Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am prepared to consider that. I am not prepared, however, to take any drastic steps in that direction until I have had an opportunity of discussing the matter with the provinces concerned. The provinces that have been referred to, Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan and Alberta have plans of their own. For instance, in Saskatchewan, I know it was the intention of the university at some time to establish a number of sub-stations to the university throughout the province. It has occurred to me that before we do anything in the way of closing any farm we should confer with those authorities, and see if they are prepared to take one or more of these institutions over and administer them. I am disposed to think, from conversations I have had with some of them, that they are not prepared just now, because their revenues are meagre, and they are trying to save money, as we are doing. Strictly speaking, educational work belongs to the provinces. That is quite right, but it has been thought advisable by the Fathers of Confederation that agricultural work should not be entirely set aside for the provinces, but that the Dominion should also participate in the educational work connected with agriculture. In Australia it is not so. There is no federal department of agriculture in Australia; all that work is done by the various states. But those who preceded me in the early days of confederation thought otherwise. I am just following in their footsteps, although I must admit it is very difficult for two governments, provincial and federal, to engage in the same work without having a certain amount of overlapping. We are all doing our very best to avoid it. I am glad to be able to say that there is splendid co-operative work between the several provinces and the Dominion. There is no jealousy or friction that I know of. Before we started new work we discussed it with them, and I think to a large extent they consulted us as to their work. But I am loath to rip into things too vigorously. We have been administering this department a comparatively short time and I should like to feel my way before beginning to tear down some of the splendid work established by my predecessors in connection with the experimental farms system. At the same time we have too many experimental farms, just as we have too many railways—not branch lines but trunk lines—and too many things in Canada for our sparse population. I am of the personal opinion that we could do with less experimental farms, but they are there and doing useful work. Shall we reduce their activities and concentrate on a smaller number, or shall we dispense with some farms where they conflict with provincial institutions of the same kind that have sprung up in recent years? That is the problem, and I have an open mind on it.

Mr. SALES: We are not asking the minister to rip into things and tear things down, and so on, but in supporting the proposal made by the hon. member for Victoria, I would ask him to consult with the ministers of agriculture, for instance, of the several provinces, the heads of the agricultural colleges, and such men as Dean Rutherford in Saskatoon, in an earnest endeavour to avoid all duplication and to define the fields which are best administered by the provincial officers and those best administered by the federal officers. The minister mentioned the Rosthern farm. That is 42 miles from Saskatoon. Is there a solitary experiment carried out at Rosthern which cannot be carried out with less expense at Saskatoon? In looking through the Auditor General's report, I find the Rosthern farm shows a loss of $20,752. Two years ago I raised this very point with my friend the minister. The amount that year was $26,000 I think, and he seems to be still following in the same old footsteps. I wonder how long the hon. minister will follow in those footsteps without really attempting to adjust a problem of this kind. I think a saving of $20,000 a year on one station alone is well worth making. Such work as the experimentation in rust, and research along those lines, are proper things for the Dominion government to carry on without doubt, and they can probably be carried on better by the Dominion. We all acknowledge the valuable work which is done at the experimental farm at Ottawa. The services of Dr. Saunders in the introduction of the Marquis wheat are very valuable. We have no wish to curtail that kind of thing. I refer merely to the duplication which I am sure the minister himself will acknowledge exists. I would like him to answer one question, if he will make a note of it, so that he will not forget it when he starts another speech. I refer to the introduction of new live stock from the Old Country, forty head. As one of the hon. members stated, we have been able to go to Chicago and prove the quality of our cattle and horses, our hogs and so on; has the hon. minister introduced any new breed of cattle, and what was the cost of these cattle brought over?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will try to answer the questions of the hon. member in the order in which they were asked. With respect to the Rosthern farm I have already pointed out that the outstanding reason why this farm had not been moved to some northern part of the province where none has ever existed was that it was going to cost more money to do it than it would cost to maintain it for a little while longer in its present position; we are trying to get the value of some of the institutions that are there now. You cannot salvage a farm and get very much out of it, except from the equipment and live stock. We have a fine big silo and some fine buildings there. We have small fruit gardens and nice surroundings, but you cannot salvage those to any extent. You can get some value from them in the next year or two. But to establish a new farm and move the equipment to it would make such a large additional expenditure that I do not know whether I could get it through the House.

Mr. SALES: Why not close it and save $20,000?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And move the equipment where? If we are going to do it systematically and properly, we should have a place picked out in the northern part of the province where we would have to buy the land and move the outfit.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the minister waiting for the hon. member to select a farm?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I am waiting until I can come down with sufficient money to pay the expense and get sufficient support in the House.

Mr. COOTE: How much equipment has the minister got which he could move to some other point?

Mr. MOTHERWELL We have all the usual farm equipment, the farm tools and the livestock. That is what we could move, and it is very considerable. Secondhand machinery is nearly as valuable now as new machinery.

Mr. COOTE: Would it be worth $20,000?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes it would be.

Mr. SALES: I do not see where the $20,000 comes in.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does the hon. gentleman mean that we would lose $20,000 more there than we would lose elsewhere?

Mr. SALES: I have the Auditor General's report here—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It costs that to operate the institution, and of course there is always a loss. Was there ever an experimental farm in the world conducted without a nominal money loss? We do not expect to get revenue in dollars and cents from experimental farms, but we expect to get a better system of agriculture and information of value to be spread over the entire community. I know some people think we should conduct these farms so as to have a profit. If someone will tell me how that is done, perhaps we could apply the system to some of our individual farms these days and make a profit.

Mr. SPENCE: While not actively engaged in farming, I take a deep interest in the products of the farm. I should like to know whether we are getting value for our money or not. It seems that each and every minister of every department, and every deputy minister as well think they should spend as much money as their predecessors regardless of whether the work is needed or not. I should like the minister to be candid with me in answering questions. I believe he is trying to do the best he can, but I want to get his candid views regardless of anybody else in the party. Is not the minister convinced that too much money is being spent on experimental farms?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, there is not, if the number of them is to be maintained.

Mr. SPENCE: Is it a paying proposition to the country to carry on these experimental farms?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, most decidedly.

Mr. SPENCE: I should like to know something about the cost of operating them and the wage bill in connection with them. What would be the annual wage bill on an average farm?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will get that. I would guess, offhand, that the cost would be three or four times as much as that of a private farm of the same size.

Mr. SPENCE: What about the one at Ottawa?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That costs more, I presume. That has to be kept constantly in shape for receiving visitors every hour of every day of the week, especially Sundays.

Mr. EVANS: I think the time has come when a change of policy should be made with regard to experimental farms. We are top heavy with certain institutions all tending towards agricultural instruction. The old experimental farms did very well in years gone by, and the one at Indian Head served the people at Saskatoon in a very efficient manner. It practically solved the difficulty further north than the real centre of Saskatchewan as the agricultural area now stands. Since then we have established an experimental farm at Saskatoon, one at Rosthern, one at Scott, and I think there is a tremendous overlapping in that line. Yet along other lines of research we have not developed at all. For instance, we know pretty well what we can raise and the best way to raise it, on all the old farms in Saskatchewan; but since the farms have grown older, problems have arisen which were not thought of years ago, and I do not think we are keeping pace with those problems. To-day, on the farms of Saskatchewan there is no product raised that can be marketed in a profitable way. Under present conditions, our dairy products, our poultry, cannot be put on the market so as to bring in anything like a price covering the cost of production. I do not think the minister was justified in discontinuing the experiment as regards chilled beef, and I should like to see more of that work carried on and less of the extension of agricultural work in the provinces.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Before we get away from this chilled beef question, I should like to say something more about it. It is one of the most important problems that we have to deal with in Canada to-day. I am just a little bit astonished that the minister gave it up after only one experiment. I have in my hand a report issued by some gentlemen who were sent over to the Old Country in 1921 by the United Grain Growers. I notice, while they are not particularly optimistic about the prospects for trade with the Old Country at the present time in chilled and frozen meats, they point out that the trade is there, and that we can have it if we will only rise to the occasion. It seems to me that that is what is needed at the present time. They state particularly that the United States packers are able to sell the most of the beef there, because they import it themselvs from the Argentine, Uruguay, and other South American countries, and they maintain selling agencies in the Old Country. It is very difficult, under the rather conservative business methods carried on in the Old Country, for a newcomer to get a foothold. But we must start somewhere, and I think Canadians are not going to admit that they are not just as shrewd business men as the Americans. I do not think they are ready to admit that they cannot go to the Old Country market and hold their own there in the chilled beef industry as well as the Americans. I am going to read an extract from this report regarding the quality of the beef. I have heard it frequently asserted and I have read it in the newspapers that Canada is not able to get in on this trade because she is not able to produce the quality of beef. The report reads:

> The truth appears to be that if Canadian chilled beef were landed in excellent condition and were to reach the hands of the dealer before being damaged by much handling or softened by the climate it would meet with a good reception on its merits, and possibly sell at a somewhat higher figure than its Argentine competitor.

They point out that there are no particular facilities for handling Canadian meat, and I presume the shipment sent over by the Department of Agriculture last year was not carefully handled. There are no proper facilities for handling the chilled beef and getting it through the ordinary selling channels. I am rather surprised to see the minister give it up and turn it down as if there was no possible chance for trade in the future. The report also points out that it will be necessary to establish a direct service between Canada and the port of London. The report continues:

> In quality Canadian chilled beef would have difficulty in steadily maintaining the standard of that from the Argentine. It has the advantage in that it is lighter and also of being at sea for only ten days as compared with twenty-one days.

Anything we might lose in quality—anl I am not prepared to admit that our beef is of any poorer quality than that of the Argentine—we would make up in the shorter time it would be at sea. I have in my hand the accounts relating to trade and navigation with the United Kingdom for 1923, and I find very illuminating figures in this report. The importations of chilled meat into the United Kingdom during 1923 totalled 7,667,000 hundredweight of 112 pounds. Of that amount, the Argentine supplied over 7,000,000 hundredweight. As regards frozen meat, importations into the United Kingdom amounted to 5,076,000 hundredweight, of which 2,721,000 hundredweight were supplied by the Argentine republic. When we come to live cattle we find that the amount shipped is very small indeed in comparison with the figures for chilled and frozen beef. I have heard it frequently asserted that the British people will not use chilled or frozen meat; they must have freshly-killed beef. These figures, however, show that an enormous quantity of chilled and frozen meat was consumed in Great Britain last year, and the consumption of this class of meat is steadily on the increase. Now it seems a rather serious thing that we are not getting any of that trade. According to the figures, the importations of chilled and frozen meat are increasing in Great Britain, and I would take it that the rather serious economic conditions which prevail there at the present time are forcing the people to buy cheaper meat. Let us analyze the situation with regard to the shipments of live meat. It takes $47 to-day to deliver a steer at Liverpool from Calgary, and figured out on the basis of the price of dressed beef delivered in Liverpool, that works out at 8 cents per pound. I do not think that the British people can afford to pay that price for meat and I do not think they will continue to buy it. We cannot look for a market for live beef in the United Kingdom, and it seems to me that this is a matter to which the minister should give his very serious attention. We have in Great Britain a High Commissioner who has, I believe, a staff of two hundred as reported in this morning's paper. A few nights ago we voted over a million dollars to provide offices for these officials, and I notice in the estimates that there is provision for $10,000 for the salary and expenses of an agricultural produce marketing agent in Great Britain. What have we an agent in Great Britain for? What have we a High Commissioner for? If we analyze our sales to the United Kingdom we find that, with the exception of grain, practically everything has dropped off, and this decline is annual. Our butter sales, I think, have dropped from 17,000,000 pounds to about 4,000,000 pounds that being the last figure for the year 1923. The same is true in regard to eggs and most other commodities. That is one respect in which I think governmental supervision is necessary; we need a selling agency to dispose of our products in the Old Country, and I hope the minister will give the matter his most serious consideration.

Mr. MILLAR: What has been the reduction in connection with the experimental farm at Indian Head? I have lived beside that farm for some twenty years and I have seen it advance from the early stages, which have been very well described here, when it served a useful purpose, until, as the farmers became acquainted with and adopted the cultural methods that were demonstrated by the institution, it gradually lost its usefulness. During the last few years the minister has adopted the method of using the farm for the production of foundation stock, and on this farm to-day there is a very large herd, in fact all that the place will accommodate, of the finest stock. Like an hon. gentleman who spoke on this subject a short time ago, I am not over optimistic about the success of this undertaking. It would seem to me, since there is the very best stock available throughout the country, that animals might be purchased more cheaply than they could be raised on an experimental farm. However, I am willing to see the minister get a fair chance to give the thing a reasonable trial. The suggestion has been made, indirectly if not explicitly, that this farm of which I speak should be scrapped. But, as it is one of the older farms, the opinion is held by some that to scrap it would mean a very great loss. Even so, it might be a wise thing to scrap it, if it is never going to be useful again. I am not yet sure, however, that the farm could not be made to serve a useful purpose. I think that if, on the older farms, efforts could be concentrated on experiments of an entirely new character instead of carrying on simply the work that every farmer around is engaged in, considerable results would be achieved. Attention could be devoted to solving the problems of the farmers which the individual cannot solve for himself. For example, experiments might be conducted in connection with the shipping of chilled beef. Then there is the rust problem. Rust has been the source of enormous losses each year, and experiments in the direction of its control would be valuable. I rather think that in the future the minister might be able to introduce experiments along that line which would be well warranted. I admit that at present this particular farm is not giving the results that should warrant the expenditure that is involved in its operation, which expenditure last year amounted to $48,-

000. But I have not yet reached the conclusion that it should be scrapped. If nothing more can be done to enhance its usefulness I may be forced in time to agree with hon. members who advocate its abandonment; but just now I cannot agree that this would be wise.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before I refer to the suggestions of my hon. friend (Mr. Millar) I will reply to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence), who asked for the wages that have been paid on the farms. We have not the figures for the past year, but if the hon. member will take a pencil and a piece of paper I will give him the figures for a typical farm, for instance, the one at Brandon. It is divided into branches, such as animal husbandry, field husbandry, and so forth.

Mr. SPENCE: It would take all day to go over the whole list.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The wages under the head of animal husbandry were $4,500.

Mr. SPENCE: I asked a fair question, namely, what was the wage bill?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not the figures for last year; these are estimates for the coming year. But the figures all relate to the same farm. If the hon. member wants the figures for last year I will take a memorandum of his request and submit them later.

5 p.m.

Mr. SPENCE: Leave the matter until the next sitting and give us the information en bloc so that we may fully understand it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You want it for last year?

Mr. SPENCE: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For all the experimental farms?

Mr. SPENCE: No, just for the one I mentioned. I want some information as to the cost of overhead and I suggest that you take the Central Experimental Farm in Ottawa.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member wants the wage bill?

Mr. SPENCE: Yes; I want to know what was paid out. Surely the department can give that information. If I were running a business and could not give the overhead cost I would stop running it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These are estimates for the coming year, but I will bring in the information later on which my hon. friend wants. If the hon. member asked for the wage bill of ten years ago he would not expect to have it right off the bat.

Mr. SPENCE: I hope the minister will not think that I want to embarrass him, but I want to get the information which I think this House is entitled to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will try to get it.

Mr. SALES: The minister has not answered my question yet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: One at a time. In reference to the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Campbell), I may say that no one was more surprised at the result of the chilled meat experiment than I was. I am running the risk of offending the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), who did not like my former efforts; but inasmuch as he is not here it will do him no harm. We shipped these three classes of meats—stores, fats, and chilled beef. The stores netted, on the basis of Saskatchewan prices, 8.58 cents a pound. The fats, killed immediately on arrival in the United Kingdom, netted 6.73 cents, or a little over 1 4/5 cents less than the stores—the same class of cattle, as near as could be humanly classified. The same class killed at Montreal and shipped as chilled beef, of the same weight, 1,200 pounds in round numbers, netted 2.96 cents, a trifle less than 3 cents a pound and a half cent more than the Argentine frozen beef. Of course there is a market in Great Britain for anything that is edible, at some kind of price. We had to enter into competition, as I say, with the Argentine frozen meat, and we got from one-half cent to a cent more for it. But we netted only 2.96 cents per pound at the point of shipment in Saskatchewan. Well, that is disappointing. I am not making a case out against it, but the experiment was made to remove the uncertainty as to whether the packers were telling the truth.

Mr. SPENCER: Why was there that big loss? Do the people who are shipping from other countries sell as cheaply as indicated by the minister's figures here?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The freight rates from Argentine may be cheaper, I do not know, but I do know that they can raise beef cheaper and that they raise it in larger quantities, in large herds, the way we used to do it in the West twenty years ago. At that time we had the very finest male animals to breed from, but the herds are now cut up into such small groups that the owners cannot afford to keep proper male animals and the result is we have not the quality of stock that we had twenty or thirty years ago. That is one reason; but the fact remains that this was chilled meat, not fresh meat. It has to be chilled for two or three days on this side before it can be shipped and by the time it gets to the other side it is twelve or fourteen days old. It is in good condition, but it is chilled meat and it does not bring the price of freshly killed meat. If our northern route via the Hudson Bay ever becomes a reality and fulfils the expectations of those who are strong believers in it, it will be a profitable route by which to ship chilled beef, because it is short and cold and will get the meat to its destination in better condition. But there is the actual result, and it was so staggering to me that I did not consider we were justified in spending at this time the additional $25,000 that was voted to continue that experiment.

With regard to the Indian Head farm, I suppose there is not a farm in the whole system that has more good work to its credit than that one. In recent years, however, owing to the number of difficulties to be contended with, the cost of operation has been exceedingly high. One reason for this is the high cost of labour and sometimes the inefficiency of labour. In addition, the shelter belts have been attacked by plant lice. Everybody in the West knows of the plant louse that attacks the box elder, the Red River maple, and so on, and its effect is such that a shelter belt which it has taken twenty-five or thirty years to grow may be destroyed so quickly that you cannot get your spraying appliances to work before the damage is done and the trees are entirely defoliated. That is also the home of brome-grass, which is a very difficult weed to eradicate, as it grows among the trees where you cannot get at it. Between the plant lice and the brome-grass the shelter belts are being killed; the trees have had to be cut down and replanted in many instances, and that costs a lot of money. Those who have ever had the contract of keeping a shelter belt in that country in good condition will know something of the almost prohibitive cost involved in connection with the operation of a section farm with a belt nearly all around it, with the fields cut up into patches of ten or fifteen acres having rows or avenues of trees around them. A lot of these trees, we believe, should be taken out. They will not rot like an ordinary tree; they start to grow up again; you have to pull them out and that costs a lot of money. But in spite of that the Indian Head farm is the surest-crop farm of the West; when we want to be certain that we shall have a proper multiplication of any new variety of seed which is developed at Ottawa we send it to the experimental farm at Indian Head. There is less loss there, less disaster, and fewer setbacks than in any other farm we have. Every farmer has experienced in his own operations another difficulty we have to face and that is the high cost and inefficiency of labour. In addition to that we have to get our chief men through the Civil Service Commission. What with farming by proxy two or three thousand miles away, getting your men through another body, it is no wonder we do not get one hundred per cent efficiency from our labour.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is the ordinary labour on the experimental farms hired through the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, by the superintendent. I was referring to the higher officials, and that, after all, is the determining factor; the success of a farm depends very largely on the efficiency of the superintendent and his assistants, who are appointed by the commission. I may say to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that I hope before long to have some change made in the organization and possibly in the personnel of the Indian Head farm that will look to a betterment in that direction. My hon. friend has said that it is not in the best condition, but there have been reasons over which even the superintendent had no control, chiefly the insect ravages to which I have referred.

Mr. MILLAR: I think the minister took me up wrongly. I do not wish to cast any reflection on the condition of the Indian Head experimental farm. I was simply pointing out that as the years went by the farmers around began to copy from the experimental farm, to work after their methods, and that in that way the farm gradually lost its usefulness.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think there is no doubt about that, and that is the reason they are drifting into the raising of live stock. They have out there the best herd of milking shorthorns that we have in our whole system, and also a number of very fine Clydesdale horses. Experiments are also being made with a view to determining a system of rotation of crops. If there is anybody in this chamber who knows of a proper working system of rotation of crops, a three, four or five year rotation, including grass—getting the grass without losing the whole year in seeding it down—and if that system has proved successful in the open prairie, I will look upon him as a public benefactor if he will disclose it to me. In this part of the country you know how the seeding down is done. Maybe your clover is seeded in the spring at this time of the year, but your timothy and other grass seeds will be sown with your grain. In the district of my hon. friend, up in Mackenzie, I think you could seed down with a grain crop for many years, and the same is true of some places in Alberta, but five years out of six, and this is according to the experience of Angus McKay, you have to seed it alone, and that is a mighty expensive undertaking. The result is that experimentation along the line of getting a proper rotation of crops, including grass, is a very important work, and we are conducting that work with the hope of being successful. There are some things we have found out already, what grass and what clovers will catch the easiest with the grain crop. Sweet clover is one of the grasses you can seed with grain with the best chance of success. Rye grass is more likely to be a success in being seeded down with grain than brome grass. These things we have discovered, but we have not yet solved the whole problem of a proper rotation. I do not know if anybody knows the solution, but if they do, we shall be glad to know it, and shall certainly make use of it.

Mr. KNOX: There is another point in connection with some of the experiments carried on at these farms that I would like to mention, and that is in connection with the feeding of cattle. I have had the opportunity of seeing the experiments carried on at Rosthern farm. At the present time they have several pens of steers there feeding. I see by the Auditor General's report that two years ago they experimented with sixty-six steers. These were bought on the open market at the stockyards. I do not know whether it was at Winnipeg or Prince Albert, but they cost laid down at the farm $2,025.42. They were fed from the beginning of the winter to the end, and the sale of beef at the end realized $5,234.18, considerably more than twice the cost of the steers. Of course, you will understand that the feed was raised on the farm, and there would be considerable cost also in regard to labour; but this is something that I think could be considered, especially at the present time when we are trying to go into the raising of beef more extensively.

While there has been considerable criticism of Rosthern being situated too near to Saskatoon, and I am quite satisfied that a mistake was made in the first place when that location was selected, because the district is very nearly the same as that surrounding Indian Head, if there is any suggestion of removing the farm, and it should not be closed up entirely, it should be taken further north, because the northern country has nothing in the shape of an experimental farm whatever. I do not think you will find a district equal to that in productiveness in the whole Dominion that has not an experimental farm situated somewhere in it, and if a change is made the farm should be located further north.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I think we are getting a little away from the text. We are dealing with an item of $1,400,000 for the experimental farms. I have always admired the work of the experimental farms. I think we have a great deal of help from them. I live in a county, in Wellington, where perhaps we had the first real test of an experimental farm operating, and I have watched the results, for after all it is by their fruits that we should judge in these things. Last August I left my own county and went up to Winnipeg, and when I arrived there about the 10th of August I could not help but remember what the Solicitor General had said in this House last year. I did not wonder at him making the speech he then made when I saw the conditions around Winnipeg, and I naturally asked myself the question, what are we doing with these experimental farms? I left the county of Wellington in Ontario, where weeds were growing thick all over the country, where cattle were being bred indiscriminately, and where, as one hon. member remarked a little while ago, the cattle were not as good as they were thirty-five years ago in that county—whether that is the fault of the experimental farm or not I do not know, but that condition exists—and when I got to Winnipeg, there right beside the market, from one thousand to fifteen hundred miles nearer the market than the points where you are establishing these experimental farms, I saw land that was dirty with weeds. Now if we cannot get the land that is right close to the market cleaned up and made fit for growing crops, why should we be building railroads two thousand miles away from the market to establish an experimental farm there? In the county of Wellington the land will produce as good crops and as profitable as the fertile plains of the West if it is handled properly, and that land is right at the market. Why is that land allowed to grow dirty and remain idle? I do not like to speak disparagingly of the experimental farms, but we are dealing with this item of $1,400,000 for experimental farms. I remember last session in this House when the item came up for the Scribe Hotel in Paris there was a good deal of debate over it, and my opinion was that Sir Henry Thornton is responsible for the management of the roads, and when we come to reckon with him we can deal with that matter. I for one did not know anything about that transaction, whether it was good or bad, but to-day we are dealing with experimental farms, and here is an item of $1,400,000 for that purpose. Cannot we reduce it without hurting anybody? I believe that is possible. I do not believe in unduly curtailing the work of the experimental farms, but as I suggested to the Minister of Agriculture last year, why not establish a farm and run it and finance it out of their own funds in each county in this country. I have talked this matter over with professors in agricultural colleges for the last thirty-five years, and they have positively refused to heed my suggestion. They cannot do it, and they will not attempt to do it. If they cannot do it and will not attempt to do it, why not cut out some of the expenditure on experimental farms so far as ordinary farming operations are concerned? I understand that at the Experimental Farm at Ottawa they have a herd of dairy cows, and I would like to know if they are paying. As far as I can gather from the reports of the general farming operations of the experimental farms, these farms have seldom if ever shown a profit. Why not curtail these expenditures if that is true, and if that herd of dairy cows is not profitable, cut it out and go on with other work. If we cut out this item it would be quite a consideration, and I think it is quite possible to do it and the farms still do work that is really worth while.

As I said before, I do not want to disparage the work the experimental farms are doing, but I do feel as some other hon. members have said, that there is overlapping at the present time, and I feel that if the work of the Dominion experimental farms was turned over to the provinces it would be better. You could give financial aid to the provinces that are not getting their share. I understand there is some complaint on the part of some of the eastern provinces. I feel that by carrying out the suggestion made we can eliminate a great deal of overlapping. There is another item in the estimates for agriculture which causes more overlapping than is necessary but I will deal with that question some other time. I merely throw out this suggestion, in common with other speakers, so that the Minister of Agriculture when he next brings down his budget to provide for the needs of agriculture may eliminate some of this unprofitable work. If the work of the experimental farms cannot be made to pay there is no use in carrying it on. If it can be made profitable then illustrations should be given in different sections of the country so that the farmers may adopt the same methods in their own farming operations. The trouble is that a prejudice against the experimental farms exists in the mind of a certain class of people. So deeply rooted is this prejudice that these people will not even read the literature which the farms send out. I should like to see work of a practical and effective nature carried on so that the farmers might be educated along really successful lines.

Mr. SALES: I wish to make a few more remarks about the Rosthern farm. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) points out the difference between the cost of certain steers and what they were sold at. There have been thirty-six men engaged as labourers at that farm at a cost of $12,784.39—that is for labour alone. In addition we have a superintendent at $3,107.35; an assistant to the superintendent at $2,085.20; a farm foreman at $1,648.25; and a stenographer and bookkeeper—I do not know what for—at $1,410.35. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Pritchard) said that we shall know these farms by the fruits which they produce. I notice that more money was spent for bulbs than for binder twine—binder twine, $69.75, bulbs from Holland, $99.42. I notice also $85 for a No. 19 Buckeye brooder and No. 5 incubator bought from some man at Qu'Appelle. I suppose they had to bring that machine from Qu'Appelle because they could not find one convenient to Rosthern. Just at that point—I do not notice any results from the brooder or the incubator; I cannot find any return for chickens or eggs. Is it any wonder that farms managed like this do not pay? Take the expenditure of $99.42 on bulbs. I like to see flowers and pretty surroundings as much as anybody, but I think it is going too far when we pay out $99 for bulbs and only $69 for binder twine. Is it not possible that the work of the farm at Rosthern can be carried on as well or better at Saskatoon? I would remind the minister of the other question of mine which he has not yet answered, regarding the importation of live stock from the Old Country—what the importation consisted of and what the cost was.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: While the figures asked for are being assembled let me answer some of the questions of my hon. friend (Mr. Sales). With regard to the purchase of bulbs. I can quite understand that perhaps more attention is being paid to horticulture now than was formerly paid. I will tell the committee this: When the question of closing the farm at Rosthern was first mooted two years ago, with the idea of moving it north, a number of very constructive suggestions were made from various quarters with respect to what disposition might be made of the farm. Among others I had suggestions from a gentleman whose name I think I might give. He is quite an active and responsible man and very much interested in horticulture.. I refer to Mr. Chipman, of the Grain Growers' Guide. He has done considerable work up in that country in connection with the dissemination of information in reference to fruits and cereals. His suggestion was that we convert that institution into a fruit farm for the purpose of demonstrating what can be done in the matter of growing fruits in the northern parts of Saskatchewan. We have not yet decided what we shall or shall not do. In the meantime we are discussing what possible use this farm can be put to, or whether we should close it up entirely. My hon. friend should understand that you cannot do these things overnight without incurring considerable loss. Before you close this farm you must have your new one selected. That is a systematic course to pursue.

Now, with regard to live stock. The animals we shipped over were largely hogs and sheep. My deputy tells me there were some cattle, and I will quote a few of the purchases from the record:

Barr, Thos. Monkton, Scot, 1 heifer, $243.33.

Mr. SALES: Shorthorn?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, an Ayrshire heifer.

Buttar, Thos. A., Coupar Angus, Scotland, 5 Shropshire rams.. .. .. $851 67
Dudgeon, A. M. Dalmeney, Scotland, 2 boars and 2 gilts.. .. .. 462 33

And the list goes on to quite a considerable extent.

Mr. SALES: If the minister would tell me what document he is quoting from I will get a copy of the report myself.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These details are to be found at page A-32 of the Auditor General's Report for 1922-3. One of the primary purposes of getting that shipment over was to introduce some new Tamworth blood among our various herds of Tamworth pigs, especially throughout Ontario and the West. This type is looked upon as an A1 bacon breed. There is a good deal of prejudice against it because of its long nose and light shoulders, but these features are not disadvantages but advantages when it comes to raising bacon hogs. In this country there has been so much inbreeding for the want of new blood by importation, that it was thought advisable to get a number of these animals over. We brought over not only hogs, but a number of sheep and cattle as well to replenish the blood of the various herds throughout Canada, surely a most proper expenditure.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I should like to follow up the questions asked by the leader of the opposition. That is in regard to the very substantial decrease in the agricultural estimates for this year as compared with last year. The leader of the opposition pointed out that there had been a decrease of, I think, $1,600,000. In connection with that decrease it seems to me one matter requires consideration, and that is the grant for agricultural education which was $1,000,000 a year, I think, for the last 10 years. I would like to ask the minister to be good enough to enunciate the reasons which prompted the government to discontinue that agricultural educational grant. It seems to me that other things might have been discontinued. I quite agree it is necessary that economy should be practised, but I do not believe this kind of economy should be practised by the government. I may be mistaken, but I am given to understand that the government adopted this policy contrary to the express recommendations of a majority of the members of this House. I am told that letters and telegrams were sent to the minister by practically every member of this House recommending a continuance of that grant, and that similar recommendations were received from all the important public bodies of this country. I think that at this stage of the history of our country we have to consider what is necessary to make it profitable or to make it possible for the people to remain in this country, instead of leaving for the United States or some other place. Much money is being spent by the government in attempting to bring immigrants to Canada. What in the world is the sense of spending money in that connection, unless immigrants are going to stay in Canada when they arrive here? What is the sense of spending hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of dollars, to make Canada a stopping place for people who desire to go to the United States? In that same connection, we cannot expect all the immigrants who come to this country to make a living in the cities, and it would not be desirable that we should endeavour to get them to go into the trades in the cities, many of which are overcrowded at the present time. There is in all the cities a certain amount of unemployment, notwithstanding the fact that so many have gone to the States and elsewhere. It is necessary, as I see it, to encourage people to go on the farms, not only to go on the farms, but to show them how they can make a decent living on those farms, and to show them how to farm scientifically; and not only that, but to show them how to sell their products scientifically, and how to go into the right lines of agriculture. I think it was a great mistake for the government to discontinue that grant. I am not speaking now altogether from a provincial standpoint or from the standpoint of the province of British Columbia, because the proportion of the grant which we got was very small indeed, I think only about $60,000 or $70,000 a year. But still, even at that figure, a great deal of good was done. I am looking at the matter from the standpoint of the whole of the Dominion, and I think that the kind of economy which prompts the government to cut out a grant in aid of agricultural education is the last kind of economy that should be practised. We have heard a great deal about economy, but if the government is going to practise economy, why not start out with matters like the Scribe hotel in Paris, and the purchase of fancy building sites in the city of London and that kind of thing?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What about the tower?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Why not start on something of that kind?

An hon. MEMBER: Or the drydock at Esquimalt.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Or on the government buildings at Ottawa. I say the last place we should try to practise economy is the place where that kind of economy is going to retard the advancement of our country. Canada, as a matter of fact, has only been scratched, and the question is, are we going to scratch it in the right way, or not? That is a matter on which the government should instruct the people of this country. The minister to-day recognizes the responsibility of the federal authorities in that connection. He stated quite candidly that the policy of this government, the same as the policy of other governments, was not to ask the provinces to undertake the whole responsibility in this connection. I would like the minister to explain the reasons why the government discontinued this grant in aid of agricultural education.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Might I suggest that that question should be better taken up at the end of the estimates, where the elimination of moneys that were in the vote last year takes place? Then it will come in order. I am afraid the Chairman would call us to order if we began discussing that question on the item for experimental farms. It can be discussed quite properly later on; although there is no vote this year, there is a place where it was voted last year. There is an item there which reads "Amount not required this year", and if my hon. friend does not object we can defer this matter as I suggest, and keep it in its proper place.

Mr. McQUARRIE: On some other occasion?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, at some other sitting. It will come up at the very last, "Appropriations not required for 1924-1925, $951,000". Will that be satisfactory?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes, if I could have some previous intimation as to when it would be called.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the Chairman will let us discuss it now I would not object. I think we have been discussing experimental farms, and I think my hon. friend had a question in connection with that. I think he repeated a question I thought I had already answered—why can we get along this year with $125,000 less than last year? Last year the vote was $200,000 more than the previous year. We had that $200,000 additional last year, and it was for some of the more pressing works that had been neglected during the war period. Having completed the more pressing works, we can relax a little, particularly as the whole Dominion of Canada is demanding economy all along the line. The cut is made in response to a demand to cut down at every point, consistent with reasonable efficiency. We had an increase last year which enabled us to put a lot of the farms on their feet—not entirely, but in some respects—especially in the Maritime provinces. Now that that has been done and the demand for economy has increased in intensity, we respond by saying that we will try to get along with $125,000 less, and we think we can do it by cutting out here and there, as we have intimated during the discussion.

Mr. GOULD: This is one of the most interesting farmers' institute meetings that I have been at for a long time. The minister has asked for suggestions, and I am sure he is quite satisfied that he has been receiving them, just the same as we are pleased to know that we have all been receiving suggestions. The thought which comes to my mind originated with the fact that, upon looking at recent maps issued by the Department of the Interior, I found here and there dotted all over the settled areas, parts of the country marked out as being best adapted for mixed farming, straight grain growing, fruit farming and various other things. That gave me the thought and idea that the provinces might better take hold of the work of experimental farms, almost in toto, with a line of demarcation between provincial and federal work. The provinces themselves might be held responsible for and given control of all activities in connection with stock. We find different breeds of stock in various parts of the country, and the provincial government themselves might better be given authority to engage in that kind of work. That would take away much of the responsibility from our Central Experimental Farm. I also believe it would give to the provinces themselves more concern in and opportunity of doing the work much better. I would illustrate that in this way, that they are nearer to the work, and we could have quicker action in endeavouring to control individuals who would be responsible for that work. If I might be allowed another word in illustration, I would add the next word in the estimates, "entomology," suggesting that the line of demarcation between the central and provincial farms might be well drawn between these two lines; that at the Central Experimental Farm, where reciprocal work with Europe and other countries could be carried on, our observatories and laboratories could be maintained, but the provinces could have control of live stock, seed, feed and such things as that. Undoubtedly our provincial officers make mistakes at times, and the thought that comes to my mind in that connection is certain advice that we received some years ago in Saskatchewan regarding conservation of moisture. The minister will remember the advice that was tendered to harrow, harrow, harrow until we were satisfied that we had harrowed enough, and then to harrow once more. Many of us followed that dictum, and the result was the majority of our mulch was crowded up on the fences, along the roads and across the prairies. The farmers, however, remedied that. Experiences taught us about as much as the Department of Agriculture. When the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) complains that the grant has been reduced, I would say that we are prepared to accept that reduction quite graciously. We can charge that to the fact that possibly the members of the minister's staff have realized that in the past there have been extravagances in connection with our experimental farms. Proof has been given from this side that such extravagances have occurred. If this decrease of $125,000 in the first item is an acknowledgement of that, we accept it with all graciousness. I contend that the item can be still further reduced and the same efficiency retained,—indeed, perhaps, with an increase in efficiency. I am sure the minister will accept the advice that has been given in good faith, and will endeavour to see if further reductions cannot be made without any sacrifice of efficiency. I would recommend that he look seriously into the question of having a line of demarcation between the work of the provincial farms and that of the Central Experimental Farm in order to prevent the overlapping which takes place and which has taken place ever since we have had experimental farms, and endeavour in this way to reduce materially the expense of carrying on all educational work and other activities in connection with agriculture.

Mr. BRETHEN: Is the grant for illustration farms included in the first item? I think there are a hundred or more.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that comes under this item. I understand the hon. member to refer to the forty-eight illustration stations. I might reply to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) by thanking him for his suggestions, because they are really constructive suggestions. To some extent I have been discussing these matters in the past two years with the provincial authorities, but they have been exceedingly shy about taking up any of this work. I am sure the House can understand why. They ask themselves: "As long as the federal government are doing this work pretty well, why should we incur the additional liability?" During the coming recess we expect to have a conference with the respective departments of agriculture of the three provinces which I have already mentioned—Alberta, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia—looking to still closer co-operation, the probable elimination of some of the work which we are doing and leaving it to the provinces. Then, possibly as time goes on, something will develop, especially in the West, so that we shall be able to get the location for the new farm and move the Rosthern farm. In Alberta, there is not very much agitation that I know of for moving the Lacombe farm. It is doing pretty good work and it is one hundred miles from Edmonton, where the nearest farm is. At the same time this will altogether depend on another year. Last year I made a statement with regard to the Agricultural Instruction Act; that what we would do with it this year would depend entirely upon the financial condition of the country and what we felt we were able to cope with. So we can live only from year to year during these times. I will promise the hon. member for Assiniboia that before anything drastic is contemplated, in fact, whether anything drastic is contemplated or not, we will confer with the respective governments of those provinces with a view to eliminating this overlapping. It is, however, unavoidable that there should be overlapping, and there always will be some as long as the two institutions are in existence.

Mr. McTAGGART: Will the minister indicate the amount of research work being carried on at experimental farms with respect to arresting the ravages of rust?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have to thank my hon. friend for asking that question, because it draws attention to one point at which we co-operate with the provincial authorities more than at any other. We have been doing research work in connection with rust in conjunction with the provincial authorities of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. We have one or two of a staff. We have a Mr. Fraser who has charge of that work at Saskatoon. We get the use of their greenhouses and plots for the purpose of carrying on that work, while we supply the man. We are doing the same work in Manitoba. We have been criticized, though not severely, for not going into that work more strongly and getting facilities of our own all along the line. That advice sounds good, but if we did do that the chances are that we should be obliged to withdraw from the other, because I do not think it would be a good idea to carry on the two concurrently—that is to say, independent work of our own and other research work, with wheats particularly—in conjunction with the provinces. That would be a double system which in my opinion would not be wise. So that up to the present our chief activities in connection with this research work have been in co-operation with the provinces, who have facilities in the way of greenhouses and so on which we have not. We have a small laboratory at Indian Head but it is more or less primitive and cannot be said to do much along that line. We are keeping close tab on similar work done in Dakota and other parts of the United States. More has been discovered regarding rust in the last ten years than was known previously, and a number of varieties of wheat have been found to be almost entirely resistent to all varieties of rust. There is one variety of cereal known as Kota which was developed on the Dakota experimental farm under the supervision of Professor Bolling and Mr. W. R. Porter, and I see by the Winnipeg newspapers that it is claimed to be 90 per cent resistent. I think that possibly they are a little enthusiastic; I do not believe that we have found a wheat that will entirely resist all the known varieties of rust, and even if we do discover such a wheat there is still a tremendous amount of work to be done, because you have to breed into that variety, in addition to resistence, the qualities that give good flour and prolific yield. Then there is the question of maturity to be considered, and all that sort of thing. It is obviously, therefore, a matter that requires a great deal of care and attention, and I should be sorry to see an end put to the work that we have been engaged in during past years in co-operation with the universities at Saskatoon and Winnipeg. The matter, I may say is in a tentative state; we have not yet decided on what lines we shall advance, but we must continue in some direction.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WHITE: Last year there was a clause in the budget, which afterwards crystallized into an act of parliament, providing for a bounty on hemp with a view to the establishment of a binder twine industry in this country. I was wondering whether the minister could give us any information as to the success of that, or whether the experimental farms were doing anything toward providing information as to the production of hemp.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Last November when I was passing through Winnipeg I had some information with regard to a certain company that was endeavouring to organize for the purpose of taking advantage of that bounty. They were on the point of being able to float their bonds, but a number of political changes occurred in the Old Country, the bond market was affected and they could not carry out their purpose. I have recently been told, however, that things look hopeful for the floating of the bonds and the establishment of a hemp industry in the vicinity of Winnipeg under the terms laid down by the bill that was passed last session. These were the factors that influenced the matter; and it was suggested further that the assistance was reduced to such a low point that the conditions were not as attractive as they might be in the matter of securing the necessary money. In the meantime we have continued to grow hemp at the various experimental farms and some retting was done at the Central farm to preserve the continuity of the experiments looking toward the establishment of an industry. In view of the amount of cordage and twine we have to import and the facility with which we can grow raw material, anything we can do to promote that industry certainly deserves our attention.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister be disposed to support an increase in the bounty for next year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It runs, I think, from year to year.

Mr. WHITE: On a gradually decreasing scale.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, gradually decreasing to almost zero. It starts at a cent and a half and reduces by a quarter of a cent until it disappears.

Mr. TOLMIE: One of our good friends to the left said during the afternoon that poultry raising did not pay in Saskatchewan. I presume he included with that poultry products. What is the experience on the experimental farms with regard to whether or not poultry pays in Saskatchewan and elsewhere?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Poultry has developed into one of the most profitable branches of farming, not only here but in other parts of Canada. During the last two years Saskatchewan has become the second largest shipper of poultry and poultry products in the Dominion, Ontario being first. In the United States the egg crop alone is worth more than the entire wheat crop of that country, showing the wonderful strides being taken in the poultry industry not only here but over the entire continent. Wherever there are facilities for taking care of the flocks, farmers and fanciers have found poultry raising very profitable. In the pioneer days the man who had not a basket of eggs and a tub of butter had very little to rely on, and now there is a good cash market for these products.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not want to permit the minister to forget this chilled and frozen meat business. I am not entirely surprised that the trial shipment made last summer was not a success. Imagine a new country starting grain growing and trying to put on the European market a trial shipment of grain without up-to-date elevators, without boats properly fitted, without proper facilities at the other end. I can quite conceive of business of that kind being handled at a distinct loss. When we ship live cattle over to the Old Country there are proper facilities for handling them and for putting them on the market, but as I understand the situation the facilities with regard to chilled and frozen meat are all owned and controlled by United States packers If we sell through them, naturally they are going to see that we do not make anything out of it. This is one of the most serious conditions that we have to face to-day, and I hope the minister will give the matter more attention and not drop it at this juncture. Perhaps he could give us some information as to this particular shipment; how it was marketed in the Old Country—because I think that is the big problem—to whom it was sold, and whether the shipments were traced right to the actual buyer. I have read that trial shipments of that kind were sold to small dealers who did not have proper facilities for keeping chilled meat. They would lose a large percentage of it and could only handle it if they allowed in the price for considerable loss. If the minister could give us some information along this line I think it would be of interest to the committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In anticipation of this matter creating a great deal of interest we issued a bulletin dealing with this shipment in detail, and I shall be glad to provide my hon. friend with a copy, because it goes into it much more exhaustively than I could.

With regard to the disposition of the meat in the Old Country we disposed of it under the most favourable conditions possible. We went on the ordinary produce exchanges and the butchers from the whole countryside were bidding for that meat in competition with the meat from other countries. We had this meat in the hands of a man who knew the business acting on our behalf to see that we got the last cent for it. I am not surprised that my hon. friend should wonder if every detail was properly looked after, because I must admit I was astonished at the difference in value of these animals when sold alive and as chilled meat. But here is a point that must be apparent to all. When you arrive with chilled meat on the British market it will be from twelve to fourteen days old, and you have to sell it very quickly whether there is a bidder or not, because it is in such a condition you are not able to keep it much longer. You have either to sell it or freeze it, and if you freeze it, it is in exactly the same class as the Argentine meat, and maybe not so good; so you have not the same chance of getting your price for chilled meat as compared with the animal that is alive. If it is a steer of the proper type and breeding that goes over there, if it goes on the pasture and puts on beef rapidly, the man who buys that animal can keep it and wait for his market. He has more to say in the value of it than one has in the case of chilled beef; because if the market does not suit him, the animal is alive and can be kept, and if it is a proper animal it will get heavier and more valuable if it is kept, whereas with chilled meat you have no choice except to sell it or freeze it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What is the difference between the price per quarter for chilled beef and fresh beef on the British market?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have already given those figures, I think. The chilled meat by the quarter brought as close as possible to fourpence halfpenny, and the fresh meat just about twice as much as eightpence.

We have distributed a great many copies of this bulletin, which goes into the minutest possible details. We could have conducted a second shipment; in fact, it was my idea to continue to remain on the market if we had money enough for three or four months to break down the prejudice against chilled meat and demonstrate to the buying public right there, even if we lost a little money, that this was a good article. But you have some contract if you are going to undertake to educate and cultivate the taste of the United Kingdom. They had a taste long before I had, and it is far better and cheaper to try and meet their taste than to undertake to change it in regard to meat or any other product. So I felt, in view of our experience and the experience of the Harris people, who had continued their shipments for two successive years and lost $30,000 per annum in the experiment, that it was hopeless to continue, because we had just repeated their experience. I had not enough money in sight to continue, and we simply did not spend any more money on it, although we had the vote of $25,000 passed last session. We simply experimented with our own cattle, and quit after that experience.

Mr. KNOX: Would not the experiment of handling only fifty carcasses be a great deal more expensive than if a much larger shipment had been made?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As a rule, volume counts, but we got a very favourable rate on this shipment. It was killed in the abattoir of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Montreal, and they gave us very favourable terms on it because they also were interested in the shipment. The shipment cost us just as much per hundred as if it had been twice as large, and when it went on the market over there it was hung up in one or two exchanges in competition with the meat from other countries and was handled as carefully as possible, because we were naturally desirous of having it make as favourable a showing as possible, and we gave it every opportunity. The three lots were divided so as to make them as nearly uniform as possible in condition and quality. I admit that you could arrive at more definite conclusions if you could continue the shipments over a year; there is no question about that. There will be a certain amount of prejudice that you will be able to remove by the continuity of your shipments of good meat, but it would take a lot of money to do that.

Another feature I might mention is that the better the meat was the more disposed the tradesmen were to pass if off as fresh-killed meat; so there was that difficulty too. Possibly, we could not prove it but some of the best of it was no doubt sold in that way. You know how these things go; the better it is the more tendency there is to palm it off as fresh-killed meat after the tradesmen have got it, but not when they are buying it.

In reply to my hon. friend's question, the meat sold for 4s. 2½d. per stone, or 12½ cents per pound, for the hind quarter, and 2s. 0½d. per stone for the fore quarter. I was more disappointed possibly than my hon. friend at the result of the shipment. I thought that because of the reduction in freight, and leaving all the offal here, we might make something, but we lost $7 per head on that, and that helped to offset anything we made on the other end.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am not entirely convinced that it is a matter of educating the taste of the United Kingdom, because the figures prove they are consuming enormous quantities of chilled meat to-day. I was glad to hear the minister refer to the possibility of some of this chilled meat having been sold as fresh meat, for that is just what I have heard. I understand that a good deal of the chilled meat was sold in that way. The figures here show that 5,076,000 British hundredweight—of 112 pounds—of chilled meat were imported and consumed in the Old Country in 1923.

I am glad to hear that the minister has issued a bulletin that will give us some information with respect to this shipment, but I am not entirely convinced that it is impossible for us to get some of this trade. I think the matter is worthy of further study, although perhaps not to the extent of wasting any considerable amount of money on it. I think we should study the possibilities of this trade very carefully. If they are able to ship large quantities from the Argentine—and they are doing this repeatedly as the figures show—I see no reason why we should not be able to do it in Canada. If there is anything lacking it probably has to do with facilities. The Argentine has the proper facilities for handling this trade. The large American packers who are making imports into England from the Argentine have their facilities already established and built up, and my opinion is that we must use the same kind of facilities to meet our competitors in that market. I am not sure whether that is correct or not, but it seems to me it is a point well worth looking into.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend, or any other hon. gentleman would like to try the experiment over again we can carry it out this year with our own cattle, I mean the experimental farm cattle. If my hon. friend would care to discuss the matter further with me I shall be quite willing to hear him. There seems to be a general feeling in favour of repeating this experiment, and we shall be in a position to do so. We shall have a lot of first class stuff ready for shipment in the course of another month or so. There is a bunch up at Rosthern that I think are exceedingly good, and there are some at the Central farm in the same category. We will make inquiries in the meantime just to see if we slipped a cog anywhere in the last experiment. If there is we shall try not to repeat the mistake. We do not like to lose $50 a steer on these farm steers; it makes a worse showing next year when we are discussing the estimates, and the returns from that particular farm will be that much less. However, since these farms are not there primarily to make a dividend or make money directly, we should not attach too much importance to that phase of the matter in the interests of the experimental farm. Therefore, I will consider the advisability of making another shipment, which I am rather disposed to favour.

Mr. TOLMIE: In connection with the chilled meat trade between Canada and the Old Country I was in England in 1921 when some private shipments were made from a Toronto abattoir to London. I accompanied the manager of the Toronto abattoir when he went down to Smithfield market for his returns, and heard his conversation with the broker down there who handled his product. At that time fresh killed beef in Great Britain was selling for about twice as much as frozen beef or chilled beef. The broker explained the small price that he had to pay him for that chilled beef by the statement that he could not be expected to sell that meat for any more than the English butcher would pay for it. It did not make any difference whether the meat came from Canada or the Argentine. If it had been put in cold storage that settled it; it was all treated as chilled or frozen beef and would only sell for the lower price. These experiments were carried on by private enterprise, as we have already said, Sir, and a loss of $36,000 per year was sustained as stated by the minister. While the government's intentions were quite good in this matter if there is any criticism I have to offer it would be that they undertook this venture with the full knowledge that it had failed already in private hands, for after all private enterprise must make the real experiment in any undertakings of the kind. From all I can learn there is no use in our endeavouring to compete with the Argentine under present conditions in the chilled beef market in London, for the reason that with their very mild climate and their low prices for labour they are able to put meat on the market at a profit for a very much lower price than Canadians can.

With regard to the experimental farm system in general, I want to say that having looked into the matter pretty well, and having an opportunity of doing so, I feel, that we have perhaps, one of the very best experimental farm systems in the world. I have heard Old Country people remark on this, visitors who were enthusiastic over what we have here. I have visited farms in Great Britain and I think there is nothing—so far as I was able to discover at least—that would compare with the Central Experimental Farm in Ottawa. If there is one thing wrong with the experimental farm system of Canada it is that the people who should use that system do not do so to anything like a sufficient degree.

With reference to the depots for breeding pure bred stock, so long as you only have the herds that are necessary to carry on your experimental work no reasonable objection can arise. But when it comes to increasing your herds to an unusual degree it produces the competition that is going to be felt by the general breeders of the country. What the minister said about selling a pure bred animal on the frontier and in this way creating an interest in pure bred stock and stimulating a market is doubtless correct. Any pure bred animal going out on the same frontier, whether produced at the experimental farms or by a private breeder will have the same effect. In the province of British Columbia we have perhaps one of the most up-to-date establishments to be found anywhere in Canada in the Colony farm. There we find that the government has a good many advantages in the way of advertising. They are able to distribute their information, the information reaches the breeders and the buyers coming into the country, and their natural inclination is to buy from a government farm simply because the purchase will have the government guarantee behind it. With few exceptions the government is able to make a much better display at exhibitions and to sell at a more reasonable price than the breeder. At the same time the system cannot be unduly extended without competing and interfering with the legitimate breeder.

Mr. BRETHEN: I quite agree with what has been said by the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) with respect to breeding depots. I think only such numbers of stock should be kept on these farms as are necessary for experimental work. I do not agree with the last speaker, however, that the breeders would fear competition from the experimental farms, because we have been given to understand that the labour costs at these farms are three or four times more than they are at the institutions of private breeders. I rather imagine that the experimental farms would suffer from competition with the private breeders.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is something in that.

Mr. BRETHEN: I believe that these breeding depots would produce at a loss and being desirous of making the best possible expenditure of public money I should not be in favour of using the farms for that purpose. I should like to draw the attention of the minister to another point and that is I believe the animals kept at an experimental farm should be of the types that are popular in the district. For instance, in Quebec there is a certain breed of dairy cattle that are very popular, and it is only proper that the stations in that province should emphasize the importance of that particular breed. If shorthorn cattle are popular in a particular district let the experimental farm concentrate on shorthorn cattle. And so throughout the whole of Canada. I believe that in that way you would have cattle that would be more useful for exhibiting the advantages of breeding, and you would have herds that would be more useful to the community to be served. Furthermore they could produce, not at a loss, but on a basis that would be profitable to the country.

Mr. STEEDSMAN: In the early part of his remarks this afternoon, the minister spoke about breeding and distribution stations. I would like to go into a discussion of that matter, but I think, looking at the items further down, that it might properly come under some other head than that of experimental farms. However, it has been touched on and if the minister would prefer that the discussion should go on under this item I am prepared to proceed. If not, I will drop it now and discuss it later.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is the proper item under which to discuss it.

Mr. STEEDSMAN: In view of the remarks of some of my colleagues, I have no doubt they will not agree with what I have to suggest. The hon. minister will remember that last fall, during his visit to the West, he was waited on in the city of Winnipeg by a group of gentlemen interested in developing new industries, particularly in Manitoba. In sections of that province, as the hon. minister is well aware, the people have come to the stage in farming operations where it will be necessary for them to make somewhat of a change. The change which is most highly recommended for those people to adopt is that of dairying. In order to go into that branch of farming they must have dairy cattle. We have no great supply of dairy cattle in western Canada. The people need these cattle now, and some of the gentlemen interested in the development of that industry made it their business to inquire where suitable dairy stock could be secured, and I think it was brought to the attention of the minister, at the meeting to which I refer, that stock of that kind could be secured at very desirable prices in the state of Wisconsin. If I am correctly informed, the minister was asked if he thought it would be desirable to have the duty removed, or the arrangement suspended, so that the duty would not be collected on a certain number of high-class dairy cattle if they were brought into that particular section of the country. I am informed that he looked upon that scheme rather favourably at the time, and agreed to take up the matter when he came back to Ottawa. I understand that he further agreed to send representatives of his department into Wisconsin to inquire into conditions there. Has that been done? If it has, who went, and what was the result? If the result was favourable to reduction in the duty, or the elimination of the duty altogether, those people might get their cattle from the nearest market and the cheapest market from which they could be supplied for that section of the country. I understand that it has been stated there is a plentiful supply of that class of stock in eastern Canada. My hon. friend will be interested in this statement. However, I am quite sure that, being opposed to protection of any nature, he would not object to the people in Manitoba—especially in the southern part of Manitoba where conditions are such that it is absolutely necessary that some other branch of the agricultural industry must be taken up with grain growing—purchasing their dairy stock in the cheapest market they can find. If the time ever comes when that particular locality becomes a dairy district, I will be an anti-protectionist even to the extent of oleomargarine. I think we should have free trade in that line. In fact, I think the minister knows that it is absolutely necessary that the people in that part of the country should not only procure their dairy stock as cheaply as possible but that they should be permitted to buy wherever they can make the purchase.

Miss MACPHAIL: The hon. Minister of Agriculture has received a very great deal of advice this afternoon, but I hope that the little bit I have to add to that already given will be patiently borne by him. We have sat all afternoon and all evening until the present hour discussing quite seriously the experimental farms, and yet in the opinion of the average farmer of Canada the experimental farms, if alluded to or thought of, are always mentioned with a sort of righteous contempt. I think that possibly the reason why the average farmer has very little to say for the experimental farm is that the experimental farms have never been made to pay, they have never put in practice the lesson they have tried to teach the farmers. It seems that it is easier for them to give advice than to carry their own teachings into practice. The experimental farms have drummed, and drummed, and drummed, on production. But our difficulty now is not a lack of production, but over-production and lack of marketing facilities. The difficulty the farmer experiences is in getting a just proportion of the selling price of his goods. The selling price of his goods is not high enough to pay him for producing those goods. I remember a suggestion that, I believe, was made in the House last year,—and I certainly heard the matter talked about outside of the House by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland)—that the strictly experimental work should come under the Industrial Research department, and the parks and all the beautiful picnic grounds should be under the Parks department, where they naturally belong. I would advise the hon. gentleman (Mr. Motherwell) to cut out the frills and the picnics. I never go out to the experimental farm in Ottawa, with all its beauty, without coming home raging angry, I think about the people who pay for that farm, who have not one shrub around their house, who have no bulbs, who have no beauty, who have not much enjoyment in life, because of the foolish things that are imposed upon them by governments, not only of the Dominion but of the provinces, counties and townships. I think, if this work of experimental farms is to go on those farms will have to turn their attention to the science of marketing farm products and not to the producing of more goods. If they would meet, without political bias, the voluntary organizations of farmers, and assist them to market their products efficiently and well, they would be doing a real service to Canada. But no, they will sit back and wait till the farmer himself, loaded down with all his handicaps, has solved his own problem, and then will come along with theories for co-operative marketing. But in this criticism I must remember to praise the federal Department of Agriculture for one thing,—they have begun co-operative marketing of eggs and have assisted the farmers in many places to get an idea of how these things should be done. If they would carry out that idea in other branches of marketing farm products, it would be very much better. I think that this item has been discussed, not only long enough but too long. We have wasted a lot of money talking about it, and I think the minister has forgotten most of what we have said, and he should, if he wishes to retain his faculties. I, therefore, move:

That item No. 40 of the Agricultural Estimates be reduced by $200,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before the vote is taken, I should like to answer a question put by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Steedsman). His recital of the circumstances in connection with the desire to import dairy cattle from the United States is substantially correct. When I was in Manitoba, I met a large deputation in Premier Bracken's office by appointment. This deputation represented the railways, the newspapers, the milk producers and several other parties, and they asked me to use my endeavours, when I came back to Ottawa, to have high-class, grade dairy cattle, permitted to enter Canada the same as pure bred cattle. I naturally was in sympathy with this idea, particularly as I knew that the people of Manitoba were ready to go into dairying and needed this so badly. But I have my limitations, especially as regards a reduction in tariffs when the House is not in session, and nothing could be done that I could see. I made inquiries into the matter, and I found that there was no such thing as a certificate of a grade animal. You have to have some way of indicating whether an animal is pure bred or not and this is done by a certificate. There is no request that, from a personal standpoint, I would have liked more to meet, especially in view of the peculiar situation of Manitoba at this time. I may say that this is a matter which we can deal with, if we like, in the coming budget. Shall we remove the duty from American farm animals, particularly dairy cattle, regardless of what they do with ours? I am hopeful that before very long our cattle will be received very much more favourably in the American market, but I do not know whether that day will be hastened by our giving away our part of the contract by letting American animals in first. I have some misgivings in that regard, although I am not a stickler on it. Sometimes things become so bad that you have to adopt a certain course regardless of what the other fellow does. We have the same suggestion as regards breeding ewes and lambs. The problem is a big one to know what you should do with regard to American grade stock. I might, however, point out that I was quite unable, as the whole cabinet would be unable, to do anything by order in council between sessions, and now that parliament has assembled, there is an embargo against these animals because of the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease in the United States. That trouble may disappear, although the disease is beginning to spread very seriously. Under present conditions, however, the problem is not capable of immediate solution.

As regards the question of investigation, I sent a competent man to Wisconsin to inquire, first, into the quality of these cattle. It was represented that you could get animals with a production of from eight to ten thousand pounds a year for a comparatively reasonable amount, running from $100 to $125 a head. My experience in life has taught me that very rarely anybody wants to sell a cow of that character. Although such cows are quite common, at the same time they are much better than the average cow and very few dairymen want to sell them. If you want to buy them, you have to give the man his price, and it is generally a good price. Our man came back and reported, and, anticipating this discussion, I have his report here. I will summarize it rather than read it. He visited Wisconsin; he visited the herds, and found that freight rates were actually not as good from Wisconsin to Manitoba as from here, because of the reduced rates given by both railways to this class of stock for transportation to the West. As regards the cattle, he found that there were no better buys in Wisconsin than in the older provinces of Canada. I noticed a report by a representative of the Milk Producers' Association—I forget the gentleman's name—who reports the very opposite. He insists that there are better purchases in Wisconsin; that you can get a bettter cow for $100 in Wisconsin than you can here. He does not say anything about freight rates being less favourable there than here. The result is that whichever report you like, you have your choice. In our report there is no desire to represent anything but the actual facts as Mr. Cook found them. He is a man well versed in freight rates and also in cattle, so he was in a good position to size the matter up. His report is too long to read; but let us say that the matter is in doubt inasmuch as our representative and the representative of the Milk Producers' Association report differently.

There is another way of starting dairying, a way that is being taught by an expert that I know of on this continent, particularly when a poor man wants to start. The idea is to begin with such animals as are within reach, of the particular type you want for breeding or milk. Buy those females, then endeavour to get a good male at the head of your herd, and breed up into something better. That may take too long, but at the same time it is not by plunging into something that is expensive that we are going to get on our feet in western Canada. Getting out of one hole to crawl into another very rarely succeeds. In the Winnipeg market, you will find you can buy five dairy type heifers for the same price that you would give for one Ontario or one Wisconsin cow. As regards freight rates, the government pays 75 per cent of the freight rates on these young females or any other live stock into the West; the railways pay 25 per cent; and the hotel bills of the buyers are also paid by the government so that you can go on to the Winnipeg market, the Calgary market, the Prince Albert market, buy an animal and ship it back into the interior without paying one dollar of transportation for the animal or the man. In view of that, I feel very strongly that a man who wants to start dairying can start in that way more cheaply and safely, particularly if a group of farmers organize, take the opportunity of forming a cattle association, and get for that particular district a male that will mate with those heifers. That is the way every experimental farm demonstrates as the most successful. The other way is to buy high-bred, expensive cattle in a southern country, where there are all kinds of modern facilities for housing the animals, where there is either good hay or good ensilage to feed them, and bring them up into a more northern climate and into the average facilities that we have for taking care of them. You will soon convert a ten-thousand-pound cow into a four-thousand-pound cow, and before you know where you are, your investment is reduced by more than 50 per cent. I am not putting this up for the purpose of giving some alternative; but the fact remains that, because of the embargo, we could not import those cattle, even if the duty were removed. We always have the other avenue available in order to start in dairying, and in my estimation those who have made the most pronounced success in dairying have started in that more modest way and have grown up in that business. I see the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) who is recognized as an authority on dairying. I have never discussed this phase of the question with him, but I feel satisfied that his general experience running over a great many years will enable him to substantiate what I have said. All the experimental farms that we have, whether you find one at Nappan or at Agassiz, show that the proper way for a man with limited means to raise a dairy herd is to start on a modest scale with the females, as I have described. When the budget comes down I think we shall find that owing to the exigencies of the country's financial situation it will be impossible for every one to have the duties reduced to the extent that he would wish.

Mr. BROWN: I want to add a few words to what has been said by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Steedsman) with regard to dairy cattle. The minister referred to the fact that a gentleman had been sent out to make an investigation in Wisconsin in connection with the dairy business, and there is no doubt that the Winnipeg District Milk Producers' Co-operative Association were not by any means satisfied with the disclosures he made in his report. The gentleman referred to by the minister is Mr. Tovell, who, I may say, is thoroughly well informed on all matters appertaining to the dairy business and is therefore competent to carry on the investigational work which he undertook. I am informed that he was sent out by the provincial government, in co-operation, I presume, with the Winnipeg District Milk Producers' Association. His report is most emphatic in support of the statement that has been made that large numbers of dairy cows can be purchased in Wisconsin and Minnesota at prices that would make their importation into Manitoba profitable if it were not for the duty. His report takes cognizance of the freight rates. Mr. Tovell also emphasizes the fact that the people of Wisconsin and Minnesota are making a special effort to cater to the trade of producing dairy cows, of which large numbers are available. Part of the report includes a map covering a number of counties in which are marked the number of dairy cows that are available, and in no instance is any county shown with a smaller number than 10,000. I see by the map that in some cases they run as high as 45,000. The minister is of the opinion that the best way to begin dairying is to buy a few heifers at the Winnipeg stock yards. I doubt the wisdom of this suggestion. It is true, perhaps, that you can begin cheaper that way, but I am satisfied that if a man is able at all to begin by buying a few first-class cows which he knows to be good, which have been tested and have a production record, or which have come from cows that have borne such a record, it would be much more satisfactory in the long run. Indeed, I question very much whether there are in the Northwest a sufficient number of dairy cows to produce the young heifers for which there would be an almost immediate demand, and I would urge strongly that the government make a note of these facts. I would seriously suggest that consideration be given to the request that these dairy cows should be admitted free of duty. We are a long way from Ontario, and while we are told that we can get cattle in Ontario and Quebec and also in the Maritime provinces, at the same time, from investigation that has been made, it would seem that, from the prices for which they can be obtained, together with the high freight rate and the effect which the long rail journey has on animals, it is much more desirable to purchase the cows from the nearest point. I think the minister should give further study to the report that has been made by Mr. Tovell. He is very much interested in the dairy business and is a man who is quite competent to form an opinion on questions of this kind. Those of us who know him are satisfied that he is very thorough when he undertakes such an investigation as he has carried out in this instance. He conscientiously devotes his abilities to finding out all that can be ascertained about these questions, and altogether I do not know of any man who is better informed on all matters relating to dairying from one end of Canada to the other.

As regards experimental farms in general, I believe, as the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) said, that we have a good system in Canada, and I believe that they have done splendid work in the past. It may possibly be true that in some cases, such as Indian Head, they seem for a time, I will not say to have outlived their usefulness, but to have reached that stage where it is necessary for them to devote their attention rather to some new phase of agriculture which was not perhaps recognized in the earlier days. I think, however, that we can offer this criticism, which has been urged again and again this afternoon, that there is too much overlapping; so that the Dominion department must institute a better method of co-operation with the provincial departments. I do not think there is any question on that point. It may be that certain lines of work can best be carried on by the provinces, and others by the Dominion. I had the privilege within the last few months of visiting two of the smaller farms, one in my own constituency, situated at Morden, and I am satisfied, from what I saw there and from what I know of the character of the young man in charge of the station, that the farm is performing a splendid service to the community. There is in my constituency, as the minister is aware, the greatest fruit-growing district in the prairies. True, the work has been to a large extent developed by private enterprise, the late Mr. Stevenson having done splendidly in that direction, and the work is now being continued not only by his sons but, as well, at the experimental station. New varieties of fruit have been developed and there is, I think, every reason to believe that from the work that is being done at that station we shall be able to supply the prairies with varieties of fruit trees which, while they will not constitute a commercial industry in those provinces, will nevertheless to a large degree enable the people of the prairies to supply their own wants. That I think is quite within the realm of possibility, and anyone who has seen what is being done there to-day must have a high appreciation of this particular line of endeavour.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The late Mr. Stevenson used to produce fruit commercially.

Mr. BROWN: Yes: I think it should be borne in mind particularly that the district is peculiarly fitted—perhaps it is better fitted than any other part of the prairies—for the production of apples. Some time I am going to follow the example set by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) and bring a sample of Manitoba apples. I also had the privilege of visiting the experimental farm at Summerland, British Columbia. I am not quite sure that all the lines of work that are being carried on there are advisable; I had some doubts as to the experiments they were making in the feeding of cattle. However, with the small opportunity I had for investigation I would not care to pronounce positively on that point. But I was very much interested in one branch of the work. They had there a pathological laboratory in charge of a young man who seemed to be the ideal type of person for carrying on that work. He is an intense enthusiast and his investigations of diseases affecting fruit, which can be carried on only in the district in which the fruit grows, will be of untold value to fruit growers of British Columbia. We cannot afford to scoff at the work that is being done by the experimental farms. Let us take it for granted that a lot of work is done that perhaps produces no immediate results. Well, plenty of work is done that does not produce any results and that cannot be said directly to pay in dollars and cents. We cannot expect that of work that is necessarily experimental. It is possible that some lines of work might be dropped; just which I would not like to say. The farms have done good service in the past, and while some readjustments may be necessary I believe they will continue to do good work. The minister would do well to take heed of many of the suggestions made this afternoon looking to an improvement of the situation in order to make the institution meet more nearly the needs of the present day, as we are satisfied it did meet the needs in the past. The Brandon experimental farm has rendered a splendid service to agriculture. It may be in the same position as the Indian Head farm; I rather think it is. And that it will perhaps have to branch out into lines of work which did not seem necessary in the early days. But I should regard it as a disaster if we should unduly handicap the work of those who are carrying on the activities of our experimental farms.

Mr. WARNER: I have some pretty clear ideas regarding these experimental farms, though they may not coincide with those of some others who have spoken. In the first place, I believe there is altogether too much overlapping in this experimental work. People do not always distinguish, however, between an experimental farm and a demonstration farm. Some of the farms in Alberta were designed to demonstrate how to make farming pay,—and in that I do not think they have succeeded as well as they might—but the experimental farm is an entirely different thing. We never expect an experimental farm to pay; you might just as well expect a laboratory in a factory to pay. It is impossible to avoid mistakes, but the mistakes that the experimental farms have made have meant more money to me than their successes. That may seem to be a queer statement, but those mistakes prevented me from doing the same thing. I have made a good many mistakes in my operations in farming and I have always found them expensive, but certainly since going to Alberta I have avoided a good many through knowing what the experimental farms have done and tried to do. I do not think the discussion here has been altogether fair; the eagerness for criticism has gone just a little too far. I have been connected with this work long enough to know something about it. I am afraid the idea is going to be held out that our experimental farms have fallen into disgrace. Personally I do not believe that that is the case. I have already admitted that I believe there has been overlapping, and perhaps there have been too many of the farms. It is a question whether we should have an experimental farm at Lacombe when there is another of the same kind at Edmonton; there is not enough variation in the climatic conditions to justify the placing of two farms so close together. But the farm at Lacombe is there, and it has been there a long while. A certain amount of experimental work is also done at the university at Edmonton. That work has been quite useful to me, as it would be to others if they would take the pains to use it. To my knowledge new varieties have been propagated through the work of the experimental farms, with resulting benefit to Canada that would be valued at thousands and even millions of dollars. I do not think that the amount of money expended is anything like as great as the value to the country of some of these experiments. We must have our experimental farms, because they are going to save the farmers a whole lot of money. They may not be carried on in the most economical or perhaps in the most intelligent way in every instance; as I have said before, mistakes are bound to be made. I do think that those in charge of the farms might well have assisted in working out a scheme to market the products that they were teaching the people to raise, and the Dominion Department of Agriculture could serve the people well by doing something in that line. The reference to chilled beef this afternoon had a bearing on that subject, and I was disappointed to hear the results of the minister's experiments with those shipments. However, when the minister got such a lick as that, and after the experience of the packing plants throughout the country, which had a very similar experience, I do not blame him for being cautious about spending more money along that line but I would like to see this matter further investigated. I think we could do better than that. We want to learn which is the best way to ship, whether in the form of chilled meat or sending the animals over alive, and I suppose we have tried both ways to find out. That is part of the work that the Dominion Department of Agriculture ought to carry on, and their mistakes will be profitable to us because we will avoid them.

Now a word along another line. I do not know that my feelings are more highly cultivated than others along the line of beautifying our homes and so forth, but I want to tell the members of this House that I do take a whole lot of pride in some efforts I have made to beautify the surroundings of my home with trees and shrubbery, and if it had not been for the guidance of the experimental farms at Lethbridge and Lacombe, I would have made a great many serious mistakes in planting this shrubbery. The farms have served me very well in that respect. I have heard talk about the Indian Head farm. I do not know much of its value in teaching the people in that neighbourhood how to conduct their operations, it may have outlived its usefulness in some respects. But I know that the people in our part of the country when they want to beautify their homes go to Indian Head to get the trees, and they are mighty glad to do it. Perhaps the farm is not making money out of the trees they are raising, but you cannot calculate the value of this work in dollars and cents. Go out through that country and look at the beautiful groves of trees that have been planted, and you will appreciate the value of the work that is being done at Indian Head in growing trees. I feel quite warm on this matter. I feel that it is worth talking about. I cannot imagine a young man going on a farm on the prairie and never planting a single shrub or tree to beautify his home. It does not take much to do it. I have been through it; I am not talking about something I know nothing about, because I have seen the time when I was building my first home, when I did not have a dollar to buy anything with, but I got it one way or another. I took a lot of pains here and there and I did a whole lot of begging, and I did not have an experimental farm in those days to go to but I beautified my home and left it there for someone else to get the benefit of. I went to Alberta, and there I had the experimental farm to help me, and it was not nearly so expensive for me to do around my home what I had done before I came to Alberta.

As to whether the experimental farms are paying, I do not think they have paid along some lines, but they have paid just as well and perhaps a little better than some experiments that I have made myself. However, I have succeeded in growing fruit trees at my home in Edmonton. I have one tree on which I had over six hundred crabs last year. I do not ever expect to make money out of growing such things as that, but the experimental farm helped me to demonstrate that I could grow crabs in that country. When it comes down to estimating in dollars and cents the value of the work they are doing, the experimental farms are not making money very probably, and we do not need to expect that, but they are helping to make Canada a better place to live in and helping the people on the prairies to have better and nicer homes, and helping us to avoid mistakes along that line. I think the experimental farms have proved a great asset to this country. We want them carried on just as economically as possible, and we do not want any more farms than we actually need. If it would pay to close down some of the farms I am perfectly willing that the minister should do it, but I want the work they are doing to be carried on extensively in the future, in order that the people may get the benefit, and if it is costing us a little money I think it is well worth while.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I listened, because I am interested, to the discussion of the free importation of grade dairy cows. I followed the minister's words as carefully as I could, but I am afraid I was left in the same mist as at the beginning. I want to know what the minister's opinion on the subject is. For a while I thought he was against it, but towards the last he intimated that he really was not against it, but that he was waging a valiant and bloody battle inside the cabinet for it but so far not successfully. What does the minister think on the subject? Is he in favour of it or against it? I understood he had given a judgment; indeed, I understood that he had given two. The first delegation that waited on him came away quite hopeful, not of a change in the law, but that the minister would get it done by order in council, by a change in the regulations, but subsequently they were notified that it could not be done at all. Will the minister tell us whether it ought to be done or whether it should not? He is Minister of Agriculture and a member of the government, and perhaps he can solve this question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was asked to permit grade dairy cattle in free. I pointed out that I had no authority to do it. I have not discussed this matter in council in full. I have discussed it with the Minister of Customs, but it has not gone any farther than that with regard to taking the duty off at that time, because we found we did not have authority to take it off. It only applied to pure bred animals. The situation now is such that you could not get them in any way if they were free, because of the embargo. If my hon. friend wants to know my personal opinion—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there an embargo on cattle from the United States coming into Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. Art thou a citizen of Canada and knowest not these things?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid my hon. friend's knowledge of the Scriptures is better than his knowledge of Canada. Is there an embargo on all cattle into Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course, there is examination, and there may be particular examination on account of the foot-and-mouth disease, but does the minister say there is an absolute embargo?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Surely. The embargo was put on first against three states because of an outbreak in California, and the two adjoining states were included in the embargo area. About a week afterwards Great Britain put an embargo on the whole of the United States, against not only cattle but hogs and sheep. Consequently, if we wanted to ship to the markets of Great Britain, we had to follow suit with respect to the United States; in other words, we were compelled to put on an embargo against the United States if we wanted to retain a market for our stockers in Great Britain. I regret very much to report, Mr. Chairman, that the latest news from California indicates that the outbreak is pretty serious, and that it has extended to two additional counties and thousands of additional head of cattle. It is therefore all the more imperative that we should keep that market good and tight until at least sixty days after the expiration of the last outbreak.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How long is it since the complete embargo was put on American cattle?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has been on about three weeks, speaking roughly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the opinion of the minister up to three weeks ago to the admission of these animals?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My opinion was—speaking personally, I cannot speak for the cabinet—that I would like to see those animals let in. At the same time I recognize there is another side to the story. I have had representations from the cattle men, the cattle growers in Manitoba vehemently objecting to it and saying "We have cattle to sell." The farmers of Manitoba and Saskatchewan say they have cattle to sell and why open the door to Wisconsin stock. That was the other side of the question. On general principles, however, speaking personally and knowing the need of Manitoba, and notwithstanding the fact that our reports indicate that when you take the freight rate into consideration, there is no better "buy" than at home, the people of that province have been under the impression that they were buying to better advantage when they bought at Wisconsin. If they are able to buy stock to advantage it means that they will go into dairying more quickly and more generally, and that is what was aimed at by the preaching of diversified farming. But if obstacles are placed in the way they say "Oh what is the use," become discouraged, and the end sought to be achieved is frustrated. Taking all things into consideration personally, as a western man, I would like to see them have access to the American market not only for dairy cattle but also for sheep anl lambs because there is considerable demand for both.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the minister means is access from the American market?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Perhaps that would be a more correct way to put it but they would need to get into that market too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister admits the raisers of dairy cattle in Manitoba are strongly against this.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says those who raise dairy cattle in Manitoba are against it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Those who have a surplus of cattle to sell, yes, because it would be interfering with their market.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have received some pretty strong protests from them myself.

Mr. FORKE: From supporters of the right hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some of them are. There are a great many more of that mind than there were. I will now watch, and I am sure the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) will watch, with interest this battle in the cabinet and we will see what happens to dairy cows when the budget comes down.

Mr. FORKE: I hesitate to take up any time by a speech, but I feel in duty bound to say something with respect to experimental farms. I do not wish to cast any reflections on the member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner), but when he was talking about his early struggles it reminded me of a Scotch story that I am going to tell the House. An old gentleman was giving advice to his son who was going forth into the world and he wanted to put the latter right. He said, "My son, mak' money. Mak' it honestly if you can, but mak' money." I do not for a moment imagine that was how the hon. member for Strathcona got along, although doubtless he was hard pressed at the commencement of his career.

In reference to the experimental farms I believe they are doing good, useful work even to-day. In saying that, I perhaps express an opinion that differs from some hon. gentlemen sitting around me. I must confess that my knowledge of these institutions is very largely confined to the Brandon farm, but I should like to acquiesce in the statement of the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), that the shortcoming which exists lies not so much in the farms themselves as in the fact that the farmers do not take advantage of what these institutions have to offer them. Last summer I visited the experimental farm twice. On both occasions there was a sort of picnic of farmers from the surrounding country. Addresses were given and visitors were conducted all over the farm, inspecting the different plots that were under crop. Now, as hon. members know, last year was one of the years when rust inflicted very serious damage on the crops in the West. At Brandon experimental farm there were probably twenty or thirty different varieties of wheat growing in different plots, and no better lesson as to the right sort of wheat to resist rust could be taught the farmers than was demonstrated at that farm. At the same time, I question if one-twentieth of the farmers know anything about the tests that are taking place. Of course, literature describing these tests is sent out, but I am afraid that literature is so voluminous in character that it defeats its own purpose. If the quantity of literature was less it would doubtless be more widely read.

In regard to the vegetables, and the other farm crops, I think a great deal of advantage can be gained by a visit to the farm at Brandon. The manager of that farm, Mr. McKilligan, is a farmer born and bred, although of course he got his education at an agricultural college. But he is an enthusiast in his work and I am sure that that farm is up to date. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) thought—maybe he did not actually say so—that it was falling behind the times, the Brandon experimental farm is an up-to-date institution and is doing good work. I want to pay a tribute to the superintendent in charge of that farm who is a good, live man and always ready to help the farmers in every way possible. Furthermore the experimental farm in Brandon has done something towards promoting co-operative marketing in eggs and poultry. I do not know whether that action is official, or otherwise, but the superintendent has taken an active part in that work and is a most energetic and praiseworthy individual.

I do not know whether the minister is entitled to all the money he is asking to carry on this work; it may be that he is asking too big a vote altogether. There was a large deputation to-day from all over the Dominion strongly urging economy, and it may be possible for the minister to get along with a little less money than he is asking for. I wanted to put myself on record on this matter. There may be too many experimental farms, but I do know that some of them are doing good work.

Mr. WILSON: I had not intended saying anything on this topic but the remarks of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) have brought me to my feet. In her speech to-night, referring to the Central Experimental Farm, she said she never visited that farm but she came back in a raging anger. I may say that I have never returned from a visit to the experimental farm in that state of mind. I have visited the farm very often and have returned feeling that I had benefited by what I had seen. It would appear from the remarks of the hon. member that she is not very conversant with floriculture or horticulture. Quite a number of my constituents are interested in both and I think we should be ill-advised to vote for the reduction of the vote for experimental farms seeing the attention that is paid there to these branches of work. There may be a certain amount of overlapping but that difficulty can be cured. I am pleased to see that the minister is putting up a larger green house at the farm and I congratulate him upon it. In such institutions the government can carry on experiments that cannot very well be undertaken by individuals. To these farms the farmers can go and obtain valuable instruction. The hon. member for Southeast Grey may sneer at the experimental farm if she chooses, but that is not the attitude adopted by the farmers in my constituency. If people are sneering, it is because they do not take advantage of what they can get by visiting the farms. Floriculture has grown in the province of Ontario to a large extent, and our horticultural societies to-day are of great benefit. I do not know any person in my constituency who is not a member of the horticultural society. We know it is a great society. It makes more beautiful homes; it makes half your home. We are told about the bulbs and shrubs at the experimental farm, and I may say to the hon. member for Southeast Grey that on application to the farm she can secure some of those without any cost. They are distributed free if you wish them, and one point that some people take exception to is that that free distribution comes in competition with the growers and dealers. But that does not occur to any great extent. My idea is that at the experimental farm we should grow the best of everything. The Department of Agriculture is in a position to buy the best of everything, and any person who visits the farm should have the opportunity of viewing the best of its kind. At some future time I should like to put on record the volume of business done even in the bulb business alone. Any person who visited the gladioli show at Guelph must have had his eyes opened. It was a wonderful show. And if we were to condemn the experimental farm, where would our Marquis wheat be? Not only the Marquis wheat, but to-day I was told, on a visit there—and I think the member for Southeast Grey might go there—that they now have a wheat which will perhaps supersede the Marquis and will be a better quality. If any person will go into the horticultural or floricultural branch under Mr. McKee, when the chrysanthemums are in bloom, and see the John R. Booth chrysanthemum, brought into being by Mr. McKee there, and practically adopted by an American, it would be a surprise to him. But these people had to come back and admit that it was a Canadian production, and to-day it is on the market under the name of the John R. Booth. Perhaps people might see the Motherwell geranium or the Tolmie geranium, if they went there. These are all experiments that are bettering conditions in this country, and I think it ill-becomes any person to cast a slur on the experimental farm. I have under my hand here the catalogue of the horticultural wizard of the United States, Burbank. If we had a Burbank in this country, would it not be an advantage to us? We have men who have made developments along the line of floriculture and horticulture, and they should be encouraged, and my only regret is that larger amounts are not placed at the disposal of the farm and the government in order to carry on experiments.

In the fruit line we have had the development of apples. The country is not interested alone in wheat, there are other things in this country besides wheat, as hon. members will know if they visit the Niagara district. It would be a good idea if some of our western friends, who perhaps have not visited that section of the country, would come there and see what is going on. In direct opposition to the hon. member who has spoken to-night, I am a protectionist, and I have a constituent who is preparing now to put out forty acres of potatoes; he has them all sprouted. This time last year his potatoes were in the ground; I expect in another day or so they will be in the ground for this year. They try to get the early varieties in order to compete with—what? To compete with the vegetables from the South. And they are handicapped—no question about it. Everything that can be done to improve conditions should be done, and it is the duty of the experimental farm to develop the earliest and best kinds of fruit and vegetables. It is a great advantage to the growers in my district to know that by using the experimental farm either at Ottawa or Guelph they can receive great benefit, the experimenting, being done at the expense of the government. I do not know if I am making a mistake, because the member for Southeast Grey started to castigate this House for taking up too much time on this item. Well, it is an item of $1,500,000 and I think the time of the House is well taken up in discussing it, because a great many things have been brought out that will be of benefit to the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada. I think the experimental farms should be encouraged. It may be that there are overlappings, but I believe they have done a great work and everything we can do in this House to encourage agriculture, floriculture and horticulture should be done.

[Mr. Wilson.]

Mr. COOTE: I agree with the last speaker that this is a very important item, and I do not know that the time taken this afternoon has been altogether wasted. It is such an important matter that I think it should be brought to the attention of the House that there are only ten members of the Conservative group which sits to our right present to-night to see that this item is properly discussed. It may not be out of place to bring to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the fact that the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) is not in his place. I believe he has been called by some of the members the official timekeeper of the House, and I think it might be wise if we would continue the discussion a little longer, as possibly the timekeeper may be here when we take the vote. We have not gained as much information in regard to experimental farms as I think we should have obtained in the length of time we have been discussing this vote. I would like to bring to the attention of the chairman and members of the committee a little item in the Auditor General's report for 1923, which will show how some of the money voted for experimental farms is expended. On page 150 of the Auditor General's report I find the following:

> Audit Office, Ottawa,
> November 6, 1923.
> Sir,—Included in the expenditure charged to experimental farms appropriation for the fiscal year 1922-23, I find a number of payments made in connection with the entertainment of excursionists, etc.
> Starting some years ago with a trifling outlay at Central Farm, Ottawa, this form of expenditure has extended to several of the branch farms, and now aggregates a considerable amount.
> During the fiscal year 1922-23, outlay of this nature at Central Farm alone amounted to $1,115.68 and at Cap Rouge, Quebec, farm, to $836.68.
> Such expenditure is not, in my opinion, properly chargeable to experimental farms appropriation, and should be incurred only after the special authority of parliament has been obtained therefor.

I would be very much obliged if the hon. minister, before we are asked to vote on this item, would tell us, if he knows, just how much has been expended for the purpose of entertaining excursionists. On page 152 of this report I find a letter from the Auditor General to the deputy minister, dated 9th November, 1923, which says:

Included in the expenditure made from live stock appropriation in the fiscal year 1922-23, I find that by cheque No. 42837 the Chateau Laurier, Ottawa, received the sum of $202 covering the cost of a "banquet on December 1, 1922, for members of the Live Stock branch."

The account is as follows:

70 dinners at $2.50.. .. .. $175

Rather expensive dinners.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not as they go now.

Mr. COOTE: Well, for farmers. Then the next item reads:

Cigars and cigarettes..	$ 17
Service..	10

I am just a little doubtful what kind of "service" that is. One of my hon. friends suggests that possibly it is liquid service. We ought to have a little more information regarding the expenditures included in this item. I hope the minister, before he asks us to vote on this question, will be good enough to tell us the amount he spent on each experimental farm last year. That will not take very long, and then the members who live near those farms will have some idea, possibly, whether the amount is being wisely expended or not.

I should like to draw the attention of the minister to one fact which has been mentioned here, but not stressed as, I think, it should be. I refer to the efforts of the Experimental Farms branch which, so far as I am aware, have been directed altogether to increasing production, and we have in Canada to-day, in a great many lines of agricultural produce, a surplus of production for the markets we have. Many authorities in the United States say that the American farmer raises too much wheat and that that is the reason why prices are so low. The Secretary of Agriculture in the Harding cabinet recently said:

Reduce the number of farmers, and the ones that are left will get more for their products.

I do not think the Minister of Agriculture whom we have in this cabinet, will agree with that, because last summer I believe he made the proud boast that Canada was now leading the world as a wheat exporter. I do not believe it is necessary for him to carry on experiments to any great extent at the present time for increasing production, particularly of wheat, because I have a little despatch from a Calgary paper which states:

On the provincial government farm at Olds last year they were able to produce 105 bushels of wheat to the acre.

The government statistics this year, I believe, state that the average yield of wheat in Alberta is 28 bushels to the acre, and I do not believe that record can be excelled by any country in the world. What the farmers need—and they do need some help—is some assistance in marketing this product. I want to quote from the Montreal Gazette of May 19 last. This statement was made by Col. Cooper, who was trade commissioner at New York during the war period. In referring to conditions in Canada, he said:

The marketing of our wheat was the crudest part of the whole foreign trade system, forcing our crop on the European market during three months, at a time when that market was flooded with wheat from all over the world, with the natural result of low prices. This meant a great deal for the industrial life of the country, because a poor price for wheat was bound to react on the purchasing price of the whole community.

I want to urge upon the minister that he should use his influence to see that there is returned to the wheat producers of the prairie provinces the amount of money which is now held by this government but which was left in their hands by the old wheat board now to be used for the purpose of assisting the farmers of the West in the formation of their wheat pools. I think he would be doing a much better service to the farmers of the West if he did that than he is in spending money to encourage them to produce more at the present time.

There is another matter which I want to bring to the attention of the minister, but I am not sure whether it is in order at this time or not. If it is not in order the minister can correct me. I have in my hand three different advertisements which were published in nearly all of the papers in Canada last year. I wish, Mr. Chairman, that I had time to read all these advertisements to you, because they are very entertaining. Each one of them winds up with the statement at the bottom in large black letters "Have faith in Canada". I believe these advertisements were accompanied by a little editorial; at least, this editorial was published in many of the papers that published the advertisements in question. One paragraph of this reads:

The farmer must remember that in the last analysis he is infinitely better off than the wage earner of the city.

I want to give the committee just a little idea of the comparison existing between what the farmer receives and what the labourer in the city receives. This is taken from the Farm and Ranch Review of Calgary, and I am sure the minister will consider it an authority. It states:

The following interesting statement bearing on this controversy—

That is of the comparison of wages on the farm and in the city.

—recently appeared in a southern exchange:

It takes 63½ dozen (762) eggs to pay a plasterer for one day of eight hour's work.

It takes 17½ bushels of wheat, or a year's receipts from an acre, to pay a bricklayer one day.

It takes 23 chickens weighing three pounds each to pay a painter for one day's work.

It takes 42 pounds of butter, or the output from ten cows, fed and milked for twenty-four hours, to pay a plumber for a day's work.

It takes a hog weighing 175 pounds, representing six months' feeding and care, to pay a carpenter for a day's work.

I would like to suggest to the minister that, instead of spending the money of the taxpayers of this country in this kind of advertisements, "Have faith in Canada," he should spend that money in endeavouring to assist the farmer to market his produce so that it will bring him a little more than it is doing to-day. A few days ago I asked the government for a return showing the amount paid by the Department of Agriculture for advertising, and I find that they paid the James Fisher Company, Limited, of Toronto, $51,290. I would like, if I am not asking the minister too many questions, if he would advise me whether that amount was not to pay for this series of advertisements. If I can go back to the contents of these advertisements again, and particularly the last statement in them: "Have faith in Canada," I want to tell the minister without any hesitation that there is no class of people in Canada that have shown their faith by their works as well as the farmers. They have never ceased production; they have produced to the limit of their ability, the limit of their credit, without any guarantee whatever that they would get for this product the cost of production. I know of no other class in Canada which is willing to do the same thing. The implement manufacturers, when they get a little intimation that possibly the duty is to be lowered on their implements, immediately run to the federal government and say: "If you take off this protection we will close up our factories and our men will all be out of work and go to the United States." The farmers that went to the United States are those who were sold out by their creditors. It was not because they voluntarily ceased producing that they went across the line, and I think it is almost an insult to the farmers for the Department of Agriculture to spend all the money they did in printing these advertisements in all the newspapers. I was discussing this matter with a farmer of Alberta. He is not in my constituency, but I am acquainted with him and I know him to be a thrifty Scotsman and a returned man.

[Mr. Coote.]

We were talking over this question of faith in Canada, because we had had the pleasure of a visit in western Canada last summer from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) who, in nearly all the speeches he made, emphasized this matter of faith in Canada This little Scotsman said to me: "Well, George, when you go back will you kindly tell the government for me that a good many of us have lived on faith for a couple of years; last year we lived mostly on hope, and now I think we have come to the stage when we shall have to live on charity." To be serious, I want to say that it is pure bunk for the Department of Agriculture to spend our good money in putting out this stuff; and if the minister wrote these articles himself, then I say it is time we had a new Minister of Agriculture. I do not like to accuse the minister of having done all the things for which his department is responsible, and so I do not charge him with the authorship of these articles. But I would suggest that if he is going to spend money in advertising he ought to advertise the produce which the farmers have to put upon the market, and should enlarge the market for the farmers, as far as he can, by means of proper advertisements. That would be reasonable; but what sense is there in spending the people's money in printing this kind of thing? The department is also spending money trying to induce the farmers to produce bacon hogs and the farmers are responding pretty well. But let me draw the attention of the minister to what happens to the hog after it leaves the farmer's hands and gets to the packer. In the year 1910 the spread per pound between live hogs and smoked bacon was 16·2 cents; in the year 1922 the spread was 30·1 cents per pound. I would suggest that the minister spend some of that $50,000, which he used in advertising, for the purpose of preventing as far as possible by some method such a spread as this, with a view to giving the farmer at least an extra cent per pound for his hog. But this big spread does not apply only to hogs.

Mr. SPENCE: What is the spread to-day?

Mr. COOTE: I am sorry I have not the figures.

Mr. SPENCE: These statements are misleading.

Mr. COOTE: I have been quoting an article in the Grain Growers' Guide and the figures I have given are for 1922.

Mr. SPENCE: You can buy the best bacon to-day for 25 cents, so that there cannot be a spread of 30 cents between the prices of the hog and the bacon.

Mr. COOTE: I have bought several pounds of bacon since coming to Ottawa and for the cheapest I have paid 35 cents and for the best 45 cents. If the hon. member can get it for 25 cents in Ottawa he might tell us where it can be procured at that price.

Mr. SPENCE: I hope hon. members will not take that seriously. I am in the foodstuffs line and I can assure the hon. member that he can buy first-class bacon at 30 cents a pound for the back, and 20 cents a pound belly. What is the use of an hon. member trying to make parliament believe he is paying 35 and 40 cents?

Mr. COOTE: I am stating a fact.

Mr. SPENCE: Your statements are all misleading.

Mr. COOTE: The House can believe the statement of the hon. member if it prefers, but I challenge him to go to the Canadian Packing Company's store on Elgin Street and get bacon for less than I have stated. If he goes there he will find that the price is as I have mentioned unless they give him a cheaper rate than they give me.

Mr. SPENCE: I will bet you a thousand dollars.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. COOTE: I have to make my living by raising wheat and hogs and I have not a thousand dollars to accept the hon. member's wager.

Mr. MARTELL: Borrow the indemnity of the hon. member for Southeast Grey.

Mr. COOTE: I think that possibly my hon. friend is under a misapprehension; I have been referring to smoked bacon. However, I suppose the hon. gentleman will immediately rise and tell me that it costs a lot to smoke bacon.

Mr. SPENCE: I will not pay any attention to you at all.

Mr. COOTE: I am highly honoured. I want to draw the attention of hon. members to certain figures published in the Agricultural Gazette for the months of January and February 1924. My hon. friend need not take my word for this; he can consult the Agricultural Gazette. At page 67 the statistics appear in regard to the Canadian meat industry. I find that the number of plants in 1921 was 84, the capital invested being $58,500,000, the number of employees 9,928, salaries and so forth, $13,500,000—I will not go through the whole list because it might weary the House. However, the cost value of the animals slaughtered was $86,500,000 as compared with a sales value of $153,000,000. In other words, the value of these animals while passing through the packing houses increases from $86,500,000 to $153,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I regret having to call the hon. member to order, but I fear I shall have to rule his present discussion irrelevant. The facts which the hon. member is submitting would be in order under the item "Health of Animals," but at the present stage I am afraid they are not germane to the item under consideration.

Mr. COOTE: When we come to the proper item I shall be glad to give the facts to the minister. We have spent millions of dollars for the purpose of increasing agricultural production, we have spent very little in an endeavour to find a market for what is produced, and that is one reason why the farmers are in their present unhappy condition. The minister might very well spend a larger percentage of the money which I know he will spend—because we cannot stop him from spending it—in endeavouring to help the farmers find a profitable market for their produce, instead of indiscriminately producing more and more.

Amendment (Miss Macphail) negatived.

Mr. SPENCER: I was going to ask the minister if he would answer the questions put by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) a few minutes ago with regard to the cost of the farms individually and the cost of advertising.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member for Macleod discussed the matter in a fair and friendly way, but evidently he was labouring under a misapprehension with regard to the practice in connection with excursions to experimental farms. I only regret that there are not more excursions so that the people might see at first hand what is going on there. One of my hon. friend's confreres from Alberta—I do not want to disclose his name unless I am asked for it—came to me and asked that the excursions to the experimental farm at Scott should be restored because of the benefit that had resulted from them in the past. So you see how difficult it is to please everyone. My hon. friend thinks there should not be any expense connected with these excursions. Well, for many years there was a college at Guelph where the people gathered in thousands; indeed, I believe it is the practice yet, and a small expense was incurred for the purpose of giving a lunch to those who visited the farm.

Mr. FORKE: They only gave us hot water at Brandon.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was very modest, I know; many a time has my wrist been tired out cutting sandwiches on occasions of that kind. But the people went away just as happy as if they had got the two- or three-dollar lunch spoken of in connection with another matter.

My hon. friend referred also, as did the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), to the advertisements. Yes, my department is responsible for those, and I wrote some of them myself. We practically advertise for tenders in every case but I do not recall offhand whether we did so in this case or not. The advertising agencies are supposed to have expert display advertisers, but so far as most of this material is concerned we have to supply it ourselves. Let me tell my hon. friend quite candidly why we engaged in that advertising campaign. In this House and elsewhere there was a disposition a year ago to indulge in a whole lot of dreary talk about our country; the dirges that were sung were to me distressing. They may have been justified; I shall not enter into that—they may be justified yet to some extent. But is it discreet; is it wise? Why depress the morale of the rest of the people who want to make the best of the circumstances during these trying times? So, the primary purpose of these advertisements was to buoy up the morale of the people of Canada, particularly the agriculturists, who needed it, in all conscience, at that time. We may not have done it in the best way, but that was our purpose. The wording of the advertisement may not have been such as to satisfy my hon. friend, but his is the first adverse criticism I have heard, and I have received a good many compliments regarding it. I shall be very glad to have any suggestions as to just how this should be done if my hon. friends think they can improve upon it. I do not pretend to know it all, and I never expect to, but I did feel that at that time there was need for buoyant advertising in order to promote the prospects of a better day in agriculture and a better day all round for Canada.

When the threshing began in the fall I noticed a statement in the press that a gentleman in the West by the name of Mr. Coote had threshed 72 bushels to the acre. I do not know whether it is the same gentleman who represents the constituency of Macleod in this House: if it is I am sure he cannot have very much complaint against the threshing returns in the constituency that he represents and on his own particular farm. If it is the member for Macleod I want to congratulate him on what is almost a record outturn of wheat. The premier of the province told me that his output was 62 bushels. I am not going to take the ground that this advertisement had anything to do with that, but what with these two circumstances my hon. friend should be buoyed up considerably in the hope of a betterment in agriculture.

The question of bacon hogs was referred to by my hon. friend; that will come up again under the live stock vote. I think he suggested that I should take the packers in hand and educate them a little. Well, I think we have done that, and they are paying on the basis of quality to the extent that they never did before. We cannot afford to pay inspectors to go all around the country wherever hogs are sold and bought, but we locate them at the packing plants. I want to give my predecessor the credit that is coming to him in connection with our present grading system. I think it is one of the most advanced systems of grading hogs on this continent; in fact, it is the only system of its kind. It was evolved through the joint efforts of the Department of Agriculture of that day—in the fall of 1921, I think it was,—the provincial departments of agriculture and all the breeding associations throughout Canada. In their joint wisdom they should surely work out something good, and they did. The regulations are capable of amendment; indeed, we have recently made some amendments in the light of past years' experience. It is not perfect, but it is an experiment in the direction of encouraging the breeding of better bacon hogs and bringing about payment on the basis of quality, without which you cannot get quality. You must pay a man for the trouble he goes to in producing a better bacon hog, otherwise he cannot be expected to do it.

Mr. FORKE: Is there any way of checking up the big plants and comparing what goes out with what goes in? Is there any danger that more No. 1 bacon may come out of the big plant than went in?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Possibly that is right: it is a good idea, I think, to get one phase of it going and then, when you have that, to take up the other phase. We did think of starting a system of grading bacon so that just what my hon. friend speaks of could be checked up; so that the quality of bacon would be so increased that when it went on the British market it would command a sufficiently higher price to warrant the packers in reflecting their price back to the man who raised the hog. We have not got that far, because it takes just that much more staff, and at this time we are restricting rather than expanding the staff. That, however, would be one of the next steps to be taken.

Mr. FORKE: A system which goes half way is a failure. It would be different if it went the whole way; if it were graded in and graded out it would probably be all right. But when a man has five or six hogs that he thinks are all graded No. 1, and they come out graded all the way from No. 1 to No. 4 and No. 5, it does not make him feel very happy. If they are graded in they should be graded out also.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: While we have not taken the step in the direction indicated by my hon. friend, we have a man working on this, so that when we do take a step it will be in the right direction. It is an entirely new thing; we have no precedent to guide us; we are, so to speak, making history in the matter of grading hogs alive. It is difficult, and unless it is accompanied by what my hon. friend suggests, it is not going to be entirely satisfactory, but as I say we are working on it.

The hon. member for Macleod raised a whole lot of interesting questions with regard to marketing and other matters, some of them a little out of order, but I might be excused for dealing with the question of marketing now in case I should forget it on some other occasion. We have now three or four branches that devote considerable attention to the marketing of various farm products—the Live Stock branch, the Fruit branch, and the Dairy branch. You will find further down in the estimates an item for a special representative in Great Britain to look after the marketing of farm products there.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was going to suggest that as we have worked pretty hard and have had some late nights this week, not without interest, if hon. gentlemen could see their way clear to pass this item I would move that we adjourn.

Mr. COOTE: There is one little matter I would like cleared up before the House adjourns. For the enlightenment of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) I would like to quote from the Montreal Star of today's date, under the heading of Wholesale Prices: Bacon, Windsor boneless, 39 cents per pound; breakfast, 26-29 cents per pound. You will note, Mr Chairman, that these are wholesale prices.

While I am on my feet I would like to thank the Minister of Agriculture for the kindly reference which he made to myself and to the good crop which I was fortunate enough to have. I want to say in all modesty that the crop was not due in any very great degree to my efforts but to a kindly Providence sending the right amount of rain at the right time.

I want also to say a word for the district in which I live. I am quite satisfied that I live in one of the best districts in Canada so far as production is concerned.

Mr. CARROLL: So say we all.

Mr. COOTE: We are not afraid to compare our production with the production of any district in Canada, I do not care where it is, even if it is in Nova Scotia. We can produce more wheat to the acre than possibly most districts in Canada. We can produce as good wheat as is produced anywhere in the world. Alberta this year won the championship of the world for wheat and for oats. One hon. member suggests that I call your attention to the fact that the number of Conservatives in the Chamber at the moment has dwindled to eight. If I might be permitted, I would like to draw that fact to the attention of the press representative for the Ottawa Journal. The hon. member for Parkdale says that they will soon be all out. Well, I wish them God-speed.

Now, Sir, Alberta can produce the best wheat and the best oats in the world. She has in years past produced the best rye and the best barley in the world. She has won a good many championships with her cattle. She has this year taken the premier honours so far as butter is concerned. And I think the Minister of Agriculture will agree with me in that. But in spite of all these facts the Calgary Herald, which I am sure hon. gentlemen will agree is not supposed to be a pessimistic journal, had a statement last fall in big headlines that between six and seven million acres of land were to leave the farmers' hands this year because of unpaid taxes. Now that land is not sold until the taxes are two years old, will any hon. member tell me just what is the matter with Alberta when she can produce the best crops in the world, as good cattle and as good butter as can be produced anywhere in the world, and yet these Alberta farmers cannot pay their taxes? Between six and seven million acres of land is more acreage than we had in wheat last year, our total production of wheat being 167,000,000 bushels.

As to being optimistic, which the minister has mentioned, it is said in one of the editorials which accompanied this article that some farmer in Alberta had written to Ottawa, last spring saying that it had started to rain in Alberta and the farmers were very optimistic, and that if optimism could pay their debts they would all be out of debt this year. So far as I am concerned I am not a pessimist; I would wish to be like Major Strange, the world prize wheat grower who described himself as a sane optimist, but that same Major Strange at a banquet given in his honour by the Edmonton Board of Trade said that "that man's name should be writ large in gold who could name one article the farmer in Alberta was to-day producing that could be sold at a profit." If there is one duty the Minister of Agriculture should perform it is to endeavour to right such a condition as that.

Mr. SPENCER: The Minister of Agriculture mentioned a few moments ago that a member from western Canada had approached him with regard to securing excursion rates to an experimental farm. He did not mention the name of that member, but I might say for the edification of the House that I was the member referred to, and I mention this because I have absolutely nothing to hide from the House or the country in any matter concerning which I approached the minister either on the floor of this House or privately by letter.

The experimental farm to which I recommended an excursion should be run is at Scott, Saskatchewan. This farm is doing some excellent work, but I have discovered during the last few years that the farmers are going there in very small numbers, mainly because of the cost in time and money. A transcontinental train runs from the West down toward Scott which they could take, and spend most of the day at the farm, and then take the night train back, and I recommended that excursion rates should be given which would make it possible for a very large number of people to take advantage of the experimental farm at that point. This could be done, I believe, to the advantage not only of the farmers themselves, but of the farm and also the railway company, and it was for that reason that I recommended to the Minister of Agriculture that there should be excursion rates at least once or twice a year to that experimental farm.

Mr. JELLIFF: It has been asked to-night how much money was spent on each experimental farm. If I remember aright something like $47,000 was spent on the Lethbridge experimental farm in my district last year, and I want to say that I do not believe there is any way in which such a sum could be expended to better advantage. My only regret is that this amount was not doubled. I do not think we should underestimate the immense value of the work that these experimental farms are doing. I have occasionally visited the experimental farm at Lethbridge, and I know that it has been throughout its career of immense value to the district in which I live. I believe it has a greater and more valuable work still before it.

On my recent visit there I noticed experiments that were being conducted along the line of poultry and egg production, and I am sorry that the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) is not in his seat to hear these statements. Mr. Fairfield, of the Lethbridge experimental farm, has been taking a great interest in the matter of poultry and egg production, especially in the testing of high grade breeds of fowl. He has a special flock of Barred Rocks, from which he has derived hens that have produced at the rate of 323 eggs per year. Where you can produce a hen that will lay an egg every day in the year, except Sundays and even sometimes on Sundays, you are going some. The value of that is beyond computation. The ordinary farm fowl is doing well if she lays from 100 to 125 eggs per year. Therefore a fowl that will lay 323 eggs in the course of twelve months multiplies your yearly production by three. It will be seen that when you have accomplished such a result as that you have achieved something of immense benefit to the farm wives of this country. In that experiment alone enough revenue has been contributed to defray more than one year's expense of conducting that experimental farm.

Now take other lines of work. It was only a few years ago that we were afflicted with a plague of grasshoppers in the West, and immense damage was being done all over that country. The Dominion experimental farm sent out to us Professor Strickland who had studied fully the methods of exterminating the pest. As a result of his labours a stop was put to the ravages of the grasshoppers in the course of two or three years, and millions of dollars were saved to the farmers of western Canada. You cannot get away from the value of experiments of that kind.

Then take the crop, referred to by my hon. friend the member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) a few minutes ago which yielded 76 bushels of wheat to the acre. That was Marquis wheat which was developed as a result of tests in the experimental farms of this country. Thus we have had results of the most valuable kinds in breeding different varieties of wheat, and in raising the standard of live stock and other products of the farm, results that are greatly increasing the production and wealth of this country. I do not think we can afford to cut one dollar from the appropriation for the maintenance of these experimental farms. I am fully in favour of that appropriation and shall vote for it very heartily. There may be some substations in isolated districts that could very properly be dispensed with, but action along that line can well be left to the good judgment of the Minister of Agriculture.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Monday, March 31, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

HOME BANK

RESOLUTION REFERRED TO BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the resolution adopted by this House on Thursday, 27th March, as follows:

"That in the opinion of this House, in view of the failure of the Home Bank and of the fact that official prosecutions and inquiries have been instituted, including the royal commission which has been appointed to investigate the facts alleged in the petition represented by the depositors of the bank and the affairs of the bank generally; and considering that the evidence received and to be taken before the several tribunals will be available for consideration, the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce should be instructed to consider the provisions of the Bank Act with a view to recommending such amendments to the act as will better protect the interests of depositors generally and will prevent similar occurrences in the future; and also to consider the report of the royal commission in its bearing upon these matters and with respect to the possibility of saving the Home Bank depositors from loss."

be referred to the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce for such action as the committee may deem advisable.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This motion will require the unanimous leave of the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The motion you have read, Mr. Speaker, was made by way of amendment to a motion which appeared on the order paper under the name of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine). On Thursday night the amendment was declared carried, but I find on the order paper to-day the original motion still remaining, and with no reference made to the amendment. I do not know that I can explain it, but I presume it is because the Speaker on Thursday night, after putting the amendement, did not put the motion as amended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not hear it put. If it was put, the motion should not appear on the order paper to-day.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I do not see the motion on the order paper to which the right hon. gentleman refers. It is another resolution that is on the order paper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes, it is another one. But was the motion as amended put?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it is recorded in the Votes and Proceedings of Thursday, March 27, as appears on page 99:

And the question being put on the said amendment, it was agreed to, on the following division.

Then after the division I find this:

And the question being put on the main motion, as amended, it was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD: I would like to inquire from the Prime Minister what is the effect of referring this resolution or the amended motion to the committee, whether or not the committee is supposed to reconsider the propriety of going on with this investigation. I do not quite understand the effect of the motion now made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion now made is to give effect to the amended resolution that passed this House the other evening whereby certain matters were referred to the Banking and Commerce committee. The motion has been worded in the terms of the amendment, so that everything that was included in the amendment will go to the Banking committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not looked up the Votes and Proceedings, but a reference to Hansard shows that my recollection was correct. The motion as amended does not appear as put in Hansard, page 789.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Votes and Proceedings are the official record of parliament—

Mr. MEIGHEN: So is Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and my own personal recollection of what took place that evening accords entirely with the record in the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. ROBB: May I bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to the attention of the House, that my right hon. friend himself said after the division, as will be seen by page 789 of Hansard:

Mr. Meighen: Mr. Speaker, how can there be an amendment carried to a motion that is withdrawn? The amendment is to the motion; the amendment having passed, there is no motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know; that is correct. There is no motion as originally put once an amendment passes, but there is a motion as amended, and the duty of the Speaker is to put the motion as amended, which I observed at the time was not done, and the Hansard record shows that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I quite remember my right hon. friend saying that, and we called the attention of the Speaker to it. The Speaker spoke in a rather low voice, but he said "The motion as amended is carried."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The point I drew attention to was this: The Speaker wanted to carry out the desire of the hon. member for East Calgary to have his motion withdrawn and asked for unanimous leave, just as it appears in Hansard. I said it could not now be withdrawn and gave my reasons, and there the matter closed. That evidently carried the Speaker's mind away from the point. It was only an oversight on his part, I know, and I have no objection whatever to a correction being made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think I am right in stating that the Deputy Clerk of the House went to the Speaker's chair and called his attention to the point, and then the Speaker corrected himself by saying that the motion as amended was carried.

Mr. HOCKEN: You are altogether wrong.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon). I remember the occasion distinctly, and members in this part of the House discussed at the time what would be the fate of that main motion. We argued that the main motion as amended should be put, and that is what should have been done. We waited with interest to see whether it would happen or not. It did not. It is an oversight it did not happen, but it is no use trying to bolster up the Votes and Proceedings and say it was done when it was not done.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: My distinct recollection is exactly as the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) mentions, and the reason I say this is because I think the Votes and Proceedings should be put in order if they are out of order. Hansard agrees with our understanding. I remember the discussion on this side of the House and remember speaking of the thing being out of order as the motion had not been completely put.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I see by the Votes and Proceedings that the motion as amended was agreed to.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS—INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees constituted by this House on Thursday, 27th March, instant, said committee to be composed of Messrs.: Béland, Copp, Low, Kyte, Papineau, Tolmie, Boys, Johnston, and Halbert, and that that portion of rule 10 limiting the number of members of the said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS—AGRICULTURE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the names of Messrs Duff, Kay and McBride be substituted for those of Messrs Marcil (Bagot), Boucher and Davies on the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and that the name of Mr. Davies be substituted for that of Mr. McBride on the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MONDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It would be well, I think, at this time for me to move the resolution that appears on the order paper with respect to government business, and which is as follows:

That on Monday, the 7th of April, and on subsequent Mondays to the end of the session, government Notices of Motions and government Orders shall have precedence after Questions and Notices of Motions for Production of Papers.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): This motion does not come usually so early. I suggest there is no need of it until the government is ready with its budget.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government is anxious to get on with business as rapidly as possible. I think it is desirable to give this notice at as early a date as may be convenient. Usually when a similar notice has been brought to the attention of the House there has been some exception taken to the date fixed. It would be well, if there is an exception to be taken on the present occasion, that it be taken at once. In the opinion of the government it is desirable that we should take Mondays for government work after April 7.

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): There is a notice of motion standing in my name on the order paper that we had planned to take up to-day, but the Minister of Railways is not here at present and therefore we cannot deal with it very well. I should therefore like to have some assurance from the government that an opportunity will be given for dealing with this motion at a later date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think there are one or two other motions that precede the resolution of my hon. friend, and probably the Minister of Railways will be here before his motion is reached. If it is reached, and the matter has had to be delayed on account of the absence of the Minister of Railways, the government will arrange a date for its discussion.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I feel that this is a retrograde move. It is not many weeks since the session opened, and I would suggest that Monday is really the only opportunity given here for the emergence of new ideas. Anything that is not settled upon by the government as a government measure will therefore be practically stifled if this motion is proceeded with. It seems to me that if we are going to follow the practice outlined in the resolution we are going to put a damper upon what is very necessary, particularly at this time in the history of our country. I do think the government ought to provide continued opportunity for private members to advance what they think is of interest and importance to the country. The difficulty about Wednesdays, as every hon. member knows, is that one cannot get a vote on that day if there is any opposition, and it means practically that Wednesday is of no use for the purpose of private members' resolutions except simply to ventilate ideas as far as time may permit. I want to submit that it is a movement in the wrong direction to cut off private members' days at so early a period in the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend brings forward a point which has often been discussed, namely, whether hon. members are afforded sufficient opportunity to deal with the resolutions which appear in their names. I am correct, I think, in saying that at least six times this session a complete list of resolutions appearing in the names of private members has been called, so that my hon. friend—with respect to resolutions of his that appeared on the order paper at all early in the session—has had at least six opportunities up to the present time of dealing with them. I do not think the government is unduly limiting discussion.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): I desire to present three petitions of the members and adherents of St. Columba's Church, Fairville, N. B., Greenock Church, St. Andrew's N. B., and Presbyterian Church of St. Martin's, N. B., against the incorporation of the United Church of Canada.

THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I desire to ask the Acting Minister of Finance if he is ready to give the date for the delivery of the budget yet?

Mr. ROBB: Not yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend prepared to state whether it will be next week?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure as to next week, I will try and let my hon. friend know before the end of the week.

ALBERTA MINERAL TAX ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Medicine Hat): I should like to ask the government if they have received from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or the Hudson's Bay Company, or from both, a petition asking that certain legislation passed by the Alberta legislature, known as the Mineral Tax Act, be disallowed and what action they have taken in regard thereto.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The government have received petitions from the parties mentioned by my hon. friend, and other parties asking for the disallowance of that act. The question is under consideration.

DAM ACROSS ST. LAWRENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): I should like to call the attention of the government to a despatch from New York which appears in the Montreal Standard of yesterday regarding a project for the construction of a dam across the St. Lawrence river for the development of electrical power to be supplied to New York, Boston and other large cities in the north-east. Has the government any knowledge of such project, and has any company applied for authority to develop such power?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Replying offhand I would say to my hon. friend that I am not aware of the government having received any official intimation of the matter to which he refers. I understand that the despatch itself has since been denied.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: When?

Mr. BUREAU: In this morning's papers.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This would be a proper time to ask the leader of the government whether he has yet obtained the consent of the United States government to table further correspondence in connection with the diversion of water from the upper lakes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes we have received consent and the correspondence is ready for submission. It will be tabled either to-night when the House rises or to-morrow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In that connection I hope the government will see to it that an opportunity is given for the resumption of the debate on the motion of the hon. member for North Toronto. The papers had not been tabled by the government when the debate was under way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that was agreed at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is correct. The debate was adjourned with the understanding that it would be continued after the papers were down.

POSTAL WORKERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): I should like to ask the government if they are aware of a despatch in this morning's press to the effect that the postal workers have called a strike for April 14, and if the government has taken any action to prevent such strike?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the exception of the report to which my hon. friend refers the government has no intimation as to the matter to which he refers. I may say, however, that from a reading of the despatch it would appear that the representatives of the postal employees who were present at the meeting in Toronto on Saturday were acting in accordance with instructions given them apparently several days ago, at the time the announcement was made that the bonuses would be reduced but before any intimation had gone to the employees as to the terms on which the Civil Service Commission would be asked to revise salaries. I might make it clear at this moment that the government in referring the matter of salary revision to the Civil Service Commission intimated that in its opinion should the salary revision give to any employee a salary larger than he would be in receipt of in virtue of the reduction of his bonus effected under the change, that the revision should date back to the first of the fiscal year 1924-5, beginning April 1, so that so far as the bonus was concerned that difference would be made good. I think, under these circumstances, it is hardly probable that this matter will go any further.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): In the same connection may I ask the Prime Minister: Are the instructions to the Civil Service Commission, in relation to the revision in salaries, in writing? Are they in the form of an order in council? And do they direct a revision upwards?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was an order in council passed in the matter; I think I had better lay it on the Table. I shall do so tomorrow.

PRIVATE BILLS

BURRARD INLET TUNNEL AND BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. CLARK moved the second reading of Bill 22, to amend an act respecting the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): There is a standing rule of the House that bills must be printed in both languages before they can be proceeded with. I raise that objection to this order.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: These two bills do not appear to be printed in French; for that reason I order that the two bills on the order paper of the second reading for today, Nos. 22 and 23, must stand.

Then, in answer to the latter part of the question, "If so, what conclusion was reached or policy established?"—I may say that as far as the Department of Customs and Excise is concerned, under whose control these matters come, there have been no such proposals made.

CANADA'S COAL SUPPLY

MOTION BY MR. CHURCH FOR A NATIONAL FUEL POLICY

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for Canada to have a national policy in relation to its coal supply and that no part of Canada should be left dependent on United States for such supply.

The government should immediately consider the initiation of an all British and Canadian coal supply and that such a policy is both a social and economic necessity and in the best interests of the future of Canada.

That a duty should be placed on coal from the United States to ensure an all British supply for Canada and thus afford adequate protection to coal mined and coked under the British flag.

That whereas coal is a necessity in effect equal to that of food it should therefore be carried on a preferential toll basis by the railway on the same basis as food.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion calls for a national policy for Canada in relation to its fuel supply. At the present time this country is dependent for its coal supply on the United States. If this policy is adopted, it will ensure an all-British coal supply, mined and coked under the British flag; it will preserve our own markets for our own coal products, and our own work for our own workmen. At present over $100,000,000 a year is going out of Canada for the benefit of wage-earners in the United States.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Might I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that difficulty in hearing is caused frequently by conversation in the chamber, and it is very hard for the hon. member to proceed with his speech?

Mr. CHURCH: It will provide work for thousands of men at present out of work in this country. The existing general exodus of from 25,000 to 28,000 a month from Canada is appalling. Canada has 20,000 miles of a national railway, we have our own merchant marine; and yet we are unable to develop the magnificent resources of the Maritime provinces, those great provinces which have done so much, before and since confederation, to make Canada what it is to-day, or to develop the resources of Alberta, a province which is so rich in natural resources. This motion proposes a national policy which would enable us to develop the great coal resources of those provinces and also to bring coal to Canada from Wales, so that all the coal we use in this country would be mined and coked under the British flag.

As the motion reads, the government should immediately consider the initiation of such a policy, which is both a social and economic necessity and in the best interests of the future of Canada. How are you going to get a national coal supply in Canada or to have a national policy in regard to Canada's coal supply, unless you adopt the basic principles of a national policy, namely a tariff to protect your own industry, the coal industry in this country, from coast to coast, to preserve your own markets for your own coal and work for your own workmen? I do not say that this can be done to-day, or in a day or two, or in the twinkling of an eye, but we should work up to it in the years that are to come.

In addition to that, the coal question to-day is 95 per cent a transportation problem, and there are many sides to this problem. In this country the Railway Commission provides for a certain preferential tariff for certain products. For instance, there is the Crowsnest pass agreement, which provides for carrying certain basic products at preferential rates from the West to the head of the lakes. There is special treatment in regard to food of all kinds. Coal to-day is just as much a necessity throughout Canada as food, because, after all is said and done, coal is a food necessity. Every article of food that appears on the table requires coal in its preparation. Besides the visible supply of coal for heating our houses, what might be called "invisible" coal is required for the generation of gas, electric light and steam in steam plants. Coal is thus, in effect, a food necessity, and for that reason it should be carried on a preferential tariff. It is so carried in the United States in many cases.

Last year this same motion was introduced in this House, not without some effect, because it led to a discussion nation-wide from coast to coast, and especially in the Maritime provinces and the great western provinces as to the appalling state of affairs and the danger the people of Canada faced in not utilising their own coal reserves. It was pointed out that they were living simply in a fool's paradise. It was stated then that Canada requires a coal supply from some other source than the United States, because Canada's dependence on the United States for its coal supply is not only a national humiliation, but a national danger. It is the duty of this parliament to take warning and to seek out some other arrangement, namely by utilising our own coal reserves. We have a national policy as regards food and clothing, and we should have a national policy as regards our coal supplies.

The question of the distribution on an equitable basis of the coal supplies of the world is one of the most pressing problems of mankind to-day, and it must be considered and dealt with in an efficient manner. This problem has been increasing in importance every year, and undoubtedly the present situation developed largely during the war when there was a scarcity of coal the world over. Every country is suffering to-day from a shortage of coal, especially Europe and the South American people. The future industrial development and the well-being of the people of the world depend as much upon an adequate supply of fuel as upon a steady supply of food. This opinion is endorsed by Mr. Herbert Hoover, the present Secretary of the Interior, in the United States government. Indeed, he declares that the civilization of Europe now rests in the hands of the coal miners to an equal degree as it does with the producers of food, if not more so; and he contends that only an adequate production of fuel will save Europe from disaster. I do not intend to go into the question of the fuel supply. Like the financial situation, it is a matter of interlocking and international interests; the fuel supply is interrelated as between the various countries in the same way as financial interests are interlocked. The geologists of the Conservation Commission of the United States have expressed the opinion that the available coal supply in that country will actually have been exhausted within a comparatively short period, and there are frequent complaints in Washington against the shipment of coal out of that country into Canada. So that, sooner or later, there is sure to be put into force an embargo against the export of coal from the United States into Canada and other countries. This probability has been pointed out by Sir Henry Thornton, the President of the Canadian National Railways. Speaking at Edmonton quite recently Sir Henry stated:

> It is essential that the railway companies, by proper service and by such assistance as lies within their power, should do all that they can to assist in mineral development and extend the selling radius of the coal and other minerals which lie in the West. Certainly it is better and wiser for the people of Canada and the people of Ontario to buy their coal from their own people than to purchase that coal from their neighbour to the south. Because, apart from the sending out of the country each year a large amount of money, there are always embarrassing questions arising with reference to the export of coal from the United States whenever there happens to be a coal shortage in this country. One of those embarrassing questions is being discussed at the present time. I hope the day will come, and the Canadian National Railways will leave nothing undone to hasten that day, when the people of Canada will not be dependent on the United States for their coal supply, except to a very limited extent.

Sir Clifford Sifton said the other day in Ottawa at a dinner of the Conservation Commission:

> We will live to see every pound of American anthracite driven out of Canada. It will mean $100,000,000 a year to Canada.

And Dr. Frank D. Adams, Dean of the Faculty of Applied Science of McGill University, says the same thing. He declares:

> They have got us by the throat. If they chose they could freeze us to death in one winter. All of Ontario and most of Quebec now depend for their supplies on the United States.

And what does Mr. George Otis Smith, director of the Geological Department of the United States say on this question? He says that it is a menace to the United States to export every year forty per cent of their coal, and that this raw material should be preserved to the United States for the purpose of manufacturing and supplying all the nations of the world with the goods they are in need of; so that they will impose a partial if not a total restriction on the export of American coal. And the Deputy Minister of Mines in the United States says practically the same thing.

The people of Manitoba the year before last adopted the national policy in regard to the problem of their coal supply. Unable any longer to get anthracite from Pennsylvania owing to the strike and shortage they were forced to use Alberta coal, and they found it quite satisfactory. As a matter of fact, they considered it fifty per cent better than the coal they formerly got from Pennsylvania. Now, what Manitoba did in reference to her coal supply the people of Ontario and central Canada should do also. There is no reason why central Canada should not obtain a part of its coal supply from the Maritime provinces, with the assistance of the merchant marine. In my opinion the people of Ontario could very well get their coal both from the East and from the West; and what the province of Manitoba did yesterday Ontario should do to-morrow and Canada the day after. The coal supply problem is largely a matter of transportation. As was pointed out last year by the committee that investigated this matter, thousands of national cars are standing at the head of the lakes in the slack spring and summer season and while it is true that some of these cars are only wheat cars, I do not see why they could not be converted to the purposes of fuel transportation, or why a special kind of car could not be constructed to serve both purposes. Besides this, I would suggest that there be a summer rate on coal transportation. The problem of supplying the Canadian people with Canadian coal is perfectly practicable: it is purely a question of transportation. When we consider the amount of money that is paid out by the Canadian people to the United States for the coal that is imported from that country, the figures are simply appalling. Last year the total imports into Canada from the United States of this one commodity amounted to $56,000,000, this sum being paid for 12,000,000 tons of anthracite in addition to shipments of soft coal. According to a return laid upon the Table of the House last week this sum has now increased in 1923 to the astounding figure of $89,000,000. These figures can be nothing but appalling in view of the general exodus of the population from Canada. When our people are leaving the country in such large numbers, it seems to me to be a matter of the gravest concern that these stupendous amounts of money should be paid out by the Canadian people for the support of the American coal barons, who can charge anything they like and over whom this parliament has of course no control whatever. And the situation is all the more serious when we look at the unfavourable trade balance between Canada and the United States at the present time. In my opinion the position of the Canadian people in this respect is particularly humiliating, especially from the economic labour and financial standpoints.

The mayor of Buffalo and the mayor of Boston have their officers counting the cars of coal crossing to Canada. Why does the mayor of Buffalo not order his officers to count the units of Canadian electricity that go into Buffalo to keep the factories of that city from dependence on the United States coal? They regard Canada as a Lazarus, prone in the dust, the coal dust, and prostrate beside the tracks of American coal roads, waiting to pick up lumps of anthracite or bituminous fuel from United States coal cars. The United States coal barons pick pretty easy money out of the pockets of the people of Canada;—they pick it a good deal faster than Canada picks free coal off the United States freight cars.

Canada does not need to throw American coal overboard as the tea was thrown overboard in Boston harbour on a certain historic occasion. Canada does need a government that will work out a declaration of independence that would free the homes of four millions of this country's population from their present dependence on United States coal. It is true that the American people are friendly to us, but their papers are not sympathetic in reference to the coal situation. The New York Times says that it is about time that the Canadian people looked after their own coal supply. I submit that no part of the Dominion of Canada should be left dependent on the United States for its coal supply, and the only way in which we can become absolutely independent in this matter is to adopt a national policy under which the people of Canada will use coal produced under the British flag. The account is not by any means one-sided as between Canada and the United States, for the United States to-day obtains from Canada 158,000 horse-power of electrical energy which is worth between $6,000,000 and $8,000,000. This power is exported to maintain industries on the American side. Then again there is the export of pulp wood from Canada to the United States. I think there should be an embargo on pulp wood shipments from this country. The late Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) took very strong ground the other day when he supported a declaration of a national policy in respect to our pulpwood resources. He expressed himself in favour of an embargo on the export of pulpwood to ensure the manufacture of the raw material in Canada, thus providing employment for our workmen. A ten per cent export tax on pulpwood would return nearly $8,000,000 a year, and would enable the government to grant a bounty of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 towards the solution of our coal problem. I do not think such a bonus would be necessary if the railway situation were thoroughly investigated, but in the absence of such investigation a bounty of $8,000,000 to encourage coal production in the Maritime provinces, and the West and the importation of coal from Wales would solve the problem of assuring the Dominion a coal supply under the British flag. That solution cannot come too soon. It is only proper that our expenditure on fuel should be distributed within our own borders. This would not only stimulate our coal mining industry,—the beneficial effects would extend to our other industries. Certainly we should not be left to the tender mercies of foreign coal miners for our fuel supply. Labour strikes may interrupt this supply at the most critical season of the year. Therefore this is a national question and should be dealt with as such.

Another feature not to be overlooked is that sooner or later we shall lose our industrial and commercial supremacy if we continue to depend on a foreign country for our coal supply. If the United States government imposed an embargo on the export of coal, our great industrial centres in Ontario and Quebec would be paralyzed. One of the foremost authorities on political economy has recently given it as his opinion that the industrial expansion of Great Britain was not due to the adoption of Cobdenism and free trade, but to the union of coal and steel. If we develop our water powers and our coal resources we shall witness the greatest industrial expansion in the history of this country. The union of steel and white coal as well as the union of steel and bituminous coal will bring this about. Ontario and Quebec are our two coalless provinces, and any interruption in our coal supply from the south would be so serious in its consequences, not only in the home but in the factory also, that the importance of the problem would be forced on the attention of the people, and it would receive the attention which it merits. Economic reasons alone are considered in the location of factories, and unless we solve this problem of a national coal supply it is nothing more than logical that industry will leave the central provinces and go east and west so as to be close to local sources of coal. To-day American capitalists are the masters of Canada's industrial situation. There are over three and a half million men to-day out of work in free trade England. And our working men cannot get jobs here because with our low tariff we too have practically free trade, and consequently twenty-five thousand of them go to the United States every 4 p.m. month. As though this were not bad enough, we are sending $100,000,000 to the United States every year to buy their coal, although Canada is one of the richest coal countries in the world, possessing one-sixth of the world's supply. American capitalists are exploiting our timber resources, and this is apparent when we scan the directorate of the large timber and lumber companies operating in the Dominion. Now they are going into the power field as well and unless we are on our guard New York capital will soon control all our waterpowers. In a word, the American capitalists will soon have some of the title deeds of this country.

We have long deplored the failure of various governments, Dominion and provincial, to take hold of this vital question and place it on a satisfactory basis. In England one of the foremost publicists of the day, Lord Milner, has expressed himself in favour of nationalizing the coal reserves of the Mother Country, in order to get over the periodical labour troubles at the mines. Even the United States talk of controlling their natural resources coal, timber, petroleum and gas wells—and a few years ago the late President Roosevelt expressed himself on the subject in these terms:

> The people of our country are threatened by a monopoly more powerful than has been ever seen, as it affects very closely their domestic and industrial life. Our next generation will witness a shortage of those natural resources, petroleum and gas. The price of coal will be such that hydraulic power turned into electrical energy will, owing to its cost, become the prevailing factor for transport, for manufacturers, for lighting and heating our towns. Our hydraulic power alone, entirely and judiciously employed, would be adequate for the present needs of transport, industries, municipalities and private individuals. The major portion of these powers is not developed and remains the national property. It would be madness to part, without conditions, with one of our greatest resources. If we become guilty of this crime, our children will be bound to pay an annual royalty on a capitalization fixed at the highest price that the trade will stand for. They will see themselves struggling with powerful sweaters entrenched behind the doctrine of discharged rights strengthened by all means of protection that money can buy and the cunning of corporations defended by legal men. These ogres of finance will have succeeded long before then to monopolize those resources so as to be able to dictate to the people the management of their affairs and their way of existence. Public opinion will be their least worry.

[Mr. Church.]

Those words sound prophetic to-day when we consider what has become of the vast coal, timber and oil resources of the United States; they are entirely under the control of great private corporations and trusts. The same thing happened in England last year and the year before, where they have periodic strikes among the coal miners, so much so that millions of people depending on them for their coal are unable to get it. Lord Milner said with respect to nationalization of the coal industry in Great Britain:

> If, as is not unreasonable, so drastic a measure as the nationalization of all the coal mines is regarded as too great a leap in the dark, it seems a pity that the experiment should not be tried in a single coalfield sufficiently large to give it a fair chance of success.
> The eternal controversy between the advocates of private and public ownership, whether of the mines or of any other great source of national wealth is never going to be settled by abstract arguments. Why should it be impossible to submit it to the test of fact?

Lord Milner adds his opinion that the conclusion an impartial student would draw from evidence given before the Coal Industry Commission would be that the present methods of producing and distributing coal are "neither economically sound nor socially beneficent. As long as they continue unchanged" said Lord Milner, "the agitation and unrest will also continue."

In view of all this the people in this country are becoming alarmed and are wondering if the day is not far distant when the people of Canada will control the oil reserves of the western provinces of Canada and have control over the coal mines also, nationalizing these basic products and using in their transport the National railways and the merchant marine. I may say to my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan), who takes a great deal of interest in this question, as do all the members from the Maritime provinces, that we would like you all to come into Macedonia and help us in Ontario to solve this coal problem. You have magnificent resources down in the Maritime provinces, and you could bring your coal up the St. Lawrence to the cities of Ontario and on up through the Great Lakes, and the people of central Canada would welcome it. If there is one province more than another that admires the people of the Maritime provinces it is Ontario, because we appreciate what we owe in confederation and the war to the great Maritime provinces. I was very glad last year as a member of the Mines and Minerals committee to observe the activity of the members from the Maritime provinces in helping to solve this problem. With the western members they took a great deal of interest in it. I can assure the maritime members that if they will come up into Ontario and help us solve this problem they will get a right royal welcome.

I believe the ships of the merchant marine could help solve this problem. Those ships are scrapped to-day. One of them was sold not long ago for a sum requiring only a deposit of $25,000 to a private boat owner in Toronto and was put on carrying package freight between the Maritime provinces, Toronto and the head of the lakes, and in a short time it cleaned up a fabulous sum of money. During the winter months the owner took a cargo of manufactured goods from the big warehouses on Wellington street, Toronto, and had his boat go down the St. Lawrence and through the Panama canal, and it cleaned up from $45,000 to $50,000 on one trip, and on the return trip made as much again. I tried to pursuade our Harbour Commission in Toronto to utilize five or six of these ships to bring freight from the Maritime provinces and also coal up to Ontario. If they had done it, they would have made from two to three hundred per cent on the money invested, just as one private owner did. What was done by private ownership should have been done long ago by the National railways and the merchant marine, but instead, those ships are being sold and others of them are tied up doing nothing. They could have been used to bring maritime coal up to Toronto and the head of the lakes. I know that some of them cannot navigate the lakes on account of their draft. They would need their boilers and engines reconstructed perhaps for that particular class of freight, but that could be done. A great many of these ships were built at Port Arthur and Collingwood and could be so reconstructed that they could solve the coal problem between the Maritime provinces and the central provinces of Canada. Private individuals can show the way when it comes to using the ships of the merchant marine for solving this problem.

I was sorry not to hear the Minister of Railways deny a statement that was made in a debate in this House the other day that the Canadian Merchant Marine has entered into the Atlantic combine for keeping up the rates and that they sat in to fix rates with the railways. I thought the object of the merchant marine was not only to act as a feeder for the National railways, but to break up shipping combines; but instead of that they just sit in with the railways and keep up the rates. I am surprised that the merchant marine has not been used long ago to bring maritime coal up to the central provinces. The Canadian National Railways are spending millions of dollars for their own purposes. If a boat load of coal comes to Toronto from Wales the first man who is down at the dock is an agent of the Canadian National Railways, and he offers a high price for that coal instead of leaving it for the householders of Ontario. If the National Railways want coal for their railway and they use millions of dollars' worth, let them take the boats of the merchant marine which are tied up at the docks and utilize them in bringing that coal from Wales.

Ontario has no coal, and as a result we are dependent on outside sources, and on foreign nations. We are as a result at the mercy of striking miners and profiteering operators over whom we have no control. Coal shortages are sometimes due to strikes in the United States and to transportation difficulties. You will see very shortly an embargo put on coal by the United States government, either before the coming elections next fall or a little after, and Canada will be left to shift for itself. Experts say that the United States will run out of coal in thirty-five or forty years in view of the increased rate of consumption; in a few years the supply of anthracite coal will be exhausted, and we shall have to look elsewhere. Canada is spending $100,000,000 in the United States every year for coal. If that money was spent in Canada it would help our trade balance and help our transportation system. Alberta is strong on developing its own resources, just as the Maritime provinces are. We have the merchant marine and twenty thousand miles of National railways, and yet they have not solved the problem.

Summing up, Canada has one-sixth of the coal of the world. We can solve this coal problem. We have solved greater problems. Canada solved greater problems during the war. Why cannot Canadians solve our fuel problem? In conclusion, I wish to refer to the transportation feature of this question, because ninety-five per cent of the coal question is a question of transportation. Two committees of this House met last year, heard evidence and presented a report. That report has not been carried out in any particular. The Railway Commission have practically abdicated their functions under the Railway Act. They have allowed the railways to fix their own coal charges; they have never fixed a rate for Alberta coal or coal from the Maritime provinces. For that reason I wrote the following letter to the Hon. Mr. Carvell, Chairman of the Railway Commission, on October 11, 1923:

I wish to call the attention of your board to the excessive rates quoted for carrying coal from Alberta to Ontario and Central Canada by the Canadian National Railway and the discrimination in various rates quoted by this railway from time to time.

As coal is a necessity equal to food cannot your board under the Railway Act protect the public by going into this case and laying down a rate? Two select committees of the House went into this question last session and I am surprised that the Railway Commission have not long ago come to the help of the people of Central Canada by protecting them from such a camouflage rate of $9.00 per ton in train lots granted by the head of the National railways.

As I intend to raise this question again at the next session of parliament I write to find out if your board will enforce of their own volition the Railway Act against these excessive tolls.

Two or three months passed without a reply and the people of Canada were wondering whether there was any railway commission in Canada because there did not seem to be any likelihood that any adequate steps would be taken to protect them. They have been asking themselves the same question for two or three years past—whether there is really a railway commission in this country. If there is a railway commission why are not the railway companies summoned before it and compelled to cut their rates down to figures that would be in consonance with the actual costs and conditions. One would expect that the head of the National Railways of Canada would come to the assistance of the people in a matter like this which is of such urgent importance. But no, instead of coming to the people's relief Sir Henry Thornton fixes a rate and says "Here is the rate which has been laid down, it is the best I can do for you".

The reply of the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners to the letter which I addressed to him did not come until late in October. The chief commissioner then wrote as follows:

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada

Ottawa, October 26, 1923.

Dear Mr. CHURCH,—

On arriving here yesterday I found yours of the 11th, instant, which was acknowledged by my secretary. In reply I can only say that the rates on coal have been filed by the railway companies in the ordinary course of events and are presumed to be just and reasonable.

It is always open to any person to attack these or any other rates, however, according to the terms of the Railway Act; and if you wish to make an application to the board with the object of having a thorough investigation into the whole question of coal rates in Canada, the board will be only too glad to offer you every opportunity and assistance, and will provide for public hearings at as early a date as possible, at which all parties can be represented and an intelligent decision reached.

Sincerely yours,

F. B. CARVELL,
Chief Commissioner.

Unfortunately I had not time to go into this question myself, so I made representations to the government of Ontario and the city of Toronto. As to the former I got very little satisfaction until the Ferguson government came into office, when an application was made to the Railway Commission to fix more equitable rates. Their grounds for doing so were:

The provincial government alleges that the rates filed by the railway companies with the board as tariff rates for transportation of such coal are excessive, and prevent the marketing of such coal in Ontario, and that Alberta and Nova Scotia coal is essential to and should be made available at reasonable and competitive prices for domestic and manufacturing purposes in Ontario, and such use would result in the profitable extension of the coal mining industry in Alberta and Nova Scotia.

The province also claims that rates covering transportation costs at a reasonable profit can be fixed at an amount which would enable and encourage the use of Alberta and Nova Scotia coal in Ontario, based on a rate for hauling during the year and for seasonal hauling from about March 1 to September 1, from Alberta and Nova Scotia to Ontario, and rates yearly and seasonal from Alberta to Fort William.

The province ask that the railway companies be directed to answer such interrogatories, giving information, as may be submitted by the applicants.

Now, the coal problem is not a problem for the private individual or for the provinces, it is one that the Dominion government should attack. The coal operators of the United States have adopted a policy of selling coal—and much of it of an inferior quality—to Canada at the highest prices. The province of Ontario is one of the greatest markets for coal on the continent to-day and it is time the federal government acted in this matter. No government, more particularly one owning such an enormous railway mileage and a merchant marine as well, should leave this question to be pressed by the provincial authorities or even by individuals. Look at what President Coolidge in the United States did when he first assumed office. He called the officials of the railway companies and the mine owners before him at the White House in Washington, and declared that unless they reduced their rates he would submit a measure to congress to control the situation. That is the kind of leader we want in this country. That is the kind of stand we want the government of this country to take. We want a government that will say to the people "We are going to adopt a national coal supply policy and we are going to carry it out. It shall no longer be the concern of the individual to look out for their supply of coal." Sir Henry Thornton has gone up and down this country quoting one railway tariff rate here, and another tariff rate there. I should like to know if Sir Henry Thornton is the court of last resort on this question, bearing in mind that we have a Railway Commission in this country that is empowered under the Railway Act to bring into force rates that are just and reasonable in the interests of the people. It is the duty of that commission to see that there is no unfair, unjust or undue discrimination between different localities on the part of the railways, but that the law shall be enforced so as to accord equality of treatment to all. That is not being done to-day. Sir Henry Thornton declares in an interview that the railway rates are not going to be reduced. How does he know that when there has been no proper determination or hearing of the case before the Railway Commission, and no adequate inquiry into railway charges and railway operations? The people of Canada are becoming very much alarmed when they see how railway rates are advancing and they are asking themselves whether we have any railway commission in this country at all, or is Sir Henry the commission of one?

Last year, in the month of July the Railway Association of Canada—which includes the Canadian Pacific Railway company and the Canadian National Railways—in one of their weekly pamphlets gave this intimation to the public:

> Central Canada is, if course, completely dependent on the American coal fields for coal.

That is what a pamphlet sent out by the Railway Association of Canada said, with respect to our source of coal supply. They say virtually "You will have to continue getting your coal supply from the United States, and what do you propose to do about it?" That is practically what Sir Henry Thornton says. Let me quote further:

> But worse than that, she is completely dependent on heavily burdened foreign railways to get that coal into cars and to get those cars away when loaded.
> It is not just a matter of Canadians having money to pay for the coal.
> The miners may strike again. Production may fall again! American home demand may increase again! There may be no coal!
> And, even if the coal is ready to be shipped, cars to ship it in may be short next fall and winter.
> If cars are available they will have to wait for the opportunity to be loaded.
> Loaded, they may have to wait for engines to draw them away.
> On the road they will face heavy traffic movement, snow storms, snow-plugged terminals and all the difficulties of fall and winter railway operation.
> All of these factors menace Canada's fuel supply for next winter; possible mining strikes or lock-outs! Lowered production! Increased American domestic demand! Car shortage in the United States! Rail congestion! Power shortage! Snow-storms!

I ask the question now: What is this parliament going to do about this question? The discussion of this subject last session led to a nationwide consideration of the problem The debate in the House, the proceedings before the Mines and Minerals committee, and the discussion in the Senate led to the question of the coal supply being considered everywhere from coast to coast. What we want is a national coal policy that will keep in Canada $100,000,000 we are now sending out, that will provide employment for the miners of the Maritime provinces and Alberta, that will keep Canadian work for Canadian workmen, that will retain our own markets for our own fuel. I believe that is the only policy for us to adopt. I do not say that such a policy can be worked out in a day or two. We may even have to continue to pay $15 or $16 a ton for our coal for a year or two longer. But if the government seriously considers this question and applies itself to the solution of the problem a definite and clearcut Canadian national policy can be reached. If we put an embargo on the export of pulpwood and power and make the American users of newsprint and power pay for it, we shall obtain enough revenue from these sources to take care of any increase in the cost of coal and solve the problem of its transportation. In formulating such a policy we are only following in the national policy path that was traced out by Sir John Macdonald and Sir J. P. Whitney. If we do as I suggest we shall devise a policy which will be truly national and which will help to safeguard Canadian industry and Canadian homes and make us a happier people—a policy of Canada for the Canadians our own home coal markets for our own coal and our own work for our own workmen.

Mr. HANCE J. LOGAN (Cumberland): I agree with the hon. member for North Toronto that this is probably one of the most important matters that could come before the House. In view of its importance—involving as it does the economic independence of Canada and perhaps even more than that—I regret that so few members are present and, incidentally, that several members of the government are absent. In my humble opinion this matter is of supreme importance and it has many ramifications. My hon. friend has gone into many of the questions involved, and has shown the urgent need of something being done. I think it was last year, when the Americans threatened to put an embargo on American coal coming into Canada, the people of Canada had an attack of "nerves;" but the incident only brought home to us our lack of wisdom in failing to make due provision for the wants of the people and of a great many industries of this country.

What are the conditions? In the Maritime provinces, it is estimated by those who are competent to know, that we have over 9,000,000,000 tons of bituminous coal. In the western country the amount in tons of coal is not measured in millions or billions, but in trillions. And yet we brought into this country last year, to keep the people warm and to provide power for manufacturers more than 20,000,000 tons mined in the United States, produced by United States miners, hauled by United States railroads and United States vessels.

Now, having stated the amount of coal we have imported, it might be well to suggest some ideas as to what can be done. There is no use talking about things unless we do something. Well, Mr. Speaker, one matter has been solved during the last year, and that is the production of coke from the bituminous coal of Canada, particularly the bituminous coals of the Maritime provinces. It has been demonstrated by the federal Mines department that coke of an equal heat-producing quality as anthracite can be produced from our bituminous coal. It has been further demonstrated that it takes one and a half tons of our bituminous coal to produce a ton of coke. Therefore, the first proposition, to my mind for this government to get busy over is the question as to what we shall do to increase the production of coke. Does it ever occur to you that if we could eliminate the importation of 5,000,000 tons of anthracite into this country—and that is the amount which came in last year—it would mean the use in coke production of 7,500,000 tons of bituminous coal in the production of that coke? Even that alone would mean an increase in the production of coal in Canada of nearly 50 per cent. It would mean the employment of thousands of miners, and the paying out of a very large amount of money for the increased production.

There are many problems involved in the production of coke. It is an expensive operation. I am informed on good authority that to put up a proper coke plant in the city of Montreal—and by the way it is almost a necessity to build coking plants in large centres in order to dispose of the by-products such as gas, and so forth—to take care of the coke requirements of Ontario and Quebec would cost about $5,000,000. Well that is a large amount of money, but we lost last year, Mr. Speaker, in exchange alone according to figures which I will read later on in buying American coal, the sum of $2,771,262, according to the rate of exchange which has predominated in this country for the last three months. If we even took the money we are throwing away and used it to build coking plants in the country, we would have gone a long way in solving the problem. Suggestions are made that we should guarantee the bonds of a company, or companies who undertake the work, if we do not desire to make it a government operation. It is also suggested there should be a bonus paid upon the production of coke per ton. These are matters which are well worthy our consideration and the consideration of the government.

Then what is the second great problem in reference to the coal question? It is transportation. We cannot transport coal from Cape Breton to Montreal at $4.80 a ton, or from Alberta to Toronto at $12 a ton and compete with American coal in Ontario and Quebec. That is a self-evident fact. I do not agree that the customs price of coal coming into this country last year is the proper value; but the value they put on coal bituminous and run of mine coal, coming into the country from the United States last year, was $3.30 per ton.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. gentleman says that we cannot transport coal from Cape Breton at $4.80 per ton. Does that mean by water?

Mr. LOGAN: That is by rail. We cannot transport it to Montreal and compete with American coal successfully, at that rate. As I said our friends cannot transport it from Alberta at $12 a ton. But coal was transported from Nova Scotia to Montreal six years ago for $1.60 per ton.

Mr. BROWN: By rail also?

Mr. LOGAN: Yes. The rate six or seven years ago was $1.60 from Springhill, Nova Scotia to Montreal.

Mr. HOCKEN: What is it now?

Mr. LOGAN: It is about $3.60. This matter was taken up by the Mines committee last session. As my hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) knows, we called a great many persons as witnesses. We called the officials of the railroads, we called the freight officials of the Canadian National Railways and we called the Canadian Pacific officials. But we did not get very far. We made a report, I think a very good report, which was brought down to this House about the last day or two of the session. That report has not been acted upon. What was disclosed in that committee? It was disclosed in the first place that officials of the Canadian National Railways had consulted with officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway before they came near the committee. But some independent witnesses came before that committee. One was Mr. M. J. Butler, formerly Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, a man who has occupied some of the biggest positions in Canada, at one time being general manager of the Dominion Coal Company at Sydney and afterwards general manager of the Armstrong-Whitworth Company, a man now living in retirement in Ontario. He made certain statements which, I think, should be considered seriously by the government. He said, to begin with: "We must eliminate the 'know it cannot be done' type. Let us also eliminate the traffic officers who are making rates predicated upon using small cars, or weak locomotives with small trainloads, or mixed train loads with a few cars of coal to fill up the tonnage."

It is, I think, clear that the problem is one that demands that equipment from beginning to end shall be adequate to handle the traffic at the lowest possible cost. The problem, as was demonstrated last year, is one of equipment. We cannot carry coal from the Alberta mines down to Toronto, or coal from Nova Scotia to central Canada, in old, broken-down cars, with small engines, and mixed trains of that character. The only way in which we can deal with the problem, which is a national problem, is to provide equipment by which coal can be brought from Alberta and from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to the central provinces in trains built for the purpose of carrying coal. In other words, let us adopt as regards coal the same kind of transportation we have for wheat. Wheat could never be economically transported to the seaboard if you had one car filled with wheat, another filled with iron and another filled with groceries. Wheat is brought east from western Canada in solid trains.

This matter is so important that it behooves the government to get busy in regard to securing proper equipment to carry coal from the West and from the Maritime provinces to central Canada. I am not going to weary the House by going through the evidence taken before the Mines committee except to say that Mr. Butler concluded by quoting from rates paid on roads on which there is proper equipment. For instance, he cited the Virginia railway, and he was able to set before the committee that, instead of its costing $12 a ton to carry coal from Edmonton to Toronto, the actual cost, if we had the proper equipment, would not exceed $4.57. Those figures have not yet been proven to be untrue. What is to be done about this? In addressing this House a few weeks ago in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I threw out the suggestion that the government should appoint a commission; that Mr. Butler be made chairman of it; that there be on that commission one man from the East and one from the West—Mr. Butler is from central Canada—that they be allowed to visit the Virginia railway, the Chesapeake and Ohio, the Illinois Central and other railway companies that have proper equipment for carrying coal, and that carry it at such a low rate, and that they come back and show us, not what the freight tariff should be, but the actual cost of carrying coal in a properly equipped train. I again urge that that policy be adopted by the government. I am not attacking any railway officials, but naturally they want to defend the old rate paid on the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. What I want to know, what I think this House wants to know and what, I believe, this country demands to know, is the actual cost of carrying coal in Canada provided we have proper equipment for carrying it. So much for the transportation question.

Let me now hurry on to consider one or two other matters which, I think, are of some interest in reference to this coal question.

Mr. McBRIDE: What did Mr. Butler say this equipment would cost, and what would be the expense of increasing the strength of bridges in order to carry that equipment?

Mr. LOGAN: I have no statement by Mr. Butler in reference to cost of equipment. In fact, he distinctly said, in the evidence which he gave before us last year, that he did not give an estimate of the cost. There is no doubt the cost would be heavy, but the object to be attained is stupendous. We cannot go on fooling with this question. We might as well try to put out a conflagration with a garden hose as endeavour to deal with this matter with the present equipment and under the present system.

I have referred briefly to coke and to transportation. Before closing—and this will be the last part of my remarks,—I propose to deal with my good friends who often twit us in eastern Canada, particularly in Nova Scotia, with the statement that we have a wonderful protective tariff on coal. Since speaking in this House a few weeks ago, I have devoted some attention to preparing a statement in order to get the actual facts This is a statement of imports of coal entered for consumption in Canada and customs duties collected thereon during the calendar year, 1923, and I think, before I have finished, you will see that there is not a protective tariff on coal. The Fielding tariff amounted to 53 cents a ton on bituminous coal, but coal at that time was worth only $2.20 a ton, and this specific duty has remained the same ever since in spite of the increased cost of production. This statement will show we are a long way from having the tariff on coal that we had even ten or fifteen years ago. It will be observed the ad valorem rate which is given is computed on the value placed on the product by the Customs department and not the value at which it sells in Canada. The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT of Imports of Coal entered for consumption in Canada and Customs Duty collected thereon during the Calendar Year 1923

Customs value on coal imported from United States.....$ 92,375,423
Loss by exchange depreciation at present average rate..... 2,771,262

Mr. CARROLL Are the figures which the hon. member has submitted carried up to the last of December, 1923?

Mr. LOGAN: Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to losing almost $3,000,000 in exchange, the whole balance of trade was upset. It is a question whether, if we had not imported $92,000,000 worth of American coal, our money would not have been at par during the whole year. If we had had par money, apart from the coal altogether, if we take other importations from the United States, we find that we could have saved in exchange during the last year some $15,000,000 which was virtually thrown away; and that, added to what we have lost by way of exchange in connection with our coal imports, represents a total loss to this country in this respect of $18,000,000 in one year. When any man says this is not an important matter, I say it is the most important that could come before parliament during this session, because it involves not only the problem of our coal supply but the whole question of the country's trade.

Let me refer to the history of this coal tariff. Away back in 1880 there was a duty of 50 cents a ton on all coal, anthracite and bituminous. In 1887, for some reason which I have never been able to learn, the duty was taken off what is sometimes called the rich man's coal, but what at any rate is the coal of the well-to-do, while the duty was left on bituminous coal. So that since 1887 there has not been one single dollar paid in duty on anthracite coal coming into Canada. As I have shown, we imported into this country last year $46,000,000 worth of anthracite. A poor man buys a suit of clothes and if it is imported from the United States he has to pay 35 per cent duty upon it, but the wealthier people of the country can buy American coal and bring it into Canada without paying any duty whatever. We need a vast amount of money to carry on the affairs of the country. We all know we are taxed to about the limit; we all know how irksome are the sales tax and the income tax. Can you tell me, Mr. Speaker, any reason under the light of heaven why we should not impose a duty upon anthracite coal to secure revenue if for no other reason.

Let me trace the history of the duty on bituminous coal. A specific duty of 53 cents per ton was placed on bituminous large coal and of 14 cents a ton on bituminous small or slack coal imported from the United States, importations from Great Britain being entitled to a preference of 33⅓ per cent. When the duty of 14 cents was placed on slack coal, this coal was considered to be of very little value. At that time you could buy millions of tons of slack coal in the United States at about 60 cents a ton. But owing to improved methods of using it and a greater demand, I find that slack coal from the United States is now given a customs value of $2.59 per ton, or only 71 cents less than the customs value of round coal. And yet this slack coal is paying a duty of 14 cents a ton, or less than 5½ per cent ad valorem while round coal is paying a duty of 53 cents per ton or about 16 per cent ad valorem.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, I think our tariff not only in reference to coal but in reference to a mighty lot of other commodities needs scientific revision, because of the many incongruous and ridiculous features now prevailing in it. At the United States mines facilities are provided for taking out the slack, and about 50 per cent of the bituminous coal imported comes in as slack coal and pays only 14 cents a ton. But it is a well-known fact that the slack is mixed with the other coal after arriving in Canada and sold as run-of-mine coal, the Customs department being defrauded of the difference in duty. Yet nothing is done to stop this fraud. The practice has been going on for years. I submit, at the present time, there is no reason why slack coal should not pay the same amount as bituminous large coal. When the duty of 53 cents was put upon bituminous coal by Mr. Fielding, it meant at the then price a tariff of about 25 per cent ad valorem. I am not asking to-day for a return to such an ad valorem duty, but I do advocate that we should place bituminous coal of all kinds and descriptions on the same basis, which would put a stop to the fraud now practised. When we have the prices so near together, we might very well impose a duty of at least 20 per cent ad valorem, and even then we would be below the tariff established by Mr. Fielding over twenty years ago.

Mr. ROBB: What would that be per ton on to-day's value?

Mr. LOGAN: Sixty-six cents a ton.

Mr. WHITE: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he is in favour of a 20 per cent duty on agricultural implements?

Mr. LOGAN: I am discussing the subject of an independent coal policy in order that we may not have to rely upon outside sources for our industrial and domestic fuel, so there is no use trying to drag a herring across the trail about what we are going to do to assist another great natural industry, namely, agriculture. A 20 per cent ad valorem duty would mean, according to the customs value of our coal imports last year, 66 cents a ton if it were specific, or an increase of 13 cents a ton. This would mean an annual tax of only 5 p.m. $1.95 a year on imported coal to a man using fifteen tons for his domestic requirements. If he should use Canadian coal even if the price were advanced 13 cents a ton, he would keep in Canada $49.50 a year most of which would be wages.

If a 20 per cent duty were put on American anthracite, with a preference of 33⅓ per cent in favour of Welsh anthracite, it would mean an increased revenue, based on last year's importations, of over $9,000,000, or a total increase, at 20 per cent on all coal anthracite and bituminous, of $12,286,272. But some one may say, "Oh, well 20 per cent is too high a tariff on anthracite coal." It would mean an increase in the price to-day, according to the customs value, of $1.85 a ton.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Might I be permitted to ask this question: Supposing you establish this tariff duty, it would be for the purpose of excluding American coal, I take it; if so, where would the revenue come from?

Mr. LOGAN: It would not be an entirely excluding tariff, I am trying to demonstrate that if we continue importing coal we will secure a vast amount of revenue by this readjustment and we will put a stop to fraud. Of course, everybody knows that incidentally under a tariff for revenue there is a certain amount of protection to the industry itself; there is no doubt about that. But if it is considered that a duty of 20 per cent on anthracite coal is too high, let me suggest to the Minister of Finance and to the government that they could at least put a duty of 50 cents a ton on this fuel of the well-to-do. This would mean on last year's importations found revenue of $2,500,000. What would it mean to the consumer? If he uses fifteen tons in the year it would mean an extra cost to him of $7.50.

These are some of the suggestions I desire to make in regard to the tariff. It was unfortunate, I submit, that when Mr. Fielding imposed the duty he did not make it ad valorem. It was placed at a specific rate per ton. As I said before, it was equivalent to about 25 per cent ad valorem at that time. Surely now when we need revenue ten times more than we needed it then, we can put a duty of 20 per cent on bituminous coal and a duty of at least 50 cents a ton on anthracite coal. By so doing we would assist in stabilizing our coal industry, assist in raising revenue, and in establishing that national coal policy which is so dear to the hearts of many of us. We have in Nova Scotia vast coal measures, but last year when we were bringing nearly $100,000,000 worth of coal from the United States to Canada five or six of our collieries down there were absolutely idle. Why? Simply because there was no market for their coal.

I only wish to repeat in closing what I said in opening. This is a matter of stupendous importance to the Dominion and deserves the attention of a full House. At the same time it deserves the most serious attention of the government, because there is a feeling throughout the country that we should be independent of the United States in respect to our fuel supply. We are dependent upon them at the present time; there is no doubt about it. Let us get down to business and see if we cannot work out a policy which will ensure our coal supply independence, and at the same time bring a tremendous amount of prosperity to Canada and add very little, if anything, to the cost of consumers. Because, I submit, if we can increase our production of coal, if we could make it possible for a mine to produce two thousand tons a day where it is now producing only six or seven hundred tons, we could in a very short time bring about a reduction in the price of our coal. One of the reasons for the present high price is the lack of a market for the production of our mines, with the resultant heavy overhead, which, of course, is reflected in the price of the commodity.

[Mr. Logan.]

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I heard the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) say some time ago that he did not want to hear anything more about protection on coal, but he seems to have a warm heart for it after all.

I hope this motion will not pass in its present form, or that if it does pass a very different interpretation will be put on the term "national policy" than that which the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) has given it. Like other "national policies" of which we have heard, it is conceived only in the interests of one section of Canada, and that is the East. It is the old story again: East is East and the West is forgotten. It is a peculiar commentary upon the widespread differences there are in Canada and how difficult it is to evolve a policy which shall be just to them all, when we find the hon. member for Cumberland saying that the mines in his district are being shut down for lack of more protection on coal, and I can say the same thing of the mines in my part of the country, but due to the fact that we have protection on coal. I have in my hand a cutting from a local newspaper. It is a year old, but the point is the same:

> Comox mine No. 5 ceased operations on Saturday. This mine gave employment to over three hundred men and produced over one thousand tons of coal per day. We understand the reason given for the closing down of this mine is the depression in the coal trade caused by the tremendous importation of foreign fuel oil.

And also, I might add, because our market in the United States is reduced by the fact that there is a duty on bituminous coal going into the United States.

I might explain, as perhaps a good many members of this House do not appreciate it, that there are three classes of coal, bituminous, lignite and anthracite, and we have in the United States tariff the only real suggestion of reciprocity there is in existence between the two countries, and that is, not a promise, not a suggestion, but an absolute feature of the law, that when Canada puts a tax, not on coal but on any one of these particular classes of coal, the United States retaliates by a similar tax on that class of coal going into the United States. If Canada takes off or reduces that duty, automatically, without legislation, a corresponding reduction is made in the United States duty. There is no duty on anthracite coal coming into Canada. There is no duty on lignite coming into Canada, the duty being taken off last year in order to help the people of Alberta to ship their coal into the United States under this reciprocity arrangement; but there is a duty, as my hon. friend from Cumberland has said, of 53 cents a ton on bituminous coal coming into Canada to help the coal mines of the Maritime provinces. The result is that when we ship our bituminous coal, and we mine a lot of coal on Vancouver Island, to the only large market we have, that is the United States, we are confronted with this reciprocity duty of 53 cents a ton. So if we could get free trade in coal, the mines in British Columbia would be much assisted, the very opposite condition to that presented by my hon. friend from Cumberland.

We are also in the peculiar position that we would be happy and satisfied if this government or parliament would give us either free trade or protection—we do not care which it is. If we had protection against fuel oil, then we would not mind the 53 cents a ton duty on coal. But if they will not give us that then we are out for free trade and taking off the 53 cents a ton on bituminous coal entering Canada, because that will give us a good market for our coal in the United States. If this were done, we would not have the condition I have depicted of our mines being idle for three or four days a week.

I would like while on this subject to remind the government, because it is reminding them, they have often been told it before, of the conditions in connection with our Canadian government ships on the Pacific ocean. Comox coal, which is situated in the district I represent, is absolutely the best coal for steaming purposes that can be got on the Pacific ocean. This is no member's eulogy of his own riding at all. I have under my hand here the results of a drastic and long-continued test made by the United States government, which is not likely to be sympathetic to alien coal, and the result is this: They find that the Comox coal of which I am talking is thirty-six per cent better for steaming purposes than any other coal on the Pacific ocean. Now that is the decision arrived at by the United States navy under very careful conditions. They had no axe to grind in favour of one mine over another, and after a drastic test they say that Comox coal for steaming purposes is thirty-six per cent better than any other steam coal on the Pacific ocean. I know that when the British fleet was stationed at Esquimalt, they used to keep quite a large fleet there, they invariably used Comox steaming coal because they recognized its superiority in that regard. Yet what do we find? We find our own Canadian government boats passing up that mine on some trivial pretext of one kind or another. It is too far away, they say. It means two hours extra steaming for a boat that is going to Australia. Two hours would not make much difference on a trip to Australia, surely, when the coal is thirty-six per cent superior for steaming purposes. These are some of the, I was going to say childish, absurd reasons given. Another one is that it is too dear. It is not too dear for the Canadian Pacific Railway, it is not too dear for the Dollar Company, both very large shipping concerns who are supposed to be very good business men; but it is too dear apparently for our government ships to buy our own coal, mined by Canadians, by Canadian machinery. It is a reproach, I think I might use almost a harsher word, but I will let it go at that, to our government that they do not patronize this coal.

I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that if this resolution goes through in its present form, the government in its interpretation of it will take a somewhat broader and bigger view of the term "national policy" than was evidently intended by the hon. member who introduced this motion.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to enter into a controversy as to whether or not a duty should be placed upon coal, because that is somewhat out of my province, but if the mover of the resolution (Mr. Church) is correct in his premises and coal is a food then, as a member of this government, I am afraid I would have to be opposed to an increased duty. I think in fairness to the House something ought to be said of the investigations carried on by the Mines branch with reference to this very important question.

Let me say at the outset that I for one would be delighted to see Canada independent of any other country so far as fuel is concerned, I think in all probability the time will come when we shall be independent of other countries for our fuel supply. It is unnecessary to point to the fact that in British Columbia they have an ample supply of coal for their own needs. Alberta has to-day opened up mines sufficient to supply the needs of Canada without opening up a single other mine in that province, and if all the mines in Alberta were working full time they alone could supply all the coal necessities of Canada. Nova Scotia too, is quite capable of supplying all Canada's fuel needs, or at all events from the central part of Ontario eastward. So the question of an adequate supply is settled in so far as this resource being within our own borders is concerned.

As former speakers have well said, the fuel problem is a question of transportation because the apathy and even antipathy of the people of Ontario and of the western central part of Canada to the lignite coals of Alberta has been overcome. Investigation and trial of the Alberta fuel has proved beyond question that it is a fuel that compares favourably with anthracite. The people like it, and are willing to use it, and there is no question about the ability of Alberta to supply it. So the problem resolves itself into a question of transportation, and transportation alone.

My hon. friends from Nova Scotia have pointed out that with proper equipment the transportation costs can be greatly reduced, and I am inclined to agree with them. Many of you will remember that shipments were made at $7 a ton, and the coal came forward in a good state and people were well satisfied with it. I think I am safe in saying that the experiment was a decided success. With respect to the duty the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has just pointed out that it worked adversely so far as that province was concerned, and we had brought to our attention a few days ago a case in which American coal entering British Columbia was coming in under the name of "sub-bituminous". Owing to the definition the coal was coming in free, but a better understanding was arrived at.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to correct the minister. The coal referred to was coming in as lignite, and therefore coming in free. It should have come in as sub-bituminous when it would have been liable to a duty.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): At all events the point is that the quality of the coal was not properly set out, and therefore the importation came in free. But we must pay some attention to the fact that we have a reciprocal arrangement with respect to the United States in regard to the import and export of coal. By adding the word "lignite" to the various grades and names of coal, we have been able to export a very considerable amount from the mines of southern Alberta into the adjacent states south of the boundary line. I am in hopes that that importation will increase because the territory importing is very close to the source of supply.

With respect to the fuel situation in Canada it may be resolved into a problem of this character: There is no acute fuel area from Winnipeg westward. There is no acute fuel area from Ottawa eastward. There is no doubt at the present moment that Alberta can compete successfully with any competitor as far as Winnipeg. There is no doubt that Nova Scotia can compete successfully with any competitor as far westward as Montreal, and I think even as far as this city. There is no problem in so far as the Alberta fuel is concerned; the antipathy to the Alberta fuel is removed. Neither is there any antipathy with respect to the Nova Scotia fuel. With respect to the American fuel we began an investigation this year in the Mines department, and under the Fuel Board, applicable to what we designate as "the acute fuel area of Canada", and what do we find? We find that about four and a half million tons of anthracite coal are coming into this portion of Canada. We know also that in all probability that supply will, within ten or fifteen years, be cut off and hence a good deal of agitation has arisen. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a tremendous supply of bituminous coal in the United States—indeed it is one of the problems we have to face—lying right along the boundaries of Canada within three or four hundred miles of the central portion of Ontario. There are tremendous coal fields there and for the next two hundred years they may be the source of supply of a great part of the United States and of this portion of Canada. I should like to see that shut out, but we will have to remember, in a discussion of this matter, that the part of the United States referred to will always be a lively competitor in the Canadian market. But in order to protect the domestic user in this area against the day when he will be denied anthracite we have carried on an investigation in the coking of bituminous coal, and while it has been conducted in the laboratories of the government here with successful results, we have had an opportunity of trying it in a commercial way in the new plant recently constructed at Hamilton. To that new plant we brought from Nova Scotia several carloads of their coking coal and put them through an experiment. We found that by a slight mixture the Nova Scotia product is equal to, even if it does not actually excel, the anthracite product of the United States, and that there is no difficulty with respect to the coking of that coal.

Mr. HUGHES: Was that slack coal?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No that was run of mine coal from Nova Scotia, from the Springhill mines I think; I have forgotten the exact locality. However, the experiment was eminently successful. In the case of the American product, the Hamilton plant can place on the market a product, one ton of which is equal to a ton of anthracite, and which has a lower ash content, at $10 a ton, plus distribution costs. I am not going into the reason why coking plants should be established in the cities of Canada; the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has dealt with that aspect of the question. Suffice it to say it will be necessary that these plants be established in centres where there is a large population in order that the by-products may be used successfully and give an adequate return because when that is the case, it is possible to have a cheapening of the product. As I say, it is possible to have bituminous coal paying a duty of 53 cents a ton manufactured into fuel at $10 a ton which has an equal value to anthracite coal for which $16.50 is being paid to-day in the acute area of Ontario. Add $3 to this price if you like and you still have an advantage of $3.50 over the price of the anthracite.

Now, a word as to the chances for Nova Scotia coal. I was told the other day—not by one of our own officers but by an officer of the British Empire Steel and Coal Company—that they can place their coal by the water route in Hamilton at $6 a ton. That is exactly what coal costs the Hamilton plant to-day—$1.75 to $2 a ton at the pit mouth plus transportation, plus the duty, and landed at the plant in Hamilton. I am not arguing that there should not be a duty, I am leaving that to one side. I simply give you the facts as disclosed by our investigation. It would be impossible for coal from Nova Scotia to compete successfully with the American product in Montreal where an all rail rate has to be paid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the minister make the statement that coal could be transported from Nova Scotia to Hamilton at $6 a ton by rail?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No by the all-water route. I pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that I was not speaking of the rail route. In the case of all-rail transportation it would be difficult for Nova Scotia coal to compete with American coal in the market of Montreal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At what price is the coal, which the minister states has been transported to Hamilton for $6 a ton, selling for in Nova Scotia?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot give my right hon. friend the pit mouth figures; I have not got them. I simply say that was a statement made to me by an official of the Empire Steel Corporation—that run of mine fit for coking could be landed on the docks at Hamilton for $6 per ton.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am told it does not sell for that at wholesale in Nova Scotia.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know what the price is in Nova Scotia. The difficulty lies in rail transportation not particularly in water carriage. I may say that the statement referred to came about in a discussion as to the advantages that would accrue to the Nova Scotia mines if the projected St. Lawrence improvement took place, and then it was pointed out that coal could be carried at the rate mentioned at the present moment. That is the situation at all events in so far as the coking problem at Hamilton is concerned.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What amount of coke would be available in Hamilton?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Just the other day I had a letter from the plant manager in which he stated that they were not running it full time, but I would have to get the figures—I would not like to give them offhand—as to the amount turned out by the plant daily or monthly. I will get them after dinner.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What type of boat and tonnage would the hon. minister suggest would be used to transport the coal from Nova Scotia to Hamilton? What would be the size and the coal capacity?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): All I can say is that cheap transportation on the Great Lakes is possible by the use of whale-back vessels that carry wheat. A vessel adapted to carry wheat successfully lends itself to the carrying of coal, and one of the advantages perhaps, if there are advantages in the improvement of the St. Lawrence, is that these large whale-backs could go down the Great Lakes, unload at Montreal or Quebec, bring back coal from Sydney and vicinity, deliver it to the ports along lakes Ontario and Erie and handle it at a very cheap rate. Undoubtedly, by having a cargo both ways, it would lessen the rates, because one of the difficulties always met with in regard to grain rates and stock rates was the fact that empties had to be brought back on every occasion. It was the back haul empty that caused the high rate on one-way haulage, and that condition prevails in reference to our coal in the West. We have to face that difficulty. The tonnage is all eastward instead of westward and that cuts into the rate both ways.

In connection with investigating this matter I thought that if the boats laden with grain unloaded at Quebec and Montreal, they might very well slip down to the mouth of the river and bring back the coal, which would lessen transportation costs both ways.

With respect to the tolls on railways, the difficulty is with the westward haul. My hon. friend pointed out that one of the difficulties would be the increased freight rates. Another difficulty is the increased rate at the pit mouth for the product itself. At the moment the American mines are selling coal for $2 a ton; this creates terrific competition, and I fear that it would require a much greater increase in duty than suggested by my hon. friend to keep the coal out of the market.

The other matter I wish to speak about is that of our investigation into the peat bogs.

Mr. LOGAN: Will the hon. gentleman state where they are selling coal for $2 a ton and what the class of coal is?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Run-of-mine coal at all the central Illinois mines is being sold to-day at $1.75 a ton. That is the lowest rate that has existed for a number of years. They offer to sell large quantities of coal at that rate. That is one reason why we find bituminous coal coming west to Winnipeg for the first time in five or six years. The very low rate for coal at the pit mouth in the United States to-day accounts for that.

One matter I wish to touch upon briefly is our investigation into the utilization of peat for fuel. Prior to my taking office in the Mines department this work was carried to a stage where it was simply a development of machinery, and one of the requests in the report of the committee last year was that the matter be carried to a conclusion. We think we have reached a conclusion and developed machinery that will manufacture peat on a profitable basis at about $3.50 a ton f.o.b. Peat will have to be used within at most, a hundred miles of the vicinity in which it is manufactured, because it is a bulky and light product and entails a high freight rate. But it has been proved that it is good fuel for fall and spring, and the early stages of winter, as a substitute for coal.

Anthracite is the coal which it will replace for these particular seasons. The government of Ontario and the federal government have arranged for a company to take over the plant at Alfred, where we have been manufacturing fuel, and to run it as a commercial enterprise. All the machinery is developed, they know exactly how to go about it, and we expect they will make a success of the undertaking, and will supply a fairly large quantity of fuel for consumption in eastern Ontario. Needless to say throughout the whole of central Ontario there are adequate peat bogs that can be developed, and a great deal of this fuel can be used as a substitute for coal.

Something was said with respect to power. Let me say, speaking particularly of the Ontario and Quebec regions, that the development of water power will go a long way to assist in solving the fuel problem. It has done so at present, and the development of water-power will relieve the situation to a large extent throughout this portion of Canada. With that object in view, we have been making, in the Interior department and the Power branch, extensive investigation into the probabilities of power development, so that we will have accurate information for those who are desirous of developing those powers for the manufacture of electricity in order to a large extent to replace fuel that is used for various purposes of manufacture.

Mr. MARCIL: We have had a very interesting report recently of an investigation carried on by a commission under Mr. R. A. Ross of Montreal, at Bienfait, Saskatchewan, in regard to briquetting the lignite there. I know this gentleman has given a great deal of study to the question, and he seems to indicate in the report of this commission that the matter has now been brought to a point where it can be carried on successfully. Will the minister give us some information on that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am very glad the hon. member has brought that question to my attention. I had forgotten it for the moment. It is not the first time this question has been mentioned in the House. Some years ago a committee was appointed to investigate the possibilities of briquetting the output of the low grade mines at Bienfait. A considerable amount of investigation has been carried on. A very large plant has been built, and experiments have been carried on at this plant up to a certain point, on the basis of what had been learned in the laboratories here at Ottawa. A carbonizer had been installed in the plant there, which seemed to work very successfully. It was placed outdoors, just outside of the buildings at the experimental plant of the laboratories of the Mines branch; but when it was tried on a commercial scale at Bienfait it proved to be a complete failure. Not only that, but the machinery that was selected and adopted for the briquetting fuel there was also a failure.

At one time the three governments participating, the federal and the two provincial governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, were on the point of quitting the experiment altogether. But just about that time at the University of Dakota they discovered a carbonizer known as the Hood-O'Dell, that seemed to work very satisfactorily. It is true they were not taking care of the by-products, —for there are by-products in the manufacture of this material, the same as in others— but it seemed to carbonize very satisfactorily. The officials of the Mines branch and of this committee investigated this carbonizer and they decided to try it out. We built it at the plant at Bienfait, erected it practically of the same dimensions with some changes, experimented with it for a period of six months, and it turned out to be an entire success. It is true that further investigations may create some savings in the by-products, but the carbonizer does the charring of the coal perfectly at a minimum of cost. So far as discoveries go in the United States, or Germany, or Belgium, where experiments are being carried on with these low grade fuels, this carbonizer seems to be the best that has been so far evolved.

After working for this period of time on the charring of the product, they discovered that their briquetting outfit was not of a character that would lend itself to the briquetting of the fuel. I think there is in the report some indication that the minister and the Mines department have not always been quite in accord with the committee, and if we disagreed about any one thing, it was this: We insisted most emphatically that in the experimental stages all that should be done was to prove the experiment; that we should not attempt in a commercial way to manufacture the product; that we should first endeavour to prove by experiment that the coal could be charred and briquetted before we entered into the purchase of machinery and the construction of a plant on a commercial scale. Outside of that, I think we have been going along very harmoniously. When we discovered that the briquetting machine was not of a character that would lend itself to the briquetting of the fuel, I asked them: Would it not be wise to ship to the university three different grades of our char and have it briquetted in a machine that was patented and set up for the purpose of doing this work? That was done. We have the product back in Canada and the experiment has been a splendid success. The fuel is a free-burning fuel, and the whole experiment, I think, can be said to be successful as regards the briquetting of this low grade lignite fuel. I advocate that it is not the purpose of the government to carry on an experiment to the point where its commercial possibilities are thoroughly proved. If you have the experiment carried out, you know how the thing is done; you have the machinery perfected that will do it. Then private enterprise has all the information required to make the manufacture of this product a success. I am afraid, however, that the cost involved in the manufacture of the briquettes is so great that, at the moment, it will not compete successfully with western lignite coals that are offered on the market at any considerable distance from the plant, but within reasonable distances of the plant, where transportation rates are not too great, there is no doubt that a plant at Bienfait can operate and compete successfully.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister made a mistake. He said that it would not compete with lignite coal that is being offered. He meant American coal?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, Alberta coal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not care whether it competes with Alberta coal or not.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I was merely mentioning, in passing, that the cost of manufacture made it difficult for it to compete with lignite coal coming from Alberta. I was not raising any question whether it should compete or not. The cost of manufacture at the moment is somewhere about $11 a ton, and with transportation rates on top of that within 600 miles, say, of the Alberta mines where coal could be delivered for probably about $10 a ton, it would not enter into competition.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the minister any information as to the quantity of peat that can be manufactured now for burning by the machinery on hand, and as to how many years the supply of that peat will last? I think the estimate was given last year in the Mines committee that the supply would last for only a very few years.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think it is estimated that the Holland Landing deposits alone would last for fifty years, if we compute the ordinary supplies for Ontario, and there are peat bogs in all parts of Ontario, as my hon. friend is aware.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The question as to how long the supply will last depends upon the quantity you can manufacture in a year.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is a little difficult to say what quantity can be manufactured in a year because drying conditions vary. In a wet year a plant would certainly not turn out two-thirds as much peat as it would in a dry year. The peat has to be air-dried. It is spread upon the ground and dried in the sun. Again I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend the exact figures; I will get them for him.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Does the minister understand that if a season is very wet, we might have none at all?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not think there would be any season when you would not have any supplies at all. One other matter that I wish to speak about, contained in the report, is the suggestion that was made to the committee by an engineer in this city, Mr. Graham, I believe, who has been continuously desirous of getting his scheme tested out by the department. We gave this gentleman an opportunity this year to test out his scheme by the pressure method. I have not had any report from him. We have tried this method out, and we have been unable in the laboratories here to evolve any scheme that one would choose in preference to the air-drying process. Up to date that seems to be the only successful process. I shall be glad to get my hon. friend the information as to the tonnage that it is expected to turn out every twenty-four hours in this plant.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): I should like to say a word on the coal question because I believe in the section of the country from whence I come, there is no subject so prominently in the minds of the people to-day as the question of a supply of Nova Scotia and Alberta coal for domestic and manufacturing purposes in Ontario. I was at home yesterday and Saturday, and I had two or three inquiries as to when we might expect Alberta coal in Guelph. Two weeks ago when I was at home on another occasion, I had the same inquiry from two or three other people. We had just a little taste of Alberta coal in Guelph and other places last fall or early last winter, and I think it has whetted the appetite of the people of Ontario to a great extent. Those who were fortunate enough to get a ton or two, by way of sample, have become very loud in their demands for more of it. They wonder why it is that parliament or the government is not showing more activity towards securing a proper supply of Canadian coal for next winter. I do not know exactly under what arrangement Alberta coal was brought to Ontario last autumn, but I believe it was under some arrangement made between the Canadian National Railways and the government of the province of Ontario whereby 10,000 tons were brought down to Ontario by way of experiment. I believe that the rate given by the railway on that occasion was something like $7 per ton, and I have heard it stated that this rate was a losing proposition for the railway inasmuch as it cost them more than that to bring the coal from the West to Ontario. So that if the business is to be carried on as a permanent one a much higher rate would have to be charged. I agree with my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) when, in his opening remarks, he stated that the coal problem to-day in Canada was perhaps the most important problem that we had to face. We do not yet seem to realize its importance. We have been threatened on two or three occasions in the last five or six years with a coal famine in central Ontario. Whether as a result of strikes in the United States or of a shortage of supply in that country, from one cause or another the people in central Canada have been face to face on two or three occasions with a very awkward situation. We should find a remedy for that difficulty without delay; but unless we get our representatives, the members of this House, to take an active interest in the question I do not believe that we shall find a solution for it.

When we realize that we pay out approximately $100,000,000 a year to obtain what one might describe as a vanishing asset, it does not seem to me to be good business The United States gets our $100,000,000 and we get the coal and eventually the heat and the ashes, and there is nothing left to show for the $100,0000,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What about the manufactured goods?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am speaking more particularly of domestic coal; we get, of course, the power for the manufacture of goods from the coal we use for that purpose. The United States to-day is getting our money, and the employment and the wages that go with that employment are all going across the border. We have in our own country, as we all admit, magnificent coal fields in the Maritime provinces and in the western provinces. Surely we have brains enough, intelligence enough and executive ability enough in this House to solve the question as to how to bring from the East and the West these coal supplies to central Canada where the people have no coal. The last clause of the resolution has not been discussed so far, and to my mind it is an important one. It is stated in these few words:

That whereas coal is a necessity in effect equal to that of food it should therefore be carried on a preferential toll basis by the railways on the same basis as food.

We have heretofore given preferential rates in regard to certain commodities and in regard to certain localities. In doing so I assume we did a right and proper thing. Should we not apply the same reasoning to the fuel question? Coal is an absolute necessity, as we all realise. Are we then to be hindered from using our own coal simply because our great railways will not give us a low enough rate of haulage? Is parliament so tied hand and foot that we cannot dictate to the railway corporations? I submit we can; and it is of the first importance, of the first necessity, that parliament take action in regard to this coal question, and do so at this session.

I was glad to see in the Speech from the Throne a reference to the coal situation. I do not know whether or not, this reference really contemplates some governmental action in regard to the matter, but at any rate the Speech from the Throne makes this announcement:

The Dominion Fuel Board has been created to study and make recommendations in regard to the development of our fuel resources with a view to making Canada independent, so far as possible, of foreign sources of supply. The investigations carried on by this Board have already been productive of important results, and legislation to encourage Canadian production will be submitted for your consideration.

Does that mean that the government is prepared at this session to offer a solution of this coal difficulty so far as regards central Canada? We from Quebec and Ontario will certainly welcome any proposal of that kind which the government may make. Upon economic grounds we should solve the question in the interests of the country. The use of Canadian coal would settle to a very large extent that vexed question of an adverse balance of trade as between Canada and the United States. As my hon. friend from Cumberland has pointed out the use of Canadian coal instead of American coal would in all human probability have kept the Canadian dollar at par because we would not have sent a hundred millions to the United States last year to pay our coal bill. If we could solve this problem it would give jobs in this country to thousands and thousands of Canadian workmen and retain these men in Canada instead of having them drift to the United States to work in the coal mines there. If all that I hear about the quantity and quality of Nova Scotia and Alberta coal, both for domestic and for manufacturing purposes be true, the provinces could supply the people of central Canada with a fuel as good if not better than that which they are using to-day, and supply it to them at a greatly reduced rate. Surely these are reasons sufficient to cause us to deliberate at some length on the question. I am afraid the government has been rather resting on its oars in regard to this matter; I am afraid we have been depending too much upon dilatory commissions of inquiry of various kinds. There have been inquiries going on in reference to the coal question, in regard to briquetting, and in regard to peat for a great many years, according to my recollection. But these inquiries have not come to a head nor have they resulted in anything concrete. I am satisfied that this House, at this session, if it so desires can frame a measure which will enable central Canada to get Nova Scotia and Alberta coal in as large quantities as may be required. It need not inflict any injury on our railway companies should we see fit to fix reasonable rates for hauling coal.

Mr. IRVINE: What would the hon. gentleman suggest in that direction?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would frame a measure having regard, first, to railway rates and secondly to financial arrangements, because I believe that money would have to be raised, in the first instance, properly to equip our railways for coal trade for which they have not been equipped hitherto. We should have to provide equipment in engines, in coal cars, in terminal facilities and perhaps in other respects, and it might run into a fairly large sum of money. But in my judgment it would be money well spent. Provide the money first, and then determine what is a fair adequate railway rate. I do not think there would be much subsequent difficulty in solving the problem, for demand and supply and ordinary business enterprise would do the rest. And as a result what would the people have? They would use in Ontario and Quebec coal produced in Canada which would result in keeping a hundred million dollars a year in Canada, which now goes to the United States. The use of Canadian coal would yield a tremendous freight tonnage for our railways and our lake shipping which in itself would furnish greatly increased employment. It would also involve large employment in our mines, far beyond anything we have hitherto enjoyed. It would develop our own resources, which to my mind is worth a great deal to this country.

I see no practical difficulties in the way of a speedy solution of this question. I have read the evidence taken last session. I was impressed by the statement of Mr. M. J.

Butler. I used to know Mr. Butler when I was chairman of the Railway committee of this House, and Mr. Butler was always at the table in his capacity of Deputy Minister of Railways. He is a very well informed man on such a question. He sees no practical difficulties. Why should we? I believe all we have to do is to put our heads together, or allow the government—because after all it is their function, they are governing the country—to develop some plan. But do not postpone the solution any longer. Do it now, so that when the next strike takes place in the Pennsylvania coal fields we shall have nothing to fear. There may or may not be an embargo in the United States. The price of coal may soar again. I had the doubtful pleasure of paying $16.50 and $17 a ton for all the coal I used last winter. I have paid in years past as high as $19 a ton for Pennsylvania anthracite of inferior quality. From all I can learn from coal dealers and others well informed we are at present paying $5, $6 and $7 a ton too much for Pennsylvania coal for domestic purposes in Ontario. Surely this is a question of sufficient interest and magnitude to cause us to deliberate some time on this motion, to discuss it thoroughly, and to gain the views of all sections of the country upon it, in the hope that we may be able to solve the problem this session and enable the people of Canada to have an abundant supply of Canadian coal at reasonable rates next winter.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHN PRITCHARD (North Wellington): When the House rose at six o'clock we were discussing the question of a coal supply for the Dominion of Canada, and I thought I would like to venture a few remarks from the fact that last harvest at the request of one of my constituents I looked into the coal situation a little when I was in Alberta, and I saw some things there in connection with the coal industry that interested me very much. I thought that if they were of any value to the members of the House, I would give them in my own way for what they are worth.

I was informed by a man in my constituency who had an interest in the coal mines at Drumheller that if I went there and got in touch with the manager of those mines, and made some inquiries about the possibility of getting coal to Ontario, I would get some useful information. From Calgary I went to Drumheller and visited the coal mines there. It was beautiful harvest weather the day I got there, with the binders running and the harvest in full swing. The manager of one of the mines met me at the station, showed me through the workings of the mine and gave me all the information I asked for, and it was very interesting. At that time the men were off work owing to certain troubles, not with their employer, but in connection with their union. That was in the early part of September.

I inquired as to the quality of coal they were putting out at that mine, and the manager showed me letters he had received from different parts of Ontario all expressing satisfaction with the coal they had received and asking for more if they could get it. I also inquired as to the possibility of continuing to ship that coal to Ontario. I had heard some men whose opinion I valued in this matter say that it was impracticable to ship coal from Alberta to Ontario, but in discussing this matter with these gentlemen at Drumheller I was led to believe that at the same rates they got for hauling grain the railways could haul coal to Toronto. If the coal could be carried as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) suggested this afternoon, during the slack season of the year when the railways were not hauling grain, they could not see any reason why the railways could not carry it for $6 a ton. The railway companies had been claiming that there was no money in hauling grain, but on the competing lines running from Drumheller the railways were anxious to get grain to haul at a rate that they had claimed was ruinous. I think our railway returns will show that a large crop of grain gives good returns to the railways where they claim they are hauling it at too low a rate. I am persuaded that that coal can be hauled for $6 a ton.

I also inquired what wages the men were getting who worked in the mine, and to my surprise I found that they were pretty well paid. They were getting anywhere from $6.85 up to as high as $20 a day in some cases. The average pay for eight hours work in the mine was $7 a day. What struck me rather forcibly at the time was that men who had good crops of grain just a mile and a half from the mines could not get men to shock the grain, and thousands of acres went unshocked while men from the mines in Drumheller were walking the streets for several weeks. These farmers offered the men $5 a day, and the day I came back from Drumheller to Calgary a friend of mine met me at the station and told me that a man had been trying to get men for the harvest fields, but had succeeded in getting only one, although men were around the employment office every day I was there. Looking into the situation a little further I found that the men, women and boys working for the Canadian Pacific were getting on an average $1,500 a year. In Alberta, from Calgary to Edmonton they had as fine a crop of wheat as I ever saw, going to an average of twenty-eight bushels per acre. At 80 cents a bushel —and they were selling it for 72 cents a bushel when I was there—it would take 320 acres of wheat to pay five men, women and boys the same money they would get if they were in the employ of the railway company. That was the situation—three hundred and twenty acres to pay five men, women and boys the same wages as the Canadian Pacific Railway were paying their help. Now three hundred and twenty acres is a lot of land to have in wheat, and that is what it would take to pay them those wages, to say nothing of overhead, the capital invested in land, stock and implements as well as taxes, hail insurance and all the rest of the items entering into the expense.

One hon. gentleman this afternoon said how very important it would be to save that money from going out of the country. Is it not just as important to increase our agricultural products and to bring into Canada twice the amount of capital that is entering the country at present? To my mind there is the crux of the situation. I am one of those who believe that wages have got to come down to a proper level. I am of the opinion that there is a connection between wages, taxes and the tariff. Organized labour and organized capital have managed to fix a price for their respective services. In what position, however, is the farmer? He has to go on the labour market and compete with those who have been fixing the price of their products, and he has to sell on the open markets of the world. If the government can overcome this handicap, if they can solve this problem, they will be able to solve lots of other problems at present confronting this country. The truth of the matter is that we are trying to arrange things artificially contrary to the natural trend of commerce. The result is that we have trouble all along the line, and that trouble will continue as long as we maintain such a policy. I think that with comparatively little trouble a successful adjustment of matters could be made. With a very slight drop in the direction I have indicated we should find an improvement. I do not say that the adjustment should be made immediately, but some modification should be carried out at once so as to make the hauling of coal profitable. I believe that could be done and that it ought to be done. That applies not only to the coal situation but to nearly every other industry in the country. A great many of our industries are interlocking in their character and the same handicap affects all. I venture to say that 80 per cent of the amount paid in taxes goes in wages. When there has been a relaxation in that respect an improvement will soon be evident.

Another handicap from which we are suffering is that too many people are what might be called "leaners". One hon. gentleman resented as unparliamentary the term "parasites" which was applied to a certain section of the community. I would not go so far as to use that term with respect to the people to whom I allude but I think it is fair to say that they want to lean on somebody. Upon whom are they going to lean? Are they going to lean upon the man who is growing wheat? Every business ought to stand on its own foundation, and I think that remark is applicable to the coal industry. I am interested in the fuel situation in Ontario to as great an extent as anybody. It is to my interest to buy as cheaply as possible, but I want to pay for my own fuel, I do not want to throw the burden on somebody else. The solution of the problem is possible if we give it a little thought, but there is no use attempting to do it piecemeal. While we are regulating the coal industry we should regulate every other industry in the country and do it on a proper basis.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): I was grieved when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) described this motion as something that was intended to benefit one section of the country. The hon. gentleman's remarks sounded to me as though he was looking for a cause for offence, instead of trying to get at the real purpose of the resolution. I think we ought to get away from the practice of pointing out that a certain thing will be advantageous only to a certain section of the country unless it can be substantiated by argument. If that proves to be the case then the proposition ought to be opposed.

I think the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), in introducing this resolution, has initiated a discussion that ought to prove of great value to parliament, and to the country. He points out that what is proposed is something for the future. Well, it is not yet in force, so necessarily it must be for the future. If we take action now—and we should have moved long ago—if we start to work out the idea embodied in the resolution, we shall have moved that far toward the solution of this problem with which we must deal. As I view the matter, more should be done to bring about co-operation between the central provinces and the eastern and western provinces of the Dominion. The central provinces of Canada are without an adequate supply of fuel. Without coal, and by reason of their large population, they consume a larger quantity of fuel than both the east and the west put together. As the mover of the resolution said, fuel is almost as great a necessity as food. In our climate it is a primary requirement and if we could bring the west and the east into co-operation, in supplying this great need of the central provinces it seems to me we ought to be pretty well on our way to harmonizing the interests of all the provinces of Canada. We are told by geologists that we have in Alberta about one-sixth of the total coal supply of the world. I see also by the report presented to the Geological Congress that in the province of Saskatchewan there are two and a half billion tons of coal. That is the estimate that has been made for that Congress. Alberta has a much larger supply of coal and, I think, a better quality. Then we have in the eastern provinces an almost unlimited quantity of excellent coal. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is a reflection on the initiative and enterprise of the people of Canada if we admit ourselves to be unequal to the task of securing for the people of Canada a supply of fuel mined within the boundaries of this country. The supply is here in abundance, and the only problem to be solved is the cost of distribution. Surely there must be enough ability, in the Canadian people to take measures that will enable Canadian mines to be run on full time and supply the central provinces with the fuel they require so badly. In the Maritime provinces there seems to be a feeling that they are cut off from Quebec and Ontario; there is a lack of, shall I say, that family spirit between these two sections of Canada that ought to exist. Surely we could make good that lack if we found a means of keeping all the mines in the Maritime provinces busy the year round, and maintaining a large industrial population that would help to consume Canadian products. The figures that were given by my hon. friend (Mr. Logan) ought to carry weight with every hon. member, to say nothing of every person in the country. My hon. friend said that about $3,000,000 was lost to Canada last year in the matter of exchange alone. I have not gone over the figures, but I am prepared to accept his statement. That money, as he says, might as well have been thrown into the lake. It was money that could have been saved and if we are sending out $3,000,000 to the United States in the shape of exchange, I submit it would be better for us to appropriate that amount of money to recoup the National railway for any loss it might incur in the handling of these absolutely necessary supplies of fuel for the central provinces of the country. Especially is that the case, Sir, when the eastern and western provinces would benefit so largely.

But, there is more than that, Mr. Speaker. There has been a good deal of unrest and discontent in the Maritime provinces, particularly in the coal mining districts, and, as far as I have been able to form an opinion as to the cause of that unrest, it is due largely to the fact that the men who have worked in the mines are restricted in the amount of labour they perform. They complain that while they get so much a day they only work three or four days a week. If they were mining coal that could be sent to the province of Ontario, and if their mines could be kept going every day, instead of three or four days a week, the men who work in these mines would get that much more in wages, and would have that much more for the subsistence of their families; and I submit they would, in all probability, be that much more contented. That is a by-product of this proposal, but it is one that has a very great weight with me, however it may affect the judgment of the other members of the House. If we can do anything to remove the recurring unrest and dissatisfaction in the Maritime provinces, I think we ought to engage our talents in that direction, and it would be an admirable thing for us to do.

I understand that during the past six months experiments have been made in the city of Hamilton, at the western end of lake Ontario, in coking Nova Scotia coal. The reports are that the experiment is a pronounced success, and that this coal which was brought from the Maritime provinces and coked in Hamilton is as high a class of fuel as the anthracite coal from the mines of Pennsylvania. Some will argue that it is a better fuel for domestic purposes. Is it not worth while for us to endeavour to ascertain if the coking of that coal at the mines would not be a profitable operation? If a ton and a half of coal makes a ton of coke, why not take a ton and a half of coal to Hamilton to have it coked into a ton of coke?

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the hon. member ever given thought to the question of the sale of the by-products? These by-products have to be manufactured from coal, as I understand it, in a centre where they can be consumed, in order to make it profitable.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not sufficiently familiar with what is done with all the by-products taken from coal to say, but if there are industries that flourish upon the by-products of the coking system, might they not be established in Nova Scotia near the coal mines? Is it not possible for industries of that kind to be located where their raw material is most easily accessible? However, if it is found that it is more profitable to coke the coal in Hamilton, I presume that is what would be done, and it does not affect my argument at all. I believe that we could, even with our present canals take coal from Nova Scotia and sell it in Ontario. If you go up into lake Superior you will find big freighters towing down barges full of iron ore, and sometimes full of wheat. Why could the barge system not be operated from the Nova Scotia dock or mine up the St. Lawrence river and through the canals into lake Ontario? In that way the cost of shipping the coal would be materially reduced. I have understood, and I have been told by those who are in the business, that one of the reasons why Nova Scotia coal is not sent to Ontario was that an arrangement existed between the mine owners in Nova Scotia and the mine owners in Pennsylvania by which the Pennsylvania men were to have the Ontario market, in consideration of the Nova Scotia owners being given the New England market. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) tells me there is nothing in that—that it is not the case—and I am glad to have his statement to that effect. That being true, Sir, there is no impediment in the way of supplying the province of Ontario largely, if not entirely, from the coal mines of Nova Scotia. I submit that that would so increase the trade between the central provinces and the Maritime provinces that it would bring about a closer community of interest and do a great deal to strengthen the bonds of this confederation, which at times are strained more than they ought to be, and more, I am sure, than any good Canadian desires that they should be.

With reference to the coal in Alberta, they tell us that it cannot be brought down to the province of Ontario where coal is so badly needed, and where there is a large market, at a price that would enable it to compete with Pennsylvania coal. I hesitate, Sir, to dispute the views of the experts of the National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway with regard to freight rates, but is is a matter of astonishment to me that these railway managers tell us quite firmly that it is impossible to bring coal from the Alberta mines to Ontario for $7 a ton, while at the same time they are bringing wheat from the Calgary zone to the head of the lakes for $5 a ton. Should it cost any more to transport a ton of coal than a ton of wheat? Is there some peculiar circumstance in the hauling of one product that does not apply to the other? I am not discussing the loading or the unloading, but merely discussing the hauling of the coal itself.

Mr. COOTE: Did the hon. gentleman make the statement that the railways are hauling wheat from the Calgary zone to Ontario for $5 a ton?

Mr. HOCKEN: That is my understanding —25 cents a hundred.

Mr. COOTE: That is to Fort William.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, the head of the lakes.

Mr. COOTE: I thought the hon. gentleman meant to this part of the country.

Mr. HOCKEN: No, my idea of the handling of Alberta coal would be to take it to the head of the lakes.

Mr. MANION: For the information of my hon. friend in regard to Alberta coal, I may say it is used at the head of the lakes to-day very successfully. It is the eastern part of the country where the difficulty occurs—the long haul—but the Alberta coal is used at the head of the lakes with very good results.

Mr. EVANS: Does $5 cover the cost to the head of the lakes, or further east?

Mr. HOCKEN: I presume that would be the cost to take it to the head of the lakes. But the cost of taking it from the head of the lakes to St. Catharines, Hamilton or Toronto could not amount to $2 a ton. That would be an excessive rate. If they got one dollar a ton for the waterborne share of the distance, I should think that would be quite sufficient, so that we ought to get at Toronto, in fact as far as Kingston, any port on lake Ontario, this coal at a rate of, at the most, $6. a ton. I am told by a mine owner in Alberta that if the mines were working all the year round, the coal could be sold at the mines for $1.75 a ton. Some of my western friends may have some information on that point. This man who owns 2,000 acres of coal lands. and who was president of a large coal company near the Drumheller mine, is my informant as to those figures. I think the present price is $2.50 a ton. If you allow $6 a ton for bringing the coal to Ontario and add that to the $1.75 a ton, that means $7.75 a ton. That coal ought to be sold in the city of Toronto or at any other lake port at the outside for $12. or less than $12 a ton, and at that price I am satisfied that it would compete with coal from the Pennsylvania mines.

The great trouble in Alberta, as it is in Nova Scotia, is that the miners do not get work all the year round. they work part time, and you must expect to pay men who work half the week a higher rate of wages than if they are working six days a week. They would be better satisfied to work at lower wages for six days a week than to work half the time at a higher rate, and you would have a more contented population. If in Alberta we could build up a mining population of from 50,000 to 100,000 families, we would have a taxpaying, voting population in Alberta that would be of the utmost value to the whole Dominion of Canada. They would be a consuming population for the manufacturers of the East, and the manufacturers of the East would be customers in buying their coal at a fair price. Surely a mutual arrangement of that kind ought to be satisfactory to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). It certainly would be satisfactory to any man whose system is not entirely filled with the virus of free trade.

Mr. GOULD: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the $12. a ton he quotes as the maximum price that should be charged in Ontario is less than is charged myself, for instance, at the point where I live, a much shorter haul, five or six hundred miles less?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not going to explain my hon. friend's financial difficulties in buying his coal. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) says that it sells at $15 a ton at the head of the lakes. If the coal costs $1.75 at the mine, and if it could be brought down for $6, I cannot see why any person should endeavour to profiteer to the extent of selling it for more than $12 a ton. Any person who would do that would be a profiteer, and that is a case where the government ought to take the matter in hand. If there is anything the government would be justified in doing, it is in taking steps, whether the article is food or fuel, to prevent anything like profiteering. I am not in favour of attempting this as a national enterprise; I have not got that far in my public ownership view; but I have got so far as to contend that no man handling food or fuel should be allowed an excessive profit upon what he turns over.

Mr. WARD: Where did the hon. gentleman get that price of $1.75?

Mr. HOCKEN: I explained before that a man who was president of a coal mine and who owned 2,000 acres of coal lands in the vicinity of the Drumheller mines gave me his word positively that they could sell the coal at a good profit at $1.75 a ton if they were working all the year round. He says that they sell it now at $2.50 a ton and they are working only part time.

When the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) was speaking about getting proper equipment for the handling of fuel, some person on this side of the House asked him if he had estimated the cost of the equipment. The thought occurred to me at the time that we might spend $50,000,000 on equipment, on coal cars, because you would not have to spend anything for locomotives. We have an equipment of locomotives sufficient to handle trains of grain cars, and I presume they would be available at other seasons of the year to handle coal cars. A sum amounting to $50,000,000 would buy an enormous quantity of coal cars. The interest on $50,000,000 would not be as much as we are now paying in exchange on the $96,000,000 which we are sending to the United States every year for our supply of coal in this country.

What I would like to see is some effort made to get co-operation between the mine owners, both east and west; all the shipping interests, particularly the government marine; and the railways, under some kind of leadership from this government or this House. I should like to see those interests co-operate to study out a plan by which this object that we are talking about to-day could be attained. Surely it is worth while making an effort. The advantages to be derived from working out successfully a plan such as the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) has proposed are enormous, not only in the saving of money, but in the certainty that we would have in Canada of a fuel supply always, and in the development of the western provinces and the eastern provinces to supply the great needs of the central provinces. I do not think anything could be suggested that is better calculated to get us all working together in an effort to use the natural products of the West and the East to supply the great needs of the central provinces. I hope, out of this discussion, there will come a substantial effort on the part of the government to work out some plan, by co-operation of the interests concerned, to accomplish the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is one of sufficient importance to engage the attention of the government to a far greater extent than it has heretofore; but before criticising the government for its, shall I say, masterly inactivity during the past year, let me attempt to answer one or both of the preceding two speakers? My hon. friend on my left (Mr. Pritchard) spent one day in the Drumheller coal fields, and he came away from that mining district convinced that all the difficulties with regard to moving coal from the mines to Ontario could be solved by reducing the wages of labour. May I inform him that recently in the Alberta legislature, one of the members of that assembly introduced a resolution asking the Alberta government to appoint a commission to investigate the entire coal trade, including wages and all other operating costs? In introducing that resolution he gave some startling figures. He gave the average earnings of employees in mines producing domestic coal in Alberta as $7.50 per day. The higher wages—he gave a tabulated list of figures—were for steam coal production.

The value of the daily production per miner in the United States was $34.98½ and in Alberta the average daily production per miner was $46.94. Let us deduct the $7.50 from $46.94, and I do not think that anyone will argue that the miner is overpaid. However, these are simply his figures, and they cannot be verified until subsequent to the investigation by the commission for which he has asked. I submit however that a cursory examination of the mining conditions in the province could hardly justify anyone in suggesting that labour wages are responsible for the high cost of the coal. To my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) may I say that I was delighted with his remarks regarding a desire to repair the breach that apparently exists between the eastern and the western provinces and central Canada. It would be quite a simple matter for those who are really sincere in this wish in the central provinces to repair that breach, and it could be done very readily. The method is so obvious that I need hardly state it; hon. gentlemen around me have already indicated it by their applause.

Mr. MANION: How?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): By removing the protective duty especially on foodstuffs and implements of production. Let me tell the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) that one of the real factors entering into the production cost is that the department has permitted a great deal of the mining lands to fall into the hands of private speculators who do not operate these mines at all but simply charge the real operators a royalty for so doing. Last session we had an inquiry into this whole question, and a most exhaustive study was made of the situation by a very excellent committee; as my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) is aware that committee was headed by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll) himself a miner at one time and now an eminent legal light. That committee, after hearing a great deal of evidence and taking testimony not only from mine operators, miners, railwaymen and economists, but also from independent outside sources, submitted an exhaustive report, not one single recommendation in which has to this day been implemented by this government. One statement made by the committee without any hesitation was that it was absolutely necessary that every effort possible should and must be made at once by Canada through its government, its transportation companies, its coal operators and manufacturers, to make Canada independent of other countries for its fuel supply. Nothing has been done by this government to implement that suggestion. The report goes on to say further, that what is wanted in this connection is propaganda and the advertising throughout Canada of the fuel value of Canadian coal. I quote from the report:

> In this connection your committee would like to point out that until two years ago the fuel needs of Winnipeg were supplied to the extent of 85 per cent by United States anthracite, but through the continued efforts of the Alberta government and the coal operators 90 per cent of that city's supply is now supplied by Alberta.

Mr. HOCKEN: What committee was that?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Mines and Minerals committee, appointed by this House last year. No educational propaganda has been carried on by this government: the work that has been carried on has been through the Alberta government's trade commissioner. That provincial government has been conducting a campaign throughout the summer in Ontario, and hon. gentlemen from that province will remember that experiments were made at Hamilton and all other important points in connection with fuel tests. We shipped coal to this province under a special rate of $7 from the Canadian National Railways, some 15,000 or 16,000 tons were transported. The coal has proved absolutely satisfactory, as all hon. members will agree. The standing committee further suggested that the Department of the Interior through its Intelligence branch should undertake this educational campaign. That has not been done, either; the government is still quiescent in the matter. Again, the committee recommended that an investigation be made immediately by independent experts into the evidence given by transportation witnesses at its hearings. In Alberta, as a previous speaker has stated, we possess 14 per cent of the world's fuel supply.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Can the hon. member name any important point in Ontario where Alberta coal has not been used? What better advertising does he want than that?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The shipment of that coal was made at the instance of the Alberta government; we have not had any co-operation from the federal government in that matter.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The commissioner from Alberta was here in the field and he received every assistance from the officers of the Mines Department. The important thing was to get the coal to the people, and they are actually using it in their furnaces.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The suggestion was made in the report that a campaign should be carried on by the Intelligence branch of the department, and I would ask the minister to show me a single pamphlet or any particle of propaganda published by the department in this matter last year.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The answer to that question is quite apparent. The coal is being used by the actual consumers in each of the communities in which coal is required. So far as I am aware, in every important community in the province of Ontario, including this city, Alberta coal has been used. That coal has come from west of Red Deer and from Drumheller, so that we have not been remiss in our duty in getting it to the people. That being the case, is the coal not getting the very best kind of advertising possible?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My statement still stands, that the department has undertaken no educational propaganda. The coal was sent here by the operators and the provincial government sent two experts along with it, one a fuel expert for testing purposes and the other a trade commissioner who carried on an educational campaign. Now, we have in Alberta 14 per cent of the world's fuel supply. West of a line drawn from Lethbridge to Edmonton we have the finest type of semi-anthracite and domestic fuels in the world. The development of that coal field will depend as much upon the establishment of a Pacific market as on the securing of the Ontario one. That this is the case is indicated by the fact that during the last few years a considerable sale has been made by the Drumheller and Lethbridge coal producers in Montana, Dakota, Oregon and Washington; and at the present time negotiations are about closed for the equipping of the city of Seattle with large bunkering facilities through which we shall be able to sell Alberta coal. Any attempt by this parliament to impose a duty against coal coming into Ontario will inevitably lead to retaliatory measures by the United States. A serious loss to the West and, indeed, I think, to all Canada would certainly result therefrom. Last session I secured from the Minister of Finance a concession with regard to the tariff. I spoke in this House in March last year asking that the duty now imposed against the coals on the n.o.p. list, upon which list our Alberta coal stood at that time, should be removed. There existed then a 53 cent duty on Alberta coal entering the States which prevented the full exploitation of the United States market by Alberta producers. The Minister of Finance lent a sympathetic ear to our suggestion and to the resolutions from the operators and boards of trade in Alberta, with the result that when the tariff came down the duty was removed. We now find hon. gentlemen to our right asking that the duty be re-imposed on Alberta coal. I hope this will not be done.

If I were of a vindictive spirit, there is nothing that would give me greater pleasure than seeing those who have so long supported tariff protection suffering under it for their coal. I am not of a vindictive spirit, therefore I do not wish them any such misfortune. But, frankly, I ask the manufacturers of Ontario, how do they like the possibility under a Conservative resolution of paying from 50 cents to $3 more a ton for the coal they use for industrial as well as for domestic purposes? And by a strange anomaly a resolution is introduced by a Conservative in this House this year asking for protection for coal, yet a request was made to the Mines and Minerals committee last year by another eminent member of the Conservative party, Mr. Mewburn, who asked that the drawback allowed on bituminous coal for manufacturing purposes in Ontario should be extended to include domestic bituminous coal also. I sometimes wonder whether they really know if they want protection or not.

There is no fuel problem in Canada. There is no necessity to establish a tariff duty in order to develop our coal fields. There is nothing that can prevent their natural development in time. Artificial stimulation of any industry in this country can only result in great losses to the consuming public. The whole question simmers down to one of transportation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not understand the hon. member yet. He stated that the former duty of 53 cents a ton on what was described as n.o.p. coal had prevented the Alberta coal fields from exploiting the American market, and was removed. I do not say that he is wrong, but I have not got it into my head yet. Would he mind helping me?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I may perhaps help the right hon. gentleman by reading him a resolution from the operators dealing with the question. It is as follows:

> Whereas the said United States tariff on coal is only made applicable to coal from countries imposing duty on coal from the United States such as Canada and
> Whereas the schedule of customs duties of the Canadian tariff, admits anthracite and coke when imported into Canada, free of duty, but imposes a duty of fifty three cents per ton on "Bituminous round and run of mine and coal not otherwise provided" and
> Whereas the coal from the Drumheller field is not anthracite or bituminous and cannot be classified under either head, but is classed by all governments and competent mining authority as "sub-bituminous" or lignite and therefore does not come under either of the specific classifications mentioned in the Canadian schedules, but is covered by the general clause "Coal not otherwise provided for" of item 588 and
> Whereas all coal imported into Canada from the United States is either anthracite or bituminous and little or none of such imported coal could be put in the sub-bituminous or lignite class with Drumheller, Edmonton or Lethbridge domestic coal, it follows that the duty levied by our government on this grade of coal under the general clause "Coal N.O.P." of item 588 is not productive of any revenue to our government and the placing of this grade of coal on the free list in Canada would not cost the government any loss of revenue, but would automatically operate to place our coal on the free list in the United States and admit coal exported by us to the United States markets without payment of duty and
> Whereas the general market conditions in the States of North Dakota, Minnesota, Idaho and Washington, have recently developed opportunity to secure outlet for our excess production and the production from Lethbridge and Edmonton which is now being marketed in the above-named territory in growing quantity and
> Whereas the railways serving the coal fields named are now ready, willing and able to furnish cars for transportation to this territory in greater quantity than they have ever been able to do in the past and are now soliciting this export business as a means of augmenting their own earnings.
> Therefore be it resolved that we ask for the removal of the 53 cents duty.

At that time we had been attempting to ship in coal to the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see. The hon. member says that the American duty automatically goes off with the removal of our duty.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was really no protection there at all.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is a reciprocal arrangement with the American Department of Interior with reference to the definition of coal, and under it we have an accepted definition known as "lignite," which is reciprocally shipped.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has made it quite clear. I will never bother my hon. friend (Mr. Garland) with a question again.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am very grateful to the right hon. gentleman for his kindly forbearance. Mr. F. W. Gray, an eminent authority on coal, and connected with the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, wrote an article about a year ago in Saturday Night, the concluding paragraph of which is as follows:

> Generally, the districts of Canada that contain the most abundant and dependable waterpowers are precisely the districts that are devoid of coal seams. The fullest development of both the coal seams and the waterpowers of Canada cannot relieve us entirely of the necessity to import coal, and both can be encouraged without stint with no fear of either interest suffering, and without the slightest likelihood of meeting the power requirements of the country.
> Similarly, the use of peat as a fuel, and the utilization of oil shales, can be encouraged to the limit of their availability without any danger of affecting the production of coal in Canada, and also with but little hope of decreasing the quantity of coal imported into Canada.

He gives some interesting figures of the increasing consumption of coal consonant with increase in population, and suggests that within thirty years Canada may have a population of fifteen million, of whom eight million will live west of Winnipeg and there will be an important concentration of population in Alberta that will not be agrarian in outlook, but distinctly industrial, with all that this implies in a democratic country. Of fifty-two million tons of coal estimated as likely to be mined, he is of opinion that about thirty-eight millions, or 73 per cent, will be mined in Alberta, Saskatchewan and eastern British Columbia. It looks as if the forecast of some years ago that the Empire is moving westward may be true. We may hope in the future to see in the province of Alberta the juxtaposition of the two great basic industries, agriculture and mining. It is one of the dreams that people perhaps are justified in expecting to see realized.

As I have said, the whole question boils down to transportation: Can the coal be moved from western and eastern points to central Canada and laid down here at a price to compete with anthracite coal from the United States? The evidence on this point before the parliamentary committee last year was exceedingly conflicting. In practically every case independent outside witnesses, men who had at one time or another

9. p.m. been connected with the railways, men who were experts in an independent sense, testified that the coal could be moved at a rate of not much over $6 a ton. Some, like Mr. M. J. Butler, even went so far as to suggest that the rate might be materially reduced even below this figure by the establisment of a special type of hundred ton gondola cars, heavy engines, and so forth. But without going into that aspect of the case at the moment, may I take up some of the points raised by the witnesses last year? At that time, with the layman's limited knowledge of the subject, we did not have very much opportunity to effectively criticize the evidence of the railway experts. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to support the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) when he states that one of the most disgraceful things about the evidence was the fact that the Canadian National witnesses did not testify until after they had consulted with the Canadian Pacific officials. Now, the Canadian Pacific authorities were not free from suspicion of being interested against the movement of this coal. When we considered the interlocking—what shall I call it?—responsibilities of the Canadian Pacific with the Pennsylvania Railway and with some of the Pennsylvania mines, we wonder perhaps if they are not biased in favour of the movement from Pennsylvania rather than from western or eastern Canada to Ontario. Another reason for our suspicion of antagonism would be that the great bulk of the coal to be moved would be by the Canadian National and not by the Canadian Pacific lines. True, there are large coal deposits around Lethbridge and Table on the Canadian Pacific, but by far the greater quantity would be moved over the Canadian National lines. I anticipate that the president of the Canadian National Railways has a pretty hard row to hoe and that he will hardly be in a position to enter into a bitter rate war with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Therefore, it may have been necessary for him through his experts to quote a rate at least not very different from the Canadian Pacific rate, which was $9.80. We suggested, in our report to this House, which was unanimously adopted by this House. that we were not satisfied with the evidence. The report reads: "The views expressed were very divergent and inconsistent,"

And went on to recommend that the government:

—"undertake an independent investigation immediately through whatever channels it deems best, to ascertain the actual cost of carrying coal from eastern and western points to central Canada. We believe that our National railway should carry fuel at cost in this crisis, and your committee suggests that the rates quoted are not cost rates but much higher.

Now with regard to those rates may I point out some extraordinary differences that exist at the present time?

We will take an ordinary single car, not train load lots, moving from Vancouver to let us say Montreal. One of them comes to my mind at this moment. The province of Quebec seems to like Epsom salts. I am not sure just why they like them, but at any rate it is a very easily moved commodity from Vancouver, and a car of Epsom salts from Vancouver to Montreal, a distance of 3,128 miles is charged $450. By the way, this car moves to any point in Quebec province, not to Montreal alone—a distance of 3,128 miles for $450. And moreover I will ask you to note that Epsom salts must be carried on a really first-class car, free from dampness, and also bearing a heavy rate of insurance. It is a strange thing that the railway authorities ask $450, precisely the same amount, for moving one car of coal from Drumheller to Toronto, a distance 1,000 miles less, and coal is a commodity requiring a very different type of car. Putting it on another basis, it costs 15 cents per car mile for the salts, and 23 cents per car mile for the coal. Naturally, one asks why, and Mr. Chard, the railway freight expert of the province of Alberta, suggests that in a trainload lot of 50 cars, moving 40 tons apiece, the rate based on the railway earnings of 1920 would be $6. The railway earnings in 1920 on the Canadian Pacific were $5.26 per train mile, and the freight earnings $5.82 per train mile in the West, and the operating expenses on all traffic $3.88.

Other commodities moving to Montreal from the same point, Vancouver, and the rates charged are found in the railway tariffs, as follows:

	Per car
Crude rubber	$300
Bean oil	300
Cottonseed oil	300
Sago, tapioca flour, tapioca	330
Skins and hides, dry	360
Sheep skins	375
Hardwood	384
Packing, such as burlap	360
Bulbs	350
Chinaware	360

And so on down a long list of articles of very little economic value and of very little necessity to the people. All these can be moved from Vancouver to Montreal for $350 or $400 or less than the railways will move such a necessity as coal for, from Drumheller, a distance of 1,000 miles less. These things have not been explained, and in reply to a query Mr. J. E. Dalrymple, vice-president of the railway, following the publication of this table I am quoting from, said that he could not answer the figures given owing to the complex character of the subject. Sir Henry Thornton giving evidence before the Senate committee last year, in answer to a question put to him by Senator Casgrain, if my memory serves me right, as to the basis for railways rates, said in effect that he could assure the Senator that he could give him any rate at any time between any two points and prove it. That roughly is the meat of his statement; I am not sure that they are the exact words he used.

Then we took evidence on freight rates between Coal Spur near Edmonton and Prince Rupert, and found that the rate was $3.40 per ton for a distance of 863 miles, or 39.02 cents per ton mile. The distance from Edmonton to Toronto is 2,102 miles, and the same rate per ton mile rate applied to Toronto from Coal Spur would be $824 per ton. These figures, I think, deserve further investigation and consideration. I do not think my friends to the extreme right are justified in taking the very timorous attitude they do in regard to the position Canada is in in connection with her coal supply. I do not think that such a grave situation exists that there is danger of a sudden closing down of industry and the entire destruction of the Canadian nation. I can hardly conceive that those who live on the other side of the border have any such extraordinary malicious intent towards this country. As a matter of fact, the residents in some of the states, particularly in Massachusetts, are extremely bitter against the importation of anthracite into Canada because they are not getting enough of it down there, and they took the opportunity of warning us in plenty of time two years ago or more that it might be necessary for us to look to ourselves or to some other source for our coal supply. I think if our friends will leave the tariff out of this question the people of the United States and the people of Canada can solve this question themselves in their own way. I would therefore move, Mr. Chairman:

That the resolution be amended by striking out paragraphs 3 and 4 and substituting therefor the following:

That the government undertake immediately an independent investigation to ascertain the coal cost of carrying coal from eastern and western coal exporting points to central Canada with a view to having a cost rate fixed for such carriage.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am reminded that the amendment contemplates an expenditure of money. However, I am not prepared to render a decision immediately, so the debate may proceed and I will inform the House later on what decision I have reached.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before you pass on the matter Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the amendment is simply carrying out word for word the recommendation of the Mines and Minerals committee passed unanimously by this House last year.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): I think we ought to agree that the matter we are discussing to-day is of national importance. The question has been fairly discussed by hon. gentlemen on both sides and expression has been given to various ideas with respect to the tariff, and otherwise. Notwithstanding that, I believe we are all highly interested in the question of Canada having a fuel supply of her own. The question is, of course, and always has been, how the Dominion is going to accomplish that. The hon. gentleman who moved this resolution has performed a good day's work by bringing this question once more before the House. Last session he moved a somewhat similar resolution into which, however, I think the question of duty did not enter. On that occasion I moved an amendment that the whole matter should be turned over to the select standing committee on Mines and Minerals for investigation and report. That amendment was accepted by the hon. member and the committee went to work. I think that committee performed an excellent service in bringing to the attention of parliament and the country the condition of our coal resources, the condition of transportation as it relates to coal. and the condition that our people may some day be in owing to failure on the part of parliament to deal with this question at an earlier date. My hon. friend the member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) was a very active member of the committee, in fact the most active member on it, and assisted it very greatly during the investigation. He, of course, comes from that part of the West where the coal resources are practically inexhaustible. Due to his efforts, information was brought before us respecting the coal situation, particularly as it referred to the West, that we had not heard before. We had much valuable information given to us by a gentleman named Stutchbury, a commissioner from Alberta with respect to the coal resources of that province. As pointed out by my hon. friend from Bow River, I think it was through his efforts, backed by those of the provincial government, that it became possible for the coal operators of Alberta to replace American anthracite in the Canadian western market, as far east as Winnipeg, to the extent of at least 90 per cent.

I do not know whether I can follow my hon. friend from Bow River in what he said as to whether or not the government have put into effect the recommendations of the committee referred to. I am not prepared to say they have done no advertising, I do not know. Nor am I prepared to say that the government have carried out the recommendation which we made to ascertain the actual cost of carrying coal from western to central Canada. They may have done so, but as to that I cannot speak with any definiteness. But there was one recommendation the government have not undertaken to implement and it is one I think my hon. friend did not touch upon. It was that there should be immediately called at some central point in Canada a conference of coal operators, of representatives of transportation companies, of representatives of the various governments Dominion and provincial, with a few members of the House of Commons committee and of the Senate, to consider the whole question.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): A conference was called in Winnipeg, not such a conference as was recommended but a conference that supplied all that the other would have accomplished.

Mr. CARROLL: It is said that two heads are better than one. The idea the committee had in recommending such a conference was that it should be representative of the federal government, of all the provinces of Canada, of the coal operators, of the transportation companies, and of parliament. I understand my hon. friend is right in saying that a conference was called by the province of Alberta. That conference met in Winnipeg and I have no doubt did excellent work, but it was not such a conference as the committee had in mind when they made their representation to parliament. The government may have considered such a conference would have been too unwieldy. My own idea was that it would be an educational conference composed of representatives from the East, from the Centre, and from the West, at which something could be done. There might be some give and take on the question of the tariff, or any other question affecting the coal industry of Canada. There might be some give and take in so far as the transportation companies of the Dominion are concerned. The conference might have demonstrated that our transportation companies, especially our railway companies, might be able—with great benefit to the country—to carry coal from Alberta into central Canada at no profit but at absolute cost. However, I am not criticizing the government for not having made this legislation effective.

During the committee investigation to which I have referred there is no doubt in the world that the evidence of the transportation magnates was in very many cases contradictory and most inconsistent. I took the trouble last summer to go into the evidence very carefully. Let me say that I know nothing about freight rates or transportation problems from the business standpoint, but having had occasion to go into the evidence in question I came to the conclusion that, with a fair amount of new equipment, coal may be carried from the Drumheller mines in Alberta to the city of Toronto for $5.50 a ton. That is only an opinion of one who has had no training in freight rates, and knows very little or nothing about transportation questions.

I was simply weighing the evidence of the three parties who gave evidence before that committee, the gentlemen from the Canadian Pacific Railway, the freight men from the Canadian National Railways and the independent men who appeared before that committee, who know something about freight rates in this country. However, the best that they would do, so far as the committee was concerned, I think, was $9 a ton, and that in long trains and for only a few months of the year. I think that our Canadian National Railways at least should be forced to carry this coal to central Canada as a national proposition at actual cost, and that is the reason why the committee suggested that we should make that recommendation, that the government should further investigate the cost of carrying this coal to whatever places they deemed sufficient, and ascertain what was the actual cost. Why should not the National Railways carry our coal at cost? I am glad to see that our National system of railways is doing very well now. Last year they surpassed all other years in the money which they took in and in the matter of running the National Railways at a minimum cost. I say it is a great national question. We do not ask the Canadian National Railways to carry coal at less than cost. That would be wrong, but we do say—and I for one will always insist—that we in this country who own those roads, have a right on behalf of the Canadian nation to insist on our National Railways carrying that coal to central Canada at cost.

So far as the transportation of coal in eastern Canada is concerned it is not the difficult problem which western Canada has to struggle with. For example from the mines of Cape Breton to Montreal coal may be transported for, I understand, $1 a ton, which is water transportation, and even at that rate, I am given to understand by men in the industry, they are not able to compete with the American bituminous coal on the markets of Montreal and while last year the mines of Cape Breton were not working at full time,—and they have some of the best day labour in Canada,—while we had a surplus of some hundred thousand tons of coal, notwithstanding the fact that the British Empire Steel Corporation have splendid facilities for transporting coal from Sydney and Roseburn to Montreal, and splendid facilities at Montreal for handling it, only 30 per cent of the bituminous demand of Quebec was met by eastern coal, which goes to show most conclusively that those who say that Nova Scotia coal cannot successfully compete with American bituminous in the markets of Montreal are absolutely correct.

I am not at this stage going into the question of tariff. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has gone into that question very much in detail. I must confess to you, Mr. Speaker, that generally I am a low tariff man. I think if we get revenue sufficient for our needs we are going far enough. I am not going to say very much to-night on the question of tariff, except to point out an inconsistency which obtains, in so far as the tariff on coal is concerned. That inconsistency is that while bituminous coal, run-of-mine coal or screen coal coming from the United States to Canada, carries a duty of 53 cents, slack coal is allowed in at 14 cents per ton duty. I think that is an inconsistency in our tariff, and I say that tariff in respect to bituminous coal should be raised, and why? The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) said this afternoon—and it is absolutely correct—that the American operators will bring coal in, say, to Montreal, where they too have splendid facilities so far as handling the coal is concerned; they will bring in run-of-mine and screen coal, but mostly run-of-mine-coal. They will pay 53 cents per ton duty on the run-of-mine coal. They will bring in slack coal to Montreal, on which they pay 14 cents duty, and will mix the two coals together, sell them as run-of-mine, and they are simply splitting the duty so far as that is concerned. Slack coal is not good for domestic fuel, but is excellent for manufacturing purposes. It is brought into Montreal by the American operators and dumped in with the run-of-mine coal; the two are mixed together and sold as domestic coal. I would like to see that duty levelled up in some way or other, and I am bringing that to the attention of the government, and especially to the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb).

I do not think the people of Ontario would stand for the extra duty, or a duty at all, on anthracite coal. I do not blame them. There is, however, an anthracite dust—and this point I would like to bring to the attention of the minister—which is used first of all for steam purposes and is used also in the manufacture of certain small articles, pipes and the like of that. I would like to bring to the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance the fact that 50 per cent of that anthracite dust which is imported into this country is not used for manufacturing purposes as a fuel at all or as a steam coal.

I have said all that I intend to say on the tariff in regard to coal, except that I do not think the people of central Canada at this stage, without a proper substitute for anthracite, will stand for a duty on anthracite coal. If the coking business becomes in Canada the success which I hope it will be some day, then there may be a reason why they should place a duty on anthracite coal, for the purpose, if for nothing else, of raising a revenue. They have a splendid substitute in the West, and I am hoping the day will come when the operators of Alberta will be able to send their anthracite into central Canada. If that day comes, that will be the time when we should discuss the duty on anthracite coal; but I do not think it is fair to the people of this country at this stage to ask for a duty on anthracite coal when we have nothing to give them in return. I come from the centre of the great coal industry of Nova Scotia, and I have no doubt that my words in this regard to-night, when I say that the time has not yet arrived when we should place a duty on anthracite coal, will not be very kindly received by all the people in my province especially by the operators.

I am coming now to another question. I am hoping the day will come when we will be able to get Alberta coal into the province of Ontario and further east, if you will, as a substitute for anthracite coal. I say, Mr. Speaker, there is one way, and in my humble opinion one way only, by which that can be accomplished, and it is that this government should undertake to so equip our National railways in the matter of carrying coal that they will be able to bring the cost down to three or four, or, at most five dollars a ton. That can be done at a very small outlay. I again bring to the attention of the government the great necessity for giving this matter their utmost consideration and care, and I hope in a short time we shall have our National railways equipped as regards the coal carrying trade as well as some of the American roads are equipped.

I have another proposition to make regarding eastern Canada, and it is a proposition which will not add one cent or one dollar to the cost of coal or coke to the consumer of this country. We heard something to-day about coke ovens which were established some time ago at Hamilton. That is all very well. Those coke ovens are established there, and I understand the government has given them no encouragement by way of subsidy or otherwise. But what good, may I ask, will the coke ovens of Hamilton be to the coal industry of Nova Scotia? I am afraid we cannot at this stage compete with the Americans in the Hamilton market, and the result will be that the coke ovens in Hamilton will be used to coke American bituminous coal which will be sent there to be coked. May I say that I made this suggestion this last year in the committee; but the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and others who are against subsidies and bonuses of all kinds refused to sign the report if my proposition was included, and good fellow that I was, I wanted to have a report that was unanimous, so I did not insist on my proposition being included. We can, however, discuss it to-night. I think I have been fair to the Alberta coal fields when I say that the government should undertake to equip the National railways to such an extent that they will be able to land Alberta coal in Ontario with freight rates of not over $5 a ton. May I ask my hon. friends from Alberta then to give some consideration at least to a proposition that I am going to make as regards eastern coal? I understand Alberta coal is not good for making coke. Much of it is a good substitute for anthracite coal. The government having undertaken to equip our National railways with the proper facilities for carrying coal from Alberta to the East, my proposition to the government as regards the coal trade in the East is this, that they should bonus every ton of coke which is manufactured from Canadian bituminous coal. The cost to the consumer will not be one dollar more. This may cost the government, the people of this country, a little in the way of money, but what an enormous benefit it will be if we in the East can replace in the markets of Canada American coal with a proper substitute, namely, coke which will be manufactured from Canadian bituminous coal? I venture to say that, if that is done, and with the proper facilities by eastern companies for carrying coal from Montreal to Hamilton, every ton of coke which will be manufactured in the coke ovens of Hamilton will be Canadian coal. I submit this proposition to the government, and I think it is something they should take into serious consideration as regards both the East and the West.

This afternoon, I noticed a letter in the Ottawa Evening Journal. It was a surprising thing to me to ascertain the enormous spread between the cost of coal landed at the international boundary and the cost of coal to the householder in the city of Ottawa. There is something wrong. May I quote some figures which are given in this paper, and these figures are absolutely right, because in answer to some questions asked by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), the government replied by giving the quantity of coal brought in and the price of that coal. From these figures it is ascertained that anthracite coal cost at the border for the last three years, $8,85, $8.74 and $8.99, respectively. The freight rate from the international boundary through which this coal comes, is $1.76 a ton, and this makes the actual cost of coal in Ottawa around $10. Is it not a marvellous thing that the coal is sold in Ottawa for $17 a ton? The people of Ottawa and of other Ontario cities are being, I was going to use a stronger word, but I will say fleeced, not by the coal operators as much as by the coal dealers. This is another question which, I think, the government should undertake to investigate on behalf, especially of the people of Ontario. The whole question is an important one and one that should be considered. The government should at the earliest possible moment take into consideration the two propositions which I have made, the one regarding proper equipment for our National railways, and the other regarding the question of a bonus on coke manufactured from Canadian bituminous coal. All these things are important, and I hope the governmen will give them their best consideration. If they sit around their round table and give the whole matter their consideration, I am sure they will make both those suggestions of mine effective in a short time.

I wish to make a few observations as regards the coal industry in Nova Scotia. I am glad to say that at the present time the industry in Nova Scotia is in a flourishing state. Unfortunately, if they keep on at the present rate of production, before the 1st June, they will likely have on their hands a surplus of one million tons of coal for which they have not got at the present time a market. The mines are running six days a week in order to give the employees employment; but in doing that they are banking a surplus of a million tons for which they have no prospective market at the present time. This is unfortunate, and if something is not done to enable the coal operators of Nova Scotia to compete more successfully with the coal operators of the United States, I am afraid that the million tons of coal, which the operators of Nova Scotia will have on hand on the 1st June and for which they have no market at present, will be on their hands, at least for the remainder of the season. There is no doubt in the world that a basic industry like coal, steel-making, farming or the rest, is the life of Canada, and if there is no financial success attending those basic industries, if I may call them so, then I have some fear for the future of Canada. If we are not able to give the manufacturing industry in this country which uses coal as a fuel in its factories, five dollar coal, then I have some fear for the future of manufacturing in Canada. The whole question of coal is so interwoven with farming, steel-making and every other industry in this country, that it is most important that we should give our whole minds to this coal question in order, first, to give Canada a cheap supply of coal and, second, to ensure the Canadian people always a supply of coal of which we have inexhaustible quantities in both the East and the West. Why should we send $100,000,000 year after year to the American people when we have at our doors the very product which we are buying from them? Why should the people of Canada give to American workmen $25,000,000 of that money which might be spent in Canada, which ought to be spent in Canada, and which I trust in a short time will be spent in Canada by Canadian operators for the benefit of Canadian labour. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether you have ruled upon the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). If you rule the hon. member's amendment out of order I beg to submit a motion in amendment thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) is in the following terms:

That paragraphs 3 and 4 be struck out and that the following be subtituted therefor:

That the government undertake an independent investigation immediately to ascertain the actual cost of carrying coal from eastern and western coal exporting points to central Canada with a view to having a cost rate fixed for such carriage.

If this amendment were adopted by the House if would bind the government to undertake immediately an independent investigation. This of necessity would entail the expenditure of money by reason of the taking of evidence, the summoning of witnesses and the appointment of investigators. If such investigators were judges of the land, there is of course a provision in the statutes which would compel them to act without expense to the government. As the amendment stands, however, it would involve in any case, if adopted by the House, a charge upon the public treasury, and upon that ground it is out of order. In this connection I may cite certain authorities. First of all there is the English rule, No. 71 which is quoted in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. This rule provides:

If any motion be made in the House for any aid, grant or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the consolidated fund or out of money to be provided by parliament, or for any charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof shall not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the House shall think fit to appoint, and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole House before a resolution or vote of the House do pass thereon.

There is a well established form of procedure which is always followed when any expenditure is involved in any of the measures that are submitted to the House. The precedents are numerous and on many occasions I have quoted the rules. I shall refer now to section 626 of Beauchesne:

This House will not proceed upon any petition, motion or bill for granting any money ,or for releasing or compounding any sum of money owing to the Crown but in a committee of the whole House.

And section 629 reads:

The recommendation of the Crown is needed for such measures as bills relating to the extension of time for the repayment of the deposit which has become liable to forfeiture in the case of a private bill; the release or compounding of sums due to the Crown; the repeal of an exemption from an existing duty, as the burthen of the duty is thereby augmented; a proposal to repeal an existing drawback on export of sugar as it effects an increase of charge upon the importers who desired to export sugar.

This applies to any question involving an expenditude or an alienation of the funds of the Crown. There must be a resolution in due form preceded by consent of the Crown. Of course, there is an exception in cases where an abstract resolution is considered by the House. Bourinot refers to this exception in the following words:

A practice has grown up in the House of allowing the introduction of resolutions by private members, when they do not directly involve the expenditure of public money, but simply express an abstract opinion on a matter which may necessitate a future grant. As this is a question not always understood, it may be explained that such resolutions, being framed in general terms, do not bind the House to future legislation on the subject, and are merely intended to point out to the government the importance and necessity of such expenditure.

Had the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Bow River been drafted in abstract terms it would not have been open to objection upon the grounds I have stated. If, for example, the hon. member had suggested therein that it was desirable that the government should consider the advisability of undertaking an independent investigation to ascertain the actual cost of carrying coal, then, according to Bourinot and May and other authorities upon this particular point, the amendment would be admissible, in view of the fact that it would only be a pious expression of opinion, not necessarily committing the government to any public expenditures. Should the House be prepared to consent unanimously to the course I have suggested, the hon. member may be allowed to re-draft his amendment in the qualifying terms I have indicated. Such an amendment would be in order; otherwise, as the amendment is at present drafted, I shall have no other course open than to rule it out of order for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think it is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the intent of my amendment is to serve the purpose you have suggested. It would be of no advantage to me to have my amendment ruled out of order, and for that reason I ask the indulgence of the House to be allowed to substitute the following modified amendment, in keeping with the suggestion you have made:

That paragraphs 3 and 4 be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

That this House urges upon the government the desirability of undertaking an investigation to ascertain the actual cost of carrying coal from eastern and western exporting points to central Canada, with a view to having a cost rate fixed for such carriage.

I trust that the resolution in this amended form will meet with the approval of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment as modified by the hon. member is in order and may be voted upon if the unanimous consent of the House can be obtained for its submission. The original amendment is of course out of order on the grounds I have stated. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to submit the amendment in its present modified form?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): I do not know that I shall object to the revised amendment, which, as you suggest, Mr. Speaker, is after all but the expression of a pious opinion. However, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is now in the hands of the Interior department, in the Mines and Minerals branch, all the information which such an investigation as is proposed could secure. At any rate, the department has the bulk of that information. But above and beyond that the Board of Railway Commissioners has in its traffic experts the best machinery on this continent for finding out that very thing. Therefore I really cannot understand why we should establish another body to make a similar investigation. If any person believes that the rates quoted by the railways for the transportation of coal from eastern and western Canada to Ontario and Quebec are not low enough he can have access to the Board of Railway Commissioners and their experts. I venture to say that the experience and ability of these men is far wider than and superior to that of any layman. The government is anxious to evolve some policy which will enable Canadians to use their own coal to the utmost, and if transportation rates stand in the way of this being done, I would submit that the Board of Railway Commissioners be asked to investigate the matter, it being the body which parliament has created for ascertaining the very information that is called for by this amendment.

Mr. CARROLL: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not be ruled out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: No. I want the opinion of the House, because the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) could not amend his amendment without unanimous consent. Am I to construe the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals as an objection to the amendment?

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not offer any objection Mr. Speaker. I would not care to leave the hon. member in a position that his amendment could not be put to the House, but I was pointing out that we already have the necessary machinery to effect the purpose which his amendment calls for.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then I take it that by unanimous consent the hon. member is allowed to substitute for his first amendment the one which I have just read?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CARROLL: Mr. Speaker, last year, as I pointed out at the beginning of my address, an amendment was moved by myself to a similar resolution sponsored by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church). My amendment on that occasion was to refer the matter to the committee on Mines and Minerals for investigation. I am bound to say that the resolution having come on rather late in the session, the committee on Mines and Minerals did not investigate the matter as thoroughly as we should like them to have done. For example, many members of the committee wanted the chairman to ask leave to continue the investigation after the House had risen. I purpose in a few moments to move an amendment to the amendment to the effect that the resolution be referred to the committee on Mines, Forests and Waters. I shall try to show the House why it should support my amendment in preference to that of my hon. friend from Bow River. Suppose that the House tonight pass the hon. member's amendment, it would not bind the government to anything. There may or may not be any further investigation. On the contrary, if the matter goes before the committee on Mines, Forests and Waters, there will be some action taken this session, and we will be hopeful of continuing our investigation of last year with some prospect of bringing it to a conclusion.

With regard to some of the comments made by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), I was one of those last year who wanted to recommend to the House that the whole question of freight rates on coal should be submitted to the Railway Commission. I am not going to say why that was not done. Many members of the committee did object that the Railway Commiscion was not in a position at that time to say what a rate on coal from Alberta to Ontario should be over newly equipped Canadian National lines. I believe that the committee will be able to make a recommendation along these lines this year, because further information will be available with regard to the equipment of the American coal carrying roads. I am saying this for the benefit of the hon. member for Bow River because I know he is deeply interested in this question and wishes to take an attitude which will be for the general benefit of Canada with respect to our coal supply. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, as an amendment to the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Kyte):

> That the following words be inserted after the word "House" in the second line of the resolution: "the select standing committee on Mines, Forests and Waters be instructed to consider the question as to whether."

I may say that the hon. member who moved the resolution (Mr. Church) is willing to support this amendment. As a matter of fact, he suggested it to me during the recess.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Carroll moves, seconded by Mr. Kyte:

> That the following words be inserted after the word "House" in the second line of the resolution: "the select standing committee on Mines, Forests and Waters be instructed to consider the question as to whether"

The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I think we can all support the motion of the hon. member for North Toronto Mr. Church) without any risk of disadvantage resulting to any part of Canada.

10 p.m. The amendment to the amendment we can also support. But what I cannot understand is the disposition of the member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who having spoken of the splendid inactivity of the government in this particular, now proposes to refer the matter to them again by an amendment which means just the same as that presented to them last year. Neither can I understand his attitude towards this whole question. The people of Ontario are not so much interested in the matter of tariffs on coal as they are in the matter of supply to the people, and of benefit to our western and our eastern industries. We had an idea that this might benefit the people of the West, but the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) is perfectly indifferent to the immediate active development of the coal industry in the West. In fact, he believes that a normal development such as is going on at the present time is quite sufficient.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I be permitted to correct the hon. member? I suggested that a normal development was preferable to an artificial one.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The explanation does not change the interpretation which I placed upon the hon. member's discussion of the matter. We were impressed with the points that were brought up this afternoon, that we are yearly pouring into the pockets of the people of the United States an immense amount of money that we believe could well be used in this country; it would provide employment and improve our trade balance; it would mean a great deal to the value of our dollar. I think sufficient has been said along that line. I think we have all come to the conclusion that this is a question of transportation. That is the point that touches Ontario to-day, and that is the line along which we want the government to view the case. It is not a matter of tariffs or anything else so much as transportation.

I thought it was significant that this whole discussion was introduced to-day, on the birthday of our Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham). I am sure it is the wish of every member of this House that his life may for many, many years be as sweet as the aroma of the flowers which decked his desk, and that it will lack the sting of the plant on which they blossomed. This is a matter that we can reasonably refer to him for his consideration along that line. But I was surprised that he would attempt to sidetrack this question again to-night to the Board of Railway Commissioners. We would rather the government take this matter into its own consideration and either through a special committee or through the standing committee on Mines and Minerals give an answer in a very short time. I must say that I considered that the Speaker's ruling would be given against the amendment because it spoke of an immediate investigation, and that we cannot expect from the present government. They have failed to give us an immediate answer on this question, and they are still likely to, but I would like to bring one point to their attention to-night which would perhaps induce them to use a little more expedition in their treatment of this question than they have shown in the past. The explanation as to coke given by the minister in charge of the department is not satisfactory; in fact, the Minister of Railways just came in to explode these remarks of his colleague.

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

Peat, of course, will develop the province of Ontario, which is acting in co-operation with the department along that line; but we have been told that the supply of peat will not last for any length of time and therefore the government should take further action. The point which I wish to bring to their attention is related to one feature of the Speech from the Throne which has been discussed thoroughly and which we hear repeated almost daily in this House, and that is the matter of emigration from this country. There is no doubt that there are many, many reasons for emigration from Canada. There is the matter of unemployment, which the government has failed to deal with, and in respect of which it has failed to produce any policy of relief. There is the matter of the closing up of our industries, for which again the government has no policy. That adds to the emigration. But over and above that there is this point: We expect in this country a population which really belongs to that area of the world lying between the 40th and the 50th parallel of latitude, and I would draw your attention to this fact: The world has always been under the mastery of people who inhabit that part of the world. They are the people who can stand a rigorous climate. They are the people especially adapted to the development of Canada. It is a race in which is mixed the Pict, the Scot, the Briton, the Scandinavian, the Angles, the Saxons and the Danes; all these people have entered into the development of this present race, and we would like to have a country where that people would develop and increase, and become a great race.

In addition to the facts I have given as to the cause of emigration, there is the attitude of that race which we desire to come to our shores, and which should be the race we should get to develop this country. If they cannot secure a proper and a sufficient supply of fuel to keep them and their families warm, their eyes will naturally turn to a warmer climate. I think that is a point that the government should realize, and it should impel them to take some action in this matter. If the people I have spoken of can see in this country a proper supply of fuel for every part of this country they will come here and stay; their minds will not be directed to a southern climate, and if nothing else will impel the government to take action in this matter I think this consideration of securing and preserving the race we desire to develop in this country should appeal to them.

I am not going to take up the time of the House further. I would, in conclusion, impress upon the government that some action should be taken immediately, and this session of the House should not be allowed to pass without some answer from the government in regard to this very important question.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): I have listened with some interest to this debate on the fuel question in this country. The idea of the resolution is that a national policy in relation to our coal supply should be adopted. According to the debate the idea of a national policy seems to be one that is not so much for the safety of the people's fuel supply, but one that would keep in this country the $100,000,000 which goes annually to the United States for coal. Now in 1878 we established a National Policy which was to corral the home market for the manufacturers of Canada. That National Policy has proved a detriment to this country, and this national policy which is being advocated to-day regarding coal is not unlike its predecessor of 1878. The idea at that time was to keep the trade of this country moving east and west. This was largely accomplished as far as goods were concerned, but instead of the population going east and west they have gone south. This is due to the fact that the construction of an unnatural dam, designed to turn trade out of its natural course, was bound to result either in the dam giving way or in its overflowing. The National Policy of 1878 has proved futile as regards the trade of this country. The national policy for fuel is bound to prove equally futile if the workers of this country will have to pay an excessive price for the commodities they need. Sir, it is unreasonable to think that the coal of Alberta or Nova Scotia can be brought to Hamilton, Guelph, or other Ontario points at a price to compete with American anthracite even with a duty in its favour. To shut out American coal by a duty so that the price of coal would not be based on competition would be disastrous even if we could keep at home the hundred million dollars now spent for outside coal. It would be a much better national policy for this country to have industries established and centres of population created at the coal fields themselves. The old National Policy of 1878 has resulted in the concentration of wealth and industry in centres like Montreal and Toronto, while the Maritime provinces and the prairies, where the coal fields are, are starved because even the very earnings of agriculture are concentrated in these great centres. The same thing is true even of the small industries that at one time dotted the rural parts of Ontario, and this province itself is suffering on that account. If we wanted to tighten up the National Policy of 1878, which was designed to keep our money at home, there are many ways in which it could be done. Indeed some of the gentlemen who are advocating a national policy regarding fuel are careful only to buy Havana cigars when they wish to smoke. They would not think of buying a cigar made of Canadian tobacco, although that would be a patriotic thing to do for a Canadian who indulges in the habit of smoking. Indeed, when we examine the sources of the supplies that are used in this House we do not buy our lead pencils, pens or pen holders in this country. We send to the United States for such articles. Why is that done?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because we have the wrong government.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think the hon. member is talking of supplies that were on hand from the last government.

Mr. EVANS: I was thinking that we have had a wrong government ever since 1878. Why turn our attention particularly to coal. If we want to carry out the National Policy of 1878 why do we everlastingly grant drawbacks on the imports of raw materials which could very well be supplied by our own country? Why, Sir, I have it on the authority of the manager of one of our large implement factories that he depends to-day on the United States for about 70 per cent of his steel. Why should that be the case after having had in Canada for so many years a tariff policy, and a system of bounties and bonuses? Perhaps some hon. gentleman to my right can answer the question. The leader of the opposition is smiling, I have no doubt he has an answer ready.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. EVANS: Reverting again to the question of coal. Seven dollars a ton was mentioned as the price at which a ton of coal could be hauled from Drumheller to Guelph or Hamilton. I think that a most exorbitant price. This would represent for a train hauling 2,000 tons a sum of $14,000 which surely is an extravagant figure for hauling a train of coal from Alberta to Ontario. Here again the fact remains that the National Policy of 1878 has, by artificial means, raised the price of everything to such a high figure that we cannot profitably work our own natural resources. One of the members for Nova Scotia who spoke desires to build up the coal industry in his own province by granting a bonus. Sir, a bonus is equally as pernicious as a protective duty. We granted bonuses last year to several industries and this policy will yet prove a boomerang to the trade of Canada. If the proposed national policy for fuel is to be based on a price to be charged for some other commodity I would warn the government to be careful against identifying themselves with it in any way whatever. If the trade of the country is allowed to follow its natural channels there will be no need for tariffs, or bonuses, or bounties. It is time the trade and commerce of Canada was released from the paternalism in which it has been enmeshed by different governments. Anything likely to divert trade from its natural channels is to be avoided at all times. It might even be disastrous to Ontario if the present system of trading in coal became disrupted. We can yet solve our coal problem by foregoing government paternalism, with its price fixing privileges of which we have had too much. The government of Canada has interfered too much in industry and commerce. A lessening of that interference rather than an increase is needed.

Mr. LOGAN: I have listened to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and also to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll), the latter proposing that this matter be referred to the committee on Mines and Minerals. I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that at the last session a very exhaustive inquiry was made into this question by that very committee. In the Journals of the House for 1923, on pages 584 and 585, is to be found the report of the committee which contains the following paragraph:

> Your committee further recommend that the government undertake an independent investigation immediately through whatever channels it deems best to ascertain the actual cost of carrying coal from eastern and western points to central Canada. We believe that our national railways should carry fuel at cost. In this instance your committee suggests that the rates quoted are not cost but much higher.

Now the Mines and Minerals committee having made the report last year that there should be an independent investigation held, I am bound to say that so far as I am concerned, I cannot vote for the motion to refer it back to that committee, but I will vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland).

The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) who is leading the House to-night suggests that this matter be sent to the Board of Railway Commissioners. That is about the last place I want to see this matter considered. The Minister of Railways was not here this afternoon, and I do not know that what I had to say would have changed his mind or interested him, but I pointed out this afternoon that we had gone into the matter most exhaustively last year and called railway officials from all railways, freight managers and officials, and we found that they would give us a rate, but we found no official connected with the government who could tell us what was the cost. We do not want the Railway Commission to establish a rate in this matter. We are trying to point out that this is a national question. What we want first is an independent commission, if you like, or an independent committee, I care not what the name may be, to investigate the cost of carrying coal where proper equipment is provided. I think it is admitted by everybody that the question of how much it will cost to carry coal from western and eastern Canada to central Canada is practically a matter of equipment. How much will it cost to provide a solid train to carry coal from distant points to central Canada? The Virginia railway of the United States carries coal in solid trains, the same as we carry wheat in this country in solid trains. The Chesapeake and Ohio has adopted the same rule to a certain extent. Some other railroads in the United States have also adopted this manner of conveying coal. Suppose we refer this back to the Mines and Minerals committee, we get to the same point we got last year. We have no power to call the president of the Virginia Railway before the Mines and Minerals Committee of Canada. We have no power to call any official from any of these railways to give evidence before this committee, but if we could appoint a commission, even if it be a commission of only one, let it be Mr. Butler, if you like, and let him be sent to the offices of the Virginia and other railways, and I have no doubt they will have great pleasure in giving him the evidence. Mr. Butler had some of the evidence last year in a letter from the president of one of these companies to himself. But we cannot get any further with the Mines and Minerals committee, and I submit when we have secured the actual cost of equipment and on top of that the real and actual cost of carrying coal in solid trains, then it is not up to the Railway Commission of Canada to establish a rate. It is up to the government of Canada to adopt a policy in this regard as to whether we are going to make this country independent of the United States of America, so far as coal is concerned.

I therefore will have to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), because I believe it is a step in the right direction, and if I vote for the amendment to the amendment I only get back to where we ended last year, to a point where we cannot proceed very much further.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): I may say that I cannot support the amendment to the amendment nor can I support the amendment. For the last session of parliament I was requested by the Prime Minister to accept the amendment to refer this matter to a committee on the understanding as I understood it, that they would consider the whole question and get the Railway Commission to hold a hearing. I wrote the Railway Commission asking them to hold a meeting and fix a rate. In the month of August the Hon. F. B. Carvell wrote me to make an application to the board, myself. I went to the Ontario government and to the city of Toronto, and an application is now pending by the Ontario government to the Railway Commission in regard to it. Last year the matter went to the committee on Mines and Minerals and the chairman of the committee tried to do what he could. He got his report prepared after twenty-five meetings, and that report was brought into the House three hours before parliament prorogued, and no opportunity given to members to discuss it.

Under the railway Act the commission should act of its own volition or the government can direct them to hold an inquiry and fix rates for all localities with equality of treatment for East and West and Alberta and the Maritime provinces. The people got tired of the Railway Commission's delays. I think it is not the duty of the individual to secure a supply of coal, it is the duty of the government of Canada to get a coal supply all Canadian. President Coolidge of the United States was not in the office three days before he summoned the Interstate Commerce Commission, the coal miners, and the railway barons before him, and he told them to regulate these rates. It was the duty of his government to see that it was done forthwith, and it was done. The Railway Commission has fallen down for three years, and it should now be referred to them with instructions to act. If this matter was referred to the committee tonight, we would not get a report until the dying days of the session. If it were referred to the Railway Commission they should act. They would examine witnesses, and ask the officials of the railroads to file tariffs and to go into the whole rate case east and west. I contend that the people of Canada want something done. Here we have an amendment to an amendment, and I cannot vote for either of them. The motion speaks for itself and I am for the whole motion. We will never get anything done in Canada if we adopt some policy like that— the old National Policy that made this country what it is to-day. We have a Railway Commission, but it has fallen down. The Railway Act is ignored by both railways. The president of one of the railways says he is in charge of fixing rates in this country and I would like to see the Railway Commission get busy and do something. I agree with the four clauses of this resolution. We should accept this resolution, as it is the only way we will ever get anything done in Canada, because sooner or later they will take action across the border and put an embargo on, and you will have to adopt some drastic policy. We will have another sample of them acting first as they did in the Fordney-McCumber tariff. It will be the same thing in reference to coal. There may be a strike. If we wait the coal barons will get in their work and we will get less coal every year, and by and bye we will be shut off from the supply altogether through an embargo. If this matter is referred to a committee parliament may close before we get any report. The time has passed for playing with motions and moving amendments. The time has come for this parliament to do something. It is for the government to take action and to direct the Railway Commission to act and fix a tariff. The last two or three clauses of the resolution are controversial, no doubt, but you will never get anything done unless you adopt measures such as this. Coal should be on a preferential basis. It is a food necessity. Every article of food requires the consumption of coal in preparation for the table. Electric light and every form of electric generation require the consumption of coal, and we must see to it that we are supplied with coal. The people can do without food for a meal or two, but they cannot do without fuel with a temperature of twenty or forty degrees below zero as we had the winter before last and last winter. As regards the third paragraph about duty and adequate protection, if the United States put an embargo on coal, Canada will have to depend on her own coal supplies. The first two paragraphs, I think, were pretty well agreed on last session, and Sir Henry Thornton, Sir Clifford Sifton, Dr. Camsell of the Mines department and others are all in favour of the first two clauses of the resolution. Something should be done in order to get a reasonable rate, because, I think, it has been proved that the coal can be transported at a reasonable rate without loss to the railways. I am anxious to get something done so that the country may get some benefit from the steam roads of Canada. After our country has spent $900,000,000 in direct and indirect aid to railways, are we to say that we cannot get any of the resources out of the provinces? The government of Canada owns 20,000 miles of railway and a merchant marine, and it should be able to assist in this matter. If, as I pointed out this afternoon, a private company was able to make money by buying a government merchant vessel and shipping freight to the head of the lakes, surely the government merchant marine can be utilized for the purpose of bringing coal from Wales or the Maritime provinces to central Canada. What has been done by private enterprise surely can be done by the government merchant marine in carrying coal from the Maritime provinces. For these reasons I should like to see something done here to-night. I am not in favour of having this matter referred to a committee, in which case nothing will be done at all. If this matter is allowed to stand over, you will find that the railways will continue to do nothing as they have been doing in the last two years. I would, therefore, like to see some definite action taken tonight on this important question.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I am strongly opposed to the resolution, because it contains one inaccuracy and one or two implied inaccuracies. It tries to establish in the minds of the people of this country a situation that does not exist. The opening paragraph reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for Canada to have a national policy in relation to its coal supply and that no part of Canada should be left dependent on United States for such supply.

In my opinion, no part of Canada is dependent on the United States at the present time for its coal supply in the proper sense of that term. With the enormous coal fields in eastern and western Canada, we cannot be dependent on the United States for our coal supply even in central Ontario to any permanent extent, because if such a situation as that stated by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) should arise, if the United States should be so insane as to put an embargo or an excessive export duty on coal, they would know immediately that with the immense coal supplies of this country, we could take care of ourselves. We might be temporarily inconvenienced, but the inconvenience would be only temporary.

With regard to hard coal, the situation is this, that within the last two or three years we have been getting a large quantity of anthracite coal from the British Islands, and every year the quantity is increasing. I have been informed by a man in the wholesale business in Montreal that next year one-half or, perhaps, two-thirds of the hard coal consumed in that city will come from the British Islands; that the quality will be fully equal to United States' coal, and the price lower. Therefore, we are not dependent on the United States for even our hard coal supplies.

Mr. CARROLL: I agree with the hon. gentleman to a certain extent. The whole question is one of cost; but if we are getting so much of a substitute for hard coal from the British Islands, how does it happen that we imported 400,000 tons more anthracite coal from the United States this year than we did three years ago?

Mr. HUGHES: I cannot answer that question. The country needs the coal, I suppose; the country is demanding it; but as a matter of fact, our coal importations from the British Islands are increasing very fast, and the supply there is equal to the demand, in fact, it is far greater than the supply in the United States. In addition to that, we are providing a substitute for hard coal that will take care of a large proportion of the slack coal mined in eastern and western Canada. I have been informed by some of the mine officials at Sydney that a very large proportion of slack coal is used for that purpose and, therefore, they are able to manufacture it cheaply. We have been told this afternoon by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), who seems to understand the question fairly well, that this coke is just as good as the hard coal imported from the United States. I want to refer to that to show that, contrary to the language of this resolution, we are not dependent on the United States for our coal supply, and that we need not worry so much about any alarming conditions arising in the immediate future.

The second paragraph of the resolution reads:

> The government should immediately consider the initiation of an all British and Canadian coal supply and that such a policy is both a social and economic necessity and in the best interests of the future of Canada.

I have already answered that paragraph, I think, by my remarks in regard to the coal supplies.

The third paragraph states:

> That a duty should be placed on coal from the United States to ensure an all British supply for Canada and thus afford adequate protection to coal mined and coked under the British flag.

Of course the flag would have to be brought in. Anything originating in Toronto would have to mention the flag. The situation is this: The duty at the present time on bituminous coal coming from the United States is 53 cents a ton. The same duty is imposed on coal from Canada entering the United States. I do not know the quantity, but I know that, as a matter of fact, the coal mines of Nova Scotia ship coal to the United States.

Mr. CARROLL: Not this year.

Mr. HUGHES: They have been doing so in the past.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): When there was no duty .

Mr. HUGHES: All right. Take the duty off. There is an arrangement between the United States and Canada that the moment we take the duty off our coal, they will take it off theirs. Then there is a market with cheap water transportation right at the door almost of the eastern Canadian coal producers. We have been told by the Minister of the Interior this afternoon that the mines of Alberta are shipping coal into the United States. If you remove the duty, would that industry not increase? Would those exportations not increase? Would it not be just as well for the miners and the people of Alberta to ship their coal to the United States as it would be to send it to Ontario? Would it not be better for the people and the industries of Ontario to get their coal from across the border where they could get it cheaper? We have been told by the Minister of the Interior that the price of coal at the pit mouth, just south of the boundary line in Illinois, is $1.75 a ton. In Nova Scotia, coal cannot be mined for any figure like that at the pit mouth. It would be at least $3 or $4 a ton, or twice as much as the price of coal in Illinois. What duty could be imposed upon it that would compel the people of Ontario to buy our coal? My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) to-day suggested that 20 per cent would be sufficient. Twenty per cent on $1.75 or $2.00! Why, 100 per cent. would not be sufficient because there is 100 per cent of a difference in the price. No duty that the Canadian people would stand would be sufficient to take the coal of Nova Scotia into Ontario, or at least into the western part of that province. According to my view of the matter, the proper solution of this problem is to meet the people of the United States on equal terms. It would be to the advantage of Nova Scotia, to the advantage of Alberta, to the advantage of Ontario and to the advantage of the whole Dominion. That is the proper solution. I should like to have the privilege of voting against the resolution, but as the amendment disposes of it I will vote for that amendment. When the time comes, however, for a further consideration of this subject I shall certainly implement by proper action the views I hold in this matter, unless something is done to cause me to change them. I see that my hon. friend from Cumberland smiles. Well, I am not above changing my opinions, but I must have substantial reasons for doing so. I submit however that I am stating facts that cannot be controverted, and in my judgment this resolution is just a scheme to inveigle the members of the Maritime provinces and those of Alberta, if not indeed of the three western provinces, and to tie them up to a policy of protection, so that when that question comes before the House in its true form they may not be able to vote against it. That in my opinion is the object behind this resolution and I am therefore going to vote against anything of the kind.

Mr. ALEXANDRE J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.): I wish to say just a few words before the vote is taken upon this question. The hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) apparently is anxious to grant further concessions to the United States coal operators so that they may be enabled to further their sales of bituminous coal in Canadian territory notwithstanding the fact that our coal mining industry in the Maritime provinces and in Alberta—although I do not speak with any authority in reference to the latter province—is to-day in a very serious condition owing to competition from the American product. My hon. friend from King's cannot support the resolution, because he thinks there is a suggestion of protection in it. Protection is a bugbear to many members of this House; and because the words "national policy" are embodied in the first paragraph of the resolution, in the minds of hon. gentlemen there is at once aroused an antagonism to the motion, irrespective of its merits; as though a national policy in regard to coal had any reference to the great National Policy introduced in 1878. I say great in this instance because that policy has been shown to be so by the mere fact that it has been upheld by every great statesman since that time. The coal industry of Nova Scotia to-day stands in need of immediate relief, and as the hon. member for Cumberland has pointed out, when the question was first brought up during the present session it was introduced by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) supported by the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken); so that at all events we of the Maritime provinces cannot be charged with taking a parochial view of this question or of advancing arguments to further sectional interests in the Maritime provinces. This question, Mr. Speaker, affects the whole Dominion, and for the life of me I cannot see what advantage we are to gain by shelving the resolution or sending it to the committee on Mines and Minerals, or to the Railway Commission, or to any other special body. Speaking of immediate relief in this matter, I want to endorse the words of the hon. member for Cumberland. We want to see Canadian coal consumed on the National railways, and we want preferential rates on the railways to enable us to send our coal to the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario, the rates at the present time being impossible. The increase in coal transportation rates between 1914 and 1922 from $2.50 per ton to $4.70 as between Sydney and Montreal represents an advance of 88 per cent, which is unjustifiable. In my opinion it could stand a reduction. The rates were increased in 1918 by 40 per cent, and I venture to say that if there were a reduction of 30 per tent in the rates for the transportation of our coal the railways would suffer no serious loss.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. gentleman think that the government or parliament could force the railways to carry coal at a great loss and then compel the taxpayers to make up the deficit, any more than they could force the railways to carry apples and other produce of Nova Scotia at a reduced rate?

Mr. DOUCET: I would want to have it established first that there would be any serious loss in carrying coal from Nova Scotia to central Canada at a rate 30 per cent lower than that at present charged. It has not been demonstrated that such a reduction would mean any serious loss to the railways, and until that is shown I shall maintain that a reduction of 30 per cent on existing rates would be justified. If the mines in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—because we have coal in that province—and in Alberta could supply the 16,000,000 tons of bituminous coal which is imported to-day from the United States, providing that transportation rates from Alberta to Toronto would not exceed $6 a ton, this country would benefit to the extent of something like $96,000,000 in this respect. If it is admitted that between 70 and 75 per cent of all transportation costs remain in the country through which the trade is transported, then I submit it is an item of such magnitude as requires the immediate consideration of this House. Therefore I urge that the coal situation calls for relief without further delay, and that we can all adopt the resolution of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church).

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) this afternoon raised a question, in which I am particularly interested, with regard to the briquetting plant at Bienfait. I had intended to raise the question myself, and was very pleased with the information given by the hon. minister (Mr. Stewart). I would direct the attention of the House to an order in council which was passed in August, 1918, directing the Lignite Utilization Board to find out two things: One, if the lignite located in those coal fields could be carbonized; two, if it would be a commercial proposition. The report recently issued by the board demonstrates beyond question, I believe, that the feasibility of carbonization may be considered established. It is within the knowledge of the House that the government of Manitoba withdrew from further participation in the experimental work, leaving the government of Saskatchewan and the federal government to carry on. I should like to know if the government proposes to instruct the board, or some other body, to continue the experiments to demonstrate the commercial possibilities of briquetting lignite at Bienfait.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In reply to the hon. gentleman I have already mentioned that the experiment in carbonization of lignite at Bienfait has proven successful. The Manitoba government having withdrawn, if the experimental work is to be continued, some other arrangement will have to be made between the Saskatchewan government and ourselves.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: (Leader of the Opposition): Before the House comes to a decision, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement on the original motion and the various amendments that have been moved since. I do not want to be content with a mere hackneyed repetition of the assertion that the resolution itself touches an important subject. To my mind the question is so transcendently important that it demands an even more radical assertion of principle at the hands of the House than is embodied in any of the motions now before us. It has engaged the minds of the Canadian people for some years, and in increasing degree it has, up to some time ago at least, engaged the attention of the Canadian government. The attention given to the problem has been intensified of late because of events that have transpired, events that have seemed to threaten at times our supply of fuel altogether, and as well because of economic tendencies which have made all the more aggravated the suffering we endure because of the withdrawal from domestic circulation of so much of our money for the purchase of American coal.

I deplore for several reasons the continued purchase of American coal in the quantities which we have been importing. First of all, it surely is axiomatic to say that government policy should always tend to minimize to the utmost the import requirements of a country relative to its consumption. I know there are some who will still argue the contrary, but really it staggers my comprehension how any one can possibly take another view. And I observe that no government ever takes any other view. I venture to say that if a new government should be formed of any party now in this House, however incipient, it would not take another view when it faced the responsibilities of power. To argue that it is not at all to our injury that we should send $100,000,000 to another country for coal instead of producing it here because we have to buy something from that other country or we cannot sell to it—how impotent is the contention! Cannot they pay us? Have they not three-quarters of the gold of the world? What is to hinder them paying us? As long as we continue in the course we are now pursuing, we are going to exhibit a limping, halting gait—simply for the reason that we are leaving others to do what it is within our power to do ourselves. One hundred million dollars, if spent within Canada, would not only be used within its own limits for the production of coal, but because of the people being here to use it the money would be turned over and over, and benefits multiplied would accrue therefrom.

But besides—and this is what I want to emphasize more because it has not been much referred to this afternoon—this country is not in a desirable, I had almost said dignified, position, in being dependent in the sense we are now upon the United States for our fuel supply. We are not, it is true, wholly dependent. If the worst come to the worst, we could at a great cost, probably at great sacrifice to our trade, entirely supply ourselves. We have the material, we have the transportation. But under the conditions of to-day the provision of the coal for ourselves from our own resources would be at such a cost that probably the productive energies of our country would be severely strained To a great degree at least we would suffer. We have not yet advanced to the position where we could meet an emergency 11 p.m. of that kind without certain and very grave anxiety. This situation I said was undesirable. It is unenviable. It is true in our relations with the United States we have got along without recourse to anything in the nature of force for over a century. For the most part we have got along without recourse to anything in the way of threatening pressure. We have got along better, I think it may be said, than any two nations wholly distinct ever got along in the world's history before. Nevertheless, there have always been, and perhaps never so many as now, differences between us. There have been matters of contention, there have been matters in the settlement of which that nation won which had the heaviest lever to wield against the other. That those questions exist to-day no one with any knowledge of Canadian affairs disputes. In fact, in my judgment, and at the moment I refer only to the debate of last week, the necessity of being immediately independent in vital requirements of the United States never was so great, never was so imminent as it is at this very hour. I do not like to be in a position with respect to the Chicago drainage canal or any other question where I am liable to be answered, by implication. if not expressly: Unless you yield, look out for your coal. If that answer lies in the mouths of American statesmen, whether they express it or not, it is going to be reflected in the results of any discussion we have on the Chicago drainage canal or any other subject of controversy. Consequently, this country owes it to itself to be in a position that no matter what step the United States may take, no matter what course they may point out to us as open to them, we are able to take care of ourselves in all eventualities, and when we are in such position we will get a better settlement of the various matters that from time to time stand between us.

I said that we could even now meet an emergency, but at great cost. If we were denied American coal, though certainly American coal interests would be very strongly against it, if we were for any reason in that position, we could bring coal from Alberta, we could bring coal from Nova Scotia; but with the facilities we have and with the instruments for its use in this province, particularly in our manufacturing centres, we undoubtedly would imperil at least some of our industries in competition with other corresponding industries, and perhaps would put many of them out of business entirely.

Thus we have got to the point where it behooves us to put ourselves in a position that no matter what may come, the loss to us by the change would not be so great as to be serious. There are several ways by which this can be done. I am not in a position to argue which is the best, but I think there are more than one which could be applied and which would be better than the present position of affairs. Some of them have been suggested this afternoon. One or two are suggested in the main motion. There is nothing on earth suggested in either amendment; but one or two are suggested in the main motion.

It has been said that we could develop our own resources by an increase in the protective duty, a duty that has remained very low for many years, that some have argued should be higher, that some on the contrary have argued should be wiped out altogether. I am not prepared myself to say, I do not claim to be in a position to say, that we could substantially increase the duty that now applies and not raise productive costs in our central provinces to a degree that would make it impossible for them to compete and hold their position in the industrial world. It might be possible; it might not. However, that is one route that is open to us, and a route that should be explored.

Another is suggested in the last clause of the amendment, that we should through this parliament legislate placing the transportation of coal in a special category and compelling our railways to levy very low rates in accordance with that category. I do not like this principle. I think it is open to the objections urged by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) this evening. I do not see any consistency, any common sense in appointing a Railway Commission with specific powers, with specific duties, and then after appointing it and empowering it to exercise such duties immediately stepping in and exercising some of these duties ourselves. If we intend to perform this function, for goodness sake let us remove the duplication and wipe the Railway Commission off the slate.

But there are still other methods. We might, for example, leave the Railway Commission in full possession of its powers, leave it and it alone commissioned to say what the right and fair rate is having regard to the railways, having regard to the producer, and having regard to the consumer; and ourselves, while the rate remained as fixed by the commission, contribute from the national treasury a share of that rate, or perhaps in co-operation with certain provinces so contribute. This is another method well worthy of exploration.

There is a fourth that has come from the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll), namely, that some system of bounty should be devised especially applicable to coking, and consequently, as he says only for the benefit of Nova Scotia coal. Possibly some corresponding help might be given to coal from the other direction. At any rate, while I do not like bounties in general, it is something worthy of consideration too. I would be ready to consider almost any course to get ourselves out of the position we are in to-day, any course save that suggested by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Hughes), which would undoubtedly and inevitably have the effect of only getting us farther in.

The amendment to the amendment is first before us. This motion suggests to the House that we refer to the committee on Mines and Minerals to consider whether or not the time has arrived for Canada to have a national policy in relation to coal. Think of the position of this House, serious, grown-up men, referring at this stage of the country's history to the Mines and Minerals committee to decide whether we should have a national policy in relation to coal! Have we not decided it over and over again? Are we not all agreed on the necessity? Is it not our duty, led by the government of the day to propound that policy and propound it now? Has not this very same subject, as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) says been before that very same committee just last session, and did not the committee deal with it and report to this House? Why insult the committee by sending the same subject back again? As a matter of fact, is not this amendment just the old habit of shunting the question out of parliament? Is it not just another way of saying "forget it", until perhaps next session we will come again and have upon it another academic discussion? For that reason I oppose the amendment to the amendment.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) moves the main amendment, which adopts the first two clauses of the resolution, but which afterwards calls upon the government to investigate as to what would be the proper rates on coal to be applied by our railways. Exactly for the reasons stated by the Minister of Railways I oppose this amendment. What is the Railway Commission for? If we are better than the Railway Commission, had not we better get rid of the commission? It costs us hundreds of thousands a year. Why spend hundreds of thousands and then do the work ourselves? I do not need to go farther. To adopt the amendment is simply to instal a precedent which will land us in endless trouble, indeed, it will land us back in the position we were in twenty-three years ago.

Then I come to the main motion. The main motion in its first two paragraphs is to my mind unobjectionable. It places up to the government squarely the necessity, the imperative immediate necessity of bringing down to parliament a national coal policy to achieve the object set out in those two clauses, and to do it at this session.

The second two clauses though are different. I have already alluded to the third, namely, that which calls now for an immediate increase in the coal duty. Even if I were of opinion that this increase should be made I do not think it would be a wise thing for parliament, in advance of the budget, to declare now that it should be done. It would simply be repeating the grave error which the government made in the Speech from the Throne, an error, which I know, in the silence of their tents in the quiet of their bed chambers they have since in tears repented; it would only repeat that error to the disturbance of Canadian industry. I am convinced that we have not the information as to whether it could be done even were this the time to do it. Consequently I could not support the third clause.

May I diverge for a moment to make a reference to some words spoken by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans). He, of course, is an ardent free trader in all things, and he has persuaded me that he is absolutely honest in his convictions, that his mind is thoroughly true. Nay, sometimes I think if we had caught him young enough we could have led him into saner and more practical policies. Nevertheless, as a free trader, he wants to know why we do not apply our protective policies more generally if we believe in them at all. "Why is it", he asks "that you take your duties off, or make them very light, upon certain raw materials which we can produce in this country instead of applying really protective duties thereby encouraging the production of those materials within our own domain." There is much in his contention but sometimes even the best of policies have to yield to exigency. I will tell him just what the exigency was which brought about this condition and which now maintains it even at the hands of this administration. Western Canada, not receiving in the same degree that the rest of the Dominion does, the benefits of a protective policy, not being as yet a highly developed industrial country, has insistently demanded all through these years that the special instruments they use themselves should enjoy a specially low rate of duty. Eastern Canada, in fact the whole Dominion, in honest endeavour to meet the views of our friends from the West brought down step by step the duties on agricultural implements, and brought them down so low that in order to enable these implements to be manufactured at all concessions were given to the producers of such implements in the way of the importations of these very articles.

Mr. EVANS: For the sake of the western farmer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the sake of the western farmer, and to the applause of the western farmer at the time.

Mr. EVANS: Never.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend was not a member of this House at that time. He may think it was not for the benefit of the western farmer but that was the intention. The production of the goods was supposed to be made somewhat cheaper on that account. Therefore this concession was made to members from the West, made in response to western demand. It is not because we have any less faith in the general principle as the right policy for our country; it is merely because in the application of that principle we want to meet, so far as we can, the desire of special sections of the Dominion who believe they are not benefited in the average degree thereby.

Now in respect of the contention that we ought as a means to the goal to wipe out our tariff duties altogther I certainly could not agree with this even though it has the authority of the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Hughes) or was it some one else? That hon. gentleman declared protection was a word which had a baneful sound in this assembly, and he said it to the applause of a number of hon. gentlemen to my left. But I noticed that across the way there was a very distinct cleavage in the applause given. Did the hon. gentleman notice that not a member of the government pounded his desk? Did he notice that even the Minister of Agriculture was silent? The Minister of the Interior received the utterance with cold dismay; and as for the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) he had a moving picture right before his eyes of the duty being wiped off coal. The hon. member who made the suggestion had to be satisfied with the vociferous pounding of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) and a few others scattered in the rear benches, with the notable exception of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). But I venture to say that if in the fulness of time even the hon. member for Hants comes within the serene circle of the government he too will be dumb as the oysters which cling to the shores of his constituency, There will not even be a breath from him in protest against protection. Oh! I have often wished that hon. gentlemen to my left, who now look across longingly to hon. gentlemen opposite for encouragement whenever they express their sentiments for free or freer trade, had been here just three or four sessions ago. Then they would have heard not a single note of dissent. All that would have ravished their ears would have been resounding applause—there would have been cheers from hon. gentlemen opposite and from the whole Liberal party in this House.

An hon. MEMBER: Why the change?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why the change? They are saddled with responsibility. To-day they are in the seats of power; and from some observations I have heard from some hon. gentlemen to my left I am disposed to suggest that if when a change comes—

An hon. MEMBER: Heaven forbid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Heaven will not need to forbid, the people will look after that. I say when the time comes that they are stationed on the right side of this chamber there will be the same change in their demeanour, the same subsidence of their enthusiasm which we have noticed on the part of those hon. gentlemen who sit over there to-night.

The solution to this question, is not to be found along the route of a free entry of bituminous coal into Canada, not so long as representatives of the Maritime provinces remain in the administration. At this time I would be in favour of the striking out of the last two paragraphs of the main motion, and supporting the paragraphs that remain but it is not open to me now so to move. The House will first vote upon this shelving, shifting, postponing, forgetting proposition of the hon. member (Mr. Carroll) and for my part I shall vote with very great pleasure against it.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment. (Mr. Carroll.)

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) has an explanation to give about his vote.

An hon. MEMBER: He cannot do it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand his vote has been cast according to his wish?

Mr. FORKE: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: The vote having been recorded cannot be changed now. His explanation will appear in Hansard and will serve his purpose with his electors. He meant to vote the other way, but by mistake he voted for the amendment to the amendment.

The vote being a tie the Speaker is called upon to cast a vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before you do that, Mr. Speaker, I believe the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) is recorded in favour of the amendment to the amendment, and my information is he came into the chamber after the question was put.

Mr. BELAND: It is not the time to discuss that now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, it is the time.

Mr. BELAND: The objection must be taken before the vote is recorded.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed the hon. gentleman came in when the vote was being taken. If that is the case his vote does not count. I would ask the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) if he heard the question put.

Mr. FINN: I was behind the curtain, and I heard the question put.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is that each member should be in his seat. The hon. gentleman did not, from a parliamentary point of view, hear the question put . Therefore the vote of the hon. gentleman should be eliminated from the division.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) came in while the vote was being taken.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course we have to trust the honour of the members. I would ask the hon. member for Strathcona if he was in the House and if he heard the question put.

Mr. WARNER: Yes, I was in the House and I heard the question put.

Mr. SPEAKER: Was the hon. gentleman in his seat when the question was put?

Mr. WARNER: I would not be sure. I might have been over there. I do not remember.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost.

Mr. CAHILL: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau), that the resolution be amended by striking out the last two clauses.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the ayes have it; I declare the amendment carried.

Main motion as amended agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Tuesday).

Tuesday, April 1, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That Messrs. Anderson, Bancroft, Gordon, Logan, Papineau, Rinfret, Vien, Wallace and Wilson be appointed to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant as far as the interests of the Commons are concerned and to act as members of the joint committee on both Houses on the restaurant.

And that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of the United States regarding the carrying out of the joint international report relating to the St. Lawrence waterways.—Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King.

Copy of correspondence, telegrams, etc., exchanged between the government of Canada, or any of its members, or with any corporations or individuals, since the 1st January, 1922, relating to the St. Lawrence waterway route and the construction of dams on the St. Lawrence for the development of certain waterpowers.—Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King.

Copy of an order in council respecting the revision of the salary of civil servants.—Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. G. C. WILSON (Wentworth): I beg to present a petition from Rev. Donald T. L. McKenoll, Rev. Thos. Wardlaw Taylor, Professor Albert T. Laing, Messrs. James Scott, and James Andrew Milne, Rev. James Wilson, and Messrs. Thos. McMillan and Stewart C. Parker of the city of Toronto in opposition to the bill to incorporate the United Church of Canada.

EXPORT OF PULPWOOD

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): On Friday of last week I called the attention of the government to an error in the answer to a question, which question asked the statutory authority for the order in council exempting existing contracts for the exportation of pulpwood for ten years. I asked the government to look into the matter and provide a correct answer. Has the government the answer yet?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I gave my right hon. friend an answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no answer given. If the leader of the government will look up his remarks he will find that he gave no answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I gave no answer I do not know how I shall be able to find my remarks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The leader of the government expressed some words but they did not constitute an answer.

EXPORTATION OF ELECTRIC POWER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. L. DESLAURIERS (St. Mary) (Translation): I desire, Mr. Speaker, to draw the attention of the House to an editorial which appeared in the Gazette of the 31st March, regarding a proposal to form a company, to be known as "Super-Power Development": the following is the extract:

First news of this super-power project was revealed in Wall Street to-day, when it was learned that a banking syndicate headed by Harris, Forbes and Company and Bonbright and Company is negotiating to underwrite about $50,000,000 of the cost.

The editorial ends with:

The system will be large enough to supply power and lighting to towns and industries for miles on either side of the main line, which will have a probable capacity of 220,000 volts.

The final difficulty, which is now being worked out, is contained in the Canadian laws. They provide that any franchise granted for the exportation of power from the country may be terminated upon one year's notice. It is expected that a method of modifying the obstacle will be found shortly.

It is stated that the development plans have been carried near to completion, because the bankers and officials feel certain of definite assurance from Canada that the laws will be changed to eliminate any interference with the project. The company will, it is expected, ask for a perpetual franchise.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to ask the hon. member to kindly put his question to the government as briefly as possible.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): I wish to inquire if the government has the intention of amending the present act regarding the exportation of electricity to other countries and if there is any truth in this rumour.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) I may say the matter of in any way modifying the statute in reference to the export of power has not been considered by the government.

WHEAT BOARD—SURPLUS FUNDS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): With reference to the amount advanced to the western provinces some years ago for relief in the matter of seed grain, and against which the government is holding the money that is in their hands, the surplus from the Wheat Board, can the minister tell me how much, if any, of those sums advanced are properly chargeable against Manitoba?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): I just happened to have under my hand and was reading at the moment—I did not know my hon. friend was going to ask the question—a memorandum from the Department of Finance, dated February 14, 1924, which reads—

Seed grain in relief account, principal outstanding on March 31st, 1923—

This is including interest.

Manitoba	$ 140,737 00
Saskatchewan	3,555,283 00
Alberta	1,567,791 00
British Columbia	197 00

PACIFIC HALIBUT FISHERY

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill 21, to amend the Northern Pacific Halibut Fishery Protection Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Nationals or inhabitants of Canada or United States and ships registered therein or belonging to them, liable to seizure.

[Mr. Deslauriers.]

Mr. STEVENS: I hope the minister will give us a complete explanation of the reason for and the need for this legislation.

Mr. CARDIN: As I have already explained, the amendments relate to section 6 of the act, which was passed last year. We desire to amend section 6 by adding after the words "in prohibited waters" the words "during the close season". As the section was enacted last year it might be argued that fishing for halibut was prohibited all the year. The words "during the close season" were omitted. This is the amendment we intend to make in section 6. The other amendment is in section 9. We intend to repeal this section, because it is a mere repetition of section 5.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The bill is just one instalment of corrections of the government's errors of last session.

Mr. STEVENS: I really have not had time to consider it fully. There is a reference regarding vessels seized by Canadian customs officers. The last section that the minister mentions referred to section 9 of the act. What was the reason for the repealing of that clause?

Mr. CARDIN: This clause reads as follows:

Every ship, vessel or boat which is foreign or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or of Canada may be seized.

If my hon. friend will refer to section 5 he will find that it says:

Every ship, vessel, or boat, including all furniture, apparel, appliances, gear, tackle and rigging thereof, which is in any manner operated or used for the purpose of committing an offence against the act or for aiding or facilitating the commission of any such offence may be seized.

So that my hon. friend will see that clause 9 is almost a repetition of what is said in clause 5; and in addition to that I may add that clause 9 may be taken as stating that only foreign vessels are liable to be seized according to the law, because it says that "every ship, vessel or boat which is foreign may be seized."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that the minister says that clause 9 as it stands is virtually a repetition of clause 5, but he says that clause 9 contains in addition the words "which is foreign." Then clause 5 does not contain these words I presume?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but the words "every ship" include foreign vessels. I understand the words "every ship" cover what is stated in clause 9.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is intended to apply to every ship, foreign and domestic. That is so described in this clause. Does clause 5 contain the words "which is foreign?"

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In respect to clause 6 what in the world has the government been doing all this past year? The way the act reads up to now, any ship that did what is stated here either in close season or open season would be liable to seizure. So that, I presume, all this year while the act was in force no ship operated at all.

Mr. CARDIN: The act is not in force.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, I understand. This still awaits the action of the Senate of the United States?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is fortunate the United States Senate provided the government with time to repair its error.

Mr. CARDIN: There is always time to repair errors.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. CARDIN moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the practice should become a habit, of putting bills through the second reading and the third reading on the same day. I do not think this is an important bill at all, but there is no need of rushing it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT—YUKON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) (for the Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25 to amend the Judges' Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—salary of judge of Territorial Court of Yukon Territory increased.

Mr. HANSON: What is the present salary of the judge of the Yukon Territorial Court? Who is the present incumbent and how long has he occupied the position?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I presume my hon. friend was absent from the House when all the explanations were given on the resolution. The present salary is $7,000. It is proposed to increase it to $9,000, which is the salary received by all the other high court judges in Canada. As was explained the other day, the judge of the Yukon Territorial Court is receiving a living allowance of $5,000. This will be reduced by $2,000 so that really this will not mean any increase in expenditure.

Mr. HANSON: It means an increase in retiring allowance.

Mr. LAPOINTE: By $1,000.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. LAPOINTE moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might explain to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) that the government's only object in seeking the third readings of these bills is to get legislation across to the Senate which is now sitting. If the third reading is deferred there will be another day's delay in sending the bill to the Senate.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BILLS PROPOSED TO AUTHORIZE THE CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction of a Canadian National Railway line from Kingsclear, a point on the Saint John and Quebec Railway in the province of New Brunswick, in a generally southwesterly direction, to a point on the St. Croix river, opposite Vanceboro, in the state of Maine; estimated mileage including existing grading, 41 miles; estimated cost, $2,123,000.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I am at liberty to discuss the details of the bill that will be based upon this resolution, but I think some at least, of the objections raised last session to the form in which this legislation was introduced, will be explained in the bill. I would prefer to defer that explanation until we have the resolutions in the form of various bills. I might point out that this resolution is for the purpose of the Canadian National Railways having a connection with an American line for traffic between the Maritime provinces and the United States, particularly the New England states. At the present time that connection is somewhat faulty. This resolution asks for a line, forty-one miles in length. As a matter of fact, possibly that may be obviated by an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, by which arrangement the construction will be but fourteen miles in length. The resolution asks for power to construct the forty-one miles, if necessary. The estimated cost is $2,123,000. If it is found necessary to construct the whole forty-one miles, it is proposed to grade the distance in 1924 and to lay the track in 1925.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, there are certain observations that I would like to bring to your attention and to the attention of the House, relevant to the various resolutions now standing in the name of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). These resolutions to be brought down by the minister in question contemplate the construction of twenty-six lines of railway aggregating in the neighbourhood of 1,000 miles, and costing approximately or slightly over $28,000,000. It, therefore, seems to me to go without saying that the matter is one of great moment to the country, one that should not be allowed to pass this House without the most careful scrutiny and without our taking into consideration all the facts relating to these proposals which are to be brought before this legislative body.

It is not my intention, in the course of these remarks, to direct any particular motive towards any particular branch line. I desire to discuss the question of branch lines to be brought down in these resolutions in a more or less general manner; but I wish to point out to the House the large amount involved in these undertakings, and also to say that any undertaking which is not absolutely essential for the welfare of the country generally, or actually and vitally necessary for any particular part of our population, should certainly in every respect be eliminated. The government should have in mind in proposing these various resolutions one consideration only, namely, the vital necessity to the country of any expenditures involved, before a single dollar is expended on these undertakings. As I have stated, these proposals entail an expenditure of $28,000,000, and for any of us in this House to say that we can spend twenty-eight million dollars, or even twenty-eight million cents, with a free hand in view of the condition of our finances at the present time is the height of absurdity. As a matter of fact, unless we get down to the lowest possible expenditure in Canada it will be utterly impossible for us to reduce the taxation which is so heavily weighing upon the people to-day; and unless that taxation is reduced to a very considerable extent it will also be impossible for any business, whether it be agricultural or otherwise, to succeed in the future. I think, Sir, that we ought to realize what an exceedingly difficult position we are in to-day in Canada. We are living beside the richest, one of the most populous, and one of the most progressive people in the wide world. In some respect in this country we are not free agents. As regards the question of wages and salaries, and in relation to other matters of that kind, we are controlled, not by our own desires but by the rates of wages and salaries that obtain in the United States; we are governed very largely by what the nation to the south of us may do in these directions. In other words, what the richest nation in the world may do we in Canada are bound also to do, so far as wages and other questions of that kind are concerned.

We have also to take into consideration this fact, that if direct taxation in the United States is lower than direct taxation in this country, then it simply means that our population will drift to the south. Some weeks ago, speaking in the House on other subjects, I directed the attention of the government to the exodus which was then taking place and which had been going on for a number of years. I do not think that we can say at this moment that that exodus has entirely ceased; in fact, I believe it is still in progress. And I do not think that the government or ourselves should be lulled into any false sense of security, or into any ungrounded satisfaction, in the suggestion that those people who leave Canada to go to the United States will surely return; because there is not the slightest shadow of doubt that many of our people, and some of the very best of them, who go to the United States never return but stay there. I say therefore that any expenditure, which the government considers necessary, should be made only from the standpoint of urgent and vital necessity; and such expenditure must be brought down to the very lowest possible figure, either if we expect to have our taxation on a par with the taxation that is levied in the United States—and I am speaking just now of direct taxation—or if we desire to retain our population. It goes without saying, of course, that if taxation in the United States is lower than taxation here, most inevitably the drift of the population must continue to the southern country. Now, I do not wish it to be understood that I am saying in this House that we should not undertake any capital expenditures at all; I believe that in a new country which is progressing as we are, and in a more or less constructive period, it would be exceedingly stupid for any man to say that we should refrain from capital expenditures. On the other hand, if we do decide upon capital expenditure of any description, as for instance in connection with these branch lines, we should look forward very carefully to make sure that that capital expenditure will be productive of a commensurate advantage. We must not act merely upon conjecture; we must be quite certain that it will be worth while and that it will serve some vital need of the people before we vote any such expenditure. So that, with all due respect to my hon. friends on this side of the House, and without the slightest desire to court unpopularity, I say, in the most decided and distinct terms, that I will support these various resolutions only in so far as I am convinced by the most ample explanations and the most adequate information on the part of the minister that the lines are necessary and that the money expended on them is essential in every particular in order to serve a vital need without which we cannot do. I wish to make myself abundantly clear in that respect, so that in the course of the various resolutions and the subsequent bills which may come up, if any information is asked for, the government and the minister in particular will know precisely the stand I take in this House and before the country in reference to this matter.

I do not think that we in this House and in the country as a whole can shut our eyes to the actual railway situation as it now exists. I offer no comment at all on the question as to how that railway situation was brought about, for I do not think that we are particularly concerned at the moment as to how it all happened. We are however vitally conerned with what is actually happening and what may happen in the future. This we must take into consideration at every step; but I doubt very much whether the nation at large or, if I may say so, every hon. member in this House, quite realizes the vast amount of money which we have expended on these undertakings. Possibly many people think that when the estimates are brought down, or when an operating deficit or a profit, as the case may be, is indicated, there is no need any longer to worry about the railways. They do not realize that in the ordinary debt of the country there is a huge burden, an indebtedness on which we are paying interest all the time, and in relation to the railways themselves; because the indebtedness in that respect is part of our national debt. In other words, we cannot build or buy railways and think that the money will simply be segregated in a certain account and that we shall not have to pay any interest on it. Money has to come from somewhere, and if it does the cost of it has actually to be paid in one account or another. We have expended vast sums in these railways; there are vast sums locked up in the public accounts and in various other accounts; and there are a number of accounts which I think it will interest hon. members and the country as well to know. I think the people would like to know just what is the liability of the Dominion of Canada in connection with our railways. I do not like wearying the House, and it is with great reluctance that I venture to read statements of figures and accounts. But there is no other method open to me of getting these figures on Hansard, and as I think they are of sufficient importance to hon. members and to the country at large I shall ask the indulgence of the House while I submit them. First of all, there is the actual cash which has been invested in these various lines. That cash invested in these lines, as at December 31, 1923, amounted to the vast sum of $1,138,600,430.

Mr. McMASTER: These are the lines now incorporated in the Canadian National Railways system?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, they are now operated as the Canadian National Railways system. I will give my hon. friend the division of that particular amount in a moment. It may interest him to have this information. First I will give the main headings. We have expended on these railways, by way of so-called advances, large sums of money on which the interest has not entirely been paid. Then come certain securities which the Dominion guaranteed, the interest on which has to be paid, and eventually the principal also. Then there is a class of securities, so-called guaranteed as to interest only. I think that is a misnomer, for as a matter of fact if interest be guaranteed the capital also is guaranteed, because the obligation to pay interest cannot be of any value unless the capital is eventually paid off. So it virtually means that both capital and interest on those securities are guaranteed by the Dominion After those again we have a mass of so-called unguaranteed securities. In those are included many millions of underlying liens, some guaranteed by various provinces, others not guaranteed at all, but all secured on the various roads of the system forming part of the National lines at the present time, and although not actually assumed—using the word in its very strictest sense—nevertheless they are virtually assumed by the Dominion, as owners of the property for the reason that if any particular block of securities became due and the interest was not paid, it would simply mean that a certain section of the line would be taken by the bond holders. Therefore as a matter of fact we have assumed those securities also, though they are not directly guaranteed.

Here is the statement to which I have reference, and if hon. members will bear with me for a moment I will read certain figures. I spoke a moment ago of the actual total amounting to $1,138,600,430.

This amount is divisible as follows:

What is now Canadian National since it was operated as such from about February, 1923.. .. ..$	16,172,847
Canadian Northern	354,212,554
Grand Trunk Pacific	138,743,070
Grand Trunk.. ..	134,583,607
Canadian Govt.. .	494,888,352
		$1,138,600,430

In addition to this there is:

Interest accrued on loans to December 31, 1923, but not paid:
Canadian National present system....	428,217
Canadian Northern.	69,589,575
Grand Trunk Pacific	27,562,616
Grand Trunk... ..	13,858,120
		111,438,539

Then there are net balances of unmatured securities outstanding guaranteed by the Dominion:

Canadian National present system.. ..	22,500,000
Canadian Northern.	144,702,913
Grand Trunk Pacific	43,432,848
Grand Trunk... ..	49,743,000
		260,378,761

And after that securities guaranteed as to interest which really means guaranteed as to principal also—Capital value of Grand Trunk stocks.. 216,207,141

There are also the outstanding obligations in the hands of the public secured on the whole or on parts of the system as the case may be—not actually guaranteed by the Dominion but assumed by it as virtual owner and on which interest has to be paid:

Canadian Northern—
Equipment Notes..	32,519,000
Securities guaranteed by various provinces	79,767,554
Unguaranteed securities..	92,816,805
		205,103,359
Grand Trunk Railway—
Securities and those of affiliated companies..	44,622,128
Equipment notes ..	13,482,700
		58,104,828
Grand Trunk Pacific—
Securities with provincial guarantees..	13,457,826
Guaranteed by Grand Trunk.. ..	62,581,253
Total cash expenditure, interest accrued on advances, securities guaranteed by Dominion either as to principal or interest or both and obligations secured on the various roads..		$2,065,872,128

Now, this is a very pretty bill, Mr. Speaker, on which we have to pay interest. We can do it. No one need be afraid of the credit of the country or its ample ability to meet all its obligations and more in full. These figures are not given for the purpose of creating a panic. There is no reason to lose courage, because I am confident we can carry the load. This statement is given however as an ample warning that we have an enormous sum in these roads and as the most apparent evidence that we must not spend more except what is absolutely essential.

Now it is true that for the year 1924 the government is asking for $56,000,000 by way of loans to the National Railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In order that there may be no misapprehension, I am presuming that the hon. member has included in the grand total the cost of the Transcontinental, the Intercolonial, the Prince Edward Island and other railways that have been built, with accumulated interest upon the cost, and that he has also included many obligations, aggregating quite a total in respect of which no interest is being paid, and for which interest we are not liable?

Mr. MARLER: In so far as the first part of this question is concerned, the right hon. gentleman is correct, the cost of the Transcontinental, the Prince Edward Island and the old government system of railways is included in the statement. Whether or not the interest has been calculated on the various amounts as advanced for these railways, I am unable to say. The statement was furnished to me by the Department of Railways and Canals. As to certain other securities on which interest is not being paid, I do not think they are included in this particular amount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think they are. I refer, for example, to the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk, and, as well, to the Canadian Northern income convertibles guaranteed conditionally. No interest is being paid on them, and we are not liable for such interest.

Mr. MARLER: Bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific guaranteed by the Grand Trunk are included in the statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the income convertibles?

Mr. MARLER: As to the income convertibles, I am not prepared to answer my right hon. friend at the moment. I could do so if I delayed to look up the figures here, but I presume the matter is not of sufficient importance at the moment for me to do so. Now, Mr. Speaker, the government is asking for a vote of $56,000,000 for the ordinary railway loans. In that sum there is, not included, of course, this additional $28,000,000. Last year we were asked for something like $74,550,000, or about $18,000,000 more than this year. This represents the gain in operating earnings of the Canadian National Railways, and possibly it may be said that in view of this gain we are justified in branching out and spending more money on our railway system, but I do not think there is any justification for this view. It would seem to me very absurd and most unreasonable that after spending something like $390,000,000 on these roads during the last three years alone there should not have been a very distinct improvement in the railway earnings, and for that reason I do not think we should be exuberant in praise or too generous in our attitude with regard to the spending of money on the building of branch lines, except, as I have stated, where they are absolutely essential.

In these operating deficits or in the operating surpluses, as the case may be, the actual interest payable to the government of Canada is not included or taken into consideration, to say nothing about the interest on the capital amounts which has been paid and which has been placed in the system. These fixed charges are continuing and are increasing materially every year. For example, in 1920 the fixed charges due the Dominion were $13,000,000. In 1921 they had increased to $19,000,000; in 1922 they were $24,000,000 and in 1923 they were $29,000,000. In other words, the amount of money payable on loans made and on indebtedness to the Dominion of Canada, not including operating deficits or earnings, was $29,000,000 on the 31st of December last.

There is another point that I think we should take into consideration: we are wont in this House to say, "Let us keep the railways out of politics;" or, "The board of directors say we should do this or should do that." I do not think we can hide behind statements of that kind. We have to accept our own responsibility in this House for the money we spend on branch lines or on any other part of the railway system. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to hide behind the cry that the railways should be kept out of politics or that the board of directors say this or say that. I want to know myself what the expenditure is to be before I share any responsibility in the matter.

In addition to that, we shall probably be told that the budget will balance this year. I am not uttering criticisms, Mr. Speaker, in this respect; I am simply stating cold facts. Twenty-eight millions is a huge sum of money and should not, either in whole or in part, be voted in this House until we know precisely what we are doing. It may be argued that on account of the budget being balanced we should branch out still more, but in my opinion that is no reason at all. I am glad to know that the budget is likely to balance, but if it does it will be because we have too great war taxes on the country, the surpluses from which are being used for other purposes, not war at all. If there is a surplus of war taxes—and I know there is—then those war taxes should be remitted, cancelled or reduced.

We are very likely to be told as regards these branch lines that in view of the reduction in the estimates we should proceed with the proposed construction. I know there has been a very considerable reduction in the estimates and I commend the government for it. That reduction, exclusive of railway expenditure, amounts to $27,000,000, of which probably $10,000,000 is due to the slackening off of war services. In other words it is due to the fact that those war services have slackened off in the ordinary course of events and have not been specially diminished in any way—services which are paid, Mr. Speaker, with war taxes. That means that there is a reduction in the estimates this year of $17,000,000, and that reduction will be not as great when the supplementaries come down. Therefore I submit that the fact that there is a reduction in the estimates is no reason at all why we should build branch lines and more railways.

These resolutions are brought down at this time of the session, and before the budget, no doubt for certain very good reasons. They are brought down, I suppose, at this particular season of the year in order that the engineers may get to work on their estimates, get their plant on the ground and start the construction, in accordance with any vote passed by this House and by the other House, in ample time during the coming summer. That is sense, there is no doubt about that; it is a good season for the measures being brought down at this time. But notwithstanding that, it seems to me that we are entitled to know exactly how our budget is going to stand for the next year before we vote $28,000,000. Business at present is not satisfied, particularly in view of the heavy taxes that are being paid. Many say that business is prosperous, but I am of the opinion that it is not as prosperous as many seem to think. Business wants to know how we are going to stand for the next fiscal year before undertaking a measure of this kind.

It was indicated by certain proposals of the government that there might be changes in the tariff, and cities in particular have been very much disturbed as to what those changes might be. I do not know what the actual proposals are; nobody knows what they are; but business is very distinctly disturbed in that connection, and I venture to say that if proposals are brought down which will injure business interests or will not improve business interests, which without doubt need improvement at the present time, certain parts of this country will not agree to the building of any of these lines. We want to know before expending money exactly where we stand, and I think we are entitled to know before voting this large sum precisely what is the fiscal policy of the government.

Without discussing any particular branch lines, I wish to say that I have taken the opportunity of studying, by the map and by such information as I have been able to procure, the various lines which are projected. Some of these lines, it is alleged, should be built because certain grading has already been done. It is urged, not by the minister but by others, that for this reason we should put rails on these gradings and complete them into railways. But in my opinion the fact that these gradings exist is no reason whatever for taking that course. If we have spent money on the grading of these lines and if it has been unwise to proceed further, the mere fact—I repeat, the mere fact; I do not want hon. members to misunderstand me—that these lines are graded and that money has been spent on the grading is no reason why millions more should be spent in turning them into profitless branch line railways.

In addition to that, so far as I can see, some of these lines are too near other existing lines and therefore are not essential. In other cases there is too little population to serve and there is not likely to be any additional population in these particular localities for some considerable time. In other cases I believe traffic arrangements could be made with other railway companies which would obviate the building of additional lines. In other cases I can find no reason whatever why the projected lines should be built, and I doubt if any railway engineer could find any. In that connection, Sir, I may point out that we have millions of acres near railways which we can use without spending enormous sums for the building of lines into sparsely populated territory.

In conclusion, as regards the remarks which I have been making I want to say this—and it has reference to a fact which, I think, is not fully understood or fully grasped—we have in this country at present two great railway systems, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific.

I think every member of this House, I think everybody in this country, should wish well for both these lines, they are both great national undertakings. But to say that the Canadian National system should progress because of unfair competition with the Canadian Pacific line is senseless in the extreme. The Canadian Pacific is just as great a national asset as the Canadian National line. In addition to that, the Canadian Pacific is known all over the world by reason of its stability in management and in finance and is, as a matter of fact, all hon. members will admit, a source of pride to this country. The Canadian Pacific is financed by its own efforts on its own credit and on its own ability, whereas all the Canadian National railway line has to do is to to come to this House and get money, and it usually gets the money it requires. Now, to have competition between these two lines is senseless in the extreme. If traffic arrangements can be made with one line to help out another line, I think those arrangements should be made. To build lines unnecessarily when there is not enough traffic to satisfy both these systems is not putting this House, is not putting this country, in a position to get lower freight rates in the very slightest degree. What we need in this country and what we must all try to get is lower transportation costs. That is what we want. Building branch railway lines may yield pleasure but that is not going to give us lower transportation costs if other railway lines are there to serve the particular purpose which the proposed new lines are intended to serve. I wish to make that point abundantly and absolutely clear in every respect, and I particularly wish to repeat—that where it is possible to make traffic arrangements with another railway these branch lines, as suggested, should not be constructed simply for the purpose of building them. In addition there is a great deal of duplication of services in this country between these two railways. I believe traffic arrangements could be made between the two systems that would be most satisfactory. Why should not such traffic arrangements be made, why should not such duplication be avoided? Why should not such duplication be remedied with a view to bringing the operating costs of both systems down to a minimum and making their operating and general profits greater?—so that in course of time we shall be prepared to demand lower transportation costs. That is what we must have in mind in connection with these proposals brought down by the minister. The object should be not to build further railways, not to spend money unnecessarily, but to get lower transportation costs and see that both these great railway companies shall survive and prosper.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat merely adding these few words. When these bills are brought down I shall expect the fullest information from the minister— and and this no doubt he will give in his usual admirable manner. I shall want to know how the expenditures are to be met and what reasons there are for building these different branch lines before I will support the proposals.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): I have listened with much interest to the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat and I must say that I am fully in agreement with him in what he has said. However, I wish to add something further to complete what the hon. member has stated. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I ever was a partisan of provincialism, much less should I like to be called parochial. Nevertheless, I wish to regard these projects for building branch lines from the point of view of the province from which I come. I have before me a statement indicating the mileage of railways in Canada by provinces, the population of each province and the percentage of population per mile. That statement is as follows:

Province	Miles of railway	Population	Percentage over Quebec per unit of population	Population per mile of railway
Quebec..	4,941	2,361,199		460
Manitoba..	4,403	610,118	3.3	138
Saskatchewan..	6,220	757,510	4.5	102
Alberta..	4,470	588,454	4.5	103
British Columbia	4,325	524,582	4.5	102
Nova Scotia..	1,438	523,837	1.4	326
Prince Edward Island.	279	88,615	1.5	314
New Brunswick..	1,816	387,876	2.2	213

In other words the province of Ontario has nearly twice as many railways as the province of Quebec. The exact percentage of the population is 1.7. The province of Manitoba, bearing in mind the difference in population, has over three times more railways than the province of Quebec, the percentage of population being 3·3. The province of Saskatchewan has more than four and a half times as many railways, bearing in mind the difference in population, as the province of Quebec, and the same with the province of Alberta. British Columbia has four and a half times as many railways bearing in mind the population as the province of Quebec. Nova Scotia has one and a half times as many railways, the percentage being 1·4. In the case of Prince Edward Island the percentage is 1.5. The province of New Brunswick has a little over twice as many railways as Quebec, the exact percentage being 2·2.

Mr. CARROLL: Has the hon. member taken into consideration the St. Lawrence river improvements upon which this country is expending millions of dollars a year?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I am quite ready to admit that my hon. friend's argument has its value but at present I am dealing with railways. Now this resolution and the bill which will follow proposes that 965 miles of railway should be built at an expenditure of $28,311,300. Out of the 965 miles now being proposed Quebec will have 31 miles, with an expenditure of $1,462,000.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is the hon. gentleman aware of the benefits the province of Quebec receives through its shipping ports from the extra branch lines and railroads in the western provinces?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I am aware of all that, but this is another question altogether. I could not answer offhand a question like that. If I were to answer the question of my hon. friend I should have to go into details as to the cost of the railways and the improvements made in the St. Lawrence, and so forth, and this is a matter which is outside of the question I have been discussing. I shall be quite willing to hear my hon. friend discuss the question as to why further railways should be built in the West.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It would be very much better if my hon. friend had made a comparison of the railways constructed in the West as compared with those constructed in Quebec.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): With reference to the new lines which are now proposed, it is provided that the following new lines will be constructed:

	Miles	Cost
Quebec	31	$1,462,000
Nova Scotia	71	3,661,000
Alberta	237	5,710,000
Saskatchewan	380	10,935,000
British Columbia	139	2,942,300
Manitoba	66	1,478,000
New Brunswick	41	2,123,000
Prince Edward Island	None	None
Ontario	"	"

There are no branch lines to be built in the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Ontario. It seems to me that the distribution of railways throughout Canada should be more equal. It appears to me that it is hardly fair, when the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia have four times as many railways as the province of Quebec, that other lines should be built in those provinces, and that lines which have long been needed in Quebec and long been sought for in the province of Quebec should be set aside. I submit that in my province several lines of railways should have been built a long time ago. For instance, we all know that the Transcontinental has no branch line connecting with Montreal. The need for a branch line linking the Transcontinental with Montreal has long been felt, but it has not been built, because of the war and because of the extraordinary expense the country has been put to during the last ten years, and because of the desire for economy. I am strongly in favour of economy, and I support the views expressed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) and for these reasons I say that if there is no money to be spent in building railways in the province of Quebec, I do not think more money should be spent on railways in the western provinces, where they have four and a half times as many railways at the present time as we have in Quebec. This is simply a matter of justice. We must not forget that railways in a community mean something. In the province of Quebec for the last hundred years we have had an exodus to the United States of from one to two million inhabitants. The statistics are not quite accurate, but everyone admits we have lost to the United States at least one million of our people from the province of Quebec. If we had twice or three times as many railways in Quebec as we have now, the natural resources of that province could be better exploited, our mines, lumber, fishery and other industries, and our people, instead of going to the United States, would have found employment in their own province. This would be a great comfort to the province, because, instead of having a population of 2,361,169, we would have a population of three million and over. I look upon this as a matter of fair play and justice, and for my part I am not ready to support the resolution as it stands.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the hon. member taken into consideration the fact that in Quebec last year there was expended for transportation purposes—harbours, rivers and so forth—the sum of $1,137,650.50, as against an expenditure in Saskatchewan and Alberta of $34,000?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): Yes, I take that into consideration, and if you take into consideration the fact that the province of Quebec is paying for the railroads of the West—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): This is a fact which will be proven on investigation, and there is no question about it. In answer to my hon. friend I say that this million and a half is just one drop in the bucket compared to what we are paying for railroads in the West. We have deficits of hundreds of millions of dollars on these railways that have been built where they should not have been built.

Now let us make another comparison. In the United States they have one mile of railway for every four hundred inhabitants, in Canada we have one mile of railway for every two hundred inhabitants; and in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia they have one mile of railway for every one hundred inhabitants. These lines by the very nature of things must come out of the moneys of the country, and must increase the deficits, and the province of Quebec is paying for this.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the hon. gentleman not aware that the western lines produce the paying tonnage and the eastern lines do not?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I will be ready to listen to my hon. friend when he undertakes to prove that the western lines are paying for themselves. My knowledge is that they do not pay for themselves, and until the proof is furnished I maintain they do not. He advances the proposition that they are the railways that pay. It will be for him to prove that, but that is another argument altogether. I was answering my hon. friend when he stated that there was expended in Quebec for wharves and harbours and improvements of the St. Lawrence, one million and a half last year. This is an insignificant sum compared to what these railways are costing us.

An hon. MEMBER: We pay that every year.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): But the railways are piling up an enormous defiicit every year. Coming back to my subject more definitely, I say there are in the province of Quebec many localities where railways are just as badly needed as they are in the West. I will give you one example. I do not want to be parochial, but I would refer to Joliette and Berthier which are my county and the adjoining county where there are communities with populations of 7,000, and they are sixty miles from a railway. Those communities have been in existence for over thirty years, and there is a great deal of traffic through that part of the country. If a railway were built there, it could develop that traffic and the country could develop, but the country cannot at present develop because it is too far from a railway. When requests are made for railways, the answer comes necessarily: "We have no money to build them." I am ready to admit that money is scarce; but we cannot on the one hand say that there is no money to build a railway in Quebec, and on the other say that there is money to build railways in the West. I have every consideration for my hon. friends from the West and the other provinces, but I have shown now that Quebec is very far behind any of the other provinces of this Dominion as regards the building of railways.

What is this confederation? It is an agglomeration of nine provinces, in which the interests, in many instances, are absolutely different, if not opposed one to another. What means has a province to advance its own interests? Its influence, and the influence in this case comes through the population. The province that is most populous is most important in this confederation—I mean in point of activity and influence—by the very nature of things. The province that has the least population has the least influence. It is reasonable for any citizen of any province to claim that his province should have the railways which it deserves, because railways bring population and population means importance and influence in this Dominion. For all these reasons, while I am not prepared to say that I shall be opposed to every one of these resolutions, I want to reserve my right to examine each and every one of them, and I feel convinced, unless I should change my opinion in the meantime—and that is not likely—that the greater part of these resolutions should be discarded.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I intend to say only a few words, because I am aware that on this side of the House there may be members who are able to speak with better knowledge than I regarding some of these branch lines. I want, however, to reply to some of the remarks made by the two previous speakers. I think it goes without saying that in this House we are all standing for economy, only our ideas as to what economy means may differ a little, sometimes on account of the particular point of view from which we view the question of economy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: If hon, gentlemen to my right will wait until I begin to express my views, perhaps they will know what I intend to speak about. It is rather surprising to find so much interest taken, before one begins to speak, as regards what one is going to say.

We hear continually about the drift of population to the south and the causes of that drift of people from Canada to the United States. I think I mentioned before that there will always be a certain number drifting over the line to the large population to the south of us. At the same time, I think we will all admit that present circumstances with us are not such as they might be to conduce to keep our people at home. I am willing to admit that hon. members in all parts of this House are quite as sincere as I am in their endeavours to better conditions, and to see that this Canada of ours shall be as prosperous as it can possibly be made.

I have no intention to discuss this matter from the standpoint of any particular province. I realise, as the last speaker has said, that there are difficulties in governing this country owing to its geographical and physical conditions. I believe all of us ought to consider from a national point of view the various items that come before us for our consideration. It is quite human that most of us will be influenced by the locality from which we come and the environment by which we are surrounded in that locality; but I think it is possible to divest ourselves of that state of feeling and to judge things with some degree of fairness to all parties concerned.

As regards the branch lines in the West, I think Manitoba has only one small branch line. Quite a number, however, of branch lines are in the western prairie provinces. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George—(Mr. Marler) was very particular to inform the House that he was not going to support any of those lines unless they were absolutely needed.

Mr. MARLER: I was referring to no particular lines in any province whatsoever.

Mr. FORKE: I quite agree with that. I was rather unfortunate in the way I made the remark. I meant all branch lines.

Mr. MARLER: I did not say that I would not support any particular branch line. I stated that no branch line should be built except where necessary and essential. I think my hon. friend will very likely agree with me in that.

Mr. FORKE: My hon. friend has put the matter better than I could put it. That was exactly what I was going to say. I quite agree with the hon. member, and I will support no line unless it is absolutely necessary and a paying proposition to build. That is the position which I would take as regards any line that is proposed at the present time. I will say a few words about that later on.

The statement was made that we must keep our railways out of politics. I could not help thinking that the hon. member was putting up a straw man simply to knock him down, because we all know that when the question is one of voting money for the Canadian National Railways, that question must come before this parliament, so when we speak about keeping the National Railways out of politics, we do not mean it in that way. If money is required for capital expenditure on the Canadian National Railways, it will have to be voted by this parliament.

Another remark was made regarding business, and I paid particular attention to that remark, because it was bracketed with the tariff. It seems to me that no address can be made in this House unless the tariff appears in it. The hon. member referred to the fact that there were certain rumours in regard to the tariff. I cannot quote his exact words, but I think I caught the meaning that business was so alarmed, in such a precarious position, that it would be very difficult to get money to build branch lines as long as business was in that particular frame of mind. I think I have the idea fairly that if business were put into a safe position through the tariff being stable, or put into the position that business would want, possibly we could go on and build branch lines. I do not know whether I drew the inference correctly, but that is the inference which I draw from the remarks made at that particular time.

Mr. MARLER: There was no suggestion on my part that money could not be obtained to build branch lines having respect to the tariff. What I intended to convey was this, that business was not at the present time certain what the tariff proposals of the government might be, and I thought it better that the fiscal policy should be definitely known before we expended a large amount of money on branch lines or anything else.

Mr. FORKE: I accept the hon. member's statement. It is pretty much along the line of what I tried to convey myself. He probably has a better command of language and can put the question more clearly than I can. As regards the situation in business, I am quite in sympathy with having industry prosper and I wish to see it prosper. When the question of taxation is referred to it is always spoken of as being something that presses heavily upon business. Well, let me say that taxation presses heavily upon all the people.

Mr. MARLER: That is precisely what I said in my opening remarks; I pointed out that taxation pressed heavily upon both agriculture and business.

Mr. FORKE: That being the case, I do not see why I should be making this speech, because the hon. member has already apparently stated everything that I have to say. He also made reference to the rivalry between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways. No one in this House harbours any antipathy at all to the Canadian Pacific Railway or regards it in an attitude of antagonism. It is one of the greatest institutions the world has ever known, and we as Canadians are proud of the fact that we have the Canadian Pacific Railway in this country. So that we can, I think, dismiss from our minds any idea of hostility to that great corporation. At the same time, however, we want to look after our own interests as far as we can just as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are doing from their own point of view. With the Canadian National Railways the position is somewhat different. We are interested not only in the efficient operation of the roads but, as well, in the financial success of the whole concern, because the success of these railways is a matter that affects not only our national pride but our national pocket as well, and we must see to it that they are made prosperous. I do not like to speak in a particularly optimistic tone in regard to the future of the railways, but I believe that at no very distant time hence a great many of our difficulties in connection with the Canadian National system will disappear with a growing population and growing business, and that the great burden that at present weighs down upon us will have been partly lifted from our shoulders.

A remark was made by an hon. member regarding the mileage of railways that were being built in the different provinces. I do not know that this is the happiest way of approaching the consideration of this subject. I think that the needs of the various provinces would constitute a better basis upon which to discuss the matter. Population per mile is not, in my opinion, a satisfactory standpoint from which to examine the railway situation in any province; rather, I think that the earning power per capita of the population for producing traffic for the railways would be a much fairer way of arriving at the true mileage which the people in any particular locality should have. On this basis I claim that in the three prairie provinces the people produce more tonnage per mile than is produced in any other province in the Dominion. I dislike mentioning personal affairs, but if I may be pardoned I may say that I have shipped as many as thirteen and fourteen cars of wheat in one year, which is a very large amount of tonnage for one individual to produce. This of course may not be typical of the entire prairie country, but I consider that the population of these provinces produces a larger tonnage of freight for the railways than any other province in Canada.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Or any other place in the world.

Mr. FORKE: It is a well known fact that the paying mileage of the railways is in the West. Hon. members from the East are continually asserting the fact that the great burden of the railways is put upon the shoulders of the people, and that the country is building western lines.

Mr. MARLER: Not everyone says that.

Mr. FORKE: Well, a good many people do. But they seem to forget that had the railway mileage stopped at Fort William, there would never have been such large dividends as have been earned by the prairie lines that were constructed from Fort William, west. Never in the history of railways have larger dividends been paid than on the western lines, but these dividends would not have been possible had the mileage stopped at Fort William. I have no hostility to the province of Quebec; indeed, I like that province and its people. But I want them to bear in mind the fact I have just stated. I do not like to see any question discussed in this House purely from a provincial point of view. It is absolutely necessary, of course, when members of parliament come here to represent certain sections of the country, that they shall look after the interests of those particular localities. But, while this must be done, I hope it will aways be done in the proper spirit and with a view to cultivating that broad national outlook which I am sure we all trust will be characteristic of the Canadian people before long.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): I do not propose delaying the House long with the observations that I have to make, but I feel that an expression of gratitude should be tendered the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), for the very able manner in which he has dealt with this matter. I believe that it is of vital importance, in considering this large number of railway bills that we should have always before us the financial condition of the country. To say whether one was in favour of branch lines or not would be as ridiculous as to say whether a man liked vegetables or not; there would be some which he would like and others which he would not like. I do not think that we can consider these branch lines in a lump; each one will have to be taken up and examined carefully, and, in my opinion, the light in which we should view this question is the light of this principle—that we in this country cannot afford to spend money upon anything except vital necessities.

Mr. EULER: We might take that for granted.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, we might take it for granted, and we should be glad to do so, were it not for the fact that proposals are submitted every few weeks which indicate quite clearly that we cannot take anything of the kind for granted. No doubt if the House were composed of gentlemen of the wisdom and prudence of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), such a remark as he has just made would be quite pertinent. However, to bring matters back to a practical level after these complimentary observations, I would suggest that in regard to each one of the bills which we shall consider, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) should be prepared to submit the following information before the Court—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: It would be well, I think, if we could all look at this question in a purely judicial and impartial frame of mind. The information which I suggest the minister should be prepared to lay before parliament is this: First, what extent of territory will be served by the proposed line; second, what number of persons will be so served; third, how far are such persons distant now from the nearest railway facilities?

Mr. CANNON: Most of them are still in Europe.

Mr. McMASTER: Well, I did not intend to give an international aspect to the matter; I should be content to consider merely the number of people in Canada who are distant from the nearest railway facilities. Then I think we should have some computation, rough though it might be, of the amount of tonnage that might be carried on the proposed branch lines, as well as the estimated earnings. The estimated profit to be obtained in the immediate, and the more distant future should also be considered. I can well understand that it might be good business to build a line even although for a year or so it might be a liability rather than an asset, if there were a very strong assurance that within two or three years that liability would be turned into an asset. I do not wish to detain the House much longer, but it seems to me that it is in the light of this principle, and with the information which I seek, that we should bring our minds to a consideration of the different branch lines proposed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended detaining the House with any remarks at this moment, but I deem it necessary to again make clear the position which we take upon this question. My hon. friend the leader of the group to my left (Mr. Forke) pointed out that everything in connection with railways, capital expenditure and the like, had to come before the House, and my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) also pointed out that there was a probability of the budget being balanced. Well, both these gentlemen are to a certain extent right, and yet they are wrong. The real reason why we are having all this discussion to-day, and no branch lines were built last year, is that the ordinary rule of showing railway capital expenditures as a matter of railway vote year by year was departed from. It is quite easy, of course, to show a favourable balance when you change your method of book-keeping, but I think my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George is quite right in saying that the balance should not be taken too seriously in connection with this matter. He might have gone further and said that with respect to that balance we will have to consider the wonderful legislation of last year along with the loans of $50,000,000, and $22,500,000 guaranteed by the government. Of course, it makes all the difference whether you do or do not consider in your balance $72,500,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Were those loans considered in previous years?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong, but I think there was never a loan which was not brought down to this House and duly voted. However that may be, we have got further admissions at the present time from my hon. friend himself, and I care not, and this House cannot very well distinguish, what he does one way or the other with the money in the light of his own admission that we already have many more millions of dollars invested in this property than it is worth.

Mr. MARLER: A year or so ago my hon. friend stated that we had to spend money on these properties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I fail to see the significance of having had to spend it.

Mr. MARLER: Well, the significance is here. The money had to be spent, my hon. friend said, because trains were running off the tracks.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh yes, my hon. friend is perfectly correct, but he is referring to something that I am not addressing myself to at the moment. It is quite correct to say that in the past money had absolutely to be spent in order to provide a proper vehicle of transportation, and the capital so spent in betterments and reconstruction is to be found in the deficits voted by this House. As I say, Mr. Speaker, the only reason for the delay last year was that a new method might be adopted and the old basis of comparison confused, with the resultant loss of time. There was something said to the effect that the money for these branch lines cannot be got quick enough by vote. Well, sir, we have already voted one-sixth of the estimates without a word of discussion. In connection with these branch lines there is no reason in the world why the estimates could not have been brought down at the very commencement of the session and the votes dealt with. That is not the reason. The reason is that it is thought to be a good thing to get a change of basis.

I do not want to delay consideration of these bills. I think that probably most of the branch lines will not at all measure up to the standard claimed by my hon. friends who have spoken, that on the contrary they will fall very far short of the standard required, for instance, by the leader of the Progressive party. But some of these branch lines I think do measure up to the standard, and we do not want to delay their proper consideration. We do however, want to get the fullest and completest information with respect to all these projects, and surely that is something which the House is entitled to. Last session we had a great deal of difficulty in getting any information at all. I recall correspondence with my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) complaining of lack of information, and it will be remembered that last session we protested against these matters being dealt with without proper information being furnished to the House. Now, I hope that will not again occur. I would ask the minister to bring down not only the information which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has already pointed out should be furnished, but also appropriate maps in order that members will know just exactly where this construction is and its relation to other lines, so that they will be able to appreciate the effect on the railway situation generally. I think we should also have—and I know that my hon. friend can get it if these matters have been properly considered—the regular traffic report from the traffic officers of the company. And over above all that, I think this House has the right to ask from the gentleman to whom we are all looking for the real operation of these lines—Sir Henry Thornton—a declaration that he requires them and believes that their construction is in the public interest. We do not want to have it said later on, as it very likely may be said in view of the location of some of the lines in this list, that the House rendered it absolutely impossible for the National system to make a proper showing. Therefore, we have a right to such a declaration and to be assured that the proposed construction will not constitute an obstacle to the successful operation of the system in future. I would ask my hon. friend to bring down this information. I would also like it to be understood that while we yield not our position that railway costs should be shown in the railway estimates, and that the whole matter be properly and fully considered when the bills are in committee, we reserve to ourselves the right to discuss any matter of principle which may arise.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I only rise to say that I fully endorse the remarks made by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) regarding the resolution now before the House. He has made such a forceful speech and has so well covered the ground that I will not weary hon. members with further arguments in support of his attitude. Like him I only wish to make my position clear, and I will do so in two words. On another occasion I stated that it was very difficult to convince some of our constituents that the construction of very important and urgent public works must be deferred at the present moment on account of the economy that we have to practise in our public expenditures. If we are to make expenditures in railway construction which are not absolutely necessary and urgent it will be impossible to convince our constituents of the necessity for delay in other works. Therefore I will await the information which the Minister of Railways will undoubtedly bring down when the resolutions come before the Committee of the Whole House for consideration. I am sure that he will be able to convince us that these projected lines are necessary and urgent at this time. If he does not,

I am sorry to say that I shall have to vote against the resolution.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the subject of the construction of railways in this country is always one in which the representatives in the House of Commons take a deep interest. This afternoon we have listened to a discussion led largely by hon. gentlemen residing in the city of Montreal or in districts within close and ready access to it. We do know that for some years in that city a rivalry has existed between the two great national railway systems of Canada. From the point of view of the districts represented by my hon. friends I presume we have not very much fault to find with their attitude. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, Montreal (Mr. Marler) has no constituents who reside very far from railways.

Mr. MARLER: He has constituents who have to pay for them, though.

Mr. KYTE: Well, the whole people of Canada contribute their proportion. When my hon. friend's constituents desire to leave the city and travel to remoter districts they are not obliged to drive by buggy or automobile a very considerable distance in order to get to the nearest railway. The same is true with regard to my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault), he not only has two railways in his riding, but he is advocating very strongly and with great eloquence the building of a bridge to connect his constituency with the city of Montreal.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Very necessary indeed.

Mr. KYTE: I quite agree that that bridge is very necessary from the point of view of the interests of my hon. friend's constituents, but he should also concede that necessary railway accommodation should be extended to rural districts.

Mr. MARLER: Never said a word against it.

Mr. KYTE: I myself live in a constituency that has not the railway accommodation that it ought to have and that the importance of that part of the country calls for. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) gave a statement in the course of his speech as to the population served by each mile of railway throughout the different provinces. I shall not recapitulate his figures, but he pointed out that in British Columbia there was a mile of railway for each 102 of the population; in Ontario, a mile for each 266, and in Quebec, a mile for each 460. In Nova Scotia there is a population of 326 to each mile of railway. In the island of Cape Breton, which ought to be and has always been regarded as a section of Nova Scotia standing by itself, we have one mile of railway to each 600 of the population. In the United States there is a mile of railway to every 400 of the population. So that from the figures quoted by the hon. member for Joliette and from those I have just given it will be seen that in the important section of Nova Scotia from which I come we have a smaller mileage of railway in proportion to the population than in any other part of Canada.

5 p.m.

During the last two years that I have occupied a seat in this House I have not pressed unduly the demands of the people of that part of the country in reference to necessary railway accommodation. I regret very much that in this very generous bill of fare as regards the supplying of branch railways for the different provinces, the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) has not been able to include the construction of a railway line from the town of St. Peters to the city of Sydney and the town of Louisburg. Nova Scotia is rich in natural resources; I do not think that in any part of Canada there is greater natural wealth than is to be found in that province. In the island of Cape Breton, which I more particularly represent in this House, there is a still larger amount of wealth in natural resources. We have there all the important coal mines of the Maritime provinces. We have there a great steel plant which gives employment to a larger number of men than probably any other industrial concern in Canada. From the town of St. Peters to the city of Sydney is a distance of sixty miles, and along that line there are valuable coal mines, deposits of ore, and settlements, the people of which make a prosperous living in the pursuit of the fisheries. These people are obliged to haul the products of their industry twenty or thirty miles to a railway. Important lumbering resources which are still undeveloped are also to be found in that section. Recently some important mineral deposits were discovered about thirty miles from the railway. A large and wealthy industrial concern in New York spent some $60,000 or $70,000 prospecting this area. They found the mineral deposits were there, but owing to their being such a long distance from a railway the project had to be abandoned. The company lost the money they had spent on it, and the mine still remains undeveloped. What was done in Ontario when large mineral deposits were found in that northern country? The moment it was known that it was wealthy in respect of mineral resources, a railway was built to tap that section of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: By the province.

Mr. KYTE: By the province; it was a Liberal government that was in office at the time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If my hon. friend will permit a question, does he not recall that the Liberal government in power at that time refused to grant the usual subsidy for the building of that road?

Mr. KYTE: Well, I am not sure as to that; at all events the Liberal government in Ontario built the railway and it has been a great advantage to that country. I do not propose, however, to be drawn away from the particular matter I have in my mind. I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of constructing the railway line to which I refer, and while I give enthusiastic support to every proposal calculated to improve the conditions of people living in the rural districts and facilitating the transport to market of the products of their industry, I desire equal consideration for every part of the Dominion of Canada.

In the proposals of the Minister of Railways provision is made for one branch railway for the province of New Brunswick, two for Nova Scotia, three for Quebec, two for Manitoba, ten for Saskatchewan, five for Alberta, and three for British Columbia, making twenty-six branches in all. It was argued by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) that owing to the sparse population in these provinces there was no justification for constructing these branch lines of railway. Mr. Speaker, one of the chief justifications for such expenditure is that the building of these railways will increase the population, and will bring more people into the country to assist in developing our resources. What is the situation that exists to-day? It is that population is moving from the rural districts to the urban centres. It is stated from time to time, unfortunately with great truth, that we have to a very large degree lost population from the rural sections. Large numbers of our people, it is alleged, have gone to the United States, and many others have moved from the rural sections to our cities. Why have they done that? Because the conditions of life in the country are not as favourable or as pleasant as they are in the cities. How can we expect the people to take up farms in sections thirty and forty miles from a railway, how can we expect them to engage in farming and help to develop our natural resources, if there are no railway facilities in the rural sections by which their products can be transported to market. The conditions that exist in western Canada are not peculiar to that part of the country; the conditions existing in the older settled portions of the Maritime provinces call just as loudly for the provision of railway accommodation as do those in the West. It is probably too late now to ask the Minister of Railways to include in his rather comprehensive scheme for the building of branch lines the railway that I have in mind, but I trust that when the House is called upon to consider railway construction at a future session the importance of the line whose construction I advocate will not be overlooked.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is my hon. friend referring to a railway line in his own constituency?

Mr. KYTE: The claims of my constituency present themselves to my mind before those of any other riding in Canada. In that respect I resemble my hon. friend. I am here to speak for my own constituency, and I should be surprised if the hon. gentleman himself admitted that he thought of any other constituency before urging the claims of his own.

Mr. MICHAUD: My hon. friend has been urging the construction of a bridge in his own constituency.

Mr. KYTE: That is possible. Most assuredly I am thinking of the railway situation in the riding I represent. I believe no greater necessity for improved railway facilities exists anywhere than is to be found in that constituency. While I heartily support the proposal of the Minister of Railways, because I believe that every community should enjoy the advantages that I desire to see provided for my own constituency, nevertheless I shall feel that the minister has not done his full duty in meeting the need for further railways until he has turned his attention to the section of Canada which I represent and whose claims I am urging with all the force I can.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I have a very vivid recollection of the debate which took place a year ago in connection with the proposals for the construction of branch lines, and I must congratulate hon. members opposite, and the country as well, on the fact that there was evidently an insurrection at the ministerial caucus held this morning, if not a riot. We on this side of the House are convinced of that by what we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend's imagination is running away with him entirely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The remarks of some hon. gentlemen opposite justify to the very letter the attitude which we on this side took a year ago with regard to the construction of these branch lines. They prove beyond all fear of contradiction that our position at that time was absolutely sound. I hope the hon. members in question will pursue their present stand until the end.

The other night I argued, in connection with a very large item that was before the Committee of Supply, that the minister was not bringing down the information to which we were entitled. The protest made had its effect. It involved some delay, but finally we obtained the desired information. I desire to express the hope now, that the Minister of Railways will not follow the course pursued by his colleague the Minister of Public Works on the occasion referred to.

Mention has been made during the discussion of the need for branch lines in various provinces, and the hon. member who spoke a minute or two ago (Mr. Kyte) referred to what was done in Ontario with respect to a railway a number of years ago. Hon. gentlemen will observe that Ontario is not mentioned in connection with the branch lines now before parliament. It must not be argued from this omission that branch lines are not needed or are not necessary in Ontario. It is very important and urgent that branch lines should be constructed in that province, particularly in the mining districts of the north. The present government of the province inherited a legacy of debt from the previous administration that makes it absolutely impossible for them to proceed in the manner they would desire with the development of the northern districts which are so urgently in need of branch lines: In regard to the particular railway to which my hon. friend referred I have a very distinct recollection of what took place in connection with this railway. It is true the enterprise was initiated when a Liberal government was in power in the province. It is equally true that the administration of that day made application to a Liberal government in Ottawa for the usual subsidy of $3,200 a mile. Even that assistance was refused, and it was not until a change of government took place at Ottawa and Toronto that the subsidy desired, and to which they were entitled, was granted to the province of Ontario. But the assistance from the Dominion treasury which that enterprise involved was a mere bagatelle compared with what is contemplated under the present proposals, and which make the Dominion government responsible for the entire cost of building branch lines in Canada.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) tried to make it appear that the bulk of the tonnage carried by the railways of the Dominion is being created in western Canada. The hon. member referred to his own farming experience under which he shipped thirteen or fourteen cars of wheat grown by him. May I point out to my hon. friend that in the constituency that I represent 2,000 car loads of freight have been shipped from one acre alone.

Mr. MILLAR: What was the nature of the commodity?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It was quarried lime stone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I might also point out that while we had a market in the United States for much of this product the Fordney-McCumber tariff imposed a duty of a dollar a ton on our stone as a result of which we have lost that market. Futhermore immense quantities of stone are being shipped by the United States into this country, and yet this government refuses to raise a hand to protect Canadian industries. Speaking about the matter of tonnage the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) the other night argued about the advantage it would be if we shipped wheat from western Canada to the markets of Great Britain, and in return brought back the products of Great Britain instead of using products of home manufacture. The hon. gentleman also pointed out that it would be, in a sense, an advantage if Russia were to supply Great Britain with her live stock and meat products, and similar commodities because Russia could meet the demand to better advantage than we can in Canada And yet at the same time the hon. gentleman argued that the soil of western Canada was becoming so depleted by reason of the system of farming they are carrying on there that something would have to be done to remedy the condition pertaining in that part of Canada. I agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) in his question: Is it so absolutely important that we should go on and deplete the virgin soil of western Canada by constructing branch lines through that part of the Dominion rather than that we should develop the resources which we have at present, and which are accessible to our present railways? As far as the province of Ontario is concerned, we are discriminated against all along the line. I see that the Minister of Agriculture is in his seat. The estimate for the experimental farms went through the other night, and Ontario got no further consideration than usual. We in Ontario have to carry on most of our experimental farms and pay for them ourselves. At the same time 48 per cent of the customs revenue of the Dominion is paid by the province of Ontario.

I would not have made any remarks this afternoon if it had not been for the statements of the chief whip of the Liberal party (Mr. Kyte). I hope that in the future some recognition will be shown northern Ontario, that fine district, the richest and most promising mineral area in the world. Prospectors have gone in there and spent their money, and all that is necessary now to develop that district is railways. Yet we are not receiving one particle of encouragement from the government, and there is no suggestion that they are going to assist us in this matter. Ontario is held up to the rest of the Dominion, as an example of a province that does things for herself. Well if that is to be the method in Ontario, and if Ontario has to pay for all these things herself, why not apply the same principle to the other provinces as well? I am not accustomed to arguing along this line. I do not believe in provincialism or localizing our efforts, and I think every hon. member of this House should take a broad general view of the questions which come before parliament, and should not be actuated by the requirements of his own particular constituency. I have not taken that view in the past, and I hope I will not have to do so in the future.

In conclusion, I desire to emphasize the propaganda which was carried on since the last session of parliament by hon. gentlemen opposite, who endeavoured to place the blame upon the party sitting on the opposition benches to-day, for their attitude with regard to branch lines. Our position has been justified this afternoon by the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite much more effectively than could have been done by any arguments we could advance.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix and Montmorency) (Translation): I had no intention, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this debate, but I cannot allow such an occasion to slip by without drawing the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) to certain facts. Last year, on a similar occasion, as well as when in the opposition I represented the county of Charlevoix and Montmorency—I had requested the hon. Minister of Railways to include if possible, in the estimates for the next year, certain amounts for the construction and operation of two branch lines extending respectively from Bay St Paul and St Urbain, and from Murray Bay to Nairn's Falls. The distance between St Paul and St Urbain is nine miles and the branch line would cost about $200,000. An important mine is located in that region which is operated by the Titanium Ore Company, and, during the war, the General Electric Company of the United States, worked with profit a neighbouring mine. I feel certain that, if a branch line was constructed to ensure the necessary service, the present shareholders of the Titanium Ore Company who all belong to the province of Quebec, might carry out very useful work in that region. St Urbain has a national park which the Department of the Interior has specially reserved for fishing and shooting. There also exists, in this locality, a great number of clubs subject to the regulations of the provincial government. I feel convinced that the building of this branch line would have for effect to increase the traffic and attract more capital and more people. This district is also a great farming district from which is exported butter, cheese and other commodities to the various parts of the province of Quebec.

As to the other branch line, between Murray Bay and Nairn's Falls, its construction dates back eleven years, before the building of the main line of the Saguenay railway. The government has not officially, up to this date, taken it over. This branch line is rented for a nominal sum, to a pulpwood company. I am told that it would take about $100,000 to put it in good working condition. A great quantity of cheese and butter is produced in this region and lumber operations are also pursued on a large scale, so that the railway has a great deal of merchandise to transport.

The hon. Minister of Railways gave me as an answer, last year, that the construction and operation by the state of these branch lines were not possible, that the money which he had at his disposal could not be spent in that part f the province because other parts of the country need railways more than the county which I have the honour to represent.

Since the last session of parliament, I have been in touch with the Department of Railways, with the management of the National Railways and among others, with Sir Henry Thornton, president of the railway. I submitted a plan by which, in my opinion, it was possible to operate that railway line, of eight to nine miles in length, in such a way as to allow the population back of Murray Bay to communicate more easily with the village of Pointe-à-Pic. I do not know what may result of this project, but I trust that the Minister of Railways and the board of management of the National Railways may find it possible to acquiesce in the just claims that I stated last year and the previous years and that I again state this year.

There is also the completion of the Quebec and Saguenay railway between Chicoutimi and Murray Bay, for a distance of about fifty-five miles which will have to be undertaken in the near future, if we wish to see the operation of the main line become profitable. I think it is necessary to extend the construction of railways, not only in such a way as to open up new territories, but so as to develop also small localities which are 10, 15 or 20 miles distant from a main railway. The county that I represent was for a number of years completely isolated from the district of Quebec, it could only communicate by boat or schooner with that district during the summer season. The railway which now extends to Murray Bay has only been operating since the last few years. The two great political parties of this country contributed to the construction of this railway. It is the Conservative party which voted certain subsidies and had the railway constructed, but the first grants had been made by a Liberal government, and without these said grants those who were at the head of this undertaking could not have started the work and completed it.

Should I again have this year a little tiff with the Minister of Railways, and be unable to take a favourable view of his leaving out of the estimates the amount requisite for the construction of the two little branch lines that I request for my county and which are very necessary, it is not an excuse for me to oppose the resolutions which he may introduce in this House. I think the hon. minister has been well advised to move a separate resolution for each proposed branch line, so that all these resolutions may be discussed and considered separately, and so also that the House may judge them on their merits and adopt the resolutions relative to the most necessary branch lines, so that they may be built immediately.

When I was elected a member of this House, as the chief liberal whip expressed it a short while ago, I was elected to represent the interests of my county and electors, but I was also elected to represent, not only the interests of my county, of my district and of my province, but in order to have a broader view of things and thus enable me to better judge of the interests of all the provinces, the East, the centre, or the West, in fact the interests of the whole of Canada. And when the Railway Department and the Board of Management of the National Railways state that the construction of these lines is necessary, either in the East or West, I think it is the duty of all the members to support the minister and vote the items for the immediate construction of these railway lines. If some members of this House have in any way expressed personal views inspired by certain reasons which are of special interests to their electors, I think that when it comes to giving their vote, after the explanations given by the Minister of Railways, there will not be one member who sits, Sir, on your right who will vote against the resolutions and bills introduced by the hon. minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) made a suggestion in which I am glad to acquiesce. These resolutions can all be discussed with more intelligence after they are placed in the form of a bill; and if I might be allowed to get some of them through, introduce the bill, and have it read the first time, they will then be allowed to stand until we get them all through and I will try to have all the information possible. Much of the discussion this afternoon has been on matters not at all connected with the railways, and I imagine some things have been said to which I could have replied, but I was debarred from doing that because we were not in committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I might point out that my hon. friend has made a substantive motion, and he has the right to reply if there is anything he can reply to.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is nothing of my right hon. friend's to reply to. He did not object much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not speak.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: I meant to add, while I was on my feet, that the bills have to go through the routine just the same as these resolutions, and there will be ample opportunity to discuss all phases of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like to have the minister make a very full statement as to what investigation has been made by the president and general manager of the system into this project in New Brunswick, and if, first of all, the president and general manager on his own responsibility recommends this project. If so, upon what does he base his recommendation? What is the anticipated earning power of this project? Does he affirm to the government, and is the affirmation in writing—if not, it ought to be, in my judgment—that this road is essential to the system; that he expects it to pay; that from the standpoint of the National system, which it is his business to run and operate, this road ought to be built? In this connection, I want to lay down what, I think, is a principle, that in respect of the management of this enterprise, the directorate should make no recommendation—when I say the directorate, I mean the general manager, because I do not think any of us are disposed to take very seriously a recommendation of the present directorate—on account of considerations that do not bear on the railway corporation itself; that is to say, any recommendation that, say the Canadian Pacific or any other equally well managed concern would not, from the railway standpoint, make. In a word, it is no business of the directorate or the general manager to take into account any consideration save railway consideration. If the government, if parliament, wants to grant a subsidy or any other assistance to any colonization road or anything of that kind, that is the business of parliament; but in the management of the railway those things cannot be taken into account, and I am pretty sure the minister will agree with that principle. On that principle, has the president and general manager recommended this railway, and if so, has he given the government the basis of his recommendation?

Mr. GRAHAM: I might say that in this list there is not a railway that has not been given to us by the Canadian National board. From the discussion I had over this particular line, I might say that the president is strongly in favour of the construction of either one of these lines for purely business reasons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Either one of them?

Mr. GRAHAM: This resolution takes authority to construct forty-one miles of railway, but if arrangements can be made with the Canadian Pacific, it will be necessary to construct only fourteen miles. This is to facilitate traffic, and the recommendation of the president is altogether from a railway standpoint. Information concerning the traffic is in a measure problematical. What traffic has been done has been done in connection with the Canadian Pacific. What they wish to have now is a connection of their own, so that they can ship directly to the New England states even if they make running rights with the Canadian Pacific Railway. They will have a good many difficulties which are details of operation unless they have a way of getting into the New England states with their own line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have heard in connection with this enterprise, as in connection with some others that are in the estimates, that there are some people who would like it because of the spending of money, but I have never yet heard anyone suggest that from a railway standpoint or an earning power standpoint, this could be justified. I notice the minister referred to the directorate. I hope he understands that I am speaking of the president. Has the minister in writing and is he ready to put on the Table the president's recommendation in regard to this road and the reasons therefor? I think the House is entitled to that in every instance. Parliament has the sole responsibility as to what moneys are voted for capital investment, and I have emphasized this principle in the House very frequently. The minister will remember that I sought to emphasize it with all the power I possess in connection with the Scribe hotel. The whole constitutional basis of the National Railways reserves to parliament full initiatory control in respect of capital investment. The responsibility is directly ours and we cannot hide behind the president or anyone else. We want his recommendation, but we equally want his reason for it. I think we are entitled to have it, not by indirect narration, but under his own signature and a copy of it laid on the Table of the House. I would especially like to have it in connection with this resolution, and there are others in regard to which it will be equally necessary.

Mr. GRAHAM: There has been no request or recommendation in writing. The fact that this list of lines was recommended to the government and explanations prepared with not only the knowledge but the direct acquiescence of the Canadian National Railway board, would, to my mind, form a sufficient reason why we should accept them as his recommendations. There is no question about this line being one of the ones which I discussed at quite some length with the president himself, and both he and the entire staff who are responsible for the management of the road seem to think that this line is necessary for the development of the trade they have in mind between the Maritime provinces and the New England states. A serious difficulty which they have had in shipping pulpwood is in getting their own cars back. One of the chief troubles we have had in the East is that the railways ship out pulpwood and somebody keeps the cars. They are not all kept outside of Canada either. The result is that men who have many cords of pulpwood to ship are wiring to the head office in Montreal; and wiring to me: "We have no cars; the cars are all gone," at a time too, when we are using many cars in the West.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If a car gets out as it does now, why cannot it get back?

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend has not studied the railway situation very much. They are supposed to head the car for home after it is unloaded, using it, as they usually do, for return freight. But there is no return freight to compare with the outgoing freight of pulpwood. Consequently our cars loiter along the road, and even when they get into Canada, under present conditions, they loiter a long while before they get back to the Canadian National. Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Gzowski represented very strongly to me that this was one point they had in view, besides others. They believe that the traffic could be improved, to the benefit not only of the railways but of the whole country, if this line or a similar one were constructed.

Mr. MANION: Does the minister say that he has no recommendation in writing for this line from the president?

Mr. GRAHAM: These recommendations are not made specifically in writing. The president and the board of directors get together and discuss various propositions to be submitted to the Minister of Railways for presentation to parliament. They presented me with a list, and there were several other lines discussed not included therein. But they made no formal written request; they simply submit a list and the Minister of Railways proceeds to get the necessary legislation through. There is not a line here that is not on the list given us by the president of the railway and the board of management.

Mr. MacLAREN: Do I understand that one of the reasons given for the building of this branch is the belief that it will facilitate getting the cars back into the country?

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood the minister to say that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say that it was solely for the purpose of getting the cars back into the country.

Mr. MacLAREN: I presume you would want to get them back.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not want to be misunderstood. There is more than one railway in Canada. Now, a railway that is crowded for cars and which is a little short of rolling stock may keep another railway's cars upon payment of a small sum per day. This line would facilitate the Canadian National Railways in using its own cars to a far greater extent than it can under present conditions.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is proposed to expend on this line the sum of $2,123,000. That I think is paying pretty well to get the cars back.

Mr. GRAHAM: Getting the cars back, as I have explained, is not the sole reason for building the line.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not say it is the sole reason, nor would I for a moment misinterpret the remarks of the minister. But that, as I understand from him, is a factor in the building of the line, and it is one that has impressed me, because I cannot see why we should build this line for the reason, among others, that it will enable us to get the cars back. Is the minister aware that there is strong objection even in New Brunswick to the building of this line, and that it is considered by many people in the province that it will be disadvantageous in that it will dislocate the routes of traffic and accentuate transportation north and south rather than east and west as we desire? Perhaps the minister does not know that it is not considered essential at the present time from the point of view of the people of New Brunswick. And besides that, there are objections being taken to the construction of this branch under any circumstances, the view being held that if the government wishes to make a useful extension in that province it should complete the Valley railway to Grand Falls, there connecting with the Transcontinental and encouraging a direct traffic east and west.

Mr. GRAHAM: A great deal of the traffic does not go very far west. This line does not touch the question of the use of Canadian ports in preference to American ports, and the object in building it is to allow the people of New Brunswick in the vicinity concerned to get their products as quickly as possible to the New England markets.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the minister will consult a map he will see that a good many lines exist now that help the people of New Brunswick to get their products across the border. I understand that we shall have an opportunity of discussing this matter later, and in the meantime I would ask the House to look most carefully into this particular proposal and to watch the criticisms that appear in the papers. If it does so it will find that the line proposed is not considered so important by the people on the ground.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am somewhat surprised to hear my hon. friend (Mr. MacLaren) suggest that this line is not considered important by the people of New Brunswick. This is not a new project; it has been before the House on several occasions since I have been a member of parliament, and even previous to the time I came here. I have never heard anyone in New Brunswick oppose it, nor am I aware that there has been opposition anywhere else. While the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) seems doubtful that anyone has recommended it, I can quote one man who was strongly in favour of it and in whom perhaps he will take more stock than the president of the Canadian National Railways. In the year 1920 when the branch lines question was before the House I brought to the attention of the then Minister of Railways the advisability of building this connecting link. I may say before I go further that this is not a branch line; it is in the nature of a funnel that serves as an outlet for the whole traffic of the Canadian National lines in the Maritime provinces, and it would draw more traffic than any other section of road in that part of the country. Speaking in the House in 1920 Hon. J. D. Reid made the following statement:

> I am familiar with the proposal to which my hon. friend (Mr. Caldwell) refers. About four years ago it was suggested that the government should build that connecting line; it was shown that its construction would result in a great saving in the matter of traffic originating in the lower province and destined to the eastern states. On account of the financial situation action was delayed. There is no doubt that the construction of this line should be carried out.

This was the view that was held by the Minister of Railways in the government of which the leader of the opposition was a member at that time. Further down Hon. Mr. Reid is reported as follows:

> I have no doubt at all that when we get back to normal conditions the government will take up a scheme such as the one suggested and deal with these matters in the way that it is practically understood by the department and the railway officials that they should be carried out.

At that time I urged upon the Minister of Railways the advisability of building this line, and in 1922 I moved a resolution in this House that this should be done as soon as the finances of the country would permit. In reply, the Minister of Railways of that day, Hon. Mr. Kennedy, spoke as follows:

> As my hon. friends have said, this matter has been before the House on two former occasions. I am informed by the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways that they have investigated this project, and while they are willing to admit that from the standpoint of interchange of traffic there is much that might be said in favour of further construction, yet they do not feel that the time is opportune to go on with it at the present time.

There was never any doubt in the minds of either of the ministers of railways of that time as to the advisability and the necessity of undertaking the building of this line. With regard to the other point that has been brought up, namely, the return of cars to the Canadian National Railways, I may say that by reason of the fact that at present the Canadian Pacific railway is the connecting link between the Canadian National railways and the Maine Central, the traffic must all go over the Canadian Pacific route from Fredericton to Vanceboro, from St. John to Vanceboro, and from Woodstock to Vanceboro. The Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways in New Brunswick are competing lines and in some sections of the province they are not far removed from each other. I have in mind something that happened less than three years ago in connection with the return of cars. A certain lumberman was shipping from his sawmill a considerable quantity of lumber to the United States under a contract which required delivery within a certain time. Although the Canadian National line runs within twenty rods of his mill, and the Canadian Pacific is about nine miles away, he could not get any cars on the Canadian National. That meant that in order to carry out his contract he had to haul his lumber overland to the Canadian Pacific siding. This almost ruined him for he had to pay more than his profit to get his lumber to the railway. The importance of returning cars to where they are needed on competing lines cannot be over-estimated, and if this connecting link had been in operation at that time this man would have been able to load his lumber at his door practically. I know farmers who have had to haul their potatoes and other produce long distances to the Canadian Pacific line. That is one of the reasons why there is such a deficit on the St. John railway—the Canadian Pacific railway has been able to starve it by withholding cars. This, I suppose, is only a matter of good business on the part of the Canadian Pacific, because as a result the traffic has gone to its line. As there will be an opportunity to discuss this matter later, I will not now detain the committee at further length.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, I think some of the facts I have are not at variance with those of my hon. friend. This connection would connect the St. John road with an American line. The St. John road is not owned by the Dominion government but by the government of New Brunswick, and the receipts go sixty per cent to the National system as lessees for operating and forty per cent to the government of New Brunswick as owners. The traffic is such that the sixty per cent of the receipts does not pay the cost of operation, nor does the forty per cent cover the overhead charges. In fact I think there is an annual deficit of $200,000 which the province has to make up. It is now suggested that the Dominion government ought to pay for the construction of a connecting line with an American road from a line which they do not own, and certainly ought not to own having regard to its earnings. I take it there is no dispute at all between my hon. friend and myself, at any rate down to this point. Then, I think it is also perfectly clear that there has been an agitation in the province for the building of the line, but the project has alwaye been turned down by the provinicial authorities. When Mr. Gutelius was operating the Intercolonial system he made recommendations which looked to a very much shorter construction and easier junction than is now proposed. Later on when the system was managed by the Canadian National Railways the management took the position that as the construction was in connection with the St. John line, its owners should build it and not the Dominion government. I think my hon. friend will find my recollection is entirely right in these particulars. So what my hon. friend is to-day doing is reversing the position taken by the former management—perhaps he will tell us on what grounds. The former management took the position that the property being owned by the St. John company and not by the Dominion government, any addition to it should be made by the owner, not by the lessee, who would get but little out of it and would not improve his own property except during the period of operation.

Mr. CALDWELL: My hon. friend is not quite correct. The railway is not owned by the St. John company, but by the government of the province.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very well, it is not owned by the Dominion government. The former management also took the ground that they could see no immediate operating benefits resulting from the connection that would justify the expense of construction. I would ask my hon. friend whether or not the project formerly considered was not very much smaller than the present one. Take, for example, the line that the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) has been talking about. It was a line of twenty-two miles and he asked only $1,000,000 for it.

Mr. CALDWELL: Our share of that connection was twenty-two miles, but we had to get an agreement with another company to build about twenty-odd miles in the state of Maine, over which we would have to get running rights.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am pretty sure the line was to be twenty-two miles, and I believe the estimated cost of construction was $1,000,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: When this twenty-two miles was built we were still twenty-odd miles from the Maine Central line. Another company which had been formed in Maine proposed to build that additional mileage, over which the government would get running rights to the Maine Central. Two roads would be involved, instead of one as is proposed in this bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, we come back to where we started. The only project the former Minister of Railways, Hon. Mr. Reid, was talking about was a line of twenty-two miles in length. While he said some nice things about that project, he would not endorse it. So perhaps my hon. friend will show just on what grounds we have this change of decision by the management. I dare say when he gets a report from the president he will be kind enough to have these grounds set out.

When we were dealing with this matter before we went into committee, I suggested that instead of discussing all the resolutions at great length we should reserve our criticisms, not only on detail but also on principle, until the different bills were brought down and we had full information. My hon. friend nodded his head at that time, but Hansard does not get the nod.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, I nodded my head while my hon. friend was in the House, and I expressed my thoughts in language when he was out. It is all on Hansard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Thank you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before we rise at six I want to submit to hon. members for their consideration my view that in respect of one or two of these ventures, these new enterprises involving the country in so much expenditure, the committee is entitled to see the direct recommendation, with the reasons for it, of the one man to whom the House looks. Others may look to the directorate; if so, they are entitled to do it. For myself I do not look to the directorate at all, and I do not think the people of this country look to the directorate, but they do look to the president. Now, the minister says in effect: "He came to me, or the directorate sent to me"—I do not know whether they did it directly or not; they may have done it through an intermediary—"presented these proposals to me; we discussed them together and I know they favour them." I do not think that is good enough for parliament. Suppose, a year or two years from now, it turns out that this is a total failure, that it does not work out at all, how are we going to hold the president responsible? How do we know that we have precisely his position, precisely what he expects and the conditions of it? He would likely at that time be able to say, "Oh, but I had other things in mind that the government did not carry out;" he would have some way of escaping it. The committee is entitled to the recommendation of the president of the railway in writing, accompanied by his reasons, his expectations, in a word, the basis of his business judgment that this money ought to be spent.

Mr GRAHAM: I think there would be no trouble in the world about getting that. My right hon. friend seems dubious; he does not appear to take anybody's word at all in this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, I did not say that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I told him distinctly that the president himself had recommended these lines; that he had been in my office at Ottawa with, I think, three or four members of the directorate. The list of lines was produced there and discussed for a couple of days. They gave me a memorandum on every line and why it should be built.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what we want. My hon. friend says, "they"; I would rather it were the president himself instead of the directorate. As long as the president's signature is to it—

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no signature to anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then what good is the memorandum? There is no question here of the minister's veracity in stating what the president wants; that is not the point. In the course of a long conversation between the president and the minister there may have been conditions laid down and other terms mentioned that could not be accurately transmitted to this House. We are entitled to something that we can hold the president to, something that represents precisely what he says, and, in what he says there should be embraced, not only his recommendation, but, as I expressed it before, the business basis for his judgment, so that later on no one will be able to say, "Well, the president's plans were not carried through; the president relied on this and relied on that, consequently he is not to blame for what occurred." That is quite possible if we continue as we are going now. But get the president's views in writing, his recommendation and his reasons, and his expectations, and we are proceeding as we ought to proceed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Did my right hon. friend always do that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, when we came before parliament we certainly put the written data on the table, and we did not refuse anything hon. members asked.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is not going to be anything refused. I am just asking the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I ask in this case. I do not mind if the information applies to all the lines; one statement can be given applicable to all and setting forth the details as to each so that we will know just what the president wants and why he wants it in respect of each of these ventures.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 22, to amend An Act to incorporate the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Mr. Clark.

Bill No. 23, respecting the Commercial Travellers Mutual Insurance Society.—Mr. Ryckman.

BILLS PROPOSED TO AUTHORIZE THE CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINES

The House again in committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction of a Canadian National Railway line from Kingsclear, a point on the Saint John and Quebec Railway in the province of New Brunswick, in a generally southwesterly direction, to a point on the St. Croix river, opposite Vanceboro, in the state of Maine; estimated mileage including existing grading, 41 miles; estimated cost, $2,123,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: During the recess I had an opportunity of looking up an editorial that appeared in the St. John Globe of 23rd February last, bearing on the proposal contained in the resolution, and I think it would be of some service if I read it. The editorial is headed "It is not wanted" and then proceeds:

One of the railroad proposals included in the branch line measures presented to parliament last spring and defeated by the Senate, called for construction of a road from a point in New Brunswick to a point on the Maine border, there to establish a connection between the C.N.R. and American railroads. If the proposal, in the same or some other form, comes before parliament during the coming session, it should arouse vigorous St. John opposition. If there were no other reasons for opposition to this measure, it should be sufficient to say that the need for economy makes expenditure of the millions involved an impossibility of the present. But there are other reasons for opposing this railroad construction. The province is already so well gridironed that further railroad construction, except such as is necessary to link up the Canadian National with the Valley road and provide a direct connection with the port terminals, can be left until development justifies their needs. The Dominion government railroad system has connections through St. John and through northern New Brunswick with railroad systems in the United States. To build another line and cut out the traffic that comes through St. John would entail an enormous expenditure without compensating benefits. In its own interests and in the interests of those economies which all recognize as obligatory at this time, St. John should study carefully any railroad proposals so menacing as the construction of another line to the international boundary.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like to point out to one of the leaders of the Conservative party that he has fallen into the same error as the other leaders of the same party and speaks in an almost inaudible voice.

Mr. MacLAREN: I thought the leader of the party was not speaking.

Mr. McMASTER: I said "one of the leaders."

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like the hon. member to hear what I have been reading.

Mr. McMASTER: That is what I want to do.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall take the necessary means to inform my hon. friend as to what I have been reading. It is an editorial from the St. John Globe and it refers to the proposal now under consideration. The heading is "It is not wanted," and that expresses the view of the paper, and those it represents, regarding the needs of this railroad at the present time. I shall not read the article again but will give a summary that can be more perfectly heard. It is the opinion of the Globe that this railroad is not necessary at the present time, partly on account of the necessity of observing economy and partly because no pressing reason exists for its construction. Another reason given is that there are railroads now running throughout the province extensively, and that routes exist for reaching the United States through other railroads. The editorial also regards it as a disadvantage to dislocate the routes of trade that are now being followed. For these reasons the opinion is expressed that it is undesirable, unnecessary, and extravagant to construct the proposed road at the present time.

Mr. McBRIDE: Can the hon. member state who wrote that?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am not aware who the actual writer is. If there is any disadvantage attaching to the article it is possibly that it emanates from a Liberal paper.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is relying on it for his argument.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And my hon. friend seems to think it is the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have not stated how much I rely on it. I am stating what the view of a prominent paper in the province is. I might also state that I myself independently coincide and agree with that view.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is that an editorial in that paper or is it a contribution by some outside person?

Mr. MacLAREN: It is an editorial. It was found in the Globe of the 23rd March. Now to finish this matter of the Globe, I shall take the opportunity of reading a second editorial of the 26th March on the same subject in the same paper, which says:

Something more than two millions of the twenty-eight millions of dollars which the Minister of Railways plans to spend on twenty-six branch line railways are for the construction of a road in New Brunswick from Kingsclear, a few miles above Fredericton, to a point on the St. Croix river opposite Vanceboro. A glance at a railway map of New Brunswick will show how this line will sidetrack St. John. At Kingsclear the branch will run from the St. John and Quebec Railway to the international border, forty-two miles away, there to link up with the Maine Central. The purpose of a connection between the Maine Central at Vanceboro and the Quebec and St. John at Kingsclear is to give the Canadian National a more direct American connection than the present St. John and Bangor route. From Kingsclear it is a shorter and more direct run via the National Transcontinental and the Central across country to Moncton and the North Shore than via St. John. The forty-two miles of railway therefore aims to divert from St. John all the east and westbound traffic which now finds its way through this city en route to and from United States points. It will lessen through traffic on the Canadian National Moncton-St. John line. It will lessen through traffic on the Canadian Pacific St. John-Vanceboro line. It will cut both railroad and terminal workers out of much employment without serving any particular traffic necessity. It is the Harvey-Salisbury Railway proposition in an amended form. St. John vigorously opposed that proposition in the long ago, and St. John should vigorously oppose this new effort to sidetrack this city and port by a large public expenditure, unnecessary at any time and absolutely indefensible at this time.

There is one further observation I wish to make at this moment, and that is that there is a good deal to show that the road that is proposed to be built is a competitive road to the Canadian Pacific. I am not advocating the Canadian Pacific interests, nor am I interested in any way in doing so, but I take it that it is the opinion of the House that at the present time our wishes and our views should be that each railroad should now be allowed to carry on its business, and that it is unnecessary and it is extravagant to build further lines of one system—that is to say of the Canadian National system—so that it may compete with the Canadian Pacific; in other words it is not an essential at the present moment.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to ask the minister why there has been a change in the routing of this proposed line? He will recall that in the bill a year ago it was proposed to divert this traffic to New England from a point about 50 miles above Fredericton, and then in a short direct line to the state of Maine, a distance of about 20 miles. Now it is proposed to run up on the St. John and Quebec railway about 16 miles above Fredericton, and go directly south to the Canadian Pacific railway, and then to have running rights over the Canadian Pacific railway from Harvey to Vanceboro, or else to build an independent line, if that cannot be arranged.

I would like to know what considerations have moved the management and the government—because I take it their interests are identical—in making the proposed change which is a very important one from the standpoint of expense. I think I know that country as well as any man in the House—in fact I think I know it a great deal better—and I have no doubt that the cost of the proposed branch line under this bill is a great deal more than the cost under the bill of last year. At the same time I quite appreciate the fact that if the railway is able to make a proper arrangement with the Canadian Pacific from Harvey westward it will be a considerable saving over the proposal of last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: All I know is that the president and board of directors give me a memorandum which says that it has been practically concluded that this is the best route for the Canadian National railway to take.

Mr. HANSON: Is that from the standpoint of grade?

Mr. GRAHAM: The memorandum does not say. I suppose it is from the standpoint of grade and maybe traffic as well.

In reply to the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. MacLaren): When I was a young man running a newspaper in the village of Morrisburg, I was strong for Morrisburg, and wrote articles almost as learned as this, protesting against the Canadian Pacific railway running east and west in the northern part of the county. According to the argument my hon. friend used, it would take traffic away from the town where I lived, but as a matter of fact I think that the Canadian National management is in duty bound to do what it thinks is best for the Canadian National system, coupled with the service to the people. If the committee is going to take the ground that anywhere the Canadian National proposes to go where it can make a dollar, everything being equal, it must not go there, if there is going to be any competition, but that it is perfectly right to go elsewhere then the road will lose money. Parliament is holding Sir Henry Thornton and his board responsible for endeavouring to make the Canadian National a success, and shortening hauls, as some branch lines in the West propose to do, will not meet with the approval of towns, and perhaps cities and communities that might be served better locally if this was not done. I will not admit that St. John will be injured a bit, but the Canadian National has a duty to perform to the Dominion of Canada and to itself, and if as my hon. friend says, a short direct route can be made to connect with the United States railways, and an interchange of traffic made which will enable the people of New Brunswick outside of the city of St. John as well as in it to get their products to their markets more quickly and more cheaply, then I think that is the chief concern for the committee to have in mind.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think perhaps the hon. minister is not aware that the main point in both these articles was that at this time, when economy was said to be the ruling motive, there was no urgency justifying the construction of that road for the reason given.

Mr. HANSON: This branch line is viewed in New Brunswick, or, at least, in that portion over which the Canadian National Railways dominates the traffic, as a business proposition, and it is from that point alone that I wish to approach this subject to-night. If you will look at the map of New Brunswick and visualise the traffic there, you will observe that the Canadian Pacific Railway holds sway in a comparatively small portion of the province, namely in the southeastern corner and along the western boundary, and that the balance of the country for the most part is served entirely by Canadian National lines. Ever since the mileage of the Intercolonial was increased by the absorption of the Canada Eastern railway, by the building of the St. John and Quebec railway, and by the absorption of the branch lines of the Intercolonial railway in New Brunswick, that system has gathered in each and every year a very considerable quantity of traffic which has been destined for New England points. During all this period of time, that system has been obliged to hand over the traffic thus originating on its lines, either to the Canadian Pacific railway at the city of St. John, or at the city of Fredericton or at Woodstock in the county of Carleton, or to the Bangor and Aroostook railway at Van Buren, Maine. As long ago as 1912, Mr. F. P. Gutelius, then general manager of the Canadian Government Railways—and I venture to say he is the best man who ever handled the Canadian Government Railways, at least, in my part of the country—conceived the idea of this independent outlet to the New England states for traffic originating on his own lines. I have no doubt, had the war not come, and had Mr. Gutelius continued as general manager of those railways, this independent funnel, so to speak, would have been built long ago.

Let me say, in passing, that as regards the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House, this question is not a local transportation question at all. It will serve little or no local purpose, and in any event I do not wish to approach the question from that standpoint. I do not, however, believe even the best friend of the project will claim for it that it is for the purpose of serving local traffic conditions. I must confess to the opponents of this project that, viewed from that standpoint, the proposition has no merit; but I say with all sincerity —and I do not care what government brings it forward—that from the standpoint of the management of the Canadian National Railways, this is a business proposition, and while this may not be the time to build it—and about this I can well understand there may be a great diversity of opinion, and I have no quarrel with anybody who takes the view that this is not an opportune time to build it—yet I say that if you were in the position of the management of the Canadian National Railways at this or at any time during the past ten years and had to see your traffic originating on your lines handed over to your keenest competitor in that whole territory, you would sympathise with them in their desire to have an independent outlet for this traffic which has been carried on for more than fifty years into the New England states. I am personally going to ask the committee, aside altogether from the two considerations which I have mentioned, namely the question of local conditions and the question of economic conditions, to view this matter on its merits alone. I believe, if the question is studied, if due regard is given to the problems that confront the management—and I sympathise with them as regards the problems with which I know they have been confronted in the past—this project will receive at least sympathetic consideration at the hands of this House.

I wish we had more information from the minister. I wish the management of the Canadian National Railways had taken us into their confidence and told us the extent of that traffic. I know it is large; I know it must be very large at certain seasons of the year, and I know there has been trouble for years in connection with the traffic to and from New England lines on account of the question of empties which was referred to this afternoon by the minister. At times, there are embargoes on Canadian cars leaving this country from Canadian railways, and it is possible to make shipments, especially of our forest and agricultural products, only in American cars. We have no direct contact with the Boston and Maine system which comprises the Maine Central system as well. Those cars are shipped down to the management of the Canadian National Railways as empties and they are grabbed up by their competitors, with the result that forest products and agricultural products in great volume cannot be moved because of the competitor having taken those empties which were destined for points on the Canadian National lines and which did not reach them. That has been a source of tribulation to the management of the Canadian National Railways for years past, and during certain seasons of the year the trouble has been very much accentuated. Of course, this is immensely more important to the shippers than it is even to the management of the railway, although they have to be the buffer between the two.

I regret very much that the original project has been abandoned. Perhaps, I can supply to the minister the reason, and I think the reason was this, that in the early days of this project and prior to last year, it was proposed to have this independent connection with New England, not with the existing railways in the Maine territory, but with a proposed new railway which would be built from the Maine boundary west to some New England point, such as Bangor. That project, I understand, unfortunately has fallen through. The promoters of that railway are not able to get their charter renewed. They have been delayed because of the delay on this side of the boundary, and within twelve months they have been denied a renewal of the franchise which they had heretofore. I think it is an unfortunate thing, from the standpoints of economy and of expenditure, that that should have occurred, and I imagine the officials of the Canadian National Railway system have been confronted with a new situation. I hope this matter will be approached from the standpoint of pure business, and if the line is not built this year, I venture to prophesy that it will be built within the near future unless some equitable arrangement can be made with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

While I am on my feet, let me say that we might as well be honest about the matter and admit that from the standpoint of business, the weakness of the proposition is that, to a certain extent at all events, it is a duplication. But I sympathize from the botton of my heart with the management of the Canadian National Railways, because of the difficulties which they have encountered on account of a line already existing which, in part at all events, gets this traffic. I cannot say anything more than I have said at this stage unless I know something more from the minister as to the routing and probable cost. I doubt very much if this road, from what I know of the first twelve miles at any rate, from St. John river south where it has to climb a very heavy watershed, can be built for $51,800 a mile. I have not very much faith in the government railways being able to build economically, especially after the experience we had in New Brunswick with the Transcontinental railway before the war, that railway having cost, I am informed, as much as $110,000 a mile. However, I hope that the present management will not be quite as prodigal as the commissioners of the Transcontinental railway were in New Brunswick during the years from 1904 to 1910. In any case, I doubt very much whether the line can be built for the figure named in the resolution. I want to point out to the minister that there are no expensive bridges to be considered, unless he duplicates or parallels that portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway line between Harvey and Vanceboro. If he does so he will find at least two very expensive bridges to build which will add materially to the cost.

I have endeavoured to be as sympathetic as possible to this proposition, but I should like to know whether it is really the intention of the management to begin operations this year. I can hardly believe it is, and I will tell the minister why, in advance. Up to last night the preliminary survey had not reached McAdam. I came by there last night and I knew that the engineers had been out for several weeks; but I was informed that the preliminary survey was still seven miles short of the westerly terminus, and it occurred to me that if the management were really serious in the intention to go on this year they had delayed that survey altogether too long. It is only fair to say, however, that the men are on the ground and are working towards their objective. I have no doubt, from the nature of the country, that the preliminary survey can be put through in the course of a week at most, by which time it might be hoped that the bill would go through. Once again, I would ask the minister whether it is the bona fide intention of the management to start this line this year, provided of course the bill goes through.

Mr. GRAHAM: The management informed me in their programme that they would grade this year and lay the track next year.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I want to make myself clear in regard to this matter and at the same time to ask for some information. I understood last year that the St. John Valley branch line was to be built between Meduncticand some point near Vanceboro, and as I gathered at that time the object was to route the traffic via the St. John and Quebec railway. Every one knows that this railway was built by the province of New Brunswick at considerable cost, the interest alone amounting at the present time to over $260,000. We have no means in New Brunswick to discharge this heavy burden out of the ordinary revenue and therefore it must be added to the provincial debt year after year. If the object of this particular branch line is to route the traffic via that St. John and Quebec railway, then I would commend it as a good business move on the part of the government to build it. But there must be no discrimination against other parts of the province. We all know that the St. John valley has too many railways from one point of view, because there is not enough traffic to keep them going. On the other hand we have no direct outlet to the United States. For the shipping of produce in the north of New Brunswick we have to route fish as well as farm products via Montreal, this entailing a very high express rate as well as a long mileage. In the case of fresh fish we have to put up with a rail freight of 1,100 miles from the Baie des Chaleurs coast to Boston, whereas if this fish were routed via Fredericton right across country it would be of considerable advantage to the people of New Brunswick. If the object of this branch line is to enable the people of the province to ship their produce across country, then I would say that we should support the measure, but if it will not help the eastern coast of New Brunswick, there would be discrimination to a certain extent and I should be inclined to object to the proposition. We have in the county of Northumberland and Gloucester a gap between Tracadie, the terminus of the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railways, and Newcastle. In this stretch of land between the baie des Chaleurs coast and the Miramichi there is a population of some forty thousand. These people are the pioneer settlers of the country and they are industrious and law-abiding; and I believe that in order to make the branch line programme complete, so far as the rights of the Maritime provinces are concerned, a line should be constructed to fill in this particular gap. It is only a matter of 52 miles and the country which the line would cover is fairly level,—a country which could be converted into one of the finest resorts in the Maritime provinces if not indeed in eastern Canada. This locality affords the very best fishing and shooting; I should say that there is no place, from this point of view, that is better anywhere in the world; and in addition to the fishing and shooting facilities that it offers, the district is largely covered by virgin forests which are awaiting development. Altogether, I am strongly of the opinion that preliminary steps at least should be taken at this stage to have this line surveyed with a view to placing it on the programme for actual construction in the very near future.

I repeat, that in order to make the new proposed line a paying proposition it must be so arranged that the traffic from most if not all of the Canadian National lines in New Brunswick shall be routed through the new road. We have the old Canada Eastern road, which connects the Miramichi valley with the St. John regions of Fredericton, and we have the old Intercolonial railway which connects the Baie des Chaleurs coast with the Miramichi valley. Then we have the old Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway which now forms a part of the Canadian National Railways and covers what is perhaps one of the finest districts in the Maritime provinces. But the difficulty is that none of these lines has any connection with United States points, and I believe that by proper arrangements a very paying business could be developed for the Canadian National Railways if proper connections were made. Take for example the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway in my constituency, a road which was described three years ago as a streak of rust. That road is now one of the most paying branch lines in the whole eastern section. During the first ten months of last year no less than 2,200 carloads of freight were shipped out. A reference to the census figures will show that the population in that section which is purely rural is over 75 persons to the square mile, which, compared with other rural sections of the Dominion, is one of the most thickly settled with the exception of the Ontario peninsula.

I am absolutely in favour of building branch lines. There are other sections in the province of New Brunswick which require railway accommodation, and the construction of branch lines in those sections should claim the first attention of the government. No doubt a mistake was made in building the Intercolonial railway through the wilderness of the Bartibogue district and the outskirts of the Miramichi valley; it should have skirted the coast of New Brunswick, which being thickly settled would furnish all kinds of traffic. Therefore I hope that this is only a start in the right direction, and that ultimately the necessary steps will be taken to handle the traffic of New Brunswick to United States points via the shortest route, for after all it must be conceded that the American market to the south is essential to the prosperity of the Maritime provinces, and unless we can reach that market with our fish and the products of the farm and forest by the shortest route and at the lowest possible freight rates, we are seriously handicapped. To-day it is a well known fact that the people are resorting more and more to fresh fish in preference to preserved and pickled fish, and our best market for our fish is to be found in the eastern states with Boston as the main distributing point. As I stated on the floor of this House last session, the fishermen on the north shore of New Brunswick are under a great handicap in reaching the Boston market, it requiring fifty hours to land their fish there, while the fishermen of Nova Scotia and the southern shore of New Brunswick can reach that market within twenty-four hours. We are also discriminated against in the express rates we have to pay. But I will deal with this subject at a more convenient time. For the present I can only formulate the hope that the building of this proposed road will be the medium of affording our traffic the shortest route to the United States markets.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I was very glad to hear the statement made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) that this project is a purely business proposition. I am sure that if the committee were familiar with the geographical position of the Maritime provinces and the railway situation in relation to the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific systems as it affects our trade with the United States, they would agree with my hon. friend that this branch line is not only sound from the business standpoint, but is absolutely essential if Sir Henry Thornton is to operate the Canadian National railway in the Maritime provinces with any degree of success.

In the province of New Brunswick we have the Canadian National railway skirting the eastern shores of the province and continuing through my own province, being the only avenue by which Nova Scotia has connection with the transportation systems of the country. There is another line of the Canadian National running from Moncton westerly to St. John. Then another line starting from Newcastle runs to the city of Fredericton, whence my hon. friend from York-Sunbury comes. But the freight of eastern New Brunswick and of the whole province of Nova Scotia which is carried by rail to the United States is tributary to the Canadian Pacific railway. It is all turned over by the Canadian National to the Canadian Pacific at St. John or at Fredericton Junction, and all the efforts on the part of the managers of the Canadian National system to build up their freight business simply enure to the benefit of the Canadian Pacific railway. One can readily see the handicap that is being placed upon the fishermen, lumbermen and farmers of the Maritime provinces through having to pay freight charges not only to the Canadian National but also to the Canadian Pacific and the Boston and Maine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there not the usual pro-rating of the through rate?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is an expert on freight rates; I am not.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is probably a shunting charge.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Yes, where connections would be made, say at Fredericton Junction. As my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) has well said, the fishing products of the Maritime provinces find their principal market in Boston, both winter and summer, that being the great fish distributing centre of the United States. Then again, owing to the building boom in eastern United States during the past two years, the main market for all our lumber has been there; and so in regard to all our other products.

Now, the proposition which is recommended by the management of the Canadian National system is to build the line mentioned in the resolution so that they will have an independent entrance to the United States in connection with the Boston and Maine at Vanceboro, and so cease being tributary to the Canadian Pacific railway with respect to freight originating on the National lines. To my mind there can be no question about the correctness of the statement made by my hon. friend from York-Sunbury that this is a business proposition. I am sure that my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. MacLaren), or rather his newspaper, is taking entirely too local a view of the situation, for I am sure that the great mass of the people in New Brunswick realize the facts to be as I have stated them, and I am confident they will say that if Sir Henry Thornton is to be held responsible for the successful management of the Canadian National railway system, he cannot, so far as our part of the country at least is concerned, be expected to continue to hand over all his traffic to an intermediate road and his greatest competitor.

Mr. DOUCET: I do not think this proposed branch line is as necessary as the arguments advanced by the last two speakers would seem to indicate. We already have outlets for New Brunswick and Maritime province products to the New England states. There is the Canadian Pacific from St. John to Vanceboro, also the lines along the St. John river to Fredericton and Woodstock and between Woodstock and McAdam junction. The project under consideration might be a fairly good proposition if economic conditions would warrant it, but in view of the present circumstances are we justified in making an initial expenditure of $2,123,000 for the construction of a small branch line between Kingsclear and a point on the St. Croix river opposite Vanceboro? If you do construct from Kingsclear to Vanceboro you cannot handle what traffic may come from the other parts of the Maritime provinces, with the exception of the northern section of New Brunswick.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What is to prevent the traffic that centres at Moncton going over the Transcontinental to Fredericton and from there down?

Mr. DOUCET: That could be done, Mr. Chairman, but it would be going somewhat out of the ordinary route, because the Transcontinental between St. John and Moncton and Fredericton has not been made much use of. But there are many sections of New Brunswick which need railway facilities much more than the part of the country dealt with in this resolution. For instance, we have a section in the northern part of the province to which reference has been made on various occasions in this House. Referring last year to the question of acquiring the Kent Northern railway, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) said:

> As to the county of Kent, New Brunswick, the Kent Northern railway is twenty-seven miles long, and I quite appreciate the fact that it might just as well have been twenty-seven inches long so far as its operation has been of any practical value. The question has been discussed as to how these people can best be served in that section of the country, because they are not served now. An effort was made by the previous government to take over the Kent Northern, and large petitions have come in from the county of Kent asking that the Moncton-Buctouche line be extended 18 miles to serve a greater number of people outside of the town of Richibucto, or Rexton, I believe, through which it passes. These matters are under consideration, and I have asked the management of the Canadian National Railways, as soon as they can possibly do so, to make a thorough investigation of the situation in the county of Kent, because my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Leger) has made my life miserable for the past three months over the question and will continue to do so, I am afraid, if I do not do something.

That road was built forty-one years ago and during the last few years it has been in the hands of a trust company. This company does not appear to be anxious to make any great capital expenditure. Last year the road was closed down for practically two months and this year it has again been unable to give the required service. I speak on behalf of the country immediately served by that road, representing the large and flourishing parishes of Richibucto, Welsford, St. Louis, St. Ignace, St. Charles and Carleton, with a total population of about 12,000. The conditions which induced my predecessor to impress upon the Minister of Railways the importance of doing something in this connection still exist, and I submit that before spending over two millions of the public money for the building of branch lines in a part of the province which is already well provided with railway facilities it would be much more advisable and much more in keeping with the giving of equal rights to all that something should be done in the matter of that branch line of 27 miles from Kent junction into Richibucto. It is true that some steps have been taken toward getting a line from Buctouche into Richibucto, a distance of 18 miles. Survey parties have been over that route and as a matter of fact that branch railway was promised no later than last December. Be that as it may, I do not intend to insist that that branch line be built if present conditions do not warrant it, but I do insist that on account of the Kent Northern railway from Kent Junc-

9 p.m. tion into Richibucto being one of the only two independent branch lines in the Maritime provinces not taken over and made part of the National Railways in 1919, steps should be taken to acquire that road either by purchase or by lease, with a view to giving service to the public. The people in that part of the country have been told that economy would have to be practised in connection with the railways. For twenty-eight years the people along the line of the Moncton and Buctouche railway, a distance of 32 miles, had a daily mail service, but since the first of January of this year the Wednesday trip has been cancelled so that to-day there is no connection between Moncton and Buctouche on Wednesday of each week, and therefore no mail distributed on that day. That condition did not prevail in the past except in cases of very stormy weather. The people in that section are entitled to better service. I submit that the vote placed in the estimates in 1919 and again passed as a revote in 1920, but which was unfortunately dropped because the company would not accept the offer made by the government at that time, should again be placed in the estimates this year with a view of acquiring the Kent Northern railway and improving the service in that part of the country, the people of which have been denied their just rights, as was represented to the committee a moment ago by the member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), and also to provide a daily service on the Moncton and Buctouche branch line. And further more we are willing to practise economy, if that is necessary, but it is a very poor consolation to the people in that section of the country to hear so much about economy and then to see branch lines built in sections where those branches will parallel or duplicate existing lines.

Mr. MICHAUD: I wish to say a few words in reference to this branch line proposed to be built in the province of New Brunswick, and I desire to express myself very clearly on the question. In the first place I am opposed to building any branch lines which will be of no benefit to our general railway system. We want to improve our railway system, as far as we can, and make it more productive, and if branch lines are necessary to bring that about by all means let us have them. If the construction of branch lines will not make our railways more profitable then it is useless to spend money for the purpose. With regard to this particular branch line let me tell you that from two-thirds to three-fourths of our lumber products will be shipped over it to the American market, either to Boston or New York. At the present time we are shipping lumber—especially deals, boards and pulpwood—partly over American lines. When this new line has been built it will be available for the shipment of farm products, as well as forest products and fish, and we shall derive some profit from the haul. With respect to the proposal to buy out branch lines of railways I may say that last fall I had the opportunity of travelling over the Kent Northern railway. I sympathize with my hon. friend (Mr. Doucet) in what he has said, but if the government system has not taken over the Kent Northern it is the fault of some people in the county of Kent. The transaction was about to be completed when the shareholders of the Kent Northern railway were advised by some of the hon. gentleman's friends not to give up the railway for a certain amount of money but to wait for a while and it would result in the purchase price being increased.

Mr. DOUCET: What justification has the hon. gentleman for making such a statement as that? Can he advance the slightest proof to substantiate it?

Mr. MICHAUD: I received the information from the late hon. member for Kent. I do not wish to prolong the debate by any remarks of mine. I am convinced the House will see the necessity for building this new branch railway. For the reasons I have given I shall support the resolution.

Mr. MARLER: Before the resolution carries I should like to say one or two things apropos of this particular line. The point which has been raised by the minister, and by others who have spoken, as I understand it, is that the traffic is now routed over the Canadian Pacific railway which arrives at more or less the same destination. Now, as far as I can see, we have not sufficient information before us just at the moment to judge as to what saving there would be in favour of this traffic going over the National line instead of being routed over the Canadian Pacific, or in other words what amount of gain the National line would derive. I wonder if the minister is in a position to give us that information. The point I should like to stress is this: We expect to spend over $2,000,000 on this line. In addition to that there will be an operating expenditure, or deficit, as the case may be. Will the expenditure be justified by the result in giving this line to the National system instead of using the Canadian Pacific railway, temporarily at least.

Mr. GRAHAM: As I understand it the position is this—hon. members with local knowledge will correct me if I am wrong. If my hon. friend were doing a large business himself scattered through several towns, would he regard it as good business to be the "gathering instrument" as it is called, and hand over the business to some person else after he has gathered it all up?

Mr. MARLER: That all depends.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Canadian National Railway is the gathering system. It gathers the traffic and hands it over to another line. Now, it is altogether in the realm of possibility that everything desired can be accomplished by the construction of fourteen or fifteen miles of railway to Harvey, provided proper running rights can be obtained over the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. MARLER: Precisely.

Mr. GRAHAM: The management have informed me, and from what I know I believe it to be true, that it is purely a business transaction on the part of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If this committee is going to pass resolutions involving the expenditure of millions of dollars merely on the verbal assurance of the railway directorate that it is a business transaction, we might at least surrender our indemnities. In all fairness to the people of Canada we ought to know something about the transaction. If we are to vote the money we should know, and the country should know, something about the circumstances. We have to answer for the resolution. I have quite a little sympathy, let me say frankly, with the argument presented a moment ago by the hon. member (Mr. Marler). In so far as parliament is concerned—not the railway directorate, although the railway directorate certainly want to look after the business returns from the railway—we should look primarily to service. If the service is being rendered now by the Canadian Pacific railway the question arises should we, in order to divert that business to the National Railway system, build another line at a cost of over two millions. The point just raised by the hon. member is this: We should certainly know first that there is to be an economic advantage instead of an economic loss. I mean to say that on the whole, taking into consideration both roads, there will be an economic advantage and a big one. Because the interest on the cost of construction itself is going to be $140,000 a year. Now, would anybody suggest for a minute that we have sufficient data before this committee showing there is going to be a profit, over and above an expenditure of $140,000 a year in interest on the construction of this road, even to the National railway system itself? We must keep in mind that our object should be to provide service for the people of Canada at the lowest capital outlay, so that the interest charges on the whole investment will be minimized to the greatest possible extent, and secondly so that the Railway Commission will be able to keep rates to their lowest possible level. That is the principle we should follow. We are told that we shall get some traffic from the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say anything of the kind, I said we would keep our own traffic.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well. The Canadian Pacific is doing the work now and we are to do that instead. That is what I understand. If that is any difference I do not know.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is quite a difference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Maybe it is. How it affects the vote I am at a loss to understand. If the people are getting the service, and the main object of a railway is service—

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend and the House will bear that in mind in future debates on the bills. He says that service to the people is paramount to profits on the railway. I would like him not to forget that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said a little more than that.

Mr. GRAHAM: The right hon. gentleman said that. He could not have had his ears open when the member for Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) was pointing out that the people were not getting the service because the Canadian National did not have a line of its own. He pointed out that, for lack of cars that were not returned to the Canadian National, he knew of an instance where a man had drawn his produce nine miles to the Canadian Pacific railway, and put his goods into Canadian Pacific cars while the Canadian National was a few rods from that man's door. But in the case of the Canadian National he could not get his cars back. The people were deprived of the service on that account and the Canadian National was deprived of the traffic.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are lots of cases of that kind, no matter how many railways you have.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend can put it any way he likes, both from the point of view of the service to the people and the point of view of the management of the railway.

Mr. CALDWELL: I had hoped that this resolution would pass and that the discussion on the general merits would occur on the presentation of the bill to the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: That was proposed and I accepted it.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is one point I wish to stress in regard to this particular road and it is this. At the present time the St. John and Quebec railway is owned by the provincial government of New Brunswick, and is operated by the Dominion government under a lease. The Dominion government turn over 40 per cent of the gross earnings as rental, the management of the railway retaining the other 60 per cent to pay operating costs. Due to the fact that this road is only a gatherer and turns the traffic over to the Canadian Pacific Railway at a point where it would begin to make a profit on the hauling of it, there has been a deficit of somewhere around half a million dollars a year, and that deficit will continue so long as we continue our present policy of turning the traffic over to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think that 40 per cent turned over to the provincial government on an average lacked $220,000 or $225,000 of paying the interest on the cost of construction of the road. If my memory serves me correctly, the other 60 per cent was about $230,000 a year short of paying the operating cost, simply because we are loading the freight, maintaining the sidings and the service to gather the freight, and turning that freight over to the Canadian Pacific. In former debates in the House I think it was conclusively proven to the House and to the management of the Canadian National Railways who are operating the St. John and Quebec railway that if this outlet is furnished and the Canadian National is allowed to handle the traffic as my hon. friend from Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) would say, and have the long haul, instead of gathering it and hauling it five or six miles and turning it over to the Canadian Pacific or the Bangor and Aroostook to have the longer haul, in place of having a deficit on the St. John and Quebec railway, that road will become a revenue producer, because I have no hesitation in saying it will be one of the best paying roads in Canada. It will be the funnel for the pouring out of this whole traffic gathered on the 2,600 miles of railway in the Maritime provinces and in Quebec. That is the feature that appeals to me.

Mr. MARLER: I would like to know how much is to accrue to the Canadian National Railways by reason of building this line.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have no doubt the minister will be able to give us this information. They will certainly have a record of the amount of freight turned over to the Bangor and Aroostook at Van Buren and at Fort Kent. I think some of it goes over to Fort Kent, hauled across in the winter on the ice when the crossing is good. There will be a record of the traffic turned over at Fredericton, Woodstock and St. John. I imagine these records will be available. I hope they will, and I am convinced they will show a volume of traffic that will assure the success of the road, not only on this length of line it is proposed to build, but the whole of the St. John and Quebec railway that is now starving for empties to handle the traffic. It is not able to get the traffic because its own cars are not returned. I do not know who is to blame for the agreement, but there was an international agreement between the United States authorities and our own railway authorities that cars could be retained for a rental of one dollar a day. I thought it was a very poor arrangement. It has been said in this House that it is as fair for our roads as for the United States roads. Well it would be if there were as many American cars coming into Canada as there are Canadian cars going into the United States. But fortunately or unfortunately as the case may be, there is a very small amount of traffic coming into Canada in American cars. Our exports to the United States in that section of Canada are much greater than our imports from that country. Therefore the cars that are sent out loaded do not always come back full. Like the Dutchman's hens, they come back with their heads and tails off and sometimes missing. Our cars come back in all these conditions, especially our potato cars. This condition is especially hard on the potato shippers. Our potato shippers in New Brunswick have to re-line their cars, and they provide a lining that costs in the neighbourhood of $50 or $60 to make them fit to transport potatoes. They furnish their own stoves and firemen. The fireman is always returned, but the cars that cross the line are not returned. They are taken to other roads that are competing with us, and our farmers are unable to get their produce to market when the market is good. We do not get the service we would get if we had immediate connection with the American roads that are interested in handling our goods, and we do not get the traffic in return that we should.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think my hon. friend is quite clear as to what he was told by my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen), nor do I think there is much room for debate as to how we should all look upon this subject. I really think we would get along more quickly if we did not have any misunderstandings or misrepresentations, no matter how harmless they are. In the first place I think we should agree—and perhaps it would be just as well if we got this into our heads and thought about it and applied it in connection with the bills—that it ought to be the business of the directors to recommend a remunerative line. In the second place, it ought to be the business, I take it, of this House to see that necessary public service is given to the people, when it can be given, with a reasonable return to the system; in other words the directors are immediately interested in results. We are interested in service, plus results. The minister says that it is the desire of this House to have railways built only where they will not pay and not where they will pay.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not put it that way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was the effect.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member says he does not want any misunderstanding. Go right along and do not have any.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is why I want to straighten it out. If he did not say that, what was the object of his reference?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is not nearly so stupid as he is pretending to be. He has got a pretty good head at times. What I said was that if parliament was going to take the ground that you must not build railways where they were going to pay because some person might be a little pinched, and that we were only going to allow the Canadian National to build roads where it would be a matter of service without paying, then it could not make a success of the project.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is just what I was saying.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He said if parliament was going to—

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member put it that I said that parliament was going to do so and so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If parliament was going to do it. You have got the "if" in there all right. You have got the "if" in strong. At any rate that was the idea. That was rather the challenge of my hon. friend in connection with the opposition to these lines. It has not been opposition to bills that has brought the railway situation where it is to-day. It has been acquiescence in railway construction without any proper railway business reason. What we are after to-day is to endeavour to make sure that those lines will pay, and that is all. I think we are also just a little bit concerned in the question of service and the necessities of the public. I do not know how many millions my hon. friends think they can raise in connection with railway construction. They have not yet told us how they are going to raise this money, or what they think it will cost them, or when they are going into the market. But I know this—and I think they will agree with this—that they can spend only a limited amount of money at the present time. As regards the question of service, I am sure that my hon. friend, upon reflection, will agree that if that $2,000,000 can be placed in some part of this country which has no lines at all, but plenty of traffic for railway lines, which has scores of settlers that have no facilities of any kind whatever, it might well be the better thing to see that that $2,000,000 is put where it will do the most good and at the same time yield a return.

So far, we have had two specific reasons given to us as the necessity of this link. If the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who supports this resolution, is correct, this project is not necessary for local purposes. He frankly says that it is not. We have not heard anything very much in that connection except what we have heard from the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell), but two concrete reasons have been given for the construction of this line. The first one, which was adopted by the minister, was that somebody had to haul his stuff nine miles to the Canadian Pacific because the Canadian National had not a car to receive the load. I wonder if one could imagine a much more ridiculous argument in behalf of an expenditure of $2,000,000, namely, that the Canadian National Railways so run their car distribution that upon some particular day they had no car ready, and somebody had to haul his stuff nine miles to the Canadian Pacific who look after their car distribution. That is all there is in that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad my hon. friend thinks so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows very well that that is all there is in it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Rubbish.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says: "Rubbish". I would like to ask him why, and perhaps we will get on.

Mr. GRAHAM: You cannot distribute cars if you do not have them, if they are not returned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And you are not going to have cars unless you look after them properly. It is the management that looks after its cars properly that has them.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend knows better than that.

Sir. HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend knows better or he ought to know better, because he has had some indirect railway experience, and he ought to know something of the difficulties, and also of the safeguards that have to be and that are taken by railway managements in order to get cars. This argument, however, is seriously put forward in this day of wonderful economy, that because a car was missing and a nine-mile drive had to be taken, this line is to be built. I wonder how many gentlemen in the West would think they were being put in a marvellous position if they could get all their stuff to a railway simply by a nine-mile drive.

Mr. GRAHAM: And leave a railway a hundred yards from their door.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if they would not like to get that. Another thing that is put forward seriously is the question of handing over traffic to the Canadian Pacific. That traffic handed over to the Canadian Pacific, as my hon. friend knows quite well, ought to be routed on through billing at a through rate. There ought to be no difference whatever as regards the shipper, unless there is an excess mileage. If there is an excess mileage, that is another matter—and we have not been told that there is an excess mileage—but that would be one of the reasons for going carefully into that aspect of the question. My hon. friend also knows that the Board of Railway Commissioners, in ordering a through railway billing, as they have the right to do and as they do scores of times, if there is any difference between the systems on the question of rating, can order a pro-rating. My hon. friend also will know very well that in ordering that pro-rate, the system that originates the traffic is given what one might call the weighty end of the pro-rate. It may be that, notwithstanding these things, my hon. friends can show such a shortening of mileage, such a saving of business, that great economies can be effected. Perhaps my hon. friend could shorten this whole discussion very much by reading the memorandum that, he says, the directors have given him. It might cover the whole thing.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I read it once this afternoon, but I will read it again for my hon. friend's benefit. Seeing that my experience has been only indirect in railways and that I do not know much, and that his has been direct and that he knows a great deal, I will read the memorandum again.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Thank you.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is the memorandum:

This is a proposed forty-one miles of grade in 1924 and forty-one miles of track in 1925.

It has been practically concluded that the best location for a direct connection of the lines in New Brunswick with rails in the United States, can be made by a line from Kingsclear to Vanceboro, by a line constructed between these points a distance of forty-one miles, at an estimated cost of $2,123,000. As an alternative the line would be built from Kingsclear over about the same route but only as far as Harvey, 14.5 miles and to connect with the Canadian Pacific railway. Then running rights would be obtained over the Canadian Pacific from Harvey to Vanceboro for use of our trains. Either proposal gives us a direct connection with the Maine Central railway at Vanceboro. This has the advantage over other proposals for a direct link to American lines, in that it will leave our proportions of present rates undisturbed and obviates other railways sharing in the receipts before reaching the Maine Central railway. The new line would be in Canadian territory all the way to the junction with the Maine Central railway. As no arrangements have been concluded with the Canadian Pacific railway for using part of their line, the estimate of cost of construction of the whole distance is included.

The purpose and justification of this line is that it will give a direct interchange between the Canadian National lines and the lines in the United States, without transferring through the Canadian Pacific railway as at present. The main advantage derived from such an arrangement will be in connection with the return of Canadian National cars from American lines as well as the more prompt handling of traffic to and from points in the New England states.

This is subject to a final arrangement being made with the Maine Central railway or some other American railway for interchange of traffic, and the establishment of suitable facilities.

Hon. gentlemen will notice these words:

Then running rights would be obtained over the Canadian Pacific from Harvey to Vanceboro for use of our trains.

It makes all the difference in the world to the Canadian National railways, whether they hand their traffic over to another railway to handle, or whether they get running rights and can give through service with their own trains. The same thing occurred between the Canadian Pacific and the Intercolonial in reference to Halifax. For a time the Canadian Pacific had running rights with its own trains through to Halifax. I do not know whether that is the case now or not.

Mr. COPP: They have that now.

Mr. GRAHAM: A strong effort was made before the Transcontinental was to make a connection with the Intercolonial, that those rights should be established. I never agreed with my friend, the late Baron Shaughnessy, on that point, believing that we should keep it for our government lines at that time. There is a great difference for the Canadian National getting running rights, handling their own traffic upon a mileage basis from handing traffic over to another railway. I cannot for the life of me see that it is anything but the purest kind of business proposition. If it were a private concern there would not be five minutes discussion on the part of the board of directors as to whether it should be done. It would simply be done. A demand has been made that we should have something in writing from the president. Well, I intend to get that. But will my hon. friend tell us now whether he ever got anything in writing from the president of the Canadian National Railways in regard to matters of this kind? Let him look back over the debates and tell the committee whether his government ever gave more information, when lines were to be built, than I am attempting to give. Was the traffic manager ever called on to make a long estimate of traffic returns? I want to be fair with my hon. friend but he is not fair with me. To-day he charged me with not replying to his correspondence. I repudiate that charge emphatically, for if there is a man in this House who is scrupulous about answering his correspondence that man is the Minister of Railways. It may take me a day or two sometimes to have it done but I always reply to letters addressed to me. My hon. friend however asked me for something that never was given by a minister in this House to any other member, and no other member but himself has ever asked for information of the kind he desires to get. He asked me last year to hand over to him a copy of my private estimates containing personal explanations and notations, and he seemed injured because I did not give it. This is something that was never asked for of a minister and never was expected before. The hon. gentleman asked for it, however, expecting to be refused and then he pretended to have a grievance at not having his demand complied with.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wish my hon. friend's memory were quite as good as his faculty for joking. However, no one can take him seriously and so no one feels a bit put out by what he says.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Be careful.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At any rate, I have not so far been perturbed by my hon. friend. What did I want last year? I think the minister has the information that I desired; and if he will look into the matter he will find that I wrote him this year asking to be informed in certain respects. To that letter I never got any answer.

Mr. GRAHAM: Evidently my hon. friend has not been to the post office to-day or he would have got his reply. He wrote a letter and then went away without waiting for the answer. I addressed a letter to him and no doubt it is in his post office box now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is all very interesting no doubt, but it really has nothing to do with the matter under discussion. The minister wants to know whether we ever got signed statements. We did. I was not content to take any one's haphazard statement and therefore I did get things signed. As to whether they were brought to the House or not I do not know, but they would have been if they had been asked for at the proper time. I do know that I used to get traffic reports and I had my officials convert them into black and white and sometimes they would be at it a week before the matter was discussed at all. But there is no credit for doing that; that is only a matter of ordinary business precaution. The minister says that this is the sort of thing business people would put through in five minutes. Well, the first thing a business man would ascertain in this case would be how much money would be saved by what it is proposed to have done. We have not got that statement yet, and until we get it we are in the dark.

Mr. HANSON: Before the bills are submitted in connection with these various resolutions will the minister obtain from the officers of the Canadian National Railways a concrete statement of the advantages which they believe will accrue to the system in the Maritime provinces if this small connecting link is built? I am satisfied that with the knowledge I have I could tabulate those advantages in a very succinct, concrete and convincing statement. The minister might also obtain from the officials an estimate of the actual saving in money which they believe will be derived. I am satisfied that a fairly approximate estimate in dollars and cents could be given which would go a long way towards a complete understanding of this matter. I am sincere about this; I am anxious to see the management lifted out of the position in which they find themselves, not altogether as gatherers but the reverse of that. I know some of the difficulties they have been labouring under. May I say to the members of this committee that for ten years I had the honour to be the solicitor for the Canadian Government Railways in New Brunswick and I was intimately connected with the management so that I have some knowledge of the difficulties they had in connection with this matter. I think the minister will probably smooth his own way if he will get the information in regard to some of these things.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have no desire to withhold any information whatever. I am the mouthpiece in parliament of the Canadian National Railways and I myself am anxious to get all the information I can. I do not see how my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) got information when he was not Minister of Railways.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We used to finance the railways then.

Mr. GRAHAM: There were things in the railways that my hon. friend did not finance. However, that is merely an aside. Now, if hon. gentlemen will let the resolution pass I shall get all the information possible when the bill is under consideration. I am precluded from discussing the bill until it is in the hands of the committee. I have asked my staff to make a note of the discussion so far as it is relevant and we shall bring down all the information possible so that hon. members will see what we propose to do, and the reasons therefor. I am asking them, however, to omit any reference to the tariff.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will the minister make a note of this request, that an explanation be given as to how the building of 41 miles of railway will enable the Canadian National Railways to get its empty cars returned to Canada from the American railroads?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I could answer that myself, but I have made a note of the question.

Mr. MANION: The memorandum which the minister read a few moments ago suggested an alternative route of fourteen miles which could be built to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway, running rights being given over the latter road. So far as I remember, the memorandum did not give the cost of that 14 miles.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the line is about the same as the territory covered by the 41 miles, that is to say, in its physical aspects, the cost I should think would be proportionate to the cost of the 41 miles.

Mr. HANSON: It would be less because there would be no expensive bridges. On the other end of the line you will have to bridge two large rivers, the St. Croix, across to Vanceboro, and the Magaguadavic.

Mr. MANION: The reason I mention it is that according to the remarks of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. minister the fourteen miles under those circumstances would cost something like half a million dollars, possibly $600,000, in contradistinction to the $2,123,000 given as the estimated figure for this line. The minister himself advocated strongly the advantages of getting running rights over the Canadian Pacific railway, if we can. At least, I so understood him. If we can build fourteen miles over the same kind of territory at a cost of $500,000 or $600,000, and obtain running rights over the Canadian Pacific railway which would give us control over our own trains, I hardly see why we should build forty-one miles for the same purpose and at an extra cost of $1,500,000. In regard to the loss of cars to the Canadian Pacific mentioned by the minister, of course we have no figures as to the number of cars which get lost, strayed or stolen through the year. I think the minister might make a note of this also and let us have some idea of the actual number involved.

Mr. GRAHAM: One time last year the United States railways had 20,000 cars in excess of the cars we had belonging to them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Sometimes they have had more than that.

Mr. MANION: But that has very little reference to this case. The hon. minister this afternoon referred to the tardiness of the Canadian Pacific in returning cars to the Canadian National.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was not blaming the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. MANION: I know that, and I cannot say that I do. I presume the Canadian National does the same to the Canadian Pacific, it being a case of tit for tat I suppose. The 20,000 Canadian cars which the hon. minister mentions the United States railroads held at one time last year brings up a point I wish to make. Every session since I became a member of this House seven years ago I have heard that same argument advanced, that we are short of cars because the United States railways have failed to return them. I have no doubt that the statement is absolutely correct. But that fact does not seem to me quite sufficient to justify our spending nearly $2,500,000 on this project. And it may cost a good deal more. I notice that the average estimated cost per mile of these lines is about $30,000, and I venture to say that these estimates are based on pre-war prices, so that this particular branch line instead of costing $2,123,000 will probably cost considerably more, and if we get off with $3,000,000 we may consider ourselves quite happy. So if it is possible to arrange to build this fourteen miles of road, I think it should be done instead of building the forty-one miles.

Another reason for my objecting to the expenditure is that I have noticed all government departments are very prone to spend money. Indeed, departments of private corporations have the same weakness, but they are much more closely checked up by their directors. I have in earlier years had a little experience in municipal government—

Mr. GRAHAM: And in the federal government.

Mr. MANION: It was very slight.

Mr. GRAHAM: Before an election, though.

Mr. MANION: It is very difficult to check up expenditure at such a time. But my hon. friends are doing everything they can to prevent an election in the near future, so they have not that argument available. But, Mr. Chairman, I have noticed that in municipal departments as in Dominion departments the officials are prone to spend. Indeed, we are aware that the Minister of Finance is always trying to keep down the expenditure of the various departments of government. No doubt the railway management would have more pride in possessing a complete system regarding which they could say, "This is our line, and over it will go our cars." But that is not the policy of the committee, because it should be our object not to encourage large expenditures and so increase our deficits; and I am sure that is the object of the minister himself. Therefore I am certain that he will reach the conclusion that so far as we in this corner of the House are concerned, we are simply trying to help him to cut down expenditure. For that reason I think he should hold this resolution up until he has brought forward all the information which we have asked for to-day. Then if we find such information does not really give sufficient reason for the building of this line we should cut it down to fourteen miles, or if this construction is not justified we should cut it out altogether.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree with my hon. friend that if the same object can be attained by the construction of only fourteen miles of branch line, it will be the better policy to pursue. As to holding up the resolution, my hon. friend will have full opportunity to discuss this and other features in the bill, when all the particulars will be before him. I am not at liberty to discuss the bill until it is in the hands of hon. members, but it will have to go through first and second readings, committee stage and third reading, and there will be full opportunity for discussion. The passing of this resolution would not prevent any discussion which could possibly take place on the bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would point out to the minister that the rules are framed with a definite object in view. The rule which requires a minister to bring a proposal of this kind before the House by way of resolution is for the express purpose of giving us the fullest information and enabling us to discuss it without restriction. When the Speaker is in the chair we know that a member can rise in his place and speak only once. But the framers of the rules in their judgment believed that when certain proposals were made in the House they should be introduced in such a way that the members could speak as often as they desired and make such inquiries as they saw fit for the purpose of obtaining full information upon which to form an intelligent judgment on the proposal before the bill itself is introduced. I think the minister need not hesitate in giving us the fullest information at the present time if we desire it. If he has it before him, surely he can give it and not wait until the bill is under discussion. I have sat here now for two or three hours listening with very great interest to the discussion, and I must say, speaking of course only for myself, that in regard to this particular resolution I am not convinced that there is any urgency for the construction of the line, I am not convinced that the present is the proper time to undertake it, and I am not convinced that any great hardship is being suffered in the particular locality where it is proposed to build this branch line.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What evidence would my hon. friend like to have on that point?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The evidence which has struck me very forcibly is an editorial which was read to the House from the St. John Globe, a newspaper which openly supports this government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend did not catch my point. He wanted evidence as to the necessity of this branch line. The same argument, I suppose, would apply to each and every one of these resolutions. Therefore it might be well for my hon. friend to intimate what kind of evidence he would want on this point. In regard to the article from the St. John newspaper, it is purely a reflection of local sentiment, because the people are afraid St. John will be cut out by reason of the construction of the proposed branch line; it has nothing to do with the merits.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will go over the evidence I desire to have if my hon. friend will patiently hear me Let me first deal with the points which to my mind are serious, whether they so impress my hon. friend or not. My information, which has been gathered almost entirely from the discussion, is that there is a section of territory in New Brunswick which is already served by one or two railways. The people of that particular section at the present moment have railway service by way of the Canadian Pacific railway and, in part, by way of the Canadian National. It is stated that that service may be improved by the construction of a new line of 41 miles at a cost of over $2,000,000. There is a railroad service there, and as yet nobody has pointed out any great inconvenience to the public. I do not overlook the case mentioned by the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick who spoke of somebody who had to drive nine miles to deliver his freight, but that is the merest kind of incident. Nobody has yet made it clear to me that any great loss or any great inconvenience is being suffered at this time in that section of New Brunswick. It is true we might give greater facilities; it is true we might shorten up the haul a little bit. But we must look over the length and breadth of Canada and see what is requisite in the way of railway construction in other parts of the country. We have on the order paper to-day twenty-six separate resolutions, and I assume they will all be supported by requisitions by the president and directors of the Canadian National Railway system. It is possible that all or nearly all are more or less desirable, but that is not the point which influences my judgment at the present moment. The question is not, are they desirable, but are they necessary at this time? If one fact has been impressed on the minds of the people during the last ten or fifteen years more than any other it is that in railway construction we have gone on in Canada rather ahead of our requirements. We have been guilty, I think, of some over construction in the matter of railways, and we have been guilty at the same time of a large amount of duplication. These conditions exist; they are matters of history now, and we have to face them and their consequences. Now, here is a proposal which looks to me just like another case of duplication. It may be that the service at the point in question is not everything the people of that section would desire or everything we would wish to give them, but under the circumstances which exist in other parts of Canada, does it seem reasonable now to expend over $2,000,000 for what will be another duplication?

My right hon. leader pointed out that the interest on this expenditure would be not less than $140,000 a year, counting the interest on the money during the period of construction. Will there be a saving to the people of Canada or to the National Railways of anything like that amount if this railway is built? Would it be worth, in the convenience to the people of that neighbourhood, anything like $140,000 a year over and above the conveniences or service at present enjoyed in that section? I doubt it very much.

We started out this session in all quarters of the House with very loud protestations with regard to economy. We were going to examine expenditures very critically; the government were going to set us 10 p.m. a good example in that respect. After sitting here a month and after passing estimates for $600,000 for a tower and a million and a half for a building in London, perhaps an amount of over two millions for a branch line railway in New Brunswick looks rather trivial. But it is a very serious outlay, and it is only part of a very large aggregate expenditure which the government now proposes. This money cannot be taken out of the treasury of the company and applied to these purposes, because the money is not in the treasury, so I assume it will be got in the only place in which we can get money in these sums, that is, on the market, by borrowing. For all the convenience, all the service that this 41 miles is going to afford to the people of New Brunswick, should we go ahead with the expenditure at this time? I am sorry to disagree with my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) on this point. As I read over these resolutions it looks to me as if a good many of them could well be postponed until our financial circumstances are a little better. I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the proposal, but viewing the matter simply as it applies to the whole of Canada, this being only one of twenty-six railway proposals, I am not convinced that the expenditure is warranted at the present time. Very weighty reasons why we should not proceed were given in the article quoted from the St. John Globe. It matters not to me whether St. John expects to be sidetracked or cut off if this line be built; the reasons are given and they are weighty. The writer of that article points out that there is a railway service in that very neighbourhood and that additional services are not at present required. He points out that there is a gridiron of railways at that point in New Brunswick and he asks us to call a halt. When the Minister of Railways says that as a young man he used to write articles for a village newspaper in Ontario protesting against the Canadian Pacific Railway going east and west, I think that is hardly an answer to the weighty reasons urged by the editorial writer in the St. John newspaper. I do not want to commit myself absolutely at the moment; I want to leave myself open in case additional information should come down or additional reasons be given why this road should now be constructed. But as I view the matter I am not convinced of the merits of the proposal; I am not convinced that we should make the expenditure at this time. I do not condemn the proposal out and out; I do not know enough about it to condemn it, but it does seem to me that it might wait for a year or two or three years until we are better able to finance the undertaking.

Mr. STEVENS: As I understand the proposal as put forward by those supporting it very strongly, one of the reasons is that it is desirable that the Canadian National Railways shall have their own outlet to the boundary between New Brunswick and the state of Maine, connecting up with the railway in Maine. Am I right in that?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says that is correct—the desire being that they want to escape carrying their traffic over the Canadian Pacific in New Brunswick to that point; is that right?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is one of the incidents in the argument in favour of the new line.

Mr. STEVENS: When they get to that point on the boundary the railway they connect with in the state of Maine is operated and controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, so what advantage do you gain?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, it is the Boston and Maine.

Mr. HANSON: It is the Maine Central, owned by the Boston and Maine.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the information I desired to get. I was informed that this line connected in Maine with the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is an American owned railway, not the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. STEVENS: That is quite true; all these branches of Canadian railways in the United States are American lines.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think my hon. friend has been misinformed as to the situation.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not operated by the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. MANION: I noticed when I drew the attention of the minister to the fact that in the memorandum a fourteen mile alternative branch line was suggested in place of the forty-one mile branch line proposed, that the minister rather thought the proposed suggestion was worthy of consideration—in fact I understood him to say that he had thought of the same thing himself. In view of this I should like to propose to the minister—I do it on my own initiative entirely as a private member—that this bill be held up temporarily until the minister makes inquiry of his own officials, and of the president and directors, or whatever officials there are to make inquiry of, and see if perhaps in the interest of economy, in the interest of the saving possibly of a million and a half of dollars, he cannot bring in a bill for the building of these fourteen miles instead of the forty-one miles as proposed. I say this in all sincerity. I think the minister would be well advised if he would reconsider the whole proposition, discuss it with his officials, and see if that suggestion could not be worked out. It would certainly be to the interest of the country whether it would be to the interest of the railway or not I do not know, but I am inclined to think it would, judging from the quotations in the memorandum given to the minister by his own officials, where they give the fourteen mile proposition as an alternative, although they do not give details. I advance the suggestion and I think it well worthy of serious consideration that the minister should move to report progress and consult with his officials in regard to the proposition as to whether it would not be in the best interest of the country as a whole to build a fourteen mile stretch of line at a cost of half a million dollars, instead of constructing a stretch of forty-one miles involving an expenditure of $2.000.000.

Mr. GOULD: I should like to ask the minister whether the present resolution provides for our share of the cost of constructing the international bridge across the St. Croix river?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will make inquiries but I understand it covers all the necessary expenditures. My hon. friend (Mr. Manion) made a very interesting suggestion, but when it is a case of doing railway business with railway officials that would be going at the matter in the wrong way to get results.

Mr. HANSON: May I just say for the information of the hon. member (Mr. Manion) that the fourteen miles referred to is part and parcel of the proposed forty-one miles of construction, and it is not an alternative route at all.

Mr. MANION: All the same the proposal to limit the construction to fourteen miles may be a very good alternative. I did not quite understand the force of the remark of the minister in regard to not accomplishing much in dealing as proposed with the members of his department. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that it may be very advisable for the minister to reconsider this project with a view to bringing in a bill for the construction of the fourteen miles simply. I say it for this reason: From the discussion I have listened to here to-day—and I have listened to it most fairly because until a few minutes ago I said nothing—I have drawn the conclusion that this road is very little wanted. Only two members of the House have really had anything to say in favour of the project—the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) and both of them are directly interested. I presume that if I were affected I would adopt exactly the same attitude as they have adopted. The railway runs through the constituency of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, and just along the border of the constituency of the hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. CALDWELL: It will not touch any point of my constituency.

Mr. MANION: I understood it ran close to my hon. friend's constituency. At any rate the only two hon. members I have heard speak in favour of the project are these two gentlemen. If the bill as it stands at the present moment is gone on with I think there is a very great likelihood of the minister, after due consideration, withdrawing it and introducing a modified bill to construct fourteen miles instead of the forty-one now proposed. I repeat the minister would be well advised if he moved to report progress and later brought in a bill for the construction of fourteen miles, which is really an alternative to what he is suggesting at the present time.

Mr. ANDERSON: I should like to know how far these two proposed lines—the fourteen mile stretch and the forty-one mile stretch—are going to parallel each other.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for York-Sunbury can explain that, he knows the local conditions better than I do.

Mr. SPENCE: In view of the financial condition of this country there is no justification for constructing a line of railway at such a cost in a district where there is very little business to be done. It may be justified in order to meet the convenience of the people in that part of the country but it cannot be made a paying proposition. There would be more justification for constructing a fourteen mile line from Kingsclear to Harvey than to build the stretch of forty-one miles from Kingsclear to Vanceboro. It would be an absolute waste of money to construct the latter when the former would serve just as well. I cannot see on what grounds the minister makes any such recommendation. It certainly is not justified by financial conditions at the present time. The thing is an absurdity and should not be tolerated.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I seriously ask my hon. friend to consider having particular regard to the railway duplication at this particular point, whether we have not already sufficient duplication of railway lines in Canada, and whether the situation would not be met by obtaining running powers over the Canadian Pacific railway. In the case of business originating at St. John on the lines of the Canadian National system for New England points, is it proposed to convey that over the St. John valley line out of St. John to the point of connection?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend think for a minute that is a business proposition? I ask him in all seriousness.

Mr. GRAHAM: Why not?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend possibly think of such a thing?

Mr. GRAHAM: I was asking, why not?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am sure my hon. friend has not thought of it seriously. What is the operating ratio down in New Brunswick at the present moment? I think my hon. friend will find that it is pretty heavy.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend will find the operating ratio is so heavy that he will get nothing through the movement of traffic down at that point. If I am wrong in that conclusion I would like to be set right. We are taking plain, straight business. It is not good business if it now costs $1.10 and you are going to make it cost $1.30. I point out that accepting your own statement, it means that you start a movement from St. John and run it from St. John down to the junction point on the American boundary—

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend wants to be fair, perhaps. He knows the movement from St. John is not the movement of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. He is confining himself to whatever traffic may originate through St. John. He is not taking New Brunswick or Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not ask where everything was coming from.

Mr. GRAHAM: Be fair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am trying to be fair.

[Mr. Spence.]

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think the hon. gentleman is trying to be fair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I asked my hon. friend whether the object of this undertaking was to take traffic from St. John to the junction shown on the map laid on the table.

Mr. GRAHAM: I answered that. My hon. friend again intimates that the object of this railway is for the sole purpose of taking traffic that originates in St. John. It is not anything of the kind. It is to make a short route for the traffic from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to the New England market.

Mr. CALDWELL: A small fraction will go through St. John.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know. Perhaps there is some other reason for it but the farther this goes on the worse I think it is, simply because my hon. friend is saying that I say something which I do not say at all. He tells me frankly one of the reasons for the work is to boost St. John.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say anything of the kind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we will have to get our information right.

Mr. STEVENS: I asked the minister a question, and I do not think he gave me a very frank answer. I pointed out that this proposed line referred to in the resolution connected at the boundary of the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick at a point called Vanceboro with a proposed American line. I pointed out that that American line—the Boston and Maine—

Mr. GRAHAM: The Maine Central.

Mr. STEVENS: —was indicated on the map to be the Canadian Pacific railway. I have a map published by my hon. friend's own government showing that. Further than that, I am informed—and I think this is perfectly correct—that the Canadian Pacific Railway actually own the majority of stock of the American line. It being an American corporation all our lines operating in the States must operate under American charters. By the construction of the fourteen miles repeatedly referred to by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) to the point at Harvey, you can deliver the Canadian National traffic to exactly the same railway, the same operators and save to the country the construction of the difference between 14 and 41 miles.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The basis of my hon. friend's argument is that the Canadian Pacific control the Boston and Maine railway. I would like to know what authority he has for that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Maine Central.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That is controlled by the Boston and Maine, and the Boston and Maine is a national enterprise in which the state has a share. All the Canadian Pacific has to do with it is that it runs from Vanceboro to a point at which its own line diverges north.

Mr. STEVENS: I understand that. It amounts to the same thing. They operate in Maine and in the province of New Brunswick. The Canadian Pacific Railway operate their own trains. The traffic is not turned over to the American corporation, and the Canadian Pacific control a substantial portion of the stock of that railway, or the bulk of it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Can the hon. gentleman give us any evidence of that?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not carry it around in my pocket.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): There is no evidence of that.

Mr. STEVENS: I contend there is. As a matter of fact, I think it is shown in the last annual statement of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not have it under my hand; I expect to have it in a very few moments, but the map I am referring to shows quite clearly the Canadian Pacific railway in the state of Maine. It is the main thoroughfare of the Canadian Pacific Railway at that point coming into the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend argues that because the Canadian Pacific Railway is marked on the map to run over the Maine Central, that consequently it controls the Maine Central. Will he say that the fact that the New York car that leaves here on the Canadian National runs over the Boston and Maine for part of the trip to New York constitutes control of the Boston and Maine?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I did not say that. The hon. gentleman is not quoting me correctly at all, but I do say that the Canadian National could deliver their traffic to the Canadian Pacific railway at a point called Harvey, which would require the construction of only 14 miles of railway in New Brunswick instead of 41 miles; in other words, it would save to this country nearly a million and a half dollars, and would accomplish the same result. If we were preventing the accomplishment of the object of this resolution, my hon. friend the minister might be able to present some argument, but we are not preventing that at all. The only thing we are asking is that the minister and the railway company shall not impose upon the country another duplication of about 30 miles of railway where it is absolutely unnecessary. We are not asking the government to forego this proposition altogether. We are not suggesting that a certain service shall not be rendered, but we do suggest that we shall not waste a million and a half dollars in giving identically the same service as could be provided by the construction of the 14 miles. I do not think there is the slightest question of this. It does not follow that because the part operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway is in the state of Maine and is under an American charter with a different name, that it is not controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Nor does it follow that it is controlled.

Mr. STEVENS: As a matter of fact I am informed by the best authority that it is controlled by the Canadian Pacific. I would be justified in asking the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), who is rather cross-examining me on evidence, what evidence he has that it is not controlled.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I come from that part of the country, and I have travelled over the railway long before the Canadian Pacific railway ever used to run from Matawamkeag to Megantic. I know from my connection with that part of the country that the Maine Central runs from Vanceboro where it joins the Boston and Maine, and is controlled by the Boston and Maine Railway, and nobody in my part of the country ever suggested, that the Canadian Pacific Railway owned any part of it.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely the hon. minister does not suggest that that is evidence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is a fact.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not as good evidence as I have in my hand. I produce a map published by the government of which the hon. minister is a member, and I think I have the "edge" on him. As far as reason and logic are concerned, I think my hon. friend is virtually out of court.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The hon. member is very adroit.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister cannot escape this fact: That by the construction of 14 miles of railway for $600,000 he can give just as good service, and overcome the present handicap, granting there is a handicap, and accomplish just as much as he will obtain by spending $2,123,000 and building 41 miles of railway. My argument is that if we can save a million here or a million there and give adequate and reasonable service, then by all means we ought to save that million and a quarter.

Let me say, at the outset, to my hon. friends to my left that I have a great deal of sympathy with some of the branch line projects on the prairies. I know that some of those lines will pay. I believe many of those lines are necessary, and I am prepared when we come to them, I will not say to support every one of them, but as we get the proper information and examine them, to support those which are really essential. I do not think there should be any proposition of bargaining on these railway bills. That is, my hon. friends have no need to fear on our part that a certain line in the prairies will not be supported if they do not support a certain line in another section of the country. Let these lines stand on their own merits and let us examine them on their merits. If there is real merit in them, let us support them. The very thing that killed the Branch Lines bill last year, the omnibus bill that was brought in covering all those lines, was the government thinking that by putting into the bill in certain lines that were necessary, that were desirable and certain lines that were perhaps warranted, those lines would carry the heavy load of unwarranted and unnecessary lines in other parts of the country. That is the situation. My desire is that we should examine each one of these resolutions, each one of these bills on its merits. I want to say to the minister that there is no reflection on him if, in the examination of these things, there is a marked difference of opinion about certain portions of some of these lines. He should not take this as a personal affront, as a life-and-death matter for the government, as if the government must go out of business and all that sort of stuff, if we do not pass this resolution. Surely we can come into this House and examine these things on their merits. Let me repeat to the minister my request, because I seem to see in his countenance a little softening. That hard look that was there a few minutes ago is passing away. I know my hon. friend, who has had a hard day, was almost losing his temper.

[Mr. E. M. Macdonald.]

Mr. GRAHAM: The only thing that makes an Irishman get a little cross is for some one to accuse him either of being an informer or of not being frank. My hon. friend accused me of not being frank when I gave him an answer.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think my hon. friend was quite frank with me.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then he has a right to get his fur up again.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me in all seriousness again bring this point to the minister's attention. It does not matter particularly whether the Canadian Pacific actually own that railway or not. The question is that from a point in Maine distant from the boundary, this line is operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. If we can save $1,500,000 by constructing only the fourteen miles of railway to Harvey instead of the forty-one to Vanceboro, I submit to the committee that we ought to construct only the fourteen miles and save the $1,500,000.

Mr. MANION: I wish once again to emphasize what I started with and what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has supported. The reason I do so is because the more I have listened to the discussion of various members of the House, the more I am convinced, and I believe the more the minister is convinced also, that the fourteen-mile proposition is a good one. If you look at any of the railways of this country, you will find what we have all said again and again exists. We have to-day throughout the country too many parallel lines running side by side. Since I made my remarks a few minutes ago, I have looked at a map of the proposed line, and I find that the fourteen-mile line would bring the Canadian National line down to the Canadian Pacific. The forty-one mile line would bring it down on a bias, so that it would gradually get closer to the Canadian Pacific, and at the end of the forty-one miles it would join up with the same American line as that with which the Canadian Pacific joins up. What is the difference between having the Canadian National run fourteen miles and then join with the Canadian Pacific, and run forty-one miles and join with an American line, even supposing the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is wrong and the Boston and Maine railway is not controlled by the Canadian Pacific? I think it would be better to construct the fourteen-mile line and connect with the Canadian Pacific. In other words, the memorandum says that we would get running rights over the Canadian Pacific and we would have exactly the same rights. I remember in my own city, the old Grand Trunk Pacific line ran a passenger train into Fort William over the Canadian Pacific. In other words, they had running rights, and there was no more opportunity for them to lose cars with those running rights than if they had their own lines. They ran into the Canadian Pacific station, the same station.

There appears to be a certain amount of false pride that makes whoever is advocating this forty-one mile line advocate it, where a fourteen-mile line would bring about the same results. The minister would be well advised to report progress and to come back to-morrow with a bill, whichever one he wants to bring in. If he gives the question serious thought and does what I think he will do, he will decide that it is in the best interest of the country to bring in a bill for the construction of the fourteen-mile line. Every corporation, every municipality in this country to-day, which finds itself overburdened with capital debt, is cutting down capital expenditure. My own city—and I ask the pardon of the House for mentioning personal things, but I know more about my own city than about others—found a few years ago that its capital debt and taxes were pretty high and that it was spending too much money. It immediately did what I think was the wisest thing in its history. About ten years ago, about the time of the breaking out of the war, it began to cut down capital expenditure, and it has been cutting out capital expenditure as far as possible with very excellent results. That is what every sane business organization is doing; but we have to-day the Canadian National Railways, which has a bigger deficit than any other corporation in the country, coming forward with a proposal to build branch lines at an estimated cost of about $30,000,000, which, I think, will cost in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000 before they are completed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Make it a hundred million dollars like last year.

Mr. MANION: If the Minister of Agriculture had the handling of the matter, I am sure he would make it a hundred million dollars, if we are to judge by the past record of his department since he began to handle it. I repeat what I was saying, that the Canadian National Railways should certainly cut down its capital expenditure, the same as other corporations, municipalities, and business organizations in this country are doing. The minister should, I think, report progress, take back his bill and give it further consideration. I am sure if he does, he will bring in a bill for the construction of the fourteen-mile line, and I would not be surprised, if he gives the matter serious consideration, if he does not bring in a bill at all.

Mr. McCONICA: I have listened to this discussion with a good deal of interest. Needless for me to say, my constituency is not particularly interested, but the proposition, as I understand it, now is: Shall we build forty-one miles or fourteen miles of railway?

Mr. MANION: And get the same results.

Mr. McCONICA: And get the same results? That is a thing that we cannot determine. What we want is the result. Supposing we pass a bill to build fourteen miles of railway and our Canadian Pacific friends say: "No, gentlemen, we do not want anything to do with you," and they will make no arrangement, what happens? We have nothing. That is the fact of the matter. If we pass this bill for the forty-one miles of railway, then you are in a position to talk to the Canadian Pacific about a running arrangement over their road. If you do not do that, you will get no running arrangement unless they get the long end of the deal. As this matter appears to me, we have 2,600 miles of railway gathering freight throughout all that eastern country, and they can haul it down to within forty-one miles of the place to which it is to be delivered. There they turn it over to another railroad, and that railroad takes it to its destination. Is it good business to control that freight to its destination? It seems to me that it is and that it is a business proposition. It has been said that we do not receive enough information in this House. Is it anybody's hope that we shall be able to come to a conclusion, each one from first-hand knowledge and from what he knows himself? I do not think so. We must take the judgment of the men who have all the facts, and the experience to weigh those facts.

Mr. MANION: Did my hon. friend not hear the minister read a memorandum from the officers of the railways in which it is stated that they would get running rights?

Mr. McCONICA: They will if they can.

Mr. MANION: No; they say that they will.

Mr. McCONICA: Well, they will before they build the 14 miles; I know that. But they cannot know whether they can get a running arrangement until they are in a position to do business. If they are authorized to build the 41 miles I would suggest that they stand a very much better chance of getting an arrangement in connection with the 14 miles. When that is done then they will be in a position to approach the Canadian Pacific Railway on equal terms. Personally, I cannot hope to be able in this House to come to an intelligent conclusion, from first-hand knowledge and from my experience with railway building, as to whether any of these lines should be built or not. We must depend upon those men who have the experience and know the facts. They are the officers of the Canadian National Railways and we all know that they have recommended that the line be built. It seems to me a sensible thing to make the connection between these two points and I certainly think we have spent enough time discussing this proposition. I hope the resolution will carry.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it the legal opinion of the government that running rights can be obtained for this line through the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know that I am in a position to give a legal opinion on the question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: An argument is based upon it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I said, a legal opinion. The Board of Railway Commissioners can give running rights upon terms to be decided by them; but, as has been explained by the hon. member who has taken his seat, if certain conditions are in existence much better terms can be made for running rights between the points under consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume the minister will admit that in the interval between last session and the present time he has dropped some 200 miles of contemplated railways.

Mr. GRAHAM: There have been some new lines included while some have been dropped. Some of the lines in the West have been dropped for the reason that, the bill having been thrown out, the territory which the projected Canadian National branch lines would have occupied is now otherwise in use. Consequently those particular lines have had to be abandoned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does that apply?

[Mr. McConica.]

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot recall just where; there were two or three western lines. I believe there was one route dropped between Kelvington and Tisdale.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What mileage is accounted for by that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Sixty-nine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sixty-nine, which the Canadian Pacific Railway has filled in the meantime. What accounts for the balance of some 130 or 137?

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not make a memorandum of the mileage that was dropped but I will submit a statement showing that.

Mr. BAXTER: I want to make just a few remarks before the resolution is carried. Some years ago a scheme similar to this was projected by Mr. Gutelius when he was manager of the Intercolonial railway, but this one seems to be in a different location. There seems also to be some question as to whether a shorter or a longer line is necessary or advisable. There is no question as to the power of the Railway Commission in this matter, and in practice there has been no question in regard to the making of arrangements between the two railways. As a matter of fact one exists to-day in relation to a piece of road from Westfield, 15 miles from the city of St. John, over which running rights have been given to what is commonly known as the Valley railway and technically known as the St. John and Quebec Railway. There was no difficulty in making an arrangement in this regard, and the power of the Railway Commission was not invoked. The railways came together, and the Valley railway, which is operated by the Canadian National railways, runs over 15 miles of the Canadian Pacific railway line. Had the Canadian Pacific Railway refused to come to terms the Railway Commission would have done justice in the matter.

I want to emphasize the railway situation as it exists in New Brunswick. Years ago the National Transcontinental line was built with the very best object in view, but it was carried diagonally across the province, and it has not to any practical extent benefited what it was intended to benefit, the port of Halifax in the province of Nova Scotia. Nor has it benefited to any extent the port of St. John in New Brunswick. Because of the location which was selected by the government of that day, it was thought by the people of New Brunswick to be necessary to build a route to serve exactly the portion of the province which the National Transcontinental failed to serve, and the province proceeded to build the St. John and Quebec railway. As all other enterprises were overtaken by stringent financial necessity caused by the war, so was this one, and the result is that the end near St. John is uncompleted so that the road runs over the Canadian Pacific railway rails for 15 miles. The northern portion is also incomplete, and this road which was intended to have tapped the National Transcontinental at Grand Falls has never reached that point; it stops at a place called Centre. I wonder whether the Minister of Railways has been made aware that the amount of money which he projects for this line to reach the state of Maine would carry the St. John and Quebec railway from the present northern terminus to Grand Falls and connect with the National Transcontinental there. The arrangement which could be made, and which I think in the interests of the country ought to be made, would be to get the Canadian Pacific Railway to accept running rights over the railway which then would be owned partly by the province of New Brunswick and partly by the Dominion of Canada. The Canadian Pacific Railway, instead of running its line through the state of Maine, would get better grades, with a slightly longer route, and would run entirely in the Maritime provinces within Canadian territory. The amount of money that would build this switch line would complete this other road. and the province of New Brunswick, which to-day is carrying a deficit because the road is leased to the Dominion government on a forty per cent arrangement, has to take from its limited revenues $260,000 in order to square the accounts of the railway. It had in the previous year to make up a deficit of $250,000. This will go on, there is no relief in prospect, and yet by the expenditure of the sum that is proposed in the bill to-night the province might be relieved of that obligation and the Canadian National Railway would function as it ought to have functioned from the first in that province—by following the Valley railroad route instead of running diagonally across the province and conferring no benefit upon New Brunswick and practically none upon Nova Scotia. In other words, we are invited to build a line that will be of some service for a certain purpose, but I think only a limited service. If the country has so much money to spare, why does it not spend it in New Brunswick where it would do the most good? If it wants to assist the people of the county of Carleton and Victoria, why does it not do so by carrying the Valley railway to the place it ought to reach? It would do infinitely more good to that section of the country than by building it where the government now proposes. I am sorry we have not to-day a statement from the responsible head of the Canadian National Railways system that the construction of this line is vital to the conduct of the business of the National road. When this is forthcoming I shall not oppose the project, for I would not put my railway opinion against the considered railway opinion of the head of the road. But I want to know very definitely that that is the view of a practical railway man, and that the vote is for railway purposes, not merely a portion of the pork barrel for my own province. I am not going to vote for the expenditure of money in my own province unless I am satisfied of the useful results that will probably flow from it. I am prepared, and have suggested to the government, a mode of spending the money which will indubitably produce useful results and will relieve the province of a very serious burden. The government must take the responsibility of spending this money in which direction they choose; I have made my position as clear as it is possible for me to state it.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 26 respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Kingsclear and the St Croix river in the province of New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. GRAHAM moved the adjournment of the House.

MR. SPEAKER—EXPLANATION

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the House adjourns I feel in duty bound to give an explanation of the statement I made last night to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), as I think it might be misconstrued against him. When I said, "His explanation will serve him with his electors." I meant that his explanation would serve its purpose. I would be sorry if anyone should think that I did not treat the hon. gentleman with courtesy.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Wednesday, April 2, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT, 1908, AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1908.

He said: The object of this bill is to give additional jurisdiction to the Juvenile Court, increase the amount of fines and modify the rules of procedure, this being recommended and asked for by various judges of the Juvenile Court and by other bodies.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28 to amend and make operative certain provisions of the Copyright Act, 1921.

He said: This bill contains a considerable number of amendments to the Copyright Act, which was passed by the House last session. In view of the manner in which bills are now being printed, I think at this stage it will not be necessary for me to make any lengthy statement as the reasons for these amendments all appear on the notes opposite to the sections to which they refer. Briefly, this bill is introduced for the purpose, amongst other things, of defining certain very important terms that are used in the Copyright Act which are not defined at present. It is also introduced for the purpose of repealing what are known as the license clauses, 13, 14, 15 and 27 of the present act, and which in the minds of the authors or the publishers constitute one of the most arbitrary discriminations against authors. The bill has also for its object the extending and making more operative certain sections of the act which refer to the protection which was intended to be given to the authors, but which is not extended because of the present state of the law. The fourth feature of the bill is to remove this matter from the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce and place it under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice.

I may say this bill in no way affects any of the rights of the printers or those who are engaged in similar industries, but is simply for the purpose of extending the protection which the authors claim in the first place they were entitled to by virtue of this act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. & 2. HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

Mr. BIRD:

What is the estimated cost of completing that section of the Hudson Bay railway between Mile 332 and Port Nelson?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: The management state that, as no recent inspection has been made of the present condition of the grading, no close estimate can be given, but from the best available information an approximate estimate would be $2,000,000 exclusive of railway terminals at Port Nelson, which were dealt with in the reply recently given as to work required at that point. This sum of $2,000,000, however, would not complete the railway for operation to Port Nelson, as to put the line from Mile 332, back to The Pas in proper operating condition would, it is estimated, cost $4,250,000.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—FREIGHT ROUTING

Mr. LOGAN:

Is the Canadian National Railway Company carrying out the agreement of one of its predecessors (the Canadian Northern Railway Company), made with the government of Canada, and contained in chapter 20 of the statutes of Canada, 1914, which among other things provides "that at all times hereafter all freight originating on the lines of the Canadian Northern or on the lines of any of the constituent companies, or on any line or lines of railway now or hereafter owned, leased or operated by the Canadian Northern or by any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, their successors or assigns, shall be carried to Canadian ports"?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: The management advise that the clause referred to is clause 6 (a) of the agreement contained in the third schedule to chapter 20 of the statutes of 1914, the agreement being a draft form subsequently executed between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and certain subsidiary companies and His Majesty the King. The clause reads as follows:

6. Routing and interchange of traffic.

The Canadian Northern and the constituent and subsidiary companies severally agree with the government as follows:

(a) that at all times hereafter all freight originating on the lines of the Canadian Northern or on the lines of any of the constituent companies, or on any line or lines of railway now or hereafter owned, leased or operated by the Canadian Northern or by any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, their successors or assigns, shall, when destined to points in Canada, be carried over the lines of the Canadian Northern or of the constituent companies or over some other Canadian railway or railways (which term shall include the line operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company between Montreal and St. John) and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall not be greater via Canadian ports than it would be via United States ports; and that all inward and outward ocean traffic shall be carried to Canadian ports, and that the Canadian Northern and the several constituent and subsidiary companies shall not in any matter within their power or control directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of any such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall in all respects in good faith use their utmost endeavours to further the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ports.

At the time this covenant was drafted, in 1914, the Canadian Northern and its subsidiaries were concerns independent of the government, seeking aid for their joint enterprise from the government. In 1918, on the acquisition by the government of the Canadian Northern capital stock, the companies in question were no longer independent of the government, stock control being substituted for covenant control and the policy of the government as implied in the agreement became and has since continued to be the policy of the management so far as Canadian ports are concerned.

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

	Salary and Wages	Expenses
September, 1923	$3,810 00	$1,842 17
October, 1923	3,860 00	1,873 53
November, 1923..	3,860 00	1,591 52
December, 1923..	3,860 00	1,447 88
January, 1924	3,980 00	1,536 78
February, 1924	4,150 32	1,398 97

3. Veterinarians, full time, 124; veterinarians, part time, 1; lay inspectors, full time, 102; lay inspectors, part time, 3.

5. Of the total percentage of hogs marketed in Canada during 1923, 14.97 per cent were graded out as select bacon. This is a total of 370,742.
6. No information available.
7. Yes. Grade 1.—Select bacon: Hogs weighing 170 to 220 pounds W.O.C. at stockyards and abattoirs or hogs weighing 180 to 230 pounds fed and watered at stockyards or at local shipping points and at such other points as may be designated from time to time; of a type and finish indicating suitability for the production of choice bacon. Jowl and shoulder light and smooth; back from neck to tail evenly fleshed; side long, medium depth, dropping reasonably straight from back; ham full, good general finish; no excess fat.

8. It is impossible to answer this question except hypothetically, and hypothetical statements are not of much value. A study of the situation would suggest that farmers would have lost more due to the raising of the minimum weight than they would have gained owing to the corresponding rise in the maximum weight. When the maximum was increased ten pounds the minimum was also raised ten pounds. It is a well known fact that with hogs not bred especially along bacon lines, as was the case with a very large proportion of Canadian hogs, putting them on the market a little on the light side is very certain to give a larger proportion of "selects" than if they were put on the market a little on the heavy side, in which latter case a very large proportion, if not all hogs not especially bred for bacon, would be likely to grade as "thick smooth".

As the breeding of the hogs in the country improves however, possibly quite a material advantage will accrue to the farmers on account of this change in the weights.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH TURKEY

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER AS TO CANADA'S ATTITUDE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) asked leave under rule 39 to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, Canada's attitude with respect to the ratification of the Treaty of Peace with Turkey.

Mr. SPEAKER: In a matter of urgent importance, affecting public policy, leave is usually given to the leader of the House to make a statement, by unanimous consent.

And leave having been granted;

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In this morning's press I observed an associated press despatch from England referring to a discussion which took place in the British House of Commons yesterday on the second reading of the bill to ratify the Treaty of Peace with Turkey and other instruments that were signed at Lausanne on July 24, 1923. The despatch contains what purports to be certain remarks of the right hon. the Prime Minister of Great Britain with reference to Canada's attitude with respect to the ratification of this treaty. I am unable to say whether or not this report is accurate with respect to the representations it contains. I have cabled to England to find out exactly what was stated by the Prime Minister. Pending a reply I might quote the reference which appears in the press. The despatch reads:

> Canada had replied that she would agree to do what the Imperial government did, Canada had raised one or two constitutional points, which he did not think was really meant by Canada to have much substance but was a sort of safeguard. In order to guard against possible extensions of the principle of the treaty without warning being given Canada desired to retain for herself certain rights of decision over and above the Imperial rights of decision.

I think I should place before the House and the country, in a form which will be immediately available in the Old Land as well, should that be so desired, the exact position of Canada in this matter. Perhaps I can do so most effectively by referring to essential features in their chronological order.

The first communication received by the government with regard to the Lausanne conference was with reference to the invitation which had been extended to different countries to be represented. It was in the nature of a despatch dated October 27, 1922, in which it was intimated that the day before invitations had been sent by the governments of Great Britain, France and Italy to the Japanese, Roumanian, Jugo-Slav, Greek and Turkish governments, of both Constantinople and Angora, to send representatives to Lausanne on November 13, to conclude treaties to end the war in the East which would replace the Treaty of Sevres; that the Russian Soviet government and the Serbian government were also invited to send to Lausanne, at any date to be fixed, representatives to take part in the discussion in reference to the stand which the conference would take at a later stage; that an inquiry was also being addressed by the three governments to the United States, expressing the hope that they would permit the United States representative to be present during the Lausanne negotiations in a capacity similar to that in which the United States representative was present during the negotiations at San Remo in 1920, or to take a more active part in the negotiations, especially on the question of the Straits. According to the arrangements agreed upon with the French and Italian governments, each government was to be represented at Lausanne by two plenipotentiaries. It was intimated that the dominion governments would be kept informed from time to time of the general lines of policy on which the British plenipotentiaries proposed to proceed, and of the course of negotiations; and, in the case of other treaties arising out of the peace, would be invited to sign a new treaty and any separate instrument regulating the status of the Straits. The despatch expressed the hope of His Majesty's government that this procedure would be in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian government.

In reply to the communication I have just referred to the view of the Canadian government was expressed pretty much as follows: It was stated that the government had no exception to take to the course pursued by His Majesty's government with respect to the conclusion of a treaty to end the war in the near East, but that as it was proposed to keep our government informed from time to time of the general lines of policy upon which the British plenipotentiaries proposed to proceed, and of the course of negotiations, and to invite us to sign a new treaty and any separate instrument regulating the status of the Straits, we deemed it advisable to avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity to inform His Majesty's government that in our opinion the extent to which Canada might be held to be bound by the proceedings of the conference or by the provisions of any treaty or instrument arising out of the same, was necessarily a matter for the parliament of Canada to decide, and that the rights and powers of our parliament in these particulars must not be held to be affected by implication or otherwise in virtue of the information with which our government might be supplied.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That communication was sent on October 31, 1922. We received a little later a communication from the British government, in which it was intimated that the British government fully understood that it would be the desire of the Canadian government that any treaty with Turkey. which might result from the conference, should be submitted to the Canadian parliament for approval before His Majesty was advised to ratify it. The despatch further stated that it was the desire of the British government that we should be kept fully informed of the developments of the conference, and that the British government would endeavour to send us full details. That seemed to necessitate making our position more explicit and another despatch was sent to the British government on November 25, 1922. In that despatch it was stated that the Canadian government had not expressed a desire to have any treaty with Turkey, which might result from the conference, submitted to the Canadian parliament for approval before His Majesty was advised to ratify it; nor did we wish to be understood as preferring any such request. We had intended to make it clear that we took no exception to Canada not being invited to be represented at the conference, but that while we had not been invited to participate we had been informed that we should be invited to sign a new treaty and any separate instrument regulating the status of the Straits, we wished to make it perfectly clear that in our opinion the extent to which Canada might be held to be bound by the proceedings of the conference, or by the provisions of any treaty or other instrument arising out of the same, was necessarily a matter for the parliament of Canada to decide. We deemed it of the utmost importance that there should be no misunderstanding as to our position with respect to Canada's obligations in this and kindred matters and we stated that in our opinion parliament would desire, as respected the treaty with Turkey and any other instrument arising out of the Lausanne Conference, to reserve to itself the right to decide, on the merits of the case, what action on the part of the people of Canada was right and proper. In this connection we asked whether we might have authority to place before parliament all the information with which we might be supplied from time to time. The British government intimated in respect to this request that as the conference was likely to be proceeding for some time, it was not desirable that this information should be made public. It was suggested that possibly all that was necessary was that parliament should be supplied with a copy of the treaty itself as soon as it was signed.

A further communication was received with respect to our signing of the treaty, saying that the British government had assumed that Canada would wish to follow the precedent set at Versailles and, in accordance with that precedent, authorize some one to sign the treaty on Canada's behalf. The British government having made that representation, we felt it imperative to point out that the procedure which was being followed with respect to Lausanne was not similar to the procedure which had been followed in the case of the Treaty of Versailles or of the subsequent treaty at Washington, inasmuch as both in the case of Versailles and in the case of Washington the Canadian government had been invited to participate in the conference and had been asked to appoint a representative. Such representative had been appointed and duly authorized to represent the country at the conference, and to sign in the name of Canada. We made it clear that the procedure referred to had never been suggested or taken; nor indeed was it possible for us to take it since we had not been invited to participate and that inasmuch as the first stages, upon which the last depended, had been omitted, it was not possible to follow the last stages of procedure adopted at the conferences at Versailles and Washington. Our position in that regard was set forth substantially as follows—I am referring now to the reply to the despatch which intimated that it was expected that we would wish to follow the procedure laid down and adopted at Versailles; we replied that the procedure in respect of the Paris Peace Conference, which was followed, also, later on in connection with the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, was the procedure to which we understood reference was being made. As to Canada's participation in those conferences we pointed out there were four separate and distinct essential stages, all of importance in the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties affecting Canada. These stages were, first, the direct representation of Canada at the conferences upon which treaties were drafted, and participation in the proceedings of the conferences by Canada's representatives, each representative holding full powers, signed by His Majesty the King, in the form of letters patent, authorizing him to sign—> for and in the name of His Majesty the King in respect of the Dominion of Canada—

—any treaties, conventions or agreements, the Canadian government having by order in council sanctioned the issuance of these full powers by His Majesty; second, the formal signing of treaties on behalf of Canada by the plenipotentiaries so named; third, the approval by the parliament of Canada of the treaties thus signed on behalf of Canada; and, fourth, the assent of the government of Canada to the final act of ratification, by His Majesty the King, of the treaty signed on behalf of Canada and approved by the parliament of Canada. We pointed out that the British government was quite right in assuming that, as regards the treaties in which Canada was supposed to have a direct or immediate interest, the procedure here outlined was the one which our government would wish to follow, and that in the case of the main political treaties concluded since the war, in general the rule seemed to have been followed that wherever the dominions had a direct or immediate interest the procedure was shaped to include their participation in the proceedings and their signature of the treaties. That in the case of the conference at Lausanne, the fact that a like procedure had not been followed with respect to representation and participation by Canada had been regarded by us as evidence that, in the opinion of the countries by whom invitations to the conference were extended, Canada could not have been deemed to have that direct and immediate interest which she was supposed to have had in the conferences at Versailles and Washington. In saying this we made it quite clear again that with respect to the course pursued by the Lausanne conference we had no exception to take; with respect to the procedure, however, we pointed out that it must be apparent, quite apart from any action or representations on the part of the government of Canada, that a different procedure had been followed at Lausanne than was followed at Versailles and Washington. Therefore under the circumstances we did not see how we could be expected, in the case of a new treaty or of any separate instrument regarding that treaty, to follow the procedure adopted in the case of the treaties concluded with Germany, Austria and Bulgaria.

That despatch was sent December 31, 1922. Through the subsequent year we received intermittent accounts of what was taking place at Lausanne, but no further reference to the question of our signature or ratification. This year, shortly before the opening of parliament, we received a communication asking if the Canadian government would concur in the ratification of the treaty which had been signed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the Prime Minister proceeds further—was there any reply to the message of December 31, 1922?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, nothing was said further with respect to our position. As I say, we were asked, shortly before the present session of parliament opened, whether the government would signify concurrence in ratification of the treaty and the conventions in question. To this communication we replied: That as Canada had not been invited to send a representative to the Lausanne conference and had not participated in the proceedings there, either directly or indirectly, and for this reason was not a signatory of the treaty, our government did not feel that it was in a position to recommend to parliament the approval of the peace treaty with Turkey and the conventions thereto, and that without the approval of parliament we did not feel that we were warranted in signifying concurrence. Having made our own position thus clear in all its bearings we added, in order that it might not be misunderstood in other ways, that with respect to ratification we would not take exception to such course as His Majesty's government might deem advisable to recommend. We pointed out that our position appeared to be in harmony with the resolution passed at the recent Imperial Conference respecting the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties, the provisions thereof with reference to signature being as follows: First concerning such as impose obligations on one part only:

(a) Bilateral treaties imposing obligations on one part of the Empire only should be signed by a representative of the government of that part. The full power issued to such representative should indicate the part of the Empire in respect of which the obligations are to be undertaken, and the preamble and text of the treaty should be so worded as to make its scope clear.

As to ratification the concluding paragraph, 2a, reads:

The ratification of treaties imposing obligations on one part of the Empire is effected at the instance of the government of that part:

And secondly, such as impose obligations on more than one part of the Empire:

(b) Where a bilateral treaty imposes obligations on more than one part of the Empire, the treaty should be signed by one or more plenipotentiaries on behalf of all the governments concerned.

2 (b) The ratification of treaties imposing obligations on more than one part of the Empire is effected after consultation between the governments of those parts of the Empire concerned. It is for each government to decide whether parliamentary approval or legislation is required before desire for, or concurrence in, ratification is intimated by that government.

We take the position that, not having been invited to the Lausanne conference, not having been represented there, not having, for the reasons that I have mentioned, signed the treaty, the treaty does not impose obligations on Canada, and that the parts of the Empire on which it does impose obligations are the only parts that should be expected to sign and ratify. As we did not regard the treaty as imposing obligations on Canada, we did not feel that it was necessary to submit the treaty to parliament for its approval, or in its name to signify concurrence in its ratification. A copy of the treaty itself, as hon. members will recall, was laid on the Table on one of the opening days of the session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Prime Minister lay on the Table the correspondence of which he has given us a summary and, as well, any relevant correspondence that has passed between the two governments?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection to laying on the Table the correspondence which I have read, except this. As my right hon. friend knows, the British government prefers that despatches of the kind in question should be communicated to parliament in indirect language rather than in the direct language in which they are couched. I have given to parliament all that is relevant, all the essential features of the entire correspondence that bears on the matter. So far as I am aware I have not omitted anything, neither have I added anything. I shall be very glad to let my right hon. friend see the correspondence himself.

Motion withdrawn.

On Notices of Motion being called:

Mr. GOULD: Mr. Speaker, might I ask,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. We have not reached the Orders of the Day. It was only by unanimous consent that the Prime Minister was allowed to make his deliverance on a question affecting public policy.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION

TRANSFERABLE VOTE IN MULTIMEMBERED CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant) moved:

Whereas redistribution as outlined by the Prime Minister at the last session of parliament has not yet been carried into effect;

And whereas the principle of the transferable (or alternative) vote has been accepted by parliament, and the Prime Minister has promised to embody it in the Dominion Elections Act during the present session;

And whereas there have been several multimembered constituencies in the past and may also be after the impending redistribution;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this House, the Dominion Elections Act be so amended as to use the transferable vote to secure, as far as possible, proportional representation in such multi-membered constituencies as may be provided for in the next redistribution.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. May says that it is not permissible to anticipate the action of parliament or of a committee appointed by parliament, or to introduce a resolution dealing with a matter already referred to a committee of the House. A few nights ago the House dealt with a proposal with regard to representation and redistribution; therefore I would like to ask if this resolution is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may say to the hon. member at once that if the committee were already appointed his objection would perhaps hold. But the committee is not yet appointed, so that I think the resolution is in order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see what the committee has to do with it. The matter perhaps not of the whole resolution but of the larger part of it is before parliament now in the form of a bill. The appointment of a committee does not affect the point of order. It might be that the motion could be amended and the part which is not affected by the bill retained, but as it stands it seems to me that the motion is subject to the point of order raised by the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill to which reference has been made affects the redistribution of the whole Dominion based upon the last census. The proposal in this case deals with the transferable vote; it deals with the mode of election, not with the redistribution itself. My ruling is that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. GOOD: I am glad to have permission, Mr. Speaker, to continue, although the hour is late and I proceed in the full knowledge that anybody who wishes to prevent a vote on this question this afternoon may do so by talking until six o'clock.

Last year I had the honour of presenting to the House two resolutions dealing with electoral reform. The first one, having to do with the alternative vote in single member constituencies, was adopted without debate and, I think, with practical unanimity. I am very much pleased to note in the Speech from the Throne that the government will embody this reform in the Dominion Elections Act during the present session. My second proposal was that at the same time there should be a limited, and more or less experimental, application of proportional representation, which alone would give us a true and adequate representation of the major bodies of existing political opinion. This resolution, after an interesting debate, was defeated by the somewhat narrow majority of eighteen votes. As the Redistribution bill was then before the House and there was reasonable expectation of its being passed before the House prorogued, I took it that the defeat of the motion would postpone any further consideration of the matter of proportional representation until the next redistribution, probably not less than ten years hence. However, as hon. members know—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members if they would kindly stop the conversation which is going on in the House, in order that the speaker may have a chance to be heard. I myself can hardly follow his remarks.

Mr. GOOD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately I have a cold to-day and I cannot speak as distinctly as I ordinarily would.

As I was going on to say, redistribution went over to the present session and I am therefore venturing to ask the House to reconsider the whole question.

The House will remember that the debate which took place last year continued until a very late hour, and owing to the desire of hon. members to reach a vote as quickly as possible I was unable to deal adequately with the objections that had been registered against the resolution. I desire, therefore, to deal very briefly this afternoon with the debate that then took place. I think the whole case against my resolution of last year was pretty well epitomized by the argument of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), to which I now propose to address myself.

In opening, my right hon. friend, in his most characteristic fashion, poured ridicule on the government for having no policy in the matter under consideration. Next he embarked upon a rather lengthy digression in order to prove to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster)—and others—that the great Conservative party was, or at least had been in time past, truly progressive. My right hon. friend's contention in this regard was well sustained by a considerable body of evidence. I have often remarked, as he did on that occasion, that there is nothing so delusive as names. In fact I should not be very much surprised, if we could apply proper standards of measurement, to find Conservatives.

Liberals and Progressives, if these terms have any significance, in all sections of this House. Party names are something like peoples' names: in the dim and distant past they were descriptive, but in process of time they have become mere tags, having no special significance. I presume, Mr. Speaker, that some time in the past my ancestors on the paternal side may have had some admirable characteristics which their descendants have neither the desire nor the right to lay claim to; and I think it is possibly somewhat the same with political parties: whether through marriage, or "morganatic alliance" or the influence of environment, they rapidly change, and the only consolation we have is that it is somewhat easier for them to change their name than it would be for a two hundred and fifty pound Mr. Small to change his name to Mr. Large. However, to digress no further in reply to my right hon. friend's digression, I may say I have no quarrel with his claim that the grand old Conservative party really possesses progressive instincts and has at least some progressive measures to its credit.

Now, coming to proportional representation itself, my right hon. friend seems disposed to endorse the charge so frequently made that this newer method of election will tend toward a continuance and multiplication of groups in parliament, a condition which he believes to be regrettable. He is forced to admit, however, that groups have arisen, continued and multiplied without proportional representation, and he admits further that the emergence and continuance of groups may be useful, holding only that the multiplication of groups does not conduce to the good of the country.

Now, if he could prove that the multiplication of groups was a result of proportional representation, his argument would be valid so far; but he does not prove it; nor can he, for the available evidence points the other way. But, supposing it could be proven that proportional representation resulted in the multiplication of groups, are we justified in concluding that it would be more difficult in that case for the electorate to decide major questions of policy than it has been under the old system? I think not. My right hon. friend's argument in this connection would be valid only if there were a single question of public policy to decide in a general election. In such a case it would not matter very much what sort of electoral methods were in use provided the issue secured a majority vote of the electors. Two parties, one for and the other against, would meet the need. But no general election is like this. There are usually several major issues and a number of minor ones. Then there is the personnel of the administration and its record. Moreover, there are questions pertaining to the qualifications, views and characters of the various candidates. Proportional representation will give greater freedom of choice to the electors and thus enable them to give expression to their views on several issues. Nor will it in any way render more difficult the settlement of any major issue, as my right hon. friend seems to think, for will not each candidate declare himself on such issue? Did not the anti-protectionist opinion in Great Britain find expression both in Labour and Liberal candidates, though these may have differed on other questions? And was it not desirable that British electors who wished to record their votes against protection should have the choice between Labour and Liberal candidates thereby enabling them to register their opinions not only on the major issue but on minor issues as well? I wish to quote, on this point, a paragraph from the last number of the British journal Representation. It is from an article entitled The Three-Party Problem and Proportional Representation:

4 p.m.

> If public opinion is divided into three main streams, the three party system is not an evil; on the contrary, it is of very great value in the organization of public opinion. The presence of three parties in the general election alone made possible the fairly clear and definite expression of national opinion on the great issues of the day, Protection, Capital Levy, Foreign Policy and Unemployment, and Socialism. Consider what would have happened if the three parties had been reduced to two, Labour and Conservative. The four million Liberal electors would have been compelled to decide whether free trade on the one hand, or the capital levy and socialism on the other, were to them the more important of the issues. Some would have voted for the Conservatives; others for Labour; many might have abstained. Either the Labour party or the Conservative party would have had a majority of seats. In either case, legislation might have been at complete variance with national wishes.

I submit, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that my right hon. friend's argument in this regard, both as respects the connection between groups and proportional representation, and as respects certain effects of groups, is not well-founded.

The next objection put forward by my right hon. friend is the fear that log-rolling may be encouraged by the existence of groups in parliament. Let me read to the House what he says in this connection. I quote from page 410 of Hansard of last year:

> The worst thing that can happen parliament is to have it so constituted that policy is determined by a system of exchange of favours, of sectional favours, of favours of any other kind—policy determined thereby rather than determined initially by government on its responsibility to parliament and ultimately to the electors. For that reason I do not think proportional representation is consonant with the British form of government.

Now, I will agree with my right hon. friend in his objection to log-rolling, but I do not see its connection with proportional representation; in the first place, because we have groups without proportional representation, and in the second place, if proportional representation gave rise to groups, the evils of log-rolling would be no worse than they are under the two-party system, where there are all kinds of opportunities for log-rolling, and that of a secret kind, within the party. How easy it is for representatives to demand local favours as a price of support of a government, how easy for that to go on within a party group if members are so minded. No; that argument is quite beside the mark.

Then finally, after admitting that much may be said in favour of proportional representation, after admitting that such a system tends toward more accurate reflection of all the views of public opinion in the mirror of parliament, my right hon. friend protests vehemently against anything in the nature of a partial or isolated application of proportional representation. Listen to what he says; I am quoting from page 411 of Hansard:

> But whether proportional representation is right or wrong, the isolated application of proportional representation is wrong, and wrong in my mind without any room for debate at all. I am against the isolated application of the principle, and would be against it even though the principle itself appealed to me as sound. Now why do I say that? You cannot have the isolated local application of proportional representation while all the rest of the country is under the old system, and either do justice as between party and party or do justice to the constituency to which proportional representation is aplied. It is unfair as between party and party, and it is unfair as respects the constituency itself. Now as between party and party you may apply proportional representation to constituencies, or to classes of constituencies, where one party is the stronger, and thereby deplete its strength in those constituencies but leave unmolested whole areas of the country where another party is the stronger, and thereby give it the whole advantage of its majority over that area. That such a result would be grossly unfair—indeed, that it would be an outrage on the public of this country, there can be no dispute at all, and I do not believe you can choose any area and say that you have chosen this fairly as between the parties represented in parliament.

There are two charges there; first, that injustice will be done as between party and party, and second, that the constituencies where proportional representation will be applied will not be fairly dealt with. Let us examine these two charges in their reverse order.

Take, for example, the specific case of the city of Winnipeg where proportional representation has been in effect for some years, and to which my right hon. friend refers. In what way has injustice been done to the inhabitants of Winnipeg by providing that the minority in that city should secure representation in the Manitoba legislature? My right hon. friend tries to tell us what injustice is done, or may be done. I shall read a few sentences from his address last year. I quote from page 412 of Hansard:

> In a word, the party that directs its policy to winning that vote—

He is referring to the rural vote.

> —plays for a stake of forty seats; the party that directs its policy to winning the city vote plays for a stake of one vote or two. As a consequence, there is every motive, there is every political motive—and let us not be so hypocritical as to deny that political motives exercise an influence in parliament—there is every political motive to neglect the constituencies to which proportional representation is applied in the public policy of the country, and to place the whole trend of that public policy in favour of those constituencies to which that system is not applied at all. There would be very little to be gained by any government in office in Manitoba to-day in so turning public policy as to be even fair to the city of Winnipeg.

My right hon. friend is too close a reasoner not to see the weakness of this argument. In fact, he makes a veiled admission when immediately after the sentence I have just read he says:

> I do not want to be understood as saying that there has been unfairness to the city.

Well, proportional representation has been in effect in the city for several years. If the menace exists there, why do we not see some realization of it? I think hon. members for that district will bear me out when I say that we have not seen such discrimination against the city of Winnipeg in the Manitoba legislature, and I think for the very good reason that the ten members for Winnipeg elected under proportional representation may be relied upon to protect the interests of the city just as well as any other ten members elected in wards or districts. Indeed, why not? There may be many differences of opinion on other matters of a provincial character, but is there any reason in the world why the ten members elected under proportional representation for the city of Winnipeg, whose opinions may differ on other matters, should not unite in protecting the city against unfair treatment? Why should they not unite to so protect the city? In fact the members elected in that way would unite to defend the city against any unfair treatment by the province, more so than ten members elected in wards, because of the fact that ward jealousies and ward needs would probably occupy a somewhat important part in the minds of the members so elected. I think, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the argument of my right hon. friend with respect to the city of Winnipeg falls down completely.

Nor is he on any better ground when he applies this argument to the federal arena. He says that there are strong sectional interests in Canada. Granted. Why should sectional interests be ignored if members be elected under proportional representation? Does my right hon. friend think that the sectional interests of Nova Scotia would be in greater jeopardy if there were a fair representation of Conservatives from that province in this House? Have not all the members from British Columbia acted unitedly in this House, no matter to what party they belonged, on such a question as that of oriental immigration? Frankly, I see no reason to believe that proportional representation would in any way hinder the united action of representatives from any particular section of the country in regard to sectional needs. On the contrary, it would enable parliament to get a more balanced and accurate view of what the various sections of the country wanted.

Now, so far as justice between party and party is concerned, it is not difficult to see what is in my right hon. friend's mind. He fears, for example, that a Liberal government will apply proportional representation to Toronto and will not apply it to Montreal. Of course injustice may be done in this way, but can it not be done now by the notorious process of gerrymandering? I think, Mr. Speaker, we shall have to depend somewhat on the sense of decency, or at all events on the public protest that would be evoked by any glaring case of that kind. I should like to assure my right hon. friend the leader of the Conservative party and his associates that if they will assist this group in getting a partial application of proportional representation, we on our part will see that they as a party are not unfairly discriminated against.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why do I ask for a partial application of proportional representation? Why do I not seek to apply it all over Canada at the same time? I should like to direct the attention of the House to three fairly definite, and I think fairly valid, reasons for my attitude in that regard.

First, because I am sufficiently cautious and conservative to believe in a not too rapid change, owing to the ever present danger of reaction. I think we all realize that even progress in the right direction may be too rapid and may bring about a reaction, if the people are not ready for it. "Slow and steady," with the emphasis on the "steady" is, I think, a good motto to keep before us in this connection.

Secondly, because it is generally believed that there are serious practical difficulties in the way of applying proportional representation to very large and sparsely settled areas. Personally, I think these difficulties have been greatly magnified, but it would be folly to ignore such belief as exists in this connection. It seems to me to be the part of wisdom, therefore, to await the result of experience. Most people are profoundly affected by actual experience, and by keeping this in mind I think we shall make greater progress in the long run than if we were to go too fast at the start.

Thirdly and finally, because while the task of the voter under proportional representation is easy, the task of the returning officer is not so easy, and in order that there may be a minimum of mistakes in the actual carrying out of the count in the various constituencies, it is desirable, in fact it is absolutely necessary, that there should be at least one trained supervisor, and it would be better to have several, in each constituency where such an experiment is tried We have some men in Canada who are prepared to supervise the count, but we have not very many, and it would give the system a black eye if, by attempting to apply it where people are not prepared to intelligently supervise the procedure, we should fall down in the application. In that way the system would be very unfairly judged.

For these reasons it seems to me desirable to make haste slowly. What objection would there be, for instance, to the application of proportional representation in Winnipeg for federal purposes, where they have already had it for provincial elections for a number of years? I cannot see any difficulty about applying it in such a case. People are familiar with the procedure. There are plenty of skilled returning officers in Winnipeg to look after the count. But the situation might be very different, indeed, if we were to make the attempt in one of the large and sparsely settled areas of northern Ontario. I think that what we ought to do would be to adopt it where it is immediately practicable and extend it as fast as it is shown to be wise.

Now, Mr. Speaker, leaving the debate of last year, let me submit to the House some information which experience has given us during the intervening period. First of all, in point of interest, I think, are the Irish elections of last summer. In this connection I would like to quote from the October number of the Proportional Representation Review. This is from an article on the Irish Free State elections and I quote as follows:

> The election of the Dail Eireann (Chamber of Deputies) of the Irish Free State, was carried out on August 27, by proportional representation with the single non-transferable vote (the Hare system). The 153 members were elected from 30 districts returning from 3 to 9 members in each. Generally speaking, each county was a district. The city of Dublin, which returned 15 members, was polled as two districts. The result may be summarized as follows:

Then there is a table showing the name of the party, the number of votes polled, the seats obtained and the seats in proportion to votes. I do not think it is necessary for me to weary the House by reading the whole of this table. There were five different parties or groups who appealed to the electors of Ireland last summer: The Government party, Anti-Treaty or Republican party, Labour, including Independent Labour, Farmers, Business and Independents. Further down in this article, I should like to quote the following comment:

> A system of election which thus gives even-handed justice to every party, even one whose leaders are in jail or "on the run," may be thought by some to be too liberal for the safety of the state. But that is not the view of those Irishmen and others who seem to us the true heirs of the great tradition of Anglo-Saxon statesmanship exemplified by such men as Pitt and Burke and Lincoln. For Americans especially it should not be hard to appreciate the profound advantage of a system of election which gives justice in representation. If the British parliament had supported Burke on March 22, 1775, when he advocated the recognition by parliament of "the ancient constitutional policy of this kingdom with regard to representation" and its application to the rebellious Americans, it would doubtless have held the colonies. The system of election used in the Free State, by giving justice (so far, we mean, as the system is concerned) even to those in rebellion against the existing government, has tended to discourage unparliamentary methods.

There is another paragraph which I shall not read, dealing with the steadying influence of proportional representation. The change of representation from that of the previous parliament has not been very noticeable, and therefore greater harmony and continuity have been possible. I should like to note in this connection also some information given in the British journal, Representation, to which I have alluded before. This is from an article on the Free State elections of 1923:

> A method of election is something more than machinery. It influences profoundly both the character of the electoral campaign and the nature of its result.

And further on:

> The influence of proportional representation can be traced even in the nominations. Apart from Dublin University, which was permitted to return unchallenged three Independents, every constituency was contested. Further, the four parties—Government, Republican, Farmer ,and Labour—had their standard-bearers, not merely in reasonably favourable constituencies, but in practically all. This did not, however, necessitate any extraordinary number of candidates.

I would like to comment at this stage that the charge which has been frequently made that this method of election results in a multiplicity of candidates as well as a multiplicity of groups, is utterly without foundation in actual experience. I continue:

> There were for the 150 contested seats in Ireland, 373 candidates.

Then it gives the statistics for Great Britain in the election of 1922 and the election of 1923, showing that under the proportional representation system, the proportion of candidates running was practically no greater than under the system which prevailed in Great Britain.

I have in my hand a letter which appeared in the London Times not long ago from Lord Monteagle, commenting upon the Irish election. After an introduction, he enumerates as follows certain broad characteristics of the Irish election of last August:

> (1) The peaceable and orderly character, not only of the polling day, but of the preliminary campaign, was as generally recognized as it was unexpected. The surprise indeed was natural when one remembers the passion and lawlessness of the previous twelve months then hardly allayed, and recalls the election disturbances of former days even in ordinarily peaceful times. The charge may surely be attributed largely to the decrease of the gladiatorial element inherent in single combat contests.

I shall not weary the House with reading the rest of this enumeration, which is very interesting, indeed, showing the unusually useful and harmonizing and stabilizing effects of this method of election in Ireland. Surely, if there is any place where the utility of this method of election had a better chance to be proven to the hilt than Ireland, I would like to know where it is.

I refer next, just for a moment or two, to the British elections of last December. On the whole, a much fairer representation was secured than in the British elections of the previous year, 1922; but this was purely by accident. That that is so, can be definitely proven by an analysis of some of the constituency or borough and county elections. I quote from the British journal, Representation, for February, 1924, a little information bearing upon this point. For instance, in the city of Birmingham, the Conservative party, with 149,000 votes, secured eleven representatives. The Liberal party, with 76,000 votes, secured none at all. The Labour party, with 28,000 votes, secured none at all. There you have about two-fifths of the votes securing the total representation in the city of Birmingham. In Cornwall, the Liberal party captured all of the seats, while the Conservative party, with 41,000 votes, secured no representation at all. If you take Wales and Monmouth together, you find that the Labour party secured a great preponderance of the representation. In Scotland also the Labour party secured a preponderance of the representation. Therefore, as I said, it is only by accident that the result on the whole comes out with a greater degree of fairness than we would expect. The situation is simply this, that Conservatives in Scotland and in certain other sections have to be content with being represented by Conservatives from cities such as Birmingham, just as in this parliament the Conservatives of Nova Scotia have to be content to be represented by the Conservatives of Ontario. I might make the same comment with respect to other provinces of the Dominion.

I should like also to refer in passing to a very interesting election which took place last November under this system in the city of Cleveland, the fifth city in importance and population in the United States. The city was divided into four districts and twenty-five councilmen were elected in it. I have here in the January number of the Proportional Representation Review a very exhaustive account of this election. I will not weary the House by making any quotations from it, although I should like to do so, if I had the time. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that anybody who reads this careful analysis of the actual experience of Cleveland must come to the conclusion that the method in this instance has a great many most important advantages.

Now let me refer to an interesting news item from New Zealand, which is, I think, of particular interest at this time:

> In New Zealand an electoral development of importance has taken place, a bill having been introduced by the government involving a partial application of P.R. in the House of Representatives. The new bill proposes P.R. for the chief cities, Auckland with 5 members, Wellington, 5, Christchurch 4 and Dunedin 4, —in all 18 members in a House of 80. Preferential voting (the alternative vote) is to be applied in the remaining constituencies. The government introduced the bill, with a view to making its provisions generally known, immediately before the parliamentary adjournment last August, and the Prime Minister stated that he "intended, all being well to proceed with it next session." As both the opposition parties, Labour and Liberal, are pledged to P.R. there is hope that a definite advance will be made.

The situation in New Zealand apparently is almost identical with the situation in this country, save that the government here has not yet adopted the policy of making an experimental application of proportional representation to certain selected constituencies.

I must refer also to the Ontario elections of last June, when the Conservative party, with a minority of the total vote, secured a very large majority of the representation. Hon. members are aware of the effort made by the preceding administration to enact two measures of electoral reform and redistribution just prior to the dissolution of the legislature last summer, and we are all familiar with the methods which were used to block those reforms and with their final failure. As a result of the failure to introduce better electoral methods in Ontario last June, we find that the Conservative party, with 49 per cent. of the vote, secured 66 per cent. of the seats; the Farmers, with 22 per cent of the vote, secured 16 per cent of the seats; the Liberal party, with 21 per cent of the votes secured 12 per cent of the seats; while the Labour and Independent vote of 7 per cent secured 5.8 per cent of the representation. Although the Conservative party may regard this situation as being very satisfactory, it is something which will undoubtedly prove a boomerang. No party which secures more than a fair share of representation ought to hold it or can hold it very long. As I remarked last year when the matter was under discussion, the farmers in the preceding government in Ontario had more than their fair share of representation, and perhaps it was that fact which to some extent led to their defeat on June 25.

In Manitoba also we find that recently the legislature has adopted the alternative or transferable vote for single-member constituencies, and there is a movement on foot to extend proportional representation outside the city of Winnipeg. I notice that two clippings, one from the Tribune and one from the Free Press, which I have here, refer to a resolution brought in by Mr. Tanner, the member for Kildonan and St. Andrews, who is apparently moving for an extension of proportional representation to some of the more thickly settled districts outside the city of Winnipeg. I merely refer to this in passing as indicating the tendency of the times. I should refer also to the situation in Alberta where, I understand, it is proposed at the next session of the legislature to adopt the alternative vote and proportional reprensentation for the whole of the province. It is too soon, perhaps, to speak definitely as to what will be done, but I understand that this is the prospect. And I notice that even in Quebec there is a considerable sentiment in favour of reform along these lines. Perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will be particularly interested in an article from the Quebec Chronicle. The first paragraph reads:

> Although the adoption of the proportional representation system of election makes comparatively slow progress in this country, the time is declared to be coming when the sheer force of example will break down all opposition. In this connection, no doubt, the statement will come as a surprise to many readers that well over one-eighth of the earth's population, it is stated, are living in proportional representation territory; that is nations or other governmental units throughout which proportional elections are held for important representative bodies by direct popular vote.

The rest of the article contains a lengthy enumeration of various countries in which this system is in use.

Now, why should we not be satisfied with the alternative vote? Last year apparently there was a feeling that if we secured one reform we should be satisfied with that. But the alternative vote, I would point out, is designed to meet a special difficulty which has been arising in recent years, the difficulty namely, in connection with the running of more than two candidates in a single-member constituency. The alternative vote meets that difficulty satisfactorily. Every one recognizes that, and that is why this House has adopted it without debate and, I think, with practical unanimity. But it does not secure or assure to us fair representation. It cannot do so, and we must go further as quickly and yet as carefully as we can. In the little magazine to which I have already referred there is an analysis of the last British general election from the point of view of the alternative vote. This article, which is very interesting, shows that, so far as can be ascertained from an analysis of that election the alternative vote would not have been of very great value in securing a fair representation in Great Britain. I do not want the House to think that I am minimising the importance of the alternative vote at all; it is very important, and I am glad that we have attained it. But nevertheless it does not meet the problem which democracies have to face at the present time. I will not impose upon the House the details of this analysis of the British elections from that point of view, but they are worth looking into.

Let me refer for a moment to the language of the resolution. Hon. members will see that it is somewhat different from the resolution of last year which was defeated by the small majority of 18. It occurred to me that possibly, as that resolution apparently was not acceptable to the House, there being no evident desire to adopt proportional representation in certain selected constituencies, the House might at least agree to apply proportional representation in any multimember constituencies that might remain after the next redistribution. In the past we have had several two-member constituencies, three of which I recall at the moment,—Halifax, St. John and Ottawa. There may be others.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are five—Cape Breton South and Richmond, St. John, Halifax, Ottawa, and Queen's, Prince Edward Island.

Mr. GOOD: I am glad to have that information. If the House cannot see its way clear now to go to the length which I suggested last session, and if these two-member constituencies are retained and possibly other multimember constituencies are brought into existence in the proposed redistribution, I think we might as well utilize the transferable vote in such constituencies to secure a fairer representation. Let me illustrate what I mean by taking the case of the city of Halifax. Let us suppose that 55 per cent of the electorate would vote Conservative and 45 per cent Liberal. Obviously it would be much fairer to have one Conservative and one Liberal representing that city in this House than it would be to have two Conservative members returned, as would almost inevitably happen under the present system even with the alternative vote. A two-member constituency is not the best for the application of proportional representation, but it is better than nothing.

If the House will not go so far—and I think it was a very moderate length to which I asked it to go last session—then perhaps it would be agreeable to adopt what I am now suggesting in this resolution. I should, however, be most happy if a member of the government, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) for instance, could see his way clear to bring in an amendment in accordance with the terms of my resolution of last session, not specifying any particular constituencies, but leaving it in the hands of the committee on redistribution to consider whether or not Winnipeg, for example, might not be selected as a federal constituency in which to apply this method. But, as I have already said, I chose this particular wording, feeling that it was the least the House could be asked to adopt, and in the hope that something might be done in this direction. I gather from the remarks made last year by the present Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) that he is not sympathetic to proportional representation being applied to Winnipeg, but I am disposed rather to accept as of more weight the very many assurances from other prominent men in that city that the system is satisfactory there.

Personally I think we might at least go this far, and I am simply submitting it to the House as a matter of opinion. We might at least apply the method in the present two-member constituencies, if they are continued, or in any multimembered constituencies. I think we could apply it in Winnipeg without any disturbance of local conditions. I should also like to see it applied in Toronto and Montreal. And I should be glad to see an experimental test made in old Ontario where we have a fairly dense mixed rural and urban population. I do not see any difficulty in its application to such a territory. As I remarked on a previous occasion, the committee of the Ontario legislature which had this matter under study some two or three years ago recommended two experimental applications of the system in mixed constituencies, one in western Ontario and one in eastern Ontario. I know that in my own district we might group together the counties of Brant and Oxford, and possibly Norfolk, to the south, forming a group-constituency which would elect about five members.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would submit to the House and to the government that now is the only chance we shall have within the next ten years to make any headway with this most important reform, a reform which has shown itself by actual experience to be an improvement on our present system. I do not want to be arbitrary, neither do I want to ask too much, and I should be most pleased if the government could see its way to consider some further application of proportional representation than I have suggested in this resolution; and, I repeat, I would welcome an amendment to that end. But, if no hon. member cares to bring in such an amendment, then I must be content with this resolution, which simply asks the House to endorse the very minimum application of the principle that is possible in Canada at the present time.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member (Mr. Good) deserves credit for the consideration he has given to the improvement of our system of representation, more particularly as concerns proportional representation—a system which is in force in many countries of the world, and which will probably be in force later on, at least partially, in this country.

[Mr. Good.]

The resolution, however, suggests that the Dominion Elections Act be amended so as to use the transferable vote to secure as far as possible proportional representation in such multimembered constituencies as may be constituted by the next redistribution. In other words, he asks the House to legislate for a condition which may or may not exist after the redistribution committee has completed its work and the bill has become law. In this respect at least the resolution is premature. Personally, I would rather see some of our double-member constituencies wiped out. As I said a few minutes ago, we have five double-member constituencies at the present time—Ottawa, Halifax, St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert, Cape Breton South and Richmond, and Queen's, P.E.I. By his resolution my hon. friend would ask the House to apply proportional representation to such constituencies as these. I do not think it would be giving a fair chance to the system of proportional representation to try it in those constituencies instead of in the big cities as the hon. member suggested last year. I myself voted for the resolution he introduced last year, but it was voted down by the House.

Mr. McMASTER: La majorité n'avait pas raison.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend says the House was wrong; perhaps that is so, but I could not help it. I think that if a trial is to be given to proportional representation it ought to be in such cities as Toronto—I believe Toronto would be the best one—Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, but not in Queen's, Prince Edward Island, for instance, which is largely a rural constituency, or in St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert, or in Halifax, which also are largely rural. As I said a moment ago, I do not think proportional representation would be given a fair trial in counties where it could not best demonstrate its advantages.

I do not like the suggestion of trying out proportional representation in a sort of makeshift way instead of discussing it and applying it openly on its merits. If proportional representation is to be introduced in Canada it should enter by the front door instead of by that sort of back entrance. I really think it is not the best way to try the system. Last year the House accepted the principle of the transferable vote, and in a very short time the government will introduce a bill to give effect to the unanimous resolution adopted at that time.

Mr. STEVENS: May I be permitted to correct my hon. friend? He says that the resolution was adopted by a unanimous vote. Speaking for myself, I voted "no" very distinctly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. STEVENS: There was no division, but when the yeas and nays were called I voted "no." I just wanted to correct my hon. friend, because I am not on record as voting for it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I might say the same thing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, I am very sorry indeed that my hon. friends did not register their protest in a more striking way, because the resolution was declared carried without anybody speaking against it, so far as I can remember, and then we proceeded to discuss the following resolution, which dealt with proportional representation. My hon. friend probably intends to oppose the change which will be effected by the bill to be introduced by the government. However, I think we stand a fair chance of getting the legislation through parliament.

I think my hon. friend (Mr. Good) should be content with this measure of progress, for which he is largely responsible on account of the consideration he has given to the question, the amount of work he has done in that connection and the remarks with which he accompanied his resolution of last year. My hon. friend himself has said that we should move slowly, that we should not progress too rapidly. Festina lente—make haste slowly—was an old axiom of the Romans, and I believe that in any movement of this kind we must not go too fast, otherwise we may run into danger. I think my hon. friend might well await the report of the committee on Redistribution before pressing his motion.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am in the same position as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in regard to the statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe): I remember distinctly that when the motion on the transferable vote was put last year practically all those in this quarter of the House said "no". It is quite true that a division was not demanded. I think myself that that was a mistake. In conversation with a great many members on the other side of the House I have ascertained that if a division had been demanded on that occasion they would have voted against the resolution. I do not believe that the resolution by any means represented the unanimous opinion of this House, and I do not believe that if the matter came before the House again, except as a government measure, any unanimous vote in favour of the transferable vote would be recorded. I believe, on the contrary, that if the supporters of the government could vote on the question as an independent measure they would vote against it. Of course I realize that if it comes before the House as a government measure the supporters of the government will feel compelled to vote in favour of it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Did the resolution come before the House last year as a government measure?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am not suggesting that. That is what I was trying to make clear; it came up just as it came up today, without the members generally knowing it was coming up and without their being properly prepared to speak on it. How many places in this chamber are vacant on this occasion? How many hon. members are not present? We must all be interested in this question, because it is a very important one, and I suggest that if some method could be arrived at whereby all hon. members irrespective of the party affiliations should have the privilege of voting on the question again—

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will allow me, does he not know that a few minutes after this motion was adopted last year, another motion, that declaring in favour of the principle of proportional representation, was defeated, the vote standing 90 to 72, which shows a considerable attendance of the members?

Mr. McQUARRIE: That does not show the attendance of the members when this particular question was being discussed. As a matter of fact the House will probably fill up a little later when a division comes on today.

Mr. GOOD: Is my hon. friend not aware that the adoption of this resolution last year without division took place almost immediately after three o'clock in a very full House?

Mr. McQUARRIE: My statement is this: That that resolution was passed last year without proper consideration, and I back up my assertion by statements made to me by many hon. members on the other side.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Name them.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am not going to name them; it would take me too long. As far as I am concerned I am absolutely opposed even to the transferable vote feature of this resolution, and I always have been. I think that every member of the official opposition is also opposed to it. Moreover, the resolution suggests that we should make an experimental test of proportional representation in an actual election. Now I would warn the House against anything of that kind. We have been making experiments with proportional representation in British Columbia for some time. We have tried it out in most of our cities. We have tried it out in Victoria, Vancouver, New Westminster, Nelson and other municipalities, and so far as I am aware, not one of these municipalities that experimented with the system follows it today. They decided that it was not a proper system.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You mean proportional representation?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes, and the single transferable vote. Both have been discarded, as the experiments proved the system to be unsatisfactory. The results speak for themselves. I might say that before this system was adopted by the cities in British Columbia it was discussed at length, and its advocates addressed public meetings and elaborated their arguments in detail. They had a Proportional Representation society out there, with branches in all the cities. So the people did not jump into this thing with their eyes shut. They tried the experiment after carefully considering the arguments pro and con, and they expected to see the results the advocates of this system had claimed for it. But they were disappointed; in actual practice it did not prove a success. And, if that was the case with us in British Columbia, why should we suppose that we shall be any more fortunate when we apply it in Dominion elections? As far as I am concerned I am absolutely opposed to these experimental tests. I do not believe in this system at all. I would rather let somebody else do the experimenting, and then when we have seen some system that works well in practice, one that is no longer in the experimental stage, we can adopt it. I am absolutely opposed to the spirit of this resolution.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. McQUARRIE: So as to make my position perfectly clear I say without any hesitation that I am opposed to the principle of proportional representation. I am also opposed to that abbreviated portion of it known as the single transferable vote. I would suggest in all sincerity that this House consider very seriously before attempting to adopt the suggestion contained in this resolution.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred a moment ago to the unanimous adoption of this resolution last year. I took occasion to interrupt him, and say that so far as I was concerned I voted "No" when this resolution was called. The question has arisen why this resolution was allowed to pass last year without discussion. I recall the occasion very well. Personally I have given a great deal of thought and study to this problem for a number of years, and I have never been able to bring myself to an approval of this system of voting. When this question was called last year I waited both for a presentation by the hon. member introducing it, who I believe spoke very few words, as Hansard will show—

5 p.m.

Mr. GOOD: May I ask the hon. member if he does not recollect the full discussion of the matter that was presented the previous year? Last year I said very little about it, simply to save time.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite true, the hon. member discussed it the year before; I am not questioning his good faith in the matter for a moment; he has been quite sincere and has given this subject a great deal of thought and study; I am simply stating what occurred last year. My hon. friend introduced his resolution with a very few words, and I awaited some utterance by the government in regard to the matter, but not a word was said. One hesitates always to rise to his feet and be the first, as it were, to oppose these things, and I certainly hesitated. The resolution passed, with very great regrets afterwards for having let the motion pass. Immediately the second resolution was called dealing with proportional representation, the two having been divided on that occasion, I rose to my feet and opposed it very vigorously, and later that motion was voted down. I want to say to the House that a great many members came to me afterwards and expressed regret that the first motion had carried without discussion. I merely refer to that in justice to myself with reference to the interruption I made a moment ago when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was speaking. While the records show the motion was carried without division, I regret that there was not a full discussion and a division on this very important subject.

I purpose giving to the House a few reasons why I am opposed to this resolution. I agree with the hon. member to my left who asked the previous speaker (Mr. McQuarrie) why he was opposed to this system of voting, that we should state our reasons why we are opposed or favourable, as the case may be. I have not come this afternoon prepared with any careful analysis of the problem. I am speaking largely from memory and from what thought I have given to the subject previously, and if my arguments are a little disjointed it is simply because I have not had the time this session to prepare any orderly address on the subject.

My hon. friend who introduced this motion intimated in his argument that this system is designed to give different groups in the community representation in the House. Indeed, this is one of the main arguments, one of the chief supporting pillars of this so-called electoral reform—that it does give representation to a variety of groups of interests in the country. On the other hand, it is also argued that parties need not have any fear of it because parties are preserved under it. Now I submit that you cannot have both; you cannot change the present system into a group system, and at the same time preserve the party system. I am not for the moment arguing pro or con. I am merely replying to the argument which is very frequently presented as one of the main reasons for the introduction of this reform. As a matter of fact, I think the tendency of the system is to multiply groups. It does not follow as a logical conclusion—it does not follow as night follows day—that that would be the result, but the general tendency is to increase the number of groups in a legislature or parliament. I want to seriously direct the attention of the House, and particularly the attention of the government, to the consideration of this particular point. I feel that perhaps this is the crux of the whole business; therefore let us ask ourselves the question, is it desirable to change or to exchange the present British parliamentary system now in vogue in Canada for a group system similar to that in vogue in France, in Switzerland, in Belgium and in many other European countries? That is the question which I propound, and that is the question to which we should give consideration.

Let me examine the proposition for a minute. The genius of the British parliamentary system is that an individual elected to parliament is elected as a representative of all the people; that is that he is not elected to represent the peculiar interests of Vancouver Centre or Winnipeg or Montreal, Toronto or any other section. He or she is elected to represent the interests of all the people of Canada in any matter that comes before parliament. As far as human nature will permit, that individual is supposed to examine each measure in the light of the interests of the country at large. I quite frankly agree that very often we will, selfishly perhaps and in varying degrees, place local interests before national interests. But, heavens, we are not infallible creatures? We are all fallible, all liable to err and do err, but that does not condemn the system or the principle underlying it. We are elected to represent all the people of the country, and the further we get away from that principle, and the more parochial our representation in this House becomes, the less efficient, the less noble is the institution of parliament. If we depart from that principle through error or fault, that is corrected by the electorate at each election if they so choose. But if we are going to depart from it deliberately by changing that system for a new system, let us examine the new system and see if it is a great improvement over the other, or if it is any improvement at all. My hon. friend (Mr. Good) made a point which is frequently made, and I have heard others make it and advance it as an unanswerable argument. I will take my hon. friend's illustration. He says that it is not right that the Conservatives of Nova Scotia should have only one representative in this House when they polled a certain number of votes in the last general election. He inferred that proportional representation or the single transferable vote, to the extent it was used, would correct this evil. Would it correct the evil? That is the question before us. I will admit if it corrects the evil—if there is an evil—then there is something in his argument. But does it infallibly correct it? Take Australia, where proportional representation is carried out in all its glory—

Mr. GOOD: May I interrupt the hon. member to say that proportional representation is not in existence in Australia.

Mr. STEVENS: I notice some of my hon. friends are very prone to applaud the minute anybody makes a positive statement. My hon. friend will admit that proportional representation is in force, in so far as the elections to the Senate are concerned. Am I right or wrong?

Mr. GOOD: As respects the Senate, yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Now will my hon. friends applaud me? I was about to say that this system in all its glory was tried out in Australia in connection with the Senate. In the elections of 1919 there were cast 860,000 Liberal votes, which elected 17 members to the Senate, and 820,000 Labour votes which elected one member. There were cast 173,000 Farmer votes which elected no senator. In other words, under proportional representation, which is supposed to be an infallible cure for the so-called evil of minority control, the situation is that with 860,000 votes the Liberals had 17 seats in the Senate, while with 993,000 votes the Labour and Farmers parties had only one seat between them in the Senate. I am not saying anything against the principle, because of that; but what I do say is that the imaginary evil, if I may use that term, of minority control, or of a group that has not a complete majority of the votes, having control of the government is not such a terrific evil after all; and furthermore that it is not corrected by the proposition now before the House.

Mr. BROWN: Could the hon. gentleman give us more information as to the details of the votes, the number of groups and the number of constituencies?

Mr. STEVENS: I did not come into the House with all the information I might have had. I am giving my hon. friend the facts. As I go along I will try and adduce certain facts which I think will support my argument fairly well. I have not the information my hon. friend asks for.

Turning to another matter, it was intimated by the hon. member who spoke a short time ago (Mr. Good) that consideration should be given to this as an experiment, that we ought to try it, and I think the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) suggested that we should try it in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. Let me say that we tried this system in the city of Vancouver for three full years. We had three different elections with proportional representation and the transferable vote. The mayor was elected under the single transferable vote, and the alderman, eight of them, were elected under a system of proportional representation in all its ramifications and perplexities.

Mr. McMASTER: What was the system of proportional representation under which they elected the city council in Vancouver? Was it the Hare system and the single transferable vote?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: They had single transferable vote for the mayor and the eight alderman were elected under the proportional representation system.

Mr. McMASTER: There are a number of systems of proportional representation. The best known and most widely used is the Hare system, the single transferable vote for the multi-member constituency. Was that the system?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot tell you the exact breed of it, but when it came to a plebiscite of the people, it ran like a hare, so that I presume it was the Hare system. I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend the exact brand. It was proportional representation in all its ramifications. Probably this fact will enlighten my hon. friend. It took at least two weeks to count the ballots, so that I presume it was a real proportional representation system. Furthermore they had to bring in trained experts and accountants to count the ballots. That would be added evidence that it was the real proportional representation. It was tried for three years. The first year there was a fairly large vote, probably the same as usual. In the second year the vote dropped to 6,000 out of some 42,000 on the list, and in the third year, only 10,000 votes were polled out of 44,000 on the list. The reason was that people lost interest in the system for the election of representatives. Last summer, independently of an election altogether, the city council submitted to the electorate a plebiscite. I have in my hands a facsimile of the plebiscite, in fact, one of the ballots sent to me by the city clerk, together with his letter. This ballot is headed:

City of Vancouver. Municipal Proportional Representation Act.

Then the question is asked:

Are you in favour of rescinding the adoption of the Municipal Proportional Representation Act in this municipality? Yes No.

Underneath the following instructions are given to the voters:

If in favour of rescinding the adoption of the Municipal Proportional Representation Act, place a cross thus (X) opposite the word "yes". If against rescinding place a cross (X) opposite the word "no".

That is a plain, simple ballot, and a plain question to the electorate whether they are in favour of retaining this system or of rejecting it. I have in my hand a letter from William McQueen, city clerk of Vancouver, in reply to an inquiry by me as regards this plebiscite. The letter is dated March 13, 1924, city clerk's office, Vancouver, B.C. It is addressed to myself and it reads:

> In reply to your letter of the 7th instant asking particulars of the plebiscite on proportional representation, I beg to say that on June 16, 1923, a vote of the electors entitled to vote for mayor was taken on the matter of rescinding the adoption of proportional representation in the city of Vancouver.
> Enclosed form of ballot
> The result was as follows:
> In favour of rescinding, (yes), 3809.
> Against rescinding, (no), 1705.
> The council of the city of Vancouver for the years 1921, 1922 and 1923 were elected under the proportional representation system.
> When proportional representation was rescinded last June, the ward system was again adopted and the council for the present year were elected under the ward system.
> Trusting this information is satisfactory,
> I remain,
> Yours very truly,
> WM MCQUEEN,
> City Clerk.

I read that for this reason: In our city, after a deliberate trial of this system for three successive years and on a plebiscite submitted to the people, this system was rejected by a vote of more than two to one. I submit to my hon. friend that it would not be reasonable or fair to impose upon the city of Vancouver at least, a proportional representation system when the people of that city have so clearly expressed their view in opposition thereto.

Mr. GOOD: What is the total vote in Vancouver?

Mr. STEVENS: I quite foresee what my hon. friend desires to know. I told him a moment ago that the number of voters on the list the year before was 44,000, and I told him also that under proportional representation the total vote polled at an annual election had dropped down to 6,000 because of the complexity of the vote, plus this—and I am in a position to give you only my word on this, but I know it, because I have studied the question and obtained the views of electors as far as possible—that the electorate became convinced that they could not secure a proper interpretation of their wishes at the polls under proportional representation. I know that is exactly contrary to the claims made for this system, but as a matter of experience that is the case. I venture to say that if hon. gentlemen will inquire carefully amongst the electorate where this system is in vogue, they will find that a substantial majority of the people amongst whom they inquire, if they inquire impartially, hold exactly that view, that this system does not do what it is supposed to do or what is claimed for it by its leading advocates, that is, give a frank and clear expression to public opinion.

Further, in regard to the query of the hon. member for Brant, I know that he will compare the vote polled with the 44,000. Let me defend my position in regard to that, and in order that we may have the matter on Hansard correctly, let me add this vote up. The total vote polled was 5,514. There was no election; but let me say to my hon. friend this. that there has been in existence in Vancouver, for at least ten years, a virile, active organization, advocating the adoption of this system of voting, a Proportional Representation Society, with regular officers, holding meetings constantly during the last ten years, advocating this system, annually attending the counting of the ballots, analysing the system, advertising its good features and so forth. So, when the test came, when this plebiscite was submitted, this association was behind the system, whereas those opposed to it were not organized at all; theirs was simply an expression of opinion of whoever chose to go to the polls. Therefore, the small number of votes polled on the plebiscite should not be quoted as wiping out, as it were, the significance of the majority in the case.

Let me turn to another phase of this question. It is claimed for proportional representation and the single transferable vote that it eliminates the chance choice; that is, supposing you have three candidates and one is elected with less than a majority of the votes, that is an unfair representation of public opinion. It is claimed in behalf of this system that it is scientifically, mathematically correct. Am I stating the claim unfairly? I think my hon. friend will agree with me that that is claimed for it. My hon. friend shakes his head. He is the first supporter of it who has ever admitted that it is not supposed to be mathematically correct. I am glad he does admit that, because it shows his fairness and honesty. It is not mathematically correct. It has in it the element of chance, the same as the other method. Let me try to explain this. I am not in a position to demonstrate it with figures. One would need a blackboard and to have the thing worked out by way of small fractions to do so, but I think I can make the matter clear to the House, perhaps in a somewhat rambling manner. This is a case that occurred in Vancouver in one of the elections. I think there were about 28 candidates for eight aldermanic positions. I cannot give the exact figures of the vote and the division of them; it would be interesting if I could; but I will give just the outline. The system followed was this: When the city clerk had ascertained what the quota for election would be—in this case it was about 800 or something of that kind—then as regards such individuals as received over the quota of 800, the excess of their votes over that quota was taken, then the second choices were counted and distributed amongst the other candidates. I ask the House: Upon what basis of science, if you like, upon what basis of equity did they take that particular man? Why should they take his counts any more than the fourth, fifth or tenth man's counts? The choice is an arbitrary one. You choose arbitrarily; you might just as fairly have chosen the fourth or the fifth man as the first man.

Or let us turn the thing around the other way. Assume for a moment that none were elected on the first choice, which often is the case; because you frequently have a long list of candidates. What is the arbitrary rule followed in that event? It is to take the lowest man and to tell him, "You go, you are finished." Why do you take the lowest man? Just on the same principle exactly as the lowest man is told now that he is defeated. In other words, there is no more justice, no more science, no more logic in it, not one particle, than there is in the present system, and it is just as arbitrary. What are the circumstances? Two men might join their forces for the purpose of trying to secure the election of one of them; and in the case I have in mind neither of the candidates who ran in that way was elected until the seventeenth count. On the seventeenth count one of them was last, the other being just above him. It was the last man's turn, under this arbitrary method, to be discarded and his seconds chosen. His seconds were chosen, and the two of them having run together, as it were, neck and neck, they naturally at that particular moment elected a man who was lowest on the list over another person who had led him all through the count to that moment.. There is nothing particularly fair about that. As a matter of fact, the man who was ahead of him in all equity was entitled to election rather than the man who was second below him. I want therefore to impress upon the House the fact that this system is not equitable but is just as arbitrary as the present method of electing representatives, with the one difference that the choice is divided up into an indefinite number of different selections according to the number of candidates on the list.

After all, what is the test of all systems of government—what is the real test? Can we not find it in the periods of history of any country under any given system of government? You do not test any system of government by some mathematical scheme of counting ballots; that is not the way to test the efficiency or the justice or the fairness of government. The system of proportional representation has been in vogue in different countries for some time now and is practised in France, in Belgium, in Switzerland, in Portugal and elsewhere on the continent of Europe. On the other hand, the system that has been followed in Great Britain, in Canada and in other parts of the Empire for so long a time is the present method of electing members to represent the people in the various legislative bodies. I agree for the moment, for the sake of argument, that this method has developed the party system, but I do not wish to digress in order to discuss that point. At all events, we have in Canada the representative system of government which has had such excellent results in Great Britain and throughout the Empire, and under which individuals are selected to represent all the people in parliament, to study and determine upon the affairs of the country at large. Will anyone suggest that the countries of Europe outside of Great Britain—France, Belgium, Portugal, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden—have been better governed than Great Britain? Will anyone suggest that any of these countries, during the last fifty or hundred years has stood out before the world as giving a better expression of government than has the British Empire? I contend that not one of them has. And what better test of the efficiency of any system of government can there be than that? What has occurred in France? Again I must apologize for not having the exact data, but hon. gentlemen, I am sure, will accept my word for it that the system of proportional representation was adopted in France some years ago.

Mr. McMASTER: It is not the same system.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is a trifle too exact; it is one of the systems.

Mr. McMASTER: And not a very proper one.

Mr. STEVENS: There are no two countries that have precisely the same form of this system, and that is the peculiarity of it. Some one suggests that it is like Heinz's pickles, having 57 varieties; yes, and as an hon. member observes, it gets you into the same pickle. After all, the proportional representation system is the same—I was going to say principle—but lack of principle—wherever it is in force. In France they have the same system in a different form from that which is followed in Switzerland and Belgium, and as a result of the practice there they have seven or eight different groups; so that, as an examination of the facts will show, during the last twenty or twenty-five years France has had a change in government on an average every year. In fact, that has been the case for the last fifty years.

Mr. FORKE: My hon. friend will admit that a change of government in France does not involve the same consequences as it does in Great Britain.

Mr. STEVENS: I frankly admit that it is a different matter altogether. But the change in government in France is made simply by means of a compromise between groups; and although M. Poincaré the other day was defeated on a technical vote in the French House of Deputies he simply fished around, after his resignation, and got together out of the various groups another government to carry on. And in this morning's papers it is stated that this new government, in office only a few days, is faced with an angry wave in the Chamber of Deputies because of something that does not suit some of the groups. The point which must be clear to all is that none of these countries has had the same stable government which has obtained in Great Britain; and a comparison of the general results obtained under the old system in Great Britain and under the new system in these other places must, I think, show quite clearly that the British government stands out above all others in so far as stability, strength and world influence are concerned. Before we bring about any change in principle in our system of electing members of parliament, I think hon. gentlemen would do well very seriously to consider the results under the two systems, by comparison over a period of years. If such a comparison is made I am convinced that it will show that the British parliamentary system is superior to the other. If that is the case, as I submit it is, then we ought to proceed with great caution in any attempt to abandon that principle for the adoption of an entirely new one.

Let me turn to another phase of the question. I shall perhaps be treading on slightly dangerous ground, but I desire to touch upon this point notwithstanding. We hear a great deal in these days about democracy. I made a few observations on this subject recently outside the House, and perhaps hon. members will pardon me if I introduce some of the arguments which I then advanced. Personally I have always had a very strong tendency towards what might be called democratic methods, using the term "democratic" in a broad, general way. But when we are dealing with a proposal for an entire change in our principles of government, I submit we ought to pause and carefully analyze our present system. It is in fact made up of three elements. It is not a pure democracy at all. We have a limited monarchy, represented in the King; we have autocracy, represented in the House of Lords and the Senate; we have pure democracy, represented in the House of Commons. I am quite aware that there are those who favour wiping out the first two elements altogether. But I say to every thoughtful member of the House, we ought to study with extreme care the advantages or disadvantages, as the case may be, of the presence of those two elements before we suggest discarding them. The more I study the history of the British parliamentary system of government, the more I am convinced that the kingly power, in the person of the King in Great Britain and of the Governor General in Canada, and the autocratic power, in the House of Lords and the Senate respectively in these two countries, serve a very excellent purpose in our system of government.

Let us take, for instance, the kingly power. Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware of the rule that we should not in our debates refer to the King, but I am speaking solely of the elements of government and shall keep within the rules of the House. At one time the kingly power was regarded as an individual and absolute right. That is not the case today. As a matter of fact, the Governor General here, or the King in Great Britain, is the last court of appeal of people who might consider themselves suffering some abuse at the hands either of the House of Commons or of the Senate or the House of Lords respectively. And British history records that during the past century or more the Crown has exercised its prerogative far oftener in the interests of minorities whose liberties were being encroached upon than arbitrarily for the benefit of the ruling classes. Therefore I appeal to the House to most carefully examine the workings of our present system before we attempt to change it in any way.

Let me take another step in this analysis. In connection with proportional representation there goes another departure from our present system. I venture to say that if this resolution passes and its provisions are embodied in the law, my hon. friend who has introduced it (Mr. Good) will be prepared to present to the House at some future session —if he is still a member—a resolution in favour of the initiative, referendum and recall. This innovation has a certain attraction for those who have a penchant for proportional representation. In other words, the two go together. But it is equally doubtful whether this other reform has any advantages to recommend it more than the reform now suggested. After all, public opinion is not infallible. I know there are those appealing to the public who like to declare that the people's opinion is infallible. Indeed, anyone uttering my views is in danger of being branded an autocrat. But let us consider the matter coolly and frankly. How can every individual in the nation be, as a unit, fully apprised of the complexities of certain questions that come before parliament? It is an utter impossibility. No bill can be drafted so clearly as to convey of it full effects to the public. Yet under this new system, which I say is correlated with the subject matter of the resolution, an appeal is made to the public and the decision is to be left entirely with them.

I think I have discussed the resolution at sufficient length. I only regret that I have not had the time to present to the House a more detailed analysis of proportional representation supported by figures and other evidence. I will conclude with an appeal to the House to give the very fullest consideration to this principle before they adopt it as a definite change in our electoral system.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I have been wondering what is the real reason why the group in the corner of the chamber situated immediately to your left is so opposed to both these ideas—that of the single transferable vote as applied to single-member constituencies, and the larger idea of proportional representation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: My hon. friend has asked why we oppose this principle. It is well recognized that this debate will close at six o'clock—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is, in so far as to-day is concerned. But if my hon. friend would let me have the floor for about ten minutes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: Surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird! I have come to a conclusion on this question, and it is this. The Conservative party thoroughly realize that the progressive thought of this country is divided roughly into two groups, that when an election comes and there are three candidates, those who support the progressive thought will give first their vote to those candidates with whom they are connected in a political party, and then to the candidates of the next poltical party that more nearly represents their views; and in that way the result will be disastrous for the Conservative party.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend—

Mr. McMASTER: Time is precious, and frivolous questions will not be answered. Why is that the reason? Because the Conservative party, when the Liberal thought of this country was united, was never able to win an election, and whenever they have won an election it has been when the Liberal or Progressive thought of the country was divided. Hence their fear of the single transferable vote.

Now let me consider some of the arguments used by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). He said that that interesting city had tried this scheme for the long period of three years, and had then found that it was inadvisable to continue it on a plebiscite in which about four thousand of the people voted out of forty-four thousand, and the system was abandoned by a considerable majority. I hold in my hand a clipping from a paper entitled, The Joke on Vancouver. It reads as follows:

> The city of Vancouver, after using proportional representation for two or three years in its municipal elections, discarded it and went back to the old system this year. The argument used against proportional representation in Vancouver was that it had made no difference in the election results. Scores of citizens were quite sure that the same men would have been elected under the old system as under proportional representation; therefore, why introduce a more complicated system when it gave no benefit? One of the men who was most active in the fight to discard proportional representation was L. D. Taylor. In the election a few days ago Mr. Taylor was one of the mayorality candidates in a three-cornered contest. The other candidates were Alderman Owen and Alderman Pettipiece. Owen was elected. Pettipiece was the low candidate. It is now realized at Vancouver that if proportional representation had been in force Taylor, in all probability, would have been elected when Pettipiece would have been counted out and his votes distributed. Owen, the new mayor, was elected on a minority vote.
> Discussing the situation, the Vancouver Province says:
> "'Poetic justice,' is how Mr. Garfield King, one of the principal proponents of the proportional representation system in the city, describes the result of the mayoralty election.
> "Under proportional representation, he believes that Mr. L. D. Taylor would have received a large majority of the 2,459 votes polled for Alderman Pettipiece.

So it would appear that perhaps the system which was tried out in this city might be a good system, even though it was abandoned for the time being. Winnipeg has had this system for a number of years; it has operated in several elections and has given satisfactory results there. It would appear that the counting of the votes caused great objections to the system as applied in Vancouver; whether the people of Winnipeg were better mathematicians than those of Vancouver is a question which I will not attempt to answer. What we want in this country is representative government. Do we get representative government under our present system? We do not get thoroughly representative government under a system which will allow great political parties to remain unrepresented in this House when the number of their adherents in the different provinces runs into some thousands. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has made an appeal to British practice and to British tradition, and he is quite right in that. I will draw his attention to the words of a great British statesman, the Hon. Herbert H. Asquith, who, in advocating proportional representation, said, "There should not be a strain of public opinion unrepresented in this House."

The tendency may be, it is stated, to multiply groups. I doubt that, but if there are substantial groups of public opinion in this country unrepresented by the official parties it is infinitely better that those groups should be multiplied in order that every strain of public opinion may find expression in this House. I cannot believe that parliamentary institutions will be effective unless proper provision is made for different strains of public opinion. It may be that in the future we will be unable to divide the Canadian people into two great groups. It may happen that we may have that system restored, and it may be that another system may have to be worked out. I believe that this system of proportional representation offers a reasonable and proper method under which sincere differences of public opinion may be represented. There is a great deal of artificiality in the present condition of our political parties and the present division. Why, we had the other day the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) urging the old Liberal principle of representation by population, and we have the member for Vancouver Centre to-day talking very much the way a Stuart talked at the time of Cromwell. The appeal to British tradition was somewhat strange in view of the fact that we have to-day a group system of parliamentary government in Great Britain. We have a Labour party on the treasury benches, and it represents a minority of the people and a minority in the House.

Mr. HOCKEN: Government by minority.

Mr. McMASTER: "Government by minority," ejaculates the member for West Toronto. It is quite true that in the future the minority whose views correspond more nearly than the views of any other group in the House may be given the responsibility of government with the control exercised by other groups in the House. That is a possible development of our British constitutional system. Our British constitutional system is not remaining the same; its very flexibility is one of its greatest virtues.

Now, I approach the discussion of this question this afternoon in very much the same position as the member for Vancouver Centre: I had not expected to take part in the debate and I have not material under my hand for a discussion of the matter in detail. But the point to be remembered is this: That our present system does not accurately or adequately reflect the differences of public opinion in our country and we have to seek out a method other than the method at present adopted. I think the sparseness of our population in most parts of this country makes proportional representation impracticable. In our large areas in the western provinces, in rural Quebec and in rural Ontario, I do not believe that in most cases proportional representation is possible, but I do believe it should be adopted in the large cities. I believe it should be adopted in Toronto; I believe it should be adopted in Montreal.

Mr. HOCKEN: It would not make any difference in Toronto.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know whether it would or not, but it would do this: If there are ten seats in Toronto and there are twenty or thirty per cent of Liberal votes in Toronto, then out of the ten seats the Liberals would get two or three. And the same way in Montreal: if there is a small proportion of Conservatives in Montreal this system would give them proper representation. To-day we find that Toronto is represented entirely by Conservatives and that Montreal is represented entirely by Liberals.

Mr. JACOBS: No—Liberals in name, some of them.

Mr. McMASTER: At least they are counted as Liberals, and for the purposes of my discussion I will do them the compliment of calling them Liberals. I say that it is an unwholesome condition—and anyone who thinks for a moment will agree with me—to have the representation of one great city all one way and the representation of another great city all the other way, especially when the number of people belonging to the different political parties make that representation an untrue and improper representation of the public opinion of those cities. What we want in this country is a method of election which will ensure an adequate and proper representation of the real thoughts and the real opinion of the people upon public matters.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the three minutes left before six o'clock will scarcely be long enough to give the explanation I should like to make in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). I was not aware that this resolution would be debated to-day. I have listened with a good deal of interest to some of the statements which have been made, and particularly to the references that have been made to a resolution calling for the transferable or alternative vote which was passed at the last session of parliament. A good many things have happened during the past year; a good deal of light has been thrown on the actions and motives of some of the people of this Dominion as well as of other countries, and I think it is about time that we were speaking frankly what we believe to be the fact, and that we should cast aside this camouflage which has been attempted by a good many people of this Dominion so far as political parties are concerned.

To my mind the object that is sought by the alternative vote, which is coupled with this resolution, is one that is intended to carry out the designs of the members of the two parties calling themselves the Progressive party and the Liberal party, whereas, as a matter of fact, there is absolutely no difference between the two. I think the people of this country thoroughly understand their object, what they have in view, and the means by which they are going to take advantage in a scheme of this kind. For that reason I must say that I am absolutely opposed to any further experiments along the line suggested by the most impractical members of the House, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), and his colleague the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). They are always ready to venture into some field where no definite results are in evidence; yes to enact freak legislation, as one hon. member suggests.

Just a little over a year ago last March, there was a meeting held in the city of Ottawa of the Liberals of eastern Ontario, and statements were made at that time by prominent men in connection with matters which are affected by the resolution before us. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the remarks that were made by one or two speakers on that occasion. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of March a year ago:

Mr. J. W. Curry, K.C., M.L.A., Toronto South-east, seat "A," after saying that the convention of eastern Ontario Liberals was to him an eye-opener, proclaimed himself a consistent believer in Liberalism which meant progress and the betterment of the people. The political situation which developed in Ontario in 1919 was a protest against Toryism. The United Farmers of Ontario had organized and developed as a protest against the actions of the Conservative party in power. Mr. Curry referred to his support of the U.F.O. government headed by Premier Drury, known for years as a staunch Liberal, and the help he had given in moulding legislation. As a result, he was told he had deserted the Liberal party, and the suggestion was made that he be read out of the party. No man could divorce him from his Liberal principles. He was behind the Liberal leader, and would be behind that leader if three parties went to the country.

What clearer evidence could you have than this statement, made by a Liberal member of the Ontario legislature with regard to his attitude?

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, April 3, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the petition of Rev. George H. Smith, D.D., of St. Catharines, in the county of Lincoln, against the petition praying for the incorporation of the United Church of Canada, on the ground that the said petition is not in conformity with the standing orders of this House.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. R. Milne be taken from the list of members comprising the standing committee on Banking and Commerce and that the name of Mr. J. Steedsman be inserted in lieu thereof.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—PRINTER'S LIABILITY

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 29, to amend the Criminal Code (Printer's liability).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. NEILL: The object of this legislation is to provide that any paper, or pamphlet, or circular, printed and intended for publication and distribution, shall contain on it the name and address of the publisher. The object of this is to facilitate the identification of the publisher of any circular, or pamphlet, or article, of that character. It is becoming increasingly frequent now that we find pamphlets circulated, containing, as this explanation states, "false, defamatory and libellous statements," sometimes seditious statements, which are intended for circulation in an anonymous way. This will check that. I may say that the legislation follows that in Britain going as far back as the year 1839 and revised since then.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

4. If an investigation was held, who held it, when was it held, and what was the verdict?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes. Order in council dated 22nd December, 1923.

[Mr. Bureau.]

T. GEORGE MACKENZIE, MEXICAN CAPTIVE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is the government aware that a British subject, a Canadian domiciled in Canada, namely T. George MacKenzie, general manager of the Compania Company, has been taken prisoner by the provisional government of Mexico, and held, it is said, for ransom?

2. If so, will the government endeavour to secure his release by negotiations or otherwise, and what has, or is being, done?

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

HEALTH DEPARTMENT OFFICIALS

Mr. ANDERSON:

1. What are the names of the officials in the Department of Health in Ottawa and what are their respective salaries?

2. How many persons were in the employ of the said department, inside and outside service, during the fiscal years 1921-22, 1922-23, 1923-24?

BRITISH COLUMBIA LIQUOR TRADE

On the question:

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. What amount of liquor has been imported into British Columbia during the calendar years 1922 and 1923?
2. What amount of liquor remained in bond and later released for export?
3. What amount of liquor was released for local consumption?
4. What amount of revenue was secured for liquor released for local consumption?
5. What amount of gross revenue was received from liquor in bond, and what is the total refund under the regulations controlling liquors in bond during the said years?

Mr. STEVENS: I had the courtesy of a conversation with officers of the Customs Department, and they point out certain impossibilities in this question. I have a change to suggest, and then, with the permission of the House, I wish to ask that it pass as an order for return. I would suggest that the word "imported" in the first line should be changed to "brought;" that in the last question, after the word "revenue," the words "or security" be inserted and that after the word "refund," the words "or release" be inserted. With these changes, if the question could pass as an order for return, I have no doubt it could be dealt with.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH TURKEY

STATEMENT IN EXPLANATION BY THE PRIME MINISTER

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: (Prime Minister): Yesterday my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) asked me, in the course of the remarks I made on the subject of the Treaty of Peace with Turkey, whether there was a reply to a despatch I had referred to, of December 31, 1922. I answered that there was not. I regret to say that I was mistaken in that regard; the fact that there was such a reply escaped my attention in looking over the files I had before me. That reply was to the effect that the British government acquiesced in the view that the plenipotentiaries who negotiated the treaty should be the parties to sign it. I will see that the despatch is submitted to my right hon. friend with the other papers.

THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Can the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) tell us when the budget is likely to be brought down?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): May I remind my hon. friend, who himself had more than once the responsibility of bringing down the budget, that the financial year has only ended this week, and he knows that the officers of the department should have at least a little time to check up accounts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not complaining; I merely want to know. I see that the newspaper reports say that it may be brought down any time.

Mr. ROBB: I will let my hon. friend know a couple of days in advance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the House should have longer notice than that.

CHIEF INSPECTOR OF FISHERIES, VANCOUVER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LADNER: Is the government seriously entertaining the proposal to abolish the office of Chief Inspector of Fisheries at Vancouver? If so, has it consulted all parties concerned?

Mr. CARDIN: The matter is under consideration.

PACIFIC HALIBUT FISHERY

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the third reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Northern Pacific Halibut Fishery Protection Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BILLS PROPOSED TO AUTHORIZE THE CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Rousseau, on the Canadian Northern Quebec railway, to Laurent, on the Quebec and Lake St. John railway, in the province of Quebec; estimated mileage including existing grading, 17 miles; estimated cost, $1,000,000.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

ROUSSEAU-LAURENT

Mr. GRAHAM: I desire to lay on the Table a communication from Sir Henry Thornton.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In regard to any particular line, or all?

Mr. GRAHAM: It covers in a general way, I think, everything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not too general, I hope.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a communication from the president of the Canadian National Railways; I did not write it. The statement is as follows:

Rousseau-Laurent cut-off, mile 0-17	Cost
Proposed in 1925—17 miles grade..	$ 719,500
Proposed in 1926—17 miles track and ballast	280,500

It is proposed in 1925 to grade the 17 miles this line involves, at an estimated cost of $719,500, and in 1926 to complete it with track and ballast, etc., at a further cost of $280,500.

The purpose of this line is the first and most important step in the grade reductions of the route from Lake St. John country south. The present grades on part of this route are too steep for economical operation. On the engine division between Lake Edward and Garneau Jct. they are 2 per cent in each direction, and between Rousseau and Laurent is the worst section of this engine run. The proposed cut-off will have .5 per cent grades in each direction and will avoid a rise of 200 feet in each direction.

The business from this line to Montreal and points beyond is steadily increasing, and very large engineering enterprises are now under way in the Lake St. John district, for hydro-electric and the paper industry development. If the expenditures now being made there are justified, it means the business to and from this district must be increased by several times the present quantity. Our line without improvement is not in shape to cope with much more business, and without grade reduction would soon come to the limit of its capacity. Another phase of the matter is that with the present freight rates and costs, it is not possible on bulk tonnage to get sufficient tonnage behind a locomotive to pay direct out of pocket expenses while operating over the present grades. This means that increased business instead of helping us only puts us further in the hole, whereas, if we reduce the grades, we can look forward to increased tonnage eventually contributing to our net profits, in an increasing ratio.

There are further grade revisions necessary to make this line a .5/10 per cent gradient route. Taking all of them into account it has been shown that, with increased business the operating saving will pay a handsome return on the amount involved. Awaiting confirmation of expected increases in business, no work is proposed till 1925, when it is anticipated this work will be badly required.

Note.—Revision of Line to Lake St. John.

I think it will be well if I read to the committee the letter I have received from Sir Henry Thornton:

Canadian National Railways
Office of the Chairman and President.
Montreal, Que. April 2nd, 1924.

Hon. GEO P. GRAHAM, M.P.,
Minister of Railways and Canals, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

With respect to the branch line programme of the Canadian National Railways, I desire to place before you the policy which governed the company in its recommendation, and the specific reasons and other data for the construction of each line.

In the preparation of the branch line programme, the following factors were given due weight:

(1) The money already spent and the work already done on each line, where such conditions existed;

(2) The strategic, economic and traffic value of each branch;

(3) The measure of relief afforded to farmers through shortening the road haul on grain and other products;

(4) A regard for the presumable aggregate sum which the finances of the Dominion would permit to be devoted to such a purpose.

After having given proper weight to the factors above mentioned, the programme which has already been submitted to you was prepared and, in addition, it was suggested that the programme, should, if adopted, be spread over a period of three years, the authority remaining alive until August 31, 1927. The objective sought in extending the life of the vote for three years was to provide that continuity of construction which is essential for economy and to enable the engineering and construction department of the railway, as well as contractors, to lay out their work in the most effective fashion. The practice is well recognized by private railways under whose administration sums, when voted by the shareholders, remain in the hands of the executive until the work is completed or authority rescinded. There would seem to exist an analogy between the shareholders of a private company in their relation to the executive, and the parliament of the Dominion of Canada in its relation to the Canadian National Railway system, which would justify such a policy if the experiences of private undertakings are of value.

Varying prices of labour and material, adverse climatic conditions and the difficulty of securing labour during the period of harvest render it imperative that an early start should be made each year if construction work is to be prosecuted with speed and economy and this, it is submitted, will not result if each branch line is to be subjected to an annual vote.

Appertaining to the Canadian National's branch line programme, for which you are submitting enabling bills to parliament, appended hereto are statements with reference to each line which set out the purpose and justification for each. While it is true that all of these lines may not be entirely justified from the present railway economic standpoint, particularly if viewed from their first few years' operations, broader grounds must be considered when preparing a system of feeders for a railway of the magnitude of that which has been entrusted to the present administration of the National Railways.

The first problem that arises from examination of the Canadian National Railways system is to ascertain the main and underlying cause of the deficits, and it is at once apparent that, although certain economies of operation and co-ordination of the various units comprising the system may materially improve the "net" position, the basic cause is found in the fact that the mileage is much too great for the traffic. The apparent answer to the necessity for more business is more people and a further development of those resources which nature has provided with a generous hand. This end can only be speedily attained by the immigration of both settlers and capital and my various officers and myself, realizing this need, have consistently endeavoured to promote both. No confidence can exist in those who lack faith in themselves. My survey of this Dominion gives me unlimited confidence in its ultimate destiny without which there could be no faith in the final success of the national lines.

Therefore we are looking to develop this vast country, at present but too sparsely settled, and asking people to emigrate and join us in this development. But what do we find? Certain sections of the country are losing the very population we are so anxious to augment. Why are these sections being depopulated? Chiefly through a lack of railway facilities, particularly on the prairies, and the question naturally arises, "Is not the settler, who has manfully demonstrated his ability to bring products from the soil, worth many times the untried immigrant? If we are to bring people into the country we should certainly not allow them to meet others who are departing in a discouraged frame of mind. Therefore, not only are branch lines necessary to develop the country and provide reasonable facilities for the immigrant, but also to retain that part of our population which has so courageously planted itself on the land.

It is not likely that the Canadian National Railways will suffer materially from a financial view, for three or four or perhaps five years if the branch line programme herein contemplated is abandoned, but it is inevitable, that should such a thing come about, at the expiration of a period of years the system will find itself robbed of all further opportunity for reasonable development. Strategic territories will have been seized by other transportation interests, and the railway will dry up at its roots. I can think of no more effective way to eventually bring about the ruin of the Canadian National Railway system than a refusal to embark upon and consistently maintain a branch line programme. No railway can stand still, and success can only be achieved by keeping abreast of the times in the fulfilment of transportation responsibility. This is even more important in a growing and rapidly developing country.

I particularly desire to make it clear that the recommendations herein contained are based not only on present day conditions but also have regard for the probable volume of traffic which would result from the settlement of the country in years to come.

I therefore endorse the programme which has been submitted to you as representing, after full consideration of all facts and factors, that minimum which is essential to the needs of the communities served by the Canadian National Railways, and the system itself.

Yours faithfully,

H. W. THORNTON,
President.

There is a note at the bottom in reference to the "Grande Fresniere Mile 0-12," which intimates that an arrangement may possibly be made with the Canadian Pacific Railway which would obviate the necessity of building this line.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Which line is that?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Huberdeau branch. That is in Quebec. If this arrangement is effected, this construction would not be necessary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before reading the letter of Sir Henry Thornton describing the situation, the minister read a statement dealing with this particular line. Is that a statement of Sir Henry Thornton?

Mr. GRAHAM: This is the statement prepared by the officials of the Canadian National Railway, and in this letter the statements accompanying each bill are endorsed by the president.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that is the statement referred to by the president in his letter?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister let us know which way this grade is? Is it in connection with the traffic north or the traffic south?

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine that it is the traffic south to a large extent. The advantage of this proposal is that it will give a five-tenths grade in each direction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If this grade is with the bulk of the traffic and not against it, it will make a difference. I would like to know the fact in regard to that.

Mr. GRAHAM: The grade is against the bulk of the traffic, as I understand it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then that grade is a lifting grade in the southerly movement?

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine there is a grade both ways probably. The memorandum says—

"And will avoid a rise of 200 feet in each direction."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand. Will the minister give the House the particulars as to the movement?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we should have the weight of movement, so that we can see what will result from this arrangement. We should have the class of traffic and the direction in which it moves. Then we should also get the information as to other grades upon the same line, when they occur and what the grade is, for example, on the movement from Chicoutimi to the point of intersection. We should have the same information from the western terminus of the branch, and also the grade from Chicoutimi south. It may be that this is merely a minor grade connection, and we are committing ourselves to a whole lot of other expenditures in order to reduce this line to a grade of five-eighths.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I read in this statement—I do not see it at the moment—that if we reduce the grades we could look forward to large increased tonnage per train.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we should have the full information.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, this is all the grade that it will be necessary to remove by this expenditure. I have not the information my hon. friend wants, but I could get it for him when we are in committee on the bill. I can get all the engineering information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. minister will see the necessity of having the information.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it is right we should have it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not only should we have the information as to class of traffic and the receipts from the line, but we should also have information as to the points between which it moves in each direction, so that we can properly consider the whole question.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister copies of an individual agreement as to each line?

Mr. GRAHAM: I put it on Hansard as we go along.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not get that for analysis until the next day. It is the memoranda that count.

Mr. GRAHAM: They are the explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are the only thing which can give us a basis for our individual judgment. This letter is virtually a Canadian Club speech; it does not furnish any matter upon which one can give an independent judgment.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is written to Canadians.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Rousseau and Laurent, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GRANDE FRESNIERE-RINFRET

Mr. GRAHAM moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction of a Canadian National line from Grande Fresniere to Rinfret Junction, in the province of Quebec; estimated mileage including existing grading, 12 miles; estimated cost, $357,000.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the line referred to in the foot-note of Sir Henry Thornton's letter?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I was in error in making that explanation a moment ago. I did not have the letter in my hand, and I was wrong in applying it to the resolution just passed. I think it applies to this one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It refers to this one. As I understand it, this is a road that runs out and connects with a line of the Canadian National; then it runs out still further, and it is that further part which it is contemplated to sell to the Canadian Pacific, in which event the construction of this line would be an economic waste. Of course the amount, relative to the rest, is not very large. I see that the name of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) is to be immortalized; I would not object to that.

Mr. ETHIER: I understand from the memorandum from Sir Henry Thornton, which was read to the committee, that there have been negotiations between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National in regard to that branch line. What was the nature and the result of those negotiations?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know what the nature of the negotiations is; of course they have not been made public. But Sir Henry Thornton says that negotiations have taken place for the acquisition by the Canadian Pacific of a certain mileage, which, if it takes place will render the construction of this mileage unnecessary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the minister's views as to the disposition of railway properties? Is that in the hands of the board, or does this parliament have something to say about it?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has asked quite a large question. I think that up to the present the company has been disposing of properties—possibly the old Grand Trunk, not the Canadian National. I know that the old Grand Trunk since I became minister sold a number of properties, concerning which the government was not consulted. I say that subject to correction, because the question has been rather sprung on me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. HANSON: What about surplus lands, for instance, in connection with Canadian Government Railways? Does this company dispose of these lands without consulting the government?

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, no; that could not be done. Those are government railways; the railways making up the Canadian National system, or part of it, are still company railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government railway is only committed for management to the Canadian National Board; it does not belong to the company. But in relation to the other properties which belong to the Canadian National Railway Company, I think the time has come when a line should be drawn to differentiate the authority of the board and the authority of parliament in that respect. I am free to say it is a phase of the whole problem which has not yet been solved. In fact, no phase of it has been solved in the last two years and three months.

Mr. GRAHAM: There were many phases left to be solved by us.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are two or three left, but the great mass of the railway problem of Canada, in my judgment, is solved so far as policy goes. There is no question that it should not be within the power of the Canadian National Railway directorate to dispose of large capital assets of that company without even the authority of the government, to say nothing of the authority of parliament. I am aware, as is the minister, that it has been done, involving very large amounts. I do not know what authority of the government was given, but I know that the authority of parliament was not sought. If this be continued we might wake up some morning to find that we had no national railways at all. It seems to me that the government owes it to the House to examine carefully the legislation in that regard and to make a recommendation to parliament as to policy. I do not make these remarks with any special reference to this line; I make them with respect to the general policy of the country's greatest asset.

Mr. GRAHAM: This question of the disposition of property was up last year, I think, in the form of a question or return, and at that time I had a good many particulars before me. But I wholly agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) that as shareholders we should not dispose of our property without at least the Governor in Council giving his consent, under some amendment to the statute—either that or the authority of parliament being obtained. As my right hon. friend says, the problem is of such great magnitude that it is possible we might find some of our property disposed of which as a government or as parliament we would not think of selling. I have made a note of that and will have it looked into, and if necessary, bring down legislation this year to cover that point.

Mr. PREVOST (Translation): It is astonishing, Mr. Chairman, that the branch line, which is mentioned in this resolution, has not been built before this. I confess that I have not a full knowledge of all the details regarding the various lines mentioned in the twenty-six resolutions that the Minister of Railways has submitted to this House. It is only right to await the explanations of the minister and the information which will be supplied by the members of this House who are familiar with the advantages, utility and even the necessity of these various branch lines.

You will allow me, Mr. Chairman, to make a few remarks on the line just referred to and upon which I can speak with some knowledge, as it is situated within the region in which I reside. The present resolution states: "that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction of a branch line of the Canadian National Railway between Grande Fresnière and Rinfret Junction, in the province of Quebec." The estimated cost would be $357,000.

Thirty miles to the north of Montreal, that is from St. Jerome—in the county of Terrebonne—at Arundel, in the county of Argenteuil—a state railway—the Canadian National serves a very rich region of mountains, valleys and plateaus, a region, to say the least, delightful both as regards its picturesque aspect and its natural resources. A large and laborious population of settlers, farmers and trading people inhabit that district and numerous tourists, whose number is ever increasing, meet in this region. Unfortunately, between Montreal, the metropolis of Canada, and those beautiful parts, there is, in the government railway system, a solution of continuity. No direct communication exists by the government railways, between this region and Montreal. Nevertheless, the Canadian National Railway between Montreal and Ottawa, passes at a distance of only twelve miles to the south of its northern route, and it is the building of those twelve miles that we ask this House to authorize.

I shall not take advantage of the occasion to discuss the state ownership of railways, to consider whether the principle is good or bad, whether its application is beneficial or not. I shall neither take advantage of the occasion to try and establish that it is responsible for the financial conditions of our railways, which has so heavily burdened our national budget. I accept the situation as it exists. The government of Canada is the owner of railways of which some lines are continuously showing deficits, deficits that must be met by means of taxes levied on the people. Other lines are assets or may easily become so. Must the government for the sake of economy which I shall call, penny wise and pound foolish, persist in operating at a loss, unprofitable lines and they are such because they are unfinished or not complete? Should the government refuse to make certain outlays which would turn to assets those deplorable deficits? Would that be a fair test of state ownership, which is one of the principal planks of this government's programme?

The branch line of the Canadian National which is under discussion, is not showing deficits, and, I think, there is very little doubt, I even feel absolutely certain, that this line would yield substantial profits if the said project was carried out.

A railway company either independent or owned by the state, first looks after its own interests. This is natural and reasonable. It is undeniable that it would be in the interest of the Canadian National Railways to own the line under discussion. Indeed, a line which would connect directly with Montreal—the commercial distributing centre of our country —must necessarily be useful and profitable to the metropolis; a line which would connect Montreal with the northern region that I mentioned just now, could but be beneficial to the metropolis, to this northern region and the National Railways themselves. Such a line, even if it did not exist, at present in the Laurentian hills, should be constructed; however, it does exist; it exists in an unfinished state. This line, shortly, will be necessary to link the metropolis to the Transcontinental which passes to the north of that part of the country.

A few years ago the boards of trade and chambers of commerce of our principal towns sent petitions and delegates to the Dominion government to request the construction of this branch line between the metropolis and the Transcontinental. The line which at present exists—and which belongs to the state—extends already for a distance of one hundred miles to the north and in the direction of the Transcontinental. This is for the future; but for the immediate present, it is certain that the construction of the twelve miles under discussion would result in increasing the traffic considerably and raise the revenue accruing from all passengers, travellers and tourists.

A transportation company must not only consider its private interests, it must also look after the interests of the public, this is why legislators enact laws which govern transportation companies. It is also the reason that the government appoint commissions to watch over the service given by transportation companies, in order that the public interest be constantly and always safeguarded. This regard for the general interest, for the public welfare must especially be in evidence, I think, when it is the state itself which supervises the means of communication and transport. In constructing the said line, the government would be performing a worthy act for the public welfare, since it would be bringing nearer the city of Montreal to a rich region visited by thousands of travellers and tourists who ask for more rapid means of transportation. Colonization, farming, lumber and mining industries are very prosperous in this district. All traffic originating in those parts can only reach Montreal after a long journey. Thanks to the proposed line, the journey between the north country and Montreal would be reduced by 45 miles, which would be an enormous gain not only as to the time saved, but also as to the lower rates which would prevail on transportation. Over and above the advantages which this line offers as regards traffic, and of which trade and industries would largely benefit, there is another that is certainly not to be neglected and this concerns thousands of tourists.

When the same question was considered by the House last year, I described the incomparable charms of this part of the Laurentian hills. The beautiful scenery of this region, the sports and outings which one may enjoy in such healthy and restful surroundings, entice more and more the lovers of nature. And that, notwithstanding the inconveniences of the present system. In fact, those who wish to reach this region are obliged to take the Canadian Pacific trains, from Montreal to St. Jerome, at a place called Montford Junction, and then change to the Canadian National. Notwithstanding these inconveniences, thousands of travellers and tourists, each week, journey to this region, and the government railway, owing to the prevailing conditions, is thereby deprived of a very large revenue.

In spite of what the Minister of Railways stated just now, I cannot believe that the board of management of the National Railways, the government or this House can approve of the sale of this line to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I cannot believe that the government would deprive itself of a paying and profitable line to keep only unprofitable lines which would, each year, further encumber our national budget. I protest, Sir, against the false notion that the government railways cannot and must not exist where the Canadian Pacific Railway desires no competitor. Why should the state forsake its rights and make way to the Canadian Pacific Railway when a national railway is considered an excellent undertaking and it is in the public interest to keep it up? Far be it from my thoughts to deprecate the importance and national usefulness of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I deny the truth of the assertion which seems to have become the pass word of some people, and which is summed up in this idea: No competition against the Canadian Pacific Railway! Private interest must make way to the general welfare, this applies to railways as well as to other questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. PREVOST (Translation): The best argument which can be brought out to show that this line is a paying proposition, and should remain the property of the government, is that the Canadian Pacific Railway considers it sufficiently remunerative to purchase it.

I cannot think of any reason which might militate against the construction of the twelve miles which is under consideration in this resolution. The cost of this branch line would be in the nature of an investment rather than of an expense, for the day when the Laurentian railway will directly connect with Montreal, we shall witness both a large increase in its freight and the growth of its revenues a hundredfold, owing to its passenger traffic, both ordinary travellers and tourists.

Furthermore, the government will be providing a numerous population, with a useful public service and will besides have in operation one of the most important lines of the National Railways, since it places the metropolis in communication with one of our most beautiful and rich regions, and, it will, some day, be the connecting link so much sought for which will unite the metropolis with the Transcontinental that passes to the north of that part of our country.

Mr. ETHIER (Translation): I can but concur, Mr. Chairman, in the remarks made by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Prevost). We are neighbours, and as such, we have always been on very good terms. I intend to continue so, and, in the present circumstances, it is a pleasure for me to support his views. I have no intention of enlarging on the magnificent description that he gave us of the region which the Montfort railway crosses. I shall be content with pointing out to the House a district that he did not mention and through which must pass this twelve mile line of railway, from Grande Fresnière to St. Jerome.

This project, Sir, is not a new idea and even before it was thought of building the branch lines, which are under discussion in the resolutions before the House, the preceding governments had understood the necessity of connecting the main line of the Canadian Northern, from Ottawa to Montreal, with the Ottawa to Quebec line. This project will be realized by the construction of this twelve-mile line, of which eleven miles happen to be in the county of Two Mountains,—which I have the honour to represent —and one mile is in the county of Terrebonne. Thus this railway will connect with the Montfort line, which is already constructed over a distance of thirty miles, as far as Huberdeau, and which it is proposed to extend, by another resolution, to St. Remy of Amherst, for a distance of two miles. I may add, by the way, that the province of Quebec's share is only twenty-nine miles of the proposed railway construction of 965 miles that this House is asked to approve.

I have already mentioned that this project is not a new one and that the late government deemed it proper and necessary to carry out this railway branch line. The government's engineers had made the survey. A number of locations were considered some years ago, and it was decided that the plans prepared by the engineers of the late government should be approved, and eventually they were accepted by the Railway Commission. The land was expropriated. The farmers were paid according to the value of the strip of land needed. Therefore, the only thing to do now is to build. All is ready. The necessary preliminaries to the construction of a railway line have been completed and the project is approved and declared urgent, useful and necessary.

What is, Sir, exactly, this twelve mile region? The main line of the Canadian Northern, between Ottawa and Montreal, crosses, at Hawkesbury, into the county of Argenteuil, and continues to Montreal, passing through the county of Two Mountains, the Grand Fresnière, St. Eustache and Isle Jesus. From the Grand Fresnière to St. Jerome, the distance is twelve miles. There is, at present, no possible means of transportation for freight and passenger traffic in this region situated to the north, on the Ottawa and Quebec line which passes through St. Philip of Argenteuil, Lachute, and continues to St. Canute, in the county of Two Mountains, and thence to St. Jerome, Joliette and Quebec. The traffic of St. Philip of Argenteuil, Lachute, St Canute, and the whole northern line, from Montfort to Grand Mine, must necessarily, to reach Montreal, pass through Joliette, which means a journey of about seventy-four miles more, than if the proposed line was constructed. We are, therefore losing the whole traffic of that region, and, what is more, we are being deprived of the traffic between St. Jerome and Grande Fresnière, of St Canute, St Monique, St Augustin and that of a large part of St. Eustache. If this branch line is built, we shall be connected with the main line of the Canadian Northern, from Montreal to Ottawa, and between the latter line and the main line of the Canadian National from Ottawa to Quebec, so that all traffic which comes from the north, instead of being carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway, will necessarily be transported by the Canadian National Railway from St. Jerome to Grande Fresnière.

Since the outset of this debate, there seems to be a tendency, among certain groups, to raise the question of economy and there are protests of extravagance heard. All members of this House favour economy, but this economy must be justified and to the purpose. Economy can be practised everywhere, even where there are deficits. The directors and the president of the board of management of the National Railways have deemed it their duty to suggest and recommend to the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) and to the government the construction of this branch line. Have not the directors and President of the Canadian National Railways assumed the responsibility to reduce the deficits and increase the revenues?

Well, if we wish to reduce the deficits, we must create the necessary and natural outlets for the traffic by which the Canadian National may profit; and if the railway line of the Canadian National between Montreal and Ottawa does not possess the necessary branch lines to make it pay, we shall always have deficits. The present branch line is the source of the largest revenues of the Canadian National, in the province of Quebec. The extension of this line to Grande Fresnière will still increase its revenues, and thereby, decrease its deficits for that part of the country.

As the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Prevost) stated, negotiations are actually being carried on between the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific Railways; a request on the part of the latter company for the purchase of said railway is officially before the Railway Commission and there seems to be a willingness to carry out the sale.

I think it is in the public interest and for the national welfare as well as in the interest of the county of Two Mountains, that this branch line be constructed. It would pass through very prosperous farming communities in my county. The latter is not a mining district, neither is it an industrial centre, but it is the most essentially farming county of the province of Quebec. This branch line would be passing through, over a distance of eleven miles, a rich, fertile agricultural region which is at a distance from any Canadian Pacific railway station. We would then have a railway line not only very useful to traffic and trade but also to tourists.

The railway between St. Eustache and Montreal is a better paying line, during the summer, owing to the great number of tourists, than the one between Montreal and Ottawa. Let us build this branch line from Grande Fresnière to Rinfret Junction and we shall soon have a considerable increase in traffic and influx of tourists. The branch line which the Canadian Pacific Railway built from St. Jerome to Mont Laurier—first, to Nomininge, thence to Mont Laurier—shows the necessity of developing that northern part of our province. The same benefit will accrue to the Canadian Northern, and even more so, because this northern region is richer in minerals, lumber and farming, than the part which has been opened up, thanks to the efforts of Curé Labelle. It is that northern part of the country which will be the most profitable to the Canadian National. That is why I am not astonished to hear that the Canadian Pacific Railway wants to purchase this branch line. It would give them full control over that part of the province, and they are well aware that such a control would be most profitable. Why then should not our country, the Canadian National and the counties interested, be themselves benefited thereby? I had no intention, Sir, of broaching this subject. I am generally content with listening and weighing what my hon. colleagues have to propose to the House or the government; but regarding this question, I deemed it my duty to clearly bring out the facts as they exist, and this, without hesitation. We protest against this proposed sale of that line to the Canadian Pacific Railway. We are glad to have the Canadian Pacific Railway. The latter plays an important part, which no one will deny, wherever its line runs, however, since the Canadian Pacific Railway comes into competition with the Canadian National, I do not see why, the moment this line is profitable, we should not take advantage of it. I disapprove of any settlement which may be agreed upon by the Railway Commission. Proposals have been made to this commission—I am officially informed. What is the nature of these proposals? I have no knowledge. I hope that as a result of the question which I put to the hon. Minister of Railways, a copy of the correspondence and documents relating to this proposed transaction will be brought down in the House. After giving the question full consideration, I have come to the conclusion that it would be in the interest of this region of the country and of the Canadian National, to build this branch line.

Mr. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I fully concur with the remarks which have just been made by the hon. members for Terrebonne (Mr. Prevost), and Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier). The twelve miles which it is proposed to build are, it is true, in the counties of Terrebonne and Two Mountains, nevertheless—I feel certain—very appreciable advantages would result for the county of Labelle. Indeed, it is a question of adding to the National Railways a branch line partly situated in the county of Terrebonne and partly in that of Labelle. The said branch line—it is known, owing to the resolution which appears further, in the Votes and Proceedings of the House—will be extended for a distance of two miles, from a place called China Clay to the village of St. Remy of Amherst. The advantages which would accrue from the construction of these two miles, in the county of Labelle, would lose a great deal of their value, if we had not—by the resolution which is at present under consideration by the House—the assurance that the Montfort Railway, that is, the line from St. Jerome to Huberdeau, will be connected to the National Railway system, so that the traffic which will be handled in the county of Labelle, along this line, may be in touch with the metropolis of Canada.

I think, Sir, that it would be bad policy for the government to sell this branch line to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have nothing to say against the latter, for it has built, in my district, an extensive railway line, which reaches the settlement situated to the northwest of Montreal, at Mont Laurier The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has greatly contributed to the settling of this northern region of the province of Quebec. The population of Labelle county has still need of this company to further extend its line twenty-seven miles, from Mont Laurier to St. Anne du Lac. I think that it is important for the National Railways to hold on to the present branch line. The Canadian Pacific line, from Montreal to Mont Laurier, has been a paying proposition, and the branch line under discussion will equally be a paying proposition. The line which we intend to finish is not a new one. We are not asking the Minister of Railways or this House to build a new branch line, but simply to complete one which has been in existence for the last forty years, in a settlement where farming, lumber and mining industries thrive. Therefore, the Canadian National line which will extend from Montreal to St Remy of Amherst will certainly be one of the most paying propositions of the National Railways. For a long time past the people in my district have been appealing to the government. Our appeal has been endorsed by the business men of the metropolis. The Boards of Trade of Montreal have often urged this project through resolutions and have requested the minister to complete this line, by the construction of the twelve miles from St Eustache to St Jerome, and by the building of two other miles from China Clay to St Remy of Amherst. On the other hand, I think, the government would be making a great mistake in selling this branch line. For the last ten years the government has been asked to construct a branch line to connect Montreal with the Transcontinental. Charters have been granted and work has been done, such as locating etc. The North Railway was incorporated about ten years ago, and their rights were acquired by the Dominion government with the object—I state again—of constructing this branch line which would link up the metropolis of Canada to the Grand Trunk Pacific. There is no doubt that it is an important question. I think that the members for the city of Montreal would gladly welcome the realization of this project, for the construction of this branch line might result in bringing about later on the building of this other line. I feel certain that these same members are at heart with us when we request the completion of the present branch line because, once finished, it will be a step forward in the direction of the country drained by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. It is the most direct and the most suitable for the purpose of connecting Montreal with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. If the government were to deprive themselves of this railway, in a few years, when this second project will be submitted to them, when the city of Montreal and the western provinces will insist on linking up the Grand Trunk Pacific railway to Montreal, we will find it impossible to carry out the construction of a branch line to connect the Grand Trunk Pacific railway with the National railways. For this reason, I think, the government should hold on to this branch line, but complete it, as I am sure it is their intention. Heretofore, the matter has only been broached between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the representatives of the National Railways. I hope that the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), advised as he has been by my hon. colleagues from Terrebonne and from Two Mountains, and by my humble self, will not go to the extent of closing any arrangement which may at present be under way. I would rather think that he will be on his guard and will preserve this branch line which I believe to be one of the most important of our national system.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have listened to what the three hon. gentlemen who have just spoken have had to say, and I gather that they are absolutely and irretrievably opposed to disposing of this branch line, or any part of it, to anybody. The arguments they have advanced are very strong, and I think they have not overdrawn the possibilities of the country. I will see that the three speeches are placed in the hands of the Canadian National management with instructions to digest them, talk the matter over, and see whether or not an error has been made in entering into these negotiations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister also see that they reach the hands of the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctôt). I notice he is always out of the House when these pro-national railway speeches are made and I would not like him to miss them. While I am on my feet may I ask that the minister put on Hansard Sir Henry Thornton's reasons specially applicable to the building of this line.

Mr. GRAHAM: I shall do so with pleasure. Here is what is proposed, and the justification for it:

Grande Fresniere, Mile 0-12	Cost
Proposed in 1924—12 miles grade; 12 miles track	$357,000

It is proposed in 1924 to grade 12 miles and lay track on it at a cost of $357,000, thus completing this line between Grande Fresniere and Rinfret Junction. The purpose of this line is to shorten the route from the Huberdeau branch and St. Jerome into Montreal. The right of way for this line has already been secured, but no further work has been done on it.

The Huberdeau branch runs into the Laurentian mountains and gives communication to a district which has become one of the important summer tourist and cottage resorts out of Montreal.

The justification for this line lies in the direct passenger connection it will give and also the shortening of the routes for freight by about 34 miles, which will mean considerable economy in operation on present business, besides attracting further business by the better service it will give.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it will help any in giving better memoranda. I would make this comment: Whatever may be the merits of this line the memorandum which the minister has read does not make out a business case for building it. I do not say that a business case cannot be made out, but the memorandum does not do it. Such a memorandum should disclose what saving is going to be effected by the construction of this line; how much freight there is at present, how much more is expected, what the profits on that traffic will be, and the relation the saving will bear to the interest charge on the investment. The memorandum gives expression to certain intentions and hopes that are entertained, but it does not put this proposition on a basis that is at all a business basis.

Mr. GRAHAM: The traffic which has been carried on this line can be given to the House; it will be merely guess work to say what the traffic will be in the future. On the strength of the present traffic an estimate may be made of the saving. It is expected there will be more traffic, otherwise the line would not be constructed. In my experience I have found that forecasts as to future traffic and the profits therefrom are merely estimates and sometimes not very close estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not any here at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: The board of management expects there will be an increase of traffic, and, perhaps a reduction in the rate on the traffic now carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As a matter of fact I would have thought that this was a case where Sir Henry Thornton could have said something tangible and definite in the memorandum. I should have said there was much more merit in the present proposition than in any other so far considered by us. There is no question but that the district is not properly served at the present time. So far as regards the question of sale to the Canadian Pacific railway I am not sufficiently posted to pronounce an opinion one way or the other. However, I do say this to the minister: If anything can be done to avoid senseless and stupid duplications of service and of railways it ought to be done, not only in this particular district but everywhere else.

Mr. BRISTOL: If you were seeking to obtain advances in the money market for enterprises of this character you would have to show, in a very definite way, before you could borrow, what the probable traffic and the financial returns would be.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a good deal of truth in that, if we look at it from one angle; but there devolve upon the Canadian National lines, duties, whether we like this or not, that private companies do not always have to assume. As I said the other afternoon in the House, private companies are altogether at liberty to select their own territory, and to build only those lines in which they will have an immediate profit. I do not say that that is being done; but I say that there are many lines that ought to be constructed with the two-fold object: One in the future—not at present—to give the Canadian National Railways a traffic that belongs to it through a branch-line system, and the other to give service to the people. Notwithstanding what my hon. friend has said, I submit that what is known as a government-owned railway, although under the name of a company, has on it, or the people think it has on it, obligations that are not imposed on a private company. But, turn to the other side. Many private companies are very careful, notwithstanding the fact that present construction will not yield a revenue, to see that they hang on to territory that rightly belongs to them, by the building of branch lines, feeling confident as business men that, in years to come, they will get a return for the present outlay, because if it was not made, the territory might go to some other line. I think I am free to say that very few branch lines that are constructed give immediately a definite return, but if they are not constructed, the trunk line might as well close up.

There is another thing that is not connected with this, but I wish to bring it to my hon. friend's attention. The Grand Trunk Pacific, if it lacks anything, lacks branch lines. That is one of the difficulties which we had in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company during the time of its construction. I am glad to hear the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) say that he feels confident this will be a paying line.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not say that. I said that it was a line that had far more merit in it than many of the others. The district is not properly served.

Mr. GRAHAM: In a degree. I agree with him in that I think this line will bring in a return at once, but it is through an older settled territory, and it is merely cutting off, as I understand the matter, certain undue distances in the transportation of the products of the people in that vicinity.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is one thing that my hon. friend has said that, I think, ought to be challenged at the earliest possible minute. He states that on this system are imposed certain obligations to which private companies are not subject. I am very sorry to hear my hon. friend make that statement. It is the sort of thing we thought we had got rid of and that my hon. friends across the aisle always think they have got rid of. If there be a difference between a private corporation and this corporation that is supposed to be handling this tremendous undertaking as a business concern in trust for all the people, the only real difference, the only possible distinction that can exist is that political motives, political interests and matters of expediency are to be considered, when they would not be considered by proper, decent business men to whom a trust had been confided. I am sorry that my hon. friend says that there is a difference. He endeavours to strengthen his position by saying that lines often have to be built in order to secure territory. I would have thought it would be comparatively easy to-day to save wasting the money of the taxpayers of this country, simply for the purpose of doing something which is said by the minister not to pay, which is said by him will yield no return, will have to be carried for some time without recompense, just in order to prevent somebody else from losing money.

Mr. GRAHAM: I said that private companies did that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would have thought that, not only the country, but the Canadian Pacific itself, had seen by this time the folly of senseless duplications and fighting for territory. Surely this House is not going to be asked to vote untold millions for the construction of branch lines simply to shut out the Canadian Pacific. The Minister of Railways can easily see that an arrangement is made that territories are held for both these systems. He can see to it that the follies of the past are some day to stop; that duplication will cease, not only of services, but of lines, and that there will be some chance for this property to become an earning property. He cannot possibly make it an earning property if the policy he proclaims is followed. If my hon. friend will take hold of this matter with both these managements for the purpose of cutting out, in the first instance, any question of rivalry in building lines that neither can afford under the excuse of holding a territory here or a territory there, and if he will also take up with them the matter of duplication of services which really add nothing whatever to the travelling and shipping facilities of the people, I am confident that something can be done very much more to the advantage of overburdened taxpayers than building railways to beat out the Jones'.

Mr. MARLER: On account of this line being in the province of Quebec and in the vicinity of Montreal, I do not want this resolution to pass without my saying a few words relative thereto. This line is, as I understand the matter, for the purpose of connecting up the present line of the Canadian National at Grande Fresnière to Rinfret Junction, so that there will be a connection from the Tunnel station in Montreal directly into Laurentides. That is the object of the line. The Canadian Pacific running from Place Viger station practically parallels the line at Montfort. The two lines at Montfort, I should imagine are not more than half a mile apart.

Mr. ETHIER: At St. Jerome.

Mr. MARLER: I was saying that the distance between the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National at Montfort Junction is very small.

Mr. ETHIER: Montfort is about twenty-five miles ahead and to the northwest, but at St. Jerome, the lines are parallel for about two or three miles. The Canadian National goes northwest and the Canadian Pacific goes right through to the north.

Mr. MARLER: I quite understand that at the particular point the hon. member speaks about they are close together, and they could be joined up without difficulty. There could be a joint service out of Place Viger station, thus obviating the necessity of building this line at all. It may be perfectly true that the building of this line may give the Canadian National traffic. Many hundreds of people would go from the Tunnel terminal instead of the Place Viger station into this beautiful territory. I admit all that, but the only effect this will have is to take so much traffic from the Canadian Pacific and give it to the Canadian National. If we approach the question of building these branch lines with this object, I have no doubt for a moment that many of these branch lines are justified. I do not approach the question with that object in view at all. When the country is served properly by one railway, one is enough particularly when traffic arrangements can be made—and they undoubtedly can be made—and if they cannot be made, we can pass laws in this parliament to ensure that they are made. If the Canadian Pacific will not make a joint arrangement, we can pass a law to make it do so. So far as I can see, this means simply taking traffic from one line and giving it to another line. As I said at the beginning, I did not want it to be supposed that because this line is in the province of Quebec and serves the city of Montreal, to a certain extent, I would therefore be in favour of it. In fact I oppose it.

Mr. LANCTOT: I was informed a few moments ago that the leader of the opposition, (Mr. Meighen) wanted to know where I was, as I did not happen to be in the chamber. I was called to the door for a few minutes but, as the right hon. gentleman will see, I am back again. I suppose he would like to know where I stand in relation to branch lines. I will tell him, because I am always willing to satisfy the hon. gentleman on questions relating to the railways. The leader of the opposition is the person who was instrumental in this country becoming the owners of nearly all the railways in Canada, and as I did not support him at that time I do not intend to endorse any of his views to-day. I have been asked on many occasions by my right hon. friend whether I had increased or reduced my price in this matter. During the campaign of 1921, it is true, in my county I told my constituents that I was ready to sell out the whole thing for a dollar. But when I so stated I included in that offer the outstanding guarantee by this government in connection with our purchase of all the railways in Canada, and that was more than a dollar. I understand that we have to meet certain liabilities in connection with the purchase of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk and all other lines. This country still owes a considerable sum on the railways. I believe that some $167,000,000 has been paid already on the Transcontinental line, and the Intercolonial railway has also been paid for. But the purchase of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern still involves a heavy liability on the country. So that when I embraced all these liabilities in the offer I made, of one dollar for the whole thing, I think I was making rather a good bargain in the interests of the country. In my opinion the country would be better off if it could dispose of the railways. As regards branch lines, I do not intend to say anything, because it seems to me that the three parties are apparently willing to support public ownership of railways at the present time. I differ from them all.

An hon. MEMBER: There is a fourth party.

Mr. LANCTOT: A fourth, and a fifth if you like, if I am the only man who is prepared to oppose this policy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I feel a great deal better now that I have heard the last word from the hon. member (Mr. Lanctot). What I was anxious about was that the speeches that had just been delivered should be placed before him for consideration, knowing how long and ardently he has desired to sell the National railway for a dollar, or a song, or anything. I wonder what he thinks of his colleagues from Quebec who are protesting against selling even a mile. Even in order to save a further expenditure of some hundreds of thousands of dollars they would not think of selling a small branch to the Canadian Pacific Railway. However, the hon. gentleman is frank enough to come and tell us that he stands solidly in his opposition to public ownership even if he has to form a sixth party.

Mr. LANCTOT: Yes, and even if I have to stand alone.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31 respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Grande Fresnière and Rinfret Junction, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUNNYBRAE-GUYSBORO

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction of a Canadian National Railway line from Sunnybrae to Guysboro, in the province of Nova Scotia; estimated mileage including existing grading, 67 miles; estimated cost, $3,500,000.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: This proposal has a somewhat lengthy history. I will read the memoradum placed in my hands by the Canadian National Railways:

Sunnybrae. Mile 0—67	Cost
Proposed in 1924—nil..	$ ....
Proposed in 1925—67 miles grade..	2,300,000
Proposed in 1926—67 miles track..	1,200,000

In 1924 no actual work of construction is proposed, but final surveys will be run and in 1925, it is the intention to do the grading on the 67 miles from Sunnybrae to Guysboro at a cost of $2,300,000, and in 1926 to lay the track and complete the line to Guysboro at a cost that year of $1,200,000.

The purpose of the line is to open up the local territory for lumber industry and provide better facilities for agricultural products as well as give direct communication to Guysboro for its fishing and allied products. On part of the route there is considerable agricultural development, and quite extensive hardwood forests which the railway will make it possible to develop.

The original intention of the survey for this line had in view a low grade line with the idea of making it the main line. The results of the surveys indicated that to obtain this character of line it would be very costly, and on account of the fact that the present main line could not be abandoned, and would have to be maintained and operated, it could not be shown that such a line, with its excessive cost of construction would be justified. The present intention is to construct a line to open up the local territory and build it to cheaper standards of construction, but keep in view the eventual use of it for an alternative main line at any time this would be warranted. Therefore, the line will be located so that eventually a low grade could be obtained, but employ steeper grades for the immediate construction.

It has been estimated that there are 250 million feet of hardwood and 200 million feet of softwood available to the line, and also some possibilities in gold and iron mining which have not been developed, possibly due to lack of transportation facilities.

The justification for this line is that it will serve a section of the country that has been in long need of railway communication in order to give it a real chance for development and to put the town of Guysboro in direct rail communication with the Canadian National System.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that from Sir Henry Thornton?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is from the board.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Referred to in Sir Henry Thornton's letter.

Mr. GRAHAM: Now perhaps the House will bear with me while I give a little history of this matter. I think all the governments of which my hon. friend and myself have been members have had this railway problem before them. I have a memorandum here taken from Hansard giving a little history of it. On August 12, 1911, the Department of Railways called for tenders, by public advertisement, for a branch line of railway from Guysborough to Sunnybrae through Country Harbour Cross Roads, with an extension from Country Harbour Cross Roads to deep water of Country Harbour.

Tenders were to be received by September 15, and, on September 30, the Minister of Railways recommended to council the acceptance of the tender of the Nova Scotia Construction Company, Limited, of Sydney, at $1,057,122. The order in council adopting this recommendation bears date October 2, 1911.

Change of government was effected on or about October 10, 1911, and, on February 10, 1912, an order in council was passed containing the following paragraph:

No formal contract has been made or prepared and it is now considered desirable to abandon the project of constructing this branch line at present, and to cancel such contract as may have been created by the above-mentioned acceptance of the company's tender.

The supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1916, contained the following item in vote No. 465, Railways and Canals, chargeable to capital, Intercolonial railway:

"Branch line from Sunnybrae to Mulgrave, $1,000,000."

This was in consequence of a statement by Mr. Cochrane, as Minister of Railways, to parliament, on March 25, 1915,—Hansard page 1468:

The line is to run from Sunnybrae, and down to the ferry there, with a branch up to Guysborough. It is not definitely settled yet to which point it will go, or whether it will go to Guysborough and Country Harbour. When the supplementary estimates come down there will be an appropriation for starting the work.

Subsequently the Minister of Railways brought down a plan of the proposed Guysborough branch and a memorandum which is to be found in Hansard, page 1700, March 29, 1915, reads as follows:

Re Guysborough subdivision—Intercolonial railway

The proposed railway extends from Sunnybrae to Mulgrave by way of Guysborough. Preliminary surveys have been made which indicate that the railway can be built on a maximum grade of five-tenths per cent westbound.

The details of the surveyed routes, is from Sunnybrae to lake Eden, thence down the East river St. Mary to post near Country Harbour Cross Roads, thence east along the valley of the Salmon river to Guysborough harbour, along the shores of Chedabucto bay and straits of Canso to Mulgrave.

The line is about eighty-eight miles in length. The distance from Truro to Mulgrave by way of Guysborough is 137 miles. The distance from Truro to Mulgrave by the present line is 122.3. The distance from Sunnybrae to Guysborough is sixty-five miles.

The object of the proposed railway is first to give transportation facilities to the central portion of Guysborough county and the port of Guysborough, and second to construct that railway with such grades as to make it the economical route for heavy traffic to and from Cape Breton over which it will be possible to haul practically double the amount of tonnage that can be hauled by the same power over the present line, which provides a great economy in operating expenses although the distance is increased about fifteen miles.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: These remarks would not apply to this line.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, a good portion of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was the line to Mulgrave to reduce grades.

Mr. GRAHAM: Let me put this on Hansard. This is what happened. This is dated March 25, 1915, and I read the following discussion from Hansard:

Mr. Sinclair: The Country Harbour branch was a part of the route as originally projected, and I want to ask the minister if he includes it in the present proposal. It is not in the mileage given.

Mr. Cochrane: Ultimately, yes, because the plan shows both places.

Mr. Sinclair: Is it on the plan?

Mr. Cochrane: Yes.

Mr. Sinclair: But you are not proposing to build it now?

Mr. Cochrane: Not until later on. I think the other road is the more important. The million dollars that I told my hon. friend would be included in the supplementary estimates will not be expended on that portion of the road at this time.

Mr. Sinclair: When does the minister propose to build the Country Harbour branch?

Mr. Cochrane: As soon as we can. I brought the map to show the hon. gentleman the whole scheme that is proposed.

Mr. Sinclair: It will be a great disappointment to the people on that part of the coast of Nova Scotia when they learn that the Country Harbour branch is dropped out of the proposal.

Mr. Cochrane. It is not dropped out of the proposal. I brought the map and the hon. gentleman can see that the road goes to both places, but I do not want to mislead him by saying that we are going to start on the branch to Country Harbour this year.

Mr. Sinclair: I quite understand that. The point I made is that while it is on the map it is not included in the minister's present proposal.

Mr. Cochrane: It certainly is a part of the proposal. The scheme as laid out includes branches from Sunnybrae to Country Harbour and Guysborough.

Out of the vote mentioned $22,000 was expended in surveys, and in the following year $978,000 was voted in the Intercolonial railway estimates of 1916-17, as found on page 52 of the estimates of that year. Then at page 2,767 of Hansard, April 11, 1916, Mr. Graham asked as to the condition of the line for which this money was being voted, and Dr. Reid who was Acting Minister of Railways in the absence of Mr. Cochrane through illness, replied as follows:

The length of this line is 93.18 miles. The object of the proposed railway is, first, to give transportation facilities to the central portion of Guysborough county and to open up and develop this portion of the country; and, second, to construct the line with .6 grade eastbound and westbound that will serve as a low grade route for the traffic from the Sydneys, Cape Breton and Newfoundland. By building the railway on the grade mentioned this traffic, which consists largely of steel products, can be handled more economically than over the present route. During the present year location surveys and plans have been completed but no construction work has been started. The amount voted in 1915-16 was $1,000,000, and the estimated expenditure out of that amount was $22,000, leaving to be revoted the amount of the present vote, $978,000.

Mr. Sinclair: When does the minister intend to build this railway?

Mr. Reid: Just as soon as financial conditions will admit of it, it is the intention of the government to build this line.

I might say in short that that is the history of the line. It was in the programme for Nova Scotia which was started in 1910 or 1911, but this line was dropped after 1911 with several of the others, and only one item in the programme was proceeded with, if I remember correctly. That is the history of this proposal, and I submit it to the House for favourable consideration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am going to ask my hon. friend to take particular care to let us have all the correspondence in connection with this line and all the reports the department now has. I am quite convinced that, if he will read them through, he will never ask the House to give it any further consideration. As the minister says, this is an old line. It is old although never built. It is old in the sense of the consideration that has been given it by politicians practically since confederation. I do not think there has ever been a local election fought in Nova Scotia, that this line has not been used one way or the other for the purpose of getting votes. There was a time when the local government undertook to build it, and ran through an election on the claim that they were going to build it. I forget whether that was once or twice. It happened at least once, and the local government being returned, of course did not build it. No one would ever build it. The only possible reason for building the line down there would be that referred to in Hansard of 1916 by the then Minister of Railways, the Hon. Mr. Cochrane. It was conclusively proved that the present main line had very bad grades; and if there were any way of helping those grades something would be gained. The whole idea was to help those grades. The Hon. Dr. Reid was concerned in it and, following as best I could what the minister said, I think he made exactly the same point, that the grades were bad and it would be a great thing if we could get better grades. That is not the present proposition. Even if that had been the present proposition, it is something which the country to-day unless we have all taken leave of our senses would never go into. It never would think of it for one minute. What would be thought of opening up a line of railway which will do nothing to overcome the admitted difficulties in connection with the main line grades? I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that there is no justification whatever for the building of this line, apart from political purposes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Is my hon. friend not aware that, in addition to the record of his own party and of ministers of railways between 1911 and 1917, the Canadain National Railway board, when presided over by Mr. Hanna, recommended the construction of this road?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is entirely misinformed. Mr. Hanna's board turned down the proposal.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I make the statement on the faith of communications to the public press made by Colonel Thomas Cantley, my opponent in Pictou county in the last election, who was a member of the board over which Mr. Hanna presided. I think his authority is as good as my hon. friend's.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite content to take it that way, but my very strong recollection is that at the time that matter was discussed, and it was discussed more than once, Mr. Hanna took the strongest possible grounds against the proposal. At any rate, if he did not, he ought to have done so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): They are all wrong but you.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is pleased to be facetious.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No, you are.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows very well that if this line is built it will never pay.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I know nothing of the sort.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I do not think my hon. friend has studied the question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I know more about it than you do.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course it is a thing that comes up in connection with the exigencies of Nova Scotia politics from time to time.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Not at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When the local government down there gets tired of this football; when it wins some elections by it and then refuses to go on and build the line, we have it transferred here just at the right time, just before the Dominion election—

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh no—a long way off.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In 1911, not so very long before the Dominion election, for the purposes of Nova Scotia politics we have this old horse trotted out to serve for just another term. Of course the contracts were not awarded; of course the tenders were not to be considered until after the elections were over, and then the contracts were awarded in the full knowledge that any sane government would probably disallow the proposal, as actually happened. I do not believe Sir Henry Thornton is very wise in recommending this thing in the way he does. We have not the slightest traffic study; the matter is not presented from the proper business viewpoint, although it is from a man alleged to be, as I believe he is, a business man. We have simply the vaguest, wishy-washiest kind of suggestion that this line should be built—that is all. I am going to ask my hon. friend to bring down the files that have to do with this matter so that they may be open to the inspection of members.

Mr. McISAAC: The hon. gentleman speaks about what has happened in Nova Scotia in reference to this proposed road, and he has said several times that the building of this road was promised by the local government. He shows a lack of knowledge of the political history of Nova Scotia when he forgets that the Hanna board of which Colonel Cantley was a member and which was functioning during the regime of the government of which my hon. friend was a member, recommended the construction of this road. But to-day my hon. friend denies that, and says that the question has been made a political football.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No one denied it.

Mr. McISAAC: My hon. friend denies that the Hanna board made that recommendation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I never said anything of the kind. I was speaking of Mr. Hanna.

Mr. McISAAC: That is what he said first, when the hon. member for Pictou corrected him. He says this has been made a political football in Nova Scotia for many years. Well, if it has, the game has been played by both sides, Conservative as well as Liberal, and one of the chief men at the bat was Sir Robert Borden. In 1910 both political parties in this House agreed that branch railways should be constructed in non-railway counties in Nova Scotia. The following resolution was passed in that year:

5 p.m.

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived in the commercial and industrial development of the province of Nova Scotia when the Intercolonial Railway of Canada should be extended into the non-railway counties of the eastern section of that province.

That resolution was agreed to both by the Conservative party, led by Sir Robert Borden at the time, and by the Liberal party. Then Sir Robert Borden made a speech in the House; it is reported at page 1182 of Hansard of 1910. I ask my hon. friend to pay attention to this; it is not the statement of a Liberal who is making a political football of the matter. Sir Robert Borden said on that occasion:

I passed along the shore of the county of Halifax to the county of Guysborough last summer. I travelled altogether about 500 miles through districts not served by railways at all, and where railway development would mean a great deal to the people and lead to considerable development in that little province. I can tell the Minister of Railways—

The present Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) was Minister of Railways at that time also.

—a great many things I saw, I could speak of a great many districts where railway facilities might mean a great deal to the people, and might lead to very great progress and advancement in that little province. I saw, in the county of Guysborough, just across the line from the county of Halifax—

Represented by himself.

—one of the most splendid harbours that can be found anywhere in the world—Country harbour. This harbour stretches back ten miles from its mouth, with water close up to the shore everywhere from forty-five to sixty feet in depth, landlocked twice, and with a splendid roadstead outside, where, in almost any weather, ships can ride in safety—and have ridden in safety without going inside. And in what condition did I find the place? Not more than a dozen families are living around that harbour. There was no railway development, no opportunity for commerce, and the fishermen had gone to the adjoining Isaac's harbour or Fishermen's harbour, for the reason that these smaller harbours would subserve their purposes better than this magnificent Country harbour of which I have spoken. All along that shore are opportunities of development. The people of Halifax county, as well as those of Guysborough county, and those of other counties in the province of Nova Scotia to which allusion has been made, have, it seems to me, fairly good reason to complain that their interests in respect of railway development have not been properly attended to in the past.

Then he concludes:

This is no time for hesitation and vacillation. Make up your mind—and I hope you have made it up in the direction I have indicated; then, give to the Intercolonial the branches, feeders, extensions which would be given if it were owned by any of the great railway corporations.

Now, that was in 1910.

Mr. GRAHAM: That was directed to myself, was it not?

Mr. McISAAC: Yes, directed to yourself as Minister of Railways by Sir Robert Borden.

The hon. member for West York, (Sir Henry Drayton) who was not then in the House but who since pretends to have learned a great deal about the political history of Nova Scotia, did not know what had happened.

Before I conclude I want to put on Hansard the letter from Colonel Cantley, so that hon. members may have the facts before them and so that the hon. member for West York will have some knowledge of the matter; for he shows a great lack of knowledge in connection with this railway. This proposal is entirely different from the others which were discussed to-day and the other day. The proposed road does not parallel any existing road. It does not interfere with the Canadian Pacific railway at all, because there is no Canadian Pacific railway in the county of Guysborough, nor any other railway. That county extending from the eastern part of Halifax county to the strait of Canso, about 150 miles long and from 20 to 75 miles in width, is without any railway except where the Canadian National touches the extreme northeastern end of the county at the strait of Canso. It is the second or third largest county in the province of Nova Scotia. The area of the county of Guysborough itself is something like 2,000 square miles. It has magnificent lumber areas. It has been estimated that there is between forty and fifty million dollars worth of lumber in Guysborough county to-day, which cannot be taken out on account of the lack of railway facilities, and on the Sunnybrae branch, between the county of Guysborough and the Intercolonial railway, in Pictou county, it is estimated that there is from four to five times that value in timber, which cannot be taken out without this road.

The fresh fish industry also cannot be developed unless there is quick transportation. Along that coast of 150 miles lies one of the greatest fishing grounds anywhere in the world, but it is entirely impossible to have a development of the fresh fish industry without quick transportation. To show you how this fish industry can be developed. In 1895 the federal government, and I think the provincial government of Nova Scotia, subsidized a small boat to run daily between Canso in the eastern end of Guysborough county, and Mulgrave, a distance of 27 miles. This daily steamer was put on for the purpose of testing what could be done in the shipment of fresh fish, and I will show you what the result has been. In 1895 the number of tons of fresh fish shipped was 790, and the expressage paid $4,805; 1896, 900 tons, expressage paid, $6,460. I will not give the figures for every year, but in 1905 the number of tons had increased to 2,201, and the expressage paid to $23,000; in 1917, 11,831 tons of fresh fish were shipped from Canso alone, and the expressage paid was $110,483. I have not the figures up to the present time, but I know that they show an increase year by year over the figures I have given and I am quite safe in saying that to-day at least 20,000 tons of fresh fish are shipped from Canso alone to the Intercolonial railway, and considering the increase in freight rates I am quite sure that the expressage paid would be over $200,000. I am only citing that as an illustration of what might be done in developing the fresh fish trade of Guysborough county if we had a railway passing through it from Sunnybrae to Guysborough and later on to the strait of Canso. When that road is built it will shorten the distance between the prairie provinces by 75 to 100 miles; that is the short line from Oxford Junction down to Sunnybrae and Country Harbour would shorten the distance by at least 75 to 100 miles. As Sir Robert Borden said, and as is admitted by everybody, Guysborough has the finest and best harbour in the world, Country Harbour.

I am going to read a letter written by Colonel Thomas Cantley to the Montreal Gazette, appearing in its issue of March 12 last, and I will ask the House to bear with me patiently, because I do not take up much of its time. Colonel Cantley was the Conservative candidate for the county of Pictou at the last general election; he was also a member of the Hanna National Railway Board up to the time he resigned; so we can have no better authority on this question; I think he will satisfy even the hon. member for Toronto and any other doubting Thomas on the other side of the House. This letter was written after a survey had been made of this line, and after Colonel Cantley had travelled with the engineer over every foot of the proposed line from Sunnybrae to Guysborough and Mulgrave. He says:

A Needed Branch Line

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—In your issue of February 20th last is an article entitled "C.N.R. Branch Lines will be introduced."

With a portion of the article I have no particular concern, but when you there state that "the Guysboro road was especially condemned, having been rejected by every government for thirty years. It would cost $7,000,000, and there would be an annual deficit of not less than $500,000," I must protest. The statement that the construction of the road was rejected by every government for thirty years is in direct conflict with the facts.

If you will consult parliamentary history you will learn that the Laurier government in 1910-11 called for tenders for the construction of the Guysboro road, after which a contract for the construction of a considerable portion of the line was entered into, and held the contractor's deposit, which accompanied the tender. Subsequent to the change of government in 1911 the incoming Minister of Railways, Hon. Frank Cochrane, after keeping the contractors and the people of Guysboro in suspense for about a year, finally cancelled the contract for construction and returned the contractor's deposit. At about the same time the minister entered into a contract for the construction of seventy miles of railway in the county of Halifax, from Dartmouth to Stewart, the county of Halifax being then represented by the Premier, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden. This road was designed to give railway advantages to the fertile valley of Musquodoboit, but the road built stopped short of reaching a most important section of the valley and really ended nowhere.

Later the Guysboro railway project had the attention of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway when, during 1919-1920, the president instructed the chief engineer to investigate the matter thoroughly and report. In pursuance of these instructions the engineer personally spent some time in the district and travelled with the writer over the whole course of the projected route. Some possible changes in alignment were then suggested and these later were thoroughly gone over by survey parties when the further data secured resulted in the adoption of some changes in location. After a full and exhaustive report had been put before the board as to the cost of the road, the gradients and the economies to be expected from its construction, the board, on the advice of the chairman, resolved to proceed with the construction of the road, and recommended that a contract be given for the building of the first section of twenty-five miles eastward from Sunnybrae, and that the work be immediately proceeded with.

The decision of the board was vetoed on the ground of financial stringency by the then treasury board of the cabinet. From these facts it is established that the Guysboro railway was not condemned by every government, but on the other hand had the support and direct approval of the Laurier government, and later also of the C.N.R. President and Board of Directors after the engineers of the board had given the matter the fullest consideration.

As to the matter of the necessity for and policy governing the construction of branch lines connecting with the C.N.R. in the West, a good deal of sound argument can be submitted. While all the branch lines projected, most of which were undertaken by the Canadian Northern management, but not completed, are not of equal importance to the successful operation of the C.N.R., some of them are doubtless necessary as feeders and the delay in their completion has adversely affected earning power of the C.N.R. Most of the settlers in the country which they should serve settled there on the clearly-stated undertaking by the Canadian Northern management that the branches would be at once begun and pushed to completion, which promise was not effectively carried out.

But it is not the western branch lines which particularly interest me, but the Sunnybrae railway, and the general treatment of the province of Nova Scotia as regards railway construction, and the unfair treatment accorded this province in view of its contribution to the general railway expenditure of Canada, and our proportion of the enormous commitments due to the taking over of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk Pacific and Grand Trunk Railways, none of the mileage of which lie within or are of any direct material benefit to the province of Nova Scotia.

The importance of the proposed so-called Guysboro railway is due to two facts, in some respects quite distinctly different, while the road from Sunnybrae to Guysboro will be of distinct advantage to the latter point, and the southeastern coast of Nova Scotia generally, Guysboro county particularly, which has today not a single mile of railway. The continuance of the road beyond Guysboro to Mulgrave, thus permitting of the diverting of the traffic now passing over the New Glasgow to Mulgrave line, and the saving to be effected thereby, is the real, important factor, which abundantly warrants the building of the line, as is well known, to all intimately associated with that portion of the C.N.R. between New Glasgow and Mulgrave.

It is a matter of common knowledge that derailments have caused and are still causing grave anxiety to the operating management and the travelling public. Accidents have been numerous owing to the gradient and alignment of the road. The grades in places amount to nearly two per cent, and are such that drivers must rush down a hill to acquire momentum to carry them over the next crest. The bottom of most of the grades are reverse curves, with their tendency toward derailment. Train wreckage with destruction of rolling stock and damage to goods has for years been heavy on the section.

For years there has been an average monthly deficit of over $50,000 on operating due to adverse physical conditions, as exemplified by the fact that a locomotive which will haul four thousand tons on the prairie sections of the C.N.R. will with difficulty handle less than one-quarter of that tonnage between Mulgrave and New Glasgow. For quite ten years a continuous and effective effort has been made by the engineering department of the eastern division to obtain a better alignment of this important eighty-mile section. Numerous engineering parties examined the whole extent of the road and, after the best trial line diversions were worked out, these departing from the present alignment at some fourteen different points, and giving an increase in the length of the road of sixteen miles, the proposed diversion still offered at best a gradient of 1.68 per cent.

In view of this result the expenditure of any considerable sum in changing the existing alignment was unanimously considered unwarranted, and it was proven beyond dispute that the only real cure for the difficulty, so far as heavy freight was concerned, was to abandon the New Glasgow-Mulgrave section for all through traffic, and extend the New Glasgow-Sunneybrae line through Guysboro to Mulgrave, where a first-class alignment could be obtained with grades not exceeding .06 going easterly and .05 coming westerly from Cape Breton—the alignment and grades on the proposed line being equal to those of the best divisions of the C.N.R. system. The length of the extension Sunnybrae to Guysboro and on to Mulgrave road would be ninety-three miles.

The engineers' estimate of the total cost at present prices, inclusive of right of way, land damages, railway stations, water tanks, sidings, telegraph and telephone system, and all other accessories whatsoever for $8,556,000, or $82,000 per mile.

The engineer data, including profile, position of bridges, sidings, water tanks, and every construction detail of that character, is complete and on file in the railway offices, Moncton. The yardage of all cuttings, fills, cost of bridges, etc., has been calculated, and the plans and data are so complete that contracts for the construction of any section of the whole line could be given by the railway management at any time such was ordered.

As to the necessity for improvement in the existing through traffic facilities, passing over the New Glasgow-Mulgrave section of the railway, it may be pointed out that the great traffic producer for the C.N.R. system in the Maritime provinces is the coal, iron and steel trade of Cape Breton and Pictou county, while all the raw material for the New Glasgow mills and forges must pass over this New Glasgow-Mulgrave section—the present grades of which are up to and exceeding, in some cases, two per cent. All trains leaving Mulgrave must have the aid of pusher engine for some miles westward.

If the traffic is diverted at Mulgrave over the proposed Guysboro-Mulgrave-Sunneybrae railway to the junction of the latter at Ferrona, New Glasgow, Pictou county, and assuming the traffic as eight trains of five hundred tons and four trains of one thousand tons daily, handling, say, sixteen thousand tons on this new line, with a .06 grade instead of the present New Glasgow-Mulgrave two per cent, and over grade, and using the capitalization values laid down by the American Railway Engineers' Association Committee, the result of the comparison using Ferrona Junction as a common point, would be a capitalization of $9,540,000. The new lines have been estimated to cost $8,500,000, therefore, it would be cheaper to build and operate by an amount of roughly $1,000,000.

Further comparison is made by assuming a considerable increase in tonnage over that at present carried which in vew of all the factors involved, and the advantages flowing out of better railway conditions, and the development in Eastern Nova Scotia, which would seem warranted, shows the new line as giving a capitalization of say $14,307,000 saving over operations of the present New Glasgow-Mulgrave line, so that with a capital expenditure of $8,500,000 for the new line, there would be a saving equal to the capitalized value of $5,800,000, to build and operate the new line.

Other calculations have been made taking New Glasgow as the common point, while still others provide for the routing of the traffic across Pictou Harbour, thence to a point on the C.N.R. at or between Amherst or Moncton, throughout which a continuous grade of about one-half per cent, could be secured, resulting in some saving in mileage, and the enormous advantage of a gradient of practically .05 as against the climbing of two mountain ranges. Gordon Summit and the Folleigh, with elevations of 566 and 612 feet, respectively, over tide water at New Glasgow.

So far we have dealt only with advantages to the railway from lower cost of transportation. The possibilities of traffic on the proposed new section of line are good, the resources are agriculture, lumber and fishing. The forest resources of Guysboro are among the most valuable in the province of Nova Scotia. Fifteen years ago these were valued at $20,000,000, which valuation would be nearly doubled at the present time. The value of the timber contiguous to the Guysboro line between Sunneybrae and the Guysboro-Pictou county line would many times exceed that figure. In this section lumber is now being transported by teams for distances of up to fifteen miles to railway.

With the railway passing through Country Harbor and Guysboro, the fresh fish industry could be centralized, and an extensive trade carried on. Were an efficient daily fresh fish service inaugurated from Guysboro and Country Harbor over the proposed road through to Montreal, there is no doubt that within a very short time of its inauguration, sufficient traffic would be offered to warrant a daily express fish service of twelve to fifteen cars, which could run through to Montreal as a solid, Maritime fish express.

These, sir, are some of the facts bearing on the necessity for and the desirability of proceeding at once with the so-called Guysboro road scheme, which the February 20th article states was especially condemned, having been rejected by every government for thirty years, which statement I know from your well-known public spirit and sense of fairness, you will now abandon with the amende honorable.

THOS CANTLEY.

New Glasgow, N.S., March 8, 1924.

[Mr. McIsaac.]

My hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) must have read the article in the Gazette to which this letter is a reply. Under the circumstances I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything further. If the necessity for this road has not been proven by the explanation of the Minister of Railways and the few remarks made by myself, surely the statement of Colonel Cantley will convince any person here of the merits of this enterprise and the necessity for its being carried to completion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite willing to admit at once that I never read the letter; but after having heard it read, I find I am entirely right in my statement. The whole argument in that letter is to get rid of the old grade, to get a new line. It is a line to Mulgrave. This is a line to the sea. I am afraid there is nothing to take back. I am quite content to leave this whole matter in the hands of the minister if he will ask Mr. Hanna if he ever recommended such a line and if he is in favour of it to-day.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does my hon. friend say that what Colonel Cantley said was untrue?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I said nothing of the kind. My hon. friend knows I did not say that. I said that it was a line to Mulgrave. This is a line to the sea.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend disputes the accuracy of the statement that the board presided over by Mr. Hanna had recommended the construction of a railway from Sunnybrae through the county of Guysborough—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To Mulgrave.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Not necessarily to Mulgrave. My hon. friend had better read the letter of his friend, Colonel Cantley and find out if he does not speak of railway construction having been adopted by the board of which he was a member, and the only reason why it was not adopted by the government led by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition (Mr. Meighen), was the decision that was come to by the treasury board of the cabinet. That was the reason. I do not know why my hon. friend should take this position of antagonism to a project which has so many merits and which ought to be constructed in the interest of the Canadian National Railways and of the country. We in Nova Scotia occupy a very peculiar position, in that it was uttered or written by Sir Henry Thornton. It dodged details at every turn. I want simply the details. Put them on record, and let us have something to try out the capacity of the board. Then we can vote with at least some semblance of intelligence. If we proceed on the present path we vote simply on the romance of Hansard.

Mr. HANSON: One sympathizes with a county the size of Guysborough, on account of the fact that it has no railway communication, but I think that we cannot afford to spend the large sum of three and a half million dollars on the mere question of sentiment, strong as sentiment may be. I should like to call the attention of the committee to a statement made by the Minister of National Defence to the effect that the road was not proceeded with in 1916 because of the financial condition of the country, and I should like to put this question to my hon. friend: Does he, or do the members on the Treasury benches, consider for a moment, that the financial condition of this country is comparably as good as it was in 1916? Does he think that a burden that was too great in 1916 is a small burden to-day? I do not think the taxpayers of the country consider that it is. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman himself gives the best reason why this vote should not be given in this year of grace 1924, when he says that the burden was too great in 1916; and I think it follows, as night follows day, that everybody will agree the burden is too great to-day, if you are viewing the matter from the standpoint of national economics and national burdens. What is said in favour of this resolution? My hon. colleague from St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter) has, I think, with a great deal of force exposed the fallacy of the argument which has been used in support of the proposal, but he has not given all the local conditions. It is true that the people living in the interior of the country are without railway communication, but he forgot to tell the committee that the people who live along the coast line of that county—and I venture to say that the great mass of population in that county live along the coast line—are for the most part served, and fairly well served, with a subsidized steamship service which this government and the country help to pay for and maintain.

The fishing industry has been referred to, and I say that the strongest argument that can be used in support of this line is that the fishing industry can be developed and well served by the establishment of a steamship service to and from Canso and along this coast.

Something has been said with respect to the great timber resources of that country. I happen to know a little about the timber resources of that country. A company in which I am interested owns in fee simple a very considerable portion of the area covered with timber. I say to hon. members of this House that, in so far as soft-wood lumber is concerned, I doubt if any of that lumber, except for the purely local market, will ever be moved by rail. You have only to go to a good-sized atlas and observe the fact that that portion of the province of Nova Scotia, and in fact I might say all portions of Nova Scotia, are very well watered, that there are numerous drivable and floatable streams, and that the timber will inevitably be brought to tidewater by the floating process, and there manufactured and shipped by water, either to the markets of Great Britain; or to the New England states. These are the only two markets that are available, and I happen to know that this very property to which I refer was always operated in that way in the hands of previous owners, and will be operated in the future by the present owners in exactly the same way. It is the only commercially profitable way in which to handle a timber limit like this. Then my hon. friend speaks of the immense quantity of hardwood lumber. Does my hon. friend know that the day has not arrived, so far as eastern Canada is concerned, when it is commercially profitable to manufacture and sell hardwood lumber?

People have tried it. Men well experienced in the lumber manufacturing business have tried it, and I say there is absolutely nothing in the hon. minister's contention that this is desirable from the standpoint of the lumber industry. The most important argument in favour of this vote is from the standpoint of the fisheries. That is the strong argument, and I advise my hon. friends on the opposite side who are anxious to see the vote go through to stick to that as the test. It has more merit than the argument in regard to the timber business. I do not know that the country is specially concerned with what transpired in 1911, or even in 1915 or 1916, to which reference has been made, but I would like this committee and the country to understand that the proposal before parliament to-day is an entirely different one from that before parliament in 1911, or even 1916, as I understand the present resolution and the resolution of 1916. The former resolution had merits from the standpoint of the betterment of the line of railway, and it is a like to base any action upon any representations that he might have made. But I assume that Colonel Cantley was, and probably he was, more reliable than my hon. friend; I assume that his letter is correct. I heard it read but I could not distinguish the words and so I do not know what the contents were. I was present during the reading of it, and while I do not know just what it stated, I am assuming that it was correct. But I challenge the building of this or any other railway upon any statement, however convinced the writer may be, unless that writer is in a position in which he is responsible to the people of Canada for the conduct of their railway business. My hon. friends who quote Colonel Cantley to-day took good care that he did not remain to give advice in regard to the railways. They did not trust him.

Mr. COPP: He resigned.

Mr. BAXTER: Well, it is to be hoped that some other members of the board will resign for a similar laudable purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM: He resigned and got out, and the Minister of National Defence kept him out.

Mr. HANSON: He did resign; for once the Secretary of State is right.

Mr. BAXTER: Assuming that the things in Colonel Cantley's letter are correct, he alone cannot be the depository of that information. It must be known to others; it must be a matter of absolute record with the Railway Board; it must be known to Sir Henry Thornton or be under his control. And what I think the people of Canada want to-day with reference to each and every one of these votes is not a swapping of passages from Hansard, is not a reference to people who are not in this House, is not a reference to people who are not the controlling board of the railways, but rather a statement in detail of the cost and the anticipated revenue which will come from the expenditure of public money. We are surely down to the day of business in the matter of our railways, regardless of the political fortunes of any party. I am not going to draw the line even there, however, and say that I would not support an expenditure for a branch line which on the face of it would be a non-paying or an actually losing proposition. I can see, in regard to many of these resolutions, which I shall not debate seriatim, that there are some in connection with which, certain moneys having been already expended, it would be far more wasteful to discontinue operations and so destroy what already exists, when the spending of a comparatively small amount would complete the work. Then there are other cases, more particularly in the West, where it would be bad policy not to reach out and help to develop the country so as to retain the people who are already there and bring in others to promote the general prosperity. That will be good business, looking to the future. But it should not be a matter of my judgment based upon a bundle of assertions made from all sides of the House; it should be a matter of judgment based upon responsible reports from the responsible people whom the country has put in charge of the railways. And that information up to the present time is absolutely lacking.

The hon. member (Mr. Carroll) read what seemed to be an interesting statement although I could catch only a few words occasionally on this side of the House. I thought I caught some reference to the amount of steel that would be handled. That is precisely the sort of information I want to see in Sir Henry Thornton's report; I should like to have an estimate of the number of tons of steel that will in all probability be transported by such a line, the revenue that will be derived, the cost of transporting, and all contrasted with the existing line. Let us have information of that character. Is that an unreasonable request? We cannot check up the truth or accuracy of that information, but this House and the country can, if the railway board is in existence after the building of the railways. And at that time, if we find that there has been a blunder, we can turn the responsible person out of office. We are more likely to get real information from actual railway men than we are from any number of politicians who during a series of years have been burdening Hansard with hopes, desires, requests and prayers. That is what I want to get down to. I would not for two minutes take the word of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) as to the need of the road, the cost of it, or its probable earnings; not that I charge the hon. gentleman with deliberately misrepresenting things, but because I would not believe that he would have in his possession information as accurate and reliable as could be obtained from the railways. Some one will say: He might go out and get it from the railway. Very well, if he does that, it will be all right, in all probability, to let the railway bring the information here. All that I heard to-day was a perfectly nebulous address, such as might have been made before a sewing circle, with reference to the need of the branch lines in Canada. The only thing that distinguishes it from a sewing circle address is the fact taken out. The forest conditions in that part of the country are far more vast and extensive than are to be found in the interior of New Brunswick. As regard the fishing industry to which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. McIsaac) has referred so ably, I know of no part of eastern Canada where natural conditions are so generously provided as in that territory.

The question is whether this proposition, ratified and approved by all men of all political parties in our province who know the situation at first hand, shall be approved or not. We have the recommendations of Sir Henry Thornton and of the previous Canadian National board; we have the ratification of both political parties and of all governments since 1910 in this House. If any difficulty is to be found with a project of that kind, then I would like to know what proposition can be submitted to this committee with confidence by this government.

Mr. BAXTER: I have just one difficulty in trying to make up my mind at all about this subject. We have been treated this afternoon to the reading, in a somewhat low tone of voice by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), of some ancient excerpts from Hansard.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not a low tone of voice.

Mr. BAXTER: Well, with loud noises round about. I just heard the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) say that this House should pay great reverence to the railway opinion of Sir Robert Borden and Colonel Thomas Cantley.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): And both railway boards.

Mr. BAXTER: I will come to that; it is the important part of the matter, but I want to be allowed to browse along the pathway for a while before I reach the point. I will get there before I am through, and in my judgment no one has done so this afternoon who has advocated the measure.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Do not be so certain that you will get there.

Mr. BAXTER: I am neither opposing nor supporting this proposal, but I want to take a few minutes to show how, in my opinion, these things ought to be approached. The National Railway Board has been constituted with the idea of standing entirely outside of politics and managing the railways, if they can be so managed, as a business proposition, utterly, absolutely and entirely divorced from political interference. I wonder whether there is any dissent in this chamber to that view.

Mr. GRAHAM: The leader of the Progressive party dissented the other day.

Mr. BAXTER: If that view is accepted, why in the world should we be appealed to in address after address to take this or the other recommendation because forsooth some gentleman who is referred to, simply because of his politics, has advocated it at some time in the past or more tolerably near the present day? What difference in the world does it make to me whether Sir Robert Borden, coming from Nova Scotia, would have liked, at some time before the war when money was more plentiful, to see a road built in some part of his own province? Had I been in the House at that time I too should have wanted a road built in my province, and I should have felt that the country in those days could afford to be liberal and might almost undertake experiments in the matter of railways. But I do not feel so to-day; and with all respect for the statements of Sir Robert Borden, I think that the gentlemen who so freely quote him should give him credit, if he were here, for having a different outlook upon the financial situation of the country from that which he had so many years ago when he advocated this and perhaps other expenditures. I am not against the building of this road, and I am distinctly not for it; I am merely trying to reach a principle which I think should underlie the construction of all these lines. First of all, let us discard the musty Hansards. If you build a line and it does not turn out according to expectation, the question seems to be, can you hang Hansard somewhere? What is the sense of it? Can you reach the men who are reported therein and punish them in any way for what might have been mistakes? And sometimes they were not mistakes, because most of those who spoke were simply putting forward the things they desired to see done and were not perhaps over careful about the evidence that lay behind. We are referred to Colonel Cantley. Colonel Cantley seems to have almost annoyed the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) by opposing him as a candidate.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I was glad he did.

Mr. BAXTER: Then it is a case of joy. But if Colonel Cantley was no more reliable in the addresses he made with regard to the railway than the Minister of National Defence was in regard to the promises he made in that election, then I am afraid I should not this sense, that we are the one province of the Dominion that has only one line of railway—

Mr. HANSON: No. The Canadian Pacific.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If my hon. friend will permit me, one line of railway through which our exports can be sent out of the province and through which we can bring imports in. There is a line of railway running through the Annapolis valley, beginning at Halifax and ending at Yarmouth, belonging to the Canadian Pacific. When I say that the Canadian National is the only line of railway in the province, I mean that it is the only line of railway which runs from our province into any other province of the Dominion, because the connections the Canadian Pacific have are by boat with the United States and the city of St. John. So, for continuous transportation in railway cars, we have to depend wholly and solely on the Canadian National, and for railway construction we must depend upon it. The situation here is nothing more or less than the completion and extension of a project adopted in 1911, when the estimate of the then Minister of Railways, who is the present minister, was passed through the House of Commons with the unanimous consent of all political parties, and with the decided approval of Sir Robert Borden who was then leader of the opposition. This step was taken that the line of railway running from Ferrona to Sunnybrae was purchased from the Nova Scotia Steel Company. Hence it is that the Word "Sunnybrae" has come into the discussion of these questions, by virtue of the fact that in the carrying out of the policy of construction, this line of railway, eleven miles long, was purchased. The government of Sir Robert Borden, through Mr. Cochrane, as was mentioned by my colleague the Minister of Railways, made in 1915 and 1916 elaborate surveys of the whole situation there, and the statement was made by Mr. Cochrane in 1916 that it was the intention of the government to proceed with the construction of this particular piece of road. The financial situation which arose on account of the prolongation of the war alone prevented the completion of the scheme which all parties supported in 1910 and 1911. When the Canadian National Railways had come in, in 1919, under the act of that year, the project was taken up and dealt with by Mr. Hanna and his board, Colonel Cantley surely ought to be the best person to give evidence on that subject, and I would recommend that the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) should peruse carefully the statement of his political friend, Colonel Cantley, who was my opponent in the last election. After he has done so, if he has any sense of fairness, I am sure he will withdraw the statements that he has been making by way of opposition to this project. The fact that Sir Robert Borden, Colonel Cantley and Mr. Cochrane, in all this period, were in favour of this proposition removes any possible suggestion of the political ideas that my hon. friend puts forward in regard to it. The line of railway up to Sunnybrae was originally built for the purpose of carrying iron ore which was smelted in the first iron furnace to be erected in this Dominion at a place called Ferrona on the line of the Intercolonial. Later on the Nova Scotia Steel Company obtained possession by purchase of vast iron areas in Belle Isle, Newfoundland, from which ore could be obtained very cheaply, being really a steam shovel proposition. Hence, they stopped using the ore which was found along this railway. Not merely the possibilities, but the probabilities and certainties as to the extent of iron and other minerals in that part of the country have been proved by the fact that this iron was obtained from ore found in the immediate vicinity of Sunnybrae. The agricultural possibilities of that country have been proven beyond the shadow of a doubt. The conditions of men who farm in the east river St. Mary and the west river St. Mary cannot be surpassed in any part of Canada.

Mr. HANSON: Is the east river St. Mary settled agriculturally? Is it not a forest above tide water?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The east river St. Mary begins at the Atlantic in Guysborough county, runs through the county of Guysborough, comes to the constituency which I represent and runs to a lake called Eden lake. The district in that vicinity is so splendidly situated from an agricultural standpoint that it is called the Garden of Eden, and it is known as the Garden of Eden to-day.

Mr. HANSON: It is a great hunting district.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No. my hon. friend should come down there. If he comes, he will find beautiful homes, fine farms, splendid production agriculturally. Across the lake he will find immense forests of hardwood timber which is not to be had to-day in many parts of Canada, as well as softwood timber, which, in view of the fact that they are twenty-five miles from a railway, cannot be well-known fact that in eastern Nova Scotia the grades of the Canadian Government railways, now the Canadian National lines, are extremely heavy and it was intended not only to serve a local purpose, such as outlined to-day, but it was intended—and I venture to say that this was the main purpose of the vote, whether it was political or not does not matter—to improve the main line, to serve the industries and to provide a direct connection between the Canadian West, Montreal and Great Britain. The local connection was merely incidental. But that is not this proposal at all. This proposal is to build a branch line from a little village called Sunnybrae to the small town of Guysborough, a town which I venture to say has not a population of a thousand people. And yet we are asked to vote $3,500,000 without a word from the traffic experts of this railway. Now, it is not fair to parliament to ask members to vote this amount of money for the extension of the present branch line, unless we have it down on the basis of dollars and cents. No one has stated in this House that this line would pay, even in the dim, distant future. No one has given us an estimate in dollars and cents of any proposed earnings. No one has given us a statement of what the cost of operation may be compared with the capital expenditure. I do think that before the government or the National Railways ask parliament to vote a large sum of money like this, they should take parliament into their confidence, so that we shall know whether this is a business proposition or whether it is a proposition to assist a community that has been declining for years, if that be the case, or whether it is simply on the basis of giving service to a community that has not had service. Everybody will agree that this county has not had railway service, but there has been a reason for it—it would never pay, and nobody ever thought it would. Any construction of lines there would simply be a detriment and a liability to the national lines rather than an asset. Will the minister say that a single one of the present branch lines in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia would to-day be justified on the basis of their being an asset to the National Railways?

Mr. GRAHAM: They were taken over, though, by the late government.

Mr. HANSON: That is no answer, although it is the argument that is always used—"you did this" or "you did that." That is no justification for my hon. friend's government. In New Brunswick the management to-day are endeavouring to institute a system of electric operation by motor cars in order to keep down the tremendous deficits on these branch lines. Yet we are told that the management are asking for a capital expenditure of three and a half million dollars to add to the already enormous toll that these branch lines are taking out of the system. There is no doubt about that; I have one in my county, a little line of six miles that serves a much more prosperous community, I venture to say, than even the Garden of Eden in my hon. friend's constituency. It is known as the York and Carleton railway and runs through the parish of Stanley. It cost $24,000 a year to run that branch line under present conditions, and the revenues never exceed $9,000. The management, therefore are quite justified in taking steps to decrease that drain on the earnings of the national lines. I venture to say that this proposal will simply be an exaggerated case of the York and Carleton railway. I do suggest to the minister that before he goes further with this resolution he obtain from the traffic department of the railway a frank statement of the possibilities; then let us try to look upon this matter from the point of view of business, not of politics, from the point of view of pure reason, not of expediency. Then let us ask ourselves the further question: If this road was not justified in 1916 because of the financial condition of the country, is it justified to-day?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LEWIS: I wish to gain just a little information in regard to the resolution before us, and especially with respect to the expenditure of $3,500,000. We heard a statement read this afternoon that the line when it shall be completed, that is, if an extra thirty miles were to be added to it, would cost in the neighbourhood of $8,500,000, but I understood this would mean the line completed, with stations, sidings, and so forth. In this resolution we have the sum of only $3,500,000, which is to cover the work for 67 miles, whereas the $8,500,000 would complete the work on say 93.8 miles, as given by one hon. member opposite. I would like to know if this $3,500,000 is the total cost in the first place of the railway with stations included.

I have also made a slight comparison between the cost of this line and other lines, and I find that this line is costing $52,000 per mile, whereas on the western prairies the average cost is about $32,000 per mile, and I was wondering whether this greater amount was due to more difficult territory that the railway would run through. I should be glad to hear from the minister on that point.

I am not standing on my feet to ask these questions with the idea of opposing this line. I have made a very careful study of that part of Nova Scotia so far as it is possible to make a study of it from maps and the various statistics that are given to the House. I have a great deal of sympathy with that part of Nova Scotia, because I can readily understand there is a large part of that province which has no railway whatever, and for that reason it does seem to me that a railway may be needed. We heard from the speech that was quoted from a paper this afternoon that Sir Robert Borden had travelled over a vast stretch of territory in that part of the country, almost 500 miles without a railway. Now as far as I am able to judge from the statistics that have been given and the information we have in regard to this line, it will not be altogether satisfactory to the people it is intended to serve, because it will not reach the greater part of them. I find that at the present time the Canadian National railway runs from Glasgow to Port Mulgrave, and this proposed line is going to run from Sunnybrae to Guysborough, a distance of 67 miles. I have endeavoured to judge the distances from the map, and as far as I can see at no point is this proposed railway more than 15 or 20 miles distant from that other line. It practically parallels it all the way through.

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend has made a study of this particular railway would he tell the committee how far it is from Port Mulgrave to Guysborough, the terminus of this railway?

Mr. LEWIS: I was taking it straight across whereas these two points are diagonally across.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. member has made a statement that is misleading.

Mr. LEWIS: I said that as far as the line runs parallel it is about 20 miles distant.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): More than that.

Mr. LEWIS: What I say is that from Sunnybrae to the coast line immediately to the east it would be fifty miles, and there would still be a territory of 50 miles with no railway. That fifty miles is gradually reduced until at the end of the railway it is about 20 miles. I am not trying to oppose this line at all, but if service is the thing that is to be rendered it does seem to me that it would be wise to run a branch from Musquodoboit, where there is a line at the present time, up as far as Guysborough, and then have a branch line from Sunnybrae into the main line, from Musquodoboit to Guysborough. I think that would serve the people better.

We have been asking for various statistics in regard to the mineral and other wealth in the territory covered by this proposed line. In the mineral map, to the southeast, this country, so far as minerals are concerned, is apparently called the gold territory. In the immediate vicinity of Sunnybrae I find that there are iron deposits, but after you get past Sunnybrae I do not find any iron deposits at all.

One statement that has been made is that this railway would assist to a great extent the fishing interests. So far as that is concerned, I think it would be very difficult to interest the fishing industry in a railway which at one end is approximately fifty miles from the coast line and at the other end twenty miles. That would hardly seem to assist them in any great measure, and I was wondering whether at some future time parliament would be asked for a further grant of money to continue the Canadian National from Musquodoboit right up to a point near Sunnybrae, to provide that territory with the railway facilities that are needed. I find that southeast of the railway there is a stretch of country where there are hardly any inhabitants, and so I immediately looked up the map in regard to density of population, and found that Sunnybrae and the territory within a radius of probably seven miles is fairly thickly populated, but immediately you leave the county of Pictou and pass on to Guysborough the railway runs through a territory that averages from four to ten people to the square mile.

I am not opposing this railway but we do know that a branch of the Canadian National or of any other railway can only pay by service, and I was wondering whether the minister would consider that this line would pay in the direction in which he is taking it, and whether it would not be of greater service to the people if it were immediately to the southeast. As I said before, it does seem to me that the people in the immediate vicinity of where this line is to be projected are being taken care of by the railway to the northeast, that is the line from New Glasgow to Mulgrave, whereas the inhabitants of the southeast part have no railway at all. For that reason I should like the minister to give us a little information in regard to that part of the country—how they expect it to be served, and what will be the amount of revenue necessary to make the line pay.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend, of course, labours under the same disadvantage, in speaking about the location of a line of railway in the province of Nova Scotia, that other members suffer from when considering the location of railway lines in Saskatchewan and Alberta when they have not visited the territory in question. Very little idea of the true situation can be got at any time by simply looking at a map, such as a railway map. In this case one may easily be led into some misapprehension by depending altogether on a map. The fact is that the province of Nova Scotia is really an island. Its connection with the mainland is by a narrow piece of land well known as the Tantramar marsh. The distance across is about twenty miles. The existing line of railway follows the north coast of Nova Scotia, in immediate proximity to the straits of Northumberland. Sunnybrae is the terminus of a line of railway which was purchased in 1911 by the then government as the beginning of a scheme of extension, not in the same direction as the existing line of railway but at an angle of about forty-five degrees, running in an easterly and southerly direction away from the other railway altogether. I want to say that this proposition stands in very much the same position as do a great many of the enterprises in the west that are provided for in these various resolutions. Railways were started before the war and progressed to a certain extent. Some of them were graded, in some cases a large portion of the line was laid, a great many of them were in various stages of construction. This particular railway was in exactly that position. It had been inaugurated and agreed upon by all the responsible people at the time. A line of railway eleven miles long was purchased leading to Sunnybrae, the direction in which this line was to go. There are valuable forests and fisheries in the territory adjacent to the line. In the same district are splendid farming lands; I do not think there is any one in eastern Nova Scotia but will admit that there are no finer farming sections or more comfortable homes and better conditions than are to be found there.

There is one phase of the matter which has not been mentioned, and I have sent for the report of the Commissioner of Mines of Nova Scotia in order to justify my statement. For years large quantities of low grade gold ores have been found at various places in the southern portions of the counties of Guysboro and Halifax. These were referred to by Sir Robert Borden when he was Prime Minister and when the opening up of this section was previously discussed. A very large quantity of gold has been taken out from time to time, but as the discoveries were made at inaccessible points far removed from a railway, it was found almost impossible to bring in suitable machinery to treat the low grade ores, or make it financially satisfactory for people to exploit them. The reports of geologists and of mining experts are to the effect that if facilities were provided so that machinery could be brought in to treat these ores in a proper way a large return would undoubtedly be derived from them. There is no question but that these low grade ores exist. The only problem is how to treat them and extract the gold contents in a manner commercially profitable. This statement, in brief, explains the situation. The agricultural, mining, fishing and lumbering resources are there awaiting development, and there will be satisfactory returns once this development is under way. The proposed railway runs away from the existing lines. As I said it is almost at an angle of forty-five degrees, perhaps thirty-five degrees, to it, and the farther you get from Sunnybrae the farther you get away from that existing line, and you cover districts where to-day the people are forty and fifty miles distant from a railway and cannot get their products out to market except by motor —which has only been in vogue for the last few years—or by horse and wagon.

Mr. HANSON: Would the minister be good enough to state why it is the vote is being asked this year if it is not being proposed to do any grading until next year? I understood from his preliminary statement nothing was to be done this year?

Mr. GRAHAM: That brings out very important points in reference to a three years' programme. People in districts not served by railways are very uneasy. In some parts of Canada the settlers have no railway transportation yet, although they moved into those districts believing that in a very short time transportation facilities would be provided. I need not go over the list but there are many places of this kind. Now when people come to other lands they do not lack courage but they become discouraged when they expect, year after year, to find a railway running past their door and their expectations are not realized. In some instances grading of lines has been done for a great many miles, and if that were not an indication that the people might expect a railway in a reasonable length of time, then there is nothing on which such an expectation could be founded. In this particular instance the line was surveyed a few years ago. Public men took an interest in it, and members on both sides of the House pledged their support to the building of the line. The people have been expecting it to be built for some time just as other people in districts throughout the West have been living for some years on the same expectation. Now these people are not anxious to move out, they would rather stay in Canada; but if no transportation is provided they will be compelled to leave the country. I believe, from the facts within my knowledge, that the psychology of telling people in a district that they will have railway transportation in a certain number of years will have a marked effect in bringing to an end the emigration of our people to other lands. A promise in an estimate—I say it advisedly—is not any good for the present condition of affairs; but if parliament in its wisdom sees fit to embalm in a statute the pledge that although these lines may not be built this year, there will be material advancement with them in the course of three years, that will inspire the people with fresh courage to stand by their guns and keep their homes in this Dominion. I believe the psychology of laying out a programme for three years will have a marked effect upon the feelings of the people of the Dominion. In laying out a stated programme the Canadian National line will be in exactly the same position as a private company. A private company lays out, and presents its programme sometimes five years ahead, yet possibly railway communication will not be provided for for years to come. But they have an appropriation which is not recalled and which is used until it is exhausted. In this three-year programme, the Canadian National is asking to be placed only on the same footing with the same opportunity of extending its branch lines as a private company is placed by its directors and shareholders. But above and beyond that, the fact that we say, by legislation, that the court of parliament is prepared to construct these branch lines, will prevent hundreds, if not thousands, of Canadians from moving out of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is well known throughout the country as a master of humour and very good humour, but he seldom tries to disguise it as he did to-night under a serious mien. He affects to tell this committee that we are suffering from emigration; that men are getting discouraged and moving out; that they cannot be restrained from going by an estimate in the Appropriation Act to build a railway, but that if you put it into another act, a branch line bill, why, they will stay.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say that. At least, that is not what I intended to say. My right hon. friend is not quite giving my meaning to the committee. It would be impossible for any person to put through this House at this session an estimate for all those lines, but it is possible to make a pledge in a statute that this amount will be spread and expended over a period of three years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether the minister thinks he has improved the situation. I will repeat what I said.

Mr. GRAHAM: It does not need improving.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It needs it badly. The minister wants to convey to the committee the impression that this is to be a pledge that these roads will be built in three years. He knows it will be nothing of the sort, not a whit more of a pledge than an appropriation in the Appropriation Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: All this amount would not be put in an appropriation for one year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister can put in the amount to be spent in one year.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend knows he would fight it twice as hard as he fights the branch line bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says that if you vote all the money you need for 1924, that will not do, because that is not embalming it; you get it embalmed when you put it in a branch line bill. There is not a whit more security for a settler in a branch line bill than in an appropriation act, nor is there as much. In an appropriation act, the money is voted on the theory and the principle that it is to be spent that year. We are asked this year to vote money that the government does not intend to spend at all, because the fact of our doing so will keep settlers in this district, but if we voted money to build the road this year they would run. Such is the theory of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am sorry, but I did not express any such theory. That is the theory my right hon. friend is expressing, not mine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is precisely what the minister says, in effect.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not in effect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And in exact effect.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because when he tries to give out that there is a pledge in the bill, there is no pledge at all. From now to the end of the session, you can pass ten bills a day of this character, and that is not a pledge to anybody that a mile or a foot of road will be built. The minister is not going to spend a dollar in this district this year, as I understand the matter. Why is he before parliament this year? Is he afraid that the Canadian Pacific might get in and pre-empt this territory?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not speaking for the Canadian Pacific. Possibly my right hon. friend is. I am speaking for the Canadian National.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not insinuate that the minister was speaking for the Canadian Pacific, and I should like to know why he insinuates that I am.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend suggested that I was trying to keep the Canadian Pacific out of Guysborough.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is mentioned in the letter of Sir Henry Thornton. He says that one of the things that has governed them has been the consideration that we should take territory that might be taken by others. There is only one other person that might take it. This is a special case. The minister does not intend to spend any money at all this year, so one would naturally assume that that was the application. The minister knows there is no chance whatever of spending this money, so why is he before parliament this year with a request for authority which he does not propose to exercise, and that next year can be given just as well as now?

Mr. GRAHAM: For the same reason, possibly—I will not say the same reason because I do not know what his reason was—that my right hon. friend put through a highways bill, paying so much each year. The amount due the year following was not to be paid the first year at all, yet he put the amount in the bill for ten years in advance. He objects to a railway programme of three years, but he made a highway programme for ten years without one dollar of it ever going into the estimates, except for salaries of officers at Ottawa.

An hon. MEMBER: Five years.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps it was. My recollection was ten years. His reason was the same as ours in this. In order that the people might know that they were going to get the highways, he spread the amount over a period of ten years, so that there would be no question. If he had had to have so much one year and so much the next, he would have put it in the estimates. The same thing applies to the appropriation for agricultural instruction. If his theory is good in this case, it would have been good for him to put in the estimates the amount intended for the year for agricultural instruction. But did he do that? No, he brought in a bill and not an item was put in the estimates in any year for that expenditure. Further than that, some years ago I had the honour of introducing a bill in this House for the removal of level crossings in Canada, railway construction in that sense. Parliament unanimously spread it over a term of years, voting a certain amount each year on which the Board of Railway Commissioners could draw for the government's share of eliminating level crossings. If my hon. friend's theory is right to-night, then I should have gone to the Railway Commission and said: How many crossings are you going to order eliminated this year and we will put in an estimate? Now, apparently that was not the proper thing to do. In 1919, my right hon. friend had that bill renewed for a term of years, and it is in the statute books to-day. The same is the case with subsidies granted to railways other than our own. Subsidies are spread over a term of years, the amounts to be paid to companies when their certificates of construction are received. Why should we not use our own line of railway as fairly as we have used other lines of railway, when we gave them subsidies? If my hon. friend wants to take the attitude of being opposed to the Canadian National, he has a perfect right to do so, but he has no right to do so under an assumed belief.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has got quite heated and delivered a rather rapid and eloquent oration. The only difficulty is that it is not correct. I have not had time to go through all the estimates, but I have managed to get to one even though he has travelled very fast. He stated that we passed an agricultural act without a word of placing anything in the estimates. We put through an act, but we put an amount in the estimates every year.

Mr. GRAHAM: Paid by statute. It was under the authority of the Agricultural Instruction Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, under the estimate. I have the 1923-24 estimate which reads:

Grant to the provinces of Canada for the purpose of assisting and encouraging agricultural instruction, grants to be made on a proportionate basis. 1923-24, $900,000; 1922-23, $1,100,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend need not think he can get away with that. That is after the appropriation ran out under the statute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the year before it ran out. Both years are in the estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM: He read them both.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Both are in the estimates. One was for the year 1923-24, $900,000; the other for the year 1922-23, $1,100,000, voted every year and debated on the floor.

Mr. GRAHAM: I should like to see it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will send it across.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know about this one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister does not want to see it now.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, I know about this one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to a bill going through in respect of any line that is essential, and the minister knows that. The minister does not need to insinuate to the House that I am an enemy of the National Railways; he could not get a soul in Canada, however innocent or partisan, to believe that.

Mr. GRAHAM: A good many people believe it now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All I ask is that the government shall do what we did. When the late government passed an act it was not afraid to come to parliament annually in the constitutional way and have the necessary money voted. We came to parliament for every dollar we required. Whatever we needed by statute or otherwise for the National Railways we included in our estimates every year, and there is no more need to do otherwise under Sir Henry Thornton than under Mr. Hanna. There are no more rights accruing to the present directorate than to any former directorate, and the necessity then is precisely the necessity now, neither more nor less. So that all this talk about having to plan ahead and the like of that is just so much political moonshine. The hon. member himself has fathered bills that contemplated expenditures extending not over two or three years but over ten years, and he has come to parliament for the money year by year to be voted; and parliament in deciding to vote the money took into account the fact that it was in pursuance of a programme which the government had laid down. I do not know why parliament cannot be trusted to do in any year what it decides to be in the interests of the country; and there is nothing to hinder the railways from laying down their programme. It is merely an attempt to avoid the constitutional review each year at the hands of parliament of the estimates demanded by the government from the representatives of the people.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all.

Mr. CHURCH: No one is more anxious than I am to see the National Railways made a success in order that the great burden which is bearing down upon the people of Canada at the present time may be lightened. It is the desire of every good citizen in the country to give to the heads of the system a free hand to administer it to the best possible advantage. But when an attempt is made to convert parliament into a sort of rubber stamp it is time for objection. There is no railway system in the world today that is being carried on in the way the Canadian National Railway system is being operated at the present time. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George pointed out yesterday, a sum of over $2,000,000,000 is tied up in our railways, and the capital cost of these 1,000 miles of branch lines, $28,000,000 as estimated, may yet go to $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 when the lines are constructed. Is this the right time to build in a period of high prices having regard to the high cost of labour, the expensiveness of material and various matters of this kind, and when in the present state of affairs there is imperative need for retrenchment rather than unnecessary expenditures.

What will be the effect of the construction of this thousand miles of railway in relation to the questions of lessening transportation costs, freight rates and the balancing of the budget? In the budget speech last year the Minister of Finance expressed the hope that some curtailment would be effected in connection with the operation of the railways. There was a deficit on the National Railways of some $70,000,000 at that time, and the necessity for retrenchment is more insistent to-day than it was then. Where is this money for these branch lines to come from? It will not come like the dew from Heaven; it cannot come out of the earnings of the road. We shall have to go into the market for this $28,000,000 or $30,000,000 capital and borrow it, and we shall have to pay a high rate of interest on it. With things as they are in the country to-day in the cities and towns, the cost of living being so high, the people are clamouring for a reduction of taxes; but it seems according to the present programme, that we may as well say good-bye to any hope in that direction. Certainly with an increased capital expenditure of $28,000,000 on branch lines we cannot look forward to any reduction in transportation costs for years to come; and I venture to predict that next year, we shall probably be asked to vote $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 in connection with branch lines.

Under these circumstances we need not look forward to seeing a balanced budget. In France they have been able to balance their accounts, and in England a year ago Stanley Baldwin's budget showed that the Mother Country had been keeping her capital commitments in check and providing for sinking fund and fixed charges out of earnings. The same thing is true of the United States. Does any hon. member know of any other country that spends money in this haphazard fashion, projecting branch lines here, branch lines there and branch lines everywhere without proper reports? Do you think the board of directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway would authorize the expenditure of $28,000,000 on branch lines on the basis of such meagre information as we have been given in this chamber in connection with these proposals? Not at all. I am an advocate of public ownership, and I yield to no one either in this House or out of it in my support of the National Railways. But I certainly do believe that they should be economically administered, and I regret to say that in my judgment they are not. Now there are no branch lines proposed for the province of Ontario. That province has had to build its own branch lines. Some of the proposed lines before us certainly could not be classed in the category of works for the "general advantage of Canada" so as to come within the four corners of the Railway Act. I do not want hon. members from the province of Nova Scotia to think that I am opposing the construction of railways in that province particularly. That is not the case. I shall be making only a brief speech on the whole railway proposition, and it so happens that I am bound to refer to the province of Nova Scotia. No one is more eager to see the three Maritime provinces receive justice at the hands of the Dominion than I am, for it is my opinion that they have never got a fair show from confederation in connection with transportation. When I refer to this matter to-night therefore I do not do so for the purpose of offering any criticism; I am merely criticising the general policy before us in regard to these branch lines.

I do not see why these twenty-eight branch lines should be treated any differently from the way in which our harbours are dealt with. Why should the National Railways be singled out for peculiar treatment? Last year the branch lines were all embraced in one bill which was thrown out by the Senate, and I venture to suggest that the Senate will do the same thing this year in connection with these bills on the meagre reports before us. I repeat, this is no way to submit a matter of this kind, of such vast importance, to the people's representatives. The Canadian Pacific Railway would not spend money on such meagre information, nor would the New York Central; and we have the opinion in that respect of the head of the latter corporation, the late Mr. A. H. Smith.

It seems to me that we are just going back to the position we were in ten or fifteen years ago in regard to railways. A royal commission was appointed to go over the whole railway system and find out what was wrong. They found that for our population, nine and a half million, we had as much railway mileage as they had in Germany with sixty-seven millions of people, or in France with forty-seven millions, or in the United Kingdom with a hundred and forty-six millions. The whole branch line programme is wrong and economically unsound at present, and cannot continue. The country will become bankrupt if we continue to pursue the course we have been pursuing. I believe there should be some branch lines. Some are necessary, but we should build only those lines that will fit in with the trunk line system and provide revenue—lines that will not be millstones around the neck of the National Railways for a long time or add to their fixed charges.

This commission which was appointed to remedy this state of affairs consisted of Mr. A. H. Smith, president of the New York Central, who was killed only last week, Mr. Acworth, one of the most brilliant operating railway managers in Great Britain, and the former head of the Railway Commission, Sir Henry Drayton, who is a member of this House. What did they recommend? Did they recommend that parliament should pass bills like this, for a branch line here, a line there and another line somewhere else? They recommended first, that before any money is voted by parliament for a charter or the extension of charters for branch lines, these matters should first of all be referred to an impartial tribunal free from party politics, the Railway Commission of this country, for a report in relation to the whole matter. They recommended further that the National Railway system be brought directly under the control of the Railway Commission so that the commission will fix rates not only for the privately owned roads but for the publicly owned roads.

They also advised that no subsidies or guarantees for any kind of branch lines should be recommended to parliament before there was an exhaustive survey of the whole question from the engineering standpoint, the financial standpoint, the railway standpoint and the traffic standpoint. These were their recommendations. Why have they been ignored during the past two or three sessions of parliament? What is the Railway Commission for? You might as well abolish it if you are going to bring down bills for branch lines for this or that constituency in this haphazard manner. The Railway Commission has on its staff traffic experts at a cost of thousands of dollars. They have on their board freight experts. These men know all about the county of Pictou and Guysborough and all the rest of the counties getting branch lines and they know whether a road from one county into another, a distance of some six or seven miles, at a cost of $57,000 a mile is necessary. They can answer all these questions. My opinion is that these bills should never be passed by this House until they have been reported upon by the experts of the Railway Commission or before they have been referred to the standing committee on Railways and Canals. We might just as well give up trying to balance the budget, or look for any change in our expenditure, if we are going to add to the capital charges on the Canadian National as we would be doing if we passed this bill tonight. The earnings cannot justify it, and we have to go into the market for $28,000,000 of capital and borrow the money. When we consider the past commitments of the Canadian National it is folly to think of this expenditure and add to the system many miles of road that will not be able to meet the fixed charges, to say nothing of the operating charges. The hon .member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) said $2,000,000,000 had been spent on railways and he seemed to charge it to public ownership but public ownership is not responsible for the situation of the Canadian National Railways. Public ownership did not build the Canadian Northern railway or the Grand Trunk, or the Grand Trunk Pacific, which is responsible to-day for the large bulk of the $2,000,000,000 account referred to yesterday by the hon. gentleman. In the province of Ontario to-day they are suffering just as much as any other province for the lack of railways and rolling stock. It was said that $400,000,000 was spent in the last three years by the National Railway for rolling stock. Very little of that went into the province of Ontario. On week-ends and holidays it is almost impossible to get cars for the railway. The Grand Trunk in Ontario was built by private parties and operated under private ownership, and it was in that province they made nearly all their money. It was a success until the Grand Trunk Pacific came into existence. They took $122,000,000 credit out of the old Grand Trunk in Ontario and $22,000,000 in cash, and invested it in the Grand Trunk Pacific in the West, and what is the result? Ontario as a result of the Grand Trunk Railway becoming bankrupt is suffering more than any other province for the lack of transportation. Is this the time to build branch lines, Mr. Chairman? We are in a period of high costs for labour and material and high charges for money. Are the New York Central, the Michigan Central and the Pennsylvania Railway system going holus bolus into the building of branch lines here and there, as is proposed in Canada? No. An embargo has been placed upon these heavy expenditures by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not believe that the construction of many branch lines would appeal to the advocates of pubilc ownership in this province.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the hon. member think the interest rate on money is so high that the government should not construct the St. Lawrence waterway?

Mr. CHURCH: The sale of power alone will pay for that work and it is not proposed to go on with that until the financial situation permits. Is this period of high prices a proper time to go into these expenditures for railways? I read a report of an eminent engineer giving a survey of the capital expense of the various railway systems throughout the world, and almost without exception the directors of many large railway corporations have refused, and their boards of directors and their shareholders have refused, to vote money for any extensive capital expenditure. In the province of Ontario branch lines of the same description as these twenty-six proposed branch lines are built entirely by the province, and many of these Ontario lines connect with the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk railways. I venture to say that if this matter were referred to the Railway Commission the experts of the commission would say that many of these branch lines are not works for the general advantage of Canada, but merely provincial railways for the benefit of the province. In the province of Ontario they built a great railway system, the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario, which tapped the Cobalt district and other rich mining districts of New Ontario. Who built that particular system of railways in New Ontario? Was it this parliament? No, the province of Ontario did it itself. Ontario applied to this parliament for a subsidy for the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario but did not get it. Now it is proposed to extend the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway up to James bay, a purely federal matter, yet Ontario will have to do this itself.

Now, look what happened in Manitoba and Saskatchewan in the case of the Hudson Bay railway, a similar road to the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario. The Hudson Bay railway is being built not by the province but entirely by the people of Canada as a federal railway.

There should not be one law for Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and another for Ontario. There should not be one federal railway law for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and another law for Ontario. The Railway Acts calls for equality of treatment, and there should be no unjust or undue discrimination between provinces and localities in railway matters whether it be with reference to branch lines or anything else. The report before us gives us very little information. The economy cry is being raised now. I hope after the branch line bills we will hear no more about economy this session. We have here twenty or thirty millions proposed for branch lines. The Progressives are for the branch lines. When is an economy not an economy? When it's progressive.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is the hon. member in favour of building the viaduct at Toronto at a cost of $15,000,000?

Mr. CHURCH: Yes, I am in favour of building a viaduct at Toronto, and I will tell the hon. member why his estimate is wrong. They have a contract for the building of the viaduct in Toronto. In fact, I was just coming to that when the hon. gentleman interrupted me. The city of Toronto through its harbour board has expended $21,000,000 of the taxpayers' money on the basis of a contract made by this railway, yet they have money to throw away on such things as a skyscraper at King and Yonge streets, a non-essential, the Scribe hotel, and so on. They can do things like that, but they cannot carry out a contract made in 1913, with a city which has always kept faith with this government. I want to say to the hon. member that the government could not spend so much post office money in his riding were it not for the fact that out of the $29,000,000 collected from all post offices in Canada, $6,000,000 comes from Toronto.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I may inform the hon. member that we really have no post office building; we have but a shack that is used for that purpose.

Mr. CHURCH: If you have not a post office then you will get a branch railway for the asking and if you do not get a branch railway it will not be Sir Henry Thornton's fault. Of $259,000,000 collected from the customs throughout Canada $60,000,000 of it or 24 per cent comes from Toronto. Yet we cannot get a post office there; we cannot get a customs house, not even a shack; we cannot get proper pay for our postal officials; we cannot get a viaduct which this government through the Grand Trunk Railway contracted to build. We cannot get anything for the citizens of Toronto. The government only pays one-third the cost of the viaduct, $8,000,000 or $9,000,000, and the receipts at Toronto will pay for it ten fold.

Now, is this the time to build this system of railways? I say, no; it will be no loss if we wait for one, two or three years until industrial conditions readjust themselves, until the money market is better and the Canadian National Railways are given a chance to balance better their budget. They are behind sixty or seventy millions at the present time, and that deficit has to be put into the tax rate of this country. That is the cause of the sales tax and income tax; that is why we are still paying war taxes to help railways and we are going to build these branch lines out of war taxes. The people have a heavy burden of debt, and if there is not some retrenchment in the public expenditure, industry and manufacturing will be driven out of Canada.

To the hon. member who spoke a moment ago I may say that there is only one city I know of in Canada that has balanced its budget, and that is the city of Toronto. Of $112,000,000 collected in Toronto only $1,000,000 went back to the city, so that the budget is balanced by the $111,000,000. That $111,000,000 would probably take care of some of the branch lines. One of the things condemned by the Drayton-Acworth report was the useless duplication and waste in connection with railway construction in this country, the growth of railway mileage exceeding by ten to one the growth of the population. The report suggested that there should be a stay in the building of railways for many years to come.

Another question that may be asked is whether these bills are in order. Ordinarily bills are brought down and read in the House the first, second and third times. The rules provide that before a bill is introduced there must be on the reverse side of the bill a proper explanation of its purposes and the details of the proposal involved, but that is not done in this case. I think this is a matter that should be looked into .

The National Railways system has 22,000 miles of single track now; the resolution proposes to build another thousand miles. You have a merchant marine; what do they do? They are sitting in with the railways in the matter of rates; are they going to sit in with these branch lines in the same way? I suppose they will keep the charges up there as well, and no doubt the Railway Commission will not be heard from in that case either. As a friend of public ownership I am afraid that public ownership will not be given a chance if the construction of branch lines is to go on as proposed—twenty-nine millions now, twenty-five or 9 p.m. twenty-six millions next year—why, branch lines will sooner or later with their deficits act as the hangman for the National Railways. During the last three years $400,000,000 has been spent on rolling stock and equipment for the National Railways, and in view of that fact it seems to me that they should have made a better showing. I think they would have made just as good a showing if the present president of the National Railways had never been born. Furthermore, I do not know of any position in the British Empire to-day that cannot be filled by a native Briton. We have an official in Toronto a Briton, Mr. H. H. Couzens, head of the Toronto Transportation Commission, who is leaving that city to-morrow to take a position with a railway company at St. Paul at $50,000 a year. We have Canadian engineers, such as Mr. F. A. Gaby and Mr. Acres, who built the Chippewa canal. There is nothing the British born cannot accomplish in big public undertakings.

No one individual is responsible for any showing that may be made by the National Railways. The government gave the president every support, but with the large expenditure on rolling stock, the improved business conditions and the carrying out of policies inaugurated by the old board we find that the credit is not all attributable to the president of the system.

I am not saying that Nova Scotia does not need some of these branch line facilities, but I would point out that in the counties of Ontario and Durham there has been an absolute waste of public money in connection with Canadian National Railways. Between Toronto and Cobourg there are four railway lines, the old Grand Trunk, with double track, running from Toronto to Port Hope and Cobourg; the Canadian Pacific, the old Canadian Northern, and the Toronto Eastern —four railways where there is not enough business for one with a double track. Yet they are going to squander money on continuing with the old Toronto Eastern, a road that in my opinion should never have become a steam radial. That policy of the Canadian National board has been condemned by the Globe newspaper, The Port Hope Guide and other Liberal organs in the Toronto district. If this branch line programme is a sample of the recommendations of the Canadian National directors, the sooner Canada gets a brand new board of directors the better. This legislation is brought down in a haphazard manner, without proper information and without any consideration of how the construction of these branch lines will affect transportation costs throughout Canada. If this is the way we are to proceed then we shall wait in vain for reduced taxation, the statement to be announced in the budget statement of the Acting Finance Minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not going to reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Church) as he has two resolutions on the order paper that he was discussing, except to say that men who, like a good many of us, have all the railways they can use, and more too, and who can reach the railway station in five minutes from their door, and by street car, should not lecture people who have not a railway within thirty or forty miles.

My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) questioned my statement about the Aid to Agriculture Act. I was absolutely right, and the estimate in his hand showed that I was right.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Caught him again.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am going to take the statute of 1919; that cannot be blamed on the present government. Hon. gentlemen know that when money is voted by statute it only appears in the estimates as a record, and is not voted upon in the House at all;

everybody knows that. Let me take the statute of 1919: Arts and Agriculture—Authorized by Statute, then comes a list of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and all the provinces, and at the bottom under the heading of "summary" this: To be voted, $3,648,000; Authorized by statute, $1,100,000. I am going to follow that up to 1920, where the same thing appeared. To be voted, $3,903,000; Authorized by statute, $1,100,000 —absolutely as I said. I am going to go further and take 1921: To be voted, $4,502,139.50; Authorized by statute, $1,100,000. There it is every year, and I am going to point out why, for this is the act passed by my right hon. friend's government.

I will not read the preamble—yes I will, because it adds point:

Whereas it is desirable that encouragement be given to agriculture in all the provinces of Canada, and whereas great and permanent benefit will result through education, instruction and demonstration carried on along lines well devised and of a continuous nature;

Note that, "of a continuous nature":

Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as fallows:

1. This Act may be cited as the Agricultural instruction Act.

2. In this act, and in any regulations made hereunder, "Minister" means the Minister of Agriculture; "province" or "provinces" shall not extend to or include the Northwest territories or the Yukon territory.

Then comes section 3, and this is the milk in the cocoanut:

3. For the purpose of aiding and advancing the farming industry by instruction in agriculture, and for the purposes authorized by this act, the following sums, aggregating ten million dollars, shall be appropriated and paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada during each fiscal year for the period of ten years beginning with the year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, namely:

During the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, the sum of seven hundred thousand dollars;

During the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and fifteen, the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars;

During the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and sixteen, the sum of nine hundred thousand dollars;

During the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, the sum of one million dollars;

During the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen, the sum of one million one hundred thousand dollars; and the like sum of one million one hundred thousand dollars during each of the succeeding fiscal years until the expiration of the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty three; provided that any portion of any of the above sums which may remain unearned or unpaid at the expiration of any of the said fiscal years previous to the last shall be carried forward and remain available according to its apportionment for the purposes of this act during any one or more of the succeeding years.

That is the statute, and the estimates were based on that statute, and were not placed in the estimates during these years for the purposes of discussion, and they were not discussed, because it was not necessary. They are there designated "authorized by statute." The other item is to be voted, and of course everything can be discussed in supply, because there is an item in the estimates for the application of the act, and under that vote everything can be discussed every year, just as it can be under the Railway Acts that I am now bringing in.

I come now to the year 1923, where the same thing occurs again. To be voted, $4,984,-500; authorized by statute, $1,100,000. That amount was not voted, but was authorized by statute.

Now I am coming to the estimate that my right hon. friend read, and I am going to refer to the House for their judgment. He read the estimate 1923-1924:

"Grant to the provinces of Canada for the purpose of assisting and encouraging agricultural instruction, grants to be made on a proportional basis." True, but the act had run out, and the money had to be voted or the farmers would not have got the money that year, it not being payable by statute any longer, and the government not having given the farmers notice voted another sum one year after the expiration of the statute. I want to point this out because although my veracity may not appear to be much to my right hon. friend, it means a great deal to me. In the estimates of 1923-1924 my right hon. friend left this little item out in the reading. Before Item 51, which I have just read, appears a star, and this is what comes after the star: "Grant to the provinces of Canada for the purposes of assisting and encouraging agricultural instruction, grants to be made on proportionate basis." Then follows the note to which the star refers, as follows: "Note: The amount shown for 1922-23 was authorized by statute."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I think I can be just as frank with the House as my hon. friend. The statement that he has made, all to the effect that I had denied that these votes were authorized by statute, is beside the point. I stated distinctly they were authorized by statute. I stated distinctly, the programme contemplated by statute and provided by statute, running in each case for those years. I stated that the item appearing in the estimates was voted each year, and I did that on the authority of the only estimate I had before me, which read just as the minister has said.

Mr. GRAHAM: But you did not read the note at the bottom.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not note the footnote at the bottom, "authorized by statute" which would be an indication that it was not voted. But I want to draw to the attention of my hon. friend that while these amounts were not voted each year, except last year when the amount was voted, what I had before me indicated that all were voted, and I said so. While they were not voted, they appear in the estimates as stated by my hon. friend, and they appear as well at the bottom of the Agriculture estimates, so the House had before it in voting the money for Agriculture the exact amount that was passing by statute to the provinces; and there is this very great difference, the House debated it every year as well. I want to know, is the Minister of Railways going this year to bring down in the Supplementary Estimates—he could not be expected to in the Main Estimates because the bills will not be through—the amount expected to be expended this year? Will it appear there as was always the case under the Agricultural Instruction Act? I venture to say he will not and I want to draw his attention to this very marked difference: In respect of the Highways Act and the Agricultural Instruction Act the money was spent under the direct supervision of other governments responsible to other parliaments; in this case there is nothing of the kind. There is no supervision by this House at all or by any other House in Canada, once this bill passes the people have absolutely no further control. The minister asks the House now to vote the money for a period of years. In a case of that sort parliament every year ought to control and every year ought to vote the money. And under the old government in every such case parliament did. Never under the old government was there a dollar voted for the National Railways—although the money is now spent by a corporation and having been placed in their hands is no longer subject to our review—never was a dollar voted for those railways by guarantee, or by a straight loan, or by a grant, or anything else, which was not voted annually in the estimates. And this government has no excuse at all in this case for departing from that precedent. All this is done by a government that was going to restore the control of parliament that had been filched away, so it claimed, by the late administration. It is the old story "Those who talk the loudest mean the least." Those who talk the loudest, now destroy that which they so loudly professed.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. GRAHAM: The apology is accepted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend will give us some information as to how he proposes to finance this line, whether he proposes to bring votes down in the regular way and keep a thorough control of these funds?

Mr. GRAHAM: Will my hon. friend pardon me, I did not catch his question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was asking the minister, through the Chairman, how it was proposed to finance this line. I notice the work is not going to be done in one year, it is being extended over a series of years. So we shall have history repeating itself, and the real work will not be commenced until an election is due. Now, if this work is not to be done in one year, is parliament to have the usual control, is the appropriation for this work going to be included in the usual vote for all these lines?

Mr. GRAHAM: The same thing will be done as in the case of other votes by statute: There will be a full explanation given every year as to the amount of money to be expended during that year, and the amount of money expended the year previous. So that parliament will have absolute control to discuss the outlay from one end of the expenditure to the other.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask the minister what he means by "control to discuss"?

Mr. GRAHAM: Mostly what I said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, Mr. Chairman, I also want to ask my hon. friend if it is not possible to provide us with maps which we can read without difficulty. The maps supplied to us are very small; I confess I cannot read anything on the map I have. It is therefore quite impossible to properly ascertain the position of these lines. Is it not possible when we are dealing with sums running into the millions of dollars to know what we are doing? No one can tell what we are doing from this small map. The other day when these discussions started I asked for a map and I think a good map should be provided without delay. I am now going to ask my hon, friend, does he himself know at what distance from the shore this line will be constructed for the major part of its length? Nobody here knows. Then does he know, for example, the distance there will be between this line and the existing railway to the north? Can he tell us that?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): They run in entirely different directions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the map I have must be wrong, because it shows they will be parallel. That is one of the conditions we complain about; we do not know what information we are getting. The minister says the information on this map is wrong. All we can do is take this map and from it the railways seem to be running in a parallel direction. Now the minister says that is not correct, that they will not parallel each other.

Mr. MACDONALD: (Pictou): One line runs from northeast of the province proper, and the other runs to the southeast corner of the province.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would invite my hon. friend to look at the map. It is a pretty small map but it shows the railways as running in a parallel direction. I will show this to the Chairman so that he can see what I say is correct. The Chairman objects; I do not know where we are going to land unless somebody will take a look at it. If my hon. friend will look at the map he will find I am correct in my statement. Perhaps the Minister of Justice will glance at the map and see whether it does not show that the two lines parallel each other.

Mr. GRAHAM: I brought over some maps but I suppose they have all disappeared. I will ask my deputy to provide some better maps before we get through these bills. I think, probably, we shall have some other maps to-morrow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the idea of the minister? Will this vote stand until we have a map to see whether this railway is running east or west, or north or south, or where, or whether the Minister of Defence or the map is right?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): This map is on too small a scale entirely. I quite agree we ought to have a much better map in the case of each one of these propositions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the Minister of Defence will go further and acknowledge that on this map the lines apparently are parallel?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I know the locality as every hon. gentleman from the province of Nova Scotia knows it and, as I say, the present line of railway skirts the northern coast of our province and finishes at Mulgrave so far as the province proper is concerned at what is practically the northeast corner of Nova Scotia. The new line of railway projected will run to the southeast corner of the province. That is the situation, and as I have already stated instead of the new line paralleling the other it will run at an angle of between thirty-five and forty-five degrees from the existing railway.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not quarreling with my hon. friend's superior knowledge of geography. I simply ask him if the railways, according to this map do not parallel each other?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The scale of this map is too small.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do not the lines run parallel?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No I will not say that. What is the scale of that map?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I cannot find out. Perhaps the minister can tell us to what scale the map is drawn. Does not the Minister of Railways know what the scale is?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not. I have told my hon. friend that I shall order better maps.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is certain information we ought to have in connection with fish shipments. We desire to know what the business situation is. The hon. member for the county (Mr. McIsaac) has advanced a point—and I think it is a good one if it is well founded—in connection with fish shipments. I am going to ask my hon. friend if he can tell me the distance between the terminus of this line and the next point at which fish shipments are now being collected?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The one is at the head of the bay and the other is at the mouth.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What will be the mileage, what is the distance? Before this matter comes up again one thing that seems to be really material can be ascertained; we can find out just what the distances will be in connection with this railway. Perhaps my hon. friend will let us have that information.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then there is another thing, we ought to have information as to the number of points where fresh fish is now picked up on the coast?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is brought by small steamers to Canso and Mulgrave.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before getting to that I was asking a question as to railway points. I observe that right along from Chester in the east to Yarmouth in the west we have a line skirting the coast pretty well. Now I take it the government has information as to what points fresh fish is loaded on that railway, which skirts the sea as it does, and how many cars are loaded at the different points. There is another thing which we should also consider in connection with this matter. There is a line of boats; in fact, there is more than one line of boats; there is a boat service which is now subsidized and which is supposed to be looking after this fish business. I think the government ought to have and to bring down information as to the amount of subsidies paid. It is quite obvious that there might be a saving by passing this bill and striking out the subsidy.

Mr. GRAHAM: I shall have a note made of the requests which my hon. friend has made and see that we get that information down. Before we ask that the bill be considered, I will try to get everything possible.

Mr. CLARK: Will the amounts to be paid under these bills and the amounts to be spent each year be put in the estimates every year?

Mr. GRAHAM: We have been discussing that for about an hour They will appear just as other amounts that are voted by statute, just as in the case of the other acts which I have cited, not for discussion, but for record.

Mr. CLARK: In the estimates?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think so. I am not sure about that until I discuss with the auditors the best methods. We are only beating around the bush. Parliament will have all the information necessary as regards the expenditure of this or any vote.

Mr. BOYS: The minister says that they will not be subject to discussion because they will be authorized by statute. What chance have we for discussion?

Mr. GRAHAM: The same chance as was the case in connection with the highways bill.

Mr. BOYS: That is a tu quoque argument. Get away from that.

Mr. GRAHAM: Last year the highways were discussed for half a day and there were no estimates at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The highways?

Mr. GRAHAM: The salaries were in for the officers, but the grant to highways was by statute. Yet we discussed everything in connection with the highways, under the amount of money for the railways of Canada, a portion of which goes to the salaries of the staff. Under that every act of that board came under the purview of this parliament for full discussion.

Mr. BOYS: That is not the point. The point I am raising is: Are we going to have an opportunity to discuss these appropriations in future years?

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

Mr. BOYS: Under what item shall we have that opportunity? The minister has said that the items will appear in the estimates, as authorized by statute, but not for discussion. If he means that, what chance shall we have for discussion?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is taking me literally. I said that items that are authorized by statute are not discussable as regards those particular items per se, if he will allow me to use that language of his. But, as a matter of fact, under the heading of Railway Estimates, everything that the railway board does or intends to do can be fully discussed. That will include these.

Mr. BOYS: I appreciate that that will be the case in a general way, but we would have no control of the expenditure, once this goes through. That is the vital point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to draw the minister's attention to this very great difference. When you vote money to be spent year after year, especially under the supervision of another parliament, you place a limit on the amount that is to be spent, so that we know every year there cannot be more than a certain amount spent. The minister never can know that under this bill and he will have no way of knowing it. I do not know how he is even to get anything in the estimates to look at. How is he going to know? No limit is set upon the expenditure. They may spend the whole amount in one year, and if the bill is like what it was last year, they can spend twice as much, because the bill last year had no fixed, definite or final limitation. The bill may be different this year, but they can spend the whole thing in one year in any case.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may not be physically possible, but there is no parliamentary restraint. That is wholly different from a policy that contemplates a fixed maximum each year, especially when the matter is something that is controlled by another parliament. You could not get a more distinct case of absolutely putting out of the control of parliament what parliament is here to do. That is what parliament is here for. I have not had time yet to look the matter up, but my recollection is—and the minister's ought to be better than mine, because he was in the House earlier—that in the case of his own Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific, though the construction was contemplated in the first place over a long term of years, the money was voted every year. I ask the minister if I am not right. What in the world is there to hinder building a little branch line here or a branch line there in the same way, when they built a railway the whole way across Canada, and through northern Canada at that? Was the money not voted every year for those two railways?

Mr. GRAHAM: There are two very distinct differences, one being that the Transcontinental was constructed under a statute making it a continuous work. It was authorized by a statute in 1903, if I remember correctly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite prepared that that be done now. Let the minister come down each year for his money as he did in the Transcontinental case.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will my right hon. friend allow me to continue? In a work like the Transcontinental, when the labour was largely brought in for the purpose and continued in operation, not interfering at all or being interfered with as labour is at the present time by farming operations, conditions were altogether different from what they are at present. Under present conditions, as I have been told time and again by some of our agricultural friends, the moment farming operations begin, a good deal of the labour leaves the railway and goes to the farm. That was not the case at all with the Transcontinental. The work was continuous year by year, a great work, with men brought in for that distinct purpose. I do not think it is a proper comparison to place, side by side, a large number of short lines, with small contractors dodging from one to another, with a great work 1,800 miles long that had to be continuous and with plenty of labour that could be had at all times on the line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I only rise to say that for the life of me I do not see the point.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am sorry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose the government, in introducing the bills for the Transcontinental and the Grank Trunk Pacific, decided that they would have to vote the money each year in the Estimates, and the reason they did that was because the labouring men would not be available for farming in the summer, presumably on account of the railway being so far to the north. I cannot express the point very well, because there is not a clear point to express.

Mr. GRAHAM: I appreciate that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I appreciate it too, and to be honest about the matter, the whole committee does. There is no point in what the minister says. What is the use of telling this committee that he has to have a bill for fear the railway men will leave the road to go on the farm? I do not object to his bill. I did not do so last year. All we asked the minister was to subjoin a clause providing that the money should be voted each year in the estimates just as it has been done for all railway construction work, and as it has been invariably done in connection with the Canadian National Railways. The government is on the wrong track in the matter, and it would have been far better to get right when it had the opportunity.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Sunnybrae and Guysborough in the province of Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DUCKS-ARMSTRONG

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction of a Canadian National Railway line from near Duck's, a point about 12.5 miles east of Kamloops, to Armstrong, and from Vernon to Kelowna, with a branch from near Vernon to Lumby, in the province of British Columbia; mileage already graded, 101 miles; estimated mileage including existing grading, 105 miles; estimated cost $2,236,000.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: Before I read the memorandum in reference to this resolution I might explain that this is one of the lines in connection with which about $5,000,000 has been expended in grading. The following is the memorandum:

Kelowna and Lumby Branches—	Cost
Grade now ahead of track-101 miles—
Proposed in 1924—4 miles grade; 57 miles track and ballast..	$1,246,000
Proposed in 1925—48 miles track and ballast..	990,000
	$2,236,000

The Kelowna branch constitutes a line from Kamloops Jct. passing through Kamloops and running through Armstrong and Vernon down to Kelowna, a distance of 117.5 miles, with another branch from Vernon through to Lumby a distance of 15 miles. That part of the line from Kamloops Junction to Kamloops, a distance of about 3 miles, is in operation and is used by the main transcontinental trains for connection to the town of Kamloops. Rather than duplicate the C.P.R. line it was contemplated to obtain running rights over the main line of the C.P.R. from between Kamloops and Ducks, a distance of about 12.5 miles, and also running rights from them between Armstrong and Vernon over their Okanagan branch, about the same distance, and this then left about 104.5 to construct.

In 1919 a contract was let for the grading of this line and grading was completed by the end of the season 1920, with the exception of a few small gaps amounting to about 4 miles. Practically all the ties required for the line have been produced locally and are now located at various points on the line.

It is proposed in 1924 to finish these gaps in the grade, lay the track and complete the line into Armstrong, and also to arrange for running rights referred to, with the C.P.R. In 1925, the line will be completed to Kelowna, and the branch to Lumby finished.

From Campbell Creek to the beginning of Grande Prairie, about Mile 35, the line runs through a broken hilly country with considerable scattered timber and grazing land, on which some cattle ranging is now done, and as this part of the line gets up to an elevation of 2,275 feet, it is not suitable for much actual farming, and will be confined to grazing and hay raising to feed stock.

The Grande Prairie valley is a flat bottom about ½ mile wide and probably ten miles long, which is fairly well developed at the present time, but when further developed should be capable of giving a fair amount of business resulting from mixed farming. At Falklands, near the foot of this valley, there is a very large and good deposit of gypsum which, if a market could be found for it, should eventually give considerable traffic.

After the end of Grande Prairie, into Armstrong, the line goes through a broken hilly country, which is only suitable for ranching and has little development on it at present.

In the district of Armstrong, which produces largely hay, oats, celery and garden products, and fruit, considerable traffic would be expected.

Vernon is the centre of a considerable area of fruit growing land (mainly apples) and the valley of Long Lake, and the valley up toward Lumby are at present tributary to Vernon.

From Vernon to Kelowna the line follows a valley parallel to and about four miles distant from Okanagan lake. From about 13 or 14 miles from Vernon, at the head of Long lake, through to Kelowna, this valley is quite extensively developed in orchards, and is susceptible of considerable more development as further water for irrigation is procured and put on the land. Our line runs down the centre of this development and would shorten the wagon haul for the producer in this district.

The first eight miles of the Lumby branch goes through a highly developed orchard district, and at this point reaches the limit of fruit growing. From there on to Lumby there is considerable development by way of mixed farming and cattle ranging, besides some development further in from there.

The business from their line will be mostly to the Pacific coast, or the prairies, so will give the main line considerable traffic, mostly of a long haul character.

There has already been expended about $5,364,000 on these branches on the right of way, grading and fencing, which are nearly completed. It is estimated it will require $2,236,000 to complete them. It is computed that although the business from these lines will not clear sufficient to pay all the fixed charges when the amount now spent is included, it will nearly do so, which means it will give a very good return on the money now asked for to complete the line.

Note:—

Kelowna.—Assumes that running rights over C.P.R. will be used between Kamloops and Campbell Creek, and also Armstrong to Vernon, total of 24 miles.

Lumby.—Lumby must have track laid in order to reach ties for Kelowna piece.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are glad to have more adequate particulars in reference to this resolution than we have received so far.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know what the laughter is about unless hon. gentlemen think that it is impossible to take seriously anything the minister says. I still think that the particulars he has just given are more ample than he has given so far in other cases. Will hon. gentlemen dispute that fact? If not, why the laughter? It is a good thing to have these particulars and the House is entitled to them. But they are far less necessary in the case of a line which manifestly must be gone on with and which should have been gone on with last year. We have 101 miles now graded ahead of track and 4 miles of grade proposed for 1924.

Mr. JACOBS: One reason would be, that this is in British Columbia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We took our stand on roads that ran through counties represented by members of the other group in this House.

Mr. JACOBS: We are talking about provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are represented here by counties. The hon. gentleman has not much to say for himself, even in his seat. This line is mostly built. It has had millions spent on it for some time now. I am acquainted with the whole district. I have been through it, and know the traffic in it, but that is no reason for saying we should not have the fullest information. It seems strange that, in respect of lines where the most of the money has been spent and most of the work done, we get more information than we receive about other new ventures, something that has never happened in parliament before.

Mr. MARLER: I do not see the slightest justification for this line in comparison with the other. My right hon. friend says that because the line is being graded—and the minister agrees with him—and several million dollars of money have been put into this graded line, that we should immediately put further money into that line and make it a profitless railway. Did my hon. friend listen to the report which was read by the Minister of Railways and Canals? Did he see any great hope in that report of that line ever paying? Did he hear the report about the hilly country it ran through? When the Guysborough line was discussed the question came up in regard to boat service. This is for the fruit service. There is a boat service from Penticton at one end, where there is an outlet, and then there is a branch line running from Sicamous to Vernon at the other end. There are boats running all the time, and there is no justification for putting money into this line. There is just as good boat service in that district as there is in Nova Scotia. I may say there is very little to recommend the Nova Scotia line at least.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the hon. member the least idea of the population along the line?

Mr. MARLER: I do not think that enters into consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are railways for?

Mr. MARLER: Why this great anxiety about this particular line? Why should there not be criticism with regard to this particular line? We have been hearing criticism about other lines.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: None about Huberdeau.

Mr. MARLER: Pardon me, I criticized it myself to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman did, but we did not.

Mr. MARLER: I am very much surprised that they did not, because it was very unnecessary also.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We treat these lines on their merits.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend is mistaken about the Huberdeau line and about this line. There is service on that lake every day in the year from one end of the year to the other.

Mr. CLARK: Every day of the year?

Mr. MARLER: So I am informed.

Mr. CLARK: Did the hon. gentleman criticize the Guysborough line to-day?

Mr. MARLER: No. I would like to criticize it very much now but I thought there was enough criticism coming from the other side of the House, and I thought I would let my hon. friends do my work. In this particular case they are not criticizing this line, but I am criticizing it, and I say there is no justification for it at all.

Mr. JACOBS: Does this line parallel the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. MARLER: No, it does not parallel the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Pacific serves this district sufficiently. I am glad the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier reminded me of that point. It brings out the very point the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) expressed several times in this debate, I commend him for it. He stated time and again that where the Canadian Pacific Railway served a certain district there was no necessity to construct other lines. The Canadian Pacific Railway serves this district at one end of the lake and by a spur line it is served at the other end of the lake. There is a boat service at the other end of the lake, and during the fruit season the service is carried on and they have an admirable outlet. There is no justification for this line more than there is for the Guysborough line.

Mr. McBRIDE: I do not think the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) knows the circumstances out in British Columbia quite as well as he would like to represent to this House or would make this House believe he does. In the first place, he says there is service on that lake every day in the year. There is nothing of the kind. I have known that lake to be frozen up.

Mr. MARLER: Will the hon. gentleman forgive me for interrupting? I think he is quite right in that respect. I should have stated there was a service on the lake at the necessary times in the year. I am obliged for the correction in that respect.

Mr. McBRIDE: Not at all. There is a number of cold storage buildings in that valley and the fruit requires to be moved out at all seasons of the year. And not only that, this line does not parallel the Canadian Pacific railway. It branches off the main line seventy-two miles west of Sicamous, where the Canadian Pacific branch starts. It runs through a splendid valley. The Grand Prairie is a much larger valley than some people imagine. I know that country well, and it runs down through the Okanagan district. The Canadian Pacific runs to Vernon, but this line runs down to Kelowna, much further than the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How far is it from Kelowna to the station on the Crownest or the Kettle valley?

Mr. McBRIDE: It must be quite a distance. I do not know that line. It is not in the same district at all. There is a gypsum deposit on this line at Grand Prairie and the mill is built to manufacture this gypsum. That mill has been there for years, and will itself contribute a large amount of traffic to this line. I think I am safe in saying that there are at the present time about five cars of gypsum per day coming into Vancouver. That mostly comes from Winnipeg. If this line were built, that traffic would all be diverted to Grand Prairie as the freight would be much less. As has already been said, about $5,500,000 has been spent on the line. The right of way is there and the ties are there: They are deteriorating as the years go by and I would be safe in saying that it would be one of the best paying branches of the Canadian National Railways west of the Rocky mountains. Last year there were over 6,000 cars of apples taken out of the Okanagan, besides other farm produce. If this line is built the Canadian National will have half of that, in fact they will have more than half of this freight, and the only men I have ever heard criticise this extension are gentlemen who are either employed by or working for the Canadian Pacific Railway—

Mr. MARLER: Is the hon. gentleman making any innuendo or slight suggestion in that respect? Let him speak out if he is.

Mr. McBRIDE: The hon. gentleman from St. Lawrence-St. George does not need to take it to himself if it does not fit him.

Mr. MacKELVIE: It is not necessary for me to say very much more than the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) has stated to the committee. I have spoken on several occasions regarding the necessity of this branch. Two or three weeks ago I dwelt on it to some extent in my remarks on the Speech from the Throne. My. hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George takes exception to this statement and shows a very incomplete knowledge of the situation in that country. He bases his principal objection on the fact that on the Okanagan lake the Canadian Pacific runs a boat which provides transportation facilities for the fruit growers of that district. He does not take into consideration the contour of that country. He does not understand that between Vernon and Kelowna, a distance of thirty-five miles, there is a section which produces perhaps 60 per cent of the apples grown in that section. The fruit growers are subjected to a yearly charge of between $300,000 and $400,000 in truckage and drayage for the hauling of their fruit to points either on the lake or at the railway at Vernon. It was estimated in a board of trade brief which was prepared on this subject a few years ago that the total loss to the farmers of the district traversed by this line in hauling charges was not less than $500,000 a year. This is a thickly populated district. It is a country of small farms, the average fruit farm consisting of ten or twenty acres. It takes upwards of fifty acres of prairie land to produce a car of grain, but this country will fill a car with produce from the orchards or with vegetables from an area of less than two acres, so that a very large traffic is to be expected from this district. Many of these orchards have not yet reached anything like maturity and in a few years their production will be doubled. Out of that valley last year went over 10,000 cars of freight; I do not know what the incoming freight represented. But a very large revenue indeed may be expected for the national lines when this great feeder is built.

Mr. MARLER: If this would be obviously such a paying line why was it not built in there long before this?

Mr. MacKELVIE: That is a question the hon. member will have to ask the government. The line has been graded for several years and undoubtedly would have been completed had not the war intervened. It was always regarded by the Canadian National authorities as a paying proposition. I venture to say that Sir Henry Thornton is as anxious as any member of this House to see it completed, and completed at an early day so that the Canadian National may, if possible, get a share of the outgoing traffic this year. The report read by the minister mentions the hilly nature of the country, but that refers only to a very small portion of it, lying between Ducks and Grand Prairie. The Grand Prairie district is a country where mixed farming has been carried on successfully for many years, and once transportation facilities are afforded it will double or treble its output. The gypsum deposit referred to by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) is acknowledged to be the largest and purest deposit of the kind on the continent. It is in the possession to-day of a Winnipeg company who are only too anxious to exploit it if they are given the necessary transportation facilities. The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) startled the House the other night by stating the tonnage obtained from a single acre in his constituency. Of course when the hon. gentleman mentioned that it came from limestone it cleared up some doubts that might have existed in the minds of hon. members. From these gypsum deposits alone I have no doubt that an output equal to the figure my hon. friend mentioned may be expected within a brief period once the railway goes in there. From Vernon south to Kelowna this line traverses the very cream of the fruit growing district of British Columbia. New orchards are being planted every day. The orchard owners of that country have been subjected to a series of bad years and they have not been able to dispose profitably of their fruit. This year also I am afraid they will suffer very heavy loss, and anything that will help them in the way of giving them better facilities is surely something to which this House should give serious consideration. The district running east of Vernon which is tapped by this spur of fifteen miles, runs through a section which contains the famous Coldstream ranch, where there is one of the best orchards in Canada. Further on it reaches the town of Lumby, which is situated in perhaps the best dairying and mixed farming section of that part of country. Back of Lumby lies a tremendous area of timber land and a great traffic is now being worked up there in ties and telephone poles. The line from Lumby to Vernon will be kept busy for a large portion of the year transporting wood products alone. I have had prepared and presented to me an estimate by the board of trade of that country in which the belief is expressed that once the line is completed, traffic amounting to a million dollars will flow over it the first year. This line can certainly be regarded as one which is capable of financial development. I sincerely believe that in the course of a very few years it will be found to be one of the best feeders of traffic for the Canadian National and that it will pay for itself handsomely.

Mr. CLARK: How far is Lumby from the lake and from the nearest railway station?

Mr. MacKELVIE: Lumby is fifteen miles from the nearest railway station and it is four miles further to the lake.

Mr. MARLER: It is the same old story—discussing these estimated costs about projected lines. As soon as a line is proposed for Nova Scotia those from that province say it is essential. Perhaps it is and perhaps it is not. It is the same thing when we come to British Columbia. The line is said to be essential. Perhaps it is and perhaps it is not.

Mr. POWER: Who should know whether or not it is essential, the people from the province concerned, or somebody else?

Mr. MARLER: We should know whether it is wise or whether it is not wise to spend this money, and with the information that is before us it is utterly impossible to determine whether it is wise or not. That is the whole question.

Mr. POWER: The hon. gentleman seems to have some objection to the people from the provinces concerned stating that the roads are essential. He claims that they are not essential and he states himself that he does not know whether they are or not.

Mr. MARLER: Certainly I do. I know very little about these roads. I think the information should be put before this House so that hon. members can determine, on the information of competent engineers, whether the proposed lines are necessary or not.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does the hon. member say that the engineers of the Canadian National are not competent?

Mr. MARLER: The engineers of the Canadian National Railways do not appear before this House, nor does Sir Henry Thornton—no one appears before this House. We have nothing but the shortest possible reports on these subjects, and we sit down here and vote millions of which we are trustees, nothing more nor less.

Mr. POWER: The right hon. leader of the opposition, a friend of my hon. friend from Montreal, states that he is quite satisfied with the information brought down in this particular case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I did not say that.

Mr. MARLER: It is not material to me whether the leader of the opposition is satisfied or not. The fact that he is satisfied is no indication that I am satisfied.

Mr. JACOBS: It is a good Conservative county through which this line passes.

Mr. MARLER: If hon. gentlemen will not treat this matter seriously, I assure them that the country will treat it seriously. Hon. members will be held accountable for voting in this committee or in the House later on for expenditures of this kind without having before them the necessary information. It is not a question of dealing with any particular province or any particular part of the country; every one of these lines has to be considered on its merits. I am not saying that this line in British Columbia is not a proper line or that the line in Guysborough is not a proper one, but I do say that we have not the information before us to judge properly of this thing. The matter should be put before us in a more intelligent way. We should have maps before us; we should have the engineers before us and the board of management. The board of management have made mistakes in the past; we know of the mistakes they have made, and we want to judge for ourselves whether or not they are making a mistake now. I am not pointing particularly to this British Columbia line or to any other line, but I say we are proceeding in a very light hearted manner in voting millions in this House the way we are doing now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I sympathize almost entirely with what the hon. member says. I have never expressed any satisfaction with the data brought down, but I have said that it is a lot more ample in this case than in cases where it was needed much more.

Mr. POWER: Even the smallest amount of praise from the right hon. gentleman immediately sends us into the heaven of expectation. We are so pleased with that little amount that we think he is praising us extremely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot really define the satisfaction I take from exalting my hon. friend even into the first heaven. Certainly the data laid before the House should be such as prima facie would show that this will be a paying line and will serve a large section of the population struggling now to be served. In this case I happen to know the district. In this case I have peculiar information. I do not assume I know it nearly as well as the hon. member behind me (Mr. MacKelvie) or the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride), but I know it fairly well and have known it for some years. From what general knowledge I have of it, it would appear to me to be a line that would certainly pay the railway, and a line undoubtedly the lack of which is causing very great suffering and hardship. But I am in full accord with what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has said: We ought to have a prima facie case on the authority of the president in this as in every other case, for hon. members who are not so well acquainted with the different territories through which these lines are to run, in order that all may give their votes in an intelligent and conscientious way. But we must be reasonable; we cannot have Sir Henry Thornton or his engineers before this House. There will come a time later on, after the bills are brought down, when the suggestions of the hon. member in that regard will be more appropriate than at this time. I do not think we ought to find fault with any of the bills in that regard, nor have I done so; but I do demand, in this case as in every other, on behalf of other hon. members as well as on behalf of myself that we should have the certificate of Sir Henry Thornton that it is his judgment that the road should be built, and not only his certificate, but the basic facts beneath the certificate to enable us to form an independent judgment of our own.

Mr. MARLER: Do I understand that my hon. friend is satisfied with a written certificate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I want the basic facts beneath the certificate, the business facts to enable us to form an independent judgment of our own. I do not think we ought to take the judgment of anybody; I do not see how we can. If we are ready to take it, what are we here for? We might just as well let the president and board of directors do what they wish. We have to form an independent judgment of our own, and I am wholly in accord with what the hon. member says, that we should have the facts before us to enable us to do so. But I do not think we can have them before us in great detail and subject them to cross-examination in Committee of the Whole. A time later on may come for that, but we should have in outline such facts as, if proven correct on examination, would warrant the road being finished.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I would like to endorse thoroughly the remarks made by the hon. member for Cariboo and the hon. member for Yale. I am fully conversant with the characteristics of the part of the country through which this branch line will run, and although this particular branch line does not touch my own district, I know the conditions there very well, and I can give full support to the hon. member for Cariboo and the hon. member for Yale in endorsing this proposed line.

There is one feature, however, that has not been brought out by the two previous speakers. This branch line, which I believe to be a sound business proposition, has been in the minds of the people of this district, which includes a considerable area, for many years. With the completion of this line to the point named, Lumby, transportation will be provided for a class of settlers who have been in there for a good many years, and a class that has not been mentioned by the two previous speakers from British Columbia. This line will provide transportation facilities for the settlers who have gone into what is called the Fire Valley district. In the last five years the province of British Columbia has built a highway or wagon road from a point called Edgewood, on the Arrow lakes, to Vernon in the Okanagan district. The settlers in the Fire Valley district went there a good many years ago, and the characteristics of the country are such that they have had no means of transportation. They have not had a wagon road in or out; they have had only a trail for many years. This particular district that I speak of is a strip of country something like a valley, seventy miles long, settled from one end to the other. Many mining properties have been developed there, but their further development is waiting upon transportation facilities. The only transportation they have had in the last ten or twenty years has been a boat service on the Arrow lakes. That service has filled certain requirements, but it has only touched one point, Edgewood. In the past few years the government have taken it upon themselves to complete a wagon road from Edgewood through this valley into the Okanagan district, and that road will be completed this year. That wagon road has been their only means of transportation in and out. With the completion of this branch line to Lumby and the completion of this wagon road which the British Columbia government is building, there will be a connecting link giving access to the settlers, and providing the transportation facilities that are necessary for the mining properties to develop. The development in this particular district will have an influence on the future development of the province, and the building of this line will in every way fulfil a longfelt want. In my own humble opinion it will only be a very short time before this branch line will be a revenue producer and be paying for itself.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I rise only for the purpose of taking exception to the statement made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, that we are voting these millions of dollars light-heartedly.

Mr. MARLER: I think we are.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member is entitled to his opinion. I am not finding any fault with him, but he seems to object to my repeating his words. I am protesting against his statement that we are voting this money light-heartedly, and I think I have a perfect right to make that protest.

Mr. MARLER: Certainly.

Mr. FORKE: I can assure the hon. member that none of the members in this part of the House is doing so. It is very difficult for a member not familiar with the local circumstances to form an accurate judgment as to the value of any particular road that is proposed. I quite agree with the hon. member who said that we can only listen to those who are familiar with these different districts. I have listened very carefully to the criticisms that have been made by different members, and to the arguments that have been advanced by those supporting these railways, also to the statements of the minister, and had I thought that I could add anything to the discussion I certainly would not have kept quiet. I am trying, as I suppose every hon. member is doing, to form just as accurate a judgment as I possibly can as to these proposed lines, whether they should be built or not, but I cannot help but think in listening to some of the criticisms that they are not always put forward for the purpose of eliciting the facts. Sometimes they seem to have other motives behind them. Perhaps I have no right to make any statement of that kind, but it struck me that that might sometimes be the case.

A lot of money is proposed to be spent upon these branch lines, and it is a serious matter. The country is in a very critical position financially, and I do not want to see one dollar spent any more than does the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, unless it can be shown to be in the best interests of this country. I do not think it is any use anyone getting up and repeating that phrase time and again. We had the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) making an eloquent speech to-night about the necessity for saving money, and then immediately afterwards he began to justify spending millions and millions in Toronto. Those millions may be perfectly legitimately spent in Toronto but it is no use for the defenders of that expenditure to criticize others who advocate spending money in some other locality. I have nothing further to add. I do not intend to take part in the discussion unless I can contribute something of value. I simply rose for the purpose of saying that we are quite serious in advocating that no money should be expended unless that expenditure is absolutely needed.

Mr. MARLER: Just one word. I wish to make my position abundantly clear to this committee, particularly to the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride). It is not a question as to whether a line is being built in Nova Scotia, or in New Brunswick or in Quebec, or any other province whatsoever. I was not directing criticism to lines in British Columbia any more than I am directing criticism to lines in any other province. I stated on Tuesday that where a line is essential and vital then, and only then, should we spend money, and to that extent I am prepared to give my support. That I repeat again in the House to-night. My right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, has told us that he knew this country and no doubt the member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) knows this country; the other members from British Columbia are equally well informed. I do not doubt that for a single moment. But I have not favoured lines in Quebec, I think those lines are certainly not necessary in so far as my own personal knowledge goes, but what I say, what I urge upon the government, is that when the time arrives—if the time does arrive—that we should have first-hand information from the necessary engineers and the necessary officers of the Canadian National railways; that we shall meet these gentlemen face to face, question them on the subject, find out for ourselves at first hand the necessity for these lines, whether they are to serve the population, and whether or not they should be built. That is the information I am going to urge, when the proper time comes, should be submitted in some manner or form before these bills go through.

Mr. MALCOLM: I have to disagree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. He is not basing the construction of this line upon a business basis. He seems to argue that the only line that should be built is one that is essential and vital, and he assumes that because the Okanagan valley is somewhat served by the Canadian Pacific railway the territory should be left entirely to that system.

Mr. MARLER: Not at all, I made no such statement. My hon. friend is misquoting me entirely.

Mr. MALCOLM: If I err at all it is in misinterpreting my hon. friend.

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. MARLER: Do not misinterpret me then.

Mr. MALCOLM: As custodians of the National system we have a perfect right to spend money from a business point of view to build branches that will serve as feeders to the National system. As an Ontario man who has some knowledge, by having travelled through that portion of British Columbia, of the possibilities of the Okanagan valley, I am neither strongly for this enterprise nor prejudiced against it. I treat it purely as a business proposition. This territory, as I know and as has been so well said by the members for the district, is considerably west of the line of rail and water served by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The proposed line will furnish transportation facilities to the more easterly portion of the Okanagan territory, and from a purely business standpoint I believe the National Railway system is perfectly wise in constructing this branch. It will not only serve the agricultural and fruit growing interests but will open up a promising mineral country besides. It is absolutely a good business proposition. Having said this, however, I must express my disappointment that a resolution has not been introduced providing for what would be one of the best lines from a business point of view, that could be constructed in the Dominion. That is a line from Grande Prairie to the National railway at Brule, which will open up a fine coal area and serve to promote settlement in the Peace river valley. I am not at all opposed to building such lines as business propositions. I do not think that as custodians of the National Railway system we should confine ourselves to lines that are absolutely essential. I think we could assist the management of the National lines in providing feeders which will furnish business to the main system.

Mr. GRAHAM: I should like to take up a minute or two in replying to some things that have been said. The government has been criticized to-day for not giving greater or more detailed information. I will make the assertion that there never was any more information given the House concerning the construction of branch lines than has been given to-day. There never was previously, so far as I can ascertain, a statement signed by the head of the Canadian National Railway system placed on the Table. But I want to go further. There is nothing to hide. We want to give parliament every information possible. Now the reason there is more detailed information available in the case of this line is that people have been all through the country and know all about its possibilities. Talk about estimating traffic on projected lines! Why it can only be a sort of educated guess, and perhaps not very much of a guess at that. In such a matter no one can guess with any certainty. One hon. gentleman spoke of the information given to the shareholders of a private company, like the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in regard to branch line projects, and said it was far more detailed than any information that has been disclosed here. Very well, I will read the information the Canadian Pacific Railway shareholders receive. I have the report here. I am not criticizing it at all, but I am pointing out that we as shareholders of the Canadian National Railway system are far more critical than the shareholders of private companies because the latter trust their directors. Here is a quotation from the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the fiscal year ended December 31, 1923:

10. During the past year a moderate programme of branch line construction in the western provinces was proceeded with, 231 miles of line being graded and 347 miles of track laid on lines the construction of which you had previously authorized. Your directors are of the opinion that some further extensions should be built during the present year in order to supply much needed railway facilities to farmers in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. All the branches have been carefully located in good territory and should develop considerable additional traffic. Your authority will be asked for proceeding with the construction of the following lines and for the issue and sale of a sufficient amount of consolidated debenture stock to meet the expenditure, namely:—

Then the report goes on to enumerate 249 miles of proposed railway construction. I have given more information as to each one of these branch lines than is to be found in the report of this private company concerning these projected 249 miles.

Mr. MILLAR: I do not want to discuss the construction of branch lines in districts that I do not know anything about. But when we come to discuss resolution No. 14 I shall be prepared to do so because it proposes to construct a branch line in the constituency which I represent. But so much has been said as to what these branch lines should earn that I feel justified in quoting a paragraph from a report on The Wheat Situation, by Henry C. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture in the United States. I think the quotation has a direct bearing on the matters we are now discussing. The extract in question reads as follows:

It is recognized that some railroads depend largely upon wheat for revenue. It seems evident, however, that in the long run such roads may profit by carrying wheat in a period of depression at little or no profit in order that agriculture may be maintained as a source of revenue in periods of prosperity. Low freight rates have aided in the settlement and development of a large part of the wheat growing regions. Low rates may be as necessary to maintain this development through periods of depression as they were to secure the settlement and development.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In answer to my hon. friend the minister I hope he is not going to take it for granted that because he has not already constructed lines in every instance he should not give proper information. I submit to him that you can learn just as much when you are running survey lines through a particular section of country as you can from the trackmen placed on dump. Traffic returns are not got from railway dumps. The real reason why we have full particulars in the present instance is that the matter seems to have been properly canvassed. There is one thing for which I would commend my hon. friend in this particular report. He has a plain statement of the management that, as regards the new money that is to be put into this venture, it will be a profitable investment.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 33, respecting the construction of Canadian National Railway lines, Kamloops-Kelowna division, province of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COWICHAN BAY-VANCOUVER ISLAND

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction of a Canadian National Railway line from a point at mile 58.3 near Deerholme on the Vancouver island main line of the Canadian Northern Pacific railway, in a generally easterly direction to Cowichan bay, in the province of British Columbia; estimated mileage includng existing gradng 8 miles; estimated cost, $358,000.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

Mr. GRAHAM: The memorandum which I have in regard to this branch line reads:

Cowichan bay, Mile 0-8—	Cost
Proposed in 1924—8 miles grade..	$230,000
Proposed in 1925—8 miles track..	128,000
	$358,000

In 1924 it is the intention to do the grading and bridging on the 8 miles at a cost of $230,000, and in 1925 to lay the track on it and complete it at a cost for that year of $128,000.

The purpose of this line is to make a short routing to tide-water for timber and its products from Vancouver island line. This would shorten the route 52 miles as against the haul to tidewater at Victoria. Besides shortening the route it would make a possible location for dumping of logs at tidewater, as there is not suitable location at Victoria for this purpose.

The construction of this line will make possible the hauling of logs off the Vancouver island line, which at present has a length which is prohibitive.

There are a large number of timber owners who stand ready to go into a big development of timber and its products as soon as this line is completed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a matter about which I do not know very much, and I am going to ask my hon. friend to give us a few more particulars. I take it from what he has just said that he is going to build a logging railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is from an existing railway to tidewater.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: From the explanation, there is no other object. Is that right?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would like to get what my hon. friend means in distinguishing a logging railway from another.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: These logging railways are put in by the different logging concerns interested in the matter and they are not put in by the system. I have a distinct knowledge of logging railways. I have had to do some work in connection with them in British Columbia. Will my hon. friend look into this and let us have the information? If there is nothing more to be said of the matter than what he has read, it would appear that this is merely a logging railway and the country should not be put to that expense. How many miles of line are already constructed in connection with this bit of railway?

Mr. GRAHAM: About fifty-eight, I think.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this the line on which we now have the motor car service?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not that information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know how the situation stands now, but we used to have only a motor car service on one of these lines, at any rate. There was not enough business to run a train. Does the minister know anything about that?

Mr. GRAHAM: The object of this bill is to get connection between the line and tidewater. I will try to get some more information, but it seems to me that there would be a great development of the timber-carrying trade. To haul the timber to Victoria to get to tidewater, as the memorandum states, the mileage is altogether too great; but if this short branch of eight miles were constructed, it would enable the timber to be carried on this railway and it would induce a development in that trade to get to tidewater by a very few miles' hauling.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What lumber is carried now on the railway? All of the lumber is not fifty-eight miles from tidewater.

Mr. CAHILL: How can lumber be carried on a railroad that is not built?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was not referring to the extension; I was referring to the existing fifty-eight miles of track, as the hon. member knows. I am asking again what lumber is carried on that existing fifty-eight miles of track?

Mr. GRAHAM: Just this explanation which my hon. friend did not get. I would imagine the haulage to Victoria was very great. The memorandum reads:

> The construction of this line will make possible the hauling of logs off the Vancouver island line, which at present has a length which is prohibitive.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is all the lumber at the far end of the line?

Mr. GRAHAM: I could not say that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister, when he comes back, will be kind enough to have a little information as to this line of fifty-eight miles, what the service is, whether the truth is, as my recollection goes, that you have only a motor car service on it, or whether a good deal of business is done, because we have no information now.

Mr. McBRIDE: I might say from what I know of the timber on Vancouver island that I would not be at all surprised, if this line were built, if enough revenue were received from it to pay for the building of it in the first twelve months after it is completed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this a logging line, or what?

Mr. McBRIDE: It is not only a timber country but there is a large agricultural district behind it as well.

Mr. DICKIE: I am thoroughly familiar with all the conditions relating to this particular line and I can inform the committee that it is one that is entirely justifiable. There is no motor service in this locality; what the hon. member (Sir Henry Drayton) is referring to is another line going into Sidney. Logs are already hauled on the line in question, 55 miles into Victoria and the railway is losing money on every carload of logs it carries. In the first place the line was badly conceived. The project was undertaken at the time that Mackenzie and Mann came to the British Columbia government for assistance for the line from Yellow Head pass to Vancouver. The people of Vancouver island and particularly of Victoria thought that if money was to be granted to these people some consideration should be shown Vancouver island, and the government of Sir Richard McBride, behind whom were all the people of the island, said to Mackenzie and Mann that they would have to build the island section or the government would not guarantee the bonds of the mainland section. Sir William Mackenzie however objected strongly but finally he gave way and this line was projected from Victoria to the Alberni canal, the district represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Neill). I do not know how much was expended on it, but it runs for some 50 or 60 miles and is more or less graded through to Alberni canal. It was a mistake in the first instance to have started the line from Victoria; it should have been started from Cowichan bay. Had they built the line from Cowichan bay to Cowichan lake this 8 miles would have carried the line to Cowichan lake, with the additional assistance asked for in a subsequent resolution, and they would have had the best paying line in Canada. The Canadian Pacific Railway with splendid business sense, while we were dallying with the matter and had not enough money to complete the line to Cowichan lake, ran a line from their main line into Cowichan lake, a distance of 20 miles. I am safe in saying that that 20 miles is the best paying piece of line in the whole Canadian Pacific system. There are logging trains every hour of the day. This 8 mile spur which connects with the Canadian Northern system is not a competitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because it opens up an immense body of timber long before it gets into the country where the Canadian Pacific Railway operates on the slope of the mountainside across the river. This line, with the spur, and with the line that is asked for in the next resolution, will pay the interest on the sinking fund on the total amount of money expended on the road. Forty or fifty miles of that road should never have been built. There is little traffic originating on it for fully forty miles. I know the conditions in this part of the country perhaps better than the engineers who have so strongly recommended the line proposed in this and the following resolution and I think it is fully justified. It runs through a dense forest until it gets to Alberni canal, a distance of 50 or 60 miles. Any one familiar with the forests of British Columbia knows what I mean when I say that the forests in this locality are dense; a cut of two hundred thousand feet per acre is not unusual. Now, I rather hesitate to say anything in support of the resolution for fear that I shall arouse the criticism of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, but there is no question whatever that this proposed line is absolutely necessary. There is no railway more justified than this, and it seems to me that the information that has been given by the engineers is quite adequate. Three members in this House, all hon. gentlemen, who know the conditions in the West, get up and say that a line—the Vernon line—is amply justified and is necessary, and still there seemed doubt in the matter. What more information do hon. gentlemen want than has been submitted? I am only one member advocating this but I know that what I say cannot be contradicted. Only a trivial amount is involved in comparison with what is spent on other lines and I do not think that there should be any objection whatever to the bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 34, respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line to Cowichan bay, on Vancouver island.

MILE 100, VANCOUVER ISLAND

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction of a Canadian National Railway line, being an extension of the Vancouver island main line of the Canadian Northern Pacific railway from mile 74 to mile 100, in the province of British Columbia; mileage already graded, 55 miles; estimated mileage including existing grading, 26 miles; estimated cost, $348,300.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: I insist on putting on Hansard the estimates and explanations in connection with these resolutions so that hon. gentlemen will have the information before them. The memorandum from the Canadian National Railways in regard to this resolution is as follows:

Vancouver island, Mile 74-100—	Cost
Grade now ahead of track, 55 miles—
Proposed in 1924,—9 miles track and ballast..	$155,000
Proposed in 1925,—17 miles track and ballast..	193,300
	$348,300

It is proposed in 1924 to lay 9 miles of track from the foot of Cowichan lake to Cottonwood, and repair 17 further miles of grade, at an estimated cost of $155,000. In 1925 to lay the track from Cottonwood, Mile 83, to Mile 100, at a cost of $193,300 for the year.

Prior to 1914 the grade on this line had been opened up to Mile 135.7 and had been completed continuously to Mile 109, with certain patches incomplete from there to Mile 135.7.

By 1921 the bridges and track had been completed to Mile 74.0, at the foot of the Cowichan lake, and subsequently nothing further has been done on this line.

The character of the country for the first 16 or 17 miles out of Victoria is partly agricultural and partly timber area of a light and scattered character of fir timber, of which a good deal has already been logged off. From Mile 20.0 to Mile 50.0 is fully timbered country, but the timber is not as thick nor as heavy as further ahead on the line. From Mile 50.0 through to the Alberni canal the line runs through an exceptionally heavy stand of timber on which, up to the present, there has been practically no development, except along the Cowichan lake where considerable logging operations have been and are going on during the working seasons. The only business of any consequence that can be expected from this line for a great many years to come will be timber and its products until the timber has been cleared and the stumps taken up to permit of agricultural development.

The justification for construction of this line is to handle the timber and its products. As the haul from Cowichan lake on the line to Victoria is 74 miles over a line of 1.5 per cent grades and 12 degrees curves, rates that would pay the railway would be excessive. To shorten this distance an alternative has been looked for and found by the proposed construction of what is known as the Cowichan bay cut-off, which would be a branch 10 miles in length from a point on the line about 12½ miles south of the foot of Cowichan lake—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the last one you dealt with.

Mr. GRAHAM: This line in connection with the other will complete the line to tidewater——Mile 62.0 to tidewater at Cowichan bay, thus reducing the haul from the foot of Cowichan lake to tidewater from 74.5 miles to 22.5 miles. This cut-off being constructed will warrant the extension of the main line to Mile 100.0 which would tap an area of exceedingly fine timber and bring it within reasonable rail haul to tidewater and should produce a big traffic.

SIR HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. gentleman show us the situation on the map?

Mr. GRAHAM: The maps are gone.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I have the map here.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will try to get a better map. These are not very good.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is not a map at all. There is a red line which shows you think of doing something.

Mr. GRAHAM: It shows where the roads are going to run.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is simply an advertising map without scale or anything. If the hon. minister thinks he can build railways on that kind of a map, it is a queer proposition. I asked for information in connection with the other line. I suppose we can hope to get that information. I want similar information to that which I got about the former line.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think the hon. gentleman behind my hon. friend gave the information in detail beyond anything I could secure for him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the hon. gentleman behind me knows a little more about the country than the engineers reporting, judging from the character of the reports we have, as he has gone into it more carefully, but we have a right to get it from the engineers, and I am going to ask my hon. friend to bring down particulars in connection with this matter as well as the other matter. The particulars will show what is being done, and we will have information, I presume, in connection with the logging area that is now being cleared. There will be no difficulty in getting pretty accurate information assuming these reports are correct, because, following the hon. minister as best I could, it seemed to me that what he read indicates that the whole of this destroyed area was once a forest, that you have a certain amount of it now cleared, and that you have the clearing back to such a point that it is no longer profitable to haul from where the timber now stands to the end. Is that right?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would imagine so.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can assume that is correct. If that is correct we will know what timber was hauled by that line from that area which is now exhausted, and we ought to be put in a position to know whether the National Railway system would be justified in making this investment or not, and of course my hon. friend will not forget the map.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 35 respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line to Mile 100 on Vancouver island.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

End of Vol. I.
