Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And the House being returned to the Commons chamber:

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of The House of Commons:

I am glad to be able to congratulate you upon the many evidences of increased prosperity. Though the general economic situation still reflects the consequences of the World War, the records of production, trade transportation, employment and public finance have been uniformly increasingly favourable throughout the Dominion. The state of general employment has been distinctly better. The volume of business has steadily increased. Especially has the country reason to feel gratified at the expansion to a notable degree of its public revenues and decline of its expenditures.

I am persuaded that a reduction in taxation, and in production and transportation costs, such as will encourage the investment of capital in industrial enterprise and attract settlers in large numbers to our Dominion, are all that are necessary to effect an economic development hitherto unparalleled.

My ministers are strongly of the opinion that a reduction of taxation is of first importance, and that to this end the efforts already put forth to combine strict economy in the administration of the public services with rigorous retrenchment in public expenditures, should be furthered in as many directions as may be possible. This is the more imperative, in that the margin of controllable expenditure within which economies can be effected is necessarily restricted.

My ministers believe, however, that in virtue of economies already effected they will, when the present financial year closes, be able to announce to the country that for the first time since 1912-1913 the national budget has been balanced. They are further of the opinion that when the budget for the ensuing fiscal year is introduced it will be found that the relation between public revenue and public expenditure is such as to justify some immediate reduction of taxation.

In the opinion of the government, such reduction of taxation as it may be possible to effect should aim primarily at reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, thereby aiding materially in the development of our natural resources, and, through cheapened production, effecting a diminution also in the cost of living.

Legislation will be introduced making provision for consolidation of the revenue collecting services of the government under one administrative head. With a view to simplifying and improving the existing system, it is also proposed to constitute a board to investigate and study the various modes of taxation.

National unity, not less than national prosperity, depends upon the surmounting of those barriers which have tended to separate western from eastern Canada and to discourage permanent settlement upon the land. Foremost in this regard are the problems incidental to tariff readjustments and to the marketing of agricultural and other natural products.

The stabilization and control of freight rates on grain from the head of the great lakes to Canadian ocean ports and thence to Liverpool, are receiving the closest attention. It is hoped that the report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission authorized last session to inquire into the subject of the handling and marketing of grain will be available for presentation to parliament this session, and that legislation based upon its recommendations may be offered for your consideration.

The further development of our magnificent inland water transportation routes, which will result in lower carrying charges for the products of the farms of the West as well as for the products of the mine, the forest, and the diversified industries of the East, is of vital importance. To aid in the accomplishment of this purpose work on the new Welland ship canal is being expedited.

A further interchange of correspondence has taken place between my government and the government of the United States with reference to the St. Lawrence waterway. In the opinion of my advisers, the importance of this question is such that further inquiry should be instituted before a final decision is reached upon the proposals which have been under consideration.

The important subject of marine insurance as affecting our ports; the permanent equalization of the rate on Canadian flour, and the removal of discriminations in ocean rates on other Canadian products are receiving attention.

As a stimulus to stock-raising in the Dominion, and of direct benefit to agriculture, the government has been endeavouring to obtain a lower carrying charge on all shipments of Canadian cattle.

Every effort will be made still further to develop the policy of Canadian trade via Canadian ports.

Particularly satisfactory and promising is the material improvement which has taken place in the financial condition of the Canadian National Railway system.

The Dominion Fuel Board has been created to study and make recommendations in regard to the development of our fuel resources with a view to making Canada independent, so far as possible, of foreign sources of supply. The investigations carried on by this board have already been productive of important results, and legislation to encourage Canadian production will be submitted for your consideration.

The amendments made to the Bank Act in the last decennial revision of the last session provided better guarantees for the public in banking operations; their wisdom has already been abundantly apparent. The depositors in the Home Bank have asked that they should be recouped the amount of their losses, and in their petition made representations which my advisers regard as so important as to warrant full investigation. To that end a commission has been appointed to inquire fully into the allegations made by these petitioners.

The Redistribution Bill of last session respecting the representation of the House of Commons will be reintroduced at an early date. Among amendments to be proposed to the Dominion Elections Act will be one providing for the use of the transferable vote in single-member constituencies.

Bills will again be submitted. with respect to the construction of Canadian National Railway lines, the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and race-track gambling. Your attention will also be invited to amendments to the Government Annuities Act, to provide additional encouragement in the promotion of thrift and self-help, and to amendments to the Militia Act with respect to the calling-out of the militia in aid of the civil power.

The Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference held in London in the months of October and November last between representatives of the government of the United Kingdom and of the British dominions and India, dealt with many subjects with which the Empire at large is interested. The reports of the proceedings of both conferences will be presented to parliament.

Members of the House of Commons:

The public accounts for the last fiscal year and the estimates for the coming year will be submitted at an early date.

You will observe that in the preparation of the estimates my advisers have felt the necessity of continuing the policy of rigid economy with respect to public services and public works, and of postponing until such time as a reduction in taxation has been effected some undertakings the early consideration of which are obviously in the public interest.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The prospects of an exceptional harvest, so bright at the close of the last session, have been more than realized. Final information as to the crops of 1923 indicate that they were the most bountiful in Canada's history. In again inviting your careful consideration to the important matters which will engage your attention, I pray that the Divine Providence, which has thus favoured our land, may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the Speech of His Excellency, the Governor General, to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except the introduction of bills until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this House under rule 10, said committee to be composed of Messieurs. Béland, Copp, Low, Kyte, Papineau, Tolmie, Boys, Johnston (Last Mountain) and Halbert, and that that portion of rule 10 limiting the number of members of the said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

Béland, Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; the Honourable Thomas A. Low, Minister of Trade and Commerce; the Honourable J. H. King, Minister of Public Works and the Honourable John E. Sinclair, Minister without portfolio, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the eleventh chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, intituled "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

REPORTS

Report of the Chief Electoral Officer in conformity with the Dominion Elections Act.—Mr. Speaker.

Joint Report of the Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms, with my approval, has appointed Edouard Taschereau, Esquire, to be his deputy during the present session of parliament.

THE LATE MR. AUGUSTE THEOPHILE LEGER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the brief interval of time which has elapsed since our last session, the hand of death has removed from our midst Mr. Auguste Theophile Leger at the time of his death, member for the constituency of Kent, New Brunswick. Mr. Leger became a member of this House in the general elections of 1917. He was re-elected in the general elections of 1921. Being of a very modest and retiring disposition, he took little part in the debates of the House. When he spoke, however, it was always with vigour, and with equal readiness in either the French or the English language. Few members were more constant in their attendance, and few have sought more faithfully to safeguard and further the interests of their constituents.

Mr. Leger was in his 72nd year at the time of his death. He was well known and highly regarded not only in his own constituency but throughout the Maritime provinces. Throughout his life he took a keen interest in public affairs. He was no stranger to the ups and downs of politics, having contested no less than six elections, three in the provincial field and three in the federal field, having won as many as he lost. For a number of years he held the position of postmaster and later of sheriff. Each position he resigned to enter a political contest. He was a staunch Liberal, and a loyal and devoted supporter of his party and its cause.

I am sure hon. members irrespective of their affiliations, will join with me in expressing our sincere sympathy with Madame Leger and the several members of the family in their great bereavement.

RIGHT HONOURABLE W. S. FIELDING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not customary, I know, to allude to the absence through illness of honourable members, but the House will permit me, I am sure, to give expression to the regret which we all experience at the circumstances which prevent the right hon. the Minister of Finance from being in his seat to-day. I called on Mr. Fielding during the morning and found him full of regrets at being unable to be with us, most anxious to be able to do his part. The old zeal and energy were there, but unfortunately not the necessary strength. I assured him that his disappointment at not being present with us would be more than equalled by our disappointment at not having him here. We can only hope that the breakdown which he has sustained and which is due to overwork in the discharge of his public duties may not be as serious as at first it threatened to be, and that in his advanced years he may be permitted to enjoy the health as well as honour which his great career so richly deserves.

SIR LOMER GOUIN—RETIREMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the honourable the former Minister of Justice found it necessary by reason of the impairment of his health to ask at the close of last year to be relieved of the responsibilities of office. I am happy to say that accepting the resignation of Sir Lomer Gouin from the ministry has not involved his resignation also from the House and that we may look forward to the pleasure of having him with us very shortly after the House has resumed its business. At the next sitting of parliament, on Monday, I shall lay on the table the exchange of correspondence which has taken place between Sir Lomer Gouin and myself in reference to his resignation.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, very rarely has it been our good fortune, in the now somewhat protracted period of years that I have been a member of this House, to open a session without being called upon to regret the demise of one or more of our members. Indeed, such has been the visitation of Providence on our numbers that at the moment I cannot recall any single session when the sad duty has not devolved upon us. This time, in the case of only one, the hon. member for Kent, New Brunswick, we are called upon to lament his absence from our midst. It was not my personal good fortune to come closely in contact with the hon. member for Kent when he was in the House. I did, however, on many occasions meet him, and I formed of his character an opinion much in consonance with that expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon. His companionable disposition, his concentrated devotion to his duties in parliament, his anxious fidelity on behalf of his own constituents, impressed all with whom he came in contact. It is for me a privilege to be permitted to join on behalf of hon. members on this side of the House with the words of the Prime Minister and with the expressions of sympathy which he has uttered in reference to the unfortunate widow and family of the late hon. member.

May I also associate myself with the expression of regret which has fallen from the Prime Minister's lips for the absence on account of illness of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the former Minister of Justice, adding only this word, that we regret alike their indisposition and that of other hon. members who are unable at this time to be amongst us.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I think I may speak on behalf of hon. members in this part of the House and concur in the remarks that have been made in reference to the death of one who was a member of this House. I am sure we all regret that such an occurrence has taken place, and I would express my sympathy to the family of the deceased member in the great loss which they have sustained.

In regard to the absence of the hon. the Minister of Finance, I can safely say that it will be a distinct loss to this House, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen in every part of the chamber will regret the fact that the hon. minister is not with us to participate in our deliberations. We all undoubtedly recognize his ability, his strength of character and his honesty of purpose, and no doubt the hope is general, notwithstanding all we hear that would suggest the contrary, that some day in the not very distant future, we may see him again sitting in the front ranks of the government.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 4.30 p.m. until Monday, March 3.

Monday, March 3, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to report to the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer certificates of the election of the Hon. Pierre Joseph Arthur Cardin for the electoral district of Richelieu.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Graham, that when this House adjourns on Tuesday, March 4, it do stand adjourned until Thursday, March 6.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I move, seconded by Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, leader of the opposition:

C., on Friday last, the 29th of February, on the occasion of the unveiling by His Excellency the Governor General of the monument to the memory of Lieut.-Col. George Harold Baker, M.P., be printed in Hansard as a supplement to the proceedings of this day.

Motion agreed to.

The bill was introduced last year, but it did not reach the second reading.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. F. L. KELLY, SECONDED BY MR. E. A. LAPIERRE

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. F. L. KELLY (Cape Breton North and Victoria) moved:

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, offering the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament.

He said: I crave the indulgence of this honourable House for the imperfect manner in which I shall present such observations as I desire to make in connection with this resolution. I am a plain business man with all the limitations of such as a public speaker and as a consequence I trust the indulgence given will be the less restricted.

I am deeply sensible of the honour which has been conferred upon the great constituency of Cape Breton North and Victoria, which I have the honour to represent, by according to me the privilege of moving this motion. I am especially pleased to have this honour in view of the fact that during last summer His Excellency the Governor General, the representative in Canada of His Most Gracious Majesty the King, was pleased to come to eastern Canada, and during his tour to visit my constituency where, in North Sydney my native town, as mayor, I had the much esteemed honour and pleasure of welcoming him to my country and of presenting to him my fellow-citizens. The visit of His Excellency, the Baron Byng of Vimy, and Lady Byng, was much appreciated by all our people, and the solicitude, and sympathy displayed by Lord Byng for the returned soldiers and their relatives, served doubly to endear him, not only to the men of Canada whom he commanded on the battlefields of France and Flanders, but to all our people irrespective of race or creed; I may truly say the people of eastern Canada are the better for his visit and that it was good for him to have been there.

It is customary, I believe, for a member to refer to outstanding features of his constituency. Cape Breton North and Victoria presents more diversified conditions than, perhaps, any other riding in Canada. Its industries are varied. In the first place we have the great industries of coal-mining and steel-making. The oldest coal-mining centre in America is situate within its boundaries; whilst its confines enclose one of Canada's greatest steel plants. Its coastal fisheries are extensive and prolific; and agriculture and lumbering therein are of primary importance. For this and other reasons, Mr. Speaker, the requirements of this constituency are many and varied as regards public works, aids to navigation, and increased public facilities in order that our industries may be more extensively developed, and our trade increased so that this constituency may, in short, come into its own.

From the business point of view the Speech from the Throne furnishes many substantial grounds for congratulation. It is gratifying to know that there are many evidences of increasing prosperity. It is pleasing to learn that whilst this country still reflects conditions many of which may be attributed to the great world war, every branch of industry gives promise of soon again being in a stable and wholesome condition. If I can judge the conditions obtaining in the business world of Canada to-day—and I presume to say I can—I believe there are indications, and many cogent reasons for believing, that Canada ere long will experience vaster and more profitable commercial developments than she has ever enjoyed in the past. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the people of Canada on having in power a government which has already restored public confidence to such a degree that business conditions have already improved, whilst the outlook for the future trade and development of our country is bright indeed.

Taxes are always odious, though at times necessary, Mr. Speaker, and for that reason a country should levy upon its citizenship only the minimum of taxation. That minimum should be assessed in the least obnoxious manner, and equitably levied upon those who can best afford to pay. However, I may say, capital should not be unduly harassed by excessive taxation, and the capitalist should be encouraged in his investments in every legitimate manner. Manufacturing industries can flourish and endure only where taxation and other costs are lightest, whilst the basic industry of agriculture can only survive when the necessary implements of production can be secured at the minimum of cost and the burden of taxation is made to bear lightly upon the tiller of the soil. The same may be said of that industry which necessitates those who prosecute it to go down to the sea in ships and have their living in deep waters —the fisheries. The task thrown upon the government of to-day, after the enormous war expenditure and other obligations, many of them wholly extravagant and unnecessary, incurred during the years preceding their coming into office, was and still is, a very onerous one. The Canadian people should never forget that the responsibility of the taxation of to-day does not rest upon this government, but upon their predecessors, who were dismissed from office only two years ago.

The removal of all artificial barriers to national unity and prosperity will find a responsive chord in the breast of all true Canadians. Canada is a country of widely divergent requirements, and it is only by endeavouring in the spirit of co-operation and forbearance, the East with the West, and West with the East, that we can hope to draw together conflicting elements. Canadians are one people; and in endeavouring to remove all artificial barriers to national unity and prosperity, I wish the government God-speed. Our people must be united for all time, in order that in this land of ours, wide in its great extent, and peopled as it is by men and women of all races and creeds, these various different elements may, as the days go by, become blended and linked together by national interest and Canadian spirit until the day shall come when

> Their varying tints unite
> And form in Heaven's light
> One Arch of Peace.

I think it is always a matter of honest and legitimate inquiry to ascertain whether the national revenues for the fiscal year have been sufficient to meet the country's expenditures. Ever since the year 1912-13 our national expenditures have greatly exceeded our country's income. Therefore, is it not a matter for sincerest congratulation to have our inquiry answered this year by the words of His Excellency which assure us that his advisers, the government of Canada, since 1921 have administered our affairs and governed Canada so wisely and well, that for the first time since 1912-13 the national budget has been balanced; and further, that, when the present financial year closes, the difference between public revenue and public expenditure will be found to be such as to justify the reduction of some of those taxes which have borne so heavily on our people? It is, Mr. Speaker, the most helpful sign, and with the government that holds the reins of office in Canada to-day, backed by the energy, thrift, ability and character of our Canadian citizens, I make bold to predict that ere long we may look forward to the day of surpluses in our country's financial transactions, the day when we shall return to such prosperity as was enjoyed during the golden era of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's regime. Already, Sir, I can see signs of "the roseate hues of that early dawn, the brightness of that day."

Mr. Speaker, I believe the government's opinion, as expressed in the Speech from the Throne, as to where the reduction in taxation should primarily take place is in the right direction, and I see in it the precursor of the further fulfilment of the historic principles of the Liberal party.

The matter of the consolidation of the various revenue collecting services is a consummation devoutly to be wished. I feel therefore Mr. Speaker, the tax-paying people of Canada will commend the government's proposal to constitute a board for the investigation of the various modes of taxation, believing, as I do, that the object of the constitution of such a board by the government is to have the taxation levied and collected with the minimum amount of expense to the government and with the least possible trouble to and exasperation of the person required to bear the tax and pay it.

Sir, the manner of the development of transportation facilities on inland waters, or any manner of transportation which will result in the lowering of the cost of carriage of the products of any of our important primary industries, will, I feel sure, merit the approbation of all fair-minded Canadians. In taking steps toward that end, the government is showing itself truly progressive and true to Liberal principles, and I am confident its efforts will receive the reward of services well performed.

Mr. Speaker, marine insurance is a matter of paramount importance to those engaged in the shipping industry, be they the owners of ships or of the cargoes carried therein. For a great length of time Canadian shipping interests have felt themselves penalized by being charged what they consider excessive rates for marine insurance, whilst in many instances there have obtained discriminatory rates against Canadian ports. That the government is seriously considering this matter is an earnest that we can confidently look forward to progressive methods calculated to ameliorate the conditions at present alleged to obtain.

The question of the permanent equalization of the rates on Canadian flour and the equalization of ocean rates generally will, I apprehend, find the attentive ear of our consignors and consignees and of our shipping and other business interests, and every true Canadian should earnestly commend this government for the steps proposed to be taken in that direction.

Mr. Speaker, it is exceedingly pleasing to know that the government promises to make every effort to develop the policy of Canadian trade through Canadian ports. Last year the increase of the British preference was conditioned upon the importation of British goods through Canadian ports. The effect of that condition was plainly evident at such import ports as Halifax, St. John, Quebec and Montreal, to which direct lines of shipping come from the British Isles. I would therefore urge upon the government that all goods coming across the Atlantic and Pacific for Canadian use and consumption, should, as a condition precedent to securing preferential customs terms, be imported through Canadian sea ports. The government has already in the short time they have been in power made a good beginning in that regard, and I think "That which they have done the earnest of the things that they will do."

All Canada will be pleased to learn that the financial condition of the Canadian National Railways has improved. This system has been a great drag on the revenue of Canada, with the resultant concomitant of great taxation upon our people. When railways are built they are supposed to do everything within the orbit of their power to help develop trade and industry, and it is to be hoped that the Canadian National system will keep in mind the rights of the people to cheap rates and transportation for the products of the basic industries of our country. The management of the Canadian National system should remember that the railways exist for the development of Canada, and I hope that as the people of Canada are ultimately responsible for the finances of the system the government will not be prone to divert to too great an extent the final say as to the management, policy and control of the railways from the government and parliament of Canada.

That the Dominion Fuel Board has for one of its main objects the making of Canada independent as far as possible of a foreign fuel supply is an encouraging sign of the times, and that legislation will be submitted to parliament calculated to increase Canadian production, is, I feel, of paramount importance to the great coal industry of this country. In the province from which I come the coal industry may be termed one of the most important. To-day that industry is more or less in a state of chaos. I do not intend to consider all the reasons for the conditions obtaining, as they may be many. Part of the trouble is undoubtedly due to disagreements from time to time between employers and employees. But I feel that the chief reason for the conditions obtaining is restricted and limited markets and high transportation charges. May I therefore make the suggestion and venture the hope that in any contemplated tariff re-adjustments the coal mining industry will be sympathetically considered with a view to the assuring to this industry the Canadian market and thus securing prosperity to our people, and a living wage to those who work in the bowels of the earth? May I also urgently request that when transportation charges on basic products are under consideration such rates on coal be stipulated as will assure its transport to where it is required at a price equitable both to producer and consumer?

The Canadian people annually send out of this country approximately one hundred millions of dollars for coal and coal products of various kinds, while we have within our own borders both west and east inexhaustible supplies of high-class fuel which should be used and so relieve this financial drain upon our resources. To enable the coal from east and west to supply the needs of the great central part of our country should be the aim of the government, and we look with hope to the announcement of a national policy on this important matter which will be of the greatest advantage to the whole country.

The building of railway lines where urgently required should always receive the favourable consideration of a government when the condition of the country's revenues permit of their construction, for the interior of the country can only be properly developed when there are satisfactory transportation facilities. In Canada to-day, I believe, there are many places in dire need of branch lines of railways in order to connect important sections with the main branch lines, and so open up and develop the interior country. In this connection I may say, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is a place in Canada in more dire need of a branch line railway, and where the people have greater claims to have one constructed, than in the county of Victoria, Nova Scotia, which is a portion of the federal constituency of Cape Breton North and Victoria. Victoria has great natural resources, but without railway connections these resources must remain dormant and her thrifty and energetic people be deprived of the fruits of development which would most surely accrue if they had a railway through their country. I commend the building of branch lines where they are legitimately required, and in this connection I strenuously urge the construction by the government of a branch line connecting Alba on the main line of the Intercolonial Railway with Baddeck, the shire town of the county of Victoria.

It is most reassuring, Mr. Speaker, to know that as a result of the amendments to the Bank Act, enacted by parliament last year, the act has been improved. The appointment by the government of a commission to investigate the failure of the Home Bank is, in my opinion, the most reasonable method to pursue; and I feel that when the report of the commission is received and considered by the government of the day, they will do what is right toward all who are vitally interested in matters pertaining to this bank.

At this session, we are informed, the reports of the proceedings of the Imperial Conference held last year will be presented to parliament. In this connection I wish to congratulate the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and his colleagues who accompanied him to the conference on the manner in which we were represented overseas. The people of the Dominion of Canada have the fullest admiration for the able and distinguished manner in which they carried on the discussions and negotiations for and in behalf of this nation within the British Empire. Right truly did they set forth the true conception and ideal of our people as regards Canada's position as an autonomous entity in that galaxy of nations which will forever surround the British Throne.

Mr. Speaker, there are many other matters in the Speech from the Throne upon which I should like to comment, but this House has been so indulgent, that I feel I should not trespass any further upon its patience. I shall therefore refrain, lest further comment make my too prolix epistle fuller still. I have much honour, Sir, in moving the motion of which you have been given notice.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing) (Translation): I think, Mr. Speaker, that my first duty, in rising, is to express my heartfelt sorrow in the loss we have sustained by the death of Auguste Théophile Léger, member for Kent, who was so unexpectedly taken away from the affection of his family and the friendship of all those who were in a position to appreciate the eminent qualities of his heart and soul.

If I now glance around me, I can but equally regret the absence of two powerful parliamentary figures, the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding and Sir Lomer Gouin, as a result of illness and thereby removed from the scene of our political activities. Let us hope that Providence will still for a long time preserve to their country these men who unsparingly devoted themselves to her moral and material prosperity.

If, on the other hand these cruel losses have not all been repaired, we should rejoice in seeing Sir Lomer Gouin's seat occupied by a man so eminent and praiseworthy as the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, the new Minister of Justice. Our most sincere congratulations equally extend to the Hon. Mr. Cardin, whom the government, by a judicious choice, has called to the important post of Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

It is not my intention to dwell at length upon the gratitude which I feel towards the Prime Minister for the marked honour which he has conferred upon the constituency of Nipissing, in choosing me to second the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I highly appreciate the favour which is bestowed upon me to continue, in this House, the rightful tradition of seconding in French the motion on the Address. Representing a county where almost half the population is French Canadian, I feel happy to see conferred upon my constituents, that is upon a numerous group of my compatriots, the honour to vindicate in their name the right of the official use of French in our parliamentary deliberations as well as in our public service.

At the opening of a session of parliament, it is the custom to briefly review the general outlook of the country. While undesirous of going into all the particulars which such an examination would entail, may I be allowed however, to point out to your kind attention a few phases of our economic situation. Undoubtedly I shall be unequal to the task which devolves upon me. I must therefore rely upon your forbearance to supplement my deficiencies as a speaker; however, I trust you will agree with me upon the reasons that we all have in hoping for a brighter future.

If I first cast my eyes, and this very naturally, I think, towards New Ontario, I perceive the enormous ore deposits of this vast region. Silver, nickel and gold, each day, are constantly being worked on a more extensive scale. The output of these precious minerals is already so great, that the mines of northern Ontario are bound to be rated among the most productive in the world. One might also mention the iron deposits which only await the just renewal of the Dominion government's bounties to further contribute to the incalculable mineral wealth of the district. Let us not forget that the development of our mining industry will soon be one of our most valuable assets making for the return of old-time prosperity.

Already this prosperity is being felt. Thanks, indeed, to a more firm stability of the European countries, thanks to a better international feeling, we may look forward to days less beclouded than those we have just emerged from.

But our reasons for this hope are still closer at hand. They become, in a way, apparent on the simple inquiry into the wise and well balanced policy that the present government proposes to pursue. You are aware, Sir, that the Canadian people rejoice over the reassuring news of a policy fostering commerce, industry and agriculture, together with a policy of strict economy. And it is especially our farmers and the wage earners, I mean, those upon whom the burden of taxation falls the heaviest, that applaud the successful efforts of our present rulers. Confidence revives on the farm and in the workshops, and I have no fear in asserting here that such confidence will not be in vain.

No doubt, in order that the financial world should participate in that ever increasing sense of security which is met with in the farmer and the workman, some reform will be necessary, but they shall take place when the time is ripe for such changes. Our banking system will, no doubt, cause the government to thoroughly and immediately investigate. They will endeavour, by wise legislative measures, to stamp out, where they may exist, certain suspicions, nay even certain fears inspired by recent and unfortunate financial failures. Convinced that stability cannot otherwise be established, the government will endeavour to consolidate a banking system where nothing will be left to chance, and where the business man, the farmer and the wage-earner will be equitably protected in their savings.

As everything bears a relation to one another when it is a question of making a country prosperous, the government will take every possible opportunity of keeping a close watch on agricultural progress and helping its normal developments. Such foresight on the part of the government will be the more justified because agricultural conditions in the West, notwithstanding the exceptional abundance of the recent harvest, have not brought that prosperity which was expected and have even left the western farmer in a more difficult financial situation than the previous years.

If it was now deemed necessary to review the industrial development of the east, one would be inclined to acknowledge that it depends largely on the more or less prosperous conditions of the eastern and western farmers, who are large consumers of products and contribute greatly to the commercial, industrial and financial expansion.

However, there exists another cause for the progress and prosperity to which I want to draw for a moment your attention. How much have we not deplored within the past few years, the enormous drain which our National Railways effected on the public funds. Nevertheless, to the great satisfaction of all, these distressing deficits of our state railways are transformed from month to month into surpluses which are playing an important part in our finances.

As a result of an energetic and wise railway policy, the national debt has decreased instead of increasing and even the ultimate financial success of our important routes of communication is anticipated. Indeed, the public has not failed to appreciate the improvements in our railway service, and in all possible manner has it generously given its support. Everybody now wishes to travel on the state owned railways, and all are desirous of confiding to their care the transportation of their merchandise.

There, however, exists another problem to which the government will devote their earnest attention and that is the problem of the St. Lawrence waterway. I do not wish to discuss anew a question which has already been debated at length. On the other hand, I should feel remiss to my duty if I remained silent on so important a question. Indeed, one must not lose sight of the civilizing influence the St. Lawrence exerted in our history. Explorers, missionaries and pioneers followed that great inland artery. The whole of our national history is linked, so to speak, to this wide fluvial route, unsurpassed throughout the world. For this reason must we congratulate the government in not acting too hastily, when it is a question of safe guarding, on that route, our most sacred interests. In appointing a commission composed of Canadian engineers, the government will have the backing of all those who have had knowledge of certain subsidised propaganda foreign to Canada, a mischievous propaganda, on behalf of an undertaking which not only would entail an enormous capital expenditure and maintenance charges, but which might also bring on dangerous international complications. Why, indeed, should we expose ourselves to see the control of the St. Lawrence river pass into foreign hands. The whole question is of the utmost importance. It therefore, seems to me that we should include in the above mentioned commission, a number of competent engineers, clear minded business men, and especially some representatives of the large shipping companies interested in the real progress of our river navigation and the financial success of the magnificent port of Montreal. In their eagerness to seize their prey, the promoters of this canal scheme have unskilfully hidden their secret intentions, by dangling before the eyes of the western farmer, the spectacle of an Aquitania majestically sailing over lake Superior to fetch and carry its cargo of wheat destined for Liverpool. Indeed, everybody knows now that it would be the water powers which would be developed along the water course between Kingston and Montreal, which is the sole aim of a propaganda so ingeniously contrived. The government will know how to deal with such rapacity.

Before, however, starting negotiations for a treaty relating to this proposed canal system, would it not be in the interest of the country to make a supplementary survey of the Georgian Bay canal scheme, would it not be better to encourage rather this truly national undertaking which, while contributing to the development of all the water powers required by eastern Ontario, would remain under Canada's control?

And since we are discussing water powers, let us hope that the Dominion government will look into that vital question: the proposed diversion of the waters of lake Michigan into the canal system of Chicago. If this diversion took place, it would become a real menace to the port of Montreal, and also to all the water powers already established between the Great Lakes and the gulf of St. Lawrence. These are all most serious problems.

But there are others which call for all the watchfulness of the Canadian government, and immigration is one of them.

So far as I am concerned, Sir, I shall heartily approve the government immigration policy, as long as that policy,—which I have no reason to doubt,—will continue to favour the coming of desirable immigrants. Already the benefit of a well-selected immigration has made itself felt through the whole country, and I am satisfied that no one needs to brood over the kind of immigration which is directed at present towards the Canadian west. We need immigration if we wish to develop efficiently our vast western territories which, within a few years, will become the most favoured region for European immigrants.

However, if on the one hand, we are to welcome a healthy foreign immigration, on the other hand the government must help us to stem the continuous exodus of our youth, and especially that of our French Canadian youths towards the neighbouring republic. The depopulation of our rural districts has, indeed, become a national scourge against which we cannot too strongly react. That is to say, the present government must take the necessary measures to retain those of our people who, attracted by vain illusions, might have had the momentary weakness of forsaking the sacred soil of their ancestors.

Before resuming my seat, let me here state very clearly, Sir, that if this task does appear difficult it certainly is not beyond the scope of the government's means of action. The people have full confidence in the ability, integrity and patriotism of those who are at present in charge of their destinies, and it is not without reason that the Canadian people feel themselves perfectly secure. Guided by a valiant and wise leader, an economist, coupled with a statesman and, who is besides advised by able and devoted lieutenants, the Canadian government cannot fail to rise to the height of the lofty purposes it has in view. Moreover, inspired by the wise and grand traditions bequeathed to it by the Great Deceased, the Liberal party will pursue its upward trend towards the accomplishment of its ideals, and it will as well guide this Canada of ours towards its immortal destinies.

I have the honour to second the motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Kelly).

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and my privilege to be first to congratulate the mover (Mr. Kelly) and the seconder (Mr. Lapierre) of the Address this afternoon on the acceptable way in which they have performed a none-too-easy task. All of us recall how trying is the ordeal when a new member first addresses this House. Sometimes the ordeal does not become very much mitigated with custom, but nevertheless the first is the most trying, and the success of the hon. members I acknowledge freely and compliment them thereupon. Possibly in respect particularly of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Kelly), if I caught aright a portion of his address, I should congratulate the government too. I observe that he is filled with ardor and enthusiasm over the many evidences of prosperity abroad in our land, and equally does he compliment the country on the excellence of the administration which now presides over it. I am sure partisan adulation could scarcely reach a more exquisite perfection.

I welcome other hon. members to this House who for the first time are among us; and may I extend my congratulations this afternoon to the hon. member who has lately become Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) and as well to the Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) on having attained cabinet rank. Cabinet rank is, of course, the legitimate ambition of all who look to progress so far as their personal positions are concerned in this House of Commons, and its attainment is a matter that calls for the congratulations of us all. Nor do I think that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Solicitor General are to any great degree responsible for those conditions and that state of government which makes the grounds for congratulation so limited at this time. Those are circumstances into which they come and of responsibility for which they from this time on will have to assume their share.

I noted of course, in the Speech from the Throne and still more after listening to the hon. member for Cape Breton North, that the government is extremely anxious to convince the House and the country that Canada is in a state of very satisfactory prosperity. The first sentence is a verdict and I am sure it has been read with curiosity and amazement by many scores of thousands of people in this country. The government in coming to the conclusion, had I think, chiefly its own interests in mind. I do not just know what these evidences are; much less do I know what the government has contributed to such evidences as may exist. I have noticed in official pronouncements, that great credit is taken for the comparatively large figures of our import and export trade. This is constantly pointed to as in itself sound and conclusive evidence of a wholesome and healthy national life, I want to examine for a moment—because this is of maximum importance—these trade returns with a view to inquiring whether or not they disclose such a proper choice of policies as tend to develop our country and increase our population and our wealth. I want to dissect some features of them in order that we may know just what their significance is, just what they do reveal and what lesson they teach as to the proper policies for our country.

It is true that for the fiscal year last past our import and export figures are greater than two years ago, greater than one year ago—and I propose in the comparisons I make not to go back beyond the three years. For, be it remembered, in the years that preceded, the total trade of our country in almost every line, exceeded the figures of the past three years in such vast proportions that comparison now is impossible. But, after the larger returns which were in the main the outgrowth of war conditions and which followed for a time after the war closed, the inevitable reaction came, here as in every other country. In 1921 that reaction was at its worst—at its worst up till then in the Dominion, in the United States, and in other countries as well. From that date on, we had a right to expect an improvement. Countries similarly situated to our own expected it, and countries similarly situated to our own realized that expectation. We have to look only to that one great nation which most closely in all geographical and commercial respects resembles our own, with which comparison can always most fairly be made: we have only to look to the republic to the south to ascertain how great has been the realization of their dreams of revival. The progress of the United States since 1921 has been phenomenal. Their country has increased in wealth: their trade has multiplied, their internal trade far more rapidly than their export trade; their financial condition has vastly improved. Instead of struggling the world over to induce people to come among them they are actually spending millions to keep people out. In this Dominion of Canada our returns show no such favourable condition. While we have exports now of about $1,014,000,000, as against $802,000,000, in the calendar year 1921 and $884,000,000 for the calendar year 1922, and while our imports show an almost equal advance, the nature of these exports and the results on the country, and the nature of these imports and their results on the country are such to give serious ground for reflection.

We are all aware, of course, that the year 1922 witnessed in this Dominion a grain crop production the greatest in all our history. The Speech from the Throne, of last year stated a just conclusion, that never had Canada been blessed with so bountiful a harvest as in the year 1922. What we saw in 1922 has been surpassed in the year just ended. The crop production vouchsafed by Providence is by all odds and from all aspects the greatest in volume in the whole history of our Dominion. Indeed, when I state that our grain exports alone for the year through which we have just passed exceed by almost one hundred millions of bushels the exports of 1921, hon. members will see that in so far as the bounty of Providence is concerned, Canada has had the basic conditions upon which a rapid advance should have been made. Our grain exports have multiplied in volume, accounting very largely for the increase in exports shown in the trade returns. Let not any hon. member misunderstand me when I make this criticism: I am as glad as any hon. member of this House that our grain exports have so increased. This is a yearly crop, and the greater the crops the better for us all, provided, of course, that they are produced and sold under conditions that make for the prosperity of those who give the toil and take the risk;—I will refer later on to what those conditions are and will try to ascertain just how far this greater production is reflected in prosperity, how far it is one of those evidences of which a government should boast.

But I find that the great increase in our exports is not even in agricultural products, but that it is to be found in what is known as "wood and the products of wood," largely wood, pulp and paper, raw unmanufactured wood, and wood manufactures. In these days have gone up from $186,000,000 in 1921 to $267,553,000 in 1923, an increase in that time of a very large percentage, and of some $80,000,000 in total product.

These wood products exported are very largely exported in the raw, in fact, there has been an increase in raw wood products exported far greater than in manufactured wood products, an increase so great as almost to startle one who examines the trade returns. I will give them later in my address. But in all respects, wood and the products of wood constitute by far the biggest advance in the trade exports of our country, and the least of all the factors in the advance in wood and the products of wood is the ultimate product, paper; while there has been an increase here, it has been the smallest of the whole, and the biggest increase has been in the raw lumber, the pulpwood and the timber, which is sent in vast quantities from our land. Indeed when one looks at the exports to the United States, he finds that over half, or to be exact, $226,000,000 odd out of $422,000,000 worth, consists of wood and the products of wood. Now, in this regard I wish to make a reflection. Wood constitutes one of the precious resources of this Dominion. Not only is the resource precious, but it is an irreplaceable resource; it is a fast diminishing resource, it is a resource depleting so rapidly that a few short years in the life of those now living is, at the present rate going to see the end. Wood and wood products we are selling, but when we are selling them we are selling our estate. We are in the position of a man who, competing with his neighbour, shows greater returns year by year by selling the neighbour some of his land. There is nothing to boast of, there is nothing to rejoice over, there is nothing to congratulate ourselves upon in this very rapid depletion of our wood resources. When the trees of Canada are gone, generations will pass before that resource can be restored. But what I want tc emphasize most is this: The object of the government should be to see to it that such regulations are applied, such policy adopted as brings within our own Dominion the maximum result for the depletion of these our irreplaceable natural resources.

An examination of the returns at the page I have in front of me shows, as well, that we are selling to the United States some $49,000,000 of agricultural products, and that during the same year we have purchased from the United States $78,814,000 odd of agricultural products; or that we a small nation are buying from a country of 110,000,000 of population about $1.60 worth for every $1 worth that that 110,000,000 are buying from us. This is the result of course of American tariff policy. It is a contingency that we must always anticipate, a contingency from which we may be freed for some short period of time, but which is bound to recur, just as certainly as the United States is bound to live. This is the condition under which we exist to-day. It is not a healthy condition. Under a consistently pursued tariff policy suited to this Dominion this would not continue. But this government in face of an American policy which shuts the door of the United States in the face of the farmer of Canada holds the door open to American produce coming into this Dominion to compete against the products of the Canadian farm. The Americans control their policy; we control ours, but I do not see any indication in the Speech from the Throne that any Canadian policy is about to be adopted which is going to give the farmers of this country the advantage they deserve and ought to have in the market which they helped to build.

There is as well a largely increased export of minerals from our Dominion, and minerals in the raw constitute a large portion of that export. It is a matter for congratulation to Canada that our mineral development is proceeding. I am waiting to hear—and I have no doubt we shall hear—hon. members of the government of the Dominion claiming credit for the mineral development of northern Ontario and northern Quebec. Perhaps they will venture to indicate by what means they are responsible. There is mineral development there. It accounts for considerable of the increase in our exports. But let us remember our duty is to see that these resources vouchsafed to us are to the utmost finished within the land that is our own, and to a minimum sent out of the country in such state that other nations and other peoples may get the advantage from them. These trade returns all indicate that this is not being done, they indicate that we are engaged to too great extent in the process of shipping raw resources in millions from our country to feed the workshops of other lands.

Looking for a moment at our imports, one cannot help but observe that we are buying from the United States very little in the way of raw resources—at least of raw resources that we do not possess ourselves. What we are buying from that country consists mainly of manufactured products—manufactured products which to the extent of seventy or eighty per cent constitute goods that can be made out of the resources of our own Dominion, or out of resources of our Dominion supplemented in part by imports which we easily can obtain. The United States have so developed their country and so directed their trade policy that they find themselves now shipping manufactured goods into Canada, goods produced by their own workmen, produced from their own farms and mines and developed in their factories, and they are buying from us the raw resources; a happy condition indeed for a country to be in.

From Great Britain we find our imports growing rapidly, and multiplying largely in the way of fibres and textiles. I hope hon. members opposite take some satisfaction from the trade returns in this regard. The multiplication of our imports of fibres and textiles since this government came into operation is something that challenges the attention of every Canadian who loves his own country first. Some forty million dollars' worth of woollens and woollen yarns came in last year, of which over eighty per cent could have been made in this Dominion with the machinery, and the plants already in existence here and by the workmen already trained in their manufacture.

Looking at our trade returns again, I notice that we still expand our binder twine importations, some 53,900,000 pounds, last year. We expand as well our importations of bituminous coal. This is what I call particularly to the attention of the hon. member for Pictou, the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): National Defence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of National Defence. Here is something, perhaps, for more national defence. It will be recalled that in order to excite the hopes and enthusiasm of his compatriots in Nova Scotia in the election of 1921 the hon. gentleman solemnly bound himself to move in this House a resolution for the increase of the duties on this bituminous coal, and he deplored the fact that this Dominion, and particularly Ontario and Quebec, were practically living off Nova Scotia, poor old Nova Scotia, and were not compelled to pay enough for the privilege of importing American coal—and the House is still waiting for the resolution. I heard the hon. member for Cape Breton North (Mr. Kelly) say that the coal industry in his province of Nova Scotia was in a state of chaos. Hon. members will be surprised at this statement. Does not the hon. member recall that to secure his election to this House his confrere from Nova Scotia, the Minister of National Defence, went upon his platform and told the people of his county that the coal industry was in the best condition it had been in for years, due to the fostering care of the government of which he was a member? I happen to have brought his speech with me, for another purpose, but I may just as well use it for this purpose.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do not take the report that appeared in the newspapers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am reading a stenographic report, and I would be just as happy if the hon. minister contradicted it as if he affirmed it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I will deal with the promises of my hon. friend in Cape Breton North election before the debate is closed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend does not seem anxious to hear his own speech. The stenographic report says:

> This business of buying coal from the United States has been stopped. The St. Lawrence markets have been restored. So far as our coal and steel industries are concerned, the year 1923 will have been one of the greatest years in this country.

I find that notwithstanding the embargo the amount of bituminous coal imported into this country last year was $49,899,099, as against the year before $37,387,285.—I am sure the people of Nova Scotia will hope that this class of embargo will not be continued too long—and as against the year before of $48,631,095, when the hon. member promised he would move a resolution in order to make it more difficult to import bituminous coal.

As regards cottons, importations have increased in two years from $46,877,000 to $70,399,000 last year. This, I find, is of considerable interest to many in our country. I find it is of considerable interest to many who, under conditions of to-day, are compelled to close their plants, and many, who, under conditions of to-day, are compelled to sell their homes and to seek in the United States labour denied them here.

Let me refer to a few further features. Our imports of farm implements—and this may have a special interest this session—rose from $7,732,000 the year before—the last year, indeed, before the effect of the hon. gentlemen's legislation came fully into view—to $11,893,646, or an increase in one year of about 55 per cent. If indications in the Speech from the Throne are correct, this, forsooth, is to be cured by making the importation of farm implements easier still.

Other features are interesting. Imports of rolling mill products, which amounted to $28,600,000 in 1921, increased to $50,800,000 in 1923. It will be interesting to have a calculation of how many artisans of Canada have been exiled from our country because of those importations.

As regards farm products, however, it is true that our grain crop has vastly increased, that our grain production has been gratifying in the extreme. I am quite aware that this condition is not universal, because there are sections of the West particularly in Manitoba which have suffered. Nevertheless, if we take Canada as a whole, a tremendous increase in our grain production has been vouchsafed by Providence. But for those products of the farm that are in the nature of manufactures themselves, largely manufactured on the farm, instead of an increase, there is a constant diminution. For example—and this I call to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell); I did not observe any mention of it in any of those speeches he made during his three or four months sojourn in western Canada this year—our butter exportations went down in one year from $8,015,000 to $4,900,000 last year. Our cheese exportations have gone down from $27,086,000 in 1921 to $23,600,000 this year, and cheese is one of the largest of the farm products of our country. Our egg exportations have declined from $5,444,000 to $2,900,000. These are some of the products of the farm that mainly count. These are the products of the farm the trend and current of which reveal whether or not a proper policy is being pursued: One does not judge the efficiency of government policy by the quality of the weather, by the warmth of the sun, by prevalence or absence of rust, by the visitations of hail; one judges the effects of a government policy by its reflection in trade returns which witness and give proof of the multiplying occupations of the people in their own country. However you put this government to the test, especially in those fields which it has invaded, where it has tried its prentice hand at legislation, in every case you find results that are disastrous or approaching disaster.

I referred a moment ago to the increased exportations of grain, and I stated that almost 100,000,000 bushels—or to be exact, 96,000,000 bushels—more had been grown for export last year than in the year 1921. At the same time, I find—and I do not attribute this, except in part, to the government itself, because now I am referring to those so-called evidences of prosperity as disclosed in trade returns—I find that wheat in 1923 sold at $1.06 a bushel at the shore. This was the average obtained by the Canadian exporter over the year 1923. The average obtained by the Canadian exporter in 1921 was $1.46 for every bushel. This shows a drop to the exporter from $1.46 to $1.06, or approximately 25 per cent. But this does not tell the whole story. While the price of farm products has been falling, the cost of transport, inclusive of lake transport and the cost of handling, instead of falling has actually increased and to-day the result is this, that the farmer is securing himself much less than the 25 per cent reduction would account for. It is undoubtedly true that for the whole product of the West for 1923 as compared with the product of the West for 1921, the farmer actually obtained only about 70 per cent of the amount that he obtained per bushel in 1921. And, be it remembered, the year 1921 was the year when hon. gentlemen went abroad through the land with flaming swords telling the farmers how they were oppressed by an autocratic government; how the middleman was bleeding them; how they were not getting for their grain the price they deserved; and how, at the same time, because of government policy, they were being charged excessive prices for the goods which they purchased.

A few more figures, however, are of interest. I have in my hand the export figures again, and I find that our exports of meats have diminished from $33,000,000 to $23,000,000 in two years; that, for example, our exports of bacon have gone down from $25,000,000 to $18,000,000; that our exports of beef have gone down from $323,000 to $226,000. At the same time, our exports of the products of the mine, in the raw state and manufactured, have gone up from $59,000,000 to $123,000,000 in two years. These are the things that actually disclose the meaning of our trade returns, and I want to ask: Are those exports being reflected, as they ought to be reflected, in the betterment of the Canadian home? Are they especially being reflected in the betterment of those classes of our population who, for years, have been in our land engaged in the historic occupations of this country?

I promised to give the figures in regard to exportations of wood and wood products, unmanufactured. Two years ago the figures were $74,136,000, and this year the figures are $123,694,000. This outside of grain is the big item of the whole export schedule.

There are one or two other figures which I shall give, and then pass on to some observations upon them. I refer particularly to woollen importations: Woollen importations have gone up to $39,389,000, an increase of some $4,000,000 in the last year alone; that refers only to a portion of the importations. When we include woollen yarns the figures are much greater still.

Now I desire to make some observations on the legislative efforts of this administration to stem the tide that has been proceeding. This government, of course, came into power committed to a tariff policy which had been resisted by the previous administration, which, by all members of that administration and by the party which it represented in this Dominion, had been described as a policy bound to result in disaster to our country if implemented in actual legislation. By that tariff policy the present government bound themselves; they undertook not merely to revise the tariff downwards but to sweep away entirely all customs duties on large classes of importations—on importations of implements of production, of food products, of lumber, of cement and of fertilizers, in short, comprehending a whole long list of classes of articles. In addition to this the government pledged themselves to a substantial reduction on many other fundamental lines comprising on the whole the vast majority of all the importations of this Dominion. Immediately they got into power they proceeded to cast aside that programme. Instead, they began to describe it by indefinite names; they called it something which was all right in 1919 but, as the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Cardin) says wholly inapplicable in the present day and generation; they described it, in the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as a chart and compass to be looked at but not to be followed; they described it, in the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), as something which he never believed in at all and did not believe in to-day, and never intended to put into effect. In that policy not one hon. gentleman on the government benches had any more belief than we have on this side of the House. But in order to entice to their side while in parliament, hon. members to my left, they proceeded to give little concessions here and there, hoping that the results might not be too baneful commercially and would be profitable politically. They went upon the principle that

> Round white stones will serve, they say,
> As well as eggs to make hens lay.

And so they touched the tariff on farm implements; they touched the tariff on textiles; they touched the tariff particularly on woollens; and they touched the tariff on British boots and shoes but not on the American product. Now let us examine the effect of the government's intrusions in tariff policy. I speak first of farm implements. I wonder what has been the progress of the disease since the government applied its cure. Farm implements were too high; that was the great complaint. Throughout western Canada they complained that the farmer was being mulcted by the big manufacturers; the then "autocratic" government had so legislated, they said, that he had to pay too much for his implements of production. Such was the disease. Let us examine its progress so far. There has been a reduction of 2½ per cent duty on farm implements. How much has there been in the price? Eevery hon. gentleman to my left and every hon. gentleman elsewhere in this House who has purchased farm implements during the latter part of last year found himself paying not less but more; something in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent to-day represents the increase in farm implements over what they cost when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. I do not attribute the increased cost to the reduction of the tariff; I do not think the tariff had the slightest effect at all on the price; nor do I believe that whatever they do now it will have any real effect, taking one year with another. It will merely remove the manufacture from one country to another; it will merely dispose of it to the United States instead of holding it in Canada; and in a very short time the farmers' last state will be found to be worse than the first. What I emphasize to hon. gentlemen opposite is the fact that they are not making very much progress in the cure; they are not affording very much relief to the farmer who is getting less for his grain and paying more for his implements.

Coming to boots and shoes, what has been the result? The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) will hope it has not been much; and I venture to suggest to hon. gentlement to my left that if they want this session to test this government's fidelity to its platform they might just make a drive on the duty on boots and shoes. The Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) has gone; he no longer reigns in that powerful seat. The hon. member for Quebec East has taken his place. He went through the West denouncing protection. I repeat, if hon. gentlemen want to test just how far the Minister of Justice believes in their policy, let them centre their attack, let them face their barrage against the duty on boots and shoes. When you touch only the class that comes from Britain you do not affect things so much; but in the condition of the boot and shoe industry to-day the Minister of Justice will take very good care that the profane hands of hon. gentlemen to my left will not be applied to that schedule, a schedule which powerfully conconcerns his county.

They got into the woollen field; they lowered the duty on British woollens, the reduction being 2½ per cent in some cases and in other minor cases 5 per cent. With what result? It has multiplied the introduction of British goods and brought about the displacement of the Canadian product, with the consequence that since the first of 1923, of our 124 woollen factories in Canada 20 have closed altogether; and as regards the 124, of all their machinery, cards, looms and all the rest 40 per cent are idle at the present time and the artisans have passed to the United States. The government have thus relieved the unemployment problem to the satisfaction of the Minister of Labour (Mr Murdock). And the process still goes on. All these "evidences of prosperity" I hold now to the view of hon. gentlemen to my left. But the "evidences of prosperity"do not stop here. What is the real test of the attractiveness of a country? Is it not the success with which that country maintains the basic population of which it is composed? Is not the first object of government, after defence—for defence, of course, comes first, and all of us in the generosity of our hearts will congratulate this government upon its noble efforts at defence—after defence, surely, is not the first object of every administration, is not the very reason for a government's existence, so to pursue public policy as to hold within the country the people who inhabit it? The country belongs first to its parent stocks. These parent stocks are here, and a government that fails to hold that class of population labours in vain in searching the cities and back lanes of Europe to get people to take their place. Unless we can first set ourselves right and pursue a course which makes it worth while for the people of the Dominion to stay at home, that makes it worth while for our parent French-Canadian people and our parent English-Canadian people, to stay at home, what futility is the effort to get other people to come in, themselves to become mere transients, passing through the sieve of Canada into the great reservoir to the south!

Now, what has been going on? I read with some amusement a speech made the other day by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) in which he tried to persuade an audience in Montreal that, after all, we were not losing very many of our people. I went to the trouble of getting figures on the subject, and I know of no reason why they should not be given to this House. I have the official figures from the American government, giving the exodus from Canada of those who declare themselves as intending to reside in the United States. These figures do not include those who go over there, I am sorry to say in large numbers, and do not so declare themselves, but who nevertheless remain within the folds of the republic. In the year 1921 the figures run, per month, 5,611; 4,308; 4,500; 6,009; 5,680; 4,644; 2,919; 3,763;—to be brief, an average for the year of 4,410 per month. This was the year proclaimed by hon. gentlemen opposite as a year of great distress, this was the year during which they expended so much pity upon the people of Canada for having to live under the sway of the government of that time. For 1922 I will give the figures too, because I recall that the Prime Minister argued two years ago that the effect of our policy would not pass away for a few months, but that after it had passed away the sun of prosperity would shine. I am going to show just how fast the clouds have receded and the sun has risen since he came into office. In 1922, particularly until the budget came down, and the government's new taxes came down, the time the government's brand new modified tariff policy was produced, the figures ran just the same as the year before: 3,015; 2,780; 3,323;—coming to April 5,309, and then 5,253. The end of the year though witnessed a figure of seven thousand for the first time in many a long day. The average for the year 1922 was 5,198 per month. Hon. gentlemen will see that the clouds were not passing away; on the contrary, towards the end of the year they were thickening and bringing little comfort to my friends opposite. In 1923 for the first three months the figures were 7,863; 7,312; 8,896. About then came the second budget, and I ask that these figures be considered by themselves. Commencing with April 1923 they run 16,317; 18,658; 18,879; 16,310;16,685; 16,874; 15,858; 20,988; 17,552, or an average from April on of 17,595 per month. This is the fine fruit and flower of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, this is the bright illuminating sun that dawned as soon as they got their stride and a chance to implement their glorious policies!

Nor did these figures tell the whole tale. Everybody knows—none know it better than the members of the government themselves—that the actual number of those who have gone from our Maritime provinces, from our central provinces and from our West as well, even in the face of a multiplied farm production, is far vaster than those figures reveal. This is the state of affairs we are labouring under now, this is the crowning evidence of that prosperity proclaimed in the Speech from the Throne and in the address of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Kelly).

Did hon. gentlemen make any other effort last year to bring about better conditions? If so, what has been their success? I often wonder if this session is to witness a repetition of the grotesque futility of the sessions that have gone. We have had some legislation from this administration. I do not see much reference to it in this remarkable Speech from the Throne. For example, we had Wheat Board legislation from this government in an attempt to relieve conditions in the West. They were going to answer the demand of western Canada as it ought to be answered, and they put on Wheat Board legislation which was to help the western farmer to get his crop to the market at the lowest expense and secure him the biggest return. So they passed the Wheat Board bill for one year, with power to renew it for another year. There it stayed for a year, and then they passed an order in council to renew it for another year. They empowered themselves to appoint a board to take care of the wheat of the western farmer. Well, I do not need to say this board was never appointed. The legislation remained there, but nothing further was ever done, and now I do not see any promise that it is going to be renewed.

Do hon. gentlemen to my left realize the horror of this situation? With what shrieks of despair the clouds would be pierced in western Canada if the farmers there understood that that precious jewel of legislation, the Wheat Board Act, was going to pass into outer darkness! How frightful the prospect! No more Wheat Board legislation from the government of Hon. Mackenzie King. The farmers have to handle the thing themselves, and do the best they can, abandoned by the administration that promised them so much. If ever there was a gold brick palmed off on innocent electors, it was the Wheat Board legislation of this government.

Then they tried their hand again. They passed last session what I think is called an Inland Freight Rates Regulation Bill, by which they were going to control freight rates on the Great Lakes. I wonder how many hon. gentlemen have read the tragic history of that legislation. Of course, it was preceded by a commission—such has been the orthodox plan ever since this anti-commission government came into power—and with the customary flourish of trumpets the bill became law. This bill compelled all those transgressors, those iniquitous vessel-owners, who they said had been extorting money unduly from the western farmer, those men who in 1922 took millions in addition to all that had been paid for freight carriage on the lakes in 1921; those who had absorbed the Crowsnest pass reduction and put it in their pockets, the bill compelled all those transgressors to file their tariffs with the Grain Commission before they could charge anything. The Grain Commission was to have power to reduce them to such a level as they thought to be just to the man who raised the grain. Well, the early consequences all of us recall. The American boats, not being under the jurisdiction of Canadian law, simply refused to comply. They fled the field; they confined themselves to American traffic. The business was thus given to the Canadian boats, and they had a monopoly. The whole traffic they had and a monopoly they enjoyed; and the Minister of Labour, with that Combines Investigation bill, sat silently in his seat. They gathered in millions in 1922 and millions more in 1923, and then alarm reached even the heart of the government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He hurried to the United States, fell at the feet of the American vessel owners, begged them to come back and rescue Canada from the plight into which she had fallen under the blow of their own legislation, begged them to come back and defy the law of this country, a law which this parliament had passed at this government's request. The Americans exacted their terms. They said, "Before we go back we must be indemnified against all breach of the Canadian law. You may say that we may hold the law in contempt, but there are other people in Canada besides you, and we want to be protected so as to be sure that we shall not be prosecuted by citizens of the Dominion, even though the government does cast its own law into the waste paper basket." And the plan evolved was this, that the grain shippers would bind themselves in their charters to indemnify the American vessel owner against breach of the law of Canada. And the Grain Commission, on the instructions of this government, said in effect to the American vessel owners. "You do not need to obey that law. Although, the law compels you to file a schedule, to file your charter, to file your tariff of rates,—you do not need to comply. It will be all right if the shipper instead just files his charter with a statement of the space consumed." And then the shipper entered into a contract to indemnify the American vessel owner for acceding to the appeal of the Canadian government to violate Canadian laws. The grain shippers, in their turn, evidently looked again to this administration. "What security are we to have," they said, "if we enter into this indemnity bond, this charter obligation with the United States vessel owner?." And the government came to the rescue once more. The government commission got behind these shippers and promised to stay behind them and justified them in this complicity in a breach of the law that this government had passed. Such is the ludicrous perambulation by which this government busied itself through the summer in nullifying the baneful effect of its legislation of the winter.

Now, we come to some other efforts of the administration. We had a Combines Investigation bill last session. The nation was suffering from a glut of monopolies. Malefactors were abroad in the land. Had not the Minister of Labour himself recognized them when he was a member of the Board of Commerce? He had seen them; he had chased them; he had tried to bring them to book, but he could not do so; he had only a wooden gun. Particularly he saw in front of him that awful Dominion Textile Company, and his heart burned with rage and with a passion to get after the monster. He saw as well the British Empire Steel Corporation; and in order to picture it in black colours, he declared and falsely declared, that it was the incorporation of the late government when he knew it was the incorporation of a Liberal government in Nova Scotia. All these malefactors he wanted the power to reach and to make do justice to the Canadian people, especially to those "masses" for whom his heart was bleeding. Those "masses" had to be taken care of against the excess and extortion of great monopolies eating at their vitals. So the Combines Investigation Act was passed—an act, by the way which did not provide power to prosecute anybody; an act which provided power to investigate, and after one circle of investigation was completed, to go around the circle again. After this exercise they could apply to the minister to go around the investigating circle once more, and after they got round it to their full satisfaction they landed just where they had begun. This, in summary, was the result of the legislation. The Minister of Labour was, appropriately enough, put in charge. He was placed on the seat, given the lines and the whip; and he was told—now you have a gun. How many hon. gentlemen have heard of any prosecution under that law? How many have heard of any investigation? I have not heard of any. If there have been any I would like the details to be presented for the delectation of parliament. All that I have heard was a pronouncement from the Minister of Labour after three or four months of operation in which he declared to a delighted nation that he had searched the country from coast to coast and could find not one combine or malefactor. Like Bolingbroke in the absence of Richard II, they had revelled in the night whilst he was wandering in the antipodes but as soon as the sun of royalty rose they stood bare and naked trembling at their sin So fled the combines and malefactors before the majesty of the sword in the hands of the Minister of Labour—this is really what the people of Canada are asked to believe.

I do not know that these escapades comprise all the efforts of the government, but they are the main ones. If there are any others for which the administration would like to take credit, I would be glad of a suggestion. What single effort of this administration has resulted in the smallest advantage to the people of Canada?

An hon. MEMBER: The Halibut treaty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Somebody suggests the Halibut treaty. There is no Halibut treaty. There would have been, I presume, only for the pride of the then Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe), who wanted to see his signature all alone with no British ambassador's name beside it to detract from its glory. But I am told—just to diverge—that there has been a tremendous diplomatic triumph. Forsooth, the British government has been persuaded to consent that after this, in such cases as that of the Halibut treaty, where the concern is mainly and wholly Canadian, the minister may sign alone again. The condition though is this, that if our government will first communicate with the British government and with all the other dominions and find that none of them have any interest in the subject, and if after that the British government consents to the treaty by recommending His Majesty the King to authorize signature, then the Canadian minister's signature can go on and stay on in solitary magnificence. This is the new pinnacle on the autonomy of Canada erected by the Prime Minister in the late conference.

Possibly I should refer to some other efforts, not wholly legislative, to remedy conditions. I am not so sure that the object here was so much to remedy conditions for the country as to remedy conditions for the government; but during the summer we had a repetition of those historic negotiations with hon. members to my left. The former leader of the Progressive party, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), was in the same manner as before hailed to Ottawa, this time accompanied by the Prime Minister of Saskatchewan. They were brought down amid very considerable publication of manifestoes and the beating of drums. What was going to take place no one knew. The public were warned, but they were held in suspense. Newspapers not in the service of but very loyal to the administration, under trying circumstances, proclaimed through their Ottawa correspondents that a marriage was contemplated—indeed, that the banns were soon to be published. After all it had been ascertained, said the correspondent of the Toronto Globe, that the demands of the western Progressives were really very small; they did not want nearly as much as was expected, and these two gentlemen were announced as being right on the threshold of the Liberal family mansion ready to take the last step into the bonds of political matrimony. But no sooner had this dispatch received publication than the whole thing ended. The clouds dispelled. All fears of hon. gentlemen from provinces to the east were proven to be groundless, for did not the hon. member for Marquette publish a statement that he and his colleague were not sent for to consider entering the government at all? Nothing in the way of such negotiation was ever even discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why certainly, and the Prime Minister says "Hear, hear." All they were sent for was to ascertain the views of western Canada, on the tariff and other subjects. Well, one would think that the Prime Minister would have known from hon. gentlemen to my left pretty much what the views of western Canada, as represented by them, are on the tariff, and on other subjects too. They have not been wholly silent in this House. But if he was not ready to take the spoken expressions of hon. gentlemen to my left, why did he not have some faith in his own ministers? Was not the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) in western Canada all summer? Indeed, did he not do the work of the Agriculture department out there—travelling to and fro among the people, occasionally delivering speeches, and drawing his salary at the end of the month? I think I have now pretty well completed the gambit of his work as Minister of Agriculture. There he spent the summer, and from the west he returned. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries of that day, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), was there as well. He travelled through the prairie provinces, and there he denounced, no doubt amid applause, the horrors of protection. There by his conduct he invited the Progressive party to come on with an onslaught against the duty on boots and shoes. He delivered himself of his very best in western Canada. He was a missionary to bring the Progressives once more to the side of the government. He too returned and laid his report at the feet of the Prime Minister. But this report and that of the Minister of Agriculture the Prime Minister contemptuously cast aside. Nor was he better satisfied with the words of the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low), for he pursued the western journey too. He came back and announced to eastern Canada that the West was just revelling in prosperity. He could see nothing there but good times and hear nothing but good news. This report the Prime Minister declined to accept as well. And then he had some others, I think. I am not sure but I think the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Robb) was out there. At all events, surely he had the new Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray). Did he not take him in in order to get the views of Manitoba? The Solicitor General fresh from the people had just entered the cabinet and was at his disposal, and as well the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau), and if all others failed surely the verdict of the Minister of Customs on western Canada woud have been accepted. But all of these ministers of his own who spent the summer travelling, whose private cars were to be seen dotting the stations of the western plains—all these ministers could not bring him a report that was any good.

Mr. BOYS: There was the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had forgotten him. The Secretary of State in order to illustrate the practice of joining the cabinet to see the world went out west as well.

Mr. COPP: When was I there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was in the West last year as far as Fort William, and the year before all through the West; so he got a bird's eye view one year, and a full view the other, and his opinion should have been of some value.

But I wonder what compliment the Prime Minister paid to the present leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke). Upon what principle of reasoning did the Prime Minister conclude that he could get western opinion or Progressive opinion better through the hon. member for Marquette than he could reliably get it through the leader of the Progressive party? The government, headed by the Prime Minister, sends 1,500 miles across the country and brings a private member out of the ranks of another party in order to find out what the views of the people are in order that he may legislate. This is the story we are told. Though the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Marquette may have very little confidence in the judgment of the Canadian people, I must frankly admit they seem to have infinite confidence in their credulity.

How often is this performance to be repeated? Does the hon. gentleman ever think of the effect of these performances upon the country? Last year, for example, we had a promise of stability. Two or three years before we had a promise of battering at the tariff till it was down, and hon. gentlemen to my left were thereby lured to the side, though not altogether within the ranks of the government party. But all these fine promises of 1919, 1920 and 1921 went by the board in 1923, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) announced that the assault was over and that stability was now the order of the day. Where is stability in the light of the present Speech from the Throne? Stability goes just where tariff destruction went. How long it will be gone it is not for me to prophesy, but I venture to say that the period of the submersion of stability will be just about as brief as the period of the submersion of the other policies which this government has from time to time announced, and from time to time abandoned.

The government comes now and brings in a Speech from the Throne. It is lengthy; it is the longest that I can recall, but, I think, in so far as the submission of material for the consideration of parliament goes, it is the most attenuated and aenemic in the history of our parliament. I would like hon. gentlemen to be good enough just to carefully analyze this Speech from the Throne. In the first place, shining out of every line, it is an electioneering document. It does not partake of the characteristics traditional in a Speech from the Throne. A Speech from the Throne by custom may contain some general observations on the state of the country, on the state of inter-empire affairs, but primarily it is for the purpose of laying before parliament the government bills for the ensuing session, the government programme, what it is proposed to submit to honourable members of this House and of the Upper House, to the end that we may address our minds to these subjects and determine what stand we shall take upon them.

This is the great purpose of a Speech from the Throne. This Speech contains a few references to microscopic amendments. Something is going to be done to the Government Annuities Act. What it is we are left to conjecture. I do not know what good it does to give us these indefinite words. It does not help us in the least. Something is going to be done to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. What it is we do not know, but there is going to be an amendment. Then there is going to be an amendment to the Militia Act by which there is no longer going to be this power of requisition of troops in the way it exists now. This is the programme the government proposes, aside from the intimation in the early part of the Speech that a bold adventure is going to be made in the way of reduction of taxation. But in so far as the Speech from the Throne commits them, this adventure is going to be confined to reducing the tariff on the implements of production.

We will all welcome reduction of taxes. Sometimes I have made a prediction as to what will happen in the course of a session. I will make one now. I will ask honourable gentlemen to carefully watch the scope of this tax reduction venture. I ask them just to measure the extent of the reduction and compare it with the extent of the increases, the additions this government has put on in previous years. One cannot help but observe that all of the additions of 1922, all the increases of 1923 were not heralded with any pronouncement in the Speech from the Throne, though I venture to say they were infinitely more important and momentous in their consequences to this country than any reduction we are going to get this session.

Intimation is given—at all events it is interpreted that way—that the proposal of the government is to take the duty off agricultural implements. This is the acceptation applied throughout the country, and the government by reason of its language is responsible for that acceptation. Since when has it been the practice in this Dominion to notify the country in advance of specific tariff reductions in the Speech from the Throne? Always in the life of Canada, yea and in every other country where parliamentary government prevails, the essential practice is that no intimation shall be given of any reduction or increase in the schedules of the tariff until the budget comes down. Why is there a departure from that practice this session? I do not need to ask honourable gentlemen to my left. Everyone of them knows. These are the "white round stones" which are expected to do the work. This is the bid that is made for the support of hon. gentlemen to my left, pending the production of the budget. What matters it to the government if business is disturbed? What matters it to them if there is a dislocation of trade? What matters it to them if capital is timid and the hand of investment is withheld? What matters it to them if artisans by the thousands apprehend the loss of their positions? These things do not matter if, forsooth, they can get enough votes from my hon. friends to my left to hold them in office till the budget comes down.

Then further on in the Speech from the Throne we find a lot of ruminations about what the opinion of the government is on this thing and on that, and the effort the government has made on one subject and the effort it is going to make on something else, what the trouble is here and there, and how much consideration the government is giving to it all. We find a prediction that this session there will be a balanced budget, and an implication through the mouth of His Excellency, that this must be the best government we have had for years because it is twelve years since such a thing has been done before. Never did self-puffery get to the stage of perfection that it has reached in this Speech from the Throne.

National unity not less than national prosperity—

Will hon. gentlemen be good enough to give attention to this reading, and try to divine what place it has in a Speech from the Throne, or what on earth it means in the way of a proposal to parliament.

> National unity not less than national prosperity depends upon the surmounting of those barriers which have tended to separate western from eastern Canada and to discourage permanent settlement upon the land. Foremost in this regard are the problems incidental to tariff readjustment and to the marketing of agricultural and other national products.

What better is parliament to be in receipt of that philosophy? What does this look to? What is the idea? Passing on, we find the following:

> The stabilization and control of freight rates on grain from the head of the Great Lakes to Canadian ocean ports and thence to Liverpool are receiving the closest attention.

We will all hope for a fruitful incubation. What control has this government over ocean rates? What is to be the nature of the operation? What do they propose in the way of legislation? In what direction are they looking? What specifically have they in mind? Or is this simply a sort of declaration of faith, in the hope that faith will be received even as works? In the same paragraph and therefore relating to this topic we find the following:

> It is hoped that the report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission authorized last session to inquire into the subject of the handling and marketing of grain will be available for presentation to parliament this session, and that legislation based upon its recommendations may be offered for your consideration.

Well, as there are no recommendations yet, what is the ground for "hoping" that legislation may be necessary? Certainly we hope the commission will be through. Our concern for the treasury is sufficient to ground that hope upon. If it does not have some recommendation, it will not be because it has not travelled far enough, or has not had a long enough retinue or that it has not cost the country enough; but I venture to say that its recommendations will bear the same relation to the cost that the historic mouse has borne to the mountain.

The next thing the government has "in mind" is:

The further development of our magnificent inland water transportation.

But the extent that their minds have progressed along this line is merely to make further inquiries, and they deem that this is progress sufficient to announce in a Speech from the Throne.

A further interchange of correspondence has taken place between my government and the government of the United States with reference to the St. Lawrence waterway.

We might have taken that for granted. The government will continue the correspondence, and I fancy we shall be at the correspondence stage when the House meets again, if this government is in power.

The important subject of marine insurance as affecting our ports; the permanent equalization of the rate on Canadian flour—

What does that mean?

—and the removal of the discriminations in ocean rates on other Canadian products are receiving attention.

These are "receiving attention" too. The attention reservoir of the government is evidently very full. What is being done about it? What is meant by "the equalisation of the rate on flour"? I asked one hon. member, a member of long experience in parliament, and he said he thought it meant procuring the same western rate as eastern rate. But this subject is under the Railway Commission. Does it mean the same rate on flour as on wheat? I do not know what it means. I venture to think the government does not know itself. But evidently those charmed words "stabilization" and "equalization" are now taking the place of "co-ordination," as they are to be found in several paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne.

The amendments made to the Bank Act. . . their wisdom has already been abundantly apparent.

The House will await with very considerable curiosity to know just what the fruit of this legislation so far has been. I have not observed any. I am not criticizing the amendments; what I am criticizing is the struggle of the government to boast of achievement. As regards all these paragraphs which I have read, may I ask what place have disjointed ruminations of this sort in a Speech from the Throne? At best, they are only a collection of hopes, mixed in with some zig-zag philosophy—the twilight musings of hon. members of the government before their last long sleep.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Then there is, as well an intimation of free farm implements, which intimation I venture to say will, in the next few months, do Canada more harm than the most ardent advocate of the change at least on the opposite side of the House, hopes will result of good from it in the next ten years. The harm is already taking place. How does this government expect that there is to be any progress, any extension of Canadian plants, any investment of capital of this Dominion, any widening of the area of labour, any stability, confidence and progress while this sword is, year after year, held over industry in this Dominion? Does the government not witness already the result of this constant threat which it has been holding out against industry ever since it attained the seats of power? Are the consequences not in evidence in the exodus returns from our border? Are the results not in evidence in our contracting plants? Are they not in evidence from the three or four thousand failures every year? I want to know who is getting the advantage—and where any advantage can be shown.

The consequence of all this is reflected, I think, in public opinion in some electoral manifestations that we have seen in the year 1923. We had a contest in Essex. It was won by the administration across the floor,—though I do not hear them venture any applause at its memory being brought back. No, the means of winning North Essex were in part revealed at the last session—I say, "in part", designedly. But a majority of 7,195 a year before was reduced to a majority of 1,072, or a fall of something over 6,100 in one year. Just two years ago last spring the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was wont to read very important lessons from results like that. He thought a government in such a condition should dissolve parliament at once. Then came a by-election in Cape Breton. A majority of 3,339 a year and a half before was reduced to a majority of 632, less than one-fifth of what it was in the general election. And this majority was secured by the clever contrivance, I presume, chiefly of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) which brought in a Labour candidate. Or probably he consorted with others to bring a Labour condidate into the field. This Labour candidate took most of them from the Conservative candidate, some 1,600 votes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My right hon. friend is making a statement that is wholly untrue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the main credit I have seen given to the hon. member in eastern Canada in late months. The facts speak for themselves.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I want to ask my right hon. friend to withdraw that statement. It is wholly and absolutely untrue in every way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which statement?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The statement that myself or myself in consort with anybody else, induced a Labour candidate to enter the field in North Cape Breton.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I venture to say the hand of the hon. gentleman was not far away.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I say that statement is absolutely untrue and I insist that my right hon. friend withdraw it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am content to let the evidence speak for itself and to accept the statement of the hon. member.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I invoke the rule of the House in regard to my right hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the right hon. member has accepted the denial of the hon. member.

Mr. BUREAU: Qualified acceptance! That is not the rule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member, however, took some part in that campaign.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): So did the right hon. member.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I did, and I am prepared to stand by every sentence I uttered. If the hon. gentleman ever succeeds in consort with his fellows in reducing a majority by some twenty-seven hundred, perhaps he will not be ashamed of taking part in a campaign.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My right hon. friend's part in the campaign reflected no honour nor glory on him, either in the utterances or the results.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is fortunate for my hon. friend that he speaks after me. I would be glad if he spoke before me; I would make sure that he did not misrepresent me. I will stand in this House by every word I uttered, by every appeal I made; and what is more, the hon. gentleman has disavowed assertions that he made, affirmed that he never made them, although they were taken down by a stenographic reporter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): And my right hon. friend comes to this House and makes statements which he knows are untrue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is uneasy and I take his uneasiness as a tribute to his conscience. The people of Canada read the address which the hon. member made. He took care to arrive, just two or three nights before the election. In his address, in order to illustrate and in order to confirm for all time the oft-proclaimed fact that this government has divorced the National Railways from all political influence, and in no wise uses it as an agent for themselves, the hon. gentleman made himself the spokesman of the National Railways to announce a decrease of rates soon to take place.

He made himself, the spokesman of the president of the National Railways when he declared that shortly, upon the return of Sir Henry Thornton, the small differential which the railways had imposed upon goods going to Atlantic ports over those going to Partland would be wiped out by the new National Railways administration. And for that he took great credit to himself. How splendid an illustration of the divorcement of the National Railways from political influence! How proper that a minister of the Crown, two nights before a by election, should be the man to announce a reduction of rates on the National Railways. This is one of the assertions attributable to the hon. member. But there is another.

I had made the statement, in addresses which I had delivered, that in my judgment the government had acted precipitately and had not exhausted all other efforts before hurrying solidiers from the ends of Canada, even from as far as Winnipeg, to over-awe the strikers at Cape Breton; and I stated as well that if the presence of militia were necessary to preserve law and order I would advocate it, as I had always done every time the occasion had arisen in my experience. I declared, however, that I did not believe that on this occasion all other means had been exhausted; and I added by way of illustration that at the strike in Winnipeg, in 1919 a more threatening one, a more difficult situation to handle, the government of the day had got along without sending one soldier at all into the area, and that without importing soldiers the whole matter had been controlled. In order to refute that position, which I had taken repeatedly, the hon. member read a telegram from his deputy minister stating that we had sent our soldiers—at least his words carried this intimation—not on requisition from the mayor or the civil authorities, but that we had sent them under power of order in council. And then he referred to an order in council passed on the 4th of April, 1918, passed with the support of his own finance minister of to-day, passed with the concurrence of the member for Halifax who on this night spoke with him on the same platform but who was in 1918, a member of the government,—an order in council to take care generally of riotous disturbances in the country; because this date in 1918 was many months before the close of the war. That order in council never was acted upon to the extent of sending in a single soldier in relation to the strike of 1919; and I repeat before the Minister of National Defence, who has everything under his own charge in his own office, that when he intimated to that audience that troops were sent from outside at the time referred to by the government or by anyone else, into that area, he intimated what was not true. Not a troop was sent there. The only troops that were used were citizen soldiers who enlisted and trained especially for the purpose of that particular crisis; and they were used only in demonstration, and at the request of the Mayor in order that all might see that the civil authorities, exercising civil instruments, would be supported if the need arose. By those means the whole situation was taken care of, and I venture to suggest to the House that it was done successfully, because the less display of force there is, the less transport of troops, so long as law and order are preserved the better always are the results. I say that matters were handled infinitely more successfully then than they were under hon. gentlemen opposite on this occasion. What I protest against is the assertion of a minister right on the eve of the contest, that there had been a misleading of the audience in a statement that was true absolutely to the letter, and the quoting from his deputy minister of a telegram which had no relation to what had actually taken place in the Winnipeg area. I had not purposed referring to this incident but for the hon. member's repeated interruptions of my remarks.

There was another by-election, this time in Halifax—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): There was one in Pictou, too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, there was one in Pictou, I know; but the hon. member may recall, that the Prime Minister stated in 1921 that there was no significance to be attached to the re-election of newly appointed Ministers. I did not contradict the assertion, even though it was made in order to nullify the significance of a majority of some 4,000 which we had obtained at the time in St. John and a majority of some 1,800 which we obtained in Colchester. And, as a matter of fact, indeed, very little significance does attach to the appeal of ministers, just appointed, to their constituents for re-election. Hon. members in every part of the House will agree with that. But in all the other cases where did the government come out? In Halifax where did they come out? A majority of 5,000 turned into a minority of some 1,900; a total majority for both candidates of some 12,000 turned into a large minority. Against what? Against the promise of an elevator, against the promise of the Dartmouth pier, against railways sidings hurried up, against the most blazing attempts at constituency bribery ever recorded, save only in the history of Kent. We had a vote last session for an elevator in Halifax. It was stated on this side of the House that probably a by-election was in sight. We were not far astray; the by-election came. Plans and specifications in due time were got out, and the receipt of the tenders was timed for the month of November, the election being timed for 5th December. The month of November came and so did the tenders. The newspapers of the district were plastered with paid advertisements of hon. gentlemen opposite, plastered with promises of a new elevator, modern in every respect, to cost $1,200,000. Speakers representing the government called upon the electors to vote for the government candidate in order that the elevator might be secured. The senior member for Halifax—not the hon. gentleman just elected—himself put advertisements in the newspapers calling upon the electors to support the government candidate, and the appeal I have before me. One after another, the appeal was,—"We have voted $1,200,000 for the elevator; you are going to have the elevator"; and the government candidate declared that he had the authority of the Prime Minister for this assertion. The Minister of National Defence speaking on the platform with the Prime Minister, supported the candidate put forward by the government. Here are some of the reasons which were put forward why the electorate should vote for the government candidate:

1. The differential rate of 20 cents a ton had been abolished.

2. The increase of 10 per cent. in British preference.

3. The government provided $1,200,000 for an elevator, saying, "The contract for this immense structure will be issued immediately as the Prime Minister announced on Friday night."

Next:

The construction by the government of large cattle sheds at Richmond, which is to aid Halifax in becoming the winter cattle-shipping port and will benefit largely in labour and money as a result of Mr. Fielding's success in seeking the removal of the British embargo against Canadian cattle.

The victor in that great conquest changes I see with the location of the election.

The two million dollar shipping pier at Dartmouth which is to be undertaken at an early date.

The government construction of wharves, breakwaters and dredges, etc.

Why waste all those votes that we passed last session? Why not use them to get government support?

The establishment by the government of an experimental fishery station.

This fishery station to include a drying plant, curing plant, smoke house, and all the rest of it. That was announced a few nights before the election by the hon. Minister of National Defence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I never made use of any such promises, and my right hon. friend is confusing me with somebody else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I did not refer to the hon. minister as making use of all these. I said the senior member for Halifax and the government candidate. But I am sure the hon. Minister of National Defence referred to the fishing plant. I have his speech.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does my right hon. friend say I should not have done so?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I told the House he did.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My right hon. friend is endeavouring to lead the House to believe that I was talking of cattle-sheds and half a dozen things of that kind. I never mentioned them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the hon. gentleman is excited this afternoon.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Do not worry about my being excited.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is not the senior member for Halifax. I do not think he could be.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No, you used my name.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Why shouldn't we do these things?" says the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My right hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, is misrepresenting me. I said, "Why should I not speak of the biological station?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, I see. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I must draw a distinction. "Why shouldn't we tell the people they are going to have a fishery plant, a chemical plant, a drying plant, a curing plant, a smokehouse—why should we not do that? That is all right." But, oh, he would never defend promising them an elevator! That is different. He castigates me for intimating that he would defend the promise to Dartmouth of a pier, or the promise of this cattle shed at Richmond; those things are beneath him. The class of politics he represents is such that he could not possibly be guilty of that offence. But when it comes to a fishery station, a chemical plant, a smoke house, a curing plant, a drying plant—it is all right to promise these as the reward for the election of the government candidate.

Now, let us follow up the history of this elevator. The tenders were opened. Even the Minister of National Defence announced that fact himself, announced it on the night of the 30th November. "There have been eight tenders received," he said, "and the only reason you have not had any of these accepted and the contract made is that the Minister of Finance took ill after getting back from Halifax, otherwise he would have called council together and had it done; but just as soon as the Prime Minister returns—and he was then on his way—those eight tenders will be reviewed and the contract made for the elevator." Do hon. gentlemen need to be told there has been no contract made? Have not they heard the election returns? No contract has been made at all, but the government organ a few nights afterwards announced, that the tenders, it is true, had been received, but after all it was found that the plans for this elevator were really too old, that instead of being plans for an elevator such as the government literature had described, they were really plans that had been prepared away back at the time of the terminal contract in Halifax about ten years before. Here the government had gone and used those ten-year-old plans for the non-existent terminals in order to hurry on the receipt of tenders and deceive the people of Halifax. So they said, "We find now we do not need an elevator of that kind at all, and we are going to have new plans and specifications drawn some time in the dim and distant future when perhaps another by-election comes to Halifax, or when perhaps a general election is in sight. Then this elevator will come on the political horizon once more."

I cannot review the conduct of this administration in Kent, N.B., with the thoroughness I should like. Suffice to say that all the records of Halifax were surpassed. The desperation of the government knew no bounds. Fishery plants? It would not have bothered the Minister of National Defence or any other minister a moment to promise a fishery plant if it would have turned the scales. I do not know but what the record of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was excelled by that of the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp). The Minister of Justice came in sackcloth and ashes to repent that the government had been harsh enough to have mounted police enforce the fisheries regulations. "This will never be done any more," said the Minister of Justice; "I can, as minister, promise you that no more mounted police will invade your homes to enforce the laws of Canada."

The Secretary of State said: Do you want a railway from Buctouche to Richibucto? If you do, you know what to do. But to have his exact language, he used the following words: the very diction will be identified, the whole style so much resembles that of his great political prototype from New Brunswick, the Hon. William Pugsley, that it would itself be sufficient for identification. So I would expect no denial from the Secretary of State. He said:

> Now, I want to ask you in all fairness, who will be your representative? Who will be more apt to get a more reasonable and fair consideration for you, Doucet, the Conservative candidate, or Bourgeois? It is to your very great advantage, and I believe it is your bounden duty, if your want better railway facilities for this part of Kent, to elect Mr. Bourgeois, who will co-operate with me—> —who will co-operate with me and my colleagues to give the people of this county what they deserve and what they want.

The language of constituency-bribing will at least never be more plain, though possibly in future years it may develop a degree of skill surpassing the language of the Secretary of State. And another speaker for the government, high in office in New Brunswick, intimated that the largest river would be harnessed, intimated indeed that the money of the Canadian taxpayer would pour in from every source, from the federal treasury and from the provincial treasury too. On these promises the government sought, and vainly sought, the election of their candidate in Kent.

These promises are what you might expect from this administration. This class of conduct is in full harmony with the style of argument, with the whole character and colour of the campaign by which hon. gentlemen opposite succeeded to power. I venture to assert that the opinion of the people of Canada, already so often expressed, now so evident that he who runs may read, now so apparent that conceivably the government is urging its supporters to keep in the best of health and the pink of condition, for they want no more by-elections—I venture to assert that the judgment of the people of Canada is already written and waits only to be handed down and that the electors only abide the day when the conduct which I have described will be once and for all put an end to—the conduct legislative, the conduct administrative and the conduct electoral.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is with much pleasure that I join with my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. Kelly) and the seconder (Mr. Lapierre) of the Address, and I thank him also for the kindly way in which he referred to the speeches they delivered.

I should also like to thank him for his congratulations extended to my colleagues who have become members of the government since the last session of the House, and to join with him in extending a welcome to the new members who are with us for the first time since last session.

To those who knew the reputation of the newly elected member for Cape Breton (Mr. Kelly), it was no surprise to hear the address to which we listened this afternoon. For some eleven years in succession and then, after a lapse of three years for another year, the hon. member held the important position of chief magistrate of the city in which he lives. He has held the confidence of the people there through his well-known business ability and capacity, and I am sure after listening to his speech to-day we all feel gratified that the part of the province from which he comes has the added voice which he will bring to the discussions of this House.

The speech delivered by my hon. friend the member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) in every way sustained the reputation he enjoys in this parliament as an effective speaker. His address to-day was delivered in the French language, but as those of us who have heard him before know, my hon. friend, like so many of his compatriots, speaks with equal readiness in the English as well as in the French tongue.

I regret that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is not in his seat at the moment. I should like to have addressed, more particularly to him what I have to say with reference to his own remarks. I must say after listening to my right hon. friend this afternoon that I was somewhat surprised at the comparatively mild tone of his discussion. My right hon. friend during the past six or eight months has been free to run at large throughout this country. He has been delivering addresses in different provinces—down by the sea, in the Maritime provinces; throughout Quebec and Ontario; he has been out through the West, I think almost as far as the mountains, if not beyond; and wherever he has gone, it has been with great difficulty that he has restrained himself in the use of adjectives sufficiently vituperative to describe from his point of view the conduct of this government and the degree to which in his opinion it had lost the confidence of the public. We have followed him across this continent in that pilgrimage of woe, in which he has played the role of chief mourner. We have listened to what he has said about the extent to which the business of the country was falling behind, the extent to which the government was burdening the nation with debt, and the extent to which taxes are being levied on the people of this country. One would have expected that after all my right hon. friend has said about the degree to which the government had lost public confidence, he would at least have had the courage this afternoon, to move, as he had the privilege of doing, a vote of want of confidence in the administration. But my right hon. friend did not take the method which parliament permits to test public feeling in a matter of this kind. He has left the extreme statements which he has made to the press of the country. He has not come into parliament and repeated here many of the things which he has been saying very loudly throughout all parts of this country.

In his peroration my right hon. friend dwelt at considerable length upon two recent by-elections, not the last one, but two recent ones. He seemed to think that because the government had not carried every seat that it contested, because it had lost two seats in by-elections, therefore it had lost to a very great extent public confidence. Well, there have been by-elections before in the history of this country. My right hon. friend was the leader of a government that had by-elections, and I would ask this House to consider for a moment just how the record stands as between my right hon. friend in his criticism of the government, and his own position.

In the government that he was a member of, the Unionist administration, there were I think twelve by-elections in a period of two and one-half years, and during that time the government lost five seats. During the time that my right hon. friend was at the head of affairs himself, his own administration in one-and-a-half years, out of eight by-elections lost three seats. But the members of this House will also recall that my right hon. friend had not the courage in the majority of cases to bring on by-elections. He left seats vacant, and when we went to the country there were ever so many constituencies not represented in this House at all because my right hon. friend was afraid to bring on by-elections. He cannot bring a charge of that kind against this administration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many were there?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the exact number, but there were a good many.

Mr. MEIGHEN: About one or two.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A good many more than that, and I would call his attention to this fact: We meet to-day without a single vacancy in the House of Commons. As they have become vacant, we have contested every seat. May I point out that this government since it has been in office, has had thirty-four by-elections, and out of the thirty-four it has lost but two seats.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the government win in Lanark, did it win Halifax, or Kent or Moosejaw?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend understands what I mean. I mean seats formerly held by the government. In two years, out of thirty-four by-elections there were lost on this side of the House, of seats which the government formerly held, only two, and that at the end of two years. I think that is about as good a record as any government in this country has ever had. Though we did not have the large following which some administrations have had, we did not hesitate to go to the country immediately a vacancy occurred and during two years we did not lose a single seat we formerly held. My hon. friend says that at some previous time I stated that there was no great significance to be attached to the return of a minister by acclamation. I do not recall the occasion he refers to, but I venture to say that if I made such a remark it related to the return of a minister immediately after the time at which the government was formed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not after it had been in office, not after it had been challenged over and over again by the opposition, not after it had been told that it had not the confidence of the people of the country. My right hon. friend was denouncing this government in the different provinces, but we brought on a bye-election in Ontario, and he did not oppose the minister, who was returned by acclamation. We brought on a by-election in Nova Scotia; he did not oppose the minister and he was returned by acclamation. We brought on another by-election in Manitoba, and though our minister was opposed he was returned to this House by a large majority. We brought on another election the other day in Quebec, and the minister was returned to this House by acclamation and took his seat to-day.

Mr. BUREAU: He was opposed in the province of Quebec by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, after my hon. friend had toured from one end of the province to the other. With regard to the two by-elections which my hon. friend refers to, I think he knows as well as I do the circumstances which accounted for the defeat in those two cases. I think the House is well aware, and I think the hon. gentleman is well aware, that the only questions that were discussed in those by-elections were local questions, except where appeals were made, as they were made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Baxter) of a sectional character—sectional appeals to one part of the country, setting it over against the other. That was the kind of appeal which my right hon. friends opposite made, but beyond that, the by-election had no significance whatever. We have taken the stand with respect to the laws of the country as we found them, that we would seek to administer them without fear and without favour. When we came into office we found, so far as the administration of public affairs was concerned, that to a considerable extent our hands were tied by the Civil Service Commission, which controls all appointments, which put into office whomever they pleased, without the government of the day having a voice one way or the other. The people of this country have not yet come to understand the meaning of that form of administration of public affairs. I am not going to debate to-night the wisdom of the Civil Service Commission carried on within certain limits and in accordance with certain principles, but I say this—and every member of the House knows it—that among the government's following from one end of the country to the other, the fact that many of those who had been bitterly opposed to the government, men who have been prominent in Tory circles, have been given political appointments under the Civil Service administration, has created dissatisfaction with the government from one end of the country to the other. More than that, as my right hon. friend knows, when we took office we said, with respect to the National railways, that we would divorce their control and management from politics. We selected a man in whom we had great confidence and made him president of the system. We gave him a board of directors to associate with him in the management, and we told him that they were to have a free hand in the administration of the railway. We believed the only way to test the wisdom of the system of national ownership was to give it a fair trial. I have taken very strong grounds on that personally. I have refused absolutely—and hon. members on this side of the House will bear me out in this statement—to listen to any appeal in any way to interfere with the control of the national railway system by the president and board of directors. I have told the president and directors that it was for them to administer the railway without fear or favour. In their endeavour to consolidate, to effect economies, in their endeavours in every way to safeguard the interests of the public, they have made changes in some parts of the Maritime provinces which have affected a large number of the citizens there. The government has been held responsible for that, though we have had nothing to do with the changes, and one effect of the changes which have been made in the Maritime provinces, under the direction of the present administration of the railway, has been a certain discontent amongst some of the government's followers, which has been reflected in part in the results of the by-elections. I think it is only fair that the country should know that. Instead of being condemned for our action, we are entitled to the confidence and support of the people of the country who want to see the Canadian National system given a fair chance and a square deal.

Let me pass on to the next topic with which my right hon. friend dealt. Instead of taking up his speech from the beginning and following it in the order of its delivery, with my right hon. friend's permission, I will take up the last point first and work back to the beginning. He touched upon the Speech from the Throne. I think that was the subject he dealt with just prior to dealing with the question of the by-elections. He said that the Speech from the Throne ought to discuss Imperial affairs, and ought to give an account of the conditions of the country, and the one thing it ought not to do was to touch on any question of the tariff. Whoever heard, he said, of changes in the tariff being described in the Speech from the Throne?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What did the hon. member say?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I spoke about a specific question affecting the tariff being foretold in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought the hon. member said any change whatever.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will show you the speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know the workings of my hon. friend's mind, and I jotted down his words. I knew exactly what he was going to say when he came to the question. The impression he tried to convey to the House was that the Speech from the Throne was not the place to mention the tariff or to mention—

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly since the dinner hour my hon. friend has had a chance to look at the speech he prepared when he was prime minister. Perhaps he looked at it or it comes back to his mind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I know what I said in the speech I made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now, I have in my hand the speech which he placed in the hands of His Excellency on the 15th February, 1921. This is what it contains:

> My advisers are convinced of the necessity for revision of the Customs tariff. In order to secure the most complete information a committee has conducted an extensive and thorough inquiry, and has secured the views of all parties and interests in every province. The hearings necessary for this purpose have now been completed, and the conclusions founded thereon will be submitted to you in due course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: Were they ever submitted?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question whether or not what is put into the lips of His Excellency is in general terms or specific terms is a very small matter as compared with whether the right hon. member leading the House puts into the lips of His Excellency words which he never intends to carry out and never does carry out. My right hon. friend knows as well as every other hon. member of this House knows, that it is customary to mention in the Speech from the Throne intended revisions in the tariff. I have in my hand the Speech from the Throne of March 25, 1897, and this is the clause that refers to the tariff there:

> A measure will be submitted to you for the revision of the tariff, which it is believed will provide the necessary revenue, and while having due regard to industrial interests, will make our fiscal system more satisfactory to the masses of the people.

That is the wording of the Speech from the Throne by a Liberal administration in 1897. That promise in the Speech from the Throne was implemented. The revision was made, and the promise made to-day by His Excellency will be implemented.

My right hon. friend said that the Speech from the Throne should contain some reference to Imperial affairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not.

Mr. BUREAU: He remarked that it contained nothing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend mean to say that he made no reference to Imperial affairs or Imperial relations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said that it was usual, amongst other things, to refer to inter-Imperial relations. I do not say that the Speech should do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was a part of my right hon. friend's criticism of the present Speech from the Throne. If he takes his own speech, the one to which I refer, I challenge him to find any kind of allusion to inter-Imperial affairs in it.

He said that the Speech from the Throne should contain some reference to the condition of affairs in our own country. I do not know whether my right hon. friend has read the first paragraph of this speech; but I think perhaps, it is worth while reading it over to him again.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know it contains that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me read the words, and if anything could be more specific and true, I would like my right hon. friend to tell me what it is:

Though the general economic situation still reflects the consequences of the world war, the records of production, trade, transportation, employment and public finance have been uniformly increasingly favourable throughout the Dominion. The state of general employment has been distinctly better. The volume of business has steadily increased. Especially has the country reason to feel gratified at the expansion to a notable degree of its public revenues and the decline of its expenditures.

This is about as specific and concrete a statement as could be given of the condition of affairs in Canada to-day, a statement which my right hon. friend was not able to put into any address which he ever presented to parliament.

My right hon. friend said: "Why should there be mention in this address of the Industrial Disputes Act?" I suppose because it referred to labour, he thought it was too insignificant a matter to mention. I notice in his own address he said.

An investigation is being conducted by the Department of Labour into systems of unemployment insurances and old age pensions.

That was the announcement he made, but nothing ever came of it one way or another. The reason reference is made in the Speech from the Throne to the Industrial Disputes Act is the same reason as applies to racetrack gambling and to the construction of the Canadian National Railway Lines bill which is mentioned in the same clause, because those were measures which passed this Commons at the last session, but were thrown out by my right hon. friend's friends in the Senate and which we intend to reintroduce at the present session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And by my right hon. friend's friends too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the next subject which was touched upon by my right hon. friend was that of immigration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Emigration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, emigration, if he wishes to put it in that way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend, in discussing this question, undertook to give to the House a quantity of statistics which he said were based upon returns of the American government. He gave those figures to parliament, but he did not tell parliament in the figures that he quoted that while the American government keep a record of the number of persons who leave Canada to go to the United States, they keep no record, nor do we keep a record of those same persons returning from the United States to Canada. Nor did he tell the House a fact which I think is, or ought to be known to him, that a little time ago an officer or officers of the Immigration Department made an examination of a number of cases specifically given to them by United States officials of names of persons who were put down on American lists as emigrants from Canada to the United States, persons who had crossed the boundary line, and of the total number of cases that were cited, 60 per cent were found to be the names of individuals who had returned and who were living in Canada again. The figures my right hon. friend cited this afternoon are not true as an indication of the extent of the so-called exodus from this country to the United States. He knows as well, that at different times in the past there have been periods when there has been a considerable efflux of population from Canada to the United States. We have witnessed some of it recently, but what is the reason? If we go back to the original cause, we shall find that one of the reasons was the fact that for a few years the machinery of immigration from other countries to this was completely disused. Of course during the period of the war no effort was made to bring in immigrants. Immediately after the war the immigration machinery was not set in motion; the offices on the other side remained closed. My right hon. friend did nothing to start immigration to this country during the entire time that he was in office. As everyone knows immigrants are not brought to a country in a day; a great deal has to be done in the way of advertising, in the way of establishing immigration offices for the purpose of giving information and the like, and it takes some little time before a movement will begin to set in from one country towards another. When we came into office we began immediately to establish that machinery. We opened offices in Europe and particularly in the British Isles, and to-day we are beginning to see the fruits of our work in the tide of immigration which is now setting towards our shores. One of the things which I wish to bring out is that the fact that immigration has not been coming for a number of years, lessens to a considerable extent the quantity of work which would be in course of development in the country and does not give the same amount of employment that would otherwise be the case, and for that reason in part some of our people, not finding the opportunities for employment in Canada they have expected, have been tempted to go to the United States to seek employment. But men who have studied conditions claim there is a fairly even balance between the two countries. For example, Premier Dunning, of Saskatchewan, in a conference regarding immigration matters which was held in Ottawa last fall, made the statement that as between the numbers of people going back and forth, in prairie schooners as they term it across the line, it was difficult to say which numbers were the more considerable.

My right hon. friend in one of his public speeches has pointed out that there is a drift from the country to the cities; that it is an inevitable thing, a natural phenomenon in all countries, likely to continue and not attributable to fiscal or other policies of a government. What my right hon. friend regards as inevitable has been happening here. Some of our people living in Canada, particularly those living adjacent to the border, have drifted over to American cities during a period of great prosperity because wages there were high and there was plenty of employment along construction lines; but those people are beginning to come back to Canada in considerable numbers, and I think we shall find, as this year goes on and is succeeded by other years, we shall soon again have the old story of reviving prosperity with increased immigration as we have had it in former years. Let me cite the figures for the last nine months. From April to December of 1923, that is to say for nine months of last year, there were 124,680 immigrants who came to this country as against 60,247 the year previous, or an increase of 107 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What were the two years?

Mr. MACKENZE KNG: I am giving the figures for the nine months from April to December 1923 as against the same months of 1922.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let my hon. friend give the figures for 1921.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have already told my hon. friend that he stopped all the immigration machinery during the period that he was in office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that the Prime Minister said that, but it is entirely wrong; not a word of it is correct. The immigration in 1921 exceeded 148,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hold to the facts that I have already mentioned. Another statement which my right hon. friend is fond of making is that we have been searching the highways and byways, the lanes and the alleys, to bring the scourings of Europe over to this country. I think I have the right hon. gentleman's exact words somewhere here. His statement has been that we have been—> scouring the cities and back lanes of Europe to bring people to this country.

My hon. friend has been making that statement in different parts of the country. He knows that it is not correct. He knows that for the most part the people who have been coming to this country have been coming from the British Isles. During the nine months from April to December, 1923, 64,127 persons came from the British Isles as against 28,525 in the corresponding nine months of the year 1922, or an increase during the last year of 125 per cent over the previous year in the immigration to this country of people of British stock. That is the answer I make to my hon. friend in his efforts to have the country believe that the government is bringing in larger numbers from other countries than from Great Britain.

May I refer for a moment to what my hon. friend said in reference to a conversation which I had with one hon. member of the House, the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), and also with Premier Dunning of Saskatchewan. My hon. friend seemed to think that it was an extraordinary thing that one who has the responsibilities of having to do with the shaping of policy in the country should seek to get information from a member of parliament or from the premier of a provincial government. May I say to the hon. gentleman that I have been getting information from as many sources as I possibly can. I asked Premier Dunning to come to Ottawa because while I had had the privilege of having a talk with the Premier of Manitoba, the Premier of Alberta and the Premier of British Columbia, I had had no opportunity of having a similar conversation with him, and knowing the important position he holds in Saskatchewan, knowing his grasp of western affairs, knowing his great ability and the public confidence he enjoys, I naturally was anxious to have a discussion with him before parliament met this session, in order to confirm certain views I had formed with regard to important matters of public policy. In the same way I asked the member for Marquette, not being sure whether he would be in the House at the opening of the session, whether he could spare the time to come to Ottawa for the purpose of a conference with me. He kindly consented to come and I had a most valuable and helpful conversation with him. I also had conversations with other gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, not merely since the session opened but during the time preceding which intervened between my return from England and the present moment. Wherever the opportunity has presented itself I have sought to discuss western and eastern affairs with members of parliament. My hon. friend asks me, what about the reports of my own ministers who have gone out West? I am sure the House must have been impressed with one thing, and that is the number of members of the present government who found it possible, and made it a point to visit western Canada and become familiar with western views. The very question which my hon. friend asks shows that the members of the government are doing their duty by the country in seeking to become acquainted at first hand with the needs of the country. If my hon. friend wants to have an answer to his question as to what significance there is in the reports of these gentlemen the members of the government who are from or who have visited western Canada, he will find it in the Speech from the Throne, which reflects their views.

There was one passage in particular the significance of which it seemed difficult for my right hon. friend to grasp. He quoted this particular passage:

> National unity, not less than national prosperity, depends upon the surmounting of those barriers which have tended to separate western from eastern Canada and to discourage permanent settlement upon the land. Foremost in this regard are the problems incidental to tariff readjustments and to the marketing of agricultural and other natural products.

If my hon. friend thinks that passage is meaningless I will refer him to the group of gentlemen opposite who represent constituencies in western Canada, and I will suggest that he inquire of them whether there is not in it one of the most significant truths ever uttered in this parliament. The exception I take to the remarks of my hon. friend is that he seems to think there should be no negotiations between eastern and western Canada. He asked this afternoon, when are we to have stability if these negotiations are to go on? Let me tell my hon. friend that we shall never have stability in this country until we get eastern and western Canada together, until we get a policy sufficiently national and Canadian for men to stand up in this House of Commons and in referring to it speak of themselves as Canadians, not as Progressives, or Liberals or any other class but as citizens who are anxious to see the country prosperous and united. We have set ourselves this task, and I make this appeal to gentlemen opposite who come from the West. We as a government have undertaken seriously to do the best we can, in the light of the knowledge we have, to bind eastern and western Canada together. We cannot do it ourselves, but we say to hon. gentlemen that if they are prepared to give us the support which we need to carry out the policies which we believe to be the national interests, we shall be able to accomplish the task that is before us. In making that statement I am not saying more than my hon. friends from the West have said repeatedly, namely, that they are prepared to stand by this government and support it so long as the government gives expression to the policies which it is pledged to carry out.

Now I might say a few words with reference to my hon. friend's remark on the tariff. To be perfectly frank, I could not make out just what he was driving at. I think he finds himself in somewhat of a difficulty. At one moment he wished to have it appear that the government had done nothing in the matter of the tariff. He told us, in not quite as loud a tone as he has done on former occasions,—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing but harm, I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—that we had done nothing in the way of carrying out what the Liberal party at the convention had recommended in the way of a downward revision of the tariff. He said, or at least he tried to convey the inference, as he has done before, that we had done nothing in that direction. On the other hand, when he began to seek for material to bolster up an argument against any further changes in the tariff, when he began to think about his high protectionist friends and the kind of doctrine they wish him to preach, he declared that we had cut the tariff so much that we were destroying the implement business and closing the woollen and textile mills and I do not know how many other industries.

Mr. BUREAU: Importing more raw wool and closing the mills. Logical.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend said that when we came into office we immediately threw aside our platform; and the whole tone of his condemnation of us in the last year or two has been on that score. Now he condemns us for carrying out that platform. He said in his speech this afternoon that I had described that platform as a chart and compass to be looked at and not followed. He knows I never uttered such words in my life.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It follows from the event.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are getting used to the casuistry of my hon. friend. I said that the Liberal platform was a chart; that the compass would be the government of the day, composed of men who were in a position to judge of the country's needs and situation, that they would be guided by the light of facts as to how far at any particular time it would be wise to go in carrying out the provisions as set forth in the platform. That is the position we took on coming into office, and that is the position we take to-day in reference to the tariff. If we needed any vindication of our position, if we needed any single statement to show that the position which we had taken was the right and proper one, it would be the attitude of my hon. friend to-day, who does not know on which score to condemn us, and which is equivalent to saying that we have avoided extremes and that in dealing with tariff matters we have exercised that caution, and prudence, and wisdom so necessary in whatever is being done.

We tell my right hon. friend that what we have done we believe to be in the country's interest, that to carry out what he himself a little earlier in his address mentioned was one of the most necessary and essential things for the development of this country may require us perhaps to go a step further. My right hon. friend spent a great deal of time in pointing out what we should be doing to develop our natural resources. If I gathered the burden of his theme at the start, when he began to speak of trade with the United States and other countries, it was to the effect that the duty of the government was to do all it possibly could to develop within Canada our natural resources. What is necessary for the development of these resources? Two things —capital and labour. We are seeking to increase the labour by adding to the numbers coming into the country through our immigration policy. What is the capital necessary for the development of our natural resources? It is first and foremost the instruments that are necessary for production in the basic industries. This is the capital that men have to work with. It is by the aid of capital and labour, made as plentiful, as ready and as efficient as it can possibly be, that the industries of our country will be best developed. And so we as a government have taken this position, believing that in the development of our natural resources lies the foundation of our national prosperity. We have said that just as soon as our finances would permit us to do it we would take the proper steps to relieve essential capital of taxation. We believe that when we announce the budget we will be able to declare that the time has come when there can be some relief from the burden of taxation of those instruments of production which are essential to the full development of the basic industries of the country.

Now, my right hon. friend said that he doubted our prosperity, that he did not know what evidences there were of prosperity, nor did he know what the government had done to contribute towards it. In the course of his speech he touched on some matters that appear in the Speech from the Throne, but he ignored other very important matters: He said nothing of what this government has done to reduce the public debt, to lessen taxation, and to effect economies in the public service—of these things my right hon. friend never said a word.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not know they existed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, before the night is over I shall teach my right hon. friend that they do exist. The trouble is that in his pilgrimage of woe which he has been engaged in during the last six or eight months he has repeated so often statements that are wholly untrue, statements that are in no way borne out by the facts, and has become so accustomed to listening to his own voice in public, that he has forgotten altogether what the truth is and what the facts are. I purpose tonight not to give my right hon. friend the kind of generalizations in which he has been indulging, not to make the imprudent and reckless statements he has been resorting to in the various provinces, but to appeal from the misrepresentations he has been making to the facts, and to leave the country to judge between us as to whether or not the propaganda which he and his friends have sent broadcast about the alleged extravagance and the waste of the present administration has any foundation in fact.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Start on the reduction of debt.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will do as my right hon. friend suggests.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What did my right hon. friend say with regard to the reduction of debt? Speaking in Winnipeg—I happen to have here a quotation from one of his speeches—my right hon. friend said:

> The burden of taxation on the Canadian people was greater than the burden on any people in any other country similarly situated in the known world.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is from the Winnipeg Tribune of September 8, 1923.

> He recognized, he said, that taxation in Canada must be great, but to-day it was beyond all reason. He wondered how people could reconcile the pre-election speeches of Sir Lomer Gouin, in which there were declarations that the public debt had to come down or Canada would be bankrupt, with the two budget statements of Mr. Fielding. The debt of the Dominion had risen by almost one hundred million dollars since the Fielding regime, and with the last budget had gone the announcement that it could not balance by $172,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Excuse me. I did not use the figures $172,000,000 at all; I used $72,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry, but I am taking the quotation as it appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune.

Mr. BUREAU: Good for the public, bad for the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has asked me to speak first of all of the debt and to show wherein this government has done anything to decrease it. I will not say anything of the debt during the period of the war. The country knows that while war is on the accumulation of debt must be vast, and while it might be expected that the government of the day would seek to meet some of the cost of the war out of the taxes of the people at the time war is in progress, which my right hon. friend and his colleagues did not do—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, which they failed to do, nevertheless the country would be prepared to expect a very considerable addition to the debt during the war and for a period immediately after the war. The war started in August 1914 and ended November 11, 1918. If we allow until the end of the fiscal year 1919-1920, six years, I think we are taking what might be correctly termed the war period. During this period vast expenditures would be made on account of war and demobilization, but one would expect those expenditures to end by that time. What was the position of my right hon. friend then? In the year 1920-21, during most of which time my right hon. friend was at the head of the administration, he added to the public debt $92,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says, "hear, hear." The next year, the year that he was prime minister, when he had the shaping of his own budget, when he had got past the period of demobilization, when we had come to the time that he says the increase of debt ought to end, he added not $92,000,000, but $81,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much of that was gratuities and how much was due to demobilization?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not going into the details of that at the moment. I am asking—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give the full details if my right hon. friend wants them. He knows that I have not got them before me at the moment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Soldier settlement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, soldier settlement and the like. But what is this government doing? Are we not also paying for soldier settlement? Are we not paying pensions and all of these other things?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very little.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend asked me to show how the debt had increased since the war. I have told him that he added $92,000,000 one year and $81,000,000 the next, and that $81,000,000 would probably have been $92,000,000 if this government had not come into office. We came into office on December 29th, 1921. In 1922-23 we had to carry a great part of the load that my hon. friend left us, liabilities that had nothing to do with the war but relating to a number of things that had we been in office we would never have though of undertaking.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will come to that in a few moments. But what was the result? At the end of that year we had not added $92,000,000, nor had we added $81,000,000. We had made an addition of about $31,000,000, or a drop of $50,000,000 in the very first year we were in office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the right hon. gentleman tell us what year it was that only $31,000,000 were added—the first of it and the end? I want to check him up.

Mr .MACKENZIE KING: That was the fiscal year 1922-23.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, my right hon. friend is entirely wrong. Either that, or the statement of the Finance Minister must be wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In 1922-23, $31,500,000, to be exact, was the amount that we added. But as I have explained to the House, that year we were not free, nor are we even yet, in the matter of shaping our budget, owing to the many obligations that we have inherited from hon. gentlemen opposite. But this year, having had one year in which to effect economies, one year during which we had some control, though not a great deal, over expenditure, when the Finance Minister makes his financial statement on the floor of the House it will be found that instead of there being any addition to the public debt, for the first time in the last ten or eleven years there will be an increase of receipts over expenditure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: (rising)—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am grateful to hon. gentlemen for their applause, but I do not need it. I was only going to ask the Prime Minister if he would be good enough to tell us how much of an obligation the country has incurred by guarantee of railway bonds, which is the plan this government has taken instead of lending the money directly out of the treasury.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give my hon. friend perhaps more in the way of particulars than he will be glad to hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, you will not give me that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be very glad to give him anything he asks if he will give me time. I will make my statement now and there will be ample opportunity to go into the details. We all understand the purpose of the propaganda which my right hon. friend through his press has been carrying on, and which he is seeking to carry on at the present time, with regard to supposed extravagance and all the rest of it. First of all, it is to conceal the waste and extravagance which prevailed while my right hon. friend was in office and which is mainly accountable for the large expenditures that still have to be made and the present heavy taxation. In the second place, it is an effort to undermine confidence in the present administration and to conceal what the present government has done and is doing in the way of effecting economies in expenditure and also in bringing about reductions in taxation.

I wish the members of the House to keep in mind what I have just said: that this year, for the first time since 1912-13, the budget will be balanced. And that will be done this year, not next. My hon. friends opposite have been talking about extravagance. They have been speaking of the "whisper of death." We have listened to all that kind of propaganda, and the country is beginning to believe that there is some truth in what is being said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says, "hear, hear". He is prepared to deceive the people; we want to give the country the truth—we do not want deception. May I say to my right hon. friend that if there is one thing which is needed in Canada to-day more than anything else it is a note of confidence and optimism, not the attitude of detraction and pessimism which my right hon. friend is so fond of taking.

Why were we not able to effect these economies sooner? First of all, there were the legacies which were inherited from the preceding government. There were legacies which grew out of their own extravagance. There were the legacies of war, the increase in the public debt resulting therefrom, the amount that has had to be paid in pensions, and for soldiers' civil re-establishment, and a large amount for soldier land settlement; and miscellaneous amounts involved in the refunding of the debt, an operation that relates particularly to the war bonds. Then, in addition there have been the special obligations which we inherited in the nature of subsidies to provinces and grants made to the provinces for highways, for agricultural instruction, for technical education, large loans for housing, in unemployment relief and several other contributions. There have been the outlays on railways and merchant marine. I would like to give the House just a few particulars in regard to these matters, and as my right hon. friend is fond of getting the exact figures, I will give them to him. For the fiscal year 1919-20 there were total disbursements of $785,869,611, including advances to railways of $45,000,000. The amount was considerably larger than that of any year of the war, but it was the year of demobilization and much of the expenditure has to be put down to that head. For the fiscal year 1920-21 the total disbursements were still as high as $528,283,199, much of it due to the waste and extravagance of my right hon. friend. For the fiscal year 1921-22, the year that my right hon. friend was in office for nine months, the total expenditure was $463,652,436, and last year, 1922-23 it was $434,452,340, or a reduction of nearly $30,000,000.

Let me make an analysis of that expenditure and see how far it was possible for the present administration to control the situation. The significant feature of it is the extent to which the expenditure is uncontrollable. By that I mean it is not within the power of the government to avoid making some of the large expenditures that have to be made. Before we can prepare for the services of the government itself, before we can attempt to meet the ordinary expenditures of the public service, we have to face vast obligations exceeding by many times the entire cost of government of a few years ago.

Let me give the principal items. For this last year, generally uncontrollable expenditures as growing out of the war were:

Interest on public debt	$137,892,735
Pensions	32,986,919
Soldiers' civil re-establishment	13,365,134
Soldier land settlement	1,819,825
Charges of management, premium, discount, exchange	1,003,068
War and demobilization	4,464,760
	$191,532,441

With reference to the item of $1,819,825 for soldier land settlement, that is for administration alone, and does not include, of course, loans amounting to some eight or ten million dollars. So on war account alone we were called upon to raise $191,532,441 before we could begin to consider any other items of the budget.

Then comes the generally uncontrollable expenditure due to the railways and the mercantile marine:

Advances to railways	$77,863,938
Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Ltd.	5,979,856

On the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, you will note, one of the colossal mistakes of my right hon. friend and his friends, we had to pay $5,979,856.

Then in further uncontrollable expenditure is included.

Regular subsidies to the provinces, under B.N.A. Act	$12,207,313
Miscellaneous uncontrollable (refunding debt)	4,042,931

That makes a total of generally uncontrollable expenditure amunting to $291,626,479.

In addition to all this uncontrollable expenditure the present administration found itself obligated by statute to pay over to the provinces the following amounts:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Technical education	$ 647,227
Grants for highways	5,854,396
Agricultural instruction aid grants	1,201,605
Employment co-ordination offices	264,590
Unemployment relief	944,878

That makes a total of $8,913,696, all of which we inherited and which we had to continue to pay whether we wished to or not, because they were contractual obligations.

To this should be added the expenditures which the present government had they been in office would never have incurred or committed the country to, such as the expenditure of $337,462 on the unfinished $40,000,000 terminals at Halifax. That is what my right hon. friend meant to put into terminals at Halifax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman had better get within at least one hundred per cent of the facts. He is at least twice, or something more than that out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend can give his explanation later I will let my figures stand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Try to be correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we take the figure of my hon. friend, who says it is only fifty per cent of that, that was a colossal waste of public money and addition to our public indebtedness. Then there was an expenditure of $562,120 on a dry dock at Esquimalt, involving another outlay of $5,000,000. Am I exaggerating there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, but the present Minister of Public Works said that the only fault he had to find with us was that we did not start it in time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The time when my right hon. friend started it was when he was seeking to assist his present political organizer in a by-election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my right hon. friend will permit me—I always permit him a correction—it was started and the land purchased and paid for in 1912, which was about seven years before the time he mentions.

Mr. TOLMIE: I should like to say to the Prime Minister that was five years before I ever went into politics at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend would tell us that the time he went into politics was when they started work on the dock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was started two years after.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There were in addition other large amounts outstanding. My hon. friend had some contractual relations with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, which this government had to meet, in an Exchequer Court award of $1,500,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Exchequer Court made no award. The government paid it without any award.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter was before the Exchequer Court and a settlement was made on that basis.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The settlement was made by this government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Other war claims aggregated a total of $6,784,623. I am giving these figures to the House that they may know why it was when the present government took office it was impossible for us to balance the budget at that time. I think any hon. member will see that these expenditures were all imposed on the government. We had to meet them before we could go on with providing the necessary expenditures in other directions for the public service.

Then there were also expenditures in connection with the acquisition of the Grand Trunk and associated systems of $100,523, or a total of $6,885,146.

That makes a grand total of obligations in the way of uncontrollable expenditure of $308,324,913.

Taking the total disbursements at $434,452,340, and subtracting the uncontrollable expenditure as set forth, totalling $308,324,903, it leaves the controllable or regular ordinary expenditure at $126,127,437. In other words, the uncontrollable expenditure has exceeded the controllable by $181,197,466.

In addition to that did I wish to take up the time of the House, I could give a list of commitments to which this government was obligated on account of public works entered into by my right hon. friend, on which there was outstanding on December 31, 1921, $13,342,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The chief would be the Welland canal, which the hon. member now says he is expediting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The chief was not the Welland canal. I am speaking only of contracts entered into by the Public Works department and am not including contracts entered into by the Department of Railways and Canals. Among the expenditures was $1,014,735 for Toronto harbour, on which my hon. friend had paid $2,000,000 odd, making an expenditure of $3,823,677 for the Toronto harbour, in addition to improvements amounting to $2,579,890, of which we still have to pay some. On the Esquimalt dock he had paid $497,140, leaving us a legacy on that account of $4,402,000; and the St. John, N.B., Courtenay Bay works, $5,194,470 on which he had spent $3,284,520, leaving us an obligation still to fulfil of $1,909,950.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who did the hon. gentleman say started that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking of the amount spent during my hon. friend's time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but who started it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might point out further to my right hon. friend that though he announced to the country in August, 1921, that the elections were to take place that year, notwithstanding that we were then on the eve of an election, he awarded contracts right and left, with the result that when we came into office we had contracts totalling a very considerable sum signed by my right hon. friend and his ministers, but on which not a single dollar had thus far been paid. We were obliged to go ahead and carry out these contracts:

September:
- William Head quarantine station.
- Wharf at Manson's landing, British Columbia.

October:
- Immigration shed at Quebec.
- Rivière du Lièvre, lock and dam.
- Drill shed, roofing, Ottawa.
- Deep water wharf at Gaspé.

November:
- Alterations to Ottawa post office.
- Entrance to Whitby harbour.
- Red Deer, Alta., post office fittings.
- Wharf at Providence Bay.
- Grosse Isle, Que., quarantine station wharf.
- Fraser river, B.C., Steveston jetty.
- Wharf at Parry Sound.
- Wharf at Cowichan Bay.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are not these all repairs and all authorized by parliament?

Mr MACKENZIE KING: They are not indicated as repairs. They are all contracts awarded and on which not a single dollar was paid out by my right hon. friend. If they were repairs he ought to have got busy and started repairing if parliament had voted money for the purpose. After the election was over—the election was over on the 6th of December—he signed a contract on December 9, for painting a bridge at St. Leonard, N.B. and also a contract on December 19 in this city for Printing bureau alterations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the Prime Minister think that if his government had been in power they would have taken care to spend the money during election?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend gave a contract for an icebreaker, amounting to a million and a half, after the election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, about a million. The hon. gentleman's government spend more than that for a second hand one.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We spent four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Besides the repairs.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, that is not so; that is with the repairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will ask the hon. gentleman to bring the figures down later. He is wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to give something which will indicate the position of our expenditure at the present time. I have made a calculation of what the total expenditure on controllable account would have been prior to the years of the war, assuming that all amounts at the time corresponded to those now placed on the uncontrollable list were deducted, and I find the following result:

	Total Expenditure	Total uncontrollable corresponding to above	Regular Ordinary
1910-11	$122,861,250	$25,194,883	$ 97,676,377
1911-12	137,142,082	30,442,162	106,699,920
1912-13	144,456,877	26,859,645	117,597,232
1913-14	186,241,048	27,613,220	158,627,828

Without making allowances for the fact that the purchasing power of the dollar in terms of services or commodities is about two-thirds to-day what it was in the years immediately prior to the war, it would appear that in controllable expenditure we reached last year an expenditure considerably below that of the last year before the war. Making allowance for the diminution of the purchasing power of the dollar we were really, so far as our controllable expenditure is concerned, at a point considerably below even the last year of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's administration. That is the position.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have already intimated that, so far as the present year is concerned, at the end of it, as a result of the economies the government has effected, as a result in part of the increased presperity of the country, due to the policies we have set in motion, we will have for the first time for over a decade a balanced budget in this House. More than that, the government, so far as its work in economy is concerned, is continuing to carry that work just as far as it possibly can. We believe that what the country to-day wants is as little in the way of public expenditure as possible, consistent with the efficiency of the public service. We believe what the country needs above everything else is a reduction in taxation, and in the preparation of the estimates we are about to submit to parliament, which we will be ready to submit as soon as the debate on the budget is over, we will be able to show a very considerable reduction beyond even that which I have already indicated. I think the House will be surprised when they find how far the government have gone in this matter. But let me say, Mr. Speaker, that while we have been effecting economies, while we have been asking members of the House not to press for public expenditures on anything except what is absolutely necessary and absolutely essential, we think we have come to a point where it will not be possible to go much further in the way of depriving this country of some of the public buildings and public works of which it is in such great need, and that in the course of time, once our expenditures are reduced to a point that we can reduce the taxation somewhat, we must take up the work of constructing some of the public works so essential to the needs of the country at the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is our answer in a word to what our hon. friends have been saying about extravagance and waste and about the increase in the public debt. Our answer to them is that we have been effecting economies all along the line, we have brought down expenditures to the point where we have balanced the budget. We intend still further to reduce the public expenditure in the estimates which we are submitting to parliament, and we intend to reduce the taxation of the people of this country.

I wish to refer to one other aspect. The country has been led to believe that the government had been adding to the public service, that, in so far as the different departments of government in Ottawa were concerned, they were overmanned and that we had been indifferent to the cry of economies so far as the Civil Service is concerned. Let me say that the reduction within the Civil Service is one of the most difficult subjects with which any government can be faced. Our hon. friends opposite claimed that they had gone about as far as it was possible to go. I think the preceding government brought

Sir George Murray over from England to tell them how these economies could be effected in the public service. I do not know what they paid him for expert advice but they gave him a considerable sum. My right hon. friend and his government brought the Griffenhagens, or the Arthur Young Company, to Canada to investigate the different departments and endeavour to make a saving. I think they paid them something like $20,000 a month. Did not my hon. friend claim that, as a result of the reports of the Griffenhagen Company they had reduced the public service to about the last point it was possible to reduce it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no. We were only in process of doing it. We reduced the number by something over 9,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to hear my hon. friend make this statement, because before the elections he was saying they had gone as far as it was possible to go, I thought.

Mr. GRAHAM: He did not go as far as the recommendations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: However, let me give the facts, with regard to reductions in the service in so far as we have found it possible to make them. First let me point out this fact: in attempting to reduce the service the government has been handicapped to a certain degree by some of the work of the Civil Service Commission. That commission had adopted a form of detailed classification in the different departments which some of us think is responsible to a considerable degree for the numbers that are kept in the service at the present time. That is one of the handicaps we have had to contend with. Another handicap which we have had to contend with in the service, so far as the showing by expenditure is concerned, is the fact that every year there has to be added increases in salaries in the nature of statutory increases. There is nothing to be found in any statute in the nature of a statutory decrease. They are all automatic increases; so that even if we kept the service at the point at which we found it, it would be inevitable that the amount that would have to be paid would be considerably in excess of the figures of the previous year.

There was the further fact that when we came into office we found a serious condition of unemployment throughout the country. As hon. gentlemen know, we were obliged the first winter to vote nearly a million dollars to alleviate the condition created by unemployment. Look at the press of this city to-day; note some of the comments that are being made concerning the intention of the government still further to reduce the public service; you find an appeal being made to the government not to make this reduction because we will add to the unemployment in the city. That condition was very serious when we took office. We had to go about matters carefully, but we did proceed nevertheless. We started in some of the departments in a quiet way, and whenever we found it possible to reduce the numbers, we did so. With what result? With the result that up to the end of last year, we had made a very considerable net reduction in the public service. In some departments it was inevitable that we should make increases. Hon. members will recall that amongst legislation which we introduced was a good deal providing for increased inspection in different branches of agriculture, the existing inspection services were very considerably expanded, others were added with the result that in the Department of Agriculture we added some 237. In the Department of Finance there were additions of something like 67 owing to the fact that there are increased new services there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Taxes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Taxation, yes. There is a good deal of detail work in connection with taxation and various refunding operations. Then in the Customs department the growing revenues in customs and excise have made it necessary to add 36 clerks. In the Post Office Department the expansion of business generally throughout the country has led to an increase of 221 clerks, and to our increasing immigration services we have added 127. We have made a total increase of 688 clerks up to the end of last year in those departments. But despite this increase, making allowance for it, we have brought about a total net decrease in the service of 2,706 in the two years. But that is not all. We have been reducing the personnel of some of the services as well. The personnel of the Fisheries Protection service has been reduced, the personnel of the Military and Naval services has been reduced, the navy by 312, the permanent militia by 418, or allowing for an increase in the Air Force of 77, making a total reduction of 653 in the defence forces. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which we thought was far too large, has been reduced from 1,668 on January 1, 1922, to 1,146 on January 1, 1924, a reduction of 552. That means a reduction in those three services, Fisheries Protection, Naval and Military and Mounted Police, of a total of 1,253, bringing the total net reduction of salaried persons in two years to 3,959 or nearly 4,000. That is up to the close of last year. Let me draw the attention of the House to this fact. Some hon. members are trying to create the impression that it is only to-day that the government is seeking to reduce the total numbers in the Civil Service; that as a consequence of some propaganda that is being spread broadcast, the government is to-day, so to speak, getting busy in the matter of reductions in the service. All of these reductions amounting to 4,000 that I have referred to, were made before the beginning of the present year, before the time at which this propaganda had started in so vigorously, so that hon. members will see that from the time it took office the government has been doing its duty by the country in seeking to effect all economies possible in the public service. In addition, as hon. members know, last session we put through legislation providing for a Board of Audit, which amongst other duties and functions will have to do with effecting further economies in the public service. That step was taken in legislation which was introduced in this House last session. We have felt that a Superannuation Act was also an essential feature in connection with further reductions in the public services. Those measures working together, the Board of Audit working in conjunction with the Civil Service Commission and the deputy heads of departments, will, we believe, effect further economies in the public service. We have gone and are going in this matter just as far as it is possible for a government to go.

May I add a word in reference to the outstanding reason why the burden of taxation on the country is what it is to-day? It is because the country to-day is obliged to carry the whole capital cost of the war. That is a statement that I want to make here on the floor of parliament. I made it in Quebec shortly before leaving for the old country. I saw that it was challenged during my absence; but I wish to repeat it here on the floor of parliament, that it has been left to the government that has succeeded the governments of my right hon. friend to pay every cent of the capital cost of the war including demobilization. During the whole period of the war and the period of demobilization, those six years, not a single cent was raised from the tax-payers of this country to meet the obligations of the war, if we take what was left for that purpose after the government had used what was raised for its own expenditures in other directions. That is a very serious situation, and I say that my right hon. friend and his friends were guilty of distinct negligence in the administration of the affairs of this country, that at a time when they were prepared to conscript men, to send them overseas to fight, they were not ready to get after the men who were making great fortunes out of the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Better try to establish that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will establish it for my hon. friend in a way that the country will know it.

Mr. BUREAU: We all know it and those who got rich know it better than we do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has asked me to establish what I am saying. Let me again make clear the statement that this country to-day and for years to come will have to bear the capital cost of the war in whole, not in part, because of the neglect of my hon. friends opposite to meet any of the capital cost of the war during the period of the war and the period of demobilization. Some statement was made in challenge of that by the former Minister of Finance. I have examined his figures pretty carefully and what do I find? I find he has put down to his account the amount that he raised to pay the interest on the cost of the war during the period that he was in office. A payment of interest on capital is a payment for the privilege of not having to meet the capital cost. It is not a payment of part of the capital cost. The other amounts were amounts used for current pensions; but pensions are not part of the capital cost of the war; they are part of the current obligations growing out of it and extending through the after years. Whether or not I am correct is a matter of simple addition and subtraction. Take the total disbursements and subtract the total receipts. See whether the balance is in excess or less than the amount that was spent on war account. These are the figures and what do they show.

Total deficiency between receipts and disbursements, six years of war period.. ..	$1,684,179,975
Less sum spent same period, war and demobilization..	1,670,406,242
	$ 13,773,733

In other words, $13,773,773 were added to the public debt over and above the capital cost of the war by the government having failed to raise sufficient to cover their expenditures for other purposes.

The real explanation of the cost of government to-day and of the need for taxation is the manner in which the governments of which my right hon. friend was a member managed the affairs of the country during the period of the war and the period of demobilization which succeeded it,—the outrageous policy of government borrowing to finance the war. The whole cost of the war, and of demobilization was thrown over upon the men and women of to-day—including those who fought in the war and have returned, and the relatives of those who lost their lives in the nation's service. Not a cent was raised during the period I have mentioned, 1914 to 1920 if you will, over and above what was required to meet expenditures incurred on consolidated revenue and capital account apart altogether from the war. The capital cost of the war and the cost of demobilization were financed by loans—loans the principal and current interest upon which it has been left to those of the present day to pay. We are now meeting the cost of the war, its entire cost. In strict accounting, not a dollar of it was met by either the Conservative or Unionist governments of Sir Robert Borden, or by the government of my right hon. friend.

Here are the figures in detail:

Year	Total Revenue Receipts	Total Disbursements	Deficit	Spent on War and Demobilization Account
	$	$	$	$
1914–1915	133,073,482	248,098,526	−115,025,044	60,750,476
1915–1916	172,149,393	339,702,502	−167,553,109	166,197,755
1916–1917	232,701,294	498,203,118	−265,501,824	306,488,815
1917–1918	260,778,953	576,660,210	−315,881,257	343,836,802
1918–1919	312,946,747	697,042,212	−384,095,465	446,519,439
1919–1920	349,746,335	785,869,611	−436,123,276	346,612,955
	1,461,396,204	3,145,576,179	−1,684,179,975	1,670,406,242

More than that. Not only did the governments of the day finance the war by borrowed money; not only did they let war profiteers go all but scot free, but in their loans they made the bonds they sold exempt from taxation, so that to-day they carry no part of the cost of the war to those who were fortunate enough to secure them.

To make still clearer my contention that the whole capital cost of the war was passed on until after the war, and still remains as a charge upon the country in spite of the large sums which were collected and are still being collected in war taxes, I may perhaps be permitted to use an illustration the force of which may appeal to those of us who were not reared in the lap of luxury. Many of us in the past, some of us perhaps in the present, have been all too well acquainted with the phenomenon known as the mortgage. We know in our individual experience how we may pay and still pay and pay in interest charges on the thing without being able to make any impression on the principal sum. Even over so short a period as five or six years we may pay in interest from one-third to one-half of the principal of the mortgage without having reduced that principal by a single dollar. Now, that is just what has happened in our national affairs. The hundreds of millions which were raised by former governments in war taxation all went to pay interest on the rapidly increasing debt and the current expense of pensioning and re-establishing our returning soldiers. In no single year of the late government's term of office after the war broke out, were the amounts raised in war taxation sufficient to do more than meet current interest on war debt and current charges for pensions and the re-establishment of returned soldiers. I have said before, and I repeat, that the whole capital cost of the war is still constituting a mortgage upon the whole national wealth of Canada. What this country has to-day on its back is a mortgage equal to the whole capital cost of the war; and that mortgage was left by the hon. member and his friends.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister forgets that his Minister of Justice says that even then it is less by half that the debt of any other country in the Empire.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Then you admit that the Prime Minister is right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not at all.

Mr. BUREAU: You agree to disagree.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has no figures at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The mere payment of interest is not a reduction of the mortgage; it is simply a payment for the privilege of postponing payment, and it is sheer stupidity or wilful refusal to see the facts which cause it to be represented in any other light. I repeat, the late government failed grievously in its duty during the war period in not making heavier demands upon the self-sacrifice of our people and raising additional taxation sufficient to meet during the war a fair proportion of the capital cost of the war, as was done, for example, in England. Whatever their reason may be, they failed to do it; they loaded the entire charge of the war on the shoulders of their successors, and now they talk glibly to us about our extravagance and taxation.

I thought of giving to the House some further statistics on evidences of increased prosperity, but I think I have spoken at sufficient length this evening.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MARTELL: Give him some of his own medicine.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire to delay the House unduly, but in view of the kind of propaganda to which the country has been subjected during the last year I think it would be to the advantage of all concerned to have the facts brought out in their true light. There are fortunately certain statistics which do tell the truth as to whether a country is prospering or not. We have the statistics of production and of trade, we have the statistics of transportation, and we have the statistics of employment and of business generally, also of public finance. Let my hon. friend take any one of these groups or take them all and he will find in every single division that there are irrefutable evidences of increased prosperity in this country during the past year, and that of a notable character. These are the facts which the country would do well to take to heart, because after all it is a good thing for a people to know when their country is prospering. There is nothing to be gained by belittling the country and making conditions out to be bad when as a matter of fact they are good and improving every day.

My hon. friend spoke this afternoon particularly of the record in agriculture. Fortunately, through the bounty of Providence, there has been a great record so far as the crops are concerned; indeed, it is the greatest in the history of Canada notwithstanding that the crop of last year was at that time also the greatest. Of agricultural crops for the year 1923, wheat gave a total yield of 474,199,000 bushels as contrasted with 399,000,000 in the year previous. The yield in oats was 537,000,000 as against 491,000,000; hay and clover 14,845,000 tons as against 14,062,000 tons. In Canada there is certainly an abundance of food for man and beast, and of the wheat crop of nearly 475,000,000 bushels over 263,000,000 were marketed before the close of the year. That is a fact which the government is entitled to take some credit for. Providence undoubtedly gave a bountiful harvest, but it remained with the administration and others associated with it to see that the harvest was to some degree marketed in as profitable a way as possible. Never before in the history of Canada has as much grain been marketed up to the close of the year as was done last year. That was due in part to lowered transportation and other costs, the lowering of which was brought about in some measure at the instance of the government. As my hon. friends know, it was this government that restored the Crowsnest pass rates on grain in the West. This government also referred back to the Railway Commisssion the matter of rates on grain to the Pacific coast from Alberta. These reduced rates had a good deal to do with the extent to which crops were marketed at the time, and the prices that obtained. An interesting development is the extent to which the wheat crop was shipped this year in part through the port of Vancouver. In 1920 the shipments of wheat via Vancouver amounted to less than one million bushels. This year the shipments to January 31st total 27,800,000 bushels, and it is probable that in all there will have been shipped for the crop year, the very high total of 50,000,000 bushels via Vancouver. Indeed, Canada will this year, as last, take the first place amongst the world's wheat exporting countries. Take other branches of agriculture. My hon. friend referred to some agricultural figures this afternoon, and perhaps it is well that we should consider some further figures in this connection. For the year 1922 the total value of our agricultural production, that is for field crops, animal products, dairy products and miscellaneous items, was estimated at $1,419,937,000, whilst the capital value or gross agricultural wealth of Canada was placed at $6,773,942,000. These figures shew the important place which the agricultural industry holds in our national life.

Let us take mining, in regard to which there has been a very distinct revival. The figures for 1923 show a mineral production of $214,102,000; those for 1922 show a production of $184,297,000; whilst in 1921 the production was $171,923,000. In reference to coal consumption and the iron and steel production, both of which are basic phenomena in industrial progress, there have been heavy increases of late. In the 11-month period ended November last 35,228,000 tons of coal were made available for use in Canada as compared with 27,952,000 tons, the average for the same period the previous three years, or an increase of 26 per cent. In 1923 the production of pig iron was 880,000 tons as compared with a production in 1922 of 384,000 tons, or more than double the output in favour of the past year as against the previous period. In 1923 the production of steel ingots and castings was 884,000 tons as compared with 486,000 tons in 1922, or an increase of 80 per cent. The production of coal in 1923 in Canada was the largest on record, being 17,132,000 tons as compared with a production in 1922 of 15,157,000 tons and in 1921 of 15,057,000 tons, an increase of approximately 2,000,000 tons. And as a result of the removal of the cattle embargo, 37,000 head of cattle were imported into Great Britain from Canada as compared with 17,000 head for the same period in the year previous.

My hon. friend last session ridiculed the treaty which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had made with France. What does it show? It shows an increase in imports from France of $869,000 and in exports of $2,083,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the Prime Minister not aware that these increases were in wheat and other products not touched by the treaty at all, whereas in articles affected by the treaty there was a diminution?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was a large increase in manufactured implements.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the aggregate there is a diminution.

Mr. BUREAU: You are mistaken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I come now to the question of the foreign trade. The visible balance last year was largely in our favour, one of the results being the rehabilitation of our currency on foreign exchanges. In 1921 it took 111.6 cents to make an American dollar; last year we had reached the point where 101.9 cents sufficed.

The exports of Canadian produce for the calendar year 1923 were $1,014,734,000, an increase of 27 per cent in two years.

The imports for consumption increased from $799,478,000 in 1921 to $903,530,000 in 1923.

The visible balance of trade which in 1921 was in our favor by only $3,222,000 had increased to $111,204,000 in 1923.

Not the least gratifying effect of our recent trade policy has been that under it our imports from the United Kingdom have increased from $123,150,000 in 1921 to $136,859,000 in 1922 and $154,492,000 in 1923. While the full effects of the extensions made in the British preference are not yet shown for a full year—they came into effect only on May 12, 1923—it is evident that Canada has been effectively contributing to promote that revival of British industry which is so badly needed in the United Kingdom, and which in its turn will contribute to improve our export trade at a time when our market on the European continent is threatened by the disturbed political, economic and financial conditions there prevailing.

Then take transportation. The total earnings notably increased last year, notwithstanding a downward tendency of freight rates. Especially was this true on the Canadian National Railways. The total earnings of Canadian railways for the eleven months ended November 1923 were $429,409,000, or an increase of 6.6 per cent over the corresponding period of the year before, which came to $402,808,000. Out of this total increase of $26,601,000, the Canadian National absorbed about $19,274,000, or over 72 per cent. This has made possible the highly satisfactory statement by Sir Henry Thornton to the effect that the net operating revenues of the Canadian National Railway system will reach $20,127,000 for 1923, as compared with about $2,480,000 for 1922.

That the improved showing of the railways in 1923 is not merely on their financial side, but extends also to the physical volume of their traffic, is shown by the fact that the estimated tonnage of freight hauled in 1923 was 113,500,000 tons, as compared with 108,530,000 tons in 1922, and with 103,131,000 tons in 1921, or an increase in the two years of over 10 per cent in the physical quantity of the commodities transported.

The growth of lake transportation and of ocean transportation indicates correspondingly large increases in volume.

Then also in the matter of employment, had I time to go into it, I could point out wherein the Department of Labour index figures show very definite improvement in that regard.

As to public finance, the House has already a statement showing vastly reduced expenditure with vastly increased revenues, making the best showing which this country has known for a long period of time.

Then adding other indices of general business, such as bank clearings, stock figures, securities and the like, one sees on every side the indication of a growing and increasing prosperity. There, Mr. Speaker, is the best answer to all that we have been obliged to listen to in the way of detraction on the part of my right hon. friend as to the condition of the country, its general business and its finances. That is the answer which we, as a government, make to the criticisms which our friends opposite have directed towards us; it is what we give to the country in account of our stewardship of the nation's affairs.

In conclusion, Sir, we believe the time has come when, instead of sounding a note of pessimism, we are justified in giving to the country a note of optimism. More than that, we feel the time has come when, instead of making appeals of a sectional character to interests in the east or to interests in the west, we ought to address ourselves rather to the nation as a whole. My right hon. friend and I had the privilege of hearing the other day an address, delivered by Mr. Vincent Massey—one of the young men of this country, accustomed to observe matters carefully and in an impartial way. He was speaking to the citizens of Ottawa, and equally to the people of Canada. He said, "It is not Downing Street but Main Street which is the foe of true Canadianism." The newspaper report of this speech contains the following:

> Turning to his theme, the speaker said the whole air seemed charged with the problematical, but so far as he was concerned he would prefer to emphasize the word Canadian rather than problems. He criticized a sectional outlook which he thought was discernible. . . But he had not much sympathy with those who saw blue ruin, red revolution, and a yellow peril, a sort of Joseph's coat of misery, which he thought also was hardly the best kind of flag under which to move towards better things.

That expression of view given at a Canadian Club meeting by Mr. Vincent Massey is, I think, the voice of the younger generation of Canada to-day of those who have faith in the country and want to see it go forward, of those who do not approve of the continual note of detraction, of pessimism and of sectionalism which has been sounded so much of late by my right hon. friend and his friends. I have spoken of the young men, let me give my hon. friend the words of an old man, one of the grand old men of this country, one most highly honoured and revered, one who some years ago used to sit in this House as a Conservative member. I give him the words of Mr. Adam Brown, of Hamilton, now in his ninety-eighth year, words which sound a note of optimism more emphatic than those already quoted and which he and his associates might well take to heart and repeat to the country as often as they can, for they are uttered by one who has been a keen observer of Canadian affairs for three quarters of a century. Concluding an address to the staff of the Canada Life Assurance Company last month, when for the fourtieth time he moved the vote of thanks to them for their services, Mr. Brown said:

> No country in the world begins the new year with greater assurance of prosperity than Canada. Let us as Canadians be prouder than ever of our great inheritance, full of hope and faith in the future that awaits our beloved Canada—a land of peace and plenty, welded heart and soul to the greatest and freest empire the world has ever known, and with hearts that change not, resolve that we will be true to our trust, rendering honest and noble service to our country whatever our calling in it may be, and handing down unsullied to millions yet unborn the precious and priceless blessings we enjoy as British subjects, under the unstained flag of our fathers.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the faith, this the spirit needed to make our country great.

On motion of Mr. Forke the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 9.40 p.m.

THE BAKER MEMORIAL

His Excellency the Governor General unveils the Monument to the Memory of Lt. Col. George Harold Baker, M.P. (5th C.M.R.) killed in action June 2, 1916, at the battle of Sanctuary Wood.

Friday, February 29, 1924.

Members of the House of Commons, invited guests, including His Excellency the Governor General, and members of the general public, assembled in the Main Lobby of the House.

Chairman, Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, K.C., Speaker.

The audience joined in singing:

O God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come;
Our shelter from the stormy blast,
And our eternal home.

Under the shadow of Thy throne
Thy saints have dwelt secure;
Sufficient is Thine arm alone,
And our defence is sure.

O God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come;
Be Thou our guard while life shall last,
And our eternal home.

The CHAIRMAN: Your Excellency, Ladies and Gentlemen: On the morrow of the eventful election of 1911, late in the autumn, parliament was convened at this very spot, under the gothic arches of the old building which soon after was to crumble and become but a memory. Amongst the new commoners appeared a young man of middle stature with an attractive expression of youth and strength combined. An early training of self-discipline and an exuberance of life blended into a harmonious whole made of him a winning personality full of vitality and charm. He hailed from the Eastern Townships, a picturesque country of rolling hills, dotted with sheets of placid and clear waters, where a luxuriant nature seems to fashion in her bosom the sterling character of her sons.

Harold Baker came from good lineage. His father long before him had, on the forum and in the legislative halls of Quebec and Ottawa, served faithfully and eloquently his country. The son had just gallantly wrested from a loyal and deserving public servant after a momentous battle, the coveted prize of his ambition.

The mandate of Brome was his and in his new career, like that of his forbears, he meant to devote many years of service to the public weal.

Three sessions passed. The House of Commons, busily engaged in enacting laws and solving problems, was hardly keeping pace with the ever-expanding forces of a young and progressive Dominion.

When all of a sudden, in the midst of a glorious summer, the first rumblings of a terrific storm were heard at a distance. From across the Atlantic, threatening lights were seen on the horizon and as hours and minutes fled, the impending storm had gathered and was soon raging from Halifax to Victoria.

The great World War was on us with its long and sombre periods of supreme trials, of hopes deferred, with its unending trail of holocausts on land, in the air and on the seas.

The youngest member of the House of Commons, Harold Baker, was one of the first to answer the call of duty. He saw that duty clearly before him and we, his colleagues, can well remember with what a radiant faith he joined the colours and bade us adieu.

As weeks and months elapsed, the yeomen gathered from the deepest recesses of this broad Dominion and the steady tramp of regiments began, as if marching in rhythmical order, with the roll of the drums. With unfaltering steps, the sun glinting on their bayonets, the first contingents reached Valcartier, impatient to board the Argosies bound for the battlefields of France all ablaze in the deadliest conflict ever witnessed between right and might.

Theirs was not a spectacular adventure. Modern warfare has lost that glamour which in centuries past stirred the imagination of peoples. When whole nations are aligned on the battlefields in a long maze of muddy burrows, war becomes anonymous. Officers and privates face the same dangers, they share the same fate. And so, in June, 1916, a brief and melancholy despatch brought us face to face with the grim and poignant realties of war. Lt.-Col. Harold Baker, our fellow member, had been killed in action at Sanctuary Wood.

The parliament of Canada, shocked, aggrieved at the sad message, felt deeply honoured at the noble example of manhood set by its Benjamin, and unanimously it resolved that another sanctuary, within its own precincts, would be dedicated to him, so that his memory would ever be enshrined with those laurels which since ancient times are the happy warrior's halo.

It is proper and fitting that Your Excellency, you who so gloriously led our Canadian boys to victory in one of the most strategic and decisive engagements of the long and bloody struggle, should be called upon to unveil this, the first monument erected in our Hall of Fame.

This bronze memorial is not only the artistic expression of the gratitiude of the nation to one dearly beloved. It is also a pious memento to all those young Canadians who, during four years of cruel agony, so prized liberty that to save it no sacrifice was for them too great.

It will stand here, at the threshold of the House of Commons, for all time to come, as a supreme lesson of the dead to the living—that love of country, devotion to duty, are not empty words or vain ideals.

It will vividly recall to future generations that the dropping volleys and the muffled drums signalling there yonder the sacrifice of so many precious lives, was also meant as a supplication to the world that hereafter the gigantic evil of war should be stopped before it got afoot.

Let that ideal for which our heroes laid down their lives be forever our guiding star. Then can it be said that from their exhausted frame buried in distant fields, their soul still radiates in our land—consoling the ones, stimulating the others—a soul refulgent with that spirit of human brotherhood which two thousand years ago was heralded in the plains of Judea by the messengers of the Prince of Peace.

Then, and then only, will it be proclaimed that Canada, bereaved by the loss of her bravest, hath through their sacrifice gained in spiritualities; that as they dashed fearlessly into the fiery furnace they bequeathed to us, the living, a noble and lasting inspiration with a memory emerging from the perishable to immortality.

His Excellency the Governor General unveiled the monument, the guard presenting arms and the bugler sounding The Last Post.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING, C.M.G., P.C., (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, Your Excellency, Ladies and Gentlemen: The ceremony in which we are participators to-day is one of historic as well as personal interest to all present. It is very fitting that the first monument to be unveiled in these halls of parliament as reconstructed since the Great War, should be to the memory of a distinguished member of the Canadian House of Commons who was killed in action. It is scarcely less significant, and will indeed be deeply gratifying to all Canadians, that the unveiling of the memorial should be by His Excellency, Lord Byng, who was in command of the Canadian Corps during the action in which Colonel Baker fell, and who to-day is our Governor General.

We are proud that parliament has seen well to pay this tribute to the memory of one of her gallant sons, but we would greatly err if this memorial did not speak to us of something more than individual loss and individual sacrifice. It is personal in character, but it is also essentially symbolic. It speaks not of one member of parliament only who gallantly served his country overseas, but of the fifty or more members of the two Houses who enlisted at the time, many of whom served actively in France, and of the eighteen members of parliament who lost sons in the Great War. But it speaks of more than this. It speaks of Canadians, approximately 600,000 in number who enlisted for service in the Great War, and above all of the more than 60,000 who gave their lives as the supreme sacrifice of this nation in the cause of the World's freedom. Of one and all of these it can be said, as it was said of the late Colonel Baker in the legend that appears to the left of the bronze figure: "And thus this man died, leaving his death for an example of a noble courage, and a memorial of virtue, not only unto young men but unto all his Nation."

The wider association and larger significance of the memorial is emphasized by the words of the legend which appears to the right of the figure. To appreciate them in all their impressiveness we must recall that they were written by another distinguished Canadian who died of wounds received in the Great War, and whose remains lie, like those of Colonel Baker, in one of the military cemeteries overseas:

> To you from falling hands we throw
> The torch; be yours to hold it high.
> If ye break faith with us who die,
> We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
> In Flanders fields.

The legend to the left is our tribute to the immortal dead. The legend to the right is their command to us. The legend to the left comes to us out of the distant past, recalling that great company of the defenders of right and of the faith, who through the ages have revealed the God-like greatness of the human spirit and have entered into the fulness of eternal life. The words of the legend to the right will continue to speak to us through all the years that lie ahead, reminding us of the obligations we who are living owe to those who are gone and to whom in the words of another poet we said:

> Here—or hereafter—you shall see it ended,
> This mighty work to which your souls are set;
> If from beyond—then, whit the vision splendid,
> You shall smile back and never know regret.

Pray God we may be given strength and grace and guidance to be true to this greatest of all trusts.

Lastly, may I say that it will always be a source of pride and satisfaction to all who view this splendid work of art to know that it also is the creation of another distinguished Canadian, Dr. Tait McKenzie, who, though at present residing in the United States, was born in the near vicinity of Ottawa, and has remained a British subject. The excellence of Dr. McKenzie's art is recognized the world over, and we are proud that we should have this splendid bronze protrait of his as the first memorial to be unveiled in our parliamentary halls.

In a word, to-day's ceremonial is a noble expression of the many sidedness of our national life—worthy in what in art it has revealed of sculpture and of verse, great in its parliamentary traditions and military achievements, but noblest in all in the manifestations of the spirit of our manhood, a spirit that is ever ready for service, and that falters not at sacrifice.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN P.C. (Leader of the Opposition): The event of this afternoon is the first of its kind in our country's history. It has been the lot of other nations to have their legislators, their parliamentarians, even their kings put on the uniform of soldiers and go forth to battle and meet a patriot's death, but so far it has been the lot of Canada only once. George Harry Baker, a gifted, comely, companionable man; the youngest of the members of the House of Commons, the centre of the hopes of his associates in parliament, the trusted of everyone, the choice of a fine old constituency, the pride of an honoured family, heard the solemn call of duty at the outbreak of the great war—he answered and he gave his life.

Thousands went to battle with him and thousands died, but Colonel Baker left a scene probably more dear to the ambitions, more attractive to aspiring manhood, than any from which others tore themselves away. There were others in the parliament of that day who joined the colors and went too. Some of them are with us still and all of them have an honoured place in memory and in public regard. But Colonel Baker alone never returned. He made the final sacrifice; bequeathed to his country the heritage of a great example and left for the records of this parliament the legacy of his gallant name.

The character of Colonel Baker is reflected, perhaps best of all, in the letters he wrote home and back to Canada during his service overseas. These are embalmed in a private biography published by his friends, and will be treasured by all who honour his memory. They disclose a modesty of demeanor, a cheerfulness of temperament, a human kindliness and with a splendid courage; qualities every one that we well knew he possessed. "I make no profession as a soldier" he said at a banquet in his honour prior to his departure, "I lay no claim to special merit. My aim is to win the confidence of my men and to leave the rest to circumstances and the turn of events." The confidence of his men he won, a confidence which reached a degree of ardor and devotion rarely equalled in our military annals. The story of the struggle in which he lost his life is one of the most tragic and thrilling in all the long and ghastly but glorious history of war. For a day and a night it raged and on into the next a thundering, deafening, murderous struggle—a struggle perhaps more distinctly Canadian on the allied side than any previous engagement. The names of Maple Copse, Observatory Ridge, and Armagh Wood, places where the sanguinary contest was waged should be names forever remembered by the children of our Dominion. Companies went forward and bravely battled on after their arms had all but disappeared, many of their men deafened and blind, but discipline maintained to the end. General Griesbach, one of our Senators was there; General Macdonell, now Principal of Royal Military College at Kingston arrived also with his men on the scene, and General Draper whom we rejoice to see with us to-day—he too played a noble part. The figure of Harry Baker moving from point to point, making his dispositions for defence, cheering his men, encouraging them by his enthusiasm and his example, is the last memory which his batallion cherishes of their commanding officer. Brave to the last, smiling to the end, imperturbable, unselfish, full of cheer, a leader even in death, he illustrated how a soldier should battle and how gentlemen should die.

A brilliant career was cut short in its prime. All that man had to live for he left behind. A domestic felicity as sweet as ever enshrouded a life, he sacrificed; social position was his, this he sacrificed as well; a professional career already prosperous, this he abandoned, a public service splendid with promise, this too he left behind. The best that life had to offer he cheerfully surrendered that his whole duty might be done.

We are accustomed to regard such an early ending of a splendid young man as the lamentable close of a life of promise. But the story of Harry Baker is a story of achievements won, even more than it is a story of promise lost. His years of maturity were crowded with things done and well done, in private life, in professional life, in public life, and on the field of war. It is in the spirit of such a career more than in expansion of territory, or even in continuance of Empire, that there lies the imperishable glory of the British name. The names of our great men, spread over the centuries, treasured forever by our children, the light that shines for their example; these are remembered and have their eternal value long after the events through which they passed have been forgotten. In the wide circle of his friends, in the larger area of his activities and his influence in the Eastern Townships where he was reared and which he loved, in the Dominion which he served, and for whose honour he died, Harold Baker will be known as one of those men.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon, Leader of the Progressive Party):

I feel almost unworthy to take part in this ceremony, as I was not privileged to have the acquaintance of the one whose memory we would honour this day. It is well as it is fitting that ceremonies such as this should take place; that monuments should be erected to the glorious dead. As the years roll away and time passes, time with healing influence will soften the blow that fell so heavily upon many, when the Great War was taking its heavy toll of human life. To them this will ever remain—the memory of the great loss sustained. But others,—and it is the way of humanity,—the incidents of those trying years will only be a memory. Maybe in the pressing importance of everyday duty they may forget the great sacrifice made by our glorious dead; and it is seemly that ceremonies such as this take place, that Memorial services be held, Memorial Halls built, Tablets set up and Monuments erected—Lest we forget! Lest we forget!

It is well that a monument should be erected in this building where one whose memory we honour served his country by representing his constituency in parliament. I was not personally acquainted with this fine soldier and gentleman, but enough for me, he heard the call of his country, he did his duty and failed not.

This statue shall stand to-day and in days to come as a constant reminder of one who did his duty and made the supreme sacrifice. It will be an inspiration to members of this House to serve their country to the best of their ability, with singleness of purpose doing the duty that lies nearest to them. There will be differences of opinion, but let it be honest differences.

The story of the sacrifices our heroic dead made for liberty, for their country, will be forever one of the splendid pages in the history of Canada, and a glorious heritage for our children and our children's children, an inspiration to all who follow that they shall be worthy of the sacrifices made. "Greater love hath no man than this that he lay down his life for his fellow men."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED K.C.M.G., (Leader of the Opposition in the Senate): It is with mingled feelings of sorrow and pride that to-day we pay this tribute to Lieut.-Col. Baker who for some years was associated with us in the parliament of Canada.

In the prime of his manhood, when life was clothed with its greatest attractiveness and promise, he heard the tocsin of war—the call of duty. All else was laid to one side and he responded with haste to the call of his country. He fell as a soldier and a fighting man would want to fall. He fell on the field of battle. In that world's conflict and clash of arms, the millions who died that we might have liberty, will live on through the ages. Their deeds are immortal, and while we shall die and be forgotten, they shall always be our survivors.

In this monument of stone and bronze erected by a grateful country, Colonel Baker will outlive not only those living to-day who sat with him in the Parliament of Canada, but this record of his gallantry and death, his life and his sacrifice, will pass down to our descendants as an outstanding and inspiring memory in the history of the Canadian parliament.

While we mourn his death, yet it is with patriotic pride that we think how gallantly he fell. When from time to time in these stately halls we view this monument commemorative of his death, we shall ask ourselves:

> And how can man die better
> Than facing fearful odds,
> For the ashes of his fathers,
> And the temples of his Gods?

Hon. Senator GEO. G. FOSTER, K.C, (Alma): Your Excellency, Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: From the hillside and valleys, from the villages and home lands of that beautiful district in the Eastern Townships in which Harry Baker was born, in which he lived his life, in which his heart was centered and from whence he marched to glory, I have been asked by his neighbours, as one of their sons, to bring a message of gratitude and appreciation on this dedication day to the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

It is not only because you have written in stone and bronze the features and story of the sacrifice of our hero; it is not only because you have added to the glory of the traditions of your parliament by preserving the details of his service, but it is because we know that without a dissenting voice two parliaments have unanimously joined in this noble tribute, and you have thereby spread his fame throughout our country by linking it with this magnificient structure. For all these reasons, our people are truly grateful.

I am quite certain that I am within the mandate entrusted to me and am voicing their wishes when I express to the four leaders of political thought, who have so generously honoured his memory, the gratitude that will be felt for them; and I can say that there will be written into the history of those Eastern Counties a true transcript of the patriotic lessons which may be learned from their utterances, and they will serve as an incentive for present and future generations to emulate the example of the hero of to-day, not only in case the country may demand a similar service, but in those other walks of life in which public service is sure to be required. I am not going to attempt to add one word to what has been said of the history and sacrifice which has been referred to, but only to express the hope that as day by day we pass within the shadow of the monument we have erected we may remember the service which Colonel Baker rendered to Canada, at a time of great national peril, and that we, too, may emulate his example in our everyday service.

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to express to you our gratitude for the kindly thought which prompted you to give this opportunity to Harry Baker's neighbours to take a part in this great national gathering.

The audience joined in singing God Save the King.

HOME BANK INVESTIGATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. F. HEALY (North Essex): Is it the intention of the government to restrict the inquiry into the Home Bank affairs to the years mentioned in the order in council?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In drafting the order in council to which the hon. gentleman refers, the government took cognizance of the petition which was presented to it by the depositors of the Home Bank. The subject matter that was referred to the commissioner is the statements that are set forth in the statement of the depositors of the Home Bank. The government assumed that in referring to a commissioner allegations prepared and presented to the government by the depositors themselves, they were going as far, possibly as the depositors would think it necessary or advisable. Representations, however, have been made to the government that it might be advisable to extend the powers of the commissioner so as to include all the transactions of the Home Bank from the date mentioned down to the time of its failure, and the government intends to endow the commissioner with that power.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister's language leaves indefinite the date back to which the investigation is to go. Is the government not prepared to have the investigation go back to the issue of the charter and the reasons and justification therefor?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government is prepared to have the fullest possible investigation made, and if in the opinion of the commissioner it is advisable to go further than has been indicated, or if in the opinion of others it seems advisable so to do, the government will be prepared to take action accordingly in the public interest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am prepared to give my opinion now. I know no justification at all for limiting the investigation to special years. If a commission should be appointed to do this work, it should go back to the initial venture and have the public know all the facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope I made it clear that the only reason why the government made any mention whatever in the order in council of the particular years was that those are the years that are specified in the petition which the depositors presented to the government, and it was in referring that petition to the commissioner that the government had occasion to mention the years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The public has an interest in the matter as well as the depositors.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): I would like to draw the attention of the government to the statement made by the liquidator that the Home Bank never had a banker as its manager, and I think that fact constitutes a strong argument for the investigation going back to the issue of the charter.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): That is what is being done.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): Is it the intention of the government to take any action at this session on the recommendation in the report of the Civil Service committee of last year?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The report is a somewhat lengthy one. I may say that the government has had the report under consideration and some action will be taken on it; but I could not undertake to say at the moment to my hon. friend how far that will go.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Monday, March 3.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, in commencing my remarks, I should like to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Kelly) and the seconder (Mr. Lapierre) of the Address who spoke yesterday afternoon. I can congratulate the mover of the Address upon his eloquence and upon the lucidity and, on the whole, the able way in which he presented his statements. I am not, of course, acquainted with the remarks that the seconder made, but I have no doubt he filled his position just as ably and well. I can quite sympathise with a new speaker who first rises to address the House, because I can well recollect the first time I rose in this place to make a few remarks. I am free to confess that I have not yet got over the nervousness that possessed me then; and, while I do not know how long my tenure may be I am beginning to become just a little afraid that that feeling is going to stay with me. I am not at all afraid of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, nor am I afraid of gentlemen to my right, and I know I have a great many supporters behind me; nevertheless I feel a good deal of nervousness in getting up to make an address. However, I have always been treated with kindness and consideration and I have no doubt I shall receive the same considerate treatment during the short time I shall engage the attention of the House this afternoon.

I was very much pleased indeed to see that His Excellency in the Speech from the Throne was able to make the statement that there were signs of returning prosperity in the affairs of our country. I doubt not that from a great many points of view this statement is true; and I am sure that every well-wisher of the country will concur in the statement I make now, that it is particularly pleasing that such should be the case at this time. I know very well that things are not as they ought to be, they are not as we would have them; but when we consider the number of Canadians who own Dominion bonds and who have savings bank deposits —which deposits have increased enormously in the last year or two—I think that we may infer from these facts, and from other conditions, that in some directions at any rate there is a returning prosperity. Unfortunately, however, this prosperity is in some respects sectional; it is evident only in some parts of the country. I am sorry to say that agriculture, the basic industry of the country, is not in a satisfactory condition. I am very well aware that world conditions have a good deal to do with the state of agriculture in Canada as well as in other countries at the present time. Nevertheless, I believe that there are certain conditions, certain disadvantages, under which agriculture is labouring to-day in this Dominion and which can be removed by proper legislation. Agriculture is perhaps in a different position from any other industry. It is our basic industry and its wellbeing affects every other calling, occupation and industry in the Dominion; and while, even with a depressed agricultural industry there may be a degree of prosperity in some particular places, in the long run the welfare and prosperity, or otherwise, of agriculture will react upon all these other occupations.

I have here a quotation which with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall read to the House. It is from the Montreal Gazette:

> The greatest wheat crop in the history of the Dominion was produced last year. The wealth of Canada has been increased by this abundant harvest and a stimulus has been given to the revival of business. With all this, the producers in the western provinces are still dissatisfied; they are still reiterating the complaint that they are being unfairly treated, that they are compelled to buy in a dear market and sell in a cheap one. So far as the East is concerned, there is no disposition to accord the producers of the West anything less than fair treatment. The interests of the West are the interests of the Dominion.

I might add to that, that the interests of agriculture in every province of the Dominion are also the interests of the whole country. Let me read just another short extract, from an editorial article in the Montreal Daily Star.

> Why do the farmers leave the West? The challenge of the West has got to be met. The immediate solvency of this country can only be preserved by insuring the agricultural prosperity of the West. We must make farming—grain-growing—pay in the West, and we must do it soon.

The foregoing is the language of two Montreal newspapers, and I am sure that farmers everywhere in this country will endorse it. There has been a vast amount of wealth produced in the three prairie provinces, and on the whole, throughout the Dominion, there has been prosperity, so far as production goes, for the agricultural communities. But in the case of agriculture, as in the case of every other business, the question to the man who produces is, not how much wealth he produces, but what are his net returns when he has balanced his books at the end of the year. And unfortunately, while we have had a vast stream of wealth pouring from the western prairies, it seems to me a tragedy that those who are engaged in that industry have not sufficient returns from their labours to make life comfortable or as it should be for those who produce that wealth. To make this position plain I might quote a few figures which were submitted in the Manitoba legislature by the premier of that province. Premier Bracken points out that a bushel of wheat to-day is in price only a little higher than it was in pre-war days. In 1914 you could purchase a gang plough for $84, whereas to-day it costs $153. A mower in 1914 cost $57; to-day it costs $93—as a matter of fact, I know it costs $100 at the present time. A waggon could be bought in 1914 for $111; to-day the price of a waggon is anywhere from $160 to $180. Three farm implements that could be purchased in 1914 for $253 to-day cost $415. Now, when you realize that fact and remember that the price of a bushel of wheat is only just a little higher than it was a few years ago it does not require much argument to show what position the farmer is in with respect to the raising of wheat. There are other figures too, which I might cite. In 1912, 10 fleeces from a sheep would purchase a suit of clothes; to-day it takes 31 fleeces to purchase a suit of the same quality. It is needless for me to elaborate along this line, because these figures show quite plainly just exactly the problems the farmers have to meet to-day in carrying on their industry.

We must look facts squarely in the face. I am not a pessimist; I am not going to preach blue ruin, nor do I believe that Canada is going to the dogs; I believe that there is a great future before this country and before agriculture in this country, and I hope that as the years go on we shall see agriculture in Canada occupying the place which it deserves. If we reflect for a moment on world history we shall realize, I think, the fact that everywhere and at all times, in the case of every nation that has ever risen to prominence, whenever in a nation agriculture has begun to decay, the beginning of that nation's decay has occurred at the same time. Now, I have no idea that such a thing is likely to happen in this country. But if that be true of the nations as a whole, it is absolutely necessary that the agricultural industry in Canada should receive our very best attention.

Let me come now to the cost of doing business. I think the great complaint that we hear at this time all over the Dominion is the high cost of production, the cost of doing business; and going from one calling to another, from one industry to another, you find always that the excuse advanced is that so much has to be charged because the cost of doing business is so high. I would call attention to this fact. An industrial concern raises the price of its product to meet increase in costs; but the farmer to-day cannot say: I am going to charge more per bushel for my wheat because it costs me more to raise it than it did formerly. His product is sold upon the markets of the world, and consequently he has no control over its price. By reason of these conditions the farmer is at the present time at the bottom of the pyramid.

I wish I could convince everyone of the absolute necessity of placing this very important calling upon a solid basis. I know very well that changed conditions require new methods to cope with them. We sometimes get a good deal of advice handed out to us as to how we ought to help ourselves, therefore it may be well for me to tell hon. members what some of my neighbours are doing in Manitoba. There we realize that wheat-raising is perhaps a little precarious; at the same time it must be remembered that next year and for a great many years to come wheat-raising will continue to be the greatest industry of the prairie provinces. Let me say that the return from our western wheat is going to be one of the principal factors in paying the public indebtedness of this country. Nevertheless we have to realize the danger of trusting entirely to a wheat crop, and our farmers are rapidly turning their attention to what is called "diversified" farming; it used to be called "mixed" farming. Last winter I had the privilege of going out to a great many meetings in Manitoba, and I may tell hon. members that politics was not so much discussed as what improvements we could make in conducting our business so as to get better returns. I mention this so that the House may know that the farmers of the west are alive to the situation. To me one of the most hopeful signs was the entire absence of any division between town and country. We found boards of trade, agricultural societies, Canadian clubs and farmers meeting together in public in the towns and villages of Manitoba to consider our economic condition and the best methods to overcome our present difficulties.

Sometimes we are told that farmers should adopt business methods. I quite agree that they should; and if there is anything to be said in favour of income tax returns I think it is the good effect resulting from agriculturalists being obliged to sit down and figure out their operations to know exactly how they stand financially at the end of the year. The other day I received a letter from one of the most intelligent farmers in Manitoba, a man of ability and integrity, who has kept accurate accounts for the past twenty-two years. I have his figures in my room, and I once thought of putting them on Hansard, for I think they are well worth studying by the House. It is not a discouraging story, on the contrary it is a story of progress during many years, of increasing wealth in a moderate way, but during the last few years the results are very discouraging. However, I am free to admit that on the whole the story is a very good advertisement for the province of Manitoba. I would add, Mr. Speaker, that this gentlemen has made only one great mistake in that long period—he accepted nomination at the last general election to support the party to my right.

In the Speech from the Throne the necessity of a reduction of taxation is emphasized. I think all of us are ready to say "Amen" to that statement. We all agree with it and will not in any way quarrel with the carrying out of such reduction. Sometimes we have been told that our criticism of the government last year was not severe enough. I hear that sometimes in the West. The Progressives are blamed now and then for having allowed such enormous estimates to go through without opposing them more vigorously than they did. I do not know whether anything more could have been done to reduce those estimates, but I do remember that many a speech was made from this quarter in which intimation was given to the ministers that we expected them to have their estimates cut down very considerably this year. Now we are patiently waiting to see what they have done to cut down the expenses of carrying on the business of the country, in the practice of that economy which we have been promised.

The figures of the growing cost of government are so familiar to hon. members that I shall refrain from quoting them. While I do not wish to see anything done that will in any way impair the efficiency of government or in any way work injustice to anyone in connection with the enforcement of economies, I think it is perfectly evident to anyone who has given the most cursory examination to the facts of the case that something can be done and something should be done to cut down our national expenses by a very large amount. The country demands economy, but I do hope that the economy effected will be a wise economy. There is such a thing as economy that is really extravagance, and whatever work is necessary for productive enterprises I trust that that money will be found. Such works are in the nature of necessities so long as they are actual productive enterprises.

I should like to see the main estimates brought down as quickly as possible so that we may have time to study and discuss them at length. I have found from experience that it is sometimes very difficult to criticise a particular estimate through not being familiar with the circumstances or not knowing the conditions under which the money will be expended. I rather suspect that when an estimate for a particular locality is before the House the member for the constituency in which the work is to be carried out, who knows the conditions and probably is best able to criticise the vote adversely, is not likely to take a very active part in so doing. We expect that the estimates will be cut very considerably this year to show that the business of the country is being carried on economically.

I think it is a mistake that so many supplementary estimates should be brought down in the dying days of the session, and I for one am prepared to protest most vigorously against the practice. I remember on the very last day of last session, the last night in fact, a vast amount of money was voted that, I am sure, no hon. member, except perhaps those who were presenting the estimates, really understood or had time to consider. I have had more adverse criticism and more complaints from people who are paying attention to our proceedings of what happened the last night of last session than in regard to almost anything else that engaged our attention. So I hope that we shall not have a repetition of the bringing down of large supplementary estimates in the last moments of the session. We can get on with our work at the beginning of the session. I am new in parliament, but it does seem strange to me that there should be so much time to spend during the early weeks and months in which we might do business and that at the end of the session there is such a complete rush, the business being pushed through without due consideration. Let us get to work now. We are ready for our work; let us get on with the public business.

I want to say a few words in regard to the customs tariff—I suppose some hon. members have heard that phrase before; it has been a subject of endless controversy in this country and of a great deal of difference of opinion, and perhaps there is no subject that comes before the people upon which there is more confusion of thought. I do not intend to discuss it minutely or from any particular angle, but there are certain cardinal principles in connection with protection that I would just like to mention, and then pass on.

It is an accepted principle in everyday life that when you can do some particular kind of work well you make that your occupation; that is what you devote your attention to, and you are quite ready to exchange your work for that of some other man who is more interested in some other line of business. From such an exchange mutual benefit results. I submit that what is true of individuals can be equally true as between nation and nation, and that is one reason why I object to high protection as a barrier to the free interchange of goods between one country and another. Nearly four hundred million bushels of wheat will go from the West this year, most of it to find a market in the Old World. How is that wheat to be paid for? We are not going to buy anything from Europe; we are going to shut that market off; we are going to make ourselves everything that we need. Well, I would like to know what we are going to be paid with, what return we are going to get for that amount of wheat. The very a-b-c of economics will teach anyone that all trade is barter of goods, the exchange of commodities. Protection restricts markets. It cannot give employment; on the contrary, it shuts down employment. Reduce taxation by increasing the cost of living? Was any thing more absurd than the idea that by making goods dear you are going to reduce the cost of living? But why complain? Our exports last year amounted to the total of $1,028,319,-123. Our imports were a great deal less—$903,-530,515. What do the worshippers at the shrine of protection want? That seems to me quite satisfactory as far as it goes. I read an article in some magazine, written by the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and one of the questions which he asks is, how can farming be made to pay? Of course I was very anxious to hear what anyone had to say on that subject. Well, what was the sum and substance of the whole article? Increase the tariff! So simple—no trouble; just increase the tariff and nothing but unbounded prosperity will come to agriculture and to every other industry in this Dominion of Canada. Mr. Speaker, we have had sixty years of that doctrine and we are still wondering what is going to solve our problem.

I had some quotations here that I might have read, from some speeches by hon. members to my right, in regard to the free importation of certain implements, but I shall not read them, because I think those gentlemen when they made the statements to which I refer were perfectly sincere, and they have a perfect right to change their opinions whenever they wish to do so. I might have referred to a speech made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) at Portage la Prairie, when he referred to the "ramparts of gold behind which the manufacturers were entrenched." But he also has every right to change his opinion if he wants to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, his geography is a little wrong; the speech was made in this House. At that time, however, the duty was very much higher, being under the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but—

Mr. FORKE: If the right hon. leader of the opposition would make a speech of that kind in the House. I wonder what he would have said at Portage la Prairie?

Now, I want to say a few words in connection with the stand that this group has always taken in regard to the tariff. People who are talking about the demands of the Progressive party always lay great emphasis upon articles used by the farmers. But I do not think the members on this side of the House are so much excited over farm implements; what they are interested in is the duties upon the necessities of life. We are not selfish; we want nothing but what is in the interests of this whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I have some sympathy for the Canadian manufacturers; I know something about the difficulties with which they have to contend. I might make a suggestion to the government: it would not be at all amiss to take the sales tax off the price of farm implements.

An hon. MEMBER: And everything else.

Mr. FORKE: I have no objection to taking it off all along the line, and I think that would not be a bad move, it would help the manufacturers. But I am going to make an appeal to the Canadian manufacturers of implements—I do not know whether they will listen to me or not. The Canadian manufacturer claims that he is not getting very much protection. No doubt he knows his business better than I do, but I know the feeling of the farmers and I am pretty sure that if the Canadian manufacturer of implements to-day would say, "I do not want any protection; I am going to give the farmers the benefit of free agricultural implements," such a sentiment would be created in favour of the Canadian manufacturer that he would very soon get that mass production that he says he wants. Do you know what the situation is to-day on most of the farms? I know what it is in the West and I have an idea that it is the same almost everywhere. In making up our income tax returns we are allowed ten per cent depreciation upon our implements. Do you know that there is hardly a farmer in the West who in his tax returns to-day is allowed any depreciation on his implements?—for the reason that his implements are all over ten years old; legally they are dead and gone, out of existence, but he is still carrying on with them, doing the best he can; he is letting acreage go out of cultivation rather than buy new implements. If that sympathetic feeling could be cultivated to-day, I am sure that a vast amount of new machinery would immediately be bought, and with the mass production that would result the implement manufacturer could, I think, get along very well almost without protection.

I have no quarrel with the Canadian manufacturer. I think the farmer and the manufacturer ought to be in the same boat; there ought to be a bond of sympathy between them, because the welfare and prosperity of the one reacts upon the welfare and prosperity of the other.

The trouble to-day is not over-production but lack of consumption. Inability to buy, that is the trouble in Canada to-day. I do not know what the Massey Harris Company, for instance, are turning out to-day, but I have no hesitation in saying that they are not turning out over one-third of the machinery they were turning out ten or fifteen years ago. Now something must be done, and something can be done, and I am sure it would be done if a proper view were taken of the situation. I am not offering this as a panacea for all ills; I am only throwing it out as a suggestion to the manufacturers. I know something about Canadian implements, and I know very well that the implements made in Canada are just as good as, if not better than, the implements made anywhere else in the world at the present time.

Another matter that is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne is national unity. I think that was referred to somewhat sarcastically last night, but maybe I am wrong. It seems to me this is a question on which everyone should be terribly in earnest. It is something that we ought to consider very seriously to-day. What hopes, what grand ideas we have had for the future of this Canada of ours, and at this late day are we beginning to talk of national unity? Is there any danger that East and West shall fall apart? We have heard mutterings in the West and some in the East, but I for one hope we shall hear no more of them, that that shall be a thing of the past, and that henceforth we are going to march forward as a united country seeking only the welfare and happiness of the people of this whole Dominion. But, Mr. Speaker, in the final analysis national unity must be based upon national justice. That is the only solid basis upon which we can build up a great and prosperous country. Is wealth to be centralized in any particular spot in this Dominion? I for one do not want to see this a country of millionaires and paupers living side by side. I want to see it a country of moderate wealth, widely distributed over this Dominion, and no section will long continue to pay tribute to any other section of the community.

I want to say this, and I say it in all seriousness, that high protection if persisted in will not spell prosperity, but in the long run it will spell disaster for this Dominion. Somtimes the United States is pointed out as a bright and shining example of what protection has done for a country. There can be no comparison in any way between the position of Canada and the position of the United States. The United States to-day, in some of its parts, at all events, is not in just as prosperous a condition as it might be. We know that agriculture in the United States, even with its vast home market, is unable to carry on with any great degree of prosperity.

I want to say a few words upon the question of transportation, and I have another short extract here that I want to read. It is taken from an article written by F. W. Cowie, B.A., Sc., M.E.I.C., entitled Transportation Routes in Canada and their Relation to Enduring Production. He says:

There are few subjects, at the present time, of more acute public interest, and none more vital in connection with enduring production in Canada, than transportation routes, and the urgent demand for a reduction in the price of transportation. Tax payers look with distrust at any suggestion of a new transportation route. On the other hand ugly facts regarding production stare us in the face.

Agricultural production, in western Canada, which otherwise offers such limitless exportable resources, is reported to be in danger of not enduring, on account of profitless returns as compared with competing countries where transportation to markets, pays a lower price—

I want to draw your attention particularly to this remark because I believe it is absolutely true:

The merchant whose desk overlooks the great harbour, and whose visitors smack of the sea, is no more concerned with international trade, than the farmer a thousand miles from the seaboard.

Now if the cost of moving goods is exorbitant it simply dries up the channels of trade. It is like the hardening of the arteries in the human body. It simply means that in the not far distant future the whole course of business will come to an end. Reduction in the cost of transportation is an absolute necessity in this country. Sometimes a thing may be an absolute necessity and yet not be within the bounds of probability. However, I do hope that there may be some method and some way adopted whereby we can reduce the cost of transportation, because I believe that upon the solving of this problem the future prosperity of our country to a very large degree depends. We want the shortest and the cheapest routes to be utilized. We sometimes speak about our Canadian harbours. I want to see all the trade possible brought to our Canadian harbours. I want to see every harbour used to the extent that it is possible to use it with economy and to the best advantage.

I want to say a few words about the Hudson Bay railway. I know a great many gentlemen in this House are anxious to get a little more information in regard to this very much needed enterprise. In fact, I know that two members in this part of the House have taken the trouble during the recess to go over the Hudson Bay route, examining the condition of the roadbed, viewing the harbour and all the improvements that have been made up there, and if we seem a little exuberant in this part of the House over the building of the Hudson Bay railway, give us credit at least for trying to get all the information we possibly can upon this undertaking. I hope one of these gentlemen at least, and perhaps both of them, will tell the House what they saw and the condition of things generally in connection with the Hudson Bay railway. They came back with a fine story, that there was a grand country up north, that it was well worth building a railroad into if for no other purpose than colonization, that there was great wealth up in that northern country. All over the west during this last year there have been meetings held by boards of trade and resolutions passed by agricultural societies and other bodies. In the city of Winnipeg we have organized to-day a "Build the Hudson Bay road" society. I want the government and hon. members of this House to understand that not for one moment can this subject be downed, because the West is determined to have the Hudson Bay railway built, and it will be built, I believe, in the not far distant future. Bear in mind that a great many people have expressed a well-founded opinion on the feasibility of this route. For over three hundred years the ships of the Hudson's Bay Company were passing in and out of that harbour, and they had very, very few accidents in all those years. However, I think this subject will be dealt with at another time.

Another matter that is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne is the satisfactory showing made by the Canadian National Railways and the progress they have made during the past year. I think every lover of our country must rejoice in the fact that we see these roads on the way to prosperity. Year by year the conditions are improving and in the not very far distant future I believe we are going to have a valuable system of railways in this country in the possession of the people.

There is an idea, and it is not original with me—it has been mentioned quite frequently in this House—and that is that the over-capitalization of the National Railways ought to be written off and a re-valuation made, which would represent the actual value of the road, and in that way the Board of Management would be given an opportunity to show what could be done under government ownership of railways. At the present time the railways are loaded with money that was misspent, money that might just as well have been thrown into the sea. That expenditure was a national loss and the nation will have to stand that loss ultimately anyway, and it seems to me it would be good business to write down that over-capitalization to a figure that the railways actually represent. That would encourage the Board of Management and the people, and perhaps make it possible in the not far distant future to have a drastic cut in freight rates over the roads. I would like to say in connection with the Board of Management that sometimes we see criticism of the board, but I think everyone who wishes well for these railways was agreed that the Board of Management ought to have a free hand, without any political manipulation or influence over them, to show what they could do and to see whether it was possible to make of that system a paying proposition. It seems to me that the Board of Management have done well. I think they have done just as well as could be expected under the conditions. That they have made mistakes, no one can deny. It is very human to make mistakes, and is there anyone in this House who is able to cast the first stone? So I do hope from this on that all political manœuvring and party advantage will be lost sight of in connection with the railways, and that every member of this House will be anxious to see that the Board of Management and the Canadian National Railways are given a fair chance. I do not suggest that they are not getting a fair chance. I hope they are, but I can assure you, Mr Speaker, that the country will not stand for anything that will jeopardize the future welfare of this great enterprise. I sometimes think there might be something done in the way of a committee composed of members of all parties in this House who could perhaps take under their peculiar care matters affecting the Canadian National Railways—anything in the world to prevent the railways from being made a partisan matter on the floor of this House, anything that will get parliament working harmoniously together to see that the railways prosper.

Now just a word in regard to freight rates on the Great Lakes. We are told that provision is to be made that freight will be carried at the very lowest rate from the Great Lakes to the ocean, and from the ocean to Liverpool. When I think of the conditions last fall and what took place on the Great Lakes, it does not fill me with very much pride. I think that Canadians as a whole might rather feel humiliated over what happened on the Great Lakes last fall, and no matter what part of the House hon. gentlemen may sit in, I think the conditions reflected equally upon the whole parliament of this country. It seemed to me—and I know something about what was taking place at the time the bill dealing with lake freight rates was going through the House—a statement was made to me that might explain something that took place in the fall when the bill came into operation—that there was a contest between the government of Canada and the interests; and when I say "the interests" I do not use the expression in the sarcastic way which is sometimes employed in this House; but when it came to a contest the people had to haul down their flag and make arrangements that would suit these gentlemen in connection with the carriage of lake freight. I give the government credit for the attempt that was made in this connection. I think that attempt was sincere and well meant, but it was futile because the interests were stronger and more powerful than parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: Well, I am expressing my own opinion; and I can assure the government that they will get all the support it is possible for us to give them if they come to grips with an organization repeating any such demands as were made on the Great Lakes last fall.

Now, let me say a word or two in connection with the subject of ocean freights. I was not very well satisfied with the answers given last session by the Minister of Agriculture to questions regarding what was being done with respect to the carrying of cattle over the ocean when the embargo against the admission of Canadian cattle into Great Britain was lifted. I cannot say what the reason was for the nature of the replies that we received, but they were not altogether satisfactory. Let me issue this warning to the government—perhaps the admonition may be unnecessary; they may be taking all adequate steps—that we are not going to be again put in the ridiculous position we formerly found ourselves in: when we fought for years and years to get the embargo against Canadian cattle removed, only to find that a line of freight boats was going to be inaugurated which would charge to the limit of what the service would stand. There can be, and there ought to be, steps taken to prevent any such unfortunate position as that. Surely enough ships can be found in Europe to transport our cattle at reasonable rates. I do not care what flag these vessels fly, but I do say that ships should be provided to transport our cattle at the lowest possible rate.

I am not going to say anything in particular on the subject of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I expect the vessels of that marine are still afloat, and are still doing good service. However, I should like to make this suggestion, I did the same thing in connection with the Canadian National Railways: We all understand the conditions under which the Canadian Government Merchant Marine was built. The ships were constructed at a time when costs were excessive, and the vessels involved a much larger expenditure than should have been the case. We will not enter into any discussion at the present time as to the reasons for this excessive cost, or why such a course was entered upon. It does seem to me, however, that it would be a wise proceeding to see whether the merchant marine could not be put on a sound basis and the transaction converted into 4 p.m. a profitable one. After all is said and done I am not convinced that these vessels are so useless as some of my hon. friends have tried to make the House believe.

A word or two now in regard to immigration. I know that my own opinions on this question do not exactly coincide with the views of some of the members even on my own side of the House. Nevertheless I feel impelled to make this statement: I do not for one moment think that putting up the bars against imports and then pulling them down in some other place, or letting in immigrants indiscriminately is going to solve our present difficulties. At the same time I do believe that a sane policy of immigration would have that happy result in the case of a great many of our troubles. I shall not rehearse the rather depressing story about the numbers of people that are leaving this country and crossing to the other side. Mr. Speaker, so long as Canadians live beside a nation which numbers one hundred and ten millions there will be, at all times, a certain drift of people into the United States. The attraction which numbers holds out, the operation of the law of gravitation, will have its influence and there will always be a movement of that kind to a greater or lesser extent. As to the question "Who goes to the United States?" let me say this: I had the privilege after the last session of parliament of visiting the city of Kingston and speaking there to the students of Queens University. I had the pleasure of attending the banquet of the graduating class of that year. I looked at that splendid gathering of young men and young women, bright, intelligent—oh! nothing finer in this Dominion—and the thought came into my mind, "Here are perhaps, a hundred young men and women of whom fifty per cent may cross the line in a very short time to seek an outlet for their energies, for their abilities, and for their education." That this seems to be the case is, to me, one of the tragedies of the present situation. I do not know just how we can cope with such a situation, but every attempt should be made to render conditions in Canada as attractive as possible in order that young people of that fine character may be induced to remain in their native land. I have often thought that if we could get some young men with intelligence, with education, and with initiative power out into our farming districts of the West to take up agriculture there as their life work, it would be a great blessing and a great advantage to that community. Unfortunately we do not find them there; the conditions are not such at the present time as to attract anybody who has any ambition whatever. "'Who comes and who goes?" I am afraid sometimes we are losing a very fine type of people. I am not blaming the government for this, I am not blaming anyone; I am looking conditions in the face and trying to find a remedy for them.

I have spoken of those who go. Now as to those who come. I have already said that I do not want to see a policy of indiscriminate immigration adopted. Do you know that in the three western prairie provinces the Anglo-Saxon people—and you might include with them those of the French race—are in the minority? Whatever the future of those provinces may be, the population is not going to be of Anglo-Saxon or of French descent; it is going to be something we know not what, and we want to be careful how we start out with foreign stock. I am not at all afraid, but we have at the present time just about enough to absorb of that description in our western prairie provinces. By all means, let us have immigration—immigration of the right sort. Get me young men, young women also, healthy and willing to work, coming from Great Britain, Scandinavia, France. I would not be afraid of Germans either at this time. They are all right; they will make good citizens in time. I will take all the immigration of that kind we can possibly get. The first thing we want to be careful about is to make conditions suitable for the people when they come here. Taxation is one of our problems; transportation is another, and the doubling of our population would go a long way towards solving those two problems. Conditions may not be just what they ought to be in Canada; but when we think of the 2,000,000 unemployed people in the British Isles to-day, we should not be afraid of inviting them here to work. Canada is all right; our country is as good as it ever was; we have just as much faith in it as we ever had, and notwithstanding the present difficulties which we are encountering, I have no fear at all for the future of our country.

In reading over the Speech from the Throne, I was rather sorry to see that when mention was made of the Bank Act, no notice was taken of some of the agitation that was going on in the country during the last year. Just the day after the Bank Act was passed last year, we had a statement given out by the Union Bank of Canada in regard to withdrawing $4,500,000, I think, from its rest account to cover up losses. Then we had the amalgamation of the Bank of Commerce and the Bank of Hamilton, and finally the failure of the Home Bank. All these brought about a great deal of unrest, discontent and dissatisfaction with banking arrangements in Canada. Throughout the country during this last year a discussion had been going on whether anything further could be done than was done in the amendments that were made to the Bank Act to make those who deposit their money in our chartered banks more secure than they have been in the past. This matter is worthy of attention. I remember making in this House last year the statement, a sort of prophecy, that when the Bank Act went through, it would not last for ten years, and I think I see my prophecy coming true. Something should and, I think, will be done to make more secure those who have money deposited in the care of the chartered banks of our country. Mention has been made of the commission that has been appointed to inquire into the losses sustained by the depositors in the Home Bank. I listened to the questions that were asked this afternoon, and I hope the report of that commission will come into this House in time to afford us an opportunity of discussing it.

In regard to the branch lines that it is proposed to build in connection with the Canadian National Railways, there is an old saying that "hope deferred maketh the heart sick." I am sure our hopes have been deferred long enough, and out on the western prairies there are many people whose hearts are sick from deferred hope of railway communication to bring them within the pale of civilization. The farmer and his wife and family marooned on the wide prairie are surely deserving of our sympathy. If the lines are constructed in the proper places, this will represent not merely an expenditure of money, but a capital expenditure that will produce great returns in the not far distant future. This is a duty which we owe to those people. They have been taken in there and put in that position and they have been promised railway facilities. They have been waiting on year after year until they are heart sick waiting for some relief in that direction. I hope no party manipulation or political wire-pulling in any way will prevent the House from voting money to construct those lines. I am not going to absolve the government entirely from blame for some of the things that took place last session. The matter might have been carried out differently and some of the difficulties that arose avoided. Let us, however, forget that, get down to business now, and see that the proper facilities are given to the people out in those western prairie provinces.

Another subject I might mention—I suppose there will be other opportunities of discussing it—is the soldiers' civil re-establishment, the soldiers who have been put on the land. I can speak only for the province of Manitoba, but all is not well. Some of the reports that we receive seem to be quite satisfactory, but I can assure this House that a great deal of hardship and suffering is being endured at this time by those returned soldiers. It was a great satisfaction to me to have a small part in the ceremony that took place in this building at the beginning of the session, a ceremony that I am proud to think upon and upon which I am sure all our memories will dwell with pleasure. But I could not help thinking at the time when we were paying to the dead that honour to which they are entitled, and while our hearts were full of thankfulness for all they did for us, we should remember those who came back, and who are struggling to establish themselves to-day and who are finding themselves in dire difficulty and distress. When I consider the position of the farming population of to-day, I know men, without particularising individuals, who own their implements, stock and everything else, and who yet have a hard time to make ends meet. Our soldier settlers were placed on the land at a time when land was high in price; they bought their stock, implements and everything else at exorbitant prices. So, how in the world can we expect them to make a living? I know there are kind hearts in this House; that we want to do justice; that we want to do right, and I sincerely hope something will be done to ensure that those men get a better and fairer deal than they are receiving at the present time. No matter whether the country loses money in the transaction, we owe this to those men.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is the peculiar condition in which we find parliamentary parties almost everywhere in the world to-day. We find governments being carried on with a minority of the House. That is a condition which we find here, a condition which we find in Great Britain, and I believe, whatever may be our private opinions, whatever we may wish, two parties or three—and I know many people will say two parties are satisfactory—from this time on, I do not think it is at all likely that we are ever going to see a government with a complete majority of the House. It is, therefore, about time that we were beginning to take these matters into consideration. It seems to me absurd that upon a matter of minor importance a government cannot afford to be in a minority vote in this House. That is not good sense; it is not good business, and I believe regulations should be made in accordance with the present condition of things everywhere in the world at present. If a straight vote of want of confidence should be moved against the government and the government is defeated, there is nothing for the government to do but to resign. That is sufficient notice that it is not wanted any longer. I mention this because, as hon. members know, the Prime Minister of Great Britain said that he was not going to be manipulated by wire-pulling to resign unless he felt that conditions warranted his resignation. These are things worth while thinking about, and it is time the Parliament of Canada was beginning to take some of these matters into consideration.

There is a great deal of anxiety to find out where the Progressives stand in this parliament to-day. I do not know why there should be any such anxiety. The Progressive party stands where it has always stood since coming into this House; the Progressives are ready to support progressive measures whenever such measures come before the House. If the government are prepared to present these measures for our consideration they know that they shall get our support; if they do not, then they will have to take the consequence. We have an abiding faith in the principles of equality of opportunity and equal justice to all sections of the country. We are willing at all times to trust the Canadian people, with sincere belief in the ultimate triumph of democracy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg to close the few remarks I have made with a quotation which I have taken from the speech of the right hon. the Prime Minister of Great Britain. I know I am unworthy even to use his language, but it is so beautiful and seems to express so well a sentiment in which I firmly believe that I am going to quote to the House his words:

> The shield of love and the spear of justice will still be in the hands of good and upright men and women, and the ideal of a great future will still be in front of our people. I see no end, thank God, to these things. I see my own horizon, I see my own skyline, but I am convinced that when my children and my children's children get there, there will be another skyline, another horizon, another dawning, another glorious beckoning from Heaven itself. That is my faith, and in that faith I go on, and my colleagues go on, doing in their own life what they can to make their generation contribute something substantial to the well-being and happiness and holiness of human life.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, we listened yesterday for some time to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and then to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) making charges and counter-charges of a rather serious character, including political bribery, misrepresentation, extravagance and sectional policies. Both these are honourable gentlemen, and I fancy that their statements must be accepted as substantially true. Possibly that is the reason why these newer groups are being sent to the House. About all that we who are in the minority here, can do, is to present as faithfully as we can the opinions of the people who return us to this House.

Reference was made in the Speech from the Throne to the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference. May I be permitted to express the belief that the greatest event which has happened in the Empire during the past year has been the attainment of office by the British Labour party. Any thoughtful man will recognize that this is not merely the coming into office of a new political party but that it rather represents the emergence into public life of a new set of ideals. It is very significant indeed that the last speaker (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressive party in this House, should have closed his speech with a quotation from the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Since, perhaps, we have not had a very full understanding of the position of labour, I should like to quote one or two sentences from the constitution of the British Labour party Its objects are national, inter-Dominion and international. It proposes:

> To secure for the producers, by hand or by brain, the full fruits of their industry and the most equitable distribution thereof that may be possible upon the basis of the common ownership of the means of production, and the best obtainable system of popular administration, and control of each industry or service; * * * to co-operate with the labour and socialist organizations in the dominions and the dependencies with a view to promoting the purposes of the party, and to take common action for the promotion of a higher standard of social and economic life for the working population of the respective countries; * * * to co-operate with the labour and socialist organizations in other countries and to assist in organizing a federation of nations for the maintenance of freedom and peace, for the establishment of suitable machinery for the adjustment and settlement of international disputes by conciliation or judicial arbitration, and for such international legislation as may be practicable.

I desire to call attention to a paragraph or so taken from the manifesto which was issued to the people of Great Britain. I do so because I believe that the attitude of the present government of Great Britain will have its very decided effects upon the policies of the various Dominions.

The Labour party challenges the tariff policy and the whole conception of economic relations underlying it. Tariffs are not a remedy for unemployment; they are an impediment to the free interchange of goods and services upon which civilized society rests. They foster a spirit of profiteering, materialism and selfishness, poison the life of nations, lead to corruption in politics, promote trusts and monopolies, and impoverish the people. They perpetuate inequalites in the distribution of the world's wealth, won by the labour of hands and brain. These inequalities the Labour party means to remove. * * * The Labour party proposes to restore to the people their lost rights in the land, including minerals, and to that end will work for re-equipping the Land Valuation Department, securing to the community the economic rent of land and facilitating the acquisition of land for public use. * * * The Labour party is working for the creation of a commonwealth of co-operative service. It believes that so far only a beginning has been made in the scientific organization of industry. It will apply in a practical spirit the principle of public ownership and control to the mines, the railway service and the electrical power stations, and the development of municipal services. * * * Labour's vision of an ordered world embraces the nations now torn with enmity and strife. It stands therefore for a policy of international co-operation, through a strengthened and enlarged League of Nations, the settlement of disputes by conciliations and judicial arbitration, the immediate calling by the British government of an international conference, including Germany, on terms of equality to deal with the Versailles Treaty, especially reparations and debts, and the resumption of free economic and diplomatic relations with Russia. This will pave the way for disarmament, the only security for the nations.

I think perhaps that members of this House will be in a better position to judge of the arguments and policies which we attempt from time to time to put forth in this corner of the House, if they understand that we have been working very much along the lines proposed by the Labour party of Great Britain co-operating with the international organizations of which it forms a unit.

Before I speak to the more general questions relative to economic conditions in Canada, I propose to introduce a particular matter which has been of very great concern to our working class population. I refer to the situation in Nova Scotia among the miners and steel workers. A commission has recently reported on the conditions there, but the Speech from the Throne contains no intimation whatever that any definite action is contemplated. We had a royal commission in 1920, we have had boards of inquiry and conciliation, we have had special inquiries, we have had the military sent down to that province twice within the last two years, and yet the conditions remain, if anything more unsatisfactory than ever. I say this in full view of the fact that recently the miners have returned to work. These inquiries and commissions have revealed wretched housing and sanitary conditions, abuses connected with the company's stores, unsatisfactory working conditions, low wages and irregular work, and in the case of the steel workers long working days of eleven and thirteen hour shifts, with every other week twenty-four hours on end. These unsatisfactory conditions prevail notwithstanding the fact that Canada was a signatory of the Peace treaty under which the workers were supposed to be given an eight hour day.

The employees have been investigated. I would suggest that it is about time that the employers, the British Empire Steel Corporation, should be investigated, and I would urge upon the government the appointment of a parliamentary committee that would go fully into these conditions which have been causing so much trouble to the authorities and such hardship to a considerable section of our people. This committee might very well investigate the abnormal profits of the corporation during the war, government contracts and subsidies, the absentee management with its officials alleged to be incompetent and superabundant, the fact that real costs and profits have often been concealed through contracts between constituent and subsidiary companies, and the amount of watered stock in the corporation.

About a year ago there appeared in the Toronto Star a series of articles dealing with the situation in Nova Scotia. One or two excerpts which suggest that the real investments of this company are not sufficient to warrant the large profits that the management insist upon taking out of the business may be of interest to hon. members. The writer says that the promoter in the first instance:

—estimated the cost of his plant at $6,000,000 at the outside. He then bonded it for that amount; and on top of that issued $15,000,000 in common stock. This original $15,000,000 of common "watered" stock is represented in the existing issues of Besco stock by $6,000,000 of common stock and by $13,500,000 of seven per cent second preference, on which the dividends are accumulative liability.

That was in the early days.

Fourteen companies of various grades of importance go to make up Besco. When the fourteen went into the caldron they owed in stocks of various kinds a little under $83,000,000. When the merging process had been completed these $83,000,000 had been transmuted into just under $102,000,000.

To pay dividends on nearly $102,000,000 of stocks should be a sufficient task for the men who have to manage an industry which must meet the world competition in the steel and coal trade. But before they can begin to do this they have to meet prior charges on over $31,000,000 of mortgages of various sorts. Thus the total amount on which the managers of Besco must struggle to pay interest is about $133,000,000.

But the addition of this $19,000,000 of "water" was not the only addition which the Besco promoters made to the burdens of the men who have to make the industry pay. One of the most striking results which an analysis of the Besco consolidation yields is the transformation of common into preferred stocks that took place. In the Besco process common stocks were reduced from sixty-three to twenty-four millions while preferred stocks rose from nineteen to seventy-seven millions.

The result of this transformation process has been the addition of charges of over $4,000,000 to the annual liabilities of the industry.

These are the statements of Mr. Francis A. Carman, who made a special investigation of the situation.

Now, the claim has been made that higher wages and more satisfactory conditions could not be given because of the financial position of this company. We find in the Montreal papers of February 1922 the annual report of the British Empire Steel Corporation. It reads:

The total earnings of the property, after deducting all manufacturing, selling and administrative expenses, amounted to $4,444,346.

Mr. R. M. Wolvin, the president, said:

After the provision of amounts required to pay all dividends accrued upon first preference stock of the corporation and the preference and preferred stock of constituent and subsidiary companies outstanding, there remained a balance of $1,031,031.07 at credit of surplus account on the 31st December, 1923. This amount added to the surplus of constituent companies carried forward $21,784,870.32 makes a consolidated surplus, $22,815,901.39.

I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that at least a decent living wage ought to be the very first claim upon the earnings of a corporation of this character.

As late as January 31st our newspapers gave the report of the commission which had been investigating the situation in Newfoundland. At a time when important negotiations were in progress between the Newfoundland government and the company, ex-Premier Squires received $46,000 from funds of the Dominion Steel Company. The action was approved by Roy Wolvin and other high officials. The people of Nova Scotia are asking: Is the Newfoundland government the only one involved?

Mr. CARROLL: Does my hon. friend not know that Mr. Walker, of England, is investigating that very question in Newfoundland at the present time? The receipt of the $46,000 does not appear to have been proven yet, and the investigation is about half through.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Certain admissions have already been made. My point is that this with the other matters which I have mentioned might very well be investigated by a parliamentary committee appointed at this session. When we find these vast natural resources of Canada under the control of an autocratic company and the large majority of the workers deprived of any voice in the management of their own affairs, I wonder whether we can claim that we have in any measure succeeded in establishing democracy in this country. I venture to quote a paragraph or two from a recent book by Viscount Milner, The Questions of the Hour:

The real gravamen of the charge against our present industrial system is not that it involves an unfair distribution of the product, but that it mismanages, misdirects and therefore unduly limits production itself. * * * Such results are inevitable as long as the investment of capital, determining as it does the nature and distribution of employment, is governed wholly by considerations of individual gain. * * * They (the wage earners) have nothing whatever to say as to the direction of capital, upon which their employment depends, yet they may at any moment be reduced to penury by its misdirection. * * * Over at least four fifths of the field of national industry the supreme direction is still exclusively in the hands of the moneyed class, and is entirely out of the control, and indeed beyond the ken, of the great body of producers. * * * There is nothing sacrosanct in the present divorce of the great body of producers from the ownership and control of the instruments of production. . . it is of comparatively recent growth.

Again and again during the past few years the workers of Nova Scotia have attempted to obtain some redress, and I think it perfectly proper to bring their case before this House, which is supposed to safeguard the interests of all the citizens of Canada. They have appealed to the provincial governments; they have appealed to the federal government. Two years ago they asked for a royal commission that would investigate thoroughly the whole situation. Their request was refused. A year ago they came asking for pensions for their aged miners who were helpless after long years of work. I believe that all they carried away from Ottawa was a copy of the Prime Minister's book, Industry and Humanity. They have sought to secure representation in parliament, but they claim that owing to gerrymandering, by which two counties were thrown into a two-member constituency, it has been made very difficult for the industrial workers to secure representation. They further claim that owing to a roorback, false appeals which were circulated immediately prior to the election, their candidate at that time, Mr. J. B. McLachlan, was defeated. I am not going into these matters. I should like this House to know that the miners claim that it has been impossible for them to obtain representation on the floor of this House. So they have been driven again and again to the strike as the only weapon which they could use. Their position in this matter has been entirely misrepresented. It was misrepresented by the papers a year ago. In a more recent strike, we were told that they had broken contracts. They maintain that according to a decision of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia given a year ago they were free to cease from their work.

That brings me to a question that has been of very great interest to the workers of Canada from coast to coast, namely, the arrest and conviction of J. B. McLachlan, the secretary of the miners. I am very glad indeed to give credit to the government in that within the last two or three days an order has been issued for the release of J. B. McLachlan on parole. It has not been generally known that the other six men who were arrested and convicted at the same time were released some time ago. I understand that Mr. McLachlan is still in Dorchester penitentiary. Whether or not he will accept his release on ticket-of-leave, I do not know, but although his release may be a certain kindness to him and to his family, it by no means goes far enough, because he still stands as a criminal. For what was he arrested? Because he wrote a circular letter which he sent out to the different unions, protesting against the brutal action of the provincial police of Nova Scotia. He stated how this force of provincial policemen had ridden down men, women and children who were going peaceably about their business. I have here—I will not take the trouble to read them to the House—statutory declarations which were presented to the commission which recently reported, substantially corroborating the statements which Mr. McLachlan had made. He was charged with spreading a false tale, and also with sedition. He was taken to Halifax, and the charge of spreading a false tale was dropped; it was found that his tale was all too true. The authorities then proceeded with the second charge, that of seditious libel. I am not going to weary the House by going into the history of the law of sedition. It is an obsolete law; it was not used in England, or very rarely used, for nearly one hundred years. The safeguards which have existed in this law up to 1919 were removed by a bit of vicious legislation which was rushed through this House at that time. Essentially sedition, although not defined in the code, consists in the criticizing of public authorities. I submit that if half as serious charges had been made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) out in the open as he made on the floor of the House yesterday, he could be charged under this law of sedition, and for the life of me I do not see that anything could save him. But surely we have got beyond the time when authorities are immune from criticism. We are surely supposed to be living in a day of democratic institutions, and if authorities are not doing the right thing they ought to be criticized. There have always existed men of heroic mould who are willing to stand up and claim their rights, and Mr. J. B. McLachlan, I believe, is one of these. It is ninety years since in Nova Scotia a man was tried for sedition. Then a man was haled before the courts and accused of being "a wicked seditious and ill-disposed person, a person of most wicked and malicious temper and disposition." That man is now regarded as one of Canada's greatest sons, Joseph Howe. But he was able to say at that time, in connection with his trial:

> And here I may be permitted to thank heaven and our ancestors, that I do not stand before a corrupt and venal court and a packed and predetermined jury.

Was J. B. McLachlan able to say that? He had been taken from his own home county and sent off to be tried in Halifax, a city which through the papers and through false representation had been poisoned against the miners through a period of many months, if not years. Further than that, his case was dealt with by judges many of whom up to the time of their elevation to the bench had been very closely connected with the coal companies. I am not for one moment accusing these judges of wilfully prostituting their office, but I say that men who for many, many years have been financially interested in certain concerns might find it very, very hard to dissociate themselves from certain points of view which they would almost inevitably have acquired. I asked, when in Nova Scotia, concerning the judges of the supreme court, and I was told that the corporation influence on the bench was so strong that the court is looked upon by labour as a company department. At least four judges were very closely connected with the companies in New Glasgow before their appointment to the bench.

Chief Justice the Hon. Robert E. Harris was president of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company shortly before his appointment. Mr. Justice Mellish, the trial judge in the McLachlan case, received his appointment in a manner which makes him an outstanding corporationist on the bench. His appointment was made shortly before the criminal trial of the Dominion Coal Company officials for causing the New Waterford explosion. The New Waterford explosion took place at New Waterford, C.B., N.S., on July 25, 1917; some 65 or 70 men losing their lives by it. The men contended the explosion was caused through negligence of the corporation and its officials, and an information was laid. The then Mr. Mellish was a member of the firm of McInnis, Mellish, Fulton and Kenny, Halifax, N.S. This firm were the chief solicitors, as their successors are to-day, for the Dominion Coal Company and the Dominion Steel Corporation, before the merger of these and other companies into the Besco. Mr. Mellish appeared in court on all their actions. This information being laid, the office of McInnis and Mellish was preparing the case for the companies involved. Shortly before the trial, Mr. Mellish received his appointment as Judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. His first important work on the bench was to hear the New Waterford explosion case at Sydney, the defence of which he had prepared for the companies, and their officials, Mr. Hector McInnis, senior in his law firm, being chief counsel for the defence on the trial at Sydney.

Mr. Justice D. D. McKenzie, a puisne judge of the court, was, previous to his appointment, the local solicitor for the Nova Scotia Steel Company, at North Sydney, and was very closely in touch with Besco.

Mr. Justice Ritchie, previous to his appointment, did work for the Dominion Coal Company. Whether he was a permanent solicitor or not, I just do not know. However, he appeared in some cases on their behalf.

Mr. Justice Rogers, previous to his appointment, was a partner of Henry, Rogers, Harris and Stewart, Halifax, and solicitor for the Nova Scotia Steel Company.

The other judges on the bench are Justices Russell and Chisholm, neither of whom had known relations with these companies.

Perhaps I should add that the Nova Scotia workers point out that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), who is officially responsible for the troops being sent to Cape Breton, has been, if he is not still, the solicitor for the coal companies. Now, Mr. Speaker, if anything more were needed to destroy the respect for the impartiality of the courts it was suplied by the congratulatory telegram sent by Besco to the Attorney General of Nova Scotia.

I regret to say that not only was there no intimation in the Speech from the Throne that any action was to be taken to give relief to this large body of people in Nova Scotia, but further there is no intimation that any action is to be taken with regard to the iniquitous legislation which was placed on the statute book in 1919. The Prime Minister intimated yesterday that several of the measures which had been passed by this House last year were to be reintroduced. But he did not suggest that the amendment to the Immigration Act was to be reintroduced. I have still hopes that the government may consider this matter; That is why I am bringing it before the House to-day. The necessity for this legislation, without going into details, I can bring before the House by reading a resolution passed at the last annual convention of the Ontario section of the Canadian Labour party:

> That, whereas, during the post-war hysteria in the year 1919, there were passed in the federal parliament amendments to the Immigration Act; amendments to the Criminal Code; amendments to the Naturalization Act, which, in effect, deprived all citizens born outside of Canada, including British born, of the right of trial by jury, which removed the constitutional safeguards of freedom of speech, freedom of press, and freedom of assembly, and which rendered acquired Canadian citizenship valueless; therefore, be it resolved, that this convention of the Ontario section of the Canadian Labour party urge the two Labour members and the Progressive members of the federal House to put forth every endeavour to have this undemocratic and un-British legislation removed from the statute books of Canada.

I am glad to note that this convention called upon the Progressives to aid in this work. I would like to believe that the Liberal party of Canada has still a sufficient respect for the old Liberal traditions that it would feel that at this session of the House it could carry out the objects of the resolution which I have just read.

In his day, Joseph Howe was fighting against an iniquitous institution known popularly as The Family Compact. He is honoured to-day as others of the older stock of Canadians have been honoured, because they so bravely took up this fight. I venture to say that J. B. McLachlan and others who are fighting against the great trusts which have grown up over all this Dominion are fighting against a more dangerous and menacing institution, or series of institutions, than that of The Family Compact. The Prime Minister is rather fond of boasting that his grandfather was a rebel. Unless he is very careful the Prime Minister's grandchildren will not be able to boast that concerning him.

The Speech from the Throne suggests that there have been many evidences of increased prosperity in Canada. I may say that I have spent a good part of the recess in travelling across Canada from coast to coast. Possibly I did not meet the same class of people that those who are responsible for the Speech from the Throne met, but I must confess I have failed to see these alleged evidences of increased prosperity. I am not a pessimist. I think it is unfair to characterize those of us who point out defects as pessimists. I would like to think that I am a realist and believe in facing the facts as they are. In my own province of Manitoba conditions have been so serious that during the past year some 131 schools with 141 class rooms have been closed, very largely owing to the economic conditions of the rural districts.

Just here I might say it does seem to me that the school trustees of Manitoba were right when they suggested that it might be necessary that the federal authorities should, in some way, subsidize education in the various provinces. I am quite well aware that education is a matter of provincial concern, but it seems hardly fair for the federal authorities to introduce large numbers of immigrants and at the same time to allow economic conditions to prevail which drive large numbers of people out of the country, without their assuming some responsibility for the social and educational needs of those that are now here.

That same suggestion applies with regard to the great question of unemployment. We are told that the employment situation is distinctly better. Well, if that is really the case, what is the reason? The large emigration to the United States, I suppose, coupled with the fact that the government immigration machinery has not yet got into full motion. My own city of Winnipeg last year expended the sum of $150,000 in relief work, in relieving some 7,447 cases. The civic authorities expressed the view last year, and they still feel, that the Dominion government should give some assistance in caring for these who required relief on account of their having arrived comparatively recently in Canada. In Vancouver, as early as October 3, there was sent out to the prairie provinces—I am reading from the Winnipeg Tribune of October 3—this warning to unemployed to stay away from Vancouver:

> Warning to Unemployed.
> Stay away from Vancouver, B. C. This Winter.
>
> 4,500 men have gone from Vancouver and district to the harvest fields, and there still remain more than sufficient to meet all local requirements.
>
> Conditions are already bad throughout British Columbia.
> No relief work at all will be provided this winter.

I would simply submit that this would be splendid immigration literature. Under the prevailing conditions Toronto has had returned harvesters on its hands. Then, as late as the 26th February I received from the Building Trades Council of Hamilton an urgent request that something should be done. The statement is made:

> The workers seem to have used up their nest-eggs during the previous winter. Many of the cases we have personally known have not eaten meat for weeks.

Furthermore a committee in Montreal as late as February 28, reports 25,000 unemployed in that city. In Ottawa we are told by the Social Service Commissioner that there are 2,400 persons receiving relief. I do not know how many unemployed there will be after the civil service reductions have been completed.

The harvest, we are informed, is the most bountiful in the country's history. Yes, but let me ask, what about the net return? I have seen passing through Winnipeg day after day continuous trains of cars loaded with wheat going eastward, but all the cars that return are empty, which indicates pretty much the situation that prevails in the West.

We are informed that there is to be a reduction of taxation. We have yet to learn how, and how much. What we need essentially in Canada is the reduction of the enormous load that is now crippling industry. We have the war debt, and there has been no suggestion put forward by the government as to how that tremendous load is to be lessened. In fact, it seems that we shall be driven to adopt the old principle of the economists, that "those shall pay who are best able to pay." If that principle is to be put into practice we shall have an extension instead of a lessening of the income tax, we shall have the establishment of an inheritance tax, we shall have the adoption of a tax on land values and the values of other natural resources thus giving the people more ready access to these.

We are told that there are to be certain tariff re-adjustments. Just what these are I do not know, but I would suggest that the tariff re-adjustments must be accompanied by other measures, or their results may prove disastrous. It may very well be, if the privileges of certain industries are taken away from them without other corresponding changes in our system, that there will result very great hardship indeed. We all recognize that manufacturing in this country is difficult because of the high overhead charges, including all kinds of inflation, and because of the taxation and the high cost of living. What we need to do to-day is to adopt some system by which these costs may be lessened and industry may be able to go free. In fact I have sometimes thought that the greatest financial need of to-day is the raising of the mortgages that press so heavily upon industry of every description. I wish we had something in the nature of what we are told about in the Old Testament, the establishment of a year of jubilee when the slaves and the debtors could go free. If that could be brought about once I am sure there would be prosperity in Canada.

It is intimated that there is to be strict economy in the administration of the public service. That is capital. Everyone will agree that nothing could be better. But when the statement goes on to call for rigorous retrenchment in the public expenditures, I think we shall have to say that the wisdom of this policy all depends on many things. There is an old proverb which says:

> There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.

Mr. McMASTER: And, "The liberal soul shall be made fat."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: "And the liberal soul shall be made fat." I suppose the crux of that question is as to what constitutes "a liberal soul."

Mr. MARTELL: It is a good soul if it is truly Liberal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I quote a sentence or two in this connection from the report of the ordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Midland Bank Limited, as reported in the London Times of January 26, 1924. The Right Hon. Reginald McKenna said on that occasion:

> When national output is below productive capacity the policy should be to let money out: When production is at a maximum, the outflow of money should be checked, and if inflationary symptoms have appeared money should be withdrawn. * * * We have deliberately to make up our minds as to what we want.
> If we mean to get rid of unemployment we must have more money in existence to take up the increased production.

This, of course, refers particularly to bank policy, but it is equally true of a government policy in dealing with financial affairs. As Mr. J. A. Hobson maintains in The Economics of Unemployment:

> The proper provision against trade depressions and unemployment lies in strengthening the consuming powers of the community, so that effective demand for consumable goods may keep full pace with every increased productivity that arises from improvements in the arts of industry; and the strengthening of consumption is obtained by a better distribution of the product of industry.

The Speech from the Throne makes incidental reference to the Home Bank, and there is to be provision, we are told, for the appointment of a commission. May I ask the question that has been asked very generally across Canada—Why not an investigation by parliament itself? Perhaps we on this side of the House are apt to feel just now that no group was more speedily justified than those of us who last year attempted to secure greater security for the shareholders and depositors of the banks. It was stated that there was no need for the adoption of an amendment which I myself put forward, that there should be government auditors. If I remember aright the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us that he had consulted with the bankers and that they did not consider government auditors necessary. We feel further that we were quite justified in asking that there should be a full investigation into the whole of the credit system. We trust that the recommendations of last year's committee will be carried out this year.

In closing, since it is very difficult for a small group such as we are, through the motions and amendments which are brought forward adequately to express what our viewpoint really is, I venture to summarise very briefly.

In view of the enormous national debt with its heavy interest charges; of the high taxation, much of which results in the transference of wealth from the many to the few; of the burden of overhead charges which is crippling industry and commerce; of the deplorable condition of agriculture owing largely to tariffs, high freight rates and inadequate credit facilities; of unemployment resulting from a lack of purchasing power sufficient to absorb production; of the continued emigration of our people; of the instability of our banks as revealed in recent mergers and failures; of the concentration of economic power in the hands of a small group who are able to direct the policy of industry for their own financial gain, rather than toward supplying human needs:

And also in view of the fact that Canada possesses abundant natural resources; sufficient plant equipment—now working below capacity—to convert our raw material into consumable commodities; a plentiful supply of labour to man the plant equipment; and ample national credit—based on our national resources and the productive power of our people—more than sufficient to finance every necessary industrial and commercial enterprise:

We urge that during the present session of parliament steps should be taken towards:

(a) the establishment of a proper system of taxation by which our natural resources will be made more readily available for the use of the people:

(b) the operation under co-operative and democratic management of our plant equipment, thus providing more abundantly for the needs of the people:

(c) reforms, or reorganization, in our financial system by means of which more equitable distribution may be secured:

(d) the basing of our foreign trade policy and international relations on the clear recognition that the world has become an economic unit in which the welfare of each nation is dependent upon the welfare of all others.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend at this time of the afternoon to follow the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) in his remarks concerning labour conditions in England, labour conditions in Nova Scotia, and those prevailing in the different cities in Canada. My attention was drawn somewhat to conditions prevailing in the cities of Montreal and Toronto and other places near Ottawa where we have some knowledge of what is taking place at the present time. He complains that in those large cities there is unemployment during the winter season. That has been one of the drawbacks of Canada since Canada has been in existence. We have seasonal occupation. In Montreal, with which I am familiar, as I have lived there most of my life, every fall and early winter there is an invasion of people from the country districts who have been engaged during the summer in navigation, in farming, railway construction and so on, and who enter the city for the purpose of wintering there. That condition has prevailed at all times. It prevails in Winnipeg; it prevails in Ottawa; and it will prevail generally throughout Canada until we find seasonal occupations during the winter season. An attempt has been made in that respect through the western country, and from what I have been able to gather, I understand that it has met with a measure of success. In Montreal, at the present time, the building trades are occupied with trying to solve that problem of carrying on building operations during the whole of the winter so as to prevent those large numbers of workmen from being unemployed during the winter season. That is one matter which will have to be solved with time and with the experience which has been gained. No government can be blamed for that condition of affairs, no more than can any government be blamed for the emigration of Canadians to the United States.

This is my twenty-fifth session of parliament that I am beginning now and I have heard that discussed over and over again at all times. I have more particular knowledge of the province of Quebec, where I was born and brought up than of any other part of Canada, and I well remember away back fifty years ago when I was a mere boy, that farm houses in the valley of the Richelieu, farm houses in the valley of the St. Lawrence were closed for one, two, three years while the farmer left with his family to enter the manufacturing towns of the New England states, to make up for what he was unable to extract from his farm. They went there by the thousands. I believe to-day there are not less than 2,000,000 Canadians, three-quarters of them of French-Canadian origin, who now inhabit the eastern states. In some cities they have almost a majority. They have elected lieutenant governors. They have elected mayors of cities. They have some of their own numbers at the head of the largest enterprises in the New England states. In some cases in the state legislatures they constitute if not a majority, at least one-half of the representation. The late Curtis Guild, a former governor of Massachusetts, told me twenty years ago when I was honoured by the Canadian Club of Boston by being asked to deliver an address there, that at that time there were enough Canadians and descendants of Canadians, mostly from the Maritime provinces, to control the election of the mayor of Boston. Therefore, this exodus from Canada to the United States has existed at all times. It has been accentuated during the last year or two because of the industrial boom which has taken place in the United States and with which all readers of the newspapers are familiar. Higher wages attract the workmen especially during the winter season when unemployment is the rule in Canada, and they go from all parts of Canada to the United States. From my own constituency a stream of young men left for Detroit to work in the automobile factories there. Some of them made a success of their trip; others were there for a time; but the majority of them have come back, because there is a lure of the home land which cannot be found elsewhere. The great drawback, however, of Canada is that we have lost many valuable sons and daughters who have gone to other lands, chiefly to the United States, and whom we should have kept here. But as the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) has said, as long as the United States remains as it is, it is impossible to believe that the day will ever come when that great magnet will not be an attraction for Canadians. The only solution for that problem which we have is to try to keep our people at home by giving them employment here, realising that a Canadian is a man who is born or brought up in this country and who is enamoured of the country and that a Canadian is worth two men who come from the outside. I heard the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) a moment ago refer to immigration in the West. Immigration is not a burning issue in my constituency nor was it ever of any great consequence there. The same is true, Mr. Speaker, of the constituency you represent. Both you and I, Sir, represent in this House—you have done so for almost thirty years and I for nearly a quarter of a century—the oldest part of the province of Quebec, that spot where Jacques Cartier landed before he ascended the St. Lawrence and proceeded ultimately to Quebec and Montreal. That part of the province of Quebec, the Gaspesian peninsula, comprises some ten thousand square miles, the size of an ordinary kingdom or two of Europe, and it has never been the centre of attraction for immigrants. They all pass by the shores of Gaspé and ascend the St. Lawrence, going on to Ontario and the West. The Gaspé country, I say, has no attractions for settlers coming from Europe. An attempt was made some years ago by the provincial government to establish some Belgian farmers in the backwoods of St. Charles de Caplan in my constituency, but the poor people who came in almost perished the first winter. They all departed in the following spring. No; we shall never have immigration into the Gaspé peninsula because the people who make a success of life there are the rugged woodsmen and fishermen, who are to the manner born; they are indigenous to the soil, so to speak, and can stand a temperature of 25 or 30 degrees below zero. They spend the winter in their lumber shanties and with their axe hew out such farm land as is necessary for the young settler and his family. That is the class of people who inhabit that country; they do not come from Europe and they never will. Those immigrants who come to Canada from Europe are attracted to the fertile fields of the western plains, where they are told that in a year or two there is a crop awaiting them. I do not blame them because I know that the same attraction exists for the Americans who come across the border.

We have had problems discussed in this House, some of which I am sorry to say have not been solved to this day; but others have been solved by the common sense of the Canadian people, because under our form of government there is a solution for every grievance no matter what its nature may be. We have difficulties at the present time, and one of the outstanding difficulties is the paucity of the population as compared with the great burden we have to bear as a result of our participation in the war. It was my good fortune when commissioner of Montreal three or four years ago to receive, along with my colleagues, that eminent man who played such a great part in the world war, Cardinal Mercier. His visit was a very transient one; he was merely passing through the country on his way elsewhere. He was not as familiar with Canadian conditions as we should have liked him to be, because his visit was originally intended for the United States. But when we told him of the extent of the participation of our Canadian people in the world war he was amazed to learn that 600,000 Canadians had gone overseas and that this country had incurred a debt which was truly bewildering. The distinguished prelate could hardly conceal his astonishment at learning the extent to which we had gone into the war.

Now that things have calmed down and the events of that time have passed into history, and many of those who participated in the debates then have disappeared from the scene, we may admit that we probably overdid matters in the war in our enthusiasm to do our share. We probably sent to the other side many men who should not have been sent, many who were unfit for the trenches, many who were unable to do the work which they were called upon to do. We probably incurred a great deal of indebtedness which we could have avoided if we had had the wisdom we now have. In one of the last speeches of the late Minister of Militia, who was so energetic in organising the first and second contingents to Europe, that gentleman declared that every dollar spent in the war was wasted, because war was waste from beginning to end. However that may be, we have to face the conditions to-day and we must bear them.

There is no man who is familiar with the state of affairs in this country at the present time, who knows its natural resources and knows the spirit of the people, who doubts for a moment that Canada will meet all her obligations. The Canadian dollar stands at par in the markets of the world; it stands practically so in New York; and this is a matter for gratification when we remember that the countries of Europe have witnessed the depreciation of their currency to the extent that we have seen.

The solution we must find is to do away with any misunderstanding which may exist, as some have said, between western and eastern Canada. I was glad to hear the leader of the Progressive party declare that so far as he knew there was no reason why there should be any cleavage between the two great portions of this country. The salvation of this Dominion lies in a united Canada. We may have differences of opinion; we may kneel at different shrines; we may speak different languages. But our aim should be one, the union of our people and the building-up in this North American continent of a great nation equal to the ones from which we have sprung. I heard the hon. member say that in some provinces of the West the people of British stock, together with the French Canadians,—because after all they are practically Britishers too, equal to if indeed not better than some Britishers—find themselves to-day in the minority in the West amongst the people who have come from other countries. That is a matter which the government cannot very well overlook. It should make certain that at all times there is a majority of people in this country who have been brought up under British institutions and who can be assimilated into Canadian citizenship.

The House was no doubt pleased, as I am sure the country was, to learn from the lips of the Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King) of the great improvement which has taken place in our finances, in business and in transportation, and in matters generally of common interest to the country. Now, two years and a few months is a very brief period for a new administration to undertake to put its house in order after the country has passed through such an ordeal as this country experienced from 1914 to 1921. True, the war ended in 1918; but the three years that followed, with demobilization and the responsibilities which were imposed upon the country, was a terrible ordeal for a country, and this government accepted a heritage such as was never bequeathed to any other administration. The leader of the Progressive party said a moment ago that the government found itself in the minority at the present time. Well, the leader of the opposition, (Mr. Meighen) did not care to put that question to the test. So far as we have gone I have reason to believe that if the Speech from the Throne is adopted, and I have no doubt that it will be, if the broad lines therein laid down are followed out, this government is no longer in a minority; far from it, it will have an overwhelming majority in the House, because the Speech from the Throne appeals to the common sense, the patriotism and the honesty of every hon. member. We all have in view the betterment of the country's finances and the solution of our railway difficulties; we desire to see an improvement in the transportation problem and an increase in our population, together with a stabilization of finance. These are all questions on which we can agree. We may differ as to the methods by which they are to be settled, but undoubtedly we all have these things as a part of our aim in the fulfilment of our duty.

I must congratulate the government, and I know the great majority of this House will do the same, upon having realized the great responsibility placed upon it and that economy —not economy, as we might say, in the stopping of productive expenditure, but economy in stopping waste, no matter where it exists —is about to be introduced. This is absolutely necessary in the present condition of the country.

Our exports and our imports are increasing, our business generally is good. The feeling between the West and the East is improving. Changes have been hinted at in the tariff, The Canadian government is composed of men who are familiar with the various conditions prevailing in Canadian industry to-day, and we may depend upon them to see that any change made in the tariff will be such as will benefit the whole country, and that no deliberate step will be taken to wound or fatally destroy any of our industries which have a reason to exist. Changes in the tariff have to be made carefully after proper consideration, and if they are brought about, as they should be, in the interests of the whole people, they will be accepted as such, because manufacturers as well as farmers must take the sweet and the sour; they cannot expect that tariffs will always be favourable to their views.

The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has spoken of the conditions prevailing in some communities, in the course of which he referred to the overhead charges and the long hours of labour, but I did not hear him make any reference to the high wages prevailing in some of our cities. The manufacturer says that these high wages are a drawback to him in meeting the competition of the American and the English manufacturer. He claims he is paying higher wages than are paid in some parts of the United States, but more especially higher wages than are paid in Great Britain. I would be the last man in this House to advocate the reduction of the wages of a working man, because I am somewhat familiar, having lived for many years in a large city, with the conditions he has to put up with, especially if he is rearing a large family, and this has been the rule rather than the exception in our province. Therefore I would be the last man to take away a farthing from a working man who is bringing up a family. On the other hand, it might be good policy to ask working men, who are more familiar with their own conditions than we can expect to be, whether very high wages naturally and necessarily mean prosperity for them. If the cost of living is to increase in consequence of the high wages that are being paid, where is the advantage to the working men? Would it not be better to make a gradual readjustment, in the course of which wages would be reduced as well as the cost of living? We all remember when Canadians used to work for $1.50 a day. When I was a boy running around the lobbies of the old House the men across the river in the Booth and the Eddy mills used to work for $1, $1.25 and $1.50 a day of ten hours, and they were perfectly happy and just as prosperous as their successors to-day who are earning from $4 to $8 a day. The value of the Canadian dollar then was one hundred cents; to-day we are told its value is fifty cents. So the working man to-day is probably not as well off as in the old days. These are conditions we are not all familiar with, but which need to be studied before any legislation is enacted, and I have enough confidence in the intelligence of the present administration to realize that no deliberate step will be taken to injure any portion of our people, but that they will be guided solely by the main object of the good of the people as a whole.

We have heard a great deal from the West. Other members will speak for their sections of the country; it is my right and duty, Mr. Speaker, to refer more particularly to my own constituency. In so doing I am sorry that I must bring up an issue which I have discussed many times in this House. In the Gaspe peninsula transportation is the great question, as it is in western Canada, and as it is no doubt in other parts of the Dominion. Lately a Roman Catholic bishop has been appointed to the See of Gaspe, which has one of the finest seaports in North America. I am referring to Monseigneur Ross, whose grandfather was a Scotchman, but who met the fate that all Scotchmen meet when they marry French Canadian women. He gave up the Gaelic language and started to speak French. He is a young but distinguished man and has undertaken to give the Gaspe peninsula some of the many things which it is lacking. One of these is education, another is the development of that part of the province of Quebec. He has been seconded in his efforts very heartily by the government of the province in so far as their jurisdiction extends to the improvements he has in view. He is building a seminary there, he is building schools, and at the present time he is negotiating with the Trappist Fathers at Oka to establish an industrial school so as to extend to the Gaspe people the benefits of agricultural instruction. He is carrying on a campaign of colonization of the land. But he has told you, Mr. Speaker, and he has told me, and he has told the people publicly, and he has told Sir Henry Thornton at a meeting to which I shall refer in a moment, that all this work will be in vain if the railway situation in that country is not brought to a solution. I know the attitude taken by the present government, that the railways are out of their control, having been handed over to the management of Sir Henry Thornton and a board of directors. I with the majority in this House voted for the placing of the National Railways in the hands of a commission having at its head a distinguished man; and Canadians to-day are familiar enough with Sir Henry Thornton to know that he is a distinguished man in every respect, and that we have been very fortunate in securing his services.

When the question of bringing about a change in the railway situation in our district became acute, I suggested to Monseigneur Ross that the best thing would be to bring Sir Henry Thornton into the constituency in order that he might become familiar with the people and the natural resources and he came on your invitation, Mr. Speaker. The Gaspe peninsula is not on the main line of travel. If it were it would be to-day one of the finest strategical points in the Dominion. As you go to the Maritime provinces you cross the Restigouche river at Matapedia and the Gaspe peninsula is left on one side. When Sir Hugh Allan promoted navigation on the St. Lawrence he contemplated making Gaspe a port of call for all steamers, and then having fast trains established so that mails could be delivered practically between Detroit and Chicago by the time the steamer reached Quebec. But political influences at that time prevailed. Sir Hector Langevin represented the county of Rimouski and he had the port placed at Father Point; the late Senator Landry got a quarantine station established in his constituency at Grosse Isle, and so on: in a word, Gaspe was neglected. But one day the construction of a railway was undertaken on the Gaspe coast. Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways, and Sir Hector Langevin asked the Dominion parliament in 1884 to vote $400,000 for the construction of a branch line along the Gaspe coast from Matapedia to Gaspe. Thereupon construction was undertaken of a branch line to connect with the Intercolonial railway, running from Matapedia to Paspebiac and ultimately to Gaspe Basin, a distance of two hundred miles. This was some eight or ten years after the Intercolonial railway had been completed. The cost of construction of the Intercolonial had been some $40,000 a mile, which was considered very excessive. The Dominion government undertook to construct the first ten miles of the Baie des Chaleurs railway—an historic railway—but when those ten miles had been completed, the government was prevailed upon to give up the construction of the railway to a private company, the claim being that it could carry out the construction cheaper than the government could. Unfortunately for the Gaspe people the enterprise was handed over to a local company which undertook to complete the railway. It had at its head a very distinguished man in those days, the late Senator Robitaille, who became Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec and represented my constituency for some fifteen years in this House. He was also at one time Receiver General of Canada. It had also Mr. Riopel, a former schoolmate and lifelong friend of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and a member of this House for a number of years. This may seem to be ancient history, but I wish to insist, Mr. Speaker, upon this point: that the government of Canada led the people of the Gaspe peninsula to believe that the two constituencies of Gaspe and Bonaventure would be linked up with the Intercolonial railway by a branch line or feeder the construction of which had been projected. This private company built the first eighty miles and after the subsidies were gone it went into insolvency. When I had the honour of being elected to this House in 1900, with the aid of Sir Wilfrid Laurier we completed the remaining twenty miles, bringing the road down to New Carlisle. You had the honour, Mr. Speaker, of representing at that time the only constituency in Canada which had not one mile of railway, and it was only natural that you should ask on behalf of your constituency an extension of this railway from New Carlisle on to Gaspe Basin, another one hundred miles. Sir Wilfrid Laurier thought the request was reasonable and had the ordinary subsidy voted to an English company which undertook to build the remaining one hundred miles from New Carlisle to Gaspe Basin. We now have a continuous stretch of two hundred miles of railway from Matapedia to Gaspe, owned by two different companies, administered by trustees for bondholders, who declare that in view of certain legislation passed here in 1911, under which an order of the Railway Commission takes precedence over first mortgage debentures, they are unable to raise any further moneys to improve the road and to give the Gaspe and the Bonaventure people the service to which they are entiled. Our Progressive friends in the West ask for $28,000,000 for the building of branch lines, but our position is that we have branch lines but we cannot get from them the service that the people should have. Sir Henry Thornton, with his staff, came down to Bonaventure on his return from the opening of the dry dock at Courtenay bay, and he was amazed at what he saw. He and all his staff were very much interested in the Gaspe peninsula, finding it to be one of the most attractive parts of the province of Quebec. There was no hall large enough to accommodate all the people who had been invited by his lordship Bishop Ross of the diocese of Gaspe to attend a meeting in connection with the improvement of this railway service. His lordship, therefore, arranged to have the meeting held in the largest church in the parish of Bonaventure, holding two thousand people, and there were gathered together English speaking and French speaking people, Protestants and Catholics, clergymen, farmers, and members of all classes of the community. We saw the unusual spectacle, in the sanctuary of a Roman Catholic church, of a meeting presided over by the bishop of the diocese, at his right the Speaker of the House of Commons and at his left Sir Henry Thornton, and other representatives of the constituency, the purpose being to discuss what, after all, was to these people a question of life and death. Sir Henry Thornton listened very patiently and very good naturedly to what was said, and afterwards unhesitatingly stated that in his opinion the people of the Gaspe peninsula were not getting the service that they were entitled to get and that it was in the interest of the public welfare that the government of Canada should see to it that these services were improved.

The province and the Dominion have expended nearly $4,000,000 in the Gaspe peninsula for the construction of these railways. During the winter one through train runs from Matapedia every week down to Gaspe Basin, and on the other days we have a freight train with one or two passenger cars attached—cars in which no Canadian should be asked to travel with his wife and children. The company declare that they are unable to do any better. They have been after every government since 1911 in an attempt to get them to purchase the railway. Well, the government of Canada to-day are not buying railways. I do not think the spirit of this House is in favour of the purchase of railways; I do not think the Senate is in favour of the purchase of railways, either. But a solution should be found for this condition. It is in the interests of the Intercolonial railway; it is in the interests of the Canadian National Railways, because every pound of freight carried by that road goes to the Intercolonial: a million and a half of business was given to the Canadian National at Matapedia station last year or the year before. Sir Henry Thornton declared that he would be delighted to operate the road to-morrow if he only had the power to do it. He said, "If the roads are given over to me I will operate them and try to make a success of them." He was confident that in two or three years they would pay their way. In fact, they are doing so at the present time. The Gaspe peninsula men work ten or twelve hours a day. They have not union wages; they are glad to work at half the rates that railway men obtain in other parts of Canada. Sir Henry Thornton is confident that if these roads are taken over he will be able to come to an agreement with the railway unions—and it is to their credit—by which this state of things will continue until the roads are put on a proper footing.

I do not want to have the English investor deprived of any rightful investment that he has made in the Gaspe peninsula. But there are people in England who have made investments which were not always wise, and the investment they have made there has so far paid them nothing. The bonds have never paid a dollar; the road has paid its way and that is all. There is a floating indebtedness against it at present of $400,000, and the company are asking, I think, about $4,000,000 for the value of the road. I do not go so far as to recommend that it be purchased, Mr. Speaker, but I have enough confidence in the members of the present administration and the patriotism of this House to believe that they will come to the assistance of these people and see that a solution of the difficulty is found. Let this road be operated under the Railway Act if necessary. Let an agreement be arrived at with these two companies by which the roads will be leased without obligation to purchase, as can be done under the Branch Lines Act of 1914, a measure adopted at the instance of the late Mr. Cochrane. The government has all the necessary power under that act. It can even go further. It can, through the Minister of Railways, say to these people, "You are not giving the service that you ought to give. Your trains in winter instead of running to Gaspe run only to New Carlisle, half the distance, where passengers have to stay over night and continue down to Gaspe the next morning. That is not your contract; that is not the agreement under which the subsidies were paid." And the minister, under section 160 of the Railway Act, can request the Board of Railway Commissioners to give an order which this company declare they are unable to fulfil, and if this fails other means can be adopted of taking possession of the road—by the appointment of a receiver. The company does not forfeit thereby any claims it may have for the value of the road. The ownership of the road is a matter of indifference to the people of that district. They naturally would sooner it should be the property of Canada, because naturally it is a feeder of the Intercolonial railway. It was intended for that purpose; it could serve no other purpose; and that is its natural destination. But if this road cannot be acquired at the present time, let it be operated by the Canadian National. All the people want is the service. Let the service be what it should be. Let the trains be maintained regularly; let the trains be decent trains, and I am informed by Sir Henry Thornton himself and by his officials that they have at the present time rolling stock and material on the Intercolonial railway, which will not bring about the expenditure of one dollar, and which will be quite sufficient to provide this branch railway with all the equipment it requires. We had some time ago an inspection of that district by a man whose word ought to carry some weight in this House, by the Hon. Mr. Carvell, Chairman of the Railway Commission, and here is the concluding paragraph of a letter that he addressed to Dr. Reid, who was then Minister of Railways, and which is interesting as far as it goes:

> It is, therefore, quite evident that this road is in very much the same position as the branch lines in New Brunswick, excepting that, in my opinion, it goes through a better country as a rule than do the New Brunswick roads. There are more people to patronize it, more business to be done, the roadbed is in better condition, and it offers a better guarantee of business than any of the other branch lines with which we have been dealing during the past three years; but the men who have invested their money must realize they have made a mistake financially as the prospects of paying dividends are very, very remote.
> I believe the Canadian National should take over these two roads and incorporate them in the government system, paying to the owners whatever in their judgment would be a reasonable amount for their equity,—probably on a somewhat higher basis than that paid or offered to the owners of the New Brunswick branch lines.

I realize in making this report that it is not part of my official duties as Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, but, having given the matter a good deal of personal consideration, I feel I am not overstepping the bounds of propriety in giving you my personal views on such an important subject.

I will leave the matter there, Mr. Speaker. It is close to six o'clock and I do not want to impose upon the House the necessity of listening to a minute description of all the resources we have in that peninsula—ten thousand square miles of what is practically "terra incognita," merely the shore line inhabited, but inhabited by seventy thousand rugged people, the descendants of the pioneer settlers of that part of the country, many from Great Britain, others from France, and others from other parts of the province of Quebec. We ask for these people fair treatment. We ask that they be given an opportunity to eke out a living in that part of Canada to which they have stuck so long and so faithfully. Nothing is more painful to you, Mr. Speaker and to myself, than to see these people emigrating to the American cities or to other parts of Canada—they who live in one of the most fertile parts of the province of Quebec, blessed with a double crop, the crop of the sea and the crop of the land, with lumber and minerals galore. We have discovered recently in the township of Lemieux, in the county of Gaspe, four square miles of lead and zinc which are declared by the experts of the Mines department to be superior to the famous Joplin deposits in the state of Missouri. We have fisheries which are second to none; our Gaspe salmon is the finest fish in the world; we have the finest population. All we ask is a chance for these people to stay at home, and if this present government can stop the exodus from the Gaspe peninsula it will secure in those constituencies the unswerving loyalty of these peaceful, law-abiding and industrious people.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, just before the House took recess I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) in regard to the railway difficulties that confront his constituency on the Baie de Chaleur. I agree with a good deal of what he says. I am somewhat conversant with the need of railways in that part of the province of Quebec. I know the hardships which the people there have to encounter by reason of the existing situation, and I would like to see some relief accorded to them. I do not know that this should come altogether through a steam railway, perhaps the needs of the people would be better served by an electric line; but if the board of directors of the National Railways would take the matter up in a businesslike way and work out the solution somewhat in the manner I have suggested, a railway service might be provided which would help the people of Bonaventure out of their difficulties. They have had a hard time, but they have a fine district down there and they have hope and faith in their country. I should like to see that part of Canada developed equally with other portions which we hope to see ultimately developed and become a great source of benefit to Canada.

Having said that much I am going to take up the time of the House for a little while to-night to discuss two or three questions which I think are of supreme importance to Canada. To begin with, I want to point out to Canadians, and especially to the voters of the Dominion, that the greatest political revolution that has occurred within the past one hundred years is now taking place in every country that has a political system similar to that which we have in the British dominions and that they have in the United States; and the best way to illustrate that revolution is to tell the House what has taken place.

First of all I am going to describe what has taken place in Canada. In 1919 in the province of Ontario the Farmers' party began to organize themselves. They did organize themselves and an election came on. The other parties neglected even to have conventions to discuss the situation, and the result was that this Farmers' party that everybody despised came into office and was there for some time. So much for that. Then, in 1921, Union government ceased to be a factor in Canada. It was dissolved and my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) who now leads the opposition became Prime Minister. He decided that he would ask His Excellency for a dissolution of parliament. His request was granted. He went to the country and came back absolutely in a minority. The Liberals assumed office with a small majority, and out of that came change. But before I go into that I want to refer to another election, that of Mr. Drury in the province of Ontario. He was premier then. He had not been premier and did not hold any office at the time of the previous election. He decided also to go the country. He did so and was not only defeated but his party was almost destroyed. The Conservative government then assumed office in Ontario, and that government now administers the affairs of the province. Then there was another election in 1923 in the Mother country. They had abandoned the Union government there a short time before Bonar Law became Prime Minister. Unfortunately he died. The party elected a new leader in Stanley Baldwin, who occupied office for a time when he decided he would go to the country for a mandate. He went to the country for a mandate and he came back without a majority. Labour, a new party came into office and assumed the government, and they are administering it to-day. They are also in a minority, and yet they occupy the Treasury benches. This came about because the leader of that party had the wit when the opportunity came to assume the leadership of the opposition. There was nothing else to do, by reason of what took place, but to have Ramsay MacDonald come into office although his party was in a minority. At any rate, to-day the Conservatives are out of office and the Liberals are weakened. The latter came back divided but since then they have united. Well, this is the outstanding feature of all these elections —that the political revolution has come, and it extends all over the British Dominions, and it has also come to our neighbours in the United States. Out of these elections we have these various parties in Ontario. We still have the Farmers' party, we still have the Liberal party, and we have the Conservative party. Those three are playing the triangle; they are still there to-day. Here in Ottawa, after the last general election, the Liberals came back with a majority. We do not know what they had a few days ago but they are confident now. Thus we have in this House a Conservative party, a Liberal party in office, a Farmers' party, and a Labor party; and instead of playing like Lloyd George upon a triangle this House now is dancing a quadrille with four parties in it. Or to put it another way we have on one side a party playing the fiddle, on the other side a party playing the flute, the Farmers playing the trombone, and the Labour party the big drum.

What is going to arise out of all this? The revolution has arrived, and I want to tell my hon. friends that the greatest menace ahead of them is that this state of affairs has arrived and is present. I do not know any party in office to-day in the British dominions that is likely to go to the people that will not have a very hard time in getting back. While there has been a revolution in the British dominions in regard to the political system, a still greater revolution is pending in the United States. There never before was such political excitement in that country as there is to-day. They have there a Republican party in charge of the administration and they can do as they like. They have also a Democratic party. But they have a third party, or rather a third and fourth party, called the Insurgent party. They are made up of insurgent Democrats and insurgent Republicans, and they are the men who are forcing the situation in the United States to-day. That country is in a state of turmoil, and nobody knows what is going to happen; but if there is anything Canada ought to watch with great interest, it is to see what will occur in the election in the United States this coming year. I would not be a bit surprised to see now the present President Mr. Coolidge not taken up by his party. I centainly expect to see an altogether new man as a presidential candidate for the Democratic party; I would be less surprised if a third presidential candidate was put forward, and he might win. It is true that Theodore Roosevelt tried it and he failed, and Mr. Taft came into office and became president; but in view of what is going on in the United States I am asking the Canadian people and this Canadian House to watch what is happening there and to watch how this revolution is coming. It will be so surprising and far reaching that nobody can quite tell what will happen. It is well worth watching.

Let me say a word for the new party that has come into office in England. I am not going to apologise for them. I think what has happened there is one of the most promising things that has happened in a long time. Some people say that that party are Reds, Bolshevists, Communists, and they have some other names for them. The best informed man in politics to-day, so far as I can judge—and I am somewhat of a judge—is Ramsay MacDonald. There is not an abler man in British politics to-day, and the ablest man, from a European point of view, is his Lord Chancellor, Lord Haldane. True, he had to admit some years ago that he was indebted to Germany for his spiritual development, for his education. But I will say this for Lord Haldane, that the greatest thing to his credit in connection with the late war was that he made a fighting machine out of the British army—I am now giving the testimony of the best generals in the war, that Lord Haldane made out of the then very poor army Great Britain had, the best fighting machine in the war. Ramsay MacDonald, Lord Haldane, Mr. Clynes, who is now leader of the House, the Colonial Secretary, and others who are there—some might think they were men who had been picked off the street—are men of character; they are able to take care of themselves; they are the ablest men in England. The correspondence, printed yesterday or the day before, that was exchanged between the Premier of France and the Prime Minister of Great Britain, has given to the world the hope that peace will come sooner than we expect, and that there will be an adjustment and an improvement. I am going to read to the House a few lines giving the opinion of Stanley Baldwin of this much-despised Labour party in England. It is surprising in a country like Canada to many people who profess to be reformers and others who profess to have no great regard for Communists, Bolshevists, and such people, to hear what Stanley Baldwin says of the party that happens to be in office at present in England. I should like the House to get the benefit of this. This is the speech that he made the day after he resigned office, a speech that he made to his own followers in the House. He said:

> Our great enemies of the future are not going to be the Liberals, who are moribund, but Labour, which is very much alive. You are not going to beat Labour on a policy of tranquillity, negation or sitting still. There is a vitality in Labour at present in the country, and unless we can share a vitality of that kind we shall be unable to conquer it. Now, to my mind, the strength of Labour arises from two sources.

Then he goes on.

> We have in our party no lack of material. We have all over the country young men who would be eager to work with us if they felt that we were no less sincere in our outlook than the Labour party. If they do not feel that, there is nothing that is going to stop the drift to Labour of the young men in the towns. It rests with us; and I would urge very strongly that in the next two or three months, inside our party and in consultation with experts outside, we should examine in the light of the present a number of the pressing problems that have presented themselves since the war, to be examined without prejudice—problems of housing, problems of education, and, almost more important than all, problems of the relationship between master and man—and that, having examined these problems, we may reach conclusions which may well form part of our social policy by the time the next election comes.

That is the Labour party that Stanley Baldwin—and he is a very able man—says they have to beat there. When people go around this country and abuse these Reds and call them Socialists, Bolshevists and all that kind of thing, they should remember that these are the men who hold office to-day in England, who have taken over the business of trying to restore prosperity, at least to restore peace, to England. I repeat what I said a few moments ago, that there never before has been a correspondence exchanged in two or three letters that has given as much hope to the world as that fine letter written by Ramsay MacDonald to the Premier of France and the reply in an equally honourable and fair-minded way by the Premier of France.

But all this has been carried on by a government in a minority. That is the revolution and some of us do not know it. There will soon be in this country a government carried on by a minority. But how do they do it?

Mr. HOCKEN: Is the present government not carrying on by a minority?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Yes, but the great feature of the new system is that it is not by votes and majorities in Houses—and this is taking place all through the United States—it is by arrangements or deals by leaders of parties within the House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: By good legislation.

Mr. MACLEAN (York: I am not disputing it; I am saying what is coming, and the members of this House and the people of this country must see it. We have seen it arrive here. When I read that statement of the leader of the Progressive party as it appeared in the press on Saturday last I came to the conclusion at once that possibly there had been some understanding. It was an honourable declaration that if they got what they wanted along Progressive lines certain things would be done. Now, that will be the same attitude in the politics of the world. There will be no longer any two-party system. Such a system does not exist here; we have four parties here, and there are three in England, while there are several in the province of Ontario. The same thing is true in the United States in the political situation that obtains there to-day. So that what I am saying will be of interest, if not to the members of this House, at least to the people of Canada.

Now I come to the question of redistribution, in connection with which the government promises a measure. Anyone who has been following political tendencies in this country knows, no doubt, that the revolution has come in the province of Manitoba, where they are adopting what is known as the single transferable vote. And we are to have the same thing in this House. With the Progressives behind it that principle may come into force in Canada. And what that transferable vote means hon. gentlemen will discover if they go back to the country for re-election, whenever the time may come. This alternate vote is the principle which enables minorities to secure some representation: by the transfer of votes, minorities that heretofore could not enjoy representation in parliament will now have it. In cities like Montreal and Toronto various deals will be made, and under this revolutionized condition which will prevail as a result of the transferable vote no one knows who will be elected; and that is something that confronts my hon. friends on the treasury benches more particularly than it does anyone else. Now, I do not say that I am against the transferable vote. We are to have it in the next Dominion election unless something happens to prevent the principle being adopted. The revolution, I say, has come and if hon. gentlemen do not quite believe in it and are inclined to laugh, let them wait until they go to the country. There is a minority government ruling in England and only a few days ago we had a minority government in office in this country; and with the far-reaching changes that are imminent in the United States, in the election which is going to take place there we shall no doubt have some surprises which will have some significance to ourselves and our friends and to the prospects of the country. Parliamentary institutions, I am glad to say, do not last; changes come. That is natural, and it is well that it should be so. People thought that they could relegate these things to leaders of parties and that they could ward off these changes. Now, however, the outstanding fact is that the people are supreme, for no party leader can dictate what shall be. If the people want more parties they will have them. They will have as many as they want and no man knows what he is talking about if he gets up here and says that he is not going to allow the two-party system to die, or that he thinks this or the other should be the case; the people will settle all that.

Let me now deal with the question of the St. Lawrence waterway. There is a percentage of the people of this country who do not like the idea of the improvement of the St. Lawrence waterway. Montreal does not like it. I should think it would be of the greatest benefit to Montreal; and if that city is not satisfied with the improvement of the St. Lawrence waterway the United States will soon make them sit up and understand that the government over there will build a canal from Buffalo to New York which would make New York the absolute port of the western world. So that when the people of Montreal say they do not want to see any improvement of the St. Lawrence, tell them they had better have a care. I believe that it is in the interest of Canada and in the interest of the United States that the St. Lawrence waterway improvement scheme should be carried out immediately, in the same way that the Panama canal project was carried out to successful completion. That undertaking was the result of an agreement. I might read a few words from Lord Charnwood's Life of Roosevelt. In 1903 Roosevelt wrote:

> Panama declared itself independent and wanted to complete the Panama canal and opened negotiations with us. I had two courses open; I might have taken the matter under advisement and put it before the Senate, in which case we should have had a number of most able speeches on the subject, and they would have been going on now and the Panama canal would be in the dim future yet. We would have had a half century of discussion and perhaps the Panama canal. I preferred we should have the Panama canal first and the half century of discussion afterwards.

And the Panama canal was built, not so much by legislation as by negotiation between the two governments. The same thing is needed in this instance. My suggestion in regard to this very necessary undertaking would be to start negotiations immediately with the United States looking to an international agreement. The great thing to be done, however, is to undertake this much-needed improvement immediately. It would provide employment in certain parts of the country and it ought to be carried out at the earliest possible date. The money could all be raised. We no doubt would have to assume half of the cost and the United States half, but there would be no trouble in raising the money, with the assistance of the United States, at a low rate of interest. If that were done the work could be completed within two years and would become the great success which the Panama canal has been. While I should not like to see the hydro-electric power investments of the people of Ontario interfered with, at the same time, if the rights of the province can be safeguarded in that connection, I should be glad to see this project undertaken including the development of water powers. In that way within two years the people of New York state and the people of Ontario and Quebec would have an immense development of water power, which would bring great strength to the manufacturing industries of both countries. Therefore I am strongly in favour of our dealing with this question at an early date.

There is an insistent call for economy of administration, and I have the utmost respect for it. Already there has been a start in this direction, there have been reductions in our national expenditure; but we must insist on still more sweeping reductions, and to this end we must do as they are doing in the United States, we must stop inflation. What five or seven years ago were comparatively small retail businesses in this country have been converted into big organizations capitalized at absurdly high figures. We have, in common with the United States, an army of profiteers, men who have made immense sums of money, and they are moving heaven and earth in their effort to ensure a continuance of profiteering. They do not want to see deflation come about. But there must be deflation. We cannot keep up the cost of living, and it will have to be reduced, even if the housewives have to go on strike. Deflation must come; and there must be other economies.

Now, I am going to suggest to the government a series of economies—and no one can give a better start in this direction than the government. To begin with my home city of Toronto, we own the street railway system, but under the system of amortization it is necessary to exact a 6¼-cent fare. I would suggest that the city authorities postpone the amortization of the street railway debt for a certain time and give the people a 5-cent fare. One or two examples like that will have a markedly beneficial effect on the public. Now let me suggest what the government may do in this direction. Let them put the postage back to pre-war rates; let them make a suggestion to the board of directors of our National Railway system that passenger and express rates be put back to pre-war levels; let them reduce the rates on telegrams. The great thing is to touch the sentiment of the people, and this can be accomplished in no better way than by starting the process of deflation which I have indicated. Therefore I hope some action will be taken by this House to bring about these reductions. As an old Greek philosopher said, to be a harpist you must play on the harp; and to touch the imagination of the people we must play in this key, we must inaugurate economies in many directions in the Civil Service, but at the same time we must establish contact with the people at points where they are vitally interested. To do this we must give them some relief in respect to postage, telegraph, express and railway rates. So my suggestion to the House is that if we really believe in economy, if we really believe in deflation, something along this line must be started in order that high prices may be cut down and profiteering be checked. The profiteers have never yet been punished. The country is full of them. Today it is overrun by a new class of profiteer—the bond security seller. I never saw so many men trying to sell bonds all over Canada as I see at the present time. Let the inflation in that respect cease for a while.

The vital thing is to get back to normal, and it is hard to accomplish it. When you try to get back to normal you meet with many difficulties, nevertheless you must keep on trying and finally the sun will begin to shine again. Put a little more hope into the people, give them leadership here from Ottawa, not only by economies in the Civil Service and other departments of government, but by encouraging deflation all around. We may have to still further reduce our army. I know some people will be sorry to see our volunteer service reduced, but the Great War was an absolute failure if it does not lead to a better condition of affairs in regard to military establishments.

I come now to taxation and new sources of revenue. I spoke about a revolution in politics, and I want to suggest to hon. members a revolution that is coming in regard to raising our national revenues. Hon. members will probably be surprised and inclined to laugh at first when they hear what I have to say, but I hope to convince them of the feasibility of my suggestion. There are certain things in which we have a monopoly, and I maintain that these monopolies can be used to secure a great national revenue—from some a little, from others a great deal. We have an absolute monopoly of nickel. Practically the world's supply of nickel is contained in about eight square miles near Sudbury. This enormous deposit is no doubt the result of some great geological upheaval in former days, and as far as we know it is the only deposit of its kind in the world. We own it absolutely; but what is taking place? Sir Alfred Mond and his father came to this country twenty years ago and they were the first to grab the Sudbury nickel deposit. They have been taking it ever since over to their refinery at Swansea, and they have turned out in that one refinery all the nickel produced in Europe. I have stated in this House—and I was rebuked by members of a former government for saying it—that Germany all through the war got from the Scandinavian countries all the nickel she wanted, and it all came from Canada. My authority for that statement was the result of an investigation made by a British admiral who visited all these countries. He saw that they had this immense supply of nickel, and he knew that it came from Canada. Probably most of it came from the International Nickel Company, a United States organization which controls three-quarters of the area containing these nickel deposits. We have one company here, a new company, which is producing nickel. They say they have not made any money. That is probably true, but I have no doubt that they hope to make it. Nickel is one most valuable metal in the world to-day; it is sought not only for war purposes but for other purposes as well. Nickel contains an undisclosed amount of four very rare metals besides nickel itself, palladium, polonium, platinum and irridium. I have asked from time to time that the information regarding these ingredients be given in this House, but it has never been disclosed to the Canadian people. So this nickel ore has been taken out of the country by Sir Alfred Mond and his friends and smelted at Swansea, the Canadians thus getting nothing in the way of wages. And the same thing is going on in the United States: they are smelting it there and they will not tell us what is the content of the precious metals outside of nickel. As we have the sole supply we should require the payment of a reasonable tax to the people of Canada before this nickel goes out to other countries. In other words, let us make them disclose what they actually have in this ore, and let us put an export duty on it. Nickel steel is the most useful material used in connection with the automotive industry, in fact in the manufacture of every kind of steel. If nickel steel is an absolute necessity to the world and it must be produced in Canada, we can say that it shall be manufactured before it leaves the country and that if others want it they must pay an export duty on it when it goes out. That would be a wise thing to do, and I hope it will be done.

I come now to another important question, that of pulp, pulpwood and paper export. There is no reason why those in other countries who must have our pulp, pulpwood and paper—and they are largely American people—should not pay us an export duty on those materials. Canada could get a large revenue out of that pulp industry and the people of this country would get the benefit of it. Now, the people of the United States have an absolute right to make their own tariff, but I want to tell my friends the farmers down the line here that when the United States impose a prohibitive duty on Canadian wheat going into their country of 35 cents a bushel, and are getting ready to make it 50 cents, the first thing they have to do is to stand up in this House and say, "Yes, Mr. American, you can keep us out of your country, but if you want our pulp we are going to make you pay an export duty on it. If you do not like to do that, perhaps you will take down your prohibitive duty on our Canadian wheat." In five years Canada will control the wheat supply of the world, and the United States and other countries will have to come to us for what they must have. So I suggest that within five years we shall be in a position to place an export duty on wheat, and that there would be no resulting disadvantage to the farmers, but, on the contrary, a benefit. So we have all these arrows in our quiver, and many others if we care to use them.

I am confident that the greatest gold producing country in the world is going to be in northern Ontario and Quebec, and there is no reason why, with the development which will take place within a comparatively few years, we should not derive an immense revenue from the export of gold. Ontario and Quebec would benefit by it very largely. It is time we began to think about these new sources of revenue, especially in view of the attitude of the United States. They are our neighbours and they have been our allies, but they are making the farmers of our West pay 35 cents in order to get a bushel of wheat into their country. Well, we should not be blamed if we said to them, "If you want our pulpwood you will have to pay an export duty on it"; then we can use some of the revenue derived from that source in the protection of our forests, the preventing of fires, the planting of trees and the maintaining of a pulpwood supply. A tax of that kind will not hurt the pulp industry of this country, although they will groan to-morrow when they hear that I have suggested that there should be such an export duty. The pulp industry is growing; the demand in the United States for Canadian paper is becoming enormous. They cannot print their papers over there unless they get pulp from outside their own country, and they have to come to Canada for it. So we cannot be blamed if we should ask them to pay an export duty on the pulp and paper that we send over, until such time as they experience a change of heart and take down the tariff wall that they have raised up against our wheat. It may be a crime to make any suggestion as to new policy in this House, but that is a suggested new method of raising revenue.

Another thing I would like to see in this country is a great iron industry, and I notice that one of the papers has entered to-day upon a campaign in that direction. So far our iron ores are rather weak and hard to handle, and although we are doing some smelting in our country it does not amount to a great deal. I am going to tell the House and the country what I think is the future of the iron industry. I have been speaking about revolutionary methods of various kinds; now the greatest revolution in iron smelting is about to take place, namely, the practice of smelting by electric current. We have an enormous amount of power available on the rivers of the Hudson slope, on the St. Lawrence and elsewhere. In England they are getting ready to burn their coal at the pit heads and to generate electrical current for use in their smelters in the production of iron. If we are alert, we may be producing iron by way of electrical smelters if we have sufficient quantities of ore, and I think we will have that ore in a short time. Hitherto the conditions have been rather discouraging, but I see to-day in a trade paper devoted to these subjects that there are immense stores of iron ore in our country. I leave that question there with my suggestion in regard to what I think will be a great source of revenue, and a great source of compulsion on our neighbours, if we choose to use it, to make them accord fair treatment to the farmers of the West in regard to wheat, if nothing else. I throw out that suggestion, and as I said before, watch what is going to happen in the United States in the coming election. If perchance the Democratic party come into office in the United States in this coming election—and I admit I opposed the reciprocity proposal that was made in this country some years ago—I would not be a bit surprised if they would come forward with an entirely new trade proposal to Canada, and use that as one reason for removing this objectionable duty on Canadian wheat.

When I was talking about economy I wanted to say this: We must continue to tax luxuries in this country. If we are not taxing them enough, let us tax them more. It will give us revenue. We must also reduce the taxes on the necessities of life.

The third thing I would suggest to the House is this: I would revise the preferential privileges in the Canadian tariff, especially in regard to our sister dominions and the Mother Country. I have heard a great deal of complaint as to the effect of those preferences. I think they might be revised, and I would suggest that they be revised.

Another thing that has got to end, and nobody yet has said it in the House—it remains for me to say it—is this: One of the greatest iniquities ever perpetrated in the United States and Canada during the war was the issuing of tax-exempted bonds, which all fell into the hands of rich men. I do not know how that can be cured. It might involve a breach of contract that Canada could not be a party to, and yet the people of the United States and the United States congress, and they are very honourable in their legislation especially in regard to financial obligations, are going to find a way to stop these tax-exempted bonds. I suppose their issuance could be continued in this country yet. Among the economies we may effect, and in order to increase the revenues of this country, let us put an end to issuing tax-exempted bonds. I think they have ceased in the United States, but I am not sure of that. I do not suppose the rich men and the rich companies would be generous enough to make concessions to the country, but a way may be found to get rid of this condition of affairs where rich men and rich companies have millions and millions of tax-exempted bonds in their safes, and yet be fair to the bond holders and be within the law. I am not advising repudiation in any sense, but a way may be found to end that condition, and the people of the United States are trying to solve that problem to-day. We have to solve it too, and we must stop now, once for all, the issuing of tax-exempted bonds. In future any securities issued in this country will have to take the ordinary course. Municipal bonds went out by millions when the opportunity offered to put them out, and national bonds went out by hundreds of millions, all tax-exempt. Probably that was a necessity of the war, but that must continue no longer. It may have ceased, but I do not think so.

Finally, for I do not want to tire the House much longer, I am coming back to the question of bank reform in this country, and I want to tell the House frankly that when I took up this subject last week and made investigations, I had intended to suggest the introduction of an amendment to the Address that I thought under the circumstances that existed last week this government would be prepared to accept, but since I have observed what has taken place within the last week, and the certainty almost of the government having the co-operation of my friends from the West, especially if my friends from the West are to get some of the things they desire, I saw it was not quite a wise thing to do, and accordingly I did not draft the amendment, but I am going to tell the House what I propose. What I want to see in this country is the reform of our banking system; it has to come right away, and if the government do not bring it about they will soon hear from the people. I suggest that we should substitute a national or Dominion note issue in place of the bank notes issued in this country. I suggest an absolute withdrawal of the bank notes issued by the banks and the substitution therefor of national notes like they have in the United States. I would also suggest that we have what they have in the United States, a Federal Reserve banking system, which is a system of re-discounting for the banks. I have no hostility against the banks in this country at all. I would like to see them increase in number and their capital multiplied, four or ten times for that matter. I would like to see their business increase and the service they can give to the Canadian people increase. There are all kinds of opportunities for the banks to make money in this country, but they have got to sit down with parliament and consent to withdraw their own notes and to substitute therefor national notes. They must also be willing to accept a system of re-discounting for banks, under the same plan that obtains in the United States. Not to weary the House I am going to ask permission to read three short paragraphs I have here, written by a Canadian, as to what occurred in the United States and brought about the reform of their currency law. They are taken from an article on "Woodrow Wilson and his domestic policy." Woodrow Wilson made the greatest record of any man who was in the war. He died the other day but he hoped to bring about the League of Nations. The United States is not yet a party to the League of Nations. For some reason they repudiated their President in regard to that matter but they are coming back to it, and if I correctly interpret what Ramsay MacDonald said in the correspondence that was published a day or two ago the United States will yet come back to the League of Nations. Now let me read what I have here on Woodrow Wilson's domestic policy:

> Mr. Wilson came to the White House at a time when all signs foreboded economic disturbance and distress. The Payne-Aldrich tariff law had caused agricultural depression and an equal price level similar to conditions now prevailing in many states as a result of the Fordney-McCumber tariff act. The currency of the country was inelastic with business often demoralized by "currency famines" and "money corners." The credits of the country were absolutely controlled by the private corporations in charge of the reserve banks.
>
> The Wilson administration within a few months created the Federal Reserve Bank system, which brought the credit of the country to the relief of business and provided an elastic currency under government control. This was accompanied by a downward revision of the tariff and followed later on by a rural credit system which has already financed farm mortgage loans to the extent of a billion dollars at a moderate rate of interest and on easy terms of payment.
> Had it not been for the Federal Reserve Bank it would have been impossible to finance the great orders for munitions placed by the Allies in the United States before the entrance of that country into the world war, or to have financed the huge expenditures and commitments of the Federal government after America's entrance into the war. There are many who believe that the Federal Reserve Bank system contributed no less toward the winning of the war than did the armed forces sent by America oversea.

Now, that is the American Reserve Bank system, which is based on national notes and only on national notes, which discounts for all the banks, and which supplied all the money necessary to carry on all those contracts during the war. That system is still in existence there, and they mean to keep it. We in Canada must have not only a national system of currency, but a national reserve bank system such as they have in the United States. We must start to have it this session, and the government will be tried by nothing so much as by what they endeavour to do to meet the views of the farmers. I want to tell them that unless they give the farmers a national note system in place of a bank note system, and unless they give them a national reserve bank there will be very serious criticism. I want to read just one more paragraph about Woodrow Wilson:

> Be that as it may, the Federal Reserve Bank will permanently remain the cornerstone of national finance. The Land Bank system for rural credits will also be a permanent institution.

I want my friends the farmers to note this:

> Had Mr. Wilson been able to give more attention to domestic affairs he would have completed his financial programme by establishing a banking system designed to give the farmers of the country the banking accommodations given by the Federal Reserve system to merchants and manufacturers.

That is what we want in this country. We want a national system of banking that will meet the requirements of the farmers and we will not get it from the present banks. In this country there has got to be a great system of national banking, similar to what they have in the United States, for the accommodation of manufacturers and farmers. Let there be equality of treatment. The farmers today are declaring that their great grievance is lack of equality in price levels. There have been low price levels for the farmers, and a high price level for the other people engaged in industry. The same thing obtains in the matter of banking accommodation; there is discrimination. We in this country have an opportunity now to get this relief; to establish a system of national notes and a system of national reserve banks, and the latter will serve the farmers as well as the men who are engaged in commerce and in manufacturing.

I want to see a real reform in banking. The people of Canada have been deprived of the finest national savings banks they ever had. A few years ago the Receiver General's offices in Canada took deposits and gave the people interest on them, and that money was absolutely secure. Somebody strangled those offices throughout almost the whole of Canada. I am informed, and I think correctly, that the Canadian government is still carrying on this national savings bank for the benefit of the people and paying interest on deposits, in the Maritime provinces and in British Columbia. Unfortunately somebody strangled the operation of the Receiver General's office in Toronto, although it was the finest bank we ever had. The people could go into the Receiver General's office, deposit their money, draw interest on it and get that money whenever they wanted it. That change was not made by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and I do not know what minister in the former government did it. However it was done and the people of Canada, especially in the province of Ontario, have been deprived of this fine savings bank system. I want to see that national savings bank restored immediately as security for the people who entertain some doubt in regard to their bank deposits.

There is another thing I want to see carried out, and I am going to put the matter up to the government now. We must modernize our savings banks in connection with our post offices. Nobody who has a deposit in one of these banks can get his money when he wants it. He has to sign a form which must be sent on to Ottawa and checked up, and it is a week or more before he gets his money. I want to see the Canadian people given the right to get their money whenever they want it, not in the form of currency but a cheque which will be cashed by any bank. The people want a return to the savings bank system we formerly had in this country; they want the right to deposit their savings in a bank controlled by the government. The Drury government in Ontario did one good thing when they established what they called Ontario government savings offices. They took in millions of deposits there and those savings offices are in existence yet. The present provincial government is talking about winding up that system, but I would advise Mr. Ferguson not to do that until he sees whether the Dominion government will not revive the system of national savings banks that obtained in connection with the Receiver General's offices, representing the treasury of this country.

And now I want to say another thing as to what is going on in the United States. The government of that country to-day are paying anybody 5 per cent on any deposit he likes to make with them. And they pay him immediately in the best money in the world, in national notes of the United States. During the war, and since, this system has gradually become, by reason of the improvements introduced by Woodrow Wilson, a splendid one. The finest banking system in the world to-day is in the United States. It is based on national notes, it will rediscount to the banks, it will take money on deposit from anybody in the country, and interest to the amount of 5 per cent is paid. The system has been such a success that it is making the banks over there somewhat concerned.

I want to conclude by making another quotation. I thought I had the letter here but I cannot put my hand on it for the moment. However, I may say that I received a letter from a gentlemen for whom I have great respect. He knows all about the losses that have occurred in this country in connection with the Home Bank. I want to tell the House what he says: The absolute fraud in connection with the present Bank Act of Canada is that the deposits in a wrecked bank are first grabbed to pay for the note issue of that bank. For that reason this parliament must do something for the people who have that grievance against the Bank Act of Canada. I do not know whether they can make out a case or not; but that is the point, that millions of the depositors' money in the Home Bank are to-day going to discharge the notes issued by that bank. This has occurred in a great number of cases in the past, and it must be cured. I wish the acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) was here; I would put the question straight to him now: Does he intend to stop that kind of business in this country, that when money is deposited by people in a bank, the first grab that is made on that money when trouble comes to the bank is to take up the bank notes that have been issued by that bank? That is what we are up against, and we all have to face depositors in that bank. We get letters every day about the matter.

The province of Quebec has had two troubles of that kind, the Provincial Bank and La Banque Nationale. It also had a good deal of trouble from a company known as La Machine Agricole, and an immense amount of securities was floated amongst the innocent people of Quebec and other parts of this country. For some reason or another Quebec has undertaken to issue $15,000,000 of the bonds of the province to take care of the people that lost their money in those bad securities and the people who lost their money in those two banks. I want to say to the depositors in the Home Bank that they have a good reason to present to this government why something should be done for their relief, in that the province of Quebec has come to the relief of its own people who have suffered to the extent of $15,000,000 in those banks and the company by which so much money was extracted from the people of that province. It may, perhaps, be an unfair thing to ask of the government; but some consideration must be paid to the people of this country, and first of all some consideration must be paid to the reforming of the banking laws, as I pointed out tonight. This sort of thing must stop. Why should we have any more bank notes in this country when we can get good, clean national notes such as we have? Is there any note so good in Canada to-day as the one dollar bill or the two dollar bill? It goes everywhere and every American will take such bills; but the minute you offer them a five dollar bill and they see that it is a travelling photograph album of the man who happens to be general manager or president of the bank, they will not take it.

There is another matter and, perhaps, the House and the government are not aware of it. The greatest crime is this: We have a national issue of notes and we issue notes of $5,000 and $10,000. The banks get them—I know they get them—and they go and deposit them in a central gold reserve in Montreal. Having deposited them there, they go out and reissue their own notes in the place of their national notes. They humiliate the national note, your note, the note of your nation, by saying that it is a discredited thing. Eventually the money has to be paid; but their notes go out, and that is the security that the depositor has, when the best note in the world, a note issued on the credit of the people, a note that would have gone everywhere, has its place taken by this bank note. That is taking place every day. Is the Minister of Finance going to stop it? Would it not be a good thing for our people to have a five dollar bill, or a ten dollar bill, or a hundred dollar bill, or a five thousand dollar bill of the government of Canada? But you cannot get them. We have issued them; but the banks have them all: the banks have silenced them, and in place of them they have issued their own notes. That is what the depositors in our banks have to take when they come to get their money.

I am going to conclude by just referring to this condition in regard to the banks. I have no hostility towards the banks. I want to see them make money, to prosper; but I want to see them give an absolutely secured service to the people of this country who are not getting it now. In the United States they have the finest system of national notes, the finest system of bank rediscount. They are taking the deposits of the people and they are giving them 5 per cent. If you are a depositor and you want to secure your money in this country—and again I say I am sorry the acting Minister of Finance is not present—if you are doubtful about your bank deposits in this country, all you have to do is to go and deposit them in the United States, and you will actually get the security of the United States that when you want that money you will get it and you do not have to take the note of a bank that may not be able to pay its way. There are millions of securities held by the banks even in this country, but there are millions of bank notes out that might be questioned any day, and unless the government is not careful to preserve the standing of such issues, in view of those things that are taking place and those revolutions that are going on, I do not know what will happen.

I want to tell the Prime Minister that if he does not consider this bank situation, his sojourn in the land of promise will not be very long. He is in the land of promise now. The Farmers have come to his relief; they have taken him on trial, and they are going to give him a close examination. They will check up the delivery of the goods every night. I do not know who the checker up is, but he will be an important man in the Progressive party. He will check up every night to see if the goods have been delivered, and if they are not delivered, something will happen. In the meantime, I would suggest that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance should take up the banking reforms that are called for in Canada. They thought they had accomplished something last year when they put through the Bank Act. They did something, but they did not do enough. No bank should object to inspection. While I am speaking of inspection, I want to mention another thing that obtains in the United States where they have these good things. Under their National Reserve Bank system every bank must be what is called a "member bank," and that practically submits them to the inspection and criticism of their fellow members. There is thus the most careful system of banking in the United States there ever was in any country. That being the case, we should follow it. We are following the Americans in many things. We can afford to follow them in these things.

I apologise to the House for taking up its time to-night. In the short speech which I have made to-night, I have endeavoured to bring to the attention of this House and still more of the people of Canada the need there is for a greater exercise of economy from the bottom up, and the still greater reason why we should not only talk about economy but begin to practise it in this House. The government should practise it in regard to not only the Civil Service, but many other things, and it should endeavour to secure the relief I have outlined to-night in regard to postage, telegraph charges, railway fares and things of that description.

Let us just show a disposition in parliament to set an example of economy; let us deflate the awful wind that is in so many of the commercial organizations of the country; let us economise in every direction wherever economy is practicable. There is a new element in the electorate of the country to-day, and that is the woman's vote. It is getting to be equal to that of the men. In England every woman of thirty may vote. They are claiming the right to vote at the age of twenty-one and they ought to have that right. We have the woman's vote to consider in this country and at the next election, under the transferable vote system, no one knows what is likely to happen. If we do not get up on our toes and show some consideration for some of the matters I have brought to the attention of the House, I think it will go very hard with some of the politicians who may then be appealing to the country. The day of absolute majorities in deliberative assemblies has gone by. Parliaments and legislative bodies generally will now be composed of different groups, and these parties will make deals just in the same way as they have done in the United States. Over there they are carrying out great economy involving hundreds of millions, and it is being made possible by arrangement between the leaders of the different parties. I do not call such an arrangement dishonest, but the fact remains that this is just what is being done. Arrangements of this kind are prevalent in the provinces and elsewhere, and we may see surprising things now that the political revolution has come. Let no one tell me that because we have a political revolution we shall have disaster. It is the will of the people in any event, and this is a democratic country. I have always been a democrat and I am a democrat to-day. A Conservative can be a good democrat, especially in relation to the policies that prevail here; and so can a Liberal. The day of democracy has arrived, and when hon. gentlemen go to the country for re-election they had better see to it that their compass is adjusted in keeping with the change that has taken place.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): It is with a great deal of pleasure that I have listened to the interesting address delivered by the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Maclean, York). I cannot say that I altogether agree with his pessimism or with the novel way in which he wishes to raise taxation. However, he has suddenly opened my eyes to one thing. I have often wondered why so many people went to the United States; now I know. I have heard a splendid eulogy of the different systems that prevail to the south, and apparently, in comparison with Canada, they are much superior to our own. Of course, in that respect I do not agree with the hon. gentleman, but I do think that some of the things that he has said are worthy of our attention, especially in regard to some of the means of raising revenue for the country. I do not think that the hon. gentleman's prophecy concerning wheat in Canada in five years' time will come true. We all know that Russia, that great agricultural country of Europe and Asia, is steadily coming back and always will be a great factor in the world's market for wheat. For that reason I do not think that the time will ever come in Canada when we shall have a complete monopoly of the situation and be able to charge just what we please for our commodity. I do think, however, in view of the situation in Canada, that it might be necessary to prevent the export of pulpwood to the nation to the south of us. I am speaking entirely for myself in this matter.

Mr. MARTELL: You are becoming a protectionist.

Mr. LEWIS: Not at all; but I remember coming to this country twenty-one years ago and taking particular observation of the great forests I passed through in going to the West; and during the past few years, coming to Ottawa and going back again, I have been comparing my recent observations with those of twenty-one years ago and I find that all along the railway tracks those great forests have been depleted, not only by those who have gone in to cut wood but also by forest fires. It seems to me, when we talk about our vast resources and their development and about utilizing them to our own advantage, that these resources belong not only to us but to our children and our children's children, and there should be some method of safeguarding the great forests we have in Canada for the generations that are to come. I therefore consider it quite legitimate that we should put an export duty on the large amount of pulpwood that is going to the United States at the present time. In my opinion there is a great deal of waste, both in the United States and in Canada, in the use of paper. One may pick up a weekly newspaper and see sometimes from thirty-six to perhaps seventy pages which, so far as the items of real news interest are concerned, might very well be condensed into six or seven pages. Instead, about seventy pages are wasted, and that means a tremendous inroad into a great national heritage which has been given us by Providence. An export duty on pulpwood would possibly remedy this wastefulness which is taking place to-day.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): One convert.

Mr. LEWIS: Now, Mr. Speaker, I listened yesterday with a great deal of interest to the speeches both of the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), and frankly, to say the least, I was quite disappointed, not with regard to the manner in which those speeches were delivered nor altogether from the standpoint of their subject matter or the outlook which both hon. gentlemen had upon the Dominion at large; but I was disappointed to know that it was possible for such conditions to have existed in the party politics of this country. I can quite understand that if the revelations were even partially true the extravagance of the past has to a large extent been the means of bringing the Dominion into its present situation. I believe the time has arrived when great national leaders should not, as it were, be washing the dirty linen of party politics, and that in the present national crisis we should have from them speeches outlining great reforms, somewhat similar to what we may observe in Great Britain at the present time, speeches presenting solutions of the problems which confront our people, and so help to bring about that peace which is the rightful heritage of this wonderful land.

My leader has very adequately covered the whole situation in regard to the Progressive viewpoint, and therefore it will not be necessary for me to enter into any details with respect to the subjects he dealt with, although I do wish to speak on some of the problems confronting us in the West. I think our leader is to be congratulated on the comprehensive manner in which he discussed the situation I also admired the candour and courage of the member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), who very often stands alone but is not afraid to voice his convictions, and who it seems to me, stands out sometimes like a prophet of old and reveals conditions as he finds them in our national life.

I think the Speech from the Throne is the best that I have heard since I became a member of this House. It is comprehensive in its treatment, and I think it truly describes the conditions obtaining to-day in this country. I was glad to find the subject of tariff reduction mentioned. It is, of course, a subject on which everyone can speak, to a certain extent, with ease, but I wish to say to my constituents at home and to the people of Canada generally that I do not believe that even tariff reductions are a panacea for all the ills from which we are suffering, although it is a step in the right direction. I was pleased to note that there would probably be a reduction of the tariff on implements. It may be true that certain of our implement manufacturers have lost a great deal of money and have gone out of business; but it is also true that thousands of farmers, who also had large investments in land and equipment, have been similarly unfortunate and lost all their capital, and there is no reason why fifty-two per cent of our population should be made to suffer for the sake of a few.

But it seems to me that the manufacturers have already anticipated the promised tariff reduction, because long before I came East it was stated by the implement agents in the West that the prices of implements had gone up at least ten per cent. Even if the government were to place agricultural implements on the free list the price to the farmer would be just the same as heretofore unless the dumping clause is repealed.

Of course, this tariff reduction will remove a grievance which the West has had against the East, and this in itself is I think a splendid thing. It has always been a grouch with the western farmer, a grouch which has always troubled the Liberal or any other party in the West, and the removal of this grievance will go a long way to bring the people together in that national unity which we so much desire.

With regard to the economic outlook in the West, it is quite true, and nobody in this part of the House wishes to deny it, that we have had the most bountiful crops. Providence has helped to solve the problem of removing our difficulties. And if it could be said of the government and of the capitalistic interests that they had done their share to that end we would be considerably nearer that prosperity which is so desirable. But when we as a people compare the prices in the reports that come to us from Ottawa, which show that so far as the farmers' commodities are concerned the ratio between what we sell and what we buy is 100 to 159 per cent, treating 100 as the basis before the war. If it was difficult for the farmer to make a profitable living before the war on a 100 to 100 per cent basis, it will be readily seen how impossible it is for him to do so when the basis is 100 to 159 per cent. So, for that reason, some means must be devised whereby this discrepancy can be removed and prices of commodities which we have to purchase brought down to the pre-war basis if we are to become prosperous or even to remain on the land.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) mentioned that as a result of the failure of the wheat board legislation we were endeavoring to form a wheat pool to market our wheat. This is quite true, and a great many people believe that it will help us considerably, but I do not think we should be too sanguine of the results that may be obtained. We may be able to save a few cents by this method, but when we come to scan the world's economic and industrial position at the present time it appears to be impossible for us to raise the price of wheat in the world's market to any great extent. Take the position of Great Britain to-day; she buys the largest amount of our grain. At the present time her industries are almost at a standstill. It is reported that on the Clyde where sixty great shipbuilding yards used to employ over 96,000 people, today only about one-half of the yards are in operation with only one-third of the men in employment. As the result of the non-recovery of Europe Great Britain's manufacturing output to-day is not 50 per cent of what it was in pre-war times. So just as long as we have these conditions in Europe we cannot expect to increase the world's market price of grain. Therefore the solution for our troubles is not to be found in that direction. Pending the recovery of Europe, which will take a long time, there is something that Canada can do, and it is this I wish to emphasize to-night. I remember reading a statement which was supposed to have been made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). Dealing with the much-needed branch lines in the West—of which I shall speak later—I understand that he said in Moose Jaw, referring to the Senate: We are waiting for the Lord to reform the Senate by death, but He has not been working very hard. I do not think it is much good waiting for Providence to solve all our problems; we ought to be able to take some steps ourselves towards their solution. When we go into the costs of production we find that in the case of the farmer these costs are too great.

When I was coming down to the opening of the provincial legislature in Regina, I happened to meet one of the members there. He did not know me, and he did not know I knew him, and began to speak of the farming situation in this country. He said something like this: It is not the fault of the government or of our present system; it is due to the false position of the farmer on the land. It is impossible, he contended, for any man with a family to make the farm pay if he goes on in the way that he does at present. Thirty or forty years ago in Ontario we lived on the farm; we never went to the town; we manufactured all our own things; and he had come to the conclusion that no Britisher, no Canadian, could really live on the farm and that the best thing to do would be to get people from Europe who could go on the land and stay there, who would never go to the town or to a picture show. Well, if that is the real economic foundation of living on the farm to-day, then I say that it is far better for us as a nation to go out of agriculture. But I believe that it is possible to live on the farm and have a comfortable existence if the conditions are made right. The first thing I would emphasize is the necessity for a reduction in freight rates. I do not see why it should not be provided in legislation that from the time the farmer places his grain on the car until it reaches the point nearest its destination it should not be interfered with, thus avoiding a great many charges, and if that is done there is no reason why the freight rate should not be lowered.

It was pointed out by my leader (Mr. Forke) that there should be a revaluation of the railways. We shall never make the Canadian National Railways pay on the basis of the purchase price. I have for two years urged in this House that this be done, and I believe it is the only business procedure to follow. Let us revalue the lines, put them on a business basis, and then I am confident that in competition with the Canadian Pacific or any other railway we can carry the farmers' wheat much cheaper than we are doing at the present time.

A few months ago some of the farmers in my district decided to send a car of turkeys to Toronto. I understand that a car of coal can be sent from Alberta to Toronto for $400, yet when they shipped that carload of turkeys and sent a man along with them it cost in the neighbourhood of $1,200. Why the discrimination? As long as conditions of this kind exist we shall never be able to make farming pay.

Just here I would like to say a word in regard to diversified farming, as it is called. How many of our farmers would succeed under present market conditions if they all went into diversified farming? I have spoken to the dean of the University of Saskatchewan on this subject, and he expresses the view that diversified farming is our only salvation. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has gone all over the country and he tells us the same thing; he can point to men in almost every district who have gone into this kind of farming and have succeeded in greater or less degree. But if every farmer in the district attempts to do the same thing, what is the result? Why, there is no market. Let me give you an instance: The cry was raised that we should go into the raising of chickens, turkeys, and so on; the year after some of the women on the farms did go into it and they got 25 to 35 cents a pound for their poultry. This year nearly every farmer's wife in the district did her best to raise turkeys, and the result was that some of them got as low as 11 cents a pound. If a breast bone happened to be a little crooked, 5 cents a pound was taken off; if in killing the bird they broke the wing, it went by default; anyway, the farmer got nothing for it. I do not know who got it. Now, I am not running farming down, but I want to show you the conditions. In our district we decided that we would give $5 to different high school boys who would stay on the farm and show how much they could make with it. I know one boy who with his $5 bought three ducks, one drake and a dollar's worth of food. He was able to raise thirty-four number one prime ducks. He looked after them the whole year, then he made a box and shipped them down to Pat Burns; and in return for all his work he got the magnificent sum of $2.90 over and above the purchase price. Do you think you are going to interest educated boys on any basis of that kind? These little instances may not amount to much but they impress our educated youths and cause them to decide to divert their energies into some more profitable channel. Therefore I would impress upon the government the need for reducing the costs of production. I may point out that I have one instance where, of the total sum received for a number of turkeys, the commission man got one-quarter, freight consumed one half, and the man who raised them got the other quarter. How can we continue diversified farming under conditions such as these? I believe the time is coming when the great leaders in Canada should get together, and, not in the spirit of party politics, a spirit which was displayed here last night; not in revealing terrible conditions as we heard them revealed, but with the interests of the people only in view, should sit down and devote their best abilities to arriving at some solution of our problems which will have the effect of bringing about contentment and prosperity.

I believe that the development of any important outlet for our grain and other commodities should receive attention, and I am of the opinion that the Vancouver harbour improvements, which have received a great deal of support from this government, will be highly beneficial to the West. I would like to mention also in passing that the Hudson Bay railway is a necessity. Of course we do not know whether or not it will be a success, but there is one thing that I think the western people deserve: they have been promised this railway and until it is tried out in actual experience no one in this House has any right to say that it will be a failure, I believe that the Hudson Bay railway will be one of the greatest benefits to our farmers in the West.

In regard to this question of diversified farming, I have an article which has some bearing upon the subject. We know that the embargo has been lifted from the export of cattle from this country to England. What price do we get for the finest quality beef at the present time? Three and four cents, and under present conditions it is not being raised at a profit, and any profit we might have on the British market has been swallowed up by the steamship companies. I do not see why this thing cannot be broken. Why, I understand the cost has been raised from $15 to $25 per head. It has been said by a notable authority that cattle can be carried overseas at $10 per head. The difference between $10 and $25 would make all the difference in the world to the cattle raisers in the West, and I think the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), who claims that he has the western situation at heart, should see to it and by every means in his power endeavour to break that monopoly which seems to exist in the shipping industry at the present time. I do not like to call down our merchant marine. It cost $70,000,000 of the Canadian people's money, but if we cannot break the combine in any other way, let these vessels be converted and be put on the ocean, and let us show to the world that these cattle can be carried overseas at the minimum rate per head. That is the only way I think in which we can solve some of the difficulties.

Now I want to speak for a moment or two in regard to the branch lines. I understand that the government is bringing down once again this year the three-year programme. I do not think this government has any right to prejudice the case of the branch lines in the West or in the East by bringing down a programme which they know will possibly not pass the Senate. The Senate has been blamed for a great many things. Possibly the Senate did right last year in stopping the programme of three years. We have in this parliament every year an estimate for the Welland canal, for instance. It was estimated in the first place that the Welland canal would cost possibly $70,000,000. That estimate was later increased and I was told by one of the ministers that it might reach the sum of $100,000,000, but the government has never so far come to parliament and asked us to pass $100,000,000 to cover the work over a series of years on the Welland canal. They have asked us to pass eight or seven or eleven million dollars from year to year for the maximum amount of work that can be carried on that year. Why cannot we deal with the branch lines in the same way? Let the government come down with an appropriation in the railway estimates for branch lines and ask for a sufficient amount to carry on the maximum amount of work that can be done this year. I am quite sure that if that were done this parliament, every part of it, would vote the money gladly, and even though it may take three years to finish the work once it is begun, there is no reason why this parliament should not vote from year to year sufficient money to carry on the programme. For that reason I sincerely hope that instead of prejudicing the case by bringing forward a three-year programme, or trying to reform the Senate if it needs reforming, the government will bring in a programme for one year that will appeal not only to members of the House but to members of the Senate as being constitutional in procedure, and then I believe that the West and the East will get our much needed railways. I have a little clipping here in which the hon. Minister of Agriculture throws the whole blame upon the Senate. He may be correct in his judgment, but at the same time I hope there will be no failure this year, and that the much needed branch lines in the West and in the East will not be prejudiced by unconstitutional, if it is unconstitutional, procedure.

We heard a great deal last night in regard to our national outlook, in regard to the burdens of our country which to a large extent are post-war in their nature, but any student of the great war and of subsequent history will admit that Canada has been very fortunate and that we have passed through the reconstruction period possibly better than any other country in the British Empire. I look with a great deal of optimism to the future. I do not see why we who have been more fortunate than any other country in the British Empire in that respect should be pessimistic in regard to the ultimate lifting of the great burden of taxation on the people. It is stated that we have a huge national debt, but should we despair when that debt is smaller than that of any other country in the British Empire? The national debt of Canada, per capita, is $270.12, as compared with $359.60 for Australia, $811.90 for New Zealand, $533.05 for South Africa, and approximately $850 for Great Britain. Why if it is possible for Ramsay MacDonald to look forward with hope and optimism to solving the problem in Great Britain where the national debt per capita is almost four times greater than our own, is it not possible for our public men with their brains and capacity and their national love for Canada to solve a much less problem? I believe that it can be done, and I hope that the best men of the nation will get together and see to it that nothing shall stand in the way—no political party, no interference of any kind. Let the solving of that problem become one of the greatest issues before this parliament at the present time.

In conclusion, I just wish to say a few words in regard to immigration. Last year I spoke at length on the Immigration Bill that passed through the House, and I think I took a very moderate attitude at that time. I want to say that as far as my own municipality and my own constituency are concerned, we need men to fill up the gaps made by those who have left. I went to the clerk of my municipality before coming down here. We had a splendid crop and I asked him, "What is the auditor's report in regard to the residents of this municipality?" He said, "There are eighty less residents than we had last year." Eighty less residents in that one municipality. That is very disheartening in regard to schools, in regard to churches, in regard to the village life and the social life of the community. We must change these conditions so that our men, the finest brawn that can be found possibly anywhere in the world, can stay and live at home with us. I believe that these men are superior in every way to any people you can bring into this country, I do not care where they come from, and the people who live here and belong to this country have the right to the first consideration on the part of any government in this country. I trust that these vacant places will be filled up in such a way that our schools and our churches and our village life will go on in the way it has been going on in the past. I hate to see great stretches of our country devastated as a result of people leaving us and though I believe that as a result of the good crop the people are in much better circumstances than before, having received the benefit of the crop, yet a great many of them were so deeply in debt that they saw no way of recovering themselves and many moved out while they had the opportunity and while the going was good. I believe that so far as the farmer is concerned, although he may not have more money at the present time, he has paid some of his back debts. But what I do say is this, that our bank collectors and other collectors have been on the scene ever since the noise of a good crop went out, and they have collected almost to the last farthing, and they have left the farmer in some instances in pretty poor circumstances. But with a continuance of good crops and a continuation of the good treatment of the people by Providence we may be able, in the course of a number of years, to overcome the existing situation. I think the problem can be solved much more quickly than by merely waiting for the effect of good crops. We can remove the drawbacks that are detrimental to the great basic industry of our national life. But acompaning this there must be prudent action in our homes, in our villages, in our municipalities, and in our governments provincial and federal. There must be mutual co-operation between the people and their representatives in the direction of helping to bring about a reduction in the cost of living and a return of peace, happiness and prosperity is assured to this great Dominion.

On motion of Mr. Marler the debate was adjourned.

REPORT

Public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1923—Hon. Mr. Robb.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend The Patent Act (French version).

He said: The intention of the bill is to correct an error that occurred in the French version of the act passed last session. In the English version a period of one year is given in which application may be made for a patent and in the French version the period is two years. The bill seeks to correct that error.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPUTY RECEIVER GENERAL'S OFFICE, TORONTO

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Will the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) please inform the House and the country when the Deputy Receiver General's office in Toronto ceased to function as a place for public deposits at interest, with right of withdrawal in Dominion notes, and whether it is true that deposits on similar terms are still being received by the Deputy Receiver General's office in British Columbia and in the Maritime provinces. If not to-day, I should like to have an answer to the question on another occasion.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): If the hon. member will place his question on the order paper I shall see that the information is secured.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): As a matter of practice I think I am entitled to ask the question on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is rather complex, and it might stand for answer until another day.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Very well; I should be glad to get the information, however.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou)

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. A few days ago in my absence, as I note in Hansard, the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) made a reference to myself in the following words:

> Perhaps I should add that the Nova Scotia workers point out that the Minister of National Defence . . . has been, if he is not still, the solicitor for the coal companies.

I desire to say that I am not solicitor for the coal companies, nor for any other company, nor any person whatever.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH
ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Tuesday, March 4.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Like other members who have preceded me, I beg to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address on the admirable manner in which they portrayed the situation to the House. Both hon. gentlemen discharged the task with honour not only to themselves but also to the House to which they belong. I desire also to extend congratulations, if he is willing to accept my congratulations, to the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) on the way in which he, too, placed his case before the House on Tuesday last. While I am free to admit that I cannot entirely agree with all that the hon. member may have said, nevertheless he brought forward his policies and the policies of his party in a straightforward and manly way, in a way, indeed, that every member of the House could well understand.

I have heard it stated on another occasion that this debate was a more or less innocuous proceeding. I cannot view the debate in such a light. On the contrary, I believe it is a very important proceeding, enabling the government to hear the views, through hon. gentlemen, that are held in the constituencies they represent. I think it is the duty of every hon. member so to enable the government, by such expressions of opinion, to formulate policies for the good of the Dominion as a whole. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, that I represent in this House the division of St. Lawrence-St. George of Montreal. I do not think it is improper to say that that division is an important one, perhaps one of the most important in this Dominion. It is important by reason of its commercial and financial activity, by reason of the wealth and learning of its people, and by reason of its undoubted devotion to the public good. I think I can safely say that no one can accuse the people of that division of narrowness nor of any lack of public spirit; and least of all can anyone accuse them of any failure to contribute to the taxes of this Dominion, for the administration of its affairs and for its development, a very considerable amount. Other qualifications these people have also; and I would ask hon. members to bear with me for a moment in that regard. The people whom I represent in this House are strong in their traditions. They reverence those old British and French traditions which in their opinion go so far as to make a nation idealistic rather than materialistic. And materialism, I think it is not improper for me to say may be found in many parts of this continent, more particularly outside of this Dominion. In addition to that, the people whom I represent are anxious to see maintained as their right and heritage the exercise of the English and French languages; and they desire to enjoy for all times the free and undisputed exercise of their various religions. All these things they regard as essential to good Canadianism. These traditions they cherish and desire to have maintained. While I am free to admit that what I have stated in this regard may strike some as being mere words, nevertheless, to the people I represent, and as well, if I may presume to say so, to the great mass of the people of Montreal and of the province of Quebec, these same sentiments form a part of their daily lives, and they should be cherished and preserved for all time. It appears to me that they can be preserved only so long as this Dominion remains a free nation, both politically and commercially, under the British Crown. And it can remain free and retain its identity as such only so long as it progresses, and expands, and retains its population. If it loses its population, if it fails to go forward, if it retrogresses, then its identity will undoubtedly be lost; and when that is gone, beyond the shadow of a doubt those traditions to which I have alluded will also be lost. That is one of the reasons, Sir, why I lay so much stress on the points which I have dealt with so far.

That being the case, there is a certain amount of alarm felt, and I think rightly felt, when we notice the lack of increase in population, and more so when we consider the great exodus of our people in the last few years. Happily the tide inwards is now increasing. But unfortunately the tide outwards is still very serious. Indeed if we look back and realize that for four long years this country poured out its blood and treasure, and for five years more has been subject to the most heavy imposts—when we realize all that and see our population still leaving us, some of us wonder if all those sacrifices have been made in vain.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we should be amazed at the emigration of our people which has taken place to the United States, and which has been in progress for some years past. My right hon. friend who leads the opposition (Mr. Meighen) dealt with this very point in his address before the House a few days ago. He spoke with the most meticulous care of this loss of population within the last year, he quoted figures month by month, and it seemed to me that he endeavoured to lead the House to believe that this emigration had taken place only in the past two years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I gave the figures for three distinct and complete years.

Mr. MARLER: Well, I have no doubt whatever that my right hon. friend stressed only the last couple of years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are the worst.

Mr MARLER: How much the worst?

Mr. MEIGHEN: About four times.

Mr. MARLER: From when?

Mr. MEIGHEN: From 1923. They are about four times worse than 1921.

Mr. MARLER: What about 1920 and 1921?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say 1923 was about four times 1921.

Mr. MARLER: Very well, we shall now have the correct figures so we can see definitely the actual position. Although I am quite free to admit that this is a serious matter, it is no more serious under this government than it was under the past government. The figures I am about to quote are taken from precisely the same source as that from which my right hon. friend derived his figures, the Department of Labour of the United States. For the two years ending 30th June, 1919, 90,234 people left Canada for the United States; the two following years ending 30th June 1921, 162,342 left. Does my right hon. friend shake his head and say that is not correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the figures are quite correct.

Mr. MARLER: I would strongly recommend my right hon. friend to look up these figures himself. He will find that they are correct, because I took them from exactly the same book as he himself used.

Mr MEIGHEN: Go ahead, what is the deduction?

Mr. MARLER: The deduction is this. For the two years to the 30th June, 1923, 163,000 people left as against 162,000 in the preceding two year period.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but what about from June on to the end of the year?

Mr. MARLER: The end of what year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The end of 1923. Why does the hon. gentleman stop in the middle of 1923 when the worst months are those that follow?

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend is always most careful to fit in his figures to some broken period; he never takes a complete year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I took the whole year, but you are breaking it in the middle.

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend is quite wrong. I am not breaking the year in the middle, I am taking the official year of the United States authorities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Take the calendar year.

Mr. MARLER: Calendar year? We heard about calendar years in Montreal, and I shall go into that later on. Let us take completed figures, and not partial, such as my right hon. friend did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend say that my figures are wrong to the extent of one man?

Mr. MARLER: I say these figures are absolutely right. The comparison shows absolutely that the departure of our population to the United States was just as great under his government as it is under the present administration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is nonsense.

Mr. MARLER: Why is it nonsense?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the hon. member leaves out the worst months that apply to this government.

Mr. MARLER: I do not leave out any months at all, I take the United States fiscal year and I stand by these figures absolutely. I challenge my right hon. friend to say they are wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But that does not bring the figures up to date.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MARLER: No, but distorting figures in this way—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Try not to, then.

Mr. MARLER: However, Mr. Speaker, while this is a very pleasant digression, it does not cover the point that I desire to stress. This exodus to the United States is a very serious matter for us in Canada, and while some in this House and some outside will say that it is only temporary, as a matter of fact it has continued for the last ten years, and the balance in favour of the United States in that period exceeds the total arrivals to the Dominion from that country. Others will say that these Canadians will return to the Dominion. Well, if that be so, why do we find in the United States to-day over 1,200,000 Canadian-born of whom 307,000 are French-Canadians? And why do we find in the mills of Massachusetts alone 260,000 Canadian-born of whom 108,000 are French-Canadians? Unfortunately these figures are only too true, you may read them to the left or to the right and then up and down and you will be forced to one conclusion only and that is that we are losing some of the best of our population to the nation to the south. Of course, if this had happened before the war possibly we would not have felt the same degree of anxiety as we feel to-day, but our position now is quite different from what it was then. Before the war we had not the heavy debt entailing the payment of some $140,000,000 a year in interest alone; we had not 22,000 miles of railway which can only be operated at a profit with ample traffic; we had not so far extended our systems of canals and elevators—and I am not criticizing this condition of affairs, I am simply taking the facts;—but we have all these things to-day and, wisely or unwisely, as the case may be, we have extended ourselves to accommodate a population five times as great as we can now boast. And yet, with only nine million people, we are still losing population.

It is usual to say that we desire more people to come to this country for the purpose of helping us pay our debts and to share the load which we are carrying. That is not our attitude at all. What we mean is that we desire more population to share with us in bringing to the greatest degree of productivity those great advantages which we enjoy and which, in my opinion, no other country in the world is so richly endowed with. That is the attitude we take in asking people to come here; that is the attitude we take in asking our own people to remain in this country. But unfortunately, although these reasons should appeal to any Canadian who loves his country and who wishes to see it advance, they do not appeal to as many as we should like. Why is it that we cannot retain our population? I do not think we have to go very far for an answer: as I see it, it is because we do not provide in this country enough steady and profitable work to go round.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: I do not see why the applause should all come from the opposition side. Well, we cannot ask as many as we would like to come to our cities; because we feel that there is not enough profitable and steady work to keep our artisans and others in continuous employment. We even feel that possibly we cannot ask as many to go on our farms as we would like to see go on them, because we are told—and I have no doubt that it is correct—that farming unfortunately does not always pay. In short we have not developed this country industrially and commercially to the extent that we should. The result is that our cities have not enough purchasing power for the farmer and the farmer has to pay more for his goods because we are obliged to manufacture too diversely instead of in large quantities. Furthermore, our production is not such as to give our railways a sufficient amount of business.

I think it is fair and sound reasoning that we in Canada should make ourselves not dependent rather than dependent on others, because in that way we shall build up our cities and develop our home market, and still have our export market in reserve. Therefore it is necessary that our policies should be such as to enable the farm to pay and our industries to live and in this—I see nothing incompatible or impossible, if only, instead of looking at the immediate present as we are wont to do, we turn our eyes to the near future. To dismiss an argument of that description in a few words is, of course, next to absurd.

Many things have to be done, many policies require to be adopted before our position can be altered. One of the questions which has a bearing upon our position industrially and agriculturally—and I will say with all due respect to my hon. friends of the Progressive party that I do not think they quite see how seriously it has affected them—is the question of taxation. Taxation as it exists and has existed for some time past is bound to affect any industry or profession—and it affects industry whether it be commercial or agricultural in its character. Before the war we raised our revenue by means of customs and excise. In 1914 we raised from customs and excise $126,000,000 out of a total revenue of $136,000,000, excluding post office and railways because the revenue and the expenditure under those heads just about balanced. With that $136,000,000 we governed the country; we expended such money as was necessary, and with a very slight addition to our public debt we went our way in peace and happiness. For the period of about fourteen years before the war our public debt increased only to the extent of $67,000,000 odd, or less than $5,000,000 per year. That was all changed with the war, and instead of the old system of indirect taxation we had tax after tax imposed by other methods. Without doubt that taxation was necessary, and I am not at all questioning its propriety, but I am drawing a comparison between the taxation which was in vogue in this country before the war and that which was imposed subsequently. As I have said, after the war, tax after tax was imposed. We had the income tax, the business profits tax, the taxes imposed under the Special War Revenue Act; various other taxes were imposed and still prevail. In 1923 we collected $154,000,000 from customs and excise, or comparatively little more than we collected in 1914, whereas from direct taxation we collected $199,000,000. In other words, direct taxation was greater than the old indirect taxation which in the past had been in vogue.

In 1914 our total revenue from all sources was $163,000,000. In 1923 our total consolidated revenue was $394,000,000. In other words, in that ten year period taxation had increased to the extent of 225 per cent, while our population had increased in the same period by around 1,200,000 or a little over 15 per cent. That meant that a population only slightly increased had to bear an enormously increased load of taxation. And what was the effect of this taxation? There could only be one effect, nothing else could happen, any tax that is imposed, no matter how or where it is imposed or how it is collected, must be borne by one person and one person only, namely the consumer—that is where the tax eventually rests; it cannot be otherwise; there is no in-between point where that tax may land and remain; it goes on down the line until the consumer, buying his boots, shoes, farm implements or anything else, has to include it in the price he pays for the goods. So that, when taxation like that has been imposed; where it has been necessary, in part at least, to impose it, we cannot wonder that the struggle for life has become more and more acute. We cannot wonder perhaps that our population is leaving us. We cannot wonder perhaps that some part of our population casts eyes on other countries where taxation is lighter and where the struggle for life is not so acute. But if we want prosperity in Canada we must have population; that is essential. Increase in taxation or the imposition of heavy taxation means a diminution in our population, whereas lighter taxation in any form means an increase in population.

A great deal has been said in the public press and elsewhere, even by my right hon. friend who leads the opposition—and he has been most vehement in his remarks—about the reduction of taxation. Some have stated that the taxation should be reduced by ten per cent, others twenty-five per cent, and so on. Various opinions have been given, but as a matter of fact, with all due deference to these various opinions, Mr. Speaker, they do not get us very far. They do not help us very much. They are far too general. They lack distinctiveness and definiteness in every respect. There is nothing on which one can hinge an opinion at all. I believe in spending less money; I have said so on the floor of this House time and time again. But those we have to look to as regards spending less money in this country are the people of Canada themselves, and it does not matter what this or any other government does, unless the people of Canada are willing to do without the things they have now and are willing to restrict their expenditure, taxation will never, and can never, be reduced in this country. If we are to proceed as we have proceeded certainly to some extent in years past, with everybody desiring to be government employees in this country, never in the wide world can taxation be reduced. If the provinces come forward, as they have come forward, and ask the Dominion treasury to put up money for matters that the provinces themselves should have undertaken in the past or should undertake now, then without the slightest shadow of a doubt taxation cannot be reduced. But let us turn to a happier trend of mind. We have, in so far as this government is concerned, spent less money. My hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) smiles. We have spent less money. A great deal of the money which this government had to spend was not due to its fault at all, it was the making of the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to taking the credit for making the money.

Mr. MARLER: I do not grasp the ambiguous answer which my right hon. friend has given. How has he made money for the country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what the hon. gentleman said. He said the money they had spent we had made. I think that is correct.

Mr. MARLER: I was not clear just what he meant. No, I put it the other way. The money has been spent in matters relating to legislation which my right hon. friend and his party put through. My right hon. friend has expressed his opinion on this matter on more than one occasion. He no doubt remembers his various journeyings in the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec was very ready and very glad to see my right hon. friend; the city of Montreal was very glad to see him and to listen to him. He no doubt will remember the address which he made in the city of Montreal in January last, in that gilded hall, surrounded by his ex-cabinet ministers, ex-bankers, ex-shipbuilder and various others, to some of the people of Montreal. Of course, we were not all expected in that gilded chamber. The ordinary people like myself listened in from our humble homes, but unfortunately, it may sometimes be, in these modern days and the ever-present press, that which a prominent and able man like my right hon. friend says is invariably recorded and given to the world. I intend to read one or two extracts from the speech that my right hon. friend made that night. He said:

To return to expenditures, up to 1920 restriction had not been possible. But from April 1st to December 31, 1921—

That, of course, is during the fiscal year 1922.

—there had been a reduction of expenditure in ordinary revenue totalling $44,000,000. In the same period of 1922—

That is, from April 1 to December 31, 1922, being part of the fiscal year 1923.

—no reduction had taken place, but there had been an increase of approximately half a million dollars. And in the same period, 1923—

That is, from April 1 to December 31, 1923, being part of the present fiscal year, 1924.

—there had been a reduction of about $1,500,000.

Then he goes on to speak of capital expenditure and is reported in these terms:

In capital expenditure for the first nine months of the fiscal year 1921—

That is, from April 1 to December 31, 1920.

—the reduction had been $20,000,000. In the same period of 1922 the reduction had been less than $3,000,000, while last year the reduction had been less than $1,000,000.

Now, with my hon. friend's permission, let us examine somewhat in detail that statement which he made to that well-picked crowd in Montreal which had been brought together to listen to his speech, but which the poor and humble people like myself had to listen to in another way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was a public meeting.

Mr. RYCKMAN: How much does a radio set cost in Montreal?

Mr. MARLER: A very small amount, but it was quite worth the amount for what we heard that night. My right hon. friend said that restriction up to 1920 had not been possible. He will correct me if I in any way inadvertently misquote him in reading from a newspaper report of his speech.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Reduction," I said.

Mr. MARLER: It is reported as "restriction", which is very much the same thing; let us use that word. Up to 1920 restriction of expenditure had not been possible, according to my right hon. friend. I suppose he meant that restriction had not been possible on account of the war. He nods his head, and I expected him to nod his head at that, because, no matter how prodigal and extravagant he was in any expenditure, in any action which was not taken that should have been taken or any action that was taken that should not have been taken, on the public hustings he always laid it to one of two causes, the war or unemployment, one or the other.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no; very often to the railways that my hon. friend's friends built.

Mr. GRAHAM: To the ones that you bought.

Mr. MARLER: It will be found that in this case my right hon. friend did not attribute the extraordinary expenditure to railways; he put it down to war and unemployment These are his two trump cards on which he relies in one case or the other as the occasion may demand. I suppose that none of these restrictions were possible at all not even in that monument of efficient bungling—the merchant marine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Liberal convention decided that it was not possible in the case of the mercantile marine.

Mr. MARLER: The Liberal convention had nothing whatsoever to do with the merchant marine. The merchant marine was a product of the brain of the government of my right hon. friend. Not one ship was put into the water except under that government. First of all, they were being built by the Imperial Munitions Board; my right hon. friend's government took the building out of the hands of the Imperial Munitions Board and decided to create, themselves, a great Canadian mercantile marine. That is what happened. Is the right hon. member ashamed of that policy; it was simply a mistake on the part of the government of my right hon. friend. Very well, why do they not acknowledge their mistake?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because I differed from that view. The hon. gentleman differed from it too in 1919, because he castigated us for not building a mercantile marine for all war purposes.

Mr. MARLER: I am much obliged to my right hon. friend for reminding me of what occurred in 1919. Unfortunately for my right hon. friend I was not in the House when these merchant marine estimates went through the House. Had I been in the House they would not have gone through, and my right hon. friend would not have been landed in these difficulties.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARLER: I suppose my right hon. friend will say to me in a moment that he went into all these things with a light heart. Will he say that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will say what I want to say.

Mr. MARLER: Certainly. Well, I venture to say this: If my right hon. friend did go into these things with a light heart he would have been glad to have got out of them with a fleet foot.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the hon. gentleman got any knowledge of what the present management of the National Railways has recommended in regard to disposing of the mercantile marine?

Mr. JACOBS: The railway management recommended the acquisition of the Hotel Scribe.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend stated there had been a reduction in expenditure totalling $44,000,000. That is for the period from 1st April, to 31st December, 1921. Why does my right hon. friend take broken periods?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because that was the period given in the return I asked for from the Finance department.

Mr. MARLER: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend made all the estimates for the fiscal year 1922. There is no question about that. But in any event up to the 31st March, 1922 there was not a reduction in the expenditure for that year of $44,000,000, there was a reduction of some $13,500,000, and the reduction at that time was due solely to the fact that war services had been diminished to the extent of $20,000,000 and non-war services actually increased to the extent of $6,000,000. My right hon. friend declared there had been no reduction in the fiscal year 1923. As a matter of fact there was a reduction in the fiscal year 1923 of $15,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that my figures were wrong in any respect?

Mr. MARLER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have the return with me that I got the figures from.

Mr. MARLER: The point I want to make, and my right hon. friend may differ with me, as this—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Answer yes or no.

Mr. MARLER: I have heard my right hon. friend ask the "yes or no" question too often. That is getting to be an old story.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is quite easy for any hon. friend to answer yes or no.

Mr. MARLER: The right hon. gentleman thinks a "yes or no" answer is quite sufficient for all these purposes. He could have obtained any statement he wanted from the Finance department. Let me state that during the fiscal year to which I have reference the reduction was not $44,000,000 but was $13,500,000. I repeat that the reduction for the following fiscal year was over $15,000,000. It was not the case, as my right hon. friend said, that there had been an increase of approximately half a million dollars.

The right hon. gentleman then went on to discuss capital expenditures. He said that for the first nine months of the fiscal year 1921 the reduction in capital expenditure had been $20,000,000; and in the same period of 1922 the reduction had been less than $3,000,000; and the reduction from 1st. April to 31st., December, 1922, had been $1.000,000. Now if we go back to the year 1919 and take the fiscal years in succession, we find that the increase of 1920 over 1919 was $44,-000,000. If we take the year 1921 we find there was an increase of $34,000,000 on capital and railways; and in 1922 there was a reduction of $23,000,000.

In another part of the same speech my right hon. friend said that must be done. Taxation must be reduced, the cost of departmental activities in the government must be cut, as it could be cut—the Conservatives had shown that. He says the Liberals had a chance to continue the work but had not the courage to brave the resistance and antagonism the policy had engendered. The right hon. gentleman attempts in that part of his speech to show that departmental expenditure had not been increased under his government. If he compares the departmental expenditure in 1914 with the departmental expenditure in 1922 and excludes war charges of every kind, he will find that his departmental expenditure increased to the extent of some $48,000,000 in that particular time. I can give my right hon. friend the figures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think you can.

Mr. MARLER: Well, let us have the figures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does my hon. friend count under war expenditure?

Mr. MARLER: I count under war expenditure everything relating to war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Tell us what the expenditures are.

Mr. MARLER: The accounts for 1922 show an expenditure of $347,000,000 as compared with $127,000,000 in 1914, making an increase of $220,000,000, allowing for a deduction on account of sinking fund which is not shown in 1922. We will deduct from that: War interest amounting to $108,000,000; direct services due to the war of $60,000,000; the increased subsidies to the provinces of $931,000; and special items such as unemployment relief and Dominion elections of $2,339,000; amounting in all to $171.000,000, leaving a net addition not due to the war or to special events of over $50,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what my hon. friend included in that item of sixty million dollars. He may have included only half.

Mr. MARLER: No, I included all the items. Would the right hon. member like the details?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. MARLER: Pensions; Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; Soldier Settlement Board; increased cost of collection of customs, income tax and business profits tax; external affairs, various special grants, such as Patriotic Fund, League of Nations, Battlefield Memorials and grants of that kind, $60,270,396.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are lots besides that.

Mr. MARLER: Not relating to war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, directly relating to war.

Mr. MARLER: What does my right hon. friend refer to?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would instance offhand the "Greater production" activities in the West under the Interior department.

Mr. MARLER: All that departmental increase, as a matter of fact, took place. There were increases in every department of the government at the time. Many departments increased by many millions of dollars. I do not see what claim my right hon. friend can make in saying the departmental activities had decreased.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Many of them had increased, but what I say is that the increase was necessitated directly by the war.

Mr. MARLER: How was the increase in the departments such as these necessitated by reason of the war—Agricultural Instruction Act which increased from $700,000 to $1,104,-000. Was that war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I did not claim it was, but I observe that that was recommended to be continued by Mr. Duncan Marshall.

Mr. MARLER: What has that to do with it? Then we have Experimental farms, $626,-000, increased to $1,272,000; Health of Animals, $442,000 increased to $1,685,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I admit we were very generous to agriculture, but hon. gentlemen opposite said we were not generous enough.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That is not war.

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend was generous to the penitentiaries, too—the amount rose from $910,000 up to $1,527,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The inmates increased.

Mr GRAHAM: Bad government.

Mr. MARLER: He was also generous in the cost of Civil government which increased from $5,607,000 to $9,658,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did not all salaries the world over increase during the war?

Mr. MARLER: All salaries the world over certainly increased during the war. The point I make is this; that my hon. friend clearly and distinctly stated in Montreal that he had decreased governmental activities, that the Conservative party had shown how the decrease could be made. Where is that decrease?

Mr. MEIGHEN: After the war, between 1920 and 1921, we decreased the Civil Service by over 9,000. That decrease was effected in eighteen months.

Mr MARLER: There is not a reduction in ordinary expenditure between 1920 and 1921; there was an increase between these years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The civil servants who were let out received their salaries, not only to the time when they went out, 4 p.m. but up to the end of 1921 and a little later. Nevertheless, the numbers diminished by over 9,000.

Mr. MARLER: Why is this remarkable diminution not reflected in the expenditure now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is, but hon. gentlemen opposite are overcoming it by other expenditures.

Mr. MARLER: And then after that, in the same speech, my right hon. friend went on to say that,—"War liabilities had ceased, yet the government,"—meaning the present government—"was unable to maintain the rate of reduction in expenditures".

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said "diminish."

Mr. MARLER: He continues

That had reflected on the cost of living which by a chart—

I am glad to see he is using charts—

—issued by the Labour department showed the jump from the imposition of the Sales Tax, the Stamp Taxes and other Liberal financial measures. The cost of living had reached its peak in 1920. It was falling rapidly in 1921 but the Mackenzie King taxes stopped the fall and there had been no reduction since.

My right hon. friend further says—

It was one of the contributory factors to emigration from Canada to the United States which in 1923 had reached a pace truly alarming. Something must be done and done at once to stop it.

And then, in his very best form, he goes on to say—

Are we to sit by in silent, shivering impotence while these men trek right in front of our eyes into a foreign land? What must be done? Taxation must be reduced.

And later on he says—

The Sales Tax, raised from 1½ to 6 per cent, must be cut and so must other taxes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Three per cent.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend was reported to have said—and I shall be glad to send him the clipping—that it was raised from 1½ to 6 per cent. Here it is clear and distinct. He states:

The Sales Tax raised, from 1½ to 6 per cent must be cut, and so must other taxes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said 1½ and 1½, it being divided. Hon. gentlemen laugh, but I do not think they understand this yet. If hon. members do not want the matter cleared they do not need to have it cleared. I usually in my speeches refer to our Sales Tax as 1½ and 1½, totalling 3, because we divide the expense of collection, but I never represented that it was 1½ to any audience in Canada.

Mr. MARLER: Well, that is what the listeners heard, or what they believed they heard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member did not get it over the radio.

Mr. MARLER: The expression was perfectly clear and distinct in the city of Montreal that the Sales Tax had been raised from 1½ to 6 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They all know better than that in Montreal.

Mr. MARLER: However, that statement remains. It has been reported, and reported on more than one occasion, and has never been contradicted by my right hon. friend to my knowledge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not read it. I knew I made the correct statement, and that satisfied me.

Mr. MARLER: Why does my hon. friend say that war expenditure had ceased in 1920?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say it. I said it diminished.

Mr. McMASTER: Could these "asides" be rendered in a little louder voice, so that we in this part of the chamber might have the full benefit of it?

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I suggest to hon. members on both sides that, in a debate of this nature, it would be wise for hon. members to stop the interruptions and the cross-examination. I say it without any invidious meaning towards anyone in particular, but I think that for the dignity of the House the debate should proceed without interruption. Unless the hon. member interrupting addresses himself to the Chair on a question of order, or unless the hon. member who has the floor is inviting cross-examination, there should be no interruption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I explain, Mr. Speaker? The invitation came very directly, from the hon. gentleman, as he admits, and I admire him for it. If he would prefer it, I am quite prepared to be silent, and, except in a special case, I will not interrupt him at all.

Mr. MARLER: I am much obliged to you, Mr. Speaker, for the courtesy and kindness in making this suggestion. I have no particular objection to the interruptions of my right hon. friend. The point I am trying to accomplish is to have the truth known throughout the country, as to what the government has done and what they have attempted to do, and as to the burden they have had saddled on their backs since they came into power, and their inability to make any further reductions than have been made. When a prominent statesman like my right hon. friend comes to an important city like Montreal and makes these statements, which are heralded abroad in the public press—as a matter of fact they were spread broadcast in the constituency I represent—it is obvious that they must be corrected somewhere; and when I undertake to correct them I do so, not necessarily with the object of annoying or exciting my right hon. friend at all, that is not my purpose, but simply to get to the actual truth of the facts. We are only trying to have reported in the newspapers exactly what did happen, exactly what was done.

I trust you will overlook the digression, Mr. Speaker. My right hon. friend attempted in that speech to make it distinct beyond any misunderstanding that, notwithstanding the war and demobilization, the expenditure on the part of his government had diminished, and diminished very considerably. I do not think I misread his remarks in that respect. Very well. In the fiscal year 1920 the total expenditure, less war and demobilization, was in round numbers, $439,000,000; for the fiscal year 1921 the total expenditure, less war and demobilization, was $511,000,000, an increase of $72,000,000. For the year 1922, again comparing it with the year 1920, the total expenditure, less war and demobilization, was $462,000,000, an increase as compared with 1920, of $22,800,000. In 1923 the total expenditure, less war and demobilization,—and that was the first year that this government had an opportunity of making reductions—was $429,000,000, or a considerable reduction as compared with 1920. What was the result of the reduction which this government made? I admit that in 1923 the demobilization expenditure was small, but I have deducted war and demobilization expenditure from the other years as well so as to put the accounts on an equal basis and make a fair comparison. The reduction which this government made in 1923, as compared with the year 1920, was $9,269,000, while it was $81,000,000 less than in 1921 and $32,000,000 less than in 1922. These are the reductions which this government has made. I might add, for the benefit of my right hon. friend and of hon. members generally, that in the expenditure of 1923 there is an amount of about $6.000,000—to be exact, $5,979,000—for the merchant marine and another $5,000,000 for the Canada Highways Act, with which this government had absolutely nothing in the world to do. That would have made the net deficit in that year only $15,000,000. Now let me take the deficits that occurred during these years, because I want to lead up to the question of taxation and as to whether we can reduce those taxes or not. The deficits for the years 1920, 1921 and 1922, that is to say, the total deficits, amounted to $609,000,000. And yet, notwithstanding all this, my right hon. friend comes forward and declares that taxation must be reduced. He says that the Liberal government imposed taxes which they should not have imposed. Will my right hon. friend tell me how he expected the interest on the deficits to be paid? Was it to be paid out of the earnings of the merchant marine or out of those of the railways?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend want an answer?

Mr. MARLER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should prefer to leave out the Belle river and Matane wharves, and hotels and other things. If that were done there would be no necessity to increase the taxes.

Mr. MARLER: That is not the point in question, nor is it the point I make. I am referring to an allegation, clear and distinct, which my hon. friend made without the slightest ambiguity in the city of Montreal, to the effect that we imposed unnecessary taxes. He said that we imposed taxes. Of course we did: what else could be done but impose additional taxes? Were those deficits that were occurring year after year to be allowed to continue? Were they to be pyramided? Had we allowed that sort of thing to go on we should have reached the stage where further progress would have been impossible. As a matter of fact we had reached that stage in my right hon. friend's administration although he never thought that we had. He did not want to impose additional taxation; he saw looming up in the future another matter of greater importance, the election, and consequently he said, "No, I will not impose taxes." My right hon. friend is perfectly well aware that the taxes he imposed in the war did not even cover the interest on war expenditures. Does he deny that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did not cover war expenditures?—Certainly not. Did any country in the world do that?

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend knows quite well what I mean: it did not cover the interest on war expenditure and had nothing to do with war capital. The war capital is absolutely intact at the present time, $1,693,000,000, with a deficit in addition to that. And yet here is a statement made by my right hon. friend as appears in the Border City Star:

> Regarding the assertion of Premier King in his recent speech at Quebec, that the former federal government had paid nothing in the way of war debts out of taxes, Mr. Meighen flatly charges this to be a falsehood. In 1919 Great Britain had paid 27 per cent of the war cost out of taxation in addition to meeting normal current expenditures, Mr. Meighen said. Canada had actually done better with a record of 28 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right too.

Mr. MARLER: Is the hon. gentleman serious?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, sir.

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend still persists in saying that part of the war capital expenditure was paid by his government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said just what my hon. friend read, that 28 per cent of all war costs was paid by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Capital cost?

Mr. MARLER: What does the statement mean?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It means what it says. I am ready to stay with the hon. member to the end, if he will. It means exactly what it says, 28 per cent of all war costs.

Mr. MARLER: Very well. That is an interesting statement and I want to get the matter in Hansard; I want it to go throughout the country; I want the House to know exactly the position which the late government took in imposing war taxes on the country, so that there will be no question about the situation at all. Of course, we all know that the late government won the war; we have been told that in the province of Quebec time and again. In regard to taxation which is put on binders, harrows and ploughs, the right hon. gentleman opposite need not look to Brantford when he talks about costs; let him look to the right. That is where the expenditure came from. However, my right hon. friend not only did not pay—and I make the statement advisedly and with care—one single dollar on war capital out of war taxes, but in addition to that, on the first of April, 1922, that is to say at the end of the fiscal year 1921, there was a deficit in connection with actual interest, pensions and war services of $128,000,000. I shall give my right hon. friend the figures. That is precisely what he saddled this government and the country with. I am not blaming him for these war expenditures, don't let him misunderstand me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman give details?

Mr. MARLER: With the greatest pleasure. I worked out these figures this morning with the published statistics, to be quite sure of their correctness. With permission I will read the table:

War Debt—1 April 1914—31 March 1923—9 years
Expenditure on war and demobilization..		$1,693,412,797
Interest paid on national debt during period..		$718,457,105
Less interest on previous debt i.e., $12,893,505 x 9 years—	$116,041,545
Less interest on railway advances to 31 December 1922	79,125,082
Less interest on railway advances 31 December 1922 to 31 March 1923..	8,310,000
		203,476,627
Leaving interest on war debt..		514,980,478
Add:
Pensions during whole period	$162,846,609
Less pre-war pensions i.e., $311,900 x 9 years..	2,807,100
		160,039,509
Last four years D.S.C.R. (not included in war and demobilization expenditure above)..		111,166,062

Add:
Soldiers' Settlement Board Administration last five fiscal years..	10,400,000
Total..	796,586,049
Collections in special war taxation during nine year period..	711,162,650
Deficit..	85,423,399
Add surplus war revenues 1923..	42,767,945
Deficit 1 April 1922 of war revenue as compared with interest on war debt and expenditure on war services).. ..	128,191,344
Leaving capital cost in addition unpaid of..	$1,693,412,797

I do not think there can be any question whatever that when this government took charge there was this deficit of $128,191,344 as regards ordinary, everyday war expenditure, to say nothing of capital expenditure.

But Mr. Speaker, the sad feature of the situation is that when the opportunity was before this country of imposing taxes upon those who were making millions out of the war such taxes were not then imposed. Of course, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are well aware why the opportunity was ignored—an election was in the offing. Hence, instead of imposing taxes those who were rich were made richer, for instead of issuing war bonds subject to tax, which my right hon. friend had a perfect right to do—he could do anything under the War Measures Act; he could have even taken all the money out of the banks—he issued tax-free bonds. Of course the cry will go up from him and his associates: "We had to work up great enthusiasm in order to get the people to buy war bonds." But these bonds are the very best investment in the country. However, he issued $915,000,000 of non-taxable war bonds—at least, that is the amount still outstanding.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman know of any belligerent country that did not take that course?

Mr. MARLER: Such a question is simply the product of a vivid imagination—nothing more, nothing less. It is not a question of what this or that country did. He has been telling us on this side of the House that we have imposed more taxes. He came down to the city of Montreal and said: Taxes must be reduced. It is he who came forward to lead us to believe, rightly or wrongly—and perhaps wrongly—that our sales tax was raised from 1½ to 6 per cent by this government. That is what the people were led to believe by his speech in Montreal. I am controverting that statement absolutely. I say this government did the only possible thing—they imposed additional taxation. They did not want to do so; what interest was it to this government to impose additional taxation? But even the war interest was not met by my right hon. friend by taxing those who were making millions out of the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, and I will not if he asks me to refrain, but does he know of any business profits tax in any country in the world higher than Canada's was? That tax was imposed on the people he refers to, and if he thinks it was not enough why doesn't he restore and augment it?

Mr. MARLER: I know of no business profits tax that was as high as Canada's. I know of no business profits tax in any other country; but what I know, and what every hon. member knows, is that millions and millions of dollars were made during the war in a manner that should not have been possible and those profits should have been returned to the people. I know, further, that $915,000,000 of non-taxable bonds are outstanding. The interest on these alone, $45,000,000 is paying no income tax, which means that these gentlemen across the way are paying so much more income tax themselves. That is the fact, and that is what we are complaining of. And yet my right hon. friend says: "Are we to sit by in silent, shivering impotence?" Well, my right hon. friend did not sit by "in silent, shivering impotence" when immigration went dead; he sat by in frozen inactivity. I observe that my right hon. friend is producing some figures, and I know what they are; he has read them half a dozen times in the House already.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, he has not read them at all. Would my hon. friend like to hear them?

Mr. MARLER: Well, let us hear what my right hon. friend has to say about them now.

Mr. BUREAU: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I knew that the Minister of Customs would commence to roar, but I do not rise unless I have the backing. The official figures show. . .

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BUREAU: I rise to a point of order. This is the seventy-eighth speech that my right hon. friend has made. Seventy-five is enough.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member (Mr. Marler) invited me to give the figures.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member who has the floor gave his permission to the right hon. leader of the opposition to interrupt?

Mr. MARLER: I again say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no objection to the hon. member's interruptions.

Mr. BUREAU: Well, we have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really do not like to interrupt him so often, but there is not a sentence he has uttered that I would not like to have contradicted, and of that contradiction to have produced the proof. I have before me the emigration and immigration figures from the official records. At the beginning of the war and for many years prior to that time the balance was strongly in our favour. At the very opening of the war the balance went heavily against us, until about February, 1917 —I will give the exact figures if hon. gentlemen want me to. We could not impose higher taxation. The Americans were not in the war, and higher taxation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Higher taxation would have made a higher balance against us. On the entrance of the American nation into the war our taxation reached a level the highest in the world, and immigration started in our favour and continued in our favour.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The balance continued heavily in our favour every year until September, 1922. It has been heavily against us ever since.

Mr. CASGRAIN: With regard to the point of order raised by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau), I do not think the right hon. leader of the opposition has the right to make speeches over and over again. He might put questions, but he should not speak every day on the same subject. He has exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already stated to the House that this cross-examining process is against the rules. Unless the hon. member who has the floor allows the interruption to take place and the explanation to be given, he must proceed with his speech. Here is the rule:

> Whilst a member is addressing the House no one has a right to interrupt him by putting a question to him, or by making or demanding an explanation. A member will at times allow such interruptions through a sense of courtesy to another but it is entirely at the option of the member in possession of the floor to give way or not to an immediate explanation.

Mr. BUREAU: We do not know at the present time who has the floor, whether it is the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) or the member for St Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler).

Mr. MARLER: Well, these interruptions are only wearying the House, and perhaps hon. members will be very glad when I sit down.

Mr. BUREAU: No, go on.

Mr. MARLER: My right hon. friend, in the address he made a few minutes ago, stated that he could controvert or repudiate most of the statements I have made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: He can repudiate them all?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In about five minutes.

Mr. MARLER: I will let my hon. friend repudiate the statement that there was a deficit in actual war expenditure as compared with everyday expenditure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do now.

Mr. MARLER: Of course he can do it now; that is exactly the attitude he took in Montreal in saying that taxes should be reduced—but it is nothing but noise; there is nothing in it at all. We are looking for reasons in this country now; we do not propose to sit under taxation without knowing the reason. We are more or less intelligent people in Montreal. I am not saying that the body before which my right hon. friend spoke was as intelligent as some of the others, but still a fairly intelligent body. My right hon. friend, in his best style, ended up his address by saying, "Are we going to sit by in silent, shivering impotence while our people trek across the line to the United States?" I was going on to say a few moments ago, when my right hon. friend interjected his address, that he not only stood by "in silent, shivering impotence" as regards immigration; he stood by in frozen inactivity. The department itself was frozen and an encumbrance on the government. It was known in the United States, through reports of departmental officials, that it was the most difficult thing in the wide world to gain entrance into Canada under the rules which were enforced at that time. Here is a paragraph from one of those reports; it is a comment by Mr. W. J. White, Superintendent of Agencies in the United States:

> During the war period, drastic restrictions were necessarily put into effect, and no doubt for good reasons these were continued after the close of the war. While they had the desired effect of keeping out many undesirables, the precautions were so sweeping that there were those who, able to qualify as far as farming experience, character, finances, etc., were denied admission, owing to the legal obstructions that it was not deemed advisable to remove.

Then it goes on to state the difficulties, and finally ends up by saying:

It could not be overtaken. In fact, everywhere there was an almost general impression that admission to Canada was so difficult as to be almost impossible.

Now, immigration is not a thing that you can turn on like a water tap from which you get so many buckets of water, and then turn off. The machinery of immigration went dead, frozen, silent, under the administration of my right hon. friend. He deliberately put upon the shores of this country a sign that none need apply; that was the effect, at least, The offices on the continent were closed—and that is what happened as regards immigration.

I want again to call attention to what my right hon. friend said as regards the sales tax. The statement he made will be clearly and distinctly corrected in Hansard and clearly and distinctly corrected in the press, so that the poorer classes in the city of Montreal who had not the privilege of attending that meeting will know that the cost of their food was not raised by six per cent, as they were led to believe, but that the tax in 1923 was actually less instead of greater than that of 1922. As a matter of fact, under the new law—and I am free to admit that I do not like the new law very well, but that is neither here nor there—the tax was lessened when compared with that imposed in 1922. Hon. gentlemen are aware of how the sales tax was imposed. It came into effect in 1920, and in that year it was imposed on two steps of trade only, that is, manufacturer to wholesaler, and wholesaler to retailer. In 1921 it was imposed on the three steps of trade, that is, producer to manufacturer, manufacturer to wholesaler, and wholesaler to retailer. That tax as originally imposed was one per cent on the ordinary channels of trade. The Conservative government raised that tax 50 per cent on the ordinary channels of trade, and this government when it came into office in 1922 raised it another 50 per cent. In other words, on each of the three steps of the ordinary channels of trade the tax was 2½ per cent. Under the 1923 law the tax was not raised but was placed on one step and one step only, that is to say, 6 per cent on all three steps combined. But the ordinary man in the street will want to know exactly what this means. He does not understand these figures. He thinks when he hears on the public hustings that the tax has been raised from one-and-a-half to six per cent that everything he buys at the corner grocery store and everywhere else, every suit of clothes and every pair of boots and shoes that he buys, has six per cent added to that particular purchase. That is the impression that has gone abroad, and that impression is totally and absolutely incorrect. We will take for example, $1,000 worth of raw material and see what it costs manufactured into the finished article under each of these laws, and what the tax is to be paid under each law. Under the law of 1920 the total tax was $51.92, and the cost of goods to the consumer was $3,544.05. In 1921 the tax was $88.99, and the cost of the finished article to the consumer $3,648.06. In 1922 the tax was $119.60, and the cost to the consumer $3,714.16. In 1923 the tax is $111.01, and the cost to the consumer $3,676.46. Now let us get clearly and distinctly in our minds what the cost of goods under the law of 1923 was over the cost under the law of 1921. It was $28.40, or slightly over three-quarters of one per cent—not six per cent—and when the law of 1923 was put into effect there was a reduction of $37.77, or over one per cent. That, of course, as hon. members will understand, is simply in the ordinary channels of trade There were under the old act various matters which meant that the tax could be very much increased.

I must apologize for taking up so much of the time of the House, but I fear that I have a great deal more to say. I was starting out to ask a few moments ago, before I had the delightful digression with my right hon. friend across the way which we both enjoyed so much, whether we could reduce taxation in this country or not. I do not think there is any use anybody saying we must reduce taxes, or that we must reduce taxation by a certain percentage or in a certain way, until we first examine what our requirements and what our revenues are, for that, after all, is the true test of the situation.

What are our requirements? Our requirements are, of course, firstly to pay the interest on our war debt, to pay for our war services, and, if possible, to create a sinking fund for the purpose of paying off our war liabilities; secondly, to pay our ordinary requirements, that is, our non-war debt, our subsidies to the provinces, and the various, everyday, out-of-pocket requirements; and thirdly, to pay our railway debt to keep our railways alive. Before taking up what revenues we have to meet these requirements, there is one matter which I would most respectfully place before the Minister of Finance, and it is this: Why do we not in this country divide our war taxes into one separate group with our war expenditure, and put our ordinary taxes into another group with our ordinary expenditure?

As it is at the present time, the taxes imposed for war and the taxes imposed for ordinary purposes are all put in precisely the same account, and although war taxes are reasonably borne, nevertheless it seems to me unfair, it seems to create an ambiguity, it seems to create more or less deception to ask people to pay war taxes that are not to be used for war purposes at all. As a matter of fact should not our war taxes be used for war purposes, and if there is a surplus of war taxes should not that surplus be used in the reduction of our debt and for a sinking fund? And if we have too much of a surplus as regards our war taxes, why should not our war taxes as such be reduced?

Then we come to ordinary taxation, which fills the next category. Should we not try and bring our ordinary expenditure within the four corners of our ordinary taxes? That is to say, segregate our ordinary taxes for ordinary, everyday purposes?

Then we come to the third category, the railways. We no doubt have to keep our railways alive but it seems to me if we want money for our railways we should call our railway expenditure a railway tax or a tax of that description. In other words if that system were followed out there would be no ambiguity, no deception. Everybody would know exactly what they were paying for and exactly what they were getting. Now I come to the question whether we could reduce the taxes. Let us take the figures for the year 1923, and they are of very considerable interest. Take, first of all, the war expenditure. The war revenue on Consolidated Fund was $199,732,496, and on special account something over $8,000,000 odd, or a total war revenue of $207,000,000.

Mr. McMASTER: What does the hon. member characterize as war revenue?

Mr. MARLER: I will give the details of that with pleasure. They are as follows:

Customs and sales tax, etc..	$106,482,000
Income..	59,711,000
Business profits..	13,031,000
Miscellaneous, Finance Dept..	2,409,000
Interest on advances to foreign governments..	10,000,000
Post Office..	7,000,000

Then there are various subsidiary amounts from the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment and the Soldiers' Settlement Board amounting to $1,000,000, which gives us a total of $199,732,496, plus an amount from special account of $8,199,000, which is a particular amount for exchange received from the British government last year. That makes a total of $207,931,829.

Mr. McMASTER: What part of customs does the hon. member allocate as being war revenue? I am merely asking for information. I think we are all immensely interested in this analysis of our financial situation and the hon. member has stated that certain moneys coming through the custom house are to be regarded as war revenue. Just what revenue coming through the custom house is to be regarded as war revenue and why?

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend will understand, it is taxation collected through the customs department. It also includes a certain amount derived from the sales tax.

Mr. McMASTER: And imposed in consequence of the war?

Mr. MARLER: Imposed, in consequence of the war.

Mr. BUREAU: It includes excise taxes?

Mr. MARLER: Excise taxes, sales tax, taxes of that description. Perhaps I should have said that was the mode of collection. It has nothing to do with customs duty at all; it is kept separate entirely.

Then we had our expenditure for war purposes. There was interest on the war debt of $108,000,000. That amount is a rather complicated one to make up, but I have had it verified by the Bureau of Statistics. There is also war services and incidental services, $52,699,000, and there were demobilization charges that year of $4,000,000, making a total expenditure of $165,000,000, leaving a surplus from war taxes of $42,767,945. Hon. members will understand that the point I am trying to make—these figures naturally intervene in any discourse in a matter of this description—is whether it is possible at the present time to reduce the taxation, and my claim is that as regards war taxes, in view of these surpluses, it would be possible to reduce in so far as the war taxes themselves are concerned.

Then coming down to our ordinary revenue, our total revenue for ordinary and special account amounted to $195,000,000, and our expenditure on ordinary and special account amounts to $175,000,000. As against that, should be deducted some $5,000,000 on government railway account, leaving a surplus of $25,000,000. Consequently from these two sources, war account and ordinary account, our finances show a surplus on all accounts of $68,000,000. Now, one would imagine on hearing of a surplus of that description that it would be possible to reduce the taxation. That would be possible if the railway situation had not to be taken into account. When we consider the railway situation not only is this surplus eaten up, but $22,000,000 in addition. During the year 1923 the cost of our railways—all the government railways—amounted to $84,960,037, and the cost of our merchant marine amounted to $5,979,000, or a total expenditure on railways and ships of $90,939,000. Consequently our war surplus to the extent of $43,000,000 was used for the purpose of keeping alive our railways and our ships; also the additional surplus we had from ordinary account, plus $22,000,000 as well. With these figures before us one can ask himself if it is possible to reduce taxation. Of course taxation could be reduced if we were to write up all our expenditure to capital account, but that would mean making deficit after deficit and the day of reckoning would very soon arrive. As a matter of fact the position of affairs is that our surplus from war expenditure and our surplus from ordinary expenditure are being used to keep our railway situation alive at the present time.

Mr. MARTELL: Why not get clear of the railways?

Mr. MARLER: This year it is stated that the railways will show an operating surplus of some $20,000,000, which is very much better than the operating surplus of some $4,000,000 last year, and the inference might be drawn that our railways are at last commencing to pay. But that is not the case at all. It is not a question merely of operating surplus. There are many other charges, as regards the railways, which must be taken into account—such as construction betterments, repayment, of old loans, extensions, and various other expenditures of that description, to say nothing of interest to the public, and leaving out of consideration entirely interest to the government. The true test, Mr. Speaker, as regards the railways, and as regards taxation relative to the railways, is, not what the operating deficit or what the operating profit may be, but it is what the public treasury must put up every year to keep these railways alive. That is the situation which should I think be understood by every member of the House. We read in the newspapers from time to time that the operating profit of the government railways is so much more this year than last year, but there are many other expenditures which must be taken into account. Take for example: In 1920 the loss on railway operation was $32,503,000 but we paid out of the public treasury on railway account $123,000,000. In 1921 the loss on railway operation was $11,847,000, while we paid out of the public treasury $105,000,000. In 1922 there was an operating profit of $4,193,000, and yet we paid out of the public treasury $84,000,000. Even if the operating surplus in 1923 amounts to $20,000,000 I think hon. gentlemen will find that there will have to be in the public accounts this year probably fifty or sixty million dollars still to keep these railways alive.

Now, there are various opinions in this House as regards the question of government owned railways. Some of us say that the railways should not have been taken over; others think that they should have been taken over. Some think that these railways are a great national asset; others think they are a great national liability. I admit quite freely that it will serve no good purpose to discuss these questions at the present time; we are perhaps past that stage. Personally I have always said, and I must state again on the floor of the House, that I do not see any particular advantage in public ownership of railways. Public ownership to me shows many disadvantages. Public ownership does not mean that railway rates are lessened in the very slightest degree.

The owners of a railway do not lessen railway rates. The owners perhaps are contributory factors in having railway rates high or low on account of efficiency or inefficiency. More efficient management may tend to lower the rates because there is a greater profit, but the main fact we have got to consider is that a railway must get a sufficient amount of traffic to keep it alive, and even a reduction or writing down of its capital cost is not going to help in the very least. Of course the protagonists of public ownership will say to me "We should keep these railways under public ownership." I fear that I must answer for myself in substantially the same way that I did when my right hon. friend first put to me a question two years ago—I personally prefer to see these railways in the hands of private individuals and administered by a private body.

Mr. WARD: Why have we got public ownership at this time?

Mr. MARLER: To answer my hon. friend's question would tax too much the patience of the House—it is a very long story.

Mr. BUREAU: Because the government took them over.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I would like to ask my hon. friend, when he denounces the public ownership of railways does he not know that private ownership of railways in the United States has reached an absolute state of bankruptcy?

Mr. BUREAU: We are dealing with Canada.

Mr. HOEY: The freight rates are higher than ours.

Mr. MARLER: I regret that I cannot answer the question of my hon. friend in an efficient manner. However, the question whether public ownership or private ownership is good, bad or indifferent is hardly a question to discuss at this time; but I would like to say to those who believe in public ownership that vast sums of money have been spent on these railways. Since 1920 we have paid out of the public treasury $392,000,000 for the purpose of these railroads. That is entirely outside of interest on many millions that had previously been put into these railways, and a great many more millions which does not appear in this amount at all. Therefore, I say to those hon. gentlemen who ask for lines to be extended and for various other matters to be effected, that they should have a little consideration for those who do not believe in public ownership quite as much as they do. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I think that the financing of the railways is far too easy a matter. The public treasury is far too open, and easy money always encourages extravagance in any matter of that description. We have heard the cry time and time again in this House and out of the House that the railways should be kept out of politics. At the same time we hear the cry shouted lustily "But we will hold you responsible for our funds;" That is what the people say. Those two cries are entirely and totally incompatible. The railways cannot be kept out of politics. They should not be kept out of politics, so long as they are owned by the government, and every dollar spent on railways should come before the House and be voted upon in a most careful and meticulous way. As a matter of fact, we cannot hide behind the cry that we should keep the railways out of politics, and unless we take every possible thing into consideration in voting the amount of money in question, it seems to me we are very failing in our trust. The practical solution of the matter of these lines, whether they are in the hands of the public or in the hands of private individuals, is to have more traffic east and west on the railways, and for that we need more production. We need people and more consumption in our country, and to obtain that consumption and production implies not only more immigration but it implies also less emigration. Therefore how can we arrive at a solution to have less emigration from the country. My answer to that is that we are not sufficiently self-reliant and self-dependent in this country. We depend upon others to do for us what we should do for ourselves. We import far too much manufactured goods and far too much foodstuffs. We should grow or manufacture these things ourselves. We should buy the foodstuffs from our own farmers. We should manufacture in this country what we can manufacture, and what we cannot manufacture we should learn to manufacture. In other words, we should be a self-dependent Canadian nation. I do not think we are a self-dependent nation. At the very least, and without the slightest exaggeration, during the calendar year 1923 we imported into this country no less than fifty million dollars worth of foodstuffs which could have been grown in this country and the money kept in this country and given to the farmers, just as well as to anybody else. In the same period of time, without the slightest semblance of exaggeration, we imported into the country one hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of manufactured goods which we could have manufactured here, which would have made work for our population in this country, and kept our money here. We look for our trade to the United States. We say to the United States "We will buy a large amount from you," and we did import from the United States last year in the neighbourhood of fifty million dollars' worth of foodstuffs, and the United States said to us in the year 1921, under the Fordney Tariff, "We do not want to have anything to do with you, get out." And under the Fordney and McCumber Tariff of 1922 they slammed and locked the door in our faces. That is the position the United States has taken as regards trading with us. But notwithstanding that our exports to the United States have fallen from 52 per cent in 1868 to 39 per cent in 1923, and our imports have risen from 33 per cent in 1868 to 67 per cent in 1923. As a matter of fact last year we bought from the States $200,000,000 more than the United States bought from us, and our exports to the United States, would show much less, if it were not the fact that we export a great deal of unmanufactured wood and a great deal of pulp and paper. In other words, I claim that we are buying from the United States a great many things we could grow on our own farms and make in our own factories. That would give employment to our people and keep in circulation the money of this country in Canada.

Then again take another situation. In 1897 we made with Great Britain what we called a reciprocal tariff. In 1898 we converted that into a preferential tariff. We increased that preferential tariff in 1900, and again in 1922 and again in 1923, and why did we do all this? We did this no doubt mainly in the hope that we would increase our exports to Great Britain, and although we have never said so, perhaps in the hope that some day Great Britain would give us a like preference as regards our staple products over the same products imported by it from other parts, outside of the Empire. We never said that or hinted it, but we hoped it would come. If we did all this for the purpose of increasing our exports, it has been a most dismal failure, because our exports to Great Britain have diminished from 56 per cent to just about 40 per cent and our imports have also diminished from 27 per cent in 1897 to 17 per cent in 1923, but during the period from 1897 to 1923 we became a much greater manufacturing country. During the war, in part to help the Mother Country, we built factories here, and, therefore that meant that those factories had to be kept busy and workmen had to be employed in those self-same factories. But notwithstanding that, and notwithstanding the fact that labour in Great Britain is paid a great deal less, we say to Great Britain, "Come along and take part of our market." It does not seem to me that that is a rational attitude to take at the present time.

In addition to that, there is the serious question of depreciated currency which must be taken into consideration. There is the question of depreciated currency from countries on the continent. Many goods come in under the British preferential tariff that are not entirely British made goods. As a matter of fact, British made goods under the British preferential tariff only have to be fabricated in England to the extent of 25 per cent, and the other 75 per cent is just as likely to be fabricated on the continent by cheap labour, and yet they are imported into Canada under the British preferential tariff, and those goods come in here and take the place of goods which we ourselves could make in this country. And then we invite other countries on the continent who have depreciated currencies to come in and take a part of our markets, too. I do not consider such a situation rational at all. I know quite well that there may be some gentlemen in this House who will wholly or at least in part disagree with me on this momentous subject. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) and many other hon. gentlemen across the floor who may be inclined to think so, need not for a moment assume that I am what is called a high and rabid protectionist; I am not; I do not speak for any manufacturer or any group of manufacturers; I have no personal interest to urge in that respect at all. I do ask, not for a tariff to pay high dividends; not for a tariff to help those who are not capable; not for a tariff to pay any dividends on watered stock. What I do ask for is "a cost-of-living tariff" which will enable our industries to exist and provide labour for our workmen in order that we may build up our cities and increase interior production, and make our railways pay their way. I do not think that such an attitude is at all unreasonable. For that reason I ask that the tariff be inquired into by those competent to make that inquiry, and that upon the advice so obtained the tariff be adjusted in a fair and reasonable manner. Until that is done I ask that no changes in the tariff, the effect of which are not understood or which may be inadvisable, be made.

I would remind the House that there is an urgent need for inquiry in reference to some of our industries the conditions of which merit investigation. It is said by some that a wrong has been done them. If a wrong has been done, is it unreasonable to ask that it be inquired into and, if wrong exists, that that wrong be removed? I appreciate the fact that in reference to the tariff there are many hon. gentlemen who will say that they care nothing about "a cost-of-living tariff," about "a development tariff," or about the Canadian manufacturer. With all deference to these gentlemen I say: Deny the principle of a cost-of-living tariff and you will close our industries and create greater depression; more than that, you will prevent many industries which barely exist to-day, from paying the taxes which are necessary for the administration of the affairs of the country and which are required to keep the railways alive and, perhaps in better times, to extend those railways. That is what will happen if the tariff is reduced in any inadvisable manner the effect of which is not sufficiently understood.

I have always been perfectly frank so far as my attitude to the tariff is concerned; I have never been ambiguous in my views on the floor of the House. I am not one who is not ready to concede changes in matters of policy provided I am shown a good and sufficient reason for those changes. I take the same stand now in relation to the tariff as I took on the floor of this House two years ago, and in the country as well, when I was elected on the principles I then advocated. I do not regard the tariff as a dogma which cannot be altered. It requires changes from time to time necessitating readjustments, and in my opinion it should be framed in the interests of revenue and in the interests of the honest, the decent and the efficient manufacturer. I do not for a single moment advocate a tariff in the interests of the man who makes vast sums in the way of dividends, not at all; what I ask for is a tariff that will provide a living wage for our workmen and will keep our people in the country. I have also stated that the tariff should be framed in the light of expert advice. I stated two years ago, as I state now, that I believed in the Laurier-Fielding tariff. That tariff brought prosperity to this country, and in the years from 1896 to 1911 very little was heard about tariff matters at all. Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself as well as other Liberal leaders gave utterance to sentiments very largely in accordance with those I am expressing to-day on this important subject. If hon. gentlemen will bear with me, I will read the following words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which have been quoted before in this House. This matter is one of importance equally alike to hon. gentlemen opposite and to myself. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> It is a humiliating confession to make that after three centuries of existence this country is still unable to supply its own wants and that it is still obliged to have recourse to foreign markets, though nature has lavished upon it all the gifts necessary to render it a manufacturing country. . . It is the duty especially for us Canadians of French origin to create. . . Thus far it seems to me that the government has been moving in the wrong direction. The government has devoted itself to recruiting an exclusively agricultural immigration; its efforts will end in nothing—the agricultural population of this country will never be increased from outside. . . We can, however,— > —introduce here with good results, I think, an industrial immigration. I do not mean simple workmen, but master mechanics and small capitalists, such as are to be found in all the cities of Europe.

And this is the point I wish to stress.

Later on another gentleman expressed the following views, which I think will be recognized:

> We do not propose to do anything that will interfere with legitimate business. We do not propose to do anything that will interfere with legitimate profits, nor, much less, do we propose to do anything that would injure our industries in any fair competition with the industries of other countries. We realize that Canada, if she is to be great, must be a country based on diversified industries. This is the day of world competition, not between town and town, or factory and factory, but between continent and continent, and realizing that, we do not propose to take steps that are in any way going to check the nation's just industries in carrying on their business in a just and reasonable way.

I do not think that my attitude to the tariff is at all different from that. No doubt someone will say that this is not a country which should rest upon a basis of diversified industries. Some gentlemen possibly might say: "Let us buy our boots and shoes in Boston instead of from the province of Quebec; let us buy our cottons and woollens from England instead of in Ontario; let us import our window glass from Belgium and our oilcloths from Germany", and so on. There are those who will say, "It does not matter whether these things are made by Canadian workmen or made by foreigners, and if they are cheaper elsewhere, we should buy them in the cheaper market. It matters not that we have attempted to build up a market in Canada during so many years. There are people who will be indifferent as to whether we preserve that market for our own producers or for someone else.

Now, I do not deny for one moment that, owing to the peculiar circumstances of the times, we can to-day bring in from these countries commodities at a lower price than they can be manufactured here. But my point is this: Are we going to build up Canada for the immediate present, or are we going to look some little way into the future? Are we to keep only the present in our vision, or are we to look further ahead to the needs of our population, not only the population here now but the population which we hope will come in the future? If we view the present only, all we have to do is continue as we are doing, converting this country into a warehouse and a dumping ground. If, on the other hand, we have vision and patience and look towards the future building-up of this country, allowing our factories to work at full time instead of half time, then the cost of commodities will be decreased, because factories on full time must necessarily produce at a far less expense than when operating at half time, as is the case to-day. In addition to that, although foreign goods are now being brought in at a lower price than similar goods can be produced by our own manufacturers, when conditions become stabilized in Europe and exchange becomes again normal, those very goods will cost substantially as much as we ourselves, in course of time, will be able to manufacture them. But we will never be in this position industrially if inadvisable and illthought-out changes are made in the tariff. I do not suggest that such changes would be made in a vicious spirit, I accuse no one of any such desire; but if changes are made without their probable effects being very fully considered our towns and cities will be bound to disappear. But we must also take into consideration—and I think the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) made a point of this the other day—that if we reduce these centres to stagnation, to a very large extent we reduce our home market. This should be our first market to look to, and our export market should be the next.

Mr. HOEY: Has the home market helped the American agriculturist to any appreciable extent? Is he any better off to-day than the Canadian agriculturist?

Mr. MARLER: With all due deference to my hon. friend, I submit that the home market has without a doubt helped our agriculturists, and without the home market they could not have got rid of the same amount of their products.

Mr. HOEY: What part of his product could the Canadian farmer not have got rid of?

Mr. MARLER: I will explain in a moment to my hon. friend just what the Canadian agriculturist has got rid of in his home market.

Mr. HOEY: That does not necessarily mean that he could not have got rid of it. The consumption of wheat in Europe to-day is only one-third of the normal consumption.

Mr. MARLER: I do not think my hon. friend could have got rid of more wheat than was got rid of by means of the export trade. Our wheat was exported to the fullest extent possible.

Mr. HOEY: To all the extent that was necessary.

Mr. MARLER: But all of the wheat grown was not exported.

Mr. HOEY: There was no need to export it.

Mr. MARLER: Perhaps I may be quite ignorant, but this is the way it appeals to me. In the crop year 1921-22 we produced around 300,000,000 bushels of wheat. Of this, 194,000,000 bushels was exported as wheat and flour, and 106,000,000 bushels was consumed in Canada. The latter was worth at least $85,000,000. In addition, there were the by-products which we retained. I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for taking up so much of the time of the House.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. MARLER: We cannot export wheat and flour alone.

Mr. HOEY: Not without purchasing other commodities; I agree with you there.

Mr. MARLER: Not without exporting other commodities.

Mr. HOEY: Not without importing other commodities; trade cannot be one-sided.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend will pardon me for contradicting him. I do not think we can establish trade channels in wheat and flour alone; we must export other commodities also.

Mr. HOEY: Explain.

Mr. MARLER: Would my hon. friend expect any country to take nothing but wheat and flour from us? Would he expect a ship to be loaded with wheat and flour only? No ship will go out with such a cargo.

Mr. HOEY: Why not?

Mr. MARLER: To create a general trade we have to carry various products to other countries.

Mr. LEWIS: What will it bring back in return?

Mr. MARLER: That is precisely the point I make with my hon. friend from Swift Current. It creates trade; but our customers overseas will not say to us that they want only our wheat and flour. It is necessary and essential for trade routes to be made up by exporting other commodities besides wheat and flour in order to create in the foreign port the needed market for our wheat and flour, because the more trade we have with any country the more demand there is for our particular product. Therefore I say we should export manufactured goods also with our wheat and flour.

Mr. COOTE: What are we going to get back for the wheat and flour and other merchandise that we export?

Mr. MARLER: Does my hon. friend suggest that I am favouring a prohibitive tariff? I never mentioned a prohibitive tariff.

Mr. HOEY: It has got to be, in order to build up industries. You say you want to build up home industries; you cannot build them up if you allow manufactured goods to come in.

Mr. MARLER: Certainly, we cannot manufacture at the present time all the goods we import.

Mr. HOEY: I see.

Mr. MARLER: But there are certain goods we should manufacture. I do not for a moment suggest that you should build a tariff fence so high that foreign goods cannot get over it—not at all. I have stated in clear and unmistakable language that all we ask is a cost-of-living tariff for the efficient manufacturer—for what we can manufacture here. In addition to that certain goods from England and other parts of the world will always enter under any tariff you may have, especially if it be only a reasonable cost-of-living tariff.

Mr COOTE: Would the hon. member kindly specify some lines of goods that he would allow us to import?

Mr. MARLER: The hon. gentleman is surely factious in putting to me such a question. He does not expect me to turn myself into a catalogue, does he?

Mr. COOTE: No, I do not really expect it.

Mr. MARLER: I am speaking in general terms, that is all. The general argument may be good or it may be bad, but it appeals to me, and I am putting it to my hon. friends opposite as it appeals to me, simply as a reasonable argument—that no hasty, ill-advised changes be made in the tariff, but that any changes which may be proposed be carefully thought out, not confining ourselves to their probable effect on the immediate present, but looking into the future to see where such changes will land us. There is nothing unreasonable about that. I am not arguing for the East alone. It is ridiculous for the East to say to the West. "We are not interested in your welfare," just as ridiculous as it would be for the West to say to the East, "We will not have anything to do with your industries." We have to try to devise a fair and reasonable policy both for the East and for the West.

Mr. MARTELL: What is the East, may I ask my hon. friend? There are plenty of low-tariff men in the East as well as in the West.

Mr. MARLER: I am not drawing any particular line of demarcation. If my hon. friend so desires, I am willing to consider the Maritime provinces in with the West.

Mr. MARTELL: That affects your argument.

Mr. MARLER: Let us put the Maritimes in with the West for the present. But it is not a question on my part of talking about prohibition; it is a question of reason, of allowing our towns and cities to live, and unless we do this I claim that our agriculturists will be injured on account of their home market being seriously diminished. Surely, my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Hoey) will admit that if we had two million more people in the city of Montreal, they would consume at least two million more barrels of flour, which means in the neighborhood of ten million bushels of wheat.

Mr. CALDWELL: What will become of the cities if the agricultural community is not allowed to live?

Mr. MARLER: I expected, Mr. Speaker, a barrage to come from that direction at this stage. I am not trying to put the agriculturist out of existence. I have endeavoured to suggest that there is much that can be done for the agriculturist; there are many taxes that can be taken off for his benefit, and I think that would be readily agreed to by every member of this House. But I submit that the tariff should not be such as to put the cities out of existence. I think we ought to have a reasonable cost of living tariff. Of course, if my hon. friends say, "No tariff," I have no desire and cannot submit an argument on that question. But what I claim is that the cities consume agricultural products and that unless the cities expand and grow, the home market will be lessened and the effects of that condition will be severely felt by the agricultural classes.

I was going to give the particulars with respect to a number of commodities, but I shall not take up the time of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MARLER: Very well. I spoke about wheat a few moments ago; let me refer to one or two other commodities. In 1921 we produced over $74,000,000 worth of butter and cheese; our export of these products was $28,000,000 and our home consumption $55,000,000. In wool we produced in 1921 $2,975,000; we exported $242,000 and consumed at home $2,732,000. In 1923 we produced in eggs $48,770,000 worth; we exported this product to the value of $1,030,000 and the consumption at home was $47,740,000. In 1921 the value of our maple products was $4,318,000; our export was only $173,000 and we consumed at home $4,145,000. In these few commodities alone, to say nothing of hosts of others, the value of the home consumption was $195,000,000, or $23 per head of the population. The exodus to the United States, of which I spoke a little while ago, has meant a loss to agriculturists in this country in these products alone of over $7,500,000. Mr. Speaker,—and I say this with the greatest respect to any member of this House who disagrees with me—if the urban population increases our home market will increase with it and there will be a distinct advantage to the agriculturist, whereas if our population decreases there will be a very distinct disadvantage. The only way we can keep people in this country is to provide work for the rural dwellers as well as for the urban dwellers; to give all the population, no matter where we get it from, something to do.

I spoke a moment ago about the British preference, and perhaps some hon. members may have seen in what I said an indication that I thought the British preferential tariff might well not be kept in effect as it is at present. I do not disguise my feelings on that subject; at the same time I would be the last man in this House to hold the belief that we should not help Great Britain to the fullest extent of our ability. But I do not think we are helping Great Britain in this way. We are not helping Great Britain by making ourselves a weak nation; our great value to the Empire can only consist in our making ourselves a strong nation, in our taking upon ourselves our fair burdens for the Empire as they may come along. The only way to put ourselves in a position to do that is to build up our population. What we could do for Great Britain to-day would be to absorb many of her surplus population and give them work in our cities and towns, in our factories and so on. But we are not prepared to give them that to-day.

I think I have finished with most of the questions which might cause recrimination or questioning in this House. There are only two other matters that I should like to touch upon, and I shall not refer to them at great length. First is the question of stability in taxation. Undoubtedly we must have taxes. A tax is an impost for the benefit of government, and as such it must necessarily be for the benefit of the people on whom it is levied. In other words, if an impost is such as is difficult or impossible to collect, the very object of the tax will in time be defeated. We, in this country in the past—and I am not speaking of any particular government; I am referring to our general attitude with regard to taxation—have said that those who were successful should be taxed a little more, those who were more successful, still more, and that the most successful should be taxed the greatest amount. I am a believer in imposing taxes where they can best be borne. There are certain industries in Canada at the present time, notably the agricultural industry, which cannot bear taxes as well as other industries can. There should be some alleviation, therefore, in that respect, and perhaps some other industry should have a tax imposed upon it in accordance with its means. Likewise the individual should be taxed according to his ability to pay. We have not taken the attitude, I think, that as partners in the state the people should be consulted before taxation is imposed, in order that the effect of the taxation may be understood and that the tax may be easily collected. As it stands now, taxation is getting more and more complicated; as a matter of fact we are rapidly turning ourselves into a nation of taxpayers and fillers in of forms. Why should we not consolidate our taxation so as to have it fall where it should rather than where it should not? Why should a government board of experts not be appointed to look into the whole question of taxation, to co-ordinate it, to have it thoroughly understood? Where it is seen that a certain business, a certain profession or certain individuals should get the benefit of an alleviation in the way of taxation, in order, perhaps, that they might be able to sell to others the products of their business, why should the tax not be taken off? In addition to that, under our present system the taxation laws emanate from one department of government and the collection of the tax is made by another. All these things, particularly at this perplexing period in our history, should be consolidated, simplified, made readily understandable, so arranged that business will be made easy and that every one can go ahead with the activities in which he is engaged without being under the necessity of continually thinking about taxes.

There is a great deal to be said in that connection. We have had experience in the matter of changes in the laws of taxation. Last year we made two very important changes, and I believe those changes were ill considered—not because we were not willing to consider them; not because the promoters were not acting in perfect good faith; not because the minister who introduced the bills was not acting in perfect good faith and did not desire to have the tax properly administered, but because we simply had not the time, or the ability, perhaps,—I say that subject to correction—to understand all the complicated matters involved, matters which could only be thoroughly understood after weeks of study.

Last year we made an amendment to the Special War Revenue Act—the sales tax. I say again that I do not for one moment attribute anything to the minister or to the promoters in that respect at all, but I venture to say that there were not six members of this House last year who understood that law, and I was not one of the six. The law as at present in force as regards the sales tax is a most complicated piece of legal machinery, difficult to administer, difficult to collect the tax, unfair in certain directions and open to grave misuses in others. As regards the unlicensed wholesaler it puts him in a most unfair position. As regards the unlicensed manufacturer, that is, the manufacturer not manufacturing up to $10,000, it is open to very, very grave abuse. I would ask the government to take into consideration this matter of the sales tax again this year and to make such necessary amendments to it or so to revise our system of taxation that the people of this country having to bear the taxes may bear them as lightly as it is possible for them to do.

Another amendment we made last year was to our income tax law. That law as it stood, even without the amendment, was a law which had been made in times of stress. It was a perfectly proper law, a law that everybody should carry out to the letter, but I doubt very much whether it is carried out entirely to the letter in all respects. I doubt very much if everything that could be collected under that law is collected, but at the same time there are elements in the income tax law which put a great many qualities which we should have in this country, such as charity, ability, and energy, straight into the hands of mortmain. It puts millions and millions of dollars in mortmain every year, either because the tax is too heavy or because it is not properly applied. Much at the present time—I will not say is kept secretly hidden; those are not the words I intend to use at all—but much money is not put into circulation that should be put into circulation to help build up the country and expand it in every way because of our income tax law. Notwithstanding this lack of vision and this lack of heart as exemplified in our income tax law, what did we do last year? We brought down an amendment which created a prior lien on all the assets of the individual. I protested last year against this amendment. I told the government at that time, and I tell the government frankly again now, that if that amendment is persisted in, it will simply mean there will be no money to lend on mortgage in this country. I feel quite confident also that when the banks fully grasp what that amendment means it will be very difficult to make loans of any kind, and very difficult to make conveyances of property. These matters are of vital importance to the West. Mortgage money must be loaned in the West. In the West there are at the present time serious restrictions on people lending money, but here the tax collector comes along, and, with the departmental mind entirely, not the mind of the people from whom the money is to be collected, but the departmental mind, says: I want a law put into effect that will make it as easy as possible for me to take the money away from the people, to stop your industry, to stop your commerce. Consequently that amendment was put on the statute books. I would solemnly warn the government that that amendment should certainly be repealed this year.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken at very great length. I owe you and hon. members of this House my heartfelt thanks for the patience with which you have listened to me here to-day. I did not desire to speak at such length, but the matters which I have brought before the House to-day are of vital interest to the people I represent, and although I in no way presume to speak for them, I believe of vital interest to the whole city of Montreal.

In addition let me say this. Not only those in the constituency I here represent but every member from the province of Quebec, nay, every person in the province of Quebec, wishes to see preserved our British and French traditions to which we have been devoted from generation to generation. Many of us for many generations have known no other home outside of our province of Quebec. I do not speak for others, but I believe that those traditions can only be preserved by Canada, as Canada, going ahead and being kept for Canadians, and being a nation, as I stated at the beginning of my remarks, under the British Crown. That, sir, is the main object and the main theme that I have to lay before the House to-day and I beg hon. gentlemen to consider that; to consider the situation in which we place ourselves if our population declines, if our work people leave us, for in that case I feel confident that these traditions which we hold in the greatest reverence, which we learnt at our mother's knee and which we cherish so dearly, will also disappear and be lost to this country.

Mr. JOHN A. MacKELVIE (Yale): Mr. Speaker, before I address myself to a few points in connection with the Speech from the Throne I would like with the same sincerity and heartiness which has characterized other speakers to compliment those who were responsible for moving and seconding the Address. I am sure they must have found it a rather difficult task this year, more so than in other sessions of the House I think, Mr. Speaker, for it must have been a somewhat agile mind, I might almost say a somewhat penetrating instinct, that could dig into the mass of tortuous verbiage which comprised the Speech of this year, and bring out any fruitful theme for congratulation so far as the government of this country is concerned.

I do not intend to follow the remarks of the previous speaker (Mr. Marler) for the simple reason that the latter part of his address was one with which I find myself most thoroughly in sympathy. Indeed, it is one which anyone in this group in the House might be proud to see on record with his own name above it. So far as the last part of his address was concerned, it so directly and pointedly featured the speech which the right hon. leader of this party recently made in Montreal that one could not fail to be impressed with the fact that that speech had sunk very deeply into the consciousness of the speaker, and in his estimation it required very serious rebuttal indeed. I will leave it to the House and to the intelligence of the country to give a verdict as to whether that rebuttal was as effective as the speaker no doubt intended it to be.

Mr. Speaker, I said that the Speech from the Throne was one in which it was difficult to find matters upon which the government could be very distinctly congratulated. Before I make reference to certain points contained therein I would like to mention a fact that must be of particular interest to this House, and that is that to-day the members received in their post office boxes a copy of the report of the proceedings of the Imperial Conference. I have not yet had the opportunity to read that report and to give it the attention I have no doubt it deserves. I expect to find it very interesting reading, but I need not hope to find within its covers any statement that will show to the people of Canada that the Canadian representatives at that conference gave the support to Mr. Baldwin's proposals that the people of this country expected they would at that time. Mr. Baldwin laid before the country his proposals. When the attention of our people was directed towards his scheme of fiscal reform in the Old Country, his policy of preferential tariffs within the Empire, it was rather humiliating, to say the least, to those who hold the opinions that are held by this group in the House—in fact I think by a good many sections of our population—it was more than humiliating, it was intensely aggravating to know that the policy which we so ardently desired to see pressed forward was supported by the Prime Ministers of South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, and that our own representative not only sat silent at the conference where the policy was propounded but in any expression that he gave to his sentiments—which assuredly were not the sentiments of Canada—intimated that all these matters were of no concern. So evidently was that position made clear by the Canadian representative that Mr. Asquith, during the recent election campaign in Great Britain, was enabled to deliver a speech in which he said that the matter of preferential tariffs was not one in which the dominions were very greatly interested, or one upon which they based any demand. In making this statement Mr. Asquith could only have had in mind the Dominion of Canada—surely the greatest of all the dominions—and he even went so far as to say practically that it was not the desire of Canada that any such policy should be brought into effect.

Now, Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from a province which was vitally interested in that fiscal policy, coming as I do from a constituency which more than any other is intensely interested in it, I feel that some attention should be directed in this House to the course taken by the Prime Minister of Canada in so representing—I think I am justified in saying, in so misrepresenting,—this Dominion on that occasion. The value of such preferential treatment on the part of Great Britain to our constituency of Yale would be such that I could hardly describe it in words. The prime interest of the constituency, as a great many members here are aware, has to do with the fruit growing industry, and a preference such as was contemplated of five shillings per hundred pounds on imported fruit would have placed our fruit growers in such a position that they would once more have seen a ray of hope ahead, whereas to-day they are almost as much disappointed as the wheat growers of the prairies are if we are to believe the stories told by our Progressive friends.

In regard to this question of tariff preference Mr. Baldwin had the courage of his convictions. He went to the country but unfortunately did not return to parliament with a majority. Nevertheless Mr. Baldwin sowed seed which will yet bear fruit, he delivered a message which future generations will read and which perhaps will come into effect even in our own time. By those of us who believe in the great and beneficent influence which the British Empire is destined to exercise in the world the happiest results were anticipated from Mr. Baldwin's plan. His vision was such that when he surveyed the whole field he realized what would follow from close inter-relationship between the different parts of the Empire; he saw the Empire drawn together by bonds of mutual interest and strengthened by a preferential tariff which would give it a place in the world such as perhaps none of us have ever dreamed to be possible. But the policy of negation, the policy of discouragement, advanced by our representative at that conference, will perhaps set the wheels of progress back for several years.

I do not know just exactly how His Excellency was made to give the expression in the Speech from the Throne that Canada is now such an extremely prosperous country. I have found that this statement received little support in any of the speeches so far delivered here. Our Progressive friends, through the mouthpiece of their leader, have assured us that the agricultural part of the community is anything but prosperous. That hon. gentleman went further and related that only one-third of the number of agricultural implements were sold now that were sold fifteen years ago, which is a pretty clear indication, that the manufacturing industry is not revelling in prosperity. The speaker who immediately preceded me also laid facts before the House which force one to reach the same conclusion. Speaking for my own consituency I have no doubt in the world that conditions there will have to be vastly improved from what they are to-day before we can claim anything approaching a measure of prosperity and happiness. For the existing evil there is a remedy, a remedy which I hope to advance during the course of my remarks but I see no indication of that remedy being applied by the present administration. Indeed I am firmly convinced that instead of bringing about a better condition of affairs the policy forecasted in the Speech from the Throne will be very certain to make existing conditions much worse. The remedy which I would desire to apply to the financial depression in Canada rests entirely in a properly devised and vigorously constructed tariff of protection. It is no news to the members of this House that I am a thorough going protectionist. It is one of the political principles to which I am most firmly anchored; and I like to congratulate myself that I belong to a party which through storm and stress, whether in power or out of power, has never deviated from the policy devised by our great leader, Sir John Macdonald, when he lifted this country out of the slough of depression and set it upon the high road to prosperity and when he unfurled the standard of a protective tariff. That standard has always waved and has never been lowered. Our present leader holds it aloft and has done so in his campaign from coast to coast. In all circumstances and in all places he has firmly adhered to the principles of his party, and has never deviated from them. In that fact we rejoice as a party. To that policy we point the people of this country as likely to yield them relief from the present depressing conditions.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Before the House adjourned at 6 o'clock I had been making some observations regarding the Speech from the Throne, and had said, among other things, that so far from being able to endorse the statements put into the mouth of His Excellency regarding the prosperous condition of Canada as a whole, I felt, greatly against my desire as a Canadian, to doubt if these things were true, and I felt compelled to take exception to that statement. I gave as an example the depressed condition of my own community and the hard struggle which fruit-growing sections of British Columbia were having to make ends meet, and, this, Sir, despite the fact that no part of Canada possesses land so admirably suited to the production of fruit and vegetables as the section which I have the honour to represent. Nature indeed seems to have intended it as a district in which the cultivation of fruit and vegetables could be most successfully prosecuted, and yet, owing to this very depression of which I am speaking, the fruit-growers of that country this year have found themselves unable to profitably market what was indeed a very large and good crop. I said that among the remedies which might be applied to cure, or at least to ameliorate, this condition was the old remedy of adequate protection which had so successfully brought this country at another period of its existence out of a condition of stagnation and depression into one of prosperity and progress.

Tariff, Mr. Speaker, has been the weapon for generations in this country in the hands of statesmen, which they have utilized not only to build up progress in the industrial, commercial and agricultural communities of the land, but at times it has been in their hands a weapon with which to negotiate for better terms in other countries. It is absurd in my opinion to term the present existing tariff of Canada as anything approaching a real protective tariff. When every country in the world which has a tariff has been building up its barriers against this country for years, when we are shut out practically from the markets of the republic to the south, which has prospered as everybody knows to a wonderful degree under that same system of protection, when, as we look abroad we find no indication of any country in the world seeking to lower its duties, I say that it is nothing short of an absurdity to term the tariff which now obtains in this country one of adequate protection. If I had my way particular attention would be given to the revision of the tariff, to bring it to a condition that would give real protection, not only to the industries of the country, but more particularly to the farming community.

I am firmly convinced that the interests of the farming community would be greatly benefited, that the country would become enriched and that prosperity would follow in its train, if the products of the soil were given a protection at least equal to twice that which now obtains. I would have our butter, eggs and vegetables and all the products of the soil subject to a customs tariff which would in some measure prevent competition from the south. I wonder with what degree of confidence those of my hon. friends in the Progressive group who place, or appear to place, their faith in a policy of reciprocity with the United States, could, under existing conditions, approach that country and attempt to negotiate with them. The United States would simply laugh at them. They would say "We give everything and receive practically nothing in return". Of course I am no believer in reciprocity with the United States. I believe that nothing would tend to bring about in a shorter time, the ruin of Canada, the ruin of our industrial concerns and our agriculturists, and, in part, the ruin of our railways than any arrangement of that kind with our neighbours to the south. But even if we desired to negotiate such an arrangement, it would be ridiculous to approach them with any such bargain as we are able to offer at present.

The fruit-growers of my district, who are believers in protection as I have indicated, see more than one way of getting protection for their industry. One of these is by a tariff, but not like our present tariff. The other is by a dumping clause, which gives them protection from the stuff dumped from the south of the line, where it has been raised and produced much earlier than in our own country. A resolution has been placed in my hands by the Associated Boards of Trade of British Columbia. Those boards of trade are not more particularly interested in the fruit-growing industry than in any other business interests of the province, but knowing, as they do, that some forty million dollars is invested in the fruit industry, and that it is suffering from very serious handicaps at present; they realize that the old dumping clause which was brought in by the previous government was a clause with teeth in it, which gripped and functioned. I wish the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) were here to listen to what I am saying. I pause here to pay a tribute to the manner in which he has administered the existing act. The principle that protection should be given by order in council and that it should be left entirely to the discretion of the Minister of Customs is nothing more than vicious. I would say to the hon. minister who has charge of that department that he has endeavoured, I think, properly, to put the dumping clause into execution, and has instructed his officials to see that it was operated in the best possible manner. As I said before, it depends entirely upon who occupies that position. We may have a Minister of Customs at any time who would do little or nothing to meet the requirements of our fruit-growing population, as he might not be sympathetic towards them and might be a believer in free trade in all matters; and under his regime nothing but disaster would come to the fruit-growing industry. So, therefore, realizing the position of this industry, the Associated Boards of Trade of British Columbia have placed in my hands the following resolution—

Whereas general prosperity must be built upon profitable agriculture, which can only be realized if farmers are enabled to sell their products at reasonable profits; and

Whereas it is detrimental to the best interests of all classes of the community that products of the soil be sold at less than their cost of production to the grower in Canada; and

Whereas products of the soil are frequently offered from foreign countries at prices which are considerably less than cost of production;

Be it therefore resolved:—That the hon. the Minister of Customs, be urged to apply the dumping penalty to all importations of agricultural products sold at less than Canadian cost of production, bearing in mind the following points:—

1. The Department of Customs be asked to publish cost of production figures for all agricultural products produced in Canada, not later than June 1st in each year, such list to be in effect for one year, and that it be provided that when Canadian products are available and importations are invoiced at less than cost of production, a special dumping duty be collected, equal to the difference between the fair market value as established by the above-mentioned list, and the price at which such fruit was imported.

2. Dumping penalty should only be applied to importations made at such times as similar products are available in Canada.

After considering this very vexed problem very carefully, this is the conclusion which the Associated Boards of Trade in my province have reached in the matter. They are not advocates of the fruit-growing industry in particular; they are interested in the general prosperity of the province; and in view of the fact that such an immense amount of capital is invested in this important industry they have come to the conclusion that the present dumping clause needs to be amended in this direction. I am cordially in sympathy with the resolution. I do not say that, perhaps, it might not be improved upon. I believe, from the experience we have had during the last few years, that even the excellent dumping clause which was put into operation by the previous government could be improved in some important respects. I have tried to put the matter before the House as briefly as possible. A large percentage of the fruit growers are to-day suffering from this depression throughout Canada and it is impossible for them in the present state of affairs to find profitable markets.

Now, I am not going to argue the pros and cons of a protective policy; the matter was admirably treated this afternoon by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). In my opinion, many vexatious problems which face the people to-day would be much more easy of solution were an adequate policy of protection such as I have indicated put into force. I believe it would have a wonderful effect on immigration; it would also tend to prevent emigration. If we can build up towns and cities in this country by establishing prosperous industrial concerns, thus providing employment for large numbers of workmen, we shall have no difficulty in retaining those of our population who are now seeking employment in the country to the south of us which has been made prosperous by virtue of a protective policy. Far from there being a steady stream of emigration from this country, we should be able to retain our population and attract back to the country many of our people who have left. But in my opinion this can be done only by having a reasonable policy of protection.

I was not able this afternoon to follow the line of argument advanced by my hon. friend from Montreal. I did understand, however, that he was endeavouring to refute some of the figures submitted to this House in his speech by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). But be the figures as they may, the personal observations of practically every member of this House must have led him to the conclusion that emigration from this country is a very serious matter at the present moment. I know of no section where the people will not tell you that they have lost hundreds, and indeed thousands, of their best citizens within the last few years. To stem this exodus is a matter that calls for the best attention of any government. What remedy is suggested by the present administration? I have heard nothing so far indicated in the speech of any hon. member, nor is there anything in the Speech from the Throne to show that the government has any really effective remedy in view.

Mr. GRAHAM: Branch lines.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I shall come to that presently; that certainly will have a marked effect in certain parts of the country. After all, we might dilate on this question of protection at very great length, but so far as I can recollect no one has summed up the matter in more concise terms than was done on one occasion by one of the greatest statesmen and patriots which this continent has ever produced. Abraham Lincoln said that if a man buys goods abroad he has the goods while the other country has the money, whereas if he buys those goods at home he has the goods and his own country has the money also. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) interjected a moment ago a remark the purport of which was that among the means of preventing emigration and of encouraging people to come to the country would be the branch lines policy of the government. I was glad to note that paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which referred to the continued prosperity of the National Railways. The figures which have been given to the country by the president of those railways during the past few months have been indeed encouraging to the people. While perhaps the president has built upon the splendid foundation laid by his predecessor, apparently he, or someone at least, has been responsible for a very marked improvement in one direction in the service of the National Railways: I refer to the esprit de corps which seems now to obtain among all the officials from the highest to the lowest. It is now a pleasure to meet them; they seem to be imbued with the idea that the service demands their hearty attention and support, and evidently they are out to give that attention and support. That no doubt is responsible in no small measure for the increased business in connection with the National lines.

Coming now to the question raised by the Minister of Railways, I wish to refer to the matter that really urged me in getting to my feet. For several years I have been working as hard as possible in this parliament to bring about the completion of a branch line running through my constituency from Kamloops to Kelowna on the Canadian National line. It has been graded for several years and the country has expended $5,250,000 upon it. The arguments for the completion of this branch line are perhaps as strong, as forcible and as unanswerable as those that can be advanced for any similar branch line in the Dominion. I have submitted them to the House at previous sessions, and I consider it my duty on this occasion again to call the attention of the government and of parliament to the matter. In the first place, we have already, as I say, expended on that branch line over $5,000,000. It is lying idle and so long as it does so we shall lose the interest on that money which, at 6 per cent, would represent over $300,000 a year. Naturally the line is deteriorating every year, and it is only a question of time when the grade will be of no further service and will have to be reconstructed if the line is completed. This branch line will serve a wonderfully productive country and will open up a new district. Passing from Kamloops through Grand Prairie and the Falkland districts, it will open up a country untouched by any transportation system. In Falkland there is, I think, the largest pure deposit of gypsum on the continent, owned by a Winnipeg firm who are only too anxious to exploit it as soon as there are the necessary transportation facilities. A sixteen mile spur from my town of Vernon to Lumby passes through a rich and thickly settled agricultural and horticultural district. It goes through the famous Coldstream ranch, and when it reaches Lumby it enters a district of wonderful fertility, a mixed farming district that produces grain and hay, and from which are exported considerable wood products such as telephone and telegraph poles, railway ties and so forth. This would bring a steady stream of revenue to the main line. From Vernon to Kelowna you have a district containing 60 per cent. of the fruit growing population of the Okanagan, and it is estimated that these men in this 35 miles are losing $200,000 a year at the present time in transportation charges, trucking their fruit to points upon the Canadian Pacific railway which would be touched by this new line. This would give them cheaper transportation facilities, and as I have already pointed out we are paying $300,000 in interest charges while our farmers are losing much money to-day trucking their products, and it would surely be a matter of economy to complete this branch line. Out of that valley this year went over ten thousand cars of fruit and vegetables and other products, and there was of course considerable incoming freight. It is estimated that the local revenue to the railway is upwards of three million dollars a year, and a very large share of that revenue would go to the National lines were this branch completed. I think I am giving a very conservative figure indeed when I say that the first year after its completion the National lines would receive at least a million dollars of traffic.

Now, as I have said, I have been exerting what abilities I possess in trying for some years to bring this matter before parliament and get the line completed. Hon. members can easily understand with what a feeling of despair I went home last year. True, the bill passed this House, but it was framed in such a way that the Senate immediately took exception to it and killed it the last day of the session. I was surprised to hear the right hon. Prime Minister say to the leader of the opposition the other night: "Your friends in the Senate killed that bill." The right hon. gentleman must have been extremely ill informed, or else he was endeavouring to deliberately deceive the House. It was not in particular the friends of the right hon. leader of the opposition in the Senate who killed that bill, for only ten votes could be scratched up in its favour, so it is not very difficult to understand that the feeling against the bill was by no means confined to the Conservative element in the upper house. Indeed, the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), I apprehend, is perfectly cognizant of the opposition in the Senate; it came from every quarter.

Greatly to my disappointment I have recently been informed—I do not know how good my authority is—that it is the intention of the government to again introduce a bill along somewhat similar lines to the ill-fated measure of last session. This, to me, would indicate that they are absolutely courting defeat, and it gives rise to the impression, which I have heard expressed in more than one section of the Dominion, that the government are not sincere in their intentions and for some reason or other, which I cannot fathom, would like to have the bill killed again. I know Sir Henry Thornton recognizes the importance of this branch line in that it would be one of the best feeders to the National system, but I do not know, and I have never been able to find anybody who could inform me, why it is that this year there is a chance of the government again introducing the bill in the same shape as they brought it down last session, which means that the Senate will mete out to it the same treatment.

I would implore the Minister of Railways to deal with these branch lines in separate bills this session, and so let each stand on its own merits. For the reasons which I have advanced to-night, and which I could enlarge upon if necessary, I have no doubt that the Senate can be persuaded that the Kamloops-Kelowna branch line is absolutely justified; and I am equally confident that the Senate will look with favour on similar branch lines on the prairies which have been graded for years and which would serve a country urgently in need of transportation for its grain, which at present has to be hauled long distances to the nearest railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does my hon. friend intimate that the Senate has not any power to amend a bill of this kind?

Mr. MacKELVIE: No, I do not exactly intimate that, Mr. Speaker; but I doubt the wisdom of cumbering such a bill with all sorts of what the Senate seem to conceive to be impossible conditions, when each line might well be the subject of a separate estimate, thus standing upon its own merits. I can conceive no possible objection to this course. The hon. minister has intimated that it would be difficult to keep the money flowing to cover the construction work on these lines after it is once started, but that has never been an insuperable difficulty in connection with any other public undertaking, and I do not see why it could not be overcome in this connection.

Mr. GRAHAM: The labour situation is never the same.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I again say that my friends surrounding me and those in the Progressive party who are interested in these branch lines present a united front in renewing their request to the minister to bring down this branch line legislation in such shape that there will be no danger of its meeting the same fate again in the upper house.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does my hon. friend think that is the real reason the Senate threw out the bill last session?

Mr. MacKELVIE: That is the reason given. I acknowledge that possibly there were some other influences at work which I cannot control; but there was the situation as it appeared before the public. The Senate gave their reasons for throwing out the bill, and in a general way the public regarded those reasons as pretty good.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not my information.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I am not upholding the Senate; indeed the hon. minister will understand that it was a very severe blow to me when the measure was defeated in the upper house. At the same time, if he will read the Senate debates of yesterday he will observe that hon. Senator Turriff intimated in very plain language that the bill as presented to the Senate was very obnoxious. I do not suppose I can say anything further to convince the minister if he is not already convinced, but I do hope that those of us who are interested in these branch lines will not have to go home to our constituents at the end of this session with the same sorry tale as we had to tell them last year. If unhappily we have to, nothing will convince those constituents that the government did not deliberately court defeat of the bill in the Senate, knowing exactly what reception it would receive there.

Something was said this afternoon by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) regarding the taxation problems which confront this country. None of us who have given any study to the situation at all have failed to reach the conclusion that industry to-day is stifled by excess taxation. The problem of how to ameliorate that condition lies in the hands of the government, and so far the only indication they have given of any remedial policy is that they intend to make a reduction in the tariff on the instruments of production—a policy which, as I have tried to point out before, instead of being a remedy would aggravate an already desperate situation.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Marler) also had something to say respecting the sales tax. I do not know whether it is possible to abolish that tax, but I do believe it could be readjusted to lighten its incidence. An extremely inequitable provision is that which exempts firms doing less than ten thousand dollars of business a year. I know a firm in my own constituency employing ten or twelve men, with over a ten thousand dollar turnover, and I also know a rival firm in which the two principals do their own work and come under the exemption clause. The night before I left for Ottawa I visited a moving picture theatre and saw flashed on the screen: Buy your products from So-and-So and save the 6 per cent sales tax. There is a most glaring instance of unequal apportionment of taxation, and surely it is something which the government, if it believes in a policy of fair dealing, will take haste to remedy before this session closes.

To-day a gentleman brought to my attention a matter on which I had not intended to speak, but which I know has been very fully pressed upon the attention of the government for some time back, and that is the condition of depositors of the Home Bank who have suffered such severe losses. Fortunately for me and my community there were no branches of this bank in my constituency. This gentleman comes from the mining town of Fernie, in East Kootenay, and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) will no doubt agree that what he said was absolutely correct. He told of a most deplorable condition in that community, miners, many of them old men who had reached the end of their working days and whose entire savings had been deposited in that bank, were left absolutely penniless. I have no remedy to suggest; it is not my duty to do so at this juncture, but I do think that the proposals of the government to sidestep the issue and to start on its jauntings another commission to make an inquiry in a restricted way into what happened in connection with this bank during a certain period is like passing out a stone to those people who are demanding bread. The right hon. leader of the House intimated yesterday when pressure was brought to bear upon him, that he would extend the scope of this commission, but the result is problematical, to say the least, no matter how far its scope is extended. In any case I think it is only right, as suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition, that the inquiry should go right back to the time of the issuing of the charter and take in those years when Hon. A. K. Maclean was handling the finances of this country as well as the time when Sir Thomas White was Minister of Finance in the Union government. The connection with it of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is also one which he would gladly see probed. But this solution suggested to the broken-hearted and impoverished depositors of the Home Bank throughout Canada will bring them very little relief indeed.

I spoke briefly this afternoon of the effects of the Imperial Conference in London, one of which was to force to the country the then government headed by Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin. I should not have said "force"; he went to the country because he thought it the right thing to do. Mr. Baldwin said that his predecessor in office had made a pledge during the election campaign as a result of which he was elected that during his regime there would be no interference with the fiscal policy of Great Britain. Mr. Baldwin could, if he so desired, force through his preferential tariff policies, he had a sufficient majority to carry them into effect; but he considered himself in honour bound to refer the matter to the electorate.

I can draw something approaching a parallel in this connection: Last session this House was informed by the government through the hon. Minister of Finance that the present tariff had at last reached the condition where it could be termed a stabilized tariff. That promise went out from the government through the Minister of Finance to the country, and I have no doubt that business men in all parts of Canada governed themselves accordingly and made their arrangements, firmly believing the pledge that had been given and that there would be no interference during the remainder of the present term of parliament. If they are to be disappointed; if this solemn pledge from the government is to be violated, is the government in a very different position from that of Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin when he conceived it his bounden duty to make an appeal to the electorate of Great Britain? Those of us who were in this House during the session of 1921 heard from the then opposition, the present party in office—from the present Prime Minister and many of his followers—insistent and vociferous demands that the administration of that day should make an immediate appeal to the country. They said, "You have no mandate from the people; the people have lost confidence in you; it is your duty to go to the country." And there seemed to be a certain amount of justice in their contention; the government of the day had carried on for a considerable length of time. At any rate, the result was an appeal to the country. I am free to state, if my judgment is worth anything in political matters, that I have discovered in traversing this country from east to west and from west to east a feeling which indicates very clearly that the people of Canada to-day have entirely lost confidence in this government.

The right hon. Prime Minister the other night, replying to the leader of the opposition, sought to pooh-pooh the significance of the by-elections in Halifax and Kent. He said, "Oh, after all, these elections were determined upon purely local issues. They do not affect the position of the government in the slightest. Such things happen; by-elections of this kind have at present no particular political significance." Well, I venture to say that if the government will do as they should do; if they will decide that having broken or being about to break the pledge given so emphatically and so explicitly at the last session of this parliament by the Finance Minister; if they will take the honourable course as did the Hon. Mr. Baldwin and make an immediate appeal to the country, they will find, I am firmly convinced, that there was far more significance in the by-elections in Halifax and Kent than the Prime Minister wishes to convey to this House.

Mr. FRED STORK (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the brief remarks which I desire to make to the House to-night, I hope I shall not be regarded as speaking in a parochial or provincial way, but in view of the present necessities of the district of Skeena, and in view also of the enormous size of that constituency, I believe that in taking on any more territory I should be transgressing the rules of good taste. Therefore I desire to-night to address my remarks particularly to the central portion of British Columbia, from which I come.

At the outset let me offer my congratulations to the government on the Speech from the Throne, in that it indicates a reduction of taxation and also a general improvement of the conditions generally throughout the Dominion of Canada. More particularly do I wish to congratulate the government on its attention to the fishing industry of British Columbia. During the session of 1922, in accordance with a resolution passed by the Fisheries Committee of this House, the government appointed a royal commission to investigate the conditions of the fishing industry on the Pacific coast. By reason of my having been honoured with a seat on that commission I am perhaps precluded from being fulsome in my praises, but permit me to say without any flattery that the work of that commission was good and that it was highly appreciated by the people of British Columbia. There have been many commissions of a similar nature touring the province, and I am free to confess that the impression they left with the people was not of the best. When our commission came along in 1922 the people in the West were wont to remark that this was just another of those joy riding affairs from which very little in the way of results could be expected. But the commission known as the Duff Commission carried out a most thorough investigation and it brought down a report upon which, I am glad to say, the government took immediate action.

One of the great issues in the province was the employment in the fisheries of nationalities other than the whites or Indians. That was a very burning question with the people who live on the Pacific coast. The recommendation of the commission was that in their estimation those other than whites or Indians should be reduced by forty per cent. Much opposition was offered to the suggestion that that reduction would not interfere with the proper operation of the fishing industry. Anyway, the suggestion was carried into effect, and I am glad to report to you, Sir, that all the people resident along the Pacific coast are of the opinion that that was a very wise measure and that it has worked no injury to the industry. I have in my possession several letters from those engaged in the canning business, and they claim it is a good measure and imposes no handicap on them. We were fortunate last year in that we had a bumper harvest of salmon in the salmon rivers of the Pacific coast. We look to a further good season this year and we hope from time to time to see the white citizens of this country given ample opportunity to develop the fisheries of that province.

Another improvement we are very glad to observe in connection with the progress of our fisheries, and that is that while on the Fraser river for a number of years back they have been allowed to use the fishing method known as the "gas boat," for some reason or other those who fish for a living on the Skeena and the Naas rivers in the north have been compelled to use the old British Columbia fishing boat equipped with a sail and oar. I never could appreciate why such a distinction should be made, but this commission that was out there last year, known as the Duff Commission, recommended that commencing with the year 1924 the use of gas boats be permitted on the Skeena. That recommendation comes into effect this year, and I know and am sure that the people who are making a living fishing will find it a very great advantage. I think if anything the regulations should have been just the reverse. The waters of the Fraser would be much more suitable for a boat with sail and oar than the placid waters of the Skeena.

But we are to have the gas boat this year and it will be a great advantage to the people who make their living from the waters of the north.

Another improvement inaugurated last year was a hydroplane patrol of waters of the north. It is a great task and very expensive, and last year the department inaugurated the plan of having a hydroplane for doing that work, and it is proving most efficient. We look forward this year to an increase in that service, because I am sure the department will find that as well as being efficient it is also very economical.

There is another aspect of the fisheries in regard to British Columbia that I wish to mention, and that is the progress of the halibut trade. The construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the northern port has completely revolutionized the halibut fishing industry. The railroad is now built to the fishing banks. Heretofore that trade was centered in the cities of Seattle and Vancouver, but it has followed the railways up north and to-day is centered in Prince Rupert. In 1923 twenty-nine and a half million pounds of halibut were marketed over the docks of the port of Prince Rupert. To convey that product to market required some fifteen hundred refrigerator cars, each car bringing a revenue to the Canadian National Railways of between $800 and $1,000. This development of the halibut fisheries has been one of the outstanding features of northern development, but the centralization of the trade also brings with it fresh problems and difficulties. Our Canadian fishermen who operate in that port are handicapped by the imposition of two cents a pound American duty. That is a burning question with the Canadian fishermen of the north, and they have protested repeatedly to the government here asking them to take whatever steps can be taken to have the duty removed. The Boat Owners' Association of that town have requested the government, in order to force this duty off, to close the port to American fisheries, but other interests in that port do not wish to see that drastic step taken. No one, I am sure, desires that the port be closed. What they do desire is that the duty be removed, and I as their representative would urge upon the government the necessity of continuing negotiations at Washington with a view to having this duty removed, because it is a grievous handicap and a great source of irritation and friction to the Canadian fishermen.

The waters of the Canadian Pacific fishing grounds are divided into three sections for the purposes of departmental administration. They are known as sections or districts Nos. 1, 2 and 3. No. 1 has its headquarters in the city of New Westminster; No. 2 has its headquarters in the city of Prince Rupert, and No. 3 has its headquarters in the city of Nanaimo. For a long time the fisheries were administered through these separate and distinct headquarters. Then a system of centralization grew up, and of late years a central office has been opened in the city of Vancouver. This does not in my estimation make for economy or efficiency. We have in the central office in Vancouver a considerable overhead expense. We have there a considerable staff, and all the positions are under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. All these officials commence at a minimum salary and work up to a maximum. The staff consists of the following:

	Maximum salary
Chief Inspector	$3,600
Chief Clerk	2,800
Accounts Clerk	2,280
Purchasing Agent	2,280
Senior Clerk-Stenographer	1,680
Clerk-Stenographer	1,260
File Clerk	1,260
Lady Clerk-Stenographer	1,260
Junior Stenographer	900
Junior Stenographer	900
Boy Messenger-Clerk	900
Revenue Collector	1,920
Gas Engine Foreman	1,920
Resident Engineer	3,000
Assistant Resident Engineer	2,040
Inspector of Hatcheries	2,160
Total	$30,160

Eight of these officials do considerable travelling from time to time, and I am thoroughly satisfied that with the salaries indicated here, plus the travelling expenses, plus also the office rental and upkeep, the total cost to the country will be in the neighbourhood of $50,000. When I first came to Ottawa two years ago I took this matter up with the department. I took it up last session, and I am taking it up again this session. I took this matter up before there was any mention of "A whisper of death" or "A carnival of extravagance." So in pressing it upon the government I trust I am not stealing anyone's copyright in this connection. I would suggest that the office be abolished immediately. I am satisfied that to revert to the old style method of having each district report directly as an independent unit to headquarters at Ottawa will make in greater degree for efficiency and for economy. Take for instance a patrolman, or a fish guardian as we call them, on the Naas river who is in doubt in regard to the operation of the regulations. He has to communicate with the inspector at Prince Rupert. The inspector at Prince Rupert writes to the chief inspector at Vancouver, who in turn gets in touch with headquarters at Ottawa. Ottawa addresses its reply to the chief inspector at Vancouver, the latter sends the message on to the inspector at Prince Rupert, who in turn communicates with the official on the Naas river. By that time the fish has escaped from the net, or some fellow over in Alaska has got away with it. I am fully satisfied that no reasons based on good economy justify the maintenance of this office. New Westminister has a district office twelve miles removed from the central office. In Nanaimo there is another district office forty miles away from the head office. My advice to the minister would be to close these offices at once and save the country some $50,000 a year, and then to give $1,000 each to the three districts in order to improve conditions there. The chief inspector in the city of Prince Rupert starts work in that position at a salary of $140 a month. In view of his responsibilities, in view of the tremendous amount of work he has to do, $140 a month is a very inadequate remuneration. Before an official can qualify for a position of that kind he has to serve in the department, and in view of this system of promotion he is an old man long before he can attain the position of inspector of the district where he will receive the princely salary of $140 a month. He can start in at a minimum salary of $1,680 per annum and the maximum to which he can attain is $2,280 per annum. I think the schedule should be reversed, and that when the official reaches this office after long years of patient work he should receive the maximum of $2,280 and that thereafter the salary should be graded down to $1,680. Because by the time the official has served for five years in this capacity, after many years of faithful service in the department, he is a subject for the old men's home. Where you have a man, such as we have at the present time, in charge of the district office in district No. 2, and where he commences at $140 a month, I consider such a salary is not in the interest of true economy. I would suggest, as I have already stated, that $1,000 of the money saved in the manner indicated be appropriated to the three fishery districts, and distributed in such a way as to improve the working conditions of the men who work in the fishery offices.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the outstanding features of western development has been the wonderful growth of the grain trade going to the Pacific ocean. The Rocky mountains form a great barrier between the prairies of the West and the Pacific ocean, but this mountain range is cut by two passes, the Kicking Horse pass and the Yellowhead pass. A few years ago only a small trickle of grain found its way through the mountain passes down to the waters of the Pacific. This small rivulet has grown to a torrent in the last couple of years, and last year it assumed the proportions of a mighty and swelling river. This growth will continue as the years go on. The grain movement to the Pacific coast has come to stay, and to-night I beseech this government to construct in the port of Prince Rupert a grain elevator so that some of this trade may be diverted to that port, and so that the Canadian National Railways may derive some benefit from the traffic which will flow over the tracks of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The city of Edmonton is the natural grain centre for central and northern Alberta, and for a large portion of the province of Saskatchewan. The government is building an elevator today in that city. That elevator in Edmonton will not fulfil its proper functions unless there is also an elevator in the port of Prince Rupert to which its wheat cargoes can be transmitted.

I desire to associate myself, with all the power and energy I possess, with deputations and delegations from that country to Ottawa, with resolutions of the Prince Rupert Board of Trade backed by the resolutions from the Board of Trade of Edmonton, with newspaper editorials from the press of both sides of politics, and with letters and telegrams innumerable urging the construction of a grain elevator in the port of Prince Rupert. The Grand Trunk Pacific railway was the product of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government. That great statesman intended the completed Grand Trunk Pacific to be a monument to his memory in the same way that the construction of the Canadian Pacific stands to the credit of the late Sir John A. Macdonald. About 1905 or 1906 the government of Sir Wilfrid projected the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific. They said they were going to open and develop a new and wonderful country. The idea caught on throughout the whole of the Dominion; and people became convinced that the railway was a sound project and that it would open up a country that was well worth developing. The settlers who have gone into that northern country have proved to the satisfaction of the country, and to the satisfaction of those who initiated this railway in the first place, that the project was a sound one. There is tributary to the Grand Trunk Pacific 3,200,000 acres of agricultural land. The Mackenzie and Peace river country, which is an empire in itself, will pour its products out to the Pacific over the lines of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. That country to-day is peopled with settlers who have suffered intensely for lack of adequate railway facilities. The Grand Trunk Pacific runs through the Skeena country for a distance of 350 miles. It serves the Nechaco valley, the Bulkley valley, the Skeena valley, the Kispiox valley, the Kitsumkalum valley, and Lakelse valley, each an empire in itself. These valleys are filled with settlers who are carrying on agricultural development as best they can. They are not meeting with very much success because local freight rates to the market are so high they can only with great difficulty make a living.

Local freight rates are based entirely upon transportation costs, and there is no immediate outlook for relief in the matter of local freight rate reduction, when we consider that we only have two or three freight trains a week travelling over the line when there should be four or five; and therefore these settlers to a man are demanding that traffic over the road be increased by the handling of wheat, so that the volume of trade over that road will make that particular branch pay. In that way they have some hope of relief and redress in the matter of local rates. Our terminal rates are the same from Edmonton to Prince Rupert as they are from Edmonton to Vancouver. This 350 miles of railroad running through the district of Skeena is manned by a great number of railway employees. We have firemen, engineers, conductors and breakmen, and all of the staff required to operate a railway. These men are only working a short time, because railway men are paid by the mile, and not by the day or the week. These men have been hanging on for years, expecting the fulfilment of the Laurier programme and the development of the Grand Trunk Pacific. They have been waiting and hoping for the development to take place; so have the settlers along that line.

But I can say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the people have no intention of remaining in their present condition indefinitely. They desire and they demand to be told what the policy of this government is towards the Grand Trunk Pacific. If these people are given to understand that there is to be no further development in the port of Prince Rupert they will govern their conduct accordingly. They will be able to map out their course for the future, but they do insist upon finding out at the earliest possible moment what the intention of the government may be towards the completion of the Laurier idea. The greatest argument I have in connection with pressing the claim for the construction of this elevator is that it will bring traffic to the Canadian National Railways. It will furnish for the farmers the cheapest market and the cheapest outlet available on the Pacific coast. They will find that at the port of Prince Rupert they can deliver their grain to the elevator which is constructed at tide water on property owned by the people of Canada. In marketing their grain in that port, they will find that there are no port charges, no tolls and no taxes or levies to be collected, and the port of Prince Rupert is as free as the air you breathe. In regard to the harbour, I say without boasting, Mr. Speaker, that it is the best harbour on the Pacific coast. The whole British fleet could anchor with safety within the shelter of that harbour, and there is no danger of ever having to spend a dollar in dredging or in the upkeep of the harbour. We have an utter absence of fog and an utter absence of ice. You can see from the dock the flash of Triple Island light located fifteen miles out from the port—if a skipper believes he requires the services of a pilot he can procure one, although many of them do not do so. The pilot can escort him to Triple Island light fifteen miles out from the port, and from that point he sets his course to Japan or for whatever port he may be destined to. Have we done anything with this port? We most assuredly have. At present there is loading in the port of Prince Rupert the twelfth steamship to be loaded with lumber for the Orient—They make the journey from Prince Rupert to Yokohama in sixteen days, which is a three-day improvement over any other record made from the Pacific coast. The terminal rates are the same from Prince Rupert to Liverpool as they are from Vancouver to Liverpool. We are 462 miles closer to the Orient than any other port.

I wish to draw the attention of those interested to the fact that, in the opening up and developing of the port of Prince Rupert, the people are buying goods in their own country, and putting money in their own pockets. I am not making this appeal to-night on behalf of the settlers, who think they are entitled to some reward for their pioneering, although, permit me to say that 35 years of pioneering in the West is deserving of consideration. I am not pleading that special treatment should be given on that account; but from the standpoint of good sound business logic, and from the standpoint of national economy, I join with all the people who are living in the western land, in the city of Edmonton and in the city of Prince Rupert, in the request that an elevator be constructed forthwith.

Mr. B. W. FANSHER (East Lambton): In rising to continue this debate, I feel that I must join with those who have preceded me in offering my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. I have listened with great interest to the many speeches that have been delivered by hon. members of this House since this debate commenced. I listened with deep interest this afternoon to the speech delivered by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). I was greatly amused at the controversy over statistics, and the discussion as to who should be held responsible for the emigration from this country. I was reminded of a story I once heard of a darky preacher who, in finishing his sermon, announced that on the next Sabbath he would take as his theme Daniel in the fiery furnace, and one of his congregation immediately arose begged his pardon and asked that he might correct him. He said that Daniel was not in the fiery furnace, but in the lion's den; whereupon the darky preacher said, "My brother has not got the point. The point I intend to make next Sabbath is that it matters not whether Daniel was in the fiery furnace or in the lion's den, he was in a terrible fix anyway." I think the taxpayer of this country is not so much concerned with who is responsible for the burden of debt that we are labouring under at the present time as he is with the question of how we are going to discharge that debt.

This debate had not gone very far until it became apparent that many things which are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne are not going to receive the attention that one certain item will receive, namely the tariff. As in other debates in former sessions of parliament, a good deal of discussion has centered around taxation and the tariff, and of course the tariff is attacked. I was very much interested in the remarks that were made this afternoon by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) in his attempt to defend the protective principle; and I was rather amused that the time of the House should be taken up with a controversy over a policy in which the hon. member and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) both agree. It is strange that whenever this country gets a national headache the leaders of the old political parties seem to know what is wrong. As we have been aware this last year, they have consulted national political doctors throughout the country, and in their speeches in this House they have indicated what they believe to be a remedy. They have looked at our national tongue, felt our national pulse, tapped our national chest in a number of places and put their ear to our national ribs, and the result of this diagnosis is that there is something wrong with our infant industries. They are agreed thus far; but when it comes to a question of the remedy some say that the tariff dose should be administered in increasing strength while others think that the dose should be diminished. The leader of the opposition declares that what is wrong with Canada to-day is that the tariff has not been administered lately in the same strength as it was administered when he was Prime Minister; and the disturbance in trade he attributes to a change in the quantity and strength of the tariff dose. On the other hand, the Prime Minister declares in the Speech from the Throne that he is persuaded that a reduction in taxation and in production and transportation costs is all that is necessary to effect an economic development hitherto unparalleled. To my mind the significance of the first part of that statement is considerable: the Prime Minister "is persuaded". I want to ask, by whom? I wonder whether it is by the resolutions of Progressive members which have been submitted in this House in the last two years, calling for tariff reduction. And when tariff reduction was not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne I wondered whether the amendment that was moved on one occasion had something to do with that persuasion. Or perhaps it was the electors of Kent and of Halifax who persuaded the Prime Minister. Possibly all these were factors in the persuasion alluded to. It occurred to me this afternoon, when the hon. gentleman from Montreal was speaking, that perhaps some persuasion was necessary indeed if there are many gentlemen on the other side of the House who also believe in the policy he advocated in his speech. But why should there be any persuasion? I have in my hand the tariff proposals as set forth in the Liberal platform of 1919. I shall read them:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of Customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: First: diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; Second: reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.
> That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food;

farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments; cement and fertilizers, should be free from Customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this resolution when returned to power.

In the face of all that, I ask, why was persuasion necessary? The Speech from the Throne indicates that we are to expect, when the budget comes down, something in the way of tariff reduction. Now, we do not judge a book by its preface; we judge it by what it contains. Nor do we judge an apple by its appearance; when it is peeled and quartered we know what it is like. I trust that the budget will fulfil the promise given in the Speech from the Throne.

There has been a good deal said about emigration from this country and the causes thereof, and perhaps further persuasion may be necessary if we are to be given in the budget the tariff reductions which we are looking for. With that end in view I am going to take the liberty to submit a few more figures which have to deal with the population of the banner province of the Dominion, the province of Ontario. Although the House has listened to a mass of statistics to-day, I trust hon. members will bear with me while I submit a few figures on the shift of population from the rural to the urban districts in old Ontario. I am taking a twenty-year period from 1901 to 1921. The population in Ontario in 1901 was 2,182,947; in 1921, 2,933,662—an increase of 750,715. Let us divide that population into urban and rural. The urban population in 1901 was 935,978; by 1921, twenty years later, it had reached 1,707,370—an increase of 771,392. Now, contrast this with the rural population during the same period. In 1901 the rural population stood at 1,246,969, but by 1921 it had dropped to 1,226,292—a decrease of 20,677. The percentages are equally significant. In 1901 we find the urban percentage to be 42.88; the rural, 57.12. By 1921 the figures are practically reversed, the urban standing at 58.19 as against 41.81 for the rural. In other words, during the last twenty years the population in the urban centres has increased nearly 800,000, while the rural population has decreased by over 20,000. These figures are taken from the last census.

But this is not the whole story. We have opened up in the north a new area for settlement, and there has been heavy immigration into it, so that this addition to the rural population there helps to balance the decrease in old Ontario. Taking the older portion of the province by itself, there has been a decrease in the rural population far in excess of the figures I have presented.

I have before me a list of the constituencies in old Ontario, taking the area south of a line from Muskoka to the Ottawa river, and the decreases since 1901 are startling. Again my figures cover the twenty-year period from 1901 to 1921. North Bruce shows a decrease of 6,552; South Bruce, 6,183; Dufferin, 5,621; Dundas, 3,962; Durham, 2,941; East Elgin, 595; Frontenac, 4,356; Grenville, 4,377; North Grey, 2,336; Southeast Grey, 8,203; East Hastings, 4,871; North Huron, 7,426; South Huron, 7,306; East Lambton, 8,639; Lanark, 4,239; Leeds, 3,066; Lennox and Addington, 4,352; West Middlesex, 6,354; Muskoka, 1,552; Norfolk, 2,781; Northumberland, 3,038; North Ontario, 2,970; North Oxford, 1,117; South Oxford, 516; South Perth, 2,233; East Peterborough, 2,575; Prescott, 557; Prince Edward, 1,508; North Simcoe, 3,971; South Simcoe, 1,589; Victoria, 4,516; North Wellington, 6,287—thirty-two constituencies with decreases running into the thousands during the last twenty years.

What do we find in the urban centres? Toronto has doubled its population every fifteen years since its incorporation, and yet in this old part of Ontario there has been a decrease in rural population. I do not mean to charge this all to our fiscal policy, or the policy which fixes upon the consumers in the rural districts a tariff tax for the benefit of the urban centres, but in large part I do think that this tax is responsible for the unequal development. It is a system whereby money is extracted from the consumers in the rural districts and small towns by the manufacturers for their own benefit, to be expended in our large centres. I submit that these statistics amply bear out my contention. Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together. Where there is money to be made, there will you find people go.

Mr. GRAHAM: Vultures.

Mr. FANSHER: I am very much indebted to the hon. Minister of Railways for the correction. Perhaps the term is a little more significant, too, than eagle. Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the vultures be gathered together. Wheresoever there is money to be made, there will the people gather. That is a natural law; it is the lure of the dollar. We have it borne out in Ontario by these statistics.

I could cite in corroboration figures for the province of Quebec. The rural population in that province, according to the last census, has decreased in the last twenty years, slightly it is true; but on the other hand the urban population has increased to a very considerable extent. To illustrate my point further, I may say that out of 416 townships in old Ontario—cutting old Ontario off from the Georgian bay to the Ottawa river—375 have lost in population during the last twenty years; they have fewer people to-day than they had in 1901. Only 41 townships show an increase, and most of them are situated close to cities which are overflowing into the surrounding townships. For instance, London has grown out into Westminster township. Windsor and the border cities have grown into the adjoining townships, and Toronto is extending out into the three ridings in York. To my mind these facts are very significant, not only from the agricultural standpoint but from the fact that there are fewer people in those rural districts to support the churches, schools and public institutions, and the costs are increasing. From the standpoint of the nation's welfare these figures are important; a development as unequal as this has been in the last twenty years cannot continue, and I would recommend that our census returns be studied more thoroughly so that they may be used as a guide in the shaping of our fiscal policy.

To add to my argument along this line I have prepared a few figures in connection with four lines of manufacture in this country, to show the amount of assistance which is afforded certain industries in the way of protection. The lines I refer to are automobiles, agricultural implements, boots and shoes, and rubber footwear and rubber goods. These are statistics obtained from information furnished by the Chief Statistician of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

There were produced in Canada in 1921, $81,833,226 worth of automobiles. Imports of automobiles into Canada were valued at $11,039,127, and exports at $8,552,883. The duty collected on the amount imported was $3,611,800. These figures show that about $80,000,000 of cars were purchased in Canada. Taking the value of the imports and the duty collected thereon, and applying that ratio to the cars purchased in Canada, we find that there was a protection afforded the automobile industry, of $23,837,880. That is not taking the tariff percentages at all; it is taking the actual returns. Now, $11,039,127 worth of imports paid duty to the extent of $3,611,800, so that every time we find that amount of $11,039,127 in the figure indicating the amount produced in Canada we get a further amount equivalent to the protection afforded by the duty.

Following that same line of reasoning in connection with agricultural implements, we find that in 1921 we collected a duty of $889,167 under this head and that there was a protection afforded of $3,824,418. When we come to boots and shoes the figures are a good deal more startling. Boots and shoes produced in Canada totalled $44,665,381. The amount imported was $1,582,697. Very few were exported, namely, $298,470 worth. The duty collected on the amount imported was $436,934, and carrying out the same ratio as with the others we find that a protection was afforded the boot and shoe industry in this country of $11,797,218.

Coming to the last of the lines of manufacture that I have considered, rubber footwear and rubber goods, there were produced in Canada in 1921, $39,469,786 worth; imports were $3,415,044; exports $4,088,205; duty collected, $971,506. The protection afforded was, therefore, $10,006,511. Combining these, we find that the duty collected on the four lines was $5,909,416 and that the protection afforded was $49,466,027. I do not say that that protection was all taken, but that amount of protection is afforded, and if industry argue that they need more tariff, surely they are taking all the protection that is afforded—otherwise they would not ask for more.

I think if we would follow all the lines of manufacture through we would find that we are taxed to support the industries of this country to an extent of which we have no idea, and yet we are told by hon. members here to-day that we should protect industry in order that we may have a home market. I sometimes wonder how serious hon. members are when they plead for a home market for the farmers' produce. I have in my hand here an advertisement issued in 1918, in time of stress, by the Finance department and the Victory Loan committee urging the farmers to subscribe to the victory loan. You will remember the argument that was used at that time. It was that we had to sell to Britain and give her credit, and that we must threrefore raise the money at home in order to pay the farmer cash so that his produce might go over to Britain, and the farmers themselves were urged to buy victory bonds. This advertisement appeared in one of the leading farm papers of this province, the Farmers' Advocate. The first sentence reads:

> The prices of Canadian farm products are fixed in large measure by the demand in Great Britain.

Now with that statement put out by the Finance Minister in the Union government in 1918, we all agree. Note the second sentence:

> The price of all is governed by the part exported.

Yet we have hon. members arguing on the floor of this House for the home market in order that the farmer may get more for his crop, when officials who are identified with that very same party say that the price of all is governed by the part exported. "Be ready," it says at the bottom "to buy victory bonds". Down below that in small print appears this:

> Issued by the Canadian Victory Loan Committee in co-operation with the Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: What was his name then?

Mr. FANSHER: Perhaps the hon. member for Brome will know better than I do as he is an older member of the House. I think it was Sir Thomas White. I think the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) became Minister of Finance in August, 1918. These victory bonds were sold in the fall. Perhaps the hon. member for West York was Minister of Finance at that time. But the point I wish to make is this: I believe that many hon. members who argue for the protective principle and a high tariff, and who use the argument of the home market, know and believe that the home market is not nearly so advantageous to the farmers of this country as they would have them believe.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have already spoken at too great a length. In conclusion, I am convinced that such unequal distribution between the rural and urban population of this country is not in the best interests of the state. I am convinced that before we shall have the degree of prosperity that we are all looking for in these troublous times some readjustment has got to be made. There is a tendency to place goods beyond the purchasing power of the consumer. The cost of distribution growing out of this centralization is high. These are problems which we will have to tackle with a will. I trust and believe that in the days to come there will be a natural readjustment brought about. I believe that in the natural course of events deflation will correspond more in all lines of industry, but at the same time I see no reason why industries that have to work two days to buy the products that another industry produces in one should be asked at this time to pay toll to the large centralized industries throughout this Dominion. The Speech from the Throne gives us promise of some redress in this regard, and I hope that that promise, to use the words of the Prime Minister himself, will be abundantly fulfilled.

Mr. J. R. OUIMET (Vaudreuil and Soulanges), (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on the 3rd of March, 1924, an honourable member who is well known to me gave utterance to the following words, which I find on page 15 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and my privilege to be first to congratulate the mover (Mr. Kelly) and the seconder (Mr. Lapierre) of the Address this afternoon on the acceptable way in which they have performed a none-too-easy task. All of us recall how trying is the ordeal when a new member first addresses this House. Sometimes the ordeal does not become very much mitigated with custom, but nevertheless the first is the most trying, and the success of the hon. members I acknowledge freely and compliment them thereupon. Possibly in respect particularly of the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. Kelly), if I caught aright a portion of his address, I should congratulate the government too.

This language is truly comforting to me, Sir, for it is the first time that I have had the honour to speak in this House.

The right hon. leader of the opposition showed so much sympathy towards new members that I shall take the liberty of adding a few remarks and of expressing my views relatively to what has been said, this session, in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I do not think the House will deny me that privilege and that the courteous members who honour me by listening, at present will not reproach me for having abused of their precious hours of deliberation during the last two sessions, as I have been very patient and I hope to be likewise treated.

I listened with much attention to the different phases of the debate. I pondered over them. I found some of them quite to the point; others I found wanting. However, before taking up the subject I must—and I believe it my duty to do so—extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I should further add, Mr. Speaker, that for the first time in my parliamentary career the occasion lends itself to publicly convey to you my respects and congratulations for the mark of confidence that parliament has bestowed upon you by raising you to that eminent post of Speaker of the House of Commons. I would fear to wound your proverbial modesty for congratulations have poured in upon you from all sides, as much from the loyal as from the disloyal opposition of His Majesty as those that come from the party to which I have the honour to belong, they are so sincere that I shall not further dwell upon them; but I have private reasons to recall them to my memory, and especially the congratulations of those who were witness of your start in life, the troubled period of your political career and the period so calm and full of consolation of your university life.

I had the signal honour—it is now nearly twenty-four years ago—to be one of your most diligent students, and although not one of your most brilliant, yet one of the most deserving, owing to nature having deprived me of many gifts.

You will remember, Sir, your lectures on the history of Law, at Laval University, now Montreal University. I must admit that, never perhaps during our university life, my contemporaries and myself benefited so much by the excellent maxims of probity, honour and patriotism that you forcibly impressed upon us at the time.

We are all growing old, and it now gives me much pleasure to recall these reminiscences this evening. As it was so well said by a great French writer—I think it was Charles Nodier, in his Souvenirs de Jeunesse—it is one of the most delightful prerogatives of old age to recall with great accuracy reminiscences of one's youth.

You will pardon me, Mr. Speaker,—both you, and the late Mr. Monk, were so kind to your students of Laval in those days,—if I recall publicly these recollections which linger forever in the memory of those who are of fair lineage. As it was so nicely expressed by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre): Tutored at the school of the great deceased, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who, although a Liberal, had a considerable number of political admirers holding opposite views to his, but who rendered him justice; you have sown the seeds of probity and honour in our midst, and we have endeavoured to follow your advice and teachings.

It is therefore in this frame of mind which you have so well fashioned that we feel happy to acknowledge publicly this homage, we, all your old students of Laval, who, since you occupy a seat in this House, number, I believe, over fifty, either as member, minister or Speaker. I beg for the leniency of the House as a new member and a novice in my political career. Representing one of the finest, if not the finest county of the province of Quebec, situated at a distance of 70 miles from Ottawa and 50 miles from Montreal, the county of Vaudreuil and Soulanges which did me the honour of returning me by acclamation March 22, 1922.

Why did this election take place at such an early date? How does it happen that our good friends, our opponents, did not think it worth while, neither in my case nor that of my good and excellent neighbour, the member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Rheaume) to contest our respective counties? There must have existed a cause to all this, and I discover it in the fact that the Conservative party was still sleeping, and that it has since awakened after an alarming slumber, which might have been taken for a serious enough coma so far as the province of Quebec is concerned. It was so fast asleep that, on the 1st of September, 1923, this same party, semi-conscious, thought it was time to awake, and, Sir, I will establish the fact that it awoke in the county of my good friend from Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Rhéaume), at Cartierville. I have before me certain invitations which had been sent to me by our good friends the Conservatives who thought that something might be gained in the county of Vaudreuil and Soulanges and that we, the Liberals should endeavour to allow ourselves to be swayed by the honourable leader of the opposition.

Therefore, on Saturday, Sept, 1, 1923, reappeared again, at Cartierville, the Conservative political picnics of the province of Quebec, and this notice, which I shall read in a minute, had been scattered everywhere in the county of Vaudreuil and Soulanges, from Point Fortune as far as Point Cascades where we have a great number of Conservatives and Liberals. Here follows the programme which had been sent to our good friends:

At Cartierville Revival of the Conservative Political Picnics
In the Province of Quebec
You are cordially invited

On Saturday, September 1, 1923, will take place, at Belmont Park, Cartierville, a large Conservative political picnic.

Belmont Park is an ideal spot for a day of rest and recreation; situated close to the tramway terminus at Cartierville, on the banks of the river des Prairies, east of Lachapelle bridge, it offers numerous amusements: merry-go-round, ferris-wheel, orchestra, band, beautiful lawns, century old trees, shaded groves. All, girls, boys, men, women and children are cordially invited to this country festival which will be a grand prelude to Labour-day.

The political picnic will begin at 9 a.m. (Standard time) and end at 9 p.m. (Standard time).

The only expense you will have to incur will be in the making up of your basket for lunch and supper.

Be one of this great popular manifestation.

Both in the morning and afternoon, games will be held, amusements of all kinds, races opened to all ages, and various tournaments which will be rewarded by the distribution of costly prizes to the winner at the end of each event.

The programme of the games will be published in the sport page of our daily newspapers, on Friday, August 31, and will also be distributed at the door of Belmont Park, on the day of the picnic.

About 2.30 p.m. will take place the open air events when political speeches will be delivered by the right honourable Arthur Meighen, the hon. Rodolphe Monty, the hon. C. C. Ballantyne, the hon. André Fauteux, the President of the Cartier-Macdonald club and the President of the Conservative Association, English section.

A sufficient space to park, if necessary, 600 motor cars, in the Belmont Park, has been reserved for the occasion. The entrance and parking of cars will be free.

The transportation facilities from Montreal to Cartierville will be announced more in detail in La Presse and La Patrie of Thursday, the 30th of August.

A special detachment of policemen will be responsible for the comfort of all and also assure that peace is well kept.

There will be no entrance fee and Belmont Park will be open that day to all who wish to divert and rest themselves.

N.B.—Keep this circular, it may be useful to you on the day of the picnic.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Rhéaume) was not, perhaps, present at this grand picnic—which took place in his county, but he was wrong. Two days after this picnic, a certain newspaper of Montreal, which I shall take the liberty to quote in this House, a very interesting newspaper, which was and still is in the public eye published a report which is worth reading, but which will be rather displeasing to the hon. members who sit on the opposite side, because it concerns them too much. This article under date of November 27, 1923, has for heading: "Mr. Meighen and his showmen." This newspaper Le Devoir among other things says:—I do not wish to overtax the House too much in quoting the whole article, for fear any one should think that I have abused my privilege during the two first sessions that I have occupied a seat in this Parliament!

The people of Quebec have the right and the duty to remember that Mr. Meighen was not the sole author of the Conscription Act, but its most narrow-minded interpreter and its most odious perpetrator.

I think, Sir, that I have the privilege of citing this extract; it is not I that speak.

It is an open secret that without the eventual and wise influence of Mr. Doherty and Mr. Borden, the laws on conscription, censure and prescription would have borne more heavily on the people. If we wish to speak of prejudice and injustice, why not begin by branding as it should be the stupid ingratitude of which the Federal Conservatives gave proof against the most respectable and the least guilty among their leaders, to cling to the sharp flanks of this knife blade politician, whom they persist in forcing upon us ?

This is very wicked, I would never have uttered these words in the House.

The people of Quebec have also the right and the duty to reject Mr. Meighen's economic policy, half-protectionist, half-socialist, his clumsy electoral empiricism which aims at winning over both the views of the West and the gold of the eastern manufacturers. The province of Quebec wishes to keep away from either one or the other policy, both are equally contrary to its instincts of social and economic equilibrium, instincts of which the Gazette is the first to acknowledge, on all occasions, the effective and truly conservative importance in the true sense of the word. By remaining faithful to this tradition, and thereby repelling the man and the policy which embraces the opposite views, the people of Quebec do not only protect their own interests: it renders a great service to the whole Confederation.

The Quebec people, the Canadian people—I mean those who are Canadians in preference to being English or French—have equally the right and the duty to sift and expose the imperialist policy of Mr. Meighen, to disclose their dangerous leanings and disastrous climax into which it would plunge the whole country.

In his recent touring of the country, Mr. Meighen applied himself, with more cunning audacity than true courage—regardless of what the Gazette may say—to justify his imperialism. He deemed it convenient to take his bearings from me: I do not wish for war any more than Bourassa! This is childish. No one, except a few rabid fools desire war for the sake of war. Very few people in France, in Germany, in England, in Italy wanted war, in 1914, still less do they want it to-day. Nevertheless, they were all embroiled in it; they are again rushing towards it. What must be shown, is that Mr. Meighen's policy does not incline to war no more than min or any body else. On this score Mr. Meighen hangs himself by wishing to justify himself, while shamefully contradicting himself.

I take the liberty, Sir, to quote this rather long article, as a number of members have already, to my knowledge, given much more extensive extracts:

"I have put on the boots of Cartier and Macdonald" he said, at Victoriaville. What modesty! That he robbed those large boots, thanks to the degradation of his party, it is possible; but so that his skeleton feet might fit, he had them ripped, shortened, narrowed and shaped in such a way that they remind us of the original ones, like certain cobbler's show-case, those of "General" Tom Thumb compared with the boots of the giant Beaupré.

Macdonald and Cartier applied themselves during all their lives to bring to a triumph this double principle: Canada must provide, to the full extent of its power, to its internal defence; England must alone carry the burden of the naval defence of the Empire and of all imperial wars. It is by adhering to this just principle that Cartier refused to the British Government any form of co-operation in the organization of a nucleus of the imperial forces; that Macdonald repelled the overtures made to drag him in the wars of the Soudan.

Sir Alexander Campbell, in 1887, established clearly that Canada has no other Imperial obligation than to provide, within the scope of her power, to the defence of her own territory. In 1890 and later, Sir Charles Tupper—

A gentleman who held, I believe, the post which the hon. member for Grenville filled at one time,— —opposed vehemently the first overture of military and naval contribution.

I think that I am interpreting the views of my hon. friend from Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) in quoting the following extract:

Mr. Meighen, like the quack doctor of Molière has "reversed everything". From the outset of the Great War, he proclaimed that the Canadian Government is held in honour to put the country "into Bankruptcy" for the glory and safety of the Empire. Again to-day, he holds that Canada is bound in duty to make common cause with Great Britain each time that the latter is at war, and therefore we must arm by land and sea. What Cartier, Macdonald, Tupper and the whole Conservative party as well as the whole Liberal party, from 1860 to 1899, held as unjust, condemnable, disastrous for Canada, even contrary to the true interests of the Empire, he considers desirable, expedient, necessary; it is even, he says, the only "honourable position" that Canada can occupy in the Empire. With such views, he wishes us to believe that "he walks in the footsteps of Cartier and Macdonald." Nonsense! At the very most be hardly finds means to screen his banners behind a torn flap of their trousers!

Obstinately resolved to continue his journey, full of jolts, in his top boots where his head is lost, as well as his feet, the Tom-Thumb of the neo-conservatism attempted, at St. Hyacinthe and Drummondville, to justify his wild prank of last year, when he insisted at all costs, that Canada should hurry to the rescue, arms in hand, at the sound of the first trumpet blast of Lloyd George, after the failure of Smyrna.

"The treaty of Sevres obliged us to this," he said, "we had to honour our signature." To want to hold us tied down for ever to a senseless, impracticable pact, disowned by all its authors, and never internationally ratified, that alone is enough to show the dangerous blindness of the personage. Can one imagine where could drag us this puny advocate, anxious for his pound of flesh, if the public aberration placed in his hands power and authority?

And the newspaper further adds:

It would be unfair not to point out the pious ardour of the two Quebec acolytes of the epileptic pontiff of unionism. Inspired by a zeal worthy of a better cause, Mr. Monty and Mr. Fauteux are bent on waging war against the "prejudices" of their compatriots. Their struggle both touching and ludicrous reminds us of the doings and gesture of certain personages matched together, in the comic reviews: Plic and Ploc, Mutt and Jeff, the Big and the Little one.

Of the two, it is still the little one who is the weaker. At Victoriaville, Mr. Fauteux reminded us of the preliminary work undertaken and the responsibility resting upon Laurier and the Liberals in the imperialist revolution which dragged us into the whirlpool of war and conscription. The remark fitted in well, and the tactic was fair. But what seems to be less in evidence, is that Mr. Fauteux and Mr. Monty, who, in the past, denounced Laurier's camouflaged imperialism, have the right to demand that their compatriots swallow Mr. Meighen's gut-twisting imperialism.

Mr. Monty thinks that the French Canadians should place their confidence in Mr. Meighen, because he speaks from day to day better French, and that tomorrow like yesterday, he is willing to place in office many "Canayens". That is what becomes, in the hands of narrow-minded politicians nationalism in matters of language and patronage. That Meighen speaks the French language like Bossuet or Mederic, like Berryer or like the most dense ear-drum breakers of our courts and hustings, this in no way alters the worth of his views, his policy and of his person. Bismark spoke French perfectly; this in no way proved that he was France's best friend. Besides, one cannot too much insist upon the fact: it is not because he is an enemy of the French Canadians that Mr. Meighen does not deserve the public confidence: it is as an enemy of Canada, as destroyer of Canadian nationality and also of the best Conservative traditions: it is because, everything tends to show it, he is ready to shatter the economic equilibrium of the country, its social peace, its international position; it is because we know that he is quite willing, to satisfy his incoherent passions of half educated theorist, to drag Canada in the worst internal as well as external ventures.

Deluded politicians may find him an able dialectician; people without any foregone conclusion but endowed with some power of observation look upon him as a dangerous demagogue. The small Plics and the big Plocs of the reborn and soulless Conservative party—will strive in vain: the people as a whole, left to their good common sense, will not have him.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to quote any further from this article for I notice the hour is quite late. However, it does seem that the Conservative party awoke, but somewhat late for our by-elections in the counties of Jacques Cartier, Vaudreuil and Soulanges and others. They are to awake, one hears, in the province of Quebec. According to what I have just mentioned a few minutes ago and the extracts quoted, it would seem that the province of Quebec will tremble in the presence of my right hon. friend, the leader of the disloyal opposition of His Majesty!

What will be this awakening of the Conservative party? What will the awakening of the whole population be, not only of the province of Quebec, but from one end of the country to the other, from Victoria to Halifax? On what grounds will the electorate stand to judge of the awakening of the disloyal opposition of His Majesty? Will it be on the good faith of the leader of the Conservative party? Will it be on the good faith of the leader of the Progressive party or will it rather be on the good faith of the leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada? I notice on the faces of those who are listening that the answer is a foregone conclusion. It will be on the good faith of the leader of the Liberal party who, at present, presides over the destinies of Canada. The people will acknowledge the good faith of the upright and honourable man who is in charge of our affairs, and the country will judge him upon this good faith. In their hearts the masses are just. Rouse their passions and they may get beyond control.

During the last session it could have been an easy matter to defeat the government. We had but, if I am not mistaken, eight of majority on the budget vote. That budget, as it was brought down in the House, made for economy, economy on all sides, economy showing thrift, etc., however, there were many others to practice; I will but mention one: that of speech. Indeed, what everyone thinks but does not express, I think it is my duty to mention, for I am free to express my thoughts. We had, in the course of the last session, on the budget as well as on other subjects many a sermon and advice. About eighty speeches were delivered on horse racing—"Malum per accidens and non malum per se" as would put it the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon)—as a guide to our views on the question of labour, on the "loafing on the job," on immigration, on Imperial matters, on the French Treaty, on halibut fishing, which the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) will now have to take up, with the help of the good advices of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Incidentally I congratulate them and also the government for these appointments. They are of all, the two best appointments that could be made by a government conscious of its responsibilities and of the worth of the men it placed in these high offices.

We also had during last session, interesting discussions on decreasing the parliamentary indemnity, and if the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) was in his seat, this evening, I should sincerely congratulate him for the gallant way in which he opposed this measure. It is particularly on this last debate that we were treated to an amusing lecture of an altogether maiden-like and innocent simplicity on the part of these sanctimonious people, always fretting for others, while quite at ease for themselves, and who imagine that through shamming all sins will be forgiven.

If we had, in this House, only promoters—or lady promoters—of the parliamentary indemnity reduction, we would have to submit to a bankruptcy act for cradles. Fortunately, as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier so well expressed it, the cradle bankruptcy is not to be feared in the province of Quebec "for husband and wife religiously live up to their matrimonial obligations." May I ask the members of this House if things would so happen in certain counties of Ontario, should the electors deem it proper to choose as their representatives persons of canonic age? But the "démon du midi" is there watching and I would not be astonished to see the county of Southeast Grey become vacant one of these days, and, there, we shall witness a great fight between the parties.

I paused, listened and kept my eyes open during the last sessions which I attended. And as I have the advantage—I think I may say so without appearing to boast—to speak both languages in use in this country, of which one is understood by all and the other—the most important and the one most used in diplomatic circles—is spoken and understood only by a selected minority, I was deeply and sadly deceived after listening attentively to the leader of the disloyal opposition of His Majesty. As to the leader of the loyal opposition of His Majesty—an opposition, forsooth, but more sedate and conforming more with the sound teachings of the instinct of self-preservation, and the satisfaction of duty accomplished for the welfare of the country and not of his party—I cannot but congratulate him on the position taken.

I have always had for the official leader of the disloyal opposition of His Majesty a profound admiration, and in this I think I share the opinion of the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laflamme) who made no secret of his admiration for the leader of the opposition, but who, in a speech he made, and which expresses well our opinion, could not approve his way of reasoning, neither his insight nor his judgment. I will quote his words, which are to be found at page 2896 of Hansard, Vol. III, Session of 1922.

> The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) who has, in this House, no greater admirer than myself and who commands a prestige far in advance of what his age would entitle him to—I say it openly; I stated it in private, I may do so in public—and who is a powerful debater almost without any rival in this House—merely told us in picturesque language which I shall condense into a simile after the Latin mind, by saying: that the hon. Minister of Finance's head was as white as winter. He forgot to add this: that time had not impaired his vigour, which recalls a spring day.

And further on, at page 2896, during the debate on the budget, when it was a question of whether the Liberal party would remain in power and what would be the stand taken by the hon. western members on the budget, he said:

> In other words the gentleman sitting opposite to us stated: Your policy is a poor one, but you are wrong in not having followed it. On the contrary, they add, the principles we have been preaching for the last half century are the only true ones; by applying them, you are wrong. This is, Mr. Speaker, one of the things that I have not yet understood, during my short experience in this House. I hope that public life will impart sufficient suppleness of mind to enable me to understand that this distinguished political leader and statesman was right when one day he endeavoured to reassure me in these words: My friend, logic and politics in Canada are two grand ladies who have never met in the same drawing room.. . . .

I think the time has come for one who, to-day, enters public life to shoulder his responsibilities, but I must, casually, remind the very able and estimable leader of the Agrarian party (Mr. Crerar) that to-night or in the wee hours of morn he will meet at the cross roads that lady of which I spoke a few seconds ago, and by name—cold logic.

And the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska ended his speech by these words which have always remained in my memory, because I esteem him highly; he is, indeed, an eminent lawyer, highly endowed, and who has much sway over the Liberal party and wields much influence in his profession, because his judgment is always sound:

I submit, Sir, that these three reasons are not worth much. I am sorry to say so—because the right hon. leader of the opposition, who does me the courtesy of listening just now, will not find in this House a greater admirer than me—I find with regret that the exigencies of politics have induced him, in his anxiety to defeat the main motion which is before Parliament, to take a stand giving the impression that there comes a time when the image of his country is dimmed by the clash of party interests, to the point of preventing him from taking a broader and more lofty view of the question.

We admit that the leader of the opposition has good qualities which he might have devoted to a better cause. I would not go so far as to say that I admire him more than the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska; it would be wronging our leader that I respect and honour, and who was able to surround himself with efficient ministers. I, therefore, admire the leader of the opposition, but, like the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska, I cannot admire his reasoning powers, his insight or agree with his conclusions; and in this I think I am expressing the opinion of one of my good friends, who at times, but at times only, evinces a kindly disposition toward the opposition leader. I refer to the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). The right hon. leader of the disloyal opposition of His Majesty is, as the Minister of Defence so well expressed it one day, like the Bourbons of the old regime: He has neither learned nor forgotten anything. He has not even forgotten his own defeat, or his enthusiasm for the glory of the Empire. And if you will allow me, I shall remind you by the way of his momentous words uttered during the war: "To the last man, to the last dollar for the glory of the Empire." All the votes of these poor soldiers that are fighting in the trenches for the glory of the Empire, we must have, to carry a county by the name of Nipissing, or Chambly and Vercheres. We must, with that end in view, send code telegrams; we must hold on to power, notwithstanding the solemn promises we gave that we were only a war government. But, nonsense, we hold the power, and we shall keep it. "What we have we hold" always for the glory of the Empire.

We know the result produced by this statement, in the province of Quebec. Destiny, chance, unfortunate words and many other contingencies that I shall not undertake to discuss have made the right hon. leader of the opposition, an extraordinary personage under cover of meekness and modesty. He has a particular way of his own to pulverise his opponents and hurl the thunderbolt of eloquence. He gave us to understand, on many occasions in this House, that the party to which we belonged had broken its pledges, that the people had made a mistake on December 6, 1921. I delight in recalling his indignation, either dissimulated or real,—because I am told he is a great comedian,—when an hon. member hailing from the county of Springfield (Mr. Hoey) reminded him of his broken pledges. This did not prevent this hon. member to vote with the leader of the opposition on the budget however the hon. member voted according to the dictate of his conscience. The right hon. leader of the opposition has also proclaimed his great, immense, unfathomable love for the province of Quebec. Well, I have a word to add in regard to this great love expressed in words so odd that it could not be thought sincere by people in earnest as those of the province to which I belong. When, Sir, he made those statements in the province of Quebec, he must have twisted his features in ludicrous fashion; it would have been worth as much as to see a dog swallow wasps. What has been this tardy admiration, and this sudden manifestation for the good old province of Quebec? You will allow me, Sir, to express it in two words. This love was declared, as I said a few minutes ago, at the time of the Cartierville picnics and the awakening of the Conservative party, but it had previously shown itself. It had seen daylight on a memorable date, a few days I think, before the general elections of December 6, 1921. About that time, there must have been a caucus of my right hon. friend's party; at that caucus they must have discussed the very uncertain chances of the Conservative party in Quebec; note, Sir, that I was not present at the caucus, but although I was not there, the following scene must have taken place, which I will enact for the amusement of the House,—it may perhaps divert the member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen): The Chairman of the liberal-tory-conservative-national-nationalist caucus must have told his partisans, by putting the question: "General elections are to take place, the date has been fixed for December 6, 1921. We have been in power against the people's wish long enough, we are going to consult popular opinion. What is, my good friends, your opinion?" Our advice is, answers the choir of leaders of the unionist group, that we must have general elections on December 6, 1921". Second question put by the Chairman of the caucus: "How shall we organize?" Unanimous answer: "The best way possible so as to remain in power which is so dear to us." There were delegates from all provinces at the caucus, even perhaps from Quebec. Third question by the chairman of the caucus: "How shall we act to meet the views of all the provinces—the Maritime provinces, the eastern and western provinces?" "For heaven's sake, give them cabinet appointments, " answers the chorus of wise Areopagities. "Ministers, ministers, inquire some delegates of the province of Quebec, but we have not had any in your cabinet since you have been in power." " We shall make some," answers solemnly the present right hon. leader of the opposition. "How will this take place?" questions the chorus of caucus members. " The thing is quite simple" answers the chairman, " we will make honourable three persons that have never taken part in politics; one in Three Rivers; another in Terrebonne; and still another in Montmorency and Charlevoix; and finally one in Beauharnois." The trick was played, and if the province of Quebec was not satisfied, well, it was very unreasonable. What happened, Sir? The result is known. The province remembered that this sudden effusion must have been brought on by interest which is the measure of the Conservative party's acts, We had the great satisfaction of seeing the Hon. Mr. Belley crushingly defeated by the hon. member for Charlevoix and Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), we saw the hon. President of the Privy Council beaten hollow by the present hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau); we saw the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Papineau) elected against the Hon. Mr. Monty; we had the full satisfaction to see the hon. Solicitor General, who had been so strongly urged upon to accept the nomination utterly defeated by the present hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Prevost). That is the result of the policy followed by my right hon. friend; and to-day it is asserted that the Liberal party—fears election. I shall quote the words of the right hon. member (Mr. Meighen) who spoke before me and immediately after my hon. friend from Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) and proclaimed in his peroration, that the Liberal party dreads elections:

> I venture to assert that the opinion of the people of Canada, already so often expressed, now so evident that he who runs may read, now so apparent that conceivably the government is urging its supporters to keep in the best of health and the pink of condition, for they want no more by-elections—I venture to assert that the judgment of the people of Canada is already written and waits only to be handed down and that the electors only abide the day when the conduct which I have described will be once and for all put an end to-the conduct legislative, the conduct administrative and the conduct electoral.

I wish to apologize, Mr. Speaker, for having spoken so much at length. We have followed Sir Wilfrid Laurier's policy since 1921, we, the Liberals represent, in this House, all the counties of the province of Quebec, and, I believe, we could again appeal with confidence to the impartial vote of the people. We have tried by all possible means to re-establish peace and harmony between the different groups and the various views which exist in this country. We are pushing forward and we will co-operate with all men of good will to bring back prosperity as it existed in our country previous to the troubled days of war. We do not wish to cast any slur upon the right hon. leader of the opposition who violently attacked us during the course of the last two sessions and who, to-day, again exhibited his fighting spirit reminding us of Captain Fracasse. He thinks that fear is in our hearts. We invite him to come to the province of Quebec as much as he pleases; he will always be a welcome guest; but as our late leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at times said: "When I visit Toronto, I am always a welcome guest, but Toronto always votes against me."

As for our good friends the Progressives, we invite them to join us, for we have always been without fear or reproach, as becomes worthy knights.

On motion of Mr. Sutherland the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 10.38 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Annual report of the Department of Railways and Canals.—Hon. Mr. Graham.

DEPUTY RECEIVER GENERAL'S OFFICE, TORONTO

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. A. ROBB: (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday on the Orders of the Day the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) made the following inquiry:

Will the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) please inform the House and the country when the Deputy Receiver General's office in Toronto ceased to function as a place for public deposits at interest, with right of withdrawal in Dominion notes, and whether it is true that deposits on similar terms are still being received by the Deputy Receiver General's office in British Columbia and in the Maritime provinces.

I now have the answer which is as follows: The Government Savings Bank agency at Toronto was closed 1st November, 1905, and the Savings Bank deposits transferred to the control of the Post Office Savings Bank. The public could make deposits and make withdrawals at this office. The withdrawals were met by issuing a cheque drawn on the Bank of Montreal. The depositors were not at any time paid in Dominion notes. Government Savings Bank offices are still in existence at Victoria, B.C., St. John, N.B., Halifax, N. S., and Charlottetown, P.E.I. All other offices have been closed out and the deposits transferred to the Post Office Savings Banks.

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Thursday, March 6.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, those of us who have been in parliament for a number of years will appreciate the difficulties of new members in addressing the House for the first time. Consequently I feel it a pleasure that we can all congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address on the manner in which they faced the ordeal.

Before proceeding to discuss matters pertaining to the Address, I should like to refer to the absence of some familiar faces as the result of illness. I refer more particularly to that veteran statesman, right hon. Mr. Fielding, and to Sir Lomer Gouin. Both of these gentlemen have occupied a very prominent place in the public life of this Dominion for many years, and I feel that I am expressing the sentiments of every hon. member when I say that we regret very much the circumstances which prevent their being present with us, and that we hope they may soon recover their usual health and vigour and be able again to participate in our deliberations. Their absence from this House is a distinct loss to the country, particularly under the conditions which now confront us.

There is nothing to be gained by trying to make ourselves believe that things are different from what they actually are. We are faced with a very serious condition of national affairs, as is every other country in the world to-day. This is something that naturally might be expected after the disturbing events of recent years. When we look back and realize the conditions which prevailed ten years ago and contemplate what has happened since, we can come to no other conclusion than that great national and international events have much more to do with our constitutional development than have the actions of individuals. We find all the nations of the world to-day endeavouring to re-establish themselves on a sound footing in order to meet most effectively the difficulties with which they are confronted. But I am sorry to have to feel that we are not acting with that unity which the occasion demands. I believe that we are altogther too provincial in our outlook, that we are viewing things from a narrow selfish standpoint instead of nationally.

There is an old saying, that a house divided against itself cannot stand. We have the old British system of government which, although not yet perfect, has been developed through the centuries and has been adopted by every progressive country in the world—the party system of parliamentary government. To-day the respective parties represented in this parliament come in solid blocs from certain provinces, and not a solitary representative from some provinces is to be found in the ranks of some of these parties. This is a new experience. I regret very much indeed that we have become, at least in my opinion, narrow and more provincial in our outlook than we were a few years ago. I have no doubt, however, that in the course of time circumstances will compel us to adopt a broader outlook. Every hon. gentleman in this House must have a distinct recollection of the dark days of 1918 when we were face to face with a grave crisis, and the fate of the world was in the balance. At that time things looked very black indeed. After four years of strenuous struggle on the part of the leading nations of the world it was found necessary, in order to bring to an end the conflict which had continued for so long, that there should be a united effort put forth by the allied nations to defeat the enemy. We all remember those ominous days. Early in the year 1918, when the greatest events were occurring, as we can quite well recall now, there came a sudden change in the condition that had prevailed, and the end of the conflict was hastened as a result of a united effort on the part of the allied countries, under a single command agreed upon for this purpose. I believe that the same spirit is absolutely essential at this time if we are to successfully overcome the difficulties that face us. Some will say, no doubt, that there is no use in reviewing past events because we are more concerned with the present and the future. Well, the experience of the past is a great teacher, and those who are not willing to profit by the experience of others, and the experience of nations in days gone by, are not likely to meet with much success in dealing with the world's affairs.

I shall mention presently a matter that has been featured in the Speech which is now under consideration by the House; and in doing so I would call the attention of hon. members to an event of some years ago which in many respects resembles the situation that now prevails: I refer to the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty which existed between the United States and Canada at that time. Some can recall what followed; I am not able to do so. I have, however, a distinct recollection of hearing these matters discussed, when I was quite young. When we review our history and see what the people of Canada did, when we realize the tremendous obligations which they undertook and how resolutely they set about overcoming their difficulties, I think we should draw an inspiration from the story of those days. As a result of the trade relations that then existed between ourselves and the United States, a country extending along our borders for four thousand miles, we found it necessary to develop new channels of trade; which completely revolutionized the business of our country. What happened? One of the first things that occurred was an unfortunate raid on our country by an organized body from the republic to the south, this was known as the Fenian raid and it was quickly repelled.

The next great event was the confederation of the scattered provinces of Canada, and in consequence of that union this great Dominion was formed in 1867. In 1870 the Hudson Bay Territory was purchased by the Dominion of Canada, and in the same year Manitoba became a province. A rebellion took place in western Canada at that time and was speedily suppressed. In 1871 the province of British Columbia came into confederation. In 1873 Prince Edward Island entered confederation, and in 1876 the Intercolonial railway was opened. In 1878 the National Policy was adopted; in 1880 the Arctic islands were added to the Dominion; in 1885 another rebellion took place in the Northwest and was quickly suppressed, and in the same year the Canadian Pacific railway was completed in order to link together the provinces which had come into confederation. In 1891 a great statesman, who had figured prominently in connection with all these events, died,—I refer to Sir John Alexander Macdonald. In 1896 the Canadian Northern Railway Company was formed; in 1903 the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway was chartered; and in 1906 Alberta and Saskatchewan became provinces of the Dominion.

I have referred to these events because I want to emphasize the necessity for a broader outlook on the part of our people. We must unite our forces if we wish to overcome our difficulties effectively. Canada entered the war at the oueset and made tremendous sacrifices in order to assist in bringing about the victory which was finally attained. I listened in this House the other day to a remark by an hon. member to the effect that possibly, if Canada could have foreseen or could have realized the obligations which she was going to assume, she would not have put forth so great an effort, nor would she have undertaken such stupendous obligations. Well, we can all be very wise after things have happened. We can see where mistakes were made. But was that the case in so far as this country is concerned? The forces which went from this Dominion met the enemy at some of the most critical points on the battle line, and it is hard to say what the result would have been had not the men from Canada been there and in the struggle. The attitude of Canada was an inspiration not only to the people of its Motherland, but to the other dominions and to all the allies. I am not one who will ever regret that we put forth every ounce of energy that it was possible for us to exert in those days. I think it was one of the finest things that ever happened in the history of this Dominion, and that it will be an inspiration of generations yet unborn to perform their full duty to this Dominion in the years to come.

After the struggle was over, we found the nations endeavouring to re-establish themselves and to meet their obligations, we again found that our neighbours to the south—and they were well within their rights—do not imagine for a moment that I am attaching any blame to them; it is their duty and their business to look after their own country and to adopt the measures that are best for their own people—adopted a customs tariff which placed another obstacle in our way in trading with them. We are again faced with a condition very similar to that which prevailed in this country in 1866 when the reciprocity treaty of that year was abrogated by the United States. I am referring to this because I wish to call the attention of the House to the position of those who argue that we made a tremendous mistake in 1911 in not adopting the reciprocity pact which was brought before parliament in that year. I want to emphasize this feature of that arrangement; it was a pact which might be terminated at any time by either party, and the people of the United States, if they felt that they were not reaping any advantage from any arrangements which they might have adopted at any time, could with a change of government or without again upset the conditions which had been in existence it may be for three or four or five or more years, and we would then again find ourselves with our trade channels destroyed, and new ones would have to be developed. What we need to do in this country is to develop a policy that we can be assured will have some degree of permanency, and to follow out that policy without regard to what may be done by people of other countries. Just along that line I would like to refer to some statements which were made by men prominent in the United States before that country saw fit to adopt what is known as the Fordney-McCumber tariff. In an address delivered before the New York Chamber of Commerce Mr. Charles M. Schwab said:

> Germany has gone back to work as has no other nation in Europe. Her working people are economizing, sacrificing and throwing themselves into real production.
>
> Believing as I do that the strength and prosperity of a nation depend upon the efficiency of its labour, I had something of a shock in contemplating this thought.
>
> Is it possible that after having won the war we of the allied nations, with everything in our hands will allow Germany to win the peace through the efforts of her labour?
>
> Germany can to-day put a ton of steel in England at a price $20 per ton cheaper than what it costs England to make it. Germany is to-day selling pneumatic tools in Detroit where formerly we made machinery and shipped it to Germany to sell there cheaper than she could make it.
>
> The difference is solely a matter of labour costs.
>
> Railroad costs must come down and it is in the interests of national prosperity that our government, acting through the Railroad Labour Board and every other agency, shall reduce railroad wages and bring costs down to a living point.

I might also refer to some remarks that were made some time ago by the then Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Lloyd George:

> One of the unfortunate results of the war, which had demonstrated the power of international good will, was that it should have developed into narrow, selfish, blind nationalism that was found in every direction, in customs restrictions and in trade and transportation. Transportation organized to develop international trade was used to prevent international trade. Not merely the amount of tariff was objectionable, but its fluctuations and uncertainties.
> The human intellect was exhausted in order to make trade as difficult as possible. This is the condition which we found at Genoa. Although peace has been established in Europe it is quite clear that the war atmosphere has to a certain extent remained. While the conference was sitting troops were marching forward towards the frontier. There is an atmosphere in Europe of international suspicion of impending conflict.

Now you have the opinion of two men very prominent in world affairs. Mr. Lloyd George was regretting the action that was being taken by the various nations of the world in order to re-establish themselves and take care of their own people. He realized the serious situation with which the people of the Old Land were confronted. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressive party in this House, the other day referred to the fact that there were two million men out of employment in the Old Land at the present time. Now these are things that are worthy of our serious consideration, and I would like to ask those who claim and advocate that those methods which have been adopted by these other countries are all wrong and are based on false premises, what influence can a small number of people, for there are only nine million of us, have against all these other nations, with their enormous populations, that are adopting protective methods of that kind? Are we going to permit ourselves to be absolutely destroyed for a principle or theory when it is a condition we have to face and not a theory? Even if I were the rankest free trader in the Dominion I should have to study the prevailing conditions. Speaking candidly I personally would much prefer—yes, a thousand times—to see a free trade policy adopted among all the nations of the world under which merit or efficiency would be the deciding factor and dominant influence in the world's affairs. Were that the case Canada would have no occasion to quail at the prospect; she would be in a position to compete with other nations. However, we must be guided by the prevailing conditions.

Here we are, in the northern part of this hemisphere, having a great industrial nation to the south of us, a nation possessed of immense wealth, a nation that did not enter the war at the same time that we did but acquired enormous wealth supplying munitions of war to the allies during that period—indeed, wealth poured in upon them to such an extent that if the people of the United States are in difficulties to-day it is probably largely owing to the fact that they have too great an accumulation of the world's gold in that country. We have a country equal in area to that of the United States but our population numbers only about nine millions whilst they have upwards of one hundred and ten millions of people. Argue as you will, we know that our people are passing to the country to the south, are crossing the international boundary line, every month, every week, and every day in increasing numbers. The prediction has been made by our immigration authorites at the port of Detroit that if the present movement continues, 500,000 of our people will cross into the United States before the end of the present year. In face of this I regret that there is no evidence of any real effort on the part of the government to do anything which will retard this movement, which will encourage our people to remain in the Dominion and develop the great resources which she undoubtedly possesses.

Mr. Schwab referred to what he deemed to be one of the most essential factors necessary to establish improved conditions in the United States, and that is transportation. If that is a prime necessity in the United States what must it be in Canada, a country of equal area but only sparsely populated? To my mind transportation is the great problem we have to solve at this time. The costs of transportation in Canada to-day are so great that they are positively strangling and discouraging industry and enterprise everywhere. We must bring about a better condition of affairs in that regard, or else we cannot develop our natural resources as they should be developed. I appreciate the difficulties that our friends in western Canada have to face, and I may say that I have seen evidence of those difficulties on numerous occasions. As I listened to the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) the other night when he described what it cost to transport the products of the farms in the West to Toronto, and other eastern points, how it practically absorbed all the profits they might naturally expect to realize on their produce, how absolutely impossible it was for people to carry on under such conditions, I could not help feeling how serious the situation was.

I am now going to touch upon something that has not been referred to in detail during the debate—the cost of railway transportation in the country. I have had occasion to make purchases in our own province, at points not a great distance away, and the cost of transportation for a distance of a few hundred miles exceeded by far the value of the products. That being the case, what a difficult position our friends in western Canada must be placed in when their products have to be transported over much greater distances than is the case in Ontario. Some time ago this question came before the House for consideration, and in 1920 it was referred to by the then Minister of Railways during the debate on the subject. The minister in question said on that occasion, with regard to the railways under the control of the Dominion government:

> The wage bill for the year exceeded seventy-three millions, having, owing largely to the McAdoo series of advances, jumped from fifty-four millions in 1918. In other words, out of every one dollar of revenue earned, seventy-eight cents passed directly, by way of wages, to the employees.

Was the service improved as a result of the changes which took place at that time? And let me emphasize this: When the change took place we were face to face with a crisis. It was absolutely impossible for the government of the day to do otherwise than to consent to the scale of wages adopted in the United States. This was referred to by the chairman of the railway board in 1921. I have here the Canadian Annual Review which gives a synopsis of some of the speeches he delivered at that time. Referring to this subject this publication says:

> The railways and the freight rates' question:—The commission and its associated railway problems were much before the public in 1921; the question of freight rates was one of the most conspicuous and difficult of these issues. Mr. Carvell was very frank in his statements and judgments; he expressed himself clearly and did not evade points of controversial character. The railway board visited the western centres in the spring of 1921 and heard various appeals and statements as to freight rates; outside of the commission sittings, Mr. Carvell continued his outspoken utterances. Speaking to the Canadian Club at Brandon on April 22, he described the railway problem as more important than the tariff or any other question before the people: "It cost $40,000,000 more to run the C.N.R. last year than was brought in, and that is not reflection on the people at the head of the railways or on the government. The Canadian National is a conglomeration of a lot of railways that couldn't run themselves and, therefore, had to be taken over by the government, and if anyone thinks the government, or any man, can take over these roads and turn them into a dividend-paying proposition in a year or so he is much mistaken." In reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, he was equally explicit as being "the finest system on the American continent". Then he turned to the West and its alleged view of railways; "I have always felt that the true criterion of a public utility that has not the power to increase its own rates is: "What does it cost to run the road"? However, I find here that the criterion is: "What the cattle sell for? What does wheat realize per bushel? Down east it would be the price realized for pulp-wood."

And so on. Further on I find:

As to the future: "No matter what happens, railway labour must be reborn and an honest day's labour for an honest day's pay must be the first principle observed. Canadian labour is not responsible for the McAdoo award, but it is responsible if it is not prepared to give honest service." His view of the labour situation was important because it could not but affect the policy and decisions of the board. "There are engineers and conductors to-day who are making $4,000, $5,000 and even $6,000 a year as the result of the McAdoo Award. I am beginning to be skeptical of the advisability of having Canadian unions controlled in the United States."

Mr. Carvell was unceasing in his expression of opinion along these lines. He told the Kiwanis Club, Vancouver, on April 7th, that, "The people want lower freight rates, but they will not permit us to cut off costly Sunday trains. * * * Next to the unnecessary train services, the greatest factor in maintaining high rates are the wages which have to be paid as the result of the McAdoo award of 1918 and the Chicago Award of July, 1920. There are station agents on the national railways whose wages are from $120 to $225 a month, but who are making from $75 to $125 a week as the result of overtime." To the Vancouver Board of Trade (April 12) he was equally explicit in denouncing, as on previous occasions, the government ownership of railways. "People are going to find out that it will cost $70,000,000 more this year to operate this toy than it will earn."

To the local Canadian Club on the 19th Mr. Carvell declared that: "There must be a rearrangement of working conditions of railway employees, a reduction in wages, a reduction in the price of coal." As to the American wage awards which Canadian railways had to adopt he said: "The payroll for the Canadian National railways prior to the McAdoo and Chicago Awards was $43,265,000; the estimate for the present year is $81,-347,000. The Canadian Pacific payroll prior to the Awards was $56,190,000; the estimate for this year is $100,000,000."

So that this matter of transportation costs is to my mind one of the most important with which we are confronted for this reason, that, instead of encouraging efficiency or anything of that nature, ensuring an honest day's labour for a day's pay, there was attached to the conditions a provision which placed a premium upon inefficiency and anything but the giving of value for the money which was being received; by reason of the fact that after a railway employee had put in so many hours, if he could delay a train service he would obtain pay and a half for the overtime. I know as a matter of fact instances where this has been deliberately done by the employees operating trains, particularly freight trains, in the province of Ontario. Hon. members can easily see what an incentive it would be to do something of that nature. Just along that line, I do not want anyone to think that I am opposed to labour unions. On the contrary, I have always approved of labour unions. I think they have done a great deal for what is commonly called labour in this country, and as a matter of fact in Canada we are all labourers; we have no class in this Dominion who would not come under that category; undoubtedly there have been very substantial results from these organizations. In this regard there has been a slight reduction, in wages, since that time, but they have made it impossible for the deflation to take place in many other occupations, and they have made it impossible to reduce the cost of living in this country. They have maintained a condition which reacts on what is commonly called labour. The cost of transporting coal, for instance, in this Dominion from the east and from the west to the central part of the Dominion is so great that it is prohibitive, and notwithstanding the abundance of this material which we have in our own country, as a result of the attitude of those who are in control of our railways at the present time—and I refer to the regulations which were put into effect in this award,—it has been made impossible for us to bring the cost of living in Canada down to the point where it should be. The deflation has taken place in so far as agriculture is concerned, and it is almost where it was prior to the war, and consequently hon. members can easily appreciate the difficulty with which those who are engaged in that industry are confronted at this time. They have been waiting patiently to see this deflation take place elsewhere. But there are organized bodies here, which are endeavouring to prevent themselves being brought under the same conditions under which one-half of the people of this country are labouring at this time.

Now this is a matter which cannot be allowed to continue, and must be dealt with by parliament so that there may be an end to this condition of affairs. We are not going to tolerate any autocracy of this kind on the part of any organized body in this Dominion. It cannot be permitted. We must have equal rights for all the people of this Dominion, without regard to any organized body which may have considerable influence, to which governments and political parties may at times be listening with a view to securing their support. I know something of what happened during the last Dominion election in my constituency. I had occasion to interview some parties with whom I was acquainted, and I went down to the railway station just at five o'clock when they would be quitting work, and I was told that the superintendent for the district had just departed on the five o'clock train for London, after issuing instructions to the foremen of the section-men employed on the road that they were all to be taken out of the county on the next morning to test a gravel pit in a county a few miles away; and notwithstanding the fact that there was a train coming in at five o'clock on the day of the election which could have brought these men back, they were not permitted to come on that train but had to wait for a later train when it was too late for them to vote. These are some of the things of what we had to contend with in the last federal election. I am referring to this because I knew of the circumstances. Not only at this one point, but at another point in the eastern part of the constituency the same thing took place, and these men were all ordered out to Paris to test a gravel pit there on that day in December. I am referring to this matter, because I believe that our transportation system is vital to the prosperity of Canada; that it constitutes the arteries, the veins, the very life blood of this country; that we cannot hope to succeed unless we have efficient transportation. While it may be said and argued that we have built railways much in advance of the requirements of the time, I am not going to deal with that matter; but I am going to argue that it is necessary for us to make the best of conditions as we find them and to see that we have efficiency in our transportation system. As Mr. Schwab pointed out to the people of the United States, it is necessary for us to deal with this problem. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day, in speaking on the Address, made reference to this and the efforts which were being put forth by the Dominion Railway Board to make a success of our system of railways. I do not wish to say anything that would in any way discourage those who are carrying on that work. I realize that they have a very difficult task and require all the encouragement which we can give them. At the same time, I am going to call your attention to something which I know a good many people in Canada are not aware of, and that is a statement made at Halifax on the 17th January, 1922, by the chairman of the railway board:

When Mr. Carvell declared that the commissioners had no control over rates on government-owned railways in general and the Intercolonial in particular; that "under the Railway Act, section 5, control of government railway's operation is excluded from the commission's powers although I think it should have supervision of such railways" that, however, "if the minister or the Governor-in-Council wishes the opinion of this board as to freight rates (on government lines) I think they would have a right to call upon it." In its general inquiry as to the equalization of eastern and western freight rates, the board sat in Ottawa in the middle of February and heard W. B. Lanigan of the Canadian Pacific Railway quote the commission's judgment in the western rate case of 1914.

The railway board, who have rendered splendid service to this country in years gone by, have apparently no control over this system. We were told by the Prime Minister the other day that this matter was outside government interference or the interference of parliament. We realized that great efforts were being made to put it far beyond the reach of parliament when a bill was brought in last year in connection with what is known as the branch line railways, for construction extending over a period of three years. This parliament was asked to vote a very large sum of money under those conditions. That, however, was not a very good time to advance such a policy as that, in view of the fact that the board which had been created by my right hon. friend, when he assumed the reins of office, had a short time before that ventured into an investment or a purchase in the city of Paris which rather startled the people of this country and which was known as the purchase of the Scribe hotel for about $2,000,000. When the present government came into power, there was in control of the government system of railways a board of old, experienced railway men who had been brought up and were familiar with the conditions of this country. Mr. D. B. Hanna, who was in control, by the wonderful work which he had accomplished during the short time in which he was at the head of the government system of railways, had done a great deal towards making a success of those old decrepit roads to which Mr. Carvell refers, that were not able to do business and that had to be taken over and operated by the government in view of the advances which had been made to them. Did the Prime Minister, when he saw fit to make a change, put forth any great effort to see that a board was selected in whom the people of this country would have confidence? Did he select men of experience, men well known for their general knowledge of the affairs of Canada? I think not; I think, on the contrary, he was looking at matters from a political standpoint rather than from the interests of this Dominion. When you consider the experience of the men who constituted that board, I think you can come to no other conclusion. Sir Henry Thornton may be an outstanding man amongst the railway men of the world; I have not a word to say against him. Personally, I knew little or nothing of him. I hope he will prove to be all that it is claimed he is, and that he will make a success of the government railways; but if he does so, I can assure you that that will not be as a result of the assistance which he is going to receive from the board, but his success will be a great tribute to the personality of Sir Henry Thornton himself. Just along that line, in 1922, before the appointment was made, the Prime Minister, in a speech which he made in his own constituency, referred to this matter. He had criticized some of the men who had been on the board which had control of this in the past, and he said:

> We will give the railways a free hand, out of the control of politics. And we will not put on the board of directors any man who is connected in any way with other railways or who is connected with companies dealing with railways.

No one in such a position would be placed upon this board! In that connection I should like to inquire how it happens that James Stewart, president of the Maple Leaf Milling Company and a director of the Bank of Montreal, was placed upon this board. I do not object to Mr. Stewart, I think he is a very capable man; but his appointment was in absolute contradiction of the statement made by the Prime Minister just before the appointments were put through. I notice there was another member of the board, a man who occupied a seat in this house for about seventeen years, a man well advanced in life, a most estimable gentleman, but a man who, it seems to me, if we may judge from his participation in the debates of this House did not know very much about railway matters. I think if hon. members will consult Hansard they will find that about nine-tenths of his oratorical efforts were put forth in expounding matters connected with the fisheries of the Maritime provinces. He was well within his rights in so doing, and no doubt he felt he was discharging his duties to his constituency. But I do not think the Prime Minister in appointing that gentleman to the directorate was helping to re-establish the confidence of the country, something which was absolutely necessary at that time. I might refer to other appointees to the National Railway Board. Some of those gentlemen did not occupy very prominent positions in our public life, and did not have the complete confidence of the people among whom they lived. I think this has been brought up in the House before. One of them, Mr. Frederick G. Dawson, was connected with a rather shady transaction in the province of British Columbia. Another director was a director of the Home Bank; he also was placed on the National Railway Board to ensure efficient railway service. It has been reported in the press that the Home Bank was in financial difficulties some time before it collapsed, and that the National Railway Board deposited in the neighbourhood of one million dollars with the bank in order to enable it to make a satisfactory report to the Finance department, the deposit, having served its purpose, being withdrawn shortly afterwards. It is also claimed by some that in view of the knowledge possessed by those who withdrew this large deposit, it will be incumbent on the country to make good the deficiency by an equivalent amount before the liquidation of the bank is closed. I do not know how much evidence there is to substantiate those claims, but I do say that as a result of the exposure, Mr. Gough had to resign his membership on the board, and another appointment has since been made to fill the vacancy.

These are some of the things which have happened in connection with our National Railway system. The Prime Minister the other night referred to what had taken place in the Kent, N.B. by-election, and how his government failed to secure the support of the electors simply by reason of the efforts that he and his colleagues had exerted to keep the National Railway system free from government interference, and he declared that the directorate are to be given a free hand. Would the evidence which I have submitted indicate that the government are not interfering in the management of these railways? If this great system does succeed, I am satisfied it will be owing entirely to Sir Henry Thornton and regardless of the board.

I notice that special reference is made in the Speech to the tariff. It has already been pointed out by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) that it was an unusual, in fact an unheard-of, proceeding for specific reference to the tariff to be made in the Speech from the Throne. I have personally taken the trouble to search the records back for quite a number of years without finding a single instance where this has occurred before What is the effect of the intimation that there will be a decrease in the tariff on instruments of production? The impression to-day is that reductions are to be made in line with the platform of the party which is now in power, and the effect of this is complete stagnation in the agricultural implement industry, a stagnation which will continue for some time. Can hon. members imagine for one moment manufacturers engaged in industries likely to be affected making large purchases of raw material to carry on their business? On the other hand, can hon. members imagine those who may be contemplating purchasing such implements doing so to-day if they think they will be able to buy them at a lower price in the near future? Instead of establishing confidence on the part of the people the government have by their action in this matter aggravated the difficulties with which our manufacturers are confronted, and I think it is due to this House and to the country that the government should state specifically, before this debate closes, their intentions in this direction, and thus remove any misapprehensions which may be entertained by those who are engaged in this industry.

At the outset of my address I remarked that the country was likely to suffer great loss by reason of the absence through illness of our right hon. friend, W. S. Fielding. Speaking on the budget last year he stated:

> There is no finality in legislation either as respects that tariff, or as respects any thing else. That which parliament can do to-day it can undo to-morrow. Everybody knows that. Nevertheless it is desirable that something like an assurance of tariff stability should be given to business men. Exceptions will occur.

A little further on he added:

> Speaking broadly, it is possible to give the country a reasonable assurance of stability of tariff. Such assurances are very desirable, for no business man would care to enter upon enterprises which may be brought into peril by frequent tariff changes.

Those were the views enunciated by that old, experienced Minister of Finance. I could duplicate those statements by quoting further from his speech on that occasion, but I do not think I need take up the time of the House by doing so. The Minister of Finance, who has occupied that office many years longer than any former Minister of Finance, had the right idea as to what disturbing elements these constant changes in the tariff would be. I remember that prior to the election of 1904, and again in 1908, the hon. gentleman put himself on record in this matter. I have here an extract from a speech which he delivered in this House in 1907 on a motion of Mr. Schaffner, that the committee reconsider item No. 445 and that the item be amended by striking out the figures 17½ per cent in the general tariff and inserting in lieu thereof the figures 10 per cent. In arguing against this reduction, which had reference to agricultural implements, Mr. Paterson, who was a member of the government at that time, expressed himself forcibly on the subject. The present Minister of Finance in that connection said:

> By a careful calculation we are advised that the drawbacks we allow are somewhat less than the disadvantage under which the mnufacturer is placed by reduction of the tariff. Even suppose for a moment that he got everything free and had a duty of 17½ per cent on the implements, would that be an extravagant duty as things go in this country? I believe this proposal of the hon. member for Souris, if adopted, would do an injustice to an established industry. My belief is that if this motion were passed we would strike a severe blow at one of the great industries of the country. I believe the International Harvester Company would find it to its interests to close up its business in Hamilton, at least so much of it as is devoted to mowers and binders, and have them made at the American branch and bring them from the United States. The factory in Hamilton is an American concern. With a moderate duty we have induced American capital to come into Canada and to establish that great industry; and after we have brought it in and established it in Canada I believe that if we were to pass this resolution the company operating that industry would find it profitable to close the Hamilton factory and bring in the goods which they make in the United States.

Now, we have upwards of $90,000,000 invested in industries of this kind in the province of Ontario alone giving employment to many thousands of workmen; and notwithstanding anything that may be said to the contrary I think it will be conceded by every hon. member who knows anything about the quality of the implements which are manufactured in the province, that our manufacturers in this Dominion turn out a class of agricultural implements equal to any turned out anywhere else in the world. There is no doubt about that; so far as efficiency in that direction is concerned, it is indicated now in the Speech from the Throne that the protection enjoyed by the manufacturers of these instruments of production is going to be lowered or removed. The duty is now 10 per cent, instead of 17 1-2 per cent. I need only call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the views expressed by the Minister of Finance, as I have already quoted them, to shew the seriousness of the situation. Is it a matter of trifling concern to us that a great industry of that kind should be put out of business in Canada to-day? If there is a possibilty of anything of that kind occurring as a result of what apparently is contemplated by the government, then I say that the government should immediately let the country know precisely what they propose to do in that regard. Has our experience in the past been such as to lead us to believe that we should be able to purchase these articles at lower prices than we are paying now? We know as a matter of fact that the reductions which have taken place in the past have not brought about such a result; on the contrary, in proportion as we have had reductions, there has been an increase in the price. Some of my hon. friends will perhaps refer to the binder twine industry, they will point to the fact that we still have a binder twine industry here, that it is thriving all right. Have they ever considered what the effect would be if we did not have that industry in Canada? And are they sure that the binder twine industry here is not being controlled by the industries in the United States? If the factories here were all closed they might anticipate an increase in the tariff. Under present conditions they have the field to themselves, and the fact is that they control the prices of the Brantford industry. We all know that the removal of the tariff in connection with binder twine was followed immediately by a tremendous increase in prices. I am satisfied that if the agricultural implement industry of this country were put out of business you would find this repeated. In the United States to-day the agricultural implement industry is controlled by the International Harvester Company, and if we close up this industry in this country we shall find across the border the biggest combine in this line on this continent. Yet my hon. friends look forward with hope to relief from present conditions as a result of a reduction or removal of the tariff on these articles. In this connection, with particular reference to the tariff policy of hon, gentlemen opposite, I want to quote a few words that were uttered by a prominent statesman of this country in 1903. The following statement was made by the Hon. J. Israel Tarte:

> I say it openly, I say it from the bottom of my heart, that I fully expected that the Liberal party, with which I have been connected during the last ten years, would carry out the policy it was understood in 1896 they would carry out. I am weighing my words. I know what arrangements, what understanding took place between some public men. I know what took place. I do not divulge any secrets. I know what we did in the election of 1896 in Montreal. I see within the radius of my eye public men who, at our request,—

"Our request," mark you; and he was a member of the Liberal party.

> —came to the city of Montreal, went to the manufacturers, with the knowledge of the leaders of the party, and told them not only would the tariff not be disturbed, but it would be changed in the right direction when the proper time came.

This is the policy that was advocated by the great Liberal party in 1896 when they obtained the confidence of the people of this Dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And in 1921 also.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And again in 1921. Strange to say, these secret agreements and understandings were all arrived at in the great metropolis of this country, the city of Montreal.

I heard the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) the other night referring to the fact that my hon. friends to my left were going to have a checker-up, a man who was going to check up on the government every night to see they were coming across and making good their promises, that they were not going to have absolute confidence in the government until the government delivered the goods. Is this not a nice condition of affairs—this process of bargain and sale between two political parties in order that the government may retain power? Is it to be the permanent policy of the once great Liberal party that it is prepared to bargain and barter with some other political party, in order that it may retain office? Are the tremendous obstacles with which we are confronted not worthy of consideration by these men above the paltry fruits of office? I do not think that matter need be dealt with further, but in so far as the tariff references are concerned it is absolutely essential that the situation shall be cleared up immediately.

I have here a statement issued by the Department of Customs and Excise for the last nine months of the past year—that is, after the close of the financial year—and I find that there was imported into this country during those nine months $130,452,285 worth of vegetable products, mainly foodstuffs and animal products which might nearly all be produced on the farms of Canada. In addition to that, there was $43,603,449 worth of vegetable products other than foodstuffs imported, or a total of $174,055,734 during the last nine months of the past year. Let me ask my hon. friends to my left and hon. members opposite if this is not a matter that demands the attention of the government and of parliament? How long can we permit such a condition of affairs to prevail? I know it will be said by some that there is a very limited market in this country, and that this is not going to provide the redress which is necessary in order to overcome the difficulties which present themselves to the people of western Canada. I appreciate to the full the difficulties with which these people are confronted, but I want to emphasize again, as I have endeavoured to do on other occasions, the need for us to realize our interdependence one upon the other. We cannot afford to divide our people into classes and groups. We must unite our forces and give a little here and a little there in order that we may bring about the best results. We ought to have, if we do not have, the same objective in view, and that is to build up on this North American continent a great and a prosperous country.

Mr. FORKE: What is that $43,000,000 worth of vegetable products made up of other than foodstuffs?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It does not specify in this report, but that information could be very easily ascertained from the customs and excise returns which are available. This is a monthly statement issued by the department and does not go into those details.

Mr. BROWN: Would it not have been a good idea to find out if it included rubber, for instance?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I might go into detail as to the imports as specified in the trade returns but I do not have them here.

Mr. BROWN: If those figures include rubber they have no force in this discussion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Rubber is not included in foodstuffs, that is a certainty. But something that comes very near to rubber is hides. Of calf skins we imported of these 4,300,000 lbs., and exported 5,177,000 lbs. in 1923. There is no tariff on hides coming into this country. Beef hides we imported to the amount of 35,011,886 lbs., and exported 46,519,400 lbs. We are great producers of these things, and hon. gentlemen will observe the advantage it would be to have some control over the situation so as not to permit imports of these goods into our country from the United States and elsewhere under present tariff conditions. Of sheepskins we imported 2,129,000 lbs., and exported 5,538,000 lbs. Of the imports a large quantity came from the United States. Another class of imports is mutton and lamb. During the last four years we imported 17,567,067 lbs., and exported 24,054,700 lbs. Of the 17,567,067 lbs. of mutton and lamb imported, 9,052,817 lbs. came from the United States. Our imports of wool during these same four years amounted to 51,891,000 libs., and we exported 26,173,626 lbs.

Mr. LUCAS: Why are these imported from the United States if we have the raw material in Canada?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Because we have no customs tariff on them.

Mr. BROWN: It is because somebody wants them.

Mr. LUCAS: Because they can buy them cheaper over there.

Mr. WARNER: Why do not the manufacturers use our home products if they are so good, and our manufacturers are so patriotic?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I will tell my hon. friend why they do not. Because they can import cheaper and poorer stuff from abroad. Take the importation of meats. During the calendar year, 1922, $9,286,552 worth of meats were imported and of agricultural implements $7,732,215 worth nearly $2,000,000 worth more of meat products than of agricultural implements were imported. Is it a matter of small importance that these food products are being brought into our country as they are at this time? Is it not important and essential that some action should be taken in that regard? Of bacon, ham and fresh pork there were imported 46,000,000 lbs; in 1921, 22,000,000 lbs.—from the United States remember; in 1922, 28,000,000 lbs. and in 1923, 33,098,000 lbs. Hon. members will wonder how it is possible for imports of this kind to be coming into Canada from the United States. Hon. members, perhaps, do not realize that pork can be raised much more cheaply in the United States than in this country. In the southern states much of the pork produced there is raised practically without any care at all; the animals run out doors the year round—in fact in some of the states when hogs were selling at 5 and 5 1-2 cents per pound they were bringing about 8 cents in Canada. You can therefore easily see the effect upon the Canadian market by the importation under a very low tariff of products of that kind, in some states fattened on acorns and nuts. Evidently a great deal of that quality of pork finds its way into Canada. Is this to continue without even a protest from hon. members to my left? Government officials are engaged by the hundreds if not by the thousands in grading our hogs and enforcing all kinds of regulations. The brain of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is so congested with the need for imposing regulations upon the Canadian farmers that it is hard to tell where the thing is going to end. Many of our farmers are so absolutely discouraged with the regulations in force to-day, that rather than submit to the required restrictions they are going out of business. In spite of our efforts to improve the quality of Canadian produce we are permitting inferior stuff to enter the country under a small specific tariff. Why not impose an ad valorem tariff against meat products of that kind so that when the price goes up the duty will also advance? Why is there such a low tariff maintained on butter and eggs, that immense quantities of these products are coming in under a duty of only 3 and 4 cents per pound and per dozen, whereas Canadian products of a like character have to meet an American tariff of 8 cents per pound and 8 cents per dozen? These are some of the inconsistencies in our present tariff. The country itself is not responsible for the disabilities from which we suffer. Canada is a land of great resources.

The Prime Minister declared that this influx from the country to the city is inevitable, and he did not hold out any hope that anything would be done to bring about a different condition of affairs. He led the House to believe that no remedy could be provided and nothing could be done. I do not agree with that position, owing to high transportation charges, and the fixation of labour prices and the hours of labour. Agriculture is at a standstill and people are becoming discouraged. I could not help thinking when referring to the names of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, of a remark that was made by one of them a short time ago in the city of Toronto, in asking the government of the province of Ontario to enforce regulations with regard to the hours of labour on government contracts and other industrial pursuits. He did not regard agriculture as an industry but as a sort of family affair and consequently it should not be interfered with. Produce food cheaply and he would be content.

The Prime Minister told us there is going to be retrenchment in expenditures, that ocean rates are to be controlled—there is no intimation that railway rates are to be controlled —and that a further interchange of correspondence has taken place between the Dominion government and the government of the United States in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway. I am not going to enter upon a discussion of the St. Lawrence waterway, but I will point out very briefly that this great avenue of commerce has been created by nature. The great North American continent is tributory to it, tremendous cities with millions of population, are located along the inland waters, and the St. Lawrence waterway will be deepened, sooner or later. Ocean traffic is coming up to the head of the lakes, and the great city of Chicago and other American cities, are insisting that this improvement be carried out. What are we doing? The government has been approached time and again, and we are told that a further interchange of correspondence has taken place in regard to the matter. We are informed in this House that all that is necessary just now is to keep up the correspondence with the United States with regard to the matter.

As far as retrenchment in expenditures is concerned, Mr. Speaker, that is something we will all welcome. I hope, however, that the reports which are current in this city at this time, that the employees who are being dismissed from the service are largely men who have served this country at the front during the war are not correct. We hear that a deputation has been organized to await upon the government to ask them to advance money for transportation purposes, to enable these people to go to the United States. I hope, for the sake of our reputation, that this is not correct. There is going to be retrenchment in the expenditures. That was indicated some time ago, although it is not referred to as specifically in the Speech as some other things, for instance the tariff. We were told a short time ago that the government were not going to continue the grant to assist in building highways in this Dominion. The construction of highways in the Dominion has changed very materially during the past few years. By reason of the difficulties which I have already pointed out, transportation for short hauls is being largely carried on by motor truck, rather than by the railways, and a great national highway is being constructed across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific, linking together the different provinces, with a view to easy intercourse between those provinces. They are not provincial highways or local highways in the sense that they were a few years ago, but they comprise one great interprovincial highway which may well come within the provision of being for the general advantage of Canada; and we are told by the government that they are going to cease giving grants for this object. We are also told the government are not going to continue the grant to agriculture under the Agricultural Instruction Act. There has been about $1,100,000 a year paid out for this purpose which, we have been informed, is not going to be continued. I would like to refer to the report in connection with this matter which was placed on the Table of the House during the last session. Some hon. members may recall that we had considerable discussion with regard to the means employed by the government to secure information in connection with this matter during the past two sessions. In this report the benefits of the Agricultural Instruction Act are referred to, and the party to whom was delegated the duty of making the report brings in his findings and concludes as follows:

Therefore I beg leave to recommend that the Agricultural Instruction Act be renewed for a period of ten years.

After interviewing the various governments of the Dominion with regard to this matter, the so-called commissioner, Mr. Duncan Marshall, points out the advantages obtained under this aid to agriculture and recommends the renewal of the act. Now we are informed that this is not to be continued any longer and that this is one of the ways in which this retrenchment is to be effected. I would like to say to the government that there is a possibility under present conditions of curtailing expenses in some lines which may not be economy in the end, but which may be the very reverse, although it may be cutting down expenditures.

The Prime Minister, in his speech in the present debate, spoke of lack of control by the government over the appointments being made in the Civil Service, by the Civil Service Commission and attributed to this the government defeats in Halifax and Kent. He said that the people cannot understand how the government are not controlling these appointments and so attach much blame to them. The indignation feigned by the Prime Minister on that occasion, I am sure, must have struck the House as being very, very amusing in view of the fact that we had some experience along these lines during the past session when the estimates were going through. I refer to the efforts put forth by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture in connection with what he termed in 1902 his "special messenger," Mr. Duncan Marshall, who was in the pay of the government, and in regard to whose duties we were anxious to obtain some information. We wanted to ascertain how the appointment came to be made. The minister displayed a good deal of ingenuity in evading the provisions of the Civil Service Act in securing appointments in his department, and I am sure the people of Kent, N.B., when they realize that possibly some of their own ministers are not able to bring about the same results as the Minister of Agriculture does when he wants something, will attach more blame to them possibly than they do at the present time. The skill displayed by the hon. minister (Mr. Motherwell) on that occasion would have been amusing, were it not that this is a serious matter. I recall that in 1922 the hon. gentleman distinctly informed the House that it was quite a temporary appointment for a specific purpose, and it would be completed in the course of six months.

He also informed us that Mr. Marshall was a commissioner for a specific purpose and not the Commissioner of Agriculture. It is well known that he has been advertised throughout this Dominion as the Commissioner of Agriculture, but the Auditor General's report, which was tabled the other day, shows that he received during the year ended March 31, last, $6,000 in salary and $4,938.51 for expenses. Strange to say, in the same Auditor General's report there is some correspondence from that department in regard to the matter:

Audit Office, Ottawa, September 20, 1923.

Dear Sir:—I find on examination of the payments made under your letter of credit during the past fiscal year, on the vote for the administration of the Agricultural Instruction Act—No. 52—that Mr. Duncan Marshall was paid as Commissioner of Agriculture, $6,000, in monthly instalments of $500, to March 31, 1923.

As you are aware Mr. Marshall's appointment as a commissioner was authorised by Order in Council—P.C. 223—dated February 7, 1922.

Will you please let me know if a commission was issued to Mr. Marshall and if such commission limited the period of his services to any specific date.

Yours truly,

WM. KEARNS,
Assistant Auditor General.

The Deputy Minister, Agriculture Department, Ottawa.

Department of Agriculture,
Ottawa, September 20, 1923.

Dear Sir:—Replying to your letter of the 20th instant, I have to advise you that no commission was issued to Mr. Marshall.

Yours very truly,

A. L. JARVIS,
Acting Deputy Minister.

It appears that Mr. Marshall was not even appointed a commissioner, although he has drawn practically $10,000 from the treasury of this country for the past fiscal year. The order in council, a copy of which I have in my hand, shows that Mr. Marshall was on the job almost as soon as the government assumed office. Under this order in council, not only was the minister authorized to have him appointed, but his appointment was to date back to January 15, 1922, almost as soon as the government assumed office. I pointed out that Mr. Duncan Marshall, supposed to be the Commissioner of Agriculture, was carrying on the work as an organiser for the Liberal party; that he had appeared in my constituency by request of Liberal officials in that constituency and had addressed a gathering of the Liberals there; and that it was intimated by the chairman that he was there by request of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I will refer to the Globe of June 29, 1922:

5 p.m.

Commissioner of Agriculture addresses Oxford Grits at picnic. Woodstock, June 28.

And so on. From the local paper, I find:

June 29, 1922. Hon. Duncan Marshall, Dominion Commissioner of Agriculture, speaks at South Oxford Liberal picnic at Otterville.

Further on:

W. C. Brown, of Tillsonburg, South Oxford, representative on the Ontario Liberal executive, occupied the chair in the absence of M. G. Dean, president of the South Oxford Reform Association, he having suffered an automobile breakdown which delayed him. Mr. Brown, in a brief and eulogistic address, introduced the speaker of the day, Hon. Duncan Marshall, who was asked by Premier King to appear at the picnic on his behalf, as he himself was unable to come.

Some of us may recall that during the past session, in endeavouring to secure some information with regard to this matter, I was ruled out of order by the Chairman for referring to it, and I was also informed that the item under which the salary of this supposed commissioner would appear was that of Civil Government. I began to look up under this heading and I was unable to find the item. I went on to discuss the matter later on, and I was again called to order by the Chair. In Hansard of February 23, 1923, I find this discussion:

Mr. Spencer: Is the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture included in this item?

Mr. Motherwell: No.

And he immediately branched off on to another subject. Again a little further on:

Mr. Spencer: The minister has not answered my question in regard to the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture. Is that included in this item?

Mr. Motherwell: No.

Mr. Sutherland: Where does the salary paid the Commissioner of Agriculture come in? I cannot find it under the head of Civil Government.

Mr. Motherwell: It was in the previous vote that has just been passed.

Was that not clever! I attempted to discuss the matter again and I was immediately called to order. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who was acting as leader of the opposition that night, stated:

Mr. Chairman, I would rather think that the hon. minister does not want to take a sharp advantage of the members of the committee.

And further on he said:

There is nothing in the estimates to show from which source the salary is paid, and I would suggest to the minister that instead of trying to take a technical advantage here he move—as I know he will— that the proper item be opened up on which this salary can be discussed.

A little further on:

Mr. Motherwell: But I want to assure the committee that I did not try to "put anything over" when they called out "carried". I am not going to stand in the way of discussing any vote.

Sir Henry Drayton: I was sure the Minister would say that.

Quite natural. The Chairman endeavoured to have the item passed. I also occupied a few minutes in discussing this item. "Item agreed to" was called:

Sir Henry Drayton: I understood that the minister was going to reopen the previous item.

The Chairman: It cannot be reopened without the unanimous consent of the committee.

Sir Henry Drayton: I understood the minister was going to ask for that consent.

Mr. Motherwell: No, no.

Sir Henry Drayton: Then the appeal has certainly gone unheeded. In fact, it has been refused.

Mr. Motherwell: I responded for myself. I cannot speak for the committee.

Sir Henry Drayton: Perhaps the minister himself will make the motion.

Mr. Motherwell: Oh, no, I will not make it.

And so on.

A little further on, after denying that efforts were being made to smuggle through the committee items that were worthy of some discussion, the minister said:

We may not come to Civil Government again for several days. I only want to reiterate what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has said, namely, that the last thing in our minds, as was suggested by some hon. gentleman, was a desire to smuggle something through. What have we to cover up?

Mr. Sutherland: That is what we would like to know.

And so the matter ended for the time being. Now, Sir, I have produced evidence that Mr. Duncan Marshall was supposed to be in the employ of the government as a commissioner when in fact he was not a commissioner at all. We were told that he was employed to do a certain thing. There is the report submitted to parliament indicating that Mr. Duncan Marshall recommended the continuance of assistance under the Agricultural Act, and that the minister and the government had paid no attention to the recommendation. Consequently we can come to no other conclusion than that the government were not sincere in claiming that Mr. Duncan Marshall was appointed for this purpose. If retrenchment is to take place, I would advise the government to see to it that their official organizer is in the future paid out of their own pockets and not out of the treasury. It is an unheard of condition of affairs and will destroy any confidence the people in this country may have in the government.

I have touched upon a few subjects that I believe are worthy of consideration, the most important being the need for national unity and the necessity for the government to immediately deal with matters of pressing concern. In this connection I would recommend that the government remove the penalty which is now placed upon enterprise and energy, because that is exactly the result of the legislation which was passed last session. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) yesterday referred to two measures that were put through this House last session by the government of which he is a supporter, measures which brought about exactly that condition of affairs. We all know that this is generally acknowledged to be the case throughout the country, and the number of exemptions by orders in council which have been issued by the government sufficiently indicates that the government themselves realize this to be so. This matter should again engage the attention of the administration.

There is also the premium that is being placed upon inefficiency and lack of energy by the regulations and hours of labour in certain occupations, particularly in the Civil Service. I think every hon. member realizes the inconvenience we are subjected to during each session through the government offices opening so late in the mornings,—6½ hours constituting a day's work for any one in the employ of the government. What we require in this country is an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. We must have value for the money that is paid out; and there is no reason why those who are engaged in the Civil Service should work only 6½ hours—in fact during a considerable portion of the year it is only about 5½ hours—while other people are labouring from eight to twelve hours a day. I have in the past pointed out that I thought it would be to the advantage of the country generally if the seat of government could be located at some place where our ministers would be free from the influence of those in the service. This is a matter that should be dealt with immediately, to see that the hours of labour are put on a parity with those obtaining in other occupations.

Mr. Speaker, I would point out that our undeveloped resources are so great that we must, if need be, offer some better inducements to attract capital. I noticed in a report of an address delivered recently by Mr. Stephen Leacock, Professor of Economics at McGill University, that he pointed out that by reason of our present policy capital was alarmed and in hiding, waiting for something to do and that it had been frightened into that concealment by the uncertainty of the present situation. Is not that a startling statement from the lips of such an economic authority as Mr. Leacock? If this is the view entertained by a man in his position, are we not right in assuming that there is grave danger confronting the country to-day?

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Many years ago I read an address by the late Principal Grant of Queen's, delivered to the students of his university, and it made a strong impression upon my mind. After pointing out the duty that students owed to themselves and to the state. he said:

> Think what a home we have. Every province is fair to see. Our sons and daughters are proud of their natal soil. Then why should not we, taken together, inspire confidence and loyalty in souls less capable of patriotic emotion? I have sat on blocks of coal in the Pictou mines, I have wandered through the glades of Cape Breton and around Cape North, I have driven for a hundred miles beneath apple blossoms in the Cornwallis and Annapolis valleys, I have seen the splendour of our western mountains, I have toiled through the passes beneath the giant cedars and Douglas pine of the Pacific slope, which hid both sun and sky at noonday, and I say that in all the four thousand miles which extend between there is everything that man can desire and a promise of a mighty future. If we cannot make a country with such material, it is because we are not true to ourselves; and if we are not true to ourselves, be sure our sin will find us out.

With a firm conviction that it is necessary in order to establish confidence on the part of our people and to encourage the development of the great resources which we have, I beg leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Charters):

> That the following words be added to the Address: We respectfully submit to your Excellency that this House views with regret the depression existing in agriculture and, as well, the all too serious exodus from the country generally, and expresses its disappointment that the Speech from the Throne, while embodying a distinct threat to an important section of industry, contains no promise of legislation which will tend to retain and enlarge the home market for our own Canadian producers; such legislation being manifestly necessary in view of the increased tariff barriers of other countries.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (King's, P. E.I.): I have listened with what attention I could give to the lengthy speech delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), and as I proceed I may perhaps have a few references to make to it. In the meantime I will take up another matter. Some few months ago an organized propaganda was started in the name of economy. Now economy is a very great virtue, whether public or private; but those who advocate it should try to be consistent, should try to have a reasonable amount of common sense in the efforts they put forward to achieve that great end. I find that this organized effort was not very old before our good Conservative friends, and particularly our good Conservative newspapers in the country, took charge of it and endeavoured to make it appear that the present government was reckless and extravagant in the public expenditures, and that therefore they should be removed from office at the earliest possible date and a government much more economical and much better qualified to manage the affairs of the country be put in their place. That this view of the matter is correct is shown by a little clipping from the Toronto Mail and Empire of a few days ago which reads:

> Newspapers all over the country are giving vent to the people's dissatisfaction with the ruling politicians. In the protest against the riot of extravagance, Liberal newspapers are joining. And what Liberal newspaper of any influence is coming to the help of the government?

Well, Mr. Speaker, this propaganda to blame the present government for being extravagant and inefficient, but particularly for being extravagant, and the effort to make it appear that their predecessors were very economical, make it necessary for those of us who know a little about recent political history to endeavour to place the facts upon record so that the people may not be misled, but may be fairly able to judge between the two political parties. And that there may be no mistake about the statements I make I will go to the public records themselves. I had the privilege of sitting in this House from 1900 to 1908, and during those years Sir Robert Borden led the opposition; and I think that at every session of parliament, at all events at almost every one, he brought forward a resolution condemning the then government for extravagance in public expenditures, and stating that the affairs of the country could be carried on with much less. In the year 1911, during the campaign, Sir Robert Borden and Mr., now Judge, Hazen of New Brunswick, came to Prince Edward Island and held several public meetings, some of them in the open air. These meetings were well attended, and Sir Robert Borden was very explicit in the statement of what he would do if the party which he led were entrusted with the administration of public affairs. He stated positively on his word of honour that he would carry on the public affairs with at least $10,000,000 less, and without any impairment or injury to the public service. Well, the Conservative party were returned to power at that election, and we have now the record of their achievements. The Conservatives would not be responsible for the expenditures of the year 1912 because they came into power in the autumn of the year 1911.

I will therefore charge that to the Liberals. The expendiutre on consolidated fund account for the year 1912 was $98,000,000; I shall give only the round figures. For the year 1913, when according to Sir Robert Borden's distinct promise to the people of this country it should have been $10,000,000 less, it was $112,000,000 or $14,000,000 more. In 1914 it was $127,000,000, another increase of $15,000,000 over the previous year. In the year 1915 it was $135,000,000. Some people might say that the war was on then, but these expenditures had no relation to the war, the war expenditures were all charged to another account. In 1916 it was $130,000,000; 1917, $148,000,000; 1918, $178,00,000; 1919, $232,000,000; 1920, $303,000,000; 1921, $361,000,000. That was the last year for which the Conservative party was responsible for the expenditure. That was the year that the Conservative party was led by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) who now leads the opposition. For the year 1922 the Liberals were wholly responsible and the expenditure that year for the same identical services was $347,000,000 or a reduction of $14,000,000. For the year 1923 the expenditure on the very same services was $332,000,000 or a reduction of $15,000,000. For the two years there was a reduction of $29,000,000, and if reduction is carried on at the same rate this year, there will be in three years under the present administration a saving of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 on consolidated fund account. Yet in the face of that record the newspapers supporting the Conservative party are crying out for a change of government and charging the present administration with reckless and riotous extravagance.

In order to show the misrepresentation that the Conservative newspapers are carrying on throughout the country at the present time regardless altogether of truth I will quote just a sentence or two from a paper published in my own province called the Charlottetown Guardian. In an editorial referring to the extravagance of the present government on March 4 it says:

> Relations between the King government and the defunct Home Bank have long been very close. Mr. Gough, a high official of the bank, was appointed to the Board of National Railway Directors at a salary of $10,000.

Every man in this country knows that the salaries of the members of the National Railways board is $2,000 a year. Yet that is the kind of propaganda that is being spread over the country by the Conservative newspapers and particularly by the paper to which I have referred. They make statements which they call facts and which are entirely foundationless and upon these alleged facts they base an argument against the government. They quote figures, multiply them by five as in the present instance, or divide them by five just as it suits their purpose, and on these false and misleading premises base an argument against the present administration.

That is the kind of propaganda that is being carried on by them throughout the country.

We might think that although the government that came into power in 1911 and went out of office in 1921 showed great extravagance in the civil administration of the country, they are entitled to some credit for carrying on the war and for the efforts they made in that direction. It was in that respect, Mr. Speaker, that the flood gates of extravagance were opened wide. I wish I could call it by some milder term than extravagance. No effort whatever was made to control the public expenditure in the years when the war was on. There is no doubt but that all the countries engaged in the war, Canada not excepted, had to pay extreme prices for anything purchased during those years, but what I complain of is that no effort was made to get anything like value for the money expended. On the contrary, it appears that an organized effort was made to waste all the money that could be wasted, and to make arrangements whereby the friends of the government and of the party in power could misappropriate tens and hundreds of millions. I would be safe in saying that if anything like value had been obtained for the money expended, our war debt, instead of being two billions, as it is at present, would not have been much over one billion dollars. Last year standing in this House I referred to an incident to show the premeditated efforts that were made to waste the public money. I referred to the drugs that were purchased through the wholesale house of Bauer and Black, purchased through a middleman and transferred to the government at several hundred per cent profit. The agent of Bauer and Black came before the Public Accounts committee and under oath stated that he had tried to sell these goods direct to the government, and that he would be quite willing to sell them to the government at the price charged to private individuals.

I am going to put a few other statements on record this afternoon, and I shall give no statement that was not sworn to before the Public Accounts committee. I am going to give the names of the parties who testified, in most cases at all events. I will follow up the drug business. A little later it was stated before the committee under oath that a woman who kept a small drug store in the province of Quebec, who was handling at most in that store only $6,000 or $7,000 worth of drugs a year, got contracts for supplying the army with drugs amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars. That was Madame Plamondon. Mr. Watters an experienced druggist in the city of Ottawa, and now mayor of this city, came before the Public Accounts committee, examined the accounts of this woman, and stated that the prices charged were from 300 to 1,000 per cent too high. That was carried on for a considerable time. That woman happened to be the sister of the then Speaker of the House, Mr. Sevigny.

Early in the war a member of parliament was given a commission and a large sum of money to go to Nova Scotia to buy horses for the army. The horses purchased were no good whatever. The Public Accounts committee endeavoured to investigate the matter. They could not get the records from the department, could not get the books, could not get the vouchers, could not get the accounts; and the department deliberately stated that the accounts had been sent overseas. Why they would be needed overseas the Lord only knows. The only thing left to the committee was to get the names of the people who sold the horses and subpoena them to Ottawa, and that was done. These men came before the committee, and on their oath stated that they sold horses for army purposes, sold horses to the commissioners who went down to Nova Scotia to buy them, that they intended to shoot that fall, because they were no good. Some of these horses were too old and had been turned down at the time of the South African war. One man swore that he got an old horse in trade for two ducks and a drake. These horses were sold to the army officers for $60 or $70. Another man swore that he naturally expected fairly good horses would be required for army purposes, and he took a fairly good horse to the place where the animals were being examined, and when he saw the kind of horses that were being sold and bought there, he put that particular horse in the barn, and telephoned his son to bring up the old mare. Accordingly the old mare was brought up and sold to the representatives of the government. Many of these horses died on the way to Quebec. Some of them were delivered at Valcartier, but lived only a few days and found their way to the glue factory in Quebec. What was done with the gentleman who was responsible for those transactions, a member of this House? Sir Robert Borden, at or about that time leading the government, stated that if he discovered any man deliberately defrauding the treasury the doors of the penitentiary would be opened for him. This particular man was asked to retire from parliament. Was he sent to the penitentiary? He was not. What punishment was meted out to him? He was sent to the immigration office in the city of Chicago at a good salary. There was a man named Allison who had very close relations with the then Minister of Militia and Defence. The manager of the New York and Ottawa railway, called the New York Central, with an office still in this city, came before the Public Accounts committee and on his oath stated that he had an order from the Militia department instructing him to place not only a private car but a private train at Mr. Allison's disposal any time he would ask for it and charge the expense to the public accounts. And when Mr. Allison, who then lived at Morrisburg or in that vicinity, wished to spend an evening in Ottawa playing bridge or playing poker, he would order a special train for himself and his friends to return to Morrisburg that night, and according to the sworn statement of the manager of the railway that expense was charged to the government.

There is another thing I wish to mention in this connection. Mr. Drew, the collector of customs at the port of Morrisburg, came before the Public Accounts committee and on his oath stated that he was directed by the department of which he was an official to admit anything and everything that came in Mr. Allison's name from the United States into Canada free without examination, and without paying any customs duty. To his own knowledge boatloads and scow loads of goods came across the river—packages, cases, barrels, and crates would be piled up on the river shore on the Canadian side until a train load would be ready, when the train would come down from Morrisburg and take the goods away into the interior of the country. Our Conservative and protectionist friends are very much exercised to-day lest some goods may find their way from the United States into this country at a small customs duty. At the time I speak of they allowed their friends to import goods into Canada without paying any customs duty at all. When Mr. Drew was giving his testimony before the Public Accounts committee he was asked to produce his authority for acting in the manner described. He said it was a letter he had received from the department giving him the instructions. He was asked to produce the letter. He then said that the Commissioner of Customs of that day, Mr. John McDougald, had sent his son a little while before that to Morrisburg and had asked him for the letter and he had given it to him. Mr. McDougald was subpoenaed before the Public Accounts committee and asked to produce the letter, but he stated it had been destroyed. He was then asked to produce the copy of the letter, but said the department did not keep a copy of it. Finally he was asked who instructed him to write the letter, and did not seem disposed to answer the question in fact he tried to refuse to answer it. He hesitated and asked the chairman if he was obliged to answer the question. Finally he stated that the minister himself dictated the letter.

Now, Sir, that is the condition of affairs that prevailed at that time. It is not pleasant for me to recall those things and I would not do it if I did not see that an effort is now being made to create a false impression in the country, and to spread the idea abroad that the men responsible for such transactions or their impenitent assigns, are the men who should be placed in charge of the public affairs of Canada. I am not aware that those men ever did penance for their crimes. They have certainly expressed no sorrow for them, and until they do I think great care should be exercised to see that they do not get another opportutnity to repeat that kind of conduct.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and his associates are very meticulous now in regard to the honour of public men. They claim that public men should be above suspicion, and that the least speck of dishonour should not attach to them. At that time, in the days I have mentioned, they were ready to swallow a camel, yea they would swallow a donkey, ears and all. They have so changed now that I imagine they would have difficulty in swallowing an oyster.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition came to the Maritime provinces last summer and visited Prince Edward Island as well as the other provinces by the sea. He made a speech in Victoria Park, Prince Edward Island to which I am going to refer, but I am sorry he is not in the House at the present moment, because I think this would be interesting to him. His speech was reported in the Charlottetown Guardian, the paper from which I have just quoted, a strong supporter of the Conservative party, having supported them right along. The right hon. gentleman commenced his speech by saying:

> My idea was to try to get firsthand knowledge of this province and the other maritimes—something of the knowledge that I think I have of the other provinces of Canada.

I will have occasion to show, I think, that he has very little knowledge regarding conditions in Prince Edward Island. Whether he has any knowledge of the other Maritime provinces I do not know. The report of his speech continues as follows—

> Mr. Meighen referred to the injustice whereby two or three provinces secure special pre-war railway rates, making the commission—

That is the Railway Commission—

—incapable of reducing other rates. This was done to catch progressive votes in the West, and meant a reduction in profits of $17,000,000, which prevented a reduction of rates in the Maritime provinces, and the members supporting the government for this province—

Referring to Prince Edward Island—

—everyone of them voted for it. They joined with Mr. King in selling out the Maritime provinces.

That was the appeal of the leader of a great political party. That was the statement made by a man that wants to see no sectionalism in this country, who wants to see Canada become a great nation. We find him going down into the Maritime provinces and making an appeal of that kind, stating that the members of this House who supported the reduction that had been made on grain and flour last year had sold out the Maritime provinces and had given to the western men something which they should not have received.

First and foremost I want to explain to the people who may read my speech what that reduction meant. Away back in 1897 the Canadian Pacific Railway made application to the government for a sum of money to enable them to build what was known as the Crowsnest Pass railway. The government at that time agreed to the proposition, and in consideration of the sum of money that was given to the company to enable them to construct that line of railway, the company gave to the federal government a large area of coal-bearing lands which they had previously received from the British Columbia government. They also made a reduction in the freight rates both east and west, which was of considerable advantage to the farmers of the prairie provinces at that time. The provinces were struggling then and were finding conditions difficult, and these reductions that had been made on the Canadian Pacific Railway rates were of very material advantage to them. As the years went on the Canadian Pacific reduced its rates and finally brought them, as I understand it aright, even below the rates in the arrangement made with the government. When the war came on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the other railways of Canada found it necessary to increase their rates, and applied to the government for permission to do so, and the government of the day gave them that permission, and probably it was all right. The increase of the rates was much larger than the former rate. In order to enable them to do that the government had to suspend the operations of the Crowsnest Pass agreement. Last year that suspension and all these increases would automatically end, and the question was whether the suspension would be extended for another year, or whether the Crownest Pass agreement should be allowed to become effective. The arrangement made—and the Progressive party and the members from the western provinces agreed to it—was that if they got a reduction on grain and flour coming east, they would be willing to accept it and allow the suspension on the other articles enumerated on the list to remain in effect for another year. The West was working under adverse conditions. We had evidences of that from the members representing that part of the country, we knew it from the public records and we knew it from the public press. They were greatly in need of any consideration that could be extended to them and this was not a great deal. I voted for that, and I would stand upon any platform in the Dominion of Canada and justify my vote. It was for doing that that the right hon. the leader of the opposition came down to Prince Edward Island, denounced me and other members of that province and tried to raise sectional issues. Whether that is the man to be leader of a great party I have my doubts.

I want to call the attention of the House and of the public, so far as I can, to another statement which he made. The right hon. member admitted that he came to the province without having any knowledge of it, and I think he left it without having a knowledge of conditions there. The report of his speech says:

Mr. Meighen referred to the injustice whereby two or three provinces secure special pre-war railway rates, making the commission incapable of reducing other rates.

He was referring to the Railway Commission. That was simply a misstatement of fact. If he knew it to be a misstatement of fact, the matter was serious. If he did not know that, he left the Maritime provinces without knowing conditions, because as a matter of fact, the Railway Commission, last year, at the instance of the members representing Prince Edward Island—I had the privilege of presenting the argument before the commision—very considerably reduced the railway freight rates as affecting that province. On coal transported from the mines in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island, we got a reduction of from forty to fifty cents a ton. We got a considerable reduction on grain, hay, straw, potatoes, lumber, lime, gypsum and several other articles of that kind. We got a reduction of about ten per cent on package goods. We got a considerable reduction on the internal freight, that is freight originating and ending in Prince Edward Island. We import about 70,000 tons of coal into Prince Edward Island each year and more than half of that comes by rail. If we suppose, say, half of it comes by rail, we got a reduction of forty to fifty cents a ton on between thirty and forty thousand tons of coal, and one can easily estimate what that will amount to. I am satisfied the reductions we were able to secure through the instrumentality of the Railway Commission, because we made out a case, amount to something like $30,000 a year for Prince Edward Island. And the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) went into that province and apparently knew nothing about the matter. But he did make an effort to raise sectional issues and to misrepresent the members from that province for doing nothing but their duty, at least, for doing their duty as they saw it.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HUGHES: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was referring to the very considerable reductions that had been made by the present government in the consolidated revenue fund account. Since they came into office they have also reduced the personnel of the Civil Service by 3,952 employees. These measures of retrenchment were undertaken long before the economy cry was raised throughout the country.

In the early winter we had two by-elections in the Maritime provinces, during the course of which a great deal was said by our Conservative friends, particularly by the new—and I suppose distinguished—leader of the Tory party in that section of the Dominion, the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter). The changes were rung on the loss of the rights of the Maritime provinces. Now, I would ask that gentleman, or any other hon. member, what rights had the Maritime provinces that this government have taken away? And what wrongs, if any, did the Liberal party inflict upon the Maritime provinces either in 1896 or in 1921 upon their accession to office? If any wrong has been inflicted, I should like to get a record of it. Now, I ask my hon. friends on the opposite side who made such wild statements in the Maritime provinces, what rights have we lost down there that they would give us if they came into office? This is a pertinent question.

On the other hand, I propose to give them a short list of the wrongs that were inflicted upon the Maritime provinces by the Conservative party, and I am going to speak more particularly of Prince Edward Island, because I know more about that province than I do of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. When we entered confederation we had a customs duty of 12 per cent, which gave us a sufficient revenue for all our purposes, and we had practically no debt. We had some small industries at the crossroads—blacksmiths' shops, carriage and farm implement factories, even some cloth factories; we made these things for our own use and were a happy and a fairly contented people, and our population was steadily increasing. To-day it is difficult to get a blacksmith at the crossroads to shoe a horse. In a word, none of these small factories are now in existence. The customs duties have been increased to such an extent that the things which we used to manufacture for ourselves are now made in western Quebec and throughout Ontario.

We in Prince Edward Island have to find a market for our products in the open world. New England and old England have been our best markets. We are obliged to sell many of our products in the United States, regardless of the Fordney or any other tariff, simply because we have no other place to sell them. For instance, we have to sell our potatoes there. Now, the potato crop to us is very much what the wheat crop is to the prairie provinces. We must raise potatoes because our soil and climate are well adapted for them, and the potato crop fits in well with the rotation of crops. You cannot carry on dairying successfully without growing vegetables, and we find a market for our potatoes in the southern states. When the Fordney tariff went into operation it placed us at a disadvantage of 30 cents a bushel on our potatoes. We could not sell the ordinary potatoes there any longer and our farmers were obliged to raise a superior quality of this product. We raise the potatoes for seed purposes. We have got into the markets of the southern United States and also of Cuba, and in these warm countries they have to change their seed every two years. As a matter of fact, they get better results if they change the seed every year Now, it has been found by experience that the potatoes that come from Prince Edward Island give better results than those obtained from any other part of the North American continent. We get a price for that article that enables us to raise it at some profit and sell it in the states of the American Union in spite of the Fordney tariff. We have to sell our butter and eggs and our cheese and bacon largely in England. We export some eggs to the United States. We can sell nothing in the provinces of Canada except a few potatoes or a little hay or oats in Nova Scotia, and we send some of these products to Newfoundland. But we are shut out from the markets of Quebec and Ontario, no matter what the transportation might be, simply for the reason that the farmers in these provinces can supply and more than supply the cities around them. Not only do they do that, but they compete with us in the small markets of Halifax, Sydney and St. John. We sell a few eggs in Montreal, but only a few. We are bound to cultivate the markets of the world wherever we can find them, and we are forced to buy our manufactured products in Quebec and Ontario at a price which is enhanced by customs duties. That is the condition of things; and these high customs duties were placed against us by the Conservatives in this country. That is one of the disadvantages under which they put us. But there is a greater one for which they are wholly responsible.

For years after the so-called National Policy had been put into force we were told that it was only an instrument to secure a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States. The reciprocity agreement of 1854 had been abolished in 1866 and the condition was very serious in the Maritime provinces. But the people in that part of the country were willing to put up with a good deal of temporary inconvenience so long as they thought it would lead to a renewal of the reciprocal trade arrangement which we had had with the United States some time before. However, things remained in that state for years and hope was deferred until finally in 1911 the Liberal government then in office succeeded in making a trade arrangement with the United States which was far better than anything we had ever expected. But the Conservative party in this House and in the country prevented the Canadian people from accepting the offer. No greater crime, no greater injustice could have been perpetrated, no greater disadvantage could have been placed upon the Maritime provinces. And they do not appear to be sorry for it. I heard the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) declare to-day that he was pleased that that arrangement with the United States had never been completed. It was better for the country, he said,—and in this he only repeats what other Conservatives have said hundreds of times—because the United States later on would in all probability have abrogated or suspended that agreement as soon as they should have discovered that it was advantageous to Canada. How does he know that? That is only a surmise.

Mr. HOCKEN: He knows it from past experience.

Mr. HUGHES: We will examine that point. That was immediately after the civil war had been concluded in the United States. Now, what attitude did official Great Britain take in that great crisis? I am sorry to say, as a Britisher, that the official attitude of Great Britain was directly opposed to the northern states regardless of political parties. Great Britain had shown no sympathy whatever with the northern states in that trying time.

Mr. McMASTER: The upper classes showed none.

Mr. HUGHES: And the political classes, too.

Mr. HOCKEN: What about John Bright?

Mr. HUGHES: I will mention him in a moment. Disraeli, Gladstone, Palmerston, Russell, Roebuck and numbers of other men whose names I cannot recall went out of their way to show their lack of friendship for the United States. Privateers were built and fitted out in Great Britain and they went to sea and preyed upon the commerce of the northern states, prolonging the struggle. Those ships never saw an American port. They were built in Great Britain, they were fitted out in Great Britain, and they were manned in Great Britain; and this, notwithstanding that Mr. Adams, the American Ambassador, had informed the government time and again of what was going on. The common people of Great Britain were suffering great privations, particularly in the cotton industry in Lancashire and Manchester owing to the stoppage of cotton imports from the United States. But, to their eternal credit, be it said that the working people of Manchester, notwithstanding their hardships, sent an enormous petition to President Lincoln wishing him godspeed in the great struggle he was making for humanity and civilization. They told him that they were willing to endure those privations; they were making no trouble, because they knew that he was striving to do what was right. That incident perhaps did more than anything else to prevent an open break between Great Britain and the United States. Lincoln was touched to the heart by it and he sent a most cordial reply to those people, because he was one of the people himself and he knew that their heart was in the right place. Lord Granville, Cobden and Bright were outstanding figures who took the other side, because they were men and they understood the struggle that was going on. They understood what it meant to humanity and to civilization, and when the war was over it was then, smarting under those conditions, that the United States denounced the reciprocity treaty, and we have no right whatever to assume that they would have taken similar action provided we had entered into an agreement they had made in good faith with us in 1911. That agreement was proposed by the Republican party in the United States, the party of high protection. They would not have repealed it, in all human probability, and the Democrats, the party of low duties or moderate protection, if they had come into office very likely would not have denounced it; so when our friends opposite say that it was a good thing we did not enter into that arrangement because it likely would have been denounced they have no justification for suggesting such a thing. It is only an excuse, and a weak excuse, for the crime they committed against the Canadian people on that occasion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That's putting it over the plate.

Mr. HUGHES: I might say a few words on the question of the tariff. The tariff is a perennial question in this country. It has been discussed in this House for many years and I suppose it will be discussed here for many years to come. Our Conservative friends take what appears to me to be a very peculiar position in regard to this matter, but perhaps they have their reasons for doing so. A short time ago I read in the Montreal Gazette an account of a speech delivered before the Conservative Business Men's Association in Toronto by Senator Gideon D. Robertson. Senator Robertson, having been a member of the late administration, being now a senator of Canada, and speaking before the Conservative Business Men's Association, and having been warmly commended the next day by the Montreal Gazette for his speech, I presume delivered on that occasion what might be considered almost an official utterance. In passing, I think the Montreal Gazette is the sanest and most respectable English-speaking protectionist newspaper in Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: Your forget the celebrated weekly.

Mr. HUGHES: I disagree entirely with the Gazette's policy but it presents its arguments fairly; and I fully believe this, that if you see in the Montreal Gazette what is alleged to be a statement of fact you can depend upon that statement. If it quotes figures, you can depend on them; but I do not agree with its policy, and I am not impressed with its arguments. Senator Robertson in that speech made this statement:

> The term "protection" may properly be applied to a variety of national activities. For example, the British navy is more of a protection to British commerce than the tariff.

I do not know what that means. Of course, I do not lay claim to any great amount of intelligence, but I suppose I have the intelligence of the man on the street. Now if the senator means that the British navy protects commerce from pirates on the high seas, I can understand that that would be a protection to commerce; but there are no pirates on the high seas now, and the navies of all the countries of the civilized world would be engaged in the same business if that is what he meant. They would keep the ocean lanes free from pirates. If he meant that the British navy imposes British goods upon the weaker nations or upon the Crown colonies at the cannon's mouth, I think he is mistaken. Great Britain herself and, so far as I know, the Crown colonies are open to the commerce of the world. There is no advantage that the British navy gives to British commerce that it does not give equally to the commerce of all the other countries of the world. It protects them all. However, that is not a very serious matter. He goes on to say:

> The customs tariff serves two specific purposes. It protects home industries and the workmen employed therein, and affords a substantial part of the country's revenue.

Then he went on to make the statement, and he proved it, that Great Britain raises by her customs tariff $13.87 per head of her population, while the United States with its higher tariff, the tariff that he and other gentlemen of the Conservative party would have us copy in this country, gets a revenue of only $2.85 per head of the population—and he says that we should adopt a tariff of that kind in order to get revenue. He proves the thing that free traders have always maintained, that if you put the tariff high enough you will get no revenue at all. But the people will pay just the same. All through the senator's speech it is implied that if we adopt a tariff similar to that of the United States, we will get a larger revenue, and we can consequently do away with other forms of taxation. Of course, the senator contradicts himself, but his arguments are just as sound and just as logical as any arguments I have ever heard from a protectionist.

When my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) was speaking this afternoon, he referred to the importation of agricultural products and other things that we were bringing in from the United States, and when someone asked him why we were bringing these things in he replied, "Because they are cheaper there." He and others just ring the changes; they declare that if we adopt a tariff policy similar to that of the United States it will increase the price of agricultural products in this country, that is, it will raise the price to the farmer, while in the United States it appears to depress the price the farmer receives for his products. Why does the remedy act so differently just south of the international boundary line, a line that is almost invisible in some places? I cannot understand these things. I have not the intelligence of these men, I suppose; it is too intricate a question. Another thing I cannot understand is this: If the manufacturers of Canada cannot hold the home market with a moderate tariff, how in the name of common sense are they going to manufacture goods, send them into the markets of the world, meet competition there, and perhaps encounter customs duties in other countries? And yet they say they can do that. Sitting down and talking with some of my Conservative friends I have asked how that could be done and I never got an answer. I can see how it could be done in a small way, that is provided the customs duty, or the tariff, was put high enough in Canada to enable the manufacturer to have a large profit upon the goods he might sell at home and enable him to sell below cost what he might send abroad. That could be done, but would it be an advantage to Canadians? My impression is that it would be an advantage to the other fellow, the man we call the foreigner. He would be getting goods cheaper than we would be getting them, he would be getting goods below cost. My hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) spoke yesterday afternoon. I think he is a sincere protectionist, an honest protectionist. He was anxious to see a tariff in this country which he called "the cost of living tariff" and he was stating that when we would send our wheat, for instance to the Old Country, we would not load the ships with wheat entirely, but would load them partly with manufactured goods.

I think I will read the paragraph in question, it will serve to make my point clearer. In reply to the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) said:

> Would my hon. friend expect any country to take nothing but wheat and flour from us? Would he expect a ship to be loaded with wheat and flour only? No ship will go out with such a cargo.

Then the hon. member for Springfield asked:

> Why not?

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said in reply:

> To create a general trade we have to carry various products to other countries.

Then my hon. friend the member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) interpolated a question. He asked:

> What will it bring back in return?

That was a crucial question. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George felt that, and he did the best he could under the circumstances. He said:

> That is precisely the point I make with my hon. friend from Swift Current. It creates trade; but our customers overseas will not say to us that they want only our wheat and flour. It is necessary and essential for trade routes to be made up by exporting other commodities besides wheat and flour in order to create in the foreign port the needed market for our wheat and flour, because the more trade we have with any country the more demand there is for our particular product. Therefore I say we should export manufactured goods also with our wheat and flour.

Again I come back and ask, how can we export manufactured goods to Great Britain if we cannot hold the home market with moderate protection? The thing is a mathematical absurdity. No tyro in economics, in my judgment, would advocate such a policy. I think the manufacturers of Canada, and their friends, have dwelt upon that phase of the question so long that they cannot see any other side to the issue; they have come to think that they are stating sound doctrine. Was it not George III—

Mr. McMASTER: George IV.

Mr. HUGHES: Who thought he won the battle of Waterloo?

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, George IV.

Mr. HUGHES: This monarch thought he commanded a division at the battle of Waterloo, and told the story so often that he finally came to believe it; and when somebody told him that they did not think he was at the battle he was very much offended. Hon. members opposite, and the protectionists generally, make the statement, and they repeat it, that a tariff does not increase the price of goods, that the manufacturers will not put up the price of their products, that home competition will keep down the prices. I have never heard one of these gentlemen give a concrete case; they speak in generalities; they are strong in platitudes and generalities, but weak, in my judgment, in concrete cases. But I have an authority on this question that I think my hon. friends opposite will accept, an authority I think even the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) will not question. It is no less a personage than the present leader of the opposition.

On 18th January 1911, the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition, and who was an active member of the opposition of those days, moved this resolution in the House:

That in the opinion of this House, a substantial reduction in the import duties on agricultural implements is now due the agriculturists of Canada, and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGHES: He added this—I want to give the whole of it:

—and is in just accord with the true ends of a protective tariff.

Now the right hon. gentleman spoke in support of the resolution and I will quote from his observations as reported on page 1924 of Hansard of that year. I will start at the beginning of the sentence, I do not divide sentences:

But before I go into that, let me give you a few figures to show that the conditions of manufacture at the present time do not warrant a very material duty of any kind, particularly as respects the articles manufactured by the International Harvester Company, binders, mowers and reapers. And I think I will convince the House that there is very little if any difference in the cost of the production of these machines on this side of the border and in the United States.

Now have conditions changed so much between Canada and the United States that costs are higher, that it costs more to manufacture these articles in this country, compared with the cost in 1911? If such conditions have come about I would like to hear it. I do not think they have. The right hon. member is on record as saying that it costs very little if any more to manufacture in Canada than it does in the United States. Then why the necessity of protection? I can see why there should be a protection. If the home manufacturer wants to charge more than the price at which the imported article can be obtained, then he requires protection. But why should he want it? The right hon. leader of the opposition in another paragraph says:

Now sir, what are the manufacturers of agricultural implements enabled to do? They are able under this tariff to exact a higher price than they could exact if the tariff were lower. From 10 to 20 per cent is about the addition which these manufacturers are able to obtain from our farmers by reason of the increased protection afforded them by this government.

I heard my right hon. friend declaim last session and the session before that he never changed his policy or his principles, that the wicked men on this side of the House had done that kind of thing, but he was far above such a course. I read an article in the Montreal Star—

Mr. GRAHAM: The whisper of death.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, sometimes called the Montreal Star. It is headed "Bridging the gap", and it states that a large petition was being got up by the coal mine owners and others of Alberta and the coal consumers of Ontario, asking the government to so reduce the cost of transporting coal from the mines in Alberta to the consumers in Ontario that we could keep out American coal, and that the consumers would get cheap coal, and the petitioners went on to say, according to this article, that this would open up the mines in Alberta, give employment to a large number of miners and furnish cheap coal to the Ontario consumer, but the Star kills the whole thing in one line at the end. It enumerates all these things, and all the advantages that would accrue to Alberta, to the miners and consumers of coal but concludes with the following sentence—

How about the other taxpayers who must meet the railway deficit?

Would the same argument not apply to protection? I will admit that protection is a good thing for the beneficiary.

Mr. HOEY: I doubt it.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, it may increase the size of the city. It may have that result temporarily. It may do these things. But how about the consuming public who have to pay the cost. How about the general public who have to pay the bill? Somebody must pay the bill in the end. The Montreal Gazette, for which publication I have a great deal of respect, discusses quite frequently the subject of carrying grain from western Canada through the Maritime provinces, routing the grain that way and developing the ports of the Maritime provinces, and says that notwithstanding the fact that it might cost a little more to do that, the grain could be brought to Portland a little cheaper. The Montreal Gazette has frequently discussed that question, and it winds up by saying that it is bad economics because the general public would have to pay the deficit on the National Railway. If this is bad economics the policy of protection is bad economics, and the Montreal Gazette ably edited as it is, strongly advocates the one and denounces or discourages the other. I have heard our friends the protectionists state, and they had no hesitation in stating, that if we adopted a tariff policy higher than it is now, a policy somewhat similar to that which they have in the United States—although it does not seem to work very well there so far as the farmers are concerned—it would work splendidly here, it would stop emigration, would increase immigration, would give more employment, would raise wages, would raise the price of farm products, and at the same time decrease the cost of living. I think they are too modest in the advantages which they claim their tariff would accomplish. Would it not also cure earache and headache, lumbago and sciatica, remove dandruff and prevent the hair from falling out? Mrs. Lydia Pinkham's pills would be nowhere alongside an adequate tariff, which, in the estimation of these gentlemen, would be a tariff made up by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Another argument, if it can be called an argument, that I often hear is that it is responsible for the development that has taken place in Canada. They say that a few years ago we were a smaller country than we are now, that we manufactured less, but that we are getting along better, and are developing and increasing. They point to the enormous development in the United States, and assume that it is all due to the protective tariff. That is a purely gratuitous assumption. The United States of America is an empire within itself. It has every variety of soil, climate and production. The people are most energetic and are the greatest commercial community on the face of the earth. They have prospered in spite of protection, not in consequence of it. Canada has done the same, in spite of protection and not in consequence of it. You might as well say that because the trees bud in the spring and the brooks run to the ocean and the birds sing in the forest, that is due to protection. I do not know what claim will be made for this panacea in the future. Perhaps the dictionary has already been exhausted in mentioning all the good things that can be said. But let us come back to the facts again. We must be sensible men, and surely we can arrive at a reasonable conclusion in regard to these things. If our protectionist friends would tell us frankly that we do not want to do business with other countries; that we want to have Canada for ourselves and for ourselves alone; that we want the home market for ourselves alone, I could then understand their argument in favour of a tariff wall being placed around Canada. But when we say that our progress, development and future depend largely on the trade we shall do with other countries throughout the world, why in the name of common sense do we proceed to fine those who endeavour to carry on that trade? Customs tariffs are after all only a fine. Nations do not trade with each other, although I heard the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) make that slip the other day. I think it was a slip. Nations do not trade with one another except in a small way. Governments may buy things from one another in time of war; but in time of peace and under all normal conditions, individuals, companies or corporations trade with one another, and it is as true as the proposition that two and two make four that individuals, companies or corporations will not engage or continue in trade unless it is to their mutual advantage to do so. If it is to the mutual advantage of individuals, companies or corporations in different countries, it follows, as the night follows the day, that it must be to the advantage of the respective countries. All trade is founded in the last analysis on barter. We must buy if we want to sell.

Mr. H. G. Wells, the noted publicist, a man well acquainted with Europe, in an article that I read the other day, stated that the curse of that part of the world was due to the fact that there were so many small countries in Europe surrounded by national tariff walls, in consequence of which it was almost impossible to carry on trade and commerce between the different nations of Europe. There were national prejudices, national tariffs, national customs, national restrictions of all kinds. These nations hobbled themselves and then they wondered why they could not walk better. Are we to imitate that kind of thing in America? I do not see any sense in the world in nations subsidizing steamers, sending trade commissioners into other countries in order to promote trade, and then, on the other hand, fining the men who engage in the trade, trying to stop them; with one hand trying to promote trade, and with the other trying to stop or impede it. We ought to be sensible, logical, or at least endeavour to be logical. If we do not want the trade of other countries, let us say so and confine ourselves entirely to Canada. The protectionists do not go that far; they do not want to go that far, because that would be ridiculous. They seem to imagine that there is something in that old dictum attributed to Barnum that a number of people are standing around all the time waiting for somebody to fool them. I hope the Canadian people will not be fooled.

Another statement that I was nearly forgetting, we hear from our protectionist friends. They deplore class consciousness in this country. They are sorry that the farmers of western Canada have grouped themselves together to promote their own interests. We have no room, they say, for that kind of thing in this country. There should not be any classes—except the Canadian manufacturers! They can monopolize that field. I am glad that the farmers are class conscious. They have some class interest and I do not blame them for it. I do not think they have much, because in a general way they do not want to place burdens on the other fellow in order to relieve themselves. They object, however, to being made to carry burdens for the benefit of others, and I do not blame them for that. But before the rise of the Farmers' party, the farmers in this Canada of ours could be divided. It may be possible still to divide them between Liberals and Conservatives, but it will not be so easy. The Protectionist party is a well organized party. They have the money, and I will admit that they have a good deal of intelligence and a good deal of craft.

Mr. HOEY: They do not show any of the intelligence.

Mr. HUGHES: They show that unfortunate principle that is with most of us, born with us, perhaps; they show a good deal of selfishness. And when elections come around, the unorganized people are largely at the mercy of the organized even though the latter group be much smaller. That is the way in which they hope to gain their victories, and they may succeed because it is no small group. We have an enemy that we cannot afford to despise. In the beginning of this protectionist business—and my memory goes back as far as 1878—it was then the infant industries that we were going to protect. Poor little things! They wanted only a nursing bottle for a year or two and it would be all right. They would return more favours than they had ever received when they would grow up to be big, strong, lusty men. A good many farmers were caught. The unsophisticated farmers will be caught by that kind of thing. I saw a cartoon somewhere that hits that off pretty well. The protectionist has just to be rocked for a year or two and to be fed carefully and tenderly until he grows to be strong, and he will return all the favours. The old farmer sat down by the cradle and he rocked and rocked. Twenty years, twenty-five years, thirty years passed and the farmer was growing old and weary. The infant had grown to boyhood, then to manhood and had reached such giant proportions that it was very hard for the old man to rock the cradle and he complained and wanted to stop. What was the reply from the "infant"? "Old hayseed, if you stop rocking this cradle, and do any more whimpering, I shall get out and kick your damned head off". I was reminded of that cartoon by an article I saw in the Montreal Star a day or two ago. It stated that the present government had dropped two pilots, Mr. Fielding and Sir Lomer Gouin, and it referred to the historic parallel of Bismarck's dismissal by the young kaiser of that day, which led to the celebrated Punch cartoon by Tenniel entitled Dropping the Pilot. As I say, that reminded me of the other cartoon, and I thought it very appropriate.

I have endeavoured to put my views on the trade question before the House as clearly as I know how. I sometimes think that a good many of our really sane men are locked up in the insane asylums and that the mad fellows are on the outside, bungling the affairs of the world—preparing for war; creating, or not trying to assuage, national prejudices: carrying on commercial wars in a world that was made so fair and that produces an abundance for all the people whom God put upon it, if we would only agree to exchange our products with our neighbours. All we have to do is to be rational and reasonable, exchanging the things that we can produce cheaply and well for the products which the people of other nations can produce cheaper and better than we can. In this way the welfare of the whole world would be enormously increased, and this exchange of products would be in itself the greatest of industries and give employment to countless numbers of people. But we do not do that, we proceed in another way. Of course, I recognize that we in Canada cannot control the world; we have got to take conditions as we find them and do the best we can under the circumstances. For that reason I do not think we could do away altogether with customs duties or with tariff legislation; but we can show an example to the rest of the world. And I cannot imagine that a lowering of our customs duties and allowing the goods of other nations to come in will injure us to any great extent. Nobody will send us goods unless we pay for them, and we can only pay for them in kind—in products of the farm, the sea, the mine and the forest. If we pay for them in that way, how in the name of common sense can our industries be ruined or destroyed?

But I am getting into the tariff question again quite unintentionally. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for listening to me with so much patience and attention.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with absorbing attention to the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) who has just taken his seat. It is the first refreshing utterance that we have heard from that side of the House since the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) saw fit to move his belongings over here. In the early part of the hon. member's speech I shrank back a little when he ventured down the slopes of the Avernus of political recrimination, but I was glad he did not dwell there too long, and I hope he will not venture there again because I think it was the only blot upon an otherwise welcome speech.

In his remarks with regard to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) he shed a new light upon the hon. gentleman's character. I wish he were present, for I should like to have another good, square look at him. He was described as being a sincere and honest protectionist. Therefore such a protectionist is one who believes in the Laurier-Fielding tariff. I appreciate very much the strong grasp which the hon. member for King's, P.E.I., has manifested in his speech of the history of the controversy between free trade and protection, and I think we are indebted to him for presenting it to us in an historical light.

The other day we listened to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) dealing as usual with matters of partisan interest and forgetting, I am afraid, the matters that engage the public mind of Canada at the present time. I listened to them, as I always do, with unstinted admiration for their great gifts and powers; and as I listened I could not help asking myself the question, in the manner of the very well known phrase, what has all this to do with the condition of Canada? I think that question is the one that is uppermost in the minds of the people of Canada just now. Our political leaders remind me of the gods of Homer who, on the misty heights of Olympus, belabour and scold each other, forgetting the poor grovelling mortals down below, and unheeding their trials, their struggles and their sorrows, engaged the while in brilliant but trivial recriminations. I believe that were the public of Canada represented here to-night, as they are to some extent, what they would wish to hear from the leaders of the House and from the more prominent members of it would be some word of insight, some word of understanding, some word of discriminating sympathy for the trials through which they are passing to-day. I believe that if, in the opening of this debate by the leaders of the government and the opposition, there had been such words of sympathy and insight expressed it would have aroused a glad response throughout the length and breadth of the land where people have been cruelly hit by hard times and by the economic conditions that have overtaken this country.

In the Speech from the Throne complacent reference is made to the bountiful harvest with which our western country has been blessed. I am afraid, however, that the significance of that bountiful harvest has been altogether lost upon the framers of that address and also upon other members of this House, if we may judge by their contributions to this debate. A year ago members on this side of the House painted the conditions of the West in very dark colours and they were scoffed at and sneered at for so doing. But time and events have justified them, and I think it is widely conceded that their picture was only too true; and those who took the opposite view are now thrust forth like foolish prophets. In my opinion time and events have fully justified the picture as presented from this side last year; and if conditions were bad then they are a good deal worse now, and I am afraid that the bountiful crop has only served to intensify, in the consciousness of the farmer of the West, the real character of the economic injustices under which he labours. There is a phrase that occurs in the famous Chartist Manifesto in reference to a similar situation, and I think it hits off the present condition quite well. I think it is the closing sentence which says:

> Once more the foolishness of our rulers hath made the goodness of God of none effect.

That is true of conditions in the West at the present time. The good crop which has come from the bounty of Providence is like the spotlight: it has but deepened the surrounding shadows in the consciousness of western farmers. In days gone by good times have followed bad times and the farmer has been led to forget his troubles. But I doubt whether he is going to forget any more. I think the iron of circumstances has burnt into his soul so deep that from this time forth he is not going to forget. The seven fat kine may swallow up the seven lean kine, but the farmer will not be misled. I believe that the farmer of the West and the farmers throughout Canada, by reason of Nature's bounty last year, will begin to study causes and not effects; they will become, as they are becoming, in a startling fashion which I could describe if I had time, radicals in the truest sense of the word, and are divining, with a clearness and precision which they have never indicated before, the true causes of their periodical misfortune.

I will not go detail by detail over the Speech from the Throne, but probably I shall serve a better purpose by presenting to the House as I see it the economic situation in which the farmer is struggling. If I were to analyze the condition of the Canadian farmer it would be in this manner: I would inquire into the matter from the point of view of the remedial measures that should apply. There are certain things which the farmer can do for himself; the remedy is largely within his own power. There are certain other things which the farmer can do only through organization and co-operation in association with his fellow farmers. But there are other things that the farmer can only accomplish through the sympathy and the co-operation of governments, and they form no small part of the farmer's problem at the present time.

Now with respect to these things which the farmer controls himself, they relate largely to the technical side of his profession, and include all those improvements he may introduce into his operations as an agriculturist. We all know what they are, because it is quite the vogue nowadays to press those things upon the farmer—the eradication of weeds, the conservation of the soil, the rotation of crops, the mixing of his operations, and so on; we are all familiar with that, it is the favourite remedy prescribed by the farmer's city friends. They are very fond of saying: Now there you are; go to it; there is the whole secret of your trouble, you do not know how to farm. Occasionally a general manager of a bank, a railway magnate, or a representative of big business, and sometimes a cabinet minister, will leave his highly polished office in the city and take a flying trip through rural Canada I notice that the poetic instincts of these gentlemen never fail to be impressed by the wide expanse of growing grain undulating in the glorious sunshine of the West, but at the same time they never fail to be impressed by the slovenly and inefficient manner in which the farmer is trying to make ends meet. I came across a gentleman of that kind when coming down to Ottawa He blamed the farmer's economic troubles upon the farmer himself. The farmer was inefficient, incapable, disorderly, and I forget just what other adjectives he used; but behind that man's loud and blatant arraignment of the farmer I saw as I nearly always do see, an impenetrable wall of ignorance as to the actual conditions under which the farmer lives. There are quite a number of people who are not ignorant, or who should not be, who often by implication make practically the same charge against the farmer. Even the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) seems to trace all the troubles of the farmer to that cause—he is farming wrong, unscientifically.

The idea for the western farmer is to have a small farm, well-tilled, of not more than eighty acres. I read somewhere, where weeds were absolutely extinct, where everything was paradisiacal, where there was nothing that was not absolutely scientific; that is the secret of the farmers' emancipation; let him get down to mixed farming and all things will be well. Now there is nothing in the world that exasperates the average farmer more than talk of that kind, and the reason is plain. He is not lacking in modesty to the extent that he believes his method of farming is perfect. The farmer, as I know him in the West at all events is human and participates in all the weaknesses of our common humanity. Like the rest of us he has a long way to go before he reaches perfection in his particular calling. But to say to the farmer at the present juncture, when he is up against it, when he is struggling for existence: You must change your methods of farming, those traditional methods into which you have entered after years of experience; you must change that or there is no hope for you—to speak like that to the farmer is about the same as offering a gilt-edged menu card to a starving man and saying: Now, eat, drink and be filled, and everything will be all right.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the average farmer is more willing to bring his methods up to date than sometimes governments are willing to help him. I noticed in the papers some time ago that the farmers of Manitoba were anxious to go in for mixed farming. At last the voice that had emanated from the city office had taken effect, and the Manitoba farmers really had a desire to go into mixed farming; so they sent word down to Ottawa to see if perchance they might import milch cows from Wisconsin free of duty. But I understand from the newspapers that they were politely but firmly told that it was not desirable to import American milch cows free of duty, even though it would help in mixed farming

Then again I understand that the axe of economy, this new-found enthusiasm, this opportunist zeal for economy is going to fall first—where? Why, upon the annual grant that this government has made for the last ten years for the agriculture extension service. And yet the city man will go on saying that mixed farming is the cure, that nothing else is of any use whatever; so hang on to that for it will save you.

Mr. HARRIS: Did not the leader of the hon. member's party intimate to this House the other night that diversified farming would help to a degree?

Mr. BIRD: Is not that just what I was admitting myself, that the farmer has a sufficient degree of intelligence to admit that diversified farming is desirable? Let me tell my hon. friend that diversified farming will come as soon as the antecedent conditions that are necessary are brought about, as soon as governments show the necessary sympathy and co-operate. I want to interject here that farming as an occupation is carried on by numerous people in this country who are the descendants of people who carried on farming before them, and that being the case the traditional rules of their vocation have arrived at a consensus. There is an accumulated wisdom in the farming profession of this country which may not be quite as high as it ought to be, but I venture to say that this accumulated wisdom that resides within the average farmer of this country is superior to anything that can be offered to him from any office chair or from any college professor.

Let me pass on to the second series of cases I have in mind. Now, there are things which the farmer can do through organization, and I am glad to think that the co-operative spirit is taking so strong possession of the farmer of Canada. If there is one thing more significant than another in the rural life of Canada to-day it is the quick growth of the co-operative spirit amongst farmers, especially out West, during this last year or two. It is spreading through the West almost like a gospel, and is capturing the imagination and the mind of the farmer, and there is very little in the farmer's mind at the present time that weighs equally with it.

Two sessions ago when the organized farmers made representations here to this parliament for a wheat board they were met with very strong and very insistent opposition right in this place, and that opposition was so strong that the measure could not get through the House until it had been debilitated by compromises that rendered it practically worthless. The farmer took it back West with him and tried to make some use of it and when he failed, as he inevitably did fail, he turned his mind in the direction of co-operative effort, and that is where his mind has been ever since. When the wheat board legislation was passing through this House the opponents of it said to the farmer "Now, it will be your salvation if you will learn to cultivate a little bit more self help. You are dependent upon governments too much. Why don't you go back and help yourselves?" But I find that the same people who opposed the wheat board and offered that advice are the very people who are trying to hamper the co-operative efforts of the farmers now. It amounts to this, Mr. Speaker: That every time the farmers of this country—or of any country for that matter—try to lift themselves up above themselves, they at once clash with some vested interest or another.

Now, as I said, the matter of co-operative marketing is a burning question in the West at the present time, and the Department of Agriculture of the Dominion, has the opportunity of its life, it has the opportunity right now to show that it is behind the farmer. I know that the Department of Agriculture has carried on educative work for some time along co-operative lines. I read a pamphlet and a very good pamphlet, the other day on co-operative marketing in eggs. But what are eggs compared with wheat? There is a hint for the Department of Agriculture. There is a movement in the West that has for its objective the marketing of the western crop through the farmer's own self controlled channels. There is an opportunity for the government to show its sympathy for the farmer, there is an opportunity not only by lending its machinery for educative purposes, but if possible of getting behind the movement with some financial backing too. A short time ago there was a deputation of farmers here from the West who had the audacity to ask the government for some of their own money in order to help them to organize for co-operative marketing of their wheat. I do not know, except from the newspapers, the effect of that interview, but I hope the result will be satisfactory to the farmer of the West in pursuing this very legitimate and very admirable aim of getting together and marketing the staple product of our western farms.

Then again there are a large number of things which the farmer cannot tackle, either single handed or through organization, except the parliament of Canada come to his help by administrative means or by legislation, and those things are most vital things that affect the farmers' position at the present moment. Co-operative marketing and the improved methods of agriculture will come in time, but it will be only in time. It will take many years to switch the western farmer over from his present methods to any other method, necessarily so. But what the farmers in the West, at any rate in my district, need is some relief now. That is what they need at the present time, they need attention; and the things from which they suffer are things entirely within the control of parliament. In fact the reason they suffer is because of the enactment of parliament, because this parliament has willed that they should suffer in that way. It is not necessary for me to mention some of those things. There is the debt under which the farmer is labouring; there is taxation; there is the tariff; there is transportation. Every one of those factors in the cost of production is grinding the face of the farmer at the present time; and grinding the face of the farmer because this government here—I beg your pardon this parliament—wills that they should grind the face of the farmer. That is the situation under which the farmer is labouring at the present time. The economic situation of the farmer is right within the hands of this parliament, right within its hands at the present time. It is no use trying to move the responsibility over to the farmer himself or to any other outside origin. The crux of the whole situation is right within this Dominion parliament. Now, someone will say that this place, this chaste temple of national causes, ought not to be degraded into a forum for the furtherance of class interest. This is the place where only the abstract good of all can be considered, and not the concrete good of a few. That is the position that one frequently hears put forward not only here but elsewhere—that this is not the place for a class to bring its grievances. But where else can the farmer bring his grievance, or carry his grievance, because here is the place of their origin? He is helpless if he is ruled out from bringing his grievance to the only place where he can possibly find redress.

Upon the financial difficulties under which the farmer labours at the present time I will not dwell very long, although I know that a good many farmers in the West believe that the financial side of their situation is the most important. During the war farmers very often were led to invest their money, through patriotic incentives, and now in the process of a few short years they are left absolutely defenceless against the rapacity of their creditors. I know large numbers of them personally, and they are most sober, capable farmers, Canadian-born, who have lost all that they had accumulated as a result of their life's toil. There are many others who, though not losing all, have been saddled with a debt that will embitter their lives as long as they live. Perhaps if I were challenged to say just how parliament could help that situation I might not be able very clearly at the moment to say; but surely parliament exists for the very purpose of seeing that that kind of thing does not happen, or if it does happen that some relief can be found. During this debate an attempt has been made to show that the war was not paid for as it proceeded. We know it was not paid for as it proceeded, but it is being paid for at the present time, to the ruination of many hard working honest farmers throughout the length and breadth of this country. Talking about capital levy, I know farmers who have suffered a capital levy. Some of them have lost four, five, six or eight thousand dollars in the course of a short time, and why? Because a war occurred in which the whole nation was involved, which was the means, not of impoverishing the nation as a whole, but simply the means of transferring millions of dollars of wealth from one part of the nation to another, and is this parliament not the place to come and lay a grievance of that kind? Surely this is the place to present it because the whole financial system of this country hinges right on this Chamber.

As I said before, I have no suggestion to make as to how the government should come to the relief of victims of our financial system. Probably if I were to venture one suggestion I would be classified amongst the theorists. Last session in the Banking committee room we had a professor from a noted American university standing before us, telling us that the war had been the means of transferring wealth, without any equivalent, from one set of persons to another set of persons to the amount of billions of dollars. I think it was said to be forty billion dollars in the United States. The same thing has occurred in Canada. There are thousands of people in Canada to-day who took homesteads in the West twenty or thirty years ago, who ever since have been working hard, saving and improving their farms, and who to-day are without farms at all. I travelled to Winnipeg with one farmer the other day who was coming down to see his wife in the General Hospital in that city. He told me that when he stood in the bank the other day and was told by the manager that the decision had been made to close him out, he felt as though it would have been as well if that manager had come and knocked him on the head. He said "My life's work and all the savings of all these years had gone." That man is homesteading afresh, at an age approaching almost sixty years. That is not an isolated case at all by any means, as I could prove if I had time. He was a capable man, born in old Ontario, sober, diligent and a good farmer; and that is the position he is in to-day. The bank manager said to him. "Why do you not write home to the people in Ontario and ask them to try and help you settle up the little balance that is left?" He told him he was ashamed to write home to old Ontario and tell the people the position he was in, after all the years he had been out West. I do not know what the intention of the government is in regard to the financial aspect of the farmers' business, but one would hope there will be an attempt at any rate to do something. It is not an easy matter for the government to address itself to the farmers' financial needs. There is a wide area for experimentation, but a beginning ought to be made in that direction, in order that the financial aspect of the farmers' business might be made as easy for him as possible.

Dealing for a moment with the question of the tariff: I have listened with a great deal of interest to that subject of never failing interest; and I believe that the farmer especially in the West, will continue to be a free trader so long as he has to sell his surplus produce on a foreign market and produce those goods under conditions of protection. It needs no prophetic gift to know just where the western farmer at any rate is going to stand on the question of free trade or protection. We have before us to-night at this stage of the debate the amendment proposed by our hon. friends to the right. As I listened to that amendment, after having listened to the previous debate, I thought to myself, now here is a new version of the mountain and the mouse. After all this fierce rumbling, booming, cracking, banging, flashing and flaring, here comes forward a mouse, a poor anaemic mouse, alas, the poor distressed agriculturist. "Cheer up Mr. Farmer, we are going to add a little to the tariff; felicitate yourself, we are going to increase the duties on your machinery; leap and shout for joy, we are going to protect you into prosperity."

I notice that the amendment draws our attention to the exodus from Canada—that doleful subject. I wondered—and yet I did not wonder—where those people are going. Does anybody here know where they are going? They are leaving Canada. Where are they going? They are leaving the farms of Canada and they are going on to the farms of the United States.

Mr. HOEY: Not on your life!

Mr. BIRD: An hon. member here knows more than I do, and I am glad he does because that is what I would fain believe myself. That is just where they are not going. No farmer in a country that has a medium protection would ever go and farm in a country that has a big protection, because that is where the farmers really starve. They do not quite starve in Canada; but they do actually starve in the United States, and they could not help starving. I will tell you where all these people are going. They are going into the cities of the United States, those great, big swollen parasites that suck the life-blood of the American producer. They are going to swell the numbers of the parasites. Long before Great Britain enjoyed free trade, William Cobbett, when he took his ride through rural England, described the city of London, which had grown prodigiously in the then recent years, as a wen, a wart, an unsightly and ugly protuberance growing up like a weed and sucking like a vampire the life-blood of the nation. That is true of the American cities. They are living on the life-blood of the American producer, the man who works in the mine, in the forest or on the sea. That is where they are going. But our friends says: "The cities create the home market." Let me tell you what they create—a big, wide-open mouth that swallows up the hard-earned toil of the man who works by his hands, the farmer in the wheat states, the corn states and the cotton states. Oh, there is no prosperity in rural America, but there is prosperity in urban America. That is always true of protectionist countries. It cannot help being true

I noticed that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland), who moved the amendment, was not quite so sympathetic with the poor working man. He said some awfully stinging things about the poor civil servant in this city and about the workingman who, by organization, had, at last, been able to protect himself. It is all right for his friends to protect themselves, but it is not right for anybody else's friends to protect themselves. This parliament and this government is suffering, not through the influence of the big interests, but through the awfully corrupt influence of the civil servants and the workingmen of this country! He said: "It would be a good thing if this building and this institution could be taken right away from that corrupting influence and all those gentle, innocent looking men whom we meet in the street and who are the servants of this country." The civil servants—they are the people who are threatening the integrity of this country, and the sooner we get this parliament away from that atmosphere, the better it will be! I will tell the hon. gentleman that right in my constituency I have a number of sites that would be ideal. Only I will warrant him that they would be just about as inaccessible to his friends as to anybody else's friends, and it would be a fearful tragedy if the Manufacturers' Association, like the civil servants and the poor workingmen, could not bring its influence to bear upon this parliament. I think, possibly, I have summed up in those few words, the quality, essence and quintessence of that thing that was tagged on to the end of the hon. gentleman's speech and that is called an amendment. Mark you, they are asking the government to do what a speaker, a short while ago in this debate, told them was criminal to do—that was to interfere with the tariff in the middle of a parliament. It is all right to move it up, but you must not move it down.

I come now to the question of transportation, and I would like to tell the House that in the farmer's mind, there is no factor that weighs upon him so much as transportation. Neither the tariff nor anything else figures with the farmer like transportation. If you stay to consider for a moment what it costs a farmer to send a bushel of wheat or a steer to Liverpool, or eggs or poultry or cream or anything else to the home market, you will know just how much transportation figures in the mind of the average farmer. Two sessions ago this parliament dealt with the Crowsnest pass agreement, and that was very highly appreciated by the western farmer, although, mark you, it was not much of a consession. It was a fragmentary piece of justice that was very quickly becoming overdue. At any rate, the farmer was grateful. Last session when the government attempted to grapple with the shipping ring on the Great Lakes, the farmer was likewise appreciative according to its degree. The failure of that attempt is just as significant to the western farmer as the injustice itself with which the attempt was made to deal. It is all very well for the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) to taunt the government with the failure, as he did; but I would like to tell the right hon. gentleman that when you begin to struggle with the big interests, it is not the species of government at all that matters, it is the genius. It was not because it was a Liberal government that it failed, but it was because it was a government—well, just as it was a government. Governments, hitherto, and even up to the present time, are not so constituted that they are of any great advantage when they begin to handle the big interests, because the big interests seem to have some kind of inside hold, and therefore, it is not easy for any government, such as we have known governments, to tackle those big freshwater monsters that batten and thrive upon the hard-earned toil of the western farmer, that Great Lakes' Kraken that lies in wait every fall until the crop ripens and then sinks its fangs into the vital spot of commerce and holds on. But we are willing that the government should try again, because they know by this time that it is a monopoly of a peculiarly vicious kind, and the only effective way to deal with such a monopoly is either to destroy it or take it over and use it for the advantage of the public at large.

Now, this naturally brings me to a very congenial subject—the natural outlets of western Canada to the sea. There is the crux of the whole transportation question. If Canada could develop its natural outlets to the utmost, these things might not happen; if every one of Canada's avenues to the sea were developed to the fullest extent, the strain that periodically falls upon any one of them would automatically be relieved, and the element of competition would assure to the farmer a minimum charge for the carriage of his products. My friends around me know what I am aiming at. In the Speech from the Throne there was some mention of transportation and, by implication, of its importance to the farmer. But the reference was in a form that, to the western mind, seems totally unwarranted. For years, and never more insistently than now, the West has been asking for the Hudson Bay route, and the government in the Speech from the Throne says in effect: Oh, yes, certainly; here is the Welland canal. We asked for an egg and they gave us, not a white stone —using the simile of the leader of the opposition—but a white elephant, which is worse even than a white stone. The West has had the Hudson Bay route in its mind and imagination for over a generation. Between the years 1907 and 1917 the activities of both governments were such as to make the West believe that at last its long cherished aspirations were about to be realized. In the latter year, 1917, however, it was thought best to suspend the work on the Hudson Bay railway in the interests of national economy. The West acquiesced in that view, with the distinct understanding that when the financial condition of the Dominion warranted it the work would be resumed. That was the compact, and so for four or five years public opinion in the West in regard to this project lay dormant; but two or three years ago certain sinister signs began to appear, certain signs of opposition, certain signs that that compact was in danger of not being observed. The opposition began to assume a very bitter form, until in the fall of 1922 it culminated in an attempt at vandalism such as has scarcely ever been equalled in the history of this country. An attempt was actually made not only to deface, but even to obliterate, the work which had already been done. I am not blaming the government for it. The thing was done unknown to the public, it was done, I venture to say, without the knowledge of the government as to its real significance, and in the West there is a firm conviction that it originated in the minds of the enemies of the proposition.

That was in the fall of 1922. By that one act public opinion in the West was aroused to fever pitch. The long cherished aspiration to which the people out there had clung was attempted to be defeated in that underhand method. The revival of public opinion in the West in regard to the Hudson Bay route coincided practically with the beginning of this parliament two years ago, and during the two sessions that have passed western representatives have done their best to present the Hudson Bay railway case to the House, as Hansard will attest. Last year our hopes were again revived by the grant of $350,000 for the continuation of the work and also by various professions made on both sides of the House, only to be dashed to the ground last summer and fall by the almost entire absence of any visible attempt to spend the money. The excuse made by the government that the vote was passed too late may be a good one, it may even be adequate—and I do not question the sincerity of the government—but I would point out that it is not the kind of excuse you can use twice; it would look a little bit faded if ever called upon to do a like service. To-day the West is looking for an early vote, an adequate vote, and a sincere vote on this matter, in spite of all this talk about economy, this opportunist economy, that has suddenly sprung up like a mushroon in certain quarters of the Dominion, because I tell you that to the western farmer, especially in the north of those rich provinces, the completion of the Hudson Bay railway is supreme economy. Why, if the expenditure made on the Welland canal for one year were spread over two or three years it would suffice to build the Hudson Bay railway to a point where it might be tried out and taken forever from the sphere of embittering controversy. This is not merely a business proposition that you can estimate in dollars and cents. It is a matter of profound sentiment, indefinable yet nevertheless powerful, that always grows in the consciousness of people who are isolated, as we are out West, towards their natural outlets to the wide world. You are dealing with a profound community consciousness that you cannot defeat. Mention is made in the Speech from the Throne of the everlasting problem of East and West, and we know it is a problem the solution of which is of supreme importance to the Dominion. Here is a chance for statesmanship to prove itself, to grant this generation-old aspiration of the West for its natural outlet to the sea. I venture to say that if this government will see its way clear to do that, if it will make a favourable and definite pronouncement of policy on this question, it will work a revolution in the mental attitude of the West towards the East which has become exasperated by reason of an unscrupulous propaganda that has been carried on by certain newspapers in the East.

The Hudson bay proposition will come up before this House at a later stage. My hon. friend for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) has a resolution on the order paper, and when it comes up for consideration I hope to be able with others to meet some of the arguments which during this last year have been spread broadcast throughout Canada, and especially throughout eastern Canada, in regard to this proposition. Statements, in reference to facts, that are patently false, have been scattered throughout the country by means of newspaper propaganda in order to defeat the West of this legitimate aim of theirs for the opening-up of their natural channel to the markets of the world; and when the resolution of the hon. member comes up I shall deal with these misrepresentations.

On motion of Mr. Logan the debate was adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now adjourn. In doing so I think it might not be out of place for me to observe that if this debate is to be concluded within a reasonable time the House, beginning next week, should sit somewhat later.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

Monday, March 10, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Nineteenth Annual Report of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.—Hon. Mr. Graham.

PRIVILEGE.—HON. MR. SINCLAIR

Hon. J. E. SINCLAIR (Queen's, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to the question of privilege. Members of the House may have observed certain rumours published in the newspapers during the past few days, and even previously, with which my name was connected. I desire, therefore, to place before the House and the country a statement of the facts so that the actual situation in connection with these rumours may be known, particularly as bearing on the extent to which I have in any way been connected with the man Mitchell who was recently under trial in London. There is nothing, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to conceal. I want hon. members and the public generally to know the truth and everything connected with the incidents to which reference has been made; I will therefore make a detailed statement of fact so that they may be the judges.

In the month of December, 1922, at a dinner given by the Board of Trade of Moncton, N.B., I met Andrew Fraser Mitchell, who said he was a son of Mr. A. P. Mitchell, Superintendent of Education of the Central Provinces of India. Mitchell said he was born in India and that he was a cousin of H. L. Fraser, an inspector at Ottawa of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Division "N," and was a nephew of the late Sir Andrew Fraser, who was in his lifetime a well known and distinguished Indian official and whose widow, Lady Fraser, now lives in Edinburgh. Mr. Mitchell informed me that he was wholly concerned in a scheme for settling in Canada Indian retired civil servants; that he had considered locations in British Columbia and elsewhere in Canada, and that he thought the Maritime provinces offered possibilities and attractions interesting for settlers of this class. He further intimated that Prince Edward Island ought to be quite suitable for his scheme of settlement, because the proposed settlers would all be possessed of means, would find the Island life agreeable in summer, and would be afforded an opportunity of going south or back to the Old Country for the winter.

Being interested in the question of obtaining immigrants to come into the province, and in consequence of Mr. Mitchell's statement that he was to visit there, I communicated with Inspector H. L. Fraser at Ottawa, who verified Mitchell's statement as to his reliability and character. In addition I caused inquiries to be made from Mr. A. A. McLean, Comptroller of the Mounted Police and formerly member for Prince Edward Island, in regard to Inspector Fraser, and received from him information which confirmed the view that the relative of Inspector Fraser's was a man who could be relied upon.

Mitchell came to Charlottetown about the middle of January, 1923. At his request I met him there and we interviewed the Premier, the Commissioner of Public Works, and the Commissioner of Agriculture, for the province. The Premier, Hon. Mr. Bell, listened to Mitchell's representations, but intimated to Mitchell that there was not much likelihood of his being employed by the province as owing to the state of the finances of the province they could not engage in emigration work.

I returned to my home at Emerald on January 18, and on the following day Mitchell came to see me. He then stated that he proposed to go on with his emigration scheme on his own account and that he had men with means who would support his project; and he proposed in any event to acquire land in Prince Edward Island for the settlement of those composing the class of men whom he proposed to bring to Canada. Mitchell also interviewed a neighbour of mine, Mr. William H. Mayne, to whom also he explained his proposals. The result was that on Saturday, 20th January, 1923, Mitchell took options on the farms of Mr. William H. Mayne, Mr. Peter Sinclair and myself, and on Monday, 22nd January, on the farm of Mr. George H. Mayne, covering in all something over 700 acres. The options were for the purchase of these farms within one year, and at the rate of $100 per acre, provided that if the options were exercised after May 1, 1923, and the crops would have to be sacrificed, payment of this damage would be made by the option holder.

In February, 1923, Mitchell came to Ottawa, saying that he was not successful in getting interested the people he expected would assist him, and would have to drop his options, and that he had again approached the provincial government of the Island who had now agreed to appoint him as colonization representative. He asked me if he could see the Minister of Immigration at Ottawa, with the idea that the province might have the benefit of $150 a month which the federal Department of Immigration allows to provincial officers overseas when they are working in harmony with Dominion immigration officials. Mitchell, recognized as a provincial official, was taken under this practice.

When Mitchell received his appointment from the provincial government he objected to its form in respect to the way in which he was designated. He telegraphed me that he was asking Premier Bell to have it changed and requested me to assist in correcting it, and on February 19 I telegraphed the Premier, Mr. Bell, accordingly.

When Mitchell went to London he appeared to have some difficulty with the Dominion Department of Immigration there, and cabled me accordingly. I did nothing more than pass his request on to the secretary of the Minister of Immigration at Ottawa.

Toward the end of July I was advised from Ottawa of disturbing reports coming from London and that Mitchell was antagonizing the shipping companies and others. Early in August I was informed when at Ottawa that Mitchell was dropped from the list.

Upon returning I received a telephone message from Mr. H. R. Thompson, of Amherst, the secretary of the Canadian Manufacturer's Association for the Maritime provinces, saying that he was in communication with Mitchell, who had wired requesting Thompson to have a survey made of lands in Prince Edward Island, which Mitchell said were held by him under options to purchase. I answered Mr. Thompson that the land owners understood that the options were ended months ago. His reply was that his instructions were to have surveys made. I told him he would have to see the land owners as I did not think the options gave any right to survey before they were taken up.

In a few days Mitchell and Thompson came to Prince Edward Island. They asked why the surveys were objected to, and were told that there was nothing to survey, since the land owners considered the options were at an end long before. Mitchell proceeded to get the land owners together and asked leave to survey the land, and for an extension of the time of the options. The land owners refused, unless the land should be paid for and possession taken by him at once. He refused to release the options, saying that he had responsible people interested with him and must go on. He distinctly stated to the land owners at that time that he had then nothing to do with governments and was carrying out his own private scheme. The owners then agreed to extend the option on payment by Mitchell of twenty per cent of the price at the end of the option period, and they agreed to give him the privilege of surveying a part of the Mayne lands.

Mitchell asked at this time to settle some colonists on the rear portion of the proposed survey on condition of his paying at the rate of $100 per acre for the part taken, payment to be made before any building should be erected or possession given. A couple of weeks later Mitchell came back with Captain Dudley, a retired Indian army officer. I saw these men at Emerald Junction, but only in a casual way. They came out to the lands and Captain Dudley was represented by Mitchell to be his agent, who would reside in Halifax, or Amherst, and who would superintend the settlement of such as would arrive by autumn.

Toward the end of August, or in the early part of September, Captain Dudley came back with Captain Butler and Captain Duthie, both retired Indian army officers. I did not see them. At this time there was lumber on the ground, but no house up. I met them the following day but I had no conversation with them.

About two weeks later, Butler and Duthie returned to Prince Edward Island. They said they were dissatisfied and refused to go on the land, stating that misrepresentations had been made by Mitchell. Thompson came to Charlottetown and asked me to come there to meet him. Later I went in and saw letters which Butler and Duthie had from Mitchell and which appeared to me to contain statements contrary to facts. Butler and Duthie stated that Mitchell made misrepresentations also to the fact that some eight families were already settled, and thirty or forty would be settled by the autumn. While we were together another message came from Amherst intimating that Captain Turner, another proposed settler, was on his way. He came and told a similar story.

I then cabled to Mitchell stating I had seen Thompson, Duthie, Butler and Turner, and that they charged him with misrepresentations, and pointed out to him that the statements in his letters as attributed to me were entirely untrue; and believing that on account of his position and relations that he was responsible, I stated that he should refund to them their money.

Later I had one or two letters from Mitchell, who tried to explain his situation and to say that Lieutenant Jackson was coming as his representative, and would settle up everything. I did not pay any further attention to Mitchell's communications. Jackson came in October, when he found one bungalow completed. Jackson told the land owners that he was representing Mitchell; that he was a retired naval officer, and that he had spent the first and second of October with Mitchell in London getting his instructions. I then showed Jackson my cablegram to Mitchell of September 27, and told him further that I thought Mitchell had misrepresented the situation. Jackson then told me that Mitchell had not shown him my cablegram, and that if he had seen that message he would not have come to Canada.

In the meantime the government of Prince Edward Island changed and the new Premier, Hon. Mr. Stewart, indicated that he proposed to investigate Mitchell's actions, and this investigation was carried out. All the landowners appeared and gave evidence at the first hearing, except that my own hearing was postponed from 25th October to the middle of November and still later, when I gave my evidence as I have stated.

I desire also to say that after the visit of Mitchell and Thompson, the sum of $279 was given by Mitchell to Mr. William H. Mayne to pay for the cost of surveying a certain portion of the properties under option. This survey was made, and later on cheques for $500, $300 and $500 respectively were received by him on account of part of the purchase price of part of the properties of George H. Mayne and William H. Mayne; the balance of these moneys after paying the cost of the survey remains in the hands of Mr. William H. Mayne. Mitchell never arranged with me at any time for the erection of any bungalow. I have not profited one cent either directly or indirectly from the transactions of the said Mitchell in Canada or elsewhere.

I have had nothing whatever to do either directly or indirectly in the promotion of Mitchell's scheme. Any visits I made, or communications I have had with the Premier of Prince Edward Island or the government of that province, or with the Minister of Immigration at Ottawa, or with his department, and connected with Mitchell in any way, were done by me in exactly the same way as I might have acted at the request of any individual, and just as every public man in Canada might have done scores of times throughout his public career. I am not responsible for anything Mitchell did or said, and not a single one of the proposed English settlers has ever made any charge against me, or offered to suggest that I was in any manner, even remotely blameworthy.

The only purpose or reason I interested myself in the matter at all was in order to advance the interests of my province. I felt, from the representations made by Mr. Mitchell, that it would be desirable to bring to Prince Edward Island men of the character and stamp that he represented he was in a position to bring there, and were it not for the fact that after full inquiries I felt that Mr. Mitchell was a reliable man, I would have had no dealings with him whatever.

I make this statement, Mr. Speaker, in order that the full facts may be known. If any detail is omitted, I have no desire that it shall be in any way held back from the members of the House and the public.

CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. Jos. T. SHAW (West Calgary): I would like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) if there is any truth in the report current in the papers that the government does not intend to take any steps to prevent the full operation of the Crowsnest pass agreement in July next.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): The action of the government will be made known in due course. I am not in a position to state its attitude to-day.

ORDER—REFERENCES TO THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister): Might I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to one thing? I seldom, if ever, call any speaker to order so long as he keeps within reasonable distance of the rules of debate, but I fear that in the debate on the Address now in progress we are getting close to the violation of a rule in referring, as has been done frequently in this House, to what has taken place in the upper chamber. I think that is not according to the well-known practice of the House of Commons. I remember being called to order on one occasion in this House for referring to what was said in the upper chamber in these words: "Somewhere, some person has used this language," I was called to order for quoting from a debate in the Senate. I think I need only call attention to the rule. In order to maintain good feeling between the two Houses of Parliament and respect one for the other, we should not refer to the debates taking place in the upper house.

UNITED STATES TARIFF ON WHEAT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Might I ask if the government contemplates taking any action, by way of retaliation or otherwise, in regard to the proposed increase in the United States tariff against Canadian wheat and wheat products?

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister): "Retaliation" is a bad word to use in business, if the object of trade is to make a profit. I would not like to say that the government had even been considering retaliation.

HOME BANK INVESTIGATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Will the acting leader of the House say whether or not anything has been done towards amending the commission in respect of the Home Bank inquiry, pursuant to the promise of the Prime Minister last week?

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister): I will look into the matter and give my hon. friend a reply tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the leader of the House lay on the table the amended commission?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have no objection to doing that when the commission is amended.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Sutherland, resumed from Friday, March 7.

Mr. HANCE J. LOGAN (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, joining with others I desire to congratulate the mover (Mr. Kelly), and the seconder (Mr. Lapierre) of the Address. We have known the member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) for a long time; we know how eloquent he is. I hail in this House a fellow Nova Scotian in the member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Kelly), who in moving the Address gave us one of the most businesslike speeches we have listened to for some sessions. I am going to speak to-day in perhaps a rather candid way. I agree with my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St George (Mr. Marler) who told us on Thursday that speeches in this debate should be rather in the direction of advice to the government of the country, and should reflect the views of the constituencies which the speakers represent. I propose this afternoon, in a most humble way, to give some advice to the government of Canada particularly in reference to the Maritime provinces to which I have the honour to belong.

The Speech from the Throne itself, as a whole, is one which commends itself to all well-wishers of Canada. If previously we had a chart we now have a definite programme to deal with at this session. Speaking as a Liberal I regard the Speech from the Throne as one calculated to give us fresh hope for the welfare of this country. Undoubtedly the speech is long, consisting as it does of twenty-one or twenty-two paragraphs, but every paragraph is important in view of the present condition of affairs with which we have to cope. I shall refer particularly, Mr. Speaker, to one or two of these paragraphs in passing. Paragraph 4 is thus worded:

> My ministers believe, however, that in virtue of economies already effected they will, when the present financial year closes, be able to announce to the country that for the first time since 1912-1913 the national budget has been balanced. They are further of the opinion that when the budget for the ensuing fiscal year is introduced it will be found that the relation between public revenue and public expenditure is such as to justify some immediate reduction of taxation.

The people of this country will welcome this declaration of an early reduction in taxation with a great deal of pleasure. We know that the war was expensive. We were quite willing during that great struggle to bear our burden. But the taxation of this country at the present time—I refer particularly to the direct taxation—is, in my humble judgment, too high, and is not in the best interests of the country as a whole.

In the next paragraph the government announce that the government propose > —to reduce the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, thereby aiding materially in the development of our natural resources, and, through cheapened production, effecting a diminution also in the cost of living.

That is a good sound Liberal principle, a doctrine which we desire to preach and to carry out. The wealth of Canada can never be built up with exotic industries. The great wealth of Canada depends upon the soil, upon the sea, upon the forest, upon the mines, and whatever we can do to lessen the cost of production in connection with these great natural resources, the richer our country must become. This doctrine is particularly pleasing to one from Nova Scotia, because there we not only have the important industry of agriculture but we also have the great mining industry, we have the lumbering industry, and we have the great fishing industry. A reduction in the cost of production will be beneficial to these industries as well as to agriculture. One would think sometimes when an industry affecting a few hundred men is getting nervous, that there were not other large industries in Canada which should be considered. I read an address the other day delivered by my hon. friend the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) before an organization in this city in which he made this statement:

> One hundred thousand of the inhabitants of Canada are dependent upon the fishing industry.

What in the name of heaven has protection ever done for the fishing industry of this country? We have in Nova Scotia probably nearly one hundred thousand people directly or indirectly dependent upon the coal mining industry. What has protection ever done for the coal mining industry of this Dominion? I will devote some little time later on in my address to a consideration of the question of the duty upon coal. I want to remove from the minds of the people of Canada the idea that we have any protection upon the production of coal. Then, too, what has protection ever done for the lumbering industry of the Maritime provinces, or for that matter what has it ever done for the agricultural interests of these provinces? Forty-five years have gone by since great hopes were held out to us. We were promised in that distant past that the National Policy would build up great industries in the Maritime provinces, that smokestacks would arise in all parts of the country, and that incidentally there would be a great market for the products of the farm. We have waited for forty-five years for this prediction to be fulfilled. I defy anybody in this House, from the leader of the opposition down, to show where high protection has been of benefit to the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Why, Sir, the two industries in my constituency that have really weathered the storm, so to speak—have weathered the hard times that followed the war—are the woollen industry in Oxford and the boot and shoe industry in Amherst. They were prosperous industries away back in the seventies before we had any National Policy; but some other industries particularly those which have been built up on a false basis were the ones to suffer first when depression came a few years ago.

Mr. Speaker, we have had it stated here there is prosperity in Canada. The leader of the opposition denies it, but I prefer to take the language of a man who occupies a very important position, namely R. S. White, editor in chief of the Montreal Gazette, the sanest Conservative newspaper in Canada. In his opening remarks in the book published this year by the Gazette company containing a commercial and financial review of the year 1923 he says:

> Surveying the state of trade in Canada in 1923, and all that pertains to the material prosperity of its people, there is much to encourage and little to dispirit.

Taking the whole of the Dominion of Canada "there is much to encourage and little to dispirit," but we must admit there are districts in Canada which have not the prosperity which we would wish. Those districts are the prairie provinces of the West and the Maritime provinces. We on this side desire to endeavour to better conditions in these two parts of Canada, believing as we do that the strength of our confederation chain depends upon the strength of the individual links. It is of no use to try to build up a strong Canada when the Maritime provinces are weak or are not prospering. The Maritime provinces were considered most important to confederation, and they are most important. But if the conditions there are not what they should be, it behooves this government, or any other government in this country, to get down, as my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) often says, to brass tacks, to find out what is the matter, and effect a remedy, if possible.

Referring again to the general prosperity of Canada outside of these two parts thereof, it is a matter of congratulation that there has been and is considerable prosperity. I know it is stated that we are very heavily in debt, that we owe about two billions four hundred millions of money, but does it ever occur to you, Mr. Speaker, that three-quarters of that money is due to Canadians, and that the people of Canada actually receive every year from that loan about ninety million dollars in interest? The government pays in pensions to the soldiers thirty-three million dollars. That money is kept in Canada; it circulates again, and part of it comes back to the treasury of the country. We advanced to railways something like seventy-seven millions last year, but was that money sent out of the country? No, it was paid out to working men, to manufacturers, and producers throughout the length and breadth of the land. We gave subsidies to the provinces of twelve million dollars which is spent in the provinces and is coming back to us in an indirect way. We gave in grants for secular education, for highways and agriculture, eight million dollars, and in ordinary expenditure about one hundred and twenty-six million dollars, all spent in Canada, and paid to Canadians. Our total expenditure for the year was about four hundred and thirty-four million. I venture to state that out of that sum three hundred and seventy-five million dollars remained in Canada, that being one of the reasons why this country is as prosperous as it is to-day. If hon. members will look at the deposits in the savings banks and in the chartered banks of the country, they will find that in spite of the fact that the Canadians have one billion seven hundred millions invested in government bonds, the deposits in the chartered banks and in the savings banks have materially increased during the last year. Therefore, I think it can be very well said that, so far as the central part of Canada is concerned there is prosperity and considerable of it.

What is the matter, may I ask, with the Maritime provinces? I am not going to speak of the prairie provinces, because there are so many honourable gentlemen from those provinces who know so much more about them than I do that it would be presumptuous on my part to speak about their difficulties. But I do claim to know something about the difficulties of the Maritime provinces. What are the difficulties? What is the cause of this depression? Why is it that so many of our manufactories are idle? Why is it that the grass grows upon the streets of many of the seaport towns of those provinces? I give you the answer, Mr. Speaker, in two words. Tariff and transportation are the causes of it. We did not feel the effects of the National Policy as long as we had cheap transportation. We did not feel it so severely as we feel it now, so long as we could transport our manufactured goods from the Maritime provinces into the middle of Canada or the West at a low rate of freight. But, a few years ago, when the late government merged the Intercolonial with the commercial railways of Canada, and raised the freight rates to their present position, we found ourselves not only up against a tariff wall, but up against a freight wall, and between the two walls we are being squeezed to death.

[Mr. Logan.]

Let us stress for a moment what happened in the Maritime provinces. Hon. members will pardon me if I go over this matter, not at as great length as I have on other occasions in the House, but to some extent to follow up my arguments. In the Maritime provinces, let it be understood and known, before confederation we were a comparatively rich people. The trade per capita of New Brunswick, let me tell hon. members, in 1864 was almost double that of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, known as old Canada, and the trade of Nova Scotia was materially greater than the trade of Canada. We owned at that time in Nova Scotia over three thousand ships which sailed out of our ports carrying products of the farms, forests, mines and fisheries. Where did they carry that produce? They carried it especially to the New England states and to the West Indies. We had at that time seventeen thousand of our sons upon the sea, manning ships, sailing through the different waters, particularly those which I have mentioned. We did not desire confederation. Let that also be distinctly understood; and so great an optimist as my very distinguished predecessor in the representation of Cumberland, that great Canadian, Sir Charles Tupper, Baronet, in 1864, three years before confederation, made the statement in the House of Assembly in Nova Scotia that the difficulties of confederation were insuperable. Shortly after that our men met in Charlottetown to form a Maritime union. While there a delegation from Upper and Lower Canada, the greatest galaxy of orators probably that ever sailed the Maritime seas—Sir John Macdonald, Hon. George Brown, D'Arcy McGee, Sir Hector Langevin, and many others of the great political stars of the country—came in upon our little convention, and said, "Walk into our parlor of confederation." The representatives of the Maritime provinces said, "No, there are too great difficulties." They said, "What are they? What are you afraid of." Our representatives said, "We are afraid, first that you will raise a tariff in this country that will by a retaliatory tariff interfere with our trade with that country which nature intended we should trade with, namely the New England states of America. If we are shut out from that market, where are we? Where is our market to come from?" With honeyed words, these orators said, "We will give you a new market to take the place of this market if you should lose it." Our delegates said to them, "How can you give us that market? You are too far away." They replied, "We will build you a means of communication, namely the Intercolonial, in order that if you lose the United States market you will have a market equally as good in the central parts of Canada." Our people listened to them. They did not however take their word; they insisted it should be in the bond, and if hon. members will read section 145 of the British North America Act they will find set out in that section not only the promised building of the Intercolonial, but the reasons why it would be built, namely to secure the consent of the people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to enter confederation. For fifty years the promises given at the time of confederation were fairly well kept. As I say, we did not feel the effect of the National Policy or high protection in this country as long as we were able to send our goods from the Maritime provinces to the West. We used to boast in the young city in which I live that we sent over half of our products to western Canada. We send mighty little of our production to western Canada or to central Canada to-day, because we are shut out of those markets by the exorbitant rates that have been put into effect upon the railways of our country, the Intercolonial included.

It is difficult for us to make the people of the rest of Canada understand our grievance in this matter, and it is difficult for them to know just how sensitive we are. There are many still living that remember the fight for confederation. It is still an unpopular subject to discuss. They know, and we, their sons, know that those solemn promises were made and we know that when the Intercolonial railway ceased to be a part of the constitution of this country and was placed among commercial railways of Canada and under the same rates of freight, a crime was committed against the people of the Maritime provinces. We are here to-day again to ask and demand that those promises made to us in 1864, 1865 and 1866, promises which I could repeat here for an hour if I cared to weary you, must be kept if we are to be at all prosperous and to become the part of confederation that we should be.

Before leaving this subject, let me say that we in the Maritime provinces feel grateful for some things that have been done by this government. Under the old government, our whole road was controlled in Toronto by Canadian Northern officials, men who had no sympathy with us and with whom we did not have much acquaintance. This government has changed that. We have had established at Moncton headquarters for the government railways in the Maritime provinces. They are in charge of a Maritime province man. The general superintendent is a Maritime province man, and equally pleasant is the fact that the general traffic manager is also a Maritime province man. We have, as I say, many things to be thankful for to this government for ameliorating the conditions that existed there four or five years ago. But I want to say now to the government and to the country that until conditions are made better as regards freight rates in the Maritime provinces, not from an economic standpoint altogether, but from a constitutional standpoint, we never can be satisfied in those provinces, and the government is bound to find that out. They found it out in the constituency of Halifax. They found it out in the constituency of Kent. Nobody in Halifax spoke about protection; even the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter) did not talk protection in Halifax. He did not talk protection in Kent. Why? That would be ridiculous; nobody wanted to hear about protection. But what he did talk about was the grievances of the Maritime provinces, and the people feel those grievances and they must be remedied.

Mr. HOCKEN: Did I understand the hon. member to say that those appointments to executive positions on the railways were made by the government?

Mr. LOGAN: Indirectly by the government. They were made by Sir Henry Thornton and his board, and Sir Henry Thornton and his board were appointed by the government, so indirectly they were appointed by the government.

Having stated the reason for the depression in the Maritime provinces, let me suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House, some things that may bring back our prosperity. In the first place, we desire export trade. We are, it has been well said, the eastern wharf of Canada. But our export trade has diminished and does not bring to us that prosperity which we formerly enjoyed. Our natural market, besides that of the United States, is to the south of us. We looked, in days gone by, to the United States. That market is closed to us by the Fordney tariff. We then looked to central and western Canada for trade. That market is closed to us by the freight tariff. Where are we to look now? We are to look to the place where we always should have looked, namely, across water transportation to the countries to the south of us. Export trade with the West Indies and with South America should be encouraged in every possible way. Trade with those countries should be built up and looked after. During this winter I had an opportunity of visiting some of the British West Indies. I desire to call the attention of one or two of the ministers of the cabinet and of the people of this country to conditions as they exist at the present time as regards trade with the islands to the south. In the Bahama islands there is a large population looking to trade with Canada. We have not a trade agent or a commercial agent of any kind at that point. In Cuba, where there should be a great trade with Canada, we have no agent at all. We have not an agent in Porto Rico or Hayti. In San Domingo and San Salvador we have no Canadian agent whatever. We have no Canadian agent in the states of Central America. That is a vast expanse of territory; it is an empire in itself; one can scarcely realize what it means. Before I went down, I thought the Bahama islands consisted of one or two little spots with a little town called Nassau. I went down to find 300 islands, one of them about as large as my native province, with great possibilities for trade, but not a soul there to talk about Canada or to try to get trade with that country. I went down into Jamaica, and found there the only Canadian agent in the whole of that vast territory which extends from the Windward islands across Central America to the Pacific ocean—one solitary person looking over this wonderful expanse, trying to solicit trade. Why, if the matter were not amusing, it would be tragic. What did I find when I reached Kingston, Jamaica —Jamaica with over a million people, Jamaica teeming with prosperity, sending out a tremendous quantity of products? I noticed in a paper sent to me yesterday from there that the United Fruit Company, which already has a big fleet there, are now putting on three 22,000 ton boats to go from New York to Jamaica, exclusively to deal with the trade of that country. And what have we there? We have one trade commissioner, a very decent sort of fellow—I do not want to criticise him personally, because he is a creature of circumstances. He is a solicitor-at-law of the Old Country, who was in Canada, I believe, in some office in Winnipeg connected with the Manitoba government. He saw an advertisement of the Civil Service Commission asking for a trade commissioner. You can imagine how much this Old Country solicitor would know about trade. He took the examination. Of course he could pass the examination, for he was a graduate of Edinburgh University. He went down to Kingston, Jamaica, to sell goods not only to the people of that island but as well to the Bahamas and all the other islands I have mentioned, and to the states of Central America, a country in which there are about five million people who produce everything we want and want everything we produce. When I got to Kingston I went to look for the office of the agent. As I walked down the principal street I saw the consulate of the United States; it was easily observable, for there was on display a large American flag fluttering to the breeze. Although Jamaica is a British country there was no difficulty whatever in finding the office of the American consul, but it was different in the case of the Canadian agent. After making several inquiries I got a boy to come with me to point out the office of the representative of the Canadian government in that large island. At length I discovered him, up in a loft. You go into an old brokendown warehouse, then you walk up a precarious stairway stuck against the wall. It was so unsteady that I thought it would go down with my weight. When I reached the top I found my friend in the loft, an apology for an office without even sufficient light. Here was the representative of the Dominion of Canada. Is that condition to remain? If it is, we might as well bid good-bye to all hope of developing an export trade with that part of the world. Down in the Leeward and the Windward islands, through to Trinidad, the conditions are pretty much the same. There is one trade agent in all that territory, representing the Dominion of Canada, and he is stationed at Bridgetown, Barbados. I met an English traveller coming home, a well-informed gentleman who for seventeen years had been selling woollens down there. It seems a remarkable fact, by the way, that anyone should be selling woollens in the Tropics; nevertheless he was engaged in that line, and he demonstrated to me that they were doing a big business. He stated they had lost some of that business during the war, the United States having got a part of it. He wanted to know what was the matter with Canada that she did not try to do business down there. I asked him what he meant. In reply he said he had been travelling in the Tropics for seventeen years and, whereas in every town of importance he had always found an American consul, whose office was conspicuous, he could never find a Canadian representative. The American consul, he pointed out, was really a trade agent. This gentleman remarked to me: "If I go into any of these offices, I find American pamphlets and circulars, catalogues and price lists; there are evidences that the American consul or trade agent is in touch with the people all over the country in his vicinity. When I go into a commercial house to sell goods I find these catalogues on the desks, and very often there is an American traveller at the other end of the desk selling his goods. On the other hand, in seventeen years I have seen only three Canadian travellers in this country." That is what I was informed by this gentleman; and of these three travellers that he mentioned, one sold flour—and I am bound to say that our flour has practically sold itself down there—the other sold rye whiskey and the third Frontenac beer. What hope is there that we shall ever develop any great business in that part of the world under such conditions? Let me go further. Take the banana industry: I found on inquiry at the Customs department to-day that we imported into Canada last year over two million bunches of bananas. You will be surprised to learn, Mr. Speaker, that of that quantity there came through Canadian ports only twenty-seven thousand bunches. I was anxious to ascertain how the Maritime provinces with their winter ports were affected in connection with these imports. In the month of March last year, I found out, not a single banana came into Canada except through the United States; in the month of February there was not one; in the month of January one lone bunch came into this country through a Canadian port, the reason, I suppose, being that the men on the boat might have no excuse for singing "Yes, we have no bananas." With such winter harbours as Halifax and St. John, and with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine sending ships across the seas, how is it that only one single bunch of bananas came into this country through a Canadian port in the months I have mentioned? They come through New York and Boston; the fruit is sold in those places and shipped to Montreal, whence it is distributed throughout this country. I do not think there is any doubt about the fact that the best bananas are grown in Jamaica; they grow wild everywhere in that island. Millions of bunches of bananas are raised there. No fruit is more easily produced, and the flavour is excellent. I left Kingston, Jamaica, and came to Halifax, Nova Scotia, I asked at the dining table for a banana. The banana given me was Jamaica fruit, but I find it has come through New York; had been shipped from New York to Montreal, and from Montreal over eight hundred miles by rail to Halifax, although we are so near to Jamaica at Halifax. Why should that condition continue in this country? What is the history of the banana industry? About fifteen years ago an effort was made to ship bananas into Canada. It was found at that time that the space on the ships sailing from that country to Canadian ports was invariably taken up by the United Fruit Company of the United States. That company would go to the agent of a line sailing to Halifax or Montreal and would engage all the space available, but they did not use the space purchased. They did that in order that no trade might be created along this line and then any charge for freight could be imposed. After a while the people almost rose in rebellion and a company was formed to operate a ship of their own. They did manage to get some bananas into Montreal but when they got there they discovered that, the day before, the United Fruit Company had flooded the market, reduced the price and so put them out of business. The result was that over a million dollars was lost in that venture.

What is the remedy? Well, there are two remedies. First I would suggest to the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that he put a duty on all bananas coming into Canada except direct from the place of origin, that is to say, bananas coming into this country from the United States I would have subject to a duty, but leave bananas absolutely free so long as they come from the West Indies or any other part of the British Empire. That is one way in which we can do something to cope with the United Fruit Company. What should be the reply to the man in Jamaica who says that he cannot stand up against the competition of the United Fruit Company through fear of being put out of business? The reply ought to be that we in Canada, with a merchant marine of our own, will fit these ships in such a way that they can carry bananas, and so we can defy the United Fruit Company. That can easily be done. We have spent about $70,000,000 building a merchant marine, and this fleet is costing us between six and seven million dollars a year in the way of deficits. I submit now that the government should hold a round-table conference, not of politicians or of men who are interested in other steamship companies but of men who are capable of dealing with this question, to consider what can be done with the merchant marine to further such trade as I have mentioned. The boats are very good. I came up on the Canadian Fisher, a good boat which could not have a better captain or more capable officers. But unfortunately we were like a chip on the top of a wave; we did not have any cargo coming from that country. Why? Principally because we have not any cold storage facilities. Now, in 1920 we entered into an arrangement known as the Canada-West Indies Trade agreement with a view of facilitating trade with the British West Indian countries. Under that agreement those countries are paying considerable amounts of money—Barbados, £5,000; Windward Islands, £2,500, and so on; and in the Western group they are paying equally large amounts. But they say that we have not really carried out the terms of our agreement. We undertook to provide cold storage if it could be done without unreasonable additional cost. That proviso may be a very good way of getting out of it, but the people down there are dissatisfied with this agreement. Everywhere I went in the southern countries I found that the people did not have any love for the United States, they want to trade with us. But they say they cannot trade with us on account of our failure to provide the necessary facilities for the shipping of their goods to this country. So I submit that men who are competent to deal with the matter, I care not from what part of the globe they come, should gather round a table, go into the question and find out whether the ships of our merchant marine cannot be so altered as to permit the carrying of goods from and to our ports. Incidentally the government should say to Sir Henry Thornton and his board—they should exercise at least this much control over the railway authorities; and this bears upon the question that is worrymy friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken)—that no more Canadian government ships shall carry goods to or from American ports; that they shall carry goods from Canadian and to Canadian ports, rather than carry Canadian goods which are shipped out of this country through the United States. Surely the wisdom of men who know about shipping could be devoted to the task of so changing these ships as to provide the facilities to which I have referred. I mention bananas as only one article affected; it applies to practically everything else. The people of the West Indies want nearly everything we produce; they want our potatoes, our grain, our cattle and particularly our fish; but owing to the inadequacy of transport facilities, trade lags and there is not sufficient business done to be of any considerable benefit to us. If we cannot transform these vessels of the Canadian government Merchant Marine into carriers of goods to and from Canadian ports, then I say let us scrap or sell the whole fleet and either subsidize or hire or build other ships, in order that we may get after this trade which is at our door and is only waiting our coming after it. We give the people of the West Indies a fifty per cent preference in our tariff, but I suggest that it would be a good thing for this country if under a reciprocal arrangement we admitted the goods of the British West Indies free. No harm could be done to any industry here, because the imports would consist largely of fruits or other commodities which are not produced in Canada. I submit also to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low) that if we are to get business it is necessary that we go after it. He is a very able and successful business man; if he had a large factory in Renfrew from which he desired to sell goods in other parts of the world, what would be the first thing he would do? He would send travellers to those places to push the sale of his goods. We cannot sell goods in the British West Indies or in any of the other countries to the south of us, I care not how much they may need what we produce, unless we send people there to sell the goods for us. We should have in the West Indies not one lone trade agent in Kingston, Jamaica, sitting up in a loft; we should have agents in every important place in the West Indies—in Nassau, in Jamaica, in British Honduras, and not only in the British possessions, but in Cuba, and the ports of Central America. If we have any desire to promote trade with the countries I have mentioned, we should have agents there to advertise our goods.

I admit that the development of this trade would be of particular benefit to the Maritime provinces. We need that trade; we are so situated that we could develop it as it was developed in the days before confederation and before we were burdened with the high protective tariff which has built up the central part of this country, very largely to our detriment.

Protection in Canada has, I submit, always tended toward centralization of manufacturing and of banking—because the banks will follow the big business of the country. At the time of confederation we had in Nova Scotia fourteen banks and fourteen sets of directors who knew our conditions and had the interests of our province at heart. These banks are gone; they have followed the business of the country, which has been centralized in Toronto and in Montreal. I do not deny that there is prosperity in central Canada, but in Heaven's name let us sometimes breathe other air than that of St. James street. Let us turn our minds to the open places of this country; let us realize that the Maritime provinces are just as important as any other part of Canada and that the western country, represented by our friends across the way, is also important, particularly in view of the riches which should come from its soil.

There is a general misunderstanding with reference to the duty upon coal as it affects the Maritime provinces. Incidentally, it is very annoying to be told, particularly by people in this part of Canada, that we in Nova Scotia should not kick about protection because we have protection as applied to our coal, iron and steel industries. Well, those who say that do not know what they are talking about, and it is necessary to be continually denying what they say through their lack of knowledge. I shall not go into the details of the iron and steel industry; that can be done much better by others who know the conditions pertaining to that industry. Suffice it to say that the average duty on iron and steel and their products is about 12 or 13 per cent; and no one can call that a protective tariff.

Let me refer for a moment to the question of coal. I shall trace briefly the history of the tariff on that commodity. Away back in 1879 there was a duty on all coal, bituminous, anthracite and slack, of fifty cents a ton. That duty remained on anthracite coal for a considerable number of years, but for some reason that I have never been able to discover it was taken off anthracite coal in 1887, and subsequently anthracite dust, as they call it, was made free. Why the poor fellow who is burning bituminous coal pays a duty upon it while the man who is much wealthier and who burns anthracite pays none, is something which I, as a tariff-for-revenue man, cannot understand.

The duty, as I say, was taken off anthracite coal entirely in 1887. Under the Fielding tariff there was a duty of 53 cents a ton—that is, the short ton—put upon bituminous coal. Why it was made a specific duty I know not. In 1923 lignite was made free. The duty upon coal at the present time is as follows: On bituminous round coal, there is a duty of 53 cents a ton. On slack coal, that is coal that runs through a certain mesh —three-quarters of an inch, I think it is—there is a duty of 14 cents a ton. Anthracite pays no duty whatever, nor does anthracite dust. If the 53 cents per ton were paid on all bituminous coal imported into this country, it would be a little better than the situation actually is now; but what are the facts? These facts cannot be controverted: Coal is bought at a colliery in the United States. At that colliery they have sifting appliances for sifting out the fine coal. It is put through a larger mesh perhaps than three-quarters of an inch, but any rate a considerable amount of that coal comes into Canada as slack coal, and therefore pays a duty of only 14 cents a ton, while the balance pays a duty of 53 cents a ton. But as soon as they get the two qualities into this country, they mix them, and the mixed product becomes once more run of mine coal. I think that is a fraud on the customs. The customs officials should see to it that run of mine coal imported from the United States really pays 53 cents a ton duty. But even if it did pay a duty of 53 cents a ton, nobody could claim that that was protection. I do not believe in specific duties. Ad valorem duties are, in my humble opinion, much more reasonable and much more just. Take, for instance, this one particular case. When the duty of 53 cents a ton was put on, coal was selling for $2.20 or $2.25 a ton. It was a reasonable duty at that time, not much more than what we ordinarily think of as a tariff-for-revenue duty. That was a fair tariff upon coal. But coal to-day has more than doubled in price, yet the tariff of 53 cents per ton remains exactly the same, and the duty is now only about 9½ per cent ad valorem. That is it would be if the coal were brought in in the right way as run of mine; as a matter of fact, if you will take the amount of coal brought into Canada last year, and the total amount of duty collected on it, you will find that the duty paid on bituminous coal imported into Canada last year was about 6½ per cent. Yet people are continually saying that we have protection on the coal of the Maritime provinces and of western Canada. Mr. Speaker, 6½ per cent is not a protective tariff at all; it is not even a tariff for revenue. I am not asking for a high tariff on coal, but I am asking that the duty be put back to the point where it was intended to be in 1897, or even 16½ or 17 per cent, a duty which we generally look upon as a tariff-for-revenue duty.

I am going now to put before the House some other facts in reference to the coal question which I think deserve our serious consideration. What we want in Canada, I submit, is a Canadian coal policy. We can never be independent of the United States until we are self-contained so far as coal is concerned. Up until the present year there has been a strong argument against our independence along that line. The objection was that people could not burn bituminous coal in certain cities on account of the smoke nuisance, and that they must therefore secure anthracite no matter what the cost and no matter what the duty. But it has been demonstrated within the last two or three months by the Canadian Fuel Board that the bituminous coal of Canada, if properly treated and made into a coke, produces a fuel equally as good as the American anthracite. So the old argument against bituminous coal, the old horror that the people had against the smoke, has passed away, and now we have a substitute for anthracite which is equally as good as anthracite.

We imported into this country last year—and these figures are well within the mark—coal to the value of over $100,000,000. Of that about 14,000,000 tons was bituminous coal and 5,000,000 tons anthracite. In converting bituminous coal into coke, one-and-a-half tons of coal are required to make one ton of coke; so if we had desired last year to replace the five million tons of anthracite brought into this country with coke, it would have meant the mining of an additional 7,500,000 tons of bituminous coal in this country. Therefore if we had a policy by which this country could be made self-contained so far as coal is concerned, we would not only prevent the importation of 14,000,000 tons of bituminous coal each year, but by making coke to take the place of anthracite, we would add 7,500,000 tons more to that 14,000,000 tons, making a total of 21,500,000 tons of extra coal mined in this country to replace the American coal now imported. We are producing about 18,000,000 tons, but if we had a proper coal policy we would add I repeat no less a quantity than 21,500,000 tons of coal mined in this country, which, at a price of $5 a ton at the mines would mean to the miners and operators and all those connected with the collieries, no less a sum than $107,500,000. In addition to that, we would have transportation costs paid to the Canadian National Railways, at say $4 per ton, amounting to $86,000,000, which would also be left in Canada to help the people of this country. Further, let me point this out. When we buy $100,000,000 of coal in the United States we have to pay in exchange, according to the rate that is being charged to-day, no less a sum than $3,500,000 of good Canadian money. That money goes in exchange, and might just as well be thrown into the sea. If you add the saving in exchange to the extra amount which would be spent in Canada for producing the coal and add to that again the cost of transportation which would be paid to Canadian railways, you get a total amount of good Canadian money which would be left here of nearly $200,000,000.

New, let me just refer again to discount on exchange. We pay it largely because we are buying so much from the United States of America. If we could reduce the amount we are paying to the United States by that $100,000,000 which we paid for coal imported last year, in all probability we would have had par money in this country at the present time, because that would have helped to bring the imports and exports as between the two countries almost to the same level. If we did that we would save the exchange upon the whole purchase price of articles other than coal brought into this country from the United States, amounting to about $520,000,000. A rate of three and a half per cent on $520,000,000 would represent over $18,000,000 more saved to the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how is coal independence to be secured? One way of bringing about that most desirable result is to provide transportation for our coal at a reasonable rate. Last year the Mines committee of the House dealt with this matter. We listened to a great amount of very valuable information from different persons in reference to coal and the transportation thereof. We had before us transportation men, we had freight agents, we had traffic managers, we had all kinds of officials to advise us as to how we could handle coal. We also had before us some men who were not connected with any transportation company. For example, there was Mr. M. J. Butler, formerly deputy minister of railways in this country, who afterwards became general manager of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, and subsequently was connected with the Armstrong-Whitworth Company, one of the largest concerns in the British Empire, a man of outstanding ability. He put before us arguments which I will not go into but will condense in this way: He said that instead of it costing us $9 or $12, which is the price to-day I believe, for transporting coal, from Edmonton or even west of that city to Toronto, coal could be put in Toronto for $4.57 a ton; that was he contended the actual cost of it. Mr. Butler was not a man picked off the street but a gentleman of knowledge and of standing in the country, and he put this statement in concise form before us. He, of course, made a condition that I submit is the crux of the whole matter, that if we are going to transport coal cheaply it must be done with proper equipment; it is no use trying to transport coal in broken-down equipment. Let me use his own language on that point:

> To begin with let us eliminate the "know it can't be done type." Let us also eliminate the traffic officers who are making rates, predicated before using, small coal cars, box cars, old weak locomotives, with small train loads— or mixed train loads, with a few cars of coal to fill up the tonnage.

It is I think clear, that the problem is one that demands that the equipment, from beginning to end shall be adequate to handle the tonnage at the lowest cost, but not at a price that the railway will suffer.

The argument that Mr. Butler makes is that we must provide the equipment in order to carry coal, and if we do that there will be a very material lessening in the cost. Therefore I submit to the government they should immediately appoint a commission, to consist of not more than three men, to make a report to the House as to the actual facts in reference to the cost of transporting coal. I am not talking about the question of income. of net revenue or gross revenue; I want to know what it actually costs to transport coal in Canada. It is almost impossible to get that knowledge from a railway official. One man may be charging $5 and it is difficult for him, perhaps, to explain the discrepancy if the cost is only $3. Then we must remember there is always a certain amount of hesitancy on the part of officials of competing companies to disclose information which might affect either corporation. What we want to do is to get down to the actual cost of carrying coal. Mr. Butler informed us that the Virginia railway is carrying coal at a very low rate, and upon that rate he has founded the rates which could be made by the railways of Canada. I therefore submit that a commission should be appointed to inquire into this matter. I would suggest that Mr. Butler be made chairman of the commission, and that a man from Alberta and a man from the Maritime provinces should be associated with him. This commission should be given power to go down into the territory of the Virginia railway where these rates exist—and, mark you, the grades there are higher than we have; do not forget that, the grades in Virginia add nothing to their advantage that I can see—the commission should also investigate the transportation costs of the Norfolk and Western, and the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the Illinois Central. In this way, I believe, it can be established what is the actual cost of carrying coal. I believe myself that if this inquiry be made it will establish that coal can be carried, from the Maritime provinces for instance to the province of Ontario, for not more than $2 a ton at the very outside. We used to pay $1.60 six or seven years ago from the Cumberland mines, Nova Scotia, to Montreal. The present rate is $3.60 or $3.80. I want to know what the actual cost of carrying that coal is, I do not want it from any railway official, I want it from a man who is independent of all transportation companies and not concerned in the importation of American coal. I believe we can do that by carrying out my suggestion; I believe we can get down to the very basis of the matter, get down to rock bottom, and find out what the transportation of coal costs. We shall then know what percentage ought to be allowed to our railways in order to enable them to make a profit.

I am now going to refer to another matter which I think is important to the Maritime provinces, and indeed to all Canada. In the Speech from the Throne it is mentioned that it is proposed to make every effort to develop still further the policy of Canadian trade via Canadian ports. Last year the Minister of Finance brought down a measure giving ten per cent reduction on British goods when imported through Canadian ports. I shall not now discuss whether that policy was right or wrong. There is a strong argument being made by the woollen people of this country that owing to the present depreciation of English currency, the unemployment situation in the United Kingdom, and the lower labour rates—as a result in a word of the operation of the law of supply and demand—that we, perhaps, made a mistake at that time in lessening the duty on woollen goods entering Canada. I am not now going to discuss the pros and cons of that question. What I want to argue is that the government should go the whole way and confine the British preference to goods brought in through Canadian ocean or river ports. I may say, however, that even with the ten per cent reduction in duty a marvellous diversion of shipments has been made to Canadian ports since the last budget. I have not the figures relating to this matter at the present time, but I presume they will be presented to us when the budget is brought down. I cannot see myself, any reason why we should not follow the historic policy of the United States and confine this preference entirely to goods brought in through our sea and river ports.

In the Speech from the Throne a reference is made to the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference held in London last year. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speakers who have so far taken part in this debate. I believe they all think as I do, that this is a serious time in the history of our country. Perhaps it would not be out of place to paraphrase in this connection, the motto which is given to students when striving to acquire a knowledge of typewriting: "Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the country." This is a good time for us to consider these matters seriously, because it is a serious time in the history of our land.

But I do resent one statement and that was the attack that was made during this debate on the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King), for not taking part, in the recent general elections in Great Britain on behalf of Mr. Baldwin's preferential tariff. I want to point out that, in my humble opinion, such interference in the British elections would have been resented just as strongly as would interference by the British prime minister in an election campaign in Canada. What are the facts? The Imperial Conference was called by the Baldwin government. The Dominions responded to the call and journeyed to London. After many weeks of conference it was agreed by the government of Great Britain to extend the preference on certain products of the Dominion. This was promised from the Old Land to sister nations in this great British commonwealth, and I insist that these promises are binding upon the homeland. Are we to be told that the British parliament which, a few years ago, although the great majority thereof was hostile to home rule, carried out an undertaking of its predecessors, and thus kept faith with southern Ireland, is going to break faith with Canada and the other sister nations? I refuse to believe it. The Baldwin government entered into a certain agreement with the United States before they went out of power, extending the right of seizure beyond the three-mile limit. Will anyone suggest that the Ramsay MacDonald government is not going to carry out to the letter its agreement with its predecessors in office. Surely we are to be treated as well, at least, as foreign nations. If not, then our faith in future imperial conferences is going to be materially lessened. So far from the Prime Minister of the country being criticized for not taking part in that election, I am sure he should be praised for the silence he maintained.

I want to advocate before I take my seat that the railway department of this country —and I now direct my remarks principally to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), to Sir Henry Thornton and his board—should endeavour to carry more produce and more exports to Canadian ports. I desire to make an argument, Mr. Speaker, upon this line, following the statutes that have been passed in this country. I think we sometimes forget about them. Let us go back to 1903 and refer to page 455 of the statutes of that year, being 3 Edward VII, Chap. 71, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Transcontinental Railway. It ratified and confirmed the agreement between His Majesty and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, which agreement forms the schedule to the act. The agreement recites among other things—and bear these words in mind—that the object is—

> To secure the most direct and economical interchange of traffic between eastern Canada and the provinces west of the great lakes, to open up and develop the northern zone of the Dominion, to promote the internal and foreign trade of Canada, and to develop commerce through Canadian ports.

Section 42 reads:

> It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and the transportation of goods through Canadian channels. The company accepts the aid on these conditions, and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway, or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for points in Canada, be carried entirely on Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports.

Section 43 reads:

> The company further agrees that it shall not, in any matter within its power, directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use its utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which public aid is granted, namely,—the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

Section 45 provides:

> The company shall arrange for and provide, either by purchase, charter or otherwise, shipping connections upon both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans sufficient in tonnage and in number of sailings to take care of and transport all its traffic, both inward and outward, at such ocean ports within Canada, upon the said line of railway, or upon the line of the Intercolonial railway, as may be agreed upon from time to time, and the company shall not divert, or, so far as it can lawfully prevent permit to be diverted, to ports outside of Canada any traffic which it can lawfully influence or control, upon the ground that there is not a sufficient amount of shipping to transport such traffic from or to such Canadian ocean ports.

Now, Mr. Speaker that was the statute confirming the agreement, with the company known as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. Upon that agreement the people of the country have spent directly and indirectly on the National Transcontinental railway, in assistance to the Grand Trunk Pacific and in other ways, probably three or four hundred million dollars. That is the basis upon which it was spent, and that provides that the trade should not be diverted from Canadian ports. Now, a large part of the country in which wheat originates is in the Grand Trunk Pacific territory and a very large part is in the old Canadian Northern Railway system territory. Let me refer to an act relating to the Canadian Northern Railway system. This is known as an Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway system, statutes of 1914, page 135, being the Act 4-5 George V, Chapter 20. The act provides for aid by the government of Canada to the company by guaranteeing its bonds to the extent of $45,000,000. That is, the old Canadian Northern Railway Company. Many hon. members in this House will remember when the statute was enacted. That statute confirms the agreement annexed which is set out. Section 6, paragraph (a) provides as follows:

That at all times hereafter all freight originating on the lines of the Canadian Northern or on the lines of any of the constituent companies, or on any line or lines of railway now or hereafter owned, leased or operated by the Canadian Northern or by any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, their successors or assigns, shall, when destined to points in Canada, be carried over the lines of the Canadian Northern or of the constituent companies or over some other Canadian railway or railways (which term shall include the line operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company between Montreal and St. John) and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall not be greater via Canadian ports than it would be via United States ports; and that all inward and outward ocean traffic shall be carried to Canadian ports, and that the Canadian Northern and the several constituent and subsidiary companies shall not in any matter within their power or control directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of any such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall in all respects in good faith use their utmost endeavours to further the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ports.

Mark you, according to the Grand Trunk Pacific agreement they must carry all goods not otherwise routed; but in the statute effecting the Canadian Northern it was not stated in that way, and they were compelled to carry freight on that line whether routed or unrouted, to and through Canadian ports. I did not know until a few weeks ago that the statute existed and I was rather surprised to find it. There are the facts. Does the government, with Sir Henry Thornton and his board, say that what this agreement imposed upon the company is not to be carried out? If the government imposed upon the Canadian Northern, when they were guaranteeing the $45,000,000 of bonds the condition that every pound of export freight should be carried out of Canadian ports, can this government which took over the Canadian Northern railway system do less than the Canadian Northern were compelled by statute to do?

Mr. GRAHAM: This government did not take it over.

Mr. LOGAN: I do not refer to this government; I refer to any government. The government of Canada at the present time owns and is operating the Canadian Northern railway through Sir Henry Thornton and his board. My contention is that if the government of Canada compelled a private company to accept that statute, they reasonably should be compelled themselves to carry out the terms of that statute. Surely, these provisions were not inserted in the statute merely for the purpose of imposing burdens on a private company. They were inserted as the embodiment of a great national idea, of carrying Canadian trade by Canadian channels and through Canadian ports. That idea was often and eloquently preached by our great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

When the late government handed over the control of the Canadian National railway system to the board of which Sir Joseph Flavelle was head some years ago, the board was evidently given a free hand to disregard the provisions of that statute which I regard as a parliamentary compact binding upon the Canadian National Railway Company and the successors of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk, because the Grand Trunk was the guarantor of the Grand Trunk Pacific and assumed its liabilities. Sir Henry Thornton, I am afraid, is following the precedent set by Sir Joseph Flavelle of ignoring the provisions of acts of parliament. The Maritime provinces have, in my opinion, a right to demand that the parliamentary compacts shall be carried out in good faith.

It is rather important to keep in mind that any net earnings of the Grand Trunk system over fixed charges do not go into the Canadian treasury, but under the agreement made by the former government they will go to pay interest on the $35,000,000 or £7,000,000 sterling, of bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company guaranteed by the Grand Trunk. Is it right or fair in the interests of national unity to starve the system in Canada leading to Maritime province ports, and to divert Canadian traffic to American ports for the benefit of investors in the companies which defaulted in their obligations to the Canadian people?

Again referring to the operation of the government railways, I am sure we desire to congratulate the railway board on the financial statements they are able to put before the Canadian people. I think I can say that we in the Maritime provinces are pleased to have a different class of management from that which we had under the old government but one thing which we in the Maritime provinces object to most strenuously is the placing upon our road of spotters to catch respectable and decent servants of that road, men who have been working there for thirty-five or forty years, and to deprive them of a right which I consider is a vested right under the Provident fund which applies to them. What are the facts? In the last few months spotters came upon the road, and as a result several of our oldest conductors have been dismissed, without trial, without counsel, without a jury. And this in a British country! I say it is wrong. If these men are guilty, they should be punished as any other man who is a defaulter is punished; but they ought not to be deprived of their pension as well as their position, upon the word of men who are not cross-examined and who are not before a proper court. As one of the representatives of the Maritime provinces, I want to protest as strongly as I can against this kind of work in respect to trusted employees. I have in mind at present a conductor who is sixty years of age, with thirty-eight years of service on the road. He was brought up on the evidence of these spotters. I read the evidence that was given before the superintendent at Moncton, and it showed that the total amount which they claimed this man had taken was about $4, consisting of small amounts, twenty, twenty-five and forty cents which he very reasonably could have forgotten to put down in the hurry of a short trip. And this conductor was entitled at that time to a pension of over $60 a month for the rest of his life. Where is he to-day? He has been ignominiously dismissed from the road. His people can be charged with being related to a man who has been stealing. In spite of the fact that he gave a boy to the war, that he has an invalid wife and a blind father to support, he is thrown on the world to-day without a cent. That is wrong, and no country, I care not where it may be, can defend such action. No democratic government can defend it. This matter should be rectified at the earliest possible moment and these grievances should be adjusted.

I should like very much to speak upon some other matters affecting particularly the Maritime provinces, but I see that the time is passing very rapidly and I must now draw these remarks to a close. I think I may say for the Maritime provinces that what we want is to get back to the old Laurier policy of tariff for revenue. It was a good enough policy to make this country rich, let us get back to it. The principle of protection is wrong, but there will be sufficient protection in any tariff for revenue in this country at the present time to give reasonable protection to Canadian industries. We have had a trial of high protection. It has not succeeded. Let any man in this House, I care not how great a protectionist he may be, come down to the Maritime provinces and go through the counties of Cumberland, Colchester, Hants, Kings, Digby, Annapolis—the Annapolis valley, the land of Evangeline—down through Yarmouth and around that beautiful south shore, and thence to other parts of our provinces and I am convinced that he must say that whatever high protection may have done for Montreal, Toronto and a few other cities in Canada, it has been a blight upon the provinces down by the sea. What we desire to get back to is a tariff for revenue. I am not a free trader; I realize that there have been built up under this protective tariff industries that we must be careful at the present time not to injure. But I believe if we get back to the policy of "tariff for revenue", if beyond that we endeavour to remove the duties from implements that are used in the development of the natural resources of this country, we shall give the people an opportunity to grow and the country to develop, we shall bring prosperity where there is no prosperity to-day.

In conclusion, we in the Maritime provinces are not at the door of parliament as mendicants or beggars. We hold our heads high as Canadians. We are not here to ask for the repeal of the union, although I am bound to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that sometimes I think if a man of the Maritime provinces were at this time to throw energy and ability into this matter, he might create a great deal of trouble in regard to confederation. I do not want to become a secessionist. I am a Canadian all the time; but before I am a Canadian, I am a Maritime province man because, in the language of one of England's best poets, that country to me is a "dearer, sweeter spot than all the rest." We ask that the promises that were made to us be kept, we ask that our conditions be properly understood, that those in authority come down among us and see the possibilities there, if only we had a chance to develop them. We ask for nothing but justice within this confederation.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to a most informative address from the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) in which he has explained all the miseries of Nova Scotia under the present government.

Mr. MARTELL: As a result of the administration of the old Tory government.

Mr. HOCKEN:—under the present government. There was one point in the hon. member's speech which I should like to have cleared up if possible. I entirely sympathise with him in his desire to have the coal of Nova Scotia sold in the province of Ontario. But I have been informed that the coal owners of Nova Scotia have an arrangement with those of Pennsylvania that the Ontario, and part of the Quebec, market shall be left to Pennsylvania in return for the privilege of sending Nova Scotia coal into the New England states.

Mr. LOGAN: I can readily tell the hon. gentleman that he is absolutely misinformed; no such understanding exists.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am glad to hear that statement from a man representing that part of the country, and I accept it. I shall endeavour to show before I get through that, if the hon. member will agree to assist in a certain policy, the coal of Nova Scotia can be made saleable in the province of Ontario even up to Windsor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I trust that those congratulations which I am expected to offer will be "taken as read," as also my condolences to the ministers who are ill. We shall thus save so much time. We have listened during the last two days of this debate to two interesting addresses, one from the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) and the other from the hon. member for King's, P. E.I., (Mr. Hughes), one entirely contradictory of the other. With one of these speeches I agree to a great extent, believing it to be reasonable; with the other I do not agree.

Mr. GRAHAM: Which one?

Mr. HOCKEN: I will tell you later. This is not surprising, Mr. Speaker; the same thing has been happening ever since the first session of this parliament. For example, we had an address from the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) declaring for the Laurier protective tariff, and in the same session we had an address from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) informing us that the government was working in the direction of free trade. Then we had an address on the National Railways from the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell) in which he attacked the principle of public ownership of railways vigorously, with a reply from the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) defending the public ownership of railways. And so we come by natural course to the present debate and find two members of the government party singing entirely different songs.

I have a good deal of sympathy with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and I approve of a good deal that he said. The hon. member declared himself a moderate protectionist, and he has given us a phrase which I think will stick, and become a permanent part of our political vocabulary: he said he stood for a "cost of living tariff." That was a palpable hit, and I want personally to thank him for the phrase. It exactly indicates my attitude on the tariff, as he said it did his. I think it is quite possible that under a protective tariff some industries might get more protection than they should be given. I have said that elsewhere, and if the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) were in his place he would remind me of it. So that I am entirely in agreement with the hon. member when he suggests that there should be a tariff board with power to go into the cost of production in connection with any particular industry, and ascertain in that way whether the protection afforded in any one case was greater than necessary to maintain the industry concerned, with a reasonable percentage of profit. The last thing in my mind is to make it possible for our manufacturers to earn excessive profits. Wherever anything of the kind can be shown I for one shall be willing to have the tariff reduced. I think Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George made a real contribution to the present debate. I expect before the debate closes to hear from the hon. member for Brantford; I fancy that a speech is about due from him on this question of reducing the tariff on agricultural implements.

Coming now to the hon. member for King's, it strikes me that his speech was very similar to the utterances he has been making here for twenty years. It was a platitudinous and pointless dissertation upon nothing, a re-hash of old worn out free trade theories. The hon. member has been making that kind of speech so long that it has lost any flavour even among the members of his own party. He charged, quite unfairly of course, but characteristically, that the right hon. the leader of this party (Mr. Meighen) had advocated a lower tariff on agricultural implements; and he represented that as a justification for the present proposed reduction. He did not tell the House, although he had been informed in the course of the debate, that, when the leader of this party proposed that reduction, the tariff on agricultural implements was twice as great as it is to-day; and moreover, that the suggestion made by my right hon. leader has been adopted since he made it, the tariff to-day being a little less than half what it was at that time. That, I think, will indicate rather a spirit of unfairness on the part of my hon. friend, which is regrettable. But I should not expect much different from my hon. friend from King's. The hon. gentleman told us in the course of his remarks that he could not understand plain English. He quoted from an address made by a senator in Toronto to the following effect:

> The term "protection" may properly be applied to a variety of national activities. For example, the British navy is more of a protection to British commerce than the tariff.

The hon. member for King's, having quoted that statement, informed the House, "I do not know what that means". He goes on to say:

> Of course, I do not lay claim to any great amount of intelligence—

And with that candid confession I think the House will entirely agree. He went further and blamed the protective tariff of this country for the difficulty in which the people of Prince Edward Island find themselves in selling their potatoes in Boston. Now, it was not the tariff that the Canadian parliament enacted that had anything to do with the sale of Prince Edward Island potatoes in Boston; it was the Fordney tariff that prevented the people of that province from selling their product. They cannot sell their potatoes, either baked, peeled or hashed-brown in Boston because there is a duty against them of 30 cents a bushel. But like good Canadians, the people in Prince Edward Island met the situation with a resourcefulness that is greatly to their credit, as the hon. member told us. If they could not sell their potatoes for table purposes they grew potatoes for seed purposes, and are now making more money selling seed potatoes in Cuba than they did selling them hashed-brown in Boston. I do not think, therefore, that the hon. gentleman has much to complain of, and the argument is rather a comical one for him to make.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): If the hon. gentleman will permit an interruption, it is the table stock we sell in Cuba. We are compelled to sell our seed potatoes in the American market, with the present duty.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation. It only confirms my belief in the ignorance of the member for King's, P.E.I., because I am quoting exactly what he said.

When I read in the Speech from the Throne that paragraph which stated that such reduction of taxation as it might be possible to effect should aim primarily at reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, I had a great deal of sympathy for the member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). That clause in the Speech from the Throne has been interpreted by the newspapers to mean the elimination of duties on agricultural implements. The mayor and the city council of Brantford have interpreted it the same way. There has been no protest from the government benches against that interpretation, so I assume that it is correct and that the duty is to be removed from agricultural implements. That would make any person sympathize with the hon. member for Brantford, because he was elected to this House upon a promise to increase the duty upon agricultural implements. And in that he was supported by the Prime Minister, if not in exact language, at least by inference. As reported in the Globe newspaper of November 25, 1921, the present Prime Minister said at Brantford:

> "I am not in favour of free trade, nor is the Liberal party." What Canada needed was not to be led to a barren, rocky shore but to the hearts of contentment and happiness and contented homes. This would be the aim of the Liberal party when returned to power.

I can imagine the people of Brantford today enjoying that feeling of contentment and happiness as they anticipate the shutting down of those industries from which they get their livelihood—because the removal of the duty from agricultural implements will certainly destroy the prosperity of Brantford and probably drive out of that city several thousand people. It is perhaps the most critical point in all Canada with regard to agricultural implements. In Toronto about ten thousand families live upon that industry, but the loss of ten thousand families from Toronto would not be a matter of great moment. It would represent only about one year's annual increment of population. The loss of Hamilton would probably be three or four thousand families, nearly all in one section. It would be disastrous to the prosperity of East Hamilton. But Brantford is a smaller city, and even if two or three thousand people are taken out—and I would think that at least one thousand families would be affected—the result will be a condition that will bring upon this government the condemnation of practically every elector of that city. Brantford has been built up as a flourishing city of twenty-five or thirty thousand people largely through the agricultural implement industry. Now my hon. friends propose to wipe the duty off, and to shut down the factories from which so many people get their livelihood—and that in respect of an industry, Mr. Speaker, which at present enjoys the small amount of protection that is afforded by a ten per cent duty.

But there is a more serious side than that. The government have been guilty of an unprecedented injustice to men employed in a great industry. They have put the agricultural implement industry into a state of suspended animation; they have rendered a judgment of suspended sentence against it by the statement made in the Speech from the Throne. The people interested in this industry do not know whether there will be any duty left, neither do the farmers who buy their product. The result is that for three or four months no business will be done in the agricultural implement plants. Nobody will manufacture; nobody will buy, nobody can sell, and until the budget is disposed of it is a matter of speculation as to what is going to happen to these men and to their capital. In Ontario and Quebec the amount invested in that industry is $100,000,000, and at the lowest computation 150,000 people live upon it in those two eastern provinces. The government comes along, and, I think without reasonable consideration, throws that industry into a state of collapse. It looks to me, Mr. Speaker, like the work of legislative amateurs. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is ill. He could not have seen that paragraph in the Speech. The ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) is away from the councils of the government. I wonder if my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), who is a man of perspicacity, had an opportunity of seeing that paragraph before it was put in the Speech? I would think better of him than to believe that he would agree to such a thing. His knowledge of politics and his long exeprience as a legislator ought to be in the nature of a balance wheel in control of the amateurs who surround him when it comes to dealing with a delicate question of this kind. I am not going to hold him responsible. I fancy that he must have been ill or taking a rest. But no more serious offence was ever committed by any government of Canada than has been committed against the agricultural implement industry by the insertion of that paragraph in the Speech from the Throne. It is something that cannot lightly be passed over. An immense amount of capital is involved. A large number of people depend upon the operatlons of that industry for their livelihood. That their interests should be so lightly regarded is a very serious matter, for which the government must accept the responsibility. It has resulted in special mass meetings being held in Brantford; and if I am not mistaken special delegations have come here to make representations to the government. So that under these circumstances if I were the hon. member for Brantford, and desiring to remain in public life, for which he has many eminent qualifications, I would without unnecessary delay file an application for a place in the Senate, because I do not think there will be any hope of his coming back as a member of this House if the government carry out their expressed determination.

Just a few words on the Home Bank case,—not to swear at anybody or to blame anybody, but to make a suggestion. I want to suggest for the consideration of the government that they should indemnify all those who held savings deposits in that bank. I differentiate the savings account from the open and business account. Savings accounts are held by widows and by poor men who save ten dollars at a time; sometimes they are trust funds. They were put in there in the belief that when parliament chartered that bank it was going to take some precautions to protect those deposits. I know that certain provisions are made in the Bank Act for the inspection of the banks, and I know how hard it is to legislate to prevent dishonesty. At the same time, those who have money in that bank are entitled to some special consideration on the part of this parliament, and I for one would be willing to support any measure that would give to these widows and poor men—mechanics, labourers, and servant girls—the money that they deposited there in good faith, depending on the government for their protection.

I had a case reported to me the day I left my city to come here. A man living in my constituency told me that he had sold his house, his automobile, his furniture, everything he had, as he was moving to the United States. Then something interfered and held him back for a week. So on the 16th of the month he deposited all the proceeds from the sale of his house and chattels in the Home Bank. On the 17th the Home Bank suspended payment, and the savings of fifteen years of labour of that man were swallowed up in the failure. That is enough to make a man an anarchist. And that is not the only case, I could cite others almost, if not quite, as bad; and I say that those who had savings bank accounts in the Home Bank are entitled to special consideration and should be indemnified by this government.

The right hon. the Prime Minister the other day was violently peevish with the leader of this party for what he called the propaganda against the government for its wastefulness and extravagance. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if that propaganda had been carried on by the right hon. leader of this party it would have been a perfectly legitimate thing for him to do. When a government is wasteful and extravagant, surely it is the duty of the opposition to reveal that fact and to give the people of the country the facts and figures. But it so happens that my right hon. leader was not in the lead in launching this propaganda. He rather came up behind. It was more the result of a popular uprising against the excessive taxation under which the people and the industry of this country are suffering. The taxation of this country, especially of the industrial life of this Dominion, is making it impossible for any man, speaking broadly —there may be one or two exceptions here and there—to make a reasonable profit on his business. By the time he pays all the taxes that are levied against him from every quarter it is with the utmost dfficulty that he can make anything, and most men conducting industries in this country to-day are living upon their reserves. They have to draw upon them extensively to keep their plants running. And instead of getting any better the prospects are that conditions will get worse. Industry cannot run very long upon its reserves. There must be a profit somewhere, or else in a short time the reserves are exhausted, the business is closed up, and those employed in it find a home in the United States, as about five hundred thousand people have found homes there since this government came into power.

It was MacLean's Magazine that first drew attention to the waste and extravagance of this government. That is a publication that has never shown itself friendly to this party. Those who remember its policy while this party was in power will agree that it was not favourable or friendly to us, in fact, we thought we had many grave reasons for complaint. But Colonel MacLean who conducts that magazine, is particularly well qualified to ventilate that subject. In addition to publishing MacLean's Magazine he publishes a number of trade journals touching the grocery trade, drygoods, and many other lines of trade. I do not know anybody in Canada who is in a position to determine the exact state of trade quite so well as Colonel MacLean. He has his reporters out all the time; he has his advertising men and his canvassers —a very large organization going in and out among all branches of trade—and their reports led him to see how necessary it was to secure a reduction in the expenditures of this government, to lessen the taxation that is imposed upon the industry and trade of the country, and to stop the waste and extravagance that is going on.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that this was rather a popular uprising than a propaganda carried on by a political party and the proof of that is to be found in the fact that many papers all over the country joined in approval of MacLean's policy. We have papers like the Toronto Star, the Brantford Expositor, and many other Liberal papers as well as Conservative, approving in the heartiest possible manner, and in the most definite terms, of the attack MacLean's Magazine had been making on the extravagance of this government. I think it is wise on the part of the government to heed this agitation as they are doing. Members of the government seemed to get cold feet. There was an immediate promise to reduce the Civil Service. Well, I read in the Montreal Gazette, in an Ottawa despatch to that journal, that the Civil Service are objecting not so much to the reduction in the personnel, as to the fact that the reducing process is not being more gradual. That means, if it means anything, that there has been no attempt to reduce the service commensurate with the needs of the situation. But now that criticisms have developed, the government is rushing in to make a general over-hauling of the Civil Service and a general reduction. I do not know just what effect this article had upon the government, but since this was printed another item has appeared in which it is stated that the government is going about this job gradually. It is not going to be done all at once now. The reducing process is going to be gradual, and as my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) explained, those who are to be let out will get an allowance of two months' salary. That will carry them to the first of June. I would like to see this government follow the example of the Imperial government. I read under date of March 4 a cable despatch stating that in Great Britain a saving of £37,000,000 is shown in the estimates for the Civil Service and Revenue departments for 1924-25. That is roughly a reduction of $180,000,000 in the expenditure on the Civil Service in Great Britain. If that can be done there, substantial reductions can be made here. If one goes over the list of civil servants in this country and compares the cost now with the cost in 1914, it must be apparent that there is plenty of room for such reduction. I am not one of those who advocate low wages. I think the labourer is worthy of his or her hire. But I think we should expect from those who serve this government in the Civil Service that they should develop a certain degree of efficiency that would result in substantial reductions in the staff. I am not satisfied that the Civil Service of this country should work only five and one-half hours a day. The League of Nations has set eight hours as a reasonable day for people to work, and I do not see any reason in the world why the Civil Service in Ottawa should not work eight hours a day. We will be told that theirs is very confining employment, that this clerical work is hard on them if they are made to work eight hours a day. Well, Mr. Speaker, go down to the Printing Bureau and you find printers and book-binders, men and women, working eight hours a day, and they are working a good deal harder, doing more to earn their money, than these young men and women in the offices in the departments. I do not suppose it is possible to persuade any government to make eight hours a day's work. But even if we made seven hours a day's work, and the employees did seven hours' work a day, you could reduce the service 15 or 20 per cent. That is what ought to be done if we are ever going to balance our budget, and reduce the taxation of this country.

Just a word, Mr. Speaker, as to the complications and exasperations of the taxation system of Canada to-day. The iniquity of the 6 per cent sales tax has been pretty well impressed upon the government if I am not mistaken. I know that every business man I am acquainted with has nothing good to say of that measure. I know the representations that have been made, and I would anticipate from all I know that the days of the 6 per cent sales tax are pretty well done, and it is likely to be either drastically mended or entirely wiped out.

Mr. BUREAU: Does my hon. friend know who asked for the 6 per cent sales tax to be put on at the source?

Mr. HOCKEN: I know who put it there.

Mr. BUREAU: Do you know who asked for it?

Mr. HOCKEN: I say I know who put it there.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a different proposition. The very men who to-day are speaking through the mouth of my hon. friend are the men who came to the government and asked that the tax be raised and imposed at the source, and that is what we have done.

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BUREAU: I am absolutely right.

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend does not know of whom I am speaking.

Mr. BUREAU: It is very easy to infer who it is unless I am more of a dunce than I think I am.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, you are. Why the very men from my hon. friend's own department do not know how to levy the tax.

Mr. BUREAU: What is that?

Mr. HOCKEN: I say that officers of your own department do not know how to levy the tax.

Mr. BUREAU: I beg your pardon.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have had an experience which proves it.

Mr. BUREAU: You have always had odd experiences because you do not undertsand the sales tax yourself.

Mr. HOCKEN: I had an auditor of the department visit my own business. When I make that statement the hon. gentleman will probably give me credit for knowing whereof I speak.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think you do, when you talk about the sales tax in the way you do.

Mr. HOCKEN: This man came into my own office. He went over the sales and picked out one particular product we sold. He said "You have not paid sales tax on that and you are due for a penalty." The general manager of my business went to the files and produced a ruling from the department showing there was no sales tax to be paid on this particular product. An auditor from the department did not know how to levy the tax. That is an actual experience within my own knowledge which occurred in connection with my own business.

Mr. BUREAU: Does my hon. friend claim we are obliged to put brains in every employee of the government. If the employee is mistaken call my attention to it, and I will put him where he belongs.

Mr. HOCKEN: The average business man is supposed to understand how to pay that tax, and if it is of such a complicated and exasperating character that the ordinary business men cannot tell how to pay it, and the auditors of the department do not know—

Mr. BUREAU: They do know.

Mr. HOCKEN: They sent an auditor to my office and he did not know of the ruling in question.

Mr. BUREAU. That happened in Toronto, they know it all there.

Mr. HOCKEN: I will go a little further and give an experience of mine in reference to the income tax. Last April I went down to the head office of the income tax department in this city and handed a statement of my income to a clerk in the department. He took the statement, told me what I had to pay, and I paid it. In January of this year I was informed by the taxation department in Toronto that I owed the department $20.70 more.

Mr. BUREAU: Toronto again.

Mr. HOCKEN: No, Ottawa. I made the statement to the taxation department in Ottawa.

Mr. BUREAU: They are the appointees of your party, we have not had much time to reform them yet.

Mr. HOCKEN: I understand the minister is reforming them just as rapidly as he can.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, and I am doing good work too.

Mr. HOCKEN: What are you going to do about these taxes when the conditions of their application are so bewildering to the average man? That is what I am complaining about and I think it is most exasperating.

Now I want to say a few words to hon. members on my left. The Prime Minister said in his speech he hoped every member of the House would speak first as a Canadian. He wanted us all to be Canadians. I entirely agree with that. I would be sorry to think any member of this House is not a Canadian, whatever his party affiliation may be. I hope his patriotism is not submerged in partisanship. I am not ready to believe any member of this House is not first of all a Canadian. We are divided in our political views, of course, and we have our political alliances. Personally I believe in a moderate protective policy and I align myself with the party advocating that policy. My hon. friends to my left believe in free trade, and they align themselves with the party believing in it. Opposite to me there is another party, but nobody knows what they believe in, or stand for. However, there will always be parties when everybody is really and truly Canadian. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the party to which I belong ought to be called Canadian. For a period approaching fifty years it has advocated the one fiscal policy, and has not wavered in its beliefs or in its support of that policy. It stands to-day where it was in 1878.

Mr. FORKE: And where it will be fifty years from now.

Mr. HOCKEN: We shall support that policy as long as we believe it to be best for the country. My hon. friends to my left are equally consistent. Since the formation of their party—perhaps before—they have been free traders. Of hon. gentlemen opposite, some of them are for the Laurier-Fielding tariff, some of them are for a revenue tariff, some for a protective tariff, and some do not want any tariff at all. There is quite a variety of opinions over there. That diversity of view does not prevail on this side of the House although there is a sharp difference of opinion among us. I believe in a protective policy because I lived under a revenue tariff. When I was a boy growing up into manhood we had a 17½ per cent tariff in this country, and the exodus that was taking place at that time was greater than is taking place to-day, and what is taking place now is quite bad enough; it is without any precedent unless you go back to the days of 1874 to 1878. I have said before in this House and I want to repeat for the benefit of hon. gentlemen to my left that I was brought up among a generation of young men 75 per cent of whom, I venture to say, left Canada for the United States as soon as they had learned a trade or a profession. The boys I went to school with were living in Chicago, Philadelphia, New York and other cities because they could not get work in the city where they were born, or in any place in the Dominion. I was a witness of American furniture, made in Grand Rapids and other places, coming in by train loads to my own city and sold at auction there. That had the effect of closing up the largest furniture factory we had in Canada at that time, and I think we have never had one quite as large since. There were 1,500 men in that one factory living in a district that is now occupied by foreigners from Ukrainia and other parts of southern Europe. That is what the 17½ per cent tariff under the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie did for this country, and the city where I live was not the only one affected; the same thing was going on in every other city. I do not want to see that state of affairs return. I am not speaking theoretically, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking from experience, and I think experience is about the best teacher that we have. I say that I do not want to see any manufacturer earn excessive profits, and I mean it; the safeguard I would propose is a tariff board that would have authority to go into any industry, examine the costs, ascertain profits, and report to this parliament that this or that or the other item of the tariff might be reduced in the interests of the general public.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask a question?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Would the hon. member extend the power of that board to investigate and find out how much money has been paid for the stock on which they want protection in order to get dividends?

Mr. HOCKEN: I would give that board authority to go into anything that would be necessary to reveal to this parliament the profit that was being earned on the capital that was put into the business. I am quite as anxious to protect the consumer as I am to protect the manufacturer, and my desire to protect the manufacturer is not that he may get a huge profit, but that the men in his employ may get living wages and be able to live in the country where they were born and brought up, and not have to go away.

I hope we are all Canadians, and I think as Canadians we ought to get together. In 1867 we began the greatest experiment in the creation of a nation that has ever been attempted in the world. We are still in the experimental stages, if I am not mistaken. But having a country which stretches nearly four thousand miles across the continent, it is inevitable that the interests of one section are not identical with the interests of another. Broadly speaking we have three divisions in this country, the Maritime provinces, Ontario and Quebec, the central provinces and the West. I think that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec are more nearly identical in their interests than any other two provinces. Perhaps the western provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta are in the same position. Here are three great divisions. Our business is to harmonize the interests of the three different sections, and I think it can be done. It can be done if the people in each province will have some regard for the welfare of the people of the other provinces but if we confine our views and considerations as to what ought to be done to our own personal needs we cannot get anywhere. We have to consider what is in the interests of the other provinces. Well, what is the fact? The eastern provinces, including the Maritime provinces need protection. The province of British Columbia requires protection. If you take the three prairie provinces, you will find that they contain about two-ninths of the population of the country. The other provinces contain seven-ninths, and the other provinces want a tariff. I say to the men of the prairie provinces that they should have regard for the fact that the people of six out of the nine provinces believe that their interests demand a tariff. If the people of the prairie provinces will go that far—and I fancy they are willing to do so, because surely the prosperity of seven-ninths of our population is of the utmost importance to the other two-ninths—something might be accomplished. I do not think for a moment that the people of the prairie provinces are possessed of a selfishness that would consider their own interests, without regard for the interests of their fellow Canadians.

Mr. SPENCER: Has the hon. member not reversed the figures? Are there not six provinces desiring freedom of trade and three wishing a tariff?

Mr. HOCKEN: No, I think the hon. gentleman is wrong. If he will go over the records whenever there has been a general election on the trade issue he will discover I am about right. The last election was not a criterion at all on the trade question. The people did not vote on that issue.

Mr. BUREAU: Nor the one before.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think perhaps they did in the West. The Grain Growers Guide has certainly inoculated the farmers of the West with the idea that nothing matters except free trade.

Mr. FORKE: Then we have the Sentinel.

Mr. HOCKEN: You do not get much protection or free trade in that.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not much of a harmonizer.

Mr. BUREAU: There is only one harmonizer in the country.

Mr. HOCKEN: But if we are going to get together we ought to do so in this House frankly and definitely. I have an idea that this clause that I refer to in the Speech from the Throne is the result of some secret diplomacy by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and Premier Dunning of Saskatchewan. They were down here and were in conference with the Prime Minister. They went away, and there is a suggestion that the duty is to be taken off agricultural implements. I did not think that our radical friends approved of secret diplomacy.

Mr. BUREAU: It only exists in the hon. gentleman's mind. There is no secret diplomacy.

Mr. HOCKEN: I was speaking to the hon. member to my left.

Mr. BUREAU: But I am listening to the hon. member.

Mr. HOCKEN: Perhaps they do not believe in secret diplomacy, but there must be something going on.

Mr. KELLNER: Has the hon. member any suggestion to make for the get-together movement?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, I have. I say that I think western Canada should be willing to accept a cost of living tariff for this country as a stable part of the policy of Canada.

Mr. EVANS: Would the hon. member please define that?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes. A cost of living tariff was defined the other day by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), as a tariff that will enable the manufacturer to live and give employment to the people of this country, but not to give to the manufacturer any excessive profits.

Mr. SPENCER: Do you consider a farmer a manufacturer in his line, and would you allow him a cost of living tariff?

Mr. HOCKEN: Sure, I would protect him wherever he needs protection. I think that he should have protection against a good deal of the stuff that comes in from the other side.

Mr. FORKE: But the hon. member must realize that it cannot be done. You cannot protect the farmer with four hundred million bushels of wheat.

Mr. HOCKEN: There may be some difficulty in placing a protective tariff on wheat.

Mr. BUREAU: You would have to cheapen the cost of living.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have an idea that some farmers grow other things besides wheat. Is a man a farmer who simply grows wheat? I am not sure, but I do not think he is. He may be a wheat grower, but he is not a farmer. Growing wheat is one operation on a farm, and that has been the great trouble in the West. They have grown wheat, wheat, wheat, and they do not grow anything but wheat.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member invites a question; do you despise the four hundred million bushels of wheat that comes from the West and goes over to Europe, and helps to keep the wheels of industry in Canada turning? Would you compare that with any other agricultural production in Canada to-day?

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. HOCKEN: The hon. gentleman made a speech when he asked a question. I do not despise anybody, and I do not despise anything that is being produced. But I say it is impossible so far as I can see to put a protective duty on wheat.

Mr. FORKE: We do not want to.

Mr. HOCKEN: But I say that there are other things besides wheat—cattle, poultry and fruit—and you have a wide range. My hon. friend has lived all his life on a wheat farm, but he knows that he can grow wheat without being a farmer.

Mr. SALES: I grow cattle as well as wheat, and my cattle are grown on an export basis the same as wheat. How are you going to protect me on the cattle?

Mr. HOCKEN: I have been diverted from my subject and as I want to finish by six o'clock I will hurry on. I say this, Mr. Speaker, to my hon. friends in particular. They have more to gain from the cheapening of transportation than from the removal of any tariff. I would exhaust the resources of this country in cheapening transportation from western Canada to the seaboard. I would do it in two or three different ways. I would, as I did last year, vote for any appropriation that is necessary to develop to its ultimate limits the port of Vancouver. If it is possible to take the grain of any of the western provinces out by Vancouver at a lower rate, I am in favour of that. Last session I went so far as to vote for the Hudson Bay railway, although I do not believe for a minute that it is ever going to give lower rates or any relief for the western farmer. Yet, it may open up a country that has some other resources, and it may pay for itself in that way. But I cannot believe the wheat will ever go out by that route. The great thing is the development of the St. Lawrence river so that ocean vessels will go up to the head of the lakes as they did last year, and take cargoes of wheat right over to Liverpool. I do not think that is the inevitable or the natural development of that route; but if the St. Lawrence river were improved to give a twenty-five or thirty-foot draft, big ships that take 500,000 bushels of grain would load at Fort William and would probably break bulk at the city of Quebec. It might be the city of Three Rivers.

Mr. BUREAU: It is the better place.

Mr. HOCKEN: But Montreal and Quebec should, under those conditions, develop into two of the greatest ports on the North American continent.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Toronto?

Mr. HOCKEN: Toronto gets nothing out of this. A ship may come in with package freight, but there are no bulk cargoes to receive from or to deliver in Toronto. A vessel holding 500,000 bushels of wheat would leave Fort William, go down to the city of Quebec and discharge into ocean boats which would go across to Liverpool, or to any other port in the world, in that way saving five to eight cents a bushel on wheat. If from five to eight cents a bushel could be saved on the wheat that was grown on the western prairies last year, the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) can figure out what that means. That is one of the ways in which transportation can be cheapened. Water transportation, as we all know, can be done at much lower rates than rail transporation.

I have another plan to suggest, and I am now going to venture into the realm of prophecy. Having had the example a day or so ago of the dean of the House, the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), who is something of a prophet, I am going to make a suggestion that may seem a little in advance of the time, but which, I will venture to predict, before many years will be a subject of serious discussion as a progressive policy for this country. I think the real reduction in the cost of transportation is to come from the electrification of the railways. I believe there are men sitting in this House to-day, yes, men in middle life or past it, who will live to see our whole western railway system electrified. If that is done, the railways will be run with at least 50 per cent greater efficiency than they have to-day. The efficiency of a railway train lies in the locomotive. An electric locomotive, by actual experience, on the New York, New Haven and Hartford line, showed an increased efficiency over steam of fifty to sixty per cent. Electric locomotives take longer trains; they take heavier grades; they eliminate all the water service and they are more efficient in every particular. Every 100 or 150 miles a steam locomotive operates, it goes into the shops to be repaired. On the New York, New Haven and Hartford railway, they inspect an electric locomotive every 1,800 miles it runs. I have some figures here that are, perhaps, worth while mentioning.

One of these statements is that in the United States to-day they are operating 5,000 miles of regular railroad on which trains are hauled by electric locomotives. On those railroads ordinary passenger and freight trains made up into ordinary trains are hauled by electricity. That is a very considerable mileage. On the Milwaukee line, they have found an increase in efficiency of 50 per cent. On some lines, they have done better. Mr. Ralston, of the New York, New Haven and Hartford line, says that there has been only one failure of a locomotive in every 21,000 miles run by electricity, whereas there is one failure for every 4,000 miles run under steam. Thirty-three electric locomotives have handled the passenger traffic in and out of the Pennsylvania terminals of New York for eleven years. They have made more than 7,000,000 miles with a record of 64 4-37 miles per detention on account of the locomotives. They have made 11,454 miles for every minute of detention. The maintenance of these locomotives over all this long time has been just about one-sixth of equivalent steam locomotives.

My suggestion—and I think it will come to pass—is that there should be constructed in every province in the West a great power plant for the purpose of operating those railways, and at the same time of supplying power to every municipality in the province. There should be a super-power zone such as they are talking about in the Atlantic states of the union. It is already proposed that the eastern states as far west as Pennsylvania shall be included in one super-power zone; that the power shall be developed largely by steam, and that the municipal power, the railway power, and all the other power used within that zone will be switched on and off as it is required. The same thing, I am convinced, can be established in the western prairies. With a large power plant in British Columbia, one in Alberta, one in Saskatchewan and one in Manitoba—and three might be enough—sufficient power could be developed from cheap coal to operate every wheel that runs on the prairies, and at the same time to run all the municipal services in all the cities that are there now or that will be there in the future. It is by co-operation that every great achievement has been effected; and if the people of the West will co-operate, the cities with the railways and with this government, if they will take the cheap coal from the mines at Drumheller and the coal from the mines of Saskatchewan where, according to the Geological congress, there are 2,400,000,000 odd tons of coal, and establish three, if not four, super-power plants between the head of the lakes and the coast, in that way you will get an efficiency for your railways that will certainly reduce the cost of operation ultimately, if not immediately, by at least 50 per cent.

Twelve per cent. of every ton which a locomotive draws is its own coal and water. Of every eight trains operated throughout the United States one train represents the cost of hauling the coal and water for the other seven. That should all be eliminated. We have the coal in the western provinces; we have the power of electricity, which is more efficient in the winter than in the summer. An electric locomotive never freezes up, instead of freezing it becomes more efficient the colder the weather. This plan could be put into effect one section at a time, first, say, the mountain section from Edmonton to the coast; then the section from Edmonton to Regina; then, moving east. Stop buying steam equipment and use what we have in those parts of the country not electrified, and buy instead new equipment of electric motive power until the whole of the west is put under electric power.

With transportation such as that you will be able to place the wheat of the prairies on the markets of the world at ten or fifteen cents, or perhaps more, per bushel less than at the present time. I say, as one coming from one of the central provinces, as one believing in protection for the industries, as one who knows that the industrial part of the country is bearing the load of taxation, that the resources of the eastern provinces are available to-day, for the electrification of the western railways, or the development of water transportation, to improve conditions for the western farmers and make it possible for them to earn a good livelihood.

There are bitter complaints from the prairies. Has there ever been a time when there were not bitter complaints from pioneering communities? The men on the prairies have done well; at least I have something which I might quote and which perhaps the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) will remember. It is an interview which Mr. C. W. Rowley, the western superintendent of the Bank of Commerce, had with my hon. friend, in which he points out that in less than forty years men who had gone into that country had got rich. But there was never a pioneer in Ontario who got rich in forty years.

Mr. FORKE: Not rich.

Mr. HOCKEN: He says so.

Mr. FORKE: He is exaggerating.

Mr. HOCKEN: It depends, of course, upon what you call rich. But the men who have pioneered out there have not had anything like the difficulties, the hardships, and the poverty which were experienced by our progenitors in this province of Ontario. It has been a comparatively easy country to the pioneer. There are, however, difficulties that are inseparable from pioneering, that is apparent. And I am satisfied that with the improvement of transportation, and if Canadians will take the thing up in a unity of spirit piece by piece, we can get a policy for the country that will be acceptable to all, a policy that will bring prosperity to all.

We in Canada have the greatest country in the world. Providence has given us a larger endowment of natural resources, and of opportunities generally, than are enjoyed by any other country. We are living in a climate that is calculated to make men strong, physically, mentally and morally. We ought to be, at the end of this century, the greatest nation in the world, able to contribute more to civilization than the Mother Country, and that is saying a great deal. There are no better people in the world than Canadians, and the climate is responsible for that. Surely, then, we ought to have the patriotism and the political capacity to get together and devise a policy which will take care of each province and promote the common interests of all. That means some little adjustment, some agreement; but, I am sure that if we are all Canadians, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggests we should be, we ought to be able to do that.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue this debate I would like to lend my word of appreciation to the mover (Mr. Kelly) and the seconder (Mr. Lapierre) of the Address for their very able speeches. The repetition of these words of praise must be getting rather monotonous to them, but I suggest that they make the most of it; for it is possibly the last time so many kind things will be said about their speeches. To the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) I would also like to extend congratulations. They contributed very ably indeed to the discussion, and while I believe they both practically admitted that they were guilty of constituency bribery, still, we enjoyed their addresses. I think I might also very consistently extend a word of congratulation to our leader (Mr. Forke) and to the leader of the Labour group in the House (Mr. Woodsworth), both of whom delivered very able addresses.

I think the country can get the best outline of what a political party has to offer by watching the discussions of their adherents in their addresses during the parliamentary recess. With this in view I have read carefully the speeches of the Prime Minister during his visit in England as well as of some of the cabinet minsters who came out west this summer. Their appeal to the country on the basis of Liberal policy seemed to be that they would bring in foreign capital and immigration. There are two methods of bringing in foreign capital. One is, in some way or other, to get hold of people who have capital and bring them into the country; that method is a comparatively good one. The other would be that of adding to our national debt and also to our interest charges, and that I consider to be a very doubtful procedure indeed at this time.

At Edmonton we were favoured during the recess with two visits from the right hon. leader of the opposition. On the first occasion I went to hear him speak, and his address was a very able one. It dealt wholly, however, with a criticism of the government of the day; he dwelt at great length and very ably on the deeds of omission and commission for which the present administration was responsible. Then he returned to the East, and later he came back to the West with a man who, I think, was instrumental in again putting the province of Ontario under the domination of Toronto—and I believe it is only fair to say that in that accomplishment he strained the Conservative machine until they could not even elect Tommy Church as mayor of Toronto at the last civic election. When he arrived in Edmonton with this "Baldwin of Canada", as he was designated, another meeting was held. Unfortunately I was not able to attend, but one of those who did attend told me that on that occasion the leader of the opposition delivered a very brilliant address and again gave the government a pretty severe castigation. When he finished up he addressed his audience in words something to this effect: "It possibly would not be very fitting for me to come out here and say all these unkind things about the Liberals without saying what the Conservatives would do if they were elected. I will tell you what they would do. You have seen the farmers leave their farms in western Canada and go down across the border in great numbers. That is nothing to what has happened in Ontario; there they are leaving every city, town and village, and the country is practically deserted. What would we do? We would build a high tariff wall around Canada and produce a home market for our farmers." There he hesitated, no doubt expecting a little applause; and I am frank to say that he is nearly always able to command it when he desires it. On that occasion, however, in that large audience, which was presumed to be a Conservative audience, there was not a clap or a "hear, hear"; not a note of appreciation could have reached his ears.

After his departure we had a third visit, from the hon. gentleman who is perhaps the heftiest member of the Conservative group in the House; I refer to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie), who was Minister of Agriculture in the late government and who is now official organizer for the Conservative party. He came out to Edmonton, and according to the papers that are more or less loyal to that party, he was having a great deal of success in organizing the Conservatives of the district. That paper made quite a number of very favourable comments during his stay and for a day or two after he had gone, but subsequently one of the other papers came out with the rather caustic remark that since the member for Victoria had left the district it seemed that the Conservatives had all gone too; and the writer suggested that in all probability they were travelling companions of the Conservative organizer. That sort of got under the Conservatives' wool a little bit, and the Edmonton Journal came out with an article on February 11th, telling of how they had organized a smoker out there and how a number of prizes had been offered for getting members for the organization. I have the article before me; it is long and I shall not read it all, but I should like to mention some of the prizes which were offered. For the grand prize, otherwise known as the "Meighen prize", a solid gold watch. In the men's contest the first prize was the "Blair prize"—Blair, by the way, is the new provincial leader of the party in Alberta—a club bag, donated by William Short; second prize, a golf bag; third prize a pocket flask; fourth prize, a gold pencil. I submit that it is a little unusual to put a gold pencil in such surroundings. The ladies also were offered some prizes. The first was a half dozen stainless steel knives with ivory handles and a half dozen 1847 Rogers dinner forks. I believe that Rogers dinner forks are manufactured in England. I submit it is rather inconsistent at least for the Conservative party to offer a prize to one of its own adherents especially at a time when the tariff is the outstanding issue, and especially a prize of knives and forks made in England.

The second prize is a handbag, the third prize ladies' gold shoes, the fourth prize a fountain pen, and two tentative prizes are offered to the man and woman who buy over one hundred tickets. We will watch the bulletins of the member for Victoria and see how the contest goes.

I think it is a fair conclusion to draw from the information we have at the present time, that the people of Canada, those who are supporting the Liberal or the Conservative party, have the option of supporting the Liberals on the promise of foreign capital and immigration being brought in, and also on the more or less indefinite promise contained in the Speech from the Throne of a tariff reduction, or of supporting the Conservatives, who I suppose would promise them protection and an opportunity, if they lived in the province of Alberta, of winning one of these very valuable prizes. So viewing both parties and the condition that our country is in to-day, I think it is only fair to say that it is very easy to see the end of the two-party system of government in Canada. I think that possibly this parliament has a smaller number of groups than the next one will have. I do not believe the day will ever come when we will go back to the two-party system in this country again.

Neither do I attach much importance to the campaign going on in the papers of this country for a Moses to lead us out of the wilderness we are in. I believe the time has come when we shall have to take advice such as was offered us this afternoon by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), of getting together in an effort to solve the economic problem of Canada. When we do get together I hope the hon. member will not forget to send us a copy of the Orange Sentinel, because I would very much like to read its editorials when we are considering getting together in this country. However, I am fully convinced that we would be better advised to try and solve this question ourselves than to go out on a prospecting tour looking for a leader which the press tells us we need at the present time. I think that possibly that view is strengthened by the late war. Invariably after all other wars there has been some great outstanding general in the public eye, but there has been none such after this war. We had one possibly who might be termed a great organizer, but I do not think it can truthfully be said that there is one general who has come through the late war whose strategy and whose skill in battle will live in the history of our country. I believe that point can be pressed home best perhaps by reference to an event which occurred recently in England. There they engaged a painter of considerable repute to paint three pictures, the first to be a picture of those who negotiated the Peace treaty, the second of those who signed the treaty, and the third of those who won the war. In a short time the artist completed the first picture, showing the statesmen and diplomats of the various countries negotiating the Peace treaty. Then he painted the second picture, in which he portrayed the signatories signing the treaty. But when he came to the third picture he tried one general after another in vain. According to reports he tried nine different generals and refused them all. They pressed him to hurry up and complete the series, and so finally he brought in a picture, not of any great general of the war, but of Britain's Unknown Soldier.

The Speech form the Throne conveys more or less of a promise of a reduction in the tariff. I am frank to say, after listening to the speeches which have come before the government benches, that I am more confused than ever as to what is meant by these tariff proposals. However, I am willing to be fair, and wait and see.

There are two omissions, in my opinion, in the Speech from the Throne to which I wish to call attention. I think that at the present time Canada is suffering more from the low prices which are paid to the farmer for his produce and from the excessive interest rates we have to pay than from any other two things we have to contend with. In the Speech from the Throne there may be more or less of a promise given of an attempt to reduce the cost of commodities which the farmer must buy, but I can see nothing there to give him any hope of an increase in the prices he gets for his commodities, and the interest rate is absolutely untouched.

I wish briefly to review the trade situation that Canada is in at the present time. I think it is one of the first axioms of economics that goods from one country must pay for goods purchased from another, and I maintain that what is largely the matter with our foreign trade at the present time is the tariff wall that we have maintained around this country, and which has kept out practically all the goods that are essential to us. About the only goods we have been able to get are the non-essentials or semi-luxuries. On the other hand, we have given to the world probably the finest wheat and the finest foodstuffs that can be grown anywhere in the civilized world to-day. The high quality of those foodstuffs is well known to practically every country in the world and to practically every individual in those countries. But the goods we are importing into this country are toys, for instance, from the Orient, silks and patent medicines from Europe —goods that might be classed as semi-luxuries. Practically no one knows the value of these goods in marketing. I believe there has grown up in our midst a merchandising combination which is taking an exorbitant toll for the service it is rendering. The United States government recently investigated this condition and found that in some cases this combination was charging as high as 1,000 per cent profit. Of course, it is pretty hard for the farmer growing wheat and Wiltshire sides to compete with profits to that extent.

We also have a few other troubles to contend with. Those of us who live in western Canada find when we come to ship our produce that the Railway Commission fixes the rates to the Great Lakes. From that point, across the Great Lakes, the rates are fixed by a combine of two men, and from there on the rates are supposed to be fixed by the competition between American and Canadian roads, but we are well informed that there is a combine between the American and Canadian roads, and that they refuse to lower the rates. Then at the ocean we have an ocean combine fixing the rates. Summing up, in shipping our goods we are up against a series of hopeless combines, and under such conditions it seems absurd to expect that a protective tariff wall is going to benefit the farmers very greatly.

There is still another policy which I have not mentioned, and that is the economic policy of doing business in Canada in such a way as to make the home market pay for the development of the foreign market. I think it is stating the case fairly to say that if a manufacturer desires to develop a foreign market, he will simply increase the price of the commodities at home, and will make the home market pay for the cost of developing that foreign market. That is the reason we often see goods manufactured in this country sold more cheaply in some foreign country than they are sold in Canada; and as a matter of fact some of our own goods, flour for example, sells more cheaply on the continent of Europe than it does here. I am convinced that in order to improve their status the farmers will have to create an organization which will be competent to handle the selling end of their business in precisely the same way. Before such an organization can be constituted, however, there is little doubt in my mind but that we shall have to get support from other industries in Canada. We believe, speaking from the standpoint of western Canada, that the urban population very gladly extend that support at the present time. We may need some support from the government, and I am a little uneasy as to what we can expect from that quarter. Very recently a delegation from our farmers' pool came down here and asked the acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) if he would kindly pay up a little bill which he owed. It dates back to the days of the old wheat board, when a sum of money was set aside to meet the winding up of expenses of the board. Those expenses were not so heavy as had been expected, and besides some of the participation certificates had been destroyed. The result is that the government have about half a million dollars of our money in their custody. But when this delegation came down and asked the acting Minister of Finance if he would mind turning it over he said "No, a few years ago some of you fellows came down here and borrowed money with which to buy seed grain. You have not yet paid that money back, so I will keep this money until the other debt is paid." It is rather unfortunate he did not state that some of the people brought in under the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's immigration campaign owed for the seed grain.

I think before I leave that subject I ought to call attention to the fact that the very day the newspapers published an article about this delegation coming down to see the acting Minister of Finance, the United States papers carried a news item to the effect that a committee had been appointed there to finance the farmers of the northwestern states. I saw two reports. One said that the capital subscription was to be ten million, the other that it was to be one hundred million. I have not been able to check the statements up and I do not know which is right. But assuming that ten millions is the correct amount, it is worth while noticing the difference in attitude between the United States and Canada. In one country the government refuse to give back about half a million in their possession which actually belongs to the western farmers, in the other they are subscribing the sum of ten million dollars to assist the farmers. I think possibly such incidents as this account for a good deal of the emigration which is to-day going to the United States from this country.

Now I want to make a few remarks with regard to the interest rates we are paying in Canada. I think it very fitting that I should remind the House that at the last session of parliament, when we were renewing the bank charters, the little group which sits in this part of the chamber asked for a number of changes in the Bank Act, changes which we hoped would probably be instrumental in reducing the interest charges and in giving us a better credit system for our country. On that occasion there was no quarrel going on about the bribing of constituencies or anything of that kind; the hand of fellowship was extended across the floor of the House by the government to the opposition at that particular time. They told us then that Canada had the finest banking system that any country ever had, and it was even suggested that we should be satisfied with it because expressions of doubt on our part might ruin our credit abroad. I think events have happened since that time which possibly show our banking system is not just as perfect as its defenders then thought it was. Quite a number of these very fine banks have got into trouble at various times. Of course I am aware it will be said in each particular case "It is only a weak sister, nothing happens to the big banks". But the big banks are strong only as long as the people have confidence in them, and when the confidence is withdrawn they are no longer able to continue. I doubt, in fact, whether a bank in any such position as that could pay its liabilities. We remember that away back in 1912, I think that was the date, one of the big banks decided to speculate in Mexican lands and the results were very disastrous. If my memory serves me correctly thirty millions were written off the books of that bank as a result of those unfortunate investments. In 1914 another bank became ambitious to enter upon railroading and had to request the assistance of the government to keep it on its feet. In 1920 another bank backed some sugar gamblers, and that bank had a sweet time to remain in business also. So I think that possibly we are entirely within our rights in discussing this financial question.

Now, I want to give the House a little idea of just how satisfactory our banking system is from a farmer's standpoint. If, say twenty years ago, a farmer wanted to buy a new binder, and his credit was good, he would go to his banker and tell him what he wished and that he desired to borrow money for the purpose. The banker would say "All right, give me your note for $150 at 8 per cent." Suppose the same farmer wanted to buy a new binder this year he would go to the banker and tell him that the old binder, having been left out in fence corners for twenty years was worn out, and he wanted to buy a new machine. The banker would say "All right give me your note for $300 and interest for 8 per cent", or probably 9 per cent. Now the number of dollars involved is not the question at issue. The vital fact is that he wishes to perform a certain function and to get money enough to do it. In the first case he is charged $12 a year for the privilege of buying the binder, in the second case he is charged $24; and when pay day comes he discovers that the principal he has to meet in the second instance is twice the amount it was in the first.

I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this is the most inopportune time the country has ever had for discussing tariff regulations, by reason of the fact that foreign exchanges are so very unstable. Practically every country outside of the United States finds that it is having a good deal of trouble in maintaining its exchange. By the way our own exchange is slipping a little within the last few days, and I doubt very much if Canada can maintain it at anywhere near the figure it is now. I think this is something the government should take under their serious consideration, as to whether they intend to permit the extra demands which were made upon the credit of our country to be met by an issue of bank credit, entailing as it does a continual payment of interest, or whether they will provide for an issue of Dominion notes to take the place of bank credit. I want to leave that subject for a moment, and I will say something further in regard to it in a few minutes.

In discussing the matter of foreign trade, I notice that the government has been particularly gratified this last few months over the fact that last year we had a favourable trade balance of about $118,000,000. Well, as I view it, possibly that is not a matter of very great gratification at all. I think it amounts to about this, that extra money could do one of three different things. It could pay the interest on our foreign debt, if we made arrangements for that in our budget. It could go back to the country as a hidden asset, or in some way that would deceive the people. It chiefly comes by increasing our national debt, and also by increasing our interest obligation. I maintain that if we are going out to try to capture foreign markets by competition, by the cheapness with which we can sell our goods to other countries, regardless of whether or not we are prepared to take their goods in payment, then we are adopting practically the policy that used to be in vogue in the military ages. There was a time in the history of the world when the country which could go forth and by force of its arms conquer new territory was the most prosperous and the most-to-be-envied country of all. That condition is changed to-day, and we are endeavouring to accomplish the same thing through the trade of Canada, but I believe that one method is as much as the other, merely wading through slaughter to a throne.

We have heard a great deal in this House since the debate started about the unity of eastern and western Canada, and I submit there is only one way that that can be maintained. There must be an economic advantage to all the various sections of Canada in the union or eventually it is going to dissolve. I am sure there is no one at the present time who is desirous of seeing such a dissolution, but when the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) this afternoon pointed out the horrible plight Brantford was getting into, and told us it was our duty to maintain the tariff, so as to hold up Brantford and some of these other cities, I could not help but think that these cities would never have been there if it had not been for the tariff; and having built these towns and brought them to their present state of development, if we find they are too heavy to carry, I am afraid we will have to get out from under the load, regardless of whether it means a dissolution of the union or not.

I would like to make a few remarks about the unsympathetic way in which the demands of the West have been met by eastern Canada and by this parliament in particular, and possibly I could cite nothing that would bring the matter home more truly than the question of the natural resources. We have been demanding the natural resources; and, for that matter, have been promised them by every parliament which we have ever had in Canada, regardless of its political affiliations. I remember when this government was elected they were trying to find a seat for the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) in the province of Alberta. I asked one of their agents why they wanted him down in Ottawa so particularly. "Well" he said, "If there is a man in western Canada who can get the natural resources for us, that man is Charlie Stewart." He came down in 1921, this is 1924 and we have not got the natural resources yet.

Then there is the matter of the Branch Lines bill. That bill went through this House last year without any very serious opposition. It was defeated in another section of parliament, the mention of which is taboo at the present time; but I would like to suggest to the government that there might be a possibility this year of getting that bill through, if they would change their methods of financing a little. We have had two or three instances in the past of the adoption of different methods. Back in 1916 the government came to the aid of the Canadian Northern Railway with a grant of sixteen million dollars, and they came to the aid of the Grand Trunk Pacific with a grant of ten million dollars. That money was simply turned over to those railway companies in exchange for securities, and went into circulation, to meet construction costs and operating costs of the road. I can see no reason at this present time, having in mind the situation of our finances to-day why the government should not make an issue of Dominion notes to pay for these branch line railways. It would save the interest bill which is bound to accrue if we finance it in the ordinary channels, and I think that the only objection that could be raised to the suggestion is that increasing the amount of the circulation without increasing production, would cause prices to go up. I think that objection would fall flat, because if that money were expended in this way, we would very materially increase production. During last session the members in this part of the House were quite frequently referred to as the calamity howlers of parliament. I think it is only fair to say that this year the calamity howlers have largely changed their positions. The cry has come from the other sections of the House to a really more marked extent than from this side.

An hon. MEMBER: Montreal.

Mr. KELLNER: Montreal and Toronto in particular. That is the natural sequence of events. When depression hits the country it starts always at the outlying districts and works back to the centre of civilization and finance, and I am convinced that before you will head off the depression from which this country is suffering and start it on the way to recovery, you will have to go out to the country districts and start prosperity there first. I know of no way in which that could be more effectively accomplished than by building those branch lines and financing them in the way I have suggested.

Before I came into the House, Mr. Speaker, I was approached with a request that I set a precedent for reducing the time of speeches—I intend, at least, to set the example of making a short speech.

Mr. EMMANUEL D'ANJOU (Rimouski) (translation): Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to join at the outset with the members who spoke before me, in congratulating the mover and seconder of the Address for the worthy and eloquent manner in which they accomplished their task. To my friend from Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) with whom I have the great privilege of being united by a long friendship, I offer my most sincere congratulations for the excellent speech he delivered in polished and irreproachable French. He speaks English well. However, for my part, I find him more eloquent when he speaks French. His electors—particularly the French Canadians—have reason to be proud of their representative and I feel certain they will acknowledge their appreciation and gratefulness when the opportunity lends itself. I am delighted to be able to sincerely congratulate the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) on his appointment to that important post. I know he will be a credit to us in his new functions, as he has always been to his compatriots in all the high offices he has filled. As to my friend, the member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin), I may tell him that all his fellow-members, and particularly those of the province of Quebec, rejoice in seeing him at the head of the Marine and Fisheries department. No doubt he will distinguish himself in that sphere as he did at the Bar, in parliament and everywhere else. As I feel in a complimentary mood, let me, Mr. Speaker, sincerely congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the worthy and truly Canadian manner in which he represented our country at the last Imperial Conference held, last summer, in London. He was the predominating figure at that conference. His firm stand on Imperial questions and his great eloquence drew upon him the admiration of all the members of this important gathering. Our distinguished Prime Minister maintained in London, as in Canada, his lofty views in regard to parliament's supremacy. He did his duty as a Canadian patriot and the stand he took at that Imperial Conference is highly to his credit and does honour to his country and fellow-citizens. Therefore, when the people of Canada will be called upon to give their appreciation as to the policy followed in London, by the eminent leader of the Liberal party, they will not hesitate in their choice between the Prime Minister and the fierce imperialist who leads the Conservative opposition in this House and through the country.

The Speech from the Throne, this year, is certainly one of the most important and substantial ever communicated to this House by a government thoughtful of the progress and the welfare of the Canadian people, and anxious of strengthening the union which must exist between all the provinces forming part of the Canadian confederation. The announcement of reductions in taxation, the removing of duties on instruments of production and especially on farm implements, the balancing of the budget, finally, all the progressive reforms promised in the Speech from the Throne, will, I am fully convinced, be acclaimed with joy by the Canadian people. The removal of duties on the implements necessary to farming will turn to the advantage not only of the western farmers, but also to those of the east. It is a measure of simple justice. And, as a Liberal, I am proud that it is a Liberal government who grants this great blessing to the farmers of this country. I feel doubly proud because I have the honour to represent, in this House, an essentially farming community, a county, I may say it with pride, most progressive and most advanced in regard to agriculture, as in all other respects The farming industry is the first and most important of all our industries. The soil is the great foster-mother, and it is worthy of the attachment and zeal of all those who have at heart the welfare and prosperity of this country. It is the foundation of progress of all nations; and all governments conscious of their duty and responsibilities, must be ready to make the greatest sacrifices to promote its development and reap its greatest yield. I am confident that the government will not rest there in its liberality to the farmers. Not only do I hope, they will not discontinue the grants for agricultural purposes to the provinces, but that on the contrary, they will be increased to their utmost. Economy is an excellent thing, but it must not be practised at the expense of the farming community. There are departments where the government can economize without it being detrimental to anyone. The estimates of National Defence should be reduced to their simplest form. If, indeed, there is a quarter where the government can and should realize the greatest savings, it is in the Department of National Defence. Requests for drill sheds or armouries must be thrown out fearlessly, not a cent should be spent on drill or training camps. It is in these respects that a wise and intelligent economy may be carried out in the best interest of the country, and this without discriminating against anyone.

Now, I come to the distressing problem of immigration and exodus of our people towards the United States. In my humble opinion, the wisest, the most patriotic, the best Canadian policy, would be to use all possible and imaginable means to keep the toilers of our land, at home. When a Canadian family emigrates to the United States, it is, generally, a loss forever to our country. The father and mother may, perhaps, feel the influence of that powerful craving for one's country, this home-sickness for their dear Canada, but the children will never want to return to farm the land of their forefathers, because, across the 45th parallel, they will have acquired the habit of an easy life, filled with many attractions appealing to them. The repatriation of Canadians must, indeed, be encouraged, but it would be infiinitely preferable to arrange matters in such a way, as to keep our people in this country. The money spent to induce immigrants would be much better employed if it were spent to encourage our compatriots to remain on Canadian soil.

Some spoke of the country's debt, and it is inquired, who shoulders its responsibilites. The leader of the opposition, the late Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) toured the province of Quebec during last summer, and, in every place he visited, he criticized the government in regard to the debt and taxes. What he forgot to tell the people of that province, but what they all know, thank Heaven, is that our foolish war venture is the cause of our country's present financial situation, and that the first one responsible for this state of affairs, is the leader of the opposition himself. And when he has disappeared not only from the political scene, but from this world, we may include in his epitaph, the stigma of the great national bankrupt. Is he not, indeed, the same person who, at the outset of the Great War, stated, at Winnipeg, his willingness to put the country in bankruptcy to save the British Empire? He has kept his word: the Empire is saved, the country is in bankruptcy. But that was not enough. Even after the war they continued to squander the public funds. The leader of the opposition forgot to tell the people of Quebec that the war was over when his Government lent $25,000,000 to Roumania, $25,000,000 to Greece, under the plea of feeding the people of those countries who suffered from famine. We learned afterwards that this money was lent conditionally to its being spent in Canada; those enormous sums were used to favour the friends of the government, and, to feed the Greeks and the Roumanians, boxes of nails and barrels of paint were sent to them. Among those who profited by the granting of those contracts were to be found a Conservative member from New Brunswick, and another Conservative holding an important office in the Meighen cabinet. The whole country is fully aware that our critical financial situation is due to this war folly, and, that the principal author, not to designate him as the sole author of our woes, is the leader of the opposition.

The leader of the opposition suddenly unfolded a great love for the province of Quebec and the beautiful French language. He one night dreamed that he had to fall in love with the province of Quebec in order to secure certain electoral gains. It was then he organized with all his lieutenants, the Montys, the Belleys, the Fauteux and all the others, a great touring trip through the province of Quebec. A little French speech is prepared for him which he mumbles out from place to place, and behold this gentleman travelling throughout the province trying to make us forget the aspersions that he and his party heaped upon us.

If the leader of the opposition is sincere in his love for the province of Quebec; if he professes any friendship towards the French-Canadians of that province and Canada, why does he not ask the Prime Minister of Ontario to blot out immediately from the statutes of that province the iniquitous regulation XVII; if he is truly sincere and wishes to carry some sway in the province of Quebec and among the French-Canadians, let him force Mr. Ferguson to abrogate the accursed and odious law.

The leader of the opposition does not wish to recall that he has been the foremost insulter of our province and race and the partisans that were at his side carried on the same dirty work. Let him not forget one thing: the people of the province of Quebec are always true to their motto, Remember. They will remember that during the Great War, if we have known days of sadness and mourning we owe them to the leader of the opposition and his party; on the other hand they will remember that they can place their confidence in the leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Prime Minister, who preserved his good common sense when most of his compatriots lost their heads during the war, and who, faithful to his principles, being first a Canadian, knew how to side with those who wish to protect their country before saving the Empire.

During his rambling through the province of Quebec, the leader of the opposition was, according to his programme, to pay a visit to Rimouski, but he did not put in an appearance. As the leader of the opposition speaks and understands French well. I greatly regret that he is not in his seat to listen to what I shall read. He must, no doubt, have come across this article published in "Le Progres du Golfe" edited by my friend, Mr. Couture, notary, whose independent mind and integrity are well known. Here follows what is stated in this article dated November 30, 1923, in regard to Mr. Meighen's visit to the province of Quebec, organized by Messrs. Monty and Fauteux:

Bear Showmen

On several occasions, Messrs Rodolphe Monty, A Fauteux and a few others bring over Mr. Meighen into the province of Quebec so as "to show" him. Their action is well-meant but. . . they will be wasting their time and money. The province of Quebec has registered against the past policy of Mr. Meighen so energetic and unanimous a protest that his very few Quebec lieutenants should husband something more than a reminiscence of it.

The wild imperialism of which this ex-Prime Minister gave proof in latter days, has so much disgusted those whose country is Canada first that they have vowed to his person an abhorrence which will probably only die with their generation. To try and slip us over again this sorry personage after having given him a sirupy coating of protection and the velvet of a recent smattering of French, is to show that one has time to waste and that one takes the French Canadian to be a kind of a rustic that can be fooled easily, assuming beforehand that he will lack the courage of remembering past insults.

Messrs Monty and associates are quite at liberty to remain faithful to their political party; it is their unquestionable right and we even admire, to a certain extent, their tenacity, notwithstanding the discredit into which their leaders, of yesterday, have fallen in our eyes. Nevertheless, siding openly with a man who is primarily responsible for the stampede, and who, has behaved in such a way that he succeeded in loading the Conservative party, in the eyes of the masses, at least, with all the sins of Israel, is to go the limit.

Mr. Meighen stated at Victoriaville that he would rather be in the opposition. His philosophy reminds us of the fox who found the grapes too sour. He tells us that Mr. King is marking time, but what would he do in the latter's place, he, the intriguer "per excellens"? We should be glad to know.

The man whose policy has been so clumsy that it roused one against the other all the provinces of the Dominion, is a man unworthy of the confidence of people who wish to find the greatness of their country in the peace and harmony between the races.

We have not met Mr. Meighen personally, but we know his political leanings, his whims for imperialism beyond all measure. This is sufficient to justify both the denial of our confidence and our hope to soon see certain Conservative leaders cease, once for all, of being bear showmen.

BAYARD.

It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that the leader of the opposition read or heard of this article, for he thought it wise to abstain from visiting Rimouski.

At all the meetings at which he took part in the province of Quebec, he glorified himself of being the author of the compulsory Military Service Act; he stated at all these gatherings, that he would have no hesitation in acting the same way, if occasion offered, and, he further added that if he had imposed this odious measure on the country, it was because it was absolutely necessary. I contend, Sir, that the leader of the opposition is unable to establish, before an intelligent audience, that conscription was a measure of urgency. No, a country like ours, with limited resources, both in men and money—which during the war accomplished the gigantic task of sending more than 500,000 volunteers oversea, to take part in the bloody European war, was not deserving that this iniquitous conscription act be forced upon it. Should not Australia have given more than us, a country four-fifths English, proof of her love and attachment to the British Empire? Nevertheless that country did not think fit to pass so extraordinary a law as that of conscription, and, twice, in a referendum as well as a general election, it threw out the measure. South Africa acted in the same way.

The leader of the opposition is unable to justify the position he took. If the compulsory Military Service Act was forced upon us, it was not so much with a view to sending more men to the front—for there were thousands and thousands in the training camps, both in England and in France who but awaited the signal to leave for the firing line—but it was purely and simply a scheme to divide the Liberal party, so as to make it easier to carry the elections. That was the principal aim of the leader of the opposition. The result which followed proved conclusively that such was truly the aim of his scheme. I challenge him to come before the electors of my county to prove that he had the conscription act carried through because it was a measure of necessity. I am fully convinced that at the next appeal to the country, the electors of Rimouski and of other parts of the province of Quebec will prove to him that he had no right to impose such an arbitrary measure. Let the leader of the opposition be not deceived, let him not think that because he came to our province, the people of that province have changed their views towards him. The province of Kuebec is essentially a French province and is polite and hospitable. It welcomed the leader of the opposition courteously but with reserve. In all parts of the province of Quebec, where the leader of the opposition visited, he thought fit to call upon the highest dignitaries of our beloved clergy, hoping by those means to capture their sympathies. But let him not make that mistake. Years ago, Sir John A. Macdonald, then leader of the Conservative party, also undertook to obtain the good offices of the clergy of the province of Quebec, nevertheless, nursing the thought of crossing them at every turn.

If you will allow me Sir, I will quote to substantiate my assertion, the letter which Sir J. A. Macdonald wrote to Mr. A. T. Galt, on the 2nd of June, 1875. Here is this letter which I have had translated in French, to please the leader of the opposition, as I know that he is to-day very partial towards the French language:

Confidential letter of Sir John A. Macdonald to A. T. Galt, June 2, 1875

I have yours of the 1st and hasten to say that I hope you will use all your influence, and with promptness and energy, to prevent a split in the British wing of the Conservative party. The pretentions of the priests are absurd but they will be fostered and supported by the French of both parties, Rouge as well as Bleu. The true policy is for the Conservatives to use all the priestly influence they can to get a Conservative majority in the local legislature. A Conservative majority in the Dominion Parliament will soon follow and that majority may be trusted to put in full force your Educational clause in the B.N.A. Act, if there is any attempt to trample on the protestants.

The present Dominion Government Mackenzie and Co. have shown the greatest possible amount of obsequiousness to the R.C.'c up here and in New Brunswick and will do so—Must do so—if a religious or educational question arises in Lower Canada. If, therefore, by the action of the British party a Rouge Government is formed, then the British will find themselves thrown over by their Rouge allies, who have learned by experience that it is necessary to be Catholics first, Rouges afterwards. And there will be no use in them appealing to the Central Government, a Government placed in power and kept in power by archbishop Lynch and the Catholic League in Ontario. It would indeed be good policy, or rather good luck, for the protestants in Quebec, if an attempt were made by Bishop Bourget to override the B.N.A. Act in the new legislature. It would bring matters to a head.

Use the priest, therefore for the next election but be ready to fight them in the Dominion Parliament. For that purpose you should be there. The clauses are yours and it would put you in a very strong position to be the champion and exponent of the rights and claims of the British Party. But you can fight this battle successfully only with your old allies.

Yours always,

(Sgd) JOHN A. MACDONALD.

The leader of the opposition seems to be following the same tactics as Sir J. A. Macdonald; he comes to our province to-day to our clergy after having insulted it. He forgot to mention to the electors of Quebec the base outrage perpetrated upon the Jesuit college at Guelph, during the war. He forgot to mention many other things. He has forgotten that he belongs to a clique of fanatics which applies itself to keep down as much as possible the French Canadian element, and which endeavours to crush all those who do not share their views. He is wasting his time at that game, for the clergy of Quebec are too high-minded and self-respecting to be deceived by those honeyed words. When the next general election comes, the leader of the opposition will perceive that his speeches did not produce the effects expected from them.

I shall not, Sir, add anything further, I thank the House for the kind attention given me, and, I wish but for one thing: that during the next recess of parliament, the leader of the opposition will pay a visit to my county; I shall be there with my electors to greet him.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (East York): Unfortunately for me, Mr. Speaker, and no doubt for some other hon. members, we were not able to follow as well as we should like the remarks that have just been made in French by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou). The hon. gentleman had a good deal to say in reference to one of the greatest statesmen whom, in my opinion, this country has ever known, the late Sir John A. Macdonald. I would remind him that there should be coupled with that illustrious name that of another great Canadian statesman, Sir George Etienne Cartier. These two great men have had, in the past, a very considerable part to play in shaping the destinies of this country and placing her in the position she occupies to-day. Had it not been for them our friends in the western provinces would not be here in such large numbers to-day having so much to say in regard to conditions in that part of the Dominion: for was it not these two statesmen who in their day put the Canadian Pacific railway across this continent in order that the sons and daughters of the western country as well as some from eastern Canada might be able to follow their vocation? I have the greatest respect for the hon. member for Rimouski, but I want to tell him that the people of Ontario are not wont to exhibit the same degree of passion as he is apt to do. We in Ontario are suffering a great deal as the result of the war, but we are bearing our burdens and our sorrow; and when the hon. gentleman rises in his place and re-hashes what happened in that strenuous time during which the affairs of the country were governed by the party to which I belong, let me urge him with all sincerity to control his passion and let us all with a united front face the future with confidence in order that we may meet the problems that confront the Dominion.

It was not my intention to take part in this debate, but one of our number having missed the train, it has devolved upon me to come forward. It is with some regret that I note the absence from the House of the backbone of this government. I admire, as other young members of the House admire, such men as the Minister of Finance (Mr.

Fielding) and the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin)—the backbone of the government. Under the circumstances I will let any further remarks in that connection be taken as read. I want to congratulate the House, however, on having amongst its members two representative citizens of this Dominion in the persons of, the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Doucet) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) who adorn our benches.

Coming now to the Speech from the Throne, I fancy that most hon. gentlemen on a first reading of it thought that it held some promise; but after we have read it a second time, those of us at least who have gone across this country from one end to the other, and who have an idea of things, feel that the Speech from the Throne is not quite justified in many respects. I represent, —like the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean)—a constituency of some 110,000 people. This is one of the largest constituencies in Canada, and we feel that the first sentence in the Speech from the Throne is not a true expression of what is taking place in Canada at the present time. The second sentence refers to our prosperity, which it ascribes to production, transportation, employment and trade. With regard to production and what may be regarded as its complement, transportation, would not hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches have been a little more honest with themselves and the country if in the Speech from the Throne they had given thanks to Providence for the wheat production we had last year and, incidentally, for the fair return shown in our railway statement?

Coupled with production and transportation we note trade, employment, public finances, and so forth. It is true that the aggregate of our trade is somewhat in excess of what it was in other years. As a young member of this House I admire the style of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) in approaching this subject; I wish that he could impart some of his demeanor to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. In my humble opinion the hon. member for Bonaventure is a statesman. One suggestion that fell from his lips gave me cause for thought; he said, after painting a picture of life in the Gaspe basin, that a large number of the people of that district had found it necessary to emigrate to Boston and the New England states, to become hewers of wood and drawers of water to the people of the south. But in my humble opinion the hewers of wood and drawers of water are left here in Canada. Analyse if you will, the trade returns for 1923, and you will find that our increases in exports are in commodities which require the services in this country of hewers of wood and drawers of water. Our lumber exports increased by 37 per cent; sole leather, which should be made into boots and shoes in this country, shows an increase of 191 per cent, imports of twine an increase of 44 per cent, wool socks of 20 per cent. Since I learned that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) was not going to speak to-night I looked up our imports and exports from the point of view of groups of commodities. Take class 6, non-ferrous metals; there our imports reached the figure of $37,532,081, but an analysis shows that these imports represent $32,670,302 worth of finished goods and only $4,861,779 of raw material. In other words, 87 per cent of the goods in class 6 which were imported were finished articles and 13 per cent the raw material. Look at the exports for the same group, do we find the same condition prevailing? No: we find that the raw materials exported in the non-ferrous metal group were 77½ per cent, whereas of the total product the exports were 22½ per cent. Surely this is a condition which indicates that we are the hewers of wood and drawers of water. The same applies to class 4, exports of wood products. Of finished materials exported in wood and wood products there were $82,271,078 worth, or 36 per cent, against raw material exported, 64 per cent, or $146,585,127. The same thing applies to the figures with respect to imports of these products; unmanufactured, $9,758,613; manufactured, $26,086,931—27 per cent of the imports in this class were raw materials and 73 per cent the finished product. This must indicate to hon. members that we are still hewers of wood and drawers of water for the people to the south of us.

Having regard to the programme forecast in the Speech from the Throne, I am satisfied that the young people of Canada will, when they study it, begin to realize that vocations are not being made available to them and that it will be necessary for them to seek another country with that end in view. We have an illustration of this when we come to analyze what is being done with regard to immigration or, more pronouncedly, with regard to emigration. A good deal has been said with regard to immigration, but I am of the humble opinion that not half enough has been said with regard to emigration. The right hon. Prime Minister, in a wild sort of manner, tried to defend this situation, but his attempt was a very weak one. Leading members representing the party opposite have tried to make excuses for the exodus from this country, and in that respect I am reminded of that sentence in Holy Writ, "And they all with one consent began to make excuse." Excuses will not do for the people of Canada, Mr. Speaker. The people are your masters, and when you come forward with excuses you will be—I would hesitate to say, condemned, but you will be told where you belong.

There is a reference in the Speech from the Throne to the looking forward to the investment of large amounts of capital in this country. As my hon. friends opposite are wont to do, and as they have shown they are able to do in a very agile manner with regard to every question and every issue, they have faced both ways on this question, because in a paragraph further down they shake the whole foundation on which the industrial structure of this country rests. No government can face both ways on the public questions of the day; our people demand a straight, definite, clear policy so that they may know where they are, and the sooner they get it the better. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is smiling to himself, but let me tell him that I am absolutely sincere in what I say. I know the feeling of 110,000 people I represent in this House, and there is more truth than fiction in what I am saying at this moment. These matters affect my constituency very seriously.

The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) said this afternoon that we should be the mere image of the people we represent. I should like to be able to acquire that image of the 110,000 people I represent, because over 60 per cent of them live in homes that they themselves own. Twenty years ago my riding had but 10,000 people; to-day it is peopled by a fine class of young citizenship which is equal to that found in any other part of Canada. One of the hon. members from Quebec has said a good deal about the birth rate in that province. Let me tell the House that within a radius of one mile from where I live, including a population of 10,000 people, the birth rate is greater than it is in any other province of Canada. Our friends from the province of Quebec, with all due deference to them, have nothing on us in that respect. These people own their own homes and intend to hang on to them if at all possible. They seek their vocation in the great city of Toronto, and want to remain there as citizens. They took their part in the Great War from 1914 to 1918 to a degree unsurpassed by any other part of the Dominion, and when they express through me a few complaints in regard to the conditions under which they labour they are deserving of some consideration. I am not one to come here and say a whole lot about what we must have and what we must not have, when this fair Dominion is going through the present crisis, but I am going to ask you to bear with me while I say a few words with regard to some of our questions in the city of Toronto.

First and foremost in my mind at the moment is one matter of national importance. I am sorry the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) is not in his seat, because I would like to say something to him, although I know he would rise in his place and say that railway matters are entirely under the direction of the president of the Canadian National Railways and the board of directors. In the city of Toronto we have the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific coming into our fair city along the water front over level crossings. These level crossings in places have as many as sixteen sets of tracks crossing our main thoroughfares, and I have seen as many as thirty motor trucks, some twenty odd horses and wagons, twenty or thirty motor cars, and around five in the evening as many as four or five hundred working people crossing these sixteen sets of tracks. True, these level crossings are protected by flagmen. These flagmen do their duty as best they can, but they have nearly all reached the age of three score and ten, and some day we are going to have a tragedy at one of these level crossings. Farther down the same tracks, there is another level crossing which our people are wont in the summer time to use when going to the Island to get a little outing. There is hardly a day in the summer when there is not a Sunday school picnic and anywhere from one to two thousand Sunday school children with their teachers going over to the Island for a picnic, and they have to cross from ten to sixteen sets of tracks to get to the boats. That is the condition that prevails in Toronto at the present time, and it should receive some attention from the present Government inasmuch as we are the owners of the Canadian National railways, and inasmuch as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was wont to say last session that the railways are in politics. This question should receive consideration also from the viewpoint of the convenience of the travelling public and the utilization of our union station, which is lying idle, from the viewpoint also of assisting the trade and commerce of the great city of Toronto, and also from the viewpoint of allowing the industries which are located to the south of these tracks to develop as they ought to develop, and our harbour development to go on untrammelled as it cannot do at the present time.

I am sorry the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) is not in his seat. I would like to say something to him about his attitude with regard to the city of Toronto. The people of Toronto have no bigotry. I see the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales), who eats rhubarb, is laughing to himself. Let me tell him that the city of Toronto was built up by the sons and daughters from the farms of Ontario, the finest people in the Dominion. Let me tell him that the city of Toronto is pouring into the national exchequer each year money by the millions—to do what? To try and hold this country together, to help you out under the conditions under which you are striving. Let me tell the hon. gentleman from Saltcoats and other hon. members of this House who are wont to cry about agricultural conditions that there are no parasites of any kind in the city of Toronto. The people of Toronto who are interested in manufacturing and the like have borne the brunt of the hard times through which we have come, and having built their business on a sure foundation in the first instance, they have, as the hon. member for Hants has said, taken their medicine. They are putting their shoulder to the wheel and are trying to overcome the conditions of to-day.

Now that my attention has been drawn to the city of Toronto by a few smiles which indicate a certain amount of scepticism on the part of some hon. members in this House, let me give you just one instance of what our people are doing. On Saturday morning I went to a certain manufacturing institution in the city of Toronto and asked permission to look at their private records. I took with me the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Jelliff). I opened up the books of this private company, which was established forty years ago by two honourable men, who raised one a family of ten children and the other a family of nine, and who after forty years of hard labour had accumulated a business with a capital of some $452,000; and when I say hard labour I speak advisedly, for these men worked from early morning until late at night, from sunrise to sunset. The heads of this institution, one of these manufacturing institutions some hon. gentlemen are wont to call parasites, sleep in a room at night with a telephone beside their bed and are ready to do business whenever it rings. All their long-distance business is done at night, to save time during the day and, incidentally, because they get a little cheaper rate. They have worked fourteen hours a day for thirty-eight or forty years and have built up in that time a business worth $452,000. Perhaps they are parasites; perhaps not; in my humble opinion they are not. In 1920 they took a loss, without any depreciation or interest of $92,600; in 1921 they took a loss of $37,800; in 1922 they took a loss of $12,731. Interest and depreciation charges in that time amounted to $100,000, so the work of these two stalwart men, with their nineteen children, over a period of forty years was wiped out of existence. I am not crying hard times in this House, but I uphold the men, who after an experience of that kind were found—where? They were found in their place of business at eight o'clock on Saturday morning with their sons in overalls and the head of the institution in a smock going around and doing the best they could—for what? For the future of this country and their children.

Mr. Speaker, when I hear hon. members in this House rise in their place and say that the people in the large centres are parasites and things of that kind, it makes my blood boil. I heard the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) the other evening say something about the party in this corner of the House. What he said about the egg that was only a nest egg, and only a rock at that, rather amused me. I noticed after he had got through that the bird had not even laid an egg. What we want more than anything else in this country is to get on common ground with one another. We in Ontario love, admire and respect, the people in the western provinces. I represent several thousand people in the county of York. I live on the farm myself during the summer months, in a four roomed house and I know something about farming conditions. I have raised as many as eight and nine hundred hogs at one season. I know what it is to grow five thousand bags of potatoes in a year. In my boyhood I have known what it was to hoe potatoes from early morning till late at night. Mr. Speaker, if you go back twenty years and look up the population in the county of York you will find as many of our sons and daughters have gone to the western provinces as are left to look after the interest of our fair county. Thinking of the remark that fell from the lips of the hon. member for Nelson the other evening that he wanted to see the traditions in the back of the heads of the people who came to that country, I can scarcely understand the views that are being enunciated here by that hon. member. I know that the brothers and sisters, sons and daughters, and relatives of the people who left the county of York to go west have not in their makeup such sentiments as have been expressed from the left hand corner of this House.

When the sarcastic laughter came from my good friends to the left I was talking about the exodus of some of the people from our country, and I was saying how sad and sorrowful we felt to see these young people quitting Canada. If hon. members will devote a thought to the city of Toronto and to the number of homes there they will see how important this question of employment is. It will be seen that there are quite a number of people engaged in the building trades there, while a number find employment in the province at large. There are some 25,500 heads of families engaged in the building trades in the province of Ontario and last year they drew in wages $28,470,174.

These people have another grievance which I want to explain as briefly as possible. That grievance is against the sales tax. Now, you may wonder how it is that working men have a grievance against that tax. My reason for mentioning the matter at this time is to afford the government an opportunity of reviewing the situation and providing relief before the budget is brought down. According to the act,—taking into consideration the work of stonemasons, sheet metal workers, and builders,—all work done at the job on any particular building is exempt from sales tax; but work wrought in stone or any sheet metal moulded into shape within a factory or shop is liable to the sales tax of 6 per cent. Now, Mr. Speaker, in a large centre of population like Toronto the municipal, provincial and federal institutions, and the citizens generally, are all urged to do as much work as possible during the winter months. Unfortunately, industries of the kind that I have described find that when they do this work in their plants they have to pay the sales tax of 6 per cent. Consequently, in order to avoid that tax they endeavour to have the work wrought as much as possible on the job. The result is that they will hold back building that necessitates that class of work until the weather permits them to get on the job. Representations have been made to the government for a change in the law such as would meet the conditions of these workers but up to the present time no relief has been afforded. I think I will read to the House, if hon. members will bear with me for a moment a few lines from a letter which one of these large contractors has sent to me on the subject:

> I might say that we have at present a large contract on Trinity College, Toronto, and through some persuasion we induced the architect, with an object in view of keeping our men employed, to have certain woodwork delivered at our factory to be covered with sheet metal. This woodwork could be covered on the building and would come under the heading of erection or installation, but we discovered that by doing this in our factory we were subject to a sales tax of 6 per cent on the labour only, and we made inquiries through the Customs department, and their ruling was that we had the option of doing the work at the building and avoiding the sales tax or doing it at our factory and paying sales tax. In other words, they did not consider the men being out of employment, their business was to collect the sales tax.

Mr. Speaker, conditions in Toronto between contractors and their employees are very amiable. They work together for the good of the citizens to the very best of their ability with the happiest results. I have also a letter from the international representative of the Sheet Metal Workers on the same subject addressed to the Hon. James Murdock, Minister of Labour, Ottawa, Ontario. I think the minister is going to follow me, and I hope he will take a note of this matter. Perhaps he will promise us to-night that some relief will be granted. The extract I wish to read is as follows:

> It has been the policy of our employers in past years to try to get enough contracts ahead, that would keep their regular employees busy during the winter months, by making this work from detail drawings for construction jobs.
>
> If this sales tax is continued on labour in our trade, the results will be, that our employers will stop making this work in the shops and will avoid paying this extra 6 per cent tax on labour, by waiting till the buildings are well under construction, and have all our work manufactured on the job, the results of this will be detrimental to our members, placing 60 per cent of our membership on the unemployment list, for the winter months, and in our opinion will only slightly increase the revenue to the Department of Finance.
> While this will affect our trade greatly, on building construction work, it also affects a number of other building trades unions to a large extent, and I feel assured that in the interest of labour you will take this matter up at your earliest convenience, to the end that this coming session of parliament will amend the act, to apply on material only, so that our members, and many others will not be added to the unemployment list during the winter months of 1924-25.

They received a reply from the Minister of Customs and Excise and also the Minister of Labour. In that reply, according to the document I have in my possession, both ministers evaded the question at issue entirely, and merely quoted for the benefit of the contractors and their employees a part of the act.

Mr. MURDOCK: Will my hon. friend read the reply from the Customs department?

Mr. HARRIS: I have already written for that reply, I have not got it here. If the minister would like me to read another letter from the international representatives of some of these unions denouncing the government in terms a little stronger than I would care to use, I should be pleased to do so.

Mr. MURDOCK: We know there are some Tories amongst them.

Mr. HARRIS: I have a letter here and am prepared to read it for the edification of the House. Perhaps I might furnish the minister with a copy. It is from A. J. Crawford, international representative of the Amalgamated Sheet Metal Manufacturers and is dated February 18, 1924. Evidently the Minister of Labour has had enough.

I was talking about some of the things that are affecting the citizens of Toronto. One of them is the necessity for better custom house accommodation. The exchequer benefited from Toronto last year to the extent of $50,000,000 from customs and excise receipts, and this year the amount will reach $60,000,000. Business men who have to pass their entries are complaining about being kept for three or four hours at a time in order to get their entries through. The facilities are absolutely inadequate for the vast amount of business requiring to be done. I bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Customs and Excise in the hope that they will give it their serious attention and grant some relief to the people of Toronto. I am glad the Minister of Public Works is here to-night to hear what I have to say with respect to the matter. It is an unfortunate thing that we do not get as large an attendance of ministers every day as we should have. Something is always happening to keep ministers away.

The first minister is not present to-night, and no one knows which minister is acting for the Post Office Department. But let me point this out: The city of Toronto yields a greater postal revenue to the Dominion exchequer than the city of Montreal and all the rest of the cities in the province of Quebec combined. Yes, and all the towns in Quebec added to that, all the Quebec centres of population of over 10,000 added to it, and you still have to go some to reach the postal revenue received from Toronto. They speak of this government studying economy and retrenchment, something which I very strongly advocated myself last session and again advocate just now. I ask this government to look into the matter of postal service in our large centres, and endeavour to get back to the pre-war rate for drop-letters, not only in Toronto but in the whole of the Dominion. I am satisfied that the increased volume of business which they would receive would in part compensate any loss the government might sustain in this direction.

I have told hon. members once or twice to-night that I am supposed to do my best to represent 110,000 of the finest people in the Dominion of Canada. I notice in the Speech from the Throne that a redistribution bill will be brought down. I also remember very well that the first minister of the Crown promised this House that that measure would be equitable. I earnestly trust that he is sincere in that, and I sincerely hope the government will give the home-loving people of the constituency I represent adequate representation in this House. I am satisfied to represent 110,000 people in this House, if everyone else will do the same—anything to cut down the overhead in running this country. We can carry on with one hundred men and women in this House, if we will. I would do anything to cut down the excess county councils, city councils and all sorts of municipal bodies which exist at the present time. We have too much legislation. It is costing us too much. At the same time if we are going to continue with 244 seats in this House, if we are going to carry on the programme the way it is proposed, I do not feel disposed to represent 110,000 people in the House, in all fairness to my constituents, because I feel convinced that they possess a degree of brain power equal to that of the people in North York, for instance.

Mr. GRAHAM: Take West York.

Mr. HARRIS: I am quite open to anything the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) will suggest. I am sure the first minister of the Crown when he makes his appeal to some 30,000 people—I do not say that he will be successful at the next election—will not be addressing an audience which is any more intelligent than an audience in East York, representative of 110,000 people. I trust this government will see to it that we have a just and equitable redistribution, so that all kinds and classes of citizens will have more or less equal representation in this House.

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. HARRIS: The hon. gentleman says "louder." I was just speaking about the first minister of the Crown. Some years ago I was in a little village called Bolton in North York. The first minister of the Crown —and I am sorry he is not here to-night— was telling the populace about the great principles of the Liberal party. An old gentleman in the back of the hall rose and said

"louder." No attention was paid to him and a few moments later he again called out "louder." In the middle of the hall was another man who was much older than the man in the rear of the hall, and who knew something about politics and other things in the Dominion of Canada; he rose and said to the gentleman who was calling "louder," "It is all right my friend, sit down and rest yourself. He is not saying anything anyway."

I am absolutely sincere in what I have said to this House, and I believe that everything I have said up to this moment is absolutely true, and it is in the minds and hearts of the people of Canada. If my hon. friend does not think so, I will pass the hat around this assembly and gather enough money to buy a box of cigars; I will place him on a railway train, let him sit in the smoking car, travel from Halifax to Vancouver, and listen to what he hears from the public—and what he will hear on the trains in Canada is from the lips of salesmen, business men, people who are wont to travel, people who in the first essential are optimistic, because otherwise they would not hold down the positions they occupy—and if he can come back to this House and say to us, that the conditions under which the Dominion is operating at the present time, due to the policy of this government in part, are what they should be, or if he can say that 40 per cent, or less than half, of the people he meets are satisfied with the government that is functioning here and now from the treasury benches, then I will give him my seat in this House.

Last session, Mr. Speaker, I suggested to the House that in the interests of the people of Canada we should have a free, frank, open discussion, so that the people could get some idea as to the magnitude and the necessity of the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway, in order that they could express themselves as to the necessity or non-necessity of the work. I was criticized by the hon. Minister of Finance in his budget speech for making that suggestion. I welcome criticism. I did not like to interrupt the minister because I sympathized with his predicament at that time. I realized the strain he was under due to the many duties he had to perform. But let me answer the minister now. I am sorry to have to do it in his absence. The words and sentiments which I expressed last session are now coming to life. The government have faced both ways on this question and now they are facing our way. The Montreal influence must have slackened or been diverted in some way or another; and the government came forward with the announcement that they have made representations to Washington and I trust it will not end up with correspondence only, but that they will put before the people of the country the necessity of this project being put through to a conclusion.

Some of us who do not know a great deal, perhaps, about matters political have been wondering why it is necessary for the first minister of the Crown and one-half of his cabinet each year to go abroad and attend all kinds of conferences, Imperial, economic and labour. I suppose the necessity is there; but with only a population of nine million, with this country scattered as it is, with the differences of opinion and the necessity for all getting together upon common ground and trying to get a definite policy which will be more satisfactory than the present one, in my humble opinion it is time the people of Canada demanded of the ministers a little more of their time at home, a little less travelling abroad, a few more conferences within the Dominion itself, not a hurried conference with Premier Dunning and the member for Marquette, (Mr. Crerar) taking place perhaps in a day or two days, not a case of bargaining or something of that nature, but let us have a big, open conference, let us put all our troubles into the pot, and see if we cannot bring forth a policy which will be more satisfactory than the policy we have at the present time. I like to feel that I can advocate something which not only bears on my own constituency, but something which will work for the general good of the people of the Dominion.

Last year I said something with reference to the province and city of Quebec. I ask you to think of that line of railway which we have lying on our backs, that Grand Trunk Pacific, running across the northern part of that province. I advocated very strongly that our western friends urge the government to do everything possible to have the freight rates from Winnipeg to Quebec city lowered and to have better port facilities provided for Quebec city so that our western friends would have lower carrying charge and better facilities for getting their products to the markets of the world. Some notice was taken of that. I notice that 5,000 cattle were shipped from Quebec to the old country last year. I hope the number will be 15,000 this year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) says: "hear, hear." If the Minister of Labour will stay at home next summer and apply himself to some of those questions, that will be a good thing for the people of Canada. I cannot see where he has given much application to the problems of Canada. I see his name in print now and again. I hope he will explain why it has been in print to the extent that it has been lately. He follows me, so I must hurry on as I want to give him plenty of time and opportunity to reply.

I rather hesitate to speak of conditions and development east and west, because apparently the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) represents western Canada in this House and nobody else is supposed to know anything about it. The hon. gentleman becomes rather amused when a member representing a manufacturing centre desires to say anything about the West. He was amused because the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association had something to say about conditions in the West. Let me tell the leader of the Progressive party that when anyone that I have met in the manufacturing industry hears things which emanate from the lips of western representatives, he is not amused, not very much amused. He sits down as a rule and tries to analyze it. He tries to get some meat from the suggestion and to get on common ground with them and their theories and ideas, and anything that I have ever advocated on any platform in any part of Canada has been along similar lines. We listen to what they have to say. We pay not very much attention to some of the theories that are advanced. We do not like some of the expressions that emanate from that corner of the House. Such things as breezes blowing in the mulberry trees, and the possibility of your pulling away from us make us feel bad. Nevertheless, as regards remarks which have a bearing upon the condition of the whole of Canada and which emanate from the hon. gentlemen who are represented in this group, we try in a sympathetic way to hear your version and we will try to meet you on common ground. We realise that your markets are, perhaps, not all in the Dominion of Canada. There is not enough of a market here to take care of everything that you produce. But we ask you in turn to realise that the industrial centres of population in Canada are consuming a large proportion of your products. An hon. member from the West spoke about parasites. One of our own United Farmers of Ontario said something about "where the carcass lies, there go the eagles," and he was helped out by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) who said: "there go the vultures." Let me tell the Minister of Railways that the vultures in the cities and in other large centres are the sons and daughters of the people who come from the country. We resent those statements. I know the minister was only joking, but such statements have a bad taste in the mouths of the people of the cities.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was correcting a quotation.

Mr. HARRIS: I appreciate that the minister was correcting a quotation, but, incidentally, he was more or less agreeing with the quotation. The Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) quoted Emerson, and although I rather hesitate to do so, I am going to quote Emerson for the information of the House in the matter of vultures and so on. Emerson says:

> Any body politic or otherwise that is wont to follow a policy and follow that policy beyond the realm of the good of the people in any body or any country will find that that policy will turn to carrion, and that carrion will be a stench in the nostrils of the people of that community.

I say to the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher), who is wont to talk about the eagles and carrion, that in the province of Ontario on June 25 last we had an example of what happened when Drury carried their policy so far in Ontario that it became carrion and a stench in the nostrils of the people of that province, with the result that on June 25 his party were put in their place and another party was put in charge. I do not like those expressions. We are all one people in this country. We in the cities are no better than you people in the country. We realize that you are good citizens, but we feel that we are as good citizens as you are. We want to get on common ground with you. We want you to intermingle with us and to help us out in our difficulties, and we in turn will help you out in yours.

In that connection I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment moved to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I support it whole heartedly because I know there are coming into this country at the present time a large number of commodities which can be grown on the farms of Ontario, the good province of Quebec and the provinces of the West. The grain imports last year amounted to $11,100,000; vegetables, $4,800,000; without any rubber. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) will be worrying about the rubber, but there is no rubber in these imports. Fruits amounted to, $26,000,000; nuts, $3,600,000. This makes a total of $45,500,000. If this government feels disposed to impose a tariff against them to raise revenue and incidentally to keep them out of the country, and if the government feels disposed to make us eat rhubarb by keeping bananas out of the country, I say more power to them and I will support them. In this way they will be raising a revenue by keeping these commodities out of the country and incidentally giving more markets for the products which the people who live on the farms are able to produce.

A policy which will help our large centres of population in this matter must be the policy in vogue in this Dominion, if we are going to keep step with the other nations of the world. It is hinted in the Speech from the Throne that the government is going to do something drastic with an industry that has been established here for some time, the agricultural implement industry. Does this government honestly believe that it is doing the people of Canada any service by intimating to this one industry that it is to be the goat for bargaining for the support of our friends to my left? Do my hon. friends opposite not know enough about the agricultural implement business to know that they are only driving the few scattered businesses that are at present working in Canada together into one great combine probably centred in Chicago? In the final analysis, are you not going to pay just as much for those implements if you drive the industry into the hands of one concern? I know some hon. members will be thinking of watered stock and all that sort of thing. There are about 110,000 people in my riding. Upon an analysis of the businesses in that particular riding I find that there is not one which has any watered stock. This talk about watered stock is all humbug. There may be an isolated case of watered stock, but as a general rule there is very little in the business of this country. Furthermore, so far as my own riding is concerned, I do not know of one man who is worth five hundred thousand dollars; nor can I recall more than two or three who are worth more than a hundred thousand dollars. There are more men in this group beside me worth more than a hundred thousand dollars than there are in my riding. Now, these industries are employing a number of very good citizens; they are employing some of our sons and daughters who are a better type of citizens than you could bring into the country by any system of immigration that you may have at the back of your minds. Certainly they are better than the people you could get by the scheme partly enunciated by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Sinclair). These people desire to stay in Canada; but if this government persists in the policy which they have enunciated—as a matter of fact they have not enunciated any policy; they have merely hinted that they are apt to do something in this direction—then I sincerely believe that they will do untold damage to the prospects of this Dominion. I am sincere; I am as sincere as is the hon. member for Nelson. I am sorry in a way that he was so sincere, because I could not agree with his views. But I am satisfied that if the government follow the policy which they hint at they will upset the industrial fabric of this country to an incalculable extent.

As I said at the outest, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend taking part in this discussion; I have merely been filling in, so to speak. There are half a dozen things which I should like to touch upon but I shall have to leave them until a later day in the session. However, let me close for the present with one statement which I think is of general interest to the country. We are ready and are very anxious to get on common ground with the difficulties that our people in the western provinces have, and we ask in behalf of the people in the large centres of population that those of the West shall try to get on common ground with us and help to bring this Dominion to the position which she should hold within this Empire.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I desire to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address on the speeches which they have delivered in this debate. With regard to the Speech from the Throne, there are I think a number of paragraphs which would indicate that the government intend to go at least some distance in the direction in which I myself and some other members in this House would like to see them go. And from the speeches that have come from hon. members to my right it would seem that they expect that the government will travel some way in that direction. Without committing myself to any approval of the Speech in all its details, I will simply say at the moment that we will wait and see what the results will be when the budget comes down. So far as the legislation that will be introduced to the House is concerned, the general tone of the Speech indicates that the government is willing to go a part of the way with us and to give us at least some of the things for which we have been asking for a number of years. I do not know whether this will be considered as bargaining for support or not; I do not know whether hon. members to my right will describe it as dishonourable bargaining. But if the government comes down with legislation which I believe to be in the interests of the country, legislation which we have been asking for, then of course it will simply put us in the position that will compel us to support them. If that is bargaining, hon. gentlemen may so describe it; but that is the position that we shall find ourselves in.

We have before us an amendment which is somewhat vague. There is an expression of regret with regard to present conditions in agriculture. There is the statement that the Speech from the Throne—

> While embodying a distinct threat to an important section of industry, contains no promise of legislation which will tend to retain and enlarge the home market for our own Canadian producers.

That suggests that the mover of the amendment would still further protect our manufacturing industries and in that way give us a larger home market. We have been following that policy in this country for a good many years. It was in 1878 that there was introduced in Canada the National Policy which was going to make this country independent of foreign countries and give our farmers a home market that would make them completely independent of the rest of the world. I have taken the trouble during the last few days to compile some figures with regard to what this National Policy has cost Canada. When criticising the budget of 1921, on May 10th, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), speaking about the reductions that had been made in the Liberal tariff, after the Liberals had come into power in 1896, made the following statement, as may be seen by reference to page 3151 of Hansard of the year I have stated:

> But it must be remembered—and economists, I think, will agree—that the saving you make in a case like that is not to be measured only by the amount that you did not pay into the Customs; you have to take into account also the check that was put upon the rise of prices at home, and that for every dollar saved to the people in that direct way probably two dollars were saved in the difference between the prices prevailing and those which would otherwise have been charged by the home manufacturer.

Taking that as a basis on which to compute what this National Policy has cost us, I find that the total revenue collected as a result of the tariff from 1879 to 1922 amounted to the large sum of $2,310,417,676. If assistance has been given to the manufacturing industries of Canada to twice the extent of the customs collections, it would seem that they have received assistance to a total of four billions. I suppose there are some who will object to that on the ground that in some cases farm produce is protected. However, I will try to show later on that the customs tariff, so far as the farming industry is concerned, is absolutely useless as a means of keeping up prices. In any case, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, and taken in conjunction with the total amount of customs revenue collected in Canada from 1879 to 1922, the National Policy has cost this country four billions of dollars. I cannot help thinking of that fact when I hear hon. members talking about the sales tax and the income tax. Whatever objections there may be to the sales tax and to the income tax, I do not think it means such a tremendous additional cost to the people over and above the actual amount that goes into the treasury as is involved in the tariff. We have heard a good deal of argument with regard to objections raised by people of the West against the continuance of this protective policy. The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Harris) said that hon. members on his side were willing to take the matter up with us and find out if we could not get on common ground. Well it is going to be an exceedingly difficult matter for us to get on common ground if we pay and they collect; if we have to pay this protection while industries centred in Toronto and other industrial communities throughout the Dominion get the advantage. I do not see where there is any equity in that, nor am I convinced that the government can provide for taxation for industrial organizations in any other way. We do not produce any revenue here; we do not create any wealth, and when we follow a policy of this kind we are merely taking money out of the pockets of the people who are unprotected and putting it into the pockets of the people who are protected.

I find that though we have given this tremendous assistance, especially to the manufacturing industries, the total invested capital of those industries in Canada, according to the Canada Year Book of 1921, is just a little over three billion dollars. So it would seem that we have actually, through the operation of the customs tariff, provided them with sufficient to pay the whole invested capital in those industries throughout the Dominion. We have about three billions in manufacturing industries, about two billions in railways and about three billions in the value of farm property. Whatever benefits may have come to any part of Canada from such a policy as this have cost the rest of Canada more than they are worth. You can pay too much for anything, no matter what it is, and I think in this regard we have paid too much for the protected industries of this country. The result has been that manufacturing has got far ahead of what it ought to be. I have before me an article by C. Howard Smith, President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, published in the Canadian Congress Journal for February, 1924. It says:

> Our taxes at present are staggering. Why? Chiefly because of the smallness of our population. Our overhead is too great. We have enough machinery now in Dominion, provincial and municipal governments to govern fifty millions of people, instead of nine. We have enough railways to serve two or three times our population. Our present system of manufacturing, banking, retailing and wholesaling could provide for the wants of many additional millions, with very little additional expense. Our taxes are only high in proportion to our population.

If the manufacturing industries of Canada can only exist behind a large protective tariff, what is the use of having them developed far ahead of the needs of the country? In the very nature of things that result is undesirable. The surplus, if there is any so far as manufactured goods are concerned, has got to go out of the country to compete in outside markets, in countries which in many cases have depreciated currencies, countries which, the manufacturers claim, have large advantages when it comes to manufacturing articles that are similar to those produced in Canada. If they can compete outside of Canada, why not inside? If they cannot compete outside, then they have got to restrict their output to the needs of Canada, and there should not exist a tariff which develops industry far in advance of the needs of the country.

When our farmers were flooding into the West, when there was plenty of free land, the situation was different so far as the agricultural implement industry was concerned. I had some relations with one of the large machinery establishments in the West and I remember the time when a man on the frontier at the end of the railway, selling agricultural machinery to a large homestead area, would sell a tremendous amount; it was stated that one agent sold a quarter of a million dollars' worth in one year. In those boom days, with protective tariffs, and with a large market owing to the settlement of western Canada, the manufacturers went on and made money. Thinking that it was a permanent thing in Canada, I suppose, they developed their industry far in exess of the needs of the country as they stand to-day, and the result is that they are having hard times. We have possibly too many industries; we certainly have too many if they cannot compete outside of Canada. So we are being bombarded to-day with requests for more protection and more help from the Dominion. If with all the assistance which has been given by the Dominion to these manufacturing industries, and particularly by the people who are unprotected, they are unable to stand on their own feet, then I want to say that the policy has miserably failed and the sooner we get away from it the better.

Owing to the financial strength which these industries have attained due to the generous policy pursued by the Dominion, they have been able to hire brains; they have built up splendid marketing organizations, and in a great many cases there has been established complete monopoly of the sale and distribution of the products, which is another thing that enables them to take full advantage of the protective tariff. When anybody says that we can protect agriculture as we have protected industries, I say that we cannot do it. It might be possible, if we got wheat pools in western Canada, or one wheat pool that would control the output of the western farmer, to take advantage of a protective tariff, but we cannot do it as long as we are selling individually as we have been doing. There was a time when we had a monopoly organization marketing Canadian wheat—the Wheat Board of 1919; and the government of that day understood this principle very thoroughly. I have before me Order in Council No. 1589, dated at the Government House, Ottawa, Thursday, the 31st day of July, 1919. It says:

> The board shall have power from time to time:
>
> (a) To take delivery of wheat in Canada at any point.
>
> (c) To sell wheat so delivered to millers in Canada for milling purposes at such prices and subject to such conditions as the board sees fit, the price of sale to millers being governed as nearly as may be by the price obtainable at the same time in the world's markets for wheat of equal value, regard being had to the cost of transport, handling and storage.

That is a provision, I take it, to prevent the board from taking advantage of the Canadian consumers at that time.

The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) who moved the amendment to the Address bewailed in his speech the fact that there was imported into this country during the last nine months of the year 1922 $130,000,000 worth of vegetable products, mainly foodstuffs and animal products. I take it that was a hint to the agriculturist, though it is not very clear, that if the party to the right should come into power they would do something to protect the farmer by keeping out those products. Since that speech was delivered I have taken the time to look up the trade returns and find out what these agricultural, vegetable and mainly food products comprised and the amount imported. The agricultural and vegetable products are divided into groups (a) and (b); (a) is mainly foods and (b) vegetable products other than foods. I will not take the time to read the amount of each article imported during the year ending March 31, 1922, but I have the details here if anyone cares to see them. But the articles that the hon. member for South Oxford apparently would keep out of the country because, as he said, they could nearly all be produced on the farms of Canada, are these: Bananas, currants, grapefruit, lemons, limes, oranges, pineapples, strawberries—I have included strawberries because they are imported into this country early in the season when the home-grown strawberries cannot be had. For instance, on the Canadian National diners you can get ripe strawberries now. They of course, were not produced in Canada. To continue with the list: dates, sago, raisins, olives, cocoanuts and preparations, walnuts, almonds, sweet potatoes, Indian corn, rice, sago and tapioca flour, cocoanut oil, cottonseed, cottonseed oil, olive oil, palm oil, peanut and sago bean oil, sugar, cocoa and chocolate, coffee and chickory, spices, ginger, mustard, nutmegs and tea.

The total amount of agricultural and vegetable products, mainly foodstuffs, imported into the country during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, was $117,346,000 worth, and the total amount imported of the articles that I have mentioned, and which I claim could not be grown in Canada except at a ridiculous increase in cost was $100,770,000, or about ninety per cent. So if the amendment is based on the idea that we are going to keep out by means of a customs tariff these products that are now being imported into the country, it is based on false premises.

Referring to the protection given to Canadian industries I would like to quote a few figures in connection with the distribution of securities issued by joint stock companies engaged in industrial enterprise in Canada, agriculture excepted, as of December 15, 1921. These figures are taken from a pamphlet entitled "Some Economic Needs of the Dominion of Canada," and was submitted to the tenth annnual meeting of the Ontario Associated Boards of Trade and Chambers of Commerce at Hamilton on November 15, 1923. I quote these figures because we have heard a great deal of the cry in western Canada of "Canada for the Canadians—patronize home industries," implying that by buying Canadian goods we would be keeping the money in our own country and be building up the Dominion as against foreign competitors. Here is the grand summary of fifteen groups engaged in industrial enterprises:

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, owing to the cost of this protectionist policy to the country, owing to the fact that we are not able in spite of that cost to build up something that looks like ever being able to stand on its own feet, I believe that the government will take a wise step if it moves away from this policy of protection, and the further away the wiser. I am sure I shall have much pleasure in supporting it if it takes a decent, substantial step in that direction.

There is a reference in the Speech from the Throne to the question of branch railways. I myself am interested in a particular branch railway. I have the good fortune or the misfortune, to represent a constituency that comprises almost one-half the area of the province of Alberta. The railway system that serves that constituency centres in Edmonton and there are three railways, one running to the west, one to the northwest and one to the north. Though in a geographical sense we are tributary to the western coast, to Vancouver and Prince Rupert, owing to the railway system we have developed in the Dominion of Canada we are made tributary to Fort William and Montreal.

I am very anxious to get a railway built that will put a base on the triangle connecting up those three railways running in a westerly and northerly direction from Edmonton—that will connect the Canadian National railway running west to Whitecourt, the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia to Grand Prairie, and other points in the Peace River district to the Canadian National railway somewhere east of the mountains. I may say that this has been a dream of the people who are living north and west of the city of Edmonton ever since they settled that country, and unless we get that railway within some time in the near future the result will be disastrous so far as the settlers are concerned. I think the cry "If we do not get just what we want when we want it we will leave the country" has been overdone. Nevertheless, I have this to say: Although last year we had one of the best crops in the history of the country there are a large number of people leaving the district. Some expect to leave in the spring. It may be that these people are mistaken in their view, I believe they are, but it is a fact that they are leaving. There are settlers in every country, especially every new country, who will not make good under any conditions; but I wish to inform the Minister of Immigration and the Minister of Railways that is not the kind of settlers we are losing. Unfortunately we are losing settlers who would be an asset to any country.

We have heard a great deal about economy in the form of articles and periodicals during the last few months, and the point has been stressed in speeches delivered in the present debate. Economy may be all right if it is correctly interpreted. I believe the expenditure I am urging would be in the interest of true economy. No doubt a great many will say the same thing with regard to their particular requests to the government, but if it is not true economy to bring a large section of Canada, one of the richest producing sections of it, to the seaboard eight hundred miles away, and keep it tributory to the seaboard three thousand miles distant—I think that is about the mileage—then I do not know what economy means. We are dealing with a transportation system, in so far as our settlers are concerned, that is very costly and in order to save the settlers there we want to get the very best railway service that is possible in view of the geographical situation of the district and its resources. It may be said that we cannot afford this expenditure at the present time. but I want to point out that we have in that district the very products that have been furnishing a large tonnage for the railways of Canada. From Edmonton westward to the coast, formerly the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern were in competition but they have been consolidated into one system west of Edmonton to Redpath Junction. To a point 150 miles west of Edmonton the territory is revenue producing, but from there to the coast there is not a large revenue producing territory at the present time. The statement has been made from time to time that in order to make the National Railways pay they must obtain tonnage. Very well, in the territory of which I speak there is a splendid opportunity to obtain tonnage. We have coal, timber and wheat in that area in abundance, and there is the possibility of producing wheat in tremendous quantities. I have here comparisons of the quantities of the total railway freight carried for October, 1923, and October, 1922, on the railways of Canada. I find that the total amounts of products hauled by all the railways, and loaded at Canadian stations, were:—Agricultural 15,751,874 tons; products of the mine 12,353,153 tons; products of the forest 8,695,722 tons; manufactures and miscellaneous, 11,636,183 tons. According to the statement of October, 1923 of the total of 4,205,335 tons of agricultural products, 3,142,953 tons represent wheat; bituminous coal is represented to the extent of 1,006,442 tons out of a total of 1,969,922 tons loaded. When we come to forest products we find there is also a very large percentage of the total loaded in that division Here is a chance for the Minister of Railways to construct a branch that is at present productive and will be for all time to come, that is not a duplication of another system, and that will go a long way towards helping to solve the problem resulting from the lack of business so far as our National Railways are concerned.

I want to say that I am particularly interested and pleased with the showing the National Railways have made during the last few years, and the steady improvement that we have seen so far as those railways are concerned but I think there is a good deal of unjust criticism with regard to the system We find, for instance, there is a duplication west of Edmonton. There are few hundred miles of track there of very costly construction that are absolutely worthless and yet interest must be paid on the bonds. We find that the Canadian Pacific Railway, with all its branch lines in western Canada, after having been established for a number of years has only one line of railway through the barren country north of lake Superior, whereas the National Railways is under the disadvantage of maintaining and helping to pay interest on two railway systems in that region. So that if we have deficits we may attribute them in part to the fact that we have two systems instead of one to maintain. Yet, in spite of that, very satisfactory progress is being made on our National Railways and the showing has improved greatly during the last few years.

It may seem a strange departure to turn from railway construction to the question of railway freight rates, but the province of Alberta, the Peace river country, and the constituency of West Edmonton are very keenly interested in the question of Pacific scale of rates. It has always been argued that the lack of business going west to the Pacific coast was one of the main causes of the high freight rates. The other of course was the stiff grades and the consequent high cost of construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, but the cost of construction has largely ceased to be an argument because it has been practically all paid for long ago. The province of Alberta has been possibly one of the chief shock absorbers of the Dominion, in so far as high freight rates are concerned. It was considered a problem for British Columbia only until a few years ago, but we now realize it is a problem for Alberta also. We had the long haul on what we bought from eastern Canada, and we had the long haul to pay on what we sold, because, of course, we paid the freight both ways. Then if we want to ship west we have the mountain scale of rates on every mile over which we ship. I have here a judgment of the Board of Railway Commissioners of September 15th, 1920. The commissioners in the case were Hon. F. B. Carvell, K.C., Chief Commissioner, S. J. McLean, Assistant Chief Commissioner, Hon. W. B. Nantel, K.C., Deputy Chief Commissioner, A. S. Goodeve, Commissioner, J. G. Rutherford, Commissioner, I find the following passage in the judgment:

> Allowing for the undoubted fact that a very large proportion of the traffic both east and west is on the commodity basis, I am still forced to the conclusion that the rates in western Canada average considerably greater than in the East, possibly around 15 or 18 per cent.

Now then the rates from Alberta west to the British Columbia coast some years ago were 50 per cent higher, and a few months ago they were 25 per cent higher than the prairie rates; and now they are just a little under 25 per cent, about 22 per cent higher. This is the reason why we are so particularly interested in this question. We believe that the high mountain rates prevent the development of traffic in that direction. We believe that we are being assessed an undue amount on our shipments in that direction. While it has been argued that the Canadian Pacific railway had very steep grades over the mountains, that argument cannot be used in regard to the Canadian National railway. Very fortunately the Canadian National has a grade which is not greater than seven-tenths of one per cent, and most of the grade lower than that—about four-tenths of one per cent. I want to say that one reason why I am so anxious to see this branch line I have mentioned connecting us with the Canadian National is that we can ship our traffic over a road which has favourable grades, and that they will not be able longer to use the argument that has been used for so many years for keeping up that specific differential. There may be difficulties with regard to this question, but it is a question that has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction in Alberta.

We have heard a great deal about the question of secession. I may say there are a great many people in western Canada talking about it to-day, and they are not foreigners. I am not anxious to see the West pull away from the East, but I desire to say that confederation can only be justified when it is in the best interests of all the people of Canada. It is not justified as an end in itself. It is only justified as the best means to serve all people in this Dominion. While the Speech from the Throne expresses the desire for corrective legislation that will lead to unity in the Dominion, I say that we can never have real, satisfactory lasting union until we can convince all our people that they are getting the same kind of treatment in the Maritime provinces and in the prairies as they are getting in Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia, or vice versa.

If we are going to have all of the disadvantages and none of the advantages of the tariff, and if our freight rates are going to be possibly, fifteen, twenty or maybe twenty-five per cent higher than they are in some other parts of Canada, and if, in addition to that, we have a bank interest rate that runs about two per cent higher than in some of the more thickly settled districts of the Dominion, I do not know how to convince any intelligent person that the treatment of all parts is equitable. The people in the West are very vigorous in their demands. I am not referring merely to the members. I am glad we have a people that are not satisfied with those conditions and will never be satisfied until they are rectified. I believe that until they get freight rates that are just about the same from coast to coast we never will have anything like real satisfaction or real unity between the various provinces of the Dominion of Canada. I quote from the judgment of the Board of Railway Commissioners dated November 23, 1921, the following:

> In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, they contended that any reduction in rates would probably endanger their chances of earning dividends for the current year. The décision of this Board in the August case of 1920 was referred to, in which it was contended that on account of the strong financial position which the Canadian Pacific Railway has occupied in the business life of Canada for many years past, any rate arrangement should be such as to leave them in a position to earn their dividend of 7 per cent. I agreed with that proposition then and reiterate it here, and, therefore, in arriving at a conclusion at the present time, I am doing so entirely on an examination of the traffic and financial requirements of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

That is referring to the fact that they were not considering the Canadian National. But there is a principle involved here that I claim is very dangerous. I do not know any reason why capital invested in a railway should be more sacred than capital invested in agriculture. The Canadian Pacific railway is not any more needful to this Dominion than the millions of acres of farm land in the country. I cannot think of any reason, and I would like somebody to suggest any, if there is any, why money invested in a railway should be secured by the guaranteeing of its dividends by a board created by this parliament, and the rest of the people have to accept almost any condition, work for nothing but the barest kind of a living, in order to provide those dividends. That is the principle that we will have to face in this Dominion of Canada, and it is one of the things we will have to set right before we can have the unity that is so much desired by all of us in this parliament. We have been in the last few years as a country, developing the grain routes of the Pacific. We have two ports on the Pacific; you might possibly say three. We have Vancouver and Prince Rupert, and I believe, New Westminster claims to be a port. I was glad to read the speech of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) because I did not have the pleasure of listening to him when he put forward his claim for Prince Rupert. That port was selected as a Pacific port by a Liberal government. The Canadian National railways are connected with Prince Rupert. They are not, I believe, at the present time connected with Vancouver, except by an arrangement whereby the Canadian National trains run over the Canadian Pacific railway. I believe the government will do very well to listen to the advice given by the hon. member for Skeena and take steps in the near future to provide money if necessary, to build an elevator there. This may be something that the government may possibly not feel inclined to do at once; but I do not see any reason why they should hesitate, because if we may judge from the Price Waterhouse report, terminal elevators have been paying very well. We do not want government elevators to pay as well as some of the elevators at Fort William according to the Price Waterhouse report, but we believe this is a business that will pay its way and incidentally help our National Railways to be a success.

HOME BANK INVESTIGATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask if the Acting Prime Minister can give us any information to-day about the scope of the commission on the Home Bank?

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister): In reply to my right hon. friend I would prefer, on second reflection, as the Prime Minister gave the undertaking for the enlargement of the scope of the investigation, to hold the matter over until he returns, which will be in a few days.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Sutherland resumed from Monday, March 10.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with those other speakers who congratulated the mover (Mr. Kelly) and the seconder (Mr. Lapierre) of the Address. I particularly feel pleased to congratulate the hon. gentleman who comes from the same section of the country as I do, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) on the honour that has been conferred upon him asking him to second the Address. At the same time, I must confess that he is not here through any fault of mine. May I add, that I join in the sympathy that has been expressed to those ministers and others who are sick and absent from the House at this time.

Mr. Speaker, the debate on the Address is usually made up of speeches dealing with the subjects brought up in the Speech from the Throne itself. As very many subjects are touched upon, one is not at a loss to deal with any one subject; but after having read the Speech of His Excellency a number of times I have come to the conclusion, that it is made up of four main types of clauses: First, clauses of double meaning and intent; second, pious hopes for the future; third, promises of better conduct; and, fourth misstatements of fact. I do not intend to make this statement without offering some proof of what I say.

In regard to clauses of double meaning and intent, one has only to read the clause regarding the St. Lawrence waterway. I notice in the papers that those who are opposed to that scheme view that clause as an encouragement to them, while those who are supporting the scheme have taken it as of some encouragement to themselves.

As to pious hopes for the future, these appear in the references to stabilization of freight rates and the cost of living. This cost of living question, like King Charles' head in writings of poor Mr. Dick, pops up every now and then.

The government's promises of better conduct deal with estimates and expenditures, and the misstatements of fact deal with past economies and the prosperity of the country. In regard to past economies, I think most members of this House would have to delve pretty deeply to find them. One case I might mention, and that is the appointment of a new Auditor General at a salary of $15,000, a position for which a salary of $6,000 was considered quite sufficient in the past. I have nothing whatever to say regarding the gentleman who was appointed, because I presume he is a most estimable gentleman, but in the past $6,000 was considered ample salary for the position, and I think one would have to reverse the telescope to find how that innovation was helping in the direction of economy.

In regard to prosperity, the Prime Minister has put into the mouth of His Excellency in the Speech, and mentioned again in his own address, as have some other members who have spoken, that marked prosperity exists in Canada to-day. Well, Sir, I am unable to discover it. I have been in many towns and cities in Canada, and I have heard the discussions here in which members from the farming sections in this country have participated, and I have yet to discover where there is real prosperity in the Dominion of Canada at the present time. In fact, I think that what we have at the present time is mainly dissatisfaction, discontent, and unrest.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The "whisper of death."

Mr. MANION: Yes, that comes from the dissatisfaction that exists. Sir, I should like to ask, what is the matter with Canada that these conditions should exist? Here we have a magnificent country, a country with all the attributes of a great nation, a country with a population so small that it is practically no population at all compared with the area of the country. When you compare the magnificent area of this country with that of the United States, where they have 110,000,000 people and room for as many more, while we have only 9,000,000, and compare it with Europe where, leaving out Russia, they have some 300,000,000 of people while we have only 9,000,000 in double the area, one wonders why this condition should exist in Canada. Then, when you take into consideration our vast resources—our minerals, our fisheries, our timber and pulp and lumber interests, our millions of acres of fertile land, and all the other resources which we have—one might well ask himself, why should these conditions be as they are at the present time? It is true that the Prime Minister offered an explanation of these conditions. According to my recollection he mentioned that one of the causes was the fact that we had appointed a great many civil servants, and another of the causes had something to do with the Intercolonial railway. May I say here, Sir, that I do not like discussing the Prime Minister's speech in his absence, although I am going to do it. I do not like to do it when he is not here, but it is not my fault that is is strolling up and down the Boardwalk at Atlantic city instead of leading the House. Furthermore, he will have the opportunity finally to reply if he chooses to do so, because he can speak again on the amendment which has been offered.

I wish to indicate what I think are the real causes of the dissatisfaction and discontent in Canada at this time. To my mind there are three main ones: First, high taxes; second, the broken promises of the Prime Minister himself; third, the destructive tariff legislation which is strangling the industrial life of our country, which is indeed strangling our country as a whole. Sir, I shall endeavour to elaborate those three causes and that shall be the total of my speech, although that elaboration may occupy some little time.

The fact of the high taxes requires no elaboration. Everybody in this country knows that we are suffering from a tremendous burden of taxation. The very fact that this government has realized at last that we are suffering from taxation is proof enough that everybody else in the country knows it. Economy, Sir, is imperative in this country. Everybody admits that, and I am very pleased that in the Speech from the Throne there is some promise of economy. That is sufficient for the elaboration of that subject; it needs no further amplification from me.

In regard to the broken promises of the Prime Minister, that is a subject I shall deal with at a little more length. I think in that regard the Prime Minister has made a record. When you compare him with any other public man we have ever had in Canada he certainly has made a record, in breaking promises if he has not in making them. It seems to me, Sir, that in the case of broken promises his appetite grew with its indulgence. And then at times, when he did not find promises were sufficient, he appointed commissions. He has already appointed I do not know how many commissions. I made an attempt to-day to find out how many commissions have been appointed by this government in the two years in which they have been in power. One prominent gentleman in this House guessed there were a dozen or more. I have been endeavouring to ascertain the number myself, and I shall just mention three or four which come to my recollection. There was a commission on questions affecting the returned soldiers; a commission on the rates charged by steamships; a commission on pulpwood; and a commission on grain. Those are four prominent commissions, four large and expensive commissions. The pulpwood commission is still sitting, and the grain commission is still sitting; and I am informed by an authority high up in the Department of Trade and Commerce that the grain commission is costing this country to-day—and it has been sitting for a long time—something like $800 per diem. But, not satisfied with appointing so many commissions in the past, I notice that in the Speech from the Throne we are promised two more.

I remember, and you will remember, Mr. Speaker, you who are a student of French history, that just before the French Revolution, when the people were crying for bread, I think it was Marie Antoinette said "Give them cake." In Canada when the people are crying out from the distressing conditions which prevail the Prime Minister says "Let us give them another commission." It is true that revolutions have not been popular in Canada, but I venture to make this prophecy —that when the opportunity next comes to the electors they will bring about such a political revolution as will put my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his associates in the wilderness from whence they came in 1921.

Now, Sir, just to specify three or four broken promises of the Prime Minister,—because I do not wish to make statements which I cannot prove: In the first place, the Prime Minister promised to the soldiers of this country that they would get better treatment than we were giving them. He travelled from Halifax to Vancouver, and he promised them that they would get very much better treatment. He implied that we were treating the soldiers badly, and he promised that if he was given power he would grant them relief. Instead of that—so far as I can find out, and I say this in all sincerity—since this government has come into power the soldiers have found that the strings have been tightened very much more than when we were in power in every possible way, and to my mind it has been more difficult for the soldiers to get the justice which is coming to them. From end to end of Canada, on that ground, there is a dissatisfied feeling amongst the soldiers of this country.

Then there was the second promise which I mentioned, that in regard to the cost of living. That was a favourite cry with the Prime Minister. He played many a tune upon that instrument. He blamed us for the high cost of living. Instead of the cost of living going down since the Prime Minister came into power it has gone up. In fact, living is so difficult to obtain for the working men of Canada that they are emigrating at the rate of fifteen or twenty thousand a month. I got the following figures from the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the index price figures for a series of years. The index figure for wholesale prices for 1913 they put at par, which was 100. In 1920, when there was a general boom throughout the world, the figure reached its very highest which was 243. In 1921 while our government was still in power the index figure dropped 72 points to 171. This government came into power in December, 1921. In 1922 —too soon for any effect from their actions, if any blame is to be attributable to them for an increase in the cost of living, or if they are to be given any credit for relief—the figure dropped to 152 from 171, a drop of 19 points. But in the last year, that is in 1923, the first year for which they can really be given credit or discredit if they are to be held responsible for the condition of affairs, the figure again rose to 153. So that the cost of living has not been reduced to the working people as was promised to them.

There was another favourite cry of the Prime Minister, and he was greatly assisted in that by our genial friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), in regard to doing away with combines, trusts and mergers. I can almost hear the Minister of Labour still striking that note, which he struck so often during the campaign, on "combines, trusts and mergers." The people were told that we were linked up with them. Hon. gentlemen opposite said they were going to show the people what they would do with combines trusts and mergers when they got into power. Well, they got into power, and it is true that last year they brought in legislation to deal with the matter, but that legislation is now pigeon-holed, so far as I can understand, and it will be a long time before it will be withdrawn from its hiding place.

Mr. MURDOCK: You need not think it is pigeon-holed.

Mr. MANION: If it is not pigeon-holed the minister has done nothing with it so far as I can discover.

Mr. MURDOCK: It is functioning perfectly.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps it has not been pigeon-holed, it has been dropped in the waste-paper basket. The Prime Minister in his speech the other day brought up the question of these combines, trusts and mergers, and criticized us for not having taxed "the profiteers." We were blamed for not having sufficiently taxed the men who had made fortunes during the war although they still had those fortunes when hon. gentlemen themselves came into power.

Mr. MARTELL: They were all Tories.

Mr. MANION: All the more reason why the Prime Minister should have gone after them if he was sincere in his proposition. I am quite sure if he were convinced they were all Tories he would have done so.

Finally there was one other favourite promise, and that is all I shall mention of the broken promises of the Prime Minister. That is in regard to responsible government. That was a particular hobby of the right hon. gentleman. I can remember well sitting in this House in 1920 and 1921 and listening to his speeches in which he abused us, like so many thugs, for being usurpers of power, for doing away with responsible government in this country, for violating the fundamental principles of democracy, for practising a colossal crime upon the people of Canada when we did not have a proper mandate from the people. I remember well those speeches. And yet at that time we had a majority I think of thirty in the House of Commons over all the existing parties. And to-day the Prime Minister is in a minority of two or three.

An hon. MEMBER: Four.

Mr. MANION: He is in a minority of four. Under these circumstances, since he is such an apostle of responsible government, I should think it would be his duty to carry on during the session, bring down all necessary legislation, and as soon as possible go to the country and get a proper mandate from the people or let someone else get it. But, instead of doing that, he simply goes on promising new legislation of whatever kind he thinks will bring votes. The other day he leaned across to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), leader of the Progressives and told him if only he would give him his support, he would bring down legislation which would be satisfactory to him. He first attempted apparently to persuade the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Not having succeeded in doing that he approached, as a last resort, the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) at the present time. And a rather amusing thing it was to me, after the Speech from the Throne had been delivered, and almost before the ink was dry upon the paper, the hon. member for Brandon hurried forward, almost with indecent haste, to assure the Prime Minister that he need not fear any embarrassment from him. I do not know that there was any need of such assurance, there certainly was not in this section of the House.

These are some of the promises which have been broken by the Prime Minister. I might go on for some hours if I wished, mentioning other broken promises, but these were outstanding instances. There was a veritable flood of promises, but a veritable damming back of their fulfilment. It was a case of running away from them and dodging them, ever since the Liberal platform of the Liberal party was framed in 1919. It was a veritable retreat from Moscow, a rout; but the Prime Minister should remember that after the retreat from Moscow came Waterloo; and he should also ponder over the fact that that other great political general who made promises which he did not carry out, Mr. Drury, is spending his time on his farm.

I think you, Mr. Speaker, who have read British literature, will remember Dicken's famous character, Mr. Micawber. He was a delightful ne'er-do-well, always in debt; and when pressed by a creditor he would give a promissory note which he never intended to pay, and then would sit back complacently in his chair and say, "Well, thank God, that debt is paid". The Prime Minister reminds me very much of Micawber. When he is pressed by the Progressive party he gives them another promise, and as they hasten forward to accept it with an innocence that Bret Harte would describe as childlike and bland, he sits back with Micawber-like complacency, and says, "Thank God that account is settled". I venture to make the assertion that Micawber paid as many of his notes as the Prime Minister will ever fulfil of his promises. Sir, because of this continual changing and veering around the policy of the present government might well be described as an advancing, retreating, sidestepping, wabbling vacillating, vote-hunting policy. There has been a change with every breath of popular feeling so much so that their policy reminds me of a southern politician, a great statesman, who at one time made a speech to his constituency and concluded in this way; "Gentlemen, them is my principles, but if they don't suit you I can change them." Is it any wonder that we have from one end of Canada to the other, discontent, dissatisfaction and unrest? I do not think so.

Now, I intend dealing with the third cause of unrest, which is the destructive tariff policy which is strangling our industrial life, and indeed strangling our country as a whole. In the Liberal platform of 1919 free trade was practically promised to the people of the country. However, as that was put forward for the purpose of getting the farmer vote, and did not succeed, it was one of the broken promises which I did not mention before. After the Liberal party came into power it is true the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), in 1922, did make a few reductions in the tariff, and also promised my hon. friends to my left that this was only a beginning. I remember his words. Then in 1923, a year later, he came forward with a few more reductions. But, Sir, he was struck with the fact that he was performing a dangerous feat, and he made a speech regarding this question. I am going to quote his (Mr. Fielding's) words, because they are worth quoting at this time. He said that stability of the tariff was needed if we were ever to get satisfactory results and were to have prosperity in the country. On May 11, 1923, just ten months ago to-day, Mr. Fielding said—

> There is a thought which does not receive as much consideration as I think sometimes it should be given in public discussions, and that is the desirability of something like tariff stability. It is desirable that something like an assurance of tariff stability should be given to business men. Exceptions will occur. There will be cases where, in the interest of the consumer, reductions in the tariff ought to be made. But the conditions to which I refer are exceptional. Speaking broadly, it is possible to give the country a reasonable assurance of stability of tariff. Such assurances are very desirable, for no business man would care to enter upon enterprises which may be brought into peril by frequent tariff changes. The tariff as it will be when the changes proposed to-day come into effect will be a moderate tariff and probably as low as the country can afford to have under present conditions.

Later in his address he said:

> Subject to the exceptional conditions such as I have mentioned I think the country should be content to accept the tariff as it will now stand as one as fair and reasonable as can be prepared under all the circumstances, and business men should be able to carry on the various enterprises without the fear of being soon disturbed by further changes.

Those are the remarks, Sir, of the Finance Minister of that day, and by the way he is still Finance Minister of Canada, but despite that fact, and despite the fact that he is sick in bed, the present government comes forward with a Speech from the Throne which is a betrayal of the Finance Minister—not only a betrayal of that minister, but a betrayal of the industrial interests of this country, because a sigh of relief went up from the industrial concerns when they were promised some measure of stability.

Mr. MARTELL: Did not my hon. friend in 1911 support reciprocity, which is going further than the government propose to go?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I supported reciprocity in 1911, but I must confess that as I grow older I get more wisdom. That is twelve years ago. I remember well at one time Lincoln was asked if he had not taken a different stand at that time than he took the year previously. He said "Yes, I have taken a different stand to-day from that which I took last year, and any man who is not wiser to-day than he was yesterday is not much of a man."

Mr. MARTELL: The fruits of office may change a man's opinion.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is not receiving much of the fruits of office.

Mr. MARTELL: None at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the hon. member not allow the Prime Minister the same privilege?

Mr. MANION: Not on such short notice.

Mr. LOGAN: Not according to Lincoln?

Mr. GRAHAM: The conversion is almost instantaneous.

Mr. MANION: The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) might agree with me that when a man changes his opinion he should acknowledge it, but when the Prime Minister changes his opinion he stands up and tells us he is in the same position as he was last year.

And, Sir, if I may continue, this betrayal of the industrial interests of the country is being carried on in spite of the depression which exists, in spite of the exodus from this country, of fifteen or twenty thousand per month of our finest young men. To hold the knife of the free trade guillotine above the necks of the industrial leaders of this country cannot lead to anything but dissatisfaction and unrest, and it is leading to that condition.

I shall now name five different industries that have been affected. The woollen industry has been seriously affected. A number of the woollen plants are idle. The Perth woollen mill, which ran along for forty-five years from the introduction of the National Policy in 1878 till this year, is now closed down for the first time. Then the boot and shoe industry is suffering from the same condition. They are suffering from the increase in the British preference, from the depreciated exchange of Britain, and from the fact that the price of labour is about half the price in Britain than it is in Canada. So that they are practically being pushed out of business.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Prime Minister said the other day that they would not be affected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, he did not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very slightly. I am not Prime Minister. The hon. gentleman seems to be a prophet at short distance.

Mr. MANION: The increase in the British preference affected them; at any rate, they are being affected just as the other industries in the country are being affected. Then we have the farm implement industry in such a position that it is going to be ruined. I hold in my hand a statement from one of the financial papers regarding the Massey-Harris Company, which is one of the largest farm implement manufacturing companies in Canada, and it shows, Sir, that they sustained a net loss last year of $22,448, and now this industry is going to be wiped out altogether. Coming a little nearer home, there are two industries in my own city which are vitally affected—the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) would be easily able to identify them—by the present cuts in the tariff. One of them—I do not intend to name either of them, because I have not their permission to do so—was an industry which in my city was employing some 300 men; and has a plant in eastern Ontario employing about the same number. Both these plants, and perhaps others for all I know, are closed at the present time. I have it from the leaders in that industry that by a very slight change in the tariff, or a very slight change in the sales tax, they could go on as they did for very many years in my city and in that eastern town, and supply the prairie provinces with their product. Then, I was on the train the other evening and I met an old friend of mine from the home city of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. He is the travelling head of one of our big corporations. As he has a plant in Fort William I asked him how business was, and he described how they were running at present on half time. He pointed out that they were being driven out of business not by British or by United States competition, but by French competition, because the French franc is down to about three or four cents; French labour is probably even cheaper than the British; and the duty on the product is so low that it allows the French product to come in and beat them. I have a great respect for the French people, indeed I have a love for them; but I have much greater love for the Canadian people, and I do not believe it is fair that our Canadian industries should be driven out in favour of French industries. That same company wrote me as I communicated with them asking for details. I have under my hand their letter in reply, in which they point out that while in Canada. they cannot compete with the French industries, they are running at a loss of about four dollars a ton on their product, operating on half time, and continuing in business for the sole purpose of holding their organization together in the hope that perhaps this government will come to its senses and give them some relief. This same product is now being manufactured and sold in the United States at a price on the basis of which this company could sell and make money; and that is because in the United States they have sense enough to protect their own industries. So here are five industries which illustrate my point—many others could be mentioned, but I think I have dealt with enough to serve the purpose.

The fact remains that no industry in Canada to-day is safe. No industrial leader knows when he is going to be slaughtered and thrown to the wolves to keep this government in power.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend is a long way from power, though.

Mr. MANION: Not nearly so long as the hon. gentleman is. Sir, would any sane man invest his money in an industrial plant in Canada under these circumstances? Would any sane man who has control of foreign capital think of bringing it into Canada and investing it? The answer is so obvious that it is not necessary to state it.

Canada alone of all countries is talking of adopting free trade. Do my hon. friends from the prairie provinces believe that all the wisdom of the ages has been extracted and passed out to that part of the country? Do they think that other nations with the exception, we will say, of Great Britain—and I will touch upon that in a moment—have no wisdom; that this little country of nine million people should think of lowering tariffs while all others deem it necessary to have protection? Why, Sir, even England made very great progress under protection. England did not have free trade until 1846, and when they adopted free trade as their policy it was after they had built up an immense line of manufacturing plants and an immense capitalistic system which enabled them to compete with and oust practically any manufacturing country in the world. Then, and not till then, did England think of adopting a free trade policy. When she felt that she could hold her own market because she could undersell any other country and because other countries had not achieved the stage of development that she had, then she proposed free trade. Cobden, himself a manufacturer, prophesied that within ten years every country in the world would adopt free trade. If every country had done that it is altogether likely that England would have profited by her free trade. As it is, she had received such a momentum under protection, she had built up such an organization under protection, that until a few years ago she was profiting very highly by her free trade system, underselling as she was, many other countries. The very act which she brought into force at that time and under which raw materials and foodstuffs were admitted into England cheaply, so cheaply that she could get them at as low prices as any other country in the world could, was in a sense the very best protection she could give to her manufacturing industries which were then so highly established. That, then, was the attitude of England. Now even England has adopted some of the protectionist system that we have in her key industries act. It is true that in a recent election she defeated protection, but I venture to assert that if Mr. Baldwin had taken three months instead of three weeks to educate the people of England away from the free trade policy which has prevailed in that country for eighty years, he would have succeeded, to England's very great benefit.

As it is—I mention this because the case of England is so often flaunted in our faces—what are the conditions in that free trade country? I do not know any country where the conditions are worse at the moment. There are about two million unemployed, and that means eight million who have nothing with which to buy their food. The people are emigrating from England even faster than they are emigrating from Canada. The case of England appears to be one which it is well worth pointing out to my hon. friends to my left. Some of them take the attitude—I do not attribute it to all of them—that the only wealth produced in Canada is that produced on the prairie farms. Well I submit that the man who takes the raw leather and turns it into boots and shoes is just as much a creator of wealth as the man who raises the animals from which the leather was taken. I submit, further, that the man who takes the wool and turns it into woollen goods, also the one who carries the operation further and turns the woollen goods into clothing, is just as much a creator of wealth as the man who raises the sheep. Furthermore, the manufacturer who takes the wheat and turns it into flour is just as truly a creator of wealth as the man who grew the wheat from which the flour was made. It is a point worth remembering, because after all we do not wish to destroy any source of wealth in our country.

If you look over the commercial history of the world you will find that all great commercial countries have been built up under protection. I have shown how England did it. At any rate, even if we lay England aside for the moment, the United States, Germany, France—all these countries were built up under a protective tariff. Germany and the United States were rapidly overtaking England and had indeed surpassed her in many branches before the war.

Mr. FORKE: Does the hon. member not think that under different circumstances we might be in a happier condition than we are to-day? He appears to be perfectly satisfied with everything, but things do not seem to be so good.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is drawing a conclusion which I do not think he has any right to draw. I am not satisfied with everything; I am trying to offer, as I shall before I have concluded, some ideas the adoption of which would, in my opinion, bring about an improvement of conditions in Canada.. My hon. friend has a right to his opinion just as much as I have to mine, but I say with all due respect that I do not think that his low tariff proposals would improve conditions; I am convinced that they would rather materially hurt conditions in this country.

I was going to say that before the war, Germany, which did not really come into the race until about 1870, had under a highly protective system outsold Great Britain and was outselling her in ten of the most important countries in Europe, including Russia. And, by the way, speaking of wealth for a moment again, I should like to refer to one point which I omitted to mention, to show that all wealth is not from agriculture. Various factors besides agriculture go to the production of wealth, and there is no doubt about the fact that England's wealth has not been agricultural; England's wealth has been produced by her manufacturing industries, her trading, and her shipping. England is indeed the least agricultural country of the important nations of the world. Now, Canada resembles the United States in most aspects —in area, in resources, in climate, and in people—more than she does any other country on the globe. Is it not, then, more sane and logical that we should copy the system of that country in our endeavour to build up the Dominion of Canada than that we should emulate the methods of two little islands on the outskirts of Europe which have an area of about 120,000 square miles, and which together could be placed three times in northern Ontario alone, between North Bay and the Manitoba boundary?

I agree with the attitude taken last night by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Kellner); in this regard the hon. gentleman's view is only in keeping with that of Mr. George Langley. My hon. friend from East Edmonton declared that it is not the tariff that is killing the agricultural industry of the western provinces. Let me quote from the words of George Langley uttered a short time ago. He is a representative farmer and public man, and I do not think that he needs any introduction from me to my western friends. George Langley says:

> I do not regard protection as an economic damnation. If we are going to protect our manufacturers, we should protect our farmers, and to help the farmer something definite should be done in respect to transportation.

The hon. member for East Edmonton took exactly that attitude, but I was sorry to see that my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) was of an entirely different opinion.

Mr. HOEY: That is East against West.

Mr. MANION: Well, the fact is that their views on this question are diametrically opposed. The hon. member for West Edmonton states that if the industries of Canada, after the years of protection that they have had—and it may have been only a period of ten years, for that matter—were not able to compete with the rest of the world, it was time that they were allowed to shift for themselves. That is in essence the statement he made. Well, suppose the farmers of the West, after suffering as they did in past years from drought, and after exerting their best efforts for years to make good, found themselves in such a condition that they could not buy seed and were forced to come to whatever government might be in office at the time and ask for assistance, as they have had to do in the past! Suppose, under those circumstances, that government should say to them: "You have been farming long enough now and if you cannot make a success of your business you had better cease operations; you will have to go to the wall."—what would any hon. gentleman say to such an attitude on the part of any government in such a case? Why, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be nothing but un-Christian and un-Canadian. By the same token, the attitude of the hon. gentleman from West Edmonton, in regard to the industries of this country, is both un-Christian and un-Canadian.

Now I wish to bring to the attention of my hon. friends to my left a point which, I think, is of some interest. What is the promise which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made that has immediately reached to the heart of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressive party? The gist of that promise was that farm implements would be put upon the free list; at least, that is what anyone would readily infer.

Mr. FORKE: I never said so.

Mr. MANION: I know my hon. friend did not, but the Prime Minister did.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. MANION: Well, the Prime Minister did not say so in so many words. He is usually in the habit of putting his thoughts in such words that one may draw any conclusion from them that he likes. But in this instance everyone has inferred, from what the Prime Minister has indicated, just what I have stated. Certainly, the inference has not been denied in any part of the country, namely, that farm implements will either be put upon the free list or have a fair reduction made in the duties upon them. Personally, if I were a farmer from the prairie provinces, after my past experience of the Prime Minister, I should be afraid to base any hopes upon any such promise. Nevertheless, as I say, that is the conclusion which everyone draws; and I submit, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Hocken) last night, that if that is not the intention of the government it is time that they indicated to the people of the country just what they mean to do; because the makers of farm implements in Canada are in a quandary; they are absolutely in a state of depression, and in fact this business is practically closed up and will remain so until the budget comes down in three or four months' time. Now, what would the cut in farm implements amount to? I made it my business to look into this question and I found that the imports of farm implements into Canada during the last fiscal year amounted to $4,500,000. The duty on that was $680,000. The farming population of Canada is 4,000,000. So that the per capita tax on farm implements last year on the whole of the farming community in the country was seventeen cents. That is what my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has offered as a sop to get the western vote. I must confess it is a rather cheap price if it is intended to purchase votes. I do not say this offensively, but in the Old Testament we are told that Esau sold his birthright for a mess of pottage; it would be a poor mess of pottage that anyone would buy for seventeen cents.

Mr. WARNER: The hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Kellner) is not here, and my hon. friend has made a comparison which in my opinion is not quite fair. Does he not think that it is a little unfair to compare the conditions brought about by nature with conditions over which men can exercise some control?

Mr. MANION: I should like to answer my hon. friend's question, but to be candid I do not see his point, and as I am anxious to proceed I shall ask him to pardon me if I do not discuss the question. I was going to point out that the total duties collected last year in the whole of Canada amounted to $133,000,000. That represents $14.50 per head, and if you allotted every farmer of the prairie provinces his share of that, I do not see that it would put the prairies in any more prosperous condition than they are in to-day.

Miss MACPHAIL: Do all the farmers of Canada live in the prairie provinces?

Mr. MANION: No, they do not, and I am glad that, by implication, my hon. friend agrees with me. I shall deal with that aspect in a moment. Let me now come to another point. The prairie farmers have not suffered, by reason of any duties levied on farm implements, in the last ten years. For this, I have the word of the leader of the Progressive party who said in his speech that for ten years not a prairie farmer has bought a farm implement at all. Yet, when the Prime Minister offers to take the duties off farm implements, the hon. member immediately jumps into his arms.

I am sure that my hon. friends to my left will agree with me, if they will look fairly at the question, that the fact that the conditions in the West are bad has nothing to do, or practically nothing to do, with the tariff. The real reason for present conditions in that part of the country is to be found in world conditions; in the transportation situation; long distances and high rates make it difficult for the farmers to get their products to market. Furthermore, marketing conditions in general would largely affect the situation. These conditions, in my opinion, have very much more to do with the state of affairs in the western provinces to-day than has the tariff.

I remember reading once an opinion of Macaulay's, that if there was one type of taxation which was least productive of benefit to a country, it was robbery. I submit that if there is one method by which you can help any industry and which is least productive of benefit to the country, it is the destruction of another industry for the attainment of that purpose. And that is what is proposed in the Speech from the Throne; that is what will, no doubt, be proposed in the budget that is to be brought down. We are to ruin some sections of the East in order to save the West; and in any case the saving in my opinion is only imaginary.

Now I come to the point raised a moment ago by my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail); the farmers of Ontario and Quebec must be considered. There are two million people in the prairie provinces. These are not all farmers, but for the sake of argument we will say that they are. But there are more than two million farmers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and they are all dependent, almost wholly, for the sale of ninety per cent of their products upon the industrial centres of the East. Would it be a fair proposition to ruin these two million farmers of Ontario and Quebec in order to succour the two million of the prairie provinces, even if the sacrifice of the interests of one community would be beneficial to those of the other community?—Which I claim would not be the case.

Mr. MARTELL: What about the Maritime provinces?

Mr. MANION: I like the Maritime provinces, although from some of the interjections that are being made I wish they had kept some of their representatives at home.

Mr. MARTELL: They never change their opinions.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, everybody realizes that the West is in a bad way; no one realizes it better than I do because I am right on the border. But so is all Canada in a bad way. My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Harris) yesterday well described the condition of some manufacturers, friends of his, in Toronto, who had lost in two or three years all that they had made in forty years.

An hon. MEMBER: Without whining.

Mr. MANION: "Without whining," is added by some hon. gentleman. But, Sir, all the business men in the towns and cities are suffering from the same depression, and I defy any hon. member to contradict this statement. Therefore while I am ready to do everything I can in a reasonable way—and I am sure all my hon. friends in this section of the House are equally ready—we are not ready to ruin the East to aid the West.

Mr. WARNER: May I ask the hon. member another question?—perhaps he will be able to see through this one. If the tariff was increased would not the difference be passed along to the consumer?

Mr. MANION: That is questionable. I do not admit that all the tariff is passed on to the consumer at the present time. Let me ask my hon. friend a question: Suppose a Canadian farmer had a farm just south of Morden, in Manitoba, one-half of which was in the United States, and he raised a thousand bushels of wheat on the Canadian half and another thousand bushels on the American half of his farm. The price of wheat is a little higher in the United States than in Canada; but there is a duty on Canadian wheat going into the United States. Suppose, further, that he wanted to sell his total production in the United States, who would pay the duty on his Canadian wheat, he himself or the consumer on the other side of the line? I submit it would be the farmer.

Mr. WARNER: No. I do not think my question is answered, and I do not think the counter question applies.

Mr. MANION: I did not expect to satisfy my hon. friend. I was not trying to do so, I was trying to show my own side of the question.

Mr. HOEY: Will the hon. gentleman admit that protection is no advantage to the United States producer in his own country?

Mr. MANION: I do not admit anything of that sort. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that protection may not increase prices at all, but it may prevent another country from dumping its surplus products into the protected country, and that is what happens in Canada to-day. Any manufacturer in the United States manufactures on a large scale for 110,000,000 people, but very frequently at the end of the season he has some surplus goods on his hands, and rather than carry the surplus over into the following year he tries to dump it on the Canadian market, and, if he were permitted, he would put out of business the Canadian manufacturer by underselling him, and thereupon proceed to recoup himself out of the pockets of the Canadian people by raising his prices. But, Sir, we do not need to go outside Canada—

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Is it not true that some of our own manufacturers are doing the same thing with goods that they ship to the British market?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I have heard it stated that they do.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Why should we protest against dumping if we are doing it ourselves?

Mr. MANION: I am not protesting; but I do object to the foreign manufacturer doing it to us if I can help it. I would not object to my hon. friend hitting back at some man who hit him, but I would object to his hitting at me without reason, and that is what every foreign manufacturer who dumps surplus goods on our markets is doing. I do not blame him, but I do not intend to let him do it if I am awake and can prevent him. The attitude of my hon. friends to my left, in view of the action of the United States government just recently in raising the duty against our wheat, is very peculiar to me. I think it is a most humiliating attitude that we should remain quiescent while the United States impose tariff duties of all kinds against us, a little country of nine million people while they have a population of a hundred and ten million. They are imposing various high duties against the farmers of this country, and the group representing the farmers of the prairie provinces stand here and say: In return for the United States hitting us on the right cheek let us turn our left cheek to them for another blow.

Miss MACPHAIL: Will the hon. gentleman admit that it was the manufacturers of Canada who made it possible for the Canadian farmer to be discriminated against by the United States?

Mr. MANION: I do not think the manufacturers of Canada have had anything to do with it. I think the Canadian manufacturer has been the cause of many of our farmers in the past having been in a very prosperous condition. But I was pointing out when I was interrupted that my hon. friends to my left take a most humiliating attitude in turning the other cheek. Two thousand years ago—and I say this not in any spirit of blasphemy—the greatest Christian of us all advocated turning the other cheek, and He was crucified. I have no doubt that my hon. friends will get the same treatment from the American business men at the first opportunity that presents itself to them.

Mr. FORKE: Would my hon. friend carry the analogy to its conclusion and say who will be the final victors?

Mr. MANION: Again I am afraid I do not understand the question.

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): If any man to-day advocated remedial measures, would he not be crucified too, and in less than the thirty-three years that it took the people of His day to crucify the Man of Nazareth?

Mr. MANION: I hope not, because I am offering remedial measures myself. Knowing my hon. friend as I do, I am quite sure he has no intention of trying to crucify me.

But, Mr. Speaker, the free trade policy was not such a panacea for the economic ills of this country when we had it. Let any hon. member look at the speeches of our public men describing conditions in Canada in 1878, before the national policy was brought into force, and he will find in the debates of that year a statement that when the Prime Minister left the door of the House of Commons conditions were so bad that he was met by a hundred and fifty hungry people who begged him for food or work. That was the state of affairs under practically a free trade policy. Yet the hon. leader of the Farmers' party (Mr. Forke) stated the other night, that we have suffered now for fifty years under protection, and it is time to change the policy. I do not know that it has been all suffering; I think we have had a fairly reasonable amount of progress, and I shall try to prove it. I admit that we have not had the progress that the United States has enjoyed, we have not had the progress that most Canadians would like their country to have had, but we have had a fairly reasonable amount. Let me give a few figures, although I do not like to encumber Hansard with too many statistics. In 1881 we had under acreage less than two and a half million acres; in 1921 our acreage was twenty-three million acres—ten times more than in 1881. The value of our field crops in 1901—I could not get any earlier figures—was $194,000,000; in 1921 it was $931,000,000. The value of our mineral production in 1881 was $10,000,000; in 1921 it had risen to $172,000,000. The total domestic exports were $84,000,000 in 1881, as compared with $1,200,000,000 in 1921. Our wood, paper and wood products were $25,000,000 in 1891, as compared with $284,000,000 in 1921. The life insurance in force was $103,000,000 in 1881, as compared with $3,000,000,000 in the latter year, while the deposits in our banks were $94,000,000 as compared with $2,300,000,000. Now, can any hon. member say that that is not progress? If he has the temerity to do so, then I do not understand what he desires. I repeat, I should like to have seen greater progress, and I am sorry that to-day instead of progressing we are retrogressing. For this lamentable condition I blame the government to a great extent. Sir, when a physician is called in to treat a patient who is in an anaemic, run-down condition, it is his duty to administer building-up remedies in an endeavour to reconstruct him. But the government, which is the physician of this country at the present time, instead of using building-up remedies for the depressed, run-down condition of the nation is using the antiquated remedy of bleeding. In fact, Sir, it is doing worse, it is trying to save one section of the body politic by amputating another—it is trying to amputate the industrial section of the state.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend permit me a question?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend will allow me to finish, please. What is still worse, it is amputating the legs of the body politic by inches.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend, who was a minister in the late administration, is a medical practitioner, and I understand that the medical world has not yet been able to discover a cure for cancer. Is not the attitude of this government to secure a remedy for the cancer left by the late administration on the country?

Mr. MANION: I might reply to my hon. friend that if industries are a cancer, that is correct. But I do not consider that industries are a cancer.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend was speaking medically.

Mr. HOCKEN: Don't put your foot in it again.

Mr. MANION: The strange thing about the attitude of this government is that they are taking that attitude in spite of the fact that two-thirds of those on the government side—I will not include my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Martell)—are protectionists. In other words, they are placing power before principle; if principle interferes with power so much the worse for the principle, and if the country interferes with power so much the worse for the country. Their attitude, in other words, is, not to relieve the West but to get their votes; and that to my mind means the ruination of this country.

Now, Sir, I am finishing and I intend to say what I consider to be the proper remedy for the conditions that exist. I know it will not appeal to my friends to my left; I do not expect to make many converts, but I believe just as sincerely in this policy as they believe in theirs. I believe that what we need in this country is a reaffirmation of the old National Policy. We need a constructive, protective, national policy for all classes of the people, a policy which will develop the resources of Canada, a policy which will retain the home market for the Canadian people, a policy which will build up a broader national life and give greater opportunities to the youth of this country, to the sons of farmers as well as to the sons of other people, and here I might just say that no class of people have done better in the industrial centres than the sons of the farmers, or their forebears, who to-day argue for free trade. We need a policy which will protect us against cheap labour, not only of the Orient but of Europe at the present time. We need a policy that will protect us against dilapidated exchange, because the exchange situation in Europe is in such a shape to-day that any country can send in its goods over our tariff barrier. We need a policy which will protect us from foreign industry, and by foreign industry I mean any industry outside of Canada, because I am a Canadian first, last and all the time. Are we to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the American and the British people? Not if I can help it, not if my word will have any effect on my people. I believe in keeping Canadian markets for the Canadian people.

Just one word in closing—and I certainly should not mention this if the Prime Minister had not mentioned it—and that is on the question of national unity. That is a favourite theme with the Prime Minister. I do not criticize him for that, but at the same time I do not think it is necessary for anybody in Canada to be continually assuring the people that he desires national unity, I do not know any decent citizen of Canada who does not desire national unity. I may say to my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that I am sure he would not question my attitude on this question, because I have given him and his confreres a very practical demonstration of the fact that I desire national unity, and as a result my three little boys speak the French language with the same facility that they speak English. Perhaps he would pass that on to the Prime Minister, and may I suggest that the Prime Minister might do a very great service to his country if he would follow my example.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree with that part of your speech.

Mr. MANION: To my mind the best way to bring about national unity is to bring about national prosperity, and the best way to bring about national prosperity is to bring about a national policy that will build up all sections and develop the resources of the whole country, so that we may build up on the northern half of this continent a great Canadian nation.

Mr. WILLIS KEITH BALDWIN: (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to use so much of the time of this House that the Upper Chamber, which has been quite lavish in its recommendations, can take any offence. Personally I am not going to follow the see-saw path that has been followed in this House during the last few days, but in my later remarks I shall broaden out and speak more from the national point of view.

I do not think anything has been said in this House that was more popular than when the leader of this government said that he would try to bring the East and the West together, for that is something every true and patriotic Canadian wants. We all want to see the East and West brought together and to have this Canada of ours one great united country.

I would remind the last speaker (Mr. Manion) that he was mistaken in one of his remarks. He made the remark that prior to 1878 there was a free trade party in this country. I wish to tell him that the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was the Liberal leader in 1878, and he had a duty of 17½ per cent ad valorem straight on almost everything. Then the hon. member went on to liken us to the antiquated party. I remember the time of confederation very well. I was quite active in the battle of 1878, and when a man says that there was a free trade party, he really knows better. No one in the province of Quebec has proclaimed since confederation that the Liberal party is a free trade party. The hon. member makes no acknowledgement that he has been corrected.

The very vigorous member for East York (Mr. Harris) last night made a great mistake in speaking of the Grand Trunk Pacific as being in the northern part of the province of Quebec. He must be almost oblivious of his geography, if geography he studied in his boyhood days, to make such a statement, for a glance at the map will show that more than nine-tenths of the province of Quebec lies north of that railway.

I believe that every man who has spoken in this House in the last ten days has had something in his speech that was commendable. I am going to handle the leader of the opposition very gently; I am not going to get into any big fight with him at the present time, but I will just mention one little thing. He went up and down this country until about eight months ago condemning this government, and no bigger charge did he make against it than that they had searched the world and then put Sir Henry Thornton over the National Railways. I do not believe I am making any mistake when I say that he was near the city of Toronto, and perhaps near the Albany Club, when he was told to come off his perch and stop talking about the man who was big enough to handle the great National system of railways. At all events, I have not noticed in the newspapers that he has made any derogatory remarks about Sir Henry Thornton since then. It is a mighty good thing that people do change their minds sometimes. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) who preceded me talked about a revolution. I do not see any cause for a revolution in this country. There is a process of evolution, and unquestionably things are evolving. An hon. gentleman opposite representing one of the Toronto constituencies gave us an outline of what we might expect to see happen in this old world in the course of a few decades. Things are evolving all around us continually, and a person who cannot see what is happening, not merely in Canada but in the world at large, is wholly lacking in conception.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been hammering away at the leader of the government on wholly fanciful grounds. After the Halifax by-election they made the wires hot with imaginary stories of the alarm he felt at the result. Do we see any manifestation of alarm on the part of the Prime Minister or the members of his government? No, we see nothing of that character. What we do see tends to reassure us. The Prime Minister called Messrs. Dunning and Crerar from the west to consult with them as to the needs of that part of Canada. That was not an evidence of alarm, but the Tory press—that press which is keeping the country ablaze not only by "whispers of death" but by misrepresentation—claimed he was calling these gentlemen down for the purpose of giving them positions in the cabinet. The truth of the matter is he was seeking needed information from them in the public interest.

Dealing with the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition in the present debate almost every sentence was pungent with sarcasm. I do not propose to answer the right hon. gentlemen, I prefer to deal with the conditions in the country. We have a great and glorious land, such as no other nation on the globe possesses. If we take an inventory of our national resources what do we find? Look at the great province of British Columbia, the second in size in this Dominion. There you find lofty mountains, fertile valleys, and a wealth of timber and minerals. So extensive is that fine province that as my hon. friend the member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) said there was room for empires in some of the valleys in his constituency. We pass eastward and we reach the great province of Alberta with its rich and fertile lands, and the chinook winds which render the climate so mild in winter. We pass on to Saskatchewan and there we find the same rich plains, the same fertile lands, and also enormous deposits of coal and oil. There is no question at all of the wonderful richness of those provinces. Next we reach the province of Manitoba and, like the other prairie provinces, it has been richly endowed by Providence. Next comes the province of Ontario with its enormous wealth. It has gold and silver and nickel mines, and we are told that it even has platinum and radium as well. Its industries are very great and very varied, and the area of its land is immense. Then we come to the greatest of all the provinces, Quebec, with its more than four thousand miles of water line for a border. In that province too there are wonderful natural resources, and like Ontario it possesses mines of great richness and extent. There is no doubt that the mines of Quebec and Ontario, in the course of a decade or two when fully developed, will make our public debt pale into insignificance. I would like to see certain people who get rich, I will not say by what means, and who go to the southern states to squander their money, remain in this country and help to develop the great central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Surely it would be far better for these people to spend their energy, their money and their time in this land of ours which is so worthy of all the attention we can bestow upon it.

Coming to the Maritime provinces, we find great timber limits, vast areas of minerals, almost inexhaustible fisheries, and fertile fields and valleys. I well recall one beautiful summer evening when I crossed the straits of Northumberland to that beautiful little gem of the sea, Prince Edward Island. I said "This is the most beautiful spot I have yet seen in this Dominion". We arrived at Summerside—it was a beautiful evening in the month of August—and as we rode through the country we saw well kept buildings and evidences of prosperity on every hand. My companion said to me "I would like to enter the homes of these people and then I should learn the last word in human happiness and contentment." I said "You need not enter these homes. Go to the New England states and there you will find out what the people from these Maritime provinces have accomplished. Or you may go to western Canada as I have done, and see there people from the Maritime provinces occupying positions of responsibility in every city and every town." I should like to make one recommendation to the people of the Maritime provinces. It is that they should yoke up, marry, have one legislative home. I do not make that suggestion because of their insignificance geographically as compared with the rest of the country. If they lack anything in area they more than make up for it by the brawn and brains of their people. But my story is not yet finished. Think of the great Yukon territory, of the wonderful country in the Mackenzie district, the Franklin district, Baffin's land in the archipelago to the north. If the latter were brought down and attached to Hudson bay, it would make of Canada a huge territory extending north and south for two thousand miles and east and west for three thousand five hundred miles. Is not this wonderful country which I have described such as to make every Canadian proud of the land of his birth or of his adoption?

We may look for great developments in the future through the medium of our waterways. If we glance at the extreme southwestern portion of the province of Ontario we find that this area is more than one-half water. It seems hard to believe that some day we shall have navigation from the head of the lakes down to the Rainy River district, down the Winnipeg river to lake Winnipeg, and through the Saskatchewan river to the foot hills of the Rockies. This may seem a dream to-day but the future will witness its realization. Let me tell the hon. members of this House that instead of spending so much time fighting we should apply ourselves with all our energy to developing this great country of ours. The waterways we are so fortunate as to possess will ultimately prove the agents of great commercial prosperity in Canada.

We have the greatest inland waterways of the world, from the eastern point of Quebec to the head waters of lake Superior. It is very nearly halfway across the continent, and I am strongly in favour of the deep waterways scheme. This proposition may not be acceptable to a great many hon. members here, but I believe in it thoroughly. I believe that Montreal will ever remain the metropolis of Canada because its great social, financial, religious and industrial advantages will keep it in that position. It is quite within the possibilities of reason that within a very short time a boat drawing thirty feet of water will be able to go from the Atlantic to Montreal, and there is a possibility that Montreal will be a twelve months' port. A certain engineer made a statement in the press that he could dam the straits of Belle Isle and thus provide communication between Newfoundland and the mainland. I remember some eleven years ago in the gulf of St. Lawrence there was a collision with a Norwegian coal boat, and some 1,100 Canadians went down. Now what is thirty million dollars compared with 1,100 lives? It is nothing. If the damming of those straits would warm the gulf, it would improve the temperature of the Maritime provinces, and would put the St. Lawrence in such a condition that boats could run to Montreal the year round. I am somewhat older than many hon. gentlemen in this House and I can remember that when the great Canadian Pacific railway was under construction we were told that the revenue from the road would never pay for the grease used on the axles. But that prediction has proved to be false; so that the man who predicts to-day is considered as a man without discrimination. There are many things we become hazy about.

If we had a twenty-foot channel from Montreal to the head of the lakes it would be very beneficial, because undoubtedly they could not use the lakes more than seven months of the year, while Montreal would be a port for twelve months. There has been great opposition to this scheme, but I think there is no justification for the opposition and that the scheme would be of great benefit. From Calais, Maine, to Florida they oppose the St. Lawrence route. It would be of enormous value to twenty or thirty of the middle or western states—the northwestern states especially. There seems to be a fear that if this waterway were constructed the United States would monopolize it, and that we could not control our own country and its destinies. Why, Mr. Speaker, does anyone believe for one moment that if the United States furnished the capital for the great undertaking it would be any different from any other undertaking at the present time? There are many such undertakings, the Carillon dam proposition, for instance. They have spent some twenty million of dollars on one—on the Grand discharge undertaking. Does anyone think Canada is in danger because an American put up half the money for this enterprise? Does anyone fear that such an undertaking as the deepening of the St. Lawrence river would destroy our country and our unity and injure our future? I consider it would be a grand advertisement for all Canada and especially Montreal.

I come, Mr. Speaker, from a section of country called the Eastern Townships, twelve or fifteen counties, some 100 miles from the island of Montreal. Someone will ask me, "Why are you interested?" Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it would be impossible to expend on the island of Montreal, or in that district, hundreds of millions of dollars without creating an immense benefit to the city and the Eastern Townships as well. It would mean the employment of thousands of workmen. The expenditure of money means employment and a benefit to the whole country. If a person is so narrow as to believe that you cannot develop one part of the country without injuring the other, it is a great pity; and such a belief savours too much of parish politics. If we are to have a country like the great nation to the south of us, unquestionably we must develop our resources. The attitude of opposition to this scheme is beyond my comprehension.

In regard to the exodus from Canada, I think no one is more responsible than the late government. In the case of the great republic to the south of us, were they afraid of immigration? No. They received all those who came, and people came from the great centres of Europe, because they had no chance in their own country, and they hewed out homes for themselves, and many of those people who went to the States with their belongings in a little tin box many years ago are among the greatest men of that great republic. Let us remember that, for the sake of the development of the country, when a bill is brought before us we should not turn it down simply because the project does not come into our district. We cannot have a great Canada without developing our vast resources, and if these resources are developed, they will pay our public debt.

An hon. gentleman yesterday mentioned a subject very dear to my heart. I have spoken upon that question in this House several times, and a gentleman who was once in this House, but who is now in the Ontario legislature, Mr. Keefer, was very much interested in it. He had been down in the British West Indies, and other islands and had seen the great resources of the country. I may say that within my day the United States have made great accretions to their territory, through small wars, through diplomacy and a few dollars. They have enlarged their outlying districts to nearly double their former size. In the British West Indies the people speak English, French and Spanish about equally. They have got the products that we require, and, instead of buying them from those countries, we have been buying a hundred million dollars worth of produce through concerns in the United States.

I saw an article stating that we had not lived up to an agreement in regard to refrigerator boats to the West Indies. At the period I mention we were buying a hundred million dollars worth of goods from the United States in tropical and semi-tropical products. They were paying the West Indies six cents for an article and selling to us for fifteen cents. Instead of going direct to that country and buying the goods from them, we are buying through the United States. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) brought that point out specifically yesterday. I was very proud of him, because he is conversant with the situation. We need their products and they need ours. We are a manufacturing country. We have the waterways and we have a means of communication with them. You will have observed that it costs practically nothing to transport logs by floating them down a great river. I have a friendly feeling toward that country which, once a little Crown colony, has now attained the status of a dominion—Newfoundland. Newfoundland should be linked up with Canada, and this could be done with the joint approval of the Mother Country, Newfoundland and ourselves. Indeed, the matter had at one time almost come to a head under the regime of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the proposal being that Newfoundland should enter the confederation on condition of the payment to her of eight millions. An hon. member shakes his head, but that is as I understood it. In that country they have wonderful deposits of iron and coal right on the waterway to which I have referred.

Mr. CARROLL: How would my hon. friend cope with the ice conditions?

Mr. BALDWIN: It has been suggested that ice-breakers be used on the St. Lawrence river so that it would be kept open. That is where the bridging of the straits of Belle Isle would come in; it would keep the ice floes from coming through the straits into the gulf, and through the influence of the gulf stream in the north the ice conditions would be further minimized. Now, the best sense in the world is common sense. The greatest school is the school of observation. Would it be beneath the dignity of those in charge of the affairs of this country to make overtures in this matter? What is this parliament for? Is it simply a debating society? Is it a place wherein a fight may be carried on to determine who shall hold the government benches? One of the finest acts of diplomacy that could ever be attributed to a public man in Canada was that of the making of overtures to the West with a view to the building up of this country. An hon. member across the way laughs. Well, there is an hon. gentleman in front of him who said there was a revolution on in this country, but I do not admit it. There is, however, evolution; many things are evolving. Compare the situation in Canada to-day with that in the United States when the slave traffic and slavery led up to a division between the North and the South and a consequent civil war. It has been said that the nineteenth century was the century of the United States and that the twentieth century would be the century of Canada. Well so it was; Canada was getting along splendidly when along came the terrible world war. Canada did her part; the world recognized Canada as a great country in training 600,000 men and sending them to the front. We have an enormous debt, but we are big enough to pay that debt; we are big enough to shoulder the burden. It is said that many of our people are leaving and going to the United States, and in this connection I may point out that the figures submitted by the leader of the opposition showed big, because thousands of those who go across the border and pay their head tax of $8 return within six months and are paid back their money. The people I would like to keep at home are the capitalists, they should go into Quebec and Ontario and open up some of our great iron mines. Look at the iron deposits that are found in the states bordering this country; look at their vast wealth. We want those men here; we do not want them down there squandering their time. We have a white population in Canada; in the United States they have 12,000,000 negroes—a question of no small account. They have had a great many lynchings down there, a condition which is a disgrace in a civilized country, and which, I presume, they are getting away from.

It has been stated in this House that the people in the West find it difficult to make a fair realization upon capital invested in farm properties. As I said last year, it would appear that both the old political parties are responsible, to the extent of about fifty-fifty, for the expending of $20,000,000 on the Hudson Bay railway. I have said in this House that if the Hudson Bay railway could be put into operation by the expenditure of four or five millions, I was in favour of it. I represent one of the largest manufacturing counties in this Dominion. No less than three of our greatest industries are located in my county—the great Dominion Textiles, the Union Twist Drill Company, the only whip factory in Canada, and scores of other manufacturers. Now, any such expenditure as I have mentioned, in any part of this great Dominion, reflects itself in my own county. I am in favour of the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. The right hon. leader of the opposition seems to think that he will have an opportunity pretty soon of going before the people; let him come to my constituency and discuss these matters. I doubt, however, whether his expectation will be realized. I believe that this session will continue to its ordinary conclusion and that we shall have two more sessions before the federal elections come on. I would ask the leader of the opposition whether he believes that if an election took place within two weeks or two months, any larger group would come back to this House than is here now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not on that side.

Mr. BALDWIN: No, and not on his side. The people of Canada do not forget. Some man goes into the pullman with a box of cigars and treats the men in there; and, as is only natural, there are people in this country, as there are in every other country, who are subject to brainstorms once in a while, and the result is that this man obtains the consensus of opinion of the whole Dominion right in that little smoker. I did not intend to make these remarks, but as the speeches of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) are always more or less tinged with sarcasm, I thought it only proper that I should make some observations this afternoon. I think that, instead of indulging in partisan criticism, the representatives of the people in parliament should come here and direct all their energies and their eloquence to the enunciation of a policy that will promote the interests of their own communities and of the country at large as well.

I see a great and glorious future ahead of this country. The twentieth century is going to be a great one for Canada, although the last ten years of the first quarter have been rendered rather frustrate as a result of war and war conditions. But this country, notwithstanding these conditions, will prosper, and in my opinion Canada will grow to be one of the greatest nations on the face of the earth. This, however, can be possible only if our people will throw off their coats and roll up their sleeves and get down to work. What I am most interested in is to see a diminution in the public debt. If we had not the railway octopus to grapple with, we should no doubt have been in a fairly good position today. Some people believe in the principle of nationally owned railways, and no doubt our railways will be a tremendous asset to Canada if the present government remains in power. I do not think that there could be found a greater business man, from the point of view of ability and experience in his own particular line, than the president of the Canadian National Railways, Sir Henry Thornton. Sir Henry Thornton has said that he will make the roads self-supporting in two or three years. I believe he will. That being the case, what better outlook do we want from the standpoint of our railways? All we need to do is so to manage the affairs of the country that we shall be able to make it possible to build branch lines to serve growing communities who are far from any means of transportation at the present time. What we want in this country is optimism, not pessimism; we do not want everlasting fighting in the House, for that is injurious to the interests of the whole country. It does not matter so much what any prime minister says; what is of importance is what the government does. And in justice to the Liberal party, this being only the third session of the present administration, is it not reasonable, sensible and businesslike that they be given a chance to administer the affairs of the country in the way a great board administers the business of an important organization? No one has ever heard of directors fighting around the board; if they did, they would soon cease to function as a body. We are placed here in trust to assist in the administration of the affairs of this Dominion, and we are neglecting our duties as representatives of the people so long as we fail to help the government, by advice and counsel, as far as we can. And the country will never prosper so long as men with the ability and the eloquence of the leader of the opposition continue to devote that ability and that eloquence to purposes other than those which will promote the interests of the people as a whole. We must give up squabbling merely to see who shall sit on the front benches. I promised when I began, Mr. Speaker, that I would not detain the House at any great length, and although there are many other matters on which I should have liked to touch, I shall bring my remarks to a close for the present.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Victoria, Alta.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate as it has progressed, and I am sure that others will agree with me when I say that one can come to no other conclusion than that conditions are not as they should be in Canada to-day. When we members of the West presumed last year to speak on immigration we were described as apostles of gloom. But if our utterances at that time were open to such criticism, I would ask now, what must be said of the very dismal picture that has been so graphically presented to the House by many hon. members, whom I will not name but who have taken part in this discussion? If we have come to the conclusion that something is wrong, then I think we have reached the point from which we may be able to make some progress.

It seems to me that altogether too much time has been consumed in this House in the past in an attempt on the part of both of the old political parties to shoulder the blame upon each other for the conditions as they have existed in the country. During the last two sessions in which I have been in this House we have listened hour after hour to the representatives of one party trying to fasten upon the other party the responsibility for railway conditions and other unfortunate circumstances in Canada at the present time. Suppose we could definitely settle who was responsible in any of these matters, would it put us any further ahead? We should still have our present problems to solve. In my opinion, therefore, as we have all been more or less responsible for conditions as they are, we should try to forget the past and should resolve henceforth to devote our time to a solution of the problems that confront us. This is what we shall have to do if we hope to move in the right direction.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) on the sentiments he expressed the other evening when he suggested that a political revolution was taking place in this country as elsewhere. I heartily endorse what he said on that occasion. I want to say that we from Alberta—and I can speak only for that province—are sent to this House not for the aggrandisement or the promotion of the interests of any political party, but for the purpose of co-operating with other members, no matter from what part of Canada they come, who have at heart the best interests of the country as a whole and are anxious to see its affairs properly governed. Our friends to the right are very fond of throwing taunts at us; they tell us that we are selling our birthright to the government. Let me inform hon. gentlemen that if ever they occupy the seats of government in this House—so far as I, at least, am concerned, and I think I can speak for the other members of this group—if they bring down anything that we consider in the best interests of the whole of Canada, they will get our support as readily as the present government. When we look back over the history of the world we see that conditions have always been changing, and we realize that the Great War, without parallel in its extent and reaction, has brought about conditions very difficult to meet. In connection with these new conditions, I was particularly struck by an article which I read a short time ago in the New Leader from the pen of Ramsay MacDonald, who is very much in the limelight at the present time as Prime Minister of Great Britain. While not in sympathy with proportional representation, he has this to say:

> All that is necessary is that we should adapt our minds and our methods of parliamentary organization to the new conditions.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the most promising suggestion which any leading statesman has yet presented for the future political development of countries enjoying the British parliamentary system. Discussing what proportional representation might bring about Mr MacDonald writes:

> The first effect will be to loosen party bonds. Members, while holding generally to party principles and conceptions of policy, will more frequently than they do now use their own judgment as to how to vote. Parties themselves may have to change, and whilst increasing their propaganda and educational work in the country, will rule in the House of Commons more by their administrative success than by party force, whilst the legislation that will be carried will have to be more in accordance than it now too often is with public desires outside and the course of debates inside. This will tend to curb the partisanship of parties and make them, like cabinets, more public servants than public dictators. This can be put in another way. It will weaken organization, but strengthen reason; it will make ministers more the instruments of the general will than the captains of party horse. On balance, that will be good, but the working of the system will call for more intelligence from the democracy.

Now, world conditions have changed to such an extent since the Great War that new methods are needed to meet them, and yet we as a people are still adhering to old-time methods. A review of the history of the world shows that with the advance of civilization our system of government has had to be changed from time to time to meet changing conditions. To-day I feel sure we have got to make another step forward in order to cope successfully with the difficulties which confront us.

New times demand new measures and new men.
The world advances, and in time outgrows the law
Which in our fathers' time seemed best;
And doubtless after us some better scheme
Will be worked out by wiser men than we,
Made wiser by the steady growth of truth.

I congratulate the government upon having at last, after wandering about for two sessions, found the long-sought chart and compass, and I trust they will now be able to navigate the ship of state to the port of prosperity.

5 p.m.

I was much interested last week by the address of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) in which he described the scenic beauty and natural resources of the peninsula of Gaspé, and I would detain the House for a moment while I deal with the area and potentialities of the province of Alberta and the achievements of its people. Our province stretches seven hundred and fifty miles from north to south, and its breadth from east to west varies from a hundred and eighty to four hundred miles, with a total area of 255,280 square miles, or 163,382,400 acres—an empire within an empire. Allowing for areas covered by lakes and rivers and the rough land of the eastern slope of the Rockies and other waste districts, we are still left with 82,810,400 acres that can be easily converted to profitable agriculture. And yet we find to-day that only ten million acres are under cultivation. During the past year we produced in that province 167,265,084 bushels of wheat and our total production of all grains was over 305,000,000 bushels. During the past twenty-six years we have had an average yield of 19¼ bushels of hard and 20¼ bushels of winter wheat per acre. At the Chicago International Show our farmers, in open competition against the world, carried off the following awards: In 1920, nineteen prizes and two championships; in 1921, thirty-two prizes and four championships; in 1922, thirty-six prizes and three championships; and in 1923, forty-three prizes and four championships. The results achieved have convinced us not only of the volume of grains and grasses capable of being produced in our province, but we are convinced that these stand head and shoulders above those produced in any other province or state on the North American continent. When I add that those results have been achieved by a population of less than 600,000 people. I think hon. members will agree with me that those people have every reason to be proud of their success. Year by year we realize more and more that there are no bounds to the production of wheat within Alberta. While mixed farming forms a very important part of our agriculture in that province, yet it is patent that the cultivation of wheat is the principal money-producing crop, and will continue to develop to a greater and greater extent as the years go by.

Apart from agriculture, we have vast coal and other mineral resources. It is estimated that the total coal reserves of the province exceed one hundred billion tons, comprising 87 per cent of the coal areas of the Dominion, 72 per cent of those of the Empire, and 14 per cent of those of the world. I hope a solution of the transportation problem may be found whereby the coal of Alberta will be hauled to Ontario at a rate which will make it possible for the people in that section to use and thus save over one hundred million dollars now paid annually to the United States, for this money would be distributed from one part of Canada to the other in labour and other costs and to this extent help us to pay our debts, particularly in the West.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have abundantly shown that we have the ability to produce in Alberta. But what are the handicaps we are laboring under? While I may have to present a sectional viewpoint in this connection, my opinion is that what affects one part of the Dominion adversely is bound to react to the prejudice of the whole country. We in Alberta are situated on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains. We have a longer freight haul than any other part of the Dominion for our produce going out and for all the commodities that we use coming in. Now nature never intended that to be so. We find that while the Rocky mountains lie between our province and the Pacific ocean, nature has provided a pass through these mountains, and our National railway traverses them on a gradient of less than half of one per cent for the greater part of the distance, with a maximum of only seven-tenths of one per cent for a distance of some twenty-eight miles. Yet we find that we are denied that natural outlet for our products. While a reduction of tariff will have a great effect, and will no doubt help us in many ways yet I am forced to this conclusion, that one of the greatest handicaps the people of the West are labouring under to-day is the transportation difficulty, and I am sure that there is nothing this government and this parliament could do for western Canada that would give that section of the country a greater measure of satisfaction than the equalization of freight rates as between the East and the West.

To give you an idea of the conditions we are labouring under in regard to freight rates, if you take eastern Canada at a basis of 100, the freight rates over the prairies will be represented by 120, and of British Columbia by 135. If you are going to adopt the principle of apportioning the freight rates according to the cost of construction or operation, then let us adopt that principle for the whole of Canada. When you take into consideration that the earnings on our roads in the West have greatly exceeded the earnings in the East, we are not prepared to admit that the cost of construction and operation in the West are greater than in the East. Let me give you these figures. From 1907 to 1911 the net earnings on the eastern lines amounted to $43,500,000, and on the western lines to $91,500,000, or $48,000,000 more in the West, or 110 per cent greater. From 1912 to 1916 the net earnings in the East amounted to $60,000,000, and in the West to $152,000,000, or $92,500,000 more in the West, or 154 per cent. From 1916 to 1920 the net earnings in the East amounted to $70,000,000 and in the West to $144,500,000, or $74,000,000 more in the West, or 105 per cent. In 1921 the earnings in the East amounted to $11,000,000 and in the West to $30,000,000, or $19,000,000 more in the West, or 157 per cent. Is it any wonder there is dissatisfaction in the West under this treatment?

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction in all parts of Canada to-day. We hear rumblings from the Maritime provinces, from central Canada and from the West, and certain members in this House seem to be of the opinion that we from the West are whining for some special favours. I should like to say to this House and to the people of eastern Canada that we from the West are not asking for any special favours. We are simply asking for equal opportunities, and we shall never have unity in this country unless it is founded upon a spirit of justice and equality.

In shipping our goods to our natural outlet we have what is known as the mountain rate, the export rate, and the domestic rate. For instance, we have an export rate at the present time from Calgary or Edmonton to Vancouver of 22½ cents per 100 pounds of wheat. The domestic rate is 42 cents per 100 pounds. I have tried to get some explanation from our freight experts and others in this country as to the justification for this domestic rate, but up to the present time I have not been able to find anyone who could give me any justification for it. We find that there is no domestic rate on wheat in eastern Canada, and the result is that a farmer in the West shipping two loads of wheat to Vancouver, if he ships one load to a Chinaman, and the Orient is taking a great deal of our wheat to-day, it pays an export rate of 22½ cents per 100 pounds, whereas the other load, if it is shipped to a fruit grower or a chicken farmer in British Columbia or to one of the mills there, has to pay the domestic rate of 42 cents per 100 pounds. We are evidently favouring the Chinese farmer in our freight rates, and enabling him to raise his eggs cheaper and flood this country with Chinese eggs to the disadvantage of our Canadian producers. Yet we are supposed to have a railway commission to deal with such matters.

When we come to the tariff it is a question that the two old parties have fought over in this House for the last forty years and it is still about where it started. We know that the tariff has been a political football ever since confederation, I want to disabuse the minds of any hon. members of the idea that we farmers are here to put our manufacturers out of business. I do not think there is a farmer in the West who wants to see that happen. We realize that we must have manufactures in this country, but one industry cannot be built up at the expense of another, and it seems to me that the only solution of this question lies in getting together in a spirit of co-operation and endeavouring to settle this question on a strictly business basis. Only by acting in that way shall we improve our conditions.

Another great handicap we labour under in the West is the matter of credit. I do not stand before this House and say that we want more credit in the West, but just as Great Britain came to the United States a couple of years ago to make arrangements for refunding her debt, over a long period of years and at a low rate of interest, so we in western Canada to-day are simply asking you to put us in a position where we can fund our debts into one loan and spread the payments over a number of years, thereby giving us a chance to meet our obligations. We are not asking for more credit, nor is any man trying to get out of the responsibilities he has assumed at the present time, but we want to make it possible for our people to pay their debts. We see what the United States is doing to help the agriculturists of that country in the matter of credit. Within the last year they brought in a rural credit scheme, and to show you the advantage the American farmer has over the Canadian farmer in making a loan, the American can secure a time loan of say $1,000, spread over thirty-four years, at the rate of 5½ per cent, which amortizes the loan. At the end of that period he will have paid off in principal and interest a sum amounting to $1,870. Now a farmer in Canada borrowing $1,000, and letting it run for thirty-four years, at 8 per cent—I am taking that as the general rate, although a great many of us are paying a higher rate of interest—will have paid back at the end of thirty-four years in principal and interest $3,720. Now, I think that is a handicap impossible for the Canadian farmer to overcome.

We all realize that immigration is one of the crying needs of Canada to-day. We have a country that is not equalled in any part of the world. We have vast natural resources, millions of acres of land that are yet uncultivated, and we have provided facilities for a population many times our actual number; we find a population of nine millions of people trying to carry a load which possibly twenty-five or fifty millions should support. Now, what is the problem before us. We all agree that our people are leaving the Dominion. Is the problem before us to spend money in going out and seeking to bring in others to take their places, or should it be our main object to try and get together, find out what is responsible for that exodus, and other evils and then provide the remedy. I believe there is no comparison between a Canadian born and bred in this country and any foreigner who may be brought in to take his place. And yet we find to-day that our Canadian born sons and daughters are leaving this country, and instead of spending money to find out what is causing this exodus, we are making expenditures on an immigration policy and flooding Europe with advertisements to attract foreign born settlers to Canada.

There is one thing we must recognize. That is that Canada is a hard country to govern. Stretching as it does from ocean to ocean, with so many divergent conditions in different parts of the country, we must adopt a broad outlook. Having realized the position we are in, we should adopt a different policy from that which has been followed in the past. We should discard the idea of considering, when a question is introduced in the House, whether it will be in the interest of a party, whether it will keep a party in power, or enable a party to get into power. We must forget all ideas of that kind, and try to evolve a policy that will be in the interest of the country as a whole.

There is one other question to which I would like to refer. It has been in my mind for some time, and it was brought out the other day when the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) was speaking of the judiciary. I am merely going to throw the suggestion out to the government and hon. members. I believe we all want to see the judiciary occupy a status high above any possibility of reflection. I want to make it quite plain at the present time that I am not casting any reflection upon our judges; but I think they should be in such a position that there would be no possibility of reflecting upon them in any manner whatever. Therefore I should like to see the appointment of judges taken out of the hands of the government and no longer continue to be a matter of political patronage. It seems to me that appointments to the judiciary could very well be left to the bar associations in the various provinces throughout the Dominion. I feel sure that the lawyers in our various provinces have enough pride in their profession to see to it that none but the very best men would be selected to sit on the bench in a judicial capacity. At the present time it is very often felt whether rightly or not, that a man is rewarded to a seat on the bench because of his political activities, I do not think it is in the best interest of the country as a whole that this should continue to be the case.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say there is no argument in regard to the wonderful character of our country. We have a land that will provide bountifully for millions: We have a class of people that, when they go to other countries, can hold their own in competition with anyone. It seems to me therefore that if we would just use a little of the common sense that the Almighty has endowed us with, and get together here not as men from the East or from the West but as Canadians assembled in parliament, and wipe away much of this party prejudice from our minds, we could solve the problem that confronts us and by so doing make of Canada a prosperous and contented land, and a land to love.

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker at the outset I wish to associate myself with those who preceded me in tendering congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I also, in common with other hon. members, deplore the absence of one so universally and respectfully esteemed as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, to see omitted from the Speech any suggestion of any legislative action whatever with respect to the retention within our Dominion of our forest reserves. I think, Sir, this is a question of immense importance to our country. It is quite possible that owing to the fact that a commission, an expensive commission, is at present touring the country and inquiring into the obvious, that the government does not care to make a pronouncement on this question until the findings of the commission are at hand. Otherwise I consider their conduct is inexcusable, in view of the very great blunder that is being perpetrated by the failure to protect our country by preventing the exportation of our raw forest products. The commission in question was sitting in British Columbia prior to my departure; I presume it is sitting there still. Owners of timber lands, American tugboat owners, and others engaged in logging were giving evidence against the imposition of an embargo upon the exportation of raw material. That those who were profiting by exportation should be against the imposition of an embargo was naturally to be expected and was the case. As usual the general public of British Columbia paid little attention to the commission, and I can safely say, through long residence in that country, and familiarity with the conditions, economic and otherwise, that were the matter subject to a plebiscite, 85 per cent of the people of British Columbia would vote for an embargo to prevent the exportation of saw logs from our country. Those logs are leaving our country at an ever accelerating rate, and we are alarmed at the rapid depletion of our forests. All talk of reforestation with Douglas fir is futile and nonsensical. The difficulties in the way of renewing the forest growth of our country are absolutely insuperable. We see our logs going, day by day, in immense booms across the border, to enrich our neighbours, and our young men are following there, to engage in the manufacture of them. We are harvesting the last crop of Douglas fir from our mountain side, and leaving behind a scene of desolation that is hard to describe. I remember once noticing a picture of Dante's Inferno by Gustave Doré which very fairly represents what the countryside looks like after being logged over. If the harpies were present the resemblance would be complete. In 1920 we exported in round numbers 28,000,000 feet of lumber in the form of saw logs from British Columbia. In 1921 we exported 90,000,000 feet and in 1922, 151,000,000. In 1923 we exported 233,000,000 feet. There are reasons for expecting that the figures will run to approximately 500,000,000 in 1924. It should be apparent to all that in the interests of the present, to say nothing of the coming generation, we must at least see to it that our timber is manufactured within the confines of our country; and even then we are perhaps cutting too freely. Let "festina lente"—make haste slowly—be our motto with respect to harvesting our timber and even our generation will profit thereby and will bless us.

Just prior to leaving the West I was credibly informed that eight standard sawmills were being or about to be erected on Puget Sound waters just south of the International boundary line. What is termed a standard mill will cut 250,000 feet of lumber per day. The eight mills in question would cut 500 million feet yearly, and it is obvious to those familiar with forestry conditions in that country that British Columbia is being looked to almost entirely for a log supply. You can easily see what a deplorable situation this is. To bring the enormity of our immense log exportation more clearly before you, let me say that the total lumber cut of New Brunswick in 1923 was 265 million feet, and surely every person, especially those from the Maritime provinces, will realize the great importance of the lumbering industry in that province. We next year will export twice that many logs, I have good reason to expect, to our American cousins.

Dr. Mayo of Rochester, Minnesota, in a recent address given under the auspices of the Canadian Club at Victoria, B.C., strongly impressed on his audience the immense importance of conserving our forests, saying that the people of his state were now realizing their folly in allowing the slaughter of their forests in one generation. A very substantial company from the southern states has recently acquired a tract of timber in British Columbia estimated at 3,000 million feet. Before leaving for the south to complete arrangements for operating, Mr. Jasspan, the company's manager, said in part:

> The depletion of our southern forests is a calamity for which this and coming generations will suffer.

He also said:

> We do not contemplate entering into the sawmill business, we will sell our logs.

The logs in question, Mr. Speaker, will doubtless go across the line. The Financial Post of February 29, has this to say with respect to the momentous question of timber exports:

> The Ontario legislature will be asked to approve of legislation placing an embargo on the exportation of hardwood from the province. The measure is designed to force United States plants in Minnesota and Wisconsin to cross into Ontario to manufacture their products if they desire to use Ontario hardwood. The measure is similar to the pine embargo of some years ago. That measure resulted in many saw mills locating in the north. There are about 1,300 hardwood plants located in Wisconsin and Minnesota. Henry Ford entered the area and purchased practically all the available reserves. The estimate made to-day is that the end of seven years will see but 100 to 110 of these plants remaining because of the exhaustion of their supply of raw material. Realizing this there has been a rush into Algoma, United States concerns have eagerly sought control of the available limits on the Canadian side. It is understood that one American concern made a contract to ship 100 million feet of hardwood across lake Superior. This was to have gone to the Iron Mountain plant of Henry Ford. Ontario's reserves of hardwood are limited. The estimate is that the small area in which hardwood thrives contains 6,500 million feet. This includes the big forest reserve and runs north to the border of the clay-belt. In discussing the embargo, Hon. James Lyons, Ontario's Minister of Lands and Forests, pointed out that some years ago the numerous saw mills around Saginaw and Bay City, Michigan, were importing Canadian logs heavily. An embargo was placed on their exportation with the result that there is $75,000,000 invested in saw mills around the Soo to-day. The Canadian Pacific railway line, Soo to Sudbury, is studded with them. He also points out that in 1900 there was an embargo in regard to pulp with the result that $190,000,000 are invested in the pulp plants of the province to-day.

This, Mr. Speaker, is my case against the exportation of saw logs. I have been fair in my arguments and if the House believes my statements, surely the hour is at hand when we will cease temporizing with this deplorable situation.

Now a few words with respect to pulpwood exports, although I confess at the outset that I am not as familiar with this question as with the one I have just dealt with. Pulpwood exportation is just commencing in British Columbia and I hope to see it strangled at birth. In 1923 there was exported from the Dominion to the United States pulpwood to the value of thirteen million dollars. Had this pulpwood been manufactured into paper it would have had a value of ninety million dollars, seventy million at least of which would have gone to labour, to people who live in our country, people who purchase the products of our farms and of our factories, people who would help to build up our nation. Instead of that this pulpwood has gone across the line to our neighbours. Surely this is bad policy for Canada.

What wonder, Mr. Speaker, that we are considered by our southern neigbours who are playing with us as a cat plays with a mouse, to be simple, non-progressive, credulous people, when in addition to errors which I have enumerated, we are going to lower our tariff barrier to those who say to us in terms that all who run may read, "We want nothing from you primitive people but your manhood, your money, and your raw forest products". Have we no economic sense? Have we no sense of national dignity; no national pride? I have no word of criticism of the business methods of the Americans. I have the utmost respect for their business acumen. Let us profit by their example. Let us pull ourselves together, sit up and take notice, and subscribe to the sentiments as expressed in the old Loyalist toast, "Here's to my country, may she ever be right, but right or wrong, my country".

Still we are a credulous people and we are buying too freely from those people. We have a balance of trade from Great Britain, our best friends in a business sense. We simply add millions to that balance of trade and pass it over to our neighbours south of the line.

We all know that the mid-western farmer is penalized to a certain extent because of tariff, but in the province from which I come we absolutely could not exist without the tariff. Our manufacturers, hundreds of them, five hundred in Vancouver, would have to go out of business if there was not a substantial tariff. We are side by side with a strong industrial nation which could afford to give away in Canada one-tenth of their product in order to put our people out of business, whereupon their prices would again go up. Our farmers and our fruit raisers in British Columbia are in just as serious straits as you are in the West. Fruit comes in from the Wenatchee, Cashmere and Yakima valleys to the south of us a little earlier than our fruit is available. Their berries come in earlier and our market is flooded. In other words these products are dumped in on us and dumped in on the prairies before those who have expended many millions in our country can get their fruit on the market. That is the competition which the people in the Okanagan country have to meet.

Speaking about hardships on the prairies reminds me of the story of two men who were fishing in a lake in British Columbia and who saw a man struggling in the water at the foot of a cliff. They pulled toward him as rapidly as they could and succeeded in rescuing him. After some fishermen's supplies had been administered to him he sat up, looked at his watch, and said: "Will you put me ashore? I am behind with my work. This is the third time this morning that I have fallen off my ranch." These are the things the farmers have to contend with in some parts of British Columbia. On the prairies a man does not have to be an amphibian to farm.

I regret very much to hear any talk about secession coming from hon. gentlemen to my left. I do not think that is the feeling that permeates the middle West. I do not like to hear this talk of the sound of a breeze going through the tops of the mulberry trees, or anything that smacks of a feeling that we are not going to be a united people. Let us forget all this racial and religious talk; let us realize that we all have our troubles. The Maritime provinces undoubtedly suffer because of our tariff policy; well, we can make up for that by giving them a quid pro quo. We certainly can give a quid pro quo to my neighbours to the left; there are ways in which we can more than make up to them what they lose through the tariff, as was so ably pointed out by the member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) this afternoon. I say with certainty that we in British Columbia could not exist—the farmers could not exist, the manufacturers could not exist, without a suitable tariff. The same can pretty well be said about Ontario and Quebec. With the Maritime provinces it is different, and it is different with you people in the West, but surely there is some way by which we can get on common ground, and avoid taking any step which, while giving comparatively small benefit to the western people, would sacrifice the manufacturing industries of Ontario and Quebec.

We have all read the startling articles in MacLean's Magazine with regard to what may be termed the "'pork barrel" argument. Part of one of those articles contained an attack on my friend from Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie). It is stated that a dry-dock was promised to Victoria as a bribe to elect that hon. gentleman. Sir, that is unqualifiedly false, because that dry-dock was promised years before the member for Victoria City entered political life. The member for Victoria City did not need to offer a dry-dock as a bonus to bring about his election. He is a well known native son of that province and I believe he could be elected in any British Columbia constituency without giving a dry-dock or anything else. Moreover, the dry-dock is not in the constituency of the hon. member for Victoria City, it is in mine. I only hope that when this gentleman writes other articles of that kind he will keep a little nearer to the facts, because he has done an injustice. A branch of the Yarrow shipbuilding firm was located in Esquimalt long before the member for Victoria City ever thought of politics or was thought of by others in that regard. Subsequently the Yarrow firm started there because of assurance that a dry-dock would be built and are now doing an immense business. They have ships there all the time and they will have larger ships when the dry-dock is big enough for them.

[Mr. Dickie.]

It was stated also in this "pork barrel" article that there already was in that district a dry-dock 265 feet long. The dry-dock is 230 feet long, and I know of six or seven war ships which during the troublous days of the war had to go to the American side to be docked because the facilities in British Columbia were not adequate. Our friends in Vancouver, of course, do not feel the same enthusiasm for a dry-dock as I do. I think, however, that with the rapid strides that are being made in that wonderful city of Vancouver, in two or three years there will be room for two or more big dry-docks in British Columbia. There are sixteen large dry docks to the south of us on the American side, and the opportunities of shipping coming into our country or going through our ports on the way to American ports are undoubtedly very great.

I was rather amused by some figures quoted by the very gentlemanly speaker from Montreal by way of proof that the exodus of people from Canada during the last two years was no greater than it had been during the two preceding years. That shows what can be done with figures. The hon. member must know, or he should know, that such a conclusion is absurd. Everybody knows, even the boy on the street, that during this last year the exodus to the States more than doubled that of the two preceding years. We in British Columbia do not know where to look for young men. They are going down to southern California, and there are very good reasons for that: unexampled prosperity reigns down there owing to the development of immense oil wells and other activities. Now these people are coming back, but only very slowly. I do not think the exodus will continue for any considerable time, but before we can stamp it out, before we can do anything to make this the country that we want it to be, we must have what has been mentioned time after time, namely, stability of tariff regulation. The people must know where they are at. Those who come from the West must realize that, in view of what they have heard. They heard it from the hon. member (Mr. Harris) who spoke last night, and who told how men engaged in industry in Toronto, industry in which hundreds of thousands of dollars had been invested, had during the last two or three years worked with their overalls on, fought with their backs to the wall, to make this a prosperous country. Still you gentlemen would lower the tariff. If you give the question the thought that it deserves I am sure that you will arrive at the conclusion that there is some other way of meeting the situation than by lowering the tariff and sacrificing the interests of Quebec and Ontario.

In conclusion, I would simply plead that we forget sectionalism, that we forget this talk of secession. We are one people, a British people, and Canadians above all. We have our difficulties. We have our racial dividing lines, though they do not prevail in the West. In the constituency that I am trying to represent we have many French Canadians and they are among the best people we have—I would we had more of them. They still hold to the teachings that they imbibed at their mother's knee, in the matter of religion and everything else, and I give them crediit for it. They are men, too, who take an active part in our public life out there. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that although I am a Conservative every one of these people voted for me in my constituency. I do not think that there is anything further that I care to say at the present time.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, the subject which I desire to discuss is to be found in the thirteenth paragraph of the Speech from the Throne. It is the shortest paragraph and deals with the development of Canadian trade through Canadian seaports. The Prime Minister in his speech did not refer to this important subject, but I hope it will receive in inverse proportion the attention which it has received up to the present time. He brushed aside the significance of the recent reverses to his party in the East by saying that they were due to sectional issues. Sectional issues! Our experience is that such issues receive the greatest attention at the hands of the government. To that land of sections and half sections, the prairie provinces, the Crowsnest pass agreement was offered last year; this year a reduction of the tariff on the instruments of production is promised; and next year or in the near future, should the government continue in power, the West will probably have its hopes revived in that Utopian vision, the Hudson Bay railway. The promise of its completion will be brought in on a charger and presented to the Progressive party. The leader of that party has already said, as have his supporters also, that this project must be carried out. Not only is the Progressive party the life and breath of the government, but it has now assumed to act as the administration's mouthpiece. I can readily understand that when a government has to contend with assaults from without as well as from within its vitality is likely to be very much weakened. Indeed, its vitality is now at a very low ebb, and the further discussion of this question has apparently been handed over by the government, appropriately enough, to the vigorous representatives of the northwestern provinces.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend will allow me? He must not get his leader in wrong. Does he not know that the right hon. gentleman has declared himself in favour of the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am trying to represent the views contained within myself.

Mr. GRAHAM: The assaults within the party.

Mr. MacLAREN: Fortunately a great many men on this side of the House have views of their own and are quite capable of expressing them. I am presenting my own view, and I am not alone in entertaining it. I tried to get an expression of opinion from the Minister of Railways last year with regard to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway, but, unlike my leader, he apparently held no opinion on the subject, at least he failed to give expression to any. These reverses of the government were not due to sectional issues but were largely due to questions of transportation which I am now discussing.

I listened yesterday with very careful attention to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), and I desire to say that many of the important subjects he dealt with received my complete acquiescence. I would refer first of all to the British preference. For many years we had a statute providing that British imports must be made through Canadian ports before the preference would become effective. This law was to be put into force by order in council, but it was never promulgated. Last year, it will be remembered, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) introduced a motion providing for a 10 per cent preference on a large number of British commodities, subject to one condition, that they be brought in through our ports. This was an acknowledgement of an important principle and was, I think, an advance on the tariff legislation that had been enacted up to that time. But after all, it is really a nibbling at the question. It is ten per cent. To be plain about the matter the figures at the present time are not conclusive because the time has been too short to prepare the statistics bearing on the point, but the belief is that even the ten per cent has had considerable influence in increasing Canadian trade through Canadian seaports. I would join with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) in urging that the motion as previously passed by this House should be readopted and put into force, so that all goods receiving the preference must come through Canadian channels. I see this further advantage in it; it does not disturb the tariff. You have a tariff, and then it is interfered with by inserting the ten per cent, but if it applies generally to all goods imported through Canadian ports, only the tariff is not disturbed.

Then there is the matter of trade with the West Indies. That, I think, was well put before the House by the hon. member. There is an opportunity for this country to benefit to a vastly greater extent than it does at the present time by the proper adjustments of duties and tariffs.

Then as to coal production in Canada. The bringing in of a policy that would be so arranged that we would be independent of any other country for our supply of coal is one of the important questions of the day. I cannot but think that the making of much greater use of our own coal than we are doing at the present time is well within our possibilities. I noticed that the hon. member for Cumberland was in favour of a duty upon bituminous coal somewhat higher than the present duty. He was careful to point out that this was not protection for the coal, but simply a tariff for revenue. What he wants is a duty on bituminous coal for revenue, for the purpose of giving protection. Now the difficulty with many members is that certain duties are perfectly all right and advantageous provided you do not put a protectionist label on them. To my mind it makes no difference at all whether you attach the name protection or not if you put the duty on, and if the hon. member for Cumberland is satisfied with that kind of designation I do not think we need worry very much about it. The result and the effect are there.

Now, a word about what was called the old Intercolonial railway. According to my understanding, the Intercolonial railway is not an integral part of the Canadian National Railways. I believe that the accounting is kept separate, and it is kept separate because the government regard it as on a different basis. I believe that under the British North America Act, technically speaking, it is not and cannot be a portion of the Canadian National Railways. Then there is the Railway Commission. The Railway Commission, cannot deal with the rates on that portion of the system called the Intercolonial railway. As a matter of fact, it is somewhat of an academic question. The Intercolonial is operated and managed with the Canadian National Railways as a matter of convenience, and because it is a matter of considerable advantage, I believe, from many points of view. That is my interpretation of the Intercolonial question. I am not sure that I have satisfied the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) on that point, but be that as it may, I think my view is put forward with considerable accuracy.

Now I come to the Canadian National Railways, and I am pleased to see the Minister of Railways in his seat. It seems to me that there is a great deal of what may be termed loose thinking and loose speaking about the relationship between the Canadian National Railway board, the government and the country. The government says a good deal along this line: We will give the railway board a free hand. Now that is an inaccurate expression, and in a matter where it is so important to define the exact relationship between the railway board, the country, and the government, I think we should have something more explicit than simply the words "a free hand." Under the act the railway board is appointed for the operation and management of these railways; for the operation and management, that is all. I presume, then, that if you say it has a free hand, it is a free hand under the conditions as expressed, that is, in the operation and management. But the board, if you read the act, is also subject to conditions and restrictions as imposed by the Governor in Council. The government, however, have imposed no conditions and no restrictions through order in council, and none are filed in that office. In other words, the government have not exercised any supervision or given any directions to the railway board. I do not mean that there should be small restrictions; I mean something above and higher than the question of operation and management. There is an opportunity there, and I presume that when the act was drawn it was put there for that purpose, in order that the government could exercise its functions on the higher ground of the best policy having regard to the conditions of the country, and that that idea be expressed and conveyed to the railway board.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is there any provision in the act which puts that responsibility upon the government?

Mr. MacLAREN: The act states that the board has conveyed to it the operation and management of the railways. I say that the government has the power of limiting, of restricting, of supervising the action of the railway board. It is laid down so in the act, and here there is an opportunity for the government to express a high policy regarding the greater matters of transportation in this country. I also say there has been, up to the present, no such policy conveyed to the railway board. It is not necessary of course, for the government to do that; they may have no policy. I presume they have not or they would so express it. In reality, one looks on the railway board as an organization which should not be interfered with in any way in matters that come legitimately within their powers unless, of course, something occurs which must be criticized. Politics must not enter into the management, but no one wishes that politics should enter there. I did not know where to place my hon. friend from Cumberland yesterday when he spoke of indirect appointments by the government to the railway system. That is a matter a little too vague in character to try and enlighten the House upon.

Now, as I say, while the government has this authority to condition, it is not free to take any policy it sees fit regarding the railways. The railway board is subject to the government, and the government is subject to the statutes that have been previously passed by parliament, and that I believe is a very important point. The government itself is not free; it is limited by statutes which have previously passed parliament. I should therefore ask what these railway acts are. My hon. friend (Mr. Logan) yesterday referred to them, and said that some of the provisions had come within his knowledge only within the last few weeks. This to us is somewhat surprising as he is looked upon as the defender of the rights of the Maritime provinces. If it be true in his case there are probably many other members of the House who are not familiar with these acts. I therefore ask hon. members to refer to the acts in question and see exactly what is contained therein. I will not attempt to quote them, I did so last year, but I again draw the attention of the House to three acts in particular. One is the National Transcontinental Railway Act of 1903, another is the Act respecting aid toward the construction of the Canadian Northern Railway of 1911, and the third is the Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway System of 1914. These acts were passed during the periods of both the Liberal government and the Conservative government. There is no way by which the present government or the opposition can decline to accept responsibility for one or more of them.

If hon. members will take the opportunity of reading these statutes they will be surprised, I believe, at all they contain. They may vary in degree, but even the powers conveyed by one or any of the three are very great and would have an enormous influence on the trade of this country. They all lay down that unrouted freight is to be passed over our Canadian railways to Canadian seaports. Large financial assistance, in some cases enormous financial assistance, was granted these railroads and in return the companies undertook to do certain things. You will find the conditions all set forth in the statutes, but for one thing they undertook that unrouted freight should be forwarded over Canadian railways to Canadian ports with a view of building up a great national policy regarding transportation in this country. That being the case, when the government took over the system of railroads it took over the commitments as well as the lines. Therefore I would submit that under all Canadian governments the control and conduct of our railway system must be subject to what is contained in these three acts. I have never heard any member of the government refer to this matter, nor do I know how the government view this question. I ask the Minister of Railways—I would ask the Prime Minister if he were present—to take the opportunity of giving the House and the country a clear statement regarding this matter. Does or does not the government consent to and accept these commitments as authoritative and as governing the actions of the railway board and themselves in the management and operation of these railways? Will the Minister of Railways convey to the public his interpretation? I think it is fair to ask for it. If it be the view of the government that these matters are authoritative, and therefore capable of being put in action, that is something that will affect the interests of our country to a very great degree. If by any chance, on the other hand, it does not appeal to the minister, I can assure him that the country will demand it. It is a request which is considered right, and the people are looking for the fulfilment of these promises and conditions. It is more than a simple matter of an agreement or contract between the railways and the government, it is also really the assent of parliament to a great policy. When those acts were adopted this House was assenting to the policy being laid down and being accepted, that transportation so far as possible should be over our Canadian rails and through our Canadian ports.

I think the attitude of everyone in this country towards the railway board and towards the National Railways should be a friendly one. I myself am a believer in nationally owned railways, and in any case, whether one is or is not a believer in them, I think our attitude should be friendly and one of support to the railway board. That does not mean that one must not, especially in parliament, take the opportunity of criticizing, if he thinks there is a fair opportunity for criticism. I think we should be rather unready to criticize, because technical knowledge is required on that board, and we probably do not know all the details; but still there are occasions I think when anyone will see that it is proper to criticize. I must not forget that it may be also proper to commend. I think one should not have any small spirit in the matter, and when one sees reason for commending the railway board I think he should do so. I do not say there is not an opportunity—I think there have been opportunities—for commending the railway board. The chairman of the railway board, Sir Henry Thornton, makes speeches occasionally throughout the country. He made one in December of last year in Toronto before a body of commercial travellers, and the report of the meeting states that it was unusually largely attended. I think one should be careful at all times, but should be especially careful when addressing a body such as commercial travellers, alert men, who are travelling all over the country; and if a statement is made to these travellers by someone holding the position of chairman of the railway board, that statement will go all over the country. If it is not quite correct, then there is a lot of misinformation disseminated. What did Sir Henry Thornton say to the commercial travellers in Toronto? He referred to many subjects, but came finally to the section where I have the honour to live, the Maritime provinces, and the report states:—

> The great complaint he recognized had come from the Maritime provinces. They said that they were being discriminated against. Sir Henry could not see that the Maritime provinces had any complaint.

Mr. McMASTER: He must know very little about them.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is a fair inference, but I do not know. He has had an opportunity. Surely he has had the opportunity of conversing with Maritime men and with some of the representatives of the government who come from the Maritime provinces and yet he says, that as far as he can make out, the Maritimes had little to complain about. I think a little less speaking and a little more listening is a—

Mr. McMASTER: A prescription that might be followed.

Mr. MacLAREN: No, but an aphorism that many men could apply to themselves with great advantage. We come to one more speech by the chairman of the railway board, and this speech was delivered in Montreal in February last. He was speaking at the St. James Literary Society, and he spoke again on various questions affecting transportation and railway matters of the day, and at the end of his address one of the audience brought a great many points before him, and especially as to how the railway was failing to work out properly in the Maritime provinces, and Sir Henry said:

> As for the Maritime provinces, I frankly do not know what to do. I do know that it is time the rest of us got together to find a remedy for the discontent of the people down there.

Now we have heard the two statements, and it may be that he has received further information since he made his Toronto speech, but be that as it may, he says that he does not know what to do, but that something should be done, and he thinks the matter should be taken up seriously. Now that being the position Sir Henry Thornton finds himself in, I presume he has made a report to the government on this point. It would seem a natural and proper thing to report to the government what he had found and that he did not know what to do. He knows there is cause for complaint and thinks that action should be taken. If he has not represented that matter to the government, I would suggest to the government that they inquire from him what means he would suggest to bring about a better condition of affairs.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to illustrate one cause of great dissatisfaction not only in the Maritimes, but over large sections of the country, and it is in reference to the grain traffic through Portland, Maine. There they are, the cities of Halifax and St. John, not very far from the city of Portland and what do we find? In November and December of 1923, and January of 1924, through Portland, Maine, and conveyed over the National railways, were 6,831,294 bushels of wheat. At the same time during the corresponding months, November and December of last year and January of this year, through the port of St. John, over the Canadian National railways, were conveyed 458,168 bushels of wheat.

We find nearly seven million bushels of wheat going through Portland, Maine, as against less than five hundred thousand through the port of St. John; and yet the chairman of the railway board says at one time in Toronto that he does not know what the cause of discontent in this matter is. Here, as I am pointing out to you is a very much larger amount of grain passing over Canadian rails through to Portland, Maine, over the National railways, as compared with that which passed through St. John. That, I submit, unless it has been specially routed, should go through Canadian ports. The Canadian government and the Canadian railways are bound by statute to encourage as much as possible the passage of grain over Canadian rails through our own ports, and discourage the passage of grain over our rails to foreign ports. Here apparently is shown that at present the provisions contained in the statutes that I have already referred to are not being observed. To show that there is more in this matter than might appear and that the main objection is not found in financial considerations, I would point out that the Canadian Pacific Railway during the same period have sent some millions of bushels of grain through the port of St. John. They are not doing it for amusement; they are doing it as a matter of business.

There is a splendid opportunity for the government to bring about, by vigorous action, a very considerable improvement in our trade. The advantage of the Imperial preference which applies only to Canada, the development of trade with the West Indies, the enforcement of the provisions contained in the acts I have spoken of—these are matters which if taken up in a vigorous way by an active government will remedy many of the conditions of which we have been complaining and will bring population and produce wealth. I cannot but think that the government is showing a masterly inactivity in these matters. I cannot see that any effort is being put forward. Only through the efforts of a strong and aggressive government, determined to carry out the tasks that lie before it, will the country take that position which I believe it should ultimately reach.

Mr. C. WALLACE STEWART (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, during the last session of this parliament various members of the group to which I adhere drew upon themselves and upon the group as a whole the adverse criticism that they were continually crying blue ruin. I have followed this debate very closely and I take it from my observations that the party to my right, the official opposition, have pre-empted to themselves rights of a similar nature for this session. I have no wish to trespass on their premises, and in order that my remarks, which otherwise might be construed to be a criticism of existing conditions, may be such as to give them a bright beginning, I am going to attempt to find some ray of sunshine in that black cloud the presence of which has been made the subject of reference by members on both sides of this House: I refer to the fact that we are losing many of our people, month by month and year by year.

It is pretty difficult, Mr. Speaker, to find any consolation in that fact, particularly when, as I understand, there have been months during the past year when we lost more people from our country than we had come into it. But I would point out for the consolation of the government that in losing these people we are losing many of those who are most discontented, and that, perhaps, is making the government of this country very much easier than it would be if those people remained here. I suggest that if those who were discontented had stayed in Canada there would have been more blue ruin talk and more calamity howling during this session than there has been in sessions in the past.

It is with the conditions that are causing people to leave this country that I am particularly concerned and regarding which I wish to speak for a short time this evening. I wish to analyze those conditions as far as I can—or some of them; I would not attempt to deal with them all—and to offer a few suggestions which in my estimation would tend to the betterment of those adverse conditions.

I have noted four things which I think may be called causes to which may be attributed a good proportion of the undesirable conditions which exist not in my constituency alone, not in western Canada alone, but in all of Canada which can be called agricultural—and I am sure that that is a very large percentage of the country. I will name the four conditions that I wish to deal with: first, the low prices prevailing for farm produce; second, the high costs of the necessities of life and the implements of production; third, transportation costs, and fourth, taxation. I am not sure that I have given them in their order of relative importance, but I do not think that matters very much; I shall discuss them in the order in which I have taken them.

I wish to place on record a few figures which, I must admit, are already on record and available to every member of this House.

I have taken them from the proceedings of the special Agricultural committee which was convened last year under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). They are enlightening, and although not strictly up to date yet I am confident that they will bear out the comparison I desire to make. First of all I will offer comparative figures for prices of grains, farm animals, and farm produce in general. Take wheat, our greatest export crop, and compare the figures of the average prices for 1913 with those of 1922, which are the years given in the table I have before me. I may say that this table was prepared by the Bureau of Statistics and was simply placed on record by the committee I have mentioned. In 1913 the average price of wheat was 67 cents—I am not sure on just what basis that price was given; in 1922 it was 85 cents, an increase of 27 per cent in those ten years. Taking oats and making the same comparison for the same years, we find the price rising from 32 to 38 cents, an increase of 18½ per cent, and for barley the increase was from 42 to 46 cents, an increase of 9½ per cent. Then, turning to farm animals and taking as an example western butcher steers on the Winnipeg market, in 1913 the average price per hundredweight was $6.37 and in 1922 it was $5.02, a decrease of 21 per cent. Taking hogs for the same years, but on the Toronto market, the increase between 1913 and 1922 would be shown as 28 per cent, but comparing the average price for 1913 with the price now being paid on that same market, a decrease is shown of 15 per cent. Take beef hides: in 1913 the average price was 14 cents and in 1922 it was 12½ cents, or a decrease of 11½ per cent. And if, Sir, we had taken either the year 1920 or 1921, for comparative purposes, with the year 1913, that decrease would have been very much greater. Taking butter, in the year, 1913, the average price was 23½ cents. In 1922, it was 31 cents, an increase of 33 per cent. Eggs show an increase of 34 per cent; and in reference to horses, which are not marketed in the usual way I have taken an extract from The Livestock News, issued by the Department of Agriculture of Saskatchewan for the month of February, 1924, which states, "The horse market is very quiet, there being a reasonable demand for good, sound, young draft horses, of from 1,400 to 1,800 pounds, at prices quoted from $100 up. Unsound, thin or undersized horses, are practically unsaleable." The whole table, as prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, is found to include practically all the produce that comes not only from the western farms, but from all the farms in Canada, and the average increase for the ten years I have cited for comparative purposes is 17 per cent. I would ask hon. members to bear that figure in mind because it has a vital relation to other figures which I shall submit. The increase in farm produce has been in the neighbourhood of 17 per cent over pre-war years. I have not quoted the extreme examples for the reason I stated when I began my remarks. But I do want to place on record what I consider an example of a condition that exists and which directly illustrates the undesirable circumstances which prevail at present among our farmers. I want to point out, however, that this is rather an extreme case. I have here a bill from the union stock yards in St. Boniface, Winnipeg, with regard to a cow that was sold there on the 19th November, 1923. Before I proceed further, let me say that I made inquiries concerning the beast in question and satisfied myself that the animal was not an exceptional one. It is true that it was not a choice beef animal, but I was assured by a score of farmers who had seen it that it was of the class of beef that is usually consumed on the farm and which, as many hon. members of this House are aware, makes a really good and substantial meal for anyone who enjoys a good farm dinner. True, this animal was sold on the wrong market; but the results are as I shall state them now. The weight of this cow was 1,140 pounds and I would point out to those who are not intimately acquainted with beef animals that any cow of this weight is not all skin and bones. The price paid in that market for this animal was 75 cents per hundred-weight, and the gross price was $8.55. From this, there had to be deducted expenses, charged up to the shipper, including freight, feed, insurance, commission, and so forth, amounting to 74.22 cents per hundredweight, making a total of $8.46. In addition to that there was another charge against the animal on account of packers' insurance of four cents, making a grand total in charges of $8.50. That meant a net return of 5 cents.

Mr. JONES: Whom was the cow sold to?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): It was sold in the Union stockyards. I have not the statement as to who purchased it, but it was sold in the usual way on that market.

Mr. JONES: Was it sold by the United Grain Growers?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): It was handled by the United Grain Growers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They disposed of the animal?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Yes; it was through the pool. I was going to refer to that, because it holds out some hope for the future. When I was interrupted I was about to say that I had in my hand, attached to the bill, the cheque which was issued on account of this animal. That cheque reads:

Pay to the order of.....five cents only.

Mr. McMASTER: Did they charge the two cent stamp to the shipper?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I presume the two cent stamp on that cheque is included in the 74.22 cents per hundredweight which was charged for the whole shipment. As I said in reply to the hon. member a moment ago, this animal was in a cattle pool and no doubt, for its quality, it will return—

An hon. MEMBER: Another nickel?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): No; I was not going to say another nickel, but something more, to the shipper.

Mr. WHITE: Does the hon. member quote that as an average transaction?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): The hon. gentleman could not have been in his seat, or he did not hear me, when I stated that I did not mention it as an average example; the average figures I quoted before. I cited this as an extreme case, but it is by no means a lone example, and it has a bearing on the conditions I am discussing.

Let us now consider the second cause of these conditions, namely, the high cost of the necessities of life and of implements of production. I desire again to submit some figures and I trust I shall be pardoned for so doing; for, while I recognize that statistics are rather dry, still they are necessary in this case. The figures in reference to comparative costs of the necessaries of life and of the implements of production relate to the same years as those which I have used with reference to the products sold. These figures are also taken from a table included, with the other table, in the report of the special agricultural committee, and which was prepared by the Bureau of Statistics. The table includes all implements commonly used on western and other farms. Comparing the years 1913 and 1922, there is shown over the whole list an average increase in cost of 64 per cent. The lowest item on that table, which happens to be drag harrows, shows an increase of 32 per cent, while the highest increase, in the case of wagons, is 90 per cent. The average over the whole list, however, is, as I have stated, 64 per cent. Let me add a further word to the information given by that table, which covers up to the year 1922. It is a well known fact that in 1923, after these figures were prepared, there was a further increase of 10 per cent, and this spring, that is to say, the spring of 1924, there has been another increase of 10 per cent. So that, taking the average increase as given by that table, of 64 per cent, and adding these additional increases, I am perfectly safe in saying that the average increase in the cost of agricultural implements from 1913 up to the present time has been well over 80 per cent.

Let me take another item, namely, clothing. I will give a few items in detail taken from a table obtained from the same source and covering the same years. Underwear shows an increase of 40 per cent; mens' suits, an increase of 60 per cent; overalls, 80 per cent; mens' shirts, 100 per cent; while the average on the whole list included in that table—all of them, articles used by men, women and children on the farm—is 76 per cent. Boots are not included in that list, but the figures for the same years show an increase on working grades of 63 per cent and on finer grades of 94 per cent. Going over the list of articles commonly used by our farm folk as well as by other consumers, we find the following percentages: Furniture, an average increase of 66 per cent; kitchen and garden hardware, an average increase of 96 per cent; dishes and pottery, a very great increase, averaging 164 per cent; lumber, an average increase of 76 per cent, and on certain grades as high as 107 per cent; cement, an increase of 64 per cent; paints, including oils, an increase of 61 per cent; wire fencing, an increase of 44 per cent; groceries—this table as prepared by the Bureau of Statistics includes a long list of groceries used by the ordinary household—an average increase of 51 per cent, the greatest increase being in sugar, 91 per cent, and the lowest in vinegar, 10 per cent—the sour and the sweet of it. I did not average the whole list, and I do not know that it would be a fair comparison to make such an average, the articles being used in such varying quantities, but I again ask hon. members to recall the figure I gave for the increase in farm products, namely 17 per cent, compare it with the percentage increases I have detailed, and, then ask themselves if any one of these increases is anywhere near as low as 17 per cent. The discrepancy between this percentage and the other percentage increases ranging from 66 to 164 per cent indicates one of the real reasons why farming conditions are not satisfactory at the present time.

Now I turn to the third cause to which I have attributed some of these difficulties—transportation costs. From the addresses that have been delivered in this House I gather that transportation costs are affecting every part of the Dominion and every industry, but I think I am safe in saying that no industry is feeling the stress of high transportation costs more than the agricultural industry, particularly in western Canada where our geographical location necessitates long transportation hauls to our available markets. Railway rates are high as compared with what they were in pre-war times, when our produce was, comparatively, the same price as it is today, approximating the same value to us. I have made a few notes of transportation costs in 1913 as compared with 1923, and these figures I propose to place on Hansard. I have taken the city of Saskatoon as the shipping point, it being the centre of western Canada and the nearest city to my constituency, although not within it. First of all I will quote comparative rates per 100 pounds on grain from Saskatoon to Fort William for 1913—and I have a few of the intervening years—and 1923. In 1913 the cost was 24 cents, that being the Crowsnest pass rate; in 1920 it was increased to 38 cents; in 1921 it was reduced to 36½ cents, and further reduced in the same year to 33½ cents, on the 6th July 1922 being put back to the orginal basis of 24 cents. The figures in 1920, 1921 and 1922, had a very great bearing on the reduction of the returns for grain which would otherwise have been comparatively high. The rates from Fort William to ports in Ontario were in 1913, 20 cents per 100 pounds and in 1923, 37½ cents; to Quebec city 25 cents and 37½ cents respectively; to Montreal, then 20 cents, and at present 37½ cents; to Halifax, 32½ cents and 57 cents respectively; to the port of St. John, 30 cents and 55½ cents respectively. I give these figures in illustration of the fact that railway rates have on the whole very considerably increased and are still a burden to agriculture. I find on other products of the farm, under the headings of fresh meats, dressed poultry, packing house products, cheese, eggs, butter and lard, that the rate from Saskatoon to Toronto in carload lots was $1.68 in 1913, later reduced to $1.21, or a decrease of 28 per cent; but in less than carload lots the rate has increased from $2.50 in 1913 to $3.85½ at the present time, or 54 per cent.

Mr. McMASTER: These figures are all per 100 pounds?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Yes. The figures on other articles in which we are interested and on which we have to pay freight are grouped under the headings of furniture, agricultural implements, wire fencing and binder twine. These outstanding items show the trend of the figures. The average increase from 1913 to 1923 has been 52 per cent and in no case has there been a decrease in rates. Now I come to the live stock freights on cattle, sheep and hogs, using Saskatoon to Winnipeg, this being our nearest market. In 1913 the rate was 32 cents per 100 pounds, in 1923 it was 39 cents, an increase of 21 per cent. In 1920-21, using the railway rates then in force, the increase was 62½ per cent. From Saskatoon to Montreal, for the same class of freight—the route over which our export animals have to travel—the rate in 1913 was 88 cents per 100 pounds, in 1923 it was $1.12½ cents, an increase of 27 per cent; and if I had used the rates for 1920 and 1921, for comparison, the increase would have been 66 per cent. I have given these figures to support the argument I have presented, that transportation rates are high and constitute a burden. I could go further and give transportation rates on the Great Lakes, but I am not going to further weary the House. I had seen the statement that transportation rates on the Great Lakes from 1913 to 1922 had increased as much as 400 per cent, and in order to verify that statement I obtained the figures, and I find that the statement was not at all an exaggeration. I will just give the minimum and maximum figures to back up my statement.

The average increase from 1913 to 1922 to Georgian bay ports was from 2.28 cents to 4.13 cents a bushel. The minimum was nine-tenths of one cent, and the maximum six-and-a-quarter cents a bushel, so you can see, Sir, that the statement that the rates have increased as much as 400 per cent is well below the actual figures. The figures from the head of the lakes to Montreal are also in the same proportion. In 1913 the rate was 5.35 cents a bushel, and for the year 1922 it was 10.60 cents a bushel. The minimum rate over those years was 3.59 cents and the maximum 12.63 cents a bushel. You will bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that these are averages, and not the figures in individual cases. Had I taken individual cargoes I could have found figures that would have shown a much greater spread than the ones I have given.

I am not going to touch on ocean rates, but if I had the figures available, and they were fully traced out, I believe that they would show a similar increase in the cost of transporting our grain and live stock to our European markets.

I will turn now to the fourth cause of these troubles which I have enumerated, and that is taxation. I think it is hardly necessary, indeed, hardly wise, for me to reiterate in this House that taxation has increased greatly in the past few years. That has been stressed so much that anything I could say along that line would only detract from rather than add to the force of that statement. Various figures have been given as to what the increase has been and what the actual present per capita taxation is. Those figures have been given to us outside this House through the press, and whether they are accurate or not, at least they are agreed to by a great many authorities. The real bearing of taxation upon the problem I have under discussion is as to whether this taxation is properly and justly levied, or whether there is a discrimination in its bearing upon the interests for which I am speaking. I maintain, Sir, that the sales tax, for example, bears very heavily upon those who pursue agriculture as their calling, because they are largely consumers. If I were to again quote extreme cases which I do not wish to do, I could quote many, many cases where those who are at present engaged in agriculture are spending their whole income just as fast as it comes along in purchasing the necessities of life and the implements of agriculture with which they work. Consequently they are paying a tax, through this sales tax and various other taxes which are taxes on consumption, on every cent which they make, whether it is net or gross income. That cannot be said of all the incomes in this country at the present time, and therefore I contend that our taxation is not justly distributed.

This afternoon the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), referred to the suggested decrease in the duty on agricultural implements, and stated that according to his computation it amounted to only 17 cents per head, not of agriculturists only, but of all the people of this country. That makes it sound a comparatively small matter, but when you consider that not all the people of this country are agriculturists, it seems a little larger, but still not a large matter. But when you remember that the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher), speaking from the floor of this House the other day, proved by figures which I think are indisputable that the taxes in protection amounted to as much as $10 for every $1 that found its way to the treasury of this country, and when you figure that out together with the figures given by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River this afternoon, you will find that it amounts to a very considerable tax upon everyone engaged in agriculture. Then compare that figure which the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River gave this afternoon with the figures for the United States, where we have good reason to believe they have a high tariff and a very considerable revenue from customs duties. The hon. member perhaps overlooked the fact that the whole revenue in the United States from customs duties averages only a little over $4 per head of the population. Compare the revenue from our agricultural implements with that, and see if it is not a fairly high percentage to be obtained from that one particular source.

Speaking with regard to the increase of taxation, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) in his very able address the other day gave us some figures which I think are enlightening, and I am going to trespass to the extent of repeating them. He told us that the increase of revenue to the government has been 225 per cent; I do not know just what period that covers, but over the same period our increase of population was only 15 per cent, indicating a per capita increase of taxation of 190 per cent. I give these figures because they bear along the line of the other figures I have presented.

Now that I have dealt with these four causes, I am going to ask the House to bear with me while I indicate certain lines of action which in my estimation would tend to better the conditions which have resulted from these causes. I think there are three distinct lines of action which can be taken which will better these conditions. In the first place, I believe that personal endeavour on the part of those engaged in agriculture will to a considerable extent better the conditions in which they find themselves. In the second place, co-operative effort on the part of those engaged in agriculture will better these conditions. After those two, I believe that legislative reforms are necessary, and I shall, of course, because of the position in which I find myself at the present time, give greater prominence to this remedy, which is the only one under the control of this House.

I wish first to refer briefly to what can be done by personal endeavour, and I propose to show what has been done. This is no experiment, because for everything that I will mention I can give you examples of where it has been tried by farmers who are good farmers, contradictory though that may sound to one of the members from Toronto who the other day told us we had no farmers in western Canada. I maintain that we have farmers there who have tried all these various methods which are within their personal grasp, and although the men who have tried by personal endeavour to better their conditions are the men in the best condition at the present time, nevertheless they have found that by their own efforts alone they cannot get out of the difficulties in which they find themselves immersed.

In the first place, I may say that efficiency and economic methods in the conduct of farming are necessary. A great many of our farmers are conducting their industry in a business-like and economical way. I think, too, that farm accounting is something that requires some attention. It cannot be brought about by legislation, it can only be done by personal effort, and I would refer to the effect of the income tax return on the average farmer in this regard. He has looked upon it as a burden, as an unnecessary burden, but I think, Sir, that the majority of them will find the small amount of accounting the return requires will in the end be of value to them.

Then I would also say that a compliance with marketing demands, both in quality and quantity, would help the average farmer and as an illustration of that I would quote the demands on the market for hogs at the present time. I have not the actual figures with me but I know that on the Winnipeg market last year a very small percentage of hogs was graded as selects. I am not saying that the present shortcomings can be remedied altogether by personal endeavour; I think perhaps a little change in inspection methods would also assist.

Mr. McMASTER: What would be the difference in price between selects and the next best grade?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I think, Sir, the standard difference is 10 per cent. I would not make the statement positively, but I think that is what the difference amounts to.

Then I would make a plea for the practice of economy in the utilization of labour. It is a criticism that can be brought against many of our farmers that they have followed the line of least resistance in that respect rather than hewing out a line for themselves under which they could utilize expensive labour and employ it to the very best advantage. On the other hand you may remind me that there are hundreds, indeed thousands of farmers who have followed out every point that I have enjoined here and have found that it has helped, as I think it will help in all cases, but that it has not wholly solved the problem.

Another thing is the care of expensive implements. We have heard complaint made in that regard with respect to farmers and I think it is a just criticism. Another thing I would suggest in the line of personal endeavour would be to look carefully after the capital investment, to see that new investment is made in something that will be directly productive, particularly at this time when every cent must be earning another cent.

Another thing to which I attach great importance is carefulness in regard to the control of noxious weeds. I may say, Mr. Speaker, there is no one item coming under the personal control of a farmer which is more important, and which if carefully attended to gives better returns than the control of noxious weeds on the farm. Still there are a great many farmers who have taken every step possible in this respect, who have kept their farms just as clean as it is possible for them to do, and yet they find it is warfare to the bitter end with them,—that their own personal endeavours cannot entirely overcome this particular difficulty. Here I want to diverge long enough to draw the attention of the government to the fact that this is something they can help in. The Minister of Agriculture, I observe, is in his seat and I hope he will pay attention to my statements as they are addressed particularly to him at this time. There are sections in western Canada, as I know it, where noxious weeds are becoming a great menace, and in those same sections there are still areas of Crown lands that are administered by the government, some of it in fact held directly by the government. I have already mentioned that some farmers have made a very great fight against these weeds and have conquered them so far as their own farms are concerned; but they cannot go out on the Crown lands and achieve the same success there. That would be an utter impossibility at the present time so far as labour and the resulting cost is concerned; and I ask you, Sir, if it is not reasonable for them to request this government to take care of the weeds on crown lands which are under federal control. Of course those farmers know perfectly well that if the government carries out such a course they will have to pay their share of the cost of doing it, the expenditure will have to be met by a tax, but even so would it not be advisable for this government to take the necessary steps. To my personal knowledge this matter has been before the government for some considerable time. and I would urge them to take the required steps before the problem becomes such a serious one that it can only be handled through the instrumentality of a severe tax. Therefore I urge the government to tackle this problem now and do their best to eradicate the weeds on crown lands adjacent to cultivated lands.

One other thing that personal endeavour is doing for many farmers, and they are finding it to be of great assistance to them, is specialization in some particular line or branch of their industry, and I want to quote just one incident that came to my attention in that regard. Not very long ago—to be precise less than two months ago—I was talking to two gentlemen and it was perhaps a coincidence that each of these gentlemen, engaged in farming in western Canada, has a brother sitting in this House. We were discussing the matter of the unprofitableness of farming at the present time. One of these men made the statement, and he is a farmer on a large scale, that when he had cleaned up he would have to dig into his capital, as he has had to do for two or three years, to square himself up, and yet he had had good results so far as yields were concerned. The other man farming in the same community with him made the statement—and he gave me some details later on which, I think, would adequately prove his statement—that the past year's crop was going to be the most profitable he had ever harvested in western Canada. The two men are farming within a very few miles of one another but the difference was this: The one man was farming—I was going to say wholly along wheat growing lines but that would not be correct, he does keep the average number of live stock, cattle and hogs on his farm; but the other man is a specialist in the growing of clover. It was just along the line of that specialization that he had received the big returns from his last year's crop, and I believe that farmers by specializing where the opportunity offers will obtain good returns.

Now I must hurry on to the next point and that is co-operative effort to better conditions. This is receiving very considerable attention in Canada at the present time, particularly wheat marketing in western Canada. I do not wish to say very much in regard to that, it is in an experimental stage so far, but the indications are that it will vindicate the test and that the results of wheat marketing by co-operative methods will indeed be proved within a year or two in this Dominion, just as other commodities of the farmer have been marketed successfully through co-operative methods. In the province of Saskatchewan in some instances we market our live stock through the initial stages co-operatively. In my own experience we organized a co-operative stock shipping association some ten or twelve years ago. In so far as hogs are concerned, the prices were not very high at that time, but our returns for hogs through shipping co-operatively increased about 33 1/3 per cent immediately over the price we had previously been receiving. As to cattle the returns were not so obvious but they were very satisfactory, and to this extent, that in the district where that stock shipping was organized, for two years after the system was inaugurated no drover shipped a car of stock from that point; the shipments of cattle and hogs were all made co-operatively.

I also wish to mention the co-operative marketing of dairy products. In the province of Saskatchewan we have found that to be a very great success indeed. Although a moment ago I drew the attention of the minister to the need for further activity on his part I would, just at this stage, give him due credit for the part he took in encouraging that system of co-operation in the marketing of dairy products, particularly cream and butter. There can be further co-operation. It has already been proved that co-operation is, to some extent, successful in the purchasing of commodities that are used in large quantities such as binder-twine, building materials and fencing. I am not going to enter into that. I simply mention it as one of the things that has been tried and proved successful as a relief for conditions such as now exist. Then further, co-operation in a community can sometimes be made very valuable and labour-saving can be effected by co-operative efforts, particularly in the matter of the threshing of our grain crop. I think that this is one thing that requires the attention of the farmers themselves, and that efforts should be made along that line.

I come now to the third point, and the one which I wish to stress most in this House, because here we have an opportunity of taking steps along the lines that I indicate; that is, legislative reforms. First of all, I have placed the need of the reduction of federal taxation by the practice of economy in administration. With that simple statement, I think I have lined myself up with the great majority of the members in this House, and I am going to add nothing further at this time. Following that I would suggest an adjustment of the burden of taxation, so that the burden will not fall so heavily on the consumer; and in conjunction with that the adoption of direct methods of taxation. I know that we have many of them at the present time. I favour the adoption of direct methods, so that it will be more clearly indicated who pays the taxes. If I may be pardoned again for diverging from the subject in hand, I cannot help reading an editorial comment from a journal—I suppose it is a very reputable journal—published in Montreal, called the Montreal Pharmaceutical Journal. It is the last issue which I received February, 1924. In this journal a very misleading statement is published, and I am going to offer it to members of this House as something that will not get us anywhere, and something that we should discourage. We should face the facts, and these are not facts—at least they are not all facts. Some of the premises are perhaps facts. This article says—

> Again we reiterate the statement that we are in Canada improperly taxed; that the taxation and various schemes of levy in effect are not alone onerous but depressing and destructive of energy and enterprise.

I think I could agree with that.

> All the revenue required can be derived from a properly constructed customs tariff.

I think hon. members to my right can go that far, but I cannot.

> Taxation levied through that channel applies to all—each and everyone living in the country would become a contributor—whereas to-day there is current to a certain extent a class taxation that is manifestly unfair.

But it does not specify.

> The farmers escape altogether.

I draw the attention of hon. members to that statement.

> Whereas they would be just as happy if they were contributing moderately under the effect of meeting figures for their daily requirements that would constitute this contribution and practically without their being aware of it.

The editor holds that up as an ideal system of taxation. I, Sir, condemn it as being the worst system of taxation we could possibly have, and the sooner we get away from it the better for all.

The third suggestion that I am making in the way of legislative reforms would be the removal of the tariff from the necessaries of life and from the implements of production, as a means of lowering the cost of living. I have already made certain comments along that line and will not further comment.

I have another thing which is not exactly legislation, but which would require legislation if it could be effected. I appeal to the government to keep before them the need for constant endeavour to secure free entry for our goods to our natural market, namely the market of the great republic to the south of us.

Then there should be a thorough investigation of transportation costs, with a view to legislation where necessary to reduce them to a possible minimun. So far as our railways are concerned, I do not suppose that, with our National Railway piling up a deficit year after year, we are likely to get much sympathy in our requests for reductions of rates, but it has already been intimated to the government, not only this session but in past sessions as well, that a revaluation of the capitalization of our Canadian National Railways might place them in a much better situation. I am inclined to believe that it would be proper to proceed along that line. So far as controlling lake transportation is concerned, I would suggest that the government take whatever steps are necessary to prevent a fiasco such as we witnessed last year occurring in the future, and I cannot see any reason in the world why, with a merchant marine at their command, they cannot offer as much competition to those unruly lake carriers as the situation calls for. Speaking of the merchant marine, I think that they could, if they so desired, use it to some extent at least to help us control the ocean transportation costs on our export live stock at least.

There is another suggestion along this same line. I suggest that the grain trade requires even more careful regulation than it has received up to the present time. I would suggest that attention be given to the grading of our grain—that is our wheat—based on its milling values, rather than on the basis which is now used, and also that a further investigation should be made as to the effect of mixing in our terminal elevators on our ultimate market for grain. Then I would suggest, along a different line, that we should proceed with our investigation which was begun last year to try and find a system for providing long term and intermediate term credits. I am not going to enlarge upon it. I would simply point it out. It is one of the things which I consider would render a considerable amount of relief to those suffering under adverse circumstances.

Lastly, I would suggest to the government that new or increased transportation facilities would to a certain extent relieve the difficulties that we suffer under at the present time. There are, Sir, three projects before this House at the present time for consideration; the St. Lawrence deep waterway project, the Pacific route for our grain and the Hudson Bay route.

At this particular time I do not intend to debate the relative value of those routes. I simply suggest to the government that they should investigate very thoroughly the possibilities of those routes, and, before I make any further statement, may I say that the Hudson Bay route cannot be properly investigated until the road is completed to the bay, and I think it is only a fair and just demand of all the agriculturists who are living in western Canada, and who are interested in that route, that the railway be completed to the bay. Then having placed that route on a fair footing with the other routes I think the government should investigate all of them and should develop those that show they would return an adequate interest on the investment made in them. I have made these suggestions, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that I might draw attention to some of the causes of and some of the remedies for the conditions under which agriculture suffers. I have already apologized to the House for the many figures I have imposed upon it, and I trust I will be forgiven for trespassing at such length upon the time of the House.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, last session that great Nestor of debate, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) whose presence we miss so much this year, was able to say, in the Coué spirit, "Things are getting better and better every day." To-day if he were in this House; if he had shared in the responsibility for the introduction of the Address and had listened to the debate so far, I think he would say, "Things are getting gloomier and gloomier all the time." After listening to all the suggestions that have been thrown out as a solution of the desperate condition of this country at the present time we are very much surprised at the tit-bit that was accepted and swallowed by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) when the Address was given and the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was made. In fact, Sir, I never before saw so few oats send the old horse's tail up.

To come to a discussion of the Address, one must condsider the premises given there, the deductions drawn from it and the discussions which have followed. The premise adopted by the government was that of rosy conditions and a prosperous country. To prove their premise and their statement they produced a new member, the hon. member for Cape Breton North (Mr. Kelly), and I would like the House to note at this time his statement in moving the motion. He said:

> I wish to congratulate the people of Canada on having in power a government which has already restored public confidence to such a degree that business conditions have already improved.

There is not a cheer from the government side about this alleged rosy condition of the country. Mr. Speaker, if there is a colour lacking in this bright garment of the government's address, I would commend to them this artist from Cape Breton, because there they will find a fruitful imagination with the possibility of producting almost any desired shade.

Now, Sir, that is his description of this government and the prevailing conditions. Let us follow him on for a few minutes. He says:

> In the province from which I come the coal industry may be termed one of the most important. To-day that industry is in a state of chaos.

Had he spoken about the fishing industry he would have used similar language, and even if he had referred to that other great industry in the Maritime provinces, the deep sea fishing sailboat contest, he would have had no brighter picture to paint than he had in describing the coal industry.

Now, still further to prove this premise of rosy conditions and a prosperous country, we have the speech of the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke), and these are his words:

> Unfortunately, however, this prosperity is in some respects sectional. . . I am sorry to say that agriculture, the basic industry of the country, is not in a satisfactory condition.

To prove further the rosy condition of this country let us look at the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). These are a few of his statements:

> The burden of overhead charges, which is crippling industry and commerce—the deplorable condition of agriculture—unemployment;—the instability of our banks.

If there is anything else he left unmentioned, I would like to know what it is—coal, fishing, agriculture, commerce, transportation, all in the most unsatisfactory condition; and yet the premise of the Speech from the Throne points to us rosy conditions and a prosperous country. But rather, I would say, instead of rosy conditions the statements which have been made are sufficient to indicate a condition of stagnation or retrogression. Repeatedly it has been stated that our population has been decreasing. Emigration has increased from 6,000 up to 15,000 or 16,000 a month. The fisheries in Nova Scotia, through decreased population, have lost about 20 per cent of their strength, and in New Brunswick and Quebec the loss has been about 40 per cent. Taking the population of the large towns which are centres of industry in Ontario, we find that 56 towns in that province show a decrease and only about 13 show an increase, varying from 20 to 100. Take the city of Brantford, one of Ontario's best industrial centres: when this government came into power they found a population in that city of about 31,362. The next year it had decreased to 30,100; to-day it is about 29,000, and if the policy announced by the government prevails, Brantford may be wiped off the map.

The Prime Minister, in referring to this emigration, said that certain officials had been placed—he did not say where or how—and that they had reported that emigrants were returning from the United States. Now, I would like to know where those officials were. I am informed that those who went to the other side from this country were inspected before they went into the factories; if they were found physically fit they were kept, but if they were found physically unfit they were sent back to Canada, and in all likelihood these are the men who, the Prime Minister's officers report are not being lost to Canada. In other words, they are being returned here physically unfit.

The next point made in the Speech from the Throne is this:

> My ministers are strongly of the opinion that reduction of taxation is of first importance, and to this end the efforts already put forth to combine strict economy in the administration of the public services with rigorous retrenchment in public expenditures should be furthered in as many directions as may possible.

You would think, Sir, that this policy had been initiated by the government, whereas the fact is that they have been absolutely driven to it. The reports from all over Canada, in the press and otherwise, have forced them to it. Moreover, in every bank report during 1923 the presidents and general managers have directed attention to this matter. For instance, the president of the Royal Bank points out distinctly that retrenchment is called for and urges an adherence to the policy of spending only on real necessities. The president of the Union Bank, Mr. W. R. Allan, in his report on our troubles, says:

> They are due to two things: first, an excess of restrictive and ill-considered legislation; and secondly, few, if any, pay sufficient attention to those virtues of economy and thrift which were characteristic of our forbears.

Now, the government having been forced to refer to this matter in the Speech, I fear their methods of economy. We have already had laid down by the government a policy of retrenchment in connection with the permanent force of militia in this country. What was that policy? As many men of the permanent force as they dismissed they replaced by civilians. This is the method of economy adopted by the government. They replace permanent men, with experience and training, by civilians with short service. I understand that the same thing is likely to occur in the Civil Service. The government say that these methods must be carried further. What have they done in the way of reducing taxation? The government came into power with a sales tax which brought into the treasury of the country $38,000,000. The first year of their administration they increased it so that there was returned to the treasury some $61,000,000 from the consumers. Last year they economized still further; they reduced taxation to a greater degree, with the result that there was brought into the treasury from the consumers the sum of $94,000,000. Now, if this system of reducing taxation is to be furthered, where will the consumers of this country land, or what dependence will anyone be able to place on promises of the government? In the face of all this, there is nothing but doubt as to the future. All along the line there is a lack of confidence. And what is the cause of this want of confidence which is being echoed in every paper throughout the land almost without reference to politics? What is being ascribed throughout the country as the cause of this condition? The simple explanation is that to-day we have an unstable government; we have what was described this afternoon as a wobbling and insincere government. In proof of that assertion, one need only point to certain things which have taken place in the past. Let me mention three or four examples of the wobbling and the insincerity of the government. A short time ago, with a great deal of éclat, the government announced that the flag had been hoisted on Wrangel island and that it would stay there. Where is it to-day, and by whose order? Take another case. During the last summer we were told that a commission or court went up to Herschel island to try two Eskimos. They went accompanied by a hangman who took the lumber to make the gallows. They were going to try these men, and in order to make sure that they would finish the job, they took the necessary appurtenances with them. A section of the public objected and a statement came from the government in reference to the matter; a messenger was despatched to stop proceedings and a few weeks after another messenger was sent out with word to let things take their course; and just a few days ago we learned that the Eskimos had been hanged. Let us take another illustration,—the Great Lakes Act. This is a very important matter, because for some time members on the government side had repeatedly informed us that they were going to deal with combines. Well, one combine was brought distinctly to their attention,—that in regard to freight rates on the Great Lakes. The government undertook to deal with the situation. Representatives of the steamships came to Ottawa, and you can imagine how they would be received by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), who was going to put an end to combines. Here was one now that was within his power. The combines had been told that they would have to eat crow, because the government would deal very stringently with them. What happened? They passed the act relating to inland water freight rates, section 3 of which reads:

Any carrier by water, operating between Port Arthur or Fort William and any other port in Canada or the United States, must within thirty days of the passing of this act, and before entering into any contract to carry grain, file with the Board of Grain Commissioners a tariff of the charges proposed to be made. If any existing tariff is to be changed, notice of the change with all particulars must be filed with the board.

The penalty for any neglect in this regard or in the case of charges being made higher than those specified is to be not more than $2,000 nor less than $500, or six months' imprisonment. Section 4 of the act provides that that board shall keep a tariff and call for information upon anyone connected with the grain trade, and a penalty is provided not exceeding $1,000 nor less than $200, or three months' imprisonment. Now, the movement of our great wheat crop from the West requires not only all Canadian bottoms, but United States ships as well. This law was enacted without consultation with those people who are acquainted with the traffic, and as a result the United States carriers refused the right of this government to control rates, just as strenuously as they resented the attempted control on the part of their own Interstate Commerce Commission. Here was a combine, and here was the government's method of dealing with it. The Minister of Labour had the instrument ready to put them out of business; the government was going to make them eat crow. But they refused to put their ships in the trade for the transportation of Canadian wheat, and the opposition growing, the government sent Mr. Boyd, the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners, to Winnipeg to consider these complaints and to arrange co-operation. The result of these negotiations was to have one of the Winnipeg brokers wire asking the United States shipowners whether they would enter the trade if the government allowed them largely to ignore the law. Can you imagine anything so ridiculous? Has any Canadian government in the past put itself in such a position as to be obliged to go to the people of the United States and ask them to ignore a law which had been enacted in this parliament? Listen to the reply:

Your message conveys suggestion managers at Cleveland commit themselves to violation or evasion of Canadian law.

Here are the combinesters.

Cleveland owners will not knowingly violate or evade any law. You and other Winnipeg brokers are familiar with the fact that Cleveland managers do not care to discuss laws of Canada which have already been enacted. So far owners have shown no disposition to take Canadian grain when we have negotiated future charters.

I should like hon. members to keep in mind that we are now approaching the time when the burden of transporting this great wheat crop would be thrown upon the carriers of the Great Lakes. The next week, August 8 to 14, saw all sorts of government declarations about the carrying of this grain—the law would be enforced, ships were going to carry it, and so on. August 14 found Mr. Boyd in Cleveland trying to persuade United States ship owners to come to our assistance and evade the law. A Cleveland press despatch of August 15, stated that at a conference the United States ship owners decided not to enter the Canadian grain trade under the terms of the act, and a message to the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada, contained these words:

Informal meeting held to-day and for reason that our ships operate as private carriers, engaged in the competitive business of transporting ore, coal and stone, with occasional grain cargoes, the prevailing opinion is that the action of the Dominion parliament has removed your grain from the class of competitive business subject to free and open competition, which is the only character of business in which the lake bulk freighters of United States registry have heretofore engaged. Under existing conditions the managers do not feel they can comply with the new law, and of course will not operate in violation of it.

Those are the members of this combine which was oppressing Canada, and they are pleaded with to come to our assistance to offset this ill-conceived legislation. The government succeeded in putting the whole trade in a chaotic condition, and, with the exception of a few independent vessel owners, the United States shipping firms refused to come to our assistance when this law, fathered by the government, was found to be impracticable and unworkable. This law was characteristic of much of the legislation passed by the government last session, and it put our trade and commerce in a chaotic condition. The result is that to-day 57,000,000 bushels of our grain are lying in storage at the head of the lakes, every point of storage is crammed, and the railroads are refusing orders eastward. Consequently a lot of our western grain has been exported this summer via Vancouver, and is still going in that direction. Yet the Prime Minister in this House took to himself the credit of sending so much grain by way of that port! To my mind the change is mainly due to this foolish and impracticable legislation.

Now, Sir, another case of wobbling producing chaotic conditions in this country is the attitude of the government in regard to immigration. A year ago the then Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) declared that he had a splendid policy, but I never heard any minister receive such a pummelling as that hon. gentleman received from his own supporters last session when he outlined his policy. This year we were to have another splendid policy of immigration. What does it amount to? Nothing.

What is to be done? The Progressives have come forward with some policies, among others a proposal to complete the Hudson Bay route. The last speaker (Mr. Stewart) and other hon. members have advocated the completion of the road in order to see whether this is a possible route for the export of western grain. I think we have had a little too much of this expenditure of the public money on experimental projects. Before construction is resumed we should have a definite statement respecting the actual conditions. One of the points made by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) was that surely it was a feasible route because the Hudson's Bay Company had used it for some three hundred years. If he would study the history of the Hudson's Bay Company he would find that they did for a period of a hundred and fifty years use the route, but on an average they employed only three small boats in charge of very experienced master mariners, and only from the end of June to the beginning of October. That was the extent of the navigation. If we are to spend any more money on this railway we should have some stronger recommendation than the practice of the Hudson's Bay Company. However, the subject will come up later in the session when we shall have an opportunity to discuss it at length.

The Progressives complain of the lack of interest shown by the East in the West. Now, Sir, the history of this country proves that the opposite is nearer the truth. The East has never shown a lack of interest in the West; in fact there would never have been a West to-day had it not been for the sacrifice made by eastern Canada. The Hudson's Bay Company did bring out a few settlers, and through the efforts of the Earl of Selkirk a small colony was planted in Manitoba. But from the time confederation was under consideration eastern Canada became interested in the condition of these settlers and advanced all the money which was paid over to the Hudson's Bay Company for the relinquishment of their charter rights. Then the question was raised of how to bring the western settlers into touch with eastern Canada and ocean transportation. At that time the trend of trade was all from the central provinces to the Atlantic ocean, and so proposals were discussed and adopted by the then sparsely settled East in the interests of the West.

In 1874 Alexander Mackenzie, leading the Liberal government of that day proposed to connect the West from the Rocky mountains to the head of the Great Lakes by a canal system. Fortunately that foolish programme never was gone on with; but if there had been some Progressives in parliament at that time they would have supported it and said: Let us build it and see what it can do—just the same as they do to-day in regard to the Hudson Bay railway. In the 80's the proposal came from Sir John A. Macdonald to construct a railway, and the Canadian Pacific railway took shape. The subsidies given to that railway consisted of 25,000,000 acres of land. I suppose the Progressives might say: That land was ours; it belonged to the West. But again let me remind them that it was the money of eastern Canada which purchased that land from the Hudson's Bay Company, and all that was at stake was put up by the people of eastern Canada. Cash aid was also given the Canadian Pacific Railway to the amount of $35,000,000.

In 1903 there was started from Winnipeg the building of what later became the Canadian Northern railway. In 1903 this government guaranteed £1,900,000, at 3 per cent, for fifty years to build a road from Gilbert Plains to Edmonton, a distance of 620 miles, and the Prince Albert branch, of 100 miles, at a cost of $13,000 a mile. In 1908 a further guarantee was given to the same road of £1,622,000, at 3½ per cent, for fifty years. This was to aid in the building of roads from Regina to the Manitoba border, a distance of 152 miles, from Saskatoon to Calgary, 175 miles, from Prince Albert to Battleford, 132 miles, from Manitoba to Rosthern, 100 miles, and the Rossburn line of 50 miles—in all some 4,500 miles of railway, at a cost of about $13,000 a mile.

In 1911 a further guarantee was given to this road of £7,490,000, at 3½ per cent, for another fifty years, and in 1910, a further guarantee of £647,000, at 3½ per cent, was made for the Canadian Northern Alberta railway. In 1912 a further guarantee was given to the Canadian Northern Alberta railway for the construction of 115 miles to the Yellowhead pass, at a cost of $35,000 a mile, or $4,025,000.

These were guarantees by the then Dominion of Canada, with the burden altogether resting on the people of eastern Canada, and they were given to provide some kind of transportation facilities for the settlers of the West, to open up the West for immigration, and to provide means for the settlers getting their produce to market. In addition to that, and in further support of this road in getting an eastern terminus, Ontario gave it land grants amounting to $10,000,000, bonds amounting to $7,860,000 and subsidies amounting to $2,000,000. The province of Quebec also gave it land grants amounting to $3,000,000, and subsidies amounting to $3,413,000.

Coming down to 1903, the Grand Trunk Pacific Act was introduced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in that year, and the aim was to provide a competitive line so that there would not be any monopoly of railroads in this country, but rather competition in rates from the West. Canada was to support that road to the extent of $45,000,000, and a further grant of $20,000,000 towards the first equipment. The government was to guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific for the construction of the western section to the extent of—remember this— 75 per cent of the cost of construction. Notwithstanding the fact that all this was generosity on the part of eastern Canada, indicating the interest the people of the East had in the development of the West, there was the other 25 per cent to be accounted for. The older members of the House, especially the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) know well that that other 25 per cent for the remainder of the construction was placed upon the old Grand Trunk, and as the old Grand Trunk only ran through eastern Canada that burden fell largely on the people of eastern Canada.

Now what was all this money guaranteed to the people of the West for? Did it indicate, or does it indicate, any lack of interest on the part of the East in the development of the West? In the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in introducing the bill, it was the desire of eastern Canada to develop the West, to attend to the needs and requirements of that fast growing country. He said:

> It is not of to-morrow but of to-day, of this hour and of this minute. Heaven grant it be not already too late. Heaven grant that whilst we tarry or dispute, the trade of Canada is not diverted to other channels.

All these future debts went to aid the farmers of the West in transporting their products to market, to carry settlers to the West, and to aid in the development of the great West. Yet we hear that this eastern portion of this great Dominion is lacking in interest in the needs of the West. After the figures I have given, and in view also of the relief that we are giving the West at the present time, I do not think that charge can be supported.

Just a few words in conclusion as to the policy that is advocated in this House by the West. We have the policy of the Liberal government in power to-day. If the policy on which the government is acting to-day is continued, how will it affect the agriculturists of this country? If Canadian citizens are leaving this country at the rate of fifteen or sixteen thousand a month, what will that mean to the agriculturists of this country? The ordinary labourer on the land can gather up his small effects, pull up stakes, and leave the country with his family at little cost to himself. The skilled artisan in this country can at very little cost pull up stakes, cross the border and leave us with a lessened population. But what position is the agriculturist in if he stays here and sees our population steadily decreasing? Let us suppose for a minute that it does decrease, and goes on decreasing; what is the prospect for us, and I would like to draw the attention of the agriculturist to this fact. If our population continues to decrease where will the money come from to pay the debt of this country? It must be laid upon the agriculturist who has to remain in the country. One part of this country cannot suffer without all parts suffering. We believe that the policy we have to-day, and the policy which leads us to bring forward this amendment to the Address, speaks to the agriculturist in this way: The debt of this country is very large and under the present government it is increasing, increasing in two years by nearly $100,000,000.

The labouring men are leaving the Dominion, and consequently greater taxation must fall on the agriculturist. We propose to overcome that by the application of protection to all parts of this country. In past years it used to be thought that only the manufacturing industries benefited by protection, but the operations of our commerce, as shown by the figures quoted by different speakers during the present debate, indicate that agricultural industries are suffering just as much as manufacturing industries, and that the former require protection just as much as the latter. Hence we say that the only policy that can relieve this country from the deepening gloom of which many hon. gentlemen have made mention, and which the newspapers have dilated upon, is a policy of protection, not only to the manufacturer but to the agriculturist.

And what do we ask in addition? We ask the government to stop what I would call "the mad dog" policy which it is pursuing at the present time. The newspapers of the country, the bankers and other personages urge upon them retrenchment. "Yes," the government said "we will retrench. We will begin with the Auditor General. We will retrench his salary from $6,000 to $15,000. We will place that official in charge of the rest of the retrenchments. We will place him in charge of putting out the little fish, of throwing out the little fellow, with a salary of $1,000 a year. This is the man who is to be thrown out and the man with an increase of $9,000 a year is to have charge of the work." Not only that but I understand an order has gone out to the deputy ministers to retrench, to cut 25 per cent off their estimates, to cut 25 per cent off here and there. It is, as I said before, a mad dog policy. The government are biting here and biting there; they have no order or system whatever in regard to their retrenchments.

We also ask the government to lessen the income tax. We do not say that the income tax should be abolished in its entirety, but we have gone so far in this method of taxation to-day that people are afraid to go any further in the direction of developing industry. They are afraid to put their money into any work that will give employment to others in this country. If we do nothing else we can surely lessen the income tax of those who are producing work, who are carrying out development in this country to some extent, and give them some relief so that the money now being taken from them will be placed back in industry and help to further develop the industrial life of the country.

We also say to the government: Spend less money on undesirable and inexcusable immigration policies. It is a sad state of affairs to-day that people are being brought out to Canada when there is no work for them. I am not speaking now of the harvesters who were induced to come to Canada, but a few weeks ago it was my experience to meet six of the finest Scottish lads I ever saw. They had been brought out to Canada by a notice in the paper saying that there was work to be found in this country. They had put up all the money they had to reach the Dominion only to find that conditions here were just about as bad as they were in the Old Country. It is possible that some of the people brought here have been provided with employment, but how many of them have only swollen the ranks of the unemployed by coming to Canada.

Now, Sir, I have spoken of this administration as a wobbling government, a vacillating government. Many parts of Canada are awaiting an answer as to what the government intend to do in regard to certain issues. There is, for example, a demand for the deepening of the St. Lawrence, for the completion of the Welland canal, for the selection of a terminal for the Great Lakes development. If the present policy of the government continues there will be no necessity for them to act more speedily than they are now doing. There will be no industries to demand the electrical current which the province of Ontario expects to obtain from the St. Lawrence waterway development. There will be no need for any further increase of electrical power in the Welland canal district. In cities like Brantford industries will perhaps close, the wheels of the mills there will no longer be grinding and turning. Even now the outlook is by no means so rosy as the Speech from the Throne declares. But there is one thing we do expect, unless the government take so long to consider their policy that the people in their anger will rise and cast them out, and that is that some day they will give an answer to the various great questions which are being pressed upon them by the people of Canada.

On motion of Mr. Speakman the debate was adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—WEDNESDAY SITTING.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister) moved that when the House adjourns it stand adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 12, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—SCRIP

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: This bill seeks to repeal section 20 of chapter 25 of the Statutes of 1921. An explanatory note with regard to section 20 says: The effect of the above section amending the Criminal Code was that no prosecution for an offence against the code, or action for penalties or forefeiture, should be commenced after the expiration of three years from the time of its commission if such offence related to or arose out of the location of land which was paid for in whole or in part by scrip or was granted upon certificates issued to half-breeds in connection with the extinguishment of Indian title.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING BILL

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, respecting Quartz Mining in the Yukon Territory.

He said: The object of the bill is to consolidate in an act of parliament various regulations. At present these regulations are contained in a large number of orders in council. The proposed act entails no radical change in the law or the system of administration. Its object is to settle the law and put it on a sound and intelligible basis.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT, 1907, AMENDMENT.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

He said: The amendments to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act here proposed, in sections 15, 57 and 58, do not introduce any new features into the present statute, but are intended simply to make clear at one or two points what has been regarded, since the passing of the act, as the obvious intention of these particular sections.

Mr. CHURCH: Will this bill interfere with litigation now before the Privy Council?

Mr. MURDOCK: Not at all, I would think.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CARILLON POWER DEVELOPMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. C. ST. PERE (Hochelaga): May I ask the Minister of Railways if any correspondence has been exchanged between the government and the National Hydro-Electric Company regarding power development at Carillon? If the answer is in the affirmative, what is the attitude of the government with regard to the demands made by such company?

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister): I am not sure as to the name of the company, but in 1910 or 1911 a lease was given for a small development of the Carillon power. In 1921 that lease was renewed with very much extended powers providing for a very considerable development. An application has been made for a still further extension of the powers contained in that lease, and the Department of Railways, through its chief engineer, is now studying just what the application means.

PROTECTION OF FORESTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior if the government has received from any provincial government, since the beginning of the year, an application to assist in protecting its forests from fire or insects?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): No, we received no demand, but there has been considerable discussion about co-operative action.

REFUND TO IMMIGRANTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I observe in the press an intimation that the government's immigration efforts, or a part of them, consist in paying $15 to certain classes of immigrants on arrival in Canada. Is that the money of the country, or is that money that is being virtually refunded by the steamship companies?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): It is not the money of the government. We have effected an arrangement with the transatlantic steamers whereby they give a rebate of twenty per cent of the passage money. That would mean $15 on a $75 ticket, and a proportionate amount on a half-fare ticket. The immigrant pays his full fare at the point of embarkation, and when he reaches Quebec or Montreal, or St. John, New Brunswick or any Canadian point, the steamship companies themselves, from their own funds, refund the twenty per cent; this being conditional, may I add, upon the immigrant declaring that it is his intention to settle in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What steamship companies have been good enough to do this?

Mr. ROBB: I had a conference with all the steamship companies;—I think they are all doing it—all the steamship companies operating. This arrangement applies to immigrants from the United Kingdom only.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Sutherland, resumed from Tuesday, March 11.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in discussing the question now before the House, the Speech from the Throne and the implications contained therein, it is perhaps inevitable that we must all approach it from what might be called a local point of view, to some extent at least. This is perhaps inevitable, for we are all influenced by our home surroundings; we are more completely conversant with the circumstances in our own districts; and we are all primarily representing the opinions and the viewpoints of the voters in our own constituencies. I am encouraged, however, by this fact: That that point of view is not peculiar to myself and it is not peculiar to the members in this corner of the House, it is a point of view which is shared and expressed by practically every member of this House who speaks. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) frankly proclaimed that he expressed the sentiments of the city of Montreal. The members from Toronto speak with an atmosphere decidedly Torontonian. The members from the Maritime provinces, from the central provinces, and from British Columbia, each expressed to the House the opinions of the people of those provinces, the views and circumstances of their own people. And perhaps that is not to be deplored; for when we come here to endeavour to lay before the House suggestions, to endeavour to bring forward a national policy which will fit, and which will develop all parts of Canada, it is necessary that we should understand the problems applying to all parts of Canada; and as each man speaks and presents the viewpoint of his own part of the country, we are able to gather together the fragmentary portions from which we can make a composite picture of our country as a whole, and that is I think to be desired. But I think it is also the fact, Mr. Speaker, that, while speaking from our own viewpoint we should at least attempt to approach our subject from a national viewpoint also, because, after all, every man and woman of average intelligence recognizes this great outstanding fact, that in the present age at least we are not living isolated lives, separate and apart from the lives led by men of other occupations in other regions, or indeed in other countries. Occupationally, and regionally we are interdependent, and all our problems are to a large extent co-related; and so it comes to pass that a selfish and narrow policy will react upon the people or upon the section who propose or who carry into effect such a policy. No gain is to be derived eventually to any part of this country, or indeed I think I can say to any part of the world, which is a definite loss and disadvantage for other people, for this reason: Taking it from our point of view as farmers, we know we can only prosper as other people from other occupations in this and other parts of the world are able to buy our goods and pay a reasonable price for them, which means that we can only prosper in proportion as the rest of this country and as the rest of the world prospers. We have had a very evident illustration of this fact during the last years when the unfortunate disorganization, the tremendous depression which has taken place in industrial Europe, has been reflected so accurately, so inevitably upon our own conditions here; showing that through the improvement in transportation, and the improvement in means of communication we are all now part of one great world society, whether we desire to recognize the fact or whether we do not.

In discussing the Speech itself, the first statement made is worthy of great consideration. I refer to the part in which it is stated that this country is gradually emerging from the slough of despond in which we have been plunged, and is attaining a comparative degree of prosperity. It is a consummation devoutly to be wished and to be hoped for, and to the extent to which it is true it is a consummation on which this country may very well congratulate itself. In regard to national prosperity, apparently there are some signs of such condition. It is shown in the increase in our trade, both export and import, particularly export. It is shown in the improving of the condition of our national railways. It is shown in the increase in our national revenue. It is forecasted in the statement that we shall probably have a balanced budget. All these things are pleasant to us, and are subjects in which we may agree. The question however is, upon analysis, how far this apparent national prosperity is reflected in private business and in our individual lives, and when we turn to that aspect of affairs I am afraid the picture is not so pleasant. Speaking for the occupation in which I am most interested, and which I understand most thoroughly, we know here that agriculture is not sharing at the present time in that prosperity. I do not propose to dwell upon that fact. The facts have been laid before this House clearly and well time and time again. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Stewart) yesterday in a most excellent speech laid the facts before us in a manner with which I shall not attempt to compete. The facts may be taken for granted. But are they any better in other occupations and in other parts of Canada? Judging by the reports which we see in the press, and judging from communications from manufacturing concerns with which every member of the House is being deluged, and judging by the statements emanating from different parts of the House, from gentlemen representing these occupations and districts, we must inevitably come to the conclusion that the depression which commenced with agriculture is now finding its way to our industrial centres, and, with very few exceptions, no business in the country is prospering now as it should prosper.

It is interesting to consider why such a state of affairs should exist now in a country which is universally acknowledged to be naturally so rich and so promising a country.

But before I touch on that, before I offer any suggestions of any kind I should like, with your permission, to make a few comments upon the address delivered yesterday by the eloquent member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion). We in this corner of the House are accustomed to look forward with pleasure and to listen with interest to what he has to say. He has impressed us on former occasions as being a man who, while holding his own views, is willing to speak without partisan bitterness, who is willing to give utterance to his opinions without reflecting upon other people, to give us facts which are accurate, to give us logic which will stand analysis. But I must frankly confess that in the address delivered yesterday we were disappointed. We did not find in that address, however eloquent it was, to any great extent those qualities which we are accustomed to look for in the remarks which come from that quarter. Facts were given, the accuracy of which might well be doubted; deductions were drawn which, to my mind at least, were hardly logical, and conclusions were arrived at which, in my opinion at any rate, were somewhat fallacious.

As to that part of his address which dealt with the shortcomings of the present government, their sins of omission and commission, their broken promises, their wobbling policies, I shall not deal. It is no part of my place here to defend the present occupants of the government benches. I leave that to them. But I may remark, in passing, on a somewhat peculiar discrepancy in one of the hon. gentleman's remarks, where first, while he did not make the direct statement, he drew the inference that the policy or the lack of policy of the present government was responsible to a large extent for the present depression in Canada. Further on, he also made the statement that our trouble now and the present depression which had fallen upon agriculture, was due and due almost wholly to the war and the effects of the war. Either of those two statements might be true; both connot be accurate. May I say, in parenthesis, in speaking of the effect of the war upon the present state of this country, it has become habitual in this House, when discussing our depression or any discouraging conditions with which we are faced, to refer them to the war, to say that the war caused this, was responsible for that, and to imply at least that in the pre-war days we had the golden age of prosperity when all men prospered, when privation and unemployment were unknown?

Mr. MANION: I might straighten out what the hon. member has said, because I think he is unintentionally misquoting me? What I stated was that farming conditions in the West were due to world conditions following the war. I was pointing out that the tariff had little to do with conditions in the West, and I said, according to my recollection—and I think it is accurate—that conditions in the farming communities in the West were more due to world conditions, transportation rates, general conditions, than to the tariff. I do not think I was speaking of conditions in Canada generally. Earlier in my remarks, I gave reasons for conditions in Canada in general.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation. In his opinion, at least, the present depression is not due to the war. I will go on with my argument. When we look back into the years immediately preceding the war, the conditions in this country from the beginning of this century, we are struck by two great facts. In the early years of the century, we find a state of great prosperity and development in this country, and I am not one who believes that prosperity and development were dependent upon or brought about to any great extent by any governmental policy. It was a natural development. At that time the lure of free lands in the West was drawing immigrants by tens of thousands to Canada. At that time a great transportation system was in process of development. Building was going on; enormous investments were being made, and work was assured on remunerative terms to practically every able-bodied man who came here willing to work. Under those conditions prosperity was inevitable, unemployment should have been and indeed, to a large extent, was unknown. But in the years immediately preceding the war, was that condition actually in effect? I think not. The same round of events was taking place then that is taking place now. In 1910, it came to a head as regards the agricultural population of this country in that famous siege of Ottawa when representatives of agriculture from all parts of Canada descended upon this parliament, impressing their needs, showing their disabilities and demanding remedial legislation. Subsequently to that,—I am not saying consequential upon that—and incidentally, coincident with that fact, came the election of 1911, fought along the lines of reciprocity. Reciprocity was, as of course you are all aware, defeated. But in spite of the defeat of reciprocity, in the next year and prior to the summer of 1914, the depression which commenced in our agricultural communities had, as at the present time, reached our industrial centres, and anyone who looks back—and I am speaking now of facts that are within the knowledge of every hon. member here—to the winter of 1913-14, for instance, or to the summer preceding that, will remember the enormous amount of unemployment, the tremendous problems in Winnipeg and other large centres to cope with that situation, the cry that went up from every business house in this country as to the lessening and, in some cases, the wiping out altogether of profits and the danger of bankruptcy. We remember those times, and the war when it came did not immediately aggravate that situation. On the contrary, it largely alleviated that situation. There could be no unemployment when half a million of our best men had left this country. Due to enormous demands for our products of all kinds, manufactured and agricultural, a great artificial stimulus was given during the years of the war, a stimulus of course, depending upon borrowed money, a stimulus which could not and should not have continued. But my point is this, that at that time the war alleviated and delayed the depression which was already upon us. We are now facing the depression again, not as a direct consequence of the war, but enhanced immeasurably because of the effects of the war. We are facing the same struggle that we faced then, with the addition of an enormously increased public debt, a consequently, enormously increased taxation, and more than that, with the complete disorganization of the economic and business life of the whole world, not just in Canada, but in other countries to which we were accustomed to look for our markets. The war did not cause our present troubles, but it has accentuated them. I think that is a fair statement to make.

Let me return to the address of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman took occasion to refer to the lack of intelligence on the part of members in this corner of the House in accepting with what he described "indecent haste"—the words being applied to our leader, —the overtures of the Liberal government, in accepting promissory notes which the government had no intention of ever paying, in selling our birthright for a mess of pottage which was never going to be delivered, for accepting the Micawber-like promises of the present government. I will perhaps pass over the question of indecent haste, because that, after all, is a matter of opinion. But when I look at the statement actually made by my leader in which he lays before the House our position, when he says:

> The Progressives are ready to support progressive measures whenever such measures come before the House. If the government are prepared to present these measures for our consideration they know that they shall get our support; if they do not, then they will have to take the consequence.

Can that be regarded as accepting a promise with indecent haste? In my opinion it is rather occupying the position of watchful waiting.

Mr. MANION: I was not referring to that speech at all; I was referring to an interview given by the hon. member's leader (Mr. Forke) some days before to the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. FORKE: Will the hon. member kindly tell us what that statement was? I do not know what it was.

Mr. MANION: I am not on the floor at present. The statement was made and quoted all over the country in every newspaper through the Associated Press. Does the hon. member deny that he gave an interview to the Free Press?

Mr. FORKE: I do not remember any interview.

Mr. MANION: It was given.

Mr. FORKE: Nor do I remember the hon. member making that statement in his speech.

Mr. MANION: That is what I was referring to.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Perhaps my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) was referring to a statement, which I remember reading in the press, in which my leader was quoted as having stated that we would maintain a position of "benevolent neutrality." Probably that is the statement to which reference is made. Well, what is benevolent neutrality after all? It means in this case simply sitting tight, but prepared in a fair-minded way to weigh the measures that may come before the House. That is my interpretation of benevolent neutrality. Should we take up a position of hostile neutrality, ready at any moment to attack all measures that may be submitted, and attack them even before they come before the House for consideration? Should we take it for granted that such measures will not be acceptable in any event? It all is in keeping with the attitude assumed since the beginning of this parliament by some hon. members to my right,—I do not say by all,—that we are here not as independents but as a sort of adjunct to the Liberal party. And what is the interpretation given to independence by hon. gentlemen to my right? As far as I can gather, an independent, in their opinion, is a man who on all occasions will vote against the present government and with the Conservative party. That however is not my opinion of an independent, nor is it the opinion of the men who sent me here to represent them. The people whom I represent want me to do one thing and one thing only, and that is to weigh to the best of my ability the measures that come before this House, whether proposed by Liberals or Conservatives, and, if I find them, from the point of view of those who elected me, to be in the best interests of the country, to give them my support.

The hon. member then pointed out, and I think rightly, that there was a depressed condition among many of the manufacturers. I believe he is accurately informed in that respect; I believe they are in a depressed condition. But he went on to state that the manufacturers were suffering from the fact that the price of labour is about half the price in Great Britain that it is in Canada; that is to say, in Britain, a free trade country, wages are very low. In the next column he is reported as saying that they were unable to compete with France because in that country, one of the most highly protected countries in the world, wages were even lower than in Great Britain. And again it has been stated, although I do not think directly by the hon. member but by other members in his party, that the manufacturers here are unable to compete with the manufacturers of the United States, which is a protected country, where wages are on a much higher level than they are in Canada.

Mr. MARLER: Is the hon. member taking into consideration the question of the depreciated currency in France?

Mr. HOEY: The hon. member is not at the moment replying to my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes, I have considered that question. But let me ask hon. members: Were wages in France previous to the war lower or higher than they were in Great Britain? They were lower. Were the manufacturers in this country any more prepared to meet the competition of France prior to the war than they are now? They were not. And at that time there was no question of a depreciated currency at all. Let me ask hon. members this question. If our manufacturers cannot compete with free trade Great Britain because of low wages there; if they cannot compete with protectionist France because of a depreciated currency and low wages there; and if they cannot compete with the United States where wages are higher than they are here, as is evidenced by the exodus of our industrial population from Canada to the United States, then in heaven's name with whom can they compete? I have a great deal of sympathy with the manufacturers because I know myself what it is for one to be unable to sell one's goods at a profit. I want to see the manufacturers sell their goods at a profit. But is it a quality inherent in Canadian manufacturers that they are unable to compete with the manufacturers of other countries? Is it due to any lack of efficiency? To what cause is it due? It cannot be due altogether to a restricted market, because the point has been taken also in reference to our manufacturers of farm implements, and if I understand correctly they have a larger possible market than the manufacturers of farm implements in the United States inasmuch as there is no tariff on our goods of that particular manufacture going to the United States.

We come then to a statement which from my reading of history is hardly historically accurate. The most serious statement which the hon. member has made has reference to the position occupied by Great Britain both previously and subsequently to the year 1846. The statement was made by the hon. gentleman that Great Britain built up such an organization under protection previously to 1846 that by the momentum thus acquired she was able to carry on successfully under free trade circumstances during the later years. Now what are the facts, at least as I read them? Of course I am speaking now purely from the historical point of view; I did not live in England at that time nor did my hon. friend, and so we both have to go by what we read. When I look back over that period I interpret the facts in this manner. About the end of the eighteenth century manufacturing on a large scale, industrialism as we know it to-day, practically had its origin; it began when steam was applied to the great industries. At that time really effective and efficient machinery was first brought into use and England by reason of her situation was able first to take advantage of that opportunity. She was able first to make use of that improved machinery to develop herself to a certain extent along the manufacturing line. Then followed the Napoleonic wars, before England had developed to any great extent and before Europe had been able to follow her example to any extent. For a quarter of a century there was a delay, a retardation of development. There was to a certain extent a depression in Europe; and England, through having already organized to some extent to take advantage of the improved machinery, was able to profit. But as time went on, as that source of profit diminished, as competition came into force, what were the conditions which we find in Great Britain immediately prior to 1846? When we read English history we find the period that has been aptly called the hungry forties, those years when unemployment was rampant there to an extent never known since; when the poorhouses of the old land were filled; when men were walking the streets in processions bearing this banner: "Give us work or give us bread." when they were subsisting, partially at least, by public doles even outside the poorhouses. That was the situation then, a situation which was even more serious than that with which they are faced at the present time. Because of that condition of affairs, because of the fact that under the protective tariff which then prevailed the people were unable to find employment and therefore were unable to buy bread, that great man, Richard Cobden, came forward and began his long, heroic campaign for the repeal of the Corn Laws. For years he carried on that campaign, aided by the growing dissatisfaction throughout the country, aided, too, it is true, by the depression of industry and the poverty of the people. Had there been prosperity Richard Cobden's efforts would have been in vain. Indeed, had everything been smiling and prosperous he would never have felt the need for undertaking that great work. He undertook it because of the distressing conditions under protection, and eventually his efforts were crowned with success, and the Corn Laws were repealed.

Mr. MARLER: Might I ask my hon. friend what British industry was the most protected at that time?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The farming industry was most protected at that time. But the hon. member stated that under protection England was flourishing, and due to the impetus given during that time she was able to carry on through the free trade years following. That is the statement I am answering. Conditions reached such a crisis that the Conservative government was obliged by the force of public opinion to introduce free trade, and under that policy England's prosperity grew by leaps and bounds. Her population in the seventy years following 1846 practically doubled, and her trade multiplied many fold. Then the hon. member compared the prosperity before free trade with the prosperity afterwards. I think the facts as I have stated them are historically accurate; they are known to every hon. member and capable of proof by everyone.

That, however, was simply by way of parenthesis. In this connection the hon. member made another statement—rather it was an expression of opinion, and as such I have no quarrel with it at all. He expressed the opinion that if Mr. Baldwin had taken three months, instead of three weeks, to educate the people of Great Britain to the fallacies of free trade, he would have succeeded, to England's very great benefit. Of course, the hon. member has a perfect right to that opinion, but I would ask him again if he has any historical backing for such a view. If I remember rightly—and it was not so very long ago—another great English statesman,

Joseph Chamberlain, set out upon the same crusade. He resigned from the government in order to give himself a free hand, and for three years following 1903—not three months—he laboured with an eloquence at least equal to that of Mr. Baldwin's, with an eloquence at least equal to that of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River; he laboured for three years to convert the British people from their attachment to free trade to his idea of protection. With what result? In the 1906 general election the Conservative government was swept out of power by an enormous majority of free trade votes. That is an historic precedent.

Mr. BROWN: Is the hon. member aware that, according to newspaper reports, the Conservative party, recognizing the wilderness into which they have wandered by their advocacy of protection, have repudiated it?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have read such reports, yes. Now, one more statement regarding conditions in Great Britain, unfortunately only too true as to the amount of unemployment there under free trade. Two million idle men have been walking the streets. I think perhaps the number is a little less now, but it is far too great still. But is that unfortunate condition due to free trade, or is it due to other factors? It seems to me that it is due, to a large extent at least, to elements entirely apart from free trade. To begin with, what country amongst the English-speaking nations of the world carried such a ponderous load during the war as did Great Britain? What country made such enormous financial sacrifices, not only to carry on her own part of the struggle but also to finance her allies? But in spite of these tremendous efforts what country is making such heroic endeavours to become again solvent, to meet her debts as they become due, to overcome the difficulties with which she is confronted? Whatever other factors may enter into our consideration of unemployment and industrial depression in Great Britain, to my mind the great outstanding factor is the dislocation of her markets as one of the after effects of the war. The disorganization of Europe has almost destroyed one of Great Britain's chief markets, and this disorganized condition has, in my opinion, been aggravated by the multiplicity of protective walls due to the Balkanizing of the Continent, preventing any reciprocal trade agreements and interrupting, and indeed blocking, the former channels of commerce. This I believe is one of the chief causes of the present insolvent condition of Europe, and the unfortunate effects I believe will continue until the cause is removed.

The hon. member stated, and it was concurred in by others in his part of the House:

> Some of them take the attitude—I do not attribute it to all of them—that the only wealth produced in Canada is that produced on the prairie farms.

I challenge him or any other hon. member to name a single member in this section of the House by whom such a statement has been made. I have never heard it, and I have followed the debates fairly closely. On the face of it the suggestion is too absurd to be taken seriously. The hon. gentleman proceeded:

> Well I submit that the man who takes the raw leather and turns it into boots and shoes is just as much a creator of wealth as the man who raises the animals from which the leather was taken.

Of course, he is a producer of wealth. Any man who does an honest day's work, who improves or creates any article, is a producer of wealth. We all know that, and nothing is to be gained by such trite statements.

The next observation made by the hon. member was in reference to a statement which he attributed to the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) although I think it was another hon. member, but that does not matter. He attributed to that hon. member the opinion that having tried out protection for forty years, if at the end of that period our manufacturers could not stand on their own feet, they should go out of business, or words to that effect; and our critic suggested that that was as unfair, un-Christian and un-Canadian as to suggest to the farmer who, after years of drouth, and notwithstanding unremitting hard work, found himself obliged to ask the government for assistance to buy seed, that he should go out of business.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that that is exactly a parallel case. If any farmer in my country had been bonused by the government for ten, fifteen, twenty or forty years, had been able to receive artificially enhanced prices for so long through the action of the government, and then found himself in such a position that he could not farm at a profit, I say that that man ought to go and do something else that he could do better.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Is it not a fact that a few years ago the Alberta government refused to extend further the seed grain assistance to farmers?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes, they refused it; they found they had gone as far as they could go. I will leave that subject with one further comment. In regard to the suggestion that we were willing to sell ourselves for a mess of pottage, willing to sell ourselves for seventeen cents, I think the statement was, I want to say that it is hardly in accord with some of the statements made by certain hon. gentlemen during recent campaigns in the Maritime provinces, when it was alleged that the government had sacrificed the interests of Canada as a whole and of the Maritime provinces in particular, had sold the public good to the Progressives for their vote and had delivered the goods. Either statement might be correct, but both cannot be. I do not intend to enter into the merits of that election, but some of the statements that were made during the campaign, including certain statements of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter)—I regret to say it in his absence—were not calculated to promote unity and harmony in this country. To my mind it was the most outstanding evidence of parochialism in politics that it has ever been my bad fortune to see.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman, in justice to the hon. member for St. John, should at least quote the statements, and he could also quote some from the hon. member who is now Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin).

Mr. GAUVREAU: What he said is known now all over the country.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: My only reason for referring—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked the hon. member to quote them.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It is a very easy thing to ask me to quote them when I have not the newspapers here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be a lot fairer, seeing that the hon. member for St. John is not here.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: My only reason for speaking of any one man was this: His addresses were reported, whether accurately or inaccurrately, in every newspaper in western Canada, and they were the only ones that were quoted. Had remarks equally parochial been made by any other man of any other party and had they come to my notice, I would have referred to them just the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No danger.

Mr. GRAHAM: The question is, were they parochial?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have said all I wish to say about the address of the hon. member. I hope I have done him no injustice; I have at least expressed my own opinions and my own feelings on the matter.

[Mr. Speakman.]

I wish now to turn to some of the suggestions which have been made in the Speech from the Throne with a view to 4 p.m. alleviating the conditions which we all agree now face this country. The first suggestion made, and one of some importance, is that of economy. I shall not dilate upon that theme. The government will receive the support of every member of this House, I think, in any measure of wise economy which they bring forward. It is most desirable that there should be a cutting down of unnecessary public expenditure, and a reduction of the personnel in governmental service until each man and each woman does a fair day's work, if they are not doing it now—I am not acquainted with the facts. I do not advocate reductions of pay to the average man or woman; I believe in the principle which has been enunciated again and again that the labourer is worthy of his hire and that every man and every woman employed by the government should receive fair, decent pay and should give in return a fair, decent day's work.

Economy, of course, can be wise economy or unwise economy. Economy carried to such an extent that the public service would be starved and rendered inefficient might be termed unwise economy. There are times when developments are necessary for the carrying on of the business of the country, and each one of these expenditures, each one of these developments, must be considered as a business investment. I am not in favour of making grants of public money as such except under extraordinary circumstances. I am in favour of public money being loaned at times on such terms and to assist in such development as will bring an adequate return, not only in business, but in business that is sufficiently profitable to enable the setting aside of an interest and sinking fund on the amount loaned. From this point of view the matter could be considered as a strictly business investment. For instance—I simply mention this case because the facts are known to me—we have the case of Montreal, where the money loaned is scrupulously returned; the development is proceeding adequately and in all parts of the country there is a certain amount of satisfaction.

I would like to refer to three outstanding problems which not only face the people of the West and those of my own occupation but which directly and indirectly bear most heavily upon all the people. First is the problem of taxation. I shall speak briefly on those topics which have already been covered by other speakers, notably by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Stewart), who dealt with them ably and eloquently. There are two or three points in this connection which might well be repeated, for the purpose not of reiteration but of endorsation and emphasis.

Speaking of taxation, we know that we are taxed heavily, and we know also that we must continue to be taxed heavily. Economy will effect some slight reduction in public expenditure, but the reduction can only be comparatively small, because a large part of our revenue is now taken up in the payment of interest and fixed charges which we cannot lessen and a large part of it is unavoidable expenditure which it would be folly to omit. Only a small portion of it, therefore, is susceptible of the application of measures of economy. Speaking offhand, I believe that if we could economize to the extent of twenty or twenty-five millions we would be doing very well, and that after all is a very small percentage of our taxation as a whole. The question, then, becomes one rather of how these taxes can best be levied and how they can best be paid so that business will be disorganized to the least possible extent and so that as little hardship as possible will be inflicted upon the individual. In that connection I am afraid I must differ from a good many members of the House who have spoken. Speaking from the point of view of taxation alone, commodity taxation, whether it be by tariff or by sales tax, is neither a fair nor an efficient form of taxation. During the last session of the House I had the pleasure of meeting some of the leading bankers of the United States, who were in this country gathering information as to the effect of the Canadian sales tax on the different industries of this country. They had approached the different business organizations and they gave me an opportunity of expressing my views in the form of a memorandum, part of which I wish to quote. I was asked only two questions: What in my opinion was the effect of the sales tax upon agriculture, and what was the expressed opinion of the organized farmers of the West in that regard. What I said in that memorandum about the sales tax applies with about equal force to the tariff or to any other form of commodity taxation, that is, to any form of taxation by which we pay through the increased price that we pay for our goods. Perhaps it is not the proper term, but that is what I would call indirect or commodity taxation. I am not now considering the tariff from the point of view of the protection afforded; those are two separate subjects, I am discussing it from the point of view of taxation and taxation alone. In the memorandum I am about to read, and I set out my opinions there as concisely as I could, I state this:

> The organized farmers of western Canada are not in sympathy with the principle of a general sales tax on commodities as at present applied, although realizing that it might with advantage be levied upon certain lines of goods, which might be termed luxuries. Their objections, which are the result of some years of careful study and observation, might be briefly summarized as follows:
> 1. This tax levied at its source must inevitably be increased by the pyramiding of profits as the goods pass through the hands of wholesalers, jobbers, retailers, etc., with the result that the ultimate purchaser must pay a sum greatly in excess of the amount received by the federal treasury. Thus the present proposed tax of six per cent would approximate ten per cent as added to the retail price of the goods affected.
>
> 2. A sales tax of this nature is unsound in its application, as it is not based on the taxpayer's ability to pay, but on the amount of goods which he must purchase. In that way it will increase in direct ratio to the number of dependents he may have, and might be approximately termed a "baby" tax, acting as a direct deterrent to the rearing of families.
>
> 3. Under this tax also, the smaller a man's available income, the greater the percentage of taxation, as of course, a larger percentage of that income must be expended in the purchase of those taxable commodities.
>
> 4. This tax bears with peculiar weight on the western farmer. Not only is he, in common with all consumers, taxed upon his purchases for household, family and personal use, but he must also pay this tax upon his instruments of production, his machinery, building and fencing materials, etc.
>
> In this respect, of course, he is placed in the same position as the manufacturers of other products, but with this difference, that in other lines of industry, the manufacturer is enabled to add this tax to the market price of his goods, thus passing it on to the consumer, while in the case of the farmer, he must absorb it himself, as the market price of his products is set in the open markets of the world.
> It has been stated by the advocates of this system of taxation that this is a method of "painless extraction". This might be taken as an insult upon the intelligence of the taxpayer, as a moment's reflection will show, that even though the money is extracted under the influence of a narcotic, upon awakening from his stupor the patient will find that not only is the money gone but that he has paid very highly for the sedative.

That, Mr. Speaker, is my opinion on taxation expressed as concisely as I could word it. I concede that it is a tax which no man can evade, every man must contribute to that tax. In talking about any form of taxation it is incumbent, of course, to make some suggestions for raising revenue. Well, in spite of the discussion upon the income tax, in spite of the suggestion that the income tax should be lowered, I believe that it is the fairest, most equitable, and the most economical form of taxation extant. The system by which we can take from every man a percentage of his net income graduated in proportion to the amount of that income, classified perhaps in accordance with the way in which he earns that net income, but a percentage taken from every man's income and taken directly, is, perhaps, Utopian. I can realize the difficulties of collecting such a tax, but I think we should place emphasis upon that as the mainstay, the backbone, of our taxation policy, and simply supplement it with further taxation as is found necessary.

Now, I must hurry on, I have already taken more time than I intended to. The next crushing weight which we are carrying is the cost of credits. I am aware that this is a question which will stand a good deal of discussion. I am aware that we are suffering from an extended credit, a too greatly extended credit in the past. I am aware of all these things, and I am not suggesting this with a view to obtaining any greatly increased credit for the farmers to enable them to buy more, to spread themselves on expenditure. I am not suggesting it so much from that point of view, as I am in order to provide a means of consolidating their present indebtedness, of refunding their present indebtedness so that it can be paid under terms that make repayment possible; and I am suggesting that we take an example from the precedent set by the United States in that regard. I suggest that we study the details and that we bring into effect if possible, and I believe it is possible, a sane and sound system of rural credits. We are, as I have pointed out before and I am not going to discuss it again, suffering under that pressure for the reason that our bankers cannot advance us the money we need on terms which will enable us to utilize it, and because the indebtedness carried now, even although in most cases the farmer still holds considerable equity in his property, forms a mountain upon his shoulders, with a high rate of interest which is accumulating all the time, rendering it impossible for him tc meet his obligations. My suggestion, carrying on the suggestions of other members, is that this government look seriously into the recommendation, the unanimous recommendation of the special committee on Agriculture last year, that they should consider most carefully any report which they may have received upon that subject, and that they should not only consider the question but should, if possible, act upon it. I know of no one thing in western Canada which would bring more immediate relief from our conditions than the adoption of a sane system of rural credits.

That brings me to the question of transportation, and again I am aware that we cannot materially reduce the cost of transportation unless we increase the tonnage which the railroads can carry. We know that. We cannot go on piling up deficits but I believe that we should at least have a fair equality as regards freight rates as between one part of Canada and the other part of Canada. That is all we are asking now. There should be a policy of some equality. It has been pointed out by my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Lucas) that discrepancy exists between the eastern and western rates—both prairie rates and mountain rates—a discrepancy which is not only affecting our own business but is reacting upon the business of the manufacturers and other industrialists in eastern Canada. The force of that was driven home to me peculiarly when I had the pleasure of visiting Vancouver during the early winter. On that occasion, amongst other things, I had the gratification of going on board the Margaret Coughlin, a pioneer in the inter-coastal trade between Atlantic and Pacific ports. I went through that great vessel which contained 8,000 tons of mixed cargo; practically everything you could name was there. I inquired of the agent what the average freight rate was upon these goods, and he told me fifty cents a hundred. That was the average on the freight from steel rails all the way to baby carriages between Montreal and Vancouver. This as compared with a rail rate which would average $1.70. Now, you can see, Mr. Speaker, the enormous impetus which would be given not only to our agricultural population, not only to the city of Vancouver, but to our eastern industrialists if we had equalized railway rates from the mountains to the coast, and had equalized rates from the port of Vancouver back to the prairies. One of the great difficulties of the men here in the industrial centres is that they cannot ship their goods to us at a price at which we can buy them. That is one of their great difficulties. The cost of transportation is one of the prime factors responsible for that and if they were in a position to take advantage of a cheap water freight rate to equalize the haul to the prairie provinces. I believe eastern industrialists would sell fifty per cent more of their goods than they are doing at the present time. Not only that but it would also increase the value of our products. I believe the subject is one to which consideration should be given not only from our point of view but also from the national point of view—not so much the question of forcing our railways to carry at a loss, but the question of utilizing to the best advantage the cheapest and best routes which we have. That is the point at issue in that connection.

I am not going to debate the question of protection and free trade. That has been dealt with, and my time is up. But I would like in conclusion to make a reference to that subject—I was going to say that tabooed subject—of national unity. It has been suggested that we should not talk about it, but should take it for granted. Nothing is gained, Mr. Speaker, by ignoring palpable facts, and the facts are that there is not the feeling of harmony between one part of Canada and another part that there should be. There is not that feeling of unity which we all desire to see. These are facts. Of course we all desire to see unity. One member desires it just as much as any other member, but the fact is that it is not there. I absolutely agree with the hon. members who have already spoken on that line, that we can only bring about that national unity of thought and spirit—I am not speaking of political unity—which is so desirable, if it is built upon an actual knowledge of the conditions prevailing in all parts of the country. From that actual knowledge is produced equality of opportunity and equality of treatment between one part of Canada and another, between one occupation in Canada and another occupation. We have been accused perhaps of speaking as a class, and we have been accused of speaking sectionally. It is not, Mr. Speaker, because we are not Canadians. We realize that these inequalities undoubtedly exist, because one occupation has not equal opportunities with another occupation, and one section of Canada has not been treated with equal fairness with other parts of Canada and has not had the same equality; and realizing those facts, I desire to bring them to the attention of the House, not for the purpose of whining, not for the purpose of crying calamity and blue ruin, but in order that these facts may be given consideration, that the cause itself may be removed, and that upon the basis of equality of opportunity, upon the basis of just legislation as applying to every man, woman and child in this country, we can build a great, a prosperous and united country.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo) I desire, first, to join with those who have preceded me in extending congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. They have acquitted themselves with a great deal of credit to themselves.

There is from time to time, from year to year, during the course of this debate, a great deal of criticism in the press and elsewhere in regard to what is termed the waste of time in discussing the Address. I have never found myself entirely in accord with that view. The Prime Minister has frequently said that he regards the cabinet as a committee of parliament. That is perhaps more or less of a polite fiction with this and other governments. But if the declaration be true, then it surely follows that the cabinet should desire to be informed of the wishes of the individual members of parliament, so that if they see fit they may incorporate into the legislation which is to be introduced to the House later the views which are expressed in debate. That should be done as early as possible, in order that action may be taken. The debate on the Address is the earliest opportunity that is presented to the members for stating their views. For that reason I believe that every man who desires to say something on the public questions of the day should avail himself of this opportunity to do so, but to do it as briefly as possible.

With much that appears in the Speech from the Throne I am in entire accord. The people of Canada will receive with a great deal of satisfaction the declaration that we are to have a reduction in expenditure. We are also to have a reduction of taxation—a taxation which has been so heavy that it has operated as a great drawback and handicap to the recovery of business and the restoration of general prosperity. The government is also to be commended and will receive credit, if it succeeds in presenting a balanced budget. It has been a matter of very considerable concern to the people of this country that up to the present time it has been found impossible to confine expenditures within the income of the government. These things it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, are paramount and the most important considerations, although a great many others could be mentioned of almost equal importance.

I propose to discuss four questions which in my opinion engage most particularly the attention of the Canadian people. I am not necessarily giving them in the order of their importance. These subjects are: taxation, with which is allied expenditures; immigration, our national railways, and lastly, the question of the tariff.

So far as taxation is concerned, I would like to reiterate what has been said by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), that you may cut the expenditures to the bone and you would still have, necessarily, an expenditure of a large irreducible minimum. That means heavy taxation for a generation or more to come, and governments will not become more popular—I am not referring to this government or to any other particular government—and governments will find themselves unpopular from time to time merely as a result of the fact that they must administer and levy heavy taxation. Governments will suffer for it. The present government cannot be held responsible for the heavy debts which have been incurred. I am not going into that question, and I am not going to place any blame for that, if there is any blame. The present government and succeeding governments will not be blamable for the taxation which must be imposed, but they will be held responsible by the Canadian people if the expenditures are greater and if the taxation is greater than need be. They will also be held responsible for methods of collecting taxes. I have always felt, Mr. Speaker, that we should confine ourselves largely to three great sources of revenue as simple as possible in their nature and mode of application. I might say to my hon. friend from Red Deer that I am not going to be dogmatic about this. It is merely an expression of opinion. One of these is a customs tariff. That is variable and will fluctuate from year to year according to the business done, and according perhaps to the rates that are applied. The second is the income tax. I believe in the income tax. I believe that those men who find themselves in receipt of heavy incomes as a result of profit being made because of the opportunities which they have in this country may very well be asked to give up some of those profits to the country in which they are made. I think, however, that certain changes could very well be made in the income tax. The collection of the income tax, and the making out of the various forms could very well be simplified. I would also say—and possibly my hon. friends opposite will not agree with me in this, that I do not believe it is a good policy to levy an income tax on an industry as such. If profits are made by an industry it would be to the advantage of industry and not detrimental to the national revenue if the income tax were levied upon the individual after he receives his dividends or his profits rather than upon the industry itself.

The third source of revenue which I have favoured has been the sales tax. So much complaint has been made within the last year or two with regard to the sales tax and its operation, that my mind is quite open as regards changes which might profitably be made. Possibly a turnover tax, which is another form of sales tax, might be considered advisable. But so many suggestions have been made as to sources of revenue which the government might tap, that I admit I have not been able to make up my mind as to what is most desirable. I would however abolish what is known popularly, and quite properly, as the "nuisance tax." I have never felt that the tax which is levied in the form of stamp taxes upon cheques, bills of exchange generally, and latterly upon receipts also, is a tax that we should have. It is a nuisance tax, and that is chiefly my reason for opposing it, although, as a matter of fact, I can see no more logic in raising money by a stamp tax than there was in the old days in levying the window tax which existed in England at one time.

Taxation should be made as little annoying as possible, and from the political point of view, that is also very desirable. The fact that people have to pay taxes is in itself a sufficient reason for prejudice against the government that applies such taxes. If the necessity of paying is accentuated by the people being subjected to unnecessary inconvenience, that operates very much to the disadvantage of the government that is in power. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who was Minister of Finance in the former government, had an illustration of that statement. He applied the luxury tax. The luxury tax in itself was very objectionable, and the method of its collection was also objectionable. I believe it was a factor in the defeat of the government that went to the people in 1921. I am free to say, however, that was not the only factor. That result was really inevitable at the time. In passing,—and this is by way of parenthesis in relation to the collection of the luxury tax, —I believe this government has fallen heir to a legacy of obligation from the previous government in the matter of a tax collected upon automobiles, a tax upon which refund was not made when the tax was abolished. While it goes distinctly against the grain for any Minister of Finance to give up money that once gets into his treasury, I believe the government should repay to those automobile dealers money which does not properly belong to the people of Canada and which we should not keep, no matter how much we need it.

The taxation problem is an exceedingly difficult one. We have unprecedented conditions as a result of the war, and it follows just as naturally that we must adopt unusual and new means of levying taxes. For that reason, I am glad to note in the Speech from the Throne that the government proposes to appoint a committee to investigate and ascertain modes of taxation which might be adopted. On that committee I would like to see represented the best thought of all parties in this House, so that they may make a report to parliament upon which may be based some system of taxation which will be satisfactory to the Canadian people.

I propose to speak for a few moments on the national railways. As a matter of fact, the national railways speak for themselves. I might say—perhaps I should not say it—that prior to a year or two ago, I had the doubtful honour, as it was considered at that time, of being practically the only member on this and almost so on the other side of the House who was in favour of public ownership of the railways and said so.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Oh, no. I was in favour of it before the hon. member came into this House.

Mr. EULER: If the hon. member will just recall my words, he will agree with me. I said "almost", and I am quite willing to say that the hon. member who made the interjection a moment or two ago is the father of it all; that he has stood nobly by public ownership of railways when everybody else was against it and he was as a voice crying in the wilderness. I said that the railways speak for themselves. According to the figures of the president of the Canadian National Railways, Sir Henry Thornton, we have improved our position financially during the year. We have operated with an improvement over last year of some $18,000,000. I believe even the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) would no longer sell the national railways for a dollar as he was prepared to do a year or two ago—

Mr. LANCTOT: I am ready to sell them for a dollar or even for seventy-five cents.

Mr. EULER:—especially when he learns that the president of the railways has predicted for next year a still further improvement of some thirty million dollars. I think the president of the Canadian National Railways is to be congratulated upon the success which he has achieved. He is making good. Of course he makes mistakes as do other people, and one of those was in connection with the purchase, or the manner of purchase, of a certain hotel in the city of Paris. But in a general way, he is making good, and he deserves encouragement from the members of this House.

I listened, with a great deal of interest, to the address of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) a few days ago, who expressed himself as still unconvinced of the merits of public ownership of railways. I rather regretted to hear him say so. He had made such an excellent speech in every other way that I did not like to see his effort marred in that manner. I should like to say to him and others who seem to have a mistaken impression of the purpose of national ownership of railways, that that purpose is not to make profits, but to give the best possible service at the lowest possible cost. Personally, I would rather be one to help pay a reasonable deficit from year to year, than see the railways of this country pass into the hands of any monopoly. I said that service was the purpose of public ownership of railways, and I know the members of this House who travel on the Canadian National Railways—and I hope they do, although they travel on passes —will admit that the service on the national railways has improved tremendously. It is not too much to say that the service on the other great railway in Canada has also improved, because that railway finds it is necessary to make improvements in order to hold its own with the national railways. All this is to the benefit of the whole Canadian people. I had the temerity to make the prediction last year on the floor of this House that in five years or less the Canadian National Railways would cease to be a burden upon the taxpayers of Canada. Sir Henry Thornton said a day or two ago that that period would be reduced by a year. He said that we might expect the Canadian National to cease to be a burden on the taxpayers of Canada in three years, and I believe he is right. When that time comes I expect that our level-headed colleagues from the province of Quebec will agree with us that the national ownership of railways is a good thing. The Canadian National Railways are owned by the people of Canada. And they are here to stay, they will continue to be owned by the Canadian people; and I venture to make this prediction that if ever there is a monopoly of railways in this country, in spite of such things as "the whisper of death," that monopoly will obtain when the people of Canada own all the railways in this country; because they will not tolerate any other kind of monopoly.

I propose to speak for a few moments on the question of immigration. It is a truism, I think, that Canada needs millions more people. Sometimes the statement is made that we should have more people in this country in order to help us carry our debt. That I think is an unfortunate way of putting it. I should like to see more people coming to Canada, but I want them to come because they find Canada a good place to live in, a country in which they can become prosperous and from living in which they can derive some benefit. I want people to come to Canada because they can be content and be willing, by reason of the benefits they get, to help in shouldering the debt. Last year there was a good deal of criticism with regard to some of the methods employed in the Department of Immigration. The restrictions, it was stated, were still too stringent. I agreed with that to some extent, and I do not think that the situation is entirely remedied at this time. We still have difficulties through the overzealousness of some of the officials overseas; and if these officials are not going to mend their ways at an early date they ought to be relieved of their duties altogther. I stated my position on immigration last year and I will state it again. I am in favour of the admission to Canada practically of all people who are healthy and white and who give promise of becoming law-abiding Canadian citizens, and, I would say, regardless of occupation and race. I listened with considerable interest to the remarks of the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) the other day. I hope I am not trenching upon a delicate subject; at least, whatever I say in this connection I say in entire good faith and I hope it will be accepted in that spirit. The hon. member said, in designating the races which he would allow to come to Canada, that he was in favour of the admission of the German people. For no reason that I can possibly imagine, when he said that, my friends sitting about me turned their faces in my direction. But they were friendly faces; and I might say here that I have always felt a great deal of gratitude to them as well as to hon. members on the other side of the House for the tolerant and kindly way in which they have always received anything I have said touching this subject. I believe they must have felt that, after all, they were in contact with one who was a Canadian of the Canadians, born and bred a Canadian, and yet never at any time ashamed of his forebears or of the race from which he came. When the hon. gentleman stated that these people became good citizens, he rather apologetically added, "in time." I was almost as much amused at that as my friends sitting about me. True, "in time;" and I think that if the history of these people is studied it will be found to be indeed a very short time. I know, Sir, that it is natural, after a war such as we have had, for hatred and prejudice to remain alive for a considerable time.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. FORKE: You will give me credit for what I said?

Mr. EULER: I give the hon. gentleman credit and thank him for what he said. Now, while the feeling to which I have referred possibly is natural, I do not think it should be permitted to influence the minds of statesmen who are dealing with questions on their merits in the interests of the country. I wish I could take those hon. members who do not know these people to the city of Kitchener, or the town of Waterloo, or the town of Elmira, or to the farms of that section, to the counties of Oxford and Perth, to Renfrew, or perhaps to the Canadian West, and show them what has been done by these people in the way of helping to build up this nation. They are proud to be Canadians, and we may well be proud of them. They take their share in the industrial, social and educational activities of this country, and they have a commendable public spirit. They are elected to our councils, occasionally one is elected a member of parliament, and until recently, were considered not unworthy of elevation to that august body known as the Canadian Senate. I would say that if we could have more people of the type we already have we should welcome them in hundreds of thousands. They will not imperil Canadian institutions, because, in addition to the qualities of thrift and industry which they are known to possess, they have the faculty of adapting themselves to their environment, and they accept all the responsibilities and duties of Canadian citizenship.

And now I come to a subject that is perhaps of more interest than anything I have so far discussed: I refer to the matter of the tariff.

Mr. HOEY: Do not spoil a good speech.

Mr. EULER: The hon. gentleman apparently would be very much surprised—I hope, not disappointed—if I echoed some of the sentiments that, no doubt, possess his own mind. My position with regard to the tariff is fairly well known in this House, and at the present moment I refer to it only because, since the submission of the Speech from the Throne, for some reason or other, the press and members of parliament and others have gone into what seems something like a panic, which does not appear to be justified by anything that is stated in the Speech itself. Reading the Speech from the Throne I find the tariff mentioned but once, and that reference is as follows:

National unity, not less than national prosperity, depends upon the surmounting of those barriers which have tended to separate western from eastern Canada and to discourage permanent settlement upon the land. Foremost in this regard are the problems incidental to tariff readjustments and to the marketing of agricultural and other natural products.

Every member of the House, I think, will subscribe to the declaration that national unity in Canada is desirable. I am not in the confidence of the government in this matter and I do not know exactly what is implied in the words "tariff readjustments." A readjustment of the tariff may imply an upward revision or a downward revision, or perhaps even both; and while certain meanings have been read into this phrase, and perhaps rightly so, I purpose to cross the tariff bridge when I come to it. The budget itself will disclose the policy of the government in this regard, and that will be discussed on its merits no doubt, when the concrete proposals of tariff readjustments come before us. Nevertheless I desire to make my own position clear. I want to discuss the subject in entire good faith from my point of view. I am from an industrial city. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) declared a few moments ago that he stood here to represent the wishes of his constituents; and that, Sir, is my purpose. I would say at the outset that I have every sympathy with the desires, the aspirations and the difficulties of the people of western Canada, as well as with those of our industrial communities. And I think that some of us, on this side of the House at least, may claim that we gave rather tangible proof of our interest in the westerner when, last year, we helped our friends opposite to obtain the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement. Tariff views, in my opinion, are very largely the result of environment and the personal profit which one may obtain from the tariff, either high or low. That opinion, perhaps will not be received with pleasure in some quarters, and my friends opposite may not agree with it, but I think an analysis of what we feel will convince us that this is the case. Selfishness, after all, is the most compelling motive in humanity.

Mr. FORKE: No, no.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend, I believe, is an optimist, and it is well that he is; but nevertheless, I believe in the truth of what I have expressed. The westerner believes in free trade or lower tariffs, and I think this is because he feels that such a change would be for his benefit. On the other hand, the easterner—the manufacturer or the operative—believes in a protective tariff because he thinks it will benefit him financially. Both are entitled to their opinions. Probably I could give no better proof of the soundness of this statement than by citing the example of the United States farmer. While our Canadian farmer in the West is a free trader or low tariff man, his brother in the United States is a high protectionist. He caused a tariff of thirty cents a bushel to be placed against Canadian wheat, and he has recently succeeded in having it raised to forty-two cents. I do not care to confront my hon. friends with any more unpleasant facts, although I might mention others.

Mr. FORKE: Go on.

Mr. EULER: I might even mention the question of oleomargarine to show that in some cases at least our friends are influenced—

Mr. BROWN: Some?

Mr. EULER: Yes; in some cases our friends are influenced by the principle of self-interest.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Ninety per cent.

Mr. EULER: It has been said, that successful statesmanship is a matter of compromise. I believe this to be the case to a considerable extent. And it is necessary, if it is at all possible, for the people of eastern Canada and western Canada to do the very best in their power to reconcile their views. It may be impossible. We have four great zones in this country—the Maritime provinces, whose natural market is in the United States, which they would like to enter, and consequently they are a low tariff people; the industrial provinces of Quebec and Ontario, which contain great manufacturing plants and whose people in very large numbers favour a tariff that will enable their industries to maintain themselves; the prairie provinces, whose interests are apparently different from those which I have enumerated; lastly British Columbia, whose interests vary again from those of their eastern neighbours. Canada is a difficult country to govern, Sir, and I should say that it is almost impossible to reconcile such conflicting views in respect to tariff laws and satisfy everybody. What appears to me to be extremely regrettable is the atmosphere of suspicion that exists on the part of the East towards the West and, if I may say so, on the part of the West towards the East. I fear—and my friends will correct me if I am wrong, for it is merely an impression I have formed—I fear our friends in the West have come to the conclusion that the manufacturer of the East has been making unduly large profits at the expense of the consumer, and that he has no consideration for the difficulties of the westerner. I do not believe that is a correct conclusion. On the other hand, I fear that the manufacturer of eastern Canada—and I know whereof I speak—has formed the impression that the western free trader or low tariff man cares not one jot or tittle whether the industries of eastern Canada survive or not. I think they are both wrong, and I would urge upon both parties to try and get the other's point of view in an endeavour to reconcile their differences, else I do not see how Canada can survive or prosper as a nation. Surely it must be possible, as in the past, to have a great agricultural industry prosper along with a flourishing manufacturing industry in the eastern provinces or elsewhere in the Dominion. Perhaps both factions believe that the present depression is caused by the tariff—the westerner believing that the tariff is too high, the easterner that it is too low. The hon. member for Red Deer stated that the depression existed before the war, which is quite true; but I believe also that that depression would ere this have passed away if war had not intervened.

I believe further, Mr. Speaker, that both these opinions are wrong, and that the depression, both in our urban centres and on our farms, goes a great deal deeper in its causes, than the tariff, although the latter may be a factor. We have heavy taxes burdening industry and checking enterprise; we have high freight rates, bearing not only against the grower of wheat, but also against the manufacturer or anyone else who does business; we have besides these two factors the impoverishment and disorganization of the belligerent nations in Europe, who have no longer the wherewithal to buy the commodities which we formerly sold to them, and lastly, it may be that some of our difficulties could be remedied, wholly or partly, by improvements in our financial and banking system.

Now, Sir, I am free to say that in theory free trade is an absolutely sound proposition; but I would repeat—in theory. If, for example, all the peoples of the world were homogeneous, if they spoke the same language, if there were no international boundaries, then I think we would have the ideal condition under which trade would flow in its natural channels. The manufacturer, I would judge, would go where he could most efficiently operate his plant, having regard to raw material, labour, transportation facilities and markets. But that is only a theory, and for my part I am expected to deal with facts and conditions as they are. We have tariff walls all about Canada. Practically every civilized nation in the world has tariff protection. The United States has a very high tariff; the other day, as I said before, they increased the duty on Canadian wheat to 42 cents a bushel. The hon. leader of the House (Mr. Graham) said the other day that he did not believe that "retaliation" was a good word. I am inclined to think that is true, yet I must admit that I have not attained to that complete state of sanctification, if I may say so, that impels me, when I am struck upon one cheek, to turn the other. Sometimes I am even tempted in a weak moment to say that the word "retaliation" in matters of trade is about the only word that our American friends understand and appreciate to the full.

I cannot argue effectively with the man who says that all tariffs, so far as their protective value is concerned, are immoral. I cannot quarrel with him; he may be able to make out a case from his own particular point of view. But I do say that circumstances alter cases. I want to lay it down as an axiom, and I believe that my Progressive friends will agree with me in this, that it is desirable that we should have a diversity of industries in this country. We cannot all be farmers. I agree with the member for St. Lawrence division—Montreal (Mr. Marler) when he says that we ought at least to manufacture in this country, so far as that may be possible, all the things that we consume. With tariff walls all about us I do not see how we can build up Canada industrially or even maintain the industries we have if we are excluded from the markets of our competitors while admitting them to equality in our own. That is a jug-handled condition that does not appeal to me.

I do not think, Sir, that I am open to the charge of being a high protectionist; and I am very glad indeed that when I make that statement my hon. friends opposite do not smile. But I am very much interested in the prosperity not only of the farmers of my constituency but of all the people whom I have the honour to represent in this House. I think I may truthfully say that the tariff is not an issue with the farmers of my constituency. They appreciate that their interests are identical with those of the city of Kitchener, the town of Waterloo, or the town of Elmira.

5 p.m.

Mr. BLACK (Huron): Would the hon. member make that statement with reference to the whole of rural Ontario?

Mr. EULER: I make it only with regard to my constituency, but the conditions would probably be found similar throughout other parts of Ontario. If for any reason, whether it be tariff or otherwise, it should come about that the industries of the city of Kitchener, we will say, were destroyed, the result would react to the detriment of the Waterloo county farmer just about as much at it would to the resident of the city of Kitchener, because the market for much of the produce of the farmers there is in that city.

While I believe in a tariff; while I believe in a tariff for revenue and in a tariff that will maintain legitimate industry, I would not for a moment place any premium upon inefficiency on the part of the Canadian manufacturer. The Canadian manufacturer who takes refuge behind the tariff when he is not conducting his establishment or his industry in an efficient manner should not receive any consideration from the government so far as tariff is concerned, nor should he be permitted by reason of the tariff, to make undue profits out of the people. But I do believe, as I say, in the maintenance of our industries, because I believe they are necessary to the proper development of our country, and for that reason I could not favour any action that would prejudice the interests of the people whom I represent. I cannot believe that there is any intention on the part of this government to do that, because if I remember rightly there was a statement made during the election campaign that if this party were returned to power no legitimate industry would be injured. My attitude, therefore, is this: I am not stating to-day that the tariff should be higher or that it should be lower, but I do maintain that no drastic or serious tariff readjustment should be made without the most careful investigation as to the probable results of such readjustment. I think that is a fair attitude to take. Moreover, I do not believe that any Minister of Finance, no matter how capable he may be, has the time to find out for himself exactly the conditions that would justify tariff readjustment, and for that reason I have gradually come to the conclusion that the suggestion of a tariff commission is worth trying out. I believe it would be well if a body of men, unprejudiced—I do not advocate that they should be manufacturers or that they should belong to any one class; all classes should be represented—men whom we could trust, men really capable of forming a correct judgment with regard to the situation and the condition of our industries—should make investigations and submit a report to the government upon which this House and the government itself could intelligently act. I do not say that their report or their suggestions would have to be accepted, because I realize that in the final analysis the parliament of Canada must pass upon all matters of taxation.

I do not see what there is to be gained at the present moment by the making of slight tariff changes. A policy of nibbling has never appealed to me. I have heard it stated that the Speech from the Throne indicates that the tariff will be removed or lowered on agricultural implements. I do not know what is to be done. I would not for a moment have my remarks considered as being antagonistic to the farmers because I would like to see them purchase their agricultural implements as cheaply as possible. But I doubt whether any member sitting opposite would say that even if the tariff on agricultural implements were entirely removed he would be able to buy his implements any cheaper. The tariff was slightly lowered some two years ago, and I think you find agricultural implements just a little more expensive to-day than they were before. I do not think that the difference is the difference at all between prosperity and the condition in which the farmers find themselves now, and I give my hon. friends opposite credit for sufficient intelligence to cause them to recognize that. It might have this effect,—I do not know: it might create considerable satisfaction among our western people that at last, as they would say, they were advancing in the direction in which they desired to travel. But I fear that while they might experience a temporary glow of satisfaction, in the final event there would not be a great deal of benefit.

I am not sure whether I shall receive commendation from my hon. friends for what I am going to say now—

Mr. McMASTER: Which group of hon. friends?

Mr. EULER: Those to my right, including the hon member for Brome; I do not know just in which group to place him. I am not able to understand why there should be any discrimination so far as protection is concerned, against the manufacturer of agricultural implements. I have never been quite able to see the reason for that. If there is anything in the principle of free trade I do not see why consistently, it should not be applied all along the line. As a matter of fact the tariff on agricultural implements is, as we all know, very low, something like 10 or 12½ per cent, probably the lowest that is placed upon any commodity. That there is a monopoly cannot be maintained, because last year some twelve or thirteen million dollars' worth was imported into Canada.

I know the argument is brought that we ought to reduce the tariff on the implements of production. I have thought that over. I have not just been able to grasp the point as well as I might. Perhaps I am dull of comprehension, but I do say this, that the man who operates the plough or a binder, or who is engaged in the industry of fishing in the Maritime provinces, or who is in any way engaged in any of these primary industries, cannot follow his occupation without wearing warm clothing, boots and shoes, eat good food and have many of the other things that enter into our civilized life. For that reason, as I say, I cannot understand why there should be any discrimination as between agricultural implements and any other commodity that is manufactured in Canada. For that reason I should just like—it may not be necessary—to caution the government to go slowly in the matter. If, as I believe, no great good can come from the possible annihilation of an industry now in this country without benefiting anyone. I should say they would do well to go slowly in the matter. In a general way I should like to advocate a policy of considerable caution in a time of uncertainty and depression, lest it might easily be worse. The tariff is not perfect. I believe that the whole tariff structure ought to be overhauled. Three years ago we were supposed to have that brought about. We had a tariff commission, or a tariff committee of the government, go out through the country gathering information but nothing further was ever done. We should have a tariff commission, which might become permanent that would go out and come in with a report, and with information that would enable us to frame a proper tariff. That, if it could not be called a national policy, I might perhaps call a rational policy.

I should like, just in conclusion, to bring one other phase of the matter before the members of this House. I have thought of it a great deal and I see no solution except possibly a tariff solution of the question. I have said that I cannot argue with the man who says that the consumer in Canada is entitled absolutely to buy his commodities at the lowest possible price no matter where they may be produced. But I should like to put this situation before the members of the House, and it is not an imaginary one. It exists in fact to-day, and is being aggravated from day to day. In the countries of Europe and Asia—to-day commodities can be manufactured a great deal more cheaply than they can be made in Canada.

Mr. FORKE: How should we get paid for our wheat?

Mr. EULER: I assume that I am too dense just to see the application of the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. FORKE: I am sorry to interrupt, I should not have done so.

Mr. EULER: It is all right.

Mr. FORKE: We are shipping immense quantites of wheat to Europe, and we must be paid for that. What return are we going to get for the commodities we send to Europe? How are be going to get paid for them?

Mr. EULER: I am not now arguing for a prohibitory tariff. I have never done so, I am not proposing to do so now. I am placing before you a condition that confronts us, a condition with which we will have to deal in some way or other. There can be manufactured in England, in Germany, perhaps in France, I know in Italy, and in Japan, articles for from one-quarter to one-half and two-thirds of the price for which they can be made in this country. And they can be so manufactured and sold in Canada because of currency depreciation for one thing and the other—and I want to deal more particularly with it—the fact that wages are much lower in those countries. Now, I want to say here that I am not in favour of reducing the wage of the Canadian worker, and I do not say that with any ulterior motive at all. I have been a worker myself and I know that the Canadian worker is not paid too much for his toil. He is entitled to receive a wage that will enable him and his family to live in comfort, to have a few pleasures, and to lay by a bit for his old age and for a rainy day. That principle, I think, ought to receive the support of every member of the House. Now if I am right that these goods can be manufactured at an infinitely cheaper price or cost than they can be in this country, if they are admitted to Canada on an equality or without any restrictions—I will put it that way, if they can be admitted to this country without any restrictions whatever—this result will follow; that Canadian made goods cannot be sold; that Canadian factories will become idle; and that Canadian workmen will be out of a job. I am just stating the fact, and I would like to ask what is the solution of that condition?

Mr. FORKE: I do not like to interrupt very much, but according to my hon. friend's argument Canadian goods can only be sold in Canada; there is no market elsewhere because we cannot produce goods to compete anywhere else in the world. Now, supposing we have more production than we have consumption, what is going to happen?

Mr. EULER: I think the hon. gentleman is hardly justified in stating that I said Canadian goods can only be sold in Canada. I thought I made it clear that we do sell goods and that we will continue to do so under all circumstances.

Mr. FORKE: Excuse me, that was an inference I would draw from your speech—that goods are manufactured cheaper all over the world than we can manufacture them for in Canada; consequently our Canadian manufacturers ought to have protection. Was that not your argument?

Mr. EULER: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. FORKE: Excuse me, I thought you did.

Mr. EULER: I did not say that goods could be manufactured in all parts of the world cheaper than they could be in Canada. My point is this; I do not feel like supporting any policy that is going to place the Canadian working man in competition with the labour that lives on a lower scale in the countries of Europe and Asia.

Mr. McMASTER: Is it not true that our greatest competition in manufactures comes from the United States.

Mr. EULER: My answer to that would be that at the present moment the Canadian manufacturer is not making any particular complaint with regard to competition from the United States—I do not think so, and I have some one hundred and fifty or one hundred and seventy-five manufacturing establishments in the riding from which I come—but he does say that the competition from the sweat shops, if you like, of Europe is more than he can compete with. We have in the province of Ontario—and this may be news possibly to some of my hon. friends—we have in the province of Ontario what is known as the minimum wage law. Under that our people are compelled to pay a certain minimum wage, and that wage, paid under the provisions of an Ontario Act, is higher in many instances than the wage that is paid in these foreign countries. I believe such a law is good in principle. There is a condition I am pointing out. But for myself I must say that I am not in favour of anything that will pit the workingman of my constituency against the cheap sweat shop labour of a foreign country, where people are living under conditions under which they should not live.

I may just for a few moments, Mr. Speaker, refer to a specific commodity,—and we are always more or less interested if concrete examples are given,—and that is the commodity of boots and shoes. There are some ten or twelve boot and shoe factories in the riding I represent. To-day, because of the rate of exchange, because of difference in wages, large quantities of boots and shoes are being imported from Great Britain. The ordinary duty on boots and shoes, is I think, 30 per cent. On account of the preferential tariff, that duty is reduced to something like 17½ per cent. I do not think the boot and shoe worker is over-paid, and I believe our boot and shoe manufacturing establishments are operated efficiently. The average wage of the shoe worker in my city, and I think throughout Ontario, is something like $23 a week. In Britain the wage is in the neighbourhood of $12 or $13. Then there is a difficulty with which our manufacturers are confronted. The depreciated currency of the European countries operates against them. A suggestion has been made—and it appeals to me—that in connection with importations it would be fair, that on those goods, when they enter a Canadian port, instead of the duty being based on the depreciated currency, it should be based on a fair valuation of the commodity in Canadian territory.

I wish to say a word or two upon what is perhaps a delicate subject, the preferential tariff. It has not been mentioned to any extent. When that tariff was introduced I suppose it was for reasons which seemed quite sufficient at that time. I suppose my friends opposite are in favour of a preferential tariff on the score of sentiment. Perhaps they are.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Very good. I thought possibly they were in favour of it because it led in the direction of free trade.

Mr. FORKE: Both.

Mr. EULER: The point I am trying to make is that there is no sentiment or very little sentiment in business. Trade and commerce are carried on between individuals on a basis of value for value.

Mr. FORKE: That is the principle we believe in.

Mr. EULER: And to get something for something. I say that is the principle upon which individuals trade, and I do not see any reason why nations should depart from that principle. These questions ought to be settled on their merits. I do not think there is any doubt that Britain herself deals with these questions on their merits. As my hon. friend suggested a moment ago, Britain placed an embargo on Canadian cattle, and they had a perfect right to do so, and we had no right to take offence, except for the fact that the reason that was given by them for that embargo was not the real reason. The embargo was placed on Canadian cattle ostensibly to protect British cattle from disease, but the real reason was to protect the breeder of British cattle. Last summer the Prime Minister attended the Imperial Conference at London. At that conference, as hon. members know, the former British Prime Minister, Mr. Baldwin, made a suggestion of a preference within the Empire. Hon. members all know what happened. At the elections Mr. Baldwin and all his policies were rejected by the British people. I say that only to emphasize the fact that the people of the Mother Country are legislating entirely in their own interests, and I am sure that, with the spirit of British fair play that exists there, they can have no possible objections if we legislate in exactly the same way. When I entered upon this subject, I said it was perhaps a delicate subject, and I am going to leave it with these words—that it matters little to the Canadian manufacturer, if his British brother puts him out of business rather than his American cousin, or anyone else on the face of the earth; the result is exactly the same.

I have spoken longer than I intended, and perhaps some of what I have said is entirely premature. My position finally is this, that I favour a tariff such as will assist us in the raising of our revenue, and a tariff that will enable us to maintain industries that are legitimate in every way. I hope the government will bear that in mind when framing any tariff policies they may have in contemplation.

I represent a constituency with an industrial population of thousands of people. Towards these workmen as well as the farmers in my constituency I feel a very keen sense of responsibility. My pledge to them at the elections of 1921 was to guard their interests to the best of my ability. That pledge I mean to keep according to my best judgment, and that pledge is not inconsistent with the declarations made by the leaders of the present government in the elections of 1921, that if they were returned to power no legitimate industry would be injured. And, Sir, I have no knowledge, and no expectation that this government will injure any legitimate industry, and I am making the statement only in order to make my position clear. I received, Sir, last year in good faith, and with approval the declaration of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who I wish were here, that henceforth there should be reasonable stability of tariff. I would still commend that to the government as a good policy to follow.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to address the House very briefly on the Speech from the Throne and the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Charters). Before doing so let me express the regret which I feel, and which has been given expression to by other members of this House, at the absence of two very distinguished members through illness. I refer to the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding and the former Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). As a new member of this House, I feel that I would like to be able to look up to those two experienced gentlemen for example and for precept as to what should be done; and while we have many other members who are equally dignified and experienced, I believe that we cannot have too many of that type in this House. I sincerely regret their absence, and hope for their speedy recovery and early return.

I also wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address on the manner in which they performed the difficult task entrusted to them. Referring to the Speech from the Throne, this is the third which has been presented to the House since the advent of the present government. The first one, as I recall it, called attention to the fact that Canada has suffered less from the effects of the war than any other country which has been involved in it. The second referred to the progress which Canada was making along commercial lines, and the third emphasized the same feature. Surely then, if we accept these statements, we must come to the conclusion that Canada is indeed prosperous. That is the impression which the government has sought to convey through the Speech from the Throne, in each of the sessions of parliament. Unfortunately, however, I fear, a careful analysis of the situation will force us to the conclusion that there is not that measure of prosperity which we would desire. When we listen to the speeches of the members of the group to our left, who have a right to speak for agriculture in this country and who have spoken with no uncertain sound, we have no doubt whatever that agriculture in Canada is not prosperous, is not successful at the present time. When we listen to the speeches of business men, men engaged in different lines of manufacture and in other lines of industry, we also come to the conclusion that they are having their difficulties and that Canada is not as prosperous as we would desire it to be. It is all very well for us to say and to feel that we should be optimistic; but when we meet here in order to legislate and to deal with conditions, we should not deceive ourselves; we must face conditions as they actually are, even though they be not as we desire to have them, and we must act accordingly.

The first matter which I desire to deal with and which is referred to in the Speech from the Throne is the necessity for a reduction of taxation. I think it is generally agreed that that is very desirable. I wish to quote an extract from an editorial which appeared in one of the Ottawa papers recently and which expresses very accurately my views upon the situation in regard to taxation:

> Mere tariff tinkering for purposes of geographical politics will not satisfy the public's demand for decreased taxes. What Canada wants is a lower sales tax and, if possible, a lower income tax. The existing income tax was justifiable during war and post-war expenditures, but with these receding, and with the United States slashing its income tax, the Canadian levy should be lowered. This country in fact cannot afford to have taxation much higher than taxation in the United States. The plain reason is that capital and people always gravitate toward low taxation and low living costs, and when a country which has these things borders our own for more than three thousand miles the consequences to Canada are likely to be grave.
>
> These consequences have been evidenced already. They are witnessed in a Canadian emigration to the United States that simply nullifies our immigration, and which, to state the stark truth, constitutes one of the gravest of our immediate problems.
>
> That drain will not be dammed by a political adjustment of the tariff. If anything, it will be increased by any policy that subjects Canadian manufacturers to stiffer competition and makes for Canadian unemployment.
>
> Eastern Canada, which is about to be led to the altar as a sacrifice to Liberal propaganda in the West, should make its voice felt in no uncertain terms. It should remind Mr. King that what it wants is not fiscal manoeuvring, but a lessening of real taxation burdens coupling with its reminder a perhaps necessary hint that the balance of political power in this country is still east of the lakes.

That expresses a very clear and well defined request for lower taxation in this country. The income tax is undoubtedly very burdensome and troublesome and is causing much dissatisfaction and hardship amongst our citizens. I sincerely hope the government will be able when the budget is brought down, to assure this House that the income tax will be substantially lowered; that it will not be so rigid; that provision will be made for further items of deduction from the gross income as it is now ascertained.

As regards the sales tax, I am sure the government files must be very bulky with the protests and objections that have been received in connection with this tax. The government will surely try to find some way of giving relief from a sales tax of 6 per cent which has been such an important element in increasing the cost of living and against which there has been such a volume of complaint. Unfortunately, the Speech from the Throne does not definitely promise any relief in this direction. I would suggest that the government seriously consider the abolition of the sales tax and the substitution of a moderate turnover tax, which would bring in the revenue which is required, which could be easily collected, and which would not be found burdensome and such an important element in increasing the cost of living, as the present sales tax.

With further reference to the income tax, let me quote a portion of an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of Tuesday, March 4, last. This deals in particular with the necessity for the revision of the income tax when one considers the action that has been taken by the United States:

> The United States House of Representatives has changed the scale of income tax reduction, and the tax revision bill as received in the Senate departs in important particulars from the plan set forth by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon. The maximum sur-tax rate which was to have been cut from fifty to twenty-five per cent under the Mellon proposals, stands at a maximum of 37½ per cent in the bill as it left the House. On the other hand, the reduction in normal rates is greater than was proposed by Mr. Mellon, and the House has made changes in other taxes which were not on the treasury programme, finally approving the bill on a vote of 408 to 8. Canadian interest in the progress of this measure is by no means academic. Every change that makes the burden of taxation lighter in the United States reacts upon this country; it attracts Canadian citizens, and it places the Dominion in a disadvantageous position as a field for investment of capital. An exceptionally capable business man expressed the opinion recently that the Canadian income tax should be cut in half, at least, on national grounds. "I believe," he said, "that many enterprising men are refraining from going into new ventures by reason of the excessive income tax they must bear in each enterprise they undertake." Other financiers and industrial leaders have said the same thing. It was said in Great Britain and the view so expressed became a principle of administrative policy; drastic economies were effected and taxation was reduced. The United States has pursued and is pursuing the same course, has reduced expenditures and is now reducing taxation. The Canadian government appreciates the need of a reduction in taxation—and proposes to cut the customs duties on the farm implements. The contrast is not comforting.

If the tax revision bill becomes law in its present form—which represents a Republican compromise—the income tax rates in the United States will be substantially lower than the rates payable in this country.

A little further on:

The loss of revenue in the United States through these proposed reductions is estimated, unofficially, at $460,000,000, yet the United States government and Congress believe the change will be profitable to the nation as well as to the individual, the point being that this huge sum of money will be turned back into the industry, trade and commerce of the country and that the resultant prosperity will be reflected in larger revenues from other forms of existing taxation. The step is a drastic one and its effect will be felt in this country unless some measures are adopted which will confer a corresponding advantage upon Canadian industry and commerce. Lowering an already low tariff will certainly not do it, particularly while the loss of protection is accompanied by heavy direct levies; industry, by that process, will be both starved and choked. A government less dependent on Progressive support—which is, apparently, a marketable commodity—might meet this situation by so adjusting the tariff as to provide the industries of the Dominion with the protection which they require, and by reducing concurrently the income and sales levies. We have not got that kind of a government, and developments which are taking place in the United States are, therefore, the more disturbing.

These two editorials reflect, I think, in a fair measure the attitude of the public regarding these matters.

Now, I want to deal for a moment with the speech of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), particularly with reference to the tariff. Let me first congratulate the hon. gentleman. He always gives to the House a great deal of information and he has done so on this occasion. I notice, however, that in dealing with the tariff he was very careful about the position which he should take, and he was quite circumspect in the words he used in stating his point of view. He said that the Speech from the Throne made only one reference to the tariff, but it seems to me that he has overlooked another paragraph which I am sure every member of the House who heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) must regard as also referring to the tariff. That paragraph reads:

In the opinion of the government, such reduction of taxation as it may be possible to effect should aim primarily at reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, thereby aiding materially in the development of our natural resources, and, through cheapened production, effecting a diminution also in the cost of living.

As the Prime Minister interpreted that section of the Speech to this House, I do not think that anyone could gather from it any other impression than that it was intended to outline and forecast a reduction in the tariff upon agricultural implements. If that interpretation be not correct then we should have from the government benches a very plain declaration in that direction; and it would appear that the hon. member for North Waterloo, in his references to the tariff, has overlooked both the statement of the Prime Minister and that particular paragraph in the Speech. The hon. member in referring to the tariff was very cautious; he stepped up to it, he stepped away from it, he stepped around it, he stepped over it, but he did not step very hard upon the proposed reductions. He seemed to me scarcely to believe that there would be any reduction in the tariff on agricultural implements. If that is the case his interpretation of the proposed action of the government is different from the construction put upon it by the people of Hamilton; he interprets it differently from the people of Brantford; and he interprets it, I believe, differently from the majority of the members of this House. I wonder whether a smoke screen is really being put up to enable the government to retreat from the interpretation which it has placed upon this matter and which is causing so much protest in the country.

The position with regard to the tariff is one upon which we should all be prepared to speak freely and openly; and for my own part I have no hesitation whatever in most vigorously protesting against any reduction on agricultural implements. I say that with a full sense of the responsibility involved in taking that position, and after hearing all that has been said in favour of a reduction by members of the group on my left. As has been pointed out, the tariff schedule on agricultural implements is very low—in fact, it is the lowest, running from ten to fifteen per cent—and any further reduction would undoubtedly hamper, and probably put out of business, those manufacturers who are engaged in that industry. I am satisfied that it would result in no ultimate benefit to the farmers. If hon. members doubt that, let them review the results that attended the abolition of the duty upon binder twine which, when placed upon the free list, soon went up in price and ultimately cost more than when it was manufactured in this country under a reasonable, protective tariff. I am of the opinion that the tariff does need revision, but in many respects I think it needs a revision upward instead of downward; and I think it is in need of an upward revision particularly in the interests of the farmer, and also of some of the manufacturers, of Canada. The Prime Minister and others have dwelt on the advisability, the importance and the necessity of uniting the eastern and western sections of this country. We are all agreed on that; we all hope that it will be accomplished. But let me suggest that we will never unite eastern and western Canada by destroying the industries of eastern Canada, no matter whether that destruction is carried out piecemeal, destroying one year the woollen industry and the next year the agricultural implement industry, or whether it is accomplished in a wholesale way. What I say is that to-day, in view of the high tariffs which are in force against Canada, the Canadian tariff should be raised in many respects. Let us look for a moment at our imports from the United States. Our total imports for the year ending January 1924 from the United States reached the enormous sum of $606,000,076 while our exports to that country for the same period were only $422,000,000 in round figures; and out of that $422,000,000 the sum of $225,000,000 was made up of exports of wood and paper. So that although we have this very large and populous nation to the south of us, our exports to that country of all kinds are very much less than our imports. Let me give the House a comparison of some of these duties upon agricultural products in the two countries. The Canadian duty on eggs is 3 cents a dozen, the American 8 cents; on butter 4 cents and 8 cents a pound respectively; on fresh meats 2 and 3 cents, and 3 and 4 cents per pound respectively; on cheese 3 cents and 5 cents per pound respectively; on wheat 12 cents and 42 cents a bushel respectively; on wheat flour 50 cents per barrel and $1.04 per hundredweight respectively; on hay $2 and $4 per ton respectively; on apples 90 cents per barrel and 25 cents per bushel of fifty pounds respectively. These figures show a very serious discrepancy between the Canadian and American duties, a discrepancy that is operating to the detriment of our farmers, which can be proved by the large imports of butter, cheese, fresh fruits, bacon and other commodities from the United States. For instance, in 1924 we imported butter from the United States to the value of $624,675; cheese, $224,778; fresh fruits, $17,409,355; bacon and hams, $844,005; fresh vegetables, $3,526,174; eggs, $2,243,263. On the other hand, our exports of these commodities to the United States were very much smaller. Therefore I contend for a revision of the tariff upwards, particularly of the duties upon farm produce.

With respect to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), I like it because it affirms faith in Canadian industry and declares for the principle of moderate and reasonable protection—a protection which will enable Canadian industry to live, which will recognize our manufacturers' right to continue in business, and which will provide employment for Canadian labour, a home market for our farmers, and will increase our railway traffic. All these advantages follow as the inevitable result of a reasonable and moderate tariff, and I cannot agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) that we should be content to "wait and see"; I do not think any opportunity should be lost of impressing upon the government the necessity of maintaining the tariff and the inadvisability of making any reduction at the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the position of the government? Every session a number of pledges have been given to the House and the country, but unfortunately those pledges have not been fulfilled. As a matter of fact, the government has retreated from the solution of every great national problem, no matter whether that problem was one of its own making or came to it from other sources. Take immigration for instance. The exodus from this country to the United States is truly alarming. The government has pointed out that immigration ceased during the war—something that could not possibly be otherwise, and the late government is surely not to be criticized for that cessation. Our friends opposite have also said that it was difficult to start the machinery of immigration after the war. I think the fact is that never in the history of Canada was it so easy to get a good class of immigrants as since the declaration of peace. Never has there been such a migration of the people of Europe, never has there been such unrest there, that unrest bringing with it a desire to move to the New World. In fact the British government has been endeavouring to provide homes overseas for her surplus population. I submit therefore that the government has lost the best opportunity that any adminstration ever had in our history to secure select and desirable immigration. Not only has it failed to rise to its opportunities in this respect, but it has failed also to prevent the exodus of our people to the United States. The figures were given last week by the leader of the opposition, showing an increase to about sixteen thousand a month during the past year. The rapidly rising tide of emigration of our best stock to the republic is reflected in the figures from the Bureau of Statistics dealing with settlers' effects exported to the United States. For the twelve months ending January, 1923 their total value amounted to $6,420,026; for the ensuing twelve months to January, 1924 I find the greatly augmented total of $9,669,731; while for the month of January alone, this year, settlers' effects were exported to the value of $559,198. So there is no diminution in this exodus southwards, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it will not be checked by the intimation in the Speech from the Throne that a further reduction in the duties on manufactured goods is contemplated. Instead of causing these Canadians to return to the Dominion it is likely to confirm their lack of confidence and aggravate their embarrassment, and must of necessity react very much to the disadvantage of Canada. Then the promises of reduction in taxation, of strict economy, of a balanced budget, of civil service reform—all these promises I am afraid will be of little avail to counteract the lack of confidence which our people have in any pledges of this government ever being redeemed. Each issue of promises is worth less than the preceding one and declines in value as rapidly as the German mark.

What is the actual position to-day of the government? They appear to have dropped their financial pilot, to have abandoned the policy of stability which he so well enunciated in his budget speech last session; the compass is not working; the chart has apparently been lost; there seems to be disagreement and threatened mutiny among the crew; the political fog is thickening, and the ship is drifting towards the rocks of defeat. And in the opinion of a constantly increasing number of our people, including many of the former friends and supporters of the government, the sooner the wreck occurs the better.

On motion of Mr. Raymond the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 13, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Report of the Ottawa Improvement Commission for the year ended March 31, 1923.—Hon. Mr. Robb.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Financial Statement of the Royal Society of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Robb.

PRIVILEGE—MR. IRVINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I would like to draw the attention of hon. members of this House to a despatch from Montreal, which appears on the front page of this morning's Ottawa Journal, giving a report of a speech I made there last evening. This report represents me as saying:

> Canada's government is like a Ford automobile, and the opposition is like a spare tire, all blown up with wind.

Further on the report says:

> We have enough ignoramuses in parliament, and if we cannot send any better we might as well not send any at all.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that while I do not charge this reputable newspaper with wilful misrepresentation, nor do I wish to impute any malicious intent to the report, yet I do wish to say that I have never on any occasion discussed the personnel of this House; and I wish to say also with regard to the illustration which I gave, that it is perfectly correct; but it was not applied to this government, nor to this opposition, it was applied to party government in general.

GRAND TRUNK GRATUITIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): I should like to ask the government whether a commission has been appointed, as promised by the Prime Minister at the last session of this House, to investigate all the circumstances and conditions connected with the payment to certain officials of the Grand Trunk and Canadian Northern railways of sums amounting to some $400,000, these gratuities being voted by the officials concerned to themselves just previous to their transference to the National railways on retirement; and if such commission was appointed, whether its findings have been communicated to the government; and, if so, what its conclusions were.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): In reply to the question of my hon. friend, I may say that I did not catch all that he said, but a commission was appointed to investigate certain matters relating to the gratuities to employees of the Grand Trunk, and other matters. That commission has reported, and I shall have the pleasure in a few days of laying that report on the Table of the House.

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Sutherland, resumed from Wednesday, March 12.

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, the ground of this debate has been pretty well covered and anything I may have to say will probably be a repetition of what has been said. However, there is a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne that appears to me rather ominous and threatening to the industrial interests of the constituency that I represent. One reason why I delayed speaking was that I had hoped that there might be some word of explanation from the government which would make the situation appear a little more definite. However, this phrase has been translated to mean—not only in my constituency, but over this country generally—that it is the intention of the government to remove the tariff duty on agricultural implements. I wish to say in this connection that, whatever else may be my duty in this House, I esteem it my first and most particular duty to represent faithfully the views of my constituents, and in doing that, Mr. Speaker, I must take a firm stand against any further reduction of the duty on agricultural implements, considering the fact that that duty has been reduced several times. A little later we will go into the question of what the duty has been in the past, and we shall find that it is lower now than it has ever been; and I take it that the present duty should be considered an irreducible minimum; I shall be firmly opposed to any further reduction. I wish to say—and I hope I make it plain enough—that no personal or party reasons will cause me to swerve from that determination. My constituency of Brantford is one that is perhaps not known to many hon. members of the House. But I know that those who know it, love it. When the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) waxed eloquent regarding the beauties of Nova Scotia and made this House resound with his eloquence in praising the Annapolis valley and Acadia, I said to myself: What would he say if he had ever seen Brantford? There are certain things with which each town or city is apt to become identified. We know that when, for instance, cotton is mentioned, the mind at once turns to Manchester; if silk or velvet, to Lyons; if lace, to the capital of little Belgium; if cutlery, we think of Sheffield; but when agricultural implements are mentioned the world over, the eye and mind naturally turn to Brantford. Brantford has been the home of the farmer's toolmaker for more than half a century, and it has produced for the farmer those implements with which he has been able to carry on his business. That is why I said, in a former address in this House, that I think the manufacture of agricultural implements should be considered a key industry in this country and so treated by any and every government. The fertile soil of our far flung, fenceless prairies, the stubborn veldt of South Africa and the distant pampas of Argentine, are all ploughed with ploughs manufactured in Brantford. The harvests of Australia, India and sunny France, as well as of this country, are reaped by harvesting machines made in Brantford. Wherever agricultural implements manufactured in Brantford have gone, they have carried the name of Canada honourably and nobly to every part of the world. So that naturally one can understand that any, and I believe every resident of Brantford, when he sees an attempt made to destroy the vital industry, the industrial life of that community, feels rather sensitive on the point, and is willing to do everything in his power to resist such an attempt. From the time of the publication of the Speech from the Throne, the city council of Brantford have passed strong resolutions. I will not take up the time of this House by reading long extracts from newspapers, although I could spend a considerable time in that way if such was the desire of hon. members. The chamber of commerce and the trades and labour council have also passed very strong resolutions, all expressing the hope that no further reduction will be made in the duty on agricultural implements.

When His Excellency uttered those words, I was unable to catch his eye, or he might, perhaps have given me a word of explanation. But I know he has been to Brantford and I know he loves Brantford; I know he would not do anything to injure Brantford. Moreover, he graciously deigned to spend a few days in the homely dwelling of one of our plough-makers, and I do not think he would return his hospitality in the way suggested in the Speech from the Throne. You may have noticed that he said that it was the government. I am loath to think that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would do anything against the interests of Brantford. In this resolution that was brought before the city council, it is stated that when the Prime Minister was in Brantford before the election, he made a promise and a pledge to the people that if he were returned to power, no legitimate industry should suffer. Consequently, we cannot, upon present evidence, condemn the Prime Minister but we shall not forget his promise. The government, as I understand the matter, is responsible; but I do not wish, until the budget is brought down and the exact condition is before us, to condemn the government, nor to take it for granted that it is going to enact any legislation that will injure Brantford. The government has often been likened to the ship of state, the chart and compass, and so forth, and I have always had rather a liking for nautical terms and similes; hence I cannot help thinking that, perhaps, on this occasion, when the ship of state is sailing and choosing the middle way between Scylla, the rock of high protection on the one side, and Charybdis, the whirlpool of free trade on the other, it seems as though it had on board a pilot who was taking it just a little too near to Charybdis. It is the pilot I am going to blame, and I say that if the government have on board a false or a wrong pilot, if they are taking advice from a man who really does not know the coast they are on, they had better drop him, get rid of him, and strike for the open water, if they want to be safe. I utter this remark in the most friendly spirit to those hon. gentlemen who are on the ship of state; but I would say this: When vessels are sailing in a convoy, if it so happens that the leading ship should drift into the whirlpool or upon a lee shore and, therefore, be wrecked, is it, in such a case, the necessary duty of every little vessel that is sailing in the convoy or squadron to follow her to destruction? I think it would seem rather that discretion should be used by each captain for the safety of his own ship. As regards my constituency of Brantford, I cannot make you understand, Mr. Speaker, because that would take too much time and I have not language at my command; but there exists between me and that constituency a different kind of feeling from that which exists between any other hon. member in this House and the place which he represents, a feeling of grateful affection that makes me feel I should be doing a wrong, an indescribable wrong, if I did not stand here four square for the interests of Brantford, and that is what I intend to do under the circumstances.

With regard to the constant changing of duties, the constant moving of the tariff, the people of Brantford, the manufacturers throughout this country, have not forgotten that we were told last year by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), that there was some hope of stabilising the tariff; that he said that instead of having it going up and down and changing, a little off this one year and a little on that the next, it was his object to make it more stable, and that it would be more satisfactory under that condition to the business interests of this country. We know that would be more satisfactory to the business interests of this country, and we know that now even this hint that has been passed out in the Speech from the Throne has had the effect of paralyzing business and discouraging capital, it has thrown many places, besides that from which I come from, into a turmoil of apprehension at what may come down in the budget. Just exactly why agricultural implements should be again singled out passes my comprehension. Some say there is a political reason, and that suggestion has been discussed generally throughout the country by the newspapers. It is said that for certain reasons that particular industry should be sacrificed to the good, at all events, of a large section of the community. In this connection I thought it was refreshing to hear the words of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressive party. I hope they impressed themselves on the mind of every one of his followers and indeed of every hon. gentleman in this House. The hon. member said that the only sure basis of national unity was equal justice to all, and I would ask him never to forget that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RAYMOND: Those gentlemen who applaud that statement will, I hope, bear it in mind. I am always glad when Britons applaud the name of justice, for I think it is the main thing; and if those gentlemen mean anything by the words they use they must mean that they will never destroy one industry for the benefit of another. The leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), in his first session in the House two years ago, uttered a similar sentiment, and I was glad that he did, he said he believed in special privileges for none and equal justice for all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RAYMOND: I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen applaud again, and I should like them to explain, when it comes to their turn—I do not want them to explain it exactly at this moment—what kind of equal justice they think it would be if one section of the country enjoyed free trade while the rest of the country was under the bonds of protection. I want to be consistent and I want to see hon. members consistent, and in endeavouring to be so I hope I shall be at least as consistent as that free trader who wants to have agricultural implements on the free list while at the same time he will not allow the workmen of the country, the mechanics and the labourers who are toiling in production, to use oleomargarine. Hon. gentlemen would prohibit the import and sale of this article and they would make its manufacture in this country an offence. And they try to excuse this attitude by their adoration for the cow. I have heard gentlemen express themselves, in veneration of the cow, in terms that would have done credit to a Hindoo worshipper of that animal; but I do want to put a plain proposition to those gentlemen: What would they think if they heard David excusing his cowardly murder of Uriah by pleading his passionate love for Bathsheba? Believing however, as they do, in equal justice, I hope that justice will characterize the legislation that they will support.

Now, the agricultural implement industry is one that has not been profitable. It has been shown, and I think it has been stated on the floor of the House, that one of our largest firms in Canada, the Massey-Harris Company lost some three years ago, $1,200,000, two years ago, some $640,000, and this year $370,000. So that if that is a legitimate industry it can hardly be claimed to be making a profit at the present time. And when farmers tell us that they are not in a position to purchase agricultural implements, I ask, what benefit will anyone derive from taking off the duty and letting more American implements come in? There is another great industry situated in Hamilton. While, of course, Brantford is the chief centre of the agricultural implement business, there are agricultural implements made in some fifty other places in Canada, and there is a large factory in Hamilton which has been established there for some years. During the last ten years, taking an average one year with another, beginning with the year 1913 and running up to 1922, both inclusive, the profit they have shown on their capital invested has been less than three per cent, per annum. In view of these facts, therefore, I do not think it can be claimed that any exorbitant profits are being made to-day or have been made within the last few years by the agricultural implement industry in Canada. As a matter of fact, our factories in Brantford have largely been closed; they have been running on very short time for the last three years. Some of them have been running lately, and I am glad to say that the factory of the Massey-Harris Company, which has not been going steadily for the last year, has benefited by the French Treaty that was made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) last year. By means of this treaty these manufacturers were able to get favourable treatment for their implements in France, and they have employed in the last year some nine hundred men, although regularly they should be employing fifteen hundred.

Now, I do not think that it is either necessary or advisable to go into the whole list of the losses of these industries. The fact is that they have suffered serious losses, and the men whom they have not been able to employ have naturally gone over to the other side. And the danger of that is that when our mechanics go across the line—and thousands have gone, not only from Brantford but from other cities as well—when hard times overtake the industries in the United States there is a return of workmen to Canada, and it is not the most skilled mechanics that return. The artisans that work in our factories, in other words, are combed out to supply the labour market in the United States, and when any workmen are to be laid off there it is the unskilled class who are dismissed; for the American manufacturers know a skilful man when they find him, and they keep him. The skilful men are not apt to come back. I do not think it is fair to give all the experiments, if we may use that term, in free trade to one industry or one town. I do not regard this as a question exactly of free trade or protection; I do not look upon it in that way. The question of free trade and protection has been argued in this House for fifty years. It began some fifty years ago when the government—then a Liberal government—raised the tariff, which was 15 per cent, to 17½ per cent, and they were accused by the Conservative party of that day of being protectionists. When the tariff was raised in 1874 from 15 per cent to 17½ per cent there was this about it: it was levied fairly, honestly and equitably as a revenue tariff on the goods imported into Canada. It was not a lopsided tariff that admitted some goods free while putting a duty on others, there was no class favoured in the levying of that tariff; whereas the intention now seems to be to favour a certain class in the levying of the present tariff. All goods came in on a revenue basis and paid alike.

Now, let me tell the House a little of our history in Brantford during the last few years with regard to the duty on agricultural implements. Just before the slump came in the price of agricultural products, 5 per cent was taken off the duty on ploughs and binders. This reduction was made for the benefit of the farming population, and naturally it was opposed by the manufacturers, but without effect. At the same time tractors were made absolutely free. As a result two tractor factories went out of business in our city. Since that time a cream separator factory has also gone out of business. When, some two years ago, there was a further tariff reduction of 2½ per cent it was felt to be very serious at a time when the farmers were not buying, when business was not good, when the agricultural population of the West said they were not in a condition to buy, and it was very difficult to see whom it was expected to benefit by the removal of the duty. It was hoped then that that would be the last slice taken off the tariff. To-day agricultural implements stand at the very bottom of the list, having the least tariff duty of any manufactured article in this country, averaging between 10 per cent on harvesting machinery and 15 per cent on plows. When that is the case can any further reduction be justified? Would it not be a fatal blow to the industry? Before that blow is struck I feel it my duty as the representative of Brantford—and I hope the representatives of other constituencies where agricultural implements are made will join with me—to resist to the extent of my power any further cut in this duty.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the condition of the western farmer is always attributable to the price of agricultural implements or the duty thereon. I am sure there is no man in this House, I do not care what his business is or where he comes from, that has a stronger or more active sympathy for the farmers in the West than I have.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RAYMOND: Well, it seems odd that some hon. gentlemen by the slight noise they make should doubt my word. I hope, however, that as time goes on they will see that I really believe in what their leader says, that the basis of national unity is equal justice; and I say that those who claim more than equal justice—mind you, those who claim for themselves through a selfish interest, or any other interest, more than equal justice to themselves—are doing an injury to our national unity. Yes, I have always felt my heart touched when I have heard of the hardships of the western farmer. When I have heard of a farmer being hailed out until there was positively nothing left upon the land for him to reap, the only thing standing there being his harvesting machinery, it has occurred to me: What a great benefit it would be to him to take the duty off agricultural implements. When I have heard of a grasshopper plague in the West that has stripped the land of vegetation, I have thought at once: What a panacea it would be for getting rid of them, to take the duty off agricultural implements. When whole sections have suffered from drought, the answer has always been: Take the duty off agricultural implements—the one panacea for all the farmers' troubles is: Take the duty off agricultural implements! Now, Sir, do you think it would be effective? Do you think that if that duty were taken off the farmer would be satisfied? I remember one experiment when the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) made tractors free just a little before the last election. I think the result ought to show the gratitude of the farmer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is a little out in his time. The duty was taken off tractors just a little after the election, not before.

Mr. RAYMOND: I beg your pardon, Sir, but I referred to the election of 1921. The duty was taken off just before that election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was about four years before.

Mr. RAYMOND: It was in 1919; that would be two years before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was in 1918.

Mr. RAYMOND: I think most farmers would remember for two years. If they have any gratitude at all it should last that length of time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member will understand that I am not disagreeing with him on the question of gratitude.

Mr. RAYMOND: It is on the question of gratitude or appreciation that I am speaking. I say if the duty were still further reduced, even if it were all stripped off, there would still be something else to complain of—and we know there are many other things—and I do not think it would appease all my friends opposite; it might some, but not all. There is rather a homely little illustration given of a mother trying to teach her child appreciation of where things come from, and if it seems too homely perhaps hon. gentlemen will bear with me while I describe it. A little boy had a religious mother, and she was teaching him his prayers.

Mr. FORKE: Speak up. The story is too good to miss.

Mr. RAYMOND: Perhaps my hon. friend knows the story. The little boy had a religious mother—and I have no doubt the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) also had a religious mother—and she wanted to teach him to be properly grateful for what he received. He was very anxious to have a drum. While she was teaching him his evening prayer he punctuated each line with "I want a drum, I want a drum." His mother began the prayer:

Now I lay me down to sleep—
("I want a drum")
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.
("I want a drum")
If I should die before I wake—
("I want a drum")
I pray the Lord my soul to take.
("I want a drum")

After the little boy fell asleep she got a drum and put it by his side, thinking that when he awoke he would be duly grateful. In the morning the little fellow opened his eyes, and on seeing the drum exclaimed. "Where the devil did that come from?" I understood the leader of the Progressive party to say he was familiar with the story, and I hope he will prove more grateful for tariff favours than the little boy was for the drum.

But I think there is even a more serious question—the question of national unity is involved. We have been told that a very serious condition exists in this country, particularly in the West, and that unless something is done there may be secession from confederation. Well, Sir, I am one of those who think that confederation is a great monument to the wise statesmanship of our political leaders, and I for one would be very, very sorry to see it destroyed or weakened by what we may term the interests of any one section of the Dominion, because I believe that the real interests of all the provinces were furthered by those who brought about confederation. I believe those interests can be so amalgamated and welded together that whatever real grievances may exist can be done away with by a little give and take. I think the gentlemen from the West can be satisfied. But when they speak of secession and of doing away with national unity—the basis of which, we must always remember, is equal justice—they must bear in mind that their fellow-Canadians who are engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements will not consider that they have received equal justice if their industry is destroyed and other industries are still allowed the benefits of protection. Are my friends opposite willing to strip away all protection? Do they want to have entire free trade for the country, or do they want it only for the implements which they themselves use? That is the question. When it is reduced to a matter of dollars and cents there is many an honest farmer in the West who pays more taxes on the tobacco he uses than he does on the whole outfit of his agricultural machinery. I believe that some of their confreres in the western States are for treating tobacco as they would treat oleomargarine; they wish to ban it, to keep it from the country, to teach us that it is wrong to manufacture, buy, sell or smoke it. What would they do, then? What taxes would be collected from the western farmer if he used no tobacco and had free agricultural implements? I think there would be very little, Sir, because we know as a matter of fact that out of $46,000,000 collected from the personal income tax the farmers of this country pay less than 2 per cent.

Mr. GOULD: There is a reason.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain it.

Mr. RAYMOND: Well, with your reason I hope you will always couple justice; as long as you do that you will be all right. There can be no justice when all the demand is on one side only. The argument and the attitude of some others is absurd, who, as I say, by way of effecting a cure for hail, for drought, for grasshoppers and so on, want the duty taken off agricultural implements, but who at the same time want the Hudson Bay Railway. How will you pay for it? Why, take the duty off agricultural implements! They want branch lines in the West; how will they pay for them? Why, take the duty off agricultural implements! That is about the basis of reasoning, not by hon. members opposite but by those who, I think, inspire them to some of the utterances that they make in this House.

I do not wish to keep the House very long, but there is just another point I would like to make, and it is this: There are these various demands from the West—the St. Lawrence waterway, the Hudson Bay Railway, branch lines, and many other things. What could have been done for them by the government has been done in the way of the Wheat Board, the suspension of the Crowsnest pass agreement, the cheapening of rates as far as possible. All these things have been done, but still, to use an expression of Shakespeare's, the only effect is to make our friends act—

As if increase of appetite had grown
By what it fed on.

Mr. Speaker, you may have read something which I saw recently in the newspaper, because one can find anything in the newspaper that is not beyond the ken of human imagination. It was the story of a bear. I would not swear whether it was the Manitoba black bear, the barren lands grizzly, the Saskatchewan brown, or one of those tremendous grizzlies from the foothills of the Rockies in Alberta, but it was a bear that was apparently very hungry and rapacious. There he was with his large white teeth glistening, his tongue lolling out and his mouth watering. A little boy was feeding him candy. The boy gave him one; the bear swallowed it, and as he did so his tongue lolled and his mouth watered more and more. The boy threw him another candy, and the bear's eyes rolled and he behaved generally in the same way as before. In fact, the bear seemed to get more and more hungry with every piece of candy he got, and finally when the boy had no more candies to throw to him, the bear gobbled him up—and still his eyes rolled, his mouth watered and his tongue lolled out, not I suppose, with a desire to get more candy, but with the appetite for another boy. Now, I am not much good at allegories, but it seems to me that that is a pretty fair account of the way the West of Canada is acting toward the East. So that after we have thrown them everything we have, they will still be more anxious for more. I believe—and I do not say it unkindly or in any unfriendly spirit—that as evidence of that we have only to look back over their demands, chief among which have been free agricultural implements and some lines of railroad that would cost a few hundred millions—and which would be paid for by taking the duty off agricultural implements!

Now, I say this, and I say it most sincerely, Mr. Speaker: We are confronted, as these gentlemen tell us, with a serious condition in this country. The farmers in the West have had a mighty hard time in the last three years. But why blame it on the tariff? Why blame it on agricultural implements? According to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for the United States there are 600,000 deserted farms in that country at the present time. And that condition is not due to the duty on agricultural implements. Hundreds of banks have failed in the rural districts; in fact, the farmers there are in a far worse state than our farmers are here.

An hon. MEMBER: Too much protection.

Mr. RAYMOND: An hon. gentleman says, "Too much protection." But this is not a question of protection or free trade. It is a question of treating all industries fairly, of letting equal justice be the basis of national unity. When one industry is to be destroyed for the benefit of another, I do not think that can be called equal justice.

To resume: I was saying that the farmers are in a bad condition, and they are making these incessant demands. Some of the things they ask for may be desirable; whether or not they are desirable from the national point of view is for the government, I suppose, to say. The Hudson Bay Railway, the branch lines, the deepening of the St. Lawrence canals—all these things will perhaps come in their time, but when in addition to that there is an organized effort on the part of the people who would be benefited to seek to free themselves from taxation, even from the taxation of the tariff on agricultural implements, I say the situation is not consistent, it is not logical.

Some few years ago, within the memory of perhaps some members of this House, a great war was fought in the United States. It was fought upon the principle of state rights, which is another form, Mr. Speaker, of what we call nowadays self-determination. Now, self-determination, while a most valuable, is a most dangerous principle. Self-determination was one of the basic principles of the American constitution, for the Declaration with which the national life of that country began states that every man is entitled to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. If you trace that constitution on from that, you will find that the limitations to that constitution have been such as to show each man where his liberty ended and where the liberty of the other man began; in other words, the effect is to curb self-determination. Need I quote any other amendment than the eighteenth amendment to the constitution, the last put into effect, which enforces prohibition in that country? That was put there to curb the spirit of self-determination; and every amendment—I think I am not mistaken—expresses that principle of curbing self-determination. The war was fought on the same principle. It was fought to curb national rights, it was only another way of suppressing self-determination. In this country to-day we are confronted with a somewhat similar condition to that with which they were confronted in 1860-1 in the United States, but with us it is a question of economic self-determination. We have a section of this country which comes to the conclusion that it must decide for itself just what economic conditions it wants to live under.

I say we are confronted with a problem, and a serious one, of economic self-determination; that is the condition as it exists in this country to-day. The action of hon. gentlemen opposite, their history, the history of their party and of their demands up to the present, show that very clearly, as I think they will agree upon reflection. If we are to have union, if we are to have the confederation saved—and we all want it saved—we must have the principle of compromise; we must have the principle of give and take; we must have men who are patriotic enough to hold up the love of country above their own self interest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RAYMOND: All right; if we have men who realize that national unity is based upon equal justice to all, then there is some hope that this vexed question of economic self-determination can be settled definitely and for all time to the advantage of all Canada in the saving of the confederation. What made Lincoln great was that he saved the union. That classic marvel, the Gettysburg speech, means nothing if it does not mean that Lincoln was the saviour of the union and of his country. The question I would ask to-day is this: Have we in this country a man of the sagacity, the wisdom, the courage, the firmness, and the kindness, so to save our confederation?

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I think the House owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Raymond), for the way in which he has interested and entertained us, and for his very frank expression of opinion. Before I proceed to deal with the Address I should like to refer to some of the remarks which he has just made.

At the outset he told the House very eloquently how the implement manufacturers of Brantford sold their machines in all countries of the world; indeed they were famous throughout the whole world, were known and used everywhere. Yet these are the people, apparently, who cannot compete in the home market.

Then again, I am afraid the hon. member has placed himself in a rather embarrassing position when he said that he stands four-square for the interests of Brantford. In his speech he appealed for national unity on the basis of national justice. He said: We must not destroy one industry to benefit another; we must hold up the love of country above selfish interest. I would like to know how he reconciles those very fine sentiments, sentiments which I think we can all endorse, with the statement that he stands four-square for the interests of Brantford. Is he prepared to sacrifice the national interest, whether it be with respect to unity or any other matter, financial or otherwise, for the interests of one locality or of one particular industry? We in this corner of the House have frequently been charged with being sectional and narrow in our attitude, we are occupational representatives, and are suspected of coming here to claim, demand and get for farmers something in the way of special privilege. I do not think, in view of what has been said this afternoon, that any such charge can be laid at our doors that would not be much more fittingly laid at the door of the hon. member who has just spoken. I have every respect for the hon. member for Brantford personally. I appreciate the embarrassing position in which he placed himself during his campaign and I sincerely sympathize with him. But I want to challenge emphatically the doctrine which is implied in his statement, "I stand four-square for the interests of Brantford." Unfortunately, I think we in this quarter of the House are not always immune from criticism along the same line, but so far as the question of oleomargarine is concerned the hon. member will admit that his criticism does not apply to me at all events.

The bear story, which was no doubt extremely interesting and amusing, has a reverse application, and I have often heard farmers use it in that way. When I spoke in the budget debate two years ago I think I made the comparison with reference to a litter of pigs, with the big fellows shoving the little fellows aside. Certainly the bear story can be applied in many other ways than the one in which it was applied by the hon. member.

Further with regard to the local situation I would like to say this: I have never known agricultural conditions in our neighbourhood to be as bad as they have been in the last couple of years. Last year eight hundred acres of very fine farm land quite near the city of Brantford went out of cultivation. It was abandoned. Some of it is yet abandoned; and this land is close to that splendid home market, the famous manufacturing city of Brantford. This spring part of my own farm, which has been rented for four years, was thrown back upon my hands, and I have been unable in three months of search to find any man who will take it at any price. I would lease it at almost any figure to any man who would take care of it for me. There are 130 acres in that part of my farm, with good buildings; it is on a cement highway and within two-and-a-half miles of this famous home market. Yet the conditions which the farmers face at the present time are such as to leave that farm and its equipment idle. I have the buildings insured for $11,000, and I cannot get anybody to touch that farm. I shall have to do the best I can with it myself. Mr. Speaker, that is an extraordinary situation. I do not attribute it altogether to the tariff, very little perhaps to the tariff, but I simply point it out as indicative of the condition of affairs that exists in close proximity to this home market on which we are so often told we must depend.

But in spite of all that I have related I am prepared to endorse what the hon. member has said about discrimination against any locality and against any industry in the matter of tariff readjustment; as a matter of grace, not perhaps as a matter of strict justice. But I think that in any readjustment, no matter what absolute justice may demand, it is wise for us to mitigate the sharpness of any blow, any distress that such readjustment may involve, and I think I speak for the members in this quarter of the House when I express the opinion that we want rather a general reduction on all the necessaries of life.

Mr. MARLER: How far should that general reduction go?

Mr. GOOD: I will answer the hon. member in just a moment. I say we want a general reduction. We do not want special privileges or anything in the nature of sops thrown out to us as farmers. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) has asked me how far tariff reductions ought to go. I am not prepared to say. I think that there too, the statement that I made with regard to the mitigation of any blow ought, perhaps, to be kept in mind, and that perhaps it would seem desirable not to make too drastic cuts in one year. I am not prepared, and I do not think the hon. gentleman could expect me to answer in detail as to how far that general cut ought to go.

Mr. MARLER: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that this general reduction of the tariff—and he said he spoke for himself and those around him—

Mr. GOOD: I hope I did.

Mr. MARLER: —would be a general reduction on all the necessities of life. Now I ask the question in general terms; and he means, I assume, that so much be taken off this year, and so much taken off next year, until gradually there would be approximately no tariff left on manufactured goods. Would the hon gentleman correct me if I am wrong?

Mr. GOOD: The question goes perhaps a little farther than I would like to go at this stage in the debate. I would be very glad indeed to go into that matter at the proper time. I think perhaps I may refer to it later on in my remarks. However, I have this to say at the moment in answer to the question, that we must have some consideration for revenue needs. We have not yet devised—but I hope we shall at some time in the not too distant future—other and better methods of taxation. Until such time as we have those methods evolved and decided upon, we shall have to rely to some extent upon customs duties or duties of that sort for revenue purposes. I think if the hon. member will pardon me, that is as far as I would care to go just at the moment in answer to his question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not take part in the debate on the Address last year or the year before. I had no intention of taking part in the debate this year, but I have been impressed this year with the somewhat different situation which faces us and it is this; the government is in a minority—a very satisfactory position in my judgment, because they have to be guided by the will of the House, and I think they ought to do that if we are going to have democratic government. I take it that the government at least tacitly invites expressions of opinion at this stage in our proceedings upon any legislation which is foreshadowed. That is my justification, and I think it is sufficient, for imposing upon the House at this time, in spite of the desire which I know exists with many to shorten the proceedings, and as they say, to get down to business.

Regarding the contents of the Speech from the Throne, I would like to express a general if somewhat qualified approval. Whatever criticism I feel disposed to make would be based perhaps more upon omissions than upon anything actually contained in the Address. I think, however, that I should comment upon several items in the government's programme.

First, with respect to the allegations of prosperity in this country, for which, as proof, the government refers us to the records of production, trade, transportation, employment and public finance. I have already referred to the situation in our own district at home. The hon. member for Brantford

(Mr. Raymond) has referred to the situation in our nearby city. It is sufficiently serious; and I want to suggest to this House that if we examine those records we may perhaps interpret them in a somewhat different way from what is intended by the government in the Speech from the Throne. The statistics of trade and transportation are undoubtedly linked up with the statistics of production, and I think we will all admit that, so far as production is concerned, the favourable showing which is made this year is due to the blessings of Providence, and not to anything any party or government may have done. We have had, particularly in the far West, a splendid year for field crops. I think in eastern Canada too, the crop this year has been very good, and we have to attribute to this fact the improved records as to production, trade and transportation. So far as unemployment is concerned, I would suggest that there is nothing particularly consoling in the fact that the figures for unemployment are reduced. That is undoubtedly due to emigration and I would suggest in that connection it might be wise for us to see why it is that the United States is more attractive than Canada for people who are out of work, why the general business conditions are better in the United States than they are in Canada.

So far as the increase in public revenue is concerned, I want to ask this question: How has this increase been secured? Has it been secured at the expense of productive industry or otherwise? Whatever satisfaction we may have with an increase in the public revenue will depend very largely upon how we can answer the question whether the increased revenue we have secured has crippled industry, or whether it has revived and helped industry. Generally speaking, I do not think we should be over-optimistic at this time, though indeed we should be thankful for what measure of prosperity we have had this last year. I made a somewhat extended trip during the summer throughout the western part of this continent, and I can assure the House that, so far as the farmers are concerned—and I think probably the effect has been seen in other industries as well—the industrial conditions are serious enough throughout the whole continent, particularly in the prairie provinces of Canada and in the middle west. I received a letter from a friend of mine in Saskatchewan in October, and I shall quote one sentence from his letter. He says:

> Economic conditions are bad. People are losing hope; scores are leaving the country, and nearly always slip out without paying their debts.

We have many hon. members here who know the situation in our western country and can speak with more authority than I can in that respect.

Now the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) pointed out very well indeed that the remedies would be found in three different fields, first that pertaining to action by the individual, second that pertaining to collective action in and through the co-operative movement, and third that pertaining to collective action in the sphere of politics. Here in this House we are concerned mainly, almost entirely I think, with the third field, and I ask the question, what should be done in that field at the present time. First how shall we approach the problem? It seems to me, so far as our attitude of mind is concerned, that we must study the problem fearlessly, patiently and without party bias. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have been very much depressed at times in this House over the party recriminations, the disposition to make party capital out of the most serious and critical national questions, and I could wish very very heartily that we could forget our party lines entirely, and sit down, as we say, around a common table and study these questions from the point of view of the national welfare, and wholly apart from any question of seeking or keeping power. I am glad to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) applauding me. He is a man who can render this country great service, but he must forget his loyalty to party.

A second question. Who must study these problems? The representatives of the people? Nay, I think the people themselves. We must give some study to them in this House, but the people outside must get down to a hard, serious, earnest study of many of these problems. One of the basic conditions to be fulfilled, if these problems are to be studied by this House, is that this House shall fairly represent the Canadian people. Does it? Perhaps it does in a measure better than it has hitherto done, but I want to impress upon the House in that connection the importance of correct representation. I have dealt with this matter before; I do not wish to elaborate upon it now; but I note, with a great deal of satisfaction, that section of the Speech from the Throne which deals with electoral reform, and I trust that that very small measure of electoral reform will enable us to secure, in the years to come, a more thoroughly and truly representative House of Commons than we can possibly get under the old system. I hope, however,—and I shall speak at greater length in this connection when the time comes—that we may, as quickly as possible and as sanely as we can, proceed a little further towards that method of election which has alone shown itself capable of giving a truly representative assembly. But I repeat, that we must study the problems, fearlessly, patiently and without party bias.

If a comprehensive study of the recent and still prevailing depression is made, I am convinced that the largest factor in the situation will be found to be the breakdown or the mismanagement or the mishandling of the currency and banking systems of the world. I can cite authorities for that, and therefore I am not placing the statement before the House as having any particular weight because I make it. I believe, however, that a serious study of the situation throughout the world will show that no cause has been more destructive of prosperity throughout practically all the civilized world than that breakdown,—a breakdown which has been very serious in recent years. It has been partly due to the war. Some think it is entirely due to the war, but that I do not believe. It is not essentially due to the war, and for that reason, indeed for any reason, no matter what the ultimate or contributing causes may be, it behooves us to make further and radical study of this most important problem in all its various aspects, because it has many aspects.

I am going to refer very briefly in this connection to the resolution which was debated in this House last year and which was committed to one of the select standing committees for investigation. The investigation was never completed. I want to express the hope that this year, when the matter is reconsidered by this House, an opportunity will be given for a continuation of that very important work.

In this connection also I want to refer, in passing, to a document which I have in my hand, published, I think, annually, by the Montreal Gazette, and entitled The Commercial and Financial Review for the year 1923. This comes from the Canadian metropolis which is so ably represented in this House, in part at least, by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). I find here, in this booklet an article written by R. S. White, Editor-in-Chief of the Montreal Gazette, a man who, one would suppose, has some sense of responsibility for what he writes or says. I want to read to the House part of this article which is entitled In the Field of Finance.

The chartered banks of Canada have encountered one of the most trying years in their experience, and have emerged with unimpaired strength and unabated public confidence.

I do not think I need comment upon that, but I would like to comment upon the fact that a man in his position should make such a statement and publish it. The article proceeds:

The revision of the Bank Act—the law which regulates their operations, defines their powers, designates their responsibilities and prescribes penalties for wrong-doing—was undertaken by the Banking and Commerce Committee of the House of Commons, and after long discussion was completed without radical change in its principles.

I think that is quite true. Now this:

A vigorous onslaught was made upon the banks by the Progressive party, who had nursed their wrath for many months and who attributed the unprofitable results of farming operations in the western provinces to the failure of the banks to freely lend to all and sundry in need of money. It was proposed by this political party to deprive the chartered banks of the privilege of issuing notes—

That is not true, as every hon. gentleman present knows. The articles goes on:

—and to give a monopoly of the currency to a national bank of issue which, being a political institution, would emit money for public and private purposes regardless of security and without provision for redemption.

What do members of this House think of a man in his position in the intelligent city of Montreal uttering such stuff as that?

Mr. MARLER: What is wrong with it?

Mr. GOOD: It is not true.

Mr. MARLER: In what respect?

Mr. GOOD: It is a misstatement of fact. I challenge the hon. member, any member of this House, to find in the records anything of that sort. There was some discussion, informally, about the proposal for a national bank of issue; but no such proposition was made definitely, and certainly there was absolutely nothing, even suggested privately, that would justify this gentleman in saying that it was suggested to create—

A national bank of issue which, being a political institution, would emit money for public and private purposes regardless of security and without provision for redemption.

That is positively absurd.

Mr. MARLER: Probably he was drawing that conclusion from the mass of evidence presented to the committee in regard to the currency. No one could draw any other conclusion from the evidence of the witnesses.

Mr. GOOD: On the contrary no intelligent man could draw such a conclusion from the record of the committee last year.

Mr. HOEY: You cannot prevent him, of course.

Mr. GOOD: The article proceeds:

It was not a new proposal nor an original scheme, but one whose futility to establish prosperity had in modern times—

I do not know what the gentleman means by "modern times."

—been exemplified in the assignats of France, the wild-cat currency of the land banks of the United States—

May I remark that these land banks were established in 1914. They issue no currency. They do a land mortgage loan business. This man is utterly at sea, and he should have known that before writing such stuff.

Mr. MARLER: Let us hear the rest of it.

Mr. GOOD: The article proceeds:

—the ruble of Russia and the mark of Germany. The firmness of the Finance Minister coupled with the sanity of the parliamentary majority caused the rejection of the dangerous fads of the Progressives, and the bill for the renewal of the bank charters for a further decennial period became law very much as introduced.

I will not read it all. He speaks of the amendments that were made and then goes on to say:

Then, shortly after prorogation of Parliament, the collapse of the Home Bank occurred. It was a small institution whose resources did not exceed one per cent of the combined resources of the banks, but the subsequent revelation of the rottenness of the institution was undoubtedly a shock to the public, and the clamour for new banking legislation was renewed in some quarters. Loudest in the outcry were the unfortunate depositors who stand to lose 60 per cent of their deposits, while the poor shareholders are stripped of every dollar of their investment and required under the double liability clause to part with as much more. It was one of the most disastrous bank failures Canada has known, but the disclosure of its mismanagement points to no remedy not already supplied by the new Bank Act. The audit of the Home Bank was palpably inefficient, a very travesty of the word; and it is to prevent the recurrence of this experience that the audit has now been made in fact as well as name. Dishonesty, indeed, cannot be anticipated nor frustrated by legislation—

That is an extraordinary statement to make —that dishonesty cannot be anticipated nor frustrated by legislation. What is our legislation for? What is the purpose of the Criminal Code?

Mr. MARLER: You cannot legislate a man into honesty.

Mr. GOOD: No, you cannot make a man honest by law.

Mr. MARLER: Well, that is what the article says.

Mr. GOOD: I beg the hon. member's pardon; the article does not say so. What the article says is that dishonesty cannot be anticipated nor frustrated by legislation.

Mr. FORKE: It can, by putting a lock on the door.

Mr. GOOD: The article continues:

—but it can be prevented from running a long course and adequately punished when detected; and this has been done.

As for the contentjon of the Home Bank depositors that their losses should be reimbursed by the other banks or by Parliament, it is so monstrously absurd as to require no argument in rebuttal.

Evidently Mr. White would not agree with the government's action in appointing a committee to investigate the allegations made by the depositors. I submit that any man, no matter what his prominence may be, who prints such mischievous rubbish as that ought to be publicly censured.

Mr. MARLER: It seems to me my hon. friend is using rather extravagant language in referring to the author of the article.

Mr. GOOD: I can find no terms more appropriate than the words I have used. The article is mischievous, because it goes to a class of people who do not understand the farmers' point of view—nor do they understand the Progressives in this House—and who will be prejudiced against the farmers by this misrepresentation. And I say it is rubbish, as I think I have shown.

In this connection I want also to refer in passing, and as dealing with this particular subject, to some correspondence I have had recently with a very prominent ex-Canadian banker now living in the United States. I am not privileged at the moment to divulge his name but I will quote two passages from his letters, one a letter to me and one a copy of a letter which he has addressed to one of the chief Canadian bankers of the present time. He says:

While as late as March last I proposed removal of some of the evils of the Canadian system, rather than a complete change, the Home Bank failure, with three other disasters, calls for more radical treatment than mere grafting of improvements. A decided change of system is essential, whether it be a modified branch system of moderate sized banks or a system without branches.

In the other letter, which is much longer, written to one of our prominent Canadian bankers, the last two sentences read:

When the currency system of the United States was at its worst, it was a pleasure to point to the Canadian system of that time. Now the latter is in ruins, due to secretive management, to over-trading beyond all example, to persistent propaganda and to united influence for monopoly.

Now, I have read these extracts not for the purpose, as may be said, of slinging mud at anyone, but to call to the attention of the House the absolutely vital need that exists for re-opening this most important question and giving it further consideration.

The second large factor in the present depression is, in my judgment, the heavy and unsound taxation from which this country suffers at the present time. Heavy taxation would not be so bad if it were of the right sort, unless indeed the revenue secured were foolishly spent.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is there any sort of taxation which the people would admit to be right?

Mr. GOOD: I will answer that question in a moment. Let me say that unsound taxation of any degree is incompatible with prosperity; and my opinion is that most of our federal taxation is thoroughly unsound in principle. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) wants to know whether there is any sound system of taxation. I want to commend him as a member of the government for suggesting—and I hope the suggestion will be carried out—that a board be constituted to study methods of taxation, because, in my opinion, if there is not any absolutely sound method there are at any rate some methods that are a good deal sounder than others; and perhaps in time, with investigation and study, the public may be convinced that certain methods are preferable to others and should be adopted. Two years ago I went to considerable trouble to present to the House, in the budget debate a criticism of the present system of federal taxation. I examined the basic questions underlying the matter of the incidence of taxation, and indicated a system which I thought sounder than any other. I have not been done the honour of having that address referred to in any way by any member of the House since that time. I should not perhaps expect recognition, but I was hoping that at least it might be attacked if it was wrong. I propose this year, if I am able, to take that matter up again when the budget debate comes on and to outline in some detail what has been done throughout the world in the direction of securing a better system of taxation than is current in Canada; and I trust, when that time comes, that the matters which I shall present will have some sympathetic consideration by all members of the House who are really concerned about our present situation.

As I remarked already I am pleased to note in the Speech from the Throne the government's proposal to constitute a board to investigate and study various modes of taxation. There is in the Speech little that is more hopeful, if the board's work is not vitiated at the outset by improper appointments. I should like also to suggest in this connection that it is very important to bring about at the earliest possible date a conference between the municipal, provincial and federal authorities who have to do with taxation, with a view to preventing wasteful overlapping in collecting agencies and the like. We have already in some provinces three income taxes, with separate machinery for their collections. Surely this is a serious waste.

I am glad also to notice the proposal of the government to consolidate the revenue collecting agencies. I think they might well go further and consider the propriety of carrying out the suggestions made by Mr. O'Leary in his series of articles in MacLean's Magazine; that is, of further consolidating the various departments or sub-departments which now overlap. This would be a very effective method of economizing.

With regard to civil service retrenchment, the situation is indeed tragic. It is bad policy at any time to have the public service overmanned; it is particularly bad to-day when productive industry is overburdened with taxation. But, on the other hand, with unemployment rife, what will happen to those who are relieved of their duties in the Civil Service? Will they become a charge on the city of Ottawa or the province of Ontario? Some consideration must be given to this aspect of the situation, and I would suggest that, while it is certainly desirable to weed out unnecessary employees, the weeding-out process be carried on carefully, although I do not suppose there is much danger of its proceeding too fast. There is naturally a constant attrition in the service through death, superannuation, marriage and voluntary resignation, and so I am of the opinion that if fresh appointments to the service are held in check a reduction of the staff can be accomplished in the fairly near future without any very serious hardships resulting to the individuals concerned, or to the municipality.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would my hon. friend elaborate his views a little? Certain employees are temporary, and when a vacancy arises it is very difficult to appoint one of these transients to fill the position, as applications are advertised for throughout the country and whoever passes the civil service examination gets the appointment. It has been suggested by a member of the Railway Commission that we should stop the influx of outsiders and utilize those who are already in the service as temporaries in filling vacancies from time to time, and so gradually reduce the staff. Of course, my hon. friend will understand that I am interrupting him in a friendly way. The trouble is that to fill any vacancy by the appointment of a temporary already on the staff will cost two or three times as much in many instances as to bring in an outsider. Therefore economy does not of necessity go hand in hand with a reduction of the staff in this way.

Mr. GOOD: I am quite free to admit that there are a number of practical difficulties in the working out of this policy, but I think the old motto applies, where there's a will there's a way; and although there might have to be a number of exceptions to any rule that may be laid down there is at least some hope of progress in the not too distant future in this direction. I do not profess to have studied the details of the Civil Service sufficiently to be able to make any specific suggestions. However, the tragedy of the situation seems to me to emphasize anew the importance of a radical study of taxation and finance, for in this direction lies our chief remedy. Apropos of this I would remind the House of one sentence quoted the other day by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) from an address delivered in England by Mr. McKenna. I have since secured a copy of that address, and it is certainly a very frank and definite statement of his views as to the connection between unemployment and financial policy; and this is one of the questions that this House ought to give attention to.

I note with satisfaction the proposal in the Speech from the Throne of tariff reduction. As I have already stated, I hope this will be a general reduction of the duties on the necessaries of life, and that we are not justified in interpreting the phrase, "instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion," too narrowly as meaning only so-called agricultural implements. Overalls are just as important to a farmer as his plow, just as much an instrument of production and just as necessary, and certainly more people are interested in getting cheap overalls than in getting cheap plows. We should try to live up to that well-known motto, the greatest good to the greatest number, and I feel confident that if the government bring down a tariff policy along this line we in this quarter of the chamber will give it our support. I would warn the government, however, of the consequences of making infinitesimal changes—of endeavouring to straddle the fence. I fear that such a policy would be fatal to them, and I hope they will take it to heart that anything of this sort would be totally unacceptable—at least to me.

The paragraph of the Speech from the Throne which deals with the Bank Act is as follows:

> The amendments made to the Bank Act in the last decennial revision of the last session provided better guarantees for the public in banking operations; their wisdom has already been abundantly apparent.

This is surely a shrewd and somewhat non-committal statement. If it means that some improvements were made last session, we all admit its correctness; but if it means that adequate improvements were enacted, the statement will be questioned. I have already submitted to the House opinions expressed by a very eminent banker as to the critical nature of our banking situation. I think the whole matter of our Bank Act needs to be reconsidered and studied in an entirely different frame of mind from what prevailed last year. Personally I am prepared to sit down with any man who differs from me in opinion, and to sympathetically and dispassionately discuss our different views on this matter; but I am not prepared to agree to any policy of blocking investigation and postponing further attempts at improvement. The matter is of the utmost importance, the country is aroused and is, I think, demanding a reconsideration of a number of banking questions that received some attention last session. I do not think public confidence can be restored until this is done, and undoubtedly it is the duty of the government to do everything in its power to restore public confidence. There is nothing worse than the obscurantist attitude—that disposition to hide things, to put the lid on and keep it screwed down.

In this connection I would also call attention to the report of the special committee on Agricultural Conditions with respect to rural credits which was presented at the close of last session. I understand that the government has already had President Tory of the University of Alberta give some attention to this matter. I saw Dr. Tory about New Year's time and had a very interesting talk with him, and I sincerely hope that although the matter is not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, this report will be brought down in such time that it may receive full attention at the hands of parliament this year.

In that connection I must refer to a letter I received not long ago from a man who was associated with Dr. Tory in the work of investigation that took place in Europe in 1913, when the commission went over there to study European rural credits. I refer to President John Lee Coulter, of the Agricultural College of North Dakota, a man who is perhaps better acquainted with rural credits in the United States than any other man in that country that I know of. I had a long talk with him in September, and subsequently have had some correspondence with him. I read this from a letter which I received from him about Christmas time:

I have somewhat followed the Canadian situation. Without doubt stabilization of prices is one of the great fundamental pillars in any structure which hopes to hold up our present civilization based as it is on some exchange. We in this country would not think of going back to any plan which did not include government supervision as a second pillar. There is no longer any doubt but that our long-term land mortgage banks is a third pillar which must hold a permanent place. The intermediate credit system which has in mind loans attached to agriculture is another one of the pillars of strength which we are just developing. At this time we are particularly studying and experimenting with co-operative organizations of many kinds.

Just one final word, Mr. Speaker, bearing upon the Speech from the Throne, with regard to the estimates. I do hope that the scandalous procedure which has prevailed in years past, and which prevailed last year to some extent, that of bringing down large estimates in the dying days of the session, will be discontinued. If the public outside knew exactly the situation in this respect, there would be a general and terrific protest throughout this whole country.

I regret that no mention was made in the Speech from the Throne of legislation to facilitate the development of the co-operative movement, a movement which, I think, holds out more hope of solving the social problems of humanity than perhaps anything else. I had intended to submit to the House some opinions of eminent men in this direction, but as the time is getting on I shall simply refer to them and say that there is a general agreement on the part of a great many men of eminence as to the desirability of assisting in the development of the co-operative movement, not only producers' co-operation or co-operative marketing, but consumers' co-operation as well. In 1907 the late Mr. Monk, who was a very progressive and useful member of this House, brought in a bill to assist the co-operative movement. I have here a little memorandum of what happened to that bill throughout a series of years, and I would like to submit it to the House. The bill was introduced in 1907 and sent to a special committee, before which the present Prime Minister and the then Governor General, Earl Grey, gave important testimony in favour of the co-operative movement. The work of the committee occupied, I think, the best part of the session, and it was thought inadvisable to bring the legislation further forward at that time owing to the fact that it was considered desirable to submit the evidence to the members of the House. The next year the matter was brought up again and the bill was unanimously passed by the Commons and sent to the Senate. Apparently the Senate got tangled up in the question of whether they were trespassing upon provincial rights or provincial jurisdiction, and after a somewhat prolonged debate in that House the matter was referred to the Department of Justice for a ruling on the question whether this parliament had any right to go further in this direction. Apparently it took the Department of Justice a long time to give a ruling, for we hear nothing more of the matter till the session of 1910, when Mr. Monk brought it up again. On the 14th of December, 1910, a new bill, redrafted apparently in view of certain rulings of the Department of Justice, was considered in Committee of the Whole and progress was reported. That is the last we hear of it. As you know, in the winter of 1911 there was a precipitate end to that session, followed by a general election and a change of government. Then in 1912 the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) reintroduced the matter, and I think it is very much to his credit that he did. The bill was given its first reading, but got no further, so far as I can find in the records. In the session of 1913-14 he introduced it again; it received its first reading, and, so far as I can find out, got no further. Then the war came on; we were engrossed, I presume, with other affairs and the whole question was shelved. I submit to the government and particularly to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) the need for some permissive legislation—for that is all we want—permissive and helpful legislation to facilitate the incorporation, organization and carrying on of co-operative activities in this country.

Finally, I would like to make some reference to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). I very much regret to see that he has left the Chamber. I would like to wait for him, but I daresay I shall have to proceed. The hon. member's address drew forth great applause from the Conservative opposition. It was certainly a very frank preaching of the doctrine which they believe. I think the hon. member for St.-Lawrence-St. George is to be commended and complimented very highly by this House for the unusual diligence that he has shown in collecting and analyzing statistical information concerning Canada's finances. With much of what he said in that connection I would like to express my agreement. But I was amazed at his remarks on the tariff. Here is his argument in brief, as I understood it, and I think I do him no injustice in so condensing it: First, Canada needs population; the diversification of industry will increase the demand for workers and therefore attract population—I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative group will give some attention to this,—the tariff will bring about diversification of industry; ergo the tariff will bring us people, enable us to retain them, supply tonnage for our railways, and generally establish better industrial conditions.

What incontestable logic! It is not new however. I wish the hon. member were here, but in his absence I will address myself to the group to my right, the Conservatives. I would like them to listen to a similar plea made seventy-five years ago in France, and I hope the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) will listen to it. It is "a petition of the manufacturers of candles, wax-lights, lamps, candlesticks, street lamps, snuffers, extinguishers, and of the producers of oil, tallow, resin, alcohol, and, generally, of everything connected with lighting." We have had lots of modern versions of this petition, Mr. Speaker, and I have listened to a good many of them:

To Messieurs the members of the Chamber of Deputies:

We are suffering from the intolerable competition of a foreign rival, placed, it would seem, in a condition so far superior to ours for the production of light that he absolutely inundates our national market with it at a price fabulously reduced. The moment he shows himself our trade leaves us—all consumers apply to him; and a branch of native industry, having countless ramifications, is all at once rendered completely stagnant. This rival, who is no other than the sun, wages war to the knife against us, and we suspect that he has been raised up by perfidious Albion (good policy as times go); inasmuch as he displays towards that haughty island a circumspection with which he dispenses in our case.

What we pray for is, that it may please you to pass a law ordering the shutting up of all windows, skylights, dormer-windows, outside and inside shutters, curtains, blinds, bull's-eyes; in a word, of all openings, holes, chinks, clefts, and fissures, by or through which the light of the sun has been in use to enter houses, to the prejudice of the meritorious manufactures with which we flatter ourselves we have accommodated our country—a country which, in gratitude, ought not to abandon us now to a strife so unequal.

We trust, Gentlemen, that you will not regard this our request as a satire, or refuse it without at least previously hearing the reasons which we have to urge in its support.

And, first, if you shut up as much as possible all access to natural light, and create a demand for artificial light, which of our French manufactures will not be encouraged by it?

If more tallow is consumed, then there must be more oxen and sheep; and, consequently, we shall behold the multiplication of meadows, meat, wool, hides, and, above all, manure, which is the basis and foundation of all agricultural wealth.

If more oil is consumed, then we shall have an extended cultivation of the poppy, of the olive, and of rape. These rich and exhausting plants will come at the right time to enable us to avail ourselves of the increased fertility which the rearing of additional cattle will impart to our lands.

Our heaths will be covered with resinous trees. Numerous swarms of bees will, on the mountains, gather perfumed treasures, now wasting their fragance on the desert air, like the flowers from which they emanate. No branch of agriculture but will then exhibit a cheering development.

The same remark applies to navigation. Thousands of vessels will proceed to the whale fishery; and, in a short time, we shall possess a navy capable of maintaining the honour of France, and gratifying the patriotic aspirations of your petitioners, the undersigned candle-makers and others.

But what shall we say of the manufacture of "articles de Paris?" Henceforth you will behold gildings, bronzes, crystals, in candlesticks, in lamps, in lustres, in candelabra, shining forth, in spacious warerooms, compared with which those of the present day can be regarded but as mere shops.

No poor resinier from his heights on the seacoast, no coalminer from the depth of his sable gallery, but will rejoice in higher wages and increased prosperity.

Only have the goodness to reflect, Gentlemen, and you will be convinced that there is, perhaps, no Frenchman, from the wealthy coalmaster to the humblest vendor of lucifer matches, whose lot will not be ameliorated by the success of this our petition.

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to take seriously the arguments that have been advanced from that time down to the present, and I suppose that will be advanced for years to come, on behalf of this policy of attempting to secure diversification of industry by such methods. Nobody objects to diversification, but I want to ask hon. members to my right whether they are quite sure that the tariff is the best thing to secure diversification, and at what price diversification is sometimes secured.

Mr. HANSON: From what book was the hon. member quoting just now?—was it Aesop's Fables?

Mr. GOOD: No, I shall be very glad to lend the book to the hon. member, and I am sure he will profit from a reading of it. I have one other quotation I wish to make. It is from Woodrow Wilson's book The New Freedom. He says:

Of course, if we are going to agree to give any fellow-citizen who takes a notion to go into some business or other for which the country is not especially adapted,—if we are going to give him a bonus on every article he produces big enough to make up for the handicap he labours under because of some natural reason or other,—why, we may indeed gloriously diversify our industries, but we shall beggar ourselves. On this principle, we shall have in Connecticut, or Michigan, or somewhere else, miles of hot-houses in which thousands of happy American workingmen, with full dinner-pails, will be raising bananas,—to be sold at a quarter apiece. Some foolish person, a benighted Democrat, like as not, might timidly suggest that bananas were a greater public blessing when they came from Jamaica and were three for a nickel, but what patriotic citizen would listen for a moment to the criticisms of a person without any conception of the beauty and glory of the great American banana industry, without realization of the proud significance of the fact that Old Glory floats over the biggest banana hothouses in the world!

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied the time of the House at considerable length, and I do not think I should say more. I do want however in conclusion, to submit to my friends to the right that they should seriously consider whether these desiderata, upon which we are all agreed, are to be secured by the methods which they advocate. We are not in disagreement as to the objects to be attained, but I want to submit again to them, in all sincerity and fairness, that they are mistaken as to the consequences and results of the methods which they so constantly and often so sincerely advocate.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a considerable degree of patience to the last speaker, (Mr. Good). I had hoped to hear from his lips some observations on the very important question of the tariff which might have been described as constructive, but instead of that, we have been treated to one or two more or less humorous observations from a couple of books. My hon. friend poses and spares no opportunity of impressing upon his fellow-members in the House the idea that he is perhaps the greatest political economist in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not at all surprised at my hon. friends calling "order," because the idea is very far from the fact. My hon. friend seeks constantly to impress the House with the idea that he is perhaps one of the leading economists of Canada, and I think we had a right to hope at least that his address to-day might have been pregnant with some presentations of solutions of problems, rather than merely a lengthy dissertation that certain problems did exist, which we all agree is the case.

Since the opening of the House I have been very much impressed with the change that has come over this Chamber. In the last two sessions of parliament it has been our habit to address ourselves to the government, situated on the government benches. We have looked to the Prime Minister and his cabinet for such attention as we might properly claim, in regard to demands for changes or consideration of big public questions. But I am impressed with the fact at the moment that while the form of government may still be situated across the Chamber on the treasury benches the substance thereof is really situated in the person, or around the person, of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressive party, for we have the word of the Prime Mininster in his address the other night that it was quite hopeless to expect him and his followers to carry into effect the policies which he has heralded all over the country as the policies of the Liberal party; to use his own words "We have to have your help," pointing his finger and directing his attention to the hon. members immediately to my left, the Progressive group. The Speech from the Throne has been described as perhaps one of the longest in our history, and I must confess that to me at least it appears to be filled—I do not wish to be harsh, but still I cannot modify my language any further—with meaningless platitudes. There are recited there a lot of pious hopes, and so very indifferently and indefinitely stated that the result is a state of chaos in the minds of the public generally. Even my hon. friends the members of the Liberal party, who held a caucus subsequent to the introduction of this important official document, one after the other confess on the floor of this House that they do not know what is meant or what is intended by the Speech. Not only is that the case, but I pick up newspaper after newspaper, editorial after editorial, and one after the other they all declare that they do not know exactly what is meant. And the most intimate friend of the government, I might say the mouthpiece of the government, the Globe, writes a column editorial trying to explain away, or at least to call a halt to, the increasing marked public opinion that certain things are meant or intended by the Speech from the Throne. But as a matter of fact, as the Globe intimates, the likelihood is, or their guess, I should say, is, that it really means something else. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) in a very excellent speech yesterday—excellent in so far as form and diction are concerned—took to task the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), reprimanding him rather severely for using that phrase which personally I do not think was in any sense extravagant, when my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) described the haste with which the leader of the Progressive party hurried to assure the government of his unqualified support as somewhat indecent haste.

Mr. FORKE: May I ask a question?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. FORKE: When and where did I offer the government unqualified support?

Mr. STEVENS: I am just coming to that; —I am rather under the impression that my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressive party, might properly be said to have displayed indecent haste in denying it. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River did not have the floor and had no opportunity of straightening out the matter, and, as it was left, there might be left on the minds of the members of the House an impression that he had misquoted the hon. leader of the Progressive party. I am going to read the interview which my hon. friend denied that he had given. First, let me read his denial, in order to save him the trouble of interrupting me again. The following appears in yesterday's Hansard—

Mr. Manion: I was not referring to that speech at all; I was referring to an interview given by the hon. member's leader (Mr. Forke) some days before to the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Forke: Will the hon. member kindly tell us what that statement was? I do not know what it was.

Mr. Manion: I am not on the floor at present. The statement was made and quoted all over the country in every newspaper through the Associated Press. Does the hon. member deny that he gave an interview to the Free Press?

Mr. Forke: I do not remember any interview.

Now I will refresh the hon. gentleman's memory by reading the interview which was given voluntarily by himself to the Winnipeg Free Press and published all over the country, and which I myself read, as did many thousands of others. The date is Ottawa, February 29, the day following the opening of parliament, and it refers to reactions to the Speech from the Throne having been instantaneous and decisive. Then the statement goes on—

Robert Forke, M.P., leader of the Progressive party, when asked to give his opinion on the legislation forecast in the Speech, said: "It is the most hopeful sign I have seen since I entered parliament. While I have not consulted the members of this group, I feel that Mr. King should be enheartened in the task to which he has pledged his party. Lest he should fear that the government will fall between two stools in losing support from his own party and failing to attract outside support from our group, I will say that if Mr. King carries out the promises contained in the Speech from the Throne the Progressive party will give him consistent support throughout the session.

That was not enough. The article proceeds:

Mr. Forke explained that he made this statement in order to convey to the Premier the knowledge that in carrying out his programme of reform, reductions in the tariff, decreased transportation costs, retrenchment and a balanced budget, the single transferable vote, the branch line construction and so on, he would not be running the slightest risk of a defeat at the hands of parliament.

Mr. FORKE: May I say a word in explanation? I remember a conversation along those lines. It was not a stated interview. However, I am not going to deny it. I thought I made it plain that I was speaking for myself personally, without having consulted my group. After listening to what has been said, I will repeat it again: If the government will come through with Progressive principles they have nothing to fear from this party. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to enter into any argument with my hon. friend. He has got himself into a sufficiently difficult dilemma, as it is, and I will leave him there, but I want to say to him that there is scarcely an occasion when he addresses this House that he does not make special claims for himself, for the consideration of this House, which is usually and generously accorded to him. But he takes advantage of my hon. friend's enforced silence—he having already spoken in the debate—to place him in a false light before the people, and that is the reason I am correcting his wholly inaccurate statement yesterday.

Mr. FORKE: I may say—oh well, let him go.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is very uneasy, and he may well be, because his conduct was not that which conduces to confidence in leaders of great parties. Now there is a declaration in the Speech from the Throne which has been noticed by all. It has indeed been the cause of a great deal of uncertainty, a great deal of anxiety throughout this country, and that is the declaration that it is the intention of the government in this session to put the implements of production on the free lists. I am aware that the word "free" is not used in the Speech from the Throne. But my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen), who immediately followed the mover and seconder of the Address, interpreted the Speech from the Throne in that way; he interpreted it so that no one in this House could misunderstand his words; and there has not been an utterance from the government benches or from a government supporter, there has not been a single bit of information given to the House contradicting the interpretation placed upon that clause by my leader. I want to direct my remarks particularly to the acting leader of the government (Mr. Graham), and I say that we have a right in this House to place that interpretation upon that clause in the Speech from the Throne. Why is it that not a minister of the Crown has entered this debate with some explanation? It has been called for by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) and by other members on that side of the House. Every one of them, one after the other, has withheld absolute condemnation of the government and withdrawal of support on one ground only, and that is the indefiniteness of that article in the Speech from the Throne. Yet we have been in this debate for ten days or thereabouts, and not a minister of the Crown has uttered a single word of explanation, beyond the one utterance by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). What was his utterance? What did he do? He turned to the hon. member for Brandon, the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), and to the other hon. gentlemen representing that group, and shaking his finger towards them, in cordiality, I believe, rather than in censure, he assured them, reassured them time and again, that he and his government intended to carry out every word and every inference contained in the Speech from the Throne. What I want to say to my hon. friend leading the government at this time is this, that the government owe it to this House as an act of common courtesy to come forward with a clear-cut declaration of what the article means. They also owe it to the country, to every purchaser of agricultural implements and implements of production of whatever character, to say what it means. They owe that to every distributor, every dealer, every agent and every manufacturer. Furthermore, how can a manufacturer map out his programme for the coming months? How can a manufacturer enter into the purchase of raw material on a large scale as they usually do and ought to do? How can a manufacturer enter into the purchase of his fuel supplies, how can he provide for the innumerable essentials that enter into his business, if he is faced with not only the inference but the declaration that implements of production are to be put on the free list?

My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) owes it to this House, and upon him personally rests the responsibility at this moment, to make that point abundantly clear. Not an hour, not a moment; should be allowed to pass without that being made clear. It is not sufficient for the members of the government to sit silently in their seats as they have done on two occasions already courting the closing of this debate. This debate would have been closed and a vote would have been taken upon the motion for the Address and the amendment, had the leader of the House and his colleagues had their way, without a single explanation, without any clearing up of the doubt that now rests in the minds of the people. I am appealing to my hon. friend; I make an appeal to him directly because he is usually of a reasonable mind; he is usually courteous. Why is it there is this silence, this ominous silence on the part of the government? Why is it there is not an explanation? My hon. friend said something. I did not catch it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was speaking to a member of the government.

Mr. STEVENS: Am I to apply to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald)? The Minister of National Defence is perhaps more cordial than the genial leader of the House. Will he tell us what is the correct interpretation? He turns his attention away. Let me appeal to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). This is my first opportunity to appeal to him as Minister of Justice, and I offer him my congratulations upon his elevation. Let me appeal to him for justice. In justice to the House and the country, will he intimate what is meant by that clause? Will he make some definite statement whether what the government intend to do is as the country from one end to the other has interpreted the clause, that is, to place implements of production on the free list? That is the question. We are entitled to an answer. If the government do not mean that, in heaven's name, what do they mean? Let them tell us exactly what they mean. It is suggested that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) might answer that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member will get his answer in time.

Mr. STEVENS: He is affected. He is interested.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: Will he tell us? Is it intended to put implements of production on the free list?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Speech speaks for itself.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says: "The Speech speaks for itself." Will he deny the correctness of the interpretation placed upon it by my leader?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not responsible for the interpretation put upon it. It may mean something different from the interpretation put on it.

Mr. STEVENS: Will he not come to the relief of his own supporters? Shall I name them again? The hon. member for North Waterloo, the hon. member for Brantford, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and one or two others, I repeat, have withheld their opposition to the government on this occasion for one reason only, and that is the lack of definite interpretation of the Speech from the Throne. The treasury benches are silent. They have been silent for a week, ten days, not taking the country into their confidence, jollying my hon. friends to my left with the vain hope that agricultural implements are going on the free list, afraid to come out and tell the country frankly where they stand, throwing out these inferences and suggestions in order that they may feel public opinion. If public opinion reacts too quickly and is sensitive and restive under the suggestion then, Mr. Speaker, mark my words, you who come from manufacturing centres, the soft pedal will be put upon the free-list talk. Cajole the hon. members of this party to our left who have treated them with a great deal of courtesy and support during this parliament past this first obstacle in the session, the Speech from the Throne! So juggle the language that the hon. gentlemen will be deceived into supporting the government for what they honestly believe to be their claim and their right, and the intention of the government to give them free agricultural implements and other implements of production! After having deceived them to that extent, accept their support to get by the first obstacle! That is the position in which the government leave themselves. Is that a dignified position? Is it a position that calls for confidence on the part of the country? Aside absolutely from the possible effect of their action, aside wholly from the record of the government in any other respect, aside from the Home Bank and one or two of the minister, is it a course that inspires confidence in the governement? Is it a course that is likely to inspire confidence in the people, which is more important, in the country itself and ist future? These are pertinent questions and they are questions that, I think, are seething in the minds of the people from one end of this country to the other. What are the government doing in this regard? They are holding over the heads of the industries of this country, like the sword of Damocles hanging over their heads by a slender thread, the threat of annihilation of some industries and certainly drastic curtailment on the part of many others. They are nibbling at that thread. Last year they nibbled at it; they severed one strand; they reduced the preferential duty on woollen goods to such an extent that they have half ruined an industry, as I will show in a moment. By their action last year and the year before they have ruined one-half of the woollen industry of Canada, as I will prove. And by the threat in the Speech from the Throne this year there is certain ruination for other industries. It appears hopeless to appeal to my hon. friend the acting leader of the government (Mr. Graham). I sincerely regret the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in so far as it is due to ill-health; but it may be that in his absence my hon. friend feels that he is not qualified to speak on this important matter. It is suggested that perhaps the Prime Minister went away without taking his colleagues into his confidence as to what he really did mean by this clause. Indeed, it is rumoured that the clause was slipped in after the whole Speech had been considered by the Cabinet as a body. Of that I cannot speak other than by rumor. But these rumors, fortified by subsequent evidence, sometimes find a lodgment in one's mind and it is very difficult to dislodge them.

Now I may turn to some observations made by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke). The hon. gentleman in his speech dealt very largely with the question of the tariff and its effect on agriculture, and so on. Of course, I do not ask my hon. friends to my left to accept my conclusions, that is hopeless. I do, however, beg of them to give some consideration to the facts and figures I am about to cite, and in the light of those figures to view the whole question of protection or free trade and the interrelationship of industry and agriculture in this country. My hon. friend stated, quite properly, that 400,000,000 bushels of wheat will go from the West this year, most of it to find a market in the old world; and then he emphasized a point which has often been stressed, and which is perfectly true, that the price of this wheat is fixed by the world market. That is the basic argument, I might say, in my hon. friend's complaint against the policy of protection in this country. I intend to analyse that situation and place before my hon. friends certain facts which, if they will be courteous enough to consider them, may tend to modify some of their views. At the same time I beg to offer these facts to the government by way of warning against the course they have indicated in the Speech from the Throne. I shall try to make my figures as little tiresome as possible.

I have the figures of the total production of wheat in Canada for the last four years, and I find that in 1920 we produced 263,000,000 bushels—I give the round numbers—as compared with 474,000,000 in 1923. Now, we exported in 1920 123,000,000 bushels and last year 242,000,000 bushels. There are two other sets of figures which I will submit before I proceed to an elucidation of the facts. The milling industry in 1920 consumed 61,000,000 bushels, and in 1923 113,000,000 bushels, leaving a surplus in Canada in 1920, at the end of the year, of approximately 79,000,000 bushels, and in 1923 of 118,000,000 bushels. Let the general significance of these figures be borne in mind, and then let us consider this question. What is the total annual consumption of wheat by the importing countries in the world? It is generally admitted to be about 650,000,000 bushels; that is accepted by all economists as about the figure. That is to say, the countries that have to import wheat for their own consumption consume in the aggregate about 650,000,000 bushels annually. Now, wheat is produced in certain major countries: the Argentine, Australia, Canada, Egypt, India, Russia—which for some years has been out of the market—a few other smaller countries, and the United States. These countries export to the importing countries this 650,000,000 bushels. If your exporting countries have a large quantity of wheat which must find a market in the world market, so-called, in excess of the 650,000,000 bushels there is going to be a very serious drop in the price of wheat. No one will dispute that. What is the situation this year? It is that Canada is exporting perhaps 100,000,000 bushels more than her normal export, indeed more perhaps than her previous high exports; and she is sending it into this world market. In other words, there is added to the world market by one country alone 100,000,000 bushels above the normal supply. That perhaps is the primary and basic cause of the low price of wheat throughout the world today. When the importing countries find wheat reaching a figure that is above what they consider a fair normal rate then they turn to potatoes, rye and other coarser foods, and that fact in its turn reduces the consumption of wheat. That is not a factor this year; I state it merely to show what is the equalizing element in the fixation of world prices.

Now I want to bring my hon. friends' attention to another aspect of the question. As I have already intimated, we consumed last year in Canada in the milling industry 113,000,000 bushels, and for seed and other purposes we used perhaps another 50,000,000 bushels. And we have a large surplus. The point I want to make, which I shall try to state in detail later on, I will now submit in a general way, and it is this. The hope of the wheat grower in Canada rests more in increasing the home consumption than it does in producing more wheat to send to an already over-supplied world market. I do not think there is any escape from that conclusion. Do not let this fact escape our minds in considering the question: the normal consumption is about the same; it does not vary very much. The world consumption of wheat for years and years has been around the figure of 650,000,000 bushels. It is not increasing year by year as consumption in a new country like Canada increases. My hon. friends who grow wheat or who represent wheat growers can never expect to overcome the handicap of that world market by simply growing more wheat and taking the duty off the implements of production. That is not the solution and it never will be. On the other hand, if Canada can be developed so that the consuming public will absorb another hundred million bushels then the present crop in Canada can be marketed without disturbing the world market, and can be marketed at an advantageous price to the farmer,

Mr. FORKE: What is the trouble with the wheat growers of the United States? Why are the farmers in the wheat-growing states in such a deplorable condition with a population of 110,000,000 or so?

Mr. STEVENS: First of all, the United States is still a wheat-exporting country.

Mr. FORKE: You said, a smaller exporting country.

Mr. STEVENS: I made no such a statement. I am surprised at my hon. friend's pique simply because I took him to task a moment ago.

Mr. FORKE: We shall see what Hansard says to-morrow.

An hon. MEMBER: He will cut it out of Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: I will not cut it out of Hansard. My hon. friend is a little in error. What I said was that there were certain major wheat exporting countries, and then I added the United States. Now I say to my hon. friend, first, that the United States is a wheat exporting country and that the price of wheat is fixed by world market conditions; secondly, that that is not the only reason.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is not the United States a wheat importing country also?

Mr. STEVENS: Let me pass on for a moment. The second reason is, that the wheat growing areas of the United States, which are perhaps ten to twenty years in advance, in time of operation, of the Canadian wheat growing areas, are producing a lower quantity of crop per annum and per acre than we or any other newer wheat growing country is producing. There is no question about that. Now I turn to my hon. friend's question—a perfectly proper one: Is not the United States a wheat importing country? Yes, to some extent and for one purpose. They import our hard wheat to mix with their soft wheat for milling purposes in order to produce flour of the requisite quality.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend, but for the purpose of information I would ask him if the great increase in the amount of Canadian wheat milled in Canada has been accompanied by a corresponding increase in the export of Canadian flour, or has the increase been consumed wholly at home?

Mr. STEVENS: I shall give my hon. friend the figures if he likes. In 1920 our mills consumed 61,000,000 bushels of grain and produced 13,000,000 barrels of flour, of which they exported 4,700,000 barrels. In 1923—my hon. friend will note the figures—the mill consumption was approximately 113,000,000 bushels of grain—this may not be exact, but it is as near as I can get it; I have not the production—and of the flour turned out 11,000,000 barrels were exported. In other words, the export to-day is about three times what it was in 1920. So the increased production was accompanied by increased export. That brings me back to what I was trying to elucidate, namely, that the chief hope of the wheat producer in Canada is the increased consumption of wheat and wheat products within our own boundaries. I think there is no escape from that.

Now, let me turn to a consideration of the argument put forward, that Canada is a great agricultural country, and if an industry cannot live without protection it has no right to live at all. I know that is an extreme statement, but sometimes you have to make your statements extreme in order to bring them forcibly to the front. I repeat the statement, that Canada being chiefly an agricultural country, industries that cannot exist without protection should be allowed to sink or swim in competition with the world.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: One of my hon. friends says "hear, hear", a little timidly. I do not agree with that view at all. I want to make my position so clear that there will be no mistake about it. I am absolutely convinced that the only fiscal policy for Canada to-day and for many years to come is a policy based on protection of Canadian industries for the upbuilding of the Dominion. I think I can demonstrate some facts in connection with this that will justify my position.

Mr. WARNER: How do you proceed to protect the wheat grower?

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to show my hon. friend how I think he can be protected. He cannot be protected against competition in the world markets; that might as well be admitted at once. There is a possibility, however, of his getting a larger market at home, and by the increase of domestic consumption catching up to the production which is now in excess of the demand. My hon. friend from Brandon used certain figures last week, and I merely want to place beside them some other figures, not to controvert his statement but merely to make a fair comparison. He stated that there had been a tremendous increase in the cost of farm machinery, and he gave us three articles in illustration of this: a plough, a mower and a wagon. His figures indicated that the increase in the cost of a plough to-day over the 1914 price was 82 per cent, of a wagon 51 per cent, and of a mower 63 per cent. These are facts which I do not dispute for a moment, but I have taken the trouble to look into the increased value of farm products. Do not let the House misunderstand me. As I say, I have not done this with the idea of controverting my hon. friend's facts at all, but merely to get a fair comparison. I take the Winnipeg Grain Exchange prices for wheat on October 6, 1913 and 1923:

Wheat No. 1..	81⅛ cents	99⅝ cents

There is an increase of 23 per cent.

	1913	1923
Oats No. 2 C.W...	33⅜	43⅝

That is an increase of 51 per cent. For butter I am taking the Montreal Export market.

An hon. MEMBER: You have switched.

Mr. STEVENS: I have not switched with any idea of deceiving. I am taking the recognized markets the world over for these commodities.

	1913	1923
No 1 Creamery Butter.. ..	27½ cents	35⅞ cents
Cheese..	13	21

Or an average incerase on those four farm products of 44 per cent. There is a discrepancy, and a serious discrepancy—there is no question about it—between those two sets of figures, and I think it perhaps illustrates the difficulty now existing between success and failure on the farm. But let me say in fairness that 1923 does not reflect the price, for instance, of wheat over a period of years. For the sake of illustration I will give the average of the last four years' prices on wheat over the 1913 price. In 1913 wheat was 81⅛ cents, and the average for the four years just closed, including 1923, is $1.56, or an increase of 92 per cent. This includes, of course, the peak years, 1920 and 1921, and should not be taken into consideration to confuse the present problem. But when my hon. friends are talking about the implement industry let them reflect that the Massey-Harris Company, for instance, has had three years of serious loss. It is true that in the previous years, 1920, 1919 and 1918, they made profits; so did my hon. friends. There was no criticism in 1920 about the price of wheat. So, when we are looking at this problem do not let us pick out the leanest years we have known for a long period on one side, and then pick out on the other side of the argument some fat year such as we had during the latter years of the war. I want to turn to a specific case. I have under my hand some particulars with regard to what is one of the tragedies that I referred to a moment ago in connection with dickering and tampering with the tariff, and that is the tragedy of the woollen industry of Canada. I have here a great many figures and facts which I am not going to deal with, but I wish to give just a few in order that we may visualize the effect of even a small interference with this trade, and I am going to try to show at least how it adversely affects even the producer of agricultural products.

The normal employment in the woollen industry is 21,800 and some odd. The annual wage bill is $17,000,000 and the cost of material is $34,900,000. In other words the woollen industry under normal conditions—not even at its maximum, but in the ordinary course—employs 21,800 consuming Canadian citizens who receive a wage aggregating $17,000,000, and in addition to that there is spent in the purchase of raw material, a substantial portion of which is bought within the country itself, more than $34,000,000. But to-day, since the amendment made by my hon. friends opposite to the tariff effecting a reduction in the British preference, this employment has been reduced to 10,800, or less than one-half what it was a little over a year ago. That is directly attributable to the reduction in the tariff. Let me demonstrate that. I will take first the wages. Wages constitute 55 per cent of the value of the goods—and this is not hearsay; it is actual demonstrated fact without any peradventure, and hon. gentlemen can readily verify it. Now, here is a comparison of the wages paid in Canada with those paid in Great Britain. I have reduced the English rates to the basis of Canadian currency, and the result is the following:

Occupation	British rate	Canadian rate
Winders..	$5 92	$13 to $15
Twisters..	6 34	13 to 15
Spinners..	5 77	13 to 15
Reelers..	6 52	17 to 20
Doffers..	5 22	13 to 15
Overlookers..	17 03	35 to 60
Warehousemen..	12.06	19 to 22
Blenders, carbonizers, labourers..	12 06	18 to 20
Male help in grey room, stockroom and packing department..	12 30	19 to 22

So that the rate in Canada is just about double, taking it right through, what it is in Great Britain. Ontario has a law fixing a minimum wage of $12.50 a week. In Ontario, therefore,—and members from that province will correct me if I am wrong—under the minimum wage law it is obligatory upon any employer to pay a minimum of $12.50 per week. So that employers in that province cannot get down to the British wages. There is no question of competition there; it is fixed by statute—and practically all these mills are in Ontario. So that the rate is fixed by Canadian statute, approved and supported by the Canadian people, and that makes a difference of double the rate in wages. I have said that the wage value is the equivalent of 55 per cent of the value of the goods; take one-half of that and you have 27½ per cent, which is the handicap of the Canadian manufacturer before he is permitted to compete in the open market with his competitor across seas. In other words, the whole of the protection of the woollen industry before it was interfered with by the government a year or two ago was absorbed in the fixed additional wage that must be paid in Canada over and above that paid in Great Britain. These are very significant figures, Mr. Speaker, and very important facts.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS: Since the dinner hour I have had placed in my hand another illustration of the effect of interference with the tariff by this government during the last two years. I will read briefly this article which appears in one of the local papers, and undoubtedly will appear in all of the financial press to-morrow:

> The Hawthorn Woollen Mills at Carleton Place have gone into voluntary liquidation and will close down. The mill when working full time employed over two hundred hands and paid wages and salaries of $250,000 annually.

Then follows a declaration by the mayor of Carleton Place that he considers this a catastrophe to the town. There is a long statement of reasons why this mill has been forced to close down, and I shall quote very briefly merely to illustrate what I shall more fully emphasize later on:

> Mr. Richard Thomson, owner of the mill, has been forty-four years in the woollen milling business.

This is not an institution that has been operated by inexperienced persons but by a man that has spent all his life in the business, and to him, it must be remembered, and to the two hundred employees trained and skilled in this work, and in no other, the closing down of the mill is a question of life. It is not merely a question of closing down a piece of machinery. It means the man's livelihood, and indeed everything which is of value to the individual.

Another factor that must be kept in mind is that there was 140,000 hundredweight of incoming freight, raw material and other things used in connection with the mill's operations, and 12,000 hundredweight of outgoing freight. This I shall refer to at length in a moment. Mr. Thomson goes on to refer to the tariff in connection with woollens, and he brings to light the fact which is well known to members of this House, that the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who we all regret is laid aside through illness, did when he was in office a few years ago, increase the duty from twenty to thirty per cent in order that the woollen industry of Canada might survive, and it not only did survive but prospered during a period of years, until in the last year or two unholy hands were again laid upon the tariff and the closing down of this mill is one of the results.

Then he refers to the exchange question, and I shall refer to that in a general way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the result of this scrapping of an industry? What are some of the effects of destroying the active operation of an industry of this kind? These are questions we have a right to ask. First, and I put it first, there is the direct effect upon those engaged in the industry, and whether a man is engaged in agriculture, as an artisan in a factory, or as a member of an office staff, that is his livelihood and naturally the stoppage affects him very directly. In this woollen industry there are some 12,000 people thrown out of work, and in this particular industry at Carleton Place over 200 employees are thrown out, with no hope of re-employment even in the near future in connection with this plant. I might add that about one thousand individuals formerly engaged in the woollen industry in Canada according to actual records kept, have gone to the United States. These are the best skilled men in the industry, and they will probably be lost to the industry in Canada for all time, at least, a substantial number of them. As was well pointed out by my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Raymond) this afternoon, when Canada trains a man or woman in any particular industry and that individual leaves the country and finds permanent employment in some other country, that is the loss of a real asset to the country—a decided loss.

This in my estimation is so important a matter that I might be pardoned for digressing a moment from the immediate argument. May I pause to say this? One of the reasons that enabled Great Britain to maintain her supremacy in the manufacturing world after the introduction of free trade was that other countries had no skilled labour, or very little, in the industries such as, particularly, cotton, woollen, iron and steel. I merely cite that in passing. In other words, the value of the skilled artisan is something that not only cannot be measured in dollars and cents; it is something that cannot be replaced except in a long period of time. We have lost those workers.

I come now to a question, a very pertinent question, asked by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) yesterday, and I shall analyze it in some detail. He cited transportation as one of the great problems of Canada. I agree with him, and further I endorse every word he said with regard to the possibility of solving the perplexing question of the adverse charge in regard to the mountain scale but I am not going to discuss that at this time. Transportation is one of the important questions, he said. It is. I have checked up several industries, I have made careful inquiry, and this is an established fact; in any class of industry that you may choose, the incoming freight to that factory is from three to fifteen times the amount of the outgoing freight. I want this fact to be seized by hon. gentlemen of this House. In the case of the woollen industry, for instance, the incoming freight to the factory is from fifteen to twenty times as great as the outgoing freight. In other words, such a factory must bring in by freight its raw material, its fuel, coal, its packing materials such as shooks for boxes and cases, its lubricating oils, its spare parts for machinery, firebrick for the furnaces, which is a constant article of replacement, and many other articles of that kind. It is a constant tonnage flowing into that factory. In the case of the woollen factory the proportion is from fifteen to twenty-one. Taking the case of shelf hardware, for another illustration, I have made careful inquiries, and I find that in that class of manufacture the incoming tonnage to the factory, as compared with the outgoing tonnage, is five to one. In connection with, I think it is glassware, the incoming tonnage is approximately four to one, and you can go down through the list with similar results. They range from three to four to one, to as high as twenty to one. The point I am making is this; if you buy an article, whether it is cloth, glassware or hardware, any article of a manufactured character you may choose, from a foreign country, it reaches your seaboard or your boundary point, and from there you get the tonnage on the finished article. If you buy a Canadian article you have not only furnished exactly the same tonnage, but you have furnished from four to twenty times the amount of tonnage in the materials and other things entering into the manufacture of that article. Is that point clear? Is it not a vital point in one of the most perplexing problems facing Canada to-day, namely transportation? I am going to reiterate, and if necessary to weary the House, that this point may be made abundantly clear; and I will go further; if you import an article, assume it comes via New York, it will come in bond over the American railway to the nearest point to the factory. In the case of Winnipeg it would come in bond to Minneapolis, and from there to Winnipeg, and Canadian roads would get a very small haul. Then coming in from New York to Hamilton, Toronto or Montreal, there is only a few miles of haul over a Canadian railway. But assuming it comes from our own seaboard, you still have the fact that by the importation of that article you have destroyed an amount of tonnage from four to twenty times greater than the tonnage of the imported article. How do we expect our railways to function under these circumstances? How do we expect this over-railroaded Canada of ours that we hear so much about, where we have too much railway for the population, to get along? How are you going to help freight rates if you take away from the railway companies a very substantial portion of the tonnage to which they are justly and properly entitled? That is my point with regard to the tonnage, and I am not going to labour it further.

Let me bring this same argument back to where I was when I introduced this portion of my remarks, namely that perhaps the main product of Canada that we sell in the world's markets is wheat, or wheat products, chiefly wheat. That article is marketed in competition with the world. Its price is fixed in Liverpool or at some central point usually determined or described as Liverpool. We cannot control that market. There is no possibility of our controlling it. On the other hand, in Canada we consume a certain amount of the wheat we grow. If we encourage the development of industry in Canada, if we increase the industrial population of Canada, then we are going to increase the consumption of wheat in Canada, and lessen the amount of wheat we have for export to this uncontrolled market, and to my mind, Mr. Speaker, there is no species of argument that can overcome that stubborn fact that the only way you are going to catch up with the over-production of wheat in Canada is by the increasing industrial life of this country.

Mr. McCONICA: Suppose you increase population by bringing ten million wheat consumers into Canada, and they manufacture in Canada and consume Canadian wheat, do you not decrease the wheat consumers of England or some other country just as much as you increase them in Canada, and is the net result on the world's supply not exactly the same?

Mr. STEVENS: No, that is not the case, and I will explain why. Hon. members laugh. If a laugh is to be logic, I must say I cannot meet that logic, but my hon. friend's question is a most pertinent and sensible one. It is a question that ought to be faced and faced very frankly, and I will try to face it as well as I can. As I understand the point, it is this. If we bring ten million artisans into Canada, increasing the industrial life of this country by that process, do we not deplete the consuming market overseas? That is virtually his question. I will answer it very bluntly, and then perhaps in a little more detail. My first argument is this. The standard of the consuming market has been approximately the same for a great many years; that is about 650,000,000 bushels a year. The consumption is distributed over a tremendously large population, and a few drawn from that population makes no appreciable difference. My second argument is that if we were drawing from Europe we would not necessarily be drawing from a wheat-consuming country. A great many of them would be, but some of them might not be. My third point—and perhaps this is the most significant point—is that for a century at least the natural increase of population in Eurpoe has been largely, not wholly but substantially, absorbed by emigration to the United States, Canada and Australia. So that the natural increase in Great Britain will easily keep pace with any emigration—from Great Britain. I think there is no question about that. You may take the figures as you like. For instance we will take Great Britain. Her population doubled in the last century. Then take France, which is one of the slowest in regard to the natural increase in population of any country in Europe, she has increased by at least ten million in the last sixty years. Germany has increased by easily double her population sixty years ago. Belgium has increased. I think Norway and Sweden, perhaps have not increased very much, but nearly all of the European countries have very largely increased by a natural process, but a substantial portion even of that increase is going to the States and Canada, and I cannot see for the life of me that there need be the slightest apprehension on that point. But I would point out the fact that Canada's wheat growing possibilities are capable of an immense expansion beyond her production to-day. Some hon. gentlemen in this House could give exact figures from memory, but I cannot. I venture, however, to say that we have not 10 per cent of our arable wheat growing lands under cultivation yet. Therefore there is room for an immense expansion in wheat growing. But what I am trying to plead with my hon. friends is that they will realize that one of the greatest hopes, not, perhaps the only one hope, for the wheat producer of Canada is increased consumption within Canada. I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. WARNER: Is the wheat production not liable to increase more rapidly than the consuming public?

Mr. STEVENS: Unquestionably; all the more emphasis on the need for increasing the consumption at home. Let us get down to concrete cases. Here you take the duty off woollens. You put 12,000 men out of work. You have sent 1,000 of them, at least, out of the country already and more probably will follow. Is any more wheat consumed in Canada because of that? Is this surplus that we have to-day not added to by that very fact? Have you not accentuated the evil? That is the point which I am trying to emphasize. Is there not, on the other hand, an opportunity of minimizing the evil by increasing the home consumption?

Mr. MORIN: The hon. member said a moment ago that if the population of Canada was increased, the local consumption would increase, but that would not affect the price of wheat if there was a surplus of production.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not catch my hon. friend's question.

Mr. MORIN: If the consumption of wheat was increased in Canada, how would that affect the price if there was still a surplus of production for export?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not speaking so much of increase of price. What I am trying to point out is this. Canada, this year, has placed upon the world market 100,000,000 bushels odd—I think I am well within the mark in putting the quantity at that figure—more than we put on the world market last year. The world market is, comparatively speaking, a fixed market; but the producing countries, if they continue to increase the surplus that they have for this world market, by that process depress the price abroad, and inasmuch as the price is fixed abroad, the price on the home market is depressed. If you can put on the world market approximately the same quantity as it will consume, then you have an opportunity of keeping that price at a reasonably decent figure. That, however, is not all. Would a million people in Canada, consuming Canadian wheat not be of infinitely greater value to the Canadian wheat grower than a million people in Europe consuming Canadian wheat? Let us look at the matter in a different way. In the city of Toronto, there are probably half a million people. Can we not visualise for a moment the tremendous quantity of tonnage for our railways which my hon. friend spoke of yesterday, the tremendous consumption of Canadian-made goods which they will require? Take a city with a population of a million people and try to visualise what that means in tonnage, in the consumption of other lines of farm products, in the consumption of Canadian-made articles and the impetus to an all-round national life for this country. Compare that with the bare shipment of two or three shiploads of wheat to the foreign country. Then answer me which is to the best advantage of Canada. That is the question.

Mr. WARNER: Does the hon. member think it is likely that we shall get as many consumers as that without getting the producing element in greater proportion and thus increasing rather than decreasing the surplus?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot quite catch the point, but I will answer it in this way. I have this in connection with my remarks in any case, and I think it will meet the point. What is required in Canada is a more even balance between the producers of foodstuffs and the consumers of foodstuffs. I must be most weak in placing my argument if I cannot make myself clearly understood.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I will agree with my hon. friends that it has been impossible for me to penetrate their minds with this argument. But it surely must be clear to them that it is a distinct advantage to the grower of wheat if, by the increase of the industrial population of this country, there is a reduction in the exportable surplus which must find its sale upon the markets of the world. I am not going to labour that particular point any longer; but in my estimation the fiscal policy for this country should be so framed as to develop and increase and accentuate the development of the industrial life of Canada rather than to pay out large sums of money to bring in additional, inexperienced agricultural producers at this time.

Mr. WARNER: Would the hon. member not have to stop the increase in production if his logic is carried out?

Mr. STEVENS: It will stop automatically. I will not have to stop it. That is one of the things, in connection with the law of production or the law of supply and demand, that I tried to point out this afternoon. This is what occurs when your foreign market is bare, when it falls below the normal average of 650,000,000 bushels and your price soars. The consuming people in the consuming market to which I referred turn to potatoes and rye, and the consumption of wheat falls until the price of wheat reaches a point at which they can afford to purchase it. My hon. friend need not fear the need of control. That will be done by the natural law of supply and demand.

Mr. WARNER: Not if you get double the population raising wheat.

Mr. STEVENS: For five years—for seven years Russia has been out of the wheat exporting business. This year, for the first time in five years, Russia sent into Great Britain a very large quantity of wheat. In one month she sent 44,000 tons into the port of Manchester. I have not the figures for the whole of Great Britain. But mark my words, next year and the year following, Russia will again be a tremendous factor in the export of wheat to the world market. I say to the Canadian wheat farmer that if he wants to safeguard his industry, that will be done by looking not to the requirements of that foreign market, but to the consumption in Canada of as much Canadian wheat as possible.

Let me turn my argument, for a moment, to another line. I appreciate that I have been speaking very much longer than I had intended to do; but interruptions called for explanation and reply, and made my remarks more extended perhaps than I had intended them to be. I want, however, to give to the House some very interesting figures in connection with Canada's foreign trade. I have used these figures publicly on two or three occasions, and, perhaps, they will fit into my argument and the position taken by myself and my colleagues in this House. In the last fifteen years the United Kingdom has sold to Canada $1,645,000,000 worth of goods and it has bought from Canada in the same period $5,070,000,000 worth of goods. In that period—I am giving these figures merely in comparison—the United States sold to Canada $7,084,000,000 worth of goods and bought from us $3,830,000,000 worth of goods. I have the figures for eleven European countries, and while I will not give all the countries, I will give the figures in toto. During the last fiscal year we sold to those eleven countries $75,870,000 worth of goods and we bought from them only $36,600,000 worth of goods. In other words, we sold them $2 worth of goods for every dollar's worth we bought from them. I take the trans-Pacific trade as another division. This includes six trans-Pacific countries, the most important. We sold last year to these countries $51,000,000 worth of goods and from them we bought $14,000,000 worth, or approximately three to one. I have gone back over a period of fifty years and I find that the same state of affairs, with certain minor differences here and there, characterizes the whole of that time: throughout the period we have bought from the United States two dollars for every dollar we have sold them, whereas in other instances in our trade with Europe, the trans-Pacific and Great Britain, we have sold to these countries from two to three dollars for every dollar we have purchased from them. Now a pertinent question appeals to me in this connection: Is our fiscal policy at the present time so framed as to bring about a proper distribution of our foreign trade? That is the important question. Here are the figures for many years, and no marked variation will be found in them if one goes back over this extended period. What is the effect of all this? The effect is seen in two other sets of figures which I shall give to the House. The average annual excess of exports over imports in our trade with the United Kingdom for that period of fifteen years is $228,000,000, whereas the average annual excess of imports over exports in our trade with the United States during the same period is on the other hand $217,000,000. What is the situation? Great Britain owes us and has owed us annually—and it is increasing—for that fifteen years an average of $228,000,000. Where does she pay that money? Does she pay it in Montreal? Where are the bills settled? Great Britain settles our claims against her by paying them in New York. Now there is a vital significance in that fact, and that significance is apparent, for one thing, in the exchange of four per cent against the Canadian dollar in New York. It was apparent to a marked degree three years ago when the exchange stood at nineteen per cent on one occasion against our dollar. But the main point I am making is that for this period of time we have had this adverse balance of trade as regards the United States and there has been no real advantage from the favourable balance of trade in relation to Great Britain. I say, therefore, to the government and to the people of Canada that not only is it desirable so to improve the industrial conditions of this country that we shall increase our industrial population, so to protect the industries of Canada that they may have an opportunity to survive and develop in the teeth of foreign competition, but it is also highly desirable so to frame our fiscal policy as to divert a portion of these purchases from the United States to such countries as have for so many years been favouring us with their purchases. What is the practical remedy? In a few words it is this, that the general tariff of Canada should be placed on a stable basis and as to farm products be increased. That is the first requisite. In the second place, we should make such treaties with other countries as deal favourably with our goods as will give us an advantage in their markets; and in so far as other countries are prepared to give us such an advantage I would advocate preferential treaties with them, although not preferential treaties that would destroy Canadian industry.

I have under my hand a mass of figures regarding our foreign trade, and while I do not wish to weary the House with a recital of them I desire to point out one thing. Since the French Treaty was entered into what has been the result? I do not for a moment criticize the making of a treaty with France, but I do think that it is a matter for criticism that we should open our markets to such luxuries as brandies, wines, silks, satins and so forth. We do question the propriety of that. What is the fact in connection with our imports of wines, brandies and whiskey? Our imports from France have increased enormously while our revenue has actually fallen in a marked degree. There has been no advantage from the standpoint of the revenue although there has been a tremendous importation of foreign whiskeys, brandies and wines; and besides there has been a great increase in the direction of silk and articles of that nature. There is no reason in my opinion why, in so far as it is necessary to sell these things in Canada, we should not encourage the manufacture of them in this country. I know of course the stock argument against this. There is the old well-worn excuse or apology, that if you do not trade with foreign countries, if you do not buy their goods, you cannot expect to sell them your own products. Time will not permit me to do so just now, but on some future occasion I shall show to the House how that policy has affected in a very marked degree certain lines of activity in this country. For the moment, however, let me say that outside of such industries as I have been referring to—the woollen industry, the implement manufacturing industry, the shelf hardware industry and innumerable allied industries of that character—there are many articles that will be trafficked in between Canada and other countries that cannot be profitably or suitably manufactured here. But what I am asking is that we should carefully survey this field and consider the principle of protection altogether without apology. I am tired of apologising for the principle of protection; I am absolutely weary of hearing people offer excuses on behalf of it. Let us clearly state that we are in favour of protecting Canadian industries so that those industries may be established here. I am utterly sick of such utterances as those of my hon. friend this afternoon. He tempered his protective speech with the suggestion of revenue. I say, I am weary of seeing my hon. friends opposite going up and down the country preaching a tariff for revenue and then whispering in the ears of the manufacturers—"Sh—we will protect you, we will not let you get hurt." Let hon. gentlemen come out frankly and declare whether they are in favour of free trade or protection. Do they still offer that old excuse that protection is an immoral principle, that it is something to be shunned, something that we should not talk about? In my estimation it is the one sane fiscal policy for Canada for the present time and perhaps for another decade or two at least.

I began my remarks with what I thought was a courteous and certainly a very pressing plea that the government might relieve the country of the anxiety into which it has plunged it by its own action. There can be no question that industry and commerce and finance in Canada to-day are in a very anxious mood. I have been heartened to this extent, that I am told that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is likely to speak to-night or perhaps to-morrow. If he does I hope he will, with his judicial mind, give to the House a clear-cut statement of what is meant by these ambiguous terms in the Speech from the Throne.

There is one thing which I had forgotten to deal with and which I beg to refer to now, and that is the interpretation that has been put upon the proposed lowering of taxation, namely, the putting upon the free list of instruments of production. Does that include other than farm implements? I have a right to assume that it does. There arrived in Ottawa to-day a fellow citizen of mine, the Hon. Mr. Sloan, Minister of Mines of British Columbia. Mr. Sloan comes with a plea, which is of a piece with what has been the policy of the government and their supporters for years—he is come to make a sectional appeal. He is going to ask the government to put mining and sawmill machinery upon the free list. Why? Now, I want my hon. friends to my left to listen to this because it is another example of the camouflage policy of hon. members opposite. He figures that by so doing the great Liberal party will ingratiate itself with the immense lumbering and mining industries of British Columbia. I say to the ministry, and to all my constituents, that I have absolutely no patience with the policy of proposing something in order to get a few votes locally at the expense of the welfare of the whole country. I go further. Without camouflaging my statement in language such as we find in the Speech from the Throne, I place myself on record that I am absolutely opposed to putting mining and sawmilling machinery on the free list unless everything else is put on the free list and we go the whole distance with free trade. The government will never do that with my support or approval, but in the face of my most bitter opposition. Let it be clearly understood that I stand for the protection of mining and sawmilling machinery just as I stand for the protection of other lines. I will tell my hon. friends why. The mining industry of Canada cannot prosper if our industrial life languishes. The only way in which iron, steel, lead, copper, zinc and other minerals can be mined and used successfully in Canada is if our industrial life is prosperous and consuming large quantities of raw materials. Therefore, if we are to protect our industries, as I advocate, then I ask for no exemption for that branch. Let me turn to lumbering. It might be an advantage if the machinery used in the manufacture of lumber could be placed on the free list. But I want reasonable protection for these articles into which lumber enters as an element, and if I want that I have no right, if I am to be consistent, to ask that the machinery of the sawmill be put on the free list; and I will not do so. I say to the government: Turn a deaf ear to this gentleman from British Columbia who is seeking merely to control a few votes by boasting that he secured for them special privilege as against those engaged in other industries.

Now, will the minister who is leading the House give to us an explanation of just what the government intends to do in regard to this clause in the Speech from the Throne? I say to the minister, basing my remarks upon all the precedents in this case, that they had no constitutional right to predict in the Speech from the Throne that there would likely be reductions in the tariff. It is wholly inconsistent with our constitutional practice, and I do not know of any case where it was done previously.

Mr. McMASTER: It was done in 1907.

Mr. STEVENS: That was general. There is a vast difference between saying that the duty on the instruments of production in certain branches of industry are likely to be reduced, and that it is intended to make a general revision of the tariff. No one would object to the latter statement appearing in the Speech from the Throne. But I want my hon. friend to realize—and I am sorry if I have failed to impress this upon him—I want him to realize that there is uncertainty and anxiety prevailing throughout the country regarding this matter. I have before me editorials from the Globe and other Toronto journals, and from the Montreal and western newspapers, all of which are interpreting this particular paragraph in the Speech from the Throne as meaning that the tariff on agricultural implements is to be substantially reduced. As I said before, how can the commercial and industrial interests of this country function properly under this condition? How can a manufacturer or a distributor place his orders? Therefore I say to the government that we demand—and I think I am fair in putting it that way—we demand an explanation of the clause; we demand it in the interests of the businesses that are affected, and we demand it in the interests of the country generally. I go a step further. I predict that my hon. friend from Brandon will find that he was altogether too hasty in accepting the clause as a fulfilment of the government's policy of 1919 or of the Progressive platform of that year; or, to put it more specifically, I predict that he and his party will get very meagre satisfaction when they review the budget in regard to any reduction of the tariff on agricultural implements. The government is frightened. They show every evidence of fear—they fear the electors, they fear their own personal supporters in this House. They do not desire to put this question to a test. I challenge them to put it to a test here, and I make the still more hopeless challenge that they put it to a test in the country. Why, at least half of those hon. members who are supporting, or who are supposed to be its supporters, have challenged the government —mildly, it is true, because of the ambiguity of the clause—but nevertheless they have indicated how they stand. And if the government dare to come out with a clear-cut statement, there will be serious defections from among its own ranks.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do not worry.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, my hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture has come to life! I wonder if he will tell us what he thinks about this?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It looks fine.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says. "It looks fine." One thing is certain, he will do anything within his power to retain his seat for another year and the salary of Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Cheap.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps my hon. friends think the minister ought to be removed from parliament? I agree with them in that, and I think the country would also agree. In all probability his constituents will agree to his early removal, if he will give them an opportunity of expressing their opinions. But in any case I say we are entitled to this declaration. I challenge my hon. friends opposite to make such a declaration, and I challenge them further to give expression in the budget, within a week if they can or at any time to the clause which is causing all this controversy and anxiety throughout the country.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any length. Indeed, it seems to me that hon. members who hold the floor for two and two and a half hours have no regard either for their fellow members or for the expense they are putting the taxpayers to; certainly they are not the type of statesmen who are ever likely to make Canada what we would all wish to see her become—a country where goodfellowship and propriety prevail from shore to shore.

There are one or two points that I would just like to touch on, and I will be as brief as possible. I have in mind the tariff taxation, and railway extensions. Now I am frank to admit that when I came to this House a little over two years ago I was about as hidebound a dyed-in-the-wool high tariff man as there was in this chamber, but after listening to the discussion of the question from the point of view of both sides of the House I must admit that I have changed my opinion a good deal. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) did put up one argument this afternoon that I admit is a hard one to answer when he showed that the government of Ontario fixed the minimum rate of wage for that province and it was twice as high as the wage paid in the Old Country, and that half the cost of the manufacture of some goods was taken up in wages. Well, that applies to the Old Country but it does not apply to the country to the south of us. Why should a man who buys an auto in this country pay a thousand dollars more for it than he would have to pay on the other side? That is a hard question to answer. If a man goes over to the United States, buys an auto and pays $3,000 for it, he brings it into Canada and pays $1,000 by way of duty. That $1,000 goes toward helping to reduce his taxes, but if he buys the auto in Canada, where does that $1,000 go? It goes into the pockets of those who have taken advantage of the tariff. I am not a free trader entirely, but I cannot help thinking that the people of Canada have stood that sort of thing just about as long as they are entitled to. I will admit that in certain cases industries need protection until they get on their feet, but when they have been given protection for the last fifty years, almost until they have grown whiskers, it is about time the people of Canada stopped feeding them on the bottle.

In connection with taxation, a number of people say that taxation on income is not right, that it is driving people out of the country; that the sales tax is not a good tax, and is helping to drive people to the other side. In my opinion a tax on income is a fit and proper tax. It would be interesting to know how many of the people who are whining about this tax grew wealthy out of the war. If a man of means in this country refuses to pay income tax, it is up to the government to see that he does. We had slackers in the war, and we have them still. These people do not want to pay their fair share of taxation necessary to keep our people who went out and fought Canada's battle and who came back here maimed and broken. As for the sales tax, I know of no way that the government can collect money better than by imposing a tax at the source of production. I think it is a fair tax and that the government will make no mistake if they continue it and properly enforce it. In my judgment they have not a sufficient staff at Vancouver to enforce that tax as it ought to be enforced; however, that is for them to say. Then, there is the tax on liquor. A deputation came to me before I left Vancouver and said, "McBride, when you go down to Ottawa we want you to use your influence in having the duty reduced on liquor coming into this country." When I asked to what extent they thought it should be reduced, they replied from 50 to 100 per cent, and they added that if the duty were reduced by that amount the government would not lose anything, I said, "Does that mean that the consumption of liquor will be doubled if the duty on it is reduced?" They said yes. "Well," I said "when I go to Ottawa, under those conditions I will use all the influence I have to induce the government to double the duty on liquor." There is as good liquor manufactured in Canada as can be brought into the country, too much of the foreign stuff is used.

There is one tax, though, to which I object, and that is the tax on demand loans. That, I think, is not a fair tax. If a man puts his own cheque in the bank for say, $20,000, he pays one dollar in taxes; up to last year it was two, but it was reduced, and I was opposed to that reduction. If he puts a demand note in the bank he pays no less than $32 a year. I say that is not fair. It may be in line with what the Scriptures say: "Who hath not, from him shall be taken that he hath." It may be the law of the country, but I say it is neither right nor just. It is giving the man who has the money an advantage to the extent of one and a half per cent over the man who has to borrow it in the bank, and I think that should be changed and changed at once. Indeed, I do not think that the government intended that it should be that way.

In regard to railway extensions, we have a railroad out there in British Columbia that could be an excellent feeder for the Canadian National. It has to pay interest on five and a half million dollars although it is not earning anything. I am referring to the line from Kamloops to Kelowna. It will cost about one and a half millions to complete that line, and it would be then one of the best feeders the Canadian National could have. Last year in apples alone about 6,000 cars were taken out of that section of the country. When the Canadian National take grain out to the coast it could take fruit back to the prairies, so that if this road were completed it would have traffic both ways. I think it is up to the government to see that that line is built with the least possible delay.

There is another line to which I would like to refer briefly, namely, an extension from the Grand Trunk Pacific into the Peace River country. I was fortunate while coming down here to be on the same train with Sir Henry Thornton, and I went into this question with him very fully. Just here I may say that the government and the people of Canada are to be congratulated upon having a man like Sir Henry Thornton at the head of the railways of this country. Indeed, I find that the men employed on these roads have but two desires since Sir Henry Thornton took charge: one is to give the very best possible service to the public of Canada, and the other to get these roads on a paying basis. I venture to predict that with the interest the employees are taking in these roads with Sir Henry Thornton at their head, within ten years these roads that some people are suggesting should be handed over to some private company will be going a long way towards carrying the public debt of Canada.

But I am getting away from the subject of an extension into the Peace River country. Sir Henry Thornton said he was going into that country during the coming summer. What his decision will be I do not know; where he will decide that extension should be I do not know, but I will abide by his decision. However, I do hope that he will connect the Peace River country by the shortest possible route with Prince Rupert taking grades into consideration. I think that the Canadian National Railway will be well advised to build elevators at Prince Rupert and to put an extension into the Peace River country, for that country in a very few years would give the elevators all they could handle. Indeed, as I see it if there were an extension built into the Peace River country from Prince George or some place near there, it would put the western section of the Grand Trunk Pacific on a paying basis.

There has been a good deal said in this House in connection with the Hudson Bay railway, and I just wish to touch on that briefly. If it can be shown that that road would be a benefit to the farmers of Manitoba and the district through which the road runs, and that it would carry their grain to the markets of the world at a cheaper rate than they are getting at the present time, I say this government is in honour bound to supply the money to have that line completed. On the other hand, if it is going to cost more to ship the grain by that route the sooner the project is abandoned the better. The government should first figure out what it would cost to put the line in first-class shape and complete it. Then they would have to figure what it would cost to build a wharf and elevators at Port Nelson and what it would cost to put in the breakwater that would be required, and that would be an expensive proposition. They would then have to find out what it would cost to dredge a channel up to the wharf and the elevators, and what it would cost to keep that channel open from year to year. All those things would have to be added to the expense of taking the grain that way. Last, but not least, they would have to find out definitely what it would cost to take grain from that port to the markets of the world. Some people say that would be a hard problem to solve, but I would not think so. I would say that the government should get in touch with every steamboat company or steamboat organization there is and ask them to submit figures as to what they would be prepared to carry the grain for, provided all the necessary loading facilities were supplied at that port. Then when the government got that information and figured out what it was going to cost, they could easily size up whether the grain could be carried cheaper to the markets of the world by the Hudson Bay route or the present route. If it can be carried cheaper by the present route, forget the money that has been spent on that road. If it can be carried cheaper by completing that road, the sooner it is completed the better. Some people have made the statement that it is the sentiment of the people that the road should be completed. Sentiment may be all right in some ways, but it does not pay bills. I say it is up to this government before any more money is spent in connection with that road to get a definite estimate of what both the road and the harbour are going to cost.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Prior to the introduction of the amendment which now stands before the House, and which was proposed by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), I had no intention of intervening in this debate, but outlining as it does the present condition of agriculture, and emphasizing the need of enlarging and retaining our home market, I feel that I should in justice to my constituents give to the House a few of my reasons for giving the amendment my whole-hearted support.

I wish to view the matter from the standpoint of agricultural interests almost entirely. Let me say that I recognize the fact that the interests of agriculture are almost identical with those of other industries in this country. The returning prosperity spoken of in the first paragraph of the Speech from the Throne, and enlarged upon by the mover (Mr. Kelly) and the seconder (Mr. Lapierre) of the Address, is not at all in evidence among the farmers of the district from which I come, and if one can judge from the expression of opinion by hon. members who have already taken part in this debate that prosperity is not enjoyed by the people of Canada as a whole. We must be grateful to a kind Providence for a bountiful harvest, but while we have reaped decided advantages therefrom our agriculturists are finding it increasingly difficult to meet their obligations. Many of them are having a struggle to live within their income, and dissatisfaction and unrest prevail generally. It is certain that not many of the agriculturists at least in the district from which I come are able to buy those automobiles of which the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) spoke on which there was a duty amounting to $1,000.

This unfortunate condition of affairs is reflected in the migration of so many of our citizens. It is beyond dispute that many of our people are going to the United States, and I do not think we are justified in maintaining that we are gaining as many from that country as we are losing to it. In a trade return which I have in my hand for the year ending January, 1924, the total value of settlers' effects coming into Canada from the United States amounted to $4,640,293, while for the same period the value of settlers' effects leaving this country for the United States amounted to $9,669,731. That seems to be conclusive evidence that the balance of immigration is greatly to our disadvantage.

Speaking from a local standpoint, and I may be pardoned for interjecting local issues in some cases, I might inform the House that a man who owns a moving van in my own constituency has during the last six months of 1923 moved forty-seven families from that immediate neighbourhood to the city of Buffalo. The reason for this exodus is not hard to find. During the year ending January, 1914, I find by this same trade return, that we imported farm products into Canada from the United States amounting to $112,000,000. I have taken the trouble to itemize these commodities, and I find that we imported from that country during that period approximately $49,000,000 of farm products, such as are grown on Canadian farms, and that come into direct competition with our own produce. During that same year I find that we have an adverse trade balance with that country amounting to over $180,000,000. That in my judgment is the reason why people are trekking to the country to the south of us. So long as we send our gold and silver across the line to build up rival industries and to enrich that country, just so long may we expect our population to drift in the same direction.

The amendment of my hon. friend asserts the necessity of taking steps to retain and enlarge our home market. We who sit in the opposition benches are, unanimously I believe, of the opinion that there is only one way that this can be accomplished. I am sure we all feel the same way in regard to that, that we should impose customs duties which will protect our producers against undue competition with the produce of other countries in our home market. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) last night gave a number of figures to the House showing very clearly the relationship of customs duties on farm products entering Canada with those of farm products which are going to the United States, and I agree with him very thoroughly in his contention that the Canadian farmer should be afforded the same protection as his American brother enjoys in his own market. Steps are also necessary to retain our markets, but in this connection what do we find? As has been stated in the House this year on more than one occasion, the British preference on woollen goods was increased last year with the result that twenty of our woollen mills have been closed down and many others have been compelled to lower their output. The importation of woollen goods has been doubled, while the total wages of our woollen operators have been cut in half. Many of our workmen have been thrown out of employment. This innovation the Prime Minister last year characterized as a step in the direction of fulfilling his pre-election pledges. If the interpretation which has been placed upon the Speech from the Throne that agricultural implements are to be put on the free list is correct, the government proposes to imperil the life of another large industry and endanger the livelihood of another large number of our Canadian workmen. Every time Canadian workmen are thrown out of employment, and every time a Canadian citizen leaves this country to find employment in the United States, we are lessening the consuming power of our own people and diminishing the home market rather than enlarging it.

The constituency which I have the honour to represent lies close to the large and important city of Hamilton. If I am correctly informed it is the third city of industrial importance in the Dominion; two of the largest implement industries in this Dominion are located there, and the placing of agricultural implements on the free list would seriously imperil their existence if it did not close their doors entirely. This would be a serious menace to the business interests of Hamilton and to agriculture in the whole surrounding community. One of the largest creameries in western Ontario is located in my constituency, fourteen miles from that city, and I hope hon. members will pardon me for giving a local touch to what I have to say. A very large percentage of their products is marketed there. Any possible advantage which the farmers of that district might derive from the lowering of the price of agricultural implements—and I would be very much surprised if there would be any such result as that if we had free agricultural implements—I repeat any possible advantage which might be derived would be much more than offset by the interference with their markets which would result. I must confess that I cannot understand the attitude of the members of the Progressive party in the province of Ontario who sit in this House. Surely they must realize the importance of retaining and enlarging our home markets. I have in my hand a trade return which I received lately and which illustrates fully the value of the home market to our farmers. It is a return which gives the particular commodities of farm origin, the production in Canada of those commodities for the year 1922 and also the proportion of that production which was exported. It starts out with wheat. The figures are as follows:

	Production in Canada 1922	Proportion of production exported Per cent
Wheat.. .. .. ..Bushels	399,786,000	53.5
Oats.. .. .. .. "	491,239,000	5.9
Barley.. .. .. .. "	71,865,000	20.3
Rye.. .. .. "	32,373,000	31.3
Peas.. .. .. "	3,429,000	7.7
Beans.. .. .. .. "	1,303,000	6.2
Corn.. .. .. "	13,798,000	0.2
Potatoes.. .. .. .. "	92,909,000	3.0
Hay and Clover.. ..Tons	14,488,000	0.4
Wool.. .. ..Lbs.	18,523,000	46.7
Butter.. .. .. "	252,501,000	5.98
Eggs.. .. ..$	48,770,000	2.01
Beef.. .. ..Lbs.	677,317,600	3.75
Pork.. .. .. "	710,449,872	6.82
Sheep and Mutton.. "	90,046,000	2.92

In many instances the amount of imports of these commodities nearly if not quite equals the exports. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is very apparent that the home market is the greatest asset which the farmer possesses, and I sincerely hope nothing will be done to curtail it in any way. If we are to have a return of prosperity in this great and growing country we must have stability, and we must have confidence on the part of our people. The two great factors which are needed in this country to-day are increased population and capital to develop our resources. The stage is all set for a wonderful national development; we have the resources, we have the agricultural area, we have the transportation facilities, and if we adopt a sympathetic and appreciative attitude towards industry, towards labour and towards agriculture; in other words, if we assure to all classes reasonable markets, we cannot help but succeed. For these reasons, I think this amendment, calling, as it does, for measures to retain and to enlarge our home market, is well worthy of the support of every hon. member of this House.

Mr. N. H. McTAGGART (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, seeing that so much of this debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne has been taken up with tariff issues, I might say that I do not propose to take up very much time in discussing the tariff. I have, however, just a word or two to say regarding the inconsistencies of some of the arguments put forward by hon. members in the case for protection, and I desire to mention some misleading statements which have been made during the course of this debate. The least important, perhaps, of those statements, but the one which surprised me the most, was the statement made by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) in connection with the importation of agricultural implements into Canada. I believe he gave the figures at $4,500,000. Yesterday afternoon, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) gave the figure in connection with the importation of agricultural implements as $12,000,000 or $13,000,000.

I listened this afternoon with deep interest to the speech of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). I might say in regard to the splendid effort which he made, that I am thoroughly in sympathy with his concern regarding the question of national unity; but I wish to add this, that as regards the major portion of his speech, I am bound to feel that it will, if anything, hasten the day when the question of national unity may possibly hang in the balance. In my opinion, if we in this chamber would apply ourselves to the task of passing legislation which would be in the interests of and fair to all sections of this Dominion, we should have less to worry about the question of national unity. I might mention another misleading statement in regard to the revenue derived from the customs tariff as applied to agricultural implements which come into this country. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River did not take into consideration the fact that the purchasers of agricultural implements throughout this Dominion pay approximately the amount of the tariff on the implement which is produced in Canada. While I do not know what the figures in regard to Canadian production represent, I would point out to hon. members of this House that if they would take the case of the Ford company as an example, they would see that while the revenue derived by way of customs tariff from the importation of Ford cars into Canada is very small, nevertheless, Canadian purchasers of Ford cars pay millions of dollars into the pockets of the Ford company.

In regard to the argument as to the ruination of our industries if the tariff is lowered on agricultural implements, I have only this to say—and then I will pass on—that the Canadian implement manufacturer is to-day competing in the markets of the world with the foreign producer, and in many cases, I believe, paying the amount of the customs tariff. In this connection, I would like at this time to make a proposition—I make it on my own account entirely—something that prior to this time has not been suggested in this House. If the manufacturer of agricultural implements or other merchandise were compelled to sell his article in the home market at the same price as that which he sells it in the foreign market, I do not think the Canadian farmer would offer any objection.

The question which I wish particularly to deal with to-night is a question which after all, notwithstanding the length of this debate, has not been discussed up to the present time. The question was suggested to me by something which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) said in his speech. He gave figures, showing that for nine months in 1923, I believe it was, approximately 17,000 people per month left Canada and went to the United States. Those figures were so startling that I thought it worth while to take up this particular question from the standpoint of the district from which I come, to examine into it and to see if it is possible to determine the reason, in the main, for those people going out. I might say that as regards the people who left western Canada, the major portion of the emigration to the United States was from that district. I live in an area in western Canada which members in bygone days in this House would remember very well. It is what is known as the pre-emption area. The pre-emption area in Saskatchewan and in Alberta represents about 61,000,000 acres of land. Back in 1908, at the time the Dominion Lands Act was passed, the lands within this area were, in the main, government lands. At that time, the policy of the government then in power was changed, and instead of those lands being granted to railway companies by way of land grants, a decision was reached to turn them over for settlement, part of them to be sold to settlers, and the proceeds from the sale of those lands was to be applied, as members of this House will remember, to building the Hudson Bay railway. The settlement of that area was very rapid after Manitoba and Eastern Saskatchewan were filled; but because of the fact that even in those days it was known that the pre-emption area in the main was an area where the rainfall is consideraly less than in other portions of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, it was decided that in order to farm successfully in that district, it was necessary to have more than one-quarter section of land. I see the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) in his seat, and I am glad he is with us, because I think he was a member of the House at the time that the Hon. Frank Oliver piloted this legislation through the House. There was much opposition at that time to the policy of giving an extra quarter section of land to the homesteader. I am not going to find fault now with the policy adopted then. I will say this, however, that at that time there was an insufficiency of knowledge as regards the character of that country, and on that account the people of that area to-day are unable to carry on agriculture to advantage. The condition to which I refer is this. In 1908 the Dominion Lands Act did not contemplate that there were sections of that area which were perhaps not as good as many other portions of the Canadian West. There were some areas which no doubt were of medium quality, some fairly good, and there were large areas where the soil was absolutely unsuited to agriculture, being fit only for grazing. The Dominion Lands Act, I say, did not take any cognizance of that fact; and because it did not, because there was no classification of lands made at that time, and settlers went on soils which were inferior, we have the present condition. Settlers came in from Europe and from the United States. The demand for homesteads at that time was very great and all these lands were settled upon indiscriminately. The settler who took up a homestead had the privilege of filing or entering for pre-emption, and the purchase price was to be three dollars an acre. At that time there were a large number of grazing leases in that area, and we have many of them to-day. At the time of the greater production campaign during the war there developed this situation: That area in common with others in western Canada was unfortunate enough to suffer a period of drouth. There were three or four dry years in succession which hit that particular district, and as a result of the conditions that obtained, many of the settlers on the inferior soil had to move out. This condition has remained unchanged up to the present time. Beginning with the year 1920, however, we were fortunate enough to secure heavier rainfall so that we have had since that time about three or perhaps four very fair crops. But the trouble which began during those dry years has existed up to the present time. To-day there are in that part of the country many of those settlers who took up homesteads at that time who are to-day unable to pay for their pre-emption. I refer to those who settled on medium class soils. Those who settled on the better class of soils have in the main settled for their pre-emption and have discharged their responsibilities to the Dominion government; those who settled on the poorer soils have been unable to meet their obligations and to-day they are uncertain whether to carry on or not. The Department of the Interior has been endeavouring to collect the back payments upon these pre-emptions, and from time to time, owing to the energetic effort that is made in this direction, many of these people are compelled to move out of the country.

I desire now to deal with another situation that exists in that area and which is closely related to this matter. I have reference to the question of railway facilities. Because the area suffered from lack of rainfall the railway companies decided not to pursue an energetic campaign of railway construction in that part of the country. To-day we have in two sections of that area a very desperate state of affairs in the matter of railway facilities. I will refer to these two sections at this particular time because I believe the matter is one of great importance and illustrates the general situation. West of Swift Current the Canadian Pacific Railway some years ago built a branch line to the Alberta line and close to the Saskatchewan river. But between that railway and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the distance in places is as far as from the city of Ottawa to Montreal. I do not know whether I should be safe in saying hundreds, but undoubtedly many dozens of farmers in that district are hauling grain to-day, say, a distance equal to that between Ottawa and Smith's Falls. The Canadian Pacific Railway have a charter to build a line through this area known as the Leader South Cantour Railway, but because they obtain all the trade north and south there seems to be no disposition on their part to proceed with the building of that line. The bill which passed this House last session would have served a very large area south-westerly from the town of Bengough in the eastern part of that section. I believe that when the Branch Lines bill passed this House last year there was general rejoicing in that district, for the people expected that the realization of their dream was imminent. But the bill did not become law and for that reason to-day many of those settlers are moving out of that area. I might mention an experience I had in that part of the country last fall. I drove from the town of Limerick fifty-two miles through the district that would be served by the branch line projected in the bill last year. I attended a rally that was held for the purpose of talking matters over, and at its close I was amused to learn of the manner in which the people of that district had contemplated impressing upon me the fact that they were so far from a railway. They had planned to compel me to walk back to the railway. I am glad to say that they did not put that intention into effect, but I am sure that I was sufficiently impressed with the long and weary miles over which those people have to haul grain.

There is in that particular area another condition that is responsible for the depopulation of the land. I am not going to deal with this question at great length to-night because it has been dealt with in the House before. I am referring now to the disparity in prices between what the farmer pays for the things he buys and what he receives for the products he sells. Suffice it to say that for most of the things which the farmer purchases the price has either remained stationary or has increased, whereas in regard to the things that he sells he gets no advantage. Let me give an illustration. For the past two years on my farm I have desired to buy a drill. I went to see the agent of a company whose headquarters are at Brantford. He quoted me the price of a new drill. I replied, "The price apparently has risen again, and I don't feel able to buy now." Upon inquiring the price of new discs for my old drill, purchased about eight or nine years ago, he quoted me $7.00, which would be equivalent to $140 for the complete drill. I do not remember what I paid originally, but I feel sure that that is close to the old price.

I have read the Speech from the Throne with very much interest and with some satisfaction. I am glad to notice that the government is at last apparently going to take a step in the right direction. For many years there has been a flirtation with the god of high protection, and I hope the government will now have the courage to carry out the programme which they have outlined to lessen the cost of living in the Dominion.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham, the House adjourned at 9.45 p.m.

SUPERVISION OF RADIO

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I should like to bring to the attention of the government a matter of urgent general interest to the general public. In the New York Times of March 12, its Washington correspondent makes this announcement.

More effective governmental supervision of radio communication, including authority to defeat attempts to monopolise the ether, was recommended to the House Committee on Merchant Marine to-day by Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce.

Secretary Hoover, in his address, gave his approval to the purposes of the pending White bill, which aims to prohibit monopoly of radio communication, allowing the Interstate Commerce Commission to review the rates charged for such service and laying down drastic regulations governing the issuance of licenses by the Secretary of Commerce for the operation of broadcasting stations.

Is such provision for the protection of the public being made by the government of Canada? I would ask the acting Prime Minister (Mr. Graham) to let the public know whether any proposal looking to a monopoly of radio communication has been made in Ottawa.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister): The question of radio is not only new, but intricate, and I would not care to give an answer offhand. As a matter of law and of practice, the management of radio is in the hands of a branch of the Marine department. Licenses are issued; regulations are in force at the present time; inspection takes place; and a small fee is paid, of course, largely for the purpose of paying for this inspection. There has been communication, whether it has been of late or not, between the governments as to the proper control of radio, as there have been or are likely to be so many broadcasting stations that the conflict of the air waves interferes with proper communication.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MEIGHEN

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to have to rise to a question of privilege. I have observed in an address given by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) in this House on the 10th instant, words which attribute to me language as respects which I want to make contradiction. I will read or attempt to read the exact language of the hon. member as it appears at page 197 of Hansard:

Le chef de l'Opposition ne veut pas se rappeler qu'il a été le principal insulteur de notre province et de notre race et que les partisans qui se tenaient à ses côtés faisaient la même sale besogne. Qu'il n'oublie pas une chose: les électeurs de la province de Québec, toujours fidèles à leur devise, se souviennent. Ils se souviendront qu'au cours de la Grande Guerre si nous avons connu des jours de tristesse et de deuil nous les devons au chef de l'Opposition et à son parti; ils se souviendront, d'autre part, qu'ils peuvent avoir confiance au chef du parti libéral, l'honorable premier ministre, qui a su garder son bon sens alors que presque tous ses compatriotes perdaient la tête pendant la guerre, et qui, fidèle à ses principes, étant Canadien avant tout, a su se ranger aux côtés de ceux qui voulaient protéger leur pays avant de défendre l'Empire.

I have read all, that the context might be seen and no injustice done. I will read the translation as I make it:

The leader of the opposition does not wish to recall that he has been the principal insulter of our province and of our race and that the partisans who cling to his side engaged in the same dirty work. Let him not forget one thing: the electors of the province of Quebec, always faithful to their motto "Remember". They will remember that in the course of the great war if we experienced days of sadness and of mourning we owe it to the leader of the opposition and to his party. They will remember, on the other hand, that they can have confidence in the leader of the Liberal party, the hon. Prime Minister, who has preserved his good sense when almost all his compatriots lost their heads during the war, and who, faithful to his principles, being a Canadian before all else, has ranged himself on the side of those who desire to protect their country before defending the Empire.

It is to the first feature alone that I have a right to refer on this occasion, that which ascribes to me an insult to the province of Quebec and to the French-Canadian race. I only desire to say that no words of mine were ever spoken or can be found uttered in this House or out of this House in my entire public or, indeed private life, that afford the slightest foundation for the grave, and I had almost said, base, allegation of the hon. member for Rimouski. This denial I have made repeatedly, and in the whole carnival of calumny on this question no one has ever attempted to substantiate the allegation, so far as I have ever seen, by quotation from my words. The next is more brief:

Le chef de l'opposition semble vouloir agir de la même façon que sir John-A. Macdonald; il vient dans notre province flagorner notre clergé après l'avoir fait insulter.

The leader of the opposition seems to wish to adopt the same methods as Sir John A. Macdonald; he comes into our province to toady to our clergy after having insulted them.

I can scarcely find words to describe this language. My only right, however, is to deny the allegation as I now do in the strongest possible terms. I can hardly conceive the type of mind which would ascribe that conduct to any person without the slightest foundation in fact. One more sentence:

Il a oublié qu'il fait partie de cette ligne de fanatiques qui travaillent à rabaisser autant que possible l'élément canadien-français et qui tâchent d'écraser tous ceux qui ne partagent pas leurs opinions.—

He has forgotten that he is a member of that league of fanatics who labour to crush as far as possible the French-Canadian element, and who seek to wipe out all those who do not agree with their opinions.

I do not know what league is referred to. If the hon. member would be more specific my denial could also be equally specific. I only say that I am a member of no league at all, either in this country or in any other, nor am I a member of any secret society, neither am I a member of any order, nor have I ever been.

BANFF PARK WATER POWER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): Can the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) inform the House what action if any has been taken with respect to the application for water power privileges in the Banff National Park?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): There is before the department an application on behalf of the Calgary Power Company, but nothing has been done in the matter; no definite conclusion has been arrived at.

RUSSIAN TRADE DELEGATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Does the government's reception of the trade delegates from Soviet Russia mean the recognition of the Soviet Republic? Does the recognition by England of Soviet Russia involve recognition by Canada?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Prime Minister): That is a large constitutional question, which I think will be referred later to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). At this moment the gentlemen to whom my hon. friend refers are in this building. I have had a conversation with them and with some of my colleagues have received the delegates and discussed trade matters with them. As to recognition of Soviet Russia, I do not know what such recognition on the part of England means so far as Canada is concerned; but in relation to the question of trade, I can only say that we are doing business on our own hook.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): I want to call the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) to an editorial that appears in the Montreal Gazette of to-day in which Mr. A. E. Warren, general manager of the Canadian National Railways, western region, is reported as stating that the Minister of Railways has ordered full speed ahead on the Hudson Bay railway. Is this statement correct, and has such an order been given?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): I am glad that my hon. friend has called my attention to this matter because the definition of the phrase "full speed" may not be fully understood.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has defined what that means.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am afraid this definition might not answer this query. Last year, as hon. gentlemen will remember, a certain sum was voted to rehabilitate or to repair and put in operating condition a certain portion of the Hudson Bay railway that has deteriorated during the past few years The estimate having gone through the House late, as nearly all estimates do under our system, very little of that money was expended. I had a conversation with Mr. Warren the other day concerning the matter with a view to taking some steps to expend a certain amount of money that I proposed to put in the estimates, and I believe the Canadian National Railways would be justified in proceeding with the work as soon as possible, trusting to the estimate going through the House.

LOBSTER FISHERIES REGULATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.): Have representations been made to have the lobster fisheries regulations for the district of South Kent and Westmoreland in the province of New Brunswick altered, changing the date of August 16 to August 1 of each year? If so, what decisions has the Department of Marine and Fisheries arrived at in the matter?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): A petition has in fact been received by the Department of Marine and Fisheries in connection with this matter but no definite action has so far been taken.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Sutherland, resumed from Thursday, March 13.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire first of all to offer my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. These hon. gentlemen had a fine document to comment upon and I think they have availed themselves splendidly of that opportunity. I may remark also, before I go further, how pleased I am and the members of the government are at the manner in which the Speech from the Throne has been received by the country.

An hon. MEMBER: By Brantford?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I expected that; I shall come to the point in a moment. The Speech from the Throne has received the commendation of all friends of progressiveness and of those who desire to uphold in Canada liberal ideas, liberal principles and liberal policies.

Mr. STEVENS: There is still a suspicion over here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: On the other hand, it has been criticised by those who belong to a different school. Let me confess to my hon. friends opposite that there are some expressions of approval which I would rather not receive because they would cause me to doubt the correctness of my own line of action. My hon. friends need not point to any member on this side. I am not aware that any supporter of the government has said that he is going to vote against the Address; quite the contrary. I am not surprised at the disappointment of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and his associates. The announcements made by His Excellency in his Speech, including the promise of a balanced budget at the end of the present fiscal year, are a decisive answer to the campaign which they have been waging throughout the country during the last six months. The citadel of misrepresentation, so industriously built up by speakers and writers in that pen-and-mouth disease which has raged throughout Canada—that citadel has crumbled. My right hon. friend in his speech on the Address—which was clever, as are all his speeches—obviously expressed the policy of his party, but it was singularly uninspiring. His speech was great in small things, and small in great things. What ray of hope is set before the eyes of young Canadians; what spirit of confidence did he place in their minds and hearts; what message of faith did he deliver to them? Nothing, Sir; nothing but dismay and bitterness. The right hon. gentleman, trying to throw ridicule on the Speech from the Throne, said it was a collection of hopes. Well, if we contrast his own speech with the Speech from the Throne, I am sure we shall all agree that it was an accumulation of discouragement and despair. Unwittingly he has paid a compliment to his opponents. Yes, the Speech from the Throne is a message of faith, of confidence, of life, of progress. The world is moving—I know my hon. friends will smile at that; the mere mention of the word liberalism gets on the nerves of those gentlemen—the world is moving, and we as a young country must move with it, we must set our vision towards the rising sun; looking at the past will not be of much avail.

An hon. MEMBER: You are looking West.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Politically, west, south, east and north—we on this side of the House are not sectionalists. Social, economic and political systems are clashing in the world today as were the armies on the battlefields five years ago. The victory will rest with those who properly protect and safeguard the needs and rights of the masses, of the producers and of the labouring men. But, Sir, in that battle, as in its counterpart of five years ago, the victory will not side with those who merely use defensive tactics and refuse to move forward.

What constructive statement can be found in the utterances of my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, delivered in this House the other day? Apart from unfair depreciation of his opponents, what did it contain? What remedy did he offer, what suggestion did he make? I ask any hon. member and I ask the people of this country, where can they find a constructive suggestion in the speech of my right hon. friend? But I am not surprised at the absence of anything constructive. At a banquet tendered to him last year by his followers in the House of Commons and the Senate, he announced that this will be his policy for some time. I do not want to be unfair to my right hon. friend, I quote his own words as reported in the Ottawa Journal of April 18, 1923:

> I never can be moved from the discharge of that duty, continued Mr. Meighen, by the importunities of those who think otherwise, by the impatience of a section of the press, nor by any device, however resourceful. I am confident that a foundation of distrust in this administration must be laid by convincing the public that the whole of the past Liberal campaign was dishonest from the beginning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I knew I would strike the heart of my right hon. friend. He continued:

As soon as we get that conviction general we shall have the foundation on which later constructive policies may be successfully built. That is our first duty, and towards that we have to concentrate our efforts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So my right hon. friend agrees still with that statement of his, that his only duty is to lay a foundation of distrust in the government of the day, and then later, when he shall have been successful, will be the time for constructive policies. Mr. Speaker, no other public man in Canada ever expressed such a statement.

And he has kept his pledge. The sole object of the campaign which has been conducted throughout the country during the last few months has been to hamper the work of those who have to clear up the ghastly muddles and messes which he and his friends have bequeathed to his successors,—what you, Sir, a lover of the classics would call damnosa hereditas. Of course, he has been supported in this campaign by all those who hate liberalism, particularly because they distrust and despise the people. He has been helped by those who are seeking more privileges and know that they cannot get them from the democratic government which is now in power. Read certain speeches, analyze certain statements that have been made, and you will see that this propaganda was a curtain-raiser for a demand for higher protection. The President of the Ontario Liberal-Conservative Association in Hamilton the other day, when organizing a branch there, said:

We are organizing to chase from Ottawa this terrific-tariff-cutting government which is in power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friends say, "hear, hear," but not very long ago they voted for a motion of the right hon. leader of the opposition which declared that we had broken our pledges in that we had not made any reduction in the tariff. I confess that I admire that Tory consistency.

Is the trade of Canada declining? Is failure going to be the outcome of Canadian industry and enterprise? Amid the confusion that has been created in the public mind by lugubrious utterances concerning the things that are hampering our prosperity, there is at least one fact that furnishes solace and courage and ground for a sane judgment on the situation, and that is that our production is increasing all the time and that the national wealth is larger than it ever was. Mr. Speaker, the statistics show that our national wealth is great, and Canadians should not slander their country—indeed, some of them are even slandering themselves for the purpose of achieving some selfish interest. The statistics show that the trade of Canada has enormously increased; that, as I have said, it has never been larger than it is to-day. Our exports are greater, and the balance is in our favour. Every time a domestic loan is floated, either by this government or by the provinces, there is money in Canada to subscribe to it. My right hon. friend said the other day that the number of business failures resulting in bankruptcy was increasing; I have here the statistics to show they have decreased fifty per cent during the last year. And yet the "whisperers of death," the disgruntled politicians, and the seekers of privileges, are claiming that all this means nothing and are adducing arguments to prove that the more trade the less wealth, the more exports the less prosperity. My right hon. friend devoted one hour of his time the other day to setting forth such an argument. Imagine what he would say if the figures were the other way.

Reference has been made to the fact that a number of our population have left the country. It is unfortunate that it should be so, but I do not hesitate to say that if men are leaving this country, those who are primarily responsible for it are the whisperers of death, the preachers of blue ruin, the men who say that Canada is to-day a land of desolation, taxes and debts. The young Canadians of to-day will never forgive those who have been slandering their country. I say that Canada and Canadians should be grateful to Providence for the condition in which our country finds itself compared with that of other nations of the world after the crisis which, in common with those other nations, we have gone through. The conditions in Europe are still affecting us. If there is one thing which the war and its effects have taught the people of the world more clearly than anything else it is the interest that every country has in the social and economic life of every other country. We are all interrelated peoples, as individuals, and what does injury to one country does injury to all the countries. Problems which are international in their scope cannot be easily remedied by purely national solutions. That is why I am a strong advocate of a league of nations. Unfortunately, the world is not yet at peace; far from it. Such a prudent and distinguished statesman as Lord Grey of Falloden said at Bath only the other day that he felt it his duty to tell his hearers that things were going from bad to worse in Europe and were shaping, if not immediately, almost certainly, toward another war. From this side of the Atlantic we must certainly say that we do not see any great improvement on the other side. Peace has not resumed its sway over the hearts and minds of men. Stability of currency, which is so necessary to the rebuilding of the shattered fabric of international trade, is not yet apparent. We have seen recently the Belgian franc, the French francs, the German mark, the Russian rouble, suffer fantastic declines; and the same thing has happened in most of the European countries and even in some parts of South America. Canada is standing the test with flying colours, in spite of the whisperers of death. We should be proud of it; we should be grateful to Providence for it, and we should not recriminate as some gentlemen have done for the last few months. I am pleased to see that they seem to realize the error of their ways: for the last few days we have not heard much about our awful financial condition; we have heard only about the tariff. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who is a fine speaker—none better, from the parliamentary viewpoint, in this House—applied himself during the whole of his speech yesterday to the tariff and merely to that. He implored me to convert my speech into a budget speech, because he asked me to give him the details. Let me tell my hon. friend that in his address he was not as logical as he usually is. He said that nothing should be stated in the Speech from the Throne concerning the tariff. Of course this has been done before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did not say that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Nothing explicit, he said. Am I right now?

Mr. STEVENS: I stated that it was not according to constitutional procedure in this House to anticipate the budget in the Speech from the Throne by declaring any specific reductions in duties on particular articles or classes of articles.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And yet my hon. friend, having stated that it is against constitutional authority or practice to declare in the Speech from the Throne what will be the specific measures with respect to the tariff, has asked me to give him that in detail.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, my hon. friend was addressing himself to every one of the ministers.

Mr. STEVENS: I asked for an explanation of an ambiguous clause.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: He says that it should not be specific, and that we should make it still more specific.

Mr. MEIGHEN: After the harm is done.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then he turned in the direction of my Progressive friends to his left and warned them that nothing would be done. So it is not explicit, as my hon. friend says.

The other fault he had to find with the government—I do not know whether it is a great fault—was that on two occasions this debate has come very close to an end and to the taking of a vote and my hon. friend was horrified at the prospect of a vote being taken on the amendment. Why, in the press, even in newspapers supporting my hon. friend, we see complaints that this debate is much too long, that it is costing the country $30,000 a day—by the way, while I mention that figure, which I see repeated in all the newspapers of the land, may I say that it is wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I at least remove that sin from the conscience of my hon. friends opposite. I am informed that the real cost to the country of a session of parliament is $55,000 per month, because the rest of the expenditure is spread over the whole year whether there is a session or not. So $30,000 a day is a little too much.

Though it may please my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, than whom I have no better friend, I really cannot agree to make a budget speech to-day, and I shall speak of something else. The details he is so anxious to receive will be officially given in the budget speech which will be delivered in a few weeks.

May I address myself now for a little while to some statements which have been made by the leader of the opposition in the country, some of which he has repeated in this House? My right hon. friend has carried on a campaign in Canada. We have been pleased to see him in my own province. He made a fine pilgrimage through the province of Quebec, in the course of which we were pleased to see him distribute medals to the schools, colleges and convents. But we were not so pleased to see him distribute misrepresentations of facts to the rest of the people of the province. He frequently at his meetings repeated what I had stated with regard to the net debt of Canada, that the net debt of Canada per capita was lower than the debt of Great Britain and of the other British Dominions. My right hon. friend agreed with that, but then he asked: "Why does not Mr. Lapointe then say why our taxes are higher?" My right hon. friend asks me a difficult question when he asks me to give the reason, for the simple reason that I cannot find a cause for an effect which exists only in his imagination. My right hon. friend was wrong every time he stated that taxation in Canada is higher than in Great Britain and the other British Dominions. Canada has the lowest taxation of them all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was expecting my right hon. friend to say No, and I have come with some ammunition. The first thing I did was to inquire as to the income tax and I have here an official communication from the Commissioner of Taxation, comparing the income tax in Canada with that paid in Great Britain and the other British Dominions. This is a very interesting statement:

Rates applicable to 1923 Income—Married person—No dependents.

Exemption: Canada, $2,000; Great Britain, $1,095; Australia, $973; New Zealand, $1,460.

Income	Canada	Great Britain	Australia	New Zealand
$ 2,000	.....	$ 82 12	$ 62 43	$ 50 01
3,000	$ 40 00	246 37	121 91	158 26
5,000	126 00	684 37	291 70	489 62
10,000	619 50	1,779 37	965 06	1,776 00
20,000	2,089 50	4,915 33	2,945 28	5,648 05
30,000	4,084 50	8,930 34	7,787 09	11,046 88
50,000	9,649 50	18,298 67	16,645 87	18,581 30

I will not ask the House to bear with me while I give the taxation on every income. Let me only say that the taxation continues in the same proportion until you reach incomes of between $150,000 and $200,000. On an income of $200,000 the Canadian pays $97,-849.50, while in Great Britain the taxation amounts to $94,948.67. The same proportion continues until you reach an income of $1,000,-000, but my right hon. friend will agree with me that the number of Canadians who pay taxes on an income of that size is rather microscopic and that the bulk of the Canadian people is less heavily taxed than the people of Great Britain and the other British Dominions so far as income tax is concerned.

Mr. MANION: What about municipal taxation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let us come to that. I asked the Bureau of Statistics about it and here is the answer I received:

The taxation revenue per head of population in the United Kingdom is $79.37.

The taxation revenue per head of population in Australia is $43.09.

The taxation revenue per head of population in New Zealand is $60.97.

The taxation revenue per head of population in Canada is $36.67.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will permit me, he does not mean to suggest that is the taxation revenue, he means the income tax revenue?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh no, I will give the details if it suits my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: Does that include provincial taxation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It does so far as Australia is concerned, it does not in the case of the other countries which are not administered in the same way. But the proposition is so vastly different that we have no hesitation at all—and any expert in taxation I have spoken to agrees in saying that Canada is the lowest-taxed country in the British Empire.

Mr. CLARK: Have you the figures with respect to the United States in that statement of taxation revenue?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, I have just read in the Congressional Record of the United States a speech by a gentleman whose name I cannot remember, the chairman of the Appropriations committee, and his statement is that the United States is the most heavily taxed country in the world. I agree with my hon. friend that the income taxation there is less than in Canada, but they have all sorts of other taxes which weigh heavily on the shoulders of their population, and any American will tell you so.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend did not ascertain the figures from the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. LAPOINTE. I did not. My reason for not doing so is that my conflict with the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) has reference to the financial position of the British Dominions and not the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: I understood my hon. friend to say that the taxation revenue for Canada was $36 per capita?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite sure that the impression my hon. friend is giving is wholly wrong; it may not be intentional on his part, I am sure it is not. The per capita taxation of Canada is somewhere around $250 per head.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, that is the debt per capita, not the taxation. I have in my hand a statement by Sir Henry Gibson, chairman of the Parliamentary committee of the National Union of Manufacturers in Great Britain. I took it from the December number of the English Review. I quote it in part:

Since the recent great war, owing to the fact that we have balanced our budget and are paying off our debt, our taxation is much higher than that of any other country in the world, thus increasing the cost of home manufactures.

There is no doubt as to that, and we must admire Britain in that respect. Whatever else can be said of Britain it must be conceded that she deals earnestly with serious problems. Britain financed her Allies during the war. She did not repudiate any debt. She did not leave the payment of those debts to posterity. She has taxed her people heavily, she is meeting her obligations, and she is giving to the world an example of honest international dealings. All honour to Great Britain for that! But, Mr. Speaker, we could not do the same in Canada, probably on account of our proximity to the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend says "hear, hear," and he is right. But why complain of our heavy taxation when other nations, and other peoples, are a good deal more heavily taxed than we are?

4 p.m. A gentleman was saying the other day, an acquaintance of my right hon. friend, that our income taxation in this country was a confiscation of capital. He was wrong, and I have shown he was wrong. Moreover if you decrease the income tax, when it has been decreased with the present financial condition of the country, somebody else will have to pay. That gentleman would like to confiscate the comforts of life which poorer people have, but which they could not have if the price of the commodities they use was increased.

My right hon. friend referred many times to the French treaty. On all platforms from which he spoke in the country he did so. He also referred to the subject when the leader of the government was speaking the other day. Of course, in his opinion that treaty is no good; it never had any merit. It pleases my right hon. friend to throw ridicule on the French treaty. He said the other day that apart from wheat our exports to France had decreased.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, Hansard will show. My right hon. friend is suffering from loss of memory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rarely suffer from that. What I said was this—that the whole increase, and more than the increase, was made up by wheat and other goods not affected by the treaty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think my right hon. friend is wrong even in that contention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I was told by a government officer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are many articles in which there was a heavy increase. My hon. friend for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) referred yesterday to the subject of agricultural implements. Since the treaty came into force we have exported $1,431,428 of agricultural implements. That is since September last. During the same period of last year we exported $796,842 worth. There has been an increase of 100 per cent in agricultural implements alone. And let me say en passant that I am pleased to see that the manufacturers of implements can compete with the world on a foreign market. There has also been an increase in various articles, mainly parts of automobiles, electrical apparatus, and aluminum ware. I have a further authority which my right hon. friend will not dispute. In July last the annual convention of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association was held in Toronto. Attached to that body is a tariff committee which presented a report. That report appeared in the July issue of Industrial Canada and here is what I read:

The Convention—

Meaning the treaty.

—removes all discriminations against Canada in favour of the United States, and in addition provides for substantial tariff preference on a considerable list of the products of each country.

And that report was carried unanimously. Surely the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) will remove from his mind this idea of brandy and wine with regard to the French treaty and admit that we did some good and that the manufacturers of the country have received it with commendation.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would the hon. gentleman give us some returns in respect to lobsters and salmon?

Mr. MEIGHEN: And condensed milk?

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will put that question on the order paper, I shall be glad. I cannot carry that information about with me.

There is another treaty which has received the sarcastic criticism of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen). I refer to the famous Halibut treaty. My right hon. friend has paraded the Halibut treaty from the Atlantic to the Pacific for the last six months. He has charged me with having "elbowed aside" the British Ambassador at Washington for the purpose of affixing my signature to that treaty, and he has repeated periodically that, as a result, the treaty is not valid; that the United States Senate has refused it, and that there is no Halibut treaty. My right hon. friend knows that that statement is not according to the facts. Last year, when the treaty was under discussion in this House, he admitted that the signature had nothing to do with the attitude of the Senate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend admitted it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my right hon. friend permit me, to-morrow, to quote what he said on that occasion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thank you, I will. Another instance of loss of memory! Let me tell my right hon. friend that the signature on the treaty had nothing to do with the rider which was attached by the Senate afterwards. The Canadian government took the stand that, as this was a purely Canadian affair concerning only Canada and the United States, the treaty should be negotiated and signed by a Canadian minister, and it was so signed. Unfortunately, this was at the end of a session of the United States congress. The treaty was submitted to the Senate of the United States in the dying hours of the session, and that rider, which had nothing to do with the signature, which was for the purpose of changing the wording of the treaty, wording which had been prepared and suggested by the Americans themselves, was not called to the attention of the authorities of the United States. I may tell my right hon. friend that he is mistaken in his prediction. I have the strongest assurance on the strongest authority that the Senate of the United States will not insist on that rider, and that the treaty will be ratified at the present session of Congress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The statement which I made and which the hon. member contradicted was that there was no Halibut treaty. Does he say again that there is a Halibut treaty?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a treaty which waits for the ratification of the American Senate, and I have every confidence that it will be ratified.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There may be, some day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This prediction of my right hon. friend is no more founded than is his prediction about the result of the next election. When my right hon. friend ventures predictions on the next election, in order to be taken seriously, he says as he did in Toronto the other day: "Gentlemen, the next government will be the most unpopular in the history of Canada." It will have to go a long way to beat the record of the National Liberal and Conservative government.

Another statement of facts which I desire to correct, since I was a party to the controversy, is with regard to the cancellation of a contract which was granted to Canadian-Vickers after the election of 1921 for the construction of an ice-breaker for an amount of $1,580,000. My hon. friend said the other day that the amount was about one milliion dollars. It is $1,580,000, and the Mikula which has been purchased by the government has cost, laid down at Quebec in first class repair, a total of $437,115.73. This includes all the repairs which were made after a certificate of Lloyds had been secured. The vessel was delivered to Canada as good as new, and the country has saved over one million dollars, my hon. friend nothwithstanding.

There is another fact which was criticized while my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) was speaking. This is in connection with the famous dry-dock at Victoria. My leader was told that that dry-dock had been started in 1911. Of course, it had nothing to do with the elections! These are the facts. In 1911, an application had been made by a private company, under the name of the Esquimalt Dry-dock and Shipbuilding Company, for the usual subsidy granted for the construction of a dry-dock; but this was abandoned and nothing was done until 1914. Then the government purchased land for constructing a dry-dock at Esquimalt at a cost of $346,221.25. Curiously enough, however, it was demonstrated that this land was not suitable as a site for a dry-dock. It is still there unused; I saw it there last fall. But it was only on the 24th December, 1919, a month or so after the election of my good friend, the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) that an order in council was passed granting authority to expropriate a new site called Skinner's Cove. This new site has cost the country $54,388.03. When this government came into office, a sum of over $1,000,000 had already been expended, and, of course, the construction of the dry-dock had to be continued. I am afraid that is not the only expenditure at Victoria which has left on the country a crushing load. I have in my hand a document concerning the construction of four wooden ships at Victoria. Under an order in council, passed during that same month of December, 1919, Canada agreed to furnish for each vessel a sum of $175,000, the builders having to contribute a sum of $75,000. The country was to have a first mortgage on the vessels, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. I will not, however, discuss this matter except to give the result and to show when there was such extravagance in the administration of the affairs of the country as is described in certain newspapers. The country has paid $644.050.65 for the construction of those four wooden ships. Only one of them has been completed, and it had to be completed by the government itself, the material being sold afterwards. The whole revenue to the government amounts to $32,-063,.60 out of $600,000. The boat was sold for $22,000, the materials for $9,000, and sundries $1,063.60. What is queer about the whole transaction is that my predecessor in the Department of Marine was strongly opposed to the giving of that money for the construction of wooden ships at Victoria. I have a letter written by him to my hon. friend, the then Minister of Finance, and also a letter from him to the Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster, prior to the passing of that order in council. Later on—and this is still more conspicuously strange—I find a letter from him dated April, 1920, which reads:

Dear Dr. TOLMIE,

I have given the matter further consideration regarding the Marine Department's supervising the construction of brigantine sailing ships that are being built largely at public expense at Victoria. You are aware that I was very much opposed to this proposition from the start, and, while I would like very much to oblige you, I really cannot have anything to do with it myself nor allow my department to be connected with it in any way.

Yours faithfully,

C. C. BALLANTYNE.

What does this mean? It means that that government gave $600,000 of the money of the country to a company for the construction of four wooden ships with which the Minister of Marine refused to have anything to do, and refused to allow the supervision of the work in a proper way, and the result is that the country has lost practically all the money that was given. This is an example of the administration which we had prior to December, 1921.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Now, my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) when he was in the city of Quebec delivered an address to the citizens; and after having made many statements to which I have referred, he paid me a compliment,—well, I do not know whether the compliment was to me or to himself. He said that his imperialism and Ernest Lapointe's imperialism were the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never said that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The newspapers said it, then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Forgive me for that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The world changes, and people change with the world. We see the truth of this to-day in the Old Country where people who were branded as disloyal and who were given a very bad reputation not very long ago are now ministers of the Crown in Great Britain. And there is a considerable change in this country. After what was said about myself and those who thought as I did not so long ago, it seems now that there is no difference between my right hon. friend and me. Well the right hon. gentleman should not charge me with elbowing British ambassadors here and there; that is somewhat different. There was a difference also last year. The House will recall that famous telegram which was sent to the British dominions by the former government of Great Britain when a crisis, or what seemed to some people a crisis, threatened in the Near East. This government took the attitude, I think very properly, that we required an explanation and detailed information before sending any answer. We were criticized for that by my right hon. friend. In Toronto he said that the duty of the government should have been to reply, as he himself said, "Ready, aye ready." My right hon. friend nods his head in assent. Perhaps it might interest him to hear what the late Mr. Bonar Law had to say about this matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said in Toronto I said in Quebec. The hon. member has quoted only one small disconnected part of my statement.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend went to Toronto to deliver his famous "Ready, aye ready" declaration, and that is why I mentioned Toronto. Here is what the late Right Hon. Mr. Bonar Law said only a few weeks, I should say a few days, after that message had been despatched:

To throw suddenly, as a bolt from the blue, this appeal for help when not one of the dominions had the remotest idea that there was any need of it, and when it was well known that their help could not come in time to be of any assistance in the crisis, was to risk, in my opinion, one of the greatest assets of this Empire. It was to take a risk with our dominions which no wise man would have taken and which I think was not more foolish than it was wrong.

That appeal, characterized by Mr. Bonar Law as being both foolish and wrong, my right hon. friend would have received with the assurance "Ready, aye ready." I do not hesitate to say that my right hon. friend is not a safe leader when there are war clouds still hanging over nations.

May I say, while on this subject, a word or two about the recent Imperial Conference. I desire to congratulate my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his associates on the work they accomplished there. The Prime Minister acted as a true British statesman, jealous of the rights and the autonomy of his own country, but just as keen an exponent of the rights of the other units of the Empire. I was sorry that my right hon. friend tried to throw some ridicule on the position of my leader at the Imperial Conference. That is not dignified political warfare. The task of my right hon. leader was appreciated differently by those who witnessed his work there, and by an almost, I might say entirely, unanimous British press. I am glad that this last conference vindicated the idea that led to these gatherings, namely, that they are conferences merely and by no means an executive committee. These gatherings are intended to allow various British prime ministers to meet together and confer, exchanging views and communicating opinions, wishing one another well, trying to help one another, but preserving all the time each his own personal individuality. And it should be so; any attempt to transform these conferences into a body with more power would be a step towards destruction.

In view of certain statements which were made by one or two of the delegates to the last conference after the result of the recent British elections, I think it is well that we should express our own views in the matter. They are mistaken who believe that the decision of any such conference is binding, either upon the dominions or upon Great Britain herself The parliament of Canada will never subscribe to this doctrine, and it does not expect the parliament of Great Britain to subscribe to it either. Those decisions are not any more binding when they relate to fiscal matters or imperial preference than when they relate to naval or other policies. It is preposterous to think that the people of Great Britain could be bound to a policy which they might have rejected at the polls by an overwhelming vote. Canadians would resent any contention that an imperial conference might interfere with our mode of raising revenue; and surely we must admit that the people of Great Britain have the same right. May I say also that we are quite able to speak for ourselves in this part of the world, and that I deny the right of any British statesman who comes to this country to go back to Great Britain and presume to represent the feelings of Canada? For instance, I have seen reports of speeches in Great Britain and editorials in British papers describing the sorrow that was manifested everywhere in Canada at the result of the last British elections. I have never seen such sorrow in this country. We are giving Great Britain a preference in our market of our own free will and because it suits us; and, Mr. Speaker, we must not forget that our goods are admitted free into Great Britain while British goods are paying duty in this country. To state that Great Britain does not act fairly with us by refusing to tax the goods of other countries while admitting our own free is sheer nonsense. Certain gentlemen—and they were the leaders of the tariff preference campaign in Great Britain—advocated free trade within the Empire. Now, whatever may be the merits of this policy—and I do not want to give my own opinion on it to-day—I may call to the notice of our manufacturers that they are already objecting, many of them strongly, to the volume of British goods now coming into this country under the preferential tariff. I ask them what would the importations be if we had free trade? All this shows that fiscal autonomy is just as necessary to this country as political autonomy, and that every nation within the Empire must be left free to devise its own fiscal policies according to its needs and the wishes of its people.

My hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) complained that a subject was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne but there was no declaration of policy in regard to it. I refer to the St. Lawrence waterway scheme. Well, there are strong supporters and advocates of this great project, and there are equally strong objectors. Is it not, then, the part of wisdom to see that all the scientific and engineering investigation necessary is made before we commit ourselves to the execution of the project? Even the report of the International Joint Waterways Commission suggested that a further investigation should be made by an enlarged engineering board. Now, to those who are very strongly opposed to this project let me say this: First, no scheme will be entered into at any time as far as I am concerned—and I think it is the policy of the government—until it is clearly shown that the present level of the St. Lawrence river at all points will never be lowered as a result of the works to be carried out; second, that all rights which any of the provinces may possess will be properly safeguarded. It has been stated in the course of this debate that there is strong opposition to the scheme in some parts of the province of Quebec. I admit there is. Perhaps there are misapprehensions which may be cleared up as the result of the investigations to be made. But let me say in this connection that the former government made a mistake, indeed a blunder, when it deprived Quebec of its representation on the International Joint Waterways Board and replaced Mr. Justice Mignault by a gentleman who had been rejected at the polls by the electors of Ontario. Quebec was and is supremely interested in this scheme. I think every hon. member will agree with me that it was a blunder to take away from the board the only representative of the province of Quebec and not replace him by another representative from that province, because the report of such a board, upon which Quebec had no representation, although it is so supremely interested, could not carry with the citizens of the province the weight of confidence which would otherwise have been the case.

My right hon. friend referred to a certain election which took place in the county of Kent, and the part which I am supposed to have taken in that election. My right hon. friend spoke of the terrible bribing policy carried on by the government in that county, and he said I went in a repentant mood and told the electors that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would not go there any more for the enforcement of the fisheries laws. Is that a crime of first magnitude? When I went down to the county I met my genial friend the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) in the city of Moncton, and the first thing I did was to buy a copy of that good Conservative newspaper, the Daily Times, which I found contained a report of a speech delivered the preceding day by my hon. friend himself. Here is what I read:

> It was by Mr. Lapointe's department that the Royal Northwest Mounted Police had been sent into the county of Kent. Never before in history had the armed forces of Canada been used for the enforcement of legislation regarding fisheries or any other regulations. They were only used in criminal matters and in cases where the civil authorities were unable to deal with the situation.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend says, "hear, hear," so he made the statement; I am glad to know it. In the same newspaper I read the following editorial comment—I shall quote only part of it:

> Mr. Lapointe treated the fishermen as outlaws; never before in the history of this province were an honest and hard-toiling body of men subjected to such vexatious, aggravating and ill-advised treatment.

When I was accused of being such a tyrant I investigated the matter and I found that it had been the policy of the Department of Marine and Fisheries since 1920 to use the mounted police for the enforcement of fisheries regulations. That policy was originated by the former government, and I found in the records of the department after the election that one of those who asked for that so-called reform was a leading member of the Conservative party—I think he was its chief organizer in Kent during the recent election campaign. My own opinion is that fisheries regulations can be enforced without the use of soldiers or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and I was pleased to declare that as long as I was Minister of Marine and Fisheries no more mounted police should go into Kent county. I hope that my hon. friend who is now administering the department (Mr. Cardin) will carry on with the promise I made—not a promise, but a statement, and I abide by it. Was there anything wrong in that? Having been charged by the gentlemen who were responsible for that change in the enforcement of the regulations with having committed such a crime, was there anything wrong in saying to them, "I am confident myself that the police are not needed in the enforcement of fisheries regulations, and that they should not be used for that purpose; if the Department of Marine needs such officers or supervisors they should appoint them from the civil population of Canada?"

Mr. HANSON: May I ask the hon. gentleman how it happens that it took him two and a half years to find that that was the policy of this department,—that he never found that out until the eve of the Kent election?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend's arithmetic is as wrong as his statement—with regard to the two and a half years. My hon. friends were in office when that policy was inaugurated.

Now, about those elections in Halifax and Kent, my right hon. friend took the attitude the other day of a triumphant, victorious general. Well I do not see that there is anything in the result for my right hon. friend to write home about. He was not there; he went to the county of Cape Breton North and Victoria. I am told that prior to his visit there we were not too sure of the election, but it came out all right afterwards. Kent and Halifax were carried without my right hon. friend, and his friends from there should have wired him on the night of the election in the terms of that historic phrase, "Brave Crillon, pends-toi, nous avons vaincu sans toi!"

An hon. MEMBER: Translate it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, I am afraid I cannot translate it—"Brave Crillon, hang yourself; we have conquered without you!" But that election was characterized by appeals which do no credit to any of the gentlemen who indulged in them, because they were sectional appeals and appeals to national discussion. Now, I have the newspapers with me; that is the safe way when you make statements with regard to what the newspapers have said. The government was represented as having sold the East to the West, more particularly in the Crowsnest pass agreement. It is remarkable the number of times the country is for sale. We are supposed to have sold the East last year and we are told to-day that we are still selling it to the western farmers. My hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), suggested a reciprocity in that sort of trade when he said that our western friends were selling their birthright for a mess of pottage; so there is sale on both sides.

Mr. MANION: I said Esau sold his.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes; so it is an extraordinary fact that that mercantile wickedness is prevailing everywhere. Well, while these hon. gentlemen were saying in Kent and Halifax that the East was being sold to the West, my right hon. friend, as the newspapers of the time will show, was in Saskatoon and Edmonton singing a love duet with Hon. Robert Rogers on a platform of reconciliation, and both were saying that the government had betrayed the interests of the West, had violated their pledges to the western farmers, and were not carrying out any of the promises made to them. Tory tactics, Tory methods—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad my right hon. friend stands up when I say that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I enjoy the wit of the hon. gentleman as much as his friends do; it is his great asset. What I wanted to say was merely this: I stated as regards betrayal at Edmonton and Saskatoon exactly what I have stated in this House and no more, and I stated in western Canada what I stated in eastern Canada with respect to the Crowsnest pass.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my right hon. friend is satisfied with what he has just said, he does not in the least contradict my statement. It does not matter whether he said it in the House as well as in the West; I am merely concerned with what he said in the West. As I was saying when my right hon. friend stood up, that is Tory tactics, Tory methods, Tory duplicity, Tory appeals to division in this country.

Mr MEIGHEN: Read it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Every one of us feels proud of the part of the country in which he lives and which is dear to him. But, Sir, if Canada is to be a great country, Maritime province rights, western rights, central Canada rights, must be subordinate to the national duty of all Canadians to build up a country undivided and indivisible, the home of a big, united people. To the accomplishment of that task we will endeavour to devote all our energies. It is my earnest hope that there will always be in this country a big party which will be the supreme line of defence, protecting Canada against division and disruption, by trying to meet in a reasonable way the views of Canadians in all sections of the country, and by trying to satisfy so far as is possible what they represent to us as their needs. No Canadian, whether he lives in the West or in the East, should concentrate his vision and mould his opinion as if Canada ended at lake Superior. There are advantages and obstacles in this country, but I hope the former outweigh the latter; indeed, that they are predominant. Of course, they are caused by geographical and economic conditions, and what we should try and do is always to consider the interests of the nation as a whole, and not the interests of an individual or of any set of individuals. We should try, not to build up a city or a district, but to build up a great Canadian nation. If to accomplish that we have to resort to some compromise, if we have to follow some middle course, I contend and believe that that course is a national duty. Any man who tries to align agriculture against industry in this country or industry against agriculture is not doing his duty to this country.

Sir. HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad I have struck a responsive chord in the heart of my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wish you would make a start and keep on in the right direction.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am going to keep on that way to the end of my remarks.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Be consistent that long.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are proud of the progress of industry in this country. It has progressed by leaps and bounds, and I am glad of it. It deserves all encouragement. But we must not forget that agriculture is the basis of our national life. I had the privilege of visiting the western provinces in the course of recent months. If that is a crime, I plead guilty, and I intend to commit it again. I have seen the wonderful crops in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and whatever opinion we may have of the views of the western farmer there is one thing of which we may all be proud, and that is that they produce more food per capita in the western provinces than anywhere else in the world. One cannot but regret that they are not receiving for their work and their investment better returns. Doubtless the conditions prevailing throughout the world are largely responsible for that, and I hope those conditions will remedy themselves in the course of time. I have not much respect for those who answer the farmers or the grain growers when they submit their grievances, that they should change their method of farming. I do not think our manufacturing friends would be satisfied, when they themselves submit the conditions which affect them, if they were answered: Well, devote your time and your energy to some other industry, produce something else.

I do not think my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) was altogether fair yesterday when he suggested to the farmers of the West that the home market was their salvation, and that they should wait until that market is increased. Whatever may be the merits or the demerits of the proposal I am sure that our friends from the West desire to have their remedy in the course of their lifetime at least, if not in this generation, and they did not seem to be inclined to follow my hon. friend into his kingdom of Utopia. I believe that what is needed is that every one in this country whether he lives in the East or the West, whether he grows wheat or works in an industrial concern, should feel that he is receiving from the government of this country an equal measure of justice; I think that everybody will agree with me in that statement. The sense of grievance in the heart or mind of any Canadian is harmful and cannot but work injury. Recriminations and denunciations are of no avail. Nothing can be built on them.

What is imperatively needed in this country is to knit afresh national brotherhood. A great Italian statesman, Mazzini, used to say that young Italy was the polar star of his thoughts. Let a united Canada be the polar star of all our actions, of all our policies. Let it be our one supreme ambition, and let every Canadian devote his time and his energy to accomplishing that end, and to building up a great and prosperous nation.

Mr. ALEXANDRE J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, may I have the temerity to follow such an eloquent speaker as the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)? I wish at the outset, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you upon the honourable position which you occupy in this chamber. Representing as you do a county whose population is largely of French-Acadian descent, and knowing that you are familiar with their customs, the hardships they have had to endure in years long past, and the lack of educational facilities they have had to contend with, I trust that if in this debate, I infringe upon the rules or the procedure of this House you will readily understand that it will be through lack of knowledge, and not through wish or intent. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I had intended to open my remarks in the French language, the language which I cherish, the language which I learnt at my mother's knee, the language of five-sixths of the population of my constituency, but I do not wish to delay this debate and I intend to use the language of the majority, one of the two great languages of this country, and one of the two official languages of this House.

We are told in the Speech from the Throne that:

> National unity, not less than national prosperity, depends upon the surmounting of those barriers which have tended to separate western from eastern Canada, and to discourage permanent settlement upon the land.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are very nice words, but so far as some of the representatives on the other side of the House are concerned, they are really vain words. If you will read the speeches made during this debate by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) and the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Ouimet) you will recognize immediately that these hon. gentlemen are not striving for national unity. What they are seeking to do is to perpetuate the disunion which has prevailed for a number of years past, largely owing to political machinations unworthy of men occupying seats in this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, I belong to the French-Acadian race who established and colonized in 1605 the first village of white people on this northern hemisphere. Our clergy through the Jesuit fathers, were also the first to enunciate pleas in behalf of civilization and christianity in 1611. From the sturdy population of those pioneer days sprang men such as Mr. Amand Landry who when called upon to sacrifice his principles in 1857, spoke as follows in the legislative assembly at Fredericton—and I may explain that he was the father of Sir. Pierre A. Landry, who occupied a seat in this House and was afterwards elevated to the bench of New Brunswick:

> My forefathers preferred the spoliation of their property and exile rather than taking the oath of allegiance which they held in abhorrence. I would be unworthy of them if I should accept this money to betray my political party. I would be dishonoured by such an action. I want to hand down to my children and to my fellow countrymen a name unblemished and revered. I very strongly decline your offer. Give back that money to those who have sent you to me, and tell them that although the Frenchman, as I am called here, may be poor, there is not enough gold in the world to corrupt him.

Sir, I am pleased indeed to follow the principles of the great Liberal-Conservative party laid down by such men as the late Sir. John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier as the principles upon which this great Dominion could be built up and best fulfil its destiny.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it true that my hon. friend ran as a farmer candidate in New Brunswick in 1921?

Mr. HANSON: It is not true.

Mr. DOUCET: Being a new member, Mr. Speaker, I would crave the indulgence of hon. members opposite. I am not averse to cross-examination but I should like to say this—if my hon. friends will only be patient and wait a little while they will lose nothing by it. As to my position and candidature in 1921 I shall make that plain when the proper time comes. I wish to say that, while I belong to the French-Acadian race and profess the same creed as the hon. members for Rimouski and Vaudreuil-Soulanges, I follow proudly, as I have already said, the principles laid down by Macdonald and Cartier. It was the latter, I believe, who said that the last gun fired in the Dominion for the defence of British institutions would be fired by a French-Canadian. Let me say that the first gun to be fired—and God forbid that the day should ever come when such action will be necessary—in defence of the French language and the Catholic faith in this Dominion will be fired by a French Acadian.

We have heard something of by-elections in this country, and the last speaker referred to the by-election in Kent county, New Brunswick. Of course all hon. members know there was an election in that county.

Mr. HANSON: The Minister of Justice knows it.

Mr. DOUCET: Yes, he undoubtedly does. The Prime Minister when he spoke in this debate said there had been thirty-four by-elections since the government had succeeded to office and that the government had only lost two. That is not a great deviation from the truth, and yet when you closely analyse exactly what happened during the last two years you will find that out of the thirty-four by-elections, twenty have reference to gentlemen appointed to offices of emolument who went back to their constituents for re-election. It would be unnatural to suppose, under the circumstances that those men should not secure re-election, especially when we remember that their constituencies in 1920 and 1921 had voted Liberal by majorities running all the way from 2,000 to 7,000. Since that time there have been several by-elections, including one to which the Minister of Justice referred, Cape Breton North and Victoria. The minister said the right hon. leader of the opposition had been in that county. He did visit the constituency, but, whatever the result of the election is attributable to, the Liberal majority of 3,339 in 1921 was cut down to a minority in the recent contest. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kelly) who now sits for that constituency does not represent a majority of the voters in the riding. There was also a by-election in North Essex when the Liberal majority of 7,195 was cut down to 1,027. Again, a by-election in Halifax, caused by the death of the late lamented Dr. Blackadar resulted in the Liberal majority dropping from 5,141 to 3,872. May I also tell the House that there was a by-election in Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan. The former member, who had been elected in 1921 by a majority of 929 was unseated. In the by-election the Progressive candidate was returned by a majority of 1,598, an increase of 669 over the result in the general election. At that by-election the Liberal candidate, Mr. Knowles, well-known to hon. members of the House, was defeated.

5 p.m.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Where was the Tory candidate?

Mr. DOUCET: In the same place where the Liberal was when my right hon. leader was elected in Grenville. The elevation of Mr. Maclean to the bench necessitated another by-election in Halifax, and the Liberal majority of 4,876 in 1921 was converted into a Conservative majority of 1,934. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has just vacated his seat. I suppose he would not like to hear the result in Kent county. The Liberal majority of 1,523 in 1921 was converted into a Conservative majority of 208.

Reference has been made to the campaign carried on in Kent county. I am not here this afternoon as spokesman for the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter), or for the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). They, as I know and as all other hon. members know, are quite able to answer for themselves. I am here, however, to explain some of the reasons why there was a change in the public opinion of Kent county, and also, inasmuch as the accusations come from the right side of the House, to lay bare some of the scandals that were committed in Kent county in order to bribe the electorate. In doing this, may I say something which also refers to the national unity which we are so anxious to preserve? I quote from reports of a meeting held at Richibucto on the 18th December when—

> Mr. Theriault, of Acadian descent himself, said that he brought them a message from the province of Quebec to vote against Meighen, because, he explained, in the opinion of Quebec and other provinces, Mr. Meighen was the representative of all that was "Bosche" in Canada.

That was one gem. Further down, he said:

> It had been Mr. Meighen who had protested against a clause in the conscription law against seminary students being exempt.

My right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) can well reply for himself, and he will no doubt avail himself of the opportunity of doing so; but may I say, for my part, that never could I find written or spoken words coming from my right hon. leader in connection with the exemption of seminary students.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There never was one.

[Mr. Doucet.]

Mr. DOUCET: I come to some of the utterances that were made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin)—and I am glad he is in his seat:

> Dealing with the War-time Elections Act Mr. Cardin drew a word-picture of agents of the government rushing to France to seek the soldiers in the trenches to get their votes. According to him, these agents did their work while bullets were screaming and soldiers died. They were like vultures. . .

You have heard that word before, have you not? It was whispered by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) to an hon. member on my left who was speaking the other night.

> They were like vultures, seeking votes among the little wooden crosses. Perhaps the vote they extracted from the poor soldier was the last act that poor soldier had performed in this life, perhaps, too, the little ballot paper was even stained with blood, but that mattered not to Mr. Meighen and his friends, who hurried back with the blood-stained papers to elect thereby candidates of their choice and keep themselves in power for the benefit and profit of their friends.

Mr. GAUVREAU: That is good stuff from Quebec.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is my hon. friend quoting from a Tory paper?

Mr. DOUCET: I am quoting from the Montreal Gazette, a stenographic report, and if my hon. friends question this report, they will have an opportunity of denying it.

Mr. BOYS: Let them do that now.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Nothing to deny. It is a true picture of what you did.

Mr. DOUCET: Need I quote any more of those nefarious scandals that were committed in that county for the purpose of winning votes in that by-election? In his address the other evening, the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that the Kent county election had been won on local issues, and that we had not used any solid or valid arguments against the administration. I might say that, apart from the racial and religious cries used by some of my hon. friends opposite, a certain number of promises were made for the purpose of catching votes in Kent county. One promise was, and it was somewhat explained this afternoon by the Minister of Justice:

> Hon. Mr. Lapointe was in a better humour and after telling a few stories launched out into an address of about an hour. The Minister of Marine also had a promise up his sleeve and this he lost no time in bringing to light. Never again as long as he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he declared solemnly, would there be a single Royal Canadian mounted policeman sent into Kent to enforce fishery regulations. Just why he did not think of this action until the by-election was getting warm, the minister forgot to tell his audience.

During that famous by-election campaign, Santa Claus visited the county. Strange to say, this honourable and much talked of personage, who generally appears on the scene about the 24th of December, appeared in Kent county this year on the 11th or 12th December. He was very lavish in his promises, and every one of the company accompanying this personage had a different pledge or promise to make to the electorate of Kent should they vote for Mr. Bourgeois. I said that the Minister of Marine had promised that no more Royal Canadian mounted policemen would be used in Kent county. I may say that the premier of the province promised hydro development. But it remained for the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) to make what I would term the most liberal promise of the whole procedure. He was at the time talking about railways and he said:

You cannot build a railway of even seventeen or eighteen miles all at once and until we get the money voted, and we attempted last session to get the approval of parliament to build some branch lines in other parts of the country, but the bill was defeated.

And of course, wherever these gentlemen spoke, they told the people how the bill came to be defeated; they did not hesitate to say that it was the Conservatives in the Senate who had refused to sanction the passing of it. Had they been fair they might have added that in referring to the bill Senator Beique, of Quebec, one of the ablest members on the government side, strongly opposed it in these terms:

I hope parliament is not committed to the board of directors of the National Railways to such an extent that it will vote blindly any amounts that are asked for building railways. They may be given a reasonably free hand, but surely parliament is entitled to know whether the demands made and the expenditures suggested are warranted.

When the bill was voted upon there were ten in favour of it, and amongst those who strongly opposed it were six Liberal senators from the province of Quebec.

Mr. BOYS: They did not tell them that.

Mr. DOUCET: No, it would not have been politic. But the following statement is attributed to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at that time Minister of Marine and Fisheries:

The Minister of Marine expressed himself as very confident regarding the election of the Liberal candidate. The outlook is very bright, he said, and there seems to be little doubt but that the people of Kent county will show their confidence in the King administration.

Poor people!

They will avail themselves of the opportunity of being represented by a man who will have access to the members of the Cabinet—

Note the word.

—as a member of the opposition could not hope to do.

Mr. MANION: Who said that?

Mr. DOUCET: The present Minister of Justice. I ask every fair-minded gentleman in this House whether the fact that a constituency returns to parliament a candidate who happens to be a member of the opposition should be a sufficient justification for a cabinet minister refusing to be interviewed. Now, I want to quote from the Regina Leader of December 17. The Leader I understand is an important newspaper that advocates the same policies as my hon. friends opposite. Dealing with these promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite and by Mr. Veniot this paper says editorially that the government has no right to barter public moneys for party support.

—which is what Hon. Mr. Copp seems to have attempted in the present campaign.

The paper has no hesitation in saying that the government candidate should be defeated at the polls and has no intention of condoning this conduct on the part of the present government as the practice is absolutely indefensible. Then referring to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Cardin) at Buctouche it says that the hon. gentleman appeals for unity between the French Canadians and the Acadians —to secure the realization of legitimate aspirations. The doctrines of the Liberal party were always the same in all the provinces in 1911, 1917 and 1921. He stated, "Premier King deserved credit for being a candidate in North York in 1917, while Doucet's friends had sent soldiers into his riding to create trouble at his meetings."

I have quoted from a Liberal newspaper; let me read somethihg else from the press. The following is a press despatch:

Never again as long as he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he declared solemnly, would there be a single Royal Canadian Mounted policeman sent into Kent to enforce fishery regulations.

Never in all the political history of Kent county was there such an open and unblushing attempt to blind eyes of the electorate to the sins of the government of the day by means of promises. The extension of the Moncton and Buctouche branch of the Canadian National railways to Richibucto, a bait that has been dangled before the eyes of Kent County electors by Grit politicians time after time, only to be thrown in the discard just as soon as the votes were counted, was again trotted out as an undertaking that would be carried to completion provided the government candidate was returned on the 20th.

I have here a copy of a letter sent by a friend of mine in Kent county to a Liberal friend outside the county. In it he says:

The county is plastered with Liberal orators, submerged in Liberal rum, and polluted with Liberal money. They are scared blue and they are resorting to all the tactics known to civilization, heathenism, idolatry and low-down "Injun" cunning in order to win. You never saw such a desperate lot of desparadoes in your life.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: The letter which my hon. friend is quoting seems to me to be compromising. I think it should be placed on record and the name of the writer disclosed.

Mr. DOUCET: Would the hon. gentleman recognize the writing if he saw it?

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Will the hon. member disclose the name of the writer?

Mr. DOUCET: Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of all these things—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will the hon. member allow me a question?

An hon. MEMBER: One at a time.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will the hon. member not give the name of the writer?

Mr. DOUCET: If the hon. gentleman wants a decisive answer, I say, no, inasmuch as I have not had the permission of the writer to divulge his name in this House.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I rise to a point of order. It is a rule of the House that an hon. member may not read a letter without giving the name of the writer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I never heard such a rule even suggested in parliament before. What the hon. member evidently has in mind is that if a Minister of the Crown reads from a public document he must put the whole document on the table; the rule does not apply to a private member at all.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Then we have the right to say that the letter is not true at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The rest of it is worse.

Mr. GAUVREAU: If you are ashamed to give the name the letter must be untrue.

Mr. STEVENS. It is uncomfortable, but—

Mr. LOGAN: An anonymous letter is a bad start.

Mr. DOUCET: Mr. Speaker, when I started to describe the means adopted by the government party to win the by-election in Kent county I did not think I would stir up such a hornet's nest. But I have here something entitled A Vicious Doctrine. It says:

Mr. Black's selection is a notice to the administration that Halifax does not approve of the heavy expenditures in public works the King government is making there, and has planned to make in the future.

I ask all fair-minded men in the House and in the country at large whether any constituency is to be punished and deprived of reasonable and necessary public works simply because of the fact that it could not see eye to eye with the Liberal candidate? But I have some further comment upon the Kent county by-election. I am quoting from the Moncton Transcript, published in the constituency of the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp), and of course the organ of the Liberal party:

But Kent county has exercised its right in choosing the representative it prefers, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Doucet will secure for the constituency all that Mr. Bourgeois could have secured. One cannot see how that is to be expected, for in a sense he is pledged to oppose anything the government may want to do for Kent.

Well, Sir, let me state here and now that if the government is prepared to include in the estimates or in the supplementaries any votes that would be beneficial to the interest of Kent county, be it the acquisition of the Kent Northern railway or the much-talked-of extension of the Monction and Buctouche railway from Buctouche to Richibucto. I, as the humble representative of Kent county will not be in a position to vote against such expenditure.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear. Safety first.

Mr. COPP: You approve of the building of that road?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DOUCET: Mr. Speaker, while to a certain degree I am annoyed, I am not surprised at the attitude taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, because I am free to admit that the Kent county by-election must have been such a fatal blow to their hopes that they can only regard it as the sinister forerunner of what is to happen to the Liberal party when it next appeals to the country.

Before laying before the House the issues upon which we conducted the campaign in Kent county, I have a few precious gems, selected from campaign speeches made by the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King), the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) and the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) in the election of 1921. First I quote from The Transcript—certainly an organ which was not prejudiced against my friend the Secretary of State—its report of a speech made by him at that time in these words:

He pronounced his policy in regard to the railway situation as to be strongly in favour of retaining the I.C.R. at its old status.

The electors of Kent county were asked by the Secretary of State and others to support the Liberal administration because they had fulfilled their promises. Have they fulfilled their promise in connection with the Intercolonial railway, when it is true that the Hanna board in 1921 had given a public decision that they would include in the Atlantic region the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and all branches east of Montreal, including the Grand Trunk line to Portland? They took charge of the administration of affairs, and the Intercolonial railway was cut off at Rivière du Loup, and the Transcontinental at Monk, so the eastern section of the railway system is about one-tenth of the whole mileage.

In The Transcript of October 14, 1921, the Secretary of State is reported as follows:

> Mr. Copp expressed his policy as being to take the I.C.R. out of the hands of the Toronto people who are using it for their own gain, and hand it back to the people of the Maritime provinces for whom it was built; and, furthermore, to bring back the many people who were forced to leave their homes here and go to Toronto.

You would imagine, Mr. Speaker, from the declarations on the other side condemning the stirring up of sectional prejudice that our hon. friend would never have been guilty of making such an appeal. He did, however, in 1921, in spite of the fact that Mr. D. B. Hanna at that time said:

> There had not been one man taken from Moncton, but that because of his competency he had been promoted to a larger sphere; and the same thing was happening in Winnipeg. In the management of a large system there had to be a consolidation of accounts, and everyone knows there has to be a central place where the accounts can be gathered. Not one man on the board of directors wished or desired to disturb anyone, but the exigencies of the situation compelled such an action.

Now, at that time Mr. Hanna explained to the country, and to those who had been more or less opposed to him because of the fact that men had been removed from Moncton to Toronto, that in each and every case promotion had taken place. In the spring of 1923 a large number of men were removed from the constituency represented by the Secretary of State and were transferred to the city of Montreal. I have no fault to find with any administration of the railways that would transfer men for the purpose of bettering the efficiency of the system; but I do complain that men who in 1923 were transferred from the offices in Moncton to Montreal, and were receiving $135 per month, were, within a few weeks later, forced to see their salaries diminished to $98 per month. I have yet to hear any public pronouncement from the Secretary of State in disapproval of such reductions. May I be permitted to refer to some of the issues that were raised in Kent? I defy any member on the opposite side to quote anything to show that I personally—and Sir, I can only speak for myself, because I carried on the campaign alone—

Mr. MICHAUD: Where was the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson)?

Mr. DOUCET: When the hon. member for York-Sunbury spoke, I did not accompany him, therefore I did not hear what he said. If he said anything that my hon. friends opposite object to, he will have a chance to express his opinion on that in the House. I wish hon. members to take note of the reasons why public sentiment in the county of Kent expressed itself on the 20th of December last in opposition to the present administration. In doing this I believe I am rendering a service to my county, and at the same time, if they are wise enough to give heed to it, I may be rendering a service also to the present government.

We had in mind the subject of immigration, in the first place, and regret was expressed at the extent of the exodus of our people to the country to the south of us. We spoke of increased taxation, of increased remuneration to men in high places, and of the policy announced at that time, and since put into effect, of reducing the expenditure on the civil service by turning out in the cold men in the lower positions while retaining at high salaries those in the upper places. We spoke also of the royal commissions, seven of which, I believe, were operating at that time. I need not dwell very long upon that; hon. members must have seen some of their reports. I venture to say, however, that the majority of these reports will not be read by anyone but by the man who is paid to read them. As a well-known eastern paper said, the whole sum and substance of these reports would be worth much less than thirty cents.

We dealt also with the question of railway rates; there is some dissatisfaction in connection with the present state of affairs in matters of transportation. We also made reference to the lack of markets; to the sending of Canadian goods through Canadian ports; and, last but not least, to the development of interprovincial trade. I should like, in the limited time available, to discuss these various questions, but I have not an opportunity of doing so now, I may have occasion later in the session, to place my position on these matters fairly before the House.

I have told you, Mr. Speaker, of the great number of men bearing gifts who were in Kent county during the by-election campaign, but notwithstanding all these offers of gifts, the county could not be bought. I have here another gem which I think I should read to the House, dealing with the necessity to beware of the man bringing gifts. It reads:

The good and kindly Veniot
With his promises so calming
To save his Liberal party
From a premature embalming.

Oh, Mr. Copp, Oh, Mr. Copp,
The railway will extend,
Judicially he ever is
Copp's and the people's friend.

It's sad and sorry work,
To keep the ship afloat.
But Copp will get no judgeship
If Doucette "Copps" the vote.

Arthur comes in hot haste
At the voice of King, his master,
To prevent a repetition
Of that Halifax Disaster.

If these big guns be air guns
To avert impending wreck,
They bring a long range cannon
To belch from Old Quebec.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the electors of Kent county were afraid of men bearing gifts. As the Trojans said of old, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes,"—I fear the Liberals even bringing gifts.

May I make some reference to the rewards given to those who took part in the Kent county campaign? In this instance, as you must know, failure rather than merit was being rewarded. First, we have the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe), promoted to the position of Minister of Justice. Then we have the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) promoted to the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I want to say frankly, that as there had to be a Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and as, so far, the present party has to remain in power, I am glad to see my hon. friend in a ministerial seat. Even though he was not successful, he certainly deserves a reward for the great amount of energy he displayed in that campaign. Then we have a third man who took part in the campaign, Mr. Arthur T. Leblanc, of Campbellton. He was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick.

Mr. MICHAUD: Does my hon. friend mean that Mr. Leblanc is not qualified for the position of Judge of the Supreme Court, or that he was disqualified because he went into Kent county?

Mr. DOUCET: I did not say anything of the kind, but I will say that he was as well qualified as any other prospective candidate for the judgeship.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: The hon. gentleman to your immediate right did not think so.

Mr. DOUCET: The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) can speak for himself, and it is not necessary—that I should take up the time of the House in answering for the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). There are others who took part in the Kent county by-election campaign who have not yet been rewarded. In this connection I wish to remind the House that the hon. member for Restigouche and Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) has not been rewarded. Why? Was it because he was the only one of the whole delegation who talked politics and did not raise the racial issue? I submit to my genial friend that his reward is due, and it is the vacant senatorship for the province of New Brunswick. There are two other gentlemen, one from Kincardine, Ontario, and the other from Fredericton, N.B. who also need rewards, and on their behalf I would suggest that the leader of the government ask his cabinet to create a new royal commission entitled "How did it happen in Kent?"

In order to reward all those who took part, Mr. Speaker, and there were twenty-two, I believe, you would have to create a new royal commission, and that would be for the purpose of creating national unity between the two great races of this Dominion, and to that commission I would suggest that Mr. Theriault, local member for the county of L'Islet, the member for Rimouski and the member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges be appointed. They would possibly be able to determine what is requisite, and the proper means to adopt, in order to bring about national unity in this country. Their utterances are testimony to that.

An hon. member of this House asked me a moment ago if I had forgotten that I was a Farmer's candidate in 1921. In 1921 the humble member for Kent was not a Farmer's candidate; he was not a Progressive candidate. In order to show where I stood on that occasion I am going to weary the House by placing on Hansard for the edification of those who seem to glory in the fact that possibly the member for Kent was a Progressive candidate, in 1921, my platform. It is as follows:

(1) We believe in friendly relations and the teaching of mutual respect between the two great races which compose this Dominion.

(2) In the matter of tariff, we favor protection for our industries, in order to give our farmers, fishermen and lumbermen a home market.

(3) We believe that the farming and labour elements of this country are not sufficiently represented in the different governments of our Dominion, and that better consideration should be given to the agricultural and industrial problems of the country.

(4) We regret that our federal ministers of late years have not been sufficiently in touch with the different sections of the country, particularly the Maritime provinces, and we assert that this is the only way to obtain responsible government.

(5) We believe that the Department of Trade and Commerce should get into more intimate contact with the public in the way of pointing out and assisting in finding markets for the people.

(6) We maintain that our representatives in Parliament should be free to support, without detriment to Canada, the party which would consider and solve the various Maritime provinces' problems, such as transportation, markets, unemployment, and the greater developments of our national resources and possibilities and in this respect we advocate:

(a) The establishment of abattoirs and cold storage systems at central points in the Maritime provinces.

(b) The establishment of an experimental farm in one of the north shore counties, with equal facilities for the French and English.

(c) That Canadian trade be directed through Canadian ports and channels.

(d) The appointment of a commissioner to make a complete study of West Indian and South American markets, and bring about the interchange of our northern products with those of the tropics, as this is the natural market for the surplus of our products of the farm, of the fisheries and of our forests.

(e) The freeing of the Intercolonial Railway from the commission control and its restoration to Government administration in keeping with the pact of confederation.

(f) The building of connecting links as feeders to railway main lines, thereby developing the agricultural, fisheries and the lumber industries of Canada, and particularly of the Maritime provinces.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that that is the platform upon which I stood in the last election, and I have no hesitation in stating that I believe my right hon. leader would subscribe to the essential part of that platform, which would be for the great advantage of this Dominion.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DOUCET: In connection with the charges made against us on the ground of sectional appeals during that campaign, of which I was speaking, let me quote a statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada at a public meeting held at Moncton in 1921, when he asked for the support of the electorate of the Maritime provinces on the following ground:

Mr. Mackenzie King said he deplored the fact that through not following the Laurier policy the result was that Canadian made goods were being exported to foreign ports and imports being brought in through foreign ports. The remedy to this condition of affairs was the return to Liberalism so that the Laurier policy might be furthered.

In view, Sir, of the claim that the Maritime provinces were not getting their just rights let me make a point clear to the House. The rights of the Maritime provinces have been talked about, and statements with respect of them have been published in the press, nevertheless, I maintain there is no such thing as Maritime province rights, the rights that have been ignored and the conditions that exist in the Maritime provinces are not merely a matter of concern for the Maritime provinces, they are really of Dominion wide importance. Let me quote here, Sir, a statement copied from the Telegraph, St. John, which is not by any means favourable to the opposition party in this House. This paper states that during the months of November and December, 1923, and of January, 1924, there was a wheat export through Portland, Maine, of 6,831,294 bushels compared with an export in the same three months of 454,168 bushels through the port of St. John, whereas not one solitary grain went through the port of Halifax. At the same time the Canadian Pacific Railway had shipped through the Canadian port of St. John 6,496,460 bushels of wheat. Hence it is that the clamour for provincial rights, or the sectional appeals of which we hear so much, come from the chief organs of the party of my hon. friends opposite.

I have here, Sir, a copy of the Moncton Transcript of 2nd April, 1923, when there was no probability of a by-election in the Maritime provinces. This is what the editor of the Transcript, the official organ of the Liberal party in that section of New Brunswick and a great supporter of the Secretary of State, said, quoting the figures of the President of the Canadian National Railways as to the increased revenue:

The public will not fail to note that according to Mr. Graham, the return of the Crowsnest grain rates cost the Canadian National $6,500,000 in revenue last year. That is to say, if these extra earnings had been available the operating surplus on the whole of the system would have been $10,600,000 instead of $4,100,000. In short the West was relieved to the extent of $6,500,000 which the rest of the country made up in the form of increased taxes.

Now, we say, Sir, that if that quotation is correct, and I believe it is correct, we were perfectly justified in saying in the Kent by-election that we could not, and we would not, permit the leader of this government to sacrifice the rights of any party in order to satisfy the Progressive party in this House.

Mr. FORKE: Very affectionate.

Mr. DOUCET: If affectionate we must be, let us be affectionate to all parts of the country. I find that the rate on Nova Scotia coal from Montreal to Hamilton, a distance of 372 miles, is $3 per ton, while the rate on United States coal from Detroit to Montreal, 563 miles, is only $2.90 per ton, or 10 cents less for 190 miles greater distance. I ask my

hon. friends who represent the constituencies of Cumberland and Pictou, and both ridings in Cape Breton, do they not believe with me that the coal industry of the Maritime provinces is not getting a fair deal at the hands of the railway board, but that United States bituminous coal receives certain concessions that we in the Maritime provinces do not enjoy?

It will be noted also that the rate of fish—and these statements were made before the Railway Commission which met at Halifax a short time ago; and mark you, the express companies to-day are before the Railway Commission and they are part and parcel of the Canadian National Railways—from Prince Rupert to Winnipeg, a distance of 1,758 miles, is $3.59 per 100 pounds, while the rate from Halifax to Winnipeg, a distance of 1,923 miles is $10.60 for the same weight. I wish to refer this item to the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) and to ask him to agree with me that the fishing industry of the Maritime provinces is not getting a fair deal.

Mr. DUFF: How long have these rates on fish been in existence? Were they not in existence quite a number of years before this government came into power?

Mr. DOUCET: I am not in a position to tell my hon. friend how long these rates have been in existence. But inasmuch as he himself admits that they are in existence to-day, I say that, for the proper development of our fishing industry and of all other industries of the Maritime provinces, we come here not as whiners or beggars, but demanding our just rights. I am reminded that just before six o'clock I had laid bare before this House the campaign in which I ran as an independent candidate at the last election in 1921. During the recess my friends asked me what reasons I had for abandoning the independent idea this year in the by-election. After the Liberal government came into power and after having reviewed their record of administration in this country, it did not take me long as it would not have taken any man with an ordinary amount of intelligence long, to come to the conclusion that the campaign of 1921 was a campaign of camouflage and a wholesale carnival of mendacity.

Mr. WARD: I would like to ask if the Conservative government, prior to 1921 was satisfactory to the hon. member in his campaign.

Mr. DOUCET: I had really believed, and I had been told that, a new member speaking in this House would not be subjected to interruptions. Of course, if interruptions have to come, they will delay me a little longer than I expected. I really intended to close my remarks before six o'clock; but I was unable to do so on account of numerous interruptions which came from the official benches. I admit they were somewhat uneasy over those recent events in the Maritime provinces which were laid bare to-day in this House and which it was right that the whole country should know. We in the Maritime provinces are not beggars; but we contend that the government is committed, because in 1903 the act creating the National Transcontinental railway explicitly stated that all unrouted traffic should be routed through Canadian ports and entirely on Canadian territory, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports. I trust my hon. friend across the floor who interrupted me a minute ago will admit that that was passed in 1903, and by the self-same party which to-day has the reins of power. In the act of 1911, respecting the construction of the Canadian Northern railway, we find identically the same thing, and in 1911, the same party was in power. In 1914, in the act respecting the Canadian Northern railway system paragraph (a) of section 6 explicitly says the same thing. Therefore, the government of this country, having acquired those great railway systems, are to my mind and, I believe, in the mind of every other hon. member in this House, committed to carrying out to the letter the provisions of those statutes. We say, further, that for the development of an interprovincial trade between the Maritime provinces, central Canada and western Canada, preference should be given to the exportation of Canadian goods through Canadian ports, Atlantic ports as well as Pacific ports, and that concessions should be given to the transportation of our coal into central Canada for the purpose of developing an interprovincial trade, which would increase production, diminish the cost of production inasmuch as it would diminish overhead charges, keep our surplus population at home, prevent the terrible exodus of our population to the country to the south of us and stimulate our local industries. I have not time this evening to develop that question, but I hope to be able to do so in this House before very long. All this would be conducive to the greater good of this Dominion.

I wish to ask the pardon of the House for having spoken so long. I know it is not customary for a new member to do so, and I have possibly outstayed my welcome. This afternoon, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), while addressing the House, seemed to find it strange that my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) should go into the province of Quebec, visit some of the clergy, some of the schools and some of the convents. I see nothing whatsoever reprehensible in that. I am not going to speak for him, all hon. members know that he can speak for himself at all times; but he has been, I believe, falsely charged, and in the same boat with him, during the events that caused so much comment upon the attitude of my hon. friend at that time, were men who had left the great old chieftain on this side of the House, crossed to the other side of the government benches and supported every measure that was placed before the House. Shortly after the great D. D. McKenzie assumed the leadership of the Liberal party in this House, he said that the latch-string was in the door, the light was in the window to welcome them across. What are the facts? I need not mention the names here, but quite a number went back. They were rewarded; some are still on the government benches, and there was just as much rejoicing over one sinner who had repented as over ninety-nine who had never sinned. Taking the whole matter into consideration, as it must be considered and looking for the greater prosperity of this Dominion of ours, vast in area, rich in natural resources, composed of the great races who have pioneered this country, I ask you, are we not above these petty things of politics? Why should we make mountains out of molehills? Are we not big enough and broad enough to cast aside these petty canvasses that are made for men to be elected upon? My sincere appeal to my compatriots who sit on the other side of the House is that in future they discard these passionate appeals on the grounds of race and religion. I can safely say that there have been no such appeals on the part of members of this party. The old Liberal-Conservative party of Macdonald and Cartier was great enough to admit within its ranks the representatives of all creeds and races, and I believe that the Liberal-Conservative party of to-day is still great enough to do the same thing. I ask therefore, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen try to be superior to politics of this character and that, when they appeal to the country in the future, they do so purely on the merits of their policies and not from the point of view of racial or religious prejudice.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be those of congratulation to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Doucet) who has just taken his seat, our new member from the county of Kent. He has shown a mastery of a language not his own and an entire absence of nervousness which I am sure must have delighted not only his applauding friends but all those who welcome him as a member of this House. I cannot attempt to make many observations concerning the subject matter on which he has favoured the House to-night. One would have to be a native of the province of New Brunswick, nay, I should judge, of the northern part of that province to be able to deal adequately with the situation as portrayed by him. But I should say that his speech was placed on a level which appealed strongly to his companions in arms in this House, and their delight at his eloquence, their transports of joy at the recounting of the victory which has been won, reminds us of those words of Shakespeare, if I may give a certain turn to them: "Now is the winter of our discontent made glorious summer by this victory of Kent." But listening to the attack he made because appeals to special interests were alleged to have been made in this campaign—and as a lawyer I should judge that it would not be well to take at one hundred per cent the allegations that have been made in this matter—for I am afraid that the witness was not altogether disinterested—I had in my ear the echoes of a by-election in which I took part, I think in the year 1919, in the old city of St. John in the same province. I remember how, from that corner of the House, the same sort of appeals were made at that time. Were the people of St. John told to think first of all of the Dominion? No. Were they told to think first of all of their province? No. Were they told to think first of all of their city? No. First of all was their port, the port of St. John; secondly, the city of St. John; thirdly, the province of New Brunswick; and after that if they had any public interest left, they might think of the Dominion of Canada. Under the circumstances I would commend those people who now display such ferocious virtue to see that they mend their own manners before they criticize the manners of others.

I purpose to-night addressing myself to a consideration of some of the protectionist arguments advanced, I am sorry to say, from both sides of the House; but before doing so I have a more pleasing task to perform, which for the moment I had forgotten. Let me say how the members of this House who love liberty, who love humanity, who love a forward looking position, have all enjoyed the delightful treat given to the House by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon. It has been like a spring of fresh water in a dry and thirsty land where no water is. Would that we heard his voice more often in this House. And though I come of Lowland Scottish and not of Highland Scottish blood, may I claim the right of the Highlander to second sight, and say that I believe from henceforth we shall hear his voice more often in this Chamber.

Now let me take up the figures placed before the House by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Meighen),—I might say, the fears and figures of the right hon. gentleman. The first fear which he imparted to us a few days ago was that created in his heart by the increased exports of wood and paper from Canada, from $213,000,000 to $267,000,000 from the year 1922 to the year 1923. This increase of $54,000,000, which some might regard as an evidence of prosperity among the Canadian people, an evidence of our growth in international trade, is viewed with alarm by the leader of the official opposition. He says that we are in the position of a man who is selling off or disposing of his capital. These forests which are being cut, he says, cannot be renewed for generations. Now, the trouble with a fine speaker—and the leader of the opposition is not free from this frailty—is the fault of exaggerating. A generation is thirty years, and it does not take several generations for a tree to grow in a forest if proper forestry methods are followed. Our lumber resources are a crop which can be harvested every twenty or thirty years, and the export of our forest resources is not the enemy of our forests; the enemies of the forests are fire and insects. The other day the Premier of Quebec made a statement in reference to this matter,—he should know something about the wood business because the province of Quebec is one of the greatest proprietors of wood in the world,—and he said that fire destroyed eighteen times as much wood as the axe did, and that insect pests were responsible for more of the destruction of our forests than the acts of man.

Then the next fear was, not that we were selling, but that we were buying too much. We were buying too much of agricultural products from the United States. We sold to that country $49,000,000; we bought, $79,000,000. I always like to look more closely into figures than merely to take them at first glance. How is this $79,000,000 made up? Fruits are the first item. I have prepared, and I am going to ask permission to place it on Hansard and so save the time of the House, a statement of what composed these imported fruits which, in 1923, amounted to just about $24,000,000:

Total Fruits from Tropics	$18,287,923

Proportion of tropial fruit imported, 76.44 per cent.

Three-quarters of these fruits were tropical. Now, unwise as, in my opinion, is the protectionist mind, I do not think our friends propose to assert in this House that bananas, oranges, lemons and pineapples should be grown in Canada under glass! Of course, a protectionist argument can be made for their growth under glass—because of the demand it would create for glass; because of the demand it would create for coal; because of the demand it would create for labour: because of these demands a very good protectionist argument can be made for growing bananas, oranges, lemons and pineapples under glass in this country. But I give credit to my friends that they do not propose such an extreme protectionist project, and therefore I simply point out that of this $24,000,000 worth of fruit which was imported, $18,287,922 represented the value of tropical fruits which could not be grown in Canada.

The next item is grain, $10,860,000. This represents soft wheat to be mixed with our harder wheat by our millers; also corn. Corn used to be taxed, but when the Liberals came into power in 1896 they put Indian corn on the free list for the benefit of our cattle-raisers. Then we have gums and resins to the value $2,000,000. These compose the basic materials for our shellac makers and for other uses in the arts. Next we have vegetable oils, $6,750,000, these being the basis of many of the soaps that are made in Canada. Crude rubber and tires account for $5,500,000; seeds, for $2,000,000; raw sugar, for $4,750,000; fresh vegetables, for $3,500,000. Now, with the exception of fresh vegetables there is hardly a thing there which any wise man would say should be kept out of Canada, because practically every one of them is the raw material of some Canadian industry.

The next fear is that we are selling too much again—for there is an impartiality about the fears of my right hon. and learned friend; first he fears we are selling too much, then he fears we are buying too much, and then he fears again that we are selling too much. Now he fears we are selling too many minerals in their raw state. He says:

> But let us remember our duty is to see that these resources vouchsafed to us are to the utmost developed within the land that is our own, and to a minimum sent out of the country that other nations and other peoples may get the advantage of them.

This is the gospel of national selfishness—the narrow nationalist and protectionist view. It is the view of trade as being a contest, the view of trade which led the nations of Europe, prior to the war, to mark out in Africa and other less developed parts of the world "spheres of influence" so that they might control the resources and keep the markets for themselves. It was that spirit as much as any other that led to the overwhelming calamity that broke on the world on the fourth of August, 1914. When we see that spirit demonstrated by the leader of a party, are we surprised that another prominent member of that party tells us that the life and death of the Founder of our religion is not an example to be followed but a warning to be avoided; and that another of his colleagues, not to be outdone, brings forward that quintessence of paganism which puts the rights and the advantages of one's country above morality; "May my country be always right, but my country right or wrong?" The national god set above morality! That would be the danger of allowing men holding such ideas to have control of the destinies of Canada, and care must be taken that our people understand these dangers and govern themselves accordingly.

Let me point out that the danger of this idea that a country with great natural resources has a right to play the dog in the manger, has a right to keep other nations from enjoying those resources, was noticed at the time the Peace treaty was made at Versailles, and it was endeavoured to be avoided in the Covenant of the League of Nations, for in that Covenant we find that the mandated territories, especially those in Africa, were placed under the more civilized powers, and it was provided in article 22 that in mandated territory the mandatory must allow equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of the members of the League.

But, there is another argument, and I think it is a just and reasonable one. What would happen to us if the United States adopted that policy: We are to hold on to all our natural resources and only export in a finished state what we want to sell? What would happen to us if the United States adopted that policy in regard to cotton? By the constitution of that country export duties are prohibited, but we have seen recently that the Americans can amend their constitution. Suppose they amended it in that fashion, suppose they put on a heavy export duty or a prohibition on the export of raw cotton, what would happen to our cotton mills? Last year we imported cotton to the value of $47,000,000 in round figures, of which $30,000,000, or two-thirds, represented raw cotton. Well, where would the Dominion Textile and the Canadian Cottons be if they were unable to get their raw cotton free into this country? It is a serious thing to think of, but it is a poor rule that does not work both ways, and it is egregious folly to propose to follow a course of conduct which, if followed by one's neighbour, may hurt you very much indeed. Coal is in the same situation. In 1923 we imported $43,750,000 worth of anthracite coal and $48,500,000 worth of bituminous coal. This coal was imported because it served our interest best to buy it in the United States. The price of coal is largely determined by the freight rate. Of course, we have immense quantities of coal both in Alberta and in Nova Scotia, but the question is, how expedient it is to haul coal those very long distances; and, of course, it would be a bad thing for us, I take it, if export duties were placed upon coal by the United States. As far as anthracite coal is concerned, a few years ago we had in Canada a shortage of coal. At that time there was a shortage of coal also in the United States, but I remember very distinctly learning with satisfaction that the American control of that time saw to it that Canada had her fair share of that indispensable article. Then, the next fear is the fear aroused by the importation of too many farm implements. That raises an interesting subject for discussion, and one into which I would call as a supporter and co-adjutor and joint advocate with myself the leader of the official opposition, because one of the best speeches ever made in this House in favour of the reduction of duty on agricultural implements was made by the then member for Portage la Prairie on the 18th of January, 1911. On that occasion he moved in this House:

> That in the opinion of this House, a substantial reduction in the import duties on agricultural implements is now due the agriculturists of Canada, and is in just accord with the true ends of a protective tariff.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: I hear the hon. member say, "Hear, hear," and I am glad that he advocates to-night those somewhat sound views—not altogether sound, but sounder than the views he usually promulgates on trade matters in this chamber.

I would like to discuss for a few moments, Mr. Speaker, the main points of this very interesting speech. He laid down this principle, as being the true principle of protection as taught by Sir John A. Macdonald himself: that protection was required merely for infant industries, and that as soon as industries got upon their feet the tariff should be gradually reduced and taken off. This is about the most reasonable of all the protectionist arguments, and if it worked that way in practice there might be something to be said for it. But the protests which we have throughout the country to-day is one of the best evidences of how difficult it is, after the duty is once put on, to have it reduced or taken off.

Well, what were the arguments advanced by the right hon. gentleman at that time? First of all he said this—I am not going over the whole speech, but I know he will correct me if I in any way misrepresent his remarks. First, then, his argument was that the cost of production in the two countries, the United States and Canada, was substantially the same. Has that changed in recent days? I do not think so. If anything, wages are higher in the United States than they are in Canada and if one gives to the Canadian implement manufacturers their raw materials at free trade prices, allows free entry of those materials into Canada, it would seem to me that the costs of production, by reason of the somewhat higher labour costs in the United States than in Canada, should be practically on a parity.

His second argument was that the industry was becoming more and more centralized into a few hands. Is that true to-day? In 1911, according to the speech made by my right hon. friend on that occasion, there were seventy implement manufacturers; to-day there are seventy-three—our population would, I think, have increased sufficiently to make up for the difference. At any rate, 80 per cent of the manufacture of agricultural implements is to-day in the hands of eleven concerns, so certainly a centralization exists yet.

The next argument was the exports bear a large proportion to the imports. Is that true to-day? Not quite so true as it was at the time this speech was delivered, but still substantially true. I have the figures for 1922; about $18,000,000 worth of implements were manufactured in Canada, and of these over $5,000,000 were exported, or between 28 and 29 per cent of the total production. It was further argued that the prices for agricultural implements were lower in the United States than in Canada. Those who live in the farming districts of this country will know whether they pay more for ploughs, harrows and agricultural implements in general north or south of the boundary. I think now, as then, the price of these articles is lower in the United States than it is in Canada. Indeed, that must be the case; if it were not so, why this wail from the implement manufacturers?

Then it was asserted that the implement manufacturers were able to sell abroad and to enter foreign countries even against hostile tariffs. Is that true to-day? I have had prepared by the Bureau of Statistics a table or schedule which I would ask leave to place on Hansard.

Exports of Agricultural Implements and Parts of (Calendar Year 1922)

Agricultural Implements and parts of	$5,041,044

Newfoundland	7,248
Norway	6,312
Germany	6,113
Morocco	5,530
Finland	4,134
Poland and Danzig	3,821

This shows that of the $5,000,000 odd of agricultural implements which were exported in the calendar year 1922, $1,355,498 worth went to the United States, over $1,000,000 to Australia, while France, the Argentine Republic, the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Belguim, Portuguese Africa, British South Africa, and so on, received our agricultural implements. Indeed, the member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), in the interesting and eloquent address with which he favoured the House last night, waxed almost lyrical in his description of how in the valleys of sunny France and on the rolling veldts of South Africa the sod was turned by the ploughs of Brantford and the golden grain was reaped by the reapers made in that interesting city of western Ontario.

Now, I have not heard a single word from the leader of the opposition, and therefore I presume I have correctly synopsized his interesting remarks on the occasion in question. It would seem to me that every one of the conditions which were his arguments in favour of the reduction of duties prevail to-day. But we have, though not as distinguished, still perhaps as valuable witnesses as the very important witness whose words I have just quoted. What do the implement manufacturers themselves say as to their—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Before he leaves that subject, will he be kind enough to tell the House what the duties were at the time the right hon. gentleman made that speech, and what they are to-day?

Mr. McMASTER: They were considerably higher then; of that there is no doubt. But the argument of the Sir John A Macdonald protectionist is that after an industry strikes a certain point, after it gets hold of the home market—not complete command of it, but a reasonable hold of it—then duties should go down and down until they come off altogether.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman say that the Canadian manufacturers have to-day anything like the share of the home market that they had then?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know whether they have or not, but I do know, that now, as then, they are able to carry their goods to twenty-four countries in the civilized world and sell them when they get there in competition with the outside world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen always prefer to cheer before they get the full facts; it is a wise course. Will the hon. gentleman not admit that those foreign sales have been in ever decreasing proportion since the reduction of duty?

Mr. McMASTER: No they have not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes.

Mr. McMASTER: I will allow the right hon. gentleman to interrupt me just in a moment. The duties were reduced some time after my eloquent and learned friend made his speech. I do not know whether they were reduced under his administration or not. Perhaps they were.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: The Finance Minister of that day seems to claim credit for it. It is always amusing how some of the protectionists are always trying to grasp some virtue for having taken down tariffs. I do not remember just when the duties were reduced, but they were reduced, I think, before 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first reduction was made at the first revision, in 1912 and a very substantial one. We carry out our pledges.

Mr. McMASTER: I am very glad, because that helps me in my argument. In the first speech I had the pleasure of delivering in this House on the budget, when, in long, far-off, but, I trust, not forgotten days, I was financial critic for the opposition, I brought out this fact: that in 1914, when according to the leader of the official opposition the reduction of duty should have reduced exports abroad, the agricultural machinery people had sent out of Canada no less than $8,000,000 worth of agricultural machinery. I think that if I am allowed to make this argument on this point here, there will not be much to complain of even from the corner farthest from me. Let me quote briefly from the evidence given in 1920 when a number of these various reductions had been made:

So far as the Massey-Harris Company is concerned—

Says Mr. Findlay in a statement prepared by him or on behalf of his company, and placed before the genial member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) who then occupied the important position of Finance Minister for Canada:

So far as the Massey-Harris Company is concerned, even to-day, placing no other consideration in the scales but that of money making we should be quite prepared to have the tariff taken off our implements if at the same time it were taken off everything that enters into the cost of producing them. In fact, considering how large our foreign trade is, in proportion to the whole, we honestly believe we could make more money under such a free trade condition than we are making at the present time.

But that is not all. He does not make that statement alone. I would draw your attention to this, Mr. Speaker:

On August 14, 1917, following a very full discussion of the whole tariff situation and its effect upon our company, the following resolution was unanimously passed by our directors and placed upon the minutes of the board.

That is the minutes of the board of the Massey-Harris Company

A further discussion on the tariff situation followed, and the president submitted figures illustrating the effect of the tariff on our business, and while the consensus of opinion was, that given free materials, machinery and all other articles entering into the manufacture of our goods and the operation of our plants, we would be as well off with free agricultural implements, it was not thought desirable to make a statement of any kind at present with regard to the position on account of the unsettled political situation.

Why the unsettled political situation should have anything to do with an economic question as to whether the tariff should come off their goods or not, it is hard for me to say.

—and the feeling that the effect of practically free trade on other Canadian manufacturing industries might be different from its effect on ourselves.

Now with these facts before us is it unreasonable to suggest that the cries of the agricultural implement manufacturers are cries made before they are hurt? But let me cite another witness. The name Cockshutt is a name which has a familiar sound to the older members of this House.

An hon. MEMBER: Where does he live?

Mr. McMASTER: He lives in Brantford. For many years he was a highly respected and much liked member of this House. He was one of the high priests of protection and as a rule, protection of a higher brand than the John A. Macdonald brand, which is exemplified in this House by the official leader of the opposition. In the debates of the session 1912-1913, the then hon. member for Brantford, Mr. Cockshutt, spoke as follows:

Speaking for myself and for my own interests, I would be prepared to say that if we got all our raw materials at an equally reduced duty, either no duty or a duty commensurate with the amount knocked off implements, we could afford, there is no question about that, to reduce the duty on agricultural implements; but it would be at the cost of displacing probably one hundred thousand men in the Dominion of Canada in all these implement works and their tributary industries that supply them with raw material.

Mr. Cockshutt was not afraid for the implement manufacturers, but he did express fears for the people in these other lines of industry whose finished product is the raw material for the implement manufacturer. Among these is the Steel Company of Canada. The Steel Company of Canada cannot have been selling a great deal of raw material to the implement manufacturers these days, because the implement manufacturers, by reason of the condition of their customers the farmers, have not been able to sell as much as they used to sell; but that company, I noticed with a great deal of pleasure the other day, while it made $484,000 in 1922 had made $1,400,000 in 1923.

It seems to me that on the whole the question of the implement manufacturers has been fairly adequately dealt with, and the testimony of the hon. leader of the opposition, the testimony of Mr. Cockshutt, and the testimony of the late Mr. Findlay should weigh in this House almost as much as the testimony of the genial and much respected and much beloved present member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond).

The next fear of the leader of the official opposition is that the imports of rolling mills products have increased by, roughly speaking, $20,000,000 between 1922 and 1923: Now what are these rolling mill products? These rolling mill products are mostly the raw materials which are worked up by our manufacturers into more finished goods, and the fact that the imports have increased is an evidence, not of a lack of prosperity, not of a lack of employment, but an evidence that there was more demand by the rolling mills for this sort of raw material. I have here, and I am going to ask leave to place on Hansard, a schedule prepared by the Bureau of Statistics in which the whole $50,866,319 worth of rolling mill imports in 1923 are compared with the like imports in 1922, and in the third column you will find the increases.

Now these increases amount to about $20,000,000, and of the increases $7,000,000 are on the free list. What does that show? It shows that in the opinion of those protectionists who made and who maintain this tariff it was wise to have them come for the benefit of Canadian industries. That being the fact, is it fair or right for the leader of the opposition to say: "It will be interesting to have a calculation of how many artisans of Canada have been exiled from our country because of these importations." These importations exiled no artisan from our country. These importations made it possible for men to do work which otherwise they would not have had to do in this country.

Now the next point—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before my hon. friend leaves that point I would raise the question as to whether permitting a statement to go on Hansard which has not been read is not creating a precedent.

Mr. GRAHAM: The rule is very often overridden. I have no doubt the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), if the House insists, will read this statement. I would be prepared to say that under the circumstances he should be allowed to place the statement on Hansard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And what is the attitude of the government regarding the creation of a precedent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, if this creates a precedent, there have been several just like it.

Mr. McMASTER: I am absolutely in the hands of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) give me one reason in support of his stand. We of course, have had the practice in connection with the financial statement of the Minister of Finance and also when the Minister of Railways presents his annual railway statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: At the moment I recall that it is done every year in connection with the railway statement. However the responsibility rests upon the House. The hon. member for Brome is in the hands of the House, and if any hon. member objects he will have to read this statement referred to.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to place this on Hansard if there is the slightest objection to it by any hon. member. I propose to put the statement on Hansard because it is very long, and I would not impose upon the patience of the House by reading it all. I think that if it is placed on Hansard my speech, if it has any value at all, will be more readily and more easily understood and considered.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no objection.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. McMASTER: I did not catch my hon. friend's last remark.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I raise no objection.

Mr. McMASTER: Very good. I thank the members of the House for their courtesy.

We come now to the question of woollen importations. Woollen importations from Great Britain have increased by $4,000,000. Now, $2,000,000 of this represents raw materials—raw wool, noils, and tops have increased little more than $2,000,000; yarns decreased a little from one year to another. So that, taking them all together raw wool, noils, tops and yarns—these three raw materials for our Canadian mills—constitute just half of the increase. But there has been another result of this increase of woollens into Canada. The result has been that the consumers of this country are getting their socks and their stockings cheaper than they were getting them a few years ago; and I think that the interests of the men, and the women and the children who wear stockings and socks in Canada have really more claim on this, or any other government, than has the particular interest that manufacture such things. Then just before I pass from the question of knitted goods, woollen goods, I would make this observation. It may be that some of the smaller mills have gone out of business. The duty on undershirts and knitted goods is 22½ per cent, 30 per cent and 35 per cent. If goods come in by St. John, or Halifax, or Montreal, you would have to take another 2½ per cent off the British preference, which would bring it down to 20 per cent. Therefore these goods are protected under the British preference by a duty of 20 per cent. Surely that should be enough protection if these industries are really native to the soil. Is it in the interests of the manufacturers themselves, if a duty of 20 per cent will not protect them, to keep them in a state between life and death by giving them higher protection? I say no it is not and I would make this observation: There are certain manufacturers of knitted goods who have made tremendous profits during the last ten years including the last year. I hold in my hand a copy of the Financial Times, and I find that Penman's, a concern that manufactures woollen goods, has earned on its common stock for ten years a total of 217·10 per cent—that is, it has had a revenue of 21¾ per cent per annum on this common stock for ten years. Now, surely such an interest as that should not be afraid of having the duty on its products somewhat reduced.

Mr. WHITE: Will the hon. gentleman give us the returns for the last ten years?

Mr. McMASTER: There was 147 per cent on the earnings for ten years put back into the business. That is to say, the other earnings were distributed in dividends, and 147 per cent was put back into the business. I read here:

> Out of 217.10 per cent earned on common, 1914 to 1923, 70 per cent has been paid in dividends. Ten year income equals 494.41 per cent on preferred against 60 per cent paid in dividends.

This is from the Financial Times of Saturday, March 1, 1924.

Mr. WHITE: Does the hon. gentleman say that the return covers the years between 1914 and 1923, thus taking in the war?

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, it would cover the war period. No doubt the profits were very large during the war period, but the point I want to make is this: It is not a fair representation of the textile business to place before the House to merely bring before the House those institutions that have not done well without, at the same time, bringing those that have done well.

The House will bear with me during the discussion of these long statements. I cannot say, as a member of the British House said a while ago, that I have a passion for statistics, but I think it is wise when statistics are quoted that they should be thoroughly gone into. I will just deal for a moment with the observations of the leader of the opposition on butter and cheese. The leader of the opposition has a style of oratory which we all admire. He has, as every artist has, the sense of the value of contrasts as well as the value of harmony, and just as a decorator will pick a colour here and a colour there, selecting one which will contrast beautifully with the other, so we find that the leader of the opposition has dealt with these figures. He says that the exports of butter went down in one year from $8,000,000 odd to $4,000,000, and that the exports of cheese went down from twenty-seven millions odd to twenty-three millions odd in one year. Those statements are absolutely and literally true, but the impression made would be that there had been a decrease in one year, in the same year, in the exports of both butter and cheese which would aggregate about six and a half millions, and that is not the fact. How is that impression made? It is by picking out the records of butter for one year and comparing them with another, and then picking out the records of another year in order to make the comparison with cheese.

9 p.m.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: Did I hear "hear, hear"?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, from me.

Mr. McMASTER: I heard no signs of negation from hon. gentleman seated immediately—not angularly—opposite. What is the right way to make a comparison? It is to take all the dairy produce, butter, cheese, milk, fresh and cream, and condensed milk, and compare them over a period of years. I have made the comparison, and as the statement is short, it will be quicker for me to read it now than to have any discussion whether the schedule shall be placed on Hansard or not. The statement is as follows:

	Exports—Dairy—Products
	1921	1922	1923
Butter..	$ 3,648,047	$ 8,105,395	$ 4,905,608
Cheese..	27,088,908	21,636,739	23,449,401
Milk, fresh and cream	2,435,977	3,024,725	4,888,797
Milk, condensed.. ..	5,641,831	3,134,590	5,104,398
Total..	$38,814,763	$35,901,449	$38,348,204

So here you have a falling off in one year and an increase the next. This is a case, I think, that emphasizes the correctness of my attitude when I say: When you receive statistics, study them profoundly, or you will run the risk of regarding statistics as they were regarded once by a gentleman who said: "There are three degrees of untruthfulness; the lie, the condemned lie, and statistics."

I should like to turn to the address delivered by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). I regret that he is not in his place to-night. I should like to congratulate him—and my words, of course, will reach him in due course—upon the very able presentation which he made of the financial condition of the country, a presentation which showed immense research, immense labour, and which was most attractively set forth in this House. As to his remarks upon the trade question, I do not find myself in such complete accord. He stated:

> We are not a sufficiently self-contained nation. We should be self-dependent. We should not import so much foodstuffs or so much manufactured goods as we do.

As to foodstuffs, I have already wearied the House with statistics in connection with the observation made along the same lines by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). As to manufactured goods, what appears to be forgotten by the hon. member is this, that unless we are prepared to receive largely in manufactured goods the price of our pre-manufactured goods the price of our exports of natural products, I, for the life of me, do not know how we are going to get paid for our exports.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What kind of credit would the hon. gentleman think would be made available by the payment of our annual indebtedness out of this country, a very large amount of which indebtedness is held in England, some $260,000,000?

Mr. McMASTER: No doubt we have an annual indebtedness to be paid and some of it is due in England. I would imagine that a great proportion of our debt which has been due in England, has already been transferred to the United States. I have no need to press the point, because I observe the hon. member agrees with me. I doubt whether we have a great deal due in England now, though we have a certain amount, and of course Great Britain owes us on national account a considerable amount of money, some $10,000,000. I think on the whole, at this time in the world's history, Great Britain will have to pay us for the goods which we send her.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. McMASTER: I am afraid she will. As a matter of fact, I do not believe our farmer friends are going to ship grain which they do not get paid for, and I am sure our millers are not going to ship flour unless they get paid for it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has my hon. friend made any calculation as to the amount of the annual indebtedness of Canada?

Mr. McMASTER: I have not made any calculation as to the exact amount of our indebtedness in Great Britain, and I do not think it could be made, for the reason that a great deal of our securities that represent debts which we contracted in days gone by through the issue of bonds in London, went over to the United States when Great Britain was borrowing heavily from the United States during the war, and also that vast quantities were bought back by ourselves. I remember when my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) was Minister of Finance, he placed a sort of voluntary embargo against the re-importation of our Canadian securities from London for the purpose, he said, of maintaining exchange rates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite wrong about that. It was not for the purpose of maintaining exchange rates; it was for quite a different reason, but that is an extraneous matter. Would my hon. friend give us his idea, as a financial expert, what the sum really is? I am speaking, not about our indebtedness in England alone, but about our foreign indebtedness. It has been placed at various sums. The lowest I know of is $260,000,000 a year on interest account, whether he accepts that or not.

Mr. McMASTER: I cannot accept that without full opportunity to examine into the whole situation. The point I wish to make is this—and I do not think it can be gainsaid—that when we export goods from Canada, we have to be prepared to take payment for those goods in large measure in manufactured articles coming from abroad. I quite agree with the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) that we owe money abroad, but I cannot say how much money we owe abroad. I think in view of the transfers of securities from the Old Country to the United States and to ourselves during and since the war, any estimate made is merely an estimate and cannot be accepted as definite, though I do not doubt for a moment that we still owe a considerable amount of money outside of this country. But I would say that it was mostly in the hands of United States, and not of British, investors; and if we are going to continue to send vast quantities of our raw materials and of our manufactured natural products, such as flour, to the markets of Britain and Europe we must be prepared to take payment in goods. Now, how do nations adjust their trade balances? In days gone by, when the balance was only a little one way or the other, it was done in gold. But now the export of gold from one country to another is practically forbidden. A nation may pay in services for the goods which it receives, and no doubt a certain amount of our raw materials and our flour which we send to Great Britain is paid for by insurance and shipping services which the people of the Old Land give to Canada. There is however no question that in the ultimate analysis the great medium of payment for our goods which we ship is goods of a different sort which we receive in return. The point I want to make is that you cannot interfere with the flow of goods into a country without interfering at the same time with the export of goods from that country. That is not merely a principle that is current in the classrooms of college professors of political economy, it is the foundation stone of international banking and is a fact that is known to every international banker in the world. What do the ships carry which we see leaving Montreal? Sometimes you will see a tramp steamer which is loaded entirely with wheat, carrying nothing else,—it may have a few deals spread here and there in order to prevent the wheat from shifting on the stormy sea. But the typical cargo, as I was informed by one of the head shipping men in Montreal when I was there last week end, is wheat, cheese and packed meats from Chicago or Canada. That is the typical cargo of the liners leaving Montreal; and on the ships coming in we get all sorts of goods from the Old Country.

I do not want to dwell too long on this point. Let me take another. Can protection increase employment in the lump or as a whole? It cannot. And this is the reason. It is quite possible that if you protect one industry you may give more employment to men engaged in that particular line than you would if you allowed matters to follow their course. But you cannot increase employment as a whole, because when you get goods into the country they are paid for by something you produce in the country itself, and the production of those goods gives as much employment as if you manufactured or produced what is imported. The only difference is this, that where you allow trade to flow freely the labour and capital of the country will flow into the channels which will produce the greatest wealth instead of being diverted, as they often are, into lines of activity which really are an economic waste so far as the national wealth is concerned. Let me give two examples. Before the war a certain British shipbuilder tendered for six ships to be built in Great Britain. He was able to tender lower than anyone else because he could buy his steel very cheaply in Belgium. But, you may say, the steel workers of Great Britain were deprived of the work of making that steel which would go into the ship. That argument is unsound, because the ships would never have been built in Great Britain unless the shipbuilder had been able to get cheap steel from Belgium. The ships would never have been built, and neither the shipbuilders in Great Britain nor the steelmakers in Britain would have had any work. But being able to get cheap steel from Belgium the shipbuilder was in a position to give employment to labour in Great Britain; and while the steelmakers there had nothing to do with that particular order they no doubt were working on some other order.

There is a famous economist in the United States, William F. Culbertson, who is on the tariff board of the American government. He cites a case to show how import duties will interfere with trade and business, and therefore with labour. In the production of high grade steel a manufacturer must have a substantial supply of tungsten, chromium and manganese. A duty is imposed on these minerals by the tariff law of the United States of 1922. It therefore became necessary to give compensatory duties to protect the maker of this high grade steel in the American market; and as far as the American market was concerned he was almost as well off as before. But the manufacturer, when he went into the foreign market, was at a disadvantage as against the steel manufacturer who was able to get tungsten, chromium and manganese free of customs duties. In that way protection must always reduce labour in so far as it prevents labour from working for a larger market, it is bound to increase the cost of production. Of course, the fear that lower duties must result in unemployment disappears when one grasps the way in which international trade is carried on.

Perhaps I might be allowed at this point to refer to an observation made by the hon. member in connection with preferences. He said in the course of his remarks that we gave preferences to Great Britain because we wished to increase our exports to that country and hoped that at some time or other Great Britain would give us preference in her markets. I do not believe that was the reason why preferences were given. They were given, to a certain extent at least, as a matter of profound and clever political strategy. That is something that may possibly be advisable at times, although I am not particularly fond of it. For years before the election of 1896 our Tory friends carried on a campaign of waving the old flag. In 1891 Sir John A. Macdonald said: "A British subject I was born; a British subject I will die," and he denounced the Grits because they proposed reciprocity with the United States. In 1896 the flag was waved, as it has been on some occasions since—the same tactics have been pursued since that time. What did the Minister of Finance do in 1897? The Liberal party had promised a reduction of duties, and so he reduced the duties by giving a substantial British preference, thus rather spiking the guns of his political opponents who had wreathed themselves about with the Union Jack and pretended to be the sole depositors of Imperial sentiment and British loyalty. But even there the matter was done not altogether to my liking, because some of the duties were raised before the preference was given. Preferences may have their place where two protectionist nations decide to move towards free trade, and each one gives to the other a certain facility in his market. It is a sort of reciprocity. It may be, and I think is, justified where a country moving from a protectionist status to a freer trade status gives to countries that allow its goods in free a better standing in its markets than to those that do not. But as to the proposals made recently for preference within the British Empire, which mean that Great Britain must, first of all, put a duty on the food of her people and the raw materials of her industry—I speak pretty well for myself in this House and perhaps for no one else—desperate as is the condition of many of our agriculturists, desperate as is the condition of many of our fishermen, I would be sorry to advise my fellow citizens for one moment to ask that the people of Great Britain should tax themselves on their food and raw materials in order that they might give us a preference in their market. I wish to see the Old Country strong and powerful—a power for peace and a power for righteousness in the world, and I believe her power as a great commercial nation is based, and based solidly upon the gospel which Bright and Cobden converted her people to eighty years ago.

But is it desirable from our own standpoint? Suppose we could get the people in the Old Land to tax wheat and other foodstuffs and raw materials coming in, and then give us a preference, would it be in our own interests to ask them to do so? I do not think it would, because, I assert the preferences would not last very long once the people of the United Kingdom had adopted the protectionist attitude of mind. We have seen it. Certain interests among the British people did not want our live animals for food purposes to come into the British market, and they kept them out for thirty years by slander, by saying our cattle were diseased, when they were much freer from disease than were their own herds. And recently what have they done? Through efforts made by different administrations in this country, all trying earnestly and sincerely to have the embargo removed—I make no exception in giving credit to Grit or to Tory in regard to the removal of the embargo—finally they succeeded in getting the British authorities to say the embargo would be removed. Well, it was removed. But so many vexatious regulations have been imposed, the doors have been opened so often only to be closed a few days afterwards on pretexts that a great many of us do not believe are very serious, that we have a continuation of what we might expect when the protectionist mind has thoroughly imbued the trade policy of the British people. The preference would not last very long, say, on wheat when the British farmers came to their members and said, "We only want a cost-of-living tariff against wheat coming in from Canada." And another very important point is this. Suppose the British people allowed our wheat to come in, and at the beginning they had a one hundred per cent preference for our flour, and that the millers, shrewd people, went to the British government and said, "Now, we just want a little cost-of-living tariff against Canadian flour. You are giving them a one hundred per cent preference. Now, just give them a ninety per cent preference; it does not amount to very much." What would it amount to? It would mean that a great deal of the flour milling carried on in Canada would be carried on in Great Britain, to the very great loss of our dairy farmers. No, we had better not ask, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said so ably and so eloquently this afternoon, for any more freedom in the British market; we had better restrict our preference to that. We had a preference before in the British market, and it was removed after the Corn Laws were repealed. Well, the protectionists of Montreal were so angry that they signed an annexation manifesto, and when the King's representative came down from Monklands, outside Montreal, to open up parliament, they treated him with grave discourtesy. I use the language of moderation in that description. When Mr. Baldwin proposed to give a bonus to encourage the growing of wheat in Great Britain of £1 an acre, I think it was, that bonus would have operated to the displacement by British wheat of wheat from Saskatchewan as well as of wheat from the Argentine. We had better not encourage the protectionists in Great Britain; rather we had better realize the wisdom of the free traders there, encourage them, and endeavour prudently and carefully to follow the example that they have given us.

And now let me add this. Before the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) sat down he invoked the name of Laurier, quoting one of his speeches, which certainly expressed a protectionist feeling. Now, while he was speaking I thought I caught the date of that speech to be 1871, but apparently the Hansard reporter did not catch the date, or it disappeared in some other way. So having this almost passion for statistics, I looked up the date and found the speech with the protectionist sentiment was delivered in 1871, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not yet thirty years old. Having sat under Sir Wilfrid, having followed him all my life, I prefer to turn to the results of his later experience and to his wider knowledge than when he was a fledgling member of the Quebec legislature. Let me quote to the House from an address delivered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier a few days before he died. After vaunting the free trade policy of Great Britain as the shield and buckler of that country and the policy which had enabled her to come triumphantly through the war, to finance her Allies and to pay her debts, he said this:

> In this country, Sir, Liberals have always been the disciples of the British people on the question of commercial freedom. Indeed, many years ago—when you recall that time to-day in the resolution which was passed upon this subject at the convention of 1893, we declared against the principle of protection, and when we had the opportunity we lived up to our declaration. Sir, it has always been made a cause of reproach to us that when in office we did not adopt, but were recreant to our declarations. Such a reproach cannot reach us. We were not recreant, we proceeded step by step towards the goal, always keeping it in view, never imposing a duty for protection's sake only, but always acting upon the principle or the basis of a tariff for revenue, and revenue only. This was our policy in the past, it is our policy to-day and we have taken this occasion to reaffirm it.

Now, whether or not Sir Wilfrid's statement of what the Liberal party had done was tinctured with a certain amount of that kindness which was the embodiment of his nature is not the question. The point I make is this, that he who represents Sir Wilfrid Laurier as an advocate of protection may be representing the Laurier of 1871, but he is not representing the thoughts and feelings of the man who became the leader of the Liberal party in 1887, who led it in the election of 1891, who led it in the election of 1896, who presided over its destinies from 1896 to 1911, when he went down to defeat in an endeavour to give to this country the greatest free trade measure that this generation had had an opportunity to accept—went down fighting for the principle of freer trade. It is not the Sir Wilfrid Laurier who presided over the destinies of the Liberal party from 1911 until his death, when during that time resolution after resolution was passed with his full concurrence and with his full support in the House of Commons asking for things which were laid down in the Liberal programme of 1919 and of which we see the glimmerings of hope of realization in the Speech from the Throne to-day.

And now I turn to the last part of my remarks, to the arguments advanced by the member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). The member for North Waterloo approaches the delivery of a protectionist argument under heavy handicaps: he possesses a love of liberty, a hatred of special privilege, a clear mind, and a considerable knowledge of economics. His first argument—and his arguments merit the most serious consideration—is this: We need protection to maintain the standard of our industrial workers. That is the way I have epitomized his first argument. Well now, in this country our industrial workers are outnumbered by four to one by all other classes of workers, and the farmers and fishermen combined outnumber the industrial workers about two to one. The census of the different classes into which the Canadian people are divided will not be ready for another year, and I have based my figures on the census of 1911. I am told by the Dominion Statistician that industrial workers have increased in number as compared to farmers, but there has been also an increase in the distributing and professional classes, the wage-earning classes other than industrial, and I do not think that I am far wrong for the purpose of my argument.

Now, my argument is this: The natural producer in Canada, especially the farmer, has to accept for his product a price determined on the markets of the world. When his wheat reaches Liverpool it has to compete with wheat raised by the peasant in Russia, by the peasant in India, by the peasant in the Balkans, as well as by the farmer in the Argentine or in Australia. His standard of living cannot be kept up by legislative enactment, and if we believe in the principle of equal rights for all and special privileges for none, why should one class in the community, and by far a less numerous class, have the right to exact legislation to maintain its standard of living when that of others cannot be maintained by similar legislative enactment? It seems to me that that is sound argument. But I do not pretend that the tariff is responsible for the maintenance of the standard of living among our own industrial classes, as I will endeavour to prove. My friend pointed out that we have cheap labour in England—a free trade country—and that our people in Canada, our industrial classes, should be protected from that cheap labour. Well, that might have been an argument of some moment had we been content to allow it to rest there. But he went on to say: "I find that the industrial workers of the part of the country which I represent are affected by importations, by the cheap labour not only of Great Britain but of France and Italy." But France and Italy are high tariff countries, and in those high tariff countries the tariff has failed to maintain its standard of living; therefore I think in this regard he has proved too much.

Again, I would make this point; although there may be certain industries which at this time feel the competition from the continent of Europe or from Britain itself, I think I am within the truth when I say that the great competitor of the Canadian manufacturer is another manufacturer on the same continent as himself, namely the American manufacturer. Now, my hon. friend, when I was trying to lead him into a statement in that regard, failed to be led, so I had to go to the figures to make my proof. I find that for the last calendar year the dutiable goods coming from Great Britain amounted to $125,000,000 and that the dutiable goods coming from the United States amounted to almost three times that sum, $361,000,000 while from the United States we imported just about four times as much goods as we did from Great Britain—in fact, fibres and textiles are the only manufactured goods in which the United Kingdom is in any way a competitor with the United States in our markets, that is, as reflected by the trade returns. Of fibres and textiles, $74,000,000 worth came from the United Kingdom and $78,000,000 from the United States, and as to all the rest—iron and its products, non-ferrous metals, non-metallic minerals, and chemical products—we find that the amounts received from the United Kingdom are trifling in comparison to the amounts received from the United States. So I think I can say with a fair degree of accuracy that the great competitor for our manufactures is not the United Kingdom, not France, not Italy, not the countries of Asia, but the United States, and that wages in the United States are if anything higher than in Canada. So that I think the maintenance of tariff for the purpose of protecting us from cheap labour falls to the ground.

And after all, does cheap labour actually involve low labour costs? Not at all. Very often the best-paid labour is the cheapest in the long run. In countries like the United States and Canada the efficient well fed and ambitious workman, although paid a higher wage than the workman of the same class in Great Britain, France or Italy, who has not the idea that he has to "ca' canny" or go easy but believes he should do the best he can for his employer, that he should be prepared to mind as many machines as it is reasonable for him to mind, the workman not imbued with the idea of going as slowly as he can but with the idea of doing as much as he can—that man is in the long run the cheap workman, and he is much cheaper at a high wage than the man with less ambition and less capacity at a much lower wage. And then, of course, we must distinguish between nominal wages and real wages. Protection does not, in my humble opinion, raise real wages. It may possibly, by raising the cost of living, bring about a certain increase of the nominal wages, but not of the real wages. What are the facts? Does protection increase real wages? I take it that it does not. Let me make my point clear.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Protection cannot increase the aggregate wealth of any people. Protection is a tax; protection is a method whereby the government undertakes to direct the labour or capital of the country into one channel rather than into another. Now, the greatest aggregate wealth will be created if labour and capital are allowed freely to find, and they will do so, the channels which will give the greatest economic return. Therefore, under free trade will you get the greatest aggregate of wealth.

Now, what are your wages? Wages are the reward which labour is able to extract from capital. Does it do that better under protection or under free trade? What does protection do? Protection has a tendency to make capital coalesce into larger and larger groups; the larger the group the more power it has. Where do we find the strongest labour unions —in the United States under protection, or in Great Britain under free trade? The fact that we have a Labour government in England today I think adequately answers that question.

I am afraid I have delayed the House for a very long time, and I must ask the pardon of the members for doing so. I have endeavoured to point out the reasons why I believe that the protectionist appeal is a mistaken appeal for this country. The protectionist is fighting in this country against the facts of nature and the facts of geography. We cannot be a self-dependent country. We have got practically only one climate; we are a fairly narrow country, that is, the inhabited part of our country stretching along the northern confines of the United States. We need to trade freely. We need to have the labour and the capital of our country directed into those channels where the greatest economic wealth can be afforded. I do not know how we are to support the economic burdens which we have upon us unless we follow that policy. I ask no government to do anything of an extreme nature, but I do ask this government to see that when they place laws on the statute book reducing the duties, those laws are not defeated by regulations. Let me give just a few examples. A client of mine was accustomed to bring in waxed paper from the Old Land for the purpose of wrapping up his loaves; he was a baker. On that wrapping paper was his name and trade-mark. For some time he brought it in under a 22½ per cent duty. You would have thought that was a high enough duty, but what happened? The Department of Customs declared that was advertising matter. It was no more advertising matter than his carts bearing the same label were advertising matter when they went round the streets of Westmount delivering his bread. But that was regarded as advertising matter and taxed at a much higher rate.

I have a letter in my pocket from a man in the western part of Canada protesting that when he brought in apples that were taxed at the rate of 30 cents a box, which had been bought in the open market and on which no special discount was given, the Customs made an arbitrary ruling that these had been bought too cheaply and that he must pay an extra 16½ cents per box, which brought up the duty on apples to a 50 per cent ad valorem rate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Could my hon. friend tell me the date of that letter? When did this happen?

Mr. McMASTER: The letter is dated March 7, 1924, and reads:

> During the month of February we purchased several cars of apples from Yakima, Washington State, U.S.A., at 90 cents and some at 85 cents per box F.O.B. there. The duty on these apples was assessed at the rate of 90 cents per barrel or 30 cents per box; but on the top of this the Customs under the Dumping Act have added a further charge of 16½ cents per box. They claim we bought the apples less than they were worth, although these apples were offered and are still being offered freely at same prices.

What the Customs should realize is that they are an organization for collecting revenue on things that come in, not for the purpose, under various pretexts, of keeping things out. I ask for nothing unreasonable. I know that when a country has followed for many years a certain system, that system must be changed with care and discretion. I believe that there are no people in this country whose desires are other than mine in regard to the trade question. We want action; we want prudent action; but we want action visible to the naked eye. I speak for myself; I have no right to speak for any other; but I confidently believe that I represent the feelings of a large number of people in this country, and the measure of the support which such people will give to this government will be in proportion to the spirit of true liberalism and of true progress which it demonstrates in the difficult task of governing and leading this country forward to a better and a finer condition of affairs.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): As I listened to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMaster) I wondered if the government could actually be so unkind when the Redistribution Bill comes up again as to abolish the constituency of Brome; and in that eventuality would it be possible for the hon. member to find another constituency?

Mr. LOGAN: Lots of them.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It would be a great loss to this House and to the country if the hon. gentleman had to leave us.

Mr. CALDWELL: No danger.

Mr. McQUARRIE: We cannot blame the government for wishing to decapitate the hon. gentleman, nor can you blame the hon. gentleman for leaving the government side of the House. The hon. gentleman is a very eloquent and convincing speaker, but so far as I can see he is not able to convince anyone but himself. Hence his position of splendid isolation at the tail-end of the House. He was not able to convince the cabinet, nor was he able to convince anyone on his side of the House. I doubt very much whether he will be able to convince anyone on the benches immediately adjoining his seat, where the Labour party sits, nor on the benches to my left; for if he did the only effect would be for them to vote against the government, which I think is practically impossible.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to add my words of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Kelly) and the seconder (Mr. Lapierre) of the Address. With a great many of the things that they said I am, of course, unable to agree, for obvious reasons. One thing I remarked while the mover was speaking and that was the vociferous applause of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell), who seemed to take quite a fatherly interest in the Address.

May I also express regret at the absence of the Minister of Finance who commands the respect and admiration, I think, not only of all the members of the House but of the people of Canada as a whole. I think it is a distinct loss to Canada that he is unable to occupy his position in this Chamber during the present session.

I regret also that the former Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) is not able to occupy the position which he used to hold. I must say that I do not regret that the former Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) is now Minister of Justice. He took an interest in his late department, and I have no doubt he will take an equal interest in the Justice department which in my opinion requires some attention. In regard to the former Minister of Justice there is a story current which may or may not have any foundation; I will give it for what it is worth. It is said that the late Minister of Justice was asked if he had given up his position because he was really ill, or if there were other reasons for his retirement. He said that while it was quite true he was far from well, he was not as sick as the Liberal party.

May I also be permitted to congratulate the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Doucet) upon his maiden speech. I think he did splendidly. He is an asset to the Conservative party, and I predict that he is the forerunner of a great many more of his race who will, in a comparatively short time, line themselves up with the Conservative party. I have been wondering about something in connection with the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien). We saw in the press not very long ago that the hon. gentleman had been appointed Deputy Minister of National Defence and we thought—at least I did when I came down here—that congratulations were due him. Now I find the newspaper forecast has not been realized; surprising to say the hon. gentleman is still in his place in this Chamber. I have been trying to account for this and am wondering whether it is possible the government has come to such a state that it is afraid to open a constituency in Quebec. It looks very much as though that might be the case, and I think, particularly after what has happened in Halifax and Kent that is the explanation.

My congratulations are also due to the new Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin). I was rather surprised to hear that he had been placed in that important position because, so far as I was aware, he had had nothing to do with fisheries up to the date of his assuming cabinet rank and there are certain hon. gentlemen opposite who have taken a very active interest in the fisheries. My mind dwells particularly on the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) who was the great critic on fishery questions when he was in opposition, and has been chairman of the Committee on Fisheries during the present parliament. I have been wondering whether there was a reason for the failure to promote the hon. member for Lunenburg, and thinking that perhaps the government was afraid to open up that constituency also. There is another hon. member of this House who might have been appointed to that position and that is the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork). He, of course, is from British Columbia and has been very much interested in the fisheries there for a great many years. Beyond all doubt British Columbia is entitled to further cabinet representation. Under the late government British Columbia was represented in two important portfolios, namely, Agriculture, and Trade and Commerce. It would have been a fit and proper thing on the part of the present government to have chosen an additional cabinet minister for British Columbia, but it did not do so. The reason, perhaps, is the same as in the other cases—the government is afraid to open a British Columbia constituency. I am very doubtful indeed whether it would be possible for this government to elect even a cabinet minister in that province.

Sir, as I have already said we have a new Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I had the pleasure of a few minutes' conversation with him the other night, and he very kindly consented to give me an audience so that I might go into matters relating to the British Columbia fisheries with him. I think from the attitude he adopted towards me that night, that we shall find him a man who is willing to see what can be done in his department. British Columbia as hon. members are aware, is a province where the fisheries are important and require, and should receive, consideration. There are a number of matters which are entitled to consideration and I think should be looked into. I had the privilege of discussing them with the present Minister of Justice, and I think he could advise the new Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the British Columbia fisheries should be looked into. There is, for instance, the Fraser river which was the greatest salmon fishery stream at one time. On the Fraser river in 1913 something over 700,000 cases of sockeye salmon, perhaps the best grade of salmon on the world's markets were packed. But there has been a falling off in the pack. We have big years every four years. The pack in 1913 was one of the big years. In 1921 the last big year only 50,000 cases of sockeye salmon were packed on the Fraser. Sockeye salmon is worth approximately $15 a case. So the new minister will comprehend immediately that the situation requires looking into. If it is possible to do anything, no time should be lost. I am convinced that something can be done. The most important feature is to continue negotiations with the authorities of the state of Washington. They are also suffering from the depletion of the fisheries in the same proportion as we are. I would like to see the new minister take the question of the Fraser river fisheries up with the board of the state of Washington and see if something can be done. An arrangement might have been made with the authorities of that state whereby the Fraser river would be closed to sockeye fishing for a number of years. They were willing to adopt a close season for a period of years, but they would not say what would happen at the conclusion of that term, and they were not prepared to give any assurance they would not again resort to the old methods which were calculated to deplete the supply. If that means simply restoring the sockeye salmon for the Americans there does not seem to be very much in the proposition. We would like to have an arrangement whereby, at the end of a closed period, the Americans would agree to abide by certain rules and regulations similar to our own. It may not be necessary to close the river entirely for that period, and I do not think it is or will be. As a matter of fact, I can state to the minister, that all the fishing interests in British Columbia, the canning associations, the fishermen and the businessmen are all agreed—they can get together on it—that no sockeye fishing should be allowed prior to the 1st August in any year. That would give the early fish, the ones which go up to the upper regions of the river, which have been absolutely depleted, a chance to ascend the stream and get to those spawning grounds. That might be tried out, and I may say that that opinion has been expressed by some very eminent authorities on fisheries.

There are a number of other matters in connection with the fisheries of British Columbia. I have placed on the order paper certain questions as to the very important recommendations contained in the report of the British Columbia Fisheries Commission, 1922. I am asking if the government intends to do anything to give effect to those recommendations. I hope the minister will look into the matter, and I think if he studies the question, he will come to the conclusion that those recommendations should be carried out.

I should like for a moment, to refer to one feature of the address delivered by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) in this debate. That is as to the central organization in British Columbia. I must state positively that I cannot agree in any particular with the hon. member for Skeena. I think it would be a mistake to do away with the central organization. I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, whether any business concern, with its head office in the East and having a branch or wanting to do business in British Columbia, would not establish a central organization there, a British Columbia office, as it were, which would administer, to a certain extent, the British Columbia business? I think that would be the case rather than that the concern should have representatives in the important cities and districts of British Columbia and have no central organization whatever. The desire of the hon. member for Skeena for economy in this connection would not be attained. He has stated that we might save some $50,000 by doing away with that central organization. I do not believe that. There are three districts, and he proposes that each one of those three districts should communicate with Ottawa directly. I believe that instead of having the expense of one organization there as you have now, you would have the expense of three, and the total cost to the country would be thereby multiplied and not decreased. There is a suggestion which I would like to make to the minister and which, it seems to me, is worthy of consideration, if he desires to effect economy in the fisheries administration of British Columbia. Prior to very recently, the central organization in British Columbia was located at New Westminster. They have there a government building, a fisheries building, with ample accommodation for the office. The office was moved to Vancouver where space was rented in one of the large blocks at quite a large rental. If the minister will return that central office to New Westminster, not only might the rental be saved, but I think the staff might be decreased. That is to say, you might use the staff at present in New Westminster with the central organization and thereby possibly eliminate some of the employees. But in any event, by returning the central organization to New Westminster, you would effect a very considerable saving and no one would be hurt. It takes only about twenty-five minutes to go from New Westminster to Vancouver, and there is a first class pavement all the way. There is no reason why the cannery men whose head offices are located at Vancouver, when they are required to do business with the central office, could not either telephone or come over to New Westminster. The really serious situation in connection with British Columbia at present exists on the Fraser river. New Westminster is right on the Fraser river, and it seems to me that that is the proper place for the fisheries office to be where it had been for many years. The offices were taken away without any previous intimation to myself, although I happened to be the member for that constituency. I later on objected, and in that objection I received the support of all the members from British Columbia, with the exception of the members for Vancouver, who took no active part at all in the matter. I think the same condition would prevail now and that almost complete unanimity would be found amongst the members from British Columbia on the question of returning the fisheries office to New Westminster.

In referring to the Fraser river, might I also touch on another matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Skeena, that is in connection with grain elevators? I listened with great interest to what he said about Prince Rupert, and I am not going to contest any of his statements in regard to the attractions which are offered by Prince Rupert as a shipping point for grain. But I say that New Westminster is on the main line of the Canadian National railways. The Fraser river is the first point where grain could be loaded on boats. The Fraser has every facility for the location of grain elevators. The Canadian National Railways, if the question were left with them, would express themselves, no doubt very freely, in favour of locating elevators on the Fraser river. The Canadian Pacific Railway has already said the same thing; it has done more than that; it has acquired large tracts of land on the Pitt river which is a tributary of the Fraser river at Port Coquitlam not very far removed from the Fraser river. My hon. friends from the prairie provinces will be interested in this because it is a matter of economy, a matter of expense, pure and simple, a matter of cost, cost of transportation. We had a visit this year from a number of our Progressive friends who inspected the Fraser river and its facilities. The question is one of shipping grain at the least possible expense, and I need only point out that to take the grain from New Westminster to Burrard Inlet at Vancouver costs something like $15 a car. Besides that, there is a good deal of congestion, and it may be difficult to obtain sites there. In any event, the sites would be very expensive. There is, on the other hand, by locating the elevators at New Westminster, a saving of $15 a car. It may be said by the shippers that the railway companies will have to bear that expense. You know what that means. It means that although the railway company bears the initial expense, at some time or other, eventually, someone else will have to pay, and it will have to come out of the traffic. I suggest that the Fraser river be given a trial. I know that this to a large extent is a matter for private enterprise, but we are hoping that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay), who has interested himself in the Fraser river, will continue the work which has been carried on there for some time in connection with the channel of the river. That channel has been greatly improved; we have had quite a good deal of shipping in the last couple of years, and the ships of the Canadian Merchant Marine and of other lines are coming there pretty frequently for lumber. The Fraser river is the centre of the lumber industry of British Columbia, about one-third of the lumber cut in the province being cut by the mills on that river. The business is there, and I respectfully ask that the Minister of Public Works continue the work he has been doing.

I quite agree with other hon. gentlemen who have spoken about the necessity for strict economy, and it seems to me that we might begin the practice of economy in this House. In any event I think it would be advisable that the session should be as short as possible consistent with the business that comes before the House. I was pleased to hear from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that the cost in connection with parliament was not so large as had been reported; but still we all know that it costs a good deal to keep this House going. I suggest that in order to reduce the length of the session we might meet each day at 2.30 instead of 3 o'clock in the afternoon. I can see no reason why that should not be done. Personally, I would go so far as to advocate meeting at 2 o'clock, but that perhaps might be inconvenient for the cabinet. I do think, however, that we might try 2.30 and save half an hour each day; over a period of four or five months that would represent a considerable economy of time.

I would call the attention of my hon. friends to my left to a statement made recently by the Right Hon. William M. Hughes, former Premier of Australia, who said that three parties were a luxury which no country could afford. I think the Progressive group might take that suggestion into consideration. They could divide things up, some of them coming over here and others going on the opposite side of the House. I do not suppose that they would all go over to the other side; but when they are voting with the government, or at least the great majority of them, there is no reason why they should not be on the opposite side, thus dispensing with this "luxury". I think that sane economy should be practised, and not false economy which would tend to retard the development of the country, I regret the policy of the government which has resulted in the discontinuance of federal aid to highway construction. A great deal of very valuable work was done by means of that grant, and when we realize the fact that tourists who come to this country leave many millions of dollars, and that many millions more would be spent in the country if we had good roads, I think the government should see the advisability of reconsidering its policy and of again doing something to assist in the construction of highways. It is also a matter for regret that the government has discontinued the aid to agricultural education. That was something that was doing considerable good. In our part of the country a great deal had been accomplished through the women's institutes and other organizations which were supported from this grant. I am very sorry indeed that the government saw fit to discontinue this aid.

Let me refer for a moment to the question of old age pensions. I think the time has arrived when this country should do something in this regard. I shall not go into the question at great length to-night, but we have seen how the matter works in other countries that are smaller and less prosperous than our own, and it seems to me that the time has come when it should be seriously considered by the government of this country. While I am on this subject I might also mention another of great importance; I have reference to the grant to the Victorian Order of Nurses. That grant has been $5,000 a year, which, in my opinion, is a disgracefully small sum for a country like this to contribute to an organization of that kind. The health of the people is a matter of vital importance; it is the most important thing that public money can be expended upon. If hon. members had the privilege of following one of the Victorian Order Nurses on her rounds he would see what a splendid, noble, heroic work these nurses are doing. He would find such a nurse going to homes that would not otherwise receive the attention of any nurse; he would find her going into homes where the people could not afford to pay for the services of a nurse; he would find that the organization was doing a great deal of charitable work. In these circumstances I think it would be a small thing to the country, and the increased taxation would be hardly appreciable, if that grant were made twenty-five thousand dollars instead of five thousand. The committees throughout Canada, working under the patronage of Her Excellency, are doing very valuable work voluntarily, without remuneration, and they are having a hard time. I seriously urge the government to take the matter into consideration.

Now I come to the Civil Service. There is no doubt in my mind that care should be exercised in the dismissals that are made in the Civil Service, because it is a matter of much importance that efficiency be not impaired. I think that a fair living wage should be provided for all who are retained in the service. I do not believe in keeping anyone in the service who is not doing his or her work or who is not of value to the country. I do say, however, that those who are retained should receive a fair living wage, and they should be decently treated just as the employees of an ordinary employer would be treated. The stability of salaries should be established; I do not believe in the principle of bonuses at all. To my mind it is a pernicious system, and more than that it seems to be—in fact I know it is—unsatisfactory to the employees themselves, for they do not know where they stand. I have seen recommendations which have been made by the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada to the government, and I do not think these recommendations are unreasonable. They ask for a salary revision and I think it should be granted; they request that the whole matter be taken up and salaries revised and put upon a fair and reasonable basis. Then there is the matter of superannuation. It is a most unfair thing in my opinion, that a man or woman who has served the country for a number of years, should be turned out upon the street without consideration. We should have superannuation, and I hope the government will do something in that direction.

I agree with those who say that taxation must be reduced, and there are ways of doing it which probably will be discovered by the new Auditor General or by the cabinet themselves. At least I hope so. I think the sales tax should be revised, because unquestionably it is not equitable in its operation. I will give an example of this in connection with our lumbering industry. A tremendous export business has grown up in British Columbia lumber, but those engaged in it are up against the sales tax. For instance, if a saw-milling company receives an order, say, from the Canadian Pacific Railway, for a shipment of lumber, the price will be quoted plus 6 per cent sales tax; if the railway company goes to a licensed wholesaler, the price quoted will be plus 3 per cent sales tax; if an order is given by the Dominion government—and a good deal of lumber is used there by the Public Works department as the minister is aware—the Dominion government has to pay a 6 per cent sales tax, while if the provincial government is the buyer no tax is payable at all. Without going into further detail, I need only say that this condition of affairs is not good business, and there must be a revision of the tax.

Then the income tax should be reduced. I would suggest that life insurance premiums be exempted. I think it is a wise policy to encourage our people to provide protection for their families, and I am not a life insurance agent; I do not need to argue the question. In the province of British Columbia there is an exemption for premiums of life insurance on the life of the taxpayer "not to exceed one-sixth of the total of the gross annual income of the taxpayer, if paid, receipts therefor to be produced to the assessor on demand." That has been the British Columbia law for some time, and is, I understand, also the law in England.

As to the tariff, I wish first of all to state that we in British Columbia are directly as well as indirectly interested in the prosperity of the prairie provinces. They are our neighbours and we are affected immediately by conditions there. In fact, our seaports are claimed by the people of those provinces as their own. The grain from all of Alberta and a great part of Saskatchewan will in a comparatively short time go out by the Pacific coast ports. Estimates have been made by those who know what they are talking about that inside of five years 200,000,000 bushels of grain will be exported through the Pacific ports. Hon. members will appreciate what that means to us. Therefore I say advisedly that we are interested in the prairie provinces in more ways than one. When the farmers on the prairies make money they come to British Columbia to reside, and thereupon their ideas on the tariff completely change—as a general rule they become good Conservatives. I know of them, men who had been heads of locals and had occupied other positions of prominence in the prairie provinces, supported me during the last election. We are glad to have them come to our province, and if any method can be devised to revise the tariff in such a way as to benefit the prairies without seriously hurting us, why every man and woman in British Columbia will hold up both hands for it. We are prepared to co-operate with the farmers of the prairies. Therefore I hope some solution of this difficult question will be arrived at.

On the 10th instant I asked the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Graham) a question in regard to the American tariff on Canadian wheat, and I will read the question and answer as they appear in Hansard of that date:

Mr. W. G. McQuarrie (New Westminster): Might I ask if the government contemplates taking any action, by way of retaliation or otherwise, in regard to the proposed increase in the United States tariff against Canadian wheat and wheat products?

Hon. members will note that I said, "by way of retaliation or otherwise."

Hon. G. P. Graham (Acting Prime Minister): "Retaliation" is a bad word to use in business, if the object of trade is to make a profit. I would not like to say that the government had even been considering retaliation.

Well, apparently they have not been considering anything else in that connection. That is the great trouble with this government—they are inactive, they do nothing.

Mr. GRAHAM: The member for Vancouver did not say so.

Mr. McQUARRIE: You need not take my word for it. I can quote to you from a good Liberal British Columbia newspaper on the subject—a newspaper which, as far as I know, has always supported this government. This is a short extract from the Vancouver Sun of the 17th January last, and is from the clever pen of John P. McConnell:

What is the outstanding fact in Canadian politics to-day? "Inaction of the government," is the answer.

Inaction in progressive legislation, inaction in carrying out promised programmes of development, inaction in reducing taxation, inaction in bringing in immigration, inaction in reducing emigration, inaction in promised tariff reforms, inaction in reducing the expenditures to meet revenues, inaction in reducing the national debt—everywhere you look you see a dreary, silent wilderness of dormant inaction.

This is the most general complaint I hear in Toronto and Montreal by both friends and enemies of the government, in business and political circles.

Inactivity, smug complacence of the government in face of crying demands of the country, are getting on the nerves of the business community. . .

Recent happenings in the East do not tend to increase confidence either in the government's intentions or ability to remedy matters.

That is the trouble in connection with the tariff. In British Columbia, in my constituency for instance, we are very much interested in the tariff. I can tell my Progressive friends that I represent something like 20,000 farmers as well as about 25,000 other people. In my constituency there is the best farming land in British Columbia, the delta of the Fraser river. We produce almost anything that could be produced anywhere, with the possible exception of tropical fruits. We have to admit that "we have no bananas," but otherwise we can produce anything. It is a great dairying district, and besides we produce hay and oats, vegetables of all kinds, and fruits. We have the greatest poultry business of any part of Canada, I suppose. We are right up against this question of the tariff, there is no doubt about it. I do not think my Progressive friends would be anxious to injure us, except perhaps, to benefit themselves in their own respective districts.

The member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) has spoken about fruit; I am interested in fruit, too. We grow in my constituency and in the adjoining constituency large quantities particularly of small fruits and I can corroborate everything the hon. gentleman said in that connection. Let me just mention one point in connection with eggs. Mind you, we are right there beside the border, and running through, but of course not all in, my constituency for a distance of 2,000 miles, from Vancouver to San Diego, California, there is the Pacific highway, a paved road all the way. Every day, I was almost going to say every hour, big truckloads of produce grown in the United States come into our markets via that road and the result is very hurtful indeed to our farmers. I have here an editorial from the same paper that I referred to a moment ago, the Vancouver Sun, dealing with the subject of eggs, and if the House will permit me, I will read it. It was published on the third of this month and it says:

> Failure of the Ottawa government to impose a reciprocal tariff on eggs entering Canada from the United States is having a depressing and, in some instances, an almost calamitous effect on the poultry industry of British Columbia.
>
> Both in point of quality and quantity this province has become one of the chief egg-producing centres of the North American continent.
>
> According to official record of performance figures, the percentage of birds qualified in British Columbia as producers of 150 eggs and over, has increased from 21.2 in 1920, 39.3 in 1921, 47.8 in 1922 to 68.5 in 1923. Annual percentages for the rest of Canada are, 11.9 in 1920, 19.5 in 1921, 19.8 in 1922 and 30.1 in 1923.
>
> British Columbia birds qualified as producers of 225 eggs and over, have increased from 2.2 in 1920 to 18.9 in 1923. The increase in this class for the rest of Canada has only been 1.5 in 1920 to 2.5 in 1923.
>
> British Columbia, therefore, is Canada's chief poultry centre. Legislation in regard to the Canadian poultry business should be based on British Columbia records as a standard.
>
> But instead of encouraging and nourishing the British Columbia poultry industry, existing Canadian tariff laws consistently throw business into the hands of American competitors.
>
> The Eastern Canadian market is flooded at present with American eggs that gain entry to the country on the comparatively negligible tariff impost of 3 cents a dozen. Considering the difference in transportation costs, British Columbia producers cannot begin to compete in the Eastern market under such a handicap.
>
> Moreover, the opportunity to recoup this loss in the New York market is obviated by the fact that Canadian egg exporters are faced with an 8-cent duty when they attempt to ship into the United States.
>
> British Columbia poultrymen, therefore, are shut out of American markets by high American tariffs and shut out of Canadian markets by American competition fostered by low Canadian tariffs.
>
> Until the Canadian Government sets up a reciprocal tariff, this fine healthy industry is doomed to a struggle against adverse circumstances, and the prosperity of Canada will be retarded.

Our neighbours to the south have a great advantage over us in that their season is two or three weeks earlier than ours in respect to all produce; that gives them the opportunity of getting the first market, and the first market is always the best. I submit seriously to the government that something ought to be done on this subject of tariff. At least they should consider doing something, but evidently they are not considering doing anything. If they wish to do right by the people of this country, if they have any interest in their welfare, it seems to me that they should consider what action should be taken in this respect. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) who said it appeared to him that in dealing with our friends on the other side of the line retaliation was the proper medicine.

I have no doubt that hon. members particularly to my left would be greatly disappointed if I did not mention the oriental question. There is just a chance, you know, that unless we say something the government will come to the conclusion that the oriental question is a dead issue. But it is not a dead issue by any means; the people of British Columbia are not going to let it die. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) knows what it is. I was sorry to see him leave the Department of Immigration. I do not know whether we shall have as good a friend in the present minister; he may be all right, but some of the statements he made in the House—in dealing with this subject, about the business we would lose and that kind of thing did not appeal to me at all. It is not a matter of business; it is a matter of the future of this country. If we do not get any business at all from Japan it does not make any difference to us. They have got to do the business anyway; they are buying these things from us because they think it pays them to do so. So that from what the present Minister of Immigration (Mr. Robb) has said on several occasions, it seems to me that he is making too much of that point. Let us forget that business question altogether and think about the matter from the point of view of nationality. As I say, the people of British Columbia are not allowing this oriental question to die; far from it. They are starting something, and the government should be in on it—an oriental survey of the whole Pacific coast, which has opened in the city of Vancouver under the direction of Dr. Robert E. Park of the University of Chicago. If the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Robb) were here I would ask him to pay particular attention to what I am about to read. This is from an article in the Vancouver Province of recent date:

The survey in question will be both scientific and comprehensive. The oriental problem on this coast resembles the weather, of which Mark Twain complained "that though everyone had talked about it very little had been done." The aim of the survey is to replace opinion with facts. For this purpose a carefully directed study will be devoted for a year or more to every phase of the relationship of the oriental to this continent. The survey, in consequence, will not concern itself with any viewpoint or the support or advocacy of any school of thought on this subject.

It is also felt that so far as the oriental is concerned the Pacific slope of Canada and the United States is the racial frontier of America.

The institute offered to co-operate with the people of the coast on any plan for an exhaustive and scientific study of the matter. As a result regional councils have been formed at five points—Vancouver, Seattle, Portland, San Francisco and Los Angeles, and groups at these points have undertaken to raise $30,000 for the work of the survey. The Institute of Social and Religious Research is contributing $25,000.

For this work, the co-operation of the University of Chicago had to be enlisted, as Dr. Park, who is one of the outstanding sociological and psychological experts of America, had to be released for this special work for a year at least. He is the author of a number of works on racial studies made among the negroes of the South, and the Poles, Hebrews and European immigrants. He adopts original and unstereotyped methods. "Get experience, not opinions", he says, "for human experiences are more valuable than statistics. Back of every opinion is an experience. These experiences may not justify opinions, but they explain them."

There will be some very eminent men on the executive. It is under the chairmanship of Dr. Wilbur, head of Leland Stanford University, and includes among its members Dr. Boggs, of the University of British Columbia, Professor Mackenzie of the University of Washington, Professor Sissons of Reed College, Portland, Dr. Bird, President of Occidental College, Los Angeles, and Mr. McCaughey, for fifteen years Superintendent of Education in the Hawaiian Islands.

This survey is going to be most important, and I would suggest to the Minister of Immigration and to the government that the government should take some part in it. So far as I am concerned experience as well as opinion has convinced me that we shall eventually have to come to exclusion; nothing short of that will do. I understand that in the United States also they are contemplating exclusion against the Japanese as well as against the Chinese. During the debate of last session the Prime Minister called attention to the fact that no country in the world had exclusion against the Japanese. If exclusion becomes law in the United States, will the Prime Minister of this country think it is time to have exclusion here? If we are going to have exclusion eventually, now is the time to commence, before this country is filled up with these orientals.

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

I would also submit, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference, that the gentleman's agreement which was negotiated by your worthy self in Japan a number of years ago has outlived its usefulness. It may have been the best arrangement that could have been made at that time, but I submit that the time has come when we in this country should control our own immigration without reference to any foreign country whether friendly or unfriendly. I submit that the gentleman's agreement should be immediately cancelled. Let us make our own immigration laws.

There is just one other matter I shall touch on. The Japanese treaty should be abrogated, for this reason, that it prevents us from passing provincial legislation as to the holding of land and other matters in connection with property and civil rights, and the result is that the most valuable land in British Columbia in the cities and in the country is being acquired by the orientals. My good friends who have been out there know that to be the case. They know that the oriental is taking firm hold and deep root in British Columbia. We must stop it. We cannot stop it by provincial legislation so long as that treaty exists, and I say that if we are going to keep this a white man's country, which it should be, if we are going to keep it for our children and our children's children, now is the time to take action.

On motion of Mr. Boys, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Report of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment for the year ended December 31, 1923.—Hon. Mr. Béland.

GRAND TRUNK GRATUITIES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): As I promised the other day, I beg to lay on the Table of the House the evidence and the report of the Royal Commissioner in the matter of an inquiry into the circumstances re payments made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company to its officers, directors, and so forth.

HOME BANK INVESTIGATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I desire first to congratulate my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the renewed evidence of health and upon his being back with us again. I would ask him whether he is laying on the Table to-day the amended order of reference in connection with the commission which is to investigate the Home Bank affairs.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thank my hon. friend for his kind personal reference. I had anticipated that he might possibly ask the question he has and I therefore brought with me a copy of the order in council referred to, and which I will now place on the Table. I might read to the House the concluding paragraph of the order which refers to the extent to which the scope of the commission has been amended:

> The Committee of the Privy Council therefore advise that the powers of the Commissioner under the said order in council be not limited to the specific years 1915, 1916 and 1918 referred to in the petition of the depositors, but should extend to an investigation of the affairs of the said bank during the whole interval between the issue of the bank's charter and the failure of the said bank, including any representations made to the government of the day, as to its condition, any action taken by any of the Ministers of Finance upon such representations as may have been made, and the effect on the position of the depositors of any audit under Section 56A of the Bank Act if made at any time in consequence of such representations.
> In view of additional representations which have been made to the government that at divers times while the said bank was in existence deposits were made and afterwards withdrawn by various depositors, under conditions which might require explanation, the Committee of the Privy Council further advise that the attention of the Commissioner be especially directed to this feature in the course of his investigation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask my right hon. friend whether this now represents the final attitude of the government, or whether the government is still open to receive suggestions. One of the chief complaints made in connection with this bank is that the bank ought never to have received a charter. That whole inquiry is shut off by this investigation. The inquiry, therefore, cannot serve a useful purpose, if we have regard to one of the chief essentials upon which the country ought to be advised, not only in connection with the position of the Home Bank, but as regards what proper safeguards ought to be taken in connection with the incorporation of such institutions. I hope this is not a final delivery.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is the first time I have heard it suggested that the government should go beyond the period at which the bank was created to inquire into its affairs; but the government is always ready to receive suggestions and to consider them carefully.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I also wish to extend my congratulations to the Prime Minister on his return. I think we are all glad to see him again. I wish to ask the government the following question: Whether it is a fact, as stated in the press, that the government has already appointed a national committee to study the St. Lawrence great waterway project. If so, will the government give the House information as to the personnel and terms of reference of the committee alleged to have been appointed?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thank my hon. friend for his opening word. I am not less pleased to see him again. I also anticipated that the question which he has asked might be asked, and I have brought to the House the correspondence relating to the deep waterway project on the St. Lawrence. As hon. members of the House observed, the correspondence was given out at Washington on Friday night, but it was not given out at Ottawa. The explanation of that circumstance is to be found by reference to the concluding paragraph of the despatch which was sent from Ottawa to Washington and which reads:

> It is suggested, subject to the concurrence by telegraph of the United States government, that this correspondence be released on the night of Friday the 14th instant, for publication simultaneously here and at Washington on the morning of Saturday the 15th instant.

Unfortunately, no telegram was received at Ottawa from Washington until Saturday morning, and in the absence of a telegram, concurring in giving out the correspondence on Friday night, the officials of the government did not feel justified in giving out the correspondence on this side.

In regard to the question which my hon. friend has asked as to the national committee, I can perhaps best answer him by explaining in a word exactly what is said in the correspondence. We have agreed that the engineering board which originally investigated matters be enlarged in accordance with the recommendation which was made by the International Joint Commission that considered the matter. The original board had two members, one Canadian and one a citizen of the United States. We have agreed for purposes of further inquiry to the enlargement of the board to six, three Canadians and three from the United States. The American government have agreed with us to this enlargement. In intimating to the American government that we were willing to enlarge the board in this way, we intimated that the government intended appointing a national committee to advise the government itself on various aspects of this important national question on which the government should be fully advised. When the Americans received our report, they intimated to us in reply that they also would appoint a national committee, and they suggested that our national committee and their national committee should meet together to decide what questions were to be referred to the enlarged joint engineering board. We intimated in our reply that to adopt that course would be to change the complexion of the national committee in a manner which would make it an international committee rather than a national committee; that we had intended our national committee to be distinctively for the purpose of advising our own government, not for other purposes, and we suggested, therefore, that for the present at least the American government should follow the suggestion which we originally made of appointing one or two representatives to confer with one or two representatives from our country to decide upon the questions that were to be referred to the enlarged joint engineering board. Our American friends have accepted that suggestion, and we are now awaiting the nomination of representatives from the government of the United States to meet with representatives of our government to decide on the questions that are to be referred to this enlarged joint engineering board. Two or three of those questions have already been set forth in the exchange of correspondence which has taken place. In addition, our government has appointed an inter-departmental committee composed of members of the Civil Service to accumulate information relating to this important project in its different bearings, to advise and inform the government on matters that they think are important for consideration, also if so desired, to advise the national committee when it is formed.

I notice in the press that the impression seems to have gone abroad that while the United States government has appointed a national committee of representative citizens, we have appointed only a committee composed of members of the Civil Service. Our national committee has not been appointed as yet. It will be appointed in due course, and will be for the purpose of advising the government on various aspects of this question of great national concern. The committee that has been referred to in the press as an advisory committee to the government, is the smaller departmental committee which I have already spoken of, and of which Colonel Biggar, the government counsel, has been appointed chairman. On that committee there is a representative from the Departments of Railways and Canals, Marine and Fisheries, Interior, Public Works, Trade and Commerce, and Finance. Those six officials will form a small inter-departmental committee to sift information that is already in the possession of the government and to take any suggestions that are likely to be of service and of help to the larger committee which will subsequently be appointed.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will the national committee have really more to say than the government in the report to be made by the joint committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The final say will rest with the government. The national committee will be advisory to the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, arising out of what my right hon. friend has just said, the final solution of the question will depend to a great extent upon the manner in which these different subjects are left to the engineering committee. Am I to understand that this national committee is to have the sole responsibility of settling the different questions for reference? I should have thought that as what is to be left for inquiry and the manner in which it is to be left, really goes to the meat of the whole question, it ought to be submitted to this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government will appoint representatives to meet the representatives of the United States to decide what questions are to be referred to the enlarged engineering board. In that way the government will be able to control the subjects that are to be covered by the reference. It is contemplated that the enlarged joint engineering board may take a little time to do its work, and during the interval other questions may be referred to it as may seem advisable, either upon representations of the inter-departmental committee, or of the national committee, or which may come to the government from any hon. member of this House. The government will be prepared to accept full responsibility both for what may and what may not be submitted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wanted to find out whether the questions would be submitted to the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No action which will in any way finally bind the country will be taken without full reference to parliament.

RURAL CREDITS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Has the government received a report from the commissioner or commissioners appointed last year to investigate the question of rural credits? If so, when may we expect this report to be laid upon the Table?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): As soon as the report is received it will have the consideration of the government.

CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): In view of the report in the daily press that the bonus to the Civil Service will be discontinued, and inasmuch as this has caused a great deal of disturbance among the postal workers, I would ask the government if they have so decided; and, in that case, if we may expect an immediate revision of salaries in which the bonus will be taken into account?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government's intentions with respect to the bonus will be made quite clear as soon as the estimates are presented to parliament. The estimates have been ready for the past week or so and will be placed on the Table just as soon as the debate on the Address is concluded.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I was going to ask a question on the same subject.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Kelly for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Sutherland, resumed from Friday, March 14.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted in the first place to associate myself with those congratulations which have proceeded from this side of the House to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister upon his return to this chamber in renewed health, strength and vigour, if we may judge from his appearance to-day? Let me assure him that during his absence, under the genial leadership of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Graham), we have conducted ourselves, I think, with due diligence and with due dignity. I doubt if a better choice could have been made for Acting Prime Minister than the Minister of Railways and Canals. His genial disposition, his uniform good nature, coupled with his long parliamentary experience, made him an ideal Acting Prime Minister, and if we have conducted our proceedings aright, great credit is no doubt due to him for it.

I regret very much the absence from the chamber this afternoon of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I believe he is unavoidably away from the city. I heard him in the address which he delivered in this House on Friday afternoon with the greatest of interest, and I had intended to-day to enter upon a reply to some of the questions which he brought to our attention on that occasion. However, I shall have to proceed in his absence, as I am sure he, of all men, will not charge me with any lack of courtesy in so doing.

What was most noticeable in the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice was not what he said, but rather what he omitted to say. We all enjoy his good humour, his jocular manner, his clever epigrams, but after all I do not think anyone would say that his speech could be called a serious pronouncement by a serious minister upon a serious subject. It was extremely witty, in parts it was brilliant, but the most outstanding feature was its careful avoidance of any discussion of the question which has occupied the attention of the House during the last two weeks and of the business interests of the whole Dominion. A most courteous invitation was certainly extended to him by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) a few days ago—if not to him, to some minister of the Crown—to state for the benefit of the House and for the information of the country what was the government's intention, what was its real meaning in portions of the language which it adopted in the Speech delivered from the Throne at the opening of this session. It has been said from this side of the House that the Speech from the Throne, on the whole, might be described as an election manifesto, and I do not think this criticism is altogether unreasonable. I do not propose for one moment to discuss the fulsome flattery of itself which the government has seen fit to include in the Speech from the Throne; if it pleases them, let them have the benefit. But the outstanding paragraph in the Speech from the Throne is one which, I

.nink, might be fairly described as ambiguous had the Prime Minister himself not undertaken to remove the ambiguity and to elucidate the paragraph in question. It was assumed from the outset by the official opposition, and I think, likewise in the Progressive ranks, that the language employed in a certain paragraph in the Speech from the Throne was a direct reference to the government's intention with regard to the customs tariff. I am going to quote the exact language, though it has been quoted on several occasions in the House:

> In the opinion of the government, such reduction of taxation as it may be possible to effect should aim primarily at reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, thereby aiding materially in the development of our natural resources, and through cheapened production, effecting a diminution also in the cost of living.

Now, that clause as it stands, unexplained, might well refer to a reduction of some direct taxation other than the tax imposed indirectly by the customs tariff. But it has been assumed from the beginning of this debate by this side of the House that the reference in question was to a removal of customs taxation, and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who spoke in reply to my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) on the opening day of this debate, made it abundantly clear, by the justification which he offered for the presence of that clause in the Speech from the Throne, that the intention of the government was to make a reduction of taxation under the customs tariff in regard to the instruments of production.

This is how the matter came up: My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, speaking of the Speech of my right hon. leader, said,—page 31 of Hansard:

> The impression he tried to convey to the House was that the Speech from the Throne was not the place to mention the tariff.

And then the Prime Minister proceeds to justify the mention of tariff action in the Speech from the Throne, and cites an instance which occurred in 1921, and another in 1897, where an intimation was given in the Speech from the Throne that tariff revision would take place during the ensuing session. There is no doubt, therefore, as to what was in the Prime Minister's mind; there is no doubt what was in the government's mind when this paragraph was inserted in the Speech from the Throne. The Prime Minister goes on and makes it doubly clear when he says again at page 31, in regard to the Speech from the Throne presented to this House in 1897;

> That is the wording of the Speech from the Throne by a Liberal administration in 1897. That promise in the Speech from the Throne was implemented. . . and the promise made to-day by His Excellency will be implemented.

I think the Prime Minister has made it abundantly clear that the disputed paragraph in the Speech from the Throne is a direct intimation of a reduction in customs taxation, and also that the intimation there given is going to be implemented by legislation during the present session.

I agree with those who take the view that it is not proper to mention any question of tariff reduction or tariff increase in the Speech from the Throne. I have been a member of the House for a good many years and I cannot recall a single instance in which this has been done. I can see very very grave reasons indeed why it should not be done; I can see no reason why it should be done. During the first session in which I had the honour to sit in this House, a constituent of mine requested me to ascertain if the government contemplated any change in the duty on books, as he expected an importation from the United States. In my innocence I approached the veteran Finance Minister of the Liberal party (Mr. Fielding), who was Finance Minister also at that time, and made the inquiry of him. Why, his very look was most staggering, and I remember well his language; he said: "Guthrie, I would consider myself everlastingly disgraced if I gave anyone any intimation as to the government's action in regard to the tariff before the budget was brought down." That was the principle he maintained throughout his long career, and I am inclined to believe that had he been able to occupy his place in the House at the opening of the present session, had he been able to deliberate with his colleagues in the preparation of the Speech from the Throne, no mention of contemplated reduction in the tariff would have been made. What is the effect of this announcement by the government? Merely to cause hesitation and uncertainty in all business operations which may possibly be affected by tariff changes; merely to cause a halt, to cause delay; to stop contracts; to create uncertainty in the business world. What would be the effect in a moment if the government stated in the Speech from the Throne that during the present session they would increase the tax on sugar? What would happen? Think of the speculation which would take place immediately in sugar. So it is with agricultural implements: the announcement that a reduction is going to be made has caused great business disarrangement in this country. Farmers will not order, jobbers will not order, manufacturers are fearful of going ahead; they want to know what is going to happen before they enter upon any new engagements.

To my mind, the statement contained in the Speech from the Throne in this regard is a very grave impropriety. I do not believe that under normal circumstances the Prime Minister would have committed the error or have it allowed to be committed. But I believe there was a direct and positive reason why the statement was made at this particular time in the Speech from the Throne. This government is known as a minority government; it has not a majority of the members of the House in support of it—not openly, at all events. The government had to give some positive assurance which would enable them to secure support from the Progressives in the House from the opening day of parliament; the government could not wait for the budget. Many important questions usually arise in this House early in the session which are voted upon before the budget is brought down, and in order to feel secure from the very opening day the government deliberately placed this improper statement of fiscal policy in the Speech from the Throne—in other words, in order to secure for themselves a certain measure of Progressive support. I will say this on behalf of the government, that while its action looks to me like a very grave impropriety, it is fairly good political engineering. The government was out on a fishing expedition; it was out fishing for Progressive votes, and it determined to bait its hook with Progressive bait, and it thought the most alluring bait would be an announcement of a reduction of the customs tariff on the instruments of production. The government was wise in its preparation and in its arrangements. It had merely to cast its bait upon the water and it immediately landed the leader of the Progressive party.

Mr. FORKE: A pretty good fish.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And now I think the Prime Minister can congratulate himself that he has at the present time almost the whole Progressive party in his basket. That was the purpose of putting this tariff statement in the Speech from the Throne. I do not know that my illustration of fishing for Progressive votes is perhaps as apt as the illustration given by my right hon. leader in his opening speech of this session, where he referred to the philosophy of Samuel Butler as expressed in that simple couplet which he placed on Hansard, that—

> Round white stones will serve, they say,
> As well as eggs to make hens lay.

Such was the homely philosophy of a very ancient rhymer and philosopher who lived in the days of the Stuart Kings in England. The philosophy is pretty sound to-day. Carrying the inquiry just a little further I wonder which particular member of the government devised this wonderful scheme of the nest egg. Thinking it over last night coming down on the train I thought that probably this scheme had its origin in the fertile mind of our good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). He is such a joker and he knows something about egg-laying and egg-laying contests. Whoever devised the scheme should be rewarded; it was a good scheme for the purpose. The government took a round white stone as a nest egg, and artfully placed it in the Speech from the Throne with a deliberate purpose, and hardly had the nest egg sentence fallen from the lips of His Excellency the Governor General than the leader of the Progressive party at once began to lay and to cackle. I reside in what may be called one of the more or less rural districts of the province of Ontario, and I know that at this particular season of the year many of the newspaper editors in my part of the country, particularly the weekly newspaper editors, are deluged with callers who produce a big egg. There will be John Smith who brings to the newspaper office a large egg from his Plymouth Rock stock; John Jones brings an egg from his Brahmas, and John Brown brings an egg that one of his Minorcas has laid, and so on. But the country editors in my part of the country and in the province of Ontario generally this spring have all become back numbers. The Winnipeg Free Press has them all "licked a mile" because the leader of the Progressive party on the first day of the session brought into the Free Press office a great white round, meaty egg saying, "Look at the egg that the Progressives have laid for the government on this occasion." I think the government may congratulate itself upon the result of the little device which it adopted to catch the unwary.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to suggest to the hon. member that a round white stone is better than a rotten egg anyway.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am in perfect agreement with my hon. friend that a round white stone is better than a rotten egg, and I do not know anyone in the House who would think otherwise. However, this I am going to say to my hon. friend the leader of the Progressive party: Now that he and his party have started to lay and to cackle at the bidding of the present government, why not go a step further? I have been told, and I am sure it is true, that the Progressive group in this House is made up of members of what we call the two traditional political parties in the Dominion of Canada. Formerly they were all either Liberals or Conservatives. They were elected to this House under the name of Progressives, but I have been informed that as we sit here to-day, of the Progressive group probably ninety per cent would have formerly lined up as Grits thoroughly dyed in the wool. One man remarked that you had only to scratch the skin of a Progressive and out would come the virus of the Grit. Well, why do they not come out in the open? Why do they not do as two of their number did last session, cross the floor of the House and openly support the government? Why not go across the floor and lay and cackle and roost in the old Grit henhouse instead of trying to keep up the illusion any longer? What interests me is to know what that large body of Conservative voters who voted for these hon. gentlemen at the last election will think of it. I know how it was in my own riding. In several townships practically every Conservative and every Grit voted for the Progressive candidate. They thought that they were voting for a man who had grown sick and tired of the two old political parties, and that the Progressives were launching out on a new movement for themselves. They desired to elect a man who had some class consciousness as a farmer, and they voted almost solidly for the Progressive candidate. They came so near to defeating me that I did not know the actual result for a while, but I managed to get in by a somewhat narrow majority. I wonder what the tens of thousands of Conservative farmers throughout the Dominion of Canada think, who voted at the last election for the Progressive party when they see them practically pledging their support to their old Grit friends—and before very long I predict that you will see them going over bodily to their old party allegiance.

Passing for a moment from that branch of the subject, I would like to touch upon one or two of the more outstanding remarks of my friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). His first criticism was directed against my right hon. friend and leader for what he called his pessimistic view of the country's situation and his lack of anything in the nature of a constructive suggestion or of constructive leadership. It is not the part of the leader of the opposition to formulate the policies of the country. Such is the work of the government. A great leader in this House, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said upon one occasion in this House that the first duty of an opposition was to oppose, to scan narrowly and to criticize. It is the prime duty of the government to bring forward to the House constructive legislation. Does the criticism come well from the lips of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice when he says that the leader of the opposition has failed to propose constructive legislation? Has he to do more than glance over the record of his own party during the last two and a half years to realize the utter lack of anything in the nature of constructive legislation which has been brought to the attention of parliament by this government? Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that the wheat board fiasco, that legislation of two years ago could be considered as a piece of real constructive legislation? Would the Minister of Justice, the first law officer of the Crown in this country, commend that legislation as a fair sample of the constructive work of this government? Would he be inclined to boast of the legislation of last session in regard to the regulation of lake freights? Is he proud of the grotesque situation which arose last autumn when the people of this country were actually humiliated by this government telling foreign ship owners that they could violate the laws of Canada? Is that constructive legislation of which the Minister of Justice would be inclined to boast? Has there been any constructive legislation, think you, in connection with the Labour department of this government? It is a strange commentary to make on the administration of that department, that upon three separate occasions in two short years this government has had to call out the military forces of this country to overawe labour men down in the Maritime provinces. Does that constitute constructive legislation, I would, Mr. Speaker, like to ask the Minister of Justice?

What constructiveness has the government displayed in regard to the movement of population from this country to the United States? Has it suggested anything, has it devised any means to stop it? Has it originated any scheme which it is submitting to parliament to try to remedy that evil? It is an evil, and more than an evil, and it is a most melancholy thing to contemplate, but perhaps the most melancholy thing presented to us is to be found in the trade reports furnished by this government when, in order to magnify the figures of the total export trade of this country, it includes in its statement of exports $9,699,000 worth of settlers effects, the goods and chattels of people who are actually leaving the country. Does not that statement in the export returns of the country tell its own story? "Oh," but you say "there are the imports of effects of settlers who have come in." Yes, but for just one-half the amount, $4,640,000. I am taking these figures from the January statement published on the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Exports of the effects of settlers going to the United States in the same period, $9,699,000. These figures furnish a sorry tale. What constructive legislation does the government propose in regard to that matter? Is the exodus from this country one of the monuments to its skill, is it one of the monuments to its constructive activity, is it something to boast of? No, Mr. Speaker, rather to be ashamed of, I would say.

I only mention these matters as a few instances of the government's misdirected activities. But the one, I think, of which the Minister of Justice was most proud, the one he was inclined the most stoutly to defend, was what we knew, or what we once knew, in this chamber, as the Halibut treaty. Now, no one knows so well as does the Minister of Justice that to-day there is no Halibut treaty in existence. There was a proposal for a treaty at one time. A proposal is one thing, and a treaty is another thing. That proposal has not been ratified by the Senate of the United States, and until it is ratified by that body it does not become a treaty. It is true that the Minister of Justice, speaking on Friday afternoon, said he had reason to believe that at some time in the near future the Senate of the United States would ratify the treaty; but how my hon. friend can view it as a government achievement, can refer to it as a piece of constructive legislation, can boast of it, passes my comprehension or the compehension of anyone who understands the real situation in regards to the Halibut proposal. There is no such thing as a Halibut treaty in existence to-day. There is merely a proposal now before the Senate of the United States in that respect.

Mr. MARTELL: That is special pleading.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When you bring back a treaty on this question from Washington, then perhaps, I may ask to have my special pleading removed from the record.

There is another statement I wish to allude to. It is a statement contained in the speech of the Prime Minister, to be found on page 35 of Hansard. The Prime Minister was criticizing the speech of the leader of the opposition and he used this language:

> In the course of his speech he touched on some matters that appear in the Speech from the Throne, but he ignored other very important matters. He said nothing of what this government has done to reduce the public debt, to lessen taxation, and to effect economies in the public service—of these things my right hon. friend never said a word.

I was a good deal put about when I heard that language used in this chamber, and I did not know whether to feel guilty myself or not. I had during the parliamentary recess on one or two occasions made speeches, and in those speeches I had deliberately stated that this government had increased the net debt of Canada, and also had increased the direct taxation. Consequently I was considerably nonplussed when I heard this statement of the Prime Minister on the opening day of the debate, and the following day I went down to the Finance department to find out just where the mistake arose. I got the figures from the Deputy Minister of Finance, and I found that I was not very much astray in my statement, but that the suggestion of the Prime Minister—because that is all I can call it, it was not a positive statement—was entirely wrong, and that my figures were absolutely right. The figures which were given to me by the Deputy Minister of Finance were as follows: On the 29th February, 1924, —that is a few days ago—the total net debt of Canada was $2,410,162,174.71. I then turned to the public accounts of this country to know what the net debt of Canada was when the late government gave up office in December, 1921, and at page 48 I found the net debt at the end of the fiscal year 1921 was $2,340,878,-983.69. Thus, by a simple process of subtraction one finds whether or not this government has increased the net debt. If reliance can be placed upon the official figures which I have obtained from the department the difference is $69,000,000 of a net increase in round numbers.

Mr. BELAND: Did my hon. friend give the figures for the net debt at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22 as over two billions?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The figures are $2,340,-878,983.

Mr. BELAND: Are you quite sure of your figures?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am only taking them from page 48 of the Public Accounts laid on the Table by the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) in the year 1922.

Mr. BELAND: I have secured some figures from the Finance department which show the net debt on March 31, 1922, was $2,422,000,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am giving it at the end of the fiscal year: At the end of the fiscal year, 1922, the amount was $2,422,135,801.

Mr. BELAND: That is the debt for which the previous government is responsible.

Mr. GUTHRIE: For nine months of that year I think we were responsible, and for three months we were not responsible, and this computation does not take into account at all a sum, which I believe is $8,000,000, which has recently come to this country, and which really should have gone to the credit of the former government. It has been paid recently, but paid by the British government as a settlement of a disputed item of exchange. It should have gone to the credit of the former government, though the payment was delayed, and this government is now taking credit for that amount.

Then, turning to the question of the taxation of the country, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) dealt with that question rather fully the other night, and he laboured to show that, in regard to taxation, Canada was really the most leniently taxed country in the whole British Empire. I think, however, that my hon. friend's figures in regard to taxation were somewhat misleading. In giving the figures for Great Britain and New Zealand, I think he gave the figures which represent the total per capita taxation of these countries. Then when he came to Australia and Canada he gave only the per capita taxation based upon Dominion taxes. In other words, so far as the Dominion of Canada was concerned the figures given by the hon. Minister of Justice on Friday night represented Dominion taxes only.

But we all know that in this country we have, in addition to Dominion taxes, provincial taxes, in some instances very heavy, and likewise municipal taxes, in many instances very heavy. I do not know that anyone can supply the exact figures pertaining to Canada at the present time, but it must be pretty generally understood that taxation per capita of a citizen of this Dominion who resides in the province of Ontario is well over the hundred-dollar mark, whereas in the figures given by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice on Friday night he stated that taxation for the Dominion of Canada to be $36.67. I am sure, from the figure given that he has included Dominion taxation only. But what is the point in his remarks? He was criticizing my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) because he had stated that the taxation in the Dominion of Canada under the late government was low. What has this government done to change it? Have there been any decreases in taxation during the last three years that anyone can point out? I am referring to direct taxation. We know of several increases in direct taxation, such as the increase in the sales tax, the increase in the cheque tax, and the adoption of a receipt tax. These are all increases. What can the government point to, or what could the Minister of Justice point to if he were here, in the way of decreases? And the good showing he was able to make in the figures he submitted to the House on Friday afternoon last was entirely to the credit of the preceding government. Any action in the matter by the present government has been to increase, and in no case has it been to decrease, the amount of direct taxation per capita upon the citizens of the Dominion.

There is another point which I would like to take up with the Minister of Justice, if he were here, upon which we cannot agree. I have tried to verify my figures—and I hope his figures will stand a similar examination—but there is a great discrepancy between us. I refer to his statement in regard to commercial failures in Canada. The Minister of Justice said that mercantile failures in Canada had decreased fifty per cent last year. He did not give any figures. I had before me statistical returns as sent out by Dun and Company, a recognized commercial agency in this country, whose reports are generally accepted as reliable. What do they show? I will take the whole period during which the late administration held power, the years 1918, 1919, 1920 and 1921. In that period Dun and Company report a total of 5,157 mercantile failures, for liabilities involving $110,000,000. Then I take the two years during which this government has held office, 1922 and 1923, and I find the total failures 6,942 and the total liabilities $129,000,000. Still, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice stated that this year showed a decrease of fifty per cent over last year. It may be that he was misled by Dun and Company's report. If he takes eleven months of last year—in the latest chart the month December 1923, is not included—he would find the total liabilities were fifty per cent less than the total liabilities of 1922, but he will not find it if he takes the whole year and if he takes the total number of failures from Dun and Company he will find the figures which I have just now included in my remarks.

Another matter I wish to refer to is the question of the building of ships at Victoria during the year 1919. A rather severe attack was launched by the Minister of Justice in his speech on Friday against his predecessors in power in regard to the expenditure of money on the Pacific coast in the year 1919 or the year 1920. By his remarks he left a very clear inference on the minds of hon. members in this House that this expenditure was authorized and proceeded with for the purpose of assisting in a by-election then pending in that province. Now, the by-election was that of our good friend the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), who joined the government of Sir Robert Borden in September 1919. The by-election took place in that month. But the shipbuilding contract was not launched until December, 1919. It could have no reference to the by-election. It had no reference to the by-election. Why was it done? The year 1919 was a very difficult year in this country for any government. The armistice took place in November, 1918, and within twelve months of the armistice we had brought back to this country probably 400,000 soldiers who had been performing their duties as soldiers of the Empire for one, two, three, or in some cases, four years. The question of unemployment was a very serious one; it was one with which the government had to grapple, and the government deliberately set about grappling with that question. In some cases, we paid out money by way of doles. In some cases, we provided work. Great expenditures were undertaken solely for the purpose of giving employment, particularly to returned soldiers. A great many soldiers, on their return to Canada, went straight to British Columbia. British Columbia, after the war, received more soldiers than she had contributed to the war, and labour conditions in the city of Victoria in December, 1919, were rather serious. The question was: Should the government pay out doles to the unemployed, particularly to the soldiers, or should it furnish them with work? The question at once arose: What work could be given them? It was decided that it would be better to build ships to provide necessary labour than to take any other course. The soldiers themselves approved that course; they wanted work, not doles. It was decided, therefore, to build at Victoria four wooden ships. Wooden ships were decided upon after some disagreement, and after much consultation. The Minister of Justice, (Mr. Lapointe) on Friday afternoon read a letter from the Hon. C. C. Ballantyne, at that time Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the former government. In that letter, Mr. Ballantyne stated very plainly that he was opposed to the construction of wooden ships; that he had opposed this method of construction from the beginning. That is true. That letter was written in March or April, 1920, following the order given in the preceding December; but I am not transgressing any rule nor making public any secret when I say that Mr. Ballantyne was always opposed to a programme of building wooden ships; he advocated steel ships. The difficulty was this as regards building steel ships at Victoria, that a very large part of the work would have to be performed either in Nova Scotia or in the United States. The unemployment was at Victoria. Wooden ships would require labour right from the forest where the trees stood until the ships were finally completed. I know it was said by some that the days of wooden ships were over; I know it was argued that wooden ships would never again pay; but we had a very strong opinion from the veteran Finance Minister of the Liberal party (Mr. Fielding) upon that question, which is to be found at pages 350-351 of Hansard of 1918, when a discussion took place in regard to steel and wooden ships. In that speech the Minister of Finance said:

> There has been in the past, and I believe there will be in the future, quite a demand for wooden ships of the smaller class. I believe the conditions that will exist at the close of the war, and for some years after the war, will be such that there will be large opportunity for the wooden shipbuilders of the country to engage in their enterprise. So that I feel that, in giving the preference to steel ship building as the hon. minister is doing, there is no danger of any injustice being done to the wooden shipbuilding industry. I believe that industry will flourish for some years to come without any particular aid from the government.

That was an opinion expressed when the matter was under discussion in parliament, but that opinion was backed by assurances of various men both in and out of the cabinet which then existed. An agreement was finally come to with a shipbuilding company at Victoria for the construction of four wooden ships, in the construction of which certain classes of returned soldier labour were to be employed. Unfortunately the government made a contract with a company which subsequently got into financial difficulties. The government agreed to advance $175,000 per ship and the company was to finance the balance, the government taking a mortgage on the ships for the amount. The company went into liquidation; it was wound up in the courts of British Columbia. The government was left with its contract not a quarter completed, with material unpaid, unpaid labour bills, and unpaid board bills for some of the soldiers who had not received their wages. The government was compelled to take over the plant and ships, and took also the loss which the minister stated to the House on Friday afternoon. Were we right or were we wrong? Was it better to employ that labour or to pay the money out in doles? One or other course had to be taken. We employed the labour; we made a loss; but saved the unemployment situation as it existed at the time at Victoria, and I doubt very much if we would have got out of it any more cheaply had we decided upon the payment of doles rather than the employment of men.

But just now, when I speak of returned soldiers, when the Minister of Soldier Civil Re-establisment (Mr. Beland) is in his place, there is one thing that appears to me to be so glaring and shocking in regard to the expenditures of this government which claims to be such an economical government, that I would like to bring it directly to the attention of the minister and the House. I have been handed a statement of the expenditures of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment for the year ended March 31, 1923. It is compiled from the report of that year placed upon the Table by the minister a few days ago and from the Auditor General's report placed on the Table a few days ago. The minister will, I trust, give it his attention and further when the time comes, when his estimates are before the House, I hope he can show that in some respects this statement is inaccurate. I doubt, however, if he can, as I am assured that it has been very carefully prepared. What does it show? It shows that last year the department expended $13,375,134.89. No one would object to that expenditure for returned soldiers, for wounded soldiers, for crippled soldiers, or for their dependents; but when you find that of that total expenditure $6,000,649.30 went to pay official salaries and only $3,065,230.72 went for the maintenance of all the hospitals and $4,309,254.87 for all the pay and allowances to soldiers and their dependents, what do these figures mean when they are divided up?

Mr. BELAND: Has my hon. friend the figures for the preceding year?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr BELAND: Will he give them to the House?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will. What do these figures show? They show that last year, in official salaries, it took over $6,000,000 to supervise the expenditure of $7,000,000, of which the soldiers received in pay $4,000,000 odd and the cost of all the institutions was $3,000,000 odd. The percentages of expenditure are as follows:

	Per cent
For official salaries..	44.87
For administrative charges, maintenance of hospitals, etc..	22.92
Payment to soldiers and their dependents..	32.21

My hon. friend has asked me to give the figures for the preceding year. I have them. I have the figures also for 1920 and 1921 if they are desired. During the year 1922 there was a total expenditure of $17,818,646.70. Of this amount salaries of officials took $6.921,432.62, or 38.84 per cent of the total.

Mr. BELAND: I know the hon. gentleman wants to be fair. Does he take into consideration the fact that in the year he is now quoting eight hundred officials were paid by the Board of Pension Commissioners, and therefore their salaries are not included in the figures he gives as being the salaries of the officials of that year? Moreover, when my hon. friend says that that amount is paid in salaries and does not go towards the support of hospitals, he is saying, unwittingly I think, something which is not accurate. Salaries include the salaries of all physicians in the hospitals.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understood that. As it is detailed—

Mr. BELAND: Does not my hon. friend think doctors may be considered officials?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. "Official salaries," it is called here.

Mr. BELAND: Yes, no "s" after the "l."

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then under the other heading we have "Administrative charges (other than salaries) maintenance, hospitals, supplies, etc." So salaries are not included under the heading of administrative charges. Administration charges for the year 1922 are given in the statement at $3,957,045.26, payment to soldiers and their dependents, also relief, $6,940,168.82, or a total of $17,818,646.70. What are the percentages of salaries? For 1922, the percentage was 38.84, for 1923, it was 44.87 of the total amount. The administrative charges for 1922 represented a percentage of 22.27, for 1923 it was 22.92—almost the same. The percentage of payments to soldiers in 1922 stood at 38.89, for 1923 it fell to 32.21.

I should like to have these figures placed on Hanasard as they appear in this statement in order that the minister may have an opportunity of looking into them, and if any corrections should be made, I shall be very glad if he will let me know what they are. I may say that the statement has been prepared from the report of his department and from the Auditor General's report laid on the table. I am told that the percentages for this year ending 31 March next, will be far less in regard to the amount payable to soldiers and their dependents and for maintenance of hospitals, but that for the payment of officials the percentage will be far greater for the year ending on the 31st day of the present month, but for this year I have no satisfactory information. I will now read the figures of which I have spoken:

In the absence of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) I shall omit some questions which I would have dealt with had he been in his seat.

Now I turn again to the particular clause in the Address which has caused by far the major part of the discussion upon His Excellency's Speech both in parliament and in the country. The government's action in regard to the tariff in the session of 1922, and again in the session of 1923, has been aptly described by my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and concurred in by my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Raymond) as a policy of nibbling. I think the word correctly describes the government's policy—if policy it can be called—in respect to the customs tariff. In the session of 1922 the government nibbled at the agricultural schedules; they reduced certain lines of agricultural machinery by 2½ per cent on the one hand, and on the other hand they increased the sales tax by 2 per cent. They did practically nothing but nibble that year. I know it was argued in this House by government supporters that a reduction of 2½ per cent on agricultural implements would not injure the manufacturer. This was stated time and time again; however, we must judge of these things by actual results. What has been the result? No sooner had the act been passed authorizing the reduction of 2½ per cent than the manufacturers of the United States began taking advantage of it by increasing their shipments into Canada. The figures pertaining to importation of agricultural implements from United States, rose and rose rapidly. They rose from $7,985,320 to a total last year of $11,701,106 according to the trade return which has been prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce. In a single year the imports of agricultural implements from United States increased by $3,716,000 as a result of a 2½ per cent cut in the Canadian tariff.

Did anyone in Canada receive any benefit from the reduction? Did the farmers of the East or of the West receive one particle of benefit from that reduction? The opposition pointed out to them at the time that they would not be benefited. Do they now believe they did receive benefit? If so, in what respect, may I ask? Did the producers of Canada get any benefit? Certainly not? Did the workingmen of Canada get any benefit? Certainly not. I think the House will be of one opinion upon these questions and will answer No to all of them. Well then, upon whom was any benefit conferred by this tariff reduction? It was conferred solely and only upon the United States manufacturer and the United States workmen; and upon no one else. It is known by everybody that almost the lowest schedule in our customs tariff is that pertaining to agricultural implements; 10 per cent, 12½ per cent up to 15 per cent on plows I believe is the range of duties in the agricultural schedule. To take it away would, in my humble judgment—and my opinion is not based on my own information, but on information that has been given me by men who ought to know—blot that industry out as a Canadian industry; it could not exist. What would be the result if you blotted it out? Men idle, certainly, many thousands of them. What are they going to do. Migrate to the United States, I suppose. Canadian factories closed, Canadian capital lost. Who is going to benefit? Did any Canadians benefit by the 2½ per cent reduction? They did not. Farmers, mechanics and manufacturers were all losers by this instance of tariff nibbling. Prices of implements to the consumer were not reduced; in fact they were increased. Upon this point I can only give the information received from the West by the Prime Minister last year and placed by him, on Hansard, in the shape of an advertisement from a western paper, which says:

> We are still in business carrying a full line of International Harvester Agricultural Implements, but regret at this time to have to inform the public that prices on agricultural implements have been slightly advanced since last season, for which we are not responsible.
>
> Advances on some of the more important lines are as follows:
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Binders | $ 8 00 |
> | Seeders | 12 00 |
> | Mower and Rake | 3 50 |
> | Gang Plow | 6 00 |
> | Cultivator | 7 50 |
>
> and other smaller lines about the same proportion.

This advance has been made notwithstanding the fact that we have a Liberal government at Ottawa, with sixty-five Progressives on the job and a Canadian Council of Agriculture in the background, all supposedly working overtime in the interests of agriculture.

Mr. FORKE: May I ask what paper that was published in—the Yorkton Enterprise?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is a paper published in Saskatchewan; I have not the name of it.

Mr. FORKE: I know all about it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am told by men engaged in the business that there was an average increase in the prices of agricultural implements to the extent of ten, twelve or fifteen per cent over and above the price that prevailed when the tariff reduction was made. That, they tell me, is the condition of the market to-day. If that was the effect of a two and a half per cent reduction, suppose the government to-day take off another two and a half per cent; suppose they continue their nibbling policy rather than place agricultural implements on the free list, does any hon. gentleman think that any farmer in Canada is going to benefit by it? No; it will react again just as it reacted in 1922. I do not believe for a moment that the government will seriously reduce the duties on agricultural implements. I agree with others who have spoken on this subject, notably the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and the hon member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), that these industries cannot stand any further reductions. The statement made in the Speech from the Throne was, to say the least, ill-advised and ill-considered, and it will not be acted upon. That is my prediction, notwithstanding the forcible statement which was made by the leader of the government on the opening of this debate. "Oh," my hon. friend the Minister of Justice said on Friday afternoon, "look at the increase which has taken place in the export of agricultural implements from Canada to France; it has amounted to 100 per cent." Well, it has increased by $634,586. The loss to Canadian industries, in imports from the United States by the reduction of 2½ per cent was $3,716,000 Taking credit for our increased exports to France, we still find that the trade of the country has been injured in the joint operation by $3,082,000.

Strong as is the case in regard to agricultural implements, it is, if anything, even stronger in regard to woollens. The riding which I have the honour to represent in this House does not manufacture agricultural implements in such large quantities as they are produced in Hamilton, Kitchener and Toronto and other places. We have some four or five of the smaller class of manufacturers of agricultural implements, but the aggregate employment is very considerable. We are likewise greatly interested in the woollens, in worsteds, in knitted goods, in carpets and the like. The woollen industry is probably brought even more closely to our notice than the agricultural industry, and when the government last session undertook to increase the British preference on woollen goods it dealt a most serious blow to the woollen industry of Canada, not only as to tweeds and worsteds but likewise to all classes of knitted goods. No sooner had the announcement been made by the government of an increase of the British preference upon woollen goods imported into Canada than the British manufacturer took advantage of the situation. He was aided to some extent, I believe, by the condition of exchange, but the increased preference and the exchange condition added together have had the direct effect of closing up some of the larger Canadian woollen manufacturing establishments. Will the House listen for a moment to some of the figures in regard to recent woollen importations—they may be on Hansard now; I am not sure. Consider the importations of British tweeds and worsteds into a country like Canada, with a population of eight and a half million people: last year, covering twelve months, 28,885,500 square yards were imported from Great Britain, an average of 3.39 square yards for every man, woman and child in the country. The United States, with a population of 117,000,000, imported only 17,364,300 square yards, an average of .14 square yards for each man, woman and child in that country. As these figures come from the Toronto Globe of 11th February, 1924, they will probably be accepted as accurate upon the government side of the House. But the outstanding fact is that in this country with our small population we import British tweeds and worsteds in excess of the total imports of the United States to the extent of 11,521,200 yards in a single year. Take the case of knitted goods. Probably every village or small town of Ontario has, or used to have, its knitting factory, for the making of woollen gloves, stockings and the like, but the moment the increased preference was announced last session, in came knitted goods from Great Britain in enormous quantities. In 1921 we brought in 2,813,866 pairs of woollen hose, the value of which was $1,201,793. In 1922 the figure jumped to 6,594,324 pairs, at a value of $2,496,458, and in 1923 it jumped again to 8,101,572 pairs, valued at $2,951,372. The point is this: Almost all of these manufactures, whether in tweeds, in worsteds, or in knitted goods, could be produced in this country. Would it not be a paying investment for Canada to manufacture them in this country? Would it not be for the general good of all the people of this country if the employment required for the manufacture of these enormous importations were given in Canada and the wages, which represent a large part of the value, were paid in this country? The government's policy of tariff nibbling has already done untold damage to the woollen manufacturing industries of this country. I may say candidly that in my younger days I had other ideas in regard to trade policy. I remember nine or ten years ago making a speech in the old House of Commons advocating that agricultural implements should be put upon the free list. That speech has been quoted many times in this House. I do not hold that opinion today, and I am inclined to answer any criticism of my change of opinion as the late Lord Morley is reputed to have answered a criticism which was once levelled at him for having changed his opinion: "I admit," he said "that ten years ago I held many opinions which I do not now entertain. I have discarded them, and anyone who desires to take up my discarded opinions is entirely welcome to do so."

Mr. FORKE: May I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps he will pick them up himself again some day?

Mr. GUTHRIE: All things are possible, of course, but at the present moment there does not seem to be any great likelihood of it. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the case of the woollen manufacturers and of the agricultural implement manufacurers at this moment for substantial tariff protection is absolutely unanswerable. I have tried to turn this matter over in my mind, I have examined it with such ability as I have from all points of the compass, to see how it affects this community, or that community, this interest or that interest; but if viewed in regard to its general application to the whole Dominion of Canada, and that is the only fair way of judging, I believe it is a most essential thing for Canada and for the people of Canada to retain these industries working at their fullest capacity. I believe it would be a fine thing for Canada to manufacture all of these woollens in this country and give all this employment in Canada.

There is one further remark I desire to make, and in this instance I am going to address myself directly to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I remember an amendment which he moved in this House in the session of 1921, and I remember well the political conditions which existed at that time. I was a member of the government at that time which had in the parliament of that day a clear majority of twenty members. The present government, I take it for granted on a statement I have heard, sits in this House in a minority of at least two; its supporters are a minority of the total membership of this House. The government of this country, in the month of March, 1921, was supported by a clear majority of twenty in this House; I think more, myself, but twenty is the figure stated by the present Minister of Justice in a speech to which I am going to refer. We had in 1920 and 1921, as we have had recently, a series of by-elections in Canada. The government of 1921 was elected towards the end of December, 1917.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, that was another government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Prime Minister had been changed, that is true. The last general election preceding that was in 1917. In July, 1920, on the retirement of Sir Robert Borden, the present leader of the opposition became head of the government, and that government was supported in this House on that day by a clear majority of twenty. There were signs, I will admit it, to be gathered from the by-elections in the fall and winter of 1920-1921 that the government of the day was losing support in the country. We had had a series of by-elections. I am not going to refer to ministerial elections or ministerial acclamations; we had a ministerial by-election down in Colchester which we carried with an enormous majority, and another in St. John, New Brunswick, with a still greater majority.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not the case that in 1917 the so-called Unionist party promised the people that an election would be held immediately after the war was over?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. MARTELL: It was done in my county at any rate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I see the situation I am going to portray is a little difficult for hon. members opposite, but here is the situation: There were one or two rather critical by-elections in the autumn of 1920. The government carried the riding of Yale in British Columbia by a substantial majority; that was a party fight. The government lost a riding in East Elgin by a narrow majority in a three-cornered fight, but perhaps our most spectacular defeat took place in West Peterborough, where the present deputy speaker of the House (Mr. Gordon) carried the election by a very substantial majority. That was also a three-cornered fight, but his majority was substantial. The House met in the February following, and on the opening day of the session the government was met with an amendment to the Address moved by my right hon. friend the present Prime Minister in the following words:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers do not possess the confidence of this House or of the country, and that their retention of office constitutes a usurpation of the powers of popular government.

That was a direct challange that the government had not the support of the country, and it was perfectly right to make such a challenge. The situation was very similar to the situation which exists in Canada to-day. The hon. member of the House who delivered the most important speech in that debate, and it was a very able argument, though I was not one of his supporters, was my hon. friend the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). He went into all the precedents on the subject and demonstrated to a conclusion, in the most forcible and cogent way that the government of that day, having regard to the verdict of the by-elections, should cease to govern, and should appeal to the people. Some of his statements I might quote. Here is one, not very complimentary to myself, it is true. At page 461 of Hansard he says:

> The third reason in favour of the amendment is that this government is no longer in harmony with public opinion—

That was his reason.

> —and has utterly lost the confidence of the country. Indeed, it has not only lost the country's confidence; it has earned its contempt. No government has the moral right to pass legislation under such circumstances. The result of the by-elections cannot be misread; they are bold, definite and unequivocal. The Canadian people have made it clear that they want a new government. They will not let the country pass through two more years of dishonourable history in order to allow a group of political gentlemen to show their consistency in their vices as well as in their virtues, and to gratify the human disinclination of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Hon. Mr. Guthrie) to become once more a private man.

The present Minister of Justice then proceeded in support of his contention to cite the late William Ewart Gladstone, a very high parliamentary authority, and a deep student of British parliamentary traditions and practice. He quoted him with great effect. I cannot read the full quotation because there are pages of it, but at page 465 of Hansard he quotes from a speech Mr. Gladstone made in the House of Commons, which will be found on page 1126 of the British Hansard. Mr. Gladstone had been Prime Minister of Great Britain and had lost several by-elections by rather large majorities. Although he had a substantial majority in the House of Commons he suddenly dissolved parliament, and at the general elections Benjamin Disraeli was returned as Prime Minister. Many of Mr. Gladstone's friends rather challenged him on the question of dissolving parliament at a time when he had a large majority in the House and Mr. Gladstone's speech in reply is what my hon. friend the present Minister of Justice quoted with absolute approval:

> It is repugnant to my feelings, and not compatible with the best interests of the country that a government should continue to govern, even with a numerical majority, when its strength is falling away, and when there are daily increasing evidences that it no longer represents the will and opinions of the constituencies.

Such then was Mr. Gladstone's opinion of the plain duty of a Prime Minister of a government which possessed a numerical majority. What think you, Mr. Speaker, as to the duty of the head of a government which is in an actual minority in the House of Commons and where recent by-elections furnish increasing evidence that the government no longer represents the will and opinions of the constituencies? The question as to whether a government has lost the confidence of the electors can only be determined by the result of by-elections. How else can we judge the question? We determine it by the by-elections. I appeal to my right hon friend the Prime Minister, and ask him what inference what meaning he can take from the recent by-elections? If he has any doubt in his mind as to the true significance of the by-elections, that is another question. If he believes that the country is against him, that a popular majority in the country is antagonistic to him, he has but one clear duty to perform and that is to resign. If he has a real doubt upon the subject then he should be bold enough to appeal to Cæsar and submit his record to the people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend attaches any significance to his own words, why did his own leader not adopt the course which I took and test the confidence of this country in the government?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am just coming to that. That speech of the Minister of Justice was delivered in this House on the second of March 1921. We wound up the session speedily, on the first of June, I think. The then Prime Minister immediately went to the Imperial Conference as was his duty. As soon as he returned from that Conference, he announced or virtually announced on the second of September at London the dissolution of parliament. He examined the precedents, he considered the citations, he felt the force of the speech which was directed against his government by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and the present Minister of Justice. He felt that the arguments were unanswerable in view of the results of the by-elections, and that by British parliamentary practice, in accord with the best principles of parliamentary traditions in Great Britain, it was his duty to test public opinion by an appeal to the people and he did so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend tell the House how many vacancies there were at the time?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not remember.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's leader was afraid to test public opinion by holding the by-elections.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That brings me to another question. The government have not the courage to create a single vacancy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why, sir, it is common talk in the lobbies, it is common knowledge in the country that no vacancy can be created on the government benches to-day save for one cause only, and that is the act of God. There will be no more judicial appointments from the ranks of the Liberal party in this House at the present time. Members of that party may look longingly at vacant seats in the red chamber, but they will not be filled by gentlemen who have seats in this House at the present time. What is the record of the by-elections during the past year? It has been gone over so often that I need not repeat it. It forms a consistent record of want of confidence in the government. Does it not bring conviction to the mind of any man that popular feeling is against this government, that popular opinion is against this government, and that this government lacks the support of the vast majority of the electors of the Dominion. Now, will my right hon. friend the Prime Minister take the manly course, will he take the courageous course, will he take the course which his predecessor took, and make the appeal to Caesar? His government to-day is a minority government—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. GUTHRIE:—not only in parliament but in the country. It has lost its popularity, it does not enjoy public confidence or support—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE:—if we are to judge by the by-elections. That is a test that was imposed. That is the test which was imposed by my right hon. friend and his Minister of Justice in 1921.

An hon. MEMBER: What about sectional appeals?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not quite catch the meaning of the hon. gentleman's observation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Two by-elections in three years!

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will my right hon. friend take the manly course, will he take the courageous course, will he be as courageous as his predecessor in his leadership of the government, will he live up to British precedents and traditions? The Minister of Justice is fond of that word "Liberalism". He rolled it round his mouth so on Friday afternoon on several occasions as a sweet morsel.

Mr. MARTELL: Did you never do that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes I have. What did my hon. friend the Minister of Justice say? He said the first principle of Liberalism is to trust the people. I wish he was here to-day. I wish I could direct his mind to his argument in 1921, to that splendid speech of his made in this House which I feel convinced the then Prime Minister that he should make an appeal to the country. I wish my hon. friend the Minister of Justice would direct that speech to his own leader to-day. But there the government sit knowing that at this moment they cannot carry a single constituency in the Dominion of Canada—I should perhaps make a few exemptions—knowing that popular opinion is against them, knowing that they are in a positive minority in this House still hanging on to office, hanging on to office against British tradition, against British precedent and contrary to the courageous example set for them by my right hon. friend and leader who as Prime Minister of this country boldly appealed to the judgment of the electors of Canada in December 1921.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would join with those hon. members who have taken part in the debate in offering my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. I am sure that both these hon. gentlemen derived a very considerable amount of pleasure in drawing the attention of the House and the country to this particular Speech. Because, Mr. Speaker, the Speech covers a large field, a proper field, a field dealing with facts, a field that truly sets forth the position of the government, and that forecasts proposed legislation. The manner in which the Speech has been received in the country generally is remarkable, and the reception accorded to it in this chamber is equally remarkable. We find the official opposition group to-day downcast and dumbfounded. During the time this debate has been under way there has been a studied effort on the part of the opposition not to deal fairly with points raised in the Speech, but to divert public attention from the issues raised by interjecting questions which should properly come up in connection with the discussion of the budget. The Speech has been so disturbing to my hon. friends opposite, that in some cases they have resorted to extreme sarcasm in order to try and weaken its effect. My hon. friend the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who usually speaks in the most courteous and reasonable manner found it necessary to refer to the Speech in the following terms:

> The Speech from the Throne has been described as perhaps one of the longest in our history, and I must confess that to me at least it appears to be filled—I do not wish to he harsh, but still I cannot modify my language any further—with meaningless platitudes. There are recited there a lot of pious hopes, and so very indifferently and indefinitely stated that the result is a state of chaos in the minds of the public generally.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend there is no chaos in the minds of the public, or the people of Canada to-day, in reference to the Speech. If there is chaos it prevails in the ranks of my hon. friends opposite. What is the outstanding feature of the Speech that would appeal to the citizen or taxpayer of Canada? What I think would appeal to him as of primary importance is the promise of a balanced budget with a surplus in sight and a reduction of taxation. A balanced budget, I am satisfied, will be very gratifying to the people of Canada. It will probably be more appreciated on account of the insidious campaign that has been carried on by the party press and official leaders and public men throughout Canada during the interval between the last and the present session. It has been represented that Canada was being forced to the dogs by reckless expenditures and policies adopted by this government. But, Mr. Speaker, since the people have been advised of the accomplishments of this government during the short period of their time in office —that is, successfully balancing the budget, indicating a surplus, and a reduction of taxes —we find that these people and the party press who have been making such representations during the summer are to-day exposed as false prophets and unreliable propagandists. But I can assure you, Sir, that the balancing of the budget has not been an easy or mean task. It has only been brought about by the most careful scrutiny of every item of expenditure. This has been reflected in the department which I have the honour to represent, the department of Public Works, being one department of government which has the largest controllable expenditure. The department, as is well known, has many ramifications throughout the country. It is charged with the responsibility or the taking care of our navigation, and dredging fleets are maintained on the Pacific, the Atlantic, and inland waterways, in order that the channels of our rivers and harbours may be kept clear from debris collected from time to time, and that the commerce of the nation may be carried over our waterways. In addition, we are charged with the construction of wharves and breakwaters, works which are continually exposed to the elements, requiring constant expenditure for maintenance and repair; the construction, repairs, and renewals of public buildings; also the operation, repairs to and renewals of some 14,184 miles of telephone and telegraph lines, 363 miles of cable, 1,342 offices, the service of the department being widespread and general throughout the whole Dominion. During the last few months it has been represented by journals of repute and public men that parliament has seen fit to grant large sums of money to this department, sums not dreamed of before. To the individual member who has been asking for expenditures in his constituency, the facts are well known, but I think it only fair that the truth should also be made known to the taxpayer or the man on the street; and I am of the opinion that the better way to refute the impression that has gone abroad is to take the expenditures that have been made over a period of years by the department, a comparison of the expenditures that the government of the day has thought necessary from time to time to ask parliament to vote, in order that the functions of that department can properly be carried on.

For the sake of comparison, I will
5 p.m. start with the year before the war.

The expenditures for public works were as follows—

1913-14	$27,991,000
1914-15	29,283,000
1915-16	19,539,000
1916-17	16,161,000
1917-18	14,055,000
1918-19	12,902,000
1919-20	16,118,000
1920-21	19,752,000
1921-22	17,140,000
1922-23	14,283,000
1923-24	16,115,000

In regard to 1923-24, our expenditures are estimated for the financial year from knowledge we have in the department, and will amount to $16,115,000. It will be noted that during the years between 1916 and 1923 the expenditures were at the lowest ebb. It is well known to hon. members of this House that public works of importance have been allowed to go into disrepair and decay, and that for a period between 1915 and 1924 there have practically been no public buildings constructed throughout Canada. With the expenditures for the last two years—that is the years this government has been in control—it will be seen they are the lowest of any two years in the ten year period mentioned except for the war years of 1916-17 and 1917-18. I do not pretend that the department has been able to give proper service for the money placed at its disposal, for from personal examination and knowledge I am convinced that there is a great need of expenditures on public buildings throughout Canada. Cities and towns have outgrown the accommodation that was considered adequate ten years ago; new communities have sprung up requiring proper facilities to carry on the government's business; but with this knowledge the government has seen fit to so shape its policy as to refrain from any large new undertakings until the budget has been balanced and a surplus in sight. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that nothing will give more gratification to the people of Canada than the balancing of the budget and following that reduction in taxation. The Speech from the Throne states that such reduction of taxation as it may be possible to effect should aim primarily at reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion. Why should these industries be first considered? Because they are basic in character, and their successful development makes possible the existence of subsidiary industries. If one will take statistical information relating to these industries he will not fail to be struck by their magnitude and importance to the people of Canada. I asked the statistical department four questions in regard to the four basic industries; that is, the industries of agriculture, lumbering and pulp, mining, and fishing; first the amount of capital invested in each, the annual value of the product, the number of people employed, and the total wages paid. And I shall ask the House to bear with me while I read this statement. I will take first the agricultural industry:

Amount of capital invested, value of land, buildings, implements, machinery and livestock, 1921	$6,586,648,000
Value of farm products 1922 estimated at	1,420,170,000
Total wages paid in 1920, cash	98,332,000
Board	33,344,000

Then I will take the lumbering industry, and the figures are as follows:

Amount of capital invested	$189,622,000
The annual value of production	179,099,000
Number of people employed	57,233
Total wages paid	$ 50,857,719

The figures for the pulp and paper industry, which is a basic industry associated with the lumber industry, are:

Amount of capital invested	$381,006,000
Annual value of production	148,123,000
Number of people employed	25,830
Total wages paid	32,918,000

In the mining industry, which includes coal mining as well as metalliferous mining, the figures are:

Amount of capital invested	$493,694,000
Annual value of production	184,297,000
Number of people employed	62,249
Total wages paid	$ 75,026,000

In the fishing industry, the figures are:

Amount of capital invested	$47,764,000
Annual value of production	41,800,000
Number of people employed	74,457
Total wages paid in canning and curing establishments	$ 3,641,000

No information available in regard to wages of fishermen.

To consolidate these figures, I am going to give the totals in these four basic industries:

Amount of capital invested	$7,698,214,000
Amount of annual production	1,973,421,000
Wages paid	320,480,000
Number of people employed	1,153,504

I am sure no member of this House will seriously contend that it is possible by building up a high tariff wall, to bring about an industrial development which will absorb the products of these basic industries. It is evident that the government should endeavour to assist in making the cost of production as low as possible, so that they may be enabled to supply the home market at reasonable prices and be in a position to go into the markets of the world and to compete successfully for the world's business.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

I am satisfied that we in Canada who realize the great richness of our natural resources, who have familiarised ourselves with the extent and character of those resources, are of opinion that the greatness and future of Canada will depend upon the scientific and proper development of those industries. His Excellency, in his Speech, goes on to suggest to the members of this House and to the people of Canada:

> That every effort will be made still further to develop the policy of Canadian trade via Canadian ports.

Action by this government last year in making the extended British preference applicable to goods brought in through Canadian ports has borne remarkable fruit, and it has enured to the benefit of Atlantic and Pacific ports. It has been found that since that legislation became effective, from the month of May to January of this year, over $50,195,000 worth of goods coming in under the preference has been actually entered under the extended preference. And I find that on the seaboard where people are watching for development, they have already seen the result of this policy. The St. John Board of Trade, an influential public body writes on March 11 as follows:

> Dear Sir,
>
> The St. John Board of Trade desires to state that it most heartily approved of the British preferential tariff clause which passed the last session of parliament, being of the opinion that it would be made wholly applicable to Canadian ports, and that these ports will be greatly benefited thereby.
>
> The St. John Board of Trade would renew its expression of approval of this preferential arrangement and would earnestly request that it be made to apply altogether to Canadian ports.
>
> A determination of this nature would undoubtedly lead to the development of the policy of development of Canadian trade via Canadian ports, as was suggested by His Excellency the Governor General in his Speech from the Throne.
>
> Appreciating this expression on the part of His Excellency, and such action as the government can take in this great enterprise.
>
> R. E. ARMSTRONG,
> Secretary, St. John Board of Trade.

I read this letter in order that the members of this House may have knowledge of the effect of the policy as introduced at the last session of parliament in the matter of British trade and British preference.

In this connection, I wish to speak with reference to recent activities in our Pacific ports, particularly the port of Vancouver, where there has been a development that has startled the people of this continent and which has largely been due to the remarkable development of the western grain route. In order that I may retain continuity in my remarks, I will submit a statement showing the increase in tonnage passing in and out of that port during the last few years:

	Shipped for export
1920-21..	700,000 bushels of grain
1921-22..	7,000,000 " "
1922-23..	19,000,000 " "

In 1923-24, 25,000,000 bushels have already passed through that port, and there is a probability of 50,000,000 bushels being shipped during this crop year. The growth in the export trade in lumber has almost equalled, if it has not exceeded the development of wheat export.

Mr. MANION: For the information of the House—how much of that went to Europe and how much to China?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the information here. If my memory serves me right, about four or five million bushels went to Japan, and the balance to the United Kingdom. I have not followed the report for this year. The figures in regard to the export trade in lumber are as follows:

	Lumber shipped
1921..	179,848,000 feet
1922..	217,175,000 "
1923..	429,600,000 "

In 1921, eighty-two vessels loaded at the port of Vancouver with 127,000 tons of freight, and pasesd through the Panama canal to the Atlantic. In 1923, 200 vessels loaded 677,000 tons of freight and passed through the Panama canal to the Atlantic.

The development has been rapid; but I think it has really only started, because we in western Canada, and, I believe, the people in eastern Canada, and the people in the Old Country, have begun to realize the advantage of the Panama canal and the possibilities of the extension of business in the Pacific and the Orient. The primary stimulus to this movement can, I think, be set down to the reduction in freight rates, resulting in a partial elimination of the mountain scale. In 1922 the government of the province of British Columbia presented argument to the Board of Railway Commissioners and succeeded in getting some relief under a general order No. 366, issued on the 30th June, 1922, by the board. I might say that there has always been a division of freight rates into class and commodity rates, the first being based on mileage and considered as standard, and second, commodity rates which are not based upon mileage, but are made by all railways as when they consider necessary in order to move traffic. About 15 per cent of the total traffic to and from British Columbia moves on class rates, the balance on commodity rates. Prior to the date of the judgment the British Columbia class rates scale, generally speaking, was based on 1½ times the prairie scale, which, worked out, meant that the mountain scale was about 33 per cent greater than the prairie scale. By this judgment the differential was cut in two and the mountain scale is now about 16⅔ per cent greater than the prairie.

At the time of this judgment the amount of grain moving to Vancouver for export was comparatively small. Grain and grain products for domestic consumption moved upon commodity rates. The board ordered that the commodity rate for wheat and wheat products for domestic consumption should be reduced by the same percentage as the class rate; but as the rate on grain and grain products for export was scarcely referred to in the argument before the board, the board did not take action in regard to it. However, on the issuance of the order the railways themselves made a reduction of 20 per cent in the export rates on grain and grain products. That was in the spring of 1922, and it will be noted that the exports, which were 700,000 bushels the year before, jumped to 7,000,000 bushels.

The British Columbia government, although receiving some concession at the hands of the Railway Commission, appealed from that judgment to the executive council. A hearing was had during the summer months, and I propose now to quote from the reference of the executive council to the railway board of October 2nd of that year the section relating to grain and other rates. It is as follows:

> And it appearing that the question as to the rates on grain from points in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba to Vancouver and other British Columbia coast points for export was not the subject of argument before the board and therefore not specifically dealt with in its said judgment;
>
> And it appearing further that on the hearing of the said appeal the petitioners asked for reductions in the said rates on grain;
>
> The committee therefore recommends that the subject of the said export grain rates from points in the said provinces to Vancouver and other British Columbia coast points be referred to the said board for immediate consideration and such effective action as it may deem necessary.

It will be noted, Mr. Speaker, that the reference was made at the beginning of October last year, it being the desire of the government that if further reductions could be made in the grain rates the matter should be dealt with early by the Board of Railway Commissioners in the hope of securing further relief. The Board of Railway Commissioners on the 10th October, 1923, issued the following order, No. 384:

> Whereas by order in council P.C. No. 2007, dated the 2nd day of October, 1923, the Governor in Council referred the subject of the said export grain rates from points in the said provinces to Vancouver and other British Columbia coast points, to the board for immediate determination and such effective action as the board may deem necessary;

After fully considering the matter and applying the principles set forth in the judgment of the board, dated October 10th, 1923, and for the reasons therein contained—

The board orders that the current rates on grain and grain products to Pacific coast ports for export be reduced uniformly ten per cent; and that all the railway companies subject to the jurisdiction of the board file tariffs, effective not later than October 22nd, 1923, showing such reduction; also that all milling, malting, storage, cleaning or bagging in transit privileges on grain now contained in the tariffs be unaffected by this order.

Mr. CLARK: When the Railway Commission was directed to review these rates, did counsel appear on behalf of the province of British Columba?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I think not. Counsel for British Columbia appeared before the Railway Commission in the spring of 1922, and they came before the executive council last summer, when they reviewed the general case and presented argument regarding the export rate on grain. It will be noted that the executive council directed the attention of the Railway Commission to the fact that further argument had been made in regard to rates on grain, and asking that the railway board review the argument.

Mr. CLARK: Is the minister aware of the fact that the province has requested the Railway Commission to hear a further appeal?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think we will meet that situation. The executive council was anxious that there should be an early reference to the Railway Commission in order that, if a reduction were made, the shippers of grain would be able to take advantage of it in the shipping season.

A further reference was made to the railway board by the executive council on the 24th October 1923. I quote the following from it:

One of the main grounds of appeal dealt with on the argument was that regarding the export grain rates from points in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba to Vancouver and other British Columbia coast points. This matter has been specifically dealt with by order in council of the 2nd October, 1923 (P.C. 2007).

The committee, therefore, recommends that all other subjects of complaint referred to in the said petition be also remitted to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada to be dealt with as it may deem proper upon the evidence already adduced and the arguments presented before the board and before Your Excellency in Council.

The committee observes, however, that in view of the vital importance of facilitating the interchange of commodities between the various sections of Canada, railway rates should be maintained at as low a basis as possible having regard to all proper considerations. Accordingly the committee is of the opinion that in the future, should transportation and traffic conditions so change as to render practicable a nearer approach to equalization of rates as between prairie and Pacific territory, the board should in the exercise of its discretion take such action as may be necessary to bring about this result.

I have reviewed briefly the reduction that has taken place not only on grain rates but on class rates generally through the appeal made in 1922 and the action of the railway companies in their granting a reduction of 20 per cent, following the order of the board in 1922, and the further reduction granted by the Railway Commission last year on the representations made to them by counsel. As the matter stands to-day the Railway Board of Canada still have before them for consideration the advisability of further reductions in railway rates. In my opinion, with a proper development of our agricultural industry and of our natural resources in the West, further representations will be made to our railways from time to time in the interests of development, and in the not far distant future the discrimination that exists between British Columbia and Alberta will be finally wiped out.

Mr. CLARK: Is the minister aware that the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners has refused to hear counsel on behalf of British Columbia in pursuance of the order of the Privy Council?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I imagine that counsel from British Columbia or any province can, under a proper mode of procedure, present arguments to the Board of Railway Commissioners. I did not understand that there had been a refusal to hear further argument, but I am satisfied that if it is the desire to present argument, there is a procedure to be followed to that end.

I wish also to deal with a matter that is of some importance to western Canada as well as to the people of the East. Over a period of many years there has been an agitation on the part of British Columbia that the ocean route be made available for the transport of commodities from the East to the West. These representations have been made by public bodies in the form of petitions from time to time. Last year interest centred around a shipment of steel rails from Sydney, Nova Scotia, which was transshipped at New York for Vancouver. It is suggested that the local customs officer at Sydney indicated verbally that rails shipped in that manner would not be subjected to duty, but on arrival at Vancouver the Dominion customs officer informed the purchaser that goods so shipped would be liable to the same duty as if they had been manufactured in and shipped from the United States. This shipment being rather large and involving a considerable sum of money, very urgent representations were made to the Dominion government by the province of British Columbia. The Dominion government was impressed by the desirability of enabling the people of western Canada as well as of eastern Canada to avail themselves of the cheaper ocean transportation for the movement of Canadian goods. It has been decided that an officer will be placed in New York who will there clear goods in transit for western Canadian ports and also goods coming from western ports to eastern Canadian points. But in the order making provisions for an officer at New York the government have thought it wise to stipulate that goods so moved should be placed in British bottoms, that is, ships of British or Canadian register. It is hoped that by this provision there will be established sailings of British or Canadian ships from Canadian Atlantic ports which will fully accommodate this traffic.

Mr. LADNER: May I inquire whether there are any lines operating ships of British or Canadian register which send vessels that way?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, there is one line, and recently the Canadian National Railways have indicated their intention to put on two ships. I am informed also that there are two or three lines which propose to establish a regular service between eastern and western Canadian ports this summer.

Mr. LADNER: Has the government any definite arrangement with those lines, with a view to making certain that the goods will be carried?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am satisfied that lines will be established if there are goods to be carried, and we have reason to believe that there will be a very considerable amount of business offering, because it is within the knowledge of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) that no less than two, and possibly three, lines are prepared to enter into this traffic.

Mr. LADNER: Why would it not be in the interests of traffic to allow any competing lines which would give the service at the reduced rates to have the benefit of the establishment of the customs officer at New York?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There will be a customs officer at New York and goods shipped to that point will have an opportunity of entering into ships of British registry.

Mr. LADNER: My question is, why not other ships?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think it only fit and proper that we should endeavour to keep this trade within Canadian channels. It will travel over Canadian railways to Canadian ports and will there enter into ships of our own register or of British register to be transported. We are satisfied that in the British merchant marine we have facilities which are sufficiently extensive to give accommodation and to bring about a competition which will control rates in the matter of this tonnage.

I regret to say that one important public body in Vancouver has taken exception to this ruling and contends that these goods should enter ships of any registry and be allowed to move freely. Now, as a representative of British Columbia and a Canadian I do not agree with this contention. I think it absolutely essential, if we are to grow as a nation, that we develop and maintain our national ports. No maritime nation can afford to build up the ports of an adjoining country at the expense of its own. I am satisfied that the people of British Columbia as a whole will endorse this attitude. I am sure that if the position were reversed and the people of Alberta and central British Columbia were to find it more acceptable to ship their goods via the ports of Seattle and Portland, our friends of the Vancouver Board of Trade would be the first to take exception and to insist on certain restrictions that would tend to confine this business to our own ports.

Mr. LADNER: Is the government in possession of any assurances to make certain that the nature of that arrangement does not mean that the rates by water will be adjusted somewhat on the same basis and at the same rate as by rail in which case the advantages of going via New York would be virtually nullified so far as lower rates are concerned.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The government will always have it within their power to amend that regulation if it is found that the people who are going to engage in this business are trying to make excessive profits out of it; but primarily, I think, we are on safe ground. It is the policy of this government to develop our own national ports, and this business, which I believe is going to become of very great importance not only to our people in western Canada but I think of even greater importance to our manufacturing friends in central and eastern Canada, should certainly remain in the channels where the people of Canada will derive the most benefit from it.

In closing, I wish to say that so far as the people of British Columbia are concerned they are desirous of seeing brought into effect by this parliament policies that will be for the development of the whole of Canada and for the benefit of all the people. We are desirous of seeing a united Canada, where there will be no suggestion of sectional discrimination as between the East and the West. We as a people are desirous of seeing a united Canada grow and prosper and become a great nation, and I believe that with the great natural resources this country possesses and with the people who are known as Canadians to-day, we have a great future before us, a future which will mean much to the Canadian people, a future within the great Empire which we are desirous to see remain as a unit not only for the benefit of British citizenship, but for the advantage of the people of the world.

Mr. R. A. HOEY (Springfield): Mr Speaker, several speeches have been delivered during the course of this debate, the very nature of which indicated considerable study and research on the part of those responsible for their creation. There was one speech, however, that seems to have left an indelible impression upon my mind, and to that speech I should like to refer at the outset. It was the speech delivered by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), the gentleman who sits to my extreme right on this bench. Viewed from the standpoint of political progress the speech was refreshing. To me it was stimulating. It was delivered in a spirit wholly non-partisan, and I should like to congratulate the hon. member upon the delivery of that speech. His was a voice from the wilderness, it is true, but nevertheless a voice I think in which we all detected very pronounced modern and progressive accents. It was significant to me, and must have been significant to others, that while one of the oldest members of this chamber, and I trust he will not think I am speaking disrespectfully, spoke in that tone, one of its youngest members of his party the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), declared very eloquently and very emphatically, and in his own inimitable style, that he still believed in and stood for the policy that has now reached or almost reached its allotted span.

Might I add this to what the hon. member for South York so ably said? I sometimes feel almost instinctively that we are in the very presence of a new organization of human society on a co-operative rather than a competitive basis. I do not mean by that that we are going to witness any violent social upheavals, anything of a cataclysmic nature, but I do feel that we are in the grip of forward moving forces. Furthermore, I believe that Great Britain to-day is becoming the very spearhead of the forces that labour for the triumph of democracy and modern civilization. I recall to mind at the moment a statement that fell from the lips of a very distinguished American citizen immediately after the close of the Great War. Addressing thousands of his fellow-countrymen who had come to hear him, he said:

> World civilization during the last four years has been passing through a revolution, a revolution which for magnitude of destruction is unparalleled in the history of human endeavour. The old social order has collapsed, and all attempts to restore it on the traditional competitive basis will end in disappointment and in disillusionment.

The discussion during the course of this debate has centred around and at times merged wholly in the question of the customs tariff. It seemed to me as I listened to the addresses delivered in defence of the protective principle, that I could detect in them all, indeed almost in every sentence, the same fallacy, a fallacy, Mr. Speaker, that in my judgment is going to influence many in this country and confuse the issue until it is successfully exploded. I refer to the fallacy of looking upon production as an end in itself, rather than as a means to an end, and that the enrichment of the Canadian people. I refer to that pernicious fallacy of looking upon labour, regardless of the expenditure of human energy, as something to be desired and something to be provided, regardless of the expense of that labour to the nation. Let me illustrate what I mean. A few weeks ago we had an abundance of snow in the city of Ottawa. That snow provided work for a certain number of men ordinarily unemployed. They were paid for the services rendered out of the pockets of the tax-payers of this city. Had that snow not come those men could have been paid an equal amount, perhaps more, in working on constructive enterprises and the citizens of Ottawa would have stood to benefit in that they would have been saved from the slush and irritation associated in our minds with life in the Dominion capital a few weeks ago. Had this money not been spent in that way it could have been devoted to constructive enterprises with the return of spring. And so it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have reached this stage: The protectionist prays continually for more snow, the free-trader for the return of spring and the release of natural forces. This brings me to the end of the first section of my remarks, and if the House has no objection I should feel thankful, Mr. Speaker, if you would call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HOEY: When the House took recess at six o'clock I was dealing with what I described to be a pernicious policy, a policy that looked upon labour or production as an end in itself, rather than as a means to an end, a policy which if persisted in would have us destroy Canadian buildings and abolish modern machinery in an attempt to provide employment. As a further illustration of what I have in mind, I want to quote some figures. During the years 1915 to 1918 inclusive a certain factory in this country produced 113,542 automobiles, and the excess price charged to Canadian purchasers over the prevailing price in the United States was $13,394,941. The wages paid by that concern during that period on the cars actually made and sold in Canada amounted to $9,083,360, and their total wage $11,960,807. That is their total wage bill on cars made for sale in Canada and for export. They paid in taxes during that period $2,284,145, leaving a surplus of $2,027,436. What do these figures mean? They mean that during this period the people of Canada could have paid all the wages this firm paid, all the taxes this firm paid, and had a surplus in the national treasury of $2,027,436, or a sum sufficient in itself to pay more than half the duty paid by this firm on their raw material entering into the manufacture of this article. The honourable, unassuming and genial member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) during the course of his speech a few days ago, told a story the point of which I failed to get at the moment. The story was that of a boy, the son of a religiously-inclined mother, and the boy was anxious to secure a drum. He punctuated his evening prayer with a request for this drum, and when he received it he proved ungrateful. Just what relationship exists between a drum and those who demand free trade I could not detect. Those who advocate free trade advocate it not for themselves but for all. It is a doctrine of freedom as opposed to a doctrine of slavery. But I want to tell the story of a boy, not the son of a religiously-inclined mother, and not the son of a woman of questionable character, but the son of a mother who was described by all as an incurable flirt, particularly when in association with politicians. She was consequently a very popular women, particularly with the older politicians. This woman had several boys, but I want to refer to one of them in particular. His name was called Industry—Infant Industry. Just why he should have been given that name no one seemed to know. There were those, however, who contended that the name was given him by one Macdonald, a Scotchman, who declared that ultimately the boy would grow and discard that name; that is to say, he would ultimately grow up and finally be knighted Viscount Monopoly. The boy was natural to begin with, but because of the position in which he was inclined to sit he developed spinal trouble—spinal meningitis. He became obsessed with a very unnatural obsession—I presume all obsessions are unnatural—an obsession that the little children with whom he played from day to day sought his destruction, and so he became persistent in his demands for a gun. Night after night, as his mother would attempt to teach him the evening prayer he would punctuate it thus—

> Now I lay me down to sleep—
> ("I want a gun")
> I pray the Lord my soul to keep.
> ("I want a gun")
> If I should die before I wake—
> ("I want a gun")
> I pray the Lord my soul to take.
> ("Get me that gun!")

And finally the gun was provided. He woke in the morning, and, instead of proving grateful, he looked at it and said, "Where the devil did that toy gun come from? I want a gun that will not only enable me to shoot those American kids next door, but those Italian kids that live at the end of the avenue, and those German kids who live on Kitchener street, and those English kids that live across the way." I think my hon. and genial friend from Brantford will agree with me that it is a dangerous thing to put guns in the hands of children, particularly children who seek the destruction of their fellows. The Canadian Manufacturers, that august body, at a meeting recently held in Hamilton passed a resolution which I shall read to the House. It is the very embodiment of modesty and reads—

> The adoption of a stable and sound fiscal policy, based on an adequate customs tariff, will bind together more firmly the provinces of Canada in national unity, attract capital, commercialize natural resources, strengthen existing industries and create new industries, raise revenue, encourage immigration, provide employment, increase traffic through national ports, furnish passengers and freight for transportation systems, lower freight rates; make farming more profitable by providing new markets abroad and facilitate profitable bargaining by means of tariffs with other countries.

I said that that was the very embodiment of modesty, because it leaves out two very important factors. It should have added unlimited campaign funds and political preferment for the party willing to espouse it. Indeed, I do not know but that they might have legitimately claimed that if you elevate the tariff high enough, that is from the low plane upon which it now is, up higher and higher and higher, it will ultimately restore hair and thus protect the bald heads of those who advocate it. You can imagine then the embarrassing position in which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) would find himself as opposed to that in which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) would find himself. That is the difficulty with the tariff. It never evenly distributes the benefits that accrue therefrom.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens)—let me say with respect to him that I am just as anxious to lead him from the error of his ways as he is to lead me from the pathway of rectitude—during the course of a speech which he delivered, and with which I shall deal, deprecated the tendency in some quarters to speak of the principle of protection as an immoral principle. I do not know that it is altogether accurate to speak of any economic principle in the abstract as immoral. It is, perhaps, not immoral as an abstract economic principle, but, in my judgment, it is immoral and vicious in its results. You ask, why? A system of taxation that slaps the mother in the face for every child that is born into the world by adding a tax on the woollen garments with which she would clothe it; a system of taxation that takes eight times as much out of the pockets of the mechanic with eight of a family who is earning $100 a month as it takes out of the pockets of a bachelor with the same wages; a system of taxation that has always led to monopoly, to centralization of wealth and the impoverishment of the rural districts, the only source from which national life can be renewed,—why should we hesitate to speak of the results which accrue from protection as immoral? The evils of protection are as wide-spread as the territory in which it operates, as deep as the distress into which our people have fallen and for which it is in no small measure responsible. Then, having spoken of the tendency to speak of the principle of protection as immoral, he went on to speak of the woollen industry. I have no objection to a man defending the woollen industry or any other industry, provided that in so doing he does not attempt to pull the wool over the hon. members' eyes. He spoke of the condition in which the woollen industry finds itself to-day. Every one that is truly Canadian—and we are all truly Canadian—regrets that condition, and if that condition in itself had not been productive of compensating factors, it would be a catastrophe. He spoke of the number of skilled workers that were thrown out of employment, skilled workers that could not easily be replaced. I want to be fair; but it was news to me to learn that the modern woollen industry, with which I am more or less familiar, required workers to be trained over a period of years in order to operate successfully modern machinery. Let us, however, suppose that that is true, and that those workers cannot be replaced from Great Britain or from any other country. Let us suppose that they are trekking to the United States, as he contended they were, to the extent of one thousand. What about the agriculturists to-day who are leaving the land, agriculturists who have been anchored to the soil for generations, experienced men? Is this not even a greater loss? I have before me the figures, provided by the United States Department of Immigration, showing not only the number of Canadians who entered the United States during the year 1923, but classifying them:

Canadians entering the United States.

	Year ending June 30, 1923	July, 1923	August, 1923
Weavers and spinners.. ..	426	54	48
Farm labourers..	3,295	422	454
Bona fide farmers..	5,409	827	697

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre compared wages paid in this country with wages paid in Great Britain. I did not think the comparison was altogether fair, for this reason, that comparing wages paid in Canada with wages paid in Great Britain means nothing unless you determine accurately and scientifically the purchasing power of the dollar. He did not, however, fall into the old trap, the trap into which protectionists sometimes fall, but which was very carefully avoided by him, that is the trap that protection is of itself responsible for keeping up wages, because during this discussion he admitted that the wages in the woollen industry were due, not to protection, but to a statute passed by the Ontario government. This admission is in itself an evidence that the tariff does not of its own volition keep up wages. How can the woollen industry be helped? The woollen industry can be helped, it seems to me, by reducing the cost of living, by substantial all-round reductions in the customs tariff, by releasing the natural resources and energy of this nation, and thus enabling us to build up industries that are truly indigenous. Without attempting to argue that two wrongs make a right, I want to compare the condition in which the woollen industry finds itself to-day with the condition of the province and the people of the province from which I come, a province with a population of almost 700,000 people. The provincial treasurer in his annual budget declared that the gross value of Manitoba's crops this year amounted to some $55,000,000; but I have in my hand a statement made out by the president of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, which goes to show that if you deduct threshing costs, elevator charges and transportation expenses you will find that the wheat, oats, barley, rye and flax crop of Manitoba this year amounted to $26,280,000 net. The total taxes amounted to $52,255,000. Let us take the estimate of the provincial treasurer that the gross value of the crop amounted to $55,000,000. It only meets our tax burden obligations which amount to $52,255,000. What about our private obligations, what about our cost of living, what about tariff taxation that does not reach the national exchequer at all?

When you go to those farmers in Manitoba to-day and inform them that the woollen industry in eastern Canada is in a precarious position despite the fact that they, in common with the rest of the country, have been subsidizing it for forty years, but that if they will only decide to pay anywhere between 30 and 50 per cent more for woollen garments and continue to feed the employees in the industry at a price less than the cost of production, then they will have the advantage of witnessing the upgrowth of the woollen industry in the Dominion, naturally, our farmers are dissatisfied. But when we come down here and attempt to bring some measure of relief to the people we have the honour to represent, our actions are described as indicating "indecent haste!" Of course, you should not be in a hurry to relieve people whose taxes this year are double their revenue; that would not be seemly. Not only are our actions described as indicating indecent haste, but we are accused of "political intrigue"—whatever that means—working beneath the surface of things, entering into unholy alliances; and by the press we are taunted with being more interested in our indemnities than we are in the people. Well, is there a member in this House who, if he is honest, will not admit that he is interested in his indemnity? But these charges are directed against us, not because hon. members believe them to be true. Deep down in their hearts they know such charges are false. They have not the slightest doubt in their minds with respect to our sincerity. This is mere political camouflage in an attempt to discredit us and build up the shattered remnants of the party to which they belong.

During the course of this debate we have been assured that Canada is in serious danger of being inundated with a superfluous quantity of wealth; it is threatening to overflow the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific and the flood is coming from every conceivable quarter. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) does not fear the United States so much, but he has a holy horror of Germany and France and Italy. Surely these nations, because of the government's action with respect to the tariff during the last two years, are dumping goods into this country out of all proportion to what they ought to be permitted to send us! Well, let us take the case of Germany for the last two years. In 1922 we imported from Germany goods to the value of $2,041,016; we exported $4,409,547 worth. Not much evidence there of any inundation of wealth. In 1923—nine months—we imported from that country goods to the value of $4,115,295, and we exported $10,455,556 worth. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) was alarmed lest we should be flooded with French wines. Let us look at the imports from France. In 1922 they amounted in value to $13,482,005, and we exported $8,208,228 worth. In 1923—nine months—after that iniquitous treaty, we imported goods to the value of $11,749,515, and we exported over $13,865,000 worth. Let us look at the case of Italy. I think I remember the hon. member for North Waterloo referred to Italy. In 1922 we imported from that country goods to the value of $1,387,370; we exported $15,335,818 worth. Let us take nine months of 1923: we imported from Italy goods to the value of $1,430,284—let us keep our minds on the millions—and we exported $17,445,158 worth.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I want to turn to that perennial argument—the home market. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre during the course of his remarks turned himself completely in this direction. He admitted that he could not hope his thoughts would enter our heads—the natural inference I drew was that our heads at least were not empty—but nevertheless he discussed the home market. I do not want to be too severe, I do not want to indulge in castigations, but I must frankly state that I do not believe for a moment the hon. member expected us to take him seriously. I say that because I have too great respect for his intelligence and for his practical knowledge of modern business and its intricacies to think for a moment that he expected us either to take him seriously or to accept his arguments. Now, what were his arguments? Briefly they were these: That the Dominion of Canada should look forward to a time, by steadily developing and building up the home market, when it could practically absorb—not wholly but practically absorb—all the wheat produced in this country. I hope this is a fair statement of his case, because I do not wish to misrepresent him.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. member permit me to observe that that is not a fair statement of my case?

Mr. HOEY: It is exceedingly difficult to know just what a fair representation of his case would be; but that, in my judgment, was the position in general terms, that he took; that was the impression left upon my mind and, I think, upon the minds of those with whom I associate in this section of the House. I want to point out to the government, and I do so in all seriousness, that if this is the policy the Conservative party in this country intend to pursue, either in the immediate or in the distant future, then that fact in itself ought to have a tremendous influence upon certain expenditures that the government are about to make, and the first of these expenditures is with respect to the development of the harbour at Vancouver. The hon. member does not believe in the importation of goods into this country—that is a view to which I shall refer in a moment—and he looks forward to the time when there will be no necessity to ship wheat from Canada in large quantities. Then what in the name of Heaven do they want a harbour at Vancouver for? Do they want it for the incubation of mermaids? Do they want a modern pool of Siloam out there for washing and cleansing discredited politicians? I want to say that I was interested in the developments at Vancouver. I discussed the matter at some length with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), whose firm contemplates making certain expenditures there. But if I believed that either in the immediate or in the remote future Canada was apt to absorb her own wheat crop, then I would absolutely speak against and vote against this appropriation.

[Mr. Hoey.]

Not only are we contemplating expenditures at Vancouver—and I trust that the people at Vancouver will grasp the significance of the philosophy that is being disseminated in and from this Chamber by their representative—not only are we attempting to build up harbour facilities there, but we are seriously considering the most pretentious and certainly the most costly project ever contemplated by the people of this country, the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. For what purpose? In order to facilitate the transportation of grain, not only during the immediate future but for a century, perhaps, to come. Well, if you look forward to the time when this country ought to consume its own wheat—and I put this seriously to the Prime Minister and to the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb); I can see evidences of interest in his countenance—if the policy advocated by my hon. friend has even a semblance of truth, then why not spend the money that you are going to spend at Vancouver and that you are thinking of spending on the St. Lawrence—why not spend it in dumping immigrants into this country? That is the logical outcome; that is the point to which his reasoning must lead us.

Oh, of course he would let certain goods come into this country. He did not specify them, so I can only imagine just what goods he would let in. He is opposed to the importation of French wines. I have thought the matter over and I presume that he would not be opposed to bringing balloons into this country. Then visualize for yourself six or seven ocean liners sailing along the deepened St. Lawrence, loaded with balloons for western Canada! Of course he would let raw material into this country—raw material from where? From the countries where there is cheap labour and where they could turn it into the finished article more cheaply than we could. Of course he will argue that he does not look forward to a time when we shall be wholly able to consume our own wheat, and that leads us back exactly to where the United States is to-day, a country that last year exported a litttle less than one-tenth of its wheat. It leads us back to the position not only of the agriculturists in the United States but to the railroads in the United States, many of which are almost bankrupt. Mr. Speaker, I challenge absolutely and positively his statement that the power of consumption of wheat in modern civilization is static at 650,000,000 bushels. The best English statisticians, the best English economists, assure us to-day that wheat consumption in Europe is one-third below normal. If you exercise your reasoning faculties for a moment, you can easily understand that on a continent where thousands are out of employment, where there is destitution and squalor and poverty, particularly in the protected countries over there, wheat consumption is in no sense normal, and if in Europe it has been static over a period of years, that condition has been due to the shattered purchasing power of the European nations. While the number of wheat consumers in modern civilization cannot be increased—not by acts of parliament—you can immeasurably increase their capacity to consume. A question was put by the hon. member for Battleford (Mr. McConica), and it was this: If you bring ten millions of people from Europe and put them in this country, do you not deplete Europe's consumption power? The question, Mr. Speaker, was not answered, because in my judgment it is absolutely unanswerable, and I think I can explain why. Although it was not answered, that does not mean that the hon. member did not make an honest attempt, finding himself in an awkward position, to reply to it, and I thought as I sat here quietly and thoughtfully, what an ingenious answer! First he said that the people drawn from such countries would not necessarily be drawn from wheat consuming nations. Now, if he had not put in the term "Europe" there I would have said that he had become converted and that he was in favour of bringing orientals to this country, but I cannot believe that. Well, if he does not belive in bringing in orientals, can he tell me a nation in Europe that is not a wheat consuming nation?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, lots of them.

Mr. HOEY: There is not in Europe, Mr. Speaker, a single nation the people of which do not consume wheat, and to stand up in this room and contend that there is is an insult to the intelligence of the men sitting here. That term "wheat consuming country" is occasionally used in the grain trade. It is a misnomer; it is a meaningless term in the grain trade, and it has no place here. When it is used in the grain trade it is used to denote countries that consume wheat, but do not import wheat. Let us suppose that we import from Russia five million people into this country. You increase the consumption here, of course, but you deplete the con sumption in Russia, and thus enable Russia to put that much more wheat on the Liverpool market.

The second explanation given was this, and it is perhaps more ingenious still. The second answer—shall I call it an evasion?—was this: That the exodus of people from Europe to the United States or to Australia or any other country is more than offset by the increase in population. I have not examined the figures; I did not think it worth while. But if those people did not leave Europe at all, would not the population increase? To say that the exodus of people from a country, or the mere distribution of the population, by emigration or immigration, has anything at all to do with the gradual propagation of the race is positively absurd. Look where the reasoning leads. Here is a young man in England thinking of getting married and he says to his sweetheart: "I think we can get married now because I saw by the papers the other day that several carloads of people have left for Canada." That is the conclusion to which you are driven; there is no escape from it. I will admit this: The hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Hudson) is here. He has read and studied along this line a great deal more than I have. I do not know that he is a Malthusian, but I know that he has studied quite a lot of Malthusian works. I will admit that economic factors to-day have some influence on the propagation of the race, particularly amongst the better-off people, but certainly economic conditions have no influence on the propagation of the race amongst the great masses of European peasants from whom we draw our immigrant population. And so it seems to me that we are brought back to the position in which the United States finds itself to-day, that is, we cannot positively hope to build up the home market to a greater extent than they have built it up.

The hon. member fell into the same fallacy again when he referred to the one thousand employees in the woollen industry who had trekked to the United States and ceased to consume wheat in Canada. Of course, but they trekked into the United States to consume wheat there, and to the extent that they consume it there they will reduce the exportable surplus of the United States to Liverpool.

Now in reply to an interrogation with respect to the United States the hon. member attributed the position of that country to two factors: First to the fact that the United States was an exporter of grain, and second, to the depletion of the soil in that country of its plant food content. Now that is the exact position to which we are drifting in this country, to the depletion of our soil of plant food content. This is the effect in the Prairie West:

The effect of a generation of cropping to wheat has been to reduce the nitrogen of the surface seven inches of soil by 20 to 30 per cent, the phosphorous content up to an equal amount, and the organic matter by from 20 to 50 tons per acre. In other words, in a generation more than one-quarter of the potential wealth of the surface soil has entirely disappeared.

Then if we are rapidly drifting to the condition of the United States, where our soil will be depleted, where we shall still have to export at least a quantity of our wheat, how can we hope to be in a better position than they are in when we reach that stage? Now what is the position of the United States to-day in this Protectionist millenium? Secretary Wallace declared recently that between 1920 and 1923, 603,000 farmers in fifteen wheat-growing states one-quarter of the entire number were either evicted from their farms under foreclosure proceedings or remained on the land through the leniency of their creditors, and the return net drainage of population from farms to city during 1922 amounted to 1,100,000 persons.

Now what of the remedy? What do the United States people at this time say with respect to the problem confronting them? I had the pleasure of listening to two magnificent addresses delivered by Secretary Wallace in Kansas City last fall, during the course of which he attempted, and attempted very sincerely and thoughtfully, to point the way out. Just about that time a noted American economist and journalist, Mr. John F. Sinclair, published an article and copyrighted it in the United States, which was very favourably commented on, and I think in a large measure endorsed by the American people. I am quoting now from the Kansas City Star of October 12, 1923. Mr. Sinclair has this to say:

Europe is trying hard to cut down her buying from the United States. Her decreasing purchasing power is also a large factor. In 1919 Europe purchased 332 million pounds of beef from us and a little less than 4 millions in 1922. Europe purchased 1,238 million pounds of bacon in 1919, but only 350 million pounds in 1922. What happened? The American livestock industry became utterly demoralized, and the value of our livestock dropped in this time 3,611 million dollars.

Exports of United States Fall

In 1920 the total export and import business of the United States totaled 13,342 million of dollars; it went down to 10,170 million dollars in 1921 and dwindled to 6,379 millions in 1922. The record for 1923 is expected to be worse.

Business is slowing down. Farmers and livestock men have as a result been ruined by the hundreds of thousands. The disease of Europe has spread to America. The manufacturer will be next to suffer.

Production is low now, but it will continue to get lower and lower, until, forced by stern necessity, America will call a world's economic conference which will not adjourn until reparations, war debts, military expenses, and the trade barriers of the world are re-adjusted. We have much to lose, but a great deal more to gain.

It is not a political league of nations that Europe needs, it is not a court of arbitration either. It is an economic United States of Europe that she needs, and must have.

Cut away tariff barriers, cut away military expenses, cut away the impossible debt charges, restore the wrecked international machine for trade and good will, and the average man in the world, now so discouraged, would feel the effects immediately. That to me is the all important next step.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make this suggestion, and I do so in all earnestness. Reference has been made there to the need for an economic conference. Thousands of Americans all over the United States are discussing the practicability of such a conference. I want to say to the Prime Minister what could be more natural, what could be more appropriate, what could be more fitting than that Canada—representing, as she does, the two great races, the British and the French, the two nations that have always stood for the best in human civilization—that Canada, as the interpreter between the old world and the new should make an attempt, a sincere attempt, to call the world economic conference and have that conference in the capital of Canada, in the city of Ottawa, at the earliest possible date.

And then I want to turn from this haven of rest, that great protectionist country the United States, just to look for a moment at poor downtrodden free trade England, and I want to quote from a speech recently delivered in the House of Commons in London by Mr. David Lloyd George in reply to the then Prime Minister, Mr. Stanley Baldwin:

Instead of attempting the settlement of Europe, the Prime Minister proposed to devote his time to tearing down the system which, with all its defects, accumulated the wealth that enabled them to go through the most exhausting war this country ever waged, enabled them to advance £2,000,000,000 to the Allies,—

Their protectionist Allies.

—enabled them to be the only country whose credits would be accepted for £1,000,000,000 by the greatest protectionist country in the world—the United States of America—and enabled them to restore the credit of this country after all the exhaustion of the war, when every protectionist country in Europe had its currency and its credit rushing down with Gadarenian fury.

That is the position, Mr. Speaker, of England to-day, of free trade England, when contrasted with the position of the United States.

Reference was made during the course of this debate to the position of Russia, and I want to deal with that very briefly. We have no doubt at all in our minds as to Russia's ability to produce wheat. I think we know what she can produce this year, I think we know fairly well what she can produce next year, and for several years. Men in the business and economic life of this country take all these factors into consideration from time to time, and obtain the best information possible on these questions; and let me say to my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that there is no doubt at all in my mind as to Russia's ability to come back. The Russian government has been recognized by the British government, a recognition which in my mind was long overdue. Personally I could never see the sense of failing to recognize the nation because she repudiated her debts, while at the same time recognizing nations that had slain our fellow countrymen. The recognition of Russia by the British government is significant. If there is any truth at all in the contention of Secretary Hughes, of the United States, that the Russian government is more interested in the spread of propaganda than it is in the rehabilitation of its people, what does that mean? It means that sympathetic relationships must undoubtedly exist at the present time between Russian statesmen and British statesmen, that the masses of both countries, pulsating under a new sense of freedom, will be bound to one another by a thousand and one intangible cords that have worked their way into the hearts and the affections of both peoples. I cannot forget, Mr. Speaker, that it was to Great Britain that Peter the Great went for counsel and advice, prior to the establishment of the city of St. Petersburg among the swamps, and I think it is to Great Britain that the Russian statesmen will turn in this crisis. Furthermore, Russia is sure to take advantage of the British Exports Credit Act in an attempt to buy largely from Great Britain those manufactured articles that are essential to the rehabilitation of the nation; and what could be more natural, or what could be more reasonable, than that Russia will attempt to pay for these commodities with wheat? Now, where does that lead us? It leads us to this conclusion—that the price of wheat on the Liverpool market, whether we want it or not, will have a tendency in the years to come to go down rather than up. That means that there is a grave danger of Canada being driven off the Liverpool market unless she can reduce the cost of producing wheat in this country. Is not that logical? Consequently it seems to me, if we are to retain our position as a wheat exporting nation to Europe, every handicap under which agriculture labours to-day that can be removed ought to be removed. And further, the time has come in the history of this country when we have got to choose betwen the basic industry agriculture and the exotic industries that we have been attempting to build up unnaturally, an attempt which has failed lamentably and miserably. If our experience of the past fifty years has not taught us that then we are indeed, and in truth, stupid pupils. But there is another factor. It seems to me that the eventuality as far as Russia is concerned could be, to an extent, avoided by drastic increases in the British preference that would swing English trade in this direction. Reduce the cost of living in this country, make Canada a cheap country in which to live, and a cheap country in which to manufacture. Swing British exports in this direction, and what could be more natural than that we would attempt to pay for these imports with agricultural products. You may say "But have you no regard at all for the Canadian workman?" Yes, and if my hon. friends to my right will turn to the British records, published by the British Board of Trade, they will find that in a ten year period, 1904 to 1914, there was only one year—1912, the year of the great coal strike—when increased imports did not mean increased employment in England. Make it a cheap country to live in, release the people from the bondage of protection, and the economies that they will effect in this way will be expended on other necessities of life. What chance have we, Mr. Speaker, of obtaining drastic increases in the British preference? Frankly, I am not optimistic. I have not much quarrel with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) who, in a cool, calm, somewhat austere spirit said the other day that there was not much difference whether we were put out of business by our American cousins or our British brother, provided our industries were destroyed. That is a perfectly logical position for a man with his philosophy to occupy, and if that were the attitude adopted by politicians campaigning in this country at election time, I would have no quarrel whatever with their position; but what is the attitude assumed at election time? I was a young man in this country during the days of the reciprocity campaign. I had come from Ireland but these people outbritoned the Britishers. From every political platform words were uttered such as these "A British subject I was born, a British subject I will die!" And those who had the temerity to question their judgment were described as disloyal, people who had grown up on a different soil, annexationists, lacking in Canadian patriotism. Well, what is the attitude of these men who claim to have a monopoly on the British connection? What is their attitude with respect to an increase in the British preference? Those men who preach patriotism for political purposes from the platforms of this country from ocean to ocean, who give out as their first hymn "Rule Britannia", and as their closing hymn "God save the King", and choose as their text, "Buy only made-in-Canada goods", and who, if they were straightforward, would declare to their hearers during their sermons "As far as the East is from the West, so far have we removed your possessions from you". Loyalists, shall I call these men? They remind me of those bats that inhabit certain caves in Kentucky, of which scientists speak, bats that love darkness rather than light. Because they chose darkness, nature has robbed them of their power to see,—not of their eyes, their eyes remain, but they have lost their power of vision. There are other ways and means, but let me say that if the British preference were drastically increased to draw imports this way, what would be the effect upon Russia? Would she not still continue to be a competitor? She would. But with our cost of production reduced here, we would have a chance of competing successfully with her. But there is another factor. If the drastic increases in the British preference took place immediately, the tendency in Russia would be to go in more for diversified farming rather than wheat growing. The stage of her development lends itself to that form of agriculture, and frankly I cannot see the sense or reason of shipping live stock from Alberta or Saskatchewan to Great Britain; we cannot do it profitably, while at the same time they are shipping wheat from Russia to Britain. Why not have a reversal of the order of things? Why not, by a rearrangement of trade, ship wheat from Canada, and have live stock shipped from Russia? There are other ways and means that can be evolved; not only can the cost of production be brought down by legislation, but it can be brought down by co-operative effort. I want to say with respect to the co-operative project that it is on its way in western Canada at the present time. Whether it is successful or not, never did the western agriculturist attempt anything more worthy of him, never did the western agriculturist attempt anything more in keeping with the spirit and demands of the age, never did he attempt anything more ethical than when he attempted, as he is attempting now, to take this staple commodity from the producer and place it on the table of the consumer without enhancing its price by the superfluous intervention of unnecessary middlemen. I want to say that there are certain compulsory features about the present wheat pool that I dislike, but let me express the hope that, in the course of time, those compulsory features will be relegated to the scrap heap, and that this pool will go on until it can establish a relationship between the co-operative exporting institutions in the Old Country. What could be more natural than that this great co-operative pool, marketing her commodity to the extent of $400,000,000 annually, should ultimately establish relationships between co-operative organizations in the Old Country? I think it would establish those relationships now were it not for the tariff barriers that keep British commodities from this country at the present time.

Mr. EULER: May I ask a question?

Mr. HOEY: Yes.

Mr. EULER: I understand from the hon. member's statement that he is in favour of the British preference. I ask then how could he consistently say that, if he is not in favour also of tariffs against other countries? Because a preference, I would say, must assume that there shall be a tariff? You cannot have a preference unless there is a tariff.

Mr. HOEY: My reply to that thoughtful question is simply this, that I am dealing with conditions as they are,—

Mr. EULER: That is what I was doing.

Mr. HOEY: —not as I would like them to be.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to raise my voice in this Chamber in protest against a minority group holding out threats, sounding a note of warning against this government if it pursues a certain policy. I want to raise my voice in protest against the minority group in this Chamber posing as anything but the remnants of a party. I want to raise my voice in protest against their having a monopoly or a right to speak for the Canadian people;—without a single representative from Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Quebec, Prince Edward Island, and with one lone lamb from Nova Scotia, posing to speak for the people of Canada, issuing notes of warning to the government as to what will happen. I admit that the Conservative party shows evidences of coming back, but coming back with reduced numbers and with ranks still further depleted. They have increased their numbers, it is true; but I read in the press the other day an intimation where certain jails and penitentiaries were increasing their numbers, and I did not take that as an indication of Canadian progress. This government has no other alternative than to pursue the policy upon which the Liberal party and the Progressive party were elected to this House—to contend otherwise is to repudiate the very principles of democratic citizenship—and to carry out the programme upon which we were elected. If it is carried out courageously, we need have no fear. But if it is approached timorously, timidly, fearfully, even though it be productive of a certain amount of good, it will be repudiated. The people of Canada to-day are looking for a Liberal programme and a Liberal policy. I have not been approached directly or indirectly by any member of the present government, by any member of the Liberal party as to what my attitude was or is going to be; I have never received a letter on the question; I have never written a letter on the question; I stand to-night as completely detached, as free and untrammelled from any party in a partisan sense, as the breezes that sweep the prairies in the district from which I come. If the government is prepared to go ahead with its programme, I am prepared to support it, not only on the tariff question and without qualification, but on any other legislation that it introduces that is in harmony with the programme upon which I was elected and which, I trust, will be carried out. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) referred to the disappointment that would be felt throughout the country by those who looked forward to the creation of a new party, to find a party that was about to be merged. I want to tell the government to-night that the people of Canada at this time are not at all interested in party triumphs, neither are they interested in change of governments. What they do want and what they are insistently demanding is a change of policy, and they do not care from what source that policy may come, provided that policy is in the interest, not of one section or of another section, but of this great, young and developing nation.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I fully realise the disadvantage, which I must bear as cheerfully as I can, the pronounced contrast, of having it fall to my lot to follow a speaker so very entertaining as he who has just resumed his seat. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Hoey) certainly combines five or six very valid factors which constitute him easily one of the most acceptable speakers in this parliament. Whether or not to-night he was in possession of that moderation which is almost always so characteristic of him, I will say this, that all his aggressiveness and all his pointed, but unpoisoned, humour were more than justified in exposing the immoderateness of the position of the "neck or nothing" high protectionist in this country and in this House. In so far as they represent some small wing of public opinion—and I say this in kindliness—they are to-night a distinct barrier across the path of all the major numbers of true and patriotic Canadians who are looking for some honourable compromise upon this crucial question of the tariff.

Hon. members in this House are generous as to the latitude, range and scope of topics which they call in order in this particular discussion, and I hope my remarks, perhaps rather rambling, will be at least technically in order, and I also hope, for the good of my auditors, that they shall not be of undue length. I did not hear, but I read the speech of my colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan). He reviewed with his masterly fidelity the rights and aspirations of the Maritimes, a question and a subject which may possibly appear to stale a little on the ear of those in this part of the Dominion, but which is still dear to us and a matter of trust. The hon. gentleman did so well that I do not propose to review what he reviewed with a masterful hand, except to refer to one subject, unimportant, perhaps, in one sense, and yet important in another sense, a subject which relates to the honourable and successful management of our great National Railways in this country. In my home town, which is a strong railway town, there are to-night three old employees of that road, who were old employees of the Intercolonial, and they stand under the stain of a dismissal by this railway board. The charges include irregularities and the grave claim that these men were pilfering money which they took from passengers by way of railway fares. I need scarcely say that if the charges were true, such a man would deserve little or no consideration. I need however, scarcely say that it will be a truism to every lawyer at least in this House that on a charge so serious the proof should be absolutely satisfactory and convincing and obtained in a thoroughly judicial way. These men are men of splendid reputations, men with such a standing in their community that those who know them would be sorry to believe they would do a single thing that was wrong. I read over the typed evidence in the case of the investigation which resulted in one dismissal, and I found that the method of trailing these men was to put spotters, as you may contemptuously call them, or detectives, if you prefer the more dignified term, upon their trail, and upon their train to clandestinely watch their actions, to see if the appropriate document was punched and handed to the passenger in cases where the latter did not obtain a ticket at the railway depot. They made their investigation like wolves, in a pack, and claimed that they found that some of these old and honoured conductors had held back and appropriated fares. The principle is the same, whatever the amount involved. Well, Sir, at that investigation only one of the detectives appeared and manfully faced the conductor whom he had accused. In the case of the other spotters, though they, the deponents were not there, their bald affidavits were used to convict and dismiss the accused.

That is the state of affairs we have there, the railway board hiring these detectives to trail the conductors, securing from them affidavits to do their cowardly work while the deponents were shooed away. Instead of having every accuser face the accused, with the right for each to look the other in the eye, and for the conductor or his friend or his counsel to cross-examine his accuser, and so enable the investigator to judge of the credibility of the opposing witnesses—because the conductors denied the charge—and make a judicial finding, we have the condition I have described.

I complained of the action to high officials of the board, including Sir Henry Thornton himself. I received an answer from them and from him which was neither satisfactory nor judicial in its tone, and I find it my duty, as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has found it his duty, to put this matter before parliament. I hope no hon. member will say that this business is unimportant, and that the owner of no heart is so callous that he would advise us to go back to the board, and if we cannot get justice there, that that is the end of it. The management of this great system of railways by a board of directors is as yet in its infancy and upon trial, and the board itself is but a child of this administration, indeed of this parliament, and therefore I ask the sympathy and the interest of hon. members in this connection. Surely we are spending money enough on a large legal staff to advise the board in all the intricacies of its work wherein questions of law or equity arise, and I hope these highly paid legal experts will be able to build up a proper British system for investigating any alleged wrong-doing by the employees of the road. It may be said that an employer has the right to dismiss his employee. But these cases are not parallel with the ordinary case. Where an individual or private firm dismisses an employee he suffers no public injustice, there is no undue publicity, and the man can go off and, whether guilty or innocent, has a fair chance to get a living at some other work; but to dismiss an old and honoured conductor of a publicly-owned railroad casts suspicion upon him all over the country, and he has no chance of recovering his reputation for honesty or of securing some other employment. Worse still, in this case the railway board say the dismissed conductor shall have no claim to any benefits of the pension fund to which he has contributed for many years and in absolute good faith. I say that these men should have a new trial, or get the benefit of the substantial doubt that exists and be restored to their positions; or that at worst their pension rights should be restored to them.

As a Nova Scotian, Mr. Speaker, I feel a sense of sorrow for the illness which is responsible for the absence from this House of the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). The reports from his residence concerning his health are, I believe, decidedly cheering. We know that he is paying the penalty for having exerted his patriotic energy too long after that good grey head which all men know became white with the blossoms of the almond tree We do trust, in fact we have a lively hope, that even this session he is going to be with us for a while. We all sincerely hope that, restored to all the health which might be expected of one in his somewhat advanced years, he will long enjoy a period of comparative rest wherein this country shall still have the benefit of his courageous and sane optimism and of his ripe experience and sage advice.

I equally regret that the hand of illness is upon the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). Fortunately his illness does not seem to be so severe and we have the prospect of seeing him back with us very soon in this House. The hon member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) the other night indulged in a joke by relating an anecdote to the effect that when the ex-minister was asked how he was, he said he was sick, but not half so sick as when he was administering his department. Well Sir, I think we could name two or three at least of the fifty hon. members in the Conservative group who would not feel the least bit sick if they saw the slightest possibility of succeeding to the portfolio of the Minister of Justice. But whether the country at large would not have some qualms of conscience and some warning qualms of the stomach in the happening of such an event I think is entirely another question.

I was led to reflect on the record thus far of our new Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when I heard the magnificent speech to which he treated us the other afternoon, and I am sure that in him the Liberal party and the country at large have found a worthy successor to his immediate and distinguished predecessor. Higher compliment I could not pay.

As a comparatively new member in this House, I want to personally welcome those who have taken their seats here since last session. I do that without prejudice to my view of the fallacy of the cause which may have sent a couple of them here. In the case of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Doucet) I agree with the talented member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) that the newcomer exhibited no nervousness in the making of his maiden speech. But I think he should be congratulated upon his good fortune in not having his fire returned by hon. members who sit around me on this side of the House, because I must say that he made a very questionable use of the white flag in prefacing his remarks by a request that we accord him the concession of consideration because it was his maiden effort, and then proceeding to launch an attack upon us which, to put it very mildly, was not as free from partisan extravagance as he was physically free himself from the demon of nervousness. But, Mr. Speaker, I notice he has left his seat, and therefore I shall refrain from half a dozen other observations which I intended to make respecting his initial speech in this chamber.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in the course of his contribution to this debate put on a very earnest look—and I assume he was really earnest—and said that there was a distinct impression of anxiety throughtout the business world of the Dominion as to an impression that we were actually going to reduce the tariff. Well, he may call it anxiety in the business world, but I would call it a rattling of the dry bones of those infant industries which, with nearly forty-six years over their heads, refuse to grow up and stand alone.

I was interested in the speech of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) the other day. The hon. member has an honourable military record and I am entirely sincere in congratulating him on that. The hand that for our country fought, whether it grasped a sword, whether it helped to heal the wounded, whether it ministered to those who died in battle-harness, is a hand I hope that as a citizen of this country I shall always properly honour. But my only regret is that the hon. member from that constituency is by no means as good a statesman as he is a warrior. He made an exceedingly partisan speech from the purely Conservative standpoint. One illustration he took to prove that the Conservative party was actually more democratic than the Liberal party was this: He said that we should go to the country; that his party went to the country when they had a majority of twenty-five over all. Well, many a bankrupt has quite a showing of goods in his shop, and the way to get at his real condition is to foot up his liabilities and his assets. They had that asset of twenty-five or thirty members and they had this liability facing them: just as often as they opened a constituency they would lose it by an overwhelming majority that indicated unmistakably the feeling of the people. I think the picture of Medicine Hat was one of the last that came into their dreams; and then, like a man doomed to cross a river where the ice was thin, they got into that state where they did not know whether it was safer to go on or to turn back. They actually opened another county; they spent the people's money in issuing the writs, in engaging a returning officer and in getting the machinery ready. But all this was done as a camouflage with regard to the time of bringing on the general election; either that, or it was done in a state of hysteria when they did not know their own mind. Well, that by-election had scarcely got under way when it was submerged by the larger issues of a general election. Yes, they had a majority of twenty-five or thirty when they went to the country. I am reminded of an occasion when I was out in a boat on Cobequid bay, a branch of the Bay of Fundy. Joseph Howe once told the people of Nova Scotia to boast of their province, that if they could say nothing else for it they could say that it had the highest tides in the world I am a poor sailor, and I found myself in a small, frail boat at the flood tide. with too many in it even for calm weather. The conditions were such that our lives were actually in danger. Not far away from us was a sand bar a few acres in extent which was rapidly becoming covered by the stormy water. A little girl in the boat pleaded with her father to run the boat over to that island in the sand, which, as all except her knew, would within an hour be entirely submerged by the tide. Of course we did not take that advice; we made for the shore, and by good luck we got there. These gentlemen do not deserve any particular thanks for choosing no longer to stand upon that majority of twenty-five or thirty, around which there raged the tide of public indignation, but rather to go to the country. They took a chance, as we did, to get to the shore of a new lease of power, and, as history has shown, they went down. But their position with that majority of twenty-five would have been just as untenable and as ridiculous as ours would have been had we disembarked on that little area of sand in the path of the tide.

The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River has told us that what this country needs is a redeclaration of the National Policy. I am sure that anyone who has that idea is behind the age; in fact, Rip Van Winkle himself was up to the minute in comparison with him. A redeclaration of the National Policy? Why, you are going back to something that had more than a fair trial and that was more than a colossal failure. A redeclaration of the National Policy? The country will know that that implies an absolute repudiation and repeal of every vestige of the British preference. I remember the days when the National Policy was dragging on its weary length, when I was a young man; like Micawber we were waiting for something to turn up. At every Tory political meeting to which I would go the statement was made that our foreign trade was increasing literally by millions, and this was put forward as a wonderful argument. I to-day took the trouble to get the figures on that, and I find that with eighteen years of trial of the National Policy, from 1878 until 1896, the total trade of Canada increased from $169,000,000, in round figures, to $221,000,000. That was an increase of about $50,000,000 which was flaunted from every Tory platform in those days and was put forth as proof of the success of the National Policy. But what was the increase during the next fifteen years under the Laurier administration, which saw the institution of the important incidence of the British preference? I find that the total trade of Canada increased from $221,000,000 in 1896 to $742,000,000 in 1911, or, roughly, ten times in fifteen years the amount that it had increased in eighteen years under the National Policy when it was functioning under the supervision of its own authors and finishers. I cannot for the life of me see any reason for turning back the hands of the clock and making a redeclaration of the National Policy. I suppose every one of these forty-six year old infant industries would then want to be rebaptized and to assume the state of newborn babes. I can imagine that in future generations there would be a recurrence of this condition. Suppose the tariff were established as at the time of the National Policy and there were a gradual policy of attrition in respect to customs duties in response to public dissatisfaction. The future beneficiaries of that wonderful policy would come back to the parliament of that future day and say, "We want a rebaptism; we want a redeclaration of the National Policy; we want a second or third life, a second or third chance." If it were the case of a cat I could conceive of her modesty coming to an end at about the ninth visit, but with the insatiate greed of the high protectionist I am afraid the process would be perpetual.

The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River—and I will give him credit for it—was decidedly original in two or three of his remarks during the course of his address. He told us boldly, and it was a complete reversal of the whole song that we have heard sung by his political associates since the election of 1921, that the country has been plunged into the alleged slough of despond in which it now flounders because, chiefly, we did not carry out our pre-election promises. I think the thing was all the other way. That is, his party that said our promises were utterly unsound and ridiculous and that their fulfilment would be the ruin of this country. It reminds me of the little boy who was asked by his school teacher to write an essay upon Pins, and he proceeded to write a little essay on the subject. His first sentence was: "Pins save thousands of lives." "Why Johnny", said his teacher, "How do you make that out?" "Oh", he says, "it is because people do not swallow them." And I suppose that if the hon. member had lived in Bible times he would have said that the only sure way to compass the death of John the Baptist would have been for King Herod to deny the dancer when she asked for John's head upon a charger. I say that the avoidance of the fulfilment of our promises, according to the Conservative party, was the salvation of the country.

It makes me just a little bit doubtful in so far as I can keep my mind from confusion in that state of facts, whether after all his heart really turned away from those sound economic propositions which were his when he was advocating that we should accept the proffer of reciprocity from the United States. He tells us that he went back on that, and he quoted Lincoln for his authority. I am afraid his authority was very far drawn. He professes to have seen the light like Paul. I do not think it was sun, moon or stars. It may have been the light that never was on sea or shore; or the light that failed. As for giving us any satisfactory answer or any semblance of a reason, he did nothing except to quote Lincoln from this long distance of time. I listened in vain for any real explanation of his somersault.

The hon. gentleman did tell us that we must look to the United States as a great example of the success of protection. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think we have said many times, and I think it is a truism and an axiom, that the United States herself is a great example of the success of free trade. I do not care what technically you call the tariffs which from time to time are found upon her wide walls; she has a great diversity of soil anl clime, f fruit and grain and mineral and fish, of resources vast and varied. She has the advantage of a seaboard that is wonderful. I say that the United States is a great example of the success of free trade. I do not think there is an area in the world which can boast in the same mileage such splendid resources, or such a splendid example of the success of free trade as the United States itself. We cannot adopt any parrot rule and say that because protection is good for the United States it is good for us. Our situation is vastly different, as I would like to show, or rather to review, for every sensible member knows it. The cases are by no means parallel; in fact, they are very dissimilar.

As I said before, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has so well dealt with the Maritime provinces that I am not going to weary you with that subject, except to quote a few figures of population which I think raise a prima facie case that we were not given a fair deal in the device of confederation. In 1871 the population of Ontario was 1,620,851, and in 1921 it had increased to 2,933,622, or an increase of more than 80 per cent; Quebec's population in 1871 was 1,191,516, and in 1921 it had increased to 2,361,199, or over 100 per cent; Nova Scotia's population in 1871 was 387,800, and in 1921 it had increased to 523,837, or an increase of less than 40 per cent; New Brunswick's population in 1871 was 285,594, and in 1921, 387,876, or an increase of less than 40 per cent; Prince Edward Island's population in 1871 was 94,021, and in 1921 it had decreased to 88,615, or about 5 per cent. Without wearying the House I wish to contrast the difference between the Maritime provinces and the central provinces by this test of increase in population, and I say that on the face of it, it raises the presumption that confederation is economically a comparatively bad thing for us. In putting this claim before you I ask this administration and this parliament to seek carefully for the remedy, and for the British principle of fair play and of even-handed justice to all. I was going to make this suggestion, Mr. Speaker: It is possible when we find ourselves up against the serious conditions that obtain in this country at the present time that we are now paying the penalty for having been a little too boastful of our own great country. I would be the last in the world to disparage the natural greatness of Canada, but we must take a sensible and a judicial view of these matters. We live side by side with a country upon whom a munificent Providence has seen fit to shower natural blessings which are even greater than ours. Take the climate, for instance, I admit that a man from a cold country may prefer our cold and rigorous climate, but a man from the average country of Europe prefers that of the United States, and that is one of the reasons why the early settlers chose to settle there, and from that nucleus the United States has built up a population of about one hundred and ten millions, whereas we have only the paltry number, by comparison, of eight or nine millions. They can grow corn. We have the soil for that too, but we have not the sun. Our quantity of corn is almost negligible, but we all know what an immense natural asset that product is to the United States in an agricultural sense. They can grow cotton, an enormous natural asset to them, while we, of course, cannot grow any of that. When you come to fruit, it is true that we have some of the finest-flavoured fruit in the world, but in quantity it is small compared with the gigantic areas of fruit that are to be found in California and Florida, and we are glad to import their fruit despite the plaint the other day from the right hon. leader of the opposition. Take the rainfall. In 1918, when the hurricane of the war had reached its height, we were disposed to claim that this country was the granary of the Empire, but in that very year Providence saw fit to withhold very largely the rainfall from our prairies, and He saw fit to give the United States their rainfall, which is usually more dependable than in our great West, and it fell to the United States to help feed England whose tenacity was being tried to the utmost, and we had a very small part in that particular work for that year. Take our seaboard. We all know when we look at the map that we have a comparatively short seaboard on the Atlantic, and it is very jagged too. In winter the greater part of it is in the grip of the ice king, but that is not so with the Atlantic seaboard of the United States. The great ships turn their prows for the United States as coming to a climate which is just a little bit warmer and more comfortable, and to harbours which know no ice and which average a better approach than they find on our shores, and the great freighters and the ocean greyhounds put into United States ports, and it is hard indeed to persuade their owners to give us any fair proportion of their traffic. Now, I do not want to be misunderstood as to all this. I trust that no man, or no woman, would be cowardly enough to go out and say I was running down my country: I am simply trying, Mr. Speaker, to preach a little lesson in modesty. I think that we sometimes have run away with the idea that our country was unique in its natural resources and in its opportunities. It is not. But I do proclaim, and very broadly, that after all we have comparatively a very great country and its greatness, one of its assets, will be the raising of a virile, an intellectual, a spiritual and an imaginative people. Mr. Speaker, in so far as we have the will to win, in so far as we conquer difficulties, in so far as we overcome the obstacles of geography, the obstacles of distance—the fact that the habitable and the cultivable part of this country is largely found stretched, almost like a shoe string, along only the southern part of it—all that is an inspiration for us to put our best brain, our best patriotism, and our best patience into working out some solution, some honourable compromise, whereby we shall make an ultimate and glorious success of Canada. It is going to take patience. The competition from the United States is such that if you spend money in bringing immigrants here, we know very well they are apt to percolate down to the United States, and the money we have spent in bringing them here goes for nothing. That is one of the objections which the armchair critics on this question of immigration do not take into account. They say "Why do you not encourage immigration as Australia did?" But the Australian continent is a great island, with a warm climate, with frost and snow almost unknown. When you get an immigrant there, it is no matter if he is dissatisfied, there is no United States border for him to slip across; he has to stay there and make the best of it. That is one of our difficulties and my point, if I may be clear is this: We should try to solve the problems of our country. It is all a fallacy and a waste of time to sit down and enumerate only the features which indicate the greatness and the advantages of our country. Let us diagnose the case. Let us look at our difficulties along with our advantages. Let us face them candidly and frankly and let us in this investigation quit us like men. We have a great country, but we are subject to great competition from our neighbours to the south.
