s of a Peaceful Race of Men Four mong the Wind-Worn Caves of Montezana County, Col.—Why They Became Extinct.

The archæologists of Denver should be happy. Almost at their very door they can now see the skulls and handiwork of men and women of pre-historic time. The caves of the cliff-dwellers on the Mancos, of Southern Colorado, have been once more entered by vandals, but this time only ruin and the dust of departed centuries were to entered by vandals, but this time only ruin and the dust of departed centuries were to be found.

The existence of these caves has long been known, but no thorough examination was ever made until a few months ago, when Charles McLoyd, a prospector and miner of the San Juan, and four companions concluded that it would be at least a lark to look into the abandoned dwellings. A writer in the Denver Republican describes the result of their investigations. No definite idea of securing a collection was thought of, but after wandering from one ruin to another on the top of the cliffs, and where the land could be made fertile, they commenced exploring the caves. Among the first entered little of interest was to be found, but they finally came to a place that was almost inaccessible. On the mesa above a large reservoir was to be seen, and it is the opinion of the explorers that this great tract of ground was once tilled by the people who lived in the caves below. But now pinon trees of great age are standing on all sides, and how many of them have sprung up, lived their days, decayed and then have been succeeded by others, no man living today knows—it may have been hundreds, it may have been thousands of years ago.

Mr. McLoyd says that the dwellings in Montezana County were found on the sides of walls of the canyon of of the Mancos and its tributaries in wind-worn caves or crevices caused by falling water, and were so completely protected from the elements that many of their effects were found in a perfect state of preservation. As a rule, these caves are in almost inaccessible places. When linhabited they were reached quite frequently by notches cut in the rock, and at other times rope ladders must have been used.

Quite a number of the houses found were of recentions dimensions, the largest below of recentions dimensions, the largest below of recentions dimensions, the largest below of recentions.

Quite a number of the houses found were while a number of the houses found were of pretentious dimensions, the largest being a building on the ground floor of which are 112 rooms, and 200 in the upper stories. This building was four stories in height with a tower, and was built of dressed stone and a cement made of the surrounding soil mixed with a substance now unknown, and the architecture now would be called that of the Roman period.

The race which inhabited it is thought to have been related to the Zunis, Moquis and Pueblos, and it is supposed was the ancestors of those tribes. This, however, is simply supposition, and is based on the formation of the skulis and the relics of different kinds left. ent kinds left.

The race, according to the theory advanced by the Smithsonian Institute, existed about ten thousand years ago. This theory is based upon the idea that the people lived and farmed on the banks of the Saltriver before the bed of that stream was changed and the finding of trees and fungt in the ruins.

The adjoining natives, the Navajos, are the only race that have any tradition concerning these people, and theirs is that cliff-dwellers became extunct op ening overcome by numbers, and, preferring death by drowning rather than at the hands of the enemy, jumped into the water below thereone, and, instead of drowning became fish. The cliff-dwellers were a quiet, indensive race, judging from the lack of instruments of war and the many articles that were used in their crude method of farming.

Phrenologically speaking, they were quiet and peaceable, the back part of the skull being very flat and often depressed, while the front part was well formed and denoted some intelligence.

front part was well formed and denoted some intelligence.

Among the skulls in the collection is one that consists of one piece only, and shows no trace of a seam between the three parts, as is usual in the human skull. The bones found would indicate that they were a people of medium height and well formed, having small hands and feet, the hair black and finer in texture than that of any known race of savages. There is no sign of any domesticated animal or fowl with the exception of the turkey; it was utilized in many ways, specimens of dust brushes, bone needles, etc., having been found. The agricultural products found consisted of corn, beans and pumpkins, for articles of food, and the yucca for that of ciothing. Their textile fabrics consisted of mats and cloths made of cord of the yucca plant interworen with the down from the turkey or fur of some animal, and is soft and flexible. fifteen feet of water. All their farming was carried on in the valleys above the canyons and was accomplished by hard labor and with the crudest of implements, nothing having been found of this nature except a sharp-pointed stick of hard wood, which was used to tear up the ground for planting.

are light in weight and of course very durable.

Their knives were made from the bones of the deer, highly polished and very sharp. There is nothing to indicate that they were acquainted in any respect with the uses of any kind of metal. They used both wood and coal for heating and cooking purposes, and had their fireplaces just outside the door in the same manner that the Mexicans do to-day. The sandals used, unlike those worn by savage tribes of the present, were made of vegetable fibers and not of skins, and there is nothing to show that the cliff dwellers were in any way proficient in the art of hunting, as only arrows of hard wood and cane are found, and they could not be used in killing large game, being of so fragile a nature. They had but few ornaments, which were made mostly of turkey bones and nuts resembling the hickory nut, and of which no other specimens are extant. There are, however, a few made of cannel coal, inliad with ivery of some kind.

This race was one evidently that on sec

This race was one evidently that on account of their peaceful natures were driven from place to place in the valley, and finally took refuge and built homes in these almost inaccessible places, and were at last overcome and perished in defense of their homes, as the unfinished walls found indicate that they were suddenly interrupted in the midst of their usual occupations and put to death.

just chipping the ends with her teeth, as do school-children, but biting off substantial quarter-inch pieces and crushing and swaling them with infinite relish. This was quite a remarkable achievement for a staid, matronly person, such as she appeared to be, and naturally she was questioned concerning this strange propensity. From what she said in reply it seems that this unusual system of diet was by no means confined to slate-pencils. Gravel is a staple article of food with her, properly strained and assorted; oyster and clam shells and friable sandstone she masticates as a man cats a soda cracker, and asks for more. She experiences an unexplainable crawing for such matter and feels compelled to eat it. The odor of the dust raised in the streets by passing vehicles arouses in her much the same sensation of unappeasable desire as affects the senses of the incbriate when assalled by the rumes of a dram-snop. There is nothing she likes better than to discover a nice retired gravel-pit and revel in the consumption of its products. "Oh, how I should like to go to the sea-shore where there is lots of clean, white sand," signed she. This extraordinary personage is a woman of about forty years of age, apparently, and is easily described as a down-east. Yankee mother of a family. The only peculiar thing about her looks is her complexion, which is curiously pale—almost corpse-like in its pallor. She says she has been accustomed to eat gravel and such like substances ever since she can remember. She lives in Lewiston. "The only thing I can't eat," observed this remarkable woman as she turned to leave the store, "is paving-stones. They break my teeth."

ADVICE ABOUT NAGGING. A Disagreeable Habit Which Is Fraught with Censiderable Danger.

A Disagreeable Habit Which Is Fraught with Censiderable Danger.

Many estimable wives and mothers become so committed to this disagreeable habit that not unfrequently the happiness of the family is wrecked by it, says the Philadelphia Press. It is so much the more to be regretted because it is from the very nature of their qualities that the habit is acquired. It is not the slip-shod, happy-go-lucky people that are annoyed by the faults of others—the shirking, the want of considerateness, the total discreptive of every plain duty. No, they are painstaking, conscientious souls who are sorely tried by the negligence of others, and waste of time and opportunity and substance it may be; who find their strength unable to bear more than two or three times their share of the best control of the best more than two or three times stance it may be; who find their strength unable to bear more than two or three times their share of the heat and burden of the day; who have again taken up the task of others less conscientious; who have again and again stood between those others and the consequences of their own indelence, folly, stupidity and injustice—these are the ones who give vent to their overwrought feeling in bitter complaining and reproach. Just here lies the danger. A careful ones who give vent to their overwrought feeling in bitter complaining and reproach. Just here lies the danger. A careful housewife, fully alive to the importance of thoroughness in the little things in the conduct of life, sees constantly so much undone or worse than undone on the part of the husband, children and servants, that in the constant endeavor to set them all right, to restrain this one, or to bring that one up to the requisite point, or to ward off the consequences of the thought-lessness of this one, and want of considerateness of this one, and want of considerateness of this one, and want of considerateness of this one, the habit of magging grows stronger and stronger upon her from day to day. But let her possess her soul in patience; let her be assidous in cultivating that "sweetness" which is the main element of Mathew Arnold's culture, and which is frequently spoken of by Jonathan Edwards, stern and tincompromising Calvinist though he was.

Better that the pecadillocs in the kitchen should be unobserved at times by the mistress than that the house should be shunned by all the willing servants in the neighborhood; better that the faults of the children should her lightly reproved than that they should learn to do without their mother's sympathy and love, which will most likely be the case if she pursues toward them a course of perpetual and persistent faultfinding; better that the husband's petty failings be passed over in silence than that he should learn to find his happness away from home, perhaps in some other woman's home.

It is not meant that all reproof of fault-ladding is reprehensible; children and server.

It is not meant that all reproof or fault-It is not meant time an reprocess, that all adding is reprehensible; children and servants must be shown how to do better, but with judicious words of commendation thrown in to temper the blame. In this, as in other things, let a golden mean be observed.
