Surely, in the future, a different policy will be adopted and we should aim at quality rather than quantity in order to secure a better class of immigrants. We should not only be concerned with encouraging immigration into this country; we should be equally concerned with maintaining a check upon that immigration. We cannot help what has happened in the past but the future is before us and that is what we are interested in now. There should be a method of registration. All immigrants coming into Canada from European countries should be registered. They should be kept track of for a certain period, possibly two or three years, and if, at the end of that time they have not become naturalized or become Canadians and British subjects, they should be deported to the country from which they came. That appears to me to be the only way to accomplish what we desire. If we do that we will build up the country with a better class of people and that should be our object rather than to have large numbers who will not be quite so desirable. By a system of registration and keeping track of immigrants for a reasonable time we will know whether they are desirable or not and if they fail to become naturalized we can deal with them.

The experience that we have had in the last four or five years with that class of people who did not become naturalized, who were aliens, foreigners to this country, has not been a happy or a profitable one. I made the statement on the floor of this House last session, that there were thousands of foreigners throughout the Dominion who were taking the places of our own boys who had responded to the call of the Empire. These men were occupying positions in which they were drawing large sums of money for wages, amounting on the average from five to ten dollars a day, and running each month to hundreds of thousands of dollars, perhaps even millions. They were becoming wealthy at the expense of our own boys who had left the country for overseas service, and I suggested that there should be a commission, or a committee, appointed to go into the matter and ascertain the actual number of these people, their method of living, and the amounts they are earning. A war tax might then be levied on these foreigners who are earning such large sums of money, and whose method of living was such that they saved almost all they earned. I think I recited, on the occasion referred to, two or three cases that we knew of in the city of Toronto, cases where men were brought into the hospital. Of these men one carried $3,000 in a belt, another had $2,500, and a third had $900. It seems to me that the present time is opportune for the carrying out of my suggestion. These foreigners, just as soon as conditions have changed in Canada, will disappear almost over-night, each one carrying with him virtually a bank, carrying money that we have received no benefit whatever from in the way of a revenue. I also said last session that we should have levied a war tax on these foreigners, the revenue from which might be applied to alleviating the condition of the orphans or widows of our deceased soldiers. Had my suggestion been carried out it would have brought in an immense revenue to the country, and would have materially lightened the burden to be borne by our own people. To-day we read in the newspapers that some ten thousand of these foreigners wish to return to some foreign country, and that five thousand others are seeking to be transported to the country from which they came. There are thousands of them going back to their native land where they will be able on Canadian money to live in comfort for the rest of their days. They are carrying millions of good money from Canada which will go to enrich other countries, and we shall derive no benefit from it whatever. So I say, our experience in the past suggests that we should adopt a different policy for the future.

In a few days legislation will be submitted to this House having for its object the expenditure of some $20,000,000 for the construction and improvement of highways. In this connection I wish to congratulate the province of Ontario for the measures it is taking to create public works to afford work for the unemployed, and I shall submit a few figures which I think go to show that Ontario at least is alert to the present situation. In the province of Ontario there are thirty-seven counties, of which thirty-six have established county road systems. These systems comprise a total mileage of 9,400. If to these figures be added the proposed mileage of the provincial system, amounting to 600, it will give a total of 10,000 miles of improved roadways. The expenditures for the year on the county road system will exceed $3,000,000, whereas the provincial system involves an expenditure on roads of approximately $2,000,000. The province of Ontario is arranging to provide this large expenditure for the purpose of giving work to the unemployed, and that work is to be carried on during the coming year. I think also that Quebec is undertaking a good roads system, and Manitoba also; I have no doubt but that the various other provinces will undertake similar outlays, and perhaps to a larger extent, which, coupled with the outlay proposed by the Dominion authorities, will result in a very large expenditure. While the province of Ontario is undertaking to expend upon roads the large amount mentioned, we have had in that province some experience of road and highway building which has not been altogether satisfactory. I have some figures with me, and contrasting the original estimate with the total expenditure for carrying out the work, there still remains a good deal to be learned in the matter of road building. Furthermore, from what I have heard with respect to the construction of the Toronto-Hamilton highway, a great deal of money expended on that enterprise was virtually wasted. I do not consider that we got full value for the money expended on that highway, nor do I believe the quality of the highway is what it should have been, and it lacks the width that is demanded in a stretch of roadway where tremendous traffic is developing for pleasure and for commercial purposes, and where the amount of tonnage transported will be very large indeed. So great indeed is the traffic which passes over this highway that I venture to say, from the nature of its construction in a very short time this roadway will have so deteriorated that it will perhaps have to be rebuilt in a more substantial way, and with greater width. The mileage is thirty-seven, and the original estimate of the cost for a roadway of sixteen feet width was some $340,000. The estimate for a roadway at eighteen feet width was $400,000. That is, after having decided to build a sixteen foot roadway the authorities discovered that it was entirely too narrow and too dangerous, and they enlarged the width to eighteen feet, which means an expenditure of approximately $400,000. The total cost of the highway, exclusive of the bridges, will be about $1,190,000. The total cost including the bridges will be $1,251,000. But I saw a few days ago where the chairman of the commission having charge of the work stated that the total expenditure when the highway is completed would be $1,480,000. So that although the original estimate for this work was $340,000, to entirely complete it will mean an outlay of a million and a half of dollars. Now there has been a great deal of complaint in connection with this work, and grievances have arisen. When the original estimate of cost was advanced to $400,000, and then exceeded, various municipalities complained. They objected to the further increased expenditure, but the commission applied for the necessary sanction to the Provincial Legislature. I may say that a member of the Legislature is chairman of the commission, and after the highway was started he insisted that the work should be completed at any cost. This gentleman forced upon the various interested municipalities that increased expenditure, and yet, notwithstanding that augmented outlay we have not got value for such large expenditure, neither is the road a suitable one for a thoroughfare with such heavy traffic. Therefore, when this Government proposes to hand over to the various provinces the sum of $20,000,000, I do not think it is showing good judgment. Nevertheless we appreciate the object in undertaking the expenditure of such a large sum in a worthy cause. We know that at this time there are many returned soldiers in Canada, and many other unemployed persons throughout Canada, and I congratulate the Government on undertaking this expenditure to provide work for those who now need it.

I do not think it is good judgment to hand to the various provinces this $20,000,000 that is to be expended in the next five years. This Government should lay down a policy of building a great transcontinental highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, costing possibly a couple of hundred million dollars and adopt and carry out its own system of building it. What does the handing over of this large expenditure to the various provinces mean? The patronage system still prevails in the provinces, and there is danger that we shall not get good value for the amount which is to be expended. Then, if the roads are constructed by the various provinces, the responsibility for anything which may be faulty or subject to criticism will rest upon this Government, which is furnishing $20,000,000 for this purpose, and, I suppose, will continue to furnish further sums. I do not think we should place on one engineer the responsibility of representing this Government on the various commissions appointed by the provinces in connection with the construction of these highways. I doubt whether that one person could cope with the situation in the various provinces and with the influences that may be brought to bear upon the spending of this money. I submit that this Government should themselves undertake to expend this money, and should themselves assume all responsibility in that connection.

There is quite a difference between a transcontinental highway and the rural highway or a township or county road. I do not doubt that the idea of building a transcontinental highway is a capital one. It will link up all the principal manufacturing towns throughout the Dominion, develop a new transportation system and create a settlement along this highway that should be very beneficial to the development of the country. It is another method of development. We have our transcontinental steam railways; we are now electrifying many railway lines, and we should construct a highway for motors, commercial and pleasure. But that would be an entirely different road from that which has been built by the provinces or from that which would be generally used by the provinces. We should not be in too big a hurry to hand this money over to the provinces. The Government would be well advised in following my suggestion that they themselves take the full responsibility for the construction of such a highway.

This expenditure of $20,000,000 is proposed, first, to assist the unemployed returned soldier, and, second, to assist the unemployed generally. How will that work out? First, we call upon the returned soldier who is unemployed and we say to him: "Here is construction work; here is employment for you." But this work—perhaps seventy per cent of it—is pick and shovel work, and the soldier will likely say: "I am not used to pick and shovel work, and I do not propose to take up that kind of work for a living." I think that the majority of the soldiers will decline to do that kind of work.

Then, in the towns and cities, there are thousands of men who are unemployed. You say to them: "Here is an expenditure of millions; by applying you can get employment." What will the answer be? I am inclined to think that the unemployed man in the city will say: "My family is in the city; all my interests are there; I do not desire to go ten, fifteen, twenty, or fifty miles from my home to do pick and shovel work." I think, therefore, he will decline to become a pick and shovel man.

Now, the next class you will draw from—and this is serious as I see it—is that of the men in the villages who are labourers or the men on the farm who work from ten to twelve hours a day, possibly getting $2.50 a day. The latter will say to his associates: "I think we had better give up this work on the farm; it is heavy work; the hours are long and the pay small. We can go to the highways commission and get $3.50 to $4 a day, and work only eight hours each day." Now, in this way you are drawing upon those who are engaged upon production, which is serious. We all know the difficulties that have been experienced in the last four or five years in connection with production on the farms. If therefore, in carrying out this scheme you draw from that section of the community, instead of working a benefit to our country in the way of production of foodstuffs, we shall be injuring it. You may be able to check that up by close inquiry and registration; but will the commission be so particular as that? Or will they circulate this money irrespective of the community that they draw from the necessary labour? We want to give employment to the unemployed; we want to circulate this money, but we do not want to draw from these various classes that I have mentioned, to the disadvantage of the Dominion. If we cannot succeed in building these highways without drawing upon rural communities in the employment of labour, then it is my view that we should not go on with that expenditure.

The Government should be congratulated for offering to the provinces $25,000,000 for the purpose of securing better housing conditions in the large cities, and incidentally reducing unemployment. Many houses in the large cities are not as sanitary and up-to-date as they should be. Toronto has had some experience in housing matters, some houses having been built by a company, but I would say that the undertaking was a failure.

I understand that a commission of the best business men in Toronto has been appointed, composed of men in whom we have every confidence, and who would not go into this if they did not think it would be a success. The difference between the two plans would be this: About ten years ago, when there was a house famine, an agitation was started that the city should go into the housing business. The city decided that if a company was formed, they would guarantee bonds to the extent of $1,000,000 for the housing company, and they would give fifteen per cent of that, or $150,000. The company was accordingly organized, got its charter and went into the housing business. The method of building, however, was not modern, nor was it in the interest of the housing of many people. They took two pieces of ground, with a total area almost as great as the block on which this building stands. These parcels of land are located in two different parts of the city. Instead of the new method that is proposed, the old company endeavoured to see how many houses they could get on a certain piece of ground irrespective of conditions. The result was that terraces of houses numbering from five, ten, fifteen, up to fifty were erected, and at the rear of each house there was a space of some fifteen feet, just sufficient for a revolving clothesline. This space was all open; there was no privacy. The result was that on wash-days the children playing around would run up against the clothes and there would be trouble. This occurred on many occasions. In front, there were nice lawns, which gave the houses a good appearance. In these houses there were three, five or six rooms on each floor, with three families in each house. The Housing Company completed the houses, and there has been a demand for them at good rentals. But it is stated that last year there was a loss to the management of over $4,000, and this has occurred at a period when rents are up sky-high. If that is the condition now, what is it going to be in the future? This Housing Company have, as I understand from the report in the press, decided to hand the management over to some loan company or collecting agency. I think the company is trying to get out from under. That is the past experience of Toronto in regard to housing.

I like the ideas of the new commission better. They purpose building houses worth about $2,500 or $3,000. They purpose having a standard width of twenty or twenty-five feet, with a depth of eighty to one hundred, or perhaps 110 feet, with the lots properly divided from each other so as to ensure privacy. The houses are to have from four to six rooms. That idea is, I think, all right. The houses are to be either detached or semi-detached. Each family will have an opportunity to have their own yard, so that their children will have a private yard to play in, and with a rear lot of a fair size there will be opportunity for gardening, which will prove an advantage to this class of people. This class of house will, as the result of experience of the old system, be found to be more suitable for the working people. I see, however, one danger even at this time of erecting that class of house. As we know, things to-day are abnormal. Supposing, as is proposed, a house is built worth $3,000, including the lot. When things become normal in two or three years from now, labour and material will be somewhat more moderate, and there is a danger of such a house depreciating in value to the extent of from $300 to $500. These houses are to be sold to the working people, so that a workingman who has bought one of these houses may find that his investment has shrunk from three to five hundred dollars, and he will become dissatisfied. If he has to leave the city and go to some other place to work, and finds it necessary either to sell or rent, and if he discovers that instead of three thousand dollars he can get only $2,500, or if he has to accept a low rental, he will become dissatisfied and may throw up the deal. The danger is, therefore, that an unpleasant feeling may be created, and that would not be desirable. The principle, however, that the commission is working on as to the class of house and also in regard to expenditure in order to give work to a large number of people, is all very good, but there is, as I have explained, the danger of dissatisfaction afterwards.

This Government has offered money for housing to the provincial governments, and they in turn have offered it to the various municipalities. Neither the Dominion Government nor any of the provincial governments is taking any risk of loss in doing this. That risk falls upon the municipalities. They have to guarantee the provincial governments and the provincial government has, in turn, to guarantee the Dominion. Therefore, if there is any loss, it will fall on the municipalities, and the result might be serious. I do not know, therefore, that at this particular time the municipalities should rush into erecting more houses.

Another matter that I have no doubt will be before the House in a few days is the temperance question. We should, in my opinion, continue for another year the Temperance Act that was passed as a war measure, and then, as this is a large and important question, a referendum should be submitted to the people of this Dominion. When one mixes amongst the people in order to find out their views, one is convinced that this is a big question, and if it is settled by the people, the people should be satisfied and we should legislate accordingly. I believe this Government did the right thing in having that Act put through. I, as a citizen of Toronto, congratulate the provincial government on their War Measures Act, although they have got into bad odour for putting it through. But nevertheless I think they were right and they will come out right in the end. What would have been the position in Toronto if that Act had not been put through? Every member here, I believe, knows the experience we had with the riot that occurred during the latter part of last year.

I am sure that if the saloons had been open, conditions would have been very much worse. As it was, there were several broken heads, and there are claims against the city amounting to from $50,000 to $80,000 for property destroyed. I think the provincial government did the right thing at the right time, and I hope the legislation will be continued, notwithstanding the fact that many people will say that the provincial government acted in an autocratic manner in putting this legislation on the statute-book. I have had considerable experience as a retailer, and I have seen considerable of the evil effects of drinking. It is not the drinker himself but his wife and children who suffer the most. I am prepared to hold up both hands in favour of temperance legislation, both provincial and Dominion.

Since last session there has been quite a restless feeling among the employees of the outside Civil Service. Last session I received many letters from employees of different branches of the Civil Service asking for consideration of their case, as owing to the high cost of living many found it difficult to make ends meet. We felt last session that the Government would relieve this condition, but they did not, and the result was that a strike took place in Toronto. A large deputation came to Ottawa to interview the Government, and I must express my appreciation of the interest taken in the matter by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) who accompanied the delegation. The delegation had two or three conferences with the Government and went home with the feeling that something would be done. But relief has not been afforded up to this day, and a spirit of restlessness continues to prevail among many thousand employees of the Government. It may not be necessary to give the men all that they are asking, but something must be done, or we shall have a bigger strike still, not only in Toronto but throughout the Dominion, and a bigger deputation coming to Ottawa, accompanied perhaps by many members of Parliament. The Government should not wait to be forced. I cannot understand their failing to see that the men have a grievance which should be remedied, and I trust the Government will at once take action to satisfy the men.

The postmasters of the substations in Toronto have also a grievance, and the same remark applies to Montreal, Winnipeg and Hamilton. A deputation representing the substation postmasters waited upon me just before I left for Ottawa. They state that the maximum salary paid at present is $200 per year, and to reach this, the office must furnish a revenue of not less than $5,000 yearly. This amount is raised altogether from the sale of stamps. I will quote from their petition to the Deputy Postmaster General:

> In view of the great increase in the cost of living, advancing rents, and higher pay for help of any description, your petitioners respectfully ask that the maximum salary paid be $400 yearly to officers producing a revenue of $5,000 or more, and to smaller revenue-producing officers in proportion. All commissions to remain the same as at present, excepting postage stamps, which will be increased to 2 per cent and that itinerant vendors' licenses be discontinued.

These itinerant vendors sell a great number of stamps, to the disadvantage of the small vendor who is put to large expense and receives such a small return. This is a matter that the Government should deal with. Two or three people should not be allowed to get the cream of the business, but that has been the case for years and years. The subpostmasters of Toronto feel that in view of the high rents and high cost of heat and light to-day they should receive higher remuneration. They have told me that if the Government does not afford them some relief they will be obliged to give up these substations. If they do that, more clerks will have to be employed to handle the work, and the cost will be greater than at present. So I think it is in the interests of the Government itself to try and meet the demand of these people.

There has been considerable discussion of the Civil Service Commission, which has been described as a very iniquitous body. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) and the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) have already spoken on this subject, and I think before the debate closes we shall hear more about the Civil Service Commission from other hon. gentlemen. Where there is so much smoke I think there must be a little fire, although I must admit that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) put up a very good defence.

There are rumours, and the public verily believe these rumours, and the only way in which they can be satisfied is to have an investigation. The hon. member for West Toronto and the hon. member for Frontenac have made certain statements. We have heard the reply to these statements. The public have read both the statements and the reply; they have read the charge and the defence, yet they are not satisfied. They are of the opinion that there is an object on each side. On the one hand they believe there is an object in the charge which has been made, while also they see an object behind the defence, and, they think there is some truth in the charges. This opinion is not confined to one hon. member, nor do I think it will have been confined to four or five before the debate closes, from what I have heard; and I do say that the matter should be investigated and even if the hon. member for West Toronto does not formulate his charges and ask for an investigation, I think the Government will be justified in the circumstances in having an investigation in order to satisfy the people that this commission is doing its work, that it may have made some slight mistakes, but not such mistakes as have been charged against it.

Now, I gave expression in this House last session as to the manner in which I thought this Civil Service Commission might operate. I said at that time that I was opposed to the patronage system as being antiquated, and that we should get away from that. Hon. members do not want to be bothered with patronage. I said, if the Civil Service Commission is going to work out to the satisfaction of the people generally and to hon. members, it will be a godsend. But, I said, I thought there was a danger in the commission undertaking that work, in this way: There is a commission of three; there is a secretary, and there are deputy heads throughout the Civil Service. I was suspicious that the commission would not undertake all the responsibility; that some of it would be shifted to the secretary, who in turn would shift it to some of the deputies, and between the secretary and the deputies the whole matter would work to the advantage of some, and instead of being patronage to large numbers it would be patronage to a favoured few. That is about what I said last session, and judging by the statements made in this House it seems that that is the way in which matters have turned out. I said then that if that was the way in which it would operate I would not be satisfied with the Civil Service Commission; and I am not satisfied now, notwithstanding the defence put up so far. I shall not be satisfied until this matter has been investigated from A to Z. After that has been done, and it has been shown clearly that there is no justification for the statements that have been made, then I will be disposed to feel that the Civil Service Commission is the proper means of administering the affairs of which it has charge. I think, therefore, that as the matter stands the Government should have an investigation, whether the hon. member (Mr. Hocken) desires it or not.

Another matter mentioned in the speech from the Throne is Women's Franchise. I agree with the suggestion that something should be done in the way of giving the franchise to the women of Canada. It has been stated on the floor of the House that the women of Canada have done a great deal towards the successful conclusion of the war; and I concur in the opinion that has been here expressed that we should recognize the part they have played in the struggle. I believe that from their own standpoint the women have done as much to win the war as the men. We know the nature of the work they have done, we are aware of the response which was made by the young women who were prepared to go forward and render every help in any direction in which they were desired to assist. They were prepared to become chauffeurs, to drive automobiles, transportation trucks and other vehicles, to assist in Red Cross work and to do many other things without which we could not have successfully carried on the war. They responded to the call from the farms, and we had farmerettes by the thousand in the Dominion, and credit is due them for the greater production which followed. If they have proven their case—as I think they have—that they were in every way equal to the occasion in every endeavour, then I think the least we can do in recognition of the noble part they have played in the war is to extend the franchise to the women of this country.

It was said by one hon. member on the other side of the House last year, when we were discussing this subject, that perhaps it might apply to one or two provinces, but that he did not think it would be found to be generally applicable. He was of the opinion that the women should be educated; that it was necessary to educate them before they could be capable of properly exercising the franchise. Well, I think we had some experience at the last election of the qualifications of the women of this country as voters. We do not need to educate them further. In my riding they voted by hundreds, and I never heard of a spoiled ballot, or of any confusion in any respect. In fact, I would pronounce them better voters than many of the men, and I think they should be congratulated on the admirable way in which they exercised the franchise, which was limited at that time. Now, I think we should extend the right to vote to the women throughout the Dominion.

Another matter that may come before the House and in connection with which there has been considerable agitation in the Dominion is the question of the aliens in this country who were disfranchised under the War-time Elections Act. It has been said by many outside of the House that the franchise should be restored to these people. I do not see it in that way. I feel they were disfranchised properly. They were aliens, doing everything they could to create disturbance in their sections of the Dominion, and I am of opinion that they should continue to be disfranchised until such time as they become good Canadians, good British subjects who are prepared to be loyal citizens, satisfied to comply with the laws of the country. Then we might extend the franchise to them, but not before. For these reasons I am not in favour of restoring to them the right to vote. I am prepared to continue for a time the present status of these people and those who may come into the Dominion; because it is only fair in the interests of our own Canadians that this should be so. Why, especially in ridings which they control, should they have as much say as those of our own people who have made such sacrifices to save the Empire, while the aliens, on the other hand, did all in their power to disrupt Canada and cause, if they could, the downfall of the Empire? I repeat, it is in the best interests of Canada that the alien should continue disfranchised.

Then there is one other matter—although in this I think I may be treading on thin ice—in which I think there should be some change. We have a Senate, the members of which are appointed by the Governor General. Their appointments are for life. Apparently, notwithstanding the fact that they are appointed to the Senate, they are eligible for positions in the Government. We have senators who are at the head of very responsible departments and from my experience last session I think it is desirable that the heads of these departments should have places on the floor of this House. Instead of the head of the department being here to answer questions, his secretary, or some officer, or another minister, is charged with that duty. I believe that the three gentlemen whom I have particularly in mind at the present moment are well qualified to discharge the duties of the positions that they occupy, and that they have the respect of the people of this country, but I do not think it is proper that men should be placed in these responsible positions who are not directly responsible to the people. Why should we have a Minister of Labour who is a member of the Senate and who is not permitted to be in this House to answer the questions that may be asked and which can only be satisfactorily answered by the head of the department? The Postmaster General is also a member of the Senate. A third member of the Government who is a member of the Senate is Sir James Lougheed. Surely a selection could be made of gentlemen who are direct representatives of the people and who would be on the floor of this House to defend their departments and to answer questions. I have no doubt that the Government felt—I do not know for what reason—that it was desirable that these gentlemen should be called upon to perform these very responsible duties. But, I would say that their selection is a slight on the members of this House. It would almost indicate that we in this House have not the ability to perform these duties. It would appear as if this Government were under a special obligation to some members of the Senate and they are discharging this obligation by giving them these responsible positions. I feel that the method of representation should be changed. If they desire to select a member of the Senate as a member of the Government he should resign, go to a constituency, appeal to the people and come back as the representative of the people to the responsible position to which he has been assigned, and he should have a place on the floor of this House so that he could answer directly the questions of members which cannot be satisfactorily answered by deputies and secretaries.

Mr. EDMOND SAVARD (Chicoutimi and Saguenay) (translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House, I feel the need of all your forbearance toward a representative of the people whose sole ambition is to discharge what he deems to be his duty.

It is not, however my intention to overtax your kind disposition, Mr. Speaker, because I consider that all the questions that have allready been dealt with, have been discussed exhaustively and with more ability than I could hope to bestow on the subject myself. Furthermore, I consider that it would be sheer temerity on my part, at this phase of the debate, to make a long speech on the Address. I shall therefore confine my remarks to a few observations in accord with the dominant feelings of the people that I have the honour to represent in this House. Before going any further, allow me, Sir, to follow the example of the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, and to add my humble quota of homage and praise to the tributes paid for more than two weeks, to the memory of the man who has occupied, and will continue to occupy such a large place in the hearts of the Canadians, and more particularly, of the French Canadians.

I have no hesitation in saying that nowhere Sir Wilfrid Laurier was more loved, more revered than in the vast regions of Lake St. John, and Chicoutimi and Saguenay; to prove that assertion, suffice it to say that it is largely, very largely—to the prestige of the illustrious dead that I owe my election with more than 1,000 majority I think I can say with the utmost confidence that nowhere our great compatriot will be more sincerely mourned because we feel that by his death we have lost a great benefactor, and that the country has lost the greatest of its citizens.

He is dead, but our hearts will continue to cherish his memory and the history of his life will always be a high example for the coming generations.

Now, Sir, allow me to join the hon. gentlemen who have taken part in the debate and to offer my congratulations to the proposer and seconder of the Address in answer to the speech from the Throne and, who have so ably acquitted themselves. I think it infortunate, however, that the Government has departed from the old established rule—the unbroken rule, I think—of having one of the two speeches in French.

On the present occasion, more than on any other, the custom should have been adhered to, because the French Canadians, like the English Canadians, are coming home from the battlefields after a glorious victory.

However, I think that I find a reason which would seemingly justify them to a certain extent; it is that the present Government is a war government that is rather crippled—their big guns not being in their proper places. They thought it proper and necessary to place in the limelight, to uphold their ground, gallant men who gained distinction on the battlefield and who surely have it at heart to maintain their reputation in this House and it seems to me that on that score the Government could not have made a better choice.

Now, Sir, let me state that I have the honour of representing one of the large—if not the largest—but surely one of the most interesting counties in the country. With few exceptions its inhabitants are French Canadians, and I would even venture to say that in this respect it occupies the foremost place among the counties throughout Canada, and that is probably one of the reasons why I regret my inability to express myself in the language of the majority, which fact naturally and almost invariably drives out almost every hon. member on the other side of the House. I do not intend to find fault with them on that score because if we were in the same circumstances, if we could not understand them, we might possibly do likewise; but all the same this much I am sure of, we would see that our duty was done and that the business of this House was not suspended.

Let us say here that we are as proud of being French Canadians as citizens of other nationalities are proud of the race to which they belong.

Why would we not be proud of being French Canadians when we can claim to be the progeny of those haughty Gauls who for so long resisted Cæsar and his all but insuperable legions? Why would we not be proud of being French Canadians when we know ourselves to be the offspring of that heroic France who for ten centuries waged war throughout the earth, almost always victoriously, for the sake of justice, civilization and freedom, and who for over four years, in a struggle unexampled in the annals of mankind, startled the world by opposing German barbarity? Finally, we are proud of being the descendants of the first inhabitants, the early settlers of this country. Our ancestors fought along while under the flag of France but, Sir, when that flag had to re-cross the seas, defeated but still radiant with honour and glory, does not history teach us that they served their new country with the same prowess and the same devotion?

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend—besides I lack the ability—to give a lecture on history, but I am pleased to recollect that at the last session an hon. member on the other side of the House, undoubtedly wearied by the unceasing reproaches heaped ever and anon upon the French Canadian race, recalled to his friends the part played by the French Canadians in our annals; he recalled the years 1775 and 1812. I am also pleased to remember that many other members on the other side, those whose reputation as French-haters is best known throughout the country, stated that there was no better, no more valorous soldiers on the battlefields than the French Canadian soldier. Such a testimony from the mouth of our worst enemies can only delight us, as it can be but the voicing of a signal truth.

Mr. Speaker, had it been possible, had we not wanted to remain French Canadians, had we lost our senses to the extent of agreeing to sacrifice the work of many centuries of painful efforts, you would now all be convinced that the blood which flows through the veins of the soldier of the glorious 22nd is the same blood which flows through the veins of the French Canadian lads.

But we are reproached with having failed in the accomplishment of our duty during the war which has just been brought to an end. Why such a reproach when we are well satisfied that the Government left no stone unturned in order to prevent the French Canadians from enlisting? We are entirely satisfied, and I say it with the utmost frankness, that the Govenment would have been pleased and would have preferred it if French Canadians had taken a different stand, so as to enable them to stir racial prejudices. I do not wish to review the circumstances of the whole organization at the beginning of the war.

The facts were already stated during the last session, and I shall be content with placing before this House and the country what occurred in my own county at the time and what were the results. An officer was sent to Chicoutimi to secure volunteers and opened an office there. In Chicoutimi as everywhere else, I regret to say, there are men either lazy or idle, very few, but still there are some, and in the best families you will often find all kinds of individuals. Well, those who would not work, the lazy ones, were unfortunately the first to enlist. Some highly respectable young men belonging to good families, would have liked to serve, but knowing as they did that they would be compelled to live for a certain length of time in company with this sort of people, they hung back. Therefore the people of Chicoutimi who were anxious to see the county do, not its duty, for we did not consider it compulsory, but its share as the other sections of the country, in recruiting the largest possible number of young men, started an agitation with a view to securing from the Government permission to have the recruiting done by the 18th regiment of Chicoutimi and by the officers of that regiment who were well acquainted with all the youth of that country around Chicoutimi and Lake St. John. Mr. Girard, former member for the constituency, was requested to apply to the military authorities on behalf of the citizens. But that was during the election of Dorchester, in which Mr. Girard was taking an active part. At any rate, four or five weeks elapsed or perhaps more, before Mr. Girard acknowledged receipt of the request. And we heard no more about it. Recruiting proceeded as usual; however, we were surprised to see how many young men from the parishes in the counties of Chicoutimi, Lake St. John and Saguenay, were enlisting under most unfortunate circumstances. To day a great number of them are resting for ever in French ground. Therefore I say that we have done our duty and more than our duty.

Now allow me, Sir, to refer to the Military Service Act. We had every reason to be opposed to that law. I do not intend to enumerate them all, and as everybody knows, when the Act became law we submitted to it and, with very few exceptions, all those who were called reported for duty. I sincerely declare, Sir, that I personally do not know a single young man who did not report immediately in conformity with the requirements of the Military Service Act. In our part of the country there are no unemployed, and as the Act provided for exemptions, most of our young men were temporarily exempted.

Later on the exemptions were nullified either by an Order in Council or by decisions of Hon. Justice Duff, and then the young men were called upon to report. The people of Chicoutimi-Saguenay were in a very awkward position. As I have already stated, there are no unemployed in that county. It was established to the satisfaction of the Courts—and Hon. Judge Duplessis could confirm what I say—that we were and are still lacking at least 30 or 35 per cent of the necessary labour to carry on our industries. The situation was a difficult one.

You remember, Mr. Speaker, that last spring, the hon. Minister of Agriculture called a conference of the Ministers of Agriculture of the various Provinces in Ottawa, in order to find means of increasing the production, and you also know that a subsidy was given to the Provinces for that purpose. I have much pleasure in saying that the Province of Quebec was the only one who not only reached its quota but exceeded it by several thousand acres, and I take pride in stating that the county of Lake St. John was leading all the counties of that province.

Were we to lose the benefit of the work done at the request of the Minister of Agriculture? Were we to let the crops rot, abandon the land, without a whisper, without even endeavouring to secure a leave of absence or an exemption to help saving the crops? That is what was done, and, personally, for several months, I travelled from Chicoutimi to Quebec with conscripts, helping them as much as I could and I never did anything but advise them to comply with the law, even if it were a bad one. All those who were able to leave their property and their crops for two or three days without any fear of these crops being destroyed, went to Quebec to report.

We have at Chicoutimi one of the largest pulp factories in the world. We have in the person of its manager one of the foremost financiers of the country, a gentleman whose patriotism is above suspicion. Could he close the doors of his factory and thereby bring ruin, desolation and poverty to a great number of families, without at least taking the precautions necessary to make sure of having enough labour to keep his industry from falling through? That is what was done. Mr. Dubuc and myself both did all we could to prevent the farms from being abandoned, the crops going to waste and the factories closed.

Towards the end of September the military authorities or the Government believing that there were a number of draft evaders in the Chicoutimi and Lake St. John region sent a regiment of 300 men, 200 horses and 3 machine guns, together with a great number of exploiters, for rounding up the defaulters. They spent two months at Chicoutimi. What was the result? Nothing at all. I believe I am within the mark in stating that they did not apprehend more than fifty men, at least twenty of whom were arrested on the trains when they were on their way to report, young farmers who were going in to the registrar's office because they had been promised that if they reported they would receive generous treatment and would be accorded the privileges granted those who reported on time. These young men had left their farms at the first possible opportunity so as to come in and report. They were apprehended, they were brought to Quebec, and some of the youths are to-day in Siberia where they were sent against their will and in spite of the pleas entered on their behalf by their families and by the most influential residents of the district. A certain number of the others died of Influenza; finally those who remained were set at liberty and found their way back to Chicoutimi.

This expedition, which cost thousands of dollars a day during two months, got nowhere, as far as results are concerned. The expense was altogether out of the ordinary and I intend, at some part of the session, demanding an accounting of this outlay in order to show the country the way this money was spent.

Mr. Speaker, like everybody else, we are appalled at the excessive cost of living and we blame this Government's maladministration. We are well aware that when a war is on the cost of living must necessarily increase but not out of all proportion; and we find the cause of the trouble in the pilfering of the public Treasury through scandalous contracts, like those already denounced in this House, awarded to insatiable profiteers against whom the Government has not cared to proceed. When we ponder on the colossal fortunes that certain friends of the Government have built up in the course of the war, we cannot very well feel astonished at the increased cost of living. If we are to believe the ex-Minister of Militia, one of these gentry alone made over 200 millions. This gives us an idea how a certain group is willing to throw everything into the maw of the golden calf. It is true that he who made these fantastical profits made use of the animal which fattens the quickest. Can you imagine anybody making profits like that without causing the people to suffer?

Now, Mr. Speaker, will you allow me to say a word on the subject of Woman Suffrage which the Government intends to put on the statutes. I say that if women must vote with their husbands this will evidently increase the number of votes. On the other hand they will have to frequent public meetings and clubs, and follow the newspapers, so as to form their opinions independently of their husbands; I claim that such a law is one of the most immoral enactments that the Government could be guilty of; for all your fine talk to the contrary notwithstanding woman was never created for that purpose and such a law diverts her from the beautiful role to which she was destined by the Creator, the role of loving helpmate and fond parent ready for any and every sacrifice to ensure the happiness of her husband and her children. This is a monstrous blunder and we protest against it.

Moreover, the women are asking for no such thing, especially in my county where the families are so large. You will allow me to inform you, Sir, that the average in my riding, and I glory in the fact, the average family boasts of from eight to ten children. You often meet with families of 12, 15 and 18 children and only a short time back a woman gave birth to her 23rd child, and 18 of her chidren are still living. I can go still further: in the neighbouring parish, that of the former member for Chicoutimi, Saint-Gédéon du Lac Saint-Jean, one woman has brought into this world 26 children. Do you believe, Sir, that in the circumstances, a woman has any time to meddle in politics? I take it, the simple mention of that fact is sufficient to show the absurdity of the Government's proposal.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to say a word about patronage. I can prove that certain political influences are still at work in the matter of appointments, especially as regards postmasters.

In the parish of Saint-Gédéon du Lac Saint-Jean, the parish which has the honour of being the home of the former member (Mr. Girard), the postmaster gave up his position last Spring. Immediately a petition signed by three-quarters of the ratepayers was sent to the Postmaster General asking that a certain citizen be appointed to succeed the retiring postmaster. The petition was forwarded to the Postmaster General through me, and as the position in question does not command a high salary, I was under the impression that the appointments were still made by the Department. A few days later I was informed that the post-office had been moved to the house of Mr. Girard's son, Mr. Eméride Girard. Then I received a new petition signed by a great many more people and asking the Postmaster General to appoint anybody in the parish except Mr. Eméride Girard; no name was put forth for appointment. I forwarded this second petition to the Postmaster General; listen to the reply:

Ottawa, July 18, 1918.

Dear Sir,

I am instructed to acknowledge your favour of the 14th inst. enclosing a petition signed by the prominent citizens of St. Gédéon (Mr. J. E. Ludger Fortin) and by a great number of the taxpayers, protesting against the appointment of Mr. Eméride Girard to the position of postmaster at St. Gédéon Station and asking that Mr. Joseph Morissette be appointed in his stead; your letter also expressed the hope that the petitioners' request would be granted.

In reply I must inform you that no appointment has been made as yet to this postmastership, the matter still being in the hands of the Civil Service Commission; but since the retiring postmaster (Mr. Arthur Couture) had to be replaced by the 1st of July we allowed him to move the post-office temporarily to the premises of his next-door neighbour, Mr. Eméride Girard.

I may add that a copy of your letter, as also a copy of the petition submitted, will be sent to the Civil Service Commission which is now in charge of all these appointments.

Very truly yours,

Robert Fowler,
Assistant Deputy Minister.

Mr. E. Savard, M.P.,
Chicoutimi, P.Q.

With their petitions before the Postmaster General and the Civil Service Commission the citizens of Saint-Gédéon naturally believed that their wishes would be respected and that the only individual they objected to would not be appointed. It was not, Sir, on account of Mr. Eméride Girard being the son of the former member that the people of Saint-Gédéon were opposed to his appointment, but solely because they knew he was not qualified for the position although the postmastership in those small municipalities does not require a great amount of learning. Anyway, he was the only citizen whose appointment would be frowned on by everybody in the district; consequently we had a right to expect that he would not be appointed. Well, in spite of all our petitions and in spite of all we could do, Mr. Girard was named postmaster, and not, mind you, by the Civil Service Commission but by the assistant inspector at Quebec, Mr. Larue. Mr. Larue himself told me of it; and he informed me that he had made this appointment some time in October and that he had never been apprised of the petition that the citizens of Saint-Gédéon had sent to Ottawa.

How did that happen, Mr. Speaker? What influence is behind Mr. Girard's appointment to the postmastership of Saint-Gédéon? The appointment was not made by the Postmaster General who has left all these affairs in the hands of the Civil Service Commission; and the Civil Service Commission did not have anything to do with it, according to Mr. Larue himself who made the appointment.

I claim that patronage is still as rampant as ever and that the influence of Mr. Girard, the former member for Chicoutimi, is directly responsible for the appointment of his son to the postmastership at Saint-Gédéon.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about our returned soldiers. Everybody is agreed that these men must be treated in the very best way. Is that being done? I claim it is not, Sir.

I have not a great many of them in my riding, but I wish to mention the case of a young sub-lieutenant named Lachance who was invalided home from the firing-line over a year ago and who since then has tried in vain to obtain a Government position. I myself wrote in his favour to the Civil Service Commission; he received an application blank which he filled in and returned; and that is the last he has heard of it.

At all events I hope the Government will see to it that these brave men are properly treated; it is certainly due them.

Now, if our returned soldiers deserve a good treatment, those who are here should not suffer hardship at the hands of the Government.

All during last Winter the people along the north shore of the St. Lawrence, from Tadoussac to the confines of Labrador were without communication with the outside world, and I claim that this was due to unjust treatment on the part of the Government. For a number of years the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier had granted a yearly subsidy of some thousands of dollars for the service between Tadoussac and St. Catherine's Bay. It is the only line of communication open between these people of the Saguenay and the rest of the country.

Last year the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir G. Foster) withdrew this subsidy. Since last Summer I have done my best to obtain from the Government the money necessary for a boat to continue this service, but all my efforts brought nothing; meanwhile I had recourse to the hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier because I understood how urgent it was for these worthy people along the north shore to have some means of communication with the rest of the country.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave me a letter which I am about to read, in English, and I pray you Mr. Speaker, to be indulgent towards my pronunciation. This letter was addressed to the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce because the Minister has left for Europe with the Prime Minister:

Ottawa Nov. 12th 1918.

My dear O'Hara,

Dr. Savard, M.P., for Chicoutimi & Saguenay informs me that he is here to obtain the continuation of a subsidy for a ferry crossing of the Saguenay river between Ste-Catherine and Tadoussac.

This subsidy was granted by the late government some twelve years ago and perhaps more.

I understand that it is now proposed to drop it. It is certainly most unfortunate.

I am well acquainted with the locality and the reason for which I pressed upon Sir Richard who was then Minister of Trade and Commerce, was that in winter the people on both sides of the Saguenay are absolutely shut off from civilization. This is particularly hard upon the people of Tadoussac, which is a place of some considerable importance. In winter they are without any kind of steam communication either by rail or vessel, except by this ferry.

I do not know who is your minister in the absence of Sir George Foster. I would ask you to place these facts before him.

Your sincerely
Wilfrid Laurier.

Now, here is the Deputy Minister's reply:

Ottawa, Nov., 15th 1918.

St. Catherine's Bay and Tadoussac.

Dear Mr. Savard,

I beg to state that I to-day brought the matter of the St. Catherine's Bay and Tadoussac service to the attention of the Honourable A. K. Maclean, Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he is of the opinion that he cannot recommend this vote in view of the stand taken by Sir George Foster in the matter.

Yours faithfully,
F. C. T. O'Hara,
Deputy Minister.

As you see, the acting minister, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, refused to do justice to a region which comprises all the people from Tadoussac to Labrador, where there are a considerable number of parishes. The only communication they had with the outside world in winter was to receive their mail every three, four, five, six, seven or eight days.

A short while ago I received a letter from Tadoussac which said:

For the last eight days we have received no mail from Quebec. The last newspapers to hand are dated the 12th, and to-day is the 19th. We shall get them when Providence wishes us to. That is the way we are being treated.

There is a contract awarded for carrying the mails between St. Siméon, in Charlevoix county, and Tadoussac, but the mails are only brought through when the thing is possible—their delivery is not compulsory —that is, when the river can be crossed in a canoe or a dory, in very calm weather, for, as you know, during the Winter it is very difficult to make this trip in a small boat.

Well, I feel bound to register a protest against the unjust treatment meted out to these worthy people of the north shore.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I close my remarks, I wish to ask the Government if it is their intention to encourage agriculture. If so, they could do no better than to provide for an experimental farm in the region of Lake St. John, rightly called "the granary of Quebec."

We have already round Lake St. John about thirty of the most thriving parishes of which nobody can get an idea without visiting them. We could establish as many more of those parishes along the valley of Lake St. John and I am perfecty satisfied that an experimental farm there would be of great benefit for the farmers.

With regard to the appointment of postmasters, here is a letter of the secretary, Mr. Foran:

Ottawa, Nov., 6th, 1918.

Sir,—I am to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 14th October in reference to the Postmastership of Chicoutimi Ouest, Que., and I am directed to say that the following procedure is adopted in the appointment of postmasters. If the salary of the post office is in excess of $1,000 the position is locally advertised and the application referred to the post office inspector of the district for his rating. The Civil Service Commission then takes final action on same. Should, however, the position be of a salary less than $1,000 the matter is referred to the Post Office Inspector for his recommendation as to the most suitable party to appoint.

The Post Office Inspector has, as yet, made no recommendation in this connection.

Your truly,

W. Foran,
Secretary.

Therefore if I understand rightly, the appointments of the postmasters are not always made by the Civil Service Commission, but are referred to the Post Office Inspector, as in the case of St. Gedeon. I think it is a bad system of patronage and I hope that in the future that method will be modified.

Mr. FRANK BAINARD STACEY (Westminster District): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion so ably introduced by the two gentlemen who have deservedly received the congratulations of this House. And first of all, Sir, on my own behalf, and also on behalf of the constituency which I represent, I wish to pay our humble tribute to the memory of the great Canadian whose chair in this House is empty, but whose influence and example will not soon pass away. As I speak, Sir, I am thinking of a little town on the north shore of the mighty Fraser river, nearly three thousand miles from this Chamber, composed very largely of men and women who are proud to call themselves compatriots of the late great French-Canadian statesman. His portrait is in their public halls, and in their private homes. Though remote from the place of their birth they fondly cherish the memory of his lofty idealism, his matchless diction, his peerless presence and his personal charm. Very many of them were his political supporters, all were his personal admirers. I would be unworthy of my position as a representative of the French-Canadian settlement in my own constituency, as well as of other English-speaking Liberals, if I did not at least attempt to voice their sentiments upon this occasion, and to express them in the presence of their brothers and friends.

[Mr. Savard.]

I wish also to congratulate the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) upon a matter for which he has received divergent kinds of criticism from members of this House: I have in mind his reference to Liberal Unionists on the occasion of his first speech during this session. In that address he gave what I am willing to admit, and believe, was intended, as a courteous intimation to former Liberals now on this side of the House, that there is an open door should they desire to return to their former political friends. I am disposed to treat such an intimation in the same manner in which I assume it was given, and as a private member on this side of the House will take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded of expressing my views on the general question of parties, and the relation of individuals and individual members thereto.

I cannot, under present conditions, endorse the view sometimes set forth that we can or could get along without parties. Citizens holding somewhat similar views on any question may constitute a party and together work for the accomplishment of a definite result. The party is the means of accomplishing this end. Many people, Sir, in this country believe that in Canadian politics the party has hitherto been given an exaggerated and exalted importance, superior even to that of the end aimed at. Political parties rest, orginally at least, on some great principle or policy, and when honest men differ as to the application or interpretation of those principles, there is likely to be a division in the party. For example, my interpretation of the principles of Liberalism as applied to Canadian patriotism led me to advocate publicly in my own town selective conscription two years before it became a vital issue in this House, and my neighbour, a staunch Conservative, so interpreted the principles and policy of his political faith that he reached the same conclusion. So we came together on what appeared to us to be a question of supreme and paramount importance. Here, to my mind, is the true philosophy of the election of 1917. A great majority of the people of Canada believed that the end was greater than the means; that the salvation of the country was of more importance than the perpetuation of any individual party. Sir, men may exhaust the adjectives in the English and French languages to condemn the provisions of the War-time Elections Act. It may have been good or it may have been evil; that I am not discussing, but I do believe that such denunciations amount to nothing. It is simply a case of shouting to keep one's courage up. The people of Canada spoke on a great issue, and they spoke with no uncertain voice.

Now, concerning the future. Time was when politicians conjured with a name; time is when men are moved by great facts and principles. I most heartily endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) yesterday with respect to the independence of all members of the House of Commons. I go one step further and say that whatever other members may do, I believe it to be my duty to maintain clear, satisfactory relations between myself and my constituents on any measure which may come before this House. Nowadays, confidence in the policy of the Government as a whole should not be expected to necessitate the destruction of selfhood or independence on matters concerning which there is legitimate ground for difference of opinion. I hold myself free to withdraw from any party or any association of men when I am convinced in my own mind that by so doing I can better serve my country and so satisfy my own conscience, and I do not intend, either now or at any time, to lend myself to the support of any measure which I cannot honestly and conscientiously accept as in the best interests of my constituency and of my country. This may probably be regarded by many, perhaps on both sides of the House, as poor politics, but fortunately, Mr. Speaker, I have neither a political past to shield nor a political future to ensure. In my judgment, it is not the cry or slogan of Liberalism, or, for that matter, of Unionism, which will win when the people of the country are appealed to at the next election. I am satisfied that the people of Canada will bring both sides of this House to the three-fold acid test of their past, their personnel, and their programme.

I desire to offer a few remarks concerning two or three matters referred to in the speech from the Throne which have received but slight attention. First of all, I should like to direct the attention of the Union Government to the advisability of making some special provision in the Land Settlement Act that will meet certain conditions which I shall take the liberty of describing. I commend the policy of inducing as many as possible of our returned men to labour or work on the land. That is certainly most desirable and commendable. But, so far as the announced policy of the Government is concerned, I am not aware that any special provision is made for the future of men who may desire to enter upon agricultural life on a smaller scale than is provided for in the terms which make for their future on the prairies. I come from a section of British Columbia where a large number of men gain a living on small farms; they are very frequently called "small farmers." Large numbers of men were recruited for the Canadian forces from the Fraser valley in the early and later stages of the war. That district was drawn upon for the 104th New Westminster, the 29th, the 47th, the 131st, the Forestry Battalion, and others. Very many of these men are coming back to their native province desirous of entering upon life in a new relation; some of them wish to resume positions they held before as farmers on a small scale. It is well known that in British Columbia, particularly in the Fraser valley, there is ample opportunity for men who desire to engage in the production of fruit, in the growing of vegetables for the market, in the raising of poultry and in the carrying on of other small industries which constitute a very profitable livelihood for any who give attention to them. I know that there is a large number of men who are looking for such a home and such a life. I do not suggest for one moment that these opportunities should be given only to residents of my own province. From all parts of the Dominion men will, I presume, seek the very best that Canada has to offer on the small farm proposition, and if they do so, they will naturally turn their eyes and their steps towards British Columbia, and in particular, the far-famed Fraser valley. That will be a matter almost of necessity, and our hope is that as a result of legislation which this Parliament will enact, ample provision will be made for the future of those men. You may, Sir, ask me: Is land available? Can men secure ten or twenty acres in that country? I do not hesitate to say that ten or twenty acres can be procured and are capable of producing as extensive and satisfactory financial results as a quarter-section of land in the Prairie Provinces. Owing to the former land policies of Governments, which policies I am not now disposed to discuss, the unfortunate fact is that there are in places large blocks of land which are held sometimes by corporations, sometimes by associations of men not so registered. But there is a considerable quantity of land now available, unoccupied, unused, which can be secured. It may be asked: Will not that land be held at a prohibitive price? Is it not likely that the owners will hold up the Government or anybody else seeking to secure land for this purpose? That is possible, but I do not think it is probable in view of the relief which the Government has. I do not believe it is a right principle, and it is much less a proper national policy, for permission to be given to great corporations to hold large blocks of land in the hope that some neighbours or some enterprising men who may come into the community will develop and improve the land and so enhance to an unnatural value their own corporate holdings. When you go to these corporations and ask them to put a price upon their land, I would suggest that this proviso be made, namely, that the price which they shall place upon their land, the price at which they hold it, shall be the price which will determine the basis of their taxation for time to come, so that they will bear their full share of financial responsibility in the community. At this period, we should say to the people who are holding valuable land in this country: You must either work or pay. I recognize the right which men holding land have to their so-called vested interests, but it is not in the interest of our country at the present time to permit vast areas of arable land to remain untilled, while the value thereof is enhanced by hard working men who in adjoining districts do their duty as citizens.

There is in our province another source of supply from which the Government may draw. A year ago I took the opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the fact that in my constituency there was a considerable number of Indian Reserves and that possibly these might in places furnish suitable homes for settlers, whether returned soldiers or other white men, in the future. In order to set this matter clearly before the House, let me say that between the town of Hope and the western end of my constituency, an area covering some seventy-five miles in length by thirty or forty miles in width, there are some fourteen bands of Indians. These are placed on seventy-two reserves, according to the last returns a total population of 1,216 people. The land reserved for these bands of Indians comprises 19,247 acres. I do not think that, so far, any exception can be taken to the extent of the reserves for these natives. This country has always sought to deal justly by the Indian, the native of this country, and my suggestion to the Government is in no wise intended to prove unfair or disadvantageous or unjust to the Indians. There is, however, one other reserve within the bounds of my constituency, in the very heart of the Fraser valley, through which the Canadian Pacific passes, between the stations of Ruby Creek and Agassiz. This island is known as Seabird Island and contains some 4,500 acres of what I do not hesitate to call the very choicest land in the province of British Columbia. That may seem a strong statement, but I think investigation and reports will prove its accuracy. On that island there are reported to be 121 Indians all told, who cultivate a total of 132.5 acres, leaving considerably over 4,000 acres of land untouched. I am of the opinion that not only is that a national loss from the standpoint of production, but it is a bad education for the native. It is not good policy that he should be permitted to hold the view that all that land is at his disposal, when it is not in any sense of the word contributing to his sustenance. It is not cultivated ground. He does not cultivate it. The finest land in the valley is still untouched. I hope the department or the Government will take into consideration the advisability of making such provision as they can for returned men to enter at least upon this island. If they do not desire to enter upon it, then I would say: Open it up for the entry of white people. Let the land be used so that it may be a source of production to the people of this country and especially to British Columbia. This is in no sense of the term a reflection upon the labour or interest or the future of the Indians. We must look after them, but I claim that this is not at all inimical to their interest, future or welfare.

I want also to draw the attention of the Government very earnestly to a sympathetic consideration of a matter that is akin to that which was presented by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Foster) this afternoon. I shall not attempt to refer to anything to which he drew the attention of the House further than to remark that my subject has reference to the same department, and I shall put it very briefly.

We have in our country rural mail carriers and rural postmasters who are very much underpaid. These men are doing the business of the country, so far as their duties require and the stipulations of the Government demand, and they are doing it faithfully and to the satisfaction of the department, or they would not be retained. But their remuneration is altogether inadequate to the services rendered, and I am speaking now with sole reference to the two classes I have mentioned. The resort of other labourers in such a situation is not within the range of their activity; they cannot strike; they must continue, and do continue, their labours. I almost hesitate to state to this House the financial condition in which some of these men are placed. It would appear to be almost a reflection upon our honour and sense of fair play, but that I may not speak altogether in the abstract, let me cite one or two cases. I happen to know, Sir, that there are men in the employ of the Government engaged as mail carriers who are in receipt of the—I cannot find an adjective to describe it, and so will say, in receipt of the wage of from fifty cents to one dollar per day for the support of themselves and their families. In other words, the whole of the income they receive from the Government, with the exception of this small pittance, is required for the upkeep of their outfit. No wonder they ask, and beg, and plead, for consideration. I have drawn the attention of the Postmaster General to this matter, and the answer I received was regular, of course, and quite correct. He stated that it was not within the power of the department to grant increases during the continuance of a contract. Of course, that is true. But, Sir, it is within the power of the department, I suppose, to make the necessary recommendation which will ensure to these men ordinary common justice and fair play, and I do sincerely hope that such measures will be taken at an early date as will give to these men who are doing their duty faithfully and well, proper remuneration. True it is that a contract is a contract. But let me say by way of explanation that this particular contract was undertaken two or three years ago when the cost not only of living but of all supplies was very much lower than it is to-day. The increased cost of supplies for the upkeep of their team and outfit has resulted in leaving only the small pittance I have mentioned for the support of these men and their families.

I listened with a very great deal of interest the other day to the address of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe). If I understood him correctly, and I would not willingly misrepresent or misinterpret anything he said, he said in substance, when speaking of some amendments to the British North America Act, that as that Act was agreed to by the four original provinces individually, it would remain for the said four provinces to bring about any amendment to the Act. I may be wrong in my interpretation, and I sincerely hope I am, for I cannot believe that that position is correct. The hon. gentleman is learned in the law, while I am but a workingman, but I cannot help feeling that that position is unjust. It is not morally right, and how can it ultimately be legally right? Has not this House something to say regarding the amendments which may later be placed before the country for consideration? Is it not impossible to suppose that the provinces which were not then born should be ignored when we come to consider amendments to that Act? It is well known that there is a growing and ever deepening conviction throughout this country that the time is not far distant when certain amendments to that Act must be brought before the people for consideration. We all know, for instance, that there is a growing feeling in the minds of Canadian citizens that all legislation should be passed by a responsible chamber. We cannot shut our eyes to that fact, and when an irresponsible chamber delivers itself in the manner in which our friends did towards the close of last session, rendering inoperative what I considered to be some of the most important items of legislation passed by this House affecting the moral and social welfare of our citizens, that does not tend to deepen the affection in which it is held by the people of Canada. And so, when the question of amendments is considered, and I hope it soon will be considered, I trust that my hon. friend will be found to be wrong, or, rather, I would hope that I have misunderstood him and that he also will admit that this House, which represents provinces not then in existence, will have something to say regarding the said amendments.

Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have referred, during the course of this debate, to the question of national unity. Indeed, some had the temerity to introduce that phrase during the stormy times of last session. That, Sir, is a great idea. It is so great, in my opinion, that it requires some special consideration. You cannot mention the phrase without the question arising in every earnest and thoughtful mind: What does national unity mean, and how can it be brought about? What are the successive steps by which such a goal may be approached and ultimately reached? This opens up a very inviting field which I shall not presume to enter at the present time, but I do make bold to say that by a process of elimination we may at least approach an answer to our question. It goes without saying that national unity cannot be a unity of race; that need not be argued. Nor can it be a unity of religion, for all Protestants are not agreed in their religious views, and I am told that even all Roman Catholics are not agreed in their religious conceptions. I know not as to the truth of that, but certainly national unity cannot mean religious unity. I suppose it needs no argument to maintain the position that national unity cannot mean language unity.

There will be two languages spoken in Canada, at least for some time to come. Can we expect national unity on political questions? That does not seem very probable within the near future. Then what is left? Wherein may we look for national unity? That, to my mind, is a very serious and a very important question. If we cannot find it within the realm of the religious, of the political, or of the racial, where shall we find it? There is only one other realm, it seems to me, in which we can find it. I believe that our national unity will ultimately be found in our national objective, and I contend that this country at the present time has no national objective. Our fathers founded this federation fifty years ago, with marvellous foresight they built for the future. During the first half century of Confederation we were engrossed with things material, necessarily and properly so, in the building up of the country, in the development of our industry, and in the bringing of settlers to this land. We were engrossed with the material, which to a certain extent was praiseworthy. Then came the war, which did more than anything else—and I do not hesitate in saying it—to unite the peoples of Canada. It did more towards that end, I believe, than any other single event in our national history. Where, then, can we find such a national objective, as will make real the ideal that is before us? In my opinion, Sir, it can be found, and must be found in the realm of the ethical. Different races, different religions, different political views, even different languages may find in a common ethical objective a bond of unity that will embrace in its manifold ramifications the other divergencies which I have enumerated; and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that such a bond of unity can be found in the ethical.

If I were an artist and had the ability, I would paint a national escutcheon for the peoples of the provinces of this Dominion, from sea to sea, something after this fashion: I would paint the word "Truth," and beside it the word "Honour," and in the background I would in some manner suggest the idea of toleration; and with that before the people, I believe we should have the possibility of national unity that would be the salvation of Canada and the making of a great Canadian nation and Canadian people—a possibility that does not otherwise seem in sight. What do I mean, Sir, by truth? Why, that suggests, indeed it compels, the very thought of education. Truth is knowledge; it bears the sign "we must know." And I would go so far as to hope that every child born in this Dominion would have a good common school education, without an exception. This, I submit, should be a part of our national provision for the future; and in the matter of education there looms up in the distance, ultimately, not only the possibility but the necessity of a great national university.

I am in full accord with that sentence uttered only recently, I think, by Principal McKay of the University of Saskatchewan,, when he said in substance that the greatest mistake the British nation ever made was that of allowing Germany to assume the role of the schoolmaster of the world. I believe he was correct. Germany was looking for truth, but she lacked honour, and the one is as essential as the other to true nationhood. We must have for the future of our country, Sir, the highest possible educational advantages for those who can reach them; and by the use of the word "can" I do not mean mere monetary ability; I mean mental capacity and moral calibre adequate to fit them for the great work that lies before them. I maintain that this Dominion should make it possible for every youth who has the character to attain the very highest position in the realm of service for the country that is obtainable anywhere; and we can do that—not perhaps in the near future, but in the distant future at any rate—through a great national post-graduate university. Why should we not be able to supply in Canada all that our land needs for its development materially, ethically or educationally? Associated with this thought is the idea of honour. If we could by any means adopt that two-fold principle of truth coupled with honour, the charges that we have listened to, and the accusations that we have heard against the manhood of our country, would very largely disappear. These things are the children of dishonour; and so long as dishonour rather than honour prevails, we shall have trouble—trouble in the House, and trouble everywhere.

The universal consensus of opinion is that we need a higher type of manhood and a nobler type of womanhood. With all deference to the womanhood of our country, I think—and undoubtedly they will be the first to endorse my opinion—that we need on the whole, even in Canada, a still nobler type of womanhood. Therefore, back of all this, and with it and around it, if we could only acquire the spirit of toleration, I believe, Sir, we would have a nation that would, in the days to come, be the largest, the grandest and the best memorial that could possibly be erected to those who have lived and died for all that is worth while in life.

This, I think, is at least worthy of the consideration of those who are dealing with national problems and national questions, and I hope, Sir, that to as large an extent as possible, we may be able, in our intercourse as provinces and as citizens, to keep the idea before us of a national unity that will allow of certain divergencies of opinion, greater liberty of thought and greater freedom of action in matters racial, religious, political, and otherwise. So long as we have before us a high ideal of national truth and honour, in an atmosphere of toleration, this is possible.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this moment because I think it is the duty of every member of this House—whether he be the most humble or the most eloquent—to give his opinion upon the serious and unusual conditions prevailing in our country. Indeed, since the beginning of the war, in order to maintain the Canadian army, the Government have heaped a debt amounting to two billions. All our industries which for the last four years were turning out munitions are at a standstill since the signing of the armistice. All our national progress is paralyzed, and to fulfil our obligations the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) issues loans within our bonds and thrusts upon us all kinds and manner of taxes. Mr. Speaker, we have now good reasons to regret all useless expenditures and all the follies, to say the least, which the Government indulged in or allowed during the war.

I still remember the reports of investigations held in the department of Militia then headed by the hon. member from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) showing that enormous sums were needlessy spent.

Now, Sir, let me state that every citizen of this country was willing to do his bit in order to win the war and to crush forever German militarism. I still remember the language of our lamented and revered leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who, speaking on behalf of the opposition, said that we should be ready to made any sacrifice and that Canada should contribute her share for the sake of humanity and civilization. However, that did not mean the enrichment of friends of the Government nor that leave should be given manufacturers to reap profits of one or two hundred per cent, as it has been laid at the doors of the Massey-Harris Company, the William Davies Packing Company and many others which I do not recall. It did not mean that companies would be permitted to become organised without any stock to get in millions, like the International Arms and Fuses Company, the Ammunition American Company. It did not mean either that speculators and combines would be allowed to lay their hands upon all the food in the country and to exact excessive prices from the consumers.

You are going to ask me, Sir, of what use is it to recall so many things of the past which can only stir up still more the indignation of the people against the Government. If I do so, it is in order to fix responsibilities so that, when history is written, it may be known who are the best friends of the country and of the people. Now, what do the Government suggest and intend to do in order to improve the situation? We have lately heard the speech from the Throne. What is there in it? Mere words, nebulous schemes, nothing practical. We are told of a new franchise. I hope, Sir, that as soon as possible will be expunged from our statute books that dishonest War-time Elections Act which enabled the Union Government to retain power against the will of the people. I appeal to the Liberal Unionists—if however their alliance with the Conservatives did not deprive them of the sense of honour and fair play—and I trust that the new Act will be more just and fair and will not permit a recurrence of the abuses which were committed at the last elections.

There is no mention in the Governor General's Speech of the repeal of the dangerous War Time Elections Act, which gives the Government the authority of governing this country by means of Orders in Council and allows them to censor all newspapers. Mr. Speaker, let us take care, we must not wait too long, because the people are tired of being governed by Orders in Council. They are waking up and the press and the public bodies are asking that the government by the people be restored. The trades unions are agitating. I have here with me a resolution adopted unanimously by the labour union of the City of Hull, asking me to do my utmost to have that kaiser-like legislation repealed.

They talk about re-construction and demobilization. The latter, as I understand it, includes the repatriation of all these gallant soldiers who won great fame on the battlefield and who offered so generously their services for the defence of Democracy. It includes also the duty of the Government to facilitate the re-establishment into civil life of all the able bodied men, either by granting them special conditions or settling them on the land, or securing work for them to earn a living, or by paying proper pensions in the case of invalided soldiers. But the war ended three months age and about 100,000 returned men, from overseas and here, were discharged. What was done in their behalf? What did they get? Nothing.

In our city of Hull, we have a great many returned soldiers, and not a day passes by without some of them coming to me to complain about the way in which they are treated by the Government. Do you want me to cite a case, Mr. Speaker? There is a letter which I have just received from a soldier by the name of Joseph Rochon, who is at present in the military hospital at St. Anne de Bellevue after serving three years in the trenches. This man who is suffering from deafness and nervous disease, as a result of wounds, is offered $5 a month as a pension. Is it not a shame? I know some others who made several attempts and applied for work, but never got satisfaction.

I consider that the country owes a debt to these brave men and I say that it is the duty of this Government to do all in their power to give them justice.

While I am speaking on this subject, I wish to present a request to the Government, namely that legislation be passed at this session granting a general amnesty to the Military Service Act defaulters. The war is over. The enemy surrendered unconditionally. Therefore why should the Government act so unmercifully with the young men who, for different reasons, did not see fit to report? Is it to secure a few cents or dollars from them or to send them to jail? What is the use? Does not the country need the activity of all its sons at the present time? I say, Mr. Speaker, that is persecution, and in view of the great victory that we have won, the Government ought to prove magnanimous and pardon them all.

Now, what is the Government doing for reconstruction? First, they will not deal with the question of tariff, because we are in a period of reconstruction. But they are not in earnest; they are not sincere, and the real motive Mr. Speaker is because the Liberals on the other side of this House, who have always favoured a reduction in the tariff would be ashamed to follow the tariff and protectionist element who for the time being rule the Government, these Liberals, in order not to lose their portfolios and their opportunities and to avoid crossing over into the cold regions of the Opposition, trample under foot their principles and sing in chorus with the Prime Minister: "Leave the tariff aside, this is a period of reconstruction."

However, is it not by revising the tariff and by a better distribution of the taxes that we shall develop reconstruction? Is it not by putting down there tariff walls and letting in free the natural products, agricultural implements and so forth, that we shall reduce the cost of living and encourage agriculture which is the foundation and the basis element of our wealth?

So true is it, that, contrarily to the hon. ministers who are always eager to retain their portfolios, all the farmers of this country demand a reduction in the tariff.

Sir, at a meeting of the Farmers' Association in the Western provinces,—exactly that part of the country to which the hon. minister of Colonization and Immigration (Mr. Calder) comes from, though he says that this is not the time to deal with the tariff—resolutions were adopted, earnestly demanding the immediate revival of the reciprocity policy adopted by the Laurier administration under the very auspices of the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) who now sits in this House. The farmers of Ontario, of that province which proved so wild with respect to the tariff, held a meeting where they adopted a resolution similar to that which was adopted in the West. So sincere are they, so serious are they also in their request, that, at three by-elections for Ontario—provincial elections—where they had candidates of their own choice, they defeated the Hearst administration, and one may say, with no intention in the least to stand as a prophet, that it was the Union Government which they were aiming at.

Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that the majority of the members of this House may continue to support the Government as long as they like, but that the people is not with them. Listening to the speech delivered by the hon. minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) I was struck with the appeal which he made to the manufacturers, at least a hundred of whom, did he say, have become millionaires during the war. He asked them to keep employing the workingmen. I am very much afraid that his appeal will not be heard in the town where I live, an industrial town where so many men are out of work since the war is over, and where it is rumoured that the salaries may be reduced by 10 per cent. A prospective strike is the subject of conversation, the workingmen are dissatisfied, and I say that they are right in this; they have been hoodwinked in every way, for four years past, they have borne the burden of the war during that time, because, after all, it is the workingmen, it is the people who pays. Therefore, let the Government make a law which may give justice to everybody, let them do away, once for all, with that policy of protection the only result of which is to enrich but one class; let them also protect the workingman, so that he may be able to live appropriately; let them fix a minimum with respect to his salary, let them create pensions for old age, because I say, Mr. Speaker, that when a workingman has spent the best of his life to enrich the capitalist—in many cases at starvation wages—he has the right to expect that the State will take care of him in his old age, so that he will not be dependent upon his family or obliged to end his days in the poor house. Let the Government grant him a life annuity in his old age and better protection against accidents and in case of unemployment. What I want is an act of justice, and were my request complied with, the important question of capital and labour would be settled forever.

I have been struck also with another part of the speech delivered by the hon. member of Public Works, where it is stated that all the revenue is absorbed by the expenses incurred on account of the war; and that one hundred millions more are wanted in order that the works which are most necessary in the country may be carried on. The hon. minister asks us where that money could be found. If I may be permitted to make a suggestion I shall first advise him to have the manufacturers surrender to the Government one half of the hundred million profits they have realized during the war. In fact, it is a shame to see that while the small industries and even the workingmen are being taxed, people like Mr. Flavelle and others are permitted to accumulate fortunes. Let us cut down the number of the ministers. We have about twenty of them. I believe that, with a better distribution of the work, ten would be quite sufficient. Let us do away with all the Commissions which have been appointed and the incumbents of which are granted salaries equal to those of hon. ministers; let us practice economy, and let us be satisfied that, by such means, we shall be in pocket many millions.

Sir, before I resume my seat I would like, as did the hon. members who preceded me to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in answer to the speech from the Throne, for the able manner in which they have discharged their duty; but I do not wish to congratulate the Government for having departed from the old custom prevailing in this House and which consisted in having the address seconded in French. It seems to me that it would have been easy enough to find, among the hon. members sitting to your right, a gentleman who was conversant with the beautiful French language, and if no such scholar could have been found, then a well gifted gentleman might have been selected among them and set to the task of learning French.

How I deplore and regret the disappearance of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier! He was a great statesman, he was for the liberal party a great chieftain, he was the idol of his compatriots and was for me, personally, a great friend or rather a great protector. As a public man, I shall strive to conform to his wise teachings and to adopt this motto which was his own: "First a Canadian, always a Canadian."

Mr. WILLIAM GARLAND McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I esteem it a great privilege to be permitted to say a few words in this debate. The speech from the Throne, to my mind, is one of the most important items in the parliamentary programme and, in my humble opinion, requires and demands the earnest and serious consideration of the House. It is no less than a message from His Majesty the King delivered to us his loyal subjects by His Excellency the Governor General and as such is not to be lightly regarded.

Previous to the war there were those among us who did not hesitate to suggest, somewhat surreptitiously perhaps, that in these enlightened times necessity no longer existed for having a king at the head of our empire and that the office of governor general should be abolished. This struck direcly at the root and foundation of our form of national government and if continued to its logical conclusion could only have one result, the disruption of the British Empire. There were others who openly urged that Canada should become a self-contained nation on more or less republican lines. Some very distinguished gentlemen, I believe, even devoted a great deal of time to writing and distributing pamphlets setting out their convictions and arguments that Canada had never received any benefit from Great Britain, but, on the contrary had suffered greatly by loss of territory and otherwise through the carelessness and inefficiency of her statesmen and diplomats.

It is with feelings of extreme consternation that we must now contemplate what would have happened to the whole civilized world if these pernicious doctrines had become consummated facts. If Canada had withdrawn from the Empire who can say that her example might not have been followed by other colonies? If our form of Government had been changed and if the British Empire had gone to pieces, is there any sane person who would have the temerity or hardihood to suggest that it would have been found possible to stop the terrible Hun in his ruthless and unchristian attempt to conquer the world? Thank God the true situation has been clearly demonstrated and the stability, foundation and principles of our form of Government have been firmly established.

The Empire has stood the test of the greatest war of history and has come through triumphantly, stronger and greater than ever. Long live the King! God bless him! Under him and his advisers, the great and powerful British Empire was able at a moment's notice to fly to the assistance of courageous little Belgium and of noble France both of which were being ravished and destroyed by the inhuman foe. Under him the silent British navy cleared the seas of enemy ships and shipping and made the transportation of troops and foodstuffs possible. Under him the nation was able to materially assist our valient allies in bringing the Bosche to his knees. The world is safe once more. It is with feelings of intense pride and admiration that we must contemplate His Majesty's personal record during the war as well as the record of the whole royal family. They placed the cause of freedom and humanity before everything else and nobly did they play their part.

As Canadians we may be doubly proud that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales attached himself to the Canadian army and shared with them the hardships and dangers of the fight. I am told that he endeared himself to the Canadian troops all of whom will agree that he is what soldiers call a good head. Perhaps I might also be permitted to suggest that even the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) will agree that the whole British aristocracy, with all their titles and other encumbrances, did magnificent work and that we as Canadians must make our acknowledgments to them.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that Canada has been singularly fortunate in the high standard of the men who have been sent to us in the capacity of Governors General. In the case of the present incumbent the high traditions of the office have been maintained.

The speech from the Throne on this occasion will live long in Canadian history if for no other reason than that it contains a well deserved acknowledgment of the splendid conduct of the soldiers of Canada. Every Canadian must have a personal sense of pride when he reads the reference to our Canadian soldiers:

> In the notable victories leading to the glorious issue accomplished by the arms of the Allies, none of the forces engaged bore a more valorous or heroic part than those of Canada, whose achievements throughout the entire war have won imperishable renown for their country. It is most gratifying to be able to state that, in the final and decisive stages of the mighty struggle, our divisions in the field were maintained at over strength, and equipped in the highest degree with all the requirements of modern warfare.

I would call particular attention to the final sentence of this paragraph:

> The appreciation and gratitude of the nation cannot be too earnestly and sincerely expressed to the gallant members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, whose sacrifices, sufferings and heroism have played so effectual a part in vindicating the cause of world liberty and civilization.

Personally, I feel that the problems affecting our returned soldiers, their dependents and the dependents of those who will not return, should receive our first consideration. However, with the kind indulgence of the House, I will refer to that subject later on.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents, I would like to add my tribute to the memory of the late, lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier. So much has been said, and so well said, in this connection that I feel that in anything I might say I could add nothing to our veneration for the memory of this wonderful man. In British Columbia the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier was held in high esteem by both Liberals and the old time Conservatives. His memory will always be kept green, and I believe for all time to come he will be considered as having been one of our greatest Canadians.

I would also like to be permitted to add my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech. I think it was singularly fortunate and appropriate that the mover and seconder should both be returned soldiers, men who had taken a part, and had done their share in defending the liberty of the world. I congratulate these hon. gentlemen on the manner in which they performed their duty in this House, and I believe that it is in strict accordance with the work they did overseas.

I would also like to add my congratulations to those already extended to the new Leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie). He has some qualifications which appeal to me, viz: He is a Presbyterian, he is Scotch, and he is a lawyer, surely a combination which cannot be surpassed; and I hope that the future will show for him a record which will stand side by side with the record made by his illustrious predecessor.

I sincerely regret that there has been some criticism from the hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches, as to the absence of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) at the Peace Conference. I have been wondering why these hon. gentlemen should worry so much that the Premier is away at this particular time. I have been wondering if perhaps they think that the majority on this side of the House is not large enough, or perhaps whether they have been thinking that the Prime Minister and his absent colleagues might be induced to follow the "light in the window," which no one else on this side of the House has yet been able to perceive. I would like to ask seriously if these hon. gentlemen really think that Canada should not be represented at the Peace Conference, and should not be represented there by the Prime Minister? Why should not the Premier be absent from this House when he has such a splendid substitute to leave in his place? I remember when I first saw Sir Thomas White. It was at Osgoode Hall in Toronto in 1899 and 1900. He was then the Big Boy of the School, Gold Medallist, prize debater, and so forth. I am glad to see him once more as the Big Boy of this school of statesmen. We must all appreciate the splendid record the Acting Prime Minister made as Finance Minister during the war. He had big problems to solve, he had big work to carry out, and he was big enough to do that work in a manner satisfactory to the great majority of Canadians.

Leaving out of consideration the many other matters in which Canada is interested at the Peace Conference, if the Prime Minister and his colleagues who are attending that Conference can assist in having the Kaiser brought to justice for his many crimes against humanity, their time will not be wasted. The Kaiser should not be allowed to escape. History will no doubt record that he was responsible for this terrible war. He was responsible for the violation of Belgium, the poison gas, the mustard gas, the liquid fire, and all other fiendish devices of hell; the crucifixion of Canadian soldiers, the air raids and the unnecessary deaths of so many defenceless women and children, and the wanton destruction of property, the sinking of the Lusitania, the murder of Nurse Cavell and Captain Fryatt, the ruthless submarine warfare, with the murderous shelling of lifeboats; and everything that is low, mean, contemptible, barbarous, inhuman and cowardly in modern warfare. The Kaiser should be brought to justice, he should have a fair trial—no doubt he will get a fair trial—and if it is shown conclusively that he personally was in any way responsible for any of the terrible crimes mentioned, he should be punished as he deserves. There are other fiends and arch-criminals among his advisers who should also be prosecuted.

I am not one, Mr. Speaker, who thinks that the ministers of the Crown should spend all their time in Ottawa. As a matter of fact I believe that their departmental duties should be lessened to such an extent that they will be able to pay frequent visits to other parts of this great Dominion. The people of British Columbia appreciated the visit of the Cabinet Ministers last fall. It put the ministers in touch with conditions in British Columbia, and let the people see and hear them, and I can say, Mr. Speaker, that they made a good impression upon the people of that province. We had the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell), the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), the Minister of Militia and Defence (Maj. Gen. Mewburn), the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid), and the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White). The latter paid his visit during the Victory Loan campaign. Possibly the most important from the standpoint of my constituency was the visit of the Minister of Public Works. Previous to his visit to my constituency that hon. gentleman did not have a very clear idea of the conditions there, such as a man must get by actually being on the scene.

The first time I met the Minister of Public Works was in Ottawa during the early part of the last session of Parliament. I went to see him about some further improvements in the channel of the Fraser river. He said to me: "Now, look here, McQuarrie, there is no use in your talking to me about trying to make a ship channel on the Fraser river. You cannot do it; it is impossible; there are too many things to contend with, and I do not propose to spend very much money on it." I said to him: "Mr. Carvell, have you been on the Fraser river?" He said: "Yes, I have been at New Westminster and I have seen the Fraser river, but I must say that I have not actually taken a trip down the Fraser river from New Westminster to the gulf." I said: "Will you promise me that when you visit British Columbia you will come to New Westminster and spend some time on the Fraser river?" He said that he would, and I said that I was satisfied. I remarked further: "Mr. Carvell, after you have seen what kind of river we have out there and what the conditions are, if you repeat your assertion that you do not care to spend any money on trying to improve that ship channel, I shall have nothing further to say; but I have too much respect for your judgment to think that you will take that stand."

Now, we were fortunate in having the Minister of Public Works spend a considerable time on the Fraser river. He is a man who wants to see for himself. You may lay engineers' reports and all that kind of thing before him, but he wants to see for himself what you have and to find out whether the goods are there or not. That is the kind of man we like; that is the kind of man we want to have visit us. Although his time was rather limited, the minister spent two days and a half on the Fraser river. We have quite a big river there; those of you who have not been out there do not understand what a great river it is. The Fraser is one of the greatest rivers in Canada; it is one of the greatest rivers in the world. It has two branches, one running to the west, which is called the North Arm, and the other to the south, which is called the main channel, the latter being the larger.

The minister spent a half day on the North Arm, and was able to see the conditions there. If we are going to have any considerable industrial advancement in British Columbia, it must be on the Fraser river. The peninsula on which Vancouver, New Westminster and the intervening municipalities are situated is practically identical with New York City so far as its geographical situation is concerned. There the great industries are on an island, which is similar to what we have, and there is the flat land along the river, which is the proper land for industrial sites.

The minister spent a whole day on the main channel. We took him up to one of the largest and most up-to-date saw mills in the world, that of the Western Canada Lumber Company. We took him down the river and showed him sawmill after sawmill, industry after industry, and we showed him the dredges at work at the mouth of the river. The river at New Westminster is something like three-quarters of a mile wide; the distance from New Westminster to the gulf is something like eighteen miles. There is deep water, forty or fifty feet, right at the docks at New Westminster. There is deep water all the way down, a good channel until you get to the sand bars at the mouth of the river.

The minister spent another day going through the upper reaches of the Fraser river. We were able also to give the minister certain information. We were able to tell him that on the Fraser river there were still remaining something like eight billion feet of timber belonging to the Provincial Government and something more than eight billion feet of merchantable timber belonging to the Dominion Government, and that if the present stumpage rate was continued the Dominion Government would receive from that timber in stumpage no less than $4,000,000. We were able to tell him that we had saw mills on the Fraser river, at and near New Westminster, with a capacity of 500,000,000 feet. We were able to tell him that we had shingle mills on the Fraser river close to New Westminster turning out 300,000,000 shingles a year. We were able to show him that something like 8,000 men were employed in these industries, and that indirectly the whole population of that district was affected. We were able to tell him that there was an investment in mills and timber of something like $100,000,000, and we were able to show him that we did business with the whole world. We ship lumber all over the world, Mr. Speaker.

Our ships are already plying between Canada and many foreign countries, but unfortunately because of the lack of sufficient depth in the channel at the present time, we are unable to accommodate the larger class of ships which wish to do business with us. We have at present a depth of some twenty-four feet, but we want to get a depth of thirty feet. We explained all these matters to the Minister of Public Works and at a little meeting that we had afterwards with him, he stated that he had been mistaken about the Fraser river. He was a big enough man to admit that the information which he had had was not altogether correct; that he had had an idea that the Fraser river was a very turbulent stream; that it was very difficult of navigation; that there were all kinds of difficulties to be contended with, and that from an engineering standpoint, successful navigation of the Fraser river was impossible of accomplishment. He told us also that he had had an idea that we were trying to build up a port in New Westminster to compete with the port of Vancouver which was a port of sufficient capacity to look after all the shipping that we might ever expect to have on that part of the Pacific. There is a splendid harbour at Vancouver. Everything that the Minister of Public Works said about it is quite true. At the meeting to which I refer, he said: "Gentlemen, I find that you do not wish to build up a port to compete with Vancouver. What you wish is to have a channel out to the sea which will enable you to send out to the world the products which you manufacture. You are entitled to that, and I am going to do everything I can to assist you to get it."

The problem is, to a layman, not a very difficult one, but I must say that, unfortunately, there has in the past been a great deal of bungling and a great deal of money thrown away in connection with the work on the Fraser river. We do not like that. It does not do us any good. It does not bring the results that we want. We want a channel and at present we have not a channel. The reason is that the whole proposition has not been undertaken intelligently. To my mind, the present Minister of Public Works is the first one who has viewed the situation in an intelligent manner. We have been fighting for years to get an engineer on that work who will do nothing but look after the dredging of that channel, who will have entire charge and authority to see that the work is done properly. Formerly, it had been done under the control of the department and there had been some supervision, but no properly qualified man was on deck all the time to see that the work was carried out in an intelligent manner. We put this situation up to the Minister of Public Works and an engineer was put in charge of the work. My information is that during the last year more and better work has been done than in any previous five years. We found that the department had been endeavouring to keep dredged a circuitous channel, one that was full of turns and curves, so that when you dug it out in one place it would fill up in another and you could never, in the world, expect to have a proper channel. We explained to the Minister of Public Works what we wanted; we said that we wanted to get a straight channel out to the sea, so that the current of the river would wash out the sand and silt which is deposited from above and thus keep itself more or less clear. We showed him our plans. He said: "That appeals to me; I am going to try it out." He is trying out this plan and I have no doubt that, under the guidance of the Minister of Public Works, we are going to have a channel down to the sea of sufficient depth to look after our requirements. I think that is what we are entitled to have. If Canada is going to be built up, she must be built up by her commerce and her industries and we, on the Pacific coast, expect to share in the advancement in those respects which is bound to come to Canada.

We had also, as I said, a visit from the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid). We in New Westminster are interested in railways as well as in other matters. We also had visiting us the managing director, the assistant managing director, and, I think, pretty nearly all the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway. They saw for themselves what the conditions were and they ascertained what our requirements from the Canadian Northern were. The original plans of the Canadian Northern Railway contemplated the construction of the main line through New Westminster to Vancouver. This company, which has at the present time a railroad of about 3,000 miles in length, is in this unfortunate position, that for the last twelve miles of that distance it has to run over the tracks of a foreign railway. Such a thing is a disgrace to Canada. If we are going to construct a railroad 3,000 miles in length, surely we can finish up the last twelve miles of it so as to have our own tracks. The city of New Westminster, in accordance with an arrangement with the Canadian Northern Railway Company, who were then in control of the road, made an expenditure of $500,000 in widening Front street which is close to the river, for the purpose of allowing the Canadian Northern to run through the city. The Canadian Northern purchased lands in New Westminster and contiguous thereto on which they spent something like $2,000,000. Those lands were purchased for the purpose of running the line through New Westminster to Vancouver. I have had the matter up with the minister and also with the managing director and his assistant, and I believe it is the intention, as soon as the necessary finances are available, to carry out the original plan.

I wish to congratulate the Government and the Minister of Railways and Canals upon their selection of the men to take charge of the Canadian National railways. In the West, both Mr. Hanna and Mr. MacLeod are very well thought of. We think they are very big men and quite capable of taking charge of a big proposition like this. They have the respect of the community, and I think they will get results. The men who took over the control of the Canadian Northern railway for the Government had a very big problem on their hands, because the Canadian Northern had a bad reputation,—a very bad reputation in British Columbia. There we have close to us the famous townsite of Port Mann, and I can say without fear of contradiction that Port Mann was one of the biggest steals ever perpetrated in the history of Canada. It is a disgrace to Canada that any one, to use a Western phrase, should be allowed to pull off a thing like that and get away with it. Port Mann did more than anything else to give the Canadian Northern a bad name. The road had also a bad reputation with the banks. I know as a matter of fact, that the banks refused to do business with any one who was looking to the Canadian Northern for payment. I am reminded of a conversation I had on my way to Ottawa last session with two business men of British Columbia, one a banker, and the other a millman. They said: "Now that the Government has taken over the Canadian Northern, it is a strange thing that they do not do something to put it on a proper financial basis. Do you know that one of the largest banks in Canada has refused to advance money to any one on the strength of a contract with the Canadian Northern?" They gave me particulars, and the first man I met in Ottawa happened to be Mr. Hanna. I said to him: "This is a nice kind of railroad you are trying to run. It appears to be discredited with the banking institutions of this country." And I told him of the conversation I had had on the train. He asked if he was at liberty to use that information, and I said, "Yes, I will give you the names of the gentlemen and all details." He said, "All right. There is going to be some fur flying in a very few minutes," and he set off down the street. I am glad to say that under the present management the financial reputation of the Canadian Northern has been very much enhanced. There is a great future for this road. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Thursday, March 13, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

PENSIONS COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I desire to move that the names of Messrs. Bonnell, Brien, Fontaine, Lang, McGibbon (Muskoka), and Savard, be added to the Special Committee on Pensions and Pension Regulations and all matters appertaining thereto.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING BUREAU.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask when we will again have the printed copies of the Debates of the House?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: At present the copies being supplied to members are mimeographed because the Government has been unable to have Hansard printed. As soon as the conditions change so that we are in a position to print the Hansards, they will be printed and distributed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When do you expect that will be?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am unable to say.

RIOTS AT KINMEL CAMP.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the Government received any further details of the rising at Kinmel Park in Wales?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no further official report.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The telegraph wires must be down.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Wednesday, March 12.

Mr. WILLIAM G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster) (resuming): Mr. Speaker, I was saying when the House adjourned yesterday, that there was a great future before the Canadian National railways if properly managed. The transcontinental line running through the West, formerly the Canadian Northern railway, is a very important one from our standpoint, and I believe that that railway is going to become a great asset for Canada. With railways the most remunerative part of the business should be the haulage of freight, and in this connection, the railroad having the best grades has a great advantage. I believe I am correct in saying that the Canadian Northern Railway transcontinental line has better grades than any other transcontinental railway in the whole of America. The following comparison with the Canadian Pacific railway exemplifies this situation very clearly: The Canadian Pacific can only haul a train of sixteen cars from Vancouver to Calgary through the mountains, whereas the Canadian Northern can haul, with one engine, fifty cars fully loaded, from Vancouver to Quebec. When the grain of Alberta and Saskatchewan flows westward this will be an important factor in the success of the Canadian Northern. A very considerable portion of the grain from these provinces is bound to go out through the Pacific.

In considering the transportation of grain, or any other product for that matter, where rail and water are both to be utilized, an important feature to be taken into account is to get the shortest rail haul to satisfactory water transportation. This will be accomplished by using the Fraser river route. We expect some day to see grain elevators on the Fraser river. We have miles and miles of excellent sites for elevators from Port Coquitlam to the gulf and when the Minister of Public Works completes the channel of the Fraser river there will be a sufficient depth of water for great freighters to dock at any of these sites.

We have four important railway lines running into New Westminster now—the Canadian Northern, Canadian Pacific, the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific. The Canadian Pacific has already intimated that it will, when the proper times comes, build elevators at Port Coquitlam and use the Fraser river route thereby cutting down its rail haul about 25 miles. It has acquired a lot of land at Port Coquitlam and will have lots of room to handle the cars without congestion. The Canadian Northern also owns a lot of property at, and in the vicinity of, New Westminster. Why not follow the lead of the Canadian Pacific and use the Fraser river route for the vast quantity of grain that is bound to be hauled? Perhaps we might even get in ahead of the Canadian Pacific and establish our elevators first. I would advise the management of this railway to consider the advisibility of building elevators on the Fraser river without delay and let others do the following. If the Canadian Northern carries out its original plan of building its line from New Westminster to Vancouver it will save the $2,000,000 it has invested in New Westminster and vicinity. It will also get the business at North Arm, Lulu Island, Burnaby and South Vancouver. Many additional miles of splendid industrial sites will be opened up and much good will result to the whole country.

I think the new management will make good. When the Government took over the line, the Canadian Northern was trying to do business without equipment and without credit. Contracts of the Canadian Northern were not recognized by the banks as security for advances. Since coming under Government control all that has been changed. One hundred and fifty engines and 16,000 cars have been added to the equipment and financial aid has placed the Canadian Northern in this position: (1) No shortage of cars; (2) no shortage of power; (3) trains running on time; (4) the public looking to do business with the Canadian Northern instead of the Canadian Northern running after the public; (5) good credit.

When the minister was out in New Westminster, we pointed out to him, among other things, the necessity of having a British Columbia man on the Canadian Northern directorate and I believe that this will have his favourable consideration. Personally, I think that every province should be represented on the Board of the Canadian National Railways.

The minister had quite a busy time in British Columbia, and we consider that he is the right man in the right place. I would also like to pay my respects to the deputy minister: he is a good man and doing good work. The other Cabinet Ministers were also very busy during their visit to British Columbia. They discussed many matters with the members of Parliament for the province, met many delegations and addressed a number of public meetings. We were glad to have them with us, and we only hope they will come again soon and that other members of the Cabinet will visit British Columbia. There is one minister, Mr. Speaker, who did not come to British Columbia, although he received a very pressing invitation to do so. I refer to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I am very sorry indeed that he did not find it convenient to come to our province. All the signs point to trouble in connection with the British Columbia fisheries. In connection with those fisheries we have had Royal Commissions, we have had International Commissions, we have had investigations of all kinds; but the situation does not appear to have yet been cleared up. Great dissatisfaction exists not only in connection with the Fraser river fisheries, but also as regards the whole of the fisheries of British Columbia, and I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the fisheries of that province amount to something. The industry is a very important one. Unfortunately on the Fraser river there has been a falling off for some time in the pack of salmon. I have here a few figures, giving the packs for several years on the Fraser river, which, with the permission of the House I shall read. The Fraser river total last year was 206,003 cases, and compares with former years as follows:

1916	106,440
1915	289,199
1914	328,390
1913	732,059
1912	173,921
1911	301,344
1910	223,148
1909	567,203
1908	89,184
1907	163,116
1906	240,486
1905	877,136
1904	128,903
1903	237,125
1902	327,095
1901	990,252
1900	316,522
1899	510,383
1898	256,101
1896	356,984

It will be seen that the 1918 pack, while not the smallest, is below the normal. These figures, however, do not show the decline in the sockeye pack, which is the best fish for canning, the total being increased by the fact that there was much more canning of other varieties than there was when the sockeye was plentiful. The varieties packed in the Fraser River District were:

	Cases.
Sockeye	16,849
Red Springs	15,192
White and Pink Springs	24,853
Chums	86,215
Pinks	18,388
Cohoes	40,111
Blue Backs and Steel Heads	4,395

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

Now it is alarming to see the depletion in such an important industry as the salmon, and I think it would be a good thing for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to give a matter of that kind very serious consideration.

There is another factor in connection with the fisheries of British Columbia, which to my mind requires and demands the attention of the minister, and that is the fact that the great majority of fishing licenses in British Columbia are issued to Japanese, and the great part of the remaining licenses are issued to other foreigners—Austrians, Greeks, Norwegians, Swedes, and so forth. Now I have here some figures which I will give in that connection. This is a letter which I received from one of the fishery officials and is dated 6th of January, 1919:

> It is quite true that so far as gill net fishing is concerned, the Japanese hold the majority of licenses. For instance on the Fraser River, during the season just closed there were 473 whites, 86 Indians, and 1,023 Japanese. In 1917 834 whites, 272 Indians, and 1,521 Japanese. In 1916, 605 whites, 198 Indians, and 1,437 Japanese. In the northern part of the province, where in 1918, 2,216 gill net licenses were issued, 1,211 were of Japanese nationality. In salmon fishing the Japanese are restricted to gill net licenses, and there is not a salmon drag, or purse-seine license issued to any one of this nationality. It is quite true that some of the white licensees employ Japanese to operate their seining licenses, but this is a matter over which the department has absolutely no control. True also, certain Japanese acted as buyers of salmon on the Fraser River for American firms, and this, of course, we cannot control.

Now, I have nothing to say against the Japanese, but I do not think it is a proper condition when we find that the majority of the licenses are being issued to men from a foreign country. Perhaps this may not appeal to hon. gentlemen as being a serious matter, but I wish to assure them that it is a very important matter, from the standpoint of British Columbia at least. When you consider the fact that in a normal year the pay-roll to the fishermen on the Fraser river only is something like a million dollars and when you see the greater part of that million dollars going to foreigners, you must realize that something should be done to remedy that state of affairs.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Could they not get white men to take their places?

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is the unfortunate part of it; the white man cannot compete with the Oriental in fishing, because these two classes of people do not live in the same way. The Japanese can live much more cheaply than the white man. The Japanese is a good fisherman, and we have plenty of white men who are good fishermen, but they cannot compete with the Japanese. I have watched this situation for something like thirty years. I have seen the Japanese menace to the fisheries increase from year to year until now these people have the monopoly of that natural resource. I remember the time when a good run of fish meant prosperity to that district, but now the money received by the fishermen goes out of the country and helps not to build up Canada, but to build up a foreign country.

The International Commission to which I have referred was formed because of the fact that our neighbours to the south were doing absolutely nothing to protect the fish. We had hatcheries, we had close seasons, we did everything we could, according to the best judgment of the men in charge of the department concerned, to conserve the salmon; but the Americans did nothing but take the fish. On the other side of the line they had large traps in which thousands of these fish were caught which otherwise would have come up to the spawning grounds in the Fraser river. It is unfortunate that those who had to do with arranging the boundary between Canada and the United States in the early days did not take these circumstances into consideration. The condition is an unnatural one that should not have been permitted to exist. However, we are face to face with it; and now we have this International Commission.

My point in referring to this commission is that, according to reports in the press, it has recommended that the number of licenses on the Fraser river be limited to 1,800. Up to the present time any one who wanted a license has been able to get one. But if the number of licenses is limited to 1,800, are we going to allow the Japanese to have the whole of them or shall we so arrange it that they will get only a fair proportion of them? One of my constituents has asked me to see if it would be possible to get the Government to make some kind of regulation cutting down to fifty per cent of the total the proportion of licenses to be issued to the Japanese. It seems to me that that suggestion is along the right line, but under present conditions its adoption is out of the question. The Government and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will have to consider what is to be done for the future; will have to consider whether foreigners are to be allowed to have all our fishing rights.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why are foreigners accorded fishing rights in the Fraser river?

Mr. McQUARRIE: We call these men foreigners, but as a matter of fact they are not foreigners. According to the law, they are naturalized British subjects. Now, you know what that means; anybody who lives in British Columbia knows what that means. These men are citizens of this country only in name and only for the particular purpose of securing a fishing license. They take the oath of allegiance to His Majesty the King, but remain loyal subjects of their own emperor.

I have referred to investigations. As a matter of fact, an investigation is now being conducted in British Columbia by Mr. Justice Eberts, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of that province, under a Royal Commission. Many charges have been made in connection with the administration of the fisheries in British Columbia—charges of graft, corruption, waste, destruction, and so on. Some of those charges have been made by men who have been rash in their statements and very unfair to the fisheries officials and to the Government. A member of the British Columbia Legislature, a returned soldier with a distinguished record in the war, made what I consider to be rash and uncalled for statements. I refer to Major Richard Burde, D.S.O. He made these charges in the Provincial Legislature and also at a public meeting. I have in my hand an extract from the Vancouver Daily Province of February 7, 1919, which reads as follows:

Big Graft Ring in Fish.

Major Burde Used Strong Language in Legislature Thursday.

Gives Details of Difficulty in Getting an Inquiry at Alberni.

Victoria, Feb. 7.—Calling the Fisheries Department a standing disgrace to Canada, "smelling of fish but of a rotten brand," Major Richard Burde, of Alberni, scathingly indicted the Federal Administration for what he described to the legislature yesterday as its absolute disregard of citizens of this province.

"There never was a bigger graft in Canada than there is in the circle where one must wait to-day for a fishing license," he said. "The very fact that an application for a seine-net license is made in private to the Chief Inspector of Fisheries and the public does not know anything about it must make any one of a penetrative mind smell graft.

"You can sell a fishing license any day in a real estate office for $3,000 or $4,000. Our fisheries in this province are being depleted. The sockeye salmon has gone to the museum and the herring would soon be in the same class, but for an inquiry which we now have instituted in the district of Alberni. Herring packers have recently gone into that territory, and fishing for them are more Japanese than I believe have any right to be in British Columbia. These men are employed to the exclusion of the whites, although fishing might well be considered a good employment for returned soldiers. In Alberni we procured thirty affidavits to prove that there had been almost enough herring wasted by the seine-net ringsters to feed Canada for three or four years. The bottom of the harbour is silvery carpeted with dead herring. Yet, when we press for an inquiry, the Dominion member for the district, the chief inspector of fisheries and his satellites met us with chips on their shoulders. Our charges by inference involved the chief inspector, but when we asked Ottawa for an inquiry we were told that it would be made by this official. We replied that we would prefer to have the Federal department send a man down to investigate the inspector rather than have that official take up our charges. The reply from Mr. Desbarats, Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, was that our message was impertinent, and that if we persisted in that course we would not get any inquiry at all. But we persisted and public opinion forced a probe. Now we have a situation where a Dominion department reluctantly consents to granting us an investigation it should have made long ago itself. This department has apparently outlived its usefulness. I am told that the seine-net fishermen impound about 150 tons of herring in each drive. Sixty per cent of them are smothered and dead by the time the other forty per cent are loaded. The dead fish drop to the bottom of the harbour, and thus the terrible waste goes on. It seems to me, and in fact I have that admission from the chief inspector of fisheries, that hundreds of Japanese working for these herring concerns have no right to engage in the occupation because they are not naturalized. But somehow or other they produce naturalization papers when called on. People say that the canneries hand out the naturalization certificates to the Japanese whenever they wish to employ them. The Japanese going home to the Orient leave their certificates behind, and the Japanese contractors apparently sell them to the new-comers or to the canneries."

The speaker went on to say that the Japanese put up tons of immature herring and ship them via Tacoma to Japan, in this way robbing British Columbia of one of its most valuable assets. The question was one which the province should take up with Ottawa and fight the matter through with the Dominion, he considered. The administration of the fisheries of British Columbia would well be in the hands of the province itself. It might be urged, of course, that to seek to bar the Japanese would be to raise an issue with an ally, but it seemed to Major Burde that if the Empire owed a debt to Japan then the Empire should pay rather than ask British Columbia to meet the whole price of the alliance.

Major Burde was not content with making a statement in the legislature involving the chief inspector and other officials in the Department of Fisheries. At a meeting held in Alberni he made further charges, involving also the Federal member for that constituency. I have here the Vancouver Daily Sun of February 22, 1919, from which I purpose reading this extract:—

Major Burde Alleges that West Coast Fisheries are Controlled by Graft Ring.

Port Alberni, Feb. 21.

Major Dick Burde, M.L.A., made a fighting speech here to-night, at a meeting of fishermen and citizens attacking the cannery men, H. S. Clements, M.P., Chief Inspector Cunningham, of the Fisheries Department and Al. Hager of the New England Fish Company, Vancouver. The provincial member was wildly applauded by the crowd when he repeated the charge that the West Coast Fisheries were controlled by a Graft Ring and urged the fishermen to stay with their fight. He contended that the scope of the inquiry should be extended, and that Mr. Cunningham should be put on the stand. If this was done, some sensational evidence would come out, he said. "There was a graft ring in fish bigger than the Yukon whiskey ring," he asserted. "I believe it because I can smell it."

With regard to Mr. Hager, Major Burde said he had heard that Hager told certain men at the Hotel Vancouver that "Burde is a liar; if we get him on the stand we will make dog meat out of him."

In answer, the major said "if Hager said he will make dog meat out of me, I'll make dirty, rotten fish meat out of him."

Referring to the Fisheries Department, Major Burde said it was the Department's business to start the investigation, not that of the fishermen. He said this was to the disgrace of Clements and the Department. "We are up against a bunch of brigands," he said. "We must not start anything we can't finish."

I will now take up the investigation. The investigation was held and Mr. Cunningham, chief inspector of fisheries, went on the stand and was examined and cross-examined at length, denying each and every one of these charges of graft and incompetency that had been made. At that investigation not one thing was proved in the way of graft or dishonesty or anything of that kind against the member for Alberni, the chief inspector of fisheries, or any of the officials of the department, and, strange to relate, Major Burde, although requested to give evidence himself, did not see fit to do so. It seems to me that when a man, whether he is a returned soldier or not—and I give Major Burde all credit for his service at the front—make such charges in the legislature, he should know that his charges are going to be substantiated, and that when an investigation is held, when the country is put to the expense of thousands of dollars to hold an inquiry of this kind, the man who makes the charges should, if he is not able to come and give evidence himself to prove his charges, produce the men upon whose statements he relied when making his charges. This kind of thing is bad for everybody concerned in it. It is bad for Major Burde; it is bad for the fisheries officials; it is bad for Mr. Clements. It does harm because people see the first reports of those charges and think there is something in them, and they do not see the last reports, which show that the charges have been absolutely exploded. The situation in connection with the fisheries of British Columbia is, to say the least, very unsatisfactory. The control and management of the fisheries is vested absolutely in one man—the Chief Inspector of Fisheries. It is absolutely a one man affair, and if that appeals to the minister as proper, I can tell him that it certainly does not so appeal to me or to a great many others. No matter how honest and capable this one man may be who has the control of licenses and all details in connection with the fisheries of British Columbia, dissatisfaction is bound to exist. The Chief Inspector is managing director, as it were, of the fisheries, with full power. It is only natural that a man who is refused a license should be dissatisfied and think there is something wrong with the man who refused him the license. This gives rise to suspicion and rumours, and rumours nearly always result, as they have done in this case, in charges and insinuations. It will not do. No one man is big enough to have full control of the fisheries of British Columbia, and I am glad to know that the acting minister is considering the appointment of a Fisheries Board for British Columbia, composed of no less than three men with a thorough knowledge of the fisheries and whose awards will be accepted by the people of the province.

I have another complaint to make in connection with the fisheries of British Columbia, and it is with regard to the removal of the office of the Chief Inspector of Fisheries from New Westminster, where it had been for fifty years, to Vancouver. I do not care to discuss this matter in the absence of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), as I may have an opportunity on some other occasion to go into the matter fully. There is a question of principle involved which I shall then discuss. After what I have said I think the House will agree that I was quite correct in saying that all signs pointed to trouble in connection with the administration of the fisheries of British Columbia. I regret very much indeed that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not see fit to go to British Columbia in connection with the fisheries. I trust that he will be back in his seat before long and will bring down legislation to remedy some of the evils I have mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, many splendid speeches have been made in this debate on various matters by men much more competent than I am to discuss them, but as I have come almost three thousand miles I hope the House will bear with me while I express a few Western ideas in a Western way. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) has told us that we have to raise millions and millions of dollars and that there will have to be an increase in the income tax; there was nothing else for it, he said. I would suggest to him and to the Government that before increasing the tax an effort should be made to collect the taxation imposed by the present Act. I have here a clipping from the Vancouver World dated February 14 last, which says that according to an official statement from Ottawa:

> The returns to date from the Income Tax Act of 1917, which applies only to incomes in excess of $3,000 in the case of married persons and $2,000 in the case of unmarried persons, show that about 30,000 assessments have been made, of which 19,000 are paid.

The first question I would ask is, why have the other 11,000 assessments not been paid? Secondly, why have only 30,000 assessments been made when there should have been at least twice that number? I will tell you the reason, Mr. Speaker. It is because a great many persons liable under the Act have not filled out the returns which they received from the tax collector, but have simply torn them up and thrown them in the waste paper basket, saying: "We shall simply be making trouble for ourselves if we fill these in." I have been told that it is a regular joke in the clubs the way men are tearing up these forms. The statement has also been made to me by men of financial standing that a great many of the returns that have been sent in are not altogether correct. If my information is correct, certainly something should be done to remedy this state of affairs. Everyone liable under the Act should be made to pay, and a return that is at all events reasonably correct should be insisted upon. I think that if that were done it would perhaps be unnecessary to increase the income tax. We should get the money that we require, in an equitable manner, and not, as we have received it heretofore, from some and not from others who were entitled to pay. I am not attaching blame to the men who have charge, in the different provinces, of the collection of the income tax. I know that in our province we have a good man. He has done his work well, but he has not a proper staff. He has not the proper clerical assistance which he should have to enable him to perform his work in the way in which it should be done. I think that the collectors in the different provinces should be afforded the necessary assistance to carry out their work more satisfactorily.

In regard to the Business Profits Tax, there seems to be a general impression that the Government intends to discontinue this tax. I do not know whether that is correct or not. In this connection I may read an editorial—a short one—which appeared in the Vancouver World of February 19, of this year:

A Tax That Should Continue.

The Business Profits War Tax, it is said, will not be renewed for 1919. If this be true Parliament ought to have a word to say about it.

The Federal Cost of Living Commissioner, in his report for last month on stocks of products in cold storage, points out that profiteering is still going on and strongly recommends that the order limiting profits should be restored and "rigidly enforced." He advocates special measures for the "protection of all Canadians for the period of reconstruction."

One such protective measure is the Business Profits War Tax. It tends to reduce profiteering and at the same time goes some distance towards allaying the labour unrest throughout the Dominion. Besides this, Canada has a huge bill of the war costs to meet and those who have made money out of the war or out of the conditions that will follow the war are the logical persons to bear the heaviest share of this debt.

Public opinion should make itself felt at Ottawa. The profiteers should not be allowed to have it all their own way.

With the sentiments expressed in that article, if the facts are correct, I entirely concur. It seems to me that this is a tax which might very well be continued; it is a tax which has produced a good deal of money. The returns under the Business Profits Tax appears to be very satisfactory, certainly a large amount of money has been collected in that way. According to information which I gather from the press, the assessments under this tax have aggregated $65,000,000, of which $59,000,000 have been collected. The balance will probably be received within the next two months.

I come now to the question of highways. I am pleased to note that the Government intends at last to do something towards assisting in the construction of highways; but I am afraid I cannot altogether agree with the manner in which this assistance is proposed to be given, as outlined in the resolution standing in the name of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. J. D. Reid); and I hope that before it is finally disposed of, the resolution will be considerably amended. I think we need, not so much the expenditure of money as the obtaining of results. We need to have assistance from the Dominion Government in the building of highways which will be of some use to the people of Canada. Now, we have in British Columbia a highway which we consider is important enough to receive assistance. I am referring to what is known as the Pacific Highway, which runs from Vancouver to San Diego, California, on the border of Mexico, a distance of some 2,000 miles. It is an international highway passing through the States of California, Oregon and Washington. In those states the counties all along that road are at present hard-surfacing it. Every county is doing its share, and the state is assisting; so that that highway of 2,000 miles down the Pacific coast will have a hard surface practically all the way. In British Columbia there is about thirty miles to connect up with that splendid international highway. Thirty miles is all we have to do to complete our portion of the work; twelve miles has already been done. The road from New Westminster to Vancouver is a splendid one, a beautiful pavement,—one of the best in Canada, and one of which we are justly proud. Only eighteen miles remain to be done. I think—and I am supported in this opinion by the people of British Columbia, the Good Roads Associations, and all other organizations interested in roads—that that is a road which should receive assistance from the Dominion Government. Now, we have heard from various hon. members on both sides of the House of the necessity for effecting national unity, encouraging the national spirit, and with those sentiments I am in entire agreement. I think we in Canada are too provincial; we know our own provinces and no others. We do not know what the rest of Canada consists of. Take British Columbia, for instance. Do we, in British Columbia, know anything about the province of Quebec, except what we read in newspapers, and observe casually on trains passing through that province? What do we in British Columbia know of the great provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, which are right at our doors, Manitoba, Ontario, and the Maritime Provinces? We know practically nothing.

The hon. member for Westminster District (Mr. Stacey) the other day, advanced in splendid words, a beautiful plan for promoting the spirit of national unity. I have another plan to suggest and it seems to me that it is possibly more practical. The best way to promote national unity in Canada is to have a road which runs from one side of Canada to the other, a good highway that you could travel over with your motors during the proper season. It is not such a big contract at all. A large part of the road has already been constructed.

In British Columbia, we are in this unfortunate position, that if we wish to go to Alberta or Saskatchewan, we must either go by rail or take our motors down by way of Seattle and Spokane, through the State of Washington and around through the United States into Alberta or Saskatchewan. Then we go up and continue on our journey. But we miss the finest part of the British Columbia scenery which compares with anything that exists in the world. The famous Alps have nothing on that scenery. It would be a great thing for you people down here to be able to get up into these mountains. It would be a great thing for us to be able to get through the mountains. What ought to be built is a road through the mountains of British Columbia connecting that province with the province of Alberta.

You may say that we want all this money for British Columbia. But, you are forgetting that you also will be able to take full advantage of this wonderful highway. You will be able to enjoy that wonderful scenery and make just as much use of the road as we will. I suggest for the serious consideration of the minister the construction of a Canadian highway. I would ask him to see whether he cannot do something more than to give us $80,000 with the small amount which will be in accordance with our population, because, if we get paid according to population we are going to get a very small amount. Our population is small but our needs are great. I would like him to consider this and see whether he cannot possibly amend his proposal in some way.

I have heard some criticism of the Official Record which has been published under the auspices of the hon. the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell). Personally, I feel that the record is filling a long felt want, that the information which it contains is of considerable value and that every copy of the record is worth keeping. History is being recorded in it from a Canadian standpoint. I hope that the minister will keep up the good work and that he will continue the record.

I am glad to see that there is an entire agreement apparently between hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that technical schools should be established by the Dominion Government. We are very badly in need of a technical school in British Columbia. I sincerely hope that the Government will assist us to establish a technical school in that province.

I was glad to see the announcement in the speech from the Throne of the intention of the Government to establish a Department of Public Health, and I listened with a great deal of interest to the eloquent speech of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) in this connection. I join with him in hoping that a first-class medical man will be placed in charge of this department. I would like to see the jurisdiction of this department considerably enlarged. I would like to see it given power to control the prices of drugs. You may talk about profiteering in foodstuffs but the profiteering in drugs has been beyond comprehension. It is nothing short of highway robbery the prices that we have had to pay for drugs all over Canada and I find it here in the East even worse than it is in the West. This is not right. It was not right during war times to allow those men who are responsible for this to take advantage of the conditions to increase their profits. I do not know who is responsible for it, I do not say that the druggists in the towns are responsible, but somebody is responsible for it and that profiteering in drugs ought to be stopped. I would like to see this department of health do something useful, take up that question and control the price of drugs.

I would also like to see the department take up the matter of supplying free medical attendance to those who wish to take advantage of it. I recognize the fact that there will always be in the medical profession men who, because of their outstanding ability, will be specialists, who will be entitled to carry on as specialists and who will be consulted as such; medical men who will command their own private practice and I would not like to see anything done to interfere with the private practice of anybody. These doctors are doing a noble work; they are members of a noble, a splendid profession. I have every respect for the men who are in it. But a great deal of sickness results from the fact that poor people do not like to go to a medical man because they are afraid of the amount of the fee that they will be charged. They say that in medicine prevention is better than cure. It is better to take a disease or a complaint of any kind in its initial stages rather than to look after it later on. Epidemics are started because cases are not attended to as they should be at the first. There should be free medical attendance for those who wish to take advantage of it. At the present time all the machinery for carrying out a system of free medical attendance is in existence. You know, Mr. Speaker, that the Government has medical officers and has hospitals to look after the returned soldiers who require medical attendance. These men are supplied with medical attendance, drugs, medicines and so on.

In due time, and I hope in the not far distant future, the soldiers will be discharged from the hospitals, and there will be no further work for those institutions or for the medical men who are looking after them. Why not continue those hospitals and those medical men in the service of the country, and give free medical attendance to the people who want to take advantage of it? I hope that the new Department of Public Health will consider that question, because I believe, and am convinced, that it is very important.

Now as to the high cost of living. I got a letter from my wife yesterday, and she said: "I hope you people down there in Ottawa will try and do something to bring down the cost of living. That is about the most important business that you can think about." That is the way all the women in this country feel at the present time. I do not see anything about this subject in the speech from the Throne, but I think some action is contemplated in the programme of the Government. Mr. Speaker, we must consider the women more than ever now under present conditions——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McQUARRIE: —and if they demand that the cost of living be brought down we shall have to comply with that demand. How it is going to be done I do not know, that is something that will have to be worked out.

As to the Civil Service Commission, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the criticism of that body, and I hope that patronage as in the old days will never be restored in Canada. Personally I do not wish to have anything to say about any of the appointments which are to be made in connection with the Civil Service. At the same time, however, I think that the Civil Service Commission can stand some remodelling, it is not working out very satisfactorily. I am not saying that with any desire to criticise any member of the Civil Service Board, I think they are trying to do their best, but the existing system needs improvement. It is all new, and the needed reforms will have to be worked out. My experience with the Civil Service Commission has been something like this: I have not heard anything from the commission since I have been a member, neither have I communicated with it, but a rather remarkable thing has happened in that connection, and that is what I want to call attention to. As a matter of fact a great many of the applicants for Civil Service positions from my constituency gave my name as one of their references. I do not know whether it was right or not for them to do so, but at any rate they did so, although not at my request. Now, the peculiar part of the proceeding is that never on one occasion have I had any reference to me from the Civil Service Commission as to any of these applications, and no appointment, so far as I know, has been made by the commission of any one from my constituency. We have good men in my constituency, just as other hon. gentlemen have in their constituencies, but they do not seem to have been recognized by the commission. Whether it is that their applications were refused and thrown out immediately the commission saw that a member of Parliament's name was given as one of the references, or not, I cannot say, but the fact remains that no reference was ever made by the commission to me. Neither am I aware whether any reference was made to any of the other gentlemen who were on the applications or not. I think it is a strange thing that before making appointments the Civil Service Commission should not communicate with all the references given on the applications. I think the Civil Service Commission will be all right if it is given time, but I do hope that patronage will not be returned to the members of Parliament.

With regard to immigration, we have to consider it as a problem—one of the greatest problems of demobilization. The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) speaking on this subject, as reported on page 220 of Hansard said: "The first thing is to get population." Again, as reported on page 221 he said: First of all get population, get people with money." I can hardly agree with the hon. gentleman that money should be the only qualification. I would say, get population, but get the right kind.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton says, "Hear, hear," so that I know that I am voicing his sentiments in making this declaration.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. McQUARRIE: To my mind there are certain classes of population that we do not want in this country. The first class is one which includes people who cannot readily be assimilated. Among this class are, the Chinese, the Japanese, the Hindus, and other Eastern races. So far as the Chinese are concerned, we get them in British Columbia. The unfortunate thing is that when you speak of the number of Chinese in Canada you practically have reference to the number of Chinese in British Columbia. I only wish the Chinese would come down here in large numbers, and that you would employ them as you think they would be useful to you. I know how you feel about it here in Ontario. You have no sympathy with us, when we speak against Oriental immigration. You say: "These Chinese will be very useful to us, we want cheap labour." I want to tell hon. gentlemen that when you get the Chinese you do not get cheap labour. The Chinaman, like everybody else, has become educated, and he is not going to work for any cheap wages. Although there is an overabundance of Chinese in British Columbia at the present time, yet they demand big wages. What would you people in Ontario think of paying $60 to $70 a month to an ordinary farm labourer, when down here you probably pay about $25, or $30?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I venture to say you pay considerably less than $60 to $75 a month for good farm labour. In British Columbia you cannot get a Chinaman who is any good to work on a farm for less than that wage. You cannot get a Chinaman, who is any good, to work in a house or residence, for less than $50 a month and board. If you want to get a good one, you must pay $75, $100 or $125 a month. Talk about cheap labour; you do not get it with the Chinese. I am safe in saying that there are too many Chinese in British Columbia, because I have no less an authority for it than the Chinese Consul at Vancouver. Conditions are so bad that he has found it necessary to go to the Vancouver City council and make representations in the matter. In speaking of these Orientals, the Chinese, Japanese and Hindus, I am referring, of course, to the coolie classes. The Chinese Consul has asked the Vancouver City council to make representations to the Dominion Government with a view to restricting Chinese immigration. I have here a copy of the written statement made by Koliang Yih, the Chinese Consul, in the Vancouver City Council chamber on February 7, 1919. It is as follows:

Although there is only one Chinese to every 3,000 Canadians in this country, yet labour conditions here, aggravated by the large number of returned soldiers, whom we all honour, make it advisable that no more Chinese labourers be allowed to come at present, unless they are returning Chinese or bona fide exempted class, pending a gentleman's agreement between the governments concerned to abolish the head tax and to limit the number of immigrants.

I understand that some 2,000 alleged students, paying $500 head tax each, have come to Canada during the past few months without expecting the war would end so suddenly, and that head tax has been received here and elsewhere on more than 1,200 alleged students who have not yet left China. I think you should petition your Federal Government and suggest that these head taxes be returned to those paying same and those who arrived at Canada three months before the armistice was signed, if they desire to return. I will do my part in requesting my government to allow no Chinese labourers to come here without applying for government's passport, properly vised by a British Consul.

Many Chinese already in this country are finding difficulties in making a living at present, and the stand I am taking now is for the protecton of their immediate interests as well as those of the Canadians.

Between the period of 1906 and 1917, no less than 30,000 Chinese have paid their head tax to the amount of more than $15,000,000 to your Federal Government. Many Chinese, finding that the conditions, both economic and social, were unbearable to them, have since returned to China, and this statement can be proved by the fact that according to the last census taken, there were less than 30,000 Chinese throughout the whole Dominion. Those unfortunate fellows who paid in the tax and went away elsewhere have certainly found themselves between the devil and the deep sea, without being driven to the latter by others.

The Chinese who are planning to come to Canada know little or nothing about the true situation caused by the sudden end of the war, and it is only right for your Government to refund the tax when it knew itself that 50 per cent of the so-called students applying for admission are unable to go to school at all. Your Government should be more rigid in examining these alleged students and more lenient in dealing with other exempted classes. But once the Chinese are admitted they should be entitled to every right and protection as any citizen or subject from other countries enjoying the most favoured agreement. I have heard so much of the Britisher's traditional sense of justice and I hope it will show itself in this case.

After all, this big question should be amicably settled by the government concerned while we are here simply to express our own points of view. I therefore suggest that the question brought up by the representatives from Fairview and Grandview be not considered by this council, and that the less talk about the Oriental immigration to mislead the public the better.

I have under my hand an extract from the Vancouver World of February 26, 1919, touching this question. It is as follows:

Chinese Pour into Vancouver.

Arrive at Average Rate of Three Hundred a Month, According to Official Return from Ottawa.

Number of Japanese Exceeds Annual Quota.

Agreement to Limit Immigration to 400 a Year Apparently Not Observed.

According to an official return obtained from Ottawa more than 400 Japanese who were to enter the country under the "gentleman's agreement," have actually passed through the ports of the Dominion inward bound during the last few years. The average for the last half-dozen years, in fact, has been nearly double the prescribed number.

There was a tremendous influx of Chinese in the year 1913-14, over fifty-five hundred coming in. The first year of the war saw this number reduced to about twenty-five per cent and during the next three years the whole number of Chinese immigrants just equalled that for 1914-15. During the first nine months of the official year 1918-19, however, the figures jumped to 2,670, or more for three-quarters of the year than for the whole of the four previous years put together. Should the influx be maintained at the same rate to the end of the period, the present official year will see the Chinese population increased by about 3,500 new-comers.

The figures referred to in the official return are as follows:

Year.	Chinese.	Japanese.
1914-15	1,258	592
1915-16	88	401
1916-17	393	648
1918-19	2,670	879

The last figures are for nine months. The question of Oriental immigration must be considered from the standpoint of the returned soldier, and I believe the returned soldiers' organizations are rather exercised over present conditions. This is an extract from the Vancouver World of February 27, 1919, which reflects the feeling fairly well:

In considering the problems dealing with the repatriation of returned men, some attention must be given to the Asiatic question, Captain F. C. Brown, of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Commission told the Kiwanis Club, on Thursday, in making an appeal for co-operation in behalf of the men who are now coming back from the front. During the months of January and February, no less than 3,000 men were brought back to this city and discharged, and of this number 1,700 are still without employment. In seeking the solution of this condition of affairs, he urged that earnest consideration would have to be given the Asiatic problem in this city, declaring that in some parts of Vancouver, one would never realize this city was not an Oriental city, to watch the passers-by and listen to the language being spoken. South of Granville Street bridge, he mentioned that no less than seven Orientals were in business for themselves, and said that he had been informed by white merchants in competition with those Orientals that if they did not have to meet that competition they could employ more returned men. It was all very well to talk about those Orientals being Allies, he said, but it has also to be remembered that they did not go away and fight for the country.

He said there seemed to exist in the minds of some business men fear that the returned men would have to be discharged again if given employment, and in this connection put forward a plea for more consideration to be shown the returned man, pointing out that the man who had been through the thickest of the fighting at the front was usually the most difficult to get back to civil life again. He urged business men not to forget the service such a man had rendered his country and to keep up the spirit of gratitude.

I have stated that the Japanese have already obtained practically a monopoly of the fishing industry. They are now going out after other industries. They are commencing to take up small farming, and there is a feeling that if this movement goes on, they will, in a very short time, monopolize small farming in British Columbia. I have not one word to say against the Japanese. The Japanese are a fine people; their men are industrious, hard-working and sober. But still they come within the class to which I have referred, namely, those who cannot readily be assimilated. In this class, we have also the Hindu. I need not say anything more about the Hindu except that so far as I can see the Hindus who are being sent to this country are some of the very worst who could possibly be got together. In any event, they are not suitable for the country; they may like the country, but the country does not like them. With all this class, the same thing prevails, namely, they cannot readily be assimilated and they will always exist as an Oriental settlement in our midst. They send a great deal of their money back to their respective countries; they do not spend it in this country. They do not help to build up this country. They take away from, rather than give, to Canada something that is worth while. There is another class which I think should be kept out. That is a class of people who might be readily assimilated, but who are of such moral fibre that we do not want them just at present. I refer, of course, to our enemy aliens. We do not want any Germans, Austrians, Turks, in this country until they are so changed in their ideals that they will be able to look at things as we do, until they reach such a stage of mental development that they will make decent and respectable citizens of this country, that is, if such a thing ever comes to pass. I notice that practically all the other Allied countries are deporting enemy aliens as fast as they can. China has despatched several boatloads of them. They are being deported from Belgium, France, England. Canada seems to be rather slow in getting rid of her share. I agree with the previous speakers who have said that we should send the alien enemies out of Canada as soon as possible. If it is necessary and advisable to do that, surely we do not want to bring into Canada other people of the same class.

The third class of people that we should keep out of Canada is the Bolsheviks. We do not want them in this country. After hearing the splendid exposition made by the president of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) of the doctrines of the cult of Bolshevism, I think we will all agree that we do not want any Bolsheviks in this country.

There is a fourth class that we must keep out of Canada, and which is pretty nearly as bad. I refer to the I. W. W's., and included in that class are the labour agitators. I can speak from information which has been given to me as to conditions in British Columbia. During the last year, hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of damage has been done by the I. W. W's. in British Columbia.

Their doctrine is to destroy everything that is of value. They destroy timber by starting fires in the forests, reservoirs by blowing up the dams, machinery by letting the water out of boilers, and all that kind of thing. They destroy anything and everything, and during last year they have certainly destroyed a whole lot in British Columbia. I do not know what destruction they have been guilty of in other parts of Canada, but certainly we do not want these men in this country, no matter how much money they have. I class with the I. W. W. the professional agitator. He is the cause of all the trouble in labour circles at the present time. If you go back far enough you will find that every strike in Canada during the last few years was caused by two or three or half-a-dozen agitators. We should not let men of this sort come into the country, and we should drive out those already here. I agree with the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) that we need population in this country, but we want population of the right kind, and our immigration officials should be very careful as to the class of immigrant they admit. It is better to get along with our present population rather than have it increased by any of the classes to whom I have referred.

I wish to say a word on behalf of the returned soldier. I am afraid there is a tendency already in this country to forget what the returned soldier has done for us. I have heard it said that he is asking for too much, that he is unreasonable. I do not believe it. I do not believe that the men who had the interests of this country and of the civilized world sufficiently at heart to go over there and offer up their lives, if necessary, would make unreasonable demands on the people and resources of this country on their return home. All the returned soldier wants is a square deal, and he is certainly entitled to that. We should not forget his wonderful record in this war, and the great changes that have been brought about during the last four years by his fighting for us. Great monarchs, like the German Emperor and the Czar of Russia, have lost their thrones and their governments are being reorganized. Other crowned heads have fallen, and the map of Europe, of Asia, Africa and other places is being made anew. Nowadays we talk of millions and billions without winking an eyelash and I think it is about time we changed our ideas of what should be done for the returned soldier. Never in the history of any country has the returned soldier got a square deal or been treated as he deserves. I am glad to see that the Government will bring down legislation on behalf of the returned soldier, in the way of increased pensions, for instance. I hope this Parliament will do a whole lot for the returned soldier. We certainly cannot do too much for him.

Mr. Speaker, you have borne with me very patiently. I trust that my remarks will bear fruit and that this Parliament will evolve means to solve the serious problems that now confront us.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, one day in the British House of Commons after the Rt. Hon. Walter Long had been speaking for three hours, Mr. Balfour's desk-mate whispered to him, "When is he going to finish?" Mr. Balfour answered, "He has finished long ago, but does not know how to stop." Without wishing to be discourteous to my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) I must say that I was reminded of that incident in the British House while he was speaking.

Mr. Speaker, the second session of the thirteenth Parliament of Canada opened under very remarkable circumstances—circumstances which all those then present will never forget as a blending of joy and grief, of hope and distress. Joy, at the news that the monster of war that had been threatening humanity for four years had finally been vanquished and overthrown. Grief, at the death of the most prominent member of this House. Hope, that the treaty of peace would free humanity forever from sanguinary contests. Distress, at the thought that the voice of the premier representative of Canadian statesmanship and patriotism would never again be heard in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I should be unworthy of the solicitude and kindness which the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier always showered upon me if my first utterance this afternoon were not a word of respect and admiration for the memory of one who, though dead, yet lives and will always live in the heart of every true Canadian. Sir, the achievements of his illustrious career have already been eloquently referred to by the church, the state, and the press. His wisdom, his brilliance, his loftiness as a statesman, his magnanimity, his magnetism and eloquence, indeed, the entire devotion of his life, from his first public utterance in the early sixties, up to a few weeks before his death, to the interests of peace, fraternity, and unity of creeds and races in this country will fill the noblest and brightest pages of Canadian history. But, Sir, he will especially be remembered and cherished on account of his kindness of heart and his generous courtesy even to the most humble. "I am glad Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not die while he was Premier of Canada," was the remark I overheard at the funeral of the great statesman. This remark was made by a modest, unknown citizen. "Why?" I venture to ask. "Well, sir," he said, "if Sir Wilfrid Laurier had died while he was Premier this tribute of admiration, and all the expressions of sympathy which have been made in regard to him from every part of Canada, would probably have been attributed to his high position in the state. But look at these enormous crowds lining the streets of the Capital and bearing visible signs of grief, people from every part of the country; they are not lamenting the death of a premier, they are mourning the sudden and final cessation of a heart whose every throb was alive for his country and his people."

The impressive ceremony could not fail to remind me of Tennyson's immortal words:—

The dark crowd moves and there are sobs and tears,
The black earth yawns, the mortal disappears
Ashes to ashes, dust to dust,
He is gone who seemed so great.
Gone, but nothing can bereave him
Of the Force he made his own
Being here, and we believe him
Something far advanced in State,
And that he wears a truer Crown
Than any wreath that man can weave him.
Speak no more of his renown;
Lay your earthly fancies down,
And in his peaceful rest leave him.
God accept him, Christ receive him.

Mr. Speaker, I heartily join in the congratulations which have been showered on the mover and the seconder of the Address, in such profusion that it would have made the hon. members blush with confusion had they not been accustomed to more severe bombardments, and although I believe that the honour conferred upon them had the effect of making them rather eulogistic of the Government, their effort on the whole was very creditable.

I may, however, express regret at the fact that the well established custom of having the seconder's speech delivered in French was departed from in this instance. This departure is surely not an indication of progress towards racial unity in Canada. The official excuse given was that the Government, having exhausted last year their French-speaking talent in the person of the hon. junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot) were not in a position to follow the custom. Now, I think that this action on the part of the Government is an emphatic and uncalled for ejectment from the Unionist party of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Mackie), who speaks French very fluently, and, I may add, eloquently, and who, as the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) has said, could not possibly have mutilated the beautiful language of Molière and Racine. Be that as it may, I concur entirely in the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address and other hon. gentlemen who have spoken, in their plea for a better understanding between the races and creeds in Canada.

I have carefully preserved all the printed references which have been made to our late departed chief by hon. members of the House and by the press, and have pasted them in a scrap book, already containing articles emanating from the same gentlemen, and the same press during the campaign of 1917. It will be an edifying and instructive page of history for my son to read when he shall have attained the age of fifteen.

Mr. Speaker, the first part of the speech from the Throne I cannot but concur in, that is the expression of relief at the cessation of hostilities, and the victory of the Allies. The happiness which our brave boys will bring back with them will be marred only by the memory of those who will never return, and who are now sleeping their last sleep in the blood-stained fields of France and Flanders. This victory is not a victory of one of the Allies, but of all the Allies. Little Belgium held the enemy for a few weeks at a tremendous sacrifice. France, by the indomitable courage of her troops and the genius of her generals, held the foe until relief could be sent. The British Empire, with her watchdogs of the sea and her army always increasing, stopped the invader. Italy, buckled up Austria, and our neighbours to the south, although arriving late, delivered a crushing blow. Mr. Speaker, when the history of this war is written, it will be shown that it was not a victory of any one of the Allies, but that the victory could not have been achieved without the co-operation of each and all of them.

But, thank God, this butchery is over, and we read in the speech from the Throne that, prior to the armistice, plans had been made for the return, demobilization and re-establishment in civil life after the close of the war of our soldiers and their dependents overseas. I am not thoroughly acquainted with the work of the department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, but it seems to me that the word " prior " at the beginning of this item is not very accurate in reference to the resignation of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) and the official cause of his withdrawal. The news of the conditions, and the riots at Kinmel Camp, seems to confirm our belief that the chairman of the Repatriation Committee was perfectly right when, in the first part of his speech, he repeated three times that the armistice took him by surprise. I am informed from a reliable source that the conditions at the camps are intolerable. A returned man of the 42nd, who enlisted in 1914, arrived at the camp on the 27th December last and stayed there a month. Nearly all the men at this camp are invalids and have been wounded. The officers in charge force them to work and assign them to all kinds of hard and dirty jobs. The officers do not take into account the length of service of a man when the question of return comes up and many men who have been in Europe for a few months are returned before those who had been fighting in France since the beginning of the war. The men are only told a few hours before their departure. The returned man who gave this information started from the camp at 12 p.m. He had to walk five miles to the station. No care was taken of the crippled, the wounded, the sick or the invalided. The officer ordered these men to take their kits on their backs and it took them two hours to reach their destination. Some of the men were totally exhausted. These men, I am informed, had asked for motors, or carriages, for their transportation and they were refused.

I heard from another man who enlisted as a private in 1914, and who arrived a few days ago. He had been over there since the beginning. He was promoted to a lieutenancy on the battlefield and he had been wounded three times and invalided. He was booked to return at the beginning of January last. He prepared himself to come back, but he was notified on the eve of his departure that an officer who had only been in London for three months attending pink teas, was taking his place and the wounded and invalided man had to wait another month.

In a beautiful booklet artistically printed by the minister and distributed by the Repatriation Committee, we are told that since the armistice the men have been classified in order to their better civil re-establishment. Since the armistice? Why, Mr. Speaker, this work had been done for the soldiers of France, England and the United States months prior to the armistice. This situation is a disgrace to this country and shows an incompetency on the part of the department and of the authorities in charge which cannot be too strongly criticised and denounced.

There are many other items in the speech from the Throne which will need our careful consideration. Amongst them is the question of prohibition. I am not prepared to give my view of this legislation before it is brought down in a more concrete form, but I wish to warn the Government of one thing. If it is their intention to have total prohibition, I hope the measure which they will introduce will not be a law of exemption like the Ontario Temperance Act. The remark made the other day in this House by my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), that in Ontario men are not valued by the amount of wealth they have but by the amount of liquor they possess is perfectly true. A few months ago I happened to spend a week in Toronto one Sunday and I asked to be shown the beautiful residences of the city. The taxi driver, when I inquired of him who was living in such-and-such a beautiful place, told me: This is Mr. So-and-So; he has $50,000 worth of liquor in his cellar.

Sir, some of my hon. friends were surprised the other day at the threatening menace of Bolshevism in this country. No wonder, with such measures as the Ontario Temperance Act. Why should the man of wealth, the profiteer, be allowed to gather regular warehouses of liquor and drink as much as he likes, while the working man of modest means, not being able to mobilize his meagre capital, will be sent to jail if he dares attempt to indulge in the very limited consumption of a glass of beer with his meals? Is it fair for the returned man to hear when he comes back, that while he was fighting overseas, those for whom he was risking his life were "stocking up," and at the same time framing and passing a law to restrict his liberty and deprive him of legitimate enjoyment? There are, Mr. Speaker, sincere and deserving people preaching prohibition, deserving apostles of prohibition, and I entertain a most profound respect for them; but there are also hypocrites, and I want to know where they are. If total prohibition is passed, let us clean the cellars, let us publish a list of all those who have liquor in their houses, or, if my suggestion is better, let us pass a law—

An hon. MEMBER: An Order in Council.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Or an Order in Council which will force the hypocrites to wear a badge or a button, with a yellow star for every case of liquor they possess; then, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that some of the most vituperous prohibitionists will look like Indians. Mr. Speaker, prohibition—I mean total prohibition—does not seem to be very popular nowadays. Let me read you a few extracts from this week's issue of the Toronto Saturday Night. I quote:

> Out in Alberta the Stewart Government has, in utter desperation, abolished the Commission created to enforce the Prohibition Act, and has "passed the buck" to the Hon. John Boyle, Attorney-General. In turn the Attorney-General also takes a pessimistic view of the situation. For instance, in a speech on the floor of the Legislature the other day, he remarked that out of the 100,000 estimated male adults of the province 60,000 of them were guilty of some infringement of the Liquor Act during 1918. That the violation of the Liquor Act in British Columbia is the chief form of popular amusement in that province is too well known to require further comment, other than to remark that it is estimated by British Columbians of unquestioned standing that fully eighty-five per cent of the male adults in that neck of the woods have in some form or other broken the prohibition enactments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Now let us come to a province geographically nearer to us. The paper says:

> In centres like Toronto we were promised that when prohibition was in force crime would decrease until there would actually be no use for jails or police. What has been the result? According to the annual report of Chief of Police Grasset, of Toronto, 25,714 persons were apprehended for crime in the year 1917, as compared with 28,206 in 1918, an increase of 2,492 for "dry" 1918. The Chief goes on to state the obvious: "There is no reason to believe that the morals of the people are improving."
> Among the members of the Ontario House there are gloomy forebodings. When prohibition is mentioned a chill runs up and down the spines of the members, and more particularly Government members. They are all wondering how the prohibition cat is going to jump. They look back to the half score by-elections and their pedal extremities seem colder than the mild winter warrants. In a word, they are in a "blue funk." The other day Colonel H. A. Machin, who sits as Conservative member of Kenora, had his first opportunity since returning from overseas, to express views on the subject. In speaking of the growth of Phariseeism in Ontario, the gallant Colonel referred to the "sin hound" who spent his time trailing people who wanted to live their own lives in their own way, and he reminded his hearers that Canadians had gone "over there" he among them, to fight for democracy and human liberty, and they came back to find their own liberty as British subjects taken away from them. The Colonel made it clear that he did not wish the return of the bar, but he did believe that the present wave of fanatical Puritanism had led the Government into taking unwarranted steps, and in so doing had trampled underfoot the rights of the individual.

I would say furthermore, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to have total prohibition, let us have machinery that will enforce the law, so that dynamite whiskey—to use some expressions from the West—squirrel gin, or rot gut, sold in blind pigs will not ruin the health of those who are not millionaires or profiteers.

I was astonished, Mr. Speaker, upon reading the speech from the Throne, to find that it contained not one line about the high cost of living. After a few moments' reflection, however, I found out the reason. I discovered again the hidden hand of the masters of this Government, the profiteers, who will not permit any attempt at the deflation of the cost of the necessities of life. The Labour Gazette of last month shows no relief in the matter of the price of these necessities—meat, eggs, milk, etc. And, Sir, the profit on these things goes not to the producer or to the farmer, but to the food king.

Perhaps the House will be interested to know the profits of the milling companies for 1917—and I am told that those for 1918 are even higher. The Ogilvie Flour Mills in 1913 made $470,000 in profits, and in 1917, $2,100,000. Their reserve fund in 1913 was $473,000; it is now $2,690,000. Up to 1916 their dividend had been 8 per cent; in 1916 it was 12 per cent, and in 1917, during the war, when everybody was told to be economical, it was 26 per cent, war taxes paid.

The Lake of the Woods Milling Company made $385,000 in profits in 1913 and $700,000 in 1917. In 1913 the dividend was 10.7 per cent; in 1916, 14 per cent, and in 1917, 18 per cent. Although the company redeemed $800,000 of bonds from 1913 to 1917, its actual reserve fund is now a million dollars more than it was in 1913.

The Maple Leaf Milling Company made $241,844 in profits in 1914 and $1,763,000 in 1917. After deducting $1,000,000 a year for depreciation, it still had $1,100,000 by way of net profits in 1917.

The Western Canada Flour Mills paid a war tax of $35,000 in 1917, but this did not prevent their profits, which were $445,000 in 1913, from climbing to $840,000 in 1917, to say nothing of an important amount paid up to their sinking fund.

Other milling companies of less importance made a brilliant showing. For instance, one of these which had a deficit of $62,000 in 1913 had a surplus of $138,000 in 1917. The result is that we have to pay an exorbitant price for bread, 7½ to 8½ cents a pound. Mr. Speaker, I could go on giving you figures on the same scale in respect to practically every necessity of life

Mr. NICKLE: Were the increased profits of the millers the result of an increased turnover or an increase in the profit per barrel on flour?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am not prepared to answer my hon. friend now, but I will tell him this: When the people are paying more and more for bread and the millers are making more excessive profits every day, something is wrong somewhere. That is common sense.

Our food control is a joke. We have another very artistic booklet. The Government is evidently in the printing business for good, and is flourishing at it, as you have noticed by the report of the commission appointed to inquire into conditions at the Printing Bureau and the present strike of employees in that institution. What do we find in this booklet? We find that the revenue derived from food licenses was $531,719 last year, and that it cost the people of Canada $491,000 to collect that amount. Is that good business, Mr. Speaker. Is that good management? No wonder the speech from the Throne did not touch this question. Imagine what the returned hero, who for four years has been risking his life at the front, will say when he finds his wife driven to despair and his children starving on account of the prohibitive prices of foodstuffs.

Another omission from the speech from the Throne was any reference to a matter which recently was of but minor importance, but which last year, through the action of the Prime Minister of Canada, developed into a matter of great importance. I refer to the question of titles. I was surprised that there was no mention of that subject in the speech from the Throne. You will remember, Sir, that last year, when the House was practically unanimous on this question, the Prime Minister came into the House armed with his whip and threatened to resign if the members on your right did not swallow all they had said and vote against their opinions. The Prime Minister gave as his principal reason for his action at that time, if I remember well, the fact that His Majesty's Government had asked that the proposal be stayed until the holding of the Imperial Conference, when the matter would be settled. He intimated that the action of the Conference would be recorded before the next session, and that in the meantime no titles would be granted. The member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) stuck to his guns and to his honour. The member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan), and the member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden) gave their support to the Government on the express condition that the matter would be discussed at the Imperial Conference and that in the meantime no titles should be granted. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) wanted to withdraw his motion, and when he could not withdraw it, on account of the objection of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe), he declined to support the amendment he himself proposed. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) did the aeroplane act and flew out of the room. The crack of the lashes of the Prime Minister's whip is still ringing in my ears, and I still see the hon. members crouching before their master. What happened, what was done at the conference? The speech from the Throne should have enlightened us on this subject, but it does not, and I am therefore not in a position to know what was done. But what I know, and what every hon. member knows, is that a few weeks after this slavish incident, contrary to the solemn promise of the Prime Minister, titles were conferred on three persons, one of them being the Minister of Trade and Commerce who must have known what was coming to him when he defended the titles a few days before with a voice trembling with pathos and tears.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who were the others?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If I am correctly informed, one of them was the brother of the Prime Minister and the other was the Clerk of the Senate, formerly, private secretary of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MURPHY: Then there was a gentleman from London.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: A question closely connected with the high cost of living is the labour question to which the speech from the Throne makes no reference. Is it possible that the Government is so blind that it does not see the tidal wave of labour unrest and legitimate revindications threatening to invade and flood our political and social institutions? Is it the intention of the Government to wait until these institutions are swamped without hope of rescue, before they wake up to realities and shake off their criminal indolence? Is it not time that the barons of finance, the industrial and railroad kings should not be given the powerful liberty of imposing upon the country their political wishes and of exercising on Canada an arrogant and unjustified dictatorship? In these times of the rejuvenation of the world, the workingman is no longer satisfied to be the material instrument producing wealth for the profiteers, without receiving any share of the comforts of life for himself and his family. Unless the workingman has confidence in his employer and is given for his own protection and welfare, a reasonable control in the management of industries, we are bound to see this peaceful country become the prey of dangerous agitators. In England, the Government has decided to apply the Whiteley system of giving the workingman a share in the management of Government workshops and yards. I hope this Government will see fit to adopt a similar measure and at the same time to provide old age pensions for the workingman.

Of all the speeches made by hon. members on your right, Mr. Speaker, the one which impressed me most was the eloquent address of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder). But after it was all over, I tried to relate to a friend of mine what the minister had said, and although my memory is fair, all that I could remember when the noise had ceased, and the western tornado had passed, was, first, that hostilities had ceased very suddenly; secondly, that hostilities had ceased much sooner than had been expected; thirdly, that the end of the war came suddenly, and fourthly, that he was still a Liberal; that no person could make him anything else, and that no one could drive him out of the Liberal party. Not relying upon my memory, I waited until the next day and on reading his speech in Hansard, I found that my remembrance was right.

As to the first three points, unpreparedness, unpreparedness and unpreparedness I would respectfully suggest to the Acting Prime Minister that a new department be created and called the Department of "Lack of Foresight" with the Minister of Immigration at the head of it, As to the fourth point, the minister seemed to be the porte-parole and premier exponent of a certain number of hon. members on the other side, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) included. I wish to ask a few questions of the minister, and I am very glad to see him now in his seat. I do not insist that he should reply immediately to my questions; but I wish he would spend just a few minutes of his valuable time on them, and see if the answers to these questions are quite satisfactory to his political conscience. First of all, what is Liberalism? Is it an association composed of members who are at liberty to belong to it when they wish, who can join when they want to, who can be expelled from it, no matter what their ideals or principles are; or is it a creed, a faith, a group of fundamental principles? Is it not repugnant to reason and to the teachings of political history that no matter what are his principles, his ideals, nay, his company, a man can always call himself a Liberal and be an adept exponent of Liberalism. I quite agree with the hon. Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder)—I was almost going to say the Minister of Unpreparedness—that no one has the authority to rule him out of the Liberal party. He has a perfect right to call himself a disciple of Liberalism as long as he wishes, but I submit that his assertion, in order not to be in conflict with the truth, must be supported by his principles, by his ideals, and by his company. I refer, of course, to his political principles and ideals. Let us see whether his principles and ideals are those of Liberalism. What is Liberalism? I have read somewhere that Liberalism is, in essence, the problem of realizing liberty. It seeks the setting free of the mass of the people in regard to self-government, trade, religion, education, and industry in all the manifold ramifications of society. The opposite to Liberalism is restriction, and means the centralization of government in the governing classes, the setting of the brakes on social progress and liberty. The aim of Liberalism is the common good: the aim of those opposed to Liberalism is the individual good. Gladstone said that the principle of Liberalism is, "Trust in the people, qualified by prudence." The principle of Unionism is mistrust of the people, qualified by fear. Mr. Asquith has said that "Liberalism is a living faith, a spirit, an attitude of mind, a form of political temperament and genius, a temperament, which, whenever it sees a wrong, would redress it absolutely, and wherever it discerns a cause for grievance anywhere would pluck that cause out by the roots." In three words I will give you, Mr. Speaker, my own conception of Liberalism: Masses versus Classes.

Now that we know what Liberalism is, let us see if the hon. Minister of Immigration has lived up to Liberalism. As a minister in the Unionist Cabinet, he is responsible constitutionally for all the acts of the Government, and constitutionally again, if he wishes to relieve himself of this responsibility his only course is to resign. Not having done so,—and there are no signs that he intends doing so—I logically surmise that all the measures of the Government have his approval.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to put my questions. Is the voting against a measure abolishing titles in Canada included in the Liberal doctrine? Will my hon. friend pretend that the War-Time Elections Act, breaking faith with thousands of citizens and dragging the honour of Canada and its fair name in the mud, is a Liberal measure? Is it the opinion of the minister that the Military Voters' Act, especially in view of the purpose for which it was used in the last election, is imbued with pure Liberalism? Was not the campaign of racial and religious prejudice carried out by the Government to which the hon. gentleman sticks like a leech anything but Liberalism? Is the consolidation of the financial ring of Toronto, erstwhile denounced by my hon. friend, an action that he could call Liberal? Is the companionship of food profiteers and the benevolent paternalism of bacon earls fit for any one who still calls himself a Liberal? Are the instructions to the military officers to disregard the orders of the established courts in accordance with Liberal principles? Is the exemption of Victory bonds from taxation, which is nothing less than a camouflage enactment to protect those who have enriched themselves during the war from paying income tax, a Liberal measure? Can my hon. friend state, without wincing, that the censorship of the press and the gagging of independent opinion is pure Liberalism? Is not the censorship on publications, which goes so far as to make it a criminal offence for any one to have in his possession Plato's Republic, anything but Liberal? Is the wholesale buying of the press of this country for political purposes a Liberal measure? Is the incompetency and indifference to the welfare of the masses, as evidenced by the present high cost of living with no relief in sight, true Liberalism? Is my hon. friend aware that Liberalism stands for a just share by the working man in the profits of industry? Does my hon. friend believe that militarism in its most truly Prussian form can be regarded as an offspring of democracy? Will my hon. friend dare to contend that the forcible sending of men to Siberia without authorization of Parliament is in accordance with Liberal ideals? I should also like to know whether it was a Liberal sentiment which prevented representatives of the people from being called into counsel during the most momentous nine months in our history?

Does the flagrant abuse of the War Measures Act, passed at a very critical time, appeal to the Liberalism of my hon. friend? Is the Government of the people by Orders in Council, even when Parliament is sitting, considered by my hon. friend a Liberal measure? Did my hon. friend ever consider that the passing of Orders in Council, with retroactive effect, is in direct violation of the liberty of the citizen? Can the hon. minister contend that the operation of the War Measures Act, three months after the war is over, to liquidate a railway company, is up to Liberal standards?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (resuming): Mr. Speaker, before recess I was in the middle of an argument regarding the Liberalism of the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization and that section of the Government who hold his views and still believe that they can logically call themselves Liberals, and remain on your right. I had, to the best of my ability, given to the House my opinion of Liberalism, and the definitions of such men as Gladstone and Asquith. I then proceeded to put certain questions to the minister, and I had a few left when six o'clock arrived. I now beg leave to proceed with them. Did my hon. friend ever consider that the passing of Orders in Council with retroactive effect is an entire violation of the liberty of the citizen? Can the minister contend that the use of the War Measures Act, three months after the war is over, to put a railway in liquidation is up to the Liberal standard? Is my hon. friend of the opinion that the handing on a plate of a parliamentary seat to a friend of the Government, distrusting at the same time the judicial authority of the Supreme Court of Canada, an action derived from the best examples of Liberalism? Does the minister believe that secret Orders in Council are not against Liberal doctrine? Well, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand an extra of the Official Gazette of 7th February last, in which nine Orders in Council passed at different dates, one as far back as the 28th September, 1917, are published for the first time—seventeen months after they were passed. To prove my assertion I will cite pages 24 and 25 of the Canada Gazette of 7th February last. The introductory passage says:

> The nine following Orders in Council were first published in the Extra of the Canada Gazette dated the 7th February, 1919.

The first Order in Council is dated 28th September, 1917; the second, 4th October, 1917; the third, 24th December, 1917; and the next, 8th day of January, 1918. But, listen to this. The next one is dated Wednesday, 1st May, 1918. Government by Order in Council is bad. It is contrary to constitutional Government and must only be resorted to with prudence and in cases of extreme urgency. But government by secret Order in Council is surely the limit of autocracy. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is not the limit to the Kaiserism and Czarism of the present Government. There is one of these Orders in Council passed 1st May, 1918, and published for the first time on 7th February, 1919, to which I especially wish to direct the attention of the House. It contains the following enactment:

> Any person who makes default in the performance of a duty imposed upon him by this paragraph shall be liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for three months with hard labour or to a fine of $100 or to both.

The fact that a man might be sent to prison for not obeying a regulation adopted in secret by the Government and never made known, even to the limited class that reads the Canada Gazette line upon line, shows to what lengths governments may go when allowed to be, as the present Government were, more or less, a law unto themselves. Surely the Liberalism of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization is the Liberalism of the Middle Ages when men were sent to dungeons by lettres de cachet at the will of the autocrat. His ultra Liberalism leads him to pass a law creating an offence punishable with imprisonment at hard labour and enabling him to jail a citizen for an offence that he could not possibly have committed. If my hon. friend has the ability, or the elasticity of political conscience to reconcile such measures with Liberal principles he will have well deserved the surname which was given to him of being "the Bob Rogers of the new Administration."

It is useless for me to take up any more of the time of this House in order to show that the company that my hon. friend is keeping is only, as my revered departed chief said last year, Toryism with a little veneer. However, I submit that the only way in which the Minister of Immigration and Colonization can make good his claim that he is still a Liberal is by answering the questions that I have put to him. If his answers satisfy the Liberal party, I will say no more, I shall be satisfied; but if the hon. gentleman's answers should not satisfy the Liberal party then how will he stand with the Unionist party at whose christening he is understood to be anxious to officiate? It is not for me to answer that question, but I have no doubt that his Unionist colleagues would like to hear from the hon. gentleman a full report about his visit to Quebec a short time ago, as to whom he met and what was discussed. Lastly, when the hon. gentleman has studied all these questions, will he not say that he is trying to clothe himself in the livery of Heaven to serve the devil?

Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) made a statement last night against which I desire to register my most vigorous protest. After indulging in a remarkable eulogy of France he spoiled his tribute of respect by saying that last year France was ready to quit. Sir, France has never quit; France cannot quit; France cannot die because she is immortal. My hon. friend cannot point to one incident in the whole history of France in which she did not finish what she had started. She did not even quit in 1870, when she was left alone and defenceless to fight the Prussian invasion; and if last year France made some remonstrances it was because some public men amongst her Allies were not willing to adopt the only policy which enabled us to beat the Hun —unity of command. My hon. friend from Springfield also seems to be a very ardent supporter of the Government, and although he has painted a most vivid and pathetic picture of the battlefields of France—for which he has my entire endorsation—the cause of his admiration and devotion to this Government may not be strange to the treatment which he received over there. I wish my education in English would allow me to introduce into my description of the feasts he attended, the slangy expressions and phraseology with which he has decorated his address; but not having had the opportunity that the hon. gentleman had of associating with the distinguished people using these expressions, I am only going to give the House a report of one incident which happened while my hon. friend was attending one of the many banquets tendered to him while in England. I am quoting now from a British paper:

> R. L. Richardson, M.P., is extremely fond of grapes. He attended a Guildhall banquet recently as a member of that expedition of Canadian editors which has been irreverently termed "Beaverbrook's printers' picnic," and being seated immediately in front of a huge fruit-basket filled with the luscious hot-house product, he proceeded to gratify his cravings with the same nonchalance as if he were in Canada. Famished Englishmen who noted his fine work estimate that at the current price (about 7 cents a grape), the Editor of the Winnipeg Tribune put away some eleven dollars' worth.

Mr. Speaker, while listening to my hon. friend Tuesday night, and hearing him state that he never believed in the sincerity of the Liberal party regarding the tariff I could not but call to memory the Macdonald election, when the hon. gentleman told the electors of that constituency the unmistakable faith he had in the Liberal party on tariff matters—that was in 1912, was it not?—and his unequivocal belief in the insincerity of the Premier of Canada, and I could not do otherwise than recall the banquet where, like Noah of old, he showed a propensity for the product of the vine, and my natural conclusion was that the eleven dollars' worth of grapes which he introduced into his anatomy some months ago have fermented and produced the spirit of affection which he displayed for the Government on Tuesday night.

I am coming now, Mr. Speaker, to a much graver question. Of course the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) had to have his usual attack on Quebec, otherwise he would have been censured at the next meeting of his lodge, as the hon. member for Toronto was last year. But I submit, Sir, with all due respect to the brethren, that the hon. member for Frontenac was not particularly happy or convincing in his argument. The hon. member gave us some figures about the number of men who joined the Expeditionary Force from the different provinces, and although he has not indicated the source of his figures, or whether they are official or not, I have no doubt he acted in good faith when he gave them. But, even supposing, for the sake of argument, that the hon. gentleman's figures were correct, I cannot agree with his conclusion. As the basis of his argument to indicate the number of men who enlisted from different counties of the province of Quebec, he took the official return of the elections in 1917, showing how many soldiers voted in each constituency. He said, for instance, that in the constituency of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) only fifteen soldiers polled votes and he concludes that only fifteen soldiers left that constituency. Sir, after the debate on the military votes last session no one can seriously contend that the return of such votes can constitute a sound basis to determine the number of soldiers who enlisted in each constituency in the Dominion. The votes of the soldiers were placed at will by the "democratic" agents of this "democratic" Government in the constituencies where they would be most useful. This, Sir, was proved beyond a doubt, and was even openly admitted at the judicial inquiry at St. Johns into the military vote, where soldiers and officers did not conceal the fact that their purpose was to vote, not in the constituencies where they came from but in the constituencies where their votes would be most useful to the Union Government. The member for Kamouraska informs me that a great number of the military electors of his constituency were forced to poll their votes in the constituency of Cumberland, N.S. May I digress a moment to request the Government not to forget, when they carry out their housing scheme, to provide homes for the six hundred odd officers and men of the Engineer Training Depot at St. Johns who swore that they had no residence in Canada.

As to the other figures given by the member for Frontenac, although I believe in his good faith I am inclined to think that his elaborate calculation about the number of men who should have enlisted in proportion to the population is utterly unfair. Let me remind him and the House, Mr. Speaker, first, that the number of persons engaged in agriculture in Quebec is much larger in proportion to the population than it is in Ontario; second, that the male population under eighteen is about five times as numerous in Quebec in proportion to population as in Ontario or in the other English-speaking provinces; third, that the number of married men in Quebec between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five is about five times as great in proportion to population as in Ontario and in the other provinces; fourth, that the British-born in the English provinces are about twenty times more numerous than they are in the province of Quebec.

Another basic element in connection with this matter which, I believe, has not been discussed in the House, was brought to my attention by an article published in Toronto Saturday Night. I was surprised to read such an article, and before I communicate it to the House, in order that my sentiments shall not be distorted, I wish to state that I have the utmost admiration and respect for the men who went overseas and who made sacrifices in so doing. Nothing is too good for them and their dependents in this country, and the Government should provide with the utmost care and diligence for their welfare and civil re-establishment. Having made these preliminary remarks, let me read the article to which I refer:

> You have seen what a real hero looks like. Thank Heaven he is plentiful enough to be recognized! Now take a squint at the other sort. Here he comes down the street. Observe him closely, for he is a type, and in his own person sums up all the charges that can be made against the wrong kind of returned hero.

> Before the war he was one of our "unassimilated population." He worked in spots, and the spots were not many. He never liked work here or anywhere else, then or now. He never had a job that demanded more than a twelve-year-old boy's intelligence, but now that he has come back he wants a clerical job, "no manual labour" if you please, and a gentleman's salary. He has become one of the leisured class, and fancies no labour harder than lifting his envelope once a week, or once a month, or whatever the term of loafing may be. His idea is to live on the Government, which will make a job for him even when there is no job and he isn't fit for it anyway.
> The chances are that he is not a hero at all, that he never got farther than Shorncliffe, that he was an unfit or a bad 'un and was sent home for cause. But take him at his own value and give him the once-over. Cap on the back of his head, no shave, tunic unbuttoned, belt missing, trousers rumpled, shoes dirty—looks as if he had slept in the back-yard of a livery stable all night. He went to the war to get a "trip 'ome," and now that he is back without having seen anything of the war nearer than Folkestone, he brings a grouch with him.

Sir, this article gives me another reason why the figures of the member for Frontenac are not sound. It is this: In Quebec we have not the type described in Toronto Saturday Night. In Quebec, every French Canadian who left made a sacrifice. In Quebec, not a French Canadian left to make a "trip home;" his only home is Canada. In Quebec, every French Canadian who went overseas left behind him dear relatives, often feeble and poor. In Quebec, not one French Canadian who left could be classed as one of our "unassimilated population." I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Frontenac has given this opportunity of finding why the enlistments in some provinces were large while in Quebec they were not. I repeat that I would not have discussed this matter again had not the member for Frontenac resorted to his bad habit of attacking Quebec every time he addresses this House. Let us hope that he has done so for the last time.

Sir, the union, harmony and fraternity between the two greatest races in the world, the French and the British, have been cemented forever on the battlefields of Europe, and I cannot find a more appropriate way of ending my remarks than by repeating the words which were uttered in this House by my revered and departed leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, during the Boer War. He said:

> Men representing both elements of the Canadian family have been fighting shoulder to shoulder for the same cause and under the same flag.
> Some of them have made the supreme sacrifice, their bodies rest in the same grave, in a fraternal clasp, until the end of time; are we not allowed to hope, and this will be my last word, that in this grave will be buried forever the last remnants of our strifes and differences.

Mr. SAUL BONNELL (East Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words this evening, and while I have not trespassed upon the time of the House before, I shall make my remarks very brief, because this debate is drawing to a close, and I am sure the members and the public in general are not anxious to hear a rehash of all the arguments which have been put forward. At the outset, I wish to offer my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address and to add my congratulations and approval to their efforts, which are especially pleasing to me because they are both men who have served their King and country overseas. It is a matter of special gratification to me because the seconder of the Address is a member of my own profession.

We, in Canada, I am sure, all rejoice in the grand and glorious termination of the war. We are proud of the part that Canada has taken and played in this titanic struggle. We are also proud of the imperishable fame which our Canadian boys have brought to Canada.

We are now face to face with the problem of getting some three or four hundred thousand men re-established in civil life. This is not an easy task, and the country has this and many other problems of great importance to deal with. Let us consider, for a moment, what this means. During the past four years, our whole machinery has been untilized towards the developing of a fighting programme. We are now bound to bring ourselves back once more to conditions of peace. The man who has been in the army for one, two, three or four years, has had some one to think and provide for him. He did not have to worry where his next meal or his next suit of clothes was coming from. Everything was provided for him, even medical attendance in case of sickness or accident. When he returns, he will be thrown on his own resources and will have to provide all these necessities for himself. In many cases he is not the same man as he was when he left our shores. He has many times gazed into the jaws of death, and it is not to be expected that he should be the same man mentally and physically as he was when he went away. I want right here to sound a warning to employers of labour on this man's behalf. Since coming back to Canada I have, in connection with medical boards, come in contact with these men appearing for medical examination with regard to pensions. I have, as a medical man, observed that these men are not the same mentally or physically as when they went away. I have watched them come back and get employment in Canada. I have watched them try one job after another, become dissatisfied with one job, throw it up and try something else. Many of them are not able to give one hundred per cent of service. All I ask for them is that the employer shall be a little patient with the returned soldier and in a short time he will be as good as he was when he left.

I am sure the Government is to be congratulated on the energetic manner in which they are dealing with these problems which are new and with which no country has had to deal with before. The huge programme of expenditure which the Government have in view will go far towards providing employment for all, and I was glad to hear the Acting Prime Minister state that in a few months there would be no unemployment in Canada. We must all recognize that we have a duty to perform in this matter, and we must not throw the burden of responsibility from one to another, or as the common phrase seems to be "pass the buck." The Government of this Dominion has a great duty to perform in providing employment for these men. The governments of the different provinces, the municipal authorities, and so on all down the line, must bear their share of the burden. During the past four years public expenditures have been reduced to a minimum. Public works have gone into disrepair. The time has now come when these public works must be put into a proper state of repair and proposed public buildings which have been left in abeyance must be erected. This will take care of a great deal of the excess of labour.

One thing in the speech from the Throne with which I am very much pleased is the statement that the Government have finally decided to constitute a department of public health. I consider this one of the most important pieces of legislation, if not the most important, to be introduced in this House at this session. We take great pride in conserving all our natural resources, but I consider the greatest asset or resource which we possess is our national life. This should be taken care of and fostered, and right at the outset I would say, not that a medical man should be in charge of this department, but that, to get the best results, a medical man must be in charge of this department. The duties of this department would, amongst other things, be to regulate immigration, to protect child labour, to deal with tuberculosis, venereal diseases, contagious and infectious diseases, such as typhoid fever, etc. It seems to me —and I am sure it is a fact—that the country and the people in general do not appreciate the seriousness of the ravages of tuberculosis.

The statistics for 1916, which are the latest I have, show that in that year the deaths from tuberculosis were as follows: Ontario 2,559, or 92 out of every 100,000 people; Quebec 3,327 or 150 out of every 100,000; Saskatchewan 323, or 45 out of every 100,000; British Columbia 413, or 108 out of every 100,000; Nova Scotia 921, or 181 out of every 100,000; Manitoba 484, or 96 out of every 100,000. There probably is no disease which can be cured more readily than tuberculosis if treated in the early stages. During the latter stages, of course, the deaths are practically 100 per cent. When the disease is recognized by medical men in the early stages and the patient put under proper treatment, at least 90 per cent of these cases can be restored to health. This is a matter of vital importance to the people of Canada. In 1916, 8,027 deaths occurred in this Dominion from tuberculosis, and I am sure that if we had proper housing conditions and sanitaria conveniently situated throughout all the provinces where people attacked by the disease could receive proper treatment, the great majority of these people would be living to-day and be an asset to this country. But the trouble now is that we have not sufficient sanitaria to take care of these people, and sometimes the responsibility is shifted from one province to another. A doctor in the East, for instance, will recommend a patient suffering from tuberculosis to go to British Columbia because the climate there may do him good. The patient may arrive in British Columbia in the latter stages of the disease and if the authorities there have not hospital accommodation for that man they may say, "You do not belong to us but to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick; go back there." Now that condition of affairs is not right and I trust that when the Department of Public Health is established it will turn its attention first to this great problem of tuberculosis and inaugurate and encourage the building of sanitaria throughout this Dominion. The sanitaria should be built and supported by the Dominion because the responsibility for the lives of the people of this Dominion rests upon this Government.

I have looked into some of the Government's plans for settling our soldiers on the land, and although in a matter of this kind one is bound to proceed rather slowly I am pleased to see that splendid progress is being made. In the province of British Columbia we have in our valleys land as fertile as can be found in any other place in the world, and thousands of the soldiers who enlisted from that province will take up land and go on the farm. Many thousands also will be attracted from the other provinces by our climate. The province of British Columbia probably offers a brighter prospect for the farmer than any other province in Canada, because the farmer there has a market right at his door. In the year 1917, we imported into the province $20,000,000 of farm and dairy products, and it practically took every dollar of gold, silver, copper, lead and zinc which we mined to feed ourselves. So I am glad that the Government is holding out inducements to the men to go on the land, and I am sure those who settle in British Columbia will meet with every success. One difficulty in British Columbia is the cost of clearing the land, and I would suggest that the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment make provision for additional assistance to men taking up land in that province to help defray the cost of clearing.

I am sure we are all glad the war is over. The wives and the sisters and the mothers of our soldiers are thankful to have their men home once more. We are all proud of our soldiers for the immortal fame they have brought to this country. We trust that the Peace Conference now sitting in Paris will achieve the object for which the war was fought, which was to make it impossible for another war such as this to occur in the future. In 1860, Tennyson looking into the future spoke of aerial combat and the aeroplanes "raining down their ghastly dew," and went on to say that the battle flag would be furled in the Parliament of Man, the federation of the world. May Tennyson's prophecy come true, and may the Peace Conference be successful in its deliberations and bring about a condition where there shall be a Parliament for the World, to which all disputes can be taken and each case decided on its merits.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, if the incertitude and unexpectedness in the trend of human events were still to be proved, the history of the past year would serve to establish them. Less than twelve months ago, on the 18th day of March, the first session of the thirteenth Parliament opened. Shadows of doom and forebodings of evil were then prevailing in our minds; for we lived in anticipation of the dreaded and boastfully heralded German attack on the Western front. Three days after the opening of the session—on March 21st—the attack was launched with an incredible fury such as the world had never before witnessed in warfare. In less than three days the Germans had destroyed the Fifth English Army and had advanced to a depth of more than thirty miles from their starting point. So great was our despair and our peril that, in the confusion of our minds, it seemed to us that the war was already lost. We all know what followed. We know of the prodigious efforts of the Hun, of the masterful strategy of the Allies, and of the ultimate crushing defeat of the enemy. The rapidity of these events, from impending defeat to complete victory, has been one of the happiest surprises of this war, so full of wonders.

The speech from the Throne refers to the successful conclusion of this greatest of all wars, and we are all happy to unite with the Government in devoutly thanking Providence for deliverance from so awful a peril. This session of Parliament, therefore, was summoned under the most favourable auspices. But suddenly, like a thunder bolt on a day of sunshine, a national calamity threw our country into mourning and deep sorrow. I refer to the death of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It had been announced that the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) and the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) would share the honour, on this side of the House, of paying a tribute to Canada's Grand Old Man. I hope I may be pardoned if I, too, following the example of hon. members on both sides of the House, take the liberty of adding my quota of admiration to the memory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I shall not speak of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as a nation-wide, or even as an empire-wide statesman. By so doing I might possibly do him injustice by exaltations which would not adequately describe his virtues. What has been spoken, written, and done throughout Canada since the hour of the death of the master, speaks for itself, and is sufficient to immortalize him. But in the name of the people of my race I wish to deposit one more crown of unwithering laurels upon his grave. Our national poet, Mr. Louis Frechette writing about the great compatriot, Louis Joseph Papineau, says:

Il fut toute une époque, et longtemps notre race
N'eût que sa voix pour glaive et son corps pour cuirasse.

When one ponders the sad event of the past few weeks, these words of the poet seem vividly to apply to our hero. Lover of liberty, defender of the oppressed, he always made himself the champion of the rights of the minority, and unfortunately it so happened that the minority which were so attacked were the people of his own race. The chant of the poet, eminently adapted to Sir Wilfrid Laurier under the present painful circumstances, will forever find its echo in the hearts of the men of his race.

The war is over. Reconstruction has begun; and racial and religious prejudices are vanishing. Generation will follow generation, and history will write the life of Laurier; and when in the years to come pilgrims from all over this country shall travel to the grave of this great man, our children and our children's children, remembering his noble work in the interests of his race, will repeat:

N'eût que sa voix pour glaive et son corps pour cuirasse.

As to hon. members on this side of the House, his disciples, I can find no expression better capable of adequately and justly describing our affliction than this text from the Holy Book: "I will smite the shepherd and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad." The shepherd, Mr. Speaker, has been smitten with an invisible hand, an inevitable hand, and the sheep of the flock, bewildered by the suddenness of the shock, have been scattered abroad with wailing and lamentation. But the flock have assembled anew. They have chosen a new leader, a new shepherd,—good, kind, and devoted—in whom they have placed their esteem and confidence.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to contribute to the numerous expressions of congratulation of which the mover and the seconder of the Address have already been the objects. Their quite apparent sincerity, together with the broadness of the views they have expressed, goes a long way, indeed, towards the bridging of the gap which now separates the two main racial elements in Canada. Let these hon. gentlemen and other hon. members of the House rest well assured that the gallant move which is now being made to unite and consolidate the divers elements in our dear country will not pass unheeded by the generous French-Canadian race, who are ready to go the full half way to meet their English compatriots and heartily shake hands with them. It was with no little pleasure that I listened the other night to the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) paying an admirable tribute to the French-Canadian people of Quebec. I am not able to quote the words of the hon. member verbatim, but I have them in my heart, and if I understood him aright, he spoke about as follows:

The people of the province of Quebec are good and generous; the people of the province of Quebec should be known better by other elements in this country; I am sure that if closer relations should exist between the people of Quebec and the people of the other provinces the sentiment which of late has not been what it should have been perhaps would be improved greatly not only to the benefit of the people of Quebec but of every other province and of the whole Dominion. Those were the words, or that was the sense of the words which were used the other night by the hon. member for Springfield. I want on this occasion to take the opportunity of offering my thanks to the hon. member and to all the other members of this House who think as he does and from what I can see there are a good many of such hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. This country is too great, its possibilities are too immense that any of us should be allowed to divert its energies from the course which Providence has set before us or to destroy these energies in the furnace of racial and religious conflict. I believe that in so speaking I express the views not only of the members of this House but of the majority of the people of this country. However good and sincere our dispositions may be I am sorry to say there are still left in this country unrepentant sinners whom I cannot help but mention in relation to race and religious conflicts that greatly grieve me. I may be wrong in my judgment. Pehaps I am wrong as to this matter that I have reference to but I for one felt that I should not allow this article that I am going to mention now go unchallenged.

On the 20th of last month while our hearts were bleeding freely because of the death of the great man a Toronto newspaper whose principal aim appears to be to insult everything Catholic and French Canadian was addressed to me and apparently to all the members of this House. I am referring to the edition of the Orange Sentinel of February 20. What was the object of having that paper addressed to us in the hour of our deep sorrow if not the malicious intent of digging deeper the ditch which unfortunately separates the English from the French by exasperating the latter race. At a time when every citizen is turning his thoughts more and more towards the unity of Canada, this paper has made it its object to work in an opposite direction. Looking at the heading on the front page of this paper I read the following:

The tragedy of Quebec, and the great failure of French-Canada in the war.

What a great English newspaper says about conditions in Quebec where the people are held in bondage to the black robes.

The lengthy article which follows and which is presented as the expression of the Saturday Review is nothing short of a web of falsehoods and misrepresentations of the most libellous character. I am convinced that the article must have been contributed by some one on this side of the ocean who is a regular contributor to the Sentinel because I cannot believe that any one in England with even the most superficial knowledge of Quebec could ever have written so false an article.

Evidently "the black robes" of Quebec are the enemy and as a consequence the French Canadians are singled out to bear the wrath of those who speak through the Sentinel. I feel very sorry that the education of those people has been so neglected that they should not know of the work of "the black robes." Ever since Canada was discovered, are they not aware that it was "the black robes" who followed, step by step, the first colonists of this country? And that the second largest river in the world, the Mississippi, was discovered by one of those black robes, Father Marquette, together with Joliette? Are they not aware that these black robes were equal in every sense to the martyrs of the first ages of Christianity in sacrificing their lives, many of them dying under torture by Indians in order to implant in this country the ideals of Christianity and civilization? Are they not aware that during the rebellion of 1837 the black robes remained faithful to the English Crown, against the people of their own race and religion, notwithstanding the injustices of which, as history has since recognized, these people had been the object? To speak of more recent times, are they not aware that the black robes of Quebec, for many years, were the supporters of Sir John Macdonald, an English Protestant and an Orangeman? They followed him against one of their own faith and race. Who will say after this that the black robes of Quebec are bigots, that they are being led in politics by religious influences largely, or that these black robes are not rendering justice to every class and to every political party in this country? They have supported Sir John Macdonald against Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I would not repeat an incident of that kind if it were not an historical fact. My friends should also be aware that, in turn, Sir John Macdonald always had the greatest consideration and respect for the black robes of Quebec. The apostles of the Sentinel should at least, if they are Tories, respect those whom Sir John Macdonald respected, lest they would pretend to be more loyal than Macdonald himself. If they are Liberals let them respect those whom Sir Wilfrid Laurier respected, lest they should appear to teach a lesson to Laurier. But I do not think these people should belong to either the Conservative or the Liberal party, because they appear to be unaware of the principles which have always guided the two great leaders whom I have mentioned. They are people belonging rather to a class of their own and I do not know how to qualify them better than by saying that they are, perhaps, more to be pitied than censured. Looking at the front page of this paper, I read:—

Our watchword: One School, one Flag, a united Canada.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to these three words and try and find out what they mean as they appear on the front page of this paper.

This motto, appearing in a paper of this kind, is certainly worth noting, as it constitutes one of the finest examples of contradiction and mockery which can be found. "One flag." Every one, I understand admits the desirability of this—even the black robes of Quebec, and it is a surprise to me that this loyal Ontario paper should have as a watchword a proposition which no one in Quebec would ever think of discussing for a second. Are we to believe that there are in Ontario, where the loyalty of the people is unquestioned, people whose faith in the flag is so staggering that it has become necessary for the Sentinel to read them a warning of this kind? " One school." If this means anything, it means that, according to the ideals of those people, there should be throughout Canada one class of schools only, and that is the English non-religious schools. Again I have to tell my friends: You are forgetting the most elementary principles of British institutions, otherwise you would be aware that in Canada, Egypt, South Africa, and every other country in the world which has been conquered by the British, they have made it a principle to leave to those whom they have conquered the free and unmolested use of their language, faith and institutions. Without these principles, the British Empire would never have become what it is to-day, and the devotion and love for the flag and the conqueror would never have been implanted in the hearts of the conquered. During my whole life, I have been taught to believe that I should be proud to live under the British flag because of the freedom and liberality of its institutions. Not only have I been taught to believe this, but I have believed it and I do believe it now. For generations my people have been taught to believe the same principles. Not only have they been taught to believe it, but they do believe it now. And yet to-day there is a newspaper published in loyal Ontario with a watchword calculated to destroy, with one stroke of the pen, what has been the immutable principles of British liberty and freedom for the last two hundred years, and which have contributed more than anything else to make the British Empire what it now is. And yet these people of the Sentinel proclaim themselves loyal subjects. They think themselves empire builders. Empire builders are they? No, they are empire destroyers, and it is fortunate that this class of people are not more numerous throughout the Empire, for they would do more to tear it asunder and destroy it than the Hun himself could ever have done.

A united Canada—this is the third proposition of the watchword. It is hardly necessary to say that this proposition is a fallacy and a mockery in the mouth of those for whom the Orange Sentinel speaks. While these people proclaim a united Canada, they are doing everything in their power to disrupt and antagonize the diverse elements which people this Dominion. I have never seen so illogical a proposition, and I can not explain it otherwise than by saying that the minds of these people have been obscured to such an extent as to deprive them of the happy faculty of common sense. If it be true that there are still in the province of Ontario people so narrow as to find delectation in the reading of absurdities such as those contained in this edition of the Sentinel, give these people their daily bread, but in the name of truth and common sense, strike out from the paper these words "A united Canada," and replace them with the words, "The disruption of Canada," for no one is contributing to a greater extent than they are in the nefarious work of disuniting and rending the component parts of Canada.

Sir, I think perhaps I have been led to discuss this last subject at too great length, and I feel rather sorry that I have done so, convinced as I am that it is not worth while speaking so long and occupying the time of the House to such an extent, trying to answer propositions such as those we see in the Sentinel. I promise the House that I will never again enter upon a consideration of a subject of this character, because to insist any more upon the views which I have expressed would be to inflict upon hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House what I would call a grave injustice, because it would tend to make other people believe that perhaps large numbers of members in this House share the ideas which are taught in this paper the Sentinel, whereas I am fully convinced that the good thinking English people of Canada reprobate these articles just as much as we reprobate them ourselves.

Now, Sir, a very important question has been more or less discussed by the speakers who have taken part in this debate—I refer to the question of indemnity. In opening up this question I think we may be allowed to ask ourselves, "What shall Canada get from this war?" We have contributed five hundred thousand men—in fact the figures show that nearly six hundred thousand have been enrolled, either voluntarily or under the Military Service Act. We have spent for war purposes nearly two billion dollars. The war is over, we have triumphed, but I think it is reasonable for every Canadian citizen to ask himself, "What shall Canada get from it?" I can imagine my hon. friends on the other side quite ready to ask me: Are you so far behind the times that you are not yet aware of what Canada is getting out of this war? To my mind what we are getting is of a two-fold character. There is first the moral question, and this is the one to which my hon. friends opposite would refer if I had been interrupted on this point. The moral result. That is the good that Canada—in fact all civilized peoples and humanity at large—has derived from this war. If we examine this proposition, I would say to my hon. friends that Canada has benefited immensely from the war because it has helped to save civilization and democracy in this world. So that from that point of view we have won tremendously. But we have not a monopoly of the moral gain; it is shared by all the other Allied nations. We are, therefore, all on the same footing so far as moral gain is concerned; we are satisfied within ourselves that we have done our duty in helping the Allies to win the war.

[Mr. Denis.]

But there is another question that we should examine; it is that of material gain. We have spent large sums of money in carrying on our part in the war, and our debt now amounts to $2,000,000,000. If I understand rightly the speech delivered by the Minister of Public Works (Hon. F. B. Carvell) the Government does not at this juncture see its way clear to pay this debt, or even the interest on it. How are we to make up the $100,000,000 that we are short? Let me make a comparison. France has helped to save civilization; she is on the same footing as we are in that regard. But France will receive a material indemnity as a result of this war. France will gain the coveted provinces of Alsace and Lorraine and will obtain other territories, the particulars concerning which have not yet been adjusted. France will gain something of immense value in the way of future guarantees, and she will be able to maintain an army much smaller than heretofore and spend very much less upon armaments than she was spending before the war. Consequently, poor France, sorely tried as she has been, is getting material gain out of this war.

Now, let us take England. England has new possessions that she did not have before the war. She has Palestine; so far as we can judge, she can have the Dardanelles if she wants them; she can control Asia Minor. England has seen the removal of the German menace against her colonies. Egypt and India are no longer threatened; South Africa will no longer be bordered by German colonies. England has established the supremacy of her navy. England will obtain great advantage in the unparalleled development of her trade. Before the war Germany was the great competitor of England in trade and commerce; after the final conclusion of the war by the signing of peace Germany, as a competitor in this regard, will have disappeared.

I have heard people say that England went into this war for the gain that she expected to derive from it. Sir, I should be ashamed of myself if for one moment I supported a view of that kind. If England had gone into this war simply to obtain some material object and had spent hundreds of thousands of lives in accomplishing that object, she would no longer deserve the respect of the world. England did not enter the war for that reason. But, actuated as she was by a sense of justice, by her responsibilities in respect of treaties she had signed, and by her desire to protect Belgium, it is nevertheless true that England will derive immense material benefit from the successful conclusion of the war. Italy also will have her gains; she will have her lost provinces on the Adriatic and other lands in the Balkans or in northern Africa.

That brings us to the inquiry: What is Canada getting out of this war in a material sense? Canada is not getting a dollar's worth of material benefit out of this war. Canada has sent her men and spent her money, but is getting no material recompense. Even if the indemnity to be paid by the Germans is sufficient to pay only a part of the debts that have been incurred, I submit that it would be reasonable for Canada to have a justly distributed proportion of that indemnity. I go further; even if the indemnity is sufficient to pay only 25 cents on each dollar of England's war debt, Canada should get more than that, because England is obtaining numerous material benefits out of the war while any indemnity paid to Canada would be the only material gain that would come to our country.

I read in the Montreal Gazette of March 8, the following despatch:

> London, Sat., March 8.—According to the Daily Mail's Paris correspondent, the powers have agreed to distribute the German warships among themselves, but the United States and Great Britain are in accord regarding the necessity for sinking their respective shares.

According to this despatch, the ships handed over by Germany will be divided among the Allied nations, but England and the United States are going to sink their shares. Certainly we have nothing to do with England or the United States sinking their shares. But it is admitted that Canada is not getting any material compensation in respect of her part in the war, and Canada needs ships. Canada needed ships in 1911; our party was defeated at that time partly on a programme of building warships. We shall need these ships after the war just as much as we needed them in 1911; the time is not far distant when this Government will be called upon to build a Canadian navy. If England sinks her share of the ships surrendered by Germany, it is quite possible that immediately after that is done Canada will begin to build battleships.

I cannot understand a policy of this kind. I can very well understand that, by reason of the competition between England and the United States, because neither wishes the navy of the other to be increased, the navies of neither of these two powers should be augmented and that the ships that are allotted to them should be destroyed. But instead of destroying the ships that are allotted to England, why should she not distribute them amongst her colonies? The United States would not be jealous of that. The United States would be jealous if England were to get too many ships and England would be jealous if the United States were to get too many, because rivalry will not end with this war. But what wrong would there be if the Dominions overseas, instead of having to build warships with their own money when their resources are exhausted, were to have distributed amongst them that part of the German navy which will be allotted to England? This is only a suggestion of mine, and I am making it for what it is worth, but at first sight, it appears reasonable to me.

Another question which has been very little dealt with in the course of this debate is that relating to defaulters. How many defaulters there actually are in this country, I do not know. Perhaps there are twenty thousand, perhaps thirty thousand, perhaps forty thousand. I have no idea as to the number, and I am sure the Government does not know what the number is. But we are sure of one thing, namely, that these defaulters do not all belong to the province of Quebec. In every province of the Dominion there are thousands of defaulters. What is the Government going to do with those people? We have a debt of $2,000,000,000. We have taxes to meet. We have the question of reconstruction facing us. We need men to cultivate the farms and to develop the industries of this country. We need help from all around. Now that the war is over, now that every one in this country is eager to work in order to unite Canada and make it a great and prosperous country, are we going to take these defaulters by the thousand and send them to jail? It is about time that the Government should let its policy on this point be known, not that I am so eager to hear it, but in order that we may know what we have to do. Not any later than the day before yesterday I was called upon to advise one of these defaulters who has been arrested and brought to Montreal. I quite understand that every man who is an outlaw is liable to be arrested and brought before a court of justice or a military tribunal and tried for his offence. But what is going on throughout Canada? Until recently, we have seen defaulters being punished with fines ranging from $5 upwards, or terms of imprisonment up to a maximum of ten years. The Government has recently passed an Order in Council fixing the amount of the fine, if I am not mistaken, between $250 and $5,000. But this does not settle the question. The Government should take the matter in hand at once and should adopt a policy in regard to these people. And I feel confident that when the Government adopts a policy, it will be a liberal policy towards these people. We all know that at all times during all wars there have been defaulters. Such men are what we term political criminals; they do not belong to the ordinary class of criminals. Now, that the war is over, what is the object in going after these people? What is the use of the Government paying officers to go through the cities, towns and villages of this country in order to arrest these defaulters, bring them before a judge and have them tried? Such a course is simply spending unnecessarily the public money. The Government need money too much to keep in their service hundreds and hundreds of detectives for this work. I do not think I should pass over this subject without quoting what I would call a reliable authority on the matter. Everybody in this House knows the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) well, and I think every one will agree with me that the hon. member has no feeling of kindness towards defaulters. This is what the hon. member said not any later than March 6:

I will tell you why I object to placing these men behind prison bars. They have been guilty of a breach of the Military Service Act. You take a man and place him in prison or in the penitentiary. Apart from the fact that he has not responded, as he should have responded, to the service of his country, he has shown no criminal instincts whatever. Is it a wise thing to take a man who has given no evidence of criminal instincts and put him in prison along with men steeped in crime? Is that wise from the national standpoint? What chance has that man to come out after two, or five years' incarceration alongside of the worst criminals the country may have produced and play the part of a man? For that reason, and not because I think they should be exempt from punishment, I believe it is a mistake to place these men behind prison bars in our penitentiaries and jails.

I always thought that the hon. member was very far advanced in his ideas in regard to punishment for military offenders. Consequently, I wish to ask the Government to follow the good advice given to them by one of their followers.

It is no more right to fine the defaulter than to put him in prison. The fine now ranges from $250 to $5,000. For the rich man the fine means nothing. The rich man can go before a judge, be fined $250, $500, $1,000,—it does not matter what amount—and he will pay the fine. But what are you going to do with the poor man? He will not be able to pay the fine and will, therefore, have to go to jail. Consequently, if this question is to be settled by imposing a fine, the rich man will escape and the poor man will go to jail.

Can we afford at this juncture to put thousands and thousands of men in jail? For no one will deny that if the defaulters are to pay a fine of $250, half of them or perhaps one-third—I do not know just how many, but at all events, a large proportion of them—will not be able to pay the fine and will have to go to jail. I say that it would be unjust to send to jail the man who cannot pay and let go scot free the man who is able to pay the fine. It would be equivalent to allowing a man to purchase his release from military service. We all know that it has been proved that some have purchased their release from military service. But the war is over now, and the Act is no longer in force, and if the Government persists in this policy it will fall very heavily on the poor man who is not a whit more guilty than the rich man. The poor man may have had to stay at home to support his parents and dependents, while in many cases there was nothing to prevent the rich man fighting for his country. I humbly request the Government to suspend these prosecutions, at least for the time being, until they have formulated a definite policy with regard to defaulters, because the question the Government have to decide is extremely important as it will affect between twenty and forty thousand people in this country.

I listened with keen interest the other day to the excellent speech of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). He is a veteran of this House and a man of recognized high culture, and while I would not have the temerity to engage in combat with him, I find it hard to avoid attempting to answer certain statements in his speech. The hon. member spoke as follows:

On the question of tariff, in my humble judgment—and I have tried to inform myself—those who represent what was formerly the Liberal party occupy a less advanced position than did the whole Liberal party of a quarter of a century ago, so far as their political policy has been stated up to the present time.

Mr. Speaker, to say that I differ in opinion with my hon. friend would be but a weak answer, but the statement that my hon. friend here expressed, an opinion quite different from his action of less than two years ago is worthy of the attention of this House. I will try to make good my statement and prove that the hon. member spoke in contradiction of his action of less than two years ago, not on the question of conscription, but on this very question of the tariff. On the 29th of May, 1917, when my hon. friend, then a Liberal, and still a Liberal according to his own profession of faith, was sitting on this side of the House, on the motion of Sir Thomas White that the House go into Committee of Supply, Hon. Frank Oliver moved in amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this House it would be in the public interest if the Customs Tariff Act were so amended as to provide:

1. That wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list.

2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery, and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.

3. That staple foods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and foods therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of, any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

4. That substantial reductions be made in the general tariff on all articles imported into Canada, excepting luxuries.

5. That the British Preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff.

After discussion a vote was taken on this amendment, the details of which appear on page 1790 of revised Hansard. Among the yeas I find: Bourassa, Buchanan, Clark (Red Deer). So my hon. friend voted for the amendment, and the vote, so far as I can judge, was a straight party vote. Sir Robert Borden, Sir Thomas White, Sir George Foster and Messrs. Cochrane, Doherty, Meighen, Reid, and so forth, voting against the amendment. Those of the Liberal party who were then present voted for the amendment and the Conservative party voted against it. The amendment was negatived. Therefore, after having given his support to the fiscal policy of this party less than two years ago, how can my hon. friend get up to-day and declare that the Liberal party occupies a less advanced position than it did twenty-five years ago? If it be true that the Liberal party in the course of the last twenty-five years has followed a retrograde movement, why has the hon. member followed this party all his life save for the last eighteen months or so? To say that the Liberal party has retrograded is equivalent to the hon. member's admitting that he himself has followed a retrograde movement. But on the merits of the case is it accurate to say that the Liberal party has not retrograded—not for one minute. To prove my assertion I need only say this: If the amendment of 1917 which I have just quoted was moved again this year and a vote taken on it, who would vote for and who against it? I think I am safe in saying that the hon. members on this side of the House would vote for the amendment and the hon. members opposite against it; at least, the majority of them would. How would the hon. member for Red Deer vote? I am sure he would have to leave behind his friends of to-day and vote for the amendment. Otherwise, he would come in conflict with his own principles in the most flagrant way. I could not for one moment entertain the idea that the hon. member should have changed his principles in regard to the fiscal question in less than two years; and I am quite sure that he would still support the amendment if it were put to the vote; otherwise he would be voting against himself and against the principles he professed less than two years ago. If the hon. member voted for the amendment, then he would be giving a vote of confidence to the party which sits on this side of the House, and against the party on the opposite side. The Liberal party has not followed a movement of retrogression, as is suggested. I may have been mistaken when I understood the hon. member to say that the Liberal party was not what it was twenty-five years ago. I cannot understand how the hon. member could support the fiscal policy of the Liberal party less than two years ago, and to-day say that this party is following a retrograde movement, notwithstanding the fact that its policy is precisely the same as it was at that time.

Now, Sir, with great literary taste and a fine sense of humour, in my opinion, the leader of the Opposition concluded his address with the parable of the light in the window; and since then a dozen speakers on the other side have devoted their talents to the discussion of the allegory which it contains. I was really surprised at this, for it never appeared to me that my leader, by placing his little light in the window, was offering any kind of provocation comparable to the challenge of the toreador waving his red flag. Nevertheless the hon. member for Red Deer has made an effort to extinguish the light in the window. For what purpose I do not know. I can see no reason why so much labour has been expanded on the other side of the House to put out this light, so inoffensive, and so flickering in the opinion of my hon. friend, if it is not their fear that that light may possibly be harmful in the way of dissolving some of the heterogeneous elements which compose the governmental majority. Why this exaggerated fear on the part of my friends? Is the Government which they support so vulnerable, that a wee 10 p.m. light in the window should be capable of perturbing it? Our friends are giving us every reason to answer the question in the affirmative. Of course, the light is not the only frightful device. The latch string is another. Is the latch string dangerous? I do not think so. What is a little latch string in comparison with the formidable lasso which the hon. the Prime Minister made use of in the formation of his Union Government?

The attitude taken by the hon. member for Red Deer leads one to believe that the sect of the Pharisees is by no means extinct. Like the biblical personage, my hon. friend sits in a conspicuous place in the temple and tenders his thanks to God that he is not like the publican sinner, my leader. We need not be surprised, after this, to hear my hon. friend speak of a little shack, as he called it, as representing the home of the light. If the ideals in the materialistic mind of the hon. member do not rise higher than the roof of a shack, no one but himself should be held accountable for the deficiency. To me, the light in the window has a very different significance. I look figuratively to it as to a grain of mustard seed, "which a man took and sowed in a field; which indeed is the least of all seeds, but when it is grown it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof."

The light in the window, small but steadfast, is the symbol of those small heavenly stars which serve faithfully to guide the mariner to his port; while the light which my hon. friend and his associates followed when they crossed over to the other side, may justly be compared to the dazzling and treacherous fires lighted by the vengeance and craft of the Trojans to entice upon the reefs the vessels of the Greeks returning from the siege of Troy.

[Mr. Denis.]

Mr. RICHARD COE HENDERS (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House I do so with considerable diffidence, and were it not for the fact that I occupy a somewhat unique position, largely representing the agricultural interests of the country, I should have refrained from addressing myself to this question during this debate. I cannot but realize the wonderful difference there is between the meeting of the House at this time and that which took place twelve months ago. At that time the nations of the world were in the throes of the mighty conflict which has just closed. We in Canada were greatly interested in the issues involved in that conflict, and we scanned the papers for news from across the sea with intensest interest, wondering what would be the issue of the next hour. Things have changed wonderfully since that time. The forces that were struggling for liberty and righteousness, justice and democracy as we see it, though they felt the strain of the conflict at that time to be intense, yet their arm was sufficiently strong and their courage sufficiently great to carry them through to victory. Democracy was saved, freedom was secured, and the small nations of the earth were accorded the satisfaction of knowing that they would be free to work out their own destiny in their own way. The war is over. An important conference is dealing with the aftermath of the struggle and preparing for conditions which, we hope and pray, will usher in a peace that shall fill the earth. We hope that the Peace Conference will be wisely guided and that its decisions will mean the end of all wars.

Coming to the issues that affect us in connection with the circumstances bringing us together in this session of the House, I may be permitted to express my views with regard to one or two things. We were impressed by the magnitude of the problem which the war presented and the energy which the people of this country put into the struggle in order that victory might be achieved. But, Mr. Speaker, while the war is over, while the fighting is done, while we hope the last drop of blood has been spilt, the problems of the war are not settled. The gathering up of the results of the war has yet to be attended to. That which is necessary to secure, out of the war, conditions which will bring peace to the peoples of the world has yet to be attended to. The responsibility resting upon the Government while the war was on in connection with marshalling our forces and despatching them overseas was very great but yet I claim that the problems confronting this Government to-day are more intricate and difficult of solution than those which already have been solved. I have an anxiety that the men who are at the head of affairs in this country shall be wisely guided and that their hands may be strengthened in every possible way in order that we may get safely through the aftermath of the war.

This brings me to make another statement. The people of Canada elected this Government as a war Government to deal with the war. I believe that I rightly interpret the mind of the people when I say that dealing with the war means dealing with all the issues of the war until normal conditions obtain. Therefore, the obligations assumed by this Government continue until reconstruction is attained and the repatriation of our men has taken place. If the people by the pronouncement they made a year ago last December declared that the Government should assume the responsibility of carrying the war through to its conclusion I claim that they demand of the Government that they stay with their job until their task is completed.

With regard to the administration I feel fairly satisfied with the conduct of the affairs of the country by the Government during the year that has passed. I do not mean that the Government has not made mistakes. A government that is traversing new ground, dealing with new issues and new problems and which has not history to fall back upon, unless it is too fearful to amount to anything, is sure to make some mistakes. A government that is progressive and courageous, and that is seeking to grapple with important questions, will push forward, will carry the issues through and it is just possible that some mistakes will occur in connection with its work. But, it is better to make mistakes of a minor character and go through, than it is to fall down in the great and important work which has been undertaken.

Some criticism has been made in regard to the War Measures Act. I would like to express an opinion in regard to that Act. Like some hon. members of the Opposition, and I have no doubt this is the opinion of members on this side of the House as well, I will say that we do not require, and would not tolerate, a War Measures Act except under peculiar and very special circumstances. Some of us believe that the circumstances were such as to demand that an extraordinary measure should be made use of and the War Measures Act, we believe, was made use of as an extraordinary measure to meet the exigencies of the case.

Why was it made use of? We had been operating under certain regulations in gathering up the men who were to arm themselves and go overseas to fight our battles. We remember very well that in connection with the Militia Act the great majority of the boys responded heartily and readily to the call. But there came a time when more men were needed and the call became more urgent. There was not that hearty response there ought to have been; at least some felt that that was the case. To overcome the difficulty that confronted us at that time other methods had to be resorted to and the introduction of those methods brought serious opposition. When these methods were made use of, people who were not so very free in coming forward under the old Militia Act became very active in propagating the idea that the old Militia Act was all that we needed.

However, the men were not forthcoming, and because of that conscription was brought into force. We come a little further down, and it came to the matter of putting into operation this new Act. The people were looking about for a government that would give effect to the law, and we find the same difficulty confronted the people. Those who said in the first place that the Military Service was good enough, but were not attempting to apply it and to use it to the best advantage, were utterly opposed to the new Act when it came into force. Therefore when the people were seeking for a government who would enforce that law, and an appeal was made to the country, the Union Government was brought into existence. That Government took hold of the enforcement of the Act, and succeeded in obtaining the men that were needed. At all events the army was brought up to the strength which the Premier of this country had pledged, and it was maintained at that strength. The material essential for the equipment of the army was also maintained in the requisite quantity. Canada was carried safely through the war, and the Government has fulfilled its pledges to the people in that connection. The people are now looking for the carrying out of what I may call the aftermath of the war, and it seems to me we may reasonably expect that the Administration which carried the country safely through the war will have the public confidence in dealing with these other questions. The Government succeeded in getting our troops together, and in training and equipping them and transporting them Overseas. Now that the war has been won, the people expect that the same Government will be able to take care of our troops, bring them back again, and reinstate them in civil life; and the Government will not have discharged its full duty until it has accomplished that work.

One of the speakers this afternoon enunciated his conception of the principles of Liberalism. I did not catch all his definitions, but I would like to make reference to one or two of them. I heard the hon. gentleman in question make use of the term "Freedom" as a term that would express what Liberalism means. He propounded certain questions to the minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) and asked how he would square his line of action with the great principles he enunciated. The inference was that the adherence to those principles was entirely on the Opposition side of the House, and that an hon. member seated on this side could not claim those principles in any way. While this hon. gentleman was making his argument I could not but think of some of the men in the past who had advocated the principles that the hon. member referred to, and how they stood up for them. I could not help but think of the men who sacrificed life and all they held dear in defence of these very principles. Then my mind reverted to some of the utterances made by certain hon. gentlemen sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, when the cry came from our gallant boys at the Front, who were fighting for freedom and liberty, to send them assistance. The question was then plaintively asked by some of these hon. gentlemen: "Has not Canada done her share?" The suggestion was that we should let the rest of our boys stay at home until some other people had sent forward a quota equal to our own. There were our lads overseas, sending back messages to us, and asking: "What are you doing that reinforcements are not coming?—you placed us in this struggle, and you are not behind us." And yet in Canada the declaration was being made, "Canada has done her share, let other people do theirs." Were the people who talked in that way the defenders of freedom? Mr. Speaker, I think that any man possessing a spark of love for freedom, could not have given expression to such sentiments. It was because the Government wanted to stand shoulder to shoulder behind the boys overseas that they took the step they did at that time. Moreover, it is because they wish to see the war problems satisfactorily settled, provision for our war indebtedness made, and our boys safely brought back and taken care of that the supporters of this Government stand shoulder to shoulder to-day. And they intend to do so, no matter what is said about "a light in the window" on the Opposition side. Mr. Speaker, those who legislate in the interests of the Dominion in the future will be men who have quit talking about Gritism and Toryism, and all that sort of thing, playing with party politics, men who stand for the principles of democracy.

Coming now to deal with some of the matters referred to in the speech from the Throne, I wish first to make a few observations with regard to the creation of the proposed Department of Public Health. I would rather that the wider appellation had been used of "public welfare," because it would express more fully, I think, what is in the minds of the people.

I hope that in the carrying out of that idea this wider meaning will be kept in mind, and that all matters pertaining to the welfare of the people will be taken care of in that way. Canada is big enough to realize that her greatest asset is the country's manhood, and that she will be strong only in so far as she preserves that manhood in the highest state of efficiency. I have no doubt that when this matter comes up for consideration such conclusions will be reached and such arrangements made as will meet the case and produce satisfactory results.

I wish to express my appreciation of the statement in the speech from the Throne that the Order in Council referring to the liquor question is to be taken care of and that legislation is to be put into effect that will hold conditions as they are until the boys are safely returned. And when they are safely returned I know that there is democracy enough in this House to cause us to say: We will face the issue, we will submit this matter to all the voters who will then decide what Canada's future policy shall be.

Representing as I do a rural constituency, I wish to direct the attention of the Government to the Daylight Saving Act. Someone has said that "God's time is good enough for me." I believe that the vast majority of the people of Canada are of that opinion. The Daylight Saving Bill has served its time; it has ended its pilgrimage upon which it was started by this Parliament a year ago, and has been quietly buried; let us hope that there will be no resurrection. As far as I understand it, the people, particularly those in the rural districts, are utterly opposed to it and do not want any more of it. I think that until there is a very strong demand for it, the Government would be well advised to leave it quietly alone.

With regard to Reconstruction, the Government has a very important task to perform. I hope that when this Parliament's work is completed, arrangements will have been made to distribute the economic burdens of the country as equitably as possible upon the shoulders of the people. Previous to the war there was a good deal of talk about the burden of taxation imposed for carrying on the business of the country. If it was an important matter to provide the money necessary in pre-war days to take care of the interest on our national debt and provide for the carrying on of the Government surely, having regard to the responsibility that rests upon us to-day, it will require the united effort and the best thought of this Parliament to devise proper means for our carrying the burden that will fall upon us in those coming days. I am not a pessimist by any means; I believe that with the natural resources which Canada possesses and with the energy and industry of our people devoted to this task, if our forces are united and the burdens of the people are equitably distributed, we shall overcome our difficulties and come out into a successful future.

This is an opportune time for the Government to consider matters that will have to be dealt with in the later sittings of the House and for members from the different constituencies to voice the views of the people on important issues in order that they may receive consideration before the Budget is brought down. So I wish to direct attention to a question that affects very vitally the great interest of agriculture. I refer to the trade policy that is to be inaugurated in connection with the carrying of our indebtedness and the meeting of our expenditures.

The people in rural life believe that the economic burdens of this country have not been equitably distributed. They believe that in connection with a certain economic policy that was introduced in Canada, privileges were obtained and certain classes of the community were able to take advantage of the position in which they were placed by these privileges and to escape the full share of their economic responsibilities and duties.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HENDERS: I hear some member on the other side of the House say "hear, hear." I wish to call attention to the fact that when these burdens were imposed upon and were being borne by the people, that same kind of cry was heard from the Opposition for a good many years. Hon. gentlemen characterized these burdens in very unmistakable terms, such as "legalized robbery," and so on.

I quite agree with the terms that were then made use of, but before hon. members opposite say "hear, hear," too loudly, I want them to remember this, that the people who made very strong use of these terms in the past and who declared their intentions as to what they would do, should they come into a position where they would have to deal with these conditions, were not so loud in their decrying of these principles after they came into power as they had been before. We have not very much to hope for or to expect if we are to be governed by the teaching of either of the old parties when we come to deal with this question. I am looking to the Union Government—

Mr. DUFF: You have great faith.

Mr. HENDERS: I am looking to the men who are not tied to any of the traditions or records of the past, because those records contain nothing flattering—I am looking to the men of the Union Government, having completed the duties and responsibilities before them, regarding the war, to undertake the responsibility of framing a fiscal policy that shall be to the advantage of the people of Canada, and after they have formulated that policy, in due time to appeal to the people of this country for their endorsation. I make this statement to them to-day, that as soon as they formulate that policy—and it must be this session—then some of us who hold strong views on this question, will declare where we are going to stand with regard to it. From what the Government has done since they came into power, I believe that we can safely look to them to open a way into the future and to give us a policy that will be in the interest of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. JOHN EWEN SINCLAIR (Queens, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I wish, at the outset of my remarks, to join with the members of this House who have preceded me in extending my felicitations to the mover and the seconder of the Address for the manner in which they have acquitted themselves. I also wish to join with the other members of this House, and especially do I wish to do so on behalf of my constituents, in saying a word of tribute to the memory of the late departed leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It may truly be said of this world-renowned statesman that by his passing a vacancy is left in the political life of Canada that cannot easily be filled. It may also be said that in his passing a life has closed that was full to overflowing of all the elements that go to make for a true democracy, a life so refulgent in its beauty and brightness that it will cast a radiant light down the future ages of this country that will lead the way and enable future leaders to attain to a higher standard in democratic ideals than they could ever have expected to attain had Sir Wilfrid Laurier never lived.

I do not intend to follow closely the argument of the hon. member (Mr. Henders). As regards his reference to the controversies that have come between the two parties in the last two years, I will just refer to them in this way—and perhaps it may be interjecting a little of a personal reflection, but I feel it is my duty to do so. When I was elected to this Parliament a little more than a year ago, I took this ground; I knew my electorate, and my electorate knew me; and the policy on which I stood was a straight and staunch supporter of the principles of Liberalism as known, announced and worked out under the leadership of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The members of this House all know the disturbed state of mind among the electorate on that occasion, being in the midst of the great war and with all the questions which were put to them. My stand on that occasion was that I reserved from all bias of party affiliation my free right as a citizen of this country to vote for any measure, from whatever source it might emanate, that might, in my judgment, assist in bringing the war to a speedy and successful conclusion. I can say to this House to-night that I maintained my stand to the highest point and never on any occasion was it necessary for me to deviate from the leadership of the late Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In the short time that has passed since our late lamented leader has departed, I firmly believe, from the records so far of his worthy successor, that I can maintain the high commission given to me by my electorate and, at the same time, be a loyal supporter of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) who now heads the Opposition.

Coming more directly to the matter contained in the speech from the Throne, I wish to express my approval of, and to concur in, that part of the Speech which tenders the gratitude of the nation to the gallant members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the suffering they underwent and for the endurance they exhibited in fighting the battles of liberty and freedom across the seas. I wish also to express my feelings of sympathy and condolence for the sisters and brothers, the wives and sweethearts, and especially the parents, of those brave boys and nurses who made the supreme sacrifice, laying down their lives on the fields of France and Flanders that liberty and civilization might be vindicated and truth and justice prevail.

Reference is also made in the speech from the Throne—and perhaps I am now entering upon matters that will be of more contention during this session of Parliament—to the intention of the Government to grant from the Dominion Treasury substantial aid to the different provinces to aid in the building of permanent highways. It is well known that this question has been discussed at great length in former Parliaments, and I wish to say that, so far as it indicates the intention of the Government to render assistance from the Federal Treasury to the various provinces, that intention will meet with my hearty approval. But from the information contained in the Notice of Motion, I feel that the method employed in granting that assistance to the provinces is not being wisely considered. We have been told time and again that the control of public roads is vested in the provincial governments, and what strikes me most forcibly in the Government's proposed legislation is the fact that the Federal Government will be interfering with and overlapping the work of the provincial governments. This overlapping or dual authority is causing a great deal of waste of money and energy in the different departments of the Government to-day and has been doing so for many years, in some cases even since Confederation.

The speech from the Throne foreshadows a proposal to establish a Department of Public Health in Canada. To illustrate my point I shall make reference to other departments of the public service at the present time. I mention the Department of Agriculture, not because I wish to criticise that department any more than any other department of this Government, but simply to show how the duplication and overlapping of work leads to waste of public money, and to raise my voice in protest against further departments of Government being organized on the same principle. It is a condition that has prevailed in the Department of Agriculture for a very long time, and was probably brought about by a lack of foresight on the part of the Fathers of Confederation. Under this Department of Agriculture we have a condition of affairs which is not wholesome or conducive to getting the best results for the money expended. We have the Federal Department of Agriculture directing its energies to the marketing end of agriculture, while nine provincial departments are taking care of production. This may seem to the casual observer to be a fair distribution of labour, but in practice it is working out in a very different way. To attain a uniform standard of excellence for Canadian produce from the Atlantic to the Pacific requires a productive organization with a single purpose, with unity of action, and kindred ideals everywhere. It must be truly Canadian, and in all its departments it must have co-operation, co-ordination, and unanimity. It must have one head, and its activities in Canada must be directed from a common centre and towards a common end. In every province we have an agricultural policy that differs essentially from the policy of any one of the other eight provinces. Examples of overlapping of work, discord among officials, and clashing of policies may be found everywhere. It would seem that the haphazard hit-or-miss propaganda of the provincial departments depends largely on the initiative of a few individuals in provincial affairs. Provincial policies thought out by men trained to think in terms of a province are somewhat narrow and wholly provincial. This must be so, because they are working to a provincial end. It will be said that precisely at this point the Dominion Department of Agriculture comes into operation and takes up the work where it is laid down by the provinces. This is what was intended, but the intention is far from being realized. Our Dominion department is failing in the duty it owes to the Canadian nation. Here we have the organization that should have scope and vision and power to achieve. We have also the men unhampered by provincial atmosphere and restriction, who ought to be able to stand out and give direction to the affairs of the country in a manner befitting the trustees of the nation. They should be able to co-ordinate the work done in the several provinces into a complete Canadian system. But upon analysis we find that the power which logically and rightfully belongs to these men and their organization has been vested in the representatives of the provinces. This leaves the Dominion department to a certain degree powerless. It simply marks time and haggles away at the edge of things while provincial organizations without either the knowledge, the incentive, or the ideal, work along in a vain attempt to frame the policy of the country. It works out wrongly. It is like trying to dress a man in a boy's suit. Whole battalions of officials are struggling to get Canada into a suit of clothes cut to fit Ontario, Quebec or one of the other provinces. The Dominion officials follow up, taking what is left for them to do, and very kindly see that nothing is left out or forgotten by the provincial brotherhood, while down in the country the public is asking questions that no one can answer.

This, then, is the kind of production policy that is in existence. It is upon such a superstructure that a system of selling associations is to be built that will emancipate the farming community from the dilemma of markets, and guarantee to both producer and consumer an efficient business system and equitable prices in the distribution and sale of the country's foodstuffs. This is a short description of the method employed to encourage agricultural production in our national agricultural policy, and I have given it simply to show the waste of money that such a policy entails.

The war has drawn public attention to the waste in production and marketing. The demand for food controllers has shown that when the nation is under stress, waste and profiteering are intolerable. As a sound economic principle, it may be stated that any public service that can be carried on by the people in the public interest should not be handled by private enterprise for private profit. In the past, deplorable waste has taken place and the business of marketing has been carried on for private profit. The Markets Branch has undertaken to assist agricultural development by organizing the sale of farm produce on the co-operative plan as a means of eliminating these two evils. Until the system of co-operative selling organizations is complete, every production organization in the country will remain handicapped. Marketing is the final process of the farm, and is purely and essentially the farmer's business. This being so, the ultimate success of the whole agricultural machine depends on the Markets Division. The Markets Division in turn depends for its very existence on the disjointed efforts of a producing organization having nine different heads throughout the Dominion. Each of the nine organizations works independently of the others, and all work without a common ideal or a national viewpoint. This,

Sir, is the condition existing to-day in the agricultural policy of Canada, and when the Government proposes to introduce legislation creating new departments, such as the Department of Public Health, it is but proper and right to expect that this House should be informed as to what has been done to co-ordinate with those new departments, the different policies of public health that exist to-day in the various provinces of the Dominion. I gather, Sir, from a perusal of the speech of the leader of the Opposition that our constitution is not clear as to whether the authority in matters of public health is vested in the provincial governments or in the Federal Government, and with this condition of doubtful authority existing I think that it is the duty of the Government, before creating such a department as is suggested, to come to a common understanding with the provinces, and adopt one authority under which matters of public health shall be administered, in order to obviate the useless expenditure of public money in the overlapping of the work of officials, and to establish a condition by which the usefulness of the Department of Public Health will not be forever handicapped.

When we come to this point we naturally ask ourselves the question: Did the Government consider this matter at the meeting of the provincial premiers and their associates in conference with the Cabinet during recess, and, if so, what decision was arrived at? Before the proposed legislation to create a Department of Public Health is introduced, I think we are entitled to a report of the discussion and the conclusions that were arrived at in that conference, in order to enable us intelligently to consider such legislation. If an agreement has been arrived at with the provinces, each of which has a department of public health of its own, we should be informed of it. But if there is no such agreement, and the authority is not vested in the Dominion Government, then, Sir, I claim that it is the duty of the Government to defer such legislation until such time as the common authority is defined by which the Dominion Government will direct the policy of public health and not "mark time" haggling away at the edge of things while provincial organizations without either the knowledge, the incentive, or the ideals work 11 p.m. along in a vain attempt to frame a national policy for the country.

When we look at the general principles of the proposed increased grants to the Department of Public Health and for assistance to public highways, we are almost led to believe that the Government has adopted this as a means of pacifying the provincial premiers and their governments in regard to the settlement of the various claims that are held by the provinces against the Government of Canada. What transpired at that meeting has not yet been laid before this House, but it is a well known fact that, had an agreement been reached consistent with the claims that were put forward and discussed by the provinces at that meeting, it would entail a considerably increased grant of money to the different provinces, and, Sir, it appears to me that, in interfering in matters in which the provinces are now directly engaged, such as the public roads and the public health, the Government is merely endeavouring to appease the provinces and not sufficiently defining the authority responsible for the proper expenditure of this money.

I suppose it would seem strange to some of the older members of the House if I, as a representative of the most easterly province in Canada, Prince Edward Island, were to make no reference to the subject of transportation. In view of the fact that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) has informed the House that large amounts of public money are to be spent in providing work for the unemployed, especially for the returned soldiers, I take this opportunity of stating, for the information of the Government, that productive works can be carried on in the province of Prince Edward Island that will yield within a very short time a profitable return for any money that may be expended on them. During the past year the Department of Railways undertook the work of broadening the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway. Only a small portion of that work has been completed, and I am sure that if the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) can see his way clear—as I think he can—to conclude this work, it will furnish employment for a large percentage of the labourers of Prince Edward Island who might otherwise be idle. It would also tend to develop the agricultural and fishing industries of Eastern Canada. The inadequate means of transportation which we have had in the past, has always been a serious handicap to the two great industries of the province, and I am confident that if the Government will continue the work so well begun, a great benefit will accrue to the agricultural interests of Prince Edward Island. I do not wish to dwell at too great length upon these matters, but they are of such importance to the province from which I come, that I feel it my duty to make reference to them. Our means of increasing production in Prince Edward Island lies not in the taking up of vacant land, but in applying the methods of intensive farming that are now being practised on the best farms. There is nothing that will induce our farmers to increase their production so much as the provision of adequate transportation facilities, and I think it is only fair to ask that these facilities be supplied.

In connection with the fishing industry, I would suggest to the Government the advisability of dividing the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and establishing a department under the direction of a minister whose sole duty would be to develop the fishing industry of Canada. The effect of the operation of such a department would be to encourage our fishermen to develop their business. It is as necessary to give assistance to the returned soldiers who wish to engage in the fishing industry as it is to assist those who desire to go back to the land.

There is another class coming back and it is composed of those who have volunteered in the naval service of Canada and the Empire during the war. They have been trained to the sea for the past three or four years. Many of them were from the maritime parts of Canada, both east and west, and when these boys come back they will take much more kindly to developing the deep-sea fisheries of Canada than to going on the land. I urge upon the members of the Government the necessity of making provision for the boys who want to return to the sea as fishermen equal to that made for the boys who choose to go back to the land and serve as farmers. I hope I have made myself clear on that point as it is a very important one. We, in Canada, in the past have looked upon our boundaries largely as the shore line, but in the future we must remember that some of the best industries can be established far beyond our shore line in the deep seas on the Atlantic and Pacific.

I wish to put myself on record as being against government by Order in Council. I can readily see the necessity for a War Measures Act extending to the Government the power to do business during the war by Order in Council, but I cannot see the necessity of using that power when the war is over—to carry on the general business of the country by Order in Council. I wish to record myself especially against the Order in Council that was referred to by the hon. gentleman on this side of the House who preceded me a short time ago, that which increased the minimum fine for defaulters to $250 and made it retroactive. I believe that the people and the Government should take a different attitude towards those who are classed as deserters or defaulters now that the war is over. We have it on no less authority than that of the Prime Minister of Great Britain that conscription in the Old Country is to be done away with. We should approach this question on a broad basis.

It was stated by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders), who preceded me, that the Government was called upon to frame policies and reconstruction measures in connection with the closing of the war without the aid of historical precedents. In that I cannot agree especially in the sense of this Order in Council to which I have referred. If you will go back and look at the condition of affairs in the United States at the close of the Civil War you will see the stand that was taken by the then President, Abraham Lincoln. In the closing days of the war, and shortly before his assassination, he issued a proclamation stating that all deserters who would report themselves to the provost marshal and serve the remainder of their term of enlistment would be pardoned. There is history and the action of the President at that time proved to be the correct solution of the problem. We must put this matter upon a broad basis looking to the future unity of Canada and having regard to the problems of reconstruction immediately before us and the great changes that we may have to face.

There is another point closely akin to this question, although not the same, which has been referred to in terms in this House and that is the Franchise Act and the application that it has had in the past, and may have in the future, to those who are termed alien enemies. While I am not by any means a lawyer, and do not profess to be, on this question I feel that it is the duty of every member of this House to record his sentiments plainly and openly. In reference to the franchise I wish to say that the sentiments expressed by the Government in the speech from the Throne with reference to granting the franchise to women and giving them seats in this House meet with my hearty approval. But when I say that, I must express the disapproval of myself and my constituents of the measure known as the War-time Elections Act. While I have no intention of anticipating what may be affixed to the Franchise Act, from the opinions expressed by some hon. members seated on your right hand, Mr. Speaker, we may expect that a selective franchise will be offered to this House at this session. In this connection I wish to refer particularly to the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Kings (Mr. McIsaac), who, speaking on alien enemies, said:

> I, for one, sincerely hope that the Government will exercise its utmost powers in carrying out whatever regulations may be enacted to drive these people out of the country. They have no rights here, and they have done much harm; I hope the Government will leave nothing undone to suppress them.

I cannot interpret that as the true sentiments of the citizens of Canada towards the people who are termed alien. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden), in his eloquent speech, referred to alien enemies and said that we would not be true to our soldiers who went overseas to fight in France and Flanders if we did not send these people home. In justification of his statement he went on to say who these alien enemies were and what constituted alien enemies. The proof which he cited simply showed that the men whom he called alien enemies had made certain statements to the effect that they were not Canadians. I have no brief to defend alien enemies. I have always taken the ground of a common citizenship and encouraged in every way possible our people to be loyal. But, if those who are termed alien enemies were to be approached in accordance with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Kings and the hon. member for Brandon, you could only expect to get the worst and basest principle of their nature brought to the surface. And, Sir, if we are to give a lead—a proper lead—to our people we must not use expressions that will set one class against another. We must propound and carry out a policy in this Parliament that will lead all classes—a policy that they can follow, and follow as a unit. In regard to this matter, I desire to place myself on record in this House, that so far as my influence and voice will go, I will stand for a common citizenship and a universal franchise as the only means of leading Canada towards her proper position in relation to the different colonies of the Empire and the nations of the world.

In conclusion, Sir, permit me to say, that our motto must be: "Let us all be Canadians in the broadest and truest sense of the term."

"Let us be Canadians."
"Let us be broad Canadians."
"Let us all be Canadians."

On motion of Mr. Peck, V.C., the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Friday, March 14. 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Certified copy of an agreement between the Elgin and Havelock Railway Company and His Majesty the King.—Hon. Mr. Reid.

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION VACANCY.

ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Some months ago a vacancy occurred on the International Waterways Commission owing to the appointment of Mr. Mignault, K.C., to the Supreme Court of Canada, and I understand that the recommendation has been made to the Imperial Government to fill that vacancy. Has the appointment yet been made by the Imperial authorities? If not, when will it be made?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): No recommendation has been made for the filling of the vacancy in question.

RIOTS AT KINMEL CAMP.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: In view of the great interest that is taken in the country in connection with the military riots at Kinmel Camp, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister when we may expect some report from the Commission, which, according to his announcement of the other day is making inquiry as to the real cause of the trouble?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am advised by the Overseas Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp) that a board of inquiry is holding a full investigation. As soon as it reports communication will be made to the House. In the meantime it is not possible to make any official statement because the board of inquiry is proceeding with the hearing.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: What about the riots at Witley Camp?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As I stated the other day, we have no official information regarding any riots at Witley Camp.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session resumed from Thursday, March 13th.

Lt.-Col. CYRUS WESLEY PECK, V.C. (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped not to intrude upon the notice of the House at such an early date because, in the presence of so many experienced Parliamentarians and debaters, I thought it might be more modest for a new member like myself to wait a while. At the same time I felt that there were some subjects being discussed on which I might be particularly qualified to speak, and being a new member and not very familiar with the rules of the House, I thought that in the debate on the Address I was less liable to get out of order; because, Sir, I have noticed from the remarks so far made by hon. members that there is an extraordinary wide range of topics which may be discussed in this debate, and one may speak about almost anything under the heavens, provided he does not talk too strongly upon those subjects which really matter.

Now, Sir, there are one or two things I am going to speak about and they relate to things which really do matter. First of all I desire to allude to a certain statement which appeared in the morning paper. I understand that when imputations are cast upon the character of hon. gentlemen the opportunity is afforded them of rising to a question of privilege. I do not wish to follow that course, or to cause any unpleasantness; I merely desire to say that the statement in the morning paper representing me as being a lawyer is absolutely and entirely untrue.

I wish to thank the House for the exceedingly kind welcome it accorded me on my arrival, and also to all hon. gentlemen on both sides for the very cordial way in which I have been received in this Chamber. I likewise desire, Sir, to thank the staff of the House for the courtesies which they have extended to me during the short time I have been here, and which, I can assure you I reciprocate in the very greatest degree.

I desire especially to thank the hon member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) for the very kind remarks he made concerning me when I entered the House and to extend my thanks to the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) for his very kind references to me. I am exceedingly sorry that I shall have to take sharp issue with the latter hon. gentleman on some of the statements which he made during his contribution to the present debate.

I join all the hon. members of the House who have so far spoken in paying my tribute of respect to the illustrious statesman who so long adorned the benches of this House, and who has now gone forever. I was exceedingly impressed with the touching and noble eloquence of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) in the speech he made the other day, when he spoke of the personal charms and personal character of the late great Leader of the Liberals. It will be well indeed if the Liberal party—I do not know the present leader of the Liberal party very well—all I know is to his credit because his name is associated with the tartan which I have worn for a long time upon the battlefield—the Liberal party or any other party will do very well indeed if they get a leader of the same fine mould, the same high character, the same lofty ideals, and who will be followed with the same devotion, the same enthusiasm and the same abiding faith, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier was followed in this House and in the country.

It is not my intention, in the few remarks I shall make, to enter upon the general subjects of politics which have been very fully covered by other hon. gentlemen who have spoken. I have not been too conversant with the ordinary subjects of politics, and if I may be excused for so saying during the last four years, to quote from the poet.

> Little of this great world can I speak
> More than pertains to feats of broil and battle.

I was very grieved indeed, Sir, on my entry into this House to hear the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) make certain statements which I deem to be of the utmost gravity. He made statements with respect to the leaders of the Canadian Corps in the field which pained me very much. I was exceedingly pained, because I felt that those statements might revive the grief felt by hundreds, nay thousands, of people in this country, who have lost their dear ones in the war. There are thousands of bleeding hearts in this country to-day, Sir. Thousands of hearts that will never be healed; thousands of mothers, sisters, wives and sweethearts are listening in vain for that footfall upon the garden path that will never sound again; and I say that any man who says anything to cause these wounds to bleed afresh should have behind him the most indisputable facts, should be able to guarantee his statements to the utmost, and should be absolutely convinced that what he says is absolutely necessary to be said in the public good. The hon. member for Victoria, whose redoubtable character I respect, in his statements in this House said that the lives of a great many Canadian soldiers had been sacrificed in vain to serve the idle ambition of the leaders of the Canadian Corps, sacrificed for no useful purpose. The hon. gentleman said: "I know Cambrai well, and General Mewburn has seen Cambrai." I do not know whether the hon. Minister of Militia wishes to associate his reputation as a tactician with the hon. member for Victoria, but that is what he said. The hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) further said:

I know Cambrai well. It is a dirty little one-horse town that is not worth the life of one Canadian soldier.

I do not know what the hon. gentleman's religion is, but I rather imagine from his speech that he is a spiritualist, because he seems to have a supernatural knowledge of things that have taken place on the battlefield. As a matter of fact, I think his medium must have been out the night before he made his address, because what he says is absolutely at variance with those things which we who were actually upon the ground saw take place. He says that Cambrai is a little one-horse town, not worth the life of one soldier. Now, I have here two maps, one a German map showing the town of Cambrai on a large scale, and the other one of our own maps showing the town on a smaller scale in its relation to the rest of the country. I wish hon. members could see this map; I shall be glad to show it afterwards to any member who wishes to see it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Perhaps the hon. gentleman could tell us the population of Cambrai.

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: I do not know the exact population, but I do know that it is far from being a little, one-horse town. Cambrai is a town of from 30,000 to 50,000 inhabitants.

Sir SAM HUGHES: 27,000.

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: Very well; that is near enough to it. But the question is not so much the population of the town as the relation which it bears to the rest of the front. If hon. gentlemen will look at this map they will see that six or seven great national highways lead into Cambrai; that several great double-track railways run into the town; that single-track railways and hundreds of roads lead into it. They will see also that a great canal system runs through the town; so that however you consider it from an administrative point of view, as a road junction and railway centre Cambrai is a place of the utmost importance and was of the greatest strategical value on that front. Moreover, if you look at this map you will see that the German army commander whose army held Cambrai and the high ground to the north would naturally rest his flank on the La Sensée canal. That canal is a very much more formidable military obstacle than it appears to be as shown on this map, because miles of the surrounding country have been flooded by the Germans. So that the German commander would have on that canal a safe and secure flank and would have a very comfortable feeling indeed. But if he lost the town of Cambrai and that high ground he would at once find his right flank to be tremendously involved in the canals and rivers that lie northeast of Cambrai, and he would have to beat a very hasty retreat —as, indeed, happened when the Canadians and the British corps got through.

It must have been the opinion of the generals of the British army that Cambrai was a very important point; otherwise, why should so many military enterprises have been attempted against it throughout the war? And, Sir, such was the opinion not only of these generals, but also of the German general staff. Perhaps you remember a statement made by Ludendorff or Hindenburg, I forget which, before Cambrai fell, in which he tried to cheer up the drooping spirits of the German people and to belittle the efforts of the Allies. The statement said: "They have really gained nothing, but when the British get into Lille and Cambrai they may begin to talk, for our situation will be serious indeed."

The hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) tried to paint a vivid picture before members of the House with regard to the town of Cambrai, and if you looked into the background of that picture you would see the villain of the piece: Sir Arthur Currie, the cold, machiavellian leader, who he says was willing to throw away the lives of all kinds of Canadians to gain a little transitory glory.

Now, the action of Cambrai was not at all a local Canadian action; it was part of an enormous military enterprise which extended over a vast area of country for days and weeks and which was only a part of what was taking place on the great western front. From the time when Foch struck his first blow, on the twenty-first of August, he continued to strike that front like a pugilist, striking here, there, and everywhere, always with relentless determination, always with consummate judgment and skill, no one knowing where the next blow would fall. The German prisoners used to say: "We live in constant terror; we never know where we are going to be attacked." He kept pounding away until he wore down the German army, demoralized the German defence, broke the heart of the German people, and made the German Government sign the most humiliating armistice ever signed in the history of nations. So, Sir, if the battle of Cambrai was wrong, it was not the fault of Sir Arthur Currie or the higher command of the Canadian corps, it was the fault of the British general staff, and had the concurrence of Field Marshal Foch, the generalissimo of the Allied armies and the greatest military genius of the age.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) said in his speech,—I thought I had the Hansard here to quote from, but I have not, —that Cambrai should not have been attacked by suburb or street fighting; and he quoted the words of an American officer, addressed to General Buller at Colenzo, to show that the only way is to "go around the darned thing." Well, Sir, that is what actually happened.

Sir SAM HUGHES: One week later.

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: Hold on; we will find out about that. I fought in two phases of the battle of Cambrai in which I did not see the town; that shows what a tremendous event the enterprise was. The Canadian corps were a long way ahead of Cambrai on the northern flank and the British corps were a long way ahead on the south. The reason why they did not actually take the town by storm was because they did not want to cause undue casualties. We had known for a long time that Cambrai was doomed; it was only a matter of time. We can generally tell from the tactical situation what is going to happen, and we knew what was going to happen in this case. So finally these corps closed in and Cambrai fell. As far as I know, there was very little, if any, street fighting in Cambrai. Our Third division went through the town, and the boys of the Canadian battalions, with their usual enthusiasm, marked on the doors of some of the buildings: "Captured by such-and-such a battalion." The British, I have heard, were rather annoyed about this; they said that our boys had gone over too far into their territory; and as I shall prove later, the centre of the line ran through Cambrai. At any rate, I am acquainted with all the officers in the various divisions, and I never heard that there was any considerable street fighting on that occasion. Of course, there may have been a little; but I question whether it amounted to anything.

The hon. gentleman tried to make it appear that this was a minor and local event with the Canadian corps, and that Sir Arthur Currie or the leaders of the Canadian corps were sacrificing human lives in this last attempt to gain glory.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Wherein do I show that it was a minor event of the Canadian Corps?

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: I am using my privilege as a member of Parliament to defend the leaders of the Canadian Corps, because they are not here to defend themselves. I have no objection to answering any question put to me by the hon. gentleman, that I can, but he will have plenty of time in this House or in the country to reply to anything that I shall say.

Not only was this not a local event of the Canadian Corps, but there were two corps employed in the capture of Cambrai, which as I said, extended over many days. Further than that, if my memory serves me aright—and I will bank more on my own memory than the hon. gentleman will go on his—, not only was this a division between two corps, but it was the division between two armies, because we were fighting on the right of the first army and a British corps was fighting on the left of the third army. One does not have to be a great strategist to see that this was not a local event which was ordered merely for the purpose of gaining glory for the Canadian leaders. I think the casualties were reasonable considering the strategical importance of that point. Cambrai fell and the great German army commenced a rapid retreat going helter-skelter up the roads that lead to southern Belgium.

I want to say this—and perhaps this may be the most important part of anything I shall say about the casualties—our orders were to this effect: that we should press forward with all possible vigour, but that we should not incur heavy casualties. I wish I had the orders with me, but these were the orders we had from the Canadian Corps, and, in my case, from the First Canadian Division.

If I may be permitted to relate an incident in which I was personally concerned in this war, I shall relate one which will fully illustrate that point. During the last three days in which my battalion under my command, and the First Division, was employed in this war, we advanced through a great series of towns and forests and in the very last days of the war the battalion under my command was advancing with the First Brigade on the left, and the good old Fourteenth, under Dick Worral, on the right. We were advancing through the forest of La Vicoigne to seize the great highway that leads from Valenciennes to St. Annand and Lille, and the double track railway that leads between those places, as well as the little village of La Vicoigne. We advanced cautiously all day, because we had to look out for ambushes, through this forest. It was a very exhaustive advance for tired soldiers, but we encountered very little opposition and incurred only two or three casualties. When we reached the edge of the forest, about 600 yards from the village of La Vicoigne, we were held up by a most intense machine-gun fire, so we got into some trenches there and I consulted with my officers as to the situation. It appeared to me that by a bold stroke after dark we might capture this village of La Vicoigne and relieve the whole situation to the south. I shall have to be very careful in what I say or perhaps the hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) will be accusing me of losing human lives. I discussed the matter with my officers and also, as one frequently does, with the men in the trenches. My officers and men said this: Let us go into the town to-night and kick the Germans out and get some good billets for the night, and not stay in this dirty, damp trench.

I may say that our infantry are so immeasurably superior to the German soldiers, and they have such a contempt for them that they do not think anything of encountering them anywhere.

But I had in mind those orders which I had received, as all other commanders had, not to incur casualties, and I said: I shall have to go down and consult the brigade. So I rode back a few hundred yards to the brigade to consult the acting brigadier, who, I think, Sir, is a friend of yours, Lt.-Col. Charles Bent, C.M.G., D.S.O., who commands the 15th Battalion, and who is one of the finest soldiers in this war. I consulted with him and explained the situation as I saw it and what we purposed doing. He said: " That is exactly what I think should be done, but you see these orders about casualties." We commanders in the field have to be very careful; if you make a success of a venture you are a great hero, but if you happen to lose a few men, no matter how well your attack might be planned, your position, your reputation, and, perhaps, your head may be the price. He said, " In view of these orders, I think it would be better to defer the action until the morning or until something else develops." It is evident, therefore, that this order was in every commander's mind. It was the order of the Canadian Corps; it was the order of the First Canadian Division. That is all I have to say on that point, except, if hon. members are interested, I may say that my patrols pushed into the town in the evening. You cannot keep those Scotchmen away from anything they think is pretty good. They pushed into the town to those good billets, and the Germans, of course, got out of there very quickly. We entered the town at twelve o'clock in ghastly stillness, and the French people came out of their cellars and received us as only French people can. At one o'clock our outposts were out, the whole situation was secure, and the rest of us were tucked away in our beds for the night. The next day the Third Division relieved our division (the First Canadian Division) in the line, and the grand old First Division had fought its last fight and passed out to rest after having achieved a military renown and a record that has seldom been equalled since war began.

A few days later Sir Arthur Currie stood by my bedside (I was ill at the time), and with that unfailing kindness with which he treats all those under his command, he called on me to inquire after my health and to chat with me upon the military situation. He uttered these words: " Peck, we might wish to deliver a stunning blow; we could do it; we might wish to inflict a crushing defeat on the Germans and kill lots of Germans, and we would like to do that to revenge ourselves for the way they have treated all those noble men we have lost; but," he said, " the policy of revenge is not worth one man's life." He said, " I am sick and horrified at the losses of our gallant Canadian troops in this war; I have an easy conscience about it, but I do not mean to start any fresh enterprise." I ask you, Sir, is that the language of a cool, cunning, designing commander who has no regard for the lives of his soldiers and who is working for and aiming at only his own idle ambition?

A few days later Mons fell. I was lying within a few miles of the city, but I did not hear any of the extraordinary things stated by the hon. member for Victoria. I find on referring to the official report of casualties that there were 75 casualties at Mons. I have a list here of casualties which cover the phases at Amiens, Arras, Cambria, Le Cateau, Valenciennes and Mons. These were only phases and may have extended over a few days, and possibly over the whole front. It is very probable that the 75 casualties at Mons were spread over two or three days or more, and probably over some miles of front. I am one of the senior officers in the Canadian Corps and I know officers in all the divisions. I have a great many grand old friends in those divisions, and we hear all the gossip that goes round. But I never heard a word about the extraordinary things mentioned by my hon. friend from Victoria. You would be surprised, Sir, to know how quickly gossip gets around in the army, and don't you ever think that you can hand these Canadian soldiers anything, or they will get your number so quick you won't know which end you are standing on. If there had been ruthless waste of life in any of those actions, we should have heard about it by other means than the eloquence of the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes). I question very much whether all of these 75 casualties fell in the city of Mons. There may have been only a few casualties there. I advanced with my battalion, if I may refer to myself once more, eight or nine miles in one day and took five towns. I received a tremendous amount of bouquets. The warm-hearted people of France came out and the gratitude they showed would have moved the heart of anybody. I kissed an awful lot of women, and the only unfortunate thing was that the older women crowded to the front, so I could not get near the better looking ones. But my point is this. We advanced eight or nine miles and passed through these five towns without firing a shot or losing a man. All we captured was five or six German military policemen who had overslept in much the same manner that policemen are reputed to do in all parts of the world. The fact of the matter is the Germans were on the run. We had them on the run and we kept them on the run, and they did not stop to fight. I question whether any man knows positively that one man fell in Mons. I certainly question it myself, for there were very few Germans there to resist the advance.

I wish to say a word about Sir Arthur Currie, the commander whom I followed in this war. I have followed him and always will follow him with affection, esteem, and loyalty. I am proud to have served under him. I consider him to be one of the great Canadians, and one of the great commanders we have had in this war. I remember making a speech early in 1917 to my officers in which I pointed out that the character of Sir Arthur Currie, his great tact, his great military instinct, and high-minded devotion to duty marked him out as the natural leader of a great democratic army. In June of that year he became the commander of the Canadian Corps, and when he did become commander he had not one bit of political influence behind him. In fact, he had to encounter political intrigue. I do not want to say this against those in authority in England, but there are some gentlemen among them who have not forgotten their political habits, when they went overseas, and they had planned against the promotion of this distinguished commander. Nevertheless, he was promoted to command the Canadian Corps, and his promotion had the approval of the Commander-in-Chief of the British army. That was the deciding factor. No matter how many schemes politicans worked in other directions, the deciding factor was the approval of the Commander-in-Chief of the British army, and Sir Arthur Currie had the approval not only of Sir Douglas Haig, but what is very much more, he had the approval of the officers and of all ranks of the Canadian Corps. I hope that the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people will reward and pay fitting tribute to Sir Arthur Currie and all those distinguished commanders who led us in the field. I can assure you, Sir, that I have the utmost admiration for them in every way, and for all the officers who supported them.

The hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) in his speech during this debate, enumerating the members of this House and their relatives who had served in the war, said:

Colonel John A. Currie, member for North Simcoe, served at the front with distinction at the Battle of St. Julien. I want to point again that the name of Colonel John A. Currie has been confounded with that of another, and deeds have been attributed to him that have not been creditable and that have absolutely no connection whatever with Colonel John A. Currie.

To whom, Sir, could that allusion refer? What commander was at St. Julien of the name of Currie of sufficient importance to attract the eloquence of the hon. gentleman? I do not know any commander of that name who was present at that battle of St. Julien except Brigadier General Arthur Currie, who commanded the 2nd Canadian Infantry Brigade, and I should be very glad if the hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) saw fit to stand up in this House and deny that he meant to refer to that man.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I mean Sir Arthur Currie, and I shall take the first fitting opportunity in this House to say that it is Sir Arthur Currie and to tell what happened.

Lt.-Col. C. W. PECK, V.C.: I have heard that this campaign of infamy is to be continued, and if so, I certainly deplore the fact. It will be unfortunate for the reputation which the Canadians have won for themselves, and which should be cherished in the heart of every true citizen of this country. This truth should forcibly appeal, I think, to every honest Canadian.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. member has asked me a question. May I ask him one?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it fair that Col. John A. Currie should go through this world under aspersions, without being vindicated?

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: I am not at all discussing the character of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that, returning from the battlefield and being received so cordially by the Parliament of the nation, I should consider it the last thing in the world I would desire to discuss or even to question the courage of any hon. gentleman; and anything which I have said has been said only from a high sense of duty and because I know what has actually taken place. And because, further, I wish to defend the reputation of those who cannot defend themselves. I beg to say that if this campaign is continued much longer—I earnestly pray that it may not—I shall tell some things of which I know, and there will be some gentlemen who will curse the day they were born.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I rise to a question of privilege.

[Lt.-Col. Peck.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in order in rising to a question of privilege. The hon. member for Skeena (Col. Peck) has the floor. He may be interrupted only with his permission, and only to be asked a question.

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: I am not a sufficiently experienced parliamentarian to deal adequately with these interruptions; but I freely state that I have the highest possible admiration for the redoubtable character of the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), and I am not one of those who think that he made a million dollars out of the Ross rifle. I have always had the greatest admiration for him, and therefore I think the statements he has made in the House are unworthy of his redoubtable character.

Now, Sir, an important subject has come up lately to which I wish to refer, namely, the discipline of the Canadian troops. We have all read the astounding intelligence of the riots that recently occurred at Rhyl, Wales. I will not for a moment attempt to condone those riots. On the contrary, I believe that if similar unfortunate events are repeated they will seriously impair the great reputation which has been won by the splendid Canadian army in the field. I shall refer to an article that appeared in one of the leading London daily newspapers. The newspaper despatch reads:

> The Daily Express in its main editorial to-day says that a most unfortunate state of feeling has arisen among the Canadians owing to the view they take of their recent treatment by the British Government and the British press. They say that, while British military troubles here and in France were minimized the Canadian camp disturbance was given full publicity. We would point out, says the Express, that this is only true of what happened in France. There the censor simply stopped the news crossing the channel, but what happened at Folkestone or Victoria Station and at Bow Street on Sunday was fully reported. None the less it is true that the blame attaching perhaps to 600 Canadians was placed on 19,000 completely innocent men, and that one or two comments were foolish and unsympathetic.

Now, Sir, that brings the British press and the British public into court, and I very much regret to strike a jarring or discordant note, as I feel I must do to-day. But I am bound to say that a certain portion of the British public and the British press have not dealt with the discipline of our Canadian troops with due tolerance and sympathy. As the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) no doubt knows, when the first Canadian contingent was in England, everything was said to exaggerate the slightest irregularity on their part. Now, it is impossible to have several hundred thousand full-blooded young men assembled together without an occasional violation of what we call military law. Military law is altogether different from civil law. For instance, if a man fails to get in in time, under military law he is arraigned in the morning, tried for a crime, and probably found guilty; while under civil law a man may return home at four or five o'clock in the morning, and make the fact a subject of mirth at his club the next day, discussing the wonderful time that he had the night before. If a man is drunk, military law imposes on him a very severe sentence; whereas in civil life, if he has imbibed too freely at the club, the good boys take care of him, see him safely into a taxi, and he goes home a hero to his friends. So that there is a very wide difference between civil and military law. But, Sir, the great test, you will find, of the character of our soldiers is the esteem in which they are held by people with whom they have come in contact. You may go to-day from Ypres to the Somme, across southern Belgium and even in Germany, and you will travel through nothing but a swath of abundant good will on every hand towards the Canadian corps. Now, you cannot make people believe that men are bad who are not so in fact; and that the Canadians are good men is the general opinion of the warm-hearted noble French people whom we admire, the gallant people of Belgium,—aye—and even the people of Germany. My battalion—which, of course, you know, is the greatest battalion that ever served in the field—left Lindlar, twenty-five miles east of Cologne, and the German people got out and lustily cheered them. You can have no more striking evidence than that of the opinion which is universally held of the Canadian soldiers.

We marched up to the Rhine on the 13th of December. The First Division crossed on the southern bridge in Cologne and held the northern bridgeheads of the Rhine to the extent of twenty-five miles east of Cologne. The Second Division crossed at Bonn and held the bridgeheads in front of Bonn. From the first moment of the time we were in that vicinity, we found the British authorities very unsympathetic and, as the saying is, "They had it in for the Canadians." They asked that the Canadians might be debarred from Cologne, but Sir Arthur Currie refused to do that. After a while there was some trouble in Cologne, sufficient to furnish the British authorities with an excuse to exclude the Canadians from that city. I may say that the British Military Governor of occupied Germany was Sir Charles Ferguson, and from the outset, as I have said, the British authorities were unsympathetic. And when this trouble occurred in Cologne they put the Canadians out of bounds, and sent a most insulting message to the Canadian corps, saying, that on account of the continued misbehaviour of the Canadians they would be excluded from Cologne.

I am very proud to say that we had commanders in the field who resented that order. I myself saw a copy of a letter which was written by Sir Arthur Currie and also one by General Sir Archibald Macdonell, commander of the First division, which division held the bridgeheads at Cologne and in front of Cologne, in which they replied to the order of the commander of the Second army. Sir Arthur Currie said, in a letter which was characterized by its vigour and dignity: "We can only consider that order, from the way in which it is couched, as insulting." Sir Archibald Macdonell very soon had his Highland spirit stirred and he wrote a letter, of which I saw a copy, to the British army commander in which he called upon him to produce the proof that the Canadians had been unduly obstreperous in Cologne. Sir Charles Ferguson wrote and made certain charges which were very grave. Sir Archibald Macdonell, that doughty Scotchman, made a scientific and searching investigation of the thing and he found that the number of Canadians who were charged—not convicted—but charged in Cologne was very much lower than the number that would be ordinarly charged amongst a similar number of men during a like period.

When the First Canadian division at last, after four years of warfare turned its weary footsteps backward to return to the rear areas and to their homes in Canada, it did so with with the insults of Sir Charles Ferguson, the military Governor, ringing in its ears.

I want to say one word about the character of Sir Charles Ferguson and then I shall have done with a subject which is a very unwelcome one to me, because this is the last thing that I should like to bring up. Sir Charles Ferguson is married to a woman of Cologne and that may account for some of his strange sympathies for the inhabitants. Sir Charles was in command of the 17th Corps at Arras when the Canadian Corps was rushed down there to save that flank of the British army. I leave to history what was going on in the south—Sir Charles Ferguson was very invidious in his references to the Canadians. Sir Charles Ferguson said to one of our officers: "We never had any trouble here until the Canadians came," and our officer answered: "Yes, that is what the Germans say."

Sir Charles Ferguson was the man who gave up Monchy which was one of the points of vantage and which was really, in a sense the key to Arras because from Monchy, you could observe Arras and you would also observe a portion of the Lens salient. Who retook Monchy? The Canadian Corps. Sir Charles Ferguson gave up Monchy and several officers of the 15th Scottish division said to me that it was the most disgraceful moment of their lives when they had to walk out of Monchy and leave a perfectly good position, one of the finest on the front and give it up to the Germans.

Sir SAM HUGHES: About what date was that?

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: Just about the end of March.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In the retreat of March?

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: Yes. Why do I say all this? I will tell you. When I was standing before my grand old battalion at Lindlar, 25 miles east of Cologne; standing before those brave fellows with whom I had been associated for nearly four years, the grandest, the noblest, the finest men that it had ever been my privilege to be associated with, I said: "When I go back I am going to bring these matters to the attention of the House of Commons." I did not mention these things that Sir Charles Ferguson had said because they might have mobbed Sir Charles, or done something of that kind had they known. But I said: "I will go back to the House and defend the character of the Canadian army before the Parliament and people of Canada," and I mean to do everything I possibly can to make the name of Sir Charles Ferguson stink in the nostrils of all honest and patriotic Canadians.

A lot of things happened in the British army that you never heard a word about. I rode into a town in 1917—there were 40,000 British troops in open insurrection, and they had taken 3,000 or 4,000 Canadian troops, not one of whom ever made any trouble, and put them to guarding railways and bridges, which I suggest was an invidious duty. Things of this kind occurred and they never mentioned a word of it. The war is still on and I am not going to mention things that happened this year, but there have been things of the most serious character that have happened on the continent, but nothing is ever said about these things. But when a Canadian does anything it receives the utmost publicity in a certain portion of the British press.

Now, I come to the question of demobilization. I am not going to discuss it at any length because I find that I have taken up more time than I intended. Most people do not seem to understand this question. I was very much impressed by the fine speech of the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) the other day. Very few people seemed to know that demobilizing a volunteer army is a greater task than organizing that same army and sustaining it in the field. The great object for which the armies have been striving has been achieved and our men naturally wish to get back to Canada and to resume their ordinary ways of life as quickly as possible. I am not here as an apologist for the Government I do not mean to do anything of that sort, Sir, but we wish to be fair. Therefore, I repeat, I was very much impressed with what the minister said. He said that the people seemed to think that their duty had ended.

If there was one thing that served as a comfort and sustenance to us in the field it was the knowledge that we had behind us a strong, vigorous, generous and chivalrous people. It was the knowledge that every day men of different creeds and different points of view were meeting together and striving in an honourable emulation to do those things that were necessary to support us in the field.

I am sure that we must all make due acknowledgement to the hon. Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) for bringing to bear on the great question of finance his undoubted talents, and to all those workers who directed the energies and encouraged the enthusiasm of the Red Cross workers and doing all those things necessary to make more effective the work of different organizations which contributed so greatly to the support of the troops in the field.

We owe an especial debt of gratitude to the fair women all over the land who met day after day in their little guilds and societies to organize the work of preparing and forwarding those comforts and parcels of wonderful things that we received in the field and which were so cheering to us in those ghastly moments of warfare. That was the greatest comfort we had in the field in all those long years; it was like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

And now I wish to appeal to this House and to the country not to think that our labours are done. Having given of your blood and treasure as you have so loyally and generously, I appeal to you to join in this colossal task of demobilization, and to help in getting this wonderful and magnificent army of ours settled back into the avenues of peace and into the field of production, so that they may be able to feel that they have the gratitude of a generous people.

I wish to allude at this point to a statement which was published in the Canadian press of yesterday or the day before. The statement in question originated from the Canadian Associated Press and was to the effect that the soldiers at Rhyl had broken into the girls' quarters—that is the nurses—that they (the girls) cowered under threatened violence, and that the soldiers otherwise misused them. I desire to point out that Colonel Colquhoun, the commander of the camp at Rhyl, declared that the men had never gone into the girls' quarters and had behaved with the utmost chivalry towards them. I think the Government should investigate this report, and if the Canadian Associated Press is found to be circulating news in this country reflecting on the honour of our glorious soldiers it should be promptly repudiated.

Now, Sir, I come down to the affairs of mundane politics. There is one matter as to which I shall no doubt be out of order if I do not deal with it, and that is the matter of the latch string which has been so much referred to. The hon. leader of the Opposition has done two notable things in the last two weeks: he has become the leader of a great party, and he has coined a phrase. There was a great man who once said, "I would rather make an epigram than rule a nation." You can therefore see that the achievements of the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) are quite considerable.

I am one of those who are considered by the hon. gentleman as having wandered from the fold. I do not agree with that. I was overseas for four years fighting for the principles of Liberalism, and if the Liberal party has not kept up to the scratch it is no fault of mine. The reason I supported the Unionist Government, and the reason the great bulk of the Canadian troops at the front did so, was because we had no faith in the Liberals getting on with the war. In the fall of 1917 our position at the front was desperate and precarious. We had had some successes that year, but we had only advanced at any point about two or three miles, except in one locality where probably an advance of five miles was made. We had only accomplished this by desperate fighting and after very serious losses. I am now speaking of the British army. We knew that the Germans were preparing an attack upon a vaster scale than had ever before preceded the assault of an army. We knew that the U-boats were making great inroads into the commerce of Britain, and it was just nip and tuck—from all the information I have gathered it was just nip and tuck from the way the U-boats were sinking vessels—and we knew that before the Americans could bring any considerable force into the field it would be very late in the following autumn. We knew that in the spring, whatever happened, we would be fighting with our backs against the wall for the very existence of the Allied armies, and for the very existence of the cause of liberty and civilization. Is it any wonder, then, that we turned to somebody who had a definite policy?

Now, Sir, I studied whilst overseas with the greatest possible attention the actions and the speeches of the members of the Liberal party as now constituted, and I could get no comfort—their policy was as the shifting sand. But, Sir, the Unionist Government at least offered us a definite policy, and a policy which gave us confidence that they would prosecute the war with all vigour. To whom should we turn therefore except to a Unionist Government, especially when we saw that their ranks comprised some of the most able and eminent Liberals in the country? Now, Sir, that is my position. When the Liberal party can show me that they have a more progressive programme than the Coalition, or any other party, and when they convince me that they are going to follow that policy, I will be prepared to support them. But I want to say this one thing: I am not going to go around in the darkness of the evening and gaze into the kitchen window, I am going to walk boldly in through the front door at high noon.

I am a Free Trader.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: I am very much gratified, Sir, to hear the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I only wish that they had evidenced the same enthusiasm during the last twenty years.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheer now.

Lt.-Col. PECK, V.C.: Like the hon. members for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), and Springfield (Mr. Richardson), I had been a supporter of the Liberal party for some time, but I have at last come to the conclusion that there is very little difference between the two parties. Free trade and low tariff may, in certain sections of the country be very good planks to ride into power on, but our administrators always seem to find protection the best policy to keep in on, and it does not seem to matter which policy is carried on so long as they can stay in power and bask in the sunshine of office. In that respect both parties seem to be pretty much on the same footing.

Now, Sir, I was elected an Independent and soldiers' candidate, to support the war policies of the Unionist Government, and I wish to say that I certainly mean to do so until I see something better. I think we should give the Unionist Government a chance, and I must say that not only here but in the Old Country, I found the members of our Unionist Government were honestly and sincerely trying to grapple with this great question of demobilization to the best of their ability. I think we should give the Government a chance, and therefore I appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides to be charitable in dealing with this question. It is all very fine to make a grandstand play in the House, and to read a letter from some soldier who may have had rather a hard time. At the same time I know that hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish to take advantage of mean political tactics, and therefore I appeal to them to show a spirit of charity in their attitude towards the Government. I can assure hon. gentlemen they will find that I will take an independent stand on questions. I do not hold a brief for the present Government, but until we get a better Administration I mean to support them.

In connection with the taking over of the Grand Trunk Pacific by the Government, I hope that the Government will institute a vigorous policy in regard to that road. I am told that there is quite a feeling throughout the country that if we leave this thing long enough under Government control the people will get sick of it and go back to private ownership. But I do not think that is a good view to take. A great friend of mine who was a well-known statesman in this country—I deplore the fact that he has since gone—once said: "You cannot build railways without imagination." Well, I am afraid that you cannot run the Grand Trunk Pacific for a short time without imagination. But the Grand Trunk Pacific runs through a tremendously rich country in the northern part of Canada and taps the great hinterland that lies to the north of all the other railroads. If a vigorous policy is put in force in this connection it would only be a short time before the Grand Trunk Pacific becomes one of the best paying roads in the Dominion. It has the lowest grades and should compete, I think, in every way with the other railroads. I notice the Minister of Railways (Hon. J. D. Reid) looking the other way. I hope that when the season opens up in the spring, a fast, modern, comfortable daily train will be put on between Quebec and Prince Rupert; I am sure that in time it would pay. I hope, too, that steamship connection will be established with the Orient, because through the saving of thirty-six hours at sea and in going over the easy grades of the Grand Trunk Pacific, we can haul the rich cargoes of China, Japan and India, to the great markets of eastern Canada and the United States much more advantageously than the other roads can do it. It is only a matter of the Government prosecuting the business with vigour and with a proper outlook, and keeping it free from graft and politics.

In closing, may I just say this. In the trenches we have no politics. It does not matter whether you are English-born or French-born, Roman Catholic, or Protestant, or anything else; you are the same as any other fellow in the trenches if you are a good soldier—and all our boys are good soldiers. In the trenches we were one grand brotherhood. Unless you are a soldier you cannot understand the espirit de corps that prevails. It is the next thing to the family feeling; it is a great and wonderful love for your fellow man. As I saw these fellows perform their duties in the avenues of death, under conditions of the greatest peril, without a murmur, always with the greatest cheerfulness, I used to think what a contrast it was when I read in Canadian newspapers accounts of some of the squalid, sordid political quarrels that take place in connection with Dominion, provincial, and municipal politics. I used to say to my officers that when our men got back to Canada, we should surely have a better national life. If we do not have a higher and nobler national life when these men—who have never quailed or faltered on the field of battle, who have shown that they possess every human virtue that men can have—return to Canada and are incorporated into our national life, then, Sir, I think that our sacrifices shall have been in vain and our time lost indeed.

Hon. WILLIAM STEVENS FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, one of our old parliamentary forms is that which allows us, on the motion for the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, to discuss a very wide range of questions. I think it is a wise provision in the old rules because it enables members at the very beginning of the session, if they so desire, to give expression to their views concerning the public affairs of the country. Sometimes when the debate is protracted, as this has been, outside critics find fault and tell us that we had better quit nonsense and get down to business. Sometimes, I suppose, the practice and the rule are abused; but there is another side to this good old form. There have been cases—far be it from me to say that this is one—when the Government, not being too ready with its business, or possibly waiting for somebody who is away to come back—may find it agreeable to allow two or three weeks to be spent at the beginning of the session in the harmless occupation of passing the Address. Even that, however, has something to be said in its favour.

Then, there is a further and more serious aspect of the matter. Every government naturally and properly desires to form its policy in harmony with the recognized wish of Parliament, and when at this stage of the session we have this free-for-all discussion, the Government have the opportunity of learning public opinion from its various angles; and perhaps in the end the debate is helpful to the business of the session and not, indeed, a waste of time.

In a debate of this kind it is almost unavoidable that there should be a considerable amount of repetition; we deal with the same subjects and the same thing has to be said often. That I may avoid that as far as possible, may I be permitted, without dwelling on any one of the points, to say that I desire to have myself associated very cordially with many of the things which have been said by the hon. gentlemen who preceded me. I should like to be associated with the well deserved compliments that were paid to the hon. gentlemen who moved (Mr. Redman) and seconded (Mr. Manion) the Address; with the expression of gratification that we all feel upon the splendid triumph of the Allies and the apparent termination of the war; with appreciation of the triumphant and heroic services of the Canadian soldiers and sailors; with reverence for the memory of those who have given up their lives; with resolve that those who are spared to come home shall have every consideration from a generous and grateful people.

I should like also—need I say—to be associated with the many eloquent, earnest and touching tributes offered from both sides of the House to the memory of our great Liberal leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who has passed away, a man who was honoured and admired by all and loved by those who knew him best.

To me it is a satisfaction—I believe it is to all of us—to feel that we have associated with us here in Parliament, in the work which we are undertaking as representatives of the people, so many gallant soldiers who served the Empire at the front and have won honour for themselves and for Canada. We are especially honoured by the presence and association of these men as fellow-workers in the discharge of our duty; and it will be no disparagement to others if I speak of the particular pleasure which we have all shared to-day as we listened to the voice of the gallant Colonel (Lt.-Col. C. W. Peck, V.C.) who wears on his breast the proudest honour that any soldier can have.

The subjects touched by the speech from the Throne are numerous. There used to be a time when, criticising speeches from the Throne both here and in our Provincial Legislatures, men were in the habit of saying that the Speech was more remarkable for what it did not contain than for what it did contain.

It is about the only thing that I have not heard said so far about the speech, and we cannot say that there is any lack of material.

The speech touches on many subjects of importance, and it sets forth a considerable bill of fare, promising a very busy session. There are some things that I suppose we shall be glad to have more information about. The overshadowing question before us to-day is one upon which we can at this stage hear but little. I refer to the financial question. The overshadowing question with us must be in regard to the tremendous burdens which are to fall upon us at the close of the war and in regard to how these burdens are to be met. That they must be met intelligently and courageously, we shall all agree. We cannot at present expect any information respecting those. That stage has not yet arrived. Indeed, we do not need much information, for the thing is so big, the figures are so colossal, that we can easily realize the tremendous burden we shall have to face, the awful debt that is accumulating, the tremendous obligations that we shall have to provide for. All that we know almost as well as when the Minister of Finance will give us the information in greater detail. We must be content to-day with the glimpse we have had of those things from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell). The figures, even in the hurried form that he gave them to us, are startling. We know, however, that they will have to be given to the House in greater detail later on. In the speech of the Minister of Public Works, there were one or two sentences which contained a meaning beyond what he intended. He dwelt, once or twice in his speech, upon the fact that his department, in determining upon expenditure on public works, would have regard, not so much to the good of the community, as to the necessity for guarding against unemployment. I thought he dwelt too much on the unemployment and too little on the usefulness to the community. The two things should, I think, go hand in hand. There is in Canada no need, for the sake of guarding against unemployment, to engage in the construction of works which are valueless or of doubtful value. Canada is still a comparatively new country, comparatively undeveloped, and in every part of our Dominion useful public works can be constructed, if we have the means to do so, where we can combine the guarding against unemployment with the service to the whole community. I hope the minister will think more of the good of the community, although I am quite sure we all sympathize with him in his desire to guard against unemployment.

There is one question that we must all think of a little as we look at the vacant chairs, when we recall that there are five ministers of the Crown who are absent from their departments, and absent from their seats in this House. One of those gentlemen, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), has, we have learned with great regret, been laid aside by a very servere illness. We rejoice to know that he is in a fair way to recovery, and we shall all be glad to welcome him back to his seat in this House, we hope, at an early date. As respects the others, the explanation is not so clear. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) are absent. We are glad to know that they are not ill. It is a great pleasure to know that. We know that they are in Paris. That is rather a pleasant place to be in if you have nothing particular to do. But what they are doing there, that is to say, what business they are doing, that is to say, what Canadian business they are doing in Paris, is one of the things that no fellow can very well understand. The Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) endeavoured to give us a little explanation; the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) gave us a little more, but whatever impression it made upon others, I must say that their contribution to the discussion led me to believe that they were just as much in the dark as we were. What in the world are these gentlemen doing away from their seats at the present time when there is so much to demand their attention at home? Ah, but you will say; are we not interested in the Peace Conference? Surely, the whole world is interested in the Peace Conference. Canada is interested in the Peace Conference. If Canada had never spent a dollar nor sent a man to the war, she would still be deeply interested in the Peace Conference, because it is dealing with world problems. I admit all that, but still the question remains: What interest has Canada in the Peace Conference that is not her interest in common with the Empire at large? If I did not know the hon. member for Halifax as well as I do, if I did not know him to be a loyal member of an ultra loyal Government, I would feel some cause for suspicion in his remarks, because he absolutely ignores the fact that Canada is a part of the British Empire. He gave us to understand that if our ministers had not crossed the seas, Canada would not be represented. I cannot admit that for an instant. I am too good an Imperialist—an Imperialist of the right stripe, mark you—to admit what I would regard almost as a reflection on British statesmen. When Mr. David Lloyd George, Prime Minister of Great Britain, and Mr. Arthur Balfour, Foreign Minister, take their seats at the council board in Paris, Canada is represented, because Canada is a part of the British Empire. Unless it can be shown that Canada has some interest separate and apart from the British Empire, there is no particular reason why we should be represented there. I have enough faith in Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Balfour to believe that if we had not sent a minister across the seas, the interests of Canada would not have been sacrificed.

There are times when Canada has an interest in public affairs somewhat apart, an interest of her own, an interest not at variance with the interest of the Empire, but an interest specially of her own. In that case it is undoubtedly a wise provision that Canada should be specially represented. In the past there have been numerous cases in which it has been desirable that Canada should be represented. I notice that in the speech from the Throne we are informed that our ministers are "attending" the Peace Conference. I think I can congratulate the Government upon the happy choice of that word. There are some hundreds of officials over there attending the Peace Conference, but attending the Peace Conference does not necessarily imply that they are doing any very large part of the business, and I have not been able to see that we have had there any Canadian business which calls particularly for their presence.

There is overseas a commercial mission which we should distinguish from the political mission. We have sent across the seas several prominent business men who form a commercial mission. Their object is to extend the trade of Canada. From all that I can learn they are not as successful in the matter as we would wish them to be, but whether they succeed or not, is, after all, not the question. The object in view is an excellent one, and I commend the Government for sending the Trade Mission. That mission has work to do; we know what it is those gentlemen are trying to do. But we cannot understand what in the world is the Canadian work that our ministers are doing in connection with the Peace Conference. I want again to emphasize the fact that Canada, as a part of the British Empire, would be represented if those gentlemen had not gone to the Peace Conference at all. I admit at once, as I said a moment ago, that there may be occasions when Canada has a special interest and at such times Canada should, of course, have her own representatives. What Canadian interest is before the Peace Conference in Paris to-day? We have no territorial axe to grind. We are not seeking any extension of territory, are we——

Sir SAM HUGHES: Greenland.

Mr. FIELDING: —and in that respect we differ a little from our sister Dominion, Australia. Australia did have some special interest to represent. She had a question of territorial expansion to be considered, so there was that excuse for Australia having special representation. She does not appear to have made much out of it, by the way. Her special representation has accomplished nothing, and she could not have been any worse off if Mr. Hughes had stayed away, because the wishes of the Australian Government—I am sorry it was so—have been set aside. But Canada has no such ground for being there. We are seeking no expansion of territory, we have no islands to gather in; in the matter of expansion of territory we are absolutely without any claim.

What then? Indemnity? If we have a claim for indemnity, in all seriousness what in the world can we do but make out the bill and send it to Mr. Lloyd George? What more could anybody do? We cannot by any act of ours induce the Germans to pay us an indemnity. If there is to be an indemnity at all it will go to the British Empire, and I am loyal enough to believe that the British Empire will give us our share if we demand it. But it appears that we do not want any indemnity. Some of the information we get from Paris we have to look on rather doubtfully perhaps, but now and then we get some information which has an official look. I have in my hand an extract from the Montreal Star's own correspondent, Mr. H. N. Moore, who in a cable from Paris dated February 10, says:

> Canada will make no special claim. A certain responsibility was assumed during the war, and that responsibility will be carried to the end. If indemnities are claimed by Britain, if one of the terms of peace is that Germany must pay not only the bill for reparation and restitution, but must also shoulder the entire cost of the war, Canada would undoubtedly receive her share. But the delegation is not pressing for this. In fact, one might assume fairly that any such proposals would be deprecated.

So we have no territorial expansion to seek, we do not want any indemnity, and in all seriousness I wish somebody would tell me what is the Canadian question which is at this time engaging the attention of the Peace Conference. There is a glamour, I suppose, about this idea of Canada having special representation. There is something fascinating about it, and many people who I think ought to be wiser are magnifying its importance and trying to make something out of it. The question is asked in Holy Scripture, "Which one of us by taking thought can add one cubit to his stature?" It was a hard question in Bible days. It was a question which was asked for the purpose of showing that the thing could not be done—but that was before the days of the Peace Conference. Mr. Speaker, some people seem to think that practically by taking thought, by passing some petty resolution in an Imperial conference or getting some second-class recognition in a conference at Paris, we are actually adding a cubit to our stature. We are not. Before we pass any votes of thanks or send bouquets to anybody in acknowledgement of this wonderful recognition of Canada as a nation, suppose we stop and think a little bit of what it all means.

What is the organization of this Peace Congress? To begin with, the congress is dominated, as it should be, by the five great powers which won the war: Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States. Each of those five powers sends five delegates to the conference, making a group of twenty-five; I shall refer to that a moment later. Inside of that group, and of greater importance, is the real working body, the governing and controlling body—and I shall give my authority a moment later for that expression—the council of ten, composed of two representatives from each of the five great powers. That is the working congress, that is the real Peace Congress, that is the big circus. The others are only side shows. Now, on that Council of ten, the real working body of the Conference, Canada has no representative; and Canada never was intended to have a representative on it. There is, however, a possibility of her being represented on it in this way: Under the panel system the powers are not obliged to be represented by the same men all the time, and if Great Britain wanted to do so she could on any given occasion name a Canadian on that Council of ten. I think I am correct in stating that according to the best information only on one occasion has that privilege been given to Canada. How it was given, when it was given, and why it was given, I may have occasion to show in a few moments. But it is important to remember when we are trying to understand what our good ministers are doing over there, that on this Council of ten, which is the real Peace Conference, we have no representation at all.

Then we come to the next body, the Council of twenty-five, composed of five members of each of the great powers. On that body Canada has no representative. Canada is a nation, you see, but she has no representative on the working body of ten, and she has no representative on the Council of twenty-five. Again, I say, she could have it on both Councils by means of the panel system, Great Britain having the power to name a Canadien also on the Council of twenty-five, if she sees fit to do so. But as it appears that the Council of twenty-five never meets, we need not worry ourselves very much whether Canada gets any glory out of that representation.

Now we come to the outer circle. We have first the Council of ten, the innermost Holy of Holies, then the Council of twenty-five, which forgets to meet, like one of those commissions of which my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) was a member, and outside of these two we have the larger body which for convenience we will call the General Council. That must be composed of from seventy-five to eighty men all told, for there are twenty-five representatives from the five great powers, and representatives from all the minor powers. Canada—let us be clear now that we have got to the point where we find Canada,—has a place on that General Council. She is represented by two delegates, and the other Dominions by two or one, as the case may be. What are the functions of that General Council? Nominally, it is the big show, the whole business. In reality, it is nothing. The five great powers are dominating the whole business, and I am glad they are, because they are the ones who won the war and they ought to dominate the Conference. But there is a lot of humbug in pretending to give representation when there is really nothing to do. That General Council met at the beginning of the Conference to hear the opening-day speeches. It may have met once since, although I am by no means clear about that, and it will be called upon to meet again when the final treaty is prepared, but representation on that body is largely a matter of humbug. The real working body is the Council of ten, on which Canada is not represented. The next body is the Council of twenty-five, which does not meet. Then comes this larger body which seldom or never meets, and is not taken seriously. Membership in that larger body is largely a matter of making an appearance.

We are told in the public press that Mr. Lloyd George fought valiantly for the admission of the dominions to the Conference. I have no doubt that is true. We are told, too, that President Wilson opposed it, and that, I suppose, is also true. My hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) emphasized the fact the other day that although the Americans at first objected to the admission of the dominions, they eventually kindly waived their objection, and that everything was therefore running smoothly. I have no doubt that Mr. Lloyd George fought valiantly for us. It is a pleasure, indeed, to know that the part Canada has played in this great drama is fully appreciated by, and has made a deep impression upon, the people of England. Every English statesman recognizes the great service that Canada has rendered in the war; every English citizen is proud of Canada, and I am quite sure that Mr. Lloyd George and all his colleagues would like to please Canada in everything that is reasonable—indeed, in some things unreasonable. Now, was it reasonable that Canada should put on airs, as a separate nation, and demand admission to this Conference, when she had no business relative to the Dominion to bring before the Conference? That is a vital point. We do not deny that there is business to do. Great interests are at stake; but they do not relate, as far as we can discover, in any degree whatever to Canada, and I fail to see the reason for all this ado about Canada's representation. Well, it seems to be admitted that Mr. Lloyd George fought valiantly for Canada's representation, and that Mr. Wilson opposed the proposal. I give Mr. Lloyd George credit for his efforts on our behalf, and appreciate the generosity of his heart, but if President Wilson opposed our representation I cannot help thinking that he did so on very sound and logical grounds. President Wilson, we are told, abandoned his objection. I wish we could learn the circumstances that led to the abandonment of his previous attitude in the matter. In the absence of that information we are left to imagination. Imagination at times is too picturesque, but occasionally one can conjecture fairly accurately a probable state of facts, and I can imagine the interview between Mr. Lloyd George and President Wilson in regard to this matter. Mr. Lloyd George probably says to Mr. Wilson: "Now, Mr. Wilson, don't make a fuss over this matter; we can fix it up." Mr. Wilson answers: "What do you mean, Mr. Lloyd George? Do you want to put the dominions in and give them representation? Have you not got your own five members from Great Britain?" "Yes," says Mr. Lloyd George. "Then," says Mr. Wilson, "what do you want more for? We have five from the United States. Suppose New York should come along and say, 'We are not quite content with the American representation as it is; we want a few more to represent the state of New York.' Would you agree to that?" "Well, no," says Mr. Lloyd George. "But they have as much right to special representation as Canada has, for the state of New York is as big a factor in the affairs of the United States as Canada is in those of the British Empire." Mr. Lloyd George looks at him significantly and says: "Well, that is all right, Mr. Wilson; you are absolutely dead right; but hold on now. We will explain this matter. You see, Mr. President, we don't intend that these Dominion people should be put into the council to do anything. We are just going to put them on for peace sake, and we want you to help us. Look at the Canadians. They are splendid fellows, but a lot of their politicians have a bee in their bonnet that they would like to call themselves a great nation, and would like to have special representation. Now, it won't hurt us to give them a kind of representation. We don't mean to put them on the Council of Ten, or the Council of Twenty-five, but merely on the outer circle which rarely or never meets at all. We will only put them alongside the smaller nations, like Liberia and Siam, and you can easily see no harm will be done. It will please our Canadian friends for some time, while it will hurt neither you nor me. Now, Mr. President, I am sure you will be good enough to help us play the game." President Wilson, heaving a very audible sigh of relief, says: "Oh! That's a different thing; I thought you were in earnest when you put up such a strenuous fight. I thought you meant to give the Dominion a real and serious part in the game." "Mr. President," says Mr. Lloyd George, "you are from across the water and you don't know the game of diplomacy quite well. Be a sport, and play the game," he adds, playfully poking the President in the ribs. President Wilson, a kindly and obliging soul, replies: "Now that you put it that way, Mr. Lloyd George, I can really see no harm in it." Then, Mr. Lloyd George informs Mr. Wilson that there are a lot of committees and sub-committees which do not meet very often. "We can distribute the Dominion men all over these," he says. "For instance, we can put one man on a committee to inquire into the assigning of the boundaries Boriabolla-gha. You know the Canadians; they are your neighbours, splendid chaps; but they are not bothering themselves about this business at all. They are going on sawing wood and paying taxes, and doing other chores. It is just a few politicians—not a bad lot you know—who want to put on frills, and it would be awfully nice of you to help us help them."

Well, this thing has become so palpable that it cannot escape notice. Our friends the ministers were fortunate enough to have with them a most capable press agent —indeed, one of the ablest journalists in Canada—and if there was any business to do over there that concerned Canada and that needed explanation, no man could do it better than my friend Mr. John W. Dafoe, of Winnipeg. But you cannot make bricks if you have neither straw nor clay; and as there was no Canadian business to transact, what in the world could Mr. Dafoe do? Day after day he sent telegrams explaining this, that, and the other thing, and the very multitude of his telegrams became confusing. Well, we got occasional glimpses from other sources. Among the gentlemen who have been in Paris in connection, not particularly with the Peace Conference, but with various surrounding matters, a couple of gentlemen were sent from among the hard-headed farmers of Western Canada, to look after the wheat business. One of these gentlemen was Mr. Norman Lambert, the secretary of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, a very capable man. As far as I can see, he is an absolutely disinterested witness. I do not see that he can have any possible object in picturing things other than they really are. My friend the President of the Privy Council has tried to paint a picture of the grandeur of this work in which our ministers are engaged over there. Well, he has not been over there himself, and consequently must take things on hearsay. I desire to read a passage or two from the pen of a man who has been on the other side, a capable and reputable witness. I have not the pleasure of knowing Mr. Lambert personally, but I believe he is a gentleman of absolutely good repute. He has referred, in a public letter he wrote not long ago, to this story of the Council of twenty-five—the body that does not meet. He says:

"This spendid vision of a council of Twenty-five, however, suddenly vanished, and out of it sprang the indomitable Council of Ten, comprised of the Prime Ministers and Foreign Secretaries of the five great allied powers, in reality the Supreme War Council of Versailles. No meetings of the Twenty-five have been held"— that is the body on which we do not get any representation; but if we have no meetings, we need not cry over the absence of our members.

"No meetings of the Twenty-five have been held, and the great Britannic Commonwealth has been represented entirely by Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Balfour. As one crestfallen Canadian delegate expressed himself to me"—

Mark you, a Canadian minister.

"As one crestfallen Canadian delegate expressed himself to me, the proposed Council of Twenty-five was just so much eye-wash."

I would like it to be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the word "eyewash" is not mine; it is not even a word of the correspondent whom I am quoting. It is the word of the Canadian minister, the crestfallen minister, given to the correspondent.

Now, if we have to rely upon our English dictionaries for an explanation I admit that there may be some difficulty in quite understanding the application of the word "eye-wash" to this particular state of affairs. But I believe I am correct when I say that the word "eye-wash" is French for camouflage. Mr. Lambert proceeds:

The reason for such eye-wash—

Camouflage.

—is not quite clear as yet to anybody outside the Ten, least of all to the Overseas Ministers.

So, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will see that I am giving you a fairly good authority for the picture I am trying to present to you of the true inwardness of this Canadian representation at the Peace Conference. He says that the thing is not satisfactory to the Overseas Minister and he goes on:

In order that the members of the British Peace Delegation from Overseas and the delegates from the nineteen small nations should have something to do, the Conference very graciously appointed them to a number of investigating commissions and special committees.

I described that to you a moment ago.

The Hon. A. L. Sifton, for instance, was made the principal British delegate on the Commission to report on international claims in connection with ports, rivers, and railways. Sir Robert Borden was asked to be a member of a commission to go to Prinkipo to deal with the Bolshevists, and also to join another body in determining the claims of Greece to greater territory. Hon. C. J. Doherty was named as a member of the British Sub-Committee on the League of Nations, but for some unexplained reason, no meeting of Mr. Doherty's Committee was ever called. He finally issued a statement to the press setting forth his views on the organization of a League of Nations, and thus was able to let the world know that the representative from Canada at Paris at least was thinking about the League of Nations.

In that little picture of our busy ministers overseas we have taken into account the Prime Minister, with his eyes towards Prinkipo, we have Mr. Doherty showing that he is thinking about the League of Nations, we have Mr. Sifton who seems to be looking after claims in connection with ports, rivers, railways and various other things which are not ports, rivers and railways over here. But there is a missing man. What in the world has become of our good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster)? The only explanation I can offer of it is that our good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce was too old a bird to be caught with chaff of that sort. I think that when he came to size up the situation he said to himself: "Now, I think that instead of waiting around in the anteroom of the Conference Chamber for something to turn up I had better go down and take a stroll on the boulevard, have an occasional sip of pink lemonade and watch the passing show." If the Minister of Trade and Commerce did that, I commend his judgment, for I think it would be more profitable as well and more agreeable than sitting around the Conference Chamber doing nothing. I have said that this humbug became really so patent that it could no longer be concealed. I have shown you what the opinion of Mr. Lambert was. Now, let me look at Mr. Dafoe's official correspondence. Mr. Dafoe made a brave effort to put the best face on the matter and I commend him for it. He is a master of the art of making much ado about nothing. But he said: We cannot keep up the game any longer, the Canadian people will see through it, and so one day he sent out this despatch—I have not the date of it but it is some time in February:

There is undoubtedly a good deal of feeling at the concentration of the Conference powers in the hands of a small committee of the Great Powers, and it is also a fact that this feeling is shared to some degree by the Dominions which recognize that the assumption of the right of control by the Council of Ten has limited their participation in the affairs of the Conference, as provided by the original plan of organization. This feeling found expression at the last Conference and there is likely to be further evidence of it at the coming meeting.

They could not keep up the game any longer, they had to admit that all this was humbug and they entered this protest. I have not the date of that despatch but on the 19th February I find a later telegram from Mr. Dafoe. You will remember that the 19th February was only a short time ago and that our ministers have been away since November last and have been in Paris days, weeks, months, looking after the Peace Conference. On the 19th February Mr. Dafoe says:

For the first time a representative of the Overseas Dominions has served on The Supreme Council of Ten, the governing body of the Peace Conference. The British Empire's representatives at this afternoon's sitting were Mr. Balfour, the British Foreign Minister, and Sir Robert Borden.

So you see that after long and weary delays, after days and weeks and months sitting around looking for a chance to do something, at last, long last, Sir Robert Borden is asked to go in that day, that sunny afternoon, on the 19th February. Of course, this was a great day! Of course, some great big thing was going to be done, some grand thing, something of importance to Canada, and that is why Sir Robert Borden was invited to be present! Now, listen:

The matter before the Council was Serbia's claim for enlarged territory.

Far be it from me to underestimate for a single moment the talents of our respected Prime Minister. We all know him here as a gentleman who is well equipped, a lawyer of high standing, and we all know that if there is anything to do, any real business falling within the scope of his professional attainments, he would do it and acquit himself well. But, is it any discourtesy to him to say that if anybody was needed to consider the boundary lines of Serbia there are twenty clerks in the British Foreign Office who could do it better than the Prime Minister of Canada? Surely all this pretence of Canada having a great part in this Conference is largely humbug. When Canada accomplishes anything in the way of constitutional reform we should be glad to know it and to express our gratitude to those who bring it about. If Canada should acquire any dignity anywhere we should be pleased to know it, but, seriously, does it bring any dignity to Canada to be nominally connected with the Peace Conference under the circumstances described in these statements which I have presented to you—not my statements but information coming direct from headquarters in Paris? No, sir.

If my feeble voice could reach those gentlemen over there I would dare to say to them: "Good friends, come home; there is real business to be done in Canada. If it were not so, we would not hurry you. You Ministers are a hard worked lot; we would not begrudge you a holiday amid the pleasant surroundings of gay Paree, but there is too much real work to be done at home." If the Prime Minister still hungers for the society of the Bolsheviki down at Prinkipo, I would suggest that he read the description of them given by the hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) the other day. My hon. friend pictured them very eloquently indeed and told us what kind of people the Bolsheviki are. Although I have no right to speak for the House generally on many things, I am going to assume that I will have the right on this question to say to Sir Robert Borden: "In the name of the Parliament of Canada do not have any truck or trade with those Bolsheviki." And if anybody is needed to settle the bounds of Serbia, or any other question of that kind, important as it may be to some people, there are a hundred persons over there who can do it much better than our respected ministers, and so I would beg them, "Come home, come home, there is lots of Canadian business to be done."

This idea of Canada being a nation seems to have seized the imagination of some people. They like to talk about it, they usually get the notion into their heads that it is a great big thing, that it is elevating Canada. Now I am not able to see it in that light. There is too much talk about Canada being a nation, loose talk; there is too much disposition to magnify our own importance without just cause. There was a report laid on the table of the House a week ago, a remarkable report, giving us some information as to the management of a large branch of the public business of Canada, and in that report the Commissioners said: "The art of doing nothing and making it look like real work seems to have been highly cultivated." Well, Sir, I think that somewhere in the departments here there must be a school of instruction for that sort of thing, and I think our ministers when they went overseas must have been taking lessons in that school, because ever since they have gone, there has been an effort to make it appear that they are doing wonderfully big things, and making of Canada a big nation, when, if I may dare to quote the words, the classic words, of a Canadian statesman no longer with us, "There aint nothing to it." Canada a nation! There is a sense in which Canada is a nation. The British Empire has been happily described as a galaxy of nations, and in that sense Canada is a nation. But in world affairs Canada is not a nation, and I for one am not inclined to look with great joy when I find the ministers over there setting forth a claim that hereafter Canada is to be known as a separate state. I quote these words from Lord Curzon, speaking in the British House of Lords. In his statement he uses the words that the place of the Dominions in the Conference was an admission that these countries were henceforth to be regarded as separate states by themselves. By themselves! That is to say that the Canadian ministers, and the other Dominion ministers, have put forth the claim that these Dominions are separate states. I do not like that, Mr. Speaker, I think it rather makes more for the separation that we used to be warned against than for the unity which we all desire. If our present state of affairs is not satisfactory—I know there are men who tell us occasionally that it is not—I would like to say to those who have any change to propose, "Give it to us in plain terms and let us see what it is." Imperial federation is a magnificent dream, and we are all better for dreaming it. I cling to the hope that one day—I do not know by what process—not by radical measures, not by revolution, but by that process of evolution under which the British constitution has developed "Where freedom broadens slowly down from precedent to precedent," by that process I hope and believe we will bring about some closer union between the Mother Country and the various portions of the Empire. There is an Imperialism and an Imperialism. There is an Imperialism which has been happily described as "jingoism," an Imperialism which blows the horn, and beats the drum, and waves the flag, and shouts about its own loyalty and questions the loyalty of other men who do not agree with it. If that is Imperialism, from it, good Lord deliver us all.

But there is another, and I think a truer Imperialism, to which I am proud to subscribe. If to be a loyal subject of the Crown—at this time when crowns are tumbling all around—if to be proud of British citizenship; if to feel that the British Empire is the greatest force, under divine Providence, for the spread of freedom and the extension of civilization throughout the world; if to desire all portions of that grand empire to come into harmonious co-operation, and into as much unity as is consistent with the maintenance of our own autonomy—if that be Imperialism, then I am proud to call myself an Imperialist. But I would earnestly beg that those who want change, those who are dissatisfied, will tell us plainly and squarely what their grievance is. I know of no grievance that Canada has. Canada has no difficulty in regard to her foreign relations. She has no need of asserting herself as a separate state—I am quoting again the words of Lord Curzon that these Dominions now claim themselves to be separate states. We have had occasion to deal with international affairs, but we never up to this moment had any minister of our Dominion set forth the claim that we were to be a separate state. We have long, Sir, had the right, with the co-operation of the British Government, to deal with international affairs when they concerned Canada. Go back a few years to 1872, to the time of the Treaty of Washington. Go back earlier. No doubt in the olden days there was a time when Canada was not consulted; when the colonies were not consulted, when the colonies had not advanced to the status which they have since obtained, when treaties were made by Great Britain and they bound the empire whether we liked them or not. But that has all passed away. By the legitimate, constitutional development of Canada we long ago acquired the right to be heard and consulted in our international affairs. In 1872 when the Treaty of Washington had to be negotiated, Sir John Macdonald went to Washington along with the Imperial Commissioners. He did not say, "I come as representing a separate state." He said, "I come as representing the British Empire." And when, a little later, the fishery question came up, and when Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and Sir Charles Tupper went to Washington to deal with matters from the Canadian point of view, the Canadian representative did not set up any claim that Canada was a separate state; he went there as a commissioner of the Empire, empowered by the British Government. A little later a small treaty, not a big treaty—a lopsided and unfair treaty, by the way—was made at Paris on behalf of Canada by Lord Dufferin, the British Ambasador, associated with Sir Charles Tupper, then High Commissioner for Canada. But Sir Charles Tupper did not put forward any plea to be considered as the representative of a separate state; it was enough for him that he represented the British Empire. Come down a little later. It fell to my lot to be associated with my friend—not now in politics—now Mr. Justice Brodeur to negotiate what I believe we may call the most important commercial arrangement with a foreign country that was ever transacted on behalf of Canada—the Franco-Canadian Treaty of 1908. Well, Sir, when my friend Mr. Brodeur and I went to the conference, went to the office at Paris, the very place where the Council is meeting to-day, the Foreign Office at the Quai d'Orsay, we were received with respect as the representatives of Canada, because our French friends knew we had come to do Canadian business. But I do not hesitate to say that we were received with greater respect, and whatever we had to say and do had very much greater weight, because my colleague and I were able to place before the Government of Mr. Clemenceau—for the old Tiger was then as now Premier of France—and because we were able to place in the hands of Mr. Pichon—who was then and is again to-day, in the whirligig of French politics, Foreign Minister—because we were able to place on the table of the Foreign Office at Paris our credentials as the plenipotentiaries of His Majesty, signed by King Edward. That was the thing that gave us weight, and strength, and power, in addition to whatever power and authority we had as ministers of Canada. That is the way these negotiations have been conducted in the past. What more could we ask? What more can we ask by way of liberty from the British Government than we have to-day? I do not hesitate to say, Sir, I can think of no change that we can ask in our relations to-day which will be at the same time of advantage to the Empire, and acceptable to our Canadian people. There have been schemes of Imperial federation devised, worthy, I am sure, in their purpose, devised by people who are very patriotic and thought they were doing good, but which one of these schemes has ever been found acceptable to the Empire, or even to the Canadian people? Not one of them, Sir, down to this moment.

The President of the Privy Council (Hon. N. W. Rowell) said the other day that the present condition was intolerable, inconceivable; that we could not go on as we are. "Inconceivable"—Sir, the word is not new; there is a familiar ring about it. For a generation and more men have been telling us that things could not go on as they were; that conditions were intolerable, inconceivable. Fussy but well meaning men in the Mother Country have been devising schemes for reorganizing the constitution of the Empire and have been telling us that it is intolerable and inconceivable that things should go on as they are. But the thing which was inconceivable and intolerable persisted in going on. When the South African war came, hundreds and thousands of Canadian boys volunteered and went to South Africa to fight for the flag; out of the intolerable and inconceivable conditions sprang the splendid movement which brought honour to Canada and honour to the flag. Then, we had the same cry; things were intolerable, inconceivable. And what happened? The great war came on. We had been told by these worthy but well-meaning people that if their particular fad or constitution were not adopted, the British Empire would go to the "demnition bow-wows." But when the great war came on, without any demand from anybody, by the free voice of the Canadian people supported by the Canadian Parliament, we raised half a million men to fight for the flag. Intolerable? No, Sir; these things are not intolerable; they are not inconceivable.

True, there is an anomaly in the position. I grant you at once that if we had been obliged to take part in the war, having no voice in the making of it, the condition would be inconceivable and intolerable. But under the principles of our constitution the only power which in reality could carry Canada into the war was the power of this Parliament; and I see nothing inconceivable, nothing intolerable, in that situation so long as the thing that we do is the result of our free voice. I have said that I should be glad if some scheme of closer union could be devised. So far, I have not seen any, and until some better scheme is devised may it not be wisdom that we should rather "bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of"?

What is it that Canada wants that she had not to-day? I do not think that Canada has any grievance in her relations with the Mother Country, and I see no particular reason why we should distress our souls over the situation. I fear that out of this glamour of a separate nation, out of this glamour of Canada playing a part of her own, will come some scheme by which we shall grasp for the shadow of a vague imperialism and lose the substance of the autonomy which we already possess.

I want to touch now on a more material question, that of the tariff. We have heard a great deal about it; no doubt we shall hear much more about it in the days to come. There is alarm and surprise in Canada on the part of a large section of our respected fellow-citizens, the manufacturers. They are very much alarmed at the outlook, especially in the West. There is just cause for their alarm. When they see the movement in the West; when they see these many meetings of agricultural organizations; when they see the legislatures of Manitoba and Saskatchewan unanimously passing resolutions demanding great tariff changes; when they find hon. gentlemen on your right, Mr. Speaker, demanding great tariff changes in general terms; when they find hon. gentlemen on your left declaring that there is no line of cleavage between them and the West and that they are prepared to act with the West—then, there is a very grave situation, and the manufacturers may well be alarmed. For their alarm there is much reason; for their surprise there is none. The situation which meets the manufacturers to-day is one which any reasonable man might very easily have anticipated. At times there are great movements of which you cannot get warning; there are tides which come without warning. I was much impressed by a passage in the speech of President Wilson at New York a few days ago when he was warning his people against some of the dangers which were presenting themselves to his mind. He said:—

> And I want to utter this solemn warning, not in the way of threat. The forces of the world do not threaten; they operate. The great tides of the world do not give notice that they are going to rise and run. They rise in their majesty and overwhelming might, and those who stand in the way are overwhelmed.

These are wise words, wise in their relation to many things in our country and in all countries to-day. But of the tide that is rising in our western country there was no lack of warning.

What was the condition of the western country and of Canada generally a few years ago? Shall I dare speak of the year 1911? Generally, Canada was prosperous, more than prosperous in her western territory. While the whole country was doing pretty well, a careful observer might have noticed that the greatest prosperity was coming to Canada in the West; that the greatest growth of Canada was in the West, and it would not have required very much wisdom and sagacity to look ahead and see the consequences which were to follow from that condition. Unfortunately, our manufacturing friends did not seem to see it. I should not speak of manufacturers generally, because there were many sane exceptions—I will not be invidious and say honourable exceptions, because they were all animated by what they believed to be their own interests. I am making no reflection on the motives of any, but the manufacturers were solemnly warned. I am going to read to you some words—they are worth something, though the one who spoke them may be of no significance—from an address that was delivered in the midst of the manufacturers in Montreal in March, 1911. The speaker was a Liberal, supporting reciprocity. He made an allusion to a speech that he had made on a previous occasion, and then proceeded to enlarge his idea. He said:—

> I ventured to point out to the manufacturers of Canada—

That was in the previous speech.

—that it was a mistake for them to array themselves in antagonism to the people of the Western Provinces. That opinion I want to express again to-day. There is the danger that East and West may be brought into antagonism. The danger is not to be found in Reciprocity itself, but the danger is that the manufacturing interests of this country and their allied moneyed interests will array themselves in hostility to the growing feeling of the Western farmers. Don't make any mistake about it—the day is within sight of the younger men here, and of some who are not so young, when there will be more people west of the Great Lakes than east of the Great Lakes. The West is going some day to dominate Canada and we, who live in the East, if we are wise, may as well look ahead and see this. What kind of a West is it to be? Is it to be a wise and prudent and sympathetic West; or is it to be a rash and reckless and dangerous West? The answer can be made by the manufacturers of the Dominion and the allied moneyed interests to-day. I do not hesitate to say that with proper care, with fair treatment, with reasonable argument, we can bring the Western farmer to be sympathetic and to be willing to work in harmony with the people of the Eastern country, who have done so much for the building up of the West.

But suppose you do not do that. Suppose the manufacturers should organize to-day with their money to defeat this agreement. I want to tell you, my brethren, that there will grow up in that western country a dangerous feeling. Don't make any mistake about it. I beg the manufacturers of this country—I always talk frankly to them and I am doing so now—I beg them not to range themselves up against the farmers of the West. The manufacturers are not hurt; they are more frightened than hurt. I give it to you as my opinion, worth much or worth little, that if by the forces of the manufacturers this agreement be destroyed, there will grow up in that western country a feeling that will be dangerous to the manufacturing interests of Canada and dangerous to the welfare of this Dominion.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Whose words were these? I did not catch the name.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think that is of importance. The words are of value; it is of no importance who spoke them. The very condition that is spoken of in those words is facing us to-day. It did not require any great sagacity to make that prediction; it was the observation of the signs of the times. In the West we find that every prediction made at that time is coming true. The manufacturers, who were looking out for number one, unfortunately did not observe what was coming. I do not blame them for looking out for number one. I am not questioning their motives; I am questioning their wisdom. A person has to look out for number one to a certain extent, because if a person does not look after his own interests, nobody else will look after it for him. But there is an intelligent selfishness and a clumsy selfishness, and I think our manufacturers indulged in a clumsy selfishness when they ranged themselves against that reciprocity agreement. What is to be the outcome of all this? We have seen in the meetings in the West; we have seen in the resolutions of the legislatures of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and we see elsewhere all through the West, the evidence of a deep feeling of unrest, of discontent, a determination that the West will no longer allow itself to be dominated by the East. We see it in the expressions of hon. gentlemen here to-day who, in their earnest desire to help the Government, are refraining from saying things that they would like to say. What is going to be the outcome of it all. Some of our Liberal friends from the West have, somehow or other, had the besetting sin of failing to adequately recognize and appreciate the measure of tariff reform that they received from the former Liberal Government. I am afraid that I shall have to include my eloquent friend, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) in that remark, and also our respected friend, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders), who spoke last night. When he condemned all the old political parties, and then when he told us of the splendid things he expected to get in the way of tariff reform from the present Government, the mental comment I made was: "I have not seen such great faith, no, not in Israel." I do not know how much tariff reform my hon. friend is going to get from the present Government, but I know there are, in the West, conditions which will press themselves upon us all. But we are told that the old parties were no good; we are told that the old Liberal Government did not do anything, and that is where lay the besetting sin of my hon. friends, that they were not ready to proclaim how much the Laurier Government had done in times past. And when some Conservative critic said that we had made no material change in the tariff; that we had simply continued the old National Policy, sometimes our Liberal friends who should have sprung to their feet and answered the question, held their peace and let it be assumed that there was something in the charge. There is nothing in the charge. The Laurier Government did great things in the way of tariff reform for the people of Canada. This is susceptible of proof by figures. If you consider only the saving of money by way of taxation at the Custom house; that is to say, if you look at what was paid in Customs taxes during the period of the Laurier Government, and then if you ascertain what would have been paid if the old rate of duty under the former Conservative Government had remained in force, you will be able to establish by actual figures that the actual saving on that item used to be a good deal of money those days, approached one hundred million dollars. That even when men were accustomed to think in millions, and not in billions. But my hon. friends who are interested in tariff questions will bear me out in this, that when you increase the tariff on a class of goods that are made at home, not only do you get the increased duty which you collect at the Customs house, but for every dollar that you collect at the Custom house for increased duty, the consumer pays to the manufacturer two dollars which does not go into the public treasury. Per contra, when you reduce your tariff to the extent of a sum representing in a given period something approaching $100,000,000 in the savings of Customs taxes, you, at the same time, give to the people of this country $2, in saving on the cost of their manufactured goods as against the other one dollar, and the money that is saved to the people is not $100,000,000, but, in all probability, $300,000,000. That would have been a good statement for my Liberal friends from the West to make, instead of some of the statements that have been made in this House. I think my Liberal friends did not support us as much as they should have done on this question.

There is another argument that might have been used with a great deal of force. If we made no change in the tariff, if we continued the old National Policy, how did it happen that the Conservative party, under the leadership of one of the fathers of the National Policy, attacked us bitterly for our new tariff, declaring that we were going to ruin the industries of this country? As a mere matter of reason and logic, that would have been an excellent argument for any of my hon. friends from the West. There is another point. The Laurier Government gave up its political life for the cause. They had given the West and the nation a great measure of tariff reform, but they were not content to rest there. They knew that there were conditions in the West which required more thoughtful consideration. They knew that if they could meet, to some extent, the feeling of the western people they would be doing a great deal for the country and a good thing for the manufacturers too. So they devised the reciprocity agreement. Sir, I have some reason for regret to-day. In these days when men who did not support reciprocity are proclaiming every day that it is the thing which the country needs, I have to regret that a noble Canadian who was associated with me in that work is not here to-day to hear the vindication of his own policy. I am sorry that some of our Liberal friends in the West have not thought more over these things. I should not speak of gratitude for favours. There should be no favours in public life—nothing but rights. Unfortunately, in almost every walk of life gratitude is a somewhat scarce commodity. But if I may not speak of gratitude I may speak of justice, and I say that the intelligent and fair-minded people of western Canada when they look over the record and think of these things will not conclude that the Laurier Government failed in its effort to please the western people in its fiscal policy.

Now, the question is coming up again, and how is it to be dealt with? We are told by some of my Liberal friends: "You must not have anything to do with politics; the wicked parties must be pushed aside." Later on, I wish to say something about party politics. We are told there should be no Grit and no Tory—stand up by yourself and blaze your own trail. I say, with all due respect, that that is very bad advice. I want to say in all sincerity that if our western or eastern friends or any other people imagine they are going to accomplish any great reform in this country except through the instrumentality of one or other of the two great parties in this country, they are cherishing a delusion. This country has been ruled by parties and it is my humble judgment that this country is going to be ruled at no distant day by parties again. The best place for a man to show his independence is within his own party ranks. An independent man within his own party ranks can do a great deal in keeping his party straight, but if he, owing to his peculiar views, stands outside party lines and tries to play his game alone he very soon finds that he can do precious little in this House alone. He may carry some measure, not of vast importance, but of some degree of interest. He may be able to play the part of a pioneer and say: "I know I can do nothing to-day, but I will plant the seed and by and by my grandchildren will see its fruits." Men have done noble service for humanity in just that way, but nothing can be accomplished early by that method. Even if you have a particular measure to which nobody seems opposed and in which you seem to have got so much of the virtue of life that everybody says it is all right, only once in a blue moon does your independent man get a measure of that kind carried through Parliament. It may be an interesting measure, but it certainly will not be a big measure. You cannot accomplish any large measure of reform, as you very well know, Sir, without having some money, and if your independent man or group of independent men comes forward with some measure of his own which he thinks is absolutely good, your eagle eye, Sir, will detect a coloured man in the fence or a dollar of expenditure involved and not only can he not have his Bill passed but you will not allow him to move or discuss it. You cannot do anything big alone. A man does not live to himself alone. We must co-operate with others. The farmers are being advised to have nothing to do with parties, and the same advice is being given to soldiers and to labour men, but I say—and I have the farmers particularly in mind now, although it applies to the others as well—that the so-called independent group which stands alone and snaps its fingers at parties will never get anywhere; it will never accomplish anything. That is self-evident. Under our system of government you cannot do anything except by identifying yourself, not slavishly, but in a manly, independent way, with one or the other of the great political parties in this country. So I say to my farmer friends of the West: If your idea is that all political parties are bad, and if you will have nothing to do with these wicked people but are going to stand alone and play a lone hand, you will have lots of fun in playing it, but you will never take a trick in the wide world.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: May I, not in any spirit of hostility, suggest that Cobden is an instance to the contrary?

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend can tell me that as an independent man so-called, he could get through this House any measure of great importance without the intervention and support of the Government, he will give me a valuable piece of information. I want to say in all sincerity to my farmer friends that if they want to accomplish anything in this great work they must look over the ground and see which of the two great political parties—and there are going to be two; I am not speaking of immediate action—comes nearest to his views. Neither party will do all he wants. I should not like to subscribe to-day to all the opinions that have been set forth in the claims of our respected western friends. I should prefer to have a free hand so that I might deal with any question that comes up in the light that Heaven may give me at the moment. I do not see the wisdom of committing one's self to a thousand and one details in advance, but this I will say: For the greater part of their programme, for the general trend towards lower taxation, for greater freedom of trade, for reciprocity and all the things Liberalism has battled for in the past I shall stand in the future and help my farmer friends to get them.

I would say, with all deference to those advising them to keep out of politics, that until they are able to pursue that course they will accomplish nothing. I do not suggest slavish support to his party by any hon. member, be he Grit or Tory; but I do say that the party system, with all its faults, is after all the best system that statesmen have been able to devise for the government of the affairs of the people. Nothing can be accomplished in a large way except through the instrumentality of one party or the other. Choose you which you will serve.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FIELDING (resuming): Mr. Speaker, just before the Deputy Speaker left the Chair at six o'clock, I was endeavouring, necessarily in a somewhat hurried way, to present a review of the tariff policy of the Laurier Government, particularly in reference to the western country, and with some reference to the future tariff policy, and particularly as to the manner in which any great reform must be accomplished in this country. I do not wish to enlarge on that subject now. It is enough to say that I realize that it is a question of very great importance and that upon whomever may fall the responsibility of dealing with the question, he will have to approach it with a sense of its immense importance in relation to a great many interests in this country.

There is only one point I care to add. I have noticed a revival of the movement to establish what is called a permanent tariff commission. Several years ago the Conservative Government introduced a measure to appoint such a commission. The measure failed to pass the Senate, and for the session it was abandoned. The Government did not revive it. I judge from that fact that on further consideration they came to the conclusion that the policy was not a wise one. If that was their conclusion I desire to endorse it very warmly, because I am persuaded that the appointment of a tariff commission is not the best way of dealing with tariff affairs in the Dominion of Canada. There is such a commission in the United States, it is true, but the methods of dealing with these things in the United States are not the same as in our country. I need hardly remind the House that in the United States members of the Government have nothing to do practically with the tariff question. The tariff is dealt with by a committee of Congress. The argument in favour of a tariff commission is that members of the Government cannot, with the thousand and one things they have to do, understand fully the tariff question and deal with it in the best way. Therefore, it is argued, they should have a body of experts to deal with it. I noticed quite recently in the Montreal Gazette, a very influential Conservative paper, revival of the argument in favour of a tariff commission. I want to quote a passage from that article in order that I may answer it. The Montreal Gazette of March 5 says:

> What a permanent tariff commission may recommend, and what the Government may accept, are not necessarily the same thing, and, in any event, Government, and not the commission, must stand or fall by its tariff policy.

That is a very plausible statement, Mr. Speaker, but when we come to analyse it it absolutely fails to carry conviction. See what the situation is. We are told that there ought to be a tariff commission because the minister, the members of the Government, with the thousand and one things they have to do, cannot sufficiently attend to the tariff question. In other words—I do not say it offensively—the theory is that the Government, and the Minister of Finance, who is usually the officer of the Government dealing with such matters, are incompetent to deal with the tariff question. Therefore, they say, we will appoint a tariff commission which is competent. Then, we are told, after the tariff commission has reported, it is for the Government to say whether it will or will not adopt the recommendation. See how strange the situation would be. The Government are, according to the argument, incompetent to deal with the question; therefore, you appoint competent men, and after your competent men have been sitting in judgment and have made a report and decided what we ought to do, you are going to leave it to the incompetent men to decide that they shall set that report aside. The thing is preposterous.

Under our system of government responsibility for the tariff, the greatest taxing machine we have, must rest with the Government and for it they must be responsible to Parliament. Under the custom of our Government the Minister of Finance becomes the proper person to deal with that question. It is certainly to be desired that he shall surround himself with competent help. If he has experts to-day, by all means let him have the benefit of help. If they are not the right ones he will get others. If he needs more help get it by all means; let him surround himself with the best possible help and advice he can get in order that he may do justice to the tariff question as a whole. When that has been done let him take that advice and apply it as he thinks best, bring down his measure to Parliament, but not try to set up any tariff commission between himself and the Parliament of Canada. With that I shall pass away from the tariff question, although it is a very broad and inviting one.

So much has been said about the evils of party politics that I want to say something of the good of party politics. So many hon. gentlemen have told us of the dreadful things that have been done by party politicians. Well, the party system is not perfect. When you say that you only admit that it is a human institution. I am persuaded that those who say that have not fully realized the purpose of the party system. Undoubtedly you can point to harm that has come from party government, but on the other hand, after coming to a calm judgment upon the question, I say you can get better results from party government than from any other kind of government except under certain special circumstances, such as, I frankly say, have existed very lately.

I am going to ask the House to permit me to indulge for about three minutes in a little personal reference. I do not like to intrude my personality upon the House. But I have frequently seen in the public press references to the circumstances under which I had the honour of being elected to this House, and the statements have not always been quite accurate. It seems to me that the point is not important, but if it is worth while discussing in the press at all perhaps we might as well have the information correct. I was nominated by a Liberal convention. If that is not clear enough and you want something more explicit, I was nominated by a straight Liberal Convention. I was nominated by the same kind of convention, and largely by the same men, as those who had honoured me with nominations for many years before. There was no Unionist convention held or called. My Conservative fellow-citizens held a convention at the same time. They nominated a gentleman as their candidate, and he declined to run. I am advised, and I think I am correct, that they then nominated another gentleman, and he declined to run. Then the convention adjourned. A few days later two gentlemen prominent in the Conservative party did me the honour of calling upon me, and they said that they had been instructed by their party to say that they would be glad if I would agree to accept a nomination from them. They knew that I had already been nominated by my Liberal friends, but they proposed that I should be the nominee of both parties. I told them that it would not be wise that I should accept the suggestion. I appreciated very much their courtesy in intimating that they were not likely to oppose me. We take our politics pretty seriously in Nova Scotia, but however seriously we take our politics down there I am glad to say that in all the years I have had the honour to represent that same constituency my personal relations with my Conservative friends have always been agreeable and I have received a great many courtesies from them. I confess that I was pleased with the intimation I received from them, that they were not likely to give me any opposition. For that courtesy I gave them my warmest thanks, which thanks I repeat here to-day, but I told them that I thought it was best, as I had already been nominated by the Liberal convention, and had accepted the nomination, that I should stand by it. That is the whole situation. Before I was nominated, and after I was nominated, and before I accepted the nomination, I had a heart to heart talk with my Liberal friends. I told them that I was obliged to differ with my leader and with a great many of my friends of the Liberal party on the question of conscription. I told them, whether I was wise or not in doing so, that I supported conscription and that I must take the same position then. I told them that while I thought Union Government had come too late to effect most of its purposes, I realized the difficulty they had in appreciating the situation. While I felt that Union Government would have been much better if it had come three years before, yet, now that it had come, I was disposed to give it an independent support, especially in all matters in any way dealing with the war. One friend of mine in the convention, with that desire for clear and explicit information which I think is characteristic of Liberals, rose and said: "Mr. Fielding, I want to ask you a question: suppose when the elections are coming on —and, of course, this was before the elections—"it turns out that there is a pretty equal division of the parties up there, and the leader of the party moves a vote of want of confidence in the Government, what will you do?" I said, "I will vote against that motion. I feel it to be my duty under the circumstances to give the Government a fair chance to bring forth their measures." That was the situation, Sir, under which I left my constituency. That was my position then, and that is the position which I desire to take to-day. I think the time has not come to bring about a change of Government in this country. I am prepared to-day to play the part of an independent supporter of the Unionist Government. How many hours, days, weeks or months that condition may continue I do not presume to say; but I think I have good reason, satisfactory to myself, why it would not be wise to press for a change of Government at this moment.

In the first place, Sir, the Unionist Government has brought forth a large number of measures designed to meet the conditions which the country is obliged to face. I am willing to admit, Sir, that these gentlemen are honestly and sincerely endeavouring to make the best they can of these arrangements. I do not for a moment believe that these gentlemen have any other desire than to do the best they can in the face of the difficulties which present themselves; and for that reason I would not desire at present to have a change of Government take place. On the various questions that may come up in the House I desire to hold myself free to vote according as my judgment may lead me, and according to the merits of the issue presented. But I say now that unless some new conditions present themselves, unless there is some new situation not visible at this moment, no vote that I shall give will have for its object the turning out of the Government at the present time. There is another reason which I desire to give. I think it not advisable to make a change of Government now, because I take it for granted that a change of Government will involve a general election, and I do not think it is in the interest of the country, or of any party, that we should now have the strife of a general election. We are too near the last election to permit us to indulge in the hope that an election to-day would be carried on quietly and smoothly; the echoes and the passions of the last election would remain; we would have a bitter contest, and I am not prepared to say which side would win. I do not think, even for the interests of my friends of the Liberal party, that it is wise for them to press to-day for a change of Government. If my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) or any of his friends should to-day move an amendment to the Address I should be obliged to vote against the amendment; I should take the ground that the Government are entitled to carry their Address. That is the first step to be taken in the management of the affairs of the country, and I should be willing to have that done, and to give them a chance to produce their measures.

Another reason, Mr. Speaker—not the highest reason, not the noblest reason—is that I do not think my Liberal friends have yet brought about that degree of unanimity and unity in the party which I believe to be essential to success. Now, I believe that unity is necessary for any party; a party naturally wants unity in order to carry on its organizations; I am sure that desire must be in the minds of my Liberal friends. Surely, we will all agree in that? Then there is a further reason. With all due respect to my Conservative friends—and I speak of them with great respect, because although we differ from them we try to differ as becomes men—I am persuaded that in the conditions which exist to-day, or which will exist very soon, while any Government will have a troubled time, the only Government which can have any hope of meeting the progressive spirit of this country will be a Government dominated by the Liberal party; and that being the case my desire is that we should bring about that unity which seems to me to be essential for all good ends. We will all agree on either side, I am sure, that that unity is desirable. How is it going to be brought about? I have no special prescription to give as to how it may be done, but perhaps I can be helpful in offering some suggestions how not to do it. Unity in the Liberal party is not going to be brought about by the men of either section—for there are two sections—throwing rocks at the other, or calling the other names. Unity in the Liberal party is not going to be brought about by either party assuming towards the other a holier-than-thou attitude; nor by either section assuming that they are in exclusive possession of the ark of the covenant of Liberalism, and that all who do not agree with them are worshipping at the shrine of Tory idolatry. None of these things will bring about Liberal unity.

Lastly, may I say that unity in the Liberal party is not going to be brought about by any kind and generous offer to give Christian forgiveness to the wandering brother. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition made a speech which was admirable in its tone, and moderate throughout; there was hardly anything in it that anybody could take exception to. If I had to take any exception at all it would be to the passage which has been so much talked about, as to the light in the window and the latch string hanging out. My hon. friend I know extended that invitation in the true spirit of Scottish hospitality, but if he will read it carefully again he will find that there is running through it that note of Christian forgiveness to which I referred, as though he were saying, "Poor wandering boys, we are sorry you made such a huge mistake, but if you will come back—we do not say, like the Master, go and sin no more, we say, come and sin no more; and if you will just be good and not do this thing any more you will be welcomed back to the old home". Well, Sir, although I admit that this is all done in the kindest spirit, it jars upon the ears of some of us. If there was a suspicion of something of that kind in the speech of my good friend the leader of the Opposition, there was more than a suspicion of it in the remarks of two or three other hon. gentlemen who spoke. Now, Mr. Speaker, the men who wandered away, if that is the phrase, we are not sure they did wander away; but these men who, for conscience sake, for empire's sake, for what they believed to be right, separated themselves from the friends with whom they were associated, separated themselves from the leader whom they loved—these men are not asking any forgiveness; they have no apologies to offer, they have no regrets to express. They felt that they were right; they feel now that they were right. But I do not wish to insist that they alone were right. They recognize that the question of conscription was a large one upon which men might differ. They realize that the men who supported conscription and the men who opposed conscription might be equally loyal and patriotic. We who supported conscription did not for a moment, and do not now, question the loyalty or the patriotism of the men who opposed conscription. They were within their rights. If we give them that credit, and do not for a moment question their loyalty or their patriotism, is it too much to ask that similar consideration shall be given to the others? Is it too much to ask now that we shall consider that question one upon which men may honourably differ, and no longer feel that it should be a cause of quarrelling between us? If some of my Liberal friends want to proclaim that the man who supports conscription cannot be a Liberal—and I have heard that almost said in the course of the discussion—then we shall be obliged to point out that if we erred in that respect we erred in good Liberal company. We have already been reminded that we supported conscription along with Mr. Herbert Asquith, the distinguished leader of the Liberal party in England. We supported conscription along with Mr. David Lloyd George, who, though he may be criticised to-day, has surely been a large contributor to the upbuilding of Liberalism in Great Britain. We supported conscription along with five-sixths of the Liberal party in the British House of Commons. We supported conscription along with Lord Crewe and Lord Bryce—James Bryce as we know him better—and all the Liberals in the House of Lords.

We have supported conscription, Sir, in common with the great mass of the Liberals of the Mother Country; we have supported conscription along with the most distinguished figure in the Liberalism of the world to-day, President Woodrow Wilson. If we are able to point to these examples; if we are able to show some reason for what we believed to be right, though we do not insist that we only were right; may we not ask my hon. friends of the Liberal party to revise their judgment on some of these questions? May we not ask them, not to admit that they were wrong, but simply to admit the possibility that the other fellow may have been right; that there may have been two sides to the question? And when my hon. friends invite us to return to the home, when they tell us that the latch string is hanging out, perhaps they would do well—the Scripture says: "Let a man examine himself"—to give a little consideration to the question whether or not the home to which they invite us is really the old homestead; whether it may not be that they, rather than we, have wandered away. The point is worth considering; and with a very old and hackneyed story, which is very appropriate, I will close this portion of my remarks. It is the story of an Indian who was found wandering in the forest. A passer-by stopped him and said: "John, what is the matter, are you lost?" "Lost?" was the answer; "No, Indian not lost; Indian here—wigwam lost."

The speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, deals with several matters which, strictly speaking, are of local concern. Legislation is foreshadowed with regard to technical education, to housing schemes, to highways and to public health—all matters which are largely, if not entirely, within the field of the local legislatures. Some of my Liberal friends feel so strongly on the question of provincial rights that they have objected to the Government legislating on these subjects at all. Well, I do not care to go quite so far as that; I would rather have these things done with the help of the Dominion than not have them done at all. The Fathers of Confederation, who are often so highly praised, especially by those who know least about their work, made a sad mess of the financial relations between the Dominion and the provinces. For years efforts have been made to straighten them out, but even yet these relations are hardly satisfactory. The provinces gave up to the Dominion the power of taxation in respect of customs and excise. There is this curious difference between the eastern and the western provinces: the western provinces were created by the Dominion, whereas the eastern provinces created the Dominion; the provinces are the fathers in the East, the Dominion is the father in the West. The eastern provinces, then, surrendered their right of taxation, thus enabling the Dominion to gather into the Federal treasury enormous sums of money. The theory of the scheme was that there was a reservation of a sufficient sum to enable the provinces to carry on their work efficiently. Time very soon proved, Sir, that the provision made for the provinces was entirely inadequate. For some years nothing was done; Sir John A. Macdonald was so proud of the Confederation scheme that he would not permit any change of it, he would not listen to any suggestion of change from the provinces. When the old chief passed away and other people came to the front, somehow or other they listened to the claims of the provinces and once or twice material changes have been made by which the provinces have been put in a better position to handle their affairs. But, even as it stands to-day, the provinces have not sufficient means. If, then, technical education is desirable; if housing is desirable; if the public health improvement is desirable; even if roads and bridges are desirable, I say at once that while I regret that the provinces are not able to do these things, I am prepared to help the Dominion Government do them rather than have them not done at all.

As to the question of highways, there is a danger. The matter has been before the House in time past, and the impression has seemed to grow that the Dominion Government wished to get control of the highways for party purposes. All I care to say about that is this: if the Dominion Government are to provide money for any given purpose and are to put it in the hands of the local governments, the Dominion Government may reasonably ask assurance that the money shall be applied to that particular purpose. That is a fair provision. If the Dominion Government are to provide money for roads, they should require of the provincial governments the assurance that the money will be spent on road schemes. Beyond that, I do not think that the Government should interfere; they should let the province handle the business and be responsible for it.

And that same principle would apply to other things. In regard to public health, may I say a word? I do not know whether the project of the Government contemplates the creation of a department of public health with a minister at the head of it. We have a good many ministers now; we have been splitting up departments in order to appoint more, and I rather think the Government could arrange this thing without increasing the number of ministers. However, the argument is commonly used that a department of public health will be created at the head of which an eminent medical man will be placed. There are on both sides of this House quite a number of eminent medical men; I have no doubt that there are a dozen men here any one of whom would honourably fill the position of head of a department of public health. At the beginning, then, you would get your medical man. But how long would he continue as head of the department? Unfortunately, we have not arrived at that condition of unity in Canada which enables us to select a man for a department of government irrespective of race, of creed, of province or of division. A vacancy occurs in the cabinet. The question is not, who is the best man for the position? It is: who is the best man for the position within the ranks of the party—necessarily he has to be of the same party—and within the particular division from which he comes? The vacancy may be in respect of a position—I am speaking very frankly—that had been held by a gentleman of the Roman Catholic faith—when you come to fill his place and you are inclined to put a Protestant in the position, you discover that the balance of power would be disturbed if you did that. It may be a case where a vacancy exists out in the western country and there is a medical man somewhere down East, where the wise men come from, whom you would like to put there. But you discover that his province is already occupying all the space it can in the Government; so you cannot take him in. The truth is that under your scheme of putting a medical man at the head of a department of public health, you would have him at the beginning, you might get him once or twice, but by-and-by you would discover that the head of the medical department was probably some respectable farmer, or, more likely, some lawyer—who, I hope, would be respectable.

Now, names do not always mean what they seem to imply. We have a Minister of Agriculture; how often has he been a practical agriculturalist? For many years the Department of Agriculture was presided over by excellent gentlemen who had no particular connection with agriculture. We have a Department of Railways; but when was there a railway engineer at the head of it? Never. These names mean nothing, and the result in this case will be that although you start in with an eminent medical man, in a few years, owing to conditions of party politics, divisional politics, racial politics, religious politics, you will have great difficulty in keeping that man in. It seems to me that if you want to have an eminent medical man preside over that department, the better plan would be to have him act as the head in some other form—as deputy minister, for instance—then he can be there and give the country continuous service. If you put him in as minister of the Crown he may be there a few months, and then he may pass away altogether. I offer that suggestion to my hon. friends in all good faith.

Now I am going to say something on a thorny question—prohibition. I may be told by my friends on your left, Sir, that this is a thorny question which the Government will have to worry over, and that we had better let them do the worrying. I have no desire to treat the question in that way; I would rather be helpful and constructive, if I could, in the matter. What is the situation to-day? By an Act of the Parliament of Canada—because the Order in Council is equivalent to an Act of Parliament of Canada—supplementing the Acts of the provincial legislatures, we virtually have prohibition over the Dominion to-day. We have actual prohibition in all the provinces save one, and in that province I understand we shall have prohibition on the first day of May. I think it never was, and is not now, the duty of the Government and of this Parliament to take any initiative in legislation on the question of prohibition. I think that is a question on which we might have due regard to the principle of provincial rights. In the olden days, just before Confederation, there were grave difficulties over the form which our constitution should take. There were men who held that we should have a legislative union, one centralised power at Ottawa, whereas, the other side of the question was that we should have a federal union wherein each province should have its own legislature. This idea of a centralized union was a very fascinating one, and I am not surprised to learn, as I do from various sources, that Sir John A. Macdonald, that masterful man, wanted to have a centralised union. He wanted to have everything here at Ottawa under his own thumb. I have rather a liking for that suggestion of a one-man power, under certain limitations, the putting of one man into some central place to do something, taking care to see that you get the right man and then supporting and helping him. That is the way to get things done, that is the way in which the war was won, when Marshal Foch was made the one-man power for the whole of the Allies. So, I rather like this notion within certain limitations. It would, however, never do in Canada. Our territory is too vast; you cannot undertake to deal with all the affairs of this country from the centre at Ottawa. Moreover, there are the differences of race and creed and other things. So the Fathers of Confederation, in their wisdom, determined that we should have a federal union. I think it is right that the question of prohibition should be viewed largely from a provincial standpoint. It was not and is not the duty of this Government to take the initiative in legislation on that question, but it was and is their duty to supplement the legislation of the provinces by such measures as will make the prohibition thoroughly effective. We have at present a Dominion law which provides that prohibition shall exist until the end of the war which, I presume, means until peace is signed, and for one year later. We are told that the Government are now considering what they will do after that. There is a current rumour as to what they intend to do. It is because I think that is a mistake that I am going to venture and presume to offer them advice not to do it. Punch's advice to those about to marry is good here, "Don't." It is presumed that the Government intend to have a referendum or a plebiscite. That statement is not made in the speech from the Throne; we do not have it in any official form; it comes to us by way of leakage, I suppose, from the caucus; and I know leakage from the caucus is very unsafe as basis for argument. But one or two members of the House, perhaps unconsciously, have disclosed the fact. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden) and, I think, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) told us that we are going to take a vote on the subject, so we really know what the Government is contemplating. But as the Government have not yet really committed themselves to it, perhaps there is still time for the thought I am offering for their consideration. My view of the matter is that we should not take the responsibility of initiating legislation, but that we should recognize the rights of the provinces. There is a strong movement amongst our temperance friends everywhere to induce the Government to bring forward very stiff legislation. I have no doubt all the members of Parliament have received various circulars on the matter. I have one pamphlet which I will read, because it seems to me to indicate the correct situation. This comes to me from Hamilton, from the International Order of Good Templars, which we are informed is the largest temperance organization in the world. I quote this passage:

> As every province in the Dominion has shown a desire, by the enacting of provincial laws, to prohibit the liquor traffic to the full extent of their constitutional powers, we believe that the time has now arrived when the expressed will of the people should be enacted into Parliamentary laws, and that at the present Session of Parliament, the "Order in Council" legislation, covering importation, manufacture and interprovincial shipment, should be enacted into Parliamentary legislation.
> We think that no further vote of the people is necessary, other than that expressed by the various provinces.

That seems to be sound reasoning. If the various provinces of this Dominion, through their Governments and legislatures, see fit, in their wisdom, to adopt a prohibitory law, and if, as is the fact, they find that, owing to constitutional difficulties, they cannot make that law effective, it is the duty of the Dominion Government and Parliament to give them such supplementary legislation as will make the law effective.

There was a time years ago when there was a great deal of difficulty over this temperance question. Both the Dominion Parliament and the local legislatures claimed the right to deal with it. We had the Dominion License law. This was one of the things over which those two gladiators, Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Oliver Mowat, fought, with the usual result that Sir Oliver Mowat won and the Dominion License law was declared to be ultra vires. The Dominion courts have established the fact that in respect to importation, exportation and manufacture, the Dominion Parliament will control, but as respects the retail sale the local Parliament will control. Let me give the House an illustration how this works. There is a prohibitory law in the province of Nova Scotia. There are a number of brewers in the province. The Halifax brewer cannot sell his beer to the consumer in Halifax, but he can ship it over to an agent in St. John, and then the Halifax consumer can write to the St. John agent and order it sent back. Thus he can get the Halifax beer if he wants it, but he has to pay the price of the beer and two railway freights in order to get it. The thing is preposterous. Seeing, therefore, that we should make prohibition effective, my advice to the Government is this: Do not take the initiative; make our legislation supplementary to the provincial law. I agree with the statement made by the International Order of Good Templars that there is no need for a referendum. I respectfully advise the Government that if there is to be a plebiscite or a referendum, they should leave that to the provinces. I do not believe there is any need for a referendum at all. There is no need for one in my constituency nor in my province. There is no question down there. My constituency stands for prohibition; the province of Nova Scotia stands for prohibition; they do not want any referendum, they do not want any plebiscite. My impression is that if the Government adopt the system of a referendum, they will cause further difficulties. I think it would be sound and safe for them to say that so long as any province, by its legislation, desires to have prohibition and to give the full effect of prohibition which its local constitution will permit, the Dominion Government will supplement that by such Dominion legislation as will make that prohibition thoroughly effective. That is a policy which is consistent with this demand of the temperance people. It is consistent with the doctrine of provincial rights to which so many people attach importance, and it is an easier solution of the question than any other method which could be adopted.

I want to speak about three or four other subjects but I am afraid I am occupying too much time, so I will ask your attention to only one or two. We are to have legislation respecting the franchise. I do not know what that means. It is a deplorable fact that every franchise Bill introduced into this House has been the subject of bitter party strife and contention. The impression seems to exist that a Franchise Bill, no matter who introduces it, is always designed to serve the interests of one party or the other and consequently it is always resisted by the people on the other side whether it be in a provincial legislature or in this House. Why should this be? We all ought to agree that the franchise is something sacred, and we all ought to be willing to agree that every man and woman in this country entitled to vote should have his and her name placed on the voters' list. We should not create a condition of affairs which will tempt men to make a struggle not only to get on the lists the names of their friends but to keep off the names of those who might vote the other way. There has, unfortunately, been trouble over this question in times past. Why should we have two franchise lists? In most of the provinces, practically all, one might say, there is practically manhood and womanhood suffrage to-day. A man with any pretence to doing almost anything is entitled to vote, and I am glad to say the women also have that right to-day. Why should we go through the form of making up one list for the provinces and another for the Dominion? The voters have to be the same set of people, and why should there not be co-operation between the Dominion and the Provincial Governments to try and agree upon a common list? This is not a new hope of mine. Thirty-four years ago, in the early days of my premiership of Nova Scotia, I saw the trouble in having two voters' lists, and I ventured to send a telegram to Sir John A. Macdonald suggesting a conference between the Dominion and Provincial Governments in the hope of agreeing on one common list. In those days representatives of the Dominion and Provincial Governments never met in conference. There always seemed to be friction between them, even when both were of the same political party. I am glad that a better condition has prevailed in later years. The Dominion Government has repeatedly invited the premiers of the different provinces to come in consultation, and I commend them for doing so; I think it was a wise thing. Then why should we not bring them together to consider this question of the franchise, and let them meet on common ground without any partisanship at all? I think the offer is worth making at all events, and I earnestly commend that suggestion to the consideration of the Government.

That brings me to another question on which I cannot hope to have my views endorsed generally. I want to agree with those gentlemen who have urged that the War-time Elections Act be repealed as quickly as possible. It is an amazing thing that men can permit themselves to stand up and support a measure of that kind. We talk sometimes of alien enemies in connection with the franchise. There are no alien enemies in that connection. The men to whom protection should be given, the men who have been unjustly treated, are British subjects, and if they were of foreign birth that is all the more reason why they should be treated justly, because they are guests in our house and a guest is always entitled to protection. How did they come to us in Canada? We sent out agents and literature into the highways and byways of continental Europe, begging men to come to Canada and settle on the land. We pictured an alluring situation where land was open for all. We assured these people of every privilege; we told them the land could be had cheaply, and that if they came here and after a certain time took the oath of allegiance to our gracious Sovereign, they would become Canadian citizens and British subjects. They came and settled here and served their time of probation. They did everything a decent citizen could do. Suddenly they wakened up one day to find that they had lost the highest prize of citizenship—the right to vote. Why? There was no concealment about it, there was no pretense of there being any other reason for disfranchising these people than that the Government believed they would vote against them. Surely, that was no reason at all.

Mr. Speaker, we shall need these men and others like them. There is one great asset of any nation, of any people, and of any individual; it is character, reputation, good faith. I made a little tour of the West Indies a few years ago, and as I went from island to island I was much impressed, as any thoughtful men must have been, by the condition I found there. The population everywhere was black or coloured, except for a handful of white people on each island. In some cases the number of whites would be larger than in others, but in every instance they constituted a small minority. And yet this handful of white men were directing and governing these islands in the midst of peace, progress, and prosperity. I asked a very intelligent coloured man with whom I was conversing how his people got along in such a situation. "Oh," he said, "it is very simple. These white men are Englishmen." I know he used the word in its broadest sense, not in the narrow sense in which we sometimes use it. "Englishman" means more than England —"What do they know of England who only England know?" The Scotchman, and the Irishman too, is sometimes offended at the use of the word "Englishman" in its narrow sense, but it was Thomas Campbell, himself a Scotchman, who wrote "Ye mariners of England who guard our native seas." England means more than one part of one little island; it means the Motherland, and sometimes the Empire at large. Well, this coloured man said, "The reason we get along so well is because these white men you speak of are Englishmen, and our people have learned that we can trust the honour and faith and justice of an Englishman." Thank Heaven for that reputation of Englishmen which is the inheritance of Britons everywhere—except in Canada.

A few months ago I heard an address delivered in the Canadian Club of Montreal by a clergyman who had spent much of his life in Eastern countries, particularly in Egypt and amongst the tribes of the desert. He told with much pride and satisfaction of the achievements of Englishmen in that region and of what England was doing to further civilization in the East. Speaking of the reputation which Englishmen possessed, he said that among one of the tribes which he knew very well it was a common thing for a man, if he wanted to give you the assurance that he would do a certain thing, to say, "By the word of an Englishman I promise it." A few days ago I heard a statement very much like that by a gentleman from South America. He was telling of the opportunities of trade down there, where we hope to do a large amount of business, and he said that Englishmen are doing a big business there and are going to keep it, "because our people trust the Englishman." And he used the very words of the clergyman, "It is a common thing for a man if he wants to give you an assurance that he will do a certain thing to say, 'By the word of an Englishman I promise it.'" Sir, we ought to be proud of that reputation which Englishmen—and Englishmen means Britons—have won throughout the wide world. Who can say to-day with fairness and justice, "By the word of a Canadian I will do it." The word of a Canadian, tried by the War-time Elections Act, is a word of trickery, a word of deception, the word of a cheat. We shall need immigrants in our country, more backs to bear the heavy burden that is coming. From what countries are we to obtain them? We want as many as we can get from Great Britain for the more British people we have in the country the better. No doubt there will be many immigrants from the United States.

No better immigrants come to Canada than those from the western United States But with all that, we are not going to have enough, and shall be compelled to send our agents abroad again. In such an event, I can imagine the agent going to one of the continental towns and talking about emigration to Canada. He has a group of men around him, and one man, who has paid particular attention to all that he has said, declares that he knows all about Canada, his brother having come to this country. The agent will suggest that perhaps he would like to follow his brother's example. "No," the man will say: "an agent like you came here a few years ago to our house and told precisely the same story you are telling now, about the attractiveness of Canada as a country of great opportunities where land could be obtained very cheaply if not free. I could not go, but my brother went, taking with him his little family. He built a home, settled down, took the oath of allegiance, and did all in his power to become a good citizen. With what result? You robbed him of his franchise. Let us pray, Mr. Speaker, that the time may soon come again when a man may be able to say, "Upon the word of a Canadian I can depend!"

One further thought only will I intrude on the House. Sir, I want to say in conclusion that I would like to see a strong plea made for a free parliament. "A free parliament?" you say; "have we not a free parliament now?" No! We had not a free parliament last year; and if the same policy of the Government be again adhered to, we are not likely to have a free parliament now. What was the situation at the opening of the first session of the new parliament? My conception of the situation was this: I felt that on matters relating to the prosecution of the war, the Government ought to be strongly supported, certainly by their friends; and I thought they might even claim support from their opponents. But I believed that on all questions not connected with the war every man in the House of Commons should be at liberty to act according to the dictates of his conscience. Was that an erroneous conception? Was there anything unreasonable in that? I think not. Yet, what happened? Before the session had advanced very far, I discovered that my conception of political freedom, as I have just indicated, was one in which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) did not share. On several occasions, on matters in no way connected with the prosecution of the war, the Whips were used to rally men to the support of a particular question; and then in the conclusion came that extraordinary scene in connection with the question of titles. The question was not important in itself. Whether a man votes for or against titles, is not, to my mind, of very great moment; but the manner in which this Parliament was strangled is unquestionably a matter in which we are gravely concerned. A motion was before the House presented by one supporter of the Government; and there was an amendment by another supporter of the Government. These matters were discussed for days and weeks, and every hon. member thought he had a right to freedom of action. Then one night the Prime Minister announced that if a certain course were not followed he would resign. This, Sir, in the midst of war, and at a very critical stage of it, too! On such a trifling pretext the Prime Minister of Canada was prepared to precipitate a political crisis that might have thrown the country into the throes of another general election. I ask my hon. friends on both sides of the House to stand up for a free Parliament. In a democratic country such as this, we may not all be able to agree on every question. I know I differ from some of my friends on this as well as the other side of the House; but I always endeavour to respect their views and opinions when I feel that they are acting conscientiously; and I ask them to do the same by me. One thing I do very earnestly ask them to do, and that is, to insist on freedom of debate, freedom of speech. We might have seen in England, about the same time, a fine example of a free, as contrasted with a strangled, Parliament. The Government had an important Bill before Parliament. An amendment was made by the House of Lords—rather an important amendment—and when it came down to the House of Commons there was displayed the true spirit of British parliamentary liberty; for the Government said on this question of the amendment: We do not regard it as vital, and we leave it to the very open judgment of the House. And the amendment which the House of Lords desired to make to the Government Franchise Bill was rejected. There, Sir, you have an example of a free parliament as compared with the parliament which we had in Canada. I trust that both Grit and Tory—if there are such people—will hereafter have the satisfaction of knowing that above everything else hon. members will stand for a free parliament representing a free people.

Mr. ROBERT KING ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to preface my remarks with a reference to the distinguished statesman who has so recently passed away, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. From the time I took any interest in political affairs he was a dominating figure in Canadian public life. Although not his follower politically, I always gave to him a large measure of admiration and respect. I admired him for his rare gift of oratory, for his outstanding ability, for his commanding figure, and for his courtly presence. He carved his name enduringly on the period in which he lived. Full of years and honours, in the evening of manhood's day, when the thread of life was growing thin he passed away. Already he is like a fragrant flower that has faded and gone. His passing marks the close of a period in Canadian history. We are now writing the title page of a new epoch in our national life, an epoch full of great promise and pregnant with the most wonderful possibilities. I feel I voice the sentiments, irrespective of their political affiliations, of the people of the county. I represent in this House when I express their appreciation of the great service which Sir Wilfrid Laurier rendered to the State. I also feel that I voice the unanimous sentiment of the citizens of the county of Halton when I extend to the widow of the departed statesman their deepest, their most profound sympathy.

I was somewhat nervous in rising to follow so eminent a gentleman as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). I must confess, however, that the hon. member is a puzzle to me, and I am sure he is a puzzle to the hon. members of the Opposition. During the first part of his speech he received considerable applause from the Opposition benches. Hon. members on that side were prepared to rejoice more at the return of one sinner than over the ninety and nine who had no need of repentance. Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. gentleman was going to step off the fence, but I see he is still in the same position he occupied at the last session of this Parliament. I heartily concur in the remarks which he made during the latter part of his speech, but there are some inconsistencies in the first part of it. He asked the question, what business had Canada at the Peace Conference? For answer to that question I would refer him to the speech of the hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell). The hon. gentleman claims that Canada has no right to representation at the Conference. Now, his attitude is rather inconsistent in view of the fact that he upheld the Union Government in the prosecution of the war. He approved of the sending of soldiers to France and Belgium, and if we took part in the conflict, is it not reasonable that we should have a right to have some say at the Conference? Surely the hon. gentleman will not contend that although we sent soldiers to fight the enemy we should have no voice in the discussion of the peace terms.

The hon. member said that Canada had not gained one cubit. It is not one cubit but many cubits that this country has gained because of the glorious action of our soldiers in establishing this country in such a prominent position among the nations of the earth, a position which it would not have attained otherwise in fifty years. That is one of the results of our taking part in the European conflict. In regard to our taking part in the Peace Conference the hon. gentleman made mention of the boundaries of the nations of Europe, but he thinks that we should not have any interest in that conference because we have no interest in these various boundaries. I would submit to him that disputes over the boundaries of Europe have been the cause of deluging that continent for a thousand years with blood. If by going into this conference and assisting in bringing about a certain measure of satisfaction with the boundaries that are established we can in the future prevent wars, we shall have done a great deal not only for the Dominion of Canada but for the whole world.

I should like to compliment the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. I compliment them on the very eloquent and efficient manner in which they performed that very responsible duty. Their remarks were most happy and reflected great credit upon themselves and upon the administration for making the selection. Their sentiments in regard to our gallant soldiers will find an answering echo in the hearts of all true Canadians. The heroism, sacrifice and glorious achievements of our citizen soldiers is a theme to inspire some Canadian poet to perpetuate their memory in immortal verse. But, our soldiers do not want to be immortalized. They want to be repatriated in the most effective and speedy manner possible. The Union Government was elected for that purpose. In their wisdom the people of Canada chose this Government to perform that duty. There is no lack of confidence amongst the members of this side of the House in the ability of the Government to live up to the expectations of the people. Liberal Unionists and Conservative Unionists alike gave up their party affiliation in order to come together on common ground in support of a coalition Government. We did that in the stress and turmoil of a great war brought together by a common interest, a common bond and a common danger that raised us far above the petty issues of political strife.

There is not any doubt that in the estimation of the people of Canada a non-partisan government is the best form of government to settle the many vexed questions which will come up for settlement during the reconstruction period. The tariff issue, that bone of contention between the East and the West, can undoubtedly be settled better by a cabinet which is representative of the two great political parties in this country than by any other form of government. If a non-partisan government cannot settle that question to the satisfaction of the people no partisan government can. If the members of this House will view that question with reference to what is in the best interests of Canada as a whole, and not from the point of view of any sectional interest, the path of the Government will be strewn with roses instead of thorns.

The hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. J. Read)—and I give the hon. gentleman credit for stating many plain truths in his own inimitable way—expressed a wish for a commission to inquire into the tariff and bring in a policy that would be satisfactory to all political parties. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is not satisfied with the present Government composed, as it is, of the leading members of those political parties. Surely, that ought to be satisfactory to any man, even the most exacting.

Possibly the hon. gentleman meant a commission representative of the Opposition in this House, but I reply that the Opposition in this House is not representative of true Liberalism. It is the personal following of the late, lamented leader whose vacant chair so eloquently reminds us that he is no more. It is a striking tribute to his great worth and personal charm that so many gave to him their undivided allegiance. I would like to tell the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) whilst congratulating him on his elevation to that honourable post, that he cannot expect to lead a National Liberal party on a provincial policy dominated by a single province. It is a significant fact that the dividing line between the parties in this House is the defence of our common country. The light is in the window indeed, but it is sadly dimmed by the mists of political prejudice and narrow provincialism. Under such circumstances it becomes the red light of danger giving due warning to all true Liberals to seek congenial companionship elsewhere.

In this country we have quite a large number of defaulters, conscientious objectors and deserters. I have classed the conscientious objector along with the others because a great many of the conscientious objectors were not aware of their objections until the passing of the Military Service Act. The sincere conscientious objector whose objection to military service is based upon his religious faith is entitled to some consideration, and I believe the Government have given that class of man certain consideration. I think it may be laid down as a principle that he who receives and accepts the protection due to a British subject has placed upon him the obligation to defend those institutions that give him protection. Those institutions are founded on the ballot; by force of arms they have survived. They have descended to us from preceding generations and are consecrated in the blood of a long line of noble ancestors. Their defence is the common duty of all. The conscientious objector or defaulter who refuses to defend his country in time of war has no right to the exercise of the legislative function in time of peace. The vote is essentially a legislative act. By it laws are enacted and laws are repealed. He who refuses to defend this fundamental principle of democracy has no right to the exercise of its privileges.

I would therefore suggest to the Government that since the war is over the imprisonment of the conscientious objector, the defaulter and deserter is expensive and ineffective. The system of meting out punishment by means of a fine has more to commend it. But I think, Mr. Speaker, that, taking everything into consideration, the best punishment is disfranchisement for life and I would recommend that respectfully to the consideration of the Government. I would make a plea also for more uniformity in the punishment of the defaulter. It is not very edifying to see a defaulter in the province of Ontario given a large fine or a long term of imprisonment when a defaulter in the province of Quebec, equally guilty, is let off with a nominal fine or a few hours imprisonment. In this connection I would cite a case that occurred in Hull just a few days ago. This is from an Ottawa paper, I think the edition of Wednesday:

> Twelve absentees under the Military Service Act who came before Magistrate Goyette in the Hull Police Court yesterday escaped with the exceedingly light penalty of six hours in jail each.
> In view of the recent passage of an Order in Council which provides a minimum penalty for this class of offender of $250 or three months in jail, the presiding magistrate was asked for an explanation.
> "These twelve men were brought before me over two weeks ago," stated Magistrate Goyette, "but for various reasons their cases were not ready to be disposed of until this morning. In view of these circumstances I did not deem it would be fair to impose a new penalty on them, when, if their cases had been disposed of when they were first arrested, they would have gotten off with the usual fine of $50 or $75.
> "I therefore imposed a term of six hours in jail on each of them, without the option of a fine. You must remember that even one hour in jail, to any one with any self respect, is as big a punishment as a longer term. In future, absentees and defaulters coming before me will be treated under the new Order in Council."

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the average defaulter and deserter has not very much self-respect, and a punishment in the shape of six hours in jail is altogether inadequate for his offence. I would call the attention of the Government to the fact that the Orders in Council which have been passed for the purpose of dealing with this inequality of punishment do not meet the case. I have not seen any Order in Council providing for a minimum punishment of three months in jail. There was an Order in Council modifying the first Order issued in December, 1917, with regard to defaulters, which was amended on the 12th February, and later on the 24th of February. If any other Orders in Council have been promulgated since that date, I have not seen any copy of the Canada Gazette which contains them. The last Order in Council provides for a minimum fine of $250, and a maximum fine of $5,000. The term of imprisonment is to be up to two years. Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that that leaves entirely too much to the discretion of the magistrate, and there consequently is too much room for discrimination in the punishment of defaulters in different parts of the Dominion.

With regard to aliens within our country, there are something like two thousand in internment camps. I am in accord with the policy of the Government that these men shall be returned to their native land at the first opportunity. But I would go further, and possibly the Government intends to do so; I would confiscate the property of those aliens, and even their earnings, leaving them only sufficient to start in a small way in their native land. There are other foreigners, however, in our country who are not enemy aliens, and these men, when they measure up to the standard of Canadian citizenship, should be given a chance; but in every instance, where their interests conflict with the interests of the returned soldier, they should give way to him.

I am pleased to compliment the Government on bringing in a Bill providing for a new franchise, and giving the women the full right to vote. But I am not in accord with hon. gentlemen on the opposite side when they claim that enemy aliens should be given a vote as before. I hope to see it provided that the enemy aliens, whether they are in this country now or come here later, shall not get the vote for at least a generation. With regard to foreigners who are not enemy aliens, I think they should be given the vote after a certain time, but not until after seven or ten years' residence in this country, and that an educational test should be applied to them; they should be required to write and read the English language and to have some knowledge of our institutions, to comprehend what the flag stands for and to understand the responsibility of Canadian citizenship. If they cannot master these things in ten years they certainly are unfit for Canadian citizenship.

The pensions which are given to our soldiers at the present time, particularly the pensions to the totally disabled soldier, are entirely inadequate, with the cost of living as we have it to-day. It is possible, Mr. Speaker, that when this country has got back to more stable conditions of peace that indadequacy may disappear. I think if there is one very definite thing in this country it is the fact that the people, the members of Parliament and the Government are desirous that the Canadian soldier shall receive the highest amount of pension compatible with his disability. I think the people of this country intend to be generous in this respect, and they are desirous that the totally disabled soldier shall receive a pension sufficient to keep him well above want during the remainder of his life. A pension of $600 is certainly not sufficient for that purpose under the present scale of living.

I would like to draw the attention of the Government to the attitude of the Pensions Board toward the average soldier who comes before them for a pension. The returned soldier claims that the attitude of the Pensions Board toward him is to keep the pension down as low as possible compatible with his disability. That is rather a parsimonious attitude. That is not the intention of the Government. It is possible that the returned soldier mistakes the attitude of the Pensions Board, but I bring this matter to the attention of the Government in order that they may inquire into it if they deem it necessary. I believe that it is better the Pensions Board should err on the side of generosity than that any soldier should be unfairly treated.

The soldier suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis is in a class by himself. In discussing that question I shall approach it from the viewpoint of the physician. I have seen something of the terrible ravages of this disease on the human organism. I know something of its deceptive character, its tendency to become latent, and its tendency to recur. The contention of the soldier is that the Pensions Board rather treats these cases from a mathematical viewpoint. The tubercle bacilli attack the lung and cause a certain part of it to die and slough off. If the patient is strong enough to resist the sloughing process the lung heals by a process of cicatrization and contraction. This places more work on the heart and causes a lessened power of areation of the blood. The soldier is not as strong as he was before, and is liable to break down under strain. The Pensions Board, after this disease has become latent, measures the disability of the soldier by the amount of cicatrization of the lung. I contend that the disability is not always in proportion to the amount of cicatrization of the lung, because in some instances the soldier may be more liable to other diseases; he may not have a strong constitution, and so will break down more easily under strain, and will show more constitutional effects from the same amount of cicatrization of the lung than another person. These soldiers are first treated in a sanatorium, and when the disease becomes latent are sent up before the Pensions Board, and given temporary pensions for six months.

That, I believe, has latterly been extended to one year. At the end of that time, if they remain healthy, they again come before the Pensions Board and are re-examined. The condition of the lung is then stated and the amount of permanent pension apportioned accordingly. If they again have an attack of the disease they are entitled to go to a sanatorium for free treatment, receiving during the period of their treatment pay and allowances the same as if they were on active service. When they are finally cured there is no readjustment of the pension. I think there should be a readjustment of the pension after each attack, because the lung is in a worse condition after each attack than it was at first. I bring this point to the attention of the Government in the hope that they will look into these statements and see whether they are accurate. They are given to me by the tubercular soldiers themselves.

Up to 31st March, 1918, 3,648 soldiers had been treated for tuberculosis, and at that time there were under treatment 1,619 men, distributed all over Canada in 21 sanatoria.

The Civil Service Commission has been attacked by the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) and has been defended by an hon. minister (Hon. A. K. Maclean). At the last session of this Parliament an Act was passed under which the Civil Service Commission was given charge of appointments to the Outside Service. In passing that Act Parliament's express purpose was to do away with the evils of patronage. It was expected that these duties would be carried out by the Civil Service Commission efficiently, expeditiously, without suspicion of wrongdoing. In my opinion, the placing of appointments in the hands of a Civil Service Commission does not entirely do away with patronage; we simply centralize it in Ottawa. The work of many is put into the hands of the few. It does not require the mind of a statesman to understand that if this work is not carried on in a proper and honest manner the gravest abuses may result. An army of something like 50,000 men and women are under the control of the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa. This commission is composed of three members, who are supposed to do all that work. I submit that the number of members of the commission should be increased. They have a secretary, who is not a member of the commission, but its servant. The secretary should have nothing whatever to do with appointments made under the commission; I assume that he has nothing to do with them. If the commission delegate their authority to him or to any one else, then there is no need for the commission and they should be removed from office.

The members of Parliament have some interest in this commission. They created the machinery under which it is operating, and if there is anything wrong with it they should be taken into the confidence of the Government in regard to the matter. The charges that were made by the member for West Toronto were replied to by the minister, but not all of them were refuted; the gravest charge of all, that with regard to the sale of examination papers to prospective candidates, has been admitted. At the trial in Ottawa a few days ago the person who was responsible for the sale of these particular papers was convicted and fined $100. I must say that it was a surprise to me to see that the commission or the Government were not represented at that trial. It is reported in the press that Mr. Foran, the secretary of the commission, expressed surprise at the verdict; apparently he did not know that the trial was taking place. I should think it was his duty and the duty of the commission to have known and to have been represented there by a lawyer who would see that all the facts were brought out. For the sale of these examination papers the commission is directly responsible. The sale of examination papers is certainly a very reprehensible act, and it is the duty of the commission to make every effort to discover how the leakage came about and who the guilty party is. Parliament demands that the truth be known. No one will be hurt by the truth except the guilty party, and he should be exposed and punished.

I compliment the Government upon its intention to institute a Federal Department of Health. The member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) placed the matter so well before the House that there is not much for me to say. I should like to associate myself, however, with the remarks of that hon. gentleman on this subject, and to impress upon the Government the advisability of having this department placed under a qualified medical man. Many medical men may be found in Canada who are eminently qualified to fill that position with satisfaction to themselves and with credit to the Government.

While on this subject I should like to make a few remarks with regard to the wonderful advance of medical science all over the world. Great advance has been made in other branches of science, particularly in the manufacture of destructive agencies of war—the only marvel is that flesh and blood could stand up against these great engines of destruction. Great advance has been made in the science of transportation, both on water and in the air. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the advances in medical, surgical and sanitary sciences have been equal to those made in any other branch of science. This war could not have taken place successfully on the western front had it not been for the wonderful advance in preventive medicine. By virtue of the discoveries in that branch, almost all kinds of infectious disease, such as typhoid fever, smallpox, diphtheria, and so on, have been eliminated from the armies. The deaths on the battle front from disease have been remarkably small; our returning soldiers who are casualties suffer principally from the effects of wounds, and very little from the effects of disease.

Mr. Speaker, I should be scarcely doing my duty if I did not give some little voice to my feelings with regard to our gallant Canadian soldiers. The day after England declared war on Germany the young men of Canada commenced their steady tramp, to the recruiting offices all over the country; from the east to the west, from the north to the south, they came offering their services in defence of the Empire. It was the most inspiring spectacle ever presented to the world by the colonial possessions of any country; it was a wonderful concrete evidence of the mighty colonizing power of England. For a thousand years the sons of Britain have been going out from her shores to the farthermost corners of the earth, carrying with them the principles of truth, justice and liberty; carrying with them the tenets of the Christian faith and the foundation principles of democracy; until now, in the twentieth century, at the call of the motherland, the descendants of these adventurous Britishers rushed to her defence in the most stupendous conflict of history. Five hundred thousand of the sons of Canada answered that call, and fighting side by side with the soldiers of the British Isles, gallantly upheld the best traditions of British arms. Sixty thousand of those sons of Canada, in the dawn of their manhood, gave up their all, in order that democracy might live. They are sleeping the sleep that knows no waking on the vine-clad slopes of northern France, and the blood-sodden fields of Belgium, a silent army whose memory will remain green in the hearts of the Canadian people so long as we cherish British ideals. It is the duty of the Canadian people so to live and act as to be worthy of the great sacrifices they have made. It is our duty to divest ourselves of political prejudices and selfish motives and stand solidly behind the Government in its efforts to do all that is possible for these returning heroes. It is our duty to restrain fanaticism and war-time hysteria and stand steady and firm in support of the Allied Conference now holding its sessions in Paris; so to support their hand against enemy aggression that the glorious victory which our soldiers have won in the field may be followed by a diplomatic victory commensurate with the sacrifices they have made. Unless we do that, we shall be unworthy of those splendid men now returning to their native land, secure in their confidence of a duty well performed, and with a fond expectation in their hearts which we at home fail to understand.

Mr. DUNCAN CAMPBELL ROSS (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, at this hour it is not my intention to weary the House with a long speech. I intend to cut my remarks as short as I possibly can, consistently with what I consider my duty to my people.

I have much pleasure in joining with the other members on both sides of the House in complimenting the mover and the seconder of the Address. They have conducted themselves with great gallantry on the field, and they have spoken very eloquently and well in this House, dealing in a most statesmanlike manner with the public matters that were mentioned in the Address.

I must also compliment the hon. and gallant member for Skeena (Lt.-Col. Peck) upon the delightful and instructive address he delivered in this House this afternoon. He has performed for me a task which I had intended to perform and has done it much better than I could possibly do it myself. He has military knowledge from which to gather his conclusions. He has knowledge which comes from being present almost when these occurrences which are spoken of in this House happened, and he is here as a representative of the people, and trying, and I have no doubt successfully trying, to do his duty by his brother officers who have carried themselves so nobly in this great struggle. As a Canadian I was very sorry to hear aspersions cast on officers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in this debate. These men are not here to defend themselves. It is very easy to cast aspersions or to put blame on any person, and it is very hard to overtake these aspersions once they have gone amongst the public. The hon. member for Skeena took up the defence of my fellow-countryman, Sir Arthur Currie, and I think there is no doubt in the mind of any hon. member in this House, nor do I think there will be any doubt in the mind of any man in this country, in regard to his action, his gallantry, his courage, his solicitude for his men, after hearing the remarks that fell from the lips of the hon. member for Skeena. The hon. member spoke of Sir Arthur Currie as a soldier; I have known him for years; I can speak of him as a man. The insinuation was made that Sir Arthur Currie wantonly sacrificed the lives of Canadian soldiers for his own glorification and to satisfy his own ambition. As an intimate acquaintance of that gallant gentleman I resent any such insinuation. Sir Arthur Currie is the last man in the British Empire who would be guilty of such conduct. I know him well, almost from boyhood. There is not a gentleman with a more kindly heart in this great land. That is the last thing he would do. As a matter of fact I know from eye-witnesses, who have been with Sir Arthur Currie after the victorious onslaught of our Canadian boys, who have seen him viewing the death and devastation that onslaught has occasioned, and I can say with confidence, believing it is true, that that general who is blamed here to-day for being heartless in regard to the use of his men, was so affected by the sights he saw, by the lives of Canadians that had been sacrificed, that he could not suppress his grief and openly burst into tears. Selfish ambition and self-glorification are made of sterner and coarser stuff than that. I believe, if a public investigation is held, or if this matter is further discussed in this House, Sir Arthur Currie will be absolutely cleared of all these suspicions, and I believe he deserves nothing but praise and thanks from this great Canadian people. It would be a strange thing if this gallant soldier, who has been honoured, not only by Britain but by France and Italy with the highest military distinctions that have been given, should not have been worthy of those honours. Casualties may have happened amongst the Canadian troops. We know they did happen. You cannot win a great victory without such things happening. But we must not forget, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Skeena this afternoon, that Sir Arthur Currie was only a cog in the big machine; that he had not charge of the forces of the Allies; that he was not the generalissimo; that he was only a sub-general; that he had to take his orders and had to obey them, just as he had to give orders and they had to be obeyed. I contend, with a considerable feeling of resentment, that it is not fair, in the absence of this man, who has covered himself with glory, to have attacks made on him in this House.

The Address speaks of our duty to our soldiers. The appreciation and gratitude of the nations cannot be too earnestly and sincerely expressed to the gallant members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. I wish to join with the members of the House who have tried well and successfully to express their gratification at the honour and glory the Canadian soldiers have brought to this country of ours. The glory has been not only the glory of the officers, but the glory of the soldiers. Some one has said that this war was a war of lieutenants, and it is true that these gallant, heroic young Canadian officers have paid an immense toll in order that liberty may prevail in the world and in order that Canada may be a free nation.

But the glory of winning this war is not due to them alone; it is not due solely to the officers nor to Sir Arthur Currie. I quite agree with what was said by the hon. member who seconded the Address (Mr. Manion) that the greater part of the glory for winning this war belongs to the infantryman in the ranks—the man who went over the top and grappled with the Germans in no man's land, and after taking the Hun trenches marched on to his objective, the German front. He is the man who suffered most, who underwent the greatest hardships, who risked most, and it is to him the greater part of the glory for winning this war should go.

We cannot do our duty by merely expressing our gratitude and appreciation of the services of these men. The men themselves and the people of this country want deeds, not words, in dealing with our returned soldiers, and one thing which the soldiers want and which the people of this country want is their return to the shores of Canada as quickly as possible. The soldiers are quite right in wanting to get back home as quickly as possible. I appreciate as keenly as any hon. member in this House the difficulties in the way due to the shortage of shipping, for instance. I appreciate the necessity of other troops also getting home, and I appreciate trade necessities in connection with this problem. But what I say is this, and I feel I shall be backed up by the whole country: It is a strange thing that during the four or five months since the armistice was signed only about one hundred thousand men have been brought back to Canada whereas, if I am correctly informed, the American Government has been successful in bringing back from the front about a million of her men. We have been engaged for almost five years in this struggle. Some of our boys have been over there ever since the war began; many of them have been there two or three years. The Americans only went into the war on the 6th of April, 1917, and have therefore been at the front a comparatively short time. They have not been subjected to the hardships our boys have undergone, nor played the part our noble boys have played, and I say it is the bounden duty of this Government to make efforts much more vigorous than they have made up to now to see that our soldiers are returned to this country and to civil life at the very earliest opportunity. It should not need a mutiny in a camp with disastrous results to life and limb to wake up the Overseas Minister of Militia in regard to this matter. As the speech from the Throne intimated the Government had known for some time that an armistice would be declared so they had plenty of time in which to prepare for the return of our soldiers. I attribute the lack of speed in this matter to the absence of unity of command in our military affairs. I think that if the return of the troops had been handled by the Minister of Militia in Canada instead of by these gentlemen overseas the men would have been returned much more quickly. I fear the reports we read in the papers are only too true, that the knights we send over to England to look after our officers as High Commissioner and as Overseas Minister of Militia are likely more concerned, as Canadians going over there are apt to become, with pink teas, social functions, dinners at the Mansion House, and their own self-glorification, than attending to the duties they are sent there to perform.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) the other day made the startling statement that in the coming year this country would have a deficit of $100,000,000. It this Government wants to save money I can conceive of no better way than by getting our boys back from overseas at the earliest possible date. That is one reason why they should be brought back more speedily. For the 250,000 or 300,000 of our men it is costing this country $3 a day each which amounts to an expenditure of from half to three-quarters of a million dollars a day. Every day that brings their discharge nearer is going to save this country anywhere from a quarter to three-quarters of a million dollars a day, according to the number of men demobilized. With the finances of the country in the state described by the Minister of Public Works, it seems to me that is one good reason why demobilization should be speeded up.

In the second place, it will mean contentment among the men. They want to get home and continue their education or go back to their ordinary vocations, and it is desirable that they should be allowed to do so at the earliest possible date.

In the third place, the earlier we get these men back the earlier they will get to work. There is going to be a great call in this country in the coming spring for men not only for the farms, but for all the building trades. Once these men are back they will be able to help build up the country instead of being an expense to it.

For these three reasons I humbly submit that the Government should do everything in their power to expedite the demobilization of these men, and I would say further, that if they have to charter ships at most exorbitant rates it will pay them financially to do so.

I am heartily in favour of vocational training for the soldiers. Any man who has fought our battles abroad and been injured so that he cannot carry on the occupation he was engaged in before the war should receive ample assistance from the Government to enable him to learn some other vocation, so that he will not be handicapped in the race of life. Vocational training is the very least this country can do for our boys.

I am also in favour of adequate pensions, and I am glad to see that the Government is not treating the matter this session with the same indifference they showed last year. The committee on pensions, I am glad to see, has already got to work, and I am sure they will go thoroughly into the matter and discuss it from all points of view. While I know that the pensions granted to Canadian soldiers to-day are the highest in the world, I feel that the members of this House and the country generally will back the Government and see that absolutely adequate pensions are paid. I am glad also that the committee on pensions is considering the cost of living in relation to pensions, and if they report to the House that the scale of pensions is not high enough I am sure the House will back up the Government in any legislation providing for adequate pensions. Furthermore, I would urge that the committee's report be presented to the House in sufficient time to allow of a free and open discussion of the whole matter, in order that the men who have served this country so faithfully and well may have justice done to them.

I am also in favour of land settlement for the soldiers, or, rather, for such of them as are qualified to go on the land and desire to do so. I do not think that every soldier who has a notion that he would like to settle on the land should be encouraged to do so unless he is fit and has some knowledge of farming, or is given some practical education in agriculture. But if these pre-requisites are carried out, I think it is in the interest of the country that soldiers should, under these circumstances, be placed on the land. I believe that it is the duty of the Government to take radical steps, and to take them at once, to see that all land held by railway companies, held by speculators, and held for grazing leases, especially near railroads, shall be expropriated at reasonable rates in order that these men may have suitable farms. I suggest that they go further if they really want to help the soldiers. If they wish to make them successful farmers, they should do what they did a year or so ago in connection with the farming industry, when they were endeavouring to promote greater production. At that time they bought for the farmers, as I am informed, a thousand tractors, and brought them into the country free of duty. It was a very laudable action on their part, and one that resulted in considerable benefit in increasing production. Now, I would suggest to the Government that if they are going to put soldiers on the land, it is only fair to them, and it is in the interests of the country, that they should take the duty off such agricultural implements as the soldiers require in order to work the land, if it is not their intention to remove the duty from these implements for all classes of the community. I think the Government should make these implements as cheap to these men as it is possible to make them, so that they will not be handicapped in their start in a new life-work.

In regard to the franchise question, I am glad to note that a new measure 10 p.m. is being introduced. I wish to associate myself with the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his views in regard to the War-time Elections Act. I do not know of any legislation in any British country which was more iniquitous. I say that, not because I was particularly injured by it myself, but I know of other members or candidates at the last election who were certainly subjected to the gravest injustice by reason of that Act. It was not British, and it was condemned not only on this side of the House. I remember distinctly what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) said in reference to the War-time Election Act, when he was on this side; and I remember also the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) rising in his place—I was next to him—and addressing the Chair when the Act was introduced, deploring the measure and asking the indulgence of the Chair in the remarks he was then about to make. He said he was ashamed of the fact that he came from the same part of the Dominion of Canada as the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) because of the iniquity of the Act. It is incomprehensible to me what the Government is thinking of, or what the Liberals who joined the Government are thinking of, if they allow that Act to remain on the statute-book.

I welcome the extension of the franchise to women. They have earned it, for they have been the civil soldiers of the war. They have done as nobly at home as the men did abroad, and I think they should have been given the franchise in 1917. At any rate, they deserved it just as much then as they do now; and I believe that at the first opportunity which is given them to register their votes they will indicate in no uncertain way the sentiments which at the present time rankle in their breasts against the action of the Government in 1917, the unfair manner in which they were treated in regard to the franchise at that time. If we are to have a new Franchise Act, I appeal to this Government to make it a fair, an honest, and a just measure. Upon the franchise all our liberties are based. As the franchise has been extended since the Reform Bill of 1832, our liberties have grown. There is only one fair franchise system, as far as I can see, and that is a system such as is followed in the province of Ontario. This was pointed out by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance. I refer to the municipal system. The franchise is based primarily on the voters' list; and if that list is fair and equitable, the representation will be fair. I appeal to the Government to adopt that system. The municipal list in the province of Ontario is prepared by the assessor in the first place, revised by the clerk, posted for thirty days, and appeals are heard by the county court judge. None of these officials are politicians; they are non-partisans. The clerk understands who are entitled to vote. He is neither a Liberal nor a Conservative. If he were either he would not long hold office. The result is that the voters' list is fairly prepared, and every one who is entitled to vote, if he desires to have his name on the list, can rest assured that his name will be on it. This is the fair, the British method. On the other hand, the method adopted at the last election was anything but fair or British. How were matters conducted? A host of enumerators were appointed, many of them Conservative ward heelers, who had only one interest at heart, namely to see that voters were on the list who were favourable to the Union Government, while those who were favourable to the Liberal party were excluded. These enumerators were supposed to be recommended by both parties. But what is the practice? We all know what happens. These people are all human; candidates are human, governments are human, enumerators are very human and sometimes very wicked. What happened in my own riding, for instance? I do not wish to be local, but I dare say the same thing happened elsewhere. We heard the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) make the deliberate statement that he would have a fair election. The War-time Elections Act, he said, would be fair; the enumerators would be non-partisan, each candidate having the privilege of naming half, so that politics would be eliminated. That statement was not only made by the Prime Minister, but ministers of the Crown assured me that such would be the case. What happened, however? There were sixty-nine polling subdivisions in the riding of West Middlesex. Now, I had a right to believe the statement of the Prime Minister made publicly in this country, and to expect that he would keep his word; and I had a right to believe that a minister of the Crown making that promise would keep his word. I repeat the question, what happened, and what will happen again, if this system is allowed to continue? I was never consulted; no member of the Liberal party was consulted. A Tory was appointed and he in turn appointed sixty-nine, or at least sixty-six, Tory partisans. Did they carry out the law justly and put on the voters' list all who should have been put on? Not at all. Some were fair, but by all means the majority were not; and on election day, instead of attending the polls, as was their duty, to put new voters on that had been left off, these men in some cases were out bringing in voters in Conservative rigs to vote against the Liberals. That is not the kind of thing that will appeal to the Canadian people and inspire them with confidence in their representation in Parliament; and that is certainly not the way in which a Parliament may be made free and honest.

Now, just one remark in reference to the Dominion Health Department. For my own part, I do not believe in it. I think it is an unnecessary duplication of office and will only entail additional expense. Everybody knows we have a sufficiency of cabinet officers at the present time, and a Civil Service that is giving enough trouble. I do not see that any good will be attained through it, and I think it is an encroachment on provincial rights. The followers of this Government will get berths and places, while the public health will not be benefited one particle. I am absolutely opposed to it. I believe it is an unnecessary and extravagant encroachment on the rights of the provinces.

There are one or two matters to which I wish to call the attention of the Government in regard to my part of the province of Ontario. Some of them may seem parochial, but most of them will affect the Dominion at large. At the present time there is a great wave of unrest all over this country. It prevails among the labouring people and the agricultural community. It prevails particularly amongst these two classes and it appears to me that it is more than justified. One thing I regret, Mr. Speaker, is that in the speech from the Throne, apart from a mention of land settlement which, to say the least, is very illusory, and apart from the assistance which the Government promise towards good roads, there is not one particle of encouragement held out to the great agricultural community. We, on this side, have listened until we almost doubt the sincerity of the hon. gentlemen on the other side about the great basic industry of the country, about the importance of agriculture, how our prosperity and the future depend upon its succcess, how it must be fostered, and how the agriculturist must be helped. But we do not see any evidence of putting these high-sounding platitudes into operation and there is nothing in the speech from the Throne to lead us to believe that at this session the Government intend to give any relief to the agriculturist.

Some people in the big cities of the country would have us believe that the farmer is a profiteer, that he is getting wealthy, that he is making untold money out of the consumers and the men in the cities. Only recently a report was published by the Ontario Minister of Agriculture. He is a lawyer. I think he is a pretty consistent Tory. I do not think he would have any prejudice in favour of the agricultural community. I have no doubt that his report is absolutely accurate. And what does he find in regard to agriculture in Ontario and in regard to its fortune-making opportunities? He tells us that there are a million men engaged in agriculture in Ontario. He estimates, after a very careful inquiry into all their resources, an income of $250,000,000 divided among them. In other words, for each man, woman and child there is an income of $250 per year; or for a family of four you would have $1,000 or, to make a generous allowance $1,200. Thus, a farmer with a family of four makes $1,200, and this calculation is based on the returns during the years 1914-1917. The farmer has $1,200 to support his family of four. He buys his farm implements, repairs them, puts in his crops, buys clothes and shoes at the exorbitant prices at which they are selling to-day, pays his taxes, educates his family and incurs all the other expenses incident to domestic life on $1,200 or $1,000 a year. Yet he is claimed to be a profiteer and to be making millions out of the people of the country. After the labouring man, the farmer gets less attention than any other class of the community. As a matter of honesty and frankness I feel compelled to say that the labouring man gets less attention than any other class of the community from the Government at Ottawa. I think he deserves more. But, what have the Government done for the farmer? How have they helped him? It is true that during the war he got larger prices than ever before but we know that this is the first time since the Crimean war that the farmer ever had prices such as he has to-day and this is the first time he ever got prices that came within any proportion of the cost of producing the things he had to sell.

Did this Government help him? Not a bit of it. This Government said: You are making too much money; we will have to check you and put the hobbles on you.

What did they do to him? When you have any grain to sell you must sell it at so much a bushel, and no more. Did they say that to the miller, the munitions maker, the bacon king or the banker? On the contrary they allowed all these classes to run riot. The miller has made his millions. My hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) proved that conclusively the other night in regard to the big millers, and, as a matter of fact, I know that the smaller millers in this country never made as much money in their history as in the last two years. They made more money out of the bread of the people in the last two years than in the fifty years preceding. We know that the shoe manufacturers are making large profits, with the result that it is almost impossible for a poor man to supply his family with shoes. The same condition exists with regard to clothes. We know what the munition manufacturers have made. They were not interfered with; in fact, they were helped and given capital with which to start their business. But when the farmer seeks to get the price that the demand for his produce would entitle it to, he is immediately checked up and a maximum price of $2.24 or something like that is placed upon his product. It is not fair to this man representing as he does a part of the community upon whose prosperity the welfare of the country so largely depends.

There are several things that the agriculturist at the present time is insisting upon getting, which he says he deserves and which I think this Government will be obliged to give him. If this Government does not give it to him, another Government will be placed in power that will be obliged to do so. The first thing that the farmer is asking in my part of the country may appear somewhat petty, but I think he knows his business as well as any other man, and it is that the daylight saving farce of last year shall not again be put into operation. We consult other men in regard to what they want for the carrying on of their business to the best advantage. I do not see why the farmers, representing sixty per cent of the people of Canada, should not be consulted in regard to this matter. In the western part of Ontario they are determined, as far as they can effect their purpose, that this system shall not be in vogue again. The farmers in the United States are of the same opinion, as are also the farmers in Manitoba and the West. This daylight saving scheme of last year interfered with many things on the farm. It interfered with their work, it interfered with the transaction of their business in town, it interfered with their children's going to school, and it interfered with the hired help of the farmers; and did no good. It is true that it may have been of some advantage to the man who wanted to go out in the afternoon and play a game of golf, or tennis, or run out into the country in his motor car, but we should consider business first rather than pleasure and the farmer's interest should be taken into account in regard to the daylight saving measure.

There is one argument against the position which the farmers take in regard to daylight saving. We are being told that the people of the United States have adopted it again and we must therefore do so. I protest against any such philosophy. It seems to me illogical and unnational. In the olden days when we tried to have reciprocity with the United States—and some of our friends across the way were not wise enough to vote for it but are clamouring for it now—we were told that if we had trade relations with the United States we were going to become an adjunct of that country, going to be its back-yard. That was not true. We were going, by reciprocity, to put ourselves right on the front street. But it seems to me that if we have to follow them in regard to the daylight saving system, and if we cannot regulate that matter for ourselves, we are certainly becoming an adjunct of the United States and are going to be their back-yard. Is it more important that the railway time tables in this country should not be reprinted, and the railways be put to a little expense, or that the farmer should be able to carry on his great agricultural operations without the embarrassment which this matter brings to him? It seems to me that the whole thing has come down to that, and I for one, coming from the agricultural part of the province of Ontario, protest against any continuation of the foolish system in question.

There is another thing to which I call the attention of the Government. In the western and central parts of the province of Ontario, there is a pressing and most insistent demand from the agriculturists for an interior terminal elevator for their grain. Not so very long ago the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario, Mr. Henry; the president of the United Farmers of Ontario, Mr.

Halbert; and the president of the United Farmers Co-operative Company, Mr. Burnaby, and other gentlemen, experts in the grain trade and in farming, sent a memorial, I believe, to this Government asking for the establishment of an interior terminal elevator. They asked that such an elevator should be built at some place in the province which would give a central location, and they urged the necessity of this on various grounds, being guided by the experience of the West in connection with terminal elevators. They had evidently studied this matter, they were men of eminence in the agricultural world, and must know that what they were asking was in the interests of the farming community, and they pointed out that in Ontario, unlike the West, there was no elevator where the grain of the province could be collected, where it could be weighed, where it could be cleaned, and where it would get an official stamp, and they urged the need of this elevator in the interest of the farmers of the province. From their representations I would judge that there are about two hundred million bushels of grain grown in Ontario. A great part of this is used in the feeding of stock, but much of it could be used for interprovincial trade, for local trade, and for export trade, and they urged these reasons for the terminal elevator. The advantages may be summarized under the following heads:

It would provide facilities for the storing, cleaning and grading of different kinds of seed and in this regard, would be of great advantage to the farmers of the province particularly with reference to grass and clover seeds.

It would be of much advantage to the livestock industry of the province by facilitating the distribution of feeding stuffs from one section to another in the case of short crops in the local districts in the province as a whole.

It would be able to perform a distinct service in preventing the deterioration of certain crops in the province in the years of too much moisture, as is illustrated in the bean crop in recent years. The crop of buckwheat this year has had to be dried because of the wet weather which prevailed at the time of harvesting.

Special emphasis is laid on the fact that such an elevator would be a public elevator and certificates issued would be official Government certificates, both of which are advantages affording great protection to the public and not available in the same sense from private enterprise.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that these men know what is in the interest of the farming community of Ontario, and that their request is very reasonable. They point out, moreover, that although this grain elevator may not pay as a commercial enterprise from the start, later on it would pay and consequently in that regard there would be no loss to the Dominion. They point out another thing which is very important in view of the observations recently made by the Minister of Public Works,—that the erection of this grain elevator, which would mean a considerable outlay, would provide employment to a great many men which the Government at the present time think is so desirable. The Minister of Public Works announced that he is erecting certain Custom House buildings in certain cities for the purpose of employing labour. It seems to me that this one form of construction will be more useful than the erection of Custom House buildings which he may be able to dispense with before long. It is one form of enterprise in which labour can be advantageously employed. I leave the suggestion to the Government and hope they will give it their most serious consideration.

There is one thing in the West that the farmers are clamouring for and that is rural credits. The farmers of Ontario, I know, would also like to see rural credits established. They feel the monopolistic tendencies of our banks, and that they would be assisted by the establishment of rural credits throughout the farming district. I have only to recall to the House that in 1913 the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) brought down a proposition in regard to rural credits which was not only accepted by the Finance Minister as a sound financial proposition, but also received the approval of the House. I think the Government might very well at this time take into consideration the establishment of rural credits throughout the West and in the province of Ontario.

But after all, Mr. Speaker, the vital question to-day is the tariff. I am not going to discuss it at length to-night because we shall have other opportunities of doing so. The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) has said that there is a cleavage between the East and the West in regard to this question. For my own part I do not wish to contradict the hon. gentleman, but I believe he is making a mistake which he will find out before many months go by, I believe there is no longer a cleavage between the East and the West in regard to the tariff question. At one time it was thought that we might say that "East is East and West is West, and never the twain shall meet" in regard to the tariff. But that day has gone by. The people of Nova Scotia and the people of Alberta are joining hands in regard to this question. The people of Quebec and the people of Saskatchewan are also joining hands; and in the province of Ontario the people are meeting on common ground. The consumer on the farm, and the consumer in the town to-day are in favour of tariff reduction; and in this connection I know that we are going to have the support, and the farmers are going to have the support, of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) who has just taken his seat, because I remember that hon. gentleman in 1911 advocating in this House, in the skilful way that only he possesses, and analysing with that clean cut analytical mind of his, the policy of relieving the farmers of Canada of the duty on agricultural implements. Upon that occasion I think the hon. gentleman convinced the House, and almost convinced his own side. I maintain that the farmers and the consumers to-day are one on this question, whether they come from the East or from the West. There is no cleavage in Canada as between the East and the West in regard to the tariff, but there is a cleavage between the people of Canada as a whole—between the consumers on the one side and the great protected privileged interests living in the great cities on the other side. That cleavage has got to be bridged, or partially bridged, by this Government, or the people of Canada will put another Government in power that will do the bridging. These cities seem to think that they occupy the position of old Imperial Rome, and that the whole country should pay tribute to them.

They seem to think that on the clothes on the labourer, on his foodstuffs, on his building material, on everything he uses, tribute should be paid to the manufacturer, to the monopolist, to the combinester, in order to let him live in luxury and plenty. That conviction will be shattered before very long. I for one—and I have always been in favour of this: it is no new advocacy on my part; it is no new faith that I am expressing—I for one am in favour of a considerable reduction of the tariff. I want to see free farm implements for the agriculturist. He is entitled to them, and I believe that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) thinks that he is entitled to them. I want to see what the farmer needs for his out-buildings—building material brought in free. I want to see cement, fertilizers, lubricating and fuel oil brought in free. As a matter of fact, I am heart and soul in favour of that resolution which was moved in the last Parliament by Hon. Frank Oliver and so ably seconded by the present Minister of Public Works (Hon. F. B. Carvell). The people are looking for some relief from the burdens of taxation imposed upon them by the tariff. There is a great outcry as to where we shall get our revenue. It does not seem to me to be well founded. I do not believe a prohibitive tariff of 42½ per cent is going to bring in a great revenue. I believe that a more reasonable tariff will bring in a larger revenue; that is the history of tariff changes. It is due to the consumer that the Government bestir itself and bring down such a tariff policy as the people are calling for.

It was brought out by the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) that there is a certain amount of stagnation in manufacturing enterprises because the Government has not the courage to move in connection with the tariff. The manufacturers know that there is a cry for a change. They know that the Government does not know what to do. They know that they are badgered on the right by their friends the monopolists and on the left their friends the people from the West. They are standing still, afraid to take the plunge. Capital is unsettled; business men do not know what orders to place. Let the Government come out in the open and do something. Let them announce a policy; let them convince the manufacturers and the business people of Canada that they have some courage in this matter, and let business get settled in the land.

As a word of warning to the Government, I quote the following from an address recently delivered by President Wilson in the United States:

> Any man who resists the present tides that run in the world will find himself thrown upon a shore so high and barren that it will seem as if he had been separated from his human kind forever.

This tide of tariff is running so high that these words of the President can be very properly applied to any Government that resists it.

The Minister of Immigration and Colonization speaks also of the cleavage in this country caused by the variety of the races and religions therein; and this he deplores. I say to him in all sincerity that such words from him do not have the right ring. Hardly more than a year has elapsed since the party which he is now supporting and then supported did everything in my province not only that men could do, but that perverse men could do, to make the cleavage between the races and religions of this country as wide and as impossible of healing as could be done. No Liberal following the Grand Old Chieftain in my part of the country was a loyal British subject; he was branded as a traitor and a pro-German, and classed as being unfit to take a place in the Parliament of Canada. These things may be forgiven, but, Mr. Speaker, they cannot be forgotten. The hon. gentleman's friends did more to undo the life-work of our great chieftain to bring harmony and unity among the races and creeds of this country than they can neutralize in the next generation, and soft words and pious advice from the hon. gentleman at this time are not at all in keeping with the conduct of his friends only a short year ago. I hope that my hon. friends will take to heart what that greatest of modern newspaper correspondents recently said. Everybody in this House was electrified by the reports of Philip Gibbs on the war—by their colour, by the manner in which he painted the heroism of the British and Canadian soldiers, by the humanity they expressed, by his love of justice, by his denunciation of the barbarity of the Hun. A short time ago he made a speech in New York in which he pointed out what men had done in America to bring about hatred and feud between the two great English races: how they had spread dissension; how they had disseminated ill-feeling. He said:

> Only bad men among us, or them, will sow seeds of suspicion or distrust and raise the rank weeds of hatred.

That expresses a very appropriate thought. The Anglo-Saxon races have cemented their friendship on the battlefields of Europe, and I hope that that friendship will be as enduring as the ages. But it seems to me that the words which I have read have some application to this country. Only bad men among us, either on this side of the House or on the other side, at election time or any other time, will sow these seeds of suspicion and distrust and raise the rank weeds of hatred between the French and English in this great land which is our common country. We might all better learn the lesson of the life of the great Canadian statesman who is now departed, and follow his example by endeavouring to build up a feeling of harmony and unity and tolerance, and thus make of this country what Providence intended it to be, one of the freest and noblest and greatest democracies of the world.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted, following the example of the elder members of this House who have taken part in this debate, to pay my humble tribute of affection and of respect to the memory of our great deceased chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

The pathetic accents with which these parliamentary precincts have resounded for a few days past, tell eloquently of the deep sorrow caused to the nation by the irreparable loss of that great personality, of that incomparable statesman, of that great Canadian, of that beloved leader of our party.

It seems to me that, as the day of his sudden demise recedes from us, the loss resulting from his mournful departure grows on our minds. Sir, it would be impossible for me to say, on this lamentable subject, anything which might interest this honourable House; I cannot add a single word to the pathetic tributes which I have listened to from the eloquent lips of those who have preceded me. I still hear the funeral knell dolefully resounding from the church steeples in our parishes, and announcing the universal grief of our population. I fully realize the fact that all honours were rendered to him up to the place of his supreme rest. Our mother country of old, always loved as she is, seems to have intended, adding thereby to the homage of those vested with the royal functions in this country, that one of her illustrious sons, in the person of general Pau, the glorious maimed soldier of 1870, should come to Laurier's grave and lay on it the flowers of remembrance and of affection. "I have the honour to offer, in the name of France," said he, "this tribute of affection and of respect to the great Canadian statesman in whose veins the French blood did flow."

Laurier was, for more than thirty years, the leader of our party in this Dominion. He was the living incarnation of the principles of Canadian Liberalism. We have laid him in his grave, but his soul lives with us, and we may well cry out: Long live Laurier!

Mr. Speaker, alluding now to the speech from the Throne, I protest with force against the policy of the Government, who undermine the constitution of this country by threatening provincial autonomy, who administer the common weal by Orders in Council and vexatious measures savouring of autocracy.

With regard to those new departures in the shape of bills relating to schools, hygiene or public highways, it is easy to see that a public spirit which one may call spirit of centralization, is being introduced to the benefit of the federal power and to the detriment of the provincial governments.

Adding to the attributes of the federal power and reducing those of the provincial powers is a thing much to be lamented, it is exactly the crime which makes of constitutions as many scraps of paper. Imperial Germany was declaimed against and the German kaiser was inveighed against to the utmost for having inaugurated in our time the abuse of power which turns treaties into scraps of paper. One of the reasons given by the Allies to all nations whether actors or spectators in the great war, was that they were fighting for civilization by crushing those by those who commit such abuses of power.

Canada boasts of having made great sacrifices in the fight for civilization against the perpetrators of these high-handed acts. But it breaks any patriotic Canadian's heart to see that the "scrap of paper" policy is not a subject of aversion for a great many citizens of this Dominion. We are sorry to find ill inspired and thoughtless people trying to lead Parliament into improper debates, which necessarily involve legislation conflicting with the autonomy of the provinces, and will consequently tear up slowly the covenant by which the provinces have been granted such autonomy, thus making of these agreements between the Dominion and Provincial Administrations as many scraps of paper.

Therefore, as a member of this House, I disapprove as much as I can of these debates and I blame the Government for permitting them to take place, because, from a federal point of view, they are not only out of order and not to be allowed, but also mean confusion which threatens the stability, and will soon lead to the violation of the political fabric of this Dominion.

I have another objection to that idea of centralization expressed in the debate on questions affecting provincial autonomy. I suggest that such a spirit brings about autocracy in a kingdom.

Absolute monarchy which was the system of government in every country in the world some centuries ago, has disappeared rejected by new generations which were won over to democracy. Now democracy can exist only through autonomy. The more you leave the initiative open to the people in the care of their interests, more or less of a local character, either in agriculture or industry, the nearer you get to real democracy. It is a system of the greatest freedom for the people under the authority which protects them. Caesarism, the old system of absolute monarchy and that of the modern Cæsars in Russia and Germany, has just been crushed in Europe, for the people bear with difficulty that kind of Government which is holding in leash all the liberties. Such an arbitrary system of government must disappear and ought to be kept out right now of Canadian politics.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when I consider another phase of the Governor General's speech I find that this Government are practising absolutism in time of peace, because they keep on administering public affairs by means of Orders in Council, which are nothing else than ukases. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the system of dictatorship was established for a certain time with the consent of the Opposition, but that was in war time, when it was thought that the majority should hold such powers if the people are to receive the necessary impulse to ensure victory to the Allies. But now the war is over, and our country is rejoicing over the complete victory that was achieved. Since the armistice in November we are living in peace. Therefore we have a right to proclaim that we revert to the constitutional system we so long enjoyed. The time has come when dictatorship has ceased to exist and must not prevail. We have a right to say, Mr. Speaker, that we have come back to the time when the Government must carry on the affairs of the country with the assistance of Parliament and conformably to the wishes of the people as expressed by their representatives.

Dictatorship, Sir, is unconstitutional and we are not justified in prolonging such a system, even though there are factions in this country urging the Government to govern in that way. For instance, with dictatorship abolished, no particular class of citizens would be permitted to compel the Government to pass Orders in Council which are nothing else than ukases, because it would be the duty of the Government to consult the members of this House who represent not one but all classes in this country. Therefore, I contend it is the duty of this Government to consult Parliament before they pass any Order in Council. It is also their duty to submit to the majority vote of Parliament. Such is the system of constitutional and democratic government, the government of the people, administered not by factions but by themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to another subject. I reproach this Government with enacting even lately vexatious legislation through Orders in Council providing for degrading punishment of innocent people.

I am speaking particularly of those young drafters who were not at fault, who did not wittingly disobey the law and yet to-day find themselves hounded by the authorities and, very often, dragged before the courts all through the country, to receive sentences of either a huge fine or imprisonment.

In this country, Sir, I believe the people are not well disposed towards militarism and that we can feel sure of ourselves in saying to-day, what was moreover recently asserted by the Prime Minister of England himself, that conscription is dead and buried. Besides we have been accustomed to believe in this country that we would never have conscription and we had heard from the lips of the hon. Prime Minister; we had read also in the Government's own press during the last election; and we had heard from the lips of members of this Government who had assured us, especially a certain class of society—the agricultural class—that conscription would never come. So, it was clearly understood, right up to the time of the last election, that we were not to have conscription in this country, and the people had become accustomed to the belief that the Military Service Act would never be passed. But, Mr. Speaker, once the election over, the Government, with its Order in Council, as usual, passed a measure abolishing the exemptions granted a certain class of our farmers. Still, the Government let it be understood to these folks that those who were thus deprived of their right to exemption would however not be called to the colours under the conscription law. The proof of this is seen in the large delegation of farmers who waited upon the Government, from Ontario and the other provinces asking the Government to redeem its promises made during the election of 1917, and to make them immune from the Act. Their motives were very patriotic. They had heard from the lips of the Prime Minister, in those days, it was hard to decide just who contributed most to the success of the Allied arms, the man who went across to fight in the trenches or the man who stayed behind on his farm working to increase the production of foodstuffs; our farmers, hearing this, thought it their duty to stay where they were, on the land, and strive patriotically to increase production.

And that is exactly what has happened since last April; these farmers whose services were absolutely necessary as producers, had of course been told to report for military service, but on the other hand they had been given to understand that if their occupation was genuinely such as to be essential to food production they would be exempt. Exemptions for this very reason were numerous. And if it so happened that a number of these young men did not report for exemption they nevertheless remained steadily at work on their farms, while the police and the Government know they were there, and they felt that they were entitled to the same treatment as those who did report and were exempted because they were performing the identical task of food production.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what do we find to-day? We find these young men, all over the country, arrested wholesale and brought before the courts; what is their crime? Their crime consists in having failed to report; they are looked upon as defaulters. However, I do not think that these young men are at all to blame; they did just what was being openly done by those of their companions who had reported and been granted exemption; they remained on their farms striving patriotically to increase food production.

It is time to call a halt to these vexatious proceedings. They have been going on for a certain time, but to-day it appears as though the Government were seeking deliberately to defy public opinion. The Government was not satisfied with the Order in Council which permitted the court to make the sentence fit the crime—if such can be called a crime—and in certain cases be content with imposing a fine of $10 or a few days in jail; no, that was not enough, and now we learn from the papers and in the Official Gazette that a new Order in Council has just been passed fixing the fine for these young offenders at from $250 to $5,000 and the term of imprisonment at a maximum of two years, I think it is.

What do we find in most of the cases of these young men who are haled before the court? First of all, a great many of them never received their notification to report. This military service law was enacted in this country with such precipitous haste and I must say, with so little precaution, that the Government sought to call young men to the colours by means of a notice served through the mails. Hence in a great many cases, and this has been admitted by the courts, the notice was either not received or received too late, and even addressed to places where the subject did not reside at all.

Now, the Government has annoying ways of doing things in other matters also. For my own part, representing as I do an agricultural district I deemed it my duty when these orders in council were passed by the Government last spring, to help these young men, as best I might, to obey the military law, to report and obtain exemption, when they were entitled to it, by reason of their being engaged in the essential industry of food production, and thus be allowed to remain on their farms.

What do we see to-day? These young farmers, these young draftees who had been granted exemption—after the same had been approved by the representative of the Department of Agriculture—were obliged to have their leave extended from time to time. Thus, the men who reported during the month of May last were granted leave until June, those reporting in June until August, and from August these exemptions —before the amnesty which granted a pardon to all those who reported before the 24th of August—were continued until the 21st of September. When this date came the Government, mindful of the pressure which had been brought to bear in this matter and of the promises it had itself made to the farmers could hardly do otherwise than extend the leave of those who were absent until October 30, and on October 30 this leave was extended to November 15.

Now notice, Mr. Speaker, that from the month of September when one of the first leaves expired, these farmers remained at their work with the assurance of the military authorities that they would not be disturbed because the leave granted them until the 21st of September was renewed from time to time without their being obliged to obtain a new leave.

Can you believe that these young farmers, who are very numerous in our country districts, and who were granted leave of absence by the military authorities should to-day be the victims of the police employed by the Department of Justice, that they have even been arrested and thrown into prison while awaiting trial? I really cannot believe that this is so. I think that some mistake has been made. Rather than believe that this thing is being done deliberately I prefer to think that the Government is not aware that these young men have exemption papers.

This thing has got to stop. More than ever it is time to stop sending these policemen into our country districts there to arrest young men who are guilty of no offence. When the amnesty was promulgated in November they were assured by the military authorities that they would obtain their final discharge, that papers for this purpose would be sent them by the commanding officer or that they could appear in person before the tribunal.

What happened? A great many of them heard the call and reported to General Headquarters and obtained their discharge. As for those others who were in remote country districts who had no knowledge of this latter call, who had in their pockets the papers entitling them to exemption, they are not at fault, they did not purposely commit any breach of the military law.

However, Mr. Speaker, I repeat, and it pains me deeply to say this,—it may be an error on the part of the Government, or of whatever department has the thing in hand, that is responsible for these doings—but I bitterly regret to find that these peaceful folk are still being arrested by officers of the law. It seems to me that a general amnesty should be proclaimed and that this persecution on the part of the Government should cease. To my mind, during these times of reconstruction the Government needs the good-will of all the country's citizens, needs especially the good-will of these young farmers who are very numerous and who did not disobey the law.

It seems to me that those should be the first ones to enjoy the benefits of an Act of amnesty, and that the Government ought to present forthwith a Bill to that effect.

The provinces showed themselves to be generous; they answered the call of the Government; they subscribed to the Victory loan and to every possible funds.

It is that same population, it is those young men who gave vent to their patriotic feeling that are given as criminals to be brought before the courts and to be heavily fined.

Mr. Speaker, I now conclude. Since the truce, the Governor General is visiting the provinces and the thought disclosed in his replies to addresses is that we British citizens should gather around the flag being thoroughly convinced that it is a flag which protects vested rights and promotes the grouping of nations. Such is what its name implies: "Union Jack" as also the motto of the people it shields: "Dieu et mon Droit." Let that thought and that spirit inspire the Dominion Parliament and the ministry which heads it; consequently, let us put aside the lash of penalties which breeds hatred and let make use instead of peaceful and kindly measures which develop a widespread love of country. Let us also keep up in this Parliament a jealous love of autonomy, eagerness to uphold it instead of trampling upon it, and all sections and individuals will hasten to hoist, hail and defend the British flag.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Meighen, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Burrell the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

RIOTS AT KINMEL CAMP.

STATEMENT BY THE ACTING PRIME MINISTER—CABLES FROM OVERSEAS MINISTER OF MILITIA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I desire to read the following cable which I have received from the Overseas Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) respecting the Kinmel Park disturbance:

Answering your inquiry further information Kinmel Park disturbance, my cable March 7th should be read in conjunction with this, covers the ground pending thorough inquiry which is being carried on. Difficulties have been encountered but discipline amongst Canadians has been considered at least equal to that of best Imperial troops. Unrest in Canadian Camps is accounted for by fact that the men have been away from their homes in Canada for periods ranging up to four years or more, have suffered great privations and are thoroughly homesick, a fact which is fully appreciated. It will be easily understood that men who have endured such hardships and monotony would when they reached Kinmel Park, the last stage in England before embarkation, if held owing to shipping difficulties, become impatient. Everything possible is done to interest the soldiers while they are waiting to be repatriated. Information on this point will follow. Armistice came at beginning of one of most severe winters England has experienced. Weather has been continually cold and wet with absolute lack of sunshine. Had we been fortunate enough to have been able to proceed with demobilization under more favourable weather conditions there would have been less cause for complaint. There has been general shortage of fuel which has added discomfort. Men have lived in camps, for most part in huts, which is only accommodation. Non-combatant troops coming from different parts of France, also lines of communication troops, have doubtedly suffered hardships owing to unavoidable and uncomfortable transportation to England, resulting in colds and in many cases influenza. Discomforts which soldier is willing to put up with when engaged in fighting assume different aspect now that war is over. Labour troubles and general unrest in British Isles and on continent have had some effect upon men. In my cable to you February 25th I pointed out that we were short nine thousand in our shipment of troops to Canada for first fifteen days of February. This was caused by Ministry Shipping not being able to deliver ships which had been specifically promised for certain dates. In some cases ships offered were upon examination refused by us because they were not suitable for carrying troops. In other cases sailings of ships have been postponed four, five and six times and such postponements or cancellations of sailings causing vast amount of extra work in re-forming of sailing parties and re-opening of documents and correction of nominal rolls, etc. Delays and cancellations also lead to rearrangement of flow of troops as far back as Belgium. Men who have been over here for long periods but who have served in corps were embarked for Canada in large numbers before March first. It was not until this date that any corps troops were embarked. Men who have served in corps who are casualties in England so far as possible are collected and drafted into units of corps which go to Canada according to dispersal areas. Difficulties arise in connection with maintaining permanent cadres owing to specially trained or technical personnel desiring to be returned to Canada in their order of priority and their replacement by efficient personnel causes great difficulty. Too much cannot be said on behalf of men engaged in this work as well as staffs in general, including clerks all descriptions who though anxious to get home and in many cases as much entitled as any one to return, are loyally and patriotically supporting me in endeavour to get troops back. I cannot speak too highly of men who are patiently and patriotically carrying on necessary work to demobilize and embark soldiers for Canada, many of whom have served for long periods and in many cases will be last to be demobilized. This work has been greatly hampered by influenza epidemic. Also work of demobilization has been interfered with through demands of Imperial authorities for necessary accommodation in order to carry out their demobilization, many Canadian reserve units in England having had to be moved at same time under great difficulties in the carrying out of their functions of demobilization. Staff difficulties are also very heavy on account of vast amount of documentation requiring to be carried out in England to meet wishes of authorities in Canada. More men have to be provided for in England than at any time since beginning of the war. Necessity of inaugurating a special system for dealing with corps troops and educating of staffs in accordance with systems prevailing in England. There are also difficulties in carrying out two forms of demobilization side by side, this being unavoidable. Disposition of surplus war material in France and England, horses, etc., is big task in itself. Never since war began has there been such an amount of work to be done in so short a period. Took some time to reverse machine which had been in operation for four and a half years and set it going in opposite direction back to Canada. All practical suggestions for improvements to assist in camp life are readily adopted. Notwithstanding all difficulties with which we are faced we will have succeeded by end of this month in moving from France to England eighty-five thousand soldiers and from England to Canada not less than one hundred thousand, which is considered here at any rate a remarkable achievement considering all circumstances.

I cabled recently to the Overseas Minister of Militia with respect to certain press reports which had reached Canada alleging that the girls' quarters at Kinmel Camp had been attacked by the men. Sir Edward Kemp replied to my cable as follows:

Cannot anticipate findings of Court Inquiry. Times, however, on March 8th stated with respect to girls employed in camp as follows: "The manageress responsible for girls declares that not the slightest attempt was made to interfere with any of them."

Lloyd's paper, March 9th, says: "No attempt was made by the rioters to interfere with them. The girls were treated with the utmost chivalry."

The Telegraph, March 8th, says: "The girls' camp was not attacked, and as a matter of fact the girls were treated with the utmost chivalry."

There is indignation here among all Canadians at exaggerations which appeared particularly in earlier reports in British press. I have expressed indignation of Canadians to newspapers privately and publicly. Some have apologized. No Canadian, however, believed that Canadian soldiers would be guilty of conduct as reported in press respecting girls working in canteens with which they were charged. Cannot say at moment when findings Court Inquiry will be ready. Do not want to create impression that haste is of primary importance. What is required is thorough inquiry.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING BUREAU.

STRIKE OF PRESSMEN—STATEMENT OF HON. MR. BURRELL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I should like the attention of the Secretary of State (Hon. Mr. Burrell) for a moment. I see by the press this morning that there is some hope of an early settlement of the trouble in the Printing Bureau. We should like to know whether that is so; also when the printing of the Hansard in the ordinary way will be resumed. It is important to members that they be supplied with the usual number of copies of Hansard; its suspension has interfered very much with the ordinary run of business.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Secretary of State): I cannot hold myself responsible for the non-printing of Hansard at this time. As to the press report that appeared this morning, I am, of course, not responsible for that either. I interviewed a committee of the striking employees this morning, and the questions involved were discussed very generally. The position at the moment is about as it was. I explained that I did not consider, in view of all the facts, that there was any justification for the strike, and that if the men came back—as I think it desirable that they should, from their own point of view—proper consideration would be given to any grievance that they believe they have.

As to their position after March 31, $2.00 a week has been given to them from April 1 last to March 31, and I shall recommend that the most sympathetic consideration be given to settle things justly as between March 31 and June 1, when the new agreements will be entered into.

CANADIAN ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE.

ALLEGATIONS BY BRIGADIER-GENERAL SMART IN QUEBEC LEGISLATURE.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister if the Government has given consideration to the charges made in the Quebec Legislature by Brigadier-General Smart, regarding maladministration of medical services overseas, and, if so, whether we may expect an announcement in this House with respect to Government action in connection with those charges?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I have some doubt as to whether my hon. friend is in order in asking a question founded upon charges made in another legislative assembly; but as he has raised the question, possibly a little more than usual latitude might be allowed to me in replying. I saw the report of the statements made by General Smart in the Quebec Legislature. They referred to a situation which existed in England in 1916, when Colonel Bruce was there and when a commission was appointed by the Government, on the recommendation of Sir George Perley, for the purpose of making a thorough inquiry into conditions affecting the Canadian Medical Service in Great Britain, and, I think, also on the continent. The matter has been discussed in this House on many occasions. I desire to say just this: that from time to time statements are, and no doubt will be made by those returning from England giving but a fragmentary and, in many cases, an exceedingly distorted view of facts. Men returning may be disappointed in their expectations; they may have some grievances of their own; they may make statements which are not founded in fact. I have no hesitation in saying that if the statements in question were made as reported in the press, they are absolutely not founded in fact and are not to be depended upon. I was in England in 1916; I was associated with Sir George Perley in connection with the creation of a commission of inquiry; I say that the action which he took was the sound action; that it had the commendation of those who knew the situation in England. And I say further in regard to Sir George Perley that I do not know of any civilian whose record shows more valuable service to Canada during the period of the war and since than that of the High Commissioner of Canada. He is a man of most superb executive ability. I have had much to do with him; I have been in continual cable communication with him on the utmost variety of subjects and he has always been prompt and exceedingly efficient and effectual in dealing with the highly important matters which I have brought to his attention from time to time. His services have been, in my opinion, simply invaluable to this country. I do not believe the charges made against him have the slightest foundation in fact.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): May I ask the Minister of Finance how soon we may expect the remaining volumes of the Auditor General's Report? When I drew attention to this matter some days ago, I was informed that they would shortly be laid upon the Table. Since that time one volume has been laid on the Table. I should like some explanation as to why volumes I and II have not reached the House while volume III has been distributed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be glad to make inquiry from the Auditor General and give a statement to-morrow regarding the matter. One volume has already been laid on the Table. The circumstances relating to the delay were explained by the Auditor General in a letter which I laid on the Table.

Mr. MURPHY: Has a new Auditor General been appointed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Major Sutherland, the Assistant Auditor General, has been appointed in place of the late Auditor General.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session resumed from Friday, March 14.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of Interior): Mr. Speaker, the definite object I have in rising is to endeavour to make reply to some features of the address delivered in this House on Friday last by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). Since the conclusion of that speech, however, the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) has delivered a very well phrased and well condensed speech on various subjects that have been under review. His remarks consisted mainly in a pilgrimage into problems of tariff, a pilgrimage in which I shall not venture to follow him at present, preferring rather to pursue the advice so often given by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) when he was Minister of Finance, and refrain, as a member of the Government, from a discussion of questions of tariff until the Budget is brought down.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross), however, indulged in the practice which is somewhat frequently pursued in this Parliament, of referring to an address I had the honour to make and a resolution I had the honour to move in this House in the early months of 1911. The resolution asked the House for a substantial reduction in the duties on implements. The remark I wish to make is this: that the hon. gentleman, in his efforts to criticise what I said at that time and myself now in relation to it, followed the habit of making a summary, or rather a very rough and hasty interpretation of what I said at that time instead of quoting my remarks as they were uttered. All I ask of him is: that whenever again he seeks to found any argument upon that speech or that resolution, he be good enough to give the text of the remarks I made or the text of the resolution, because I can assure him now that though something over eight years have gone by there is not a paragraph of that speech by whose principles I am not prepared to abide. The hon. gentleman appears to be at the present time a convert to the arguments I then adduced. I am very glad to know that. I cannot recall, however, that I got much assistance from him then when he was supporting the Government in office. He is an example of the very numerous class of men who are much easier of conversion and much more receptive to new platforms and new policies while enjoying the freedom of opposition and of private life than they are when confronted with the responsibilities of Government.

I am sure that the members of this House Sir, both to your right and to your left, will share with me in congratulating the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) on the vigour both of mind and body, of which he gave such ample evidence in his speech of last Friday. It is a matter of encouragement to us all, and indeed of inspiration, that a man of his years and of his long register of public service, a man who when very many around him now were in their cradles was Prime Minister of his province, can at this time rise to as high a level of controversial skill as at any period of his career.

There are many positions in the long range of subjects over which he traversed with which I do not care to take issue. Indeed, with much that he said I am in substantial accord, and my references this afternoon will be rather to contentions he brought forward and positions he took up in respect of which it may be said that the skill with which they were defended was very much better than the care with which they were selected.

First of all; in the latter part of his address, he took the ground that this was no longer a free Parliament; that this was a strangled and shackled Parliament and he ventured to appeal to hon. members to shake off the shackles and restore the pristine freedom of this House. Well, any hon. member or any one looking down from the gallery who has watched the proceedings of this Parliament for the past ten years during which I have been a member, or, indeed, for any ten years preceding, and noted the healthy atmosphere of independence and freedom and the extraordinary latitude of criticism exercised by hon. members on both sides, will have some difficulty in conceiving how any reflective mind could come to the conclusion that this Parliament, of all parliaments, is shackled.

In attempting to establish his case the Ex-Minister of Finance enunciated certain precepts as to what should be the duty of the supporter of a party, and particularly of a supporter of a government, under the constitutional conditions of parliamentary government under which we live. With the principles he enunciated I want to take issue—and indeed the sharpest possible issue. He proclaims himself an adherent of the party system. Generally speaking, I have no fault to find with that position. I am not able to conceive how our parliamentary government can possibly be continued save under some form of the party system. A party system necessarily involves the concession of individual opinion to the will of the majority. It necessarily involves the tempering of individual aspirations to the average will of the entire body, with the result that though the final policy to which the party man eventually adheres may not meet the individual opinions of many, it will at all events fairly represent the average opinion of all. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), while supporting the general principle of party support, states that it must be confined to one class of subjects only, and that a wholly different relationship exists between the members of a party and the Government in office, or the members of the opposite party and the leader of the Opposition, in another class of subjects. These are his words:

> I felt that on matters relating to the prosecution of the war the Government ought to be strongly supported, certainly by their friends, and I thought they might have claimed support from their opponents even in matters relating to the prosecution of the war. But I believe that on all questions not connected with the war every man in the House of Commons should be at liberty to act according to the dictates of his conscience. Was that an erroneous conception? Was there anything unreasonable in that?

There is just this much unreasonable in that. I should like to inquire why the operation of conscience should be excluded from the consideration of subjects connected with the prosecution of the war? Why should conscience reign only in the sphere of the trivial and the secondary, and be wholly excluded when it comes to the sphere of the important and the vital? If an hon. member of this House is asked to support some article of policy relating to the prosecution of the war which he believes to be not serving the interests of the country at all, which he believes will be a dishonour to his country and result, in part at all events, in disaster to his country, is he to be told that his conscience must not be allowed to speak or to affect his vote, and that on all such matters of great and imperious concern he must bow to the party will and support the Government in office? And is he at the same time to be told that in matters wholly secondary and trivial and inconsequential to the State, in order that his conscience may be kept alive, he is to be allowed to give it free play and to vote just as he likes?

I have stated, in plain language, I am sure, the principles which the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's deems to be sound. Those principles need only to be stated to be condemned as wholly unsound and wrong.

I said a few moments ago that the very existence of party, necessary as it is to the continuity of governmental authority and to the efficiency of government as government, necessarily involved unity of action and support by party, save in certain extraordinary circumstances. But it would appear to me that the time when a member might see his way not to support the Government in office which he was elected to support would be an occasion, not of minor, but of major consequence—an occasion when the most vital interests of the State were concerned, and when he would determine that rather than support a policy of far-reaching consequence that he deems to be wrong, he would prefer that the Government of the day should change, or that there should be an appeal to the higher court of public opinion. On many such occasions hon. members of this House have seen fit to break from party and take a place by themselves, voting against the Government which generally they were desirous to support. That is a statement of the principle as it has operated and as it is recognized both in the Old Land and in this.

The hon. member, however, went on to give a special instance, and he said in that special instance a grave error was made which resulted in the shackling of this House by the Prime Minister of Canada. I wish to refer to that instance. It was on the occasion of the titles debate of last session. On that occasion the Prime Minister, in the name of the Government of this country moved a certain amendment to a resolution that was before this House. The circumstances were these: The subject of titles had engaged a very large share of public attention for some time and had been under discussion in the press of Canada. In view of that volume of public attention, and in view also, and particularly, of the fact that the question, important or unimportant though it might be in itself, involved our relationship with the Crown and with the Imperial authorities, the Government of this country felt it its duty to come to a definite decision of policy with regard thereto. They came to that decision, and embodied it in an Order in Council; and, more than that, communicated their decision with regard to this subject to the Government of Great Britain

In that position the Government found itself when the question came under discussion in this House, and in such circumstances the Government was bound to take its place as a government, where it had taken it in the Order in Council, and as thus communicated to the Imperial authorities. Now, I know of no case in British history, or in our own history, where a government, having finally taken up a position and having communicated that position to the authorities to whom it had to be communicated under the circumstances, could permit that policy to which they were committed to be overthrown by parliament, and thereafter continue to carry on the government of the country. There must be a consideration on the part of Government, as regards each individual case, of its general bearing on the whole body of public legislation. That consideration a government is bound to give, and the Government having given that consideration and come to its decision, were it to be overthrown, the authority necessary to its efficiency is impaired—and a long series of British precedents has taught us that a government in that position serves the public interests best by retiring from office and giving place to those who better represent the people in Parliament. It is not that a government is afraid to carry on, nor that it seeks anything for itself. It is merely in deference to the well-established rule—established through a thousand years of experience—that a government whose authority is so challenged or impaired cannot with advantage legislate in the public interests. Furthermore, there existed this circumstance in connection with the Titles situation; that the Government of Great Britain, after communication of the position assumed by the Government of Canada, had, in the most respectful and urgent terms, asked this Government to defer further consideration of the subject, pending a conference upon it in England in the summer of 1918, and in view of that special communication, the stand taken by the Prime Minister in this House was inevitable and necessary. So that the Prime Minister—whether our stand previously had been right or wrong—in speaking as he did in Parliament on that night, was not making anything of a threat to Parliament; he was merely laying down a constitutional principle, by which constitutional principle he deemed himself to be bound.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) referred to an Act, passed not by this Government, but by the Government which preceded it, known as the War-time Elections Act. The language which he applied to that legislation was by far the strongest language which he used in the course of his address—language which later I shall quote, and for which he will have to take full responsibility. He made the attack knowing, as he well knew and as no one knew better, that on the subject of the merits of that Bill on the merits of the legislation which that Bill put into effect, there was necessarily a difference of opinion on the part of ministers who now compose the Government of Canada. He approved of the principle of those men coming together and uniting for another and a higher purpose, and he knew as well, in making his attack upon it, that that Bill of itself goes out of existence automatically on demobilization, and that the Government of the day has no contemplation of its being exercised before demobilization. Consequently there would not appear to be very much practical object to be served by the stand he took.

Inasmuch as the attack which he made was certainly of an extraordinary character, and placed, at all events half of the members of this Government in a position that justifies vigorous defence, I wish to offer a little serious comment from the point of view of a member of this House, and of the late Administration, and in no way affecting to speak on behalf of the Government as constitued now. The hon. member stated that under the War-time Elections Act, a class of the population of this country was disfranchised. That is true. He stated that these disfranchised persons would have voted against the Government of the day had they not been disfranchised, or would as a rule have voted against it. That also I do not deny. I believed that to be true then, and I believe it to be true now. But he went on to say that the only reason given for their disfranchisement was the fact that they would vote against the Administration. Now, I introduced that Bill myself—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I prepared that Bill myself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very glad to hear my work approved by hon. gentlemen opposite. I stated the grounds of that Bill to the House. Many other hon. members of this House, both in the Government and out of the Government, stated the principle behind that Bill and the reasons for it; and no one of them—myself or any other—ever stated, as the hon. gentleman claims we stated, that the reason for that Bill was the fact that the persons disfranchised would otherwise vote against the Government. It is one thing to believe they would; it is wholly another thing to base a Bill on that belief. The fact that they would would be no reason whatever for such legislation. The reason they were disfranchised, as has a hundred times been repeated—be that reason sufficient or be it not—was that these men, bound as they were by ties of blood and kin, and by ties of a very freshly severed citizenship to the enemies of this country were not in a position, freely as Canadian citizens, to decide an issue that involved the conduct of war with the nation from which they came. That, briefly stated, was the reason given; that, briefly stated, was the reason behind the Bill. It was either sufficient or it was not. In my judgment it was good; in my judgment any other course would have been wholly unjustifiable.

But more than that: the hon. member states that the honour of the British name, the honour of the Canadian name, suffered a very serious defamation by the passing of that Act. I will quote his words. He went through a prolonged homily on the value of reputation and of character; on the value of the British name throughout the world, and he proceeded to say:

> Who can say to-day, with fairness and justice, "By the word of a Canadian I will do it"? The word of a Canadian, tried by the War-time Elections Act, is a word of trickery, a word of deception, and the word of a cheat.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now, hon. gentlemen venture to "hear, hear" again. It may just be possible that that invective, bitter as it is, extraordinary as it is, may in a few seconds be brought back and laid at the door of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's himself. Is it to be argued that because a person is given the rights of a British subject he is guaranteed forever the franchise? Is it to be argued that an alien coming to this country and acquiring the status of a British subject thereby enjoys a higher guarantee of citizenship than a British-born subject? Nobody would venture either assertion. It cannot be supported. It is not contended by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, or even suggested. He enjoys the same securities as the British subject born, no more and no less. But it is argued that to disfranchise British subjects born, or to disfranchise these others, is to indulge in trickery, deception and cheating. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was for a long time Premier of the province of Nova Scotia. He came into office about the year 1883, and while he was a member of the Government of the province he introduced a Bill into the legislature of Nova Scotia by which Bill he would disfranchise within that province British subjects in the persons of all within the confines of Nova Scotia who were in the employment of the Government of Canada. That was a clause which was in the Act before, and when he brought it into the Legislature of Nova Scotia and pleaded for its reintroduction into law a motion was made by a member urging that the clause providing for disfranchisement of all these employees of the railways, post offices, inland revenue offices, lighthouses and other services of the Dominion Government in that province, should be struck out. That motion in amendment was resisted by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's,—his resistance prevailed and the clause was retained. That clause reads as follows:

> It shall not be lawful for any person to vote at any election for a member or members to represent the people in the general assembly of this Province, who at any time within fifteen days before the day of election, was an employee, or in the receipt of wages or emolument of any kind as such employee, in the Post Office, the Custom House, the Inland Revenue Department, the Lighthouse service, on the Government railroads, in the Crown Land Office, or the Local Public Works and Mines.

Then it goes on to except those who are merely supplying material and the actual postmaster and mail courier himself. And the class of men disfranchised, born British subjects, bore just about as large a proportion of the electorate of the province as those disfranchised by the War-time Elections Act bore to the electorate of Canada. He himself reaped the fruits of this disfranchisement during five provincial elections in that province.

I am not arguing that the disfranchisement was wrong. I am not questioning it. It is not necessary for my contention to argue that the disfranchisement was wrong. It was put upon the ground that these persons, being employees of the Federal authorities, would be under the influence of their employers and would not be free voters in the contest. It is a little difficult to understand why that argument would not equally apply to any person in the service of any other employer in the province of Nova Scotia. But, assuming that the argument is good and putting it on the highest plane you can, what is it? It is that by reason of external influence these British subjects were not free in the determination of questions appertaining to the province of Nova Scotia. Will anybody tell me that the influence, the stress, the power of the ties of blood and kin; the groanings and tears of brothers overseas fighting against this country would not be a thousand times more powerful than would be an influence of that kind? If British honour, if the British name, if the Canadian name has suffered a catastrophe in this country by reason of the exercise of the power of disfranchisement, that catastrophe is a whole lot older than the War-time Elections Act, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was himself a participant in the wreck.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not sure about the date of the Act to which the hon. gentleman refers. Is the introduction of this not very much older than the coming in as Premier of Nova Scotia of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated so. It was introduced in 1871, three or four years after Confederation, but does the hon. gentleman argue that if men had been wrongfully disfranchised for thirteen years the continuation of the wrong is justified?

Mr. McKENZIE: The Liberals repealed the Act in Nova Scotia and it is out of date long ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They repealed the Act in 1909 long after the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's had ceased to be interested in Nova Scotia politics. If the War-times Elections Act is absolutely wrong;—though passed only for one election—how could the legislature of Nova Scotia support an Act and keep it on the statute-book for 38 years as the law of that province, founded on the same principle but on a far weaker case?

Now, I come to that feature of the address of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's in which he criticised the representation of this country at the Peace Conference now in session at Paris. The argument of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was that there were no subjects under discussion at this Peace Conference in which Canada had any special concern or in which Canada had any interest distinct from the interests of the British Islands, and that our representation there should be merged in the representation selected by the British Parliament. His line of thought first of all was that unless we had subjects under discussion there in which we had a purely Canadian interest, as distinct from the interest of Great Britain, we had no right to representation and he said that President Wilson was sound and logical when he resisted representation on the part of Canada. It is very difficult for me to comprehend how an hon. gentleman of the long experience of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) could possibly do justice to his intellect and come to the conclusion that there were no subjects under discussion in which we had a very distinct and very vital interest.

We do not fully know what is taking place; that is to say we know nothing more than is communicated to us through the regular channels. The deliberations will subsequently be made public to the extent that the conference decides, and then we will know what has been under discussion. But it seems to me that we can come to a conclusion as to the subjects that are probably under review. First of all there are the fourteen point of President Wilson on the basis of which the terms of settlement are finally to rest. There are those points that will be under discussion, and what is one of them? One of them says something about an economic arrangement as to trade between the powers of the world. That must be under discussion. I would not like to undertake to define what was in the President's mind but I presume there was something, and will anybody venture to suggest that this Dominion should not be represented and that we have no distinct interest, aside altogether from the interest of the British Islands, in the determination of the question of an economic arrangement as to trade between the Powers?

Furthermore there is under discussion there the question of the purchase, the transportation, and the disposition of food stuffs as between Allied and enemy countries. Will any one suggest that our interests with regard to that are identical with the interests of Great Britain? Our interests are by no means identical; they are distinct, and the problem for us is wholly a Canadian problem. And there could be nothing more vital, and nothing more important, than that representatives of this Dominion of high standing and authority should be there to safeguard the interests of Canada. There is nothing that bears more on the prosperity of this country at this time than the share of trade obtained by this country in the reconstruction of the desolated parts of Europe, and the share of purchases made by this country for foodstuffs and for other supplies for Allied and enemy lands. It is all right to have a trade commission, but the principles that bear on these problems are under discussion at the Peace Conference, and in the determination of these principles it is essential to this Dominion that it should be represented.

Then there is the matter of transportation, pending, at all events, the conclusion of the terms of peace. Will any one suggest that the problem of transportation is the same for Canada as it is for Great Britain? It is a different problem altogether, and it is Canadians who must have a say in the solution of that problem so far as we are concerned. I could pass from subject to subject, but there will scarcely be a matter within the deliberations of that conference in which we have not an interest, and a distinctive interest. But assuming again that on no single topic have we any concern or any special interest that may be separated from and made distinct from the interest of Great Britain, I affirm here as a Canadian citizen that as a distinct entity within the British Empire, and as a distinct self-governing entity, we are entitled to a voice in the attitude assumed by Great Britain in the disposal of every question that pertains to the terms of peace.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) referred to the fact that only on one occasion was the representative of Canada seated at the inner council of Ten which, he states, and rightly states, is so powerful in the determination of the problems of the Conference. He made some fun of the reference in the despatch to the fact that the subject under discussion at that meeting was the fixing of the boundaries of Serbia, and intimated to this House that the determination of that question should be left to clerks in the Foreign Office in England, and that in it we had no concern whatever. Well, sixty thousand soldiers of this country have come to early graves as a result of this war, and you do not trace very far back the causes that led to the war until you come to the boundaries of Serbia. Bosnia, and Herzegovina filched from Serbian control! the Serajevo massacre! the flame that lighted the world. And on the proper solution of the boundaries of Serbia, as of every power, on the certainty that those boundaries will be delimited in accordance with rightful principles of race and nationality and of self-determination, on the certainty that they will be based on the general consent of nations and in fundamental equity as between nations—on that depends the peace and prosperity of mankind for generations to come.

It is no flattery to the Prime Minister of Canada, no flattery to the Government of Canada, to say that Sir Robert Borden at this time, removed as he is from local or European prejudices, wholly divorced as he is from the ties and understandings that may have bound countries in days gone by, and possessed as he is, of lofty judicial temperament, high legal endowment and strong personality and will—it is no flattery to him to say that his services may be inestimable in the determination of the question of the boundaries of Europe.

Let me assure Parliament—it needs no assurance I hope—that the Prime Minister did not go over to take part in that Conference, and in the negotiations that led to the Conference and that decided its constitution, he did not go over merely as a matter of his own convenience, or to satisfy his pride; he went over there on the earnest and repeated solicitation of the Prime Minister of Great Britain himself, on his earnest and repeated appeal—praying him to come not at the end of November, or at the 4 p. m. beginning of the Conference, but praying Sir Robert to come and give his services early, not to great Britain, not to Canada, but to the whole Empire, in the determination of the constitution of the Conference, in the determination of all the arrangements leading to it, and in all the problems with which the Government and the Empire were confronted leading to and before that Conference.

I do not think that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was doing quite justice to this Dominion when he pictured the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States as feeding out candy to this country, endeavouring to flatter us, and, as it were, to tickle the vanity of Canada in deciding whether we should have representation or not. He even went so far as to say that President Wilson was sound and logical in his position when he took the ground, as in fancy he pictured him taking it, that we had no more right to separate representation than had the state of New York over and above the representation of the United States. Could a more preposterous thought be addressed to a deliberative assembly. Has the state of New York no say in the determination or the government of the United States? Has it no voice in the selection of the delegates of the United States? Has the state of New York any option as to whether or not it goes to war if the United States goes to war? Now let me read the words of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. He says that he can conceive of an anomaly—he can conceive of something that would be wholly inconceivable and intolerable, and this is what it would be:

> True, there is an anomaly in the position. I grant you at once that if we had been obliged to take part in the war, having no voice in the making of it, the condition would be inconceivable and intolerable.

Well, there may be a sense in which, on a declaration of war by Britain, we have a constitutional right to determine whether we will take part in the conflict or not, there may be a constitutional sense in which we have a right to say whether we will take part in the conflict or not; but assuming there is, assuming the hon. member is right—that it would be inconceivable and intolerable that we should be bound by Britain's decision to go to war if we have no say as to whether she goes or not—then I want to put to him this question: are we not to be bound by the Treaty of Peace? Is the Treaty of Peace that binds the British Empire not to bind this country? Yes, we will surely be bound by every line and letter of that treaty that affects the Empire of Britain. And, if such be true, then on what principle under Heaven are we not to have any representation or any say in the making of the Treaty of Peace? If therefore it is inconceivable and intolerable that we should have to go to war on the declaration of war by Great Britain because we have no voice in the declaration, surely it is inconceivable and intolerable that we should be bound by the Treaty of Peace if we have no voice or say in the terms of the treaty at all.

Now it is quite true that the Council of Ten is the principal body, and very likely the initiating body of the conference. And it is very likely true as well that only on rare occasions can Canada have her actual representatives sitting at that council. But what I contend is this: It is absolutely vital that in the determination of the position that the representatives of this Empire shall take at the conference, be they Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Balfour or anybody else, the representatives of this country must sit on the British delegation and have their voice. It is true that those representatives cannot be dominant on the British panel. It is just as true that the representatives of Nova Scotia or of my province in this Parliament cannot possibly dominate this Parliament; but here they are represented and can make their influence felt, and so long as they can do that, they have their rights. Similarly, we must be represented on the British delegation in order that the influence and the opinion of this country may be reflected in the action taken by the delegates of the Empire in the Council of Ten.

I do not know by what title the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) describes his new faith. It certainly is not the old Liberalism; it is certainly not anything to which this Union Government can possibly subscribe. The idea that our representation in the concerns of Empire must be merged in representatives selected by the Parliament and Government of Britain and that we can have no say outside of that—surely that is not the Liberalism of to-day. The member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) shakes his head, but I think I heard him applaud and I heard a great many hon. members opposite applaud when the member for Shelburne and Queen's was enunciating these extraordinary theories.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Not at that juncture.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I noticed also that the member for Rouville (Hon. Mr. Lemieux) observed a discreet silence; he did not like the new dogmas that were being placed before him by the member for Shelburne and Queen's. If the attitude of the member for Shelburne and Queen's with relation to our representation at the conference—a compound of colonization and imperialism gone mad—is to be taken as an indication on his part of a return to the lighted chamber of Liberalism, he emphatically has taken to heart the advice of the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) and has taken his provisions with him. I say this to hon. members who so vigorously applauded the remarks of the member for Shelburne and Queen's on this subject; after they go out from under the magic of his eloquence and mingle with their own peoples, they will not hear many plaudits of heresy like this, especially in the strongholds of their faith.

Mr. MURPHY: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In this we have the imprimatur of the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) and so we may take it for granted that hereafter Canada will be conceded to be properly represented in the councils of the Empire and that we shall no longer hear it suggested that the Prime Minister and his colleagues should return to Canada and not continue their work—a work they have so far performed so well in the greatest conference of all time.

A word more, and I have done. I have heard it stated more than once during the progress of this debate, that the Government is seeking shelter from criticism under the shadow of war and that the freedom of criticism of the old days is denied. Well, there was a time, when the war was in progress, when the fate of this country was in peril, that we did ask from hon. gentlemen greater care in the attacks they levelled against the Administration and greater efforts at unity in this House than are ordinarily made under the party system. That was not for the protection or for the good of the Government; it was, as we deemed it, in the vital interests of the country. We felt that the advantages of union were greater than the advantages, however important they were, of the full and free play of party criticism in Parliament. We felt it was important that there should not be an encouragement of disunion in the country by unnecessary disunion in Parliament. But the war is over now—at all events, the peril is passed—we want no favours; we ask for no quarter; we seek no shelter. If the opponents of this Government have any batteries in reserve, let the heavy artillery come on. We shall exhaust every effort to learn and to understand our duty, and by the courage and the efficiency of its performance, we are quite prepared to be judged.

Mr. JULES EDOUARD PREVOST (Terrebonne) Translation): Mr. Speaker, whoever in this House rises to take part in this debate, cannot help noticing with deep sorrow the vacant seat once occupied by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Hon. members who preceded me were anxious to lay their tribute of sweet remembrance and praise on the grave of that illustrious Canadian. As the days pass away, we realize more and more that a great voice has lapsed into silence, but within these precincts we can still hear the echo of the golden words with which Laurier used to express the great Liberal principles which always guided his life and illuminated Canadian politics.

Just as the stars project their rays over the boundless space long after their fires are extinct, the splendor cast on our national life by Laurier is not about to fade away and will be continued for a long time in our history. He is still alive, first in our heart then in the Liberal policy which was his own and which cannot die. We do not see him among us and his pleasant smile and intelligent eyes shine no more in this House, but his spirit is still present, I mean the vivid inspiration which created, maintained and developed in his mind the wise political doctrines of the golden mean, the only one that may apply to this country.

Some people have disdainfully called that policy opportunism. Truly, it was opportunism, but the right kind of opportunism. There are two sorts of opportunism; one, woeful and vile, which consists of changing heart and soul according to the time and chances of personal benefit; the other, a well comprehensive policy, which leads you to accept unavoidable but honest compromises in order to go as far as possible toward the end in view which it would be difficult to accomplish all of a sudden.

Laurier's science of conceding was always guided by the most sincere Liberalism. His idea of Liberalism hovered always very high; it was most attractive because it appealed to all indiscriminately and solicited the support of every man in the heart of whom, as he so well described, are enshrined the principles of eternal truth and unalterable justice.

It was Liberalism in its most extensive form, that which Laurier advocated and practiced, opposing action to reaction, the reasonable emancipation of the mind to its bondage, progress to stagnancy, education to ignorance, and including claims for all legitimate liberties, tolerance, war on fanaticism and the firm respect of the rights of mankind.

Thus placed at the apex, Laurier's idea of Liberalism prevailed over the races, the creeds and even the parties. That is why he had so many supporters and explains how he leaves so many sincere admirers on all sides, in all groups. But he believed, and we believe with him, that the Liberal party is the political organization which is most capable to carry out the ideal of Liberalism.

We are the trustees of Laurier's doctrine. It is our duty, as much as our best claim to glory, to work for the triumph of that ideal of Canadian Liberalism. The whole of Canada is proud of Laurier and surrounds his memory with praise and regrets as a halo the brightness of which nothing can ever impair.

But we, his adepts, his political followers, have greater cause than any others to pride ourselves on such a leader and to mourn his death. Should Laurier come back in our midst now I believe he would say to us, in pleasant and fervid tones: "My friends, men amount to little; what counts is the ideal. The ideal of Canadian Liberalism did not disappear with me and when I bequeathed it to you, I gave you the best of myself."

By the light of our late lamented leader's political doctrine, allow me to consider for a few moments the policy, or rather the lack of policy of this Government. It is a well known fact that this Union Government has been the greatest enemy of union in Canada. Unionism has divided the country, the souls and hearts of its people, the Liberal as well as the Conservative parties, and the Government to which it gave birth is divided against itself. The Union Government will destroy itself like the scorpion which bites off its own tail. That party whose policy was embodied in the one cry: "Win the War," has not even succeeded in administering safely the affairs of this country in the actual interest of the war.

The sensational disclosures made in this House, a few days ago, by the hon. member for Victoria, ex Minister of Militia, are adding to the substantial evidence already secured.

Those whose mission it is to wash the Government of all impurity may reply that the hon. member for Victoria did not go in the trenches and, therefore, is not well acquainted with what was going on at the front; they may also say that he was relieved from his duties of Minister by Sir Robert Borden and that his criticism is inspired by personal grudge. But another arraignment still more formidable than the charges laid by the ex-Minister of Militia, has just been made against the military administration of this Government which is alleged to have been created for the purpose of "winning the war." I am referring to the statements made in the legislature of Quebec, last Friday, by General Smart, Conservative member for Westmount.

In a forceful speech, General Smart, who returned from overseas recently, where he secured an important command and remarkable promotions after four years of active service, denounced the medical service and the general administration of the Canadian army in Great Britain and in Canada.

What will be the answer of this Government to the charges laid by the general, who makes the following solemn declaration:

> Before I left England, I was requested by several officers to call the attention of the Canadian people upon certain conditions which obtained there for a long time and which the officers could not bring to light.
> Unfortunately they can do nothing for those who are dead, except perpetuate their memory and extend protection to their families; but there are many officers and men who are going to be the wards of the Government during the next 20 or 30 years, and it is in their own interest that I should bring forth the following facts: I say, without any fear of being contradicted by any unbiased authority, that the medical administration overseas was bad. It showed itself dull and careless and should have been much improved. Personally, after a stay of four years overseas, I have no confidence in those who carry on the administration in Great Britain.

General Smart sharply criticized the heads of the Army Medical Corps and particularly Sir George Perley who, according to his statement, caused much harm and trouble which he set forth and condemned. In the course of his violent denunciation, General Smart cited facts and names; his facts were quite specific. For instance he charged the heads of the Army Medical Corps with having caused the death of General Steele and through their inefficiency and carelessness, and with rendering incurable a great number of soldiers.

The dealings of Sir George Perley, General Turner and Sir Edward Kemp are closely scrutinized by that gallant officer. He positively states that the troubles at Rhyl, as well as those which occurred at Shorncliffe, at Witney and at Bramshott, were the outcome of the resentment inspired by the treatment to which the men had been subjected for a long time past. He denounced some of the Orders in Council passed by this Government and wondered whether this Government were composed of men still possessed of common sense.

After having re-asserted that the overseas administration was bad and had been so for the last two years, General Smart moved the following resolution which was adopted unanimously:

That in the opinion of this House, the Federal Government should supply the people with all the information relative to the treatment meted out to officers and men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force recruited in this province, who have returned from overseas sick or wounded and are still under treatment in the hospitals.

Mr. Gault another Conservative of long standing, whose name I have already mentioned, seconded general Smart's motion.

In view of these facts, the "win the war" Government find themselves in a queer position. Such is the work accomplished by the Government, who juggled away the election in 1917, by proclaiming that they want first of all to organize the Canadian army in order to win the war. Such is the record of this Union Government, who persist in saying that their task is not yet completed and that their existence is absolutely necessary for the welfare of the country. The more we go, the more we realize the harm which they are doing, as evidenced by the returning officers and soldiers. General Smart exclaimed in the Quebec Legislature: "I do not want imperialism, if it must be at the cost of the soldiers suffering". These words which fall as a whip's lash on the face of the Government are expressing my own opinion, and I may add that the "win-the-war" cry, with which the Unionists were able to smother the free and true expression of public opinion in 1917, is no longer strong enough to drown the loud denunciations and the bitter complaints of those who fell the victims of the carelessness, incompetence and favoritism of this Government. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, since the tragedy on the battlefield is over, why should they keep up at home this joke of unionism which has not even a pretence to justify its existence?

Let us see what the Government has accomplished. In establishing conscription, they satisfied nobody, and, less of all, the western farmers; they broke the harmony, so essential to the efficiency of our common endeavour during the terrible war in which we were taking part. Under that useless legislation, they succeed in securing only a few hundred soldiers more than they would have done under the voluntary system, had the latter been properly organized. It is easy to prove it, and I will do so on another occasion during this session, should I be given an opportunity to do so.

The speech from the Throne contains no reference to the most serious problems which Canada is facing to-day. The country is indebted to the extent of $2,000,000,000. Each year we shall require several hundred millions to meet our most unavoidable obligations. One of the ministers told this House a few days ago that he expected a deficit of one hundred millions for the next fiscal year. However, the speech from the Throne does not mention any way by which the Government can secure the revenue which they require.

There is no mention of the cost of living in the speech from the Throne, though it is a difficult problem which requires a prompt solution. Who does not know of, or has not suffered from the effects of the increased cost of living: unjustified penury and hardship for the great majority of the people, distress for many, evident social unrest, agitation among certain sections of the proletariat, strikes or threat to strike, ever swelling budgets on account of the increases in salary, pensions and bonuses which we must provide for

Were not the people entitled to expect that the Government, re-organized under the high-sounding title of unionism, would deal carefully with the economic conditions of the country which were and are still most critical? What efficient steps were taken to prevent excessive profits, to prohibit hoarding, to prevent the formation of combines for the purpose of boosting prices and to reduce the cost of living? This government did not take enough care of these economic problems. The prices of commodities have steadily gone up, not only since the war, but even since 1913. I want to point out that the crisis resulting from the increased cost of living dates not only from the time when the war broke out, and cannot be attributable exclusively to the war. Even previous to the war, two years after the coming into power of the Borden government, a financial crisis was raging in Canada. The customs receipts decreased by $1,000,000 during each of the six months previous to the outbreak of the war. Those of the railways decreased by $13,000,000 in 1914; immigration was slackening and the applications for homesteads had fallen off considerably, though the war was not declared. Then the cost of living was increasing steadily. Therefore the war is not the only cause and source of that increase, but of course, it has made conditions worse. The burden imposed upon our people becomes heavier every day. The cost of feeding a family is now $14 a week, compared with $7 in 1914. This is a serious problem for all salaried people, for those who have a small income. Bread and bacon, to mention only these two articles of food, are dearer in Canada than in Great Britain.

Is it possible, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated in his manifesto in 1917, to doubt that prices here are increased through causes which are not related in any way to the war, except that the war served as a pretext for that increase?

Again I say that the evil was due to excessive profits and the hoarding of foodstuffs with a view to increasing the prices. Everybody knows it, and so does the Government better than anyone else. Then why did they not apply an efficient remedy?

First, this Government ought to have taken efficient means to bring under their control all the manufacturers producing foodstuffs, in order that these might be sold at fixed prices such as was done in Great Britain, Australia and elsewhere.

In Great Britain, the Government guaranteed certain prices to the farmers and procured them labour, horses and implements at fixed prices. The farmers were promised substantial returns for their wheat, potatoes and so forth, thus stimulating production. Then the Government fixed the retail prices of meat, milk, butter, margarine, cheese, sugar, potatoes, fats, poultry, pork, rabbits, ham, bacon, tea, coffee, oils, and so forth, to the consumers. By some legislation they caused the bread to be sold to the people at reasonable prices.

Adequate measures were also adopted by the Australian government. In a recent work entitled "State Regulation of Prices in Australia," an Australian economist, Mr. H. L. Wilkinson, states that the government's legislation and intervention in that country caused a reduction of prices which would not have obtained otherwise, thus affecting the cost of living to the advantage of the consumers. The intervention of the Australian government, in one simple case, that of bread, saved the consumers of the Commonwealth a sum of $2,000,000. Sometime about the summer of 1916, the Australian government made up a list of prices which could not be increased without their consent, covering from meats to Italian paste for children. It is worth while comparing the prices of the main products of Canada and Australia. I have with me a comparative statement which, though it was made in February, 1917, can give us a good idea of the cost of living in Australia and Canada, for the difference in prices in these two countries has necessarily increased.

Here is the statement as drawn out on February 15, 1917:

	Australia.	Canada.
Bran (per ton)	$21.84	$35.00
Bread (per 1½ lb. loaf)	.05	.09
Butter	.36	.40 to .46
Bacon	.27 to .33	.32 to .33
Cheese	.21	.30
Flour	5.28 to 6.00	9.20 to 9.90
Oatmeal (per 100 lb. bag)	2.40	3.80
Potatoes (per bushel)	.45½	2.00 to 2.34
Eggs	.18 to .24	.50 to .58
Yellow sugar (per lb.)	.06	.08
White sugar (per lb.)	.06½	.09

The official report shows the cost of living increased from February, 1914, to February, 1917:

In Australia	9·4%
In Canada	44·2%
In United States	25%

Once more I say that the Union Government should have interfered, as was done elsewhere. They should have made arrangements with the producers of foodstuffs so as to let them have a fair return in proportion to the money invested, in order that the middle class consumer might secure food at the cheapest rates. Should it have been impossible to make such arrangements, the Government should have requisitioned all food manufactures. This is what President Wilson did in the United States, after the revolting conditions that prevailed had been disclosed in an investigation of the scandalous profits made by meat packers. In Canada as well in the United States an investigation showed the exorbitant profits made in certain foodstuffs. Then it was the duty of this Government to put an end to those scandals. They did nothing of the kind; the business of their millionaire friends must not be interfered with.

A few weeks ago, Mr. Childow, an expert chemist of Chicago, stated at a meeting of the Montreal Housewives League: "Your food control department took greater care in protecting the millers than the small consumer. If the big American millers were able to declare dividends of 37 per cent by making a profit of 25 cts. per barrel of flour, the Canadian miller must have made still more with a profit of 40 cents, to which the Government assented. Beside, all you have to do is to watch for their annual reports and you will notice the enormous profits which the millers of this country are piling up."

The Government should have stepped in whenever the high prices were not justified, instead of limiting their intervention to foodstuffs. They had the necessary power to do so which they exercised in connection with the price of newsprint. Why did they not act likewise in the case of a great many other products and staple commodities the high cost of which is the cause of the helpless condition of so many homes? Instead of that, the Government did nothing and when they appeared as though they were taking action, it was inefficient. They did not fix the prices, they let the food accumulate in storage, they cared for nothing but to assist the profiteers and did not check the importation of our most indispensable products.

In his manifesto of 1917, Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated that no efficient measures for the lowering of the cost of living could be secured before the tariff had been revised and the duty taken off the commodities which make for excessive profits, hoarding and combines with a view to boosting the prices. Furthermore he said: "If I should be entrusted with the administration of this country, I would see to it that the farmers be immediately relieved of the customs duties which are a burden to them." Laurier also promised to abolish immediately the war tax of 7½ per cent which this Government has imposed since the beginning of the war. He said clearly: "I would abolish immediately the duties on agricultural implements and other farming requisites, such as requested by the western farmers, and I would make a feature of my administration a general and well elaborated revision of the tariff with a view to promoting production in Canada and relieving the Canadian consumer."

That is still desirable. Exaggerated protection, specially that of foodstuffs, is one of the principal causes of the high cost of living. The duty on foodstuffs is now forty per cent, which means sixty per cent for the consumer, as the profit made on such goods by the middlemen, represent 20 per cent. However, none of these products should be taxed more than 20 per cent.

The merchant who is unable, notwithstanding that protection, to compete with foreign manufacturers ought to change his occupation. Protection is a good thing as long as it applies to all classes and provided it does not work for the sole benefit of the producers but for that of the consumers as well. We are importing only 25 per cent of what we are consuming in this country; the other 75 per cent is the product of our own manufactures. While we are consuming Canadian goods, we are paying, through an increase in prices, a large proportion of the duty that we would have to pay if we had to import those goods. Each family is paying $300 or $400 in customs duties which fall into the treasury, and increase the manufacturers' profits, thanks to the tariff. This is exorbitant and the Liberal party has always striven to protect the consumer as well as the producer.

In 1893, the Liberal party did not include free Trade in their platform, as it is asserted by Conservatives and others. The 1893 platform included first, a tariff for the purpose of revenue; secondly, commercial reciprocity of natural products with the United States.

What did the Liberals do when they came into power? Here is what the blue books show. The Macdonald tariff was enforced in 1879; and the result was that in 1881, the average duty was 20.19 per cent on dutiable and free goods.

The Liberals came into power in 1896, and the Fielding tariff was adopted in 1897. The result was that two years after, in 1899, they were charging 16.17 per cent on all dutiable and free goods, that is 3.49 per cent less on the value of the goods imported for home consumption. For every $100 collected in 1879, we were charging only $83 in 1899. And the Liberal party kept on lowering the tariff from year to year. However when they came into power, the expenses of the country exceeded the receipts by two millions, and this did not prevent them from lowering the tariff. Therefore the Liberals have first reduced the duties to the extent of $17 per $100, and then they did away with high protection duties on all staple commodities.

For instance, cotton and linen and linen goods had to pay a specific duty of from one to two cents per square yard and an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent; the Liberal Administration abolished the specific duty and made a big cut in the ad valorem duty. The consumer was benefited for, when you come down to it, it is the consumer who has to pay the customs duties on all the goods we import into this country.

Some other examples: There was a duty of 7½ cents per gallon on petrol; the Liberals reduced this to 5 cents. Under the Tories molasses paid an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent; the Liberals cut this down to 1¼ cents a gallon. Under the Conservative Administration ready-made clothing paid 10 cents a pound plus an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent; under the Liberals the 10 cents per pound duty was abolished and the ad valorem reduced by 10 per cent.

The Liberal Government followed the same policy with regard to woollens; under the Conservatives these goods paid a specific duty of 7½ cents and 20 per cent ad valorem; the Liberals abolished the specific duty.

So that it may be said in very truth that the Liberals instituted a tariff for revenue only; and they adopted a policy of reciprocity with the United States in natural products.

We are told that a downward revision of the tariff at the present time would deprive the country of revenue which is badly needed. That sort of argument does not put the question on the proper plane. The tariff may be lowered in such a way as to protect the consumer and nevertheless still maintain and even increase the country's revenue. What must be done is to change the incidence of taxation. Let us note that in Canada about 10 per cent of our revenue is derived from excess profits and from the income tax, while 90 per cent is derived from customs duties and excise, which latter affect the pockets of the consumer. In England 82 per cent of the revenue is derived from excess profits and from the income tax while customs and excise furnish only 18 per cent. In England the burden is on the rich; here it is chiefly the poor man who pays. In France, besides the income tax there is a tax on excess profits. Starting at 50 per cent this tax has risen to 60 per cent on all profits above 500,000 francs. I believe this tax has been still further increased. If I be correct, 60 per cent is levied on profits beyond 100,000 francs, 70 per cent above 200,000 and, as in England, 80 per cent on all profits over and above 500,000 francs. In Canada the Union Government which always protects the big fellow at the expense of those who are least able to bear it, instead of increasing the excess profits tax so as to bear more heavily on the higher profits, has done just the opposite. I'll prove this to you: the income tax passed at the session of 1917 falls on the salaried workers and, on the other hand, exempts in unbelievable proportions the profits of the big enterprises which have fattened on the war; the same is true of big business which, through its tremendous capital, puts an abnormal strain on the resources of the country.

Let us compare the amounts contributed, in proportion to their profits, by the companies with a capital of $100,000, first through the war profits tax which lapsed on December 31, 1918, and then through the income tax.

A company making 10 per cent profit paid into the Treasury, under the business profits tax, $750; under the income tax that company pays only $280. A profit of 15 per cent brought $2,000; with the new tax all we get is $480. A 20 per cent profit gave $4,500; now it gives only $680; a 25 per cent profit used to give $8,250; all it gives now is $880. A profit of 30 per cent which used to bring $12,000 now merely brings in $1,080. A profit of 50 per cent contributed, under the old tax $27,000; under the income tax, the Treasury receives only $1,880. A 100 per cent profit used to give $64,500 in taxes; now it gives but $3,000; while a profit of 200 per cent which was formerly taxed to the tune of $139,500 is now asked to pay a paltry $7,880.

Would we like to get a better understanding of how it is that the companies which are making very big profits are exempt from the tremendous burden of taxation while those with small salaries are being constantly called upon to pay a great deal more than they can afford? Let us cite a few instances of this and, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me to be perhaps a bit tiresome so as to make clear what I have to say and prove my case with substantial facts and figures

Let us suppose that the companies I am about to speak of made the same profits in 1916, 1917 and 1918, and then let us compare what they formerly paid, and what they pay to-day, into the Public Treasury. Let us take the Ogilvie Company, for instance: in 1916 its revenue on a capital investment of $5,622,486, warranted the payment, under the business profits tax, of $280,886. In 1917, if we suppose the company's revenue to be the same as in 1916, the tax on its profits should have amounted to $547,478, but with the income tax all the company has to pay on its 1919 profits is $60,564.

Another company, one which is not unknown, is the Wm. Davies Co.; in 1916 they paid an excess profits tax of $223,063. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, they should pay $1,380,000; but for 1919 all the income tax demands from them is $55,200.

The net profits of the Nova Scotia Steel Co. in 1916 were $2,104,478 and the excess profits tax brought $237,252; but their income tax for 1919 is only $84,056.

Take Canada Foundry: net profits in 1916, $653,852; war tax, $222,368. The income tax has reduced this amount to $26,-152.

The Ford Motor Co., with an invested capital of $5,909,000, cleared profits amounting to $3,303,678, or 54.2 per cent, in 1916. Under the old tax this company contributed to the Treasury $697,323. In 1917 its taxes amounted to $1,782,095, but with the income tax this will be cut down to $127,-987.

The Northern Aluminium Co., with a capital investment of $3,860,000 cleared $1,636,600 profits in 1916, or 42.4 per cent; tax in 1916, $341,679; tax in 1917, $822,332. With the new income tax this company has to pay a mere tax of $65,565.

The Canada Forging Co., with an investment of $1,455,526 cleared $991,359 profits in 1916, let us say 68.11 per cent, and this brought a tax of $222,368; in 1917 this company paid into the Treasury $590,689; while in 1919 all they will pay will be $39,524.

The Steel Co. of Canada, with an investment of $13,963,000, cleared in 1916 a profit of $2,210,343, or 15.83 per cent; hence its tax amounted to $308,240; in 1917 the company paid taxes to the tune of $337,055; the income tax will bring only $88,293.

The Imperial Oil Co., capital, $27,161,000, cleared in 1916, $4,837,364 or 17.81 per cent; war tax, $734,046; 1917, $924,849. The tax under the new order will be only $193,374.

The Fairbanks-Morse Co., capital, $3,686,-500, cleared $669,100, in 1916 a percentage of 18.15 per cent; war tax $102,748; 1917, $135,767. The income tax will be satisfied with $26,640.

These figures go to show how lightly the income tax bears on the companies that are making the heaviest profits. And we must not lose sight of the fact that a great many of them are manufacturing articles of universal use, the prices of which have increased enormously since the declaration of war.

It is evident that these millionaire companies are not paying a sufficient share of the taxes which burden our Canadian people. Even when their share of the taxes was higher than it is today they were still paying less than they would have paid in Australia for instance.

Thus, in 1916, Stanfield Limited, instead of paying $14,297, would have paid $54,844 in Australia; in 1917 they would have paid $82,266. The Consolidated Rubber Co., would have paid to the Australian Treasury, in 1916, $453,750 instead of $154,687; and in 1917 they would have paid $680,625 instead of $247,500. In Australia, in 1916, the Dominion Canners would have paid $278,425 taxes instead of the $79,125 they paid Canada; in 1917, their taxes would have been $417,637 instead of $177,120.

The Government, far from looking to these millionaire corporations for an increase in our revenue at a time when the war which brought them colossal fortunes is putting a huge debt on this country, asks them for less than ever and lightens their burden.

If the Government had adopted a more enlightened policy, as has been done in Australia, they could abolish the duty on every single one of the prime necessaries of life and still increase the country's revenue.

The Union Government has neglected, and continues to neglect the alarming difficulties which the nation are vitally interested in seeing solved. If this Union Government insists on staying on despite the march of events which to-day fail to justify its existence, at least it should not reveal itself as a union against one race, against a minority that, within the fold of Confederation possesses, by virtue of our Constitution and of the most elementary justice, the same rights as the majority.

Oligarchy has been precisely defined: "A small group of citizens who undertake to govern to the exclusion of the other citizens" (such was Canada from 1791 to 1840) "or a numerous class who exercise a monopoly of political power to the exclusion of the other citizens" (such is Canada since 1917, that is since the spontaneous generation of Union Government.)

We must regard a government of that kind as one of the enemies of freedom.

The present Government systematically neglects the French Canadian element and refuses to grant these people the share they are entitled to in the administration and the reconstruction of the country.

The Government is not justified in giving as its reason the fact that the province of Quebec went solid against those in power at the time of the 1917 elections. To begin with, the French Canadian element has plenty of company: the Opposition group in this House represents 800,000 Canadian voters of whom 519,940 are outside the province of Quebec; and this figure of 519,940 is one half of the vote polled by the Government throughout the entire Dominion.

Besides, has the Government any right to indulge such a narrow-minded grudge when it has proclaimed itself so often and so loudly the champion of democracy, justice and freedom? Nevertheless the Union Government, instead of striving to bring about the union of all races, the harmonious concord of all minds and hearts in a common national undertaking, without distinction of nationality, creed or opinion, seems determined to organize a union against the French Canadian Catholics, and thus comes under the head of the definition I gave a moment ago: a class who exercise a monopoly of political power to the exclusion of other citizens.

I find one proof of this, one out of a hundred, in the fact that we barely find two French Canadians on the numerous commissions appointed by the Government during the war; so much so that the Montreal district Chambre de Commerce was moved to protest, and with good reason, against this ostracism of French Canadians on the commissions appointed by the Union Government, especially on the commission sent to represent Canada in France and Belgium. In this connection the Government's fanaticism brought about the result, which not only is ridiculous but will work harm to our country's interests, that commissioners who have not the slightest knowledge of the French language represent Canada in France and Belgium in an endeavour to promote our commercial interests after the war! After that we can hardly feel astonished that the said commission is not meeting with any great success.

I find another proof of this deplorable spirit that seems to animate the Government, which styles itself a Union Government, in the list of physicians recently appointed by the Repatriation committee. Out of fifty doctors appointed how many are French Canadian? Not a single one!

If we but watch a bit these governmental appointments and the distribution of federal funds we are soon convinced, and the conviction strengthens the further we go, that we French Canadians are being systematically robbed. We are being deprived of our share of the profits accruing to us as partners in Confederation. The element which supports Union Government comprises only 54 per cent of the population and still they wish to treat the French Canadians as a conquered and ransomed people. What we contribute to the Public Treasury and what comes back to us in the form of public expenditure shows clearly the supremely unjust manner in which the Government of National Discord treats a race that is inferior to no other and that holds imprescriptible rights to representation whether in the councils of the nation, in the public service or in honours and in the distribution of State moneys.

Can it be that the Union Government is the official representative of that Anglo-Canadian clique defined and upbraided by William Moore in his fine book "The Clash" in which he, a Protestant and an Anglo-Canadian acknowledges and proves that his compatriots are meting out to the French Canadians exactly the same treatment as that which characterized the deportment of the Germans towards the people of Alsace-Lorraine, the Poles and the Danes.

I am asking for no favour or privilege for the French Canadian all I wish for is the recognition of that right for which the Great Powers of the Entente have just won a glorious victory. Have not the French Canadians the same right to national liberty and to justice as the Czecho-Slovaks, the Poles and the other nationalities within the muscovite empire? After the war which has just come to a close and which was heralded as humanity's crusade for the triumph of right let us hope that never again will any people be forced to bear the yoke of a tyrannical majority. Let them well understand and harken to what I say, those Unionists who are plotting the degradation of the French Canadians, those jingoes and Tories who persecute us in our language and in our faith wherever they meet us.

We must never lose sight of the fact, and particularly the Union Government should always bear in mind, that the British Empire is not founded on violence, on force, on oligarchy, but on moral principles, on the principles of liberty and equality.

I claim for all those whose country occupies the first place in their hearts, and who want to see this country rise to prosperity and greatness in the full enjoyment of peace and harmony, I claim for both races in Canada the same political reciprocity that King Albert promised the Walloons and the Flemish on his return to Belgium last November.

Let the Union Government which insists on surviving the war at least accomplish deeds of life and not of death. Let the Government beware of dishonouring the name of Canada by depriving citizens of foreign extraction, whom we ourselves brought here at great expense, of rights which were promised and given them. Let us clean, or rather let us disinfect our statutes of that iniquitous measure the War Time Elections Act, and not show more severity than France or the United States towards citizens of enemy origin. So long as these folks remain peaceful citizens, respectable, industrious and law-abiding we cannot, without forfeiting our honour, repudiate the rights we granted them when we admitted them to British citizenship.

Let the Union Government give millions to the provinces for the building of great national highways, for the development of technical education, which forms the backbone of our industrial progress and our commercial expansion, for organizing hygiene and sanitation throughout the country, for agriculture; I am in favour of all that; but these grants should be made on a just basis, on the basis of population, and the distribution of the grants should be left to the autonomous government of each province.

Let the Government think of the people and stop being the protector of our millionaires, and this latter to such an extent that one of the Government's own friends was able to say that it belonged to Mr. Flavelle.

Let the Government see to it that the consumer is protected and this can be done without working any harm to our industries, if the tariff is lowered on all the necessaries of life and prices are fixed in such a way as to prevent the profiteers from piling up fortunes out of all reason.

Let the Government proceed to make a more equitable distribution of the taxes, so that the rich man and not the poor man will pay most. Let it show the greatest solicitude for our glorious soldiers who have emblazoned the name of Canada on the battlefields of Europe, let it show as much interest in the humblest of them as in the officers; let it shelter from misery our wounded and their families and furnish steady employment to the others, by reinstating them in their old positions, by settling them on the land or by utilizing their labour on works of national importance.

Let the Government be generous and just to all military defaulters; most of them are farmers who had been promised exemption and were shamefully deceived by the Government. Let the Government forgive; it has itself so much to be forgiven.

I fear, Mr. Speaker, that all this cannot be accomplished under the present Government which instead of giving its attention to matters of what we term reconstruction, seems to be entirely preoccupied with holding together its own structure which threatens to fall apart. We perceive the outer sign which permits us to force the tumbling into a heap of this patched up edifice. That is what is causing such great anxiety to the Government and that is what makes us feel hopeful; for the sooner this mongrel union, which will go down in history under the mocking title of "unionism," has been sundered, the better it will be for the people of this country who will then choose administrators and legislators more respectful of our Constitution, more jealous of the rights of all our citizens, and more devoted to the real interest of this dear land of ours.

Mr. JOHN A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the discussion on the question that is now before the House, I would like, on behalf of the interests that I largely represent, as well as on my own behalf, to say a word or two in regard to the passing of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. We in the West owe very much to our departed friend, much more than I would attempt at this time to enumerate. About the time of his taking up the reins of office here in 1896, the West was in a very bad condition, the agriculturists of Western Canada being, in so far as the marketing of their products was concerned, almost entirely in the hands of possibly one of the largest and most gigantic combines. I refer to the grain combine. It is not necessary to go into the details; suffice it to say that we had to take just what they saw fit to give us. As there was no machinery whatever of a Federal character to deal with such conditions, we appealed to the late Prime Minister for redress, and we received it in a very great measure. Whatever else there may be on which we may differ, there is at least one warm spot that will always remain for Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the hearts of the agriculturists of Western Canada. We feel that he was indeed a great and noble person; his aim in life was to relieve the oppressed, and I think I can say with all sincerity that the life of our departed friend was largely devoted to this sublime object. If the words of the Master be true,—as I believe,—then, I am sure that the dead Liberal chieftain's cup has been an overflowing one in this world and will continue as such in the great beyond.

Before touching on the speech from the Throne, I would like to refer to one or two of the remarks made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) in this House.

I am sorry the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) is not in his seat, not that I have any very serious criticism to make, for with a great deal that he said I am thoroughly in accord; but there are one or two points I should like to touch on, and the first point is with reference to the presence overseas of certain ministers of the Crown. I am not in a position to say whether it is necessary for them all to be there at the present time, but I have no hesitation whatever in saying that, so far as the presence overseas of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is concerned, there never was a time in the history of Canada when they were more required over there than now. I had the pleasure of being in England a couple of months ago, and conditions there and on the Continent are such that unless we have the very best possible representation overseas conditions in Canada within twelve months will be very far from favourable. I will refer to this matter later when dealing with the chief product of Western Canada —our grain.

I also wish to criticise the remarks of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's with reference to the "word of a Canadian" not standing for very much when certain legislation passed by this Parliament some time ago is taken into consideration. With all due respect for his opinion, I can cite a case where we would have suffered much greater humiliation by breaking our word than on the occasion my hon. friend had in mind. Ever since our boys have been going to the war, what promise have we made to them? From one end of Canada to the other the parting word has been: "We will see you through boys, we will back you up to the last man and the last dollar." As to that there was no division of opinion throughout this country. And I ask, what value would be placed on our word now if we in this House had said, as some have said: "Canada has done enough for the present; let other countries who have not done their share have their way for a while." If this Parliament had said that, the word of a Canadian, the word of the Canadian people might truly have been lightly thought of; if we had not taken the stand we did I shudder to think of the criticism that would have been levelled at us by the few Canadian soldiers who would have returned. I for one would have hung my head in shame when they came back, and I am sure many others would have done the same.

The hon. member (Mr. Fielding) also gave some advice to the farmers of Western Canada. He advised them to join up with one or the other of the two great political parties in this country, but he would not undertake to say which party they should join. Surely, the hon. member, with his long political experience, was a little unreasonable in leaving the selection to agriculturists without any political experience whatever, especially seeing that for the time being he had decided to stay in a position from which he could jump to one side of the fence or the other. For his information and for the information of the House I might say that the farmers of Western Canada have absolutely no intention,—and I doubt if they will have for some considerable time—of tying themselves up to either one of the two great political parties we knew in this country in the past. Neither do I think they are going to tie themselves up definitely to the Unionist party, at this particular time. They do not wish to fetter themselves in any way; they are determined to have absolute freedom so far as action in this House is concerned.

A representative of the press has described it as a case of choosing between the sheep and the goats. That should be an easy decision to make under ordinary circumstances, for certainly the western farmers do not want to link themselves up with the goats whichever they may be. and as the Good Book tells us to beware of wolves in sheep's clothing, we do not like to tie ourselves up with the sheep, even supposing we were able to distinguish them from the goats at the present time.

With the greater portion of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General, and particularly with that part referring to the war having been brought to a successful conclusion, I am in hearty accord. But with other parts of the speech I do not entirely agree. I think the first legislation mentioned is the new Franchise Act that will be brought down. I do not know just what is in the minds of the Government, but I will say this much: unless the new Act makes radical changes in the Act on which the last election was fought, it will be severely criticised so far as Western Canada is concerned. I do not say that I disapprove entirely of the War-time Elections Act, but it has certain features which the West did not like, and I trust the Government will give due consideration to that.

With regard to highways, although I should undoubtedly like to see good highways, I am thoroughly convinced that there are other things which we need more at this moment than highways, or what might be termed automobile roads. A national highway has been spoken of. To attempt to build such a highway at this time would in my opinion be utter folly, and I am convinced that there are many other works which should first be undertaken, and which would prove much more valuable and provide an equal amount of employment, and perhaps more congenial employment. Take, for instance, our railways. The amount of money which the Government purposes setting aside for distribution, over a number of years, in the building of highways, would go a long way towards giving relief in the way of railway facilities to certain districts in Western Canada which have been waiting patiently for it for the last seven or eight, and, in some cases, ten or even twelve years.

The next matter referred to in the Address is the question of housing. Now, if it is the intention of the Government to confine the proposed assistance to returned men, I have nothing whatever to say in opposition to it. I entirely agree with any proposal that aims at assisting those who are now seeking homes, and who have been married overseas. I think we should give such men every possible assistance in securing homes. But if it is the intention that this assistance shall be general, for any and every one in the country, then I would certainly object very seriously. I do not think that such a thing would be proper. We, in Canada, should surely be in sufficiently good circumstances to be able to look after our domestic wants,—that is, those of us who have remained at home during the war. Employment has been abundant, wages have been, to say the least, fair, and in some cases more than fair; and it seems to me that those desiring accommodation should be in a position to obtain their own requirements, if they have not been overseas. The matter of assisting the returned soldier is one that, in my opinion, should be given special consideration. The plan under which the Government are now working is in some respects very good. In other respects I do not think it goes far enough. Some three or four years ago I outlined what I thought to be a better plan, and the Government has adopted my suggestion practically in its entirety, but with this exception, that they are leaving the returned soldier entirely at the mercy of the land speculator, at least so far as Western Canada is concerned. As far as I can ascertain, there is no provision made for dealing with those who purchased land in that part of the country years and years ago, who gave for it a mere pittance, and who are now holding it at what, to my mind, are exorbitant and unreasonable prices; at all events when it is offered to the returned soldiers. This Government might very well indeed devote its attention to some measure whereby the present Soldiers' Settlement Board, or some other board, could step in when they considered prices were exorbitant, and act as arbitrator between the returned soldiers and those holding the land.

Now, I come to the question of prohibition. I do not think we need worry very much about that. I feel that the Government must surely be convinced that the people of Canada have intimated very unequivocally to them their opinion on this matter. There is one argument,—indeed, I might term it a campaign,—that is being used to defeat the interests of prohibition in Canada. This argument came to my notice on different occasions. It is an argument which is being urged by those who are anxious to have the prohibition law, as they say, "eased up just a little bit." They contend that the soldiers want beer; that they have been accustomed to getting it overseas and will demand it on their return. Well, were I a returned soldier I would regard such a statement in the light of an insult. I cannot for one moment think that the boys who have been "over there" fighting all this time for our protection, will come back and lend their assistance to any attempt that may be made to restore in this country a demon which no less a personage that the Prime Minister of Great Britain said was a greater enemy to England than the Germans themselves. I repeat, Sir, I cannot for one moment think that those boys have anything like that in their minds at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall mention some of the things that are not contained in the Address of His Excellency, and which are of considerable interest, at least so far as our part of the Dominion is concerned. I have learned much since coming here, and I have discovered that the gulf that existed between the East and the West is now in some respects very largely bridged; and that there is a feeling, which is apparently steadily growing, in favour of a greater degree of freedom in relation to matters of fiscal policy. We discern it on all sides. It appears in very unexpected quarters; and personally I think that this Government would be wise to heed it. At the present time, owing to some misconceptions as to what the Western agriculturists, as well as those of Eastern Canada, have been asking for, I would request the privilege of placing on Hansard the entire platform as propounded by the Canadian Council of Agriculture. It has never before been placed in Hansard. The first section of our platform is this:

1.—A League of Nations as an international organization to give permanence to the world's peace by removing old causes of conflict.

2.—We believe that the further development of the British Empire should be sought along the lines of partnership between nations free and equal, under the present governmental system of British constitutional authority. We are strongly opposed to any attempt to centralize imperial control. Any attempt to set up an independent authority with power to bind the Dominions, whether this authority be termed parliament, council or cabinet, would hamper the growth of responsible and informed democracy in the Dominions.

The Tariff.

3.—Whereas Canada is now confronted with a huge national war debt and other greatly increased financial obligations, which can be most readily and effectively reduced by the development of our natural resources, chief of which is agricultural lands;

And whereas it is desirable that an agricultural career should be made attractive to our returned soldiers and the large anticipated immigration, and owing to the fact that this can best be accomplished by the development of a national policy which will reduce to a minimum the cost of living and the cost of production;

And whereas the war has revealed the amazing financial strength of Great Britain, which has enabled her to finance, not only her own part in the struggle, but also to assist in financing her Allies to the extent of hundreds of millions of pounds, this enviable position being due to the free trade policy which has enabled her to draw her supplies freely from every quarter of the globe and consequently to undersell her competitors on the world's markets, and because this policy has not only been profitable to Great Britain, but has greatly strengthened the bonds of Empire by facilitating trade between the Motherland and her overseas dominions—we believe that the best interests of the Empire and of Canada would be served by reciprocal action on the part of Canada through gradual reductions of the tariff on British imports, having for its object closer union and a better understanding between Canada and the Motherland and at the same time bring about a great reduction in the cost of living to our Canadian people.

Fosters Combines.

And whereas the Protective Tariff has fostered combines, trusts, and "gentlemen's agreements" in almost every line of Canadian industrial enterprise, by means of which the people of Canada—both urban and rural—have been shamefully exploited through the elimination of competition, the ruination of many of our smaller industries and the advancement of prices on practically all manufactured goods to the full extent permitted by the tariff;

And whereas agriculture—the basic industry upon which the success of all other industries primarily depends—is unduly handicapped throughout Canada as shown by the declining rural population in both Eastern and Western Canada, due largely to the greatly increased cost of agricultural implements and machinery, clothing, boots and shoes, building material and practically everything the farmer has to buy, caused by the Protective Tariff, so that it is becoming impossible for farmers generally, under normal conditions, to carry on farming operations profitably;

And whereas the Protective Tariff is the most wasteful and costly method ever designed for raising national revenue, because for every dollar obtained thereby for the public treasury at least three dollars pass into the pockets of the protected interests, thereby building up a privileged class at the expense of the masses, thus making the rich richer and the poor poorer;

And whereas the Protective Tariff has been and is a chief corrupting influence in our national life because the protected interests in order to maintain their unjust privileges have contributed lavishly to political and campaign funds, thus encouraging both political parties to look to them for support, thereby lowering the standard of public morality.

Definite Tariff Demands.

Therefore be it resolved that the Canadian Council of Agriculture, representing the organized farmers of Canada, urges that, as a means of remedying these evils and bringing about much needed social and economic reforms, our tariff laws should be amended as follows:—

(a) By an immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff.

(b) By reducing the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual, uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will ensure complete Free Trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

(c) That the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911, which still remains on the United State statute books, be accepted by the Parliament of Canada.

(d) That all foodstuff not included in the Reciprocity Agreement be placed on the free list.

(e) That agricultural implements, farm machinery, vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, illuminating fuel and lubricating oils be placed on the free list, and that all raw materials and machinery used in their manufacture also be placed on the free list.

(f) That all tariff concessions granted to other countries be immediately extended to Great Britain.

(g) That all corporations engaged in the manufacture of products protected by the customs tariff be obliged to publish annually comprehensive and accurate statements of their earnings.

(h) That every claim for tariff protection by any industry should be heard publicly before a special committee of Parliament.

Taxation Proposals.

4.—As these tariff reductions may very considerably reduce the national revenue from that source, the Canadian Council of Agriculture would recommend that, in order to provide the necessary additional revenue for carrying on the Government of the country and for the bearing of the cost of the war, direct taxation be imposed in the following manner:—

(a) By a direct tax on unimproved land values, including all natural resources.

(b) By a graduated personal income tax.

(c) By a graduated inheritance tax on large estates.

(d) By a graduated income tax on the profits of corporations.

(e) That in levying and collecting the business profits tax the Dominion Government should insist that it be absolutely upon the basis of the actual cash invested in the business and that no considerations be allowed for what is popularly known as watered stock.

(f) That no more natural resources be alienated from the Crown, but brought into use only under short-term leases, in which the interests of the public shall be properly safeguarded, such leases to be granted only by public auction.

The Returned Soldier.

5.—With regard to the returned soldier we urge:—

(a) That it is the recognized duty of Canada to exercise all due diligence for the future well-being of the returned soldier and his dependents.

(b) That demobilization should take place only after return to Canada.

(c) That first selection for return and demobilization should be made in the order of length of service of those who have definite occupations awaiting them or have other assured means of support, preference being given first to married men and then to the relative need of industries, with care to insure so far as possible the discharge of farmers in time for the opening of spring work upon the land.

(d) That general demobilization should be gradual, aiming at the discharge of men only as it is found possible to secure steady employment.

(e) It is highly desirable that if physically fit discharged men should endeavour to return to their former occupation, employers should be urged to reinstate such men in their former positions wherever possible.

(f) That vocational training should be confined to those who while in the service have become unfitted for their former occupation.

(g) That provision should be made for insurance at the public expense of unpensioned men who have become undesirable insurance risks while in the service.

(h) That facilities should be provided at the public expense that will enable returned soldiers to settle upon farming land when by training or experience they are qualified to do so.

6.—We recognize the very serious problem confronting labour in urban industry resulting from the cessation of war, and we urge that every means economically feasible and practicable should be used by federal, provincial and municipal authorities in relieving unemployment in the cities and towns; and, further, recommend the adoption of the principle of co-operation as the guiding spirit in the future relations between employer and employees—between capital and labour.

Land Settlement.

7.—A land settlement scheme based on a regulating influence in the selling price of land. Owners of idle areas should be obliged to file a selling price on their lands, that price also to be regarded as an assessable value for purposes of taxation.

8.—Extension of co-operative agencies in agriculture to cover the whole field of marketing, including arrangements with consumers' societies for the supplying of foodstuffs at the lowest rates and with the minimum of middleman handling.

9.—Public ownership and control of railway, water and aerial transportation, telephone, telegraph and express systems, all projects in the development of natural power, and of the coal mining industry.

Other Democratic Reforms.

10.—To bring about a greater measure of democracy in government, we recommend:—

(a) The immediate repeal of the War Time Elections' Act.

(b) The discontinuance of the practice of conferring titles upon citizens of Canada.

(c) The reform of the federal Senate.

(d) An immediate check upon the growth of government by order in council, and increased responsibility of individual members of parliament in all legislation.

(e) The complete abolition of the patronage system.

(f) The publication of contributions and expenditures both before and after election campaigns.

(g) The removal of press censorship upon the restoration of peace and the immediate restoration of the rights of free speech.

(h) The setting forth by daily newspapers and periodical publications, of the facts of their ownership and control.

(i) Proportional representation.

(j) The establishment of measures of direct legislation through the initiative referendum and recall.

(k) The opening of seats in Parliament to women on the same terms as men.

That, Mr. Speaker, in substance is the programme of the Western agriculturist. I might go so far as to say that it is the programme of the agriculturists of Eastern Canada also. I might go even further and say that those who have been the most advanced in the demand for tariff concessions have been the organized agriculturist body of the province of Ontario, and they have gone further in their demands than have the organized agriculturists of Western Canada. Things are moving, and it will be well, indeed, not only for the members of the Government, but for the members of this House to keep their ears very close to the ground. There is a feeling of discontent abroad which is not by any means confined to the agriculturist; the consumer is probably just a little more agitated over present conditions than even the agriculturist. That is being manifested very clearly in a great many quarters, and even from some unexpected directions, so that I think it behooves us all to give serious consideration to this matter during the present session in order that we may possibly avoid serious consequences before Parliament might have an opportunity of meeting again.

I am not at present going to enter into any argument about the tariff, because this is not the proper time to do so—when the Budget is brought down ample opportunity will be afforded for full discussion—but I would just say, for the benefit of those entrusted with the framing of that Budget, that we expect something of a rather generous nature in so far as the reduction of the tariff is concerned. As intimated last session by myself, we have been keeping close watch on the trend of events, and we have been keeping our ear to the ground. Hon. gentlemen will remember that I stated then that we were prepared to give the Union Government every opportunity to make good.

The reason advanced last session for not interfering with the tariff was the seriousness of the war situation. We agreed with that to a man. Not a Western member that I know of raised the slightest objection to passing that issue over until another session at least, and possibly until the actual conclusion of the war, that is, the actual fighting. Now the war is over in so far as the fighting is concerned. We expect that within a very short time the peace treaty will have been concluded and signed, so that we shall know where we are at. We have come back again this session, and the request now made is that we leave the tariff question in abeyance during the period of reconstruction. Mr. Speaker, that is going just a little too far; that is asking just a little too much; the request is entirely too indefinite. There are those who might endeavour—I will not say that they would—to have us believe that reconstruction will be going on when the next session meets. I do not doubt but that it will, for reconstruction will take some considerable time; it depends entirely upon the attitude of the people towards reconstruction work. A Reconstruction Association has been formed in Eastern Canada they were very anxious to get Western Canada linked up with them—and they had their representatives out through the West. We attended some of the gatherings, addressed by those gentlemen, and listened to their speeches, but it is the same old method that has been adopted. They, too, according to their spokesmen, have an Eastern and Western method of campaigning. One of their officials—and a very prominent one I may say—when speaking in a manufacturing town in Eastern Canada, the town of Galt, I believe it was, is reported as having said that the tariff was a dead issue, it was as musty as the tombs of Egypt, and should not, under any consideration, be resurrected; it should be left there. That same gentleman came West. He visited my home town and addressed the Canadian Club there. I had the pleasure of listening to his address, but in so far as the tariff was concerned the mustiness had all disappeared—the issue had been resurrected from the tombs of Egypt very hurriedly and had been transplanted to Western Canada, for his words there were that the tariff was quite a live issue and must be dealt with. "But," this gentleman said, "I do not say that there should be an upward revision of the tariff at all;" he took very good care, however, not to intimate that there would be a possibility of a downward revision in so far as they were concerned; he kept that very much under his hat. That kind of talk will not satisfy Western Canada.

Surely we can deal with this tariff issue on its merits, give it the same position in the East as it holds in the West, and talk in exactly the same way to those who may be anxious to have it maintained as to those who are anxious to have it revised downward. And there is another attitude that has been displayed in the House which I deprecate very much. I noticed the other day that when some references were made to the reduction of the tariff, and one Western gentleman was waxing quite eloquent in speaking of the subject, an hon. gentleman from Eastern Canada jumped up very indignantly and strutted out of the Chamber, using expressions in regard to my friend's arguments that I would not care to use on the floor of the House, as I think they would be pronounced unparliamentary, and you, Mr. Speaker, would be quite within your jurisdiction in asking for a retraction of them. If that is the attitude some people in Eastern Canada are going to take against the arguments of the West, well and good, but we had all hoped there would be a different spirit displayed. Let me say that the West is not one of those communities of people that cannot at least attempt, and I think fairly well, to distinguish and appreciate the other man's point of view. We have never taken the attitude that we are absolutely right, that we invariably have got to have exactly what we ask for; but we would like the manufacturers, who have been asking us to postpone tariff reduction from one year to another, to at least give us an idea of what we might expect from them even if we did agree to postpone it for another year. But they vouchsafe no information; they simply ask us to come back a year later when doubtless we will be asked to postpone consideration again for some other reason.

Now, as I have already stated, in so far as Western Canada is concerned, we have got to the end of our tether, and for the benefit of the manufacturers I want to make a statement to the House, and it is this: I may preface it by stating the position four or five years ago, when this matter came up in the House. There was a strong agitation in the West at that time for tariff reduction, and there was just as strong opposition to it in the East. The press was inflamed with arguments and abuse of the western farmer by eastern interests. Then a movement was started in the West in the way of a campaign to persuade all our western agriculturists to buy only imported articles. Now, that was just at the bursting point, as it were; and a few representatives of agriculture in the West counselled these people at least to stay their hand in that respect, which they did.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. MAHARG (resuming): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was attempting, for the benefit of the Manufacturers' Association, to describe a situation that was almost sure to arise unless something was done along the lines I had suggested in regard to the tariff. I was endeavouring to describe the acute feeling in favour of tariff reduction versus protection that existed in Western Canada some few years ago. I had just started to outline a movement that was taking form there, the result of which would have been that practically no articles of Canadian manufacture would have been purchased throughout Western Canada. As I intimated, some of the leaders in the movement thought this would be unwise and, their counsel prevailing, no action was taken at that time. The matter had come before our organized bodies in a very concrete form, and everything pointed towards definite action being taken, but the feeling was allayed for the time being. Feeling is, however, running a little high again, and I have no doubt that a similar situation will arise in the future. Should that be the case, none of the leaders would be able to stem the tide. I am not saying this for purely selfish reasons. Under present conditions we have to have a revenue, and if the Government decides to maintain the present policy of raising the major proportion of its revenue by indirect taxation by means of a tariff, then there is only one thing for us as patriotic citizens to do, and that is to buy our requirements in such a way that the revenue derived from that source will go into the treasury of the country and not be divided between the treasury and those whom the tariff is protecting. We shall be very sorry to see such a condition of affairs arise. We are just as anxious as the manufacturers themselves that they shall continue to prosper and increase their output. In fact, from the attitude the manufacturers assume, I think we are a little more anxious for them to increase their output than they are themselves. We are supported in our views not only in the West but in the East, and what I have described is the feeling not merely of the agriculturists of the West but of almost the entire population of the West. I do not think there is in Western Canada a newspaper that does not support the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. The Legislature of Saskatchewan, at a recent session, unanimously passed a resolution endorsing these views and asking for tariff reduction. Although that assembly is composed of persons on both sides of politics, there is no division in that regard. Returned soldiers in Western Canada with whom I have been speaking are in favour of those principles. I hold in my hand a letter from a returned soldier who has undergone eight or ten operations resulting from his wounds, but who has still enough pluck to go back on to the land and endeavour to work out his own destiny. This is a quotation from his letter:

> What your association is fighting for will benefit thousands of soldiers who go on the land.

It is the association of farmers to which he refers. This is not class legislation so far as the West is concerned.

The West made Union Government possible. Why did the West support Union Government almost unanimously? In the province from which I come Union Government could not have received stronger support than it did. Out of seven or eight acclamations of Unionist candidates throughout all of Canada, four came from Saskatchewan. There was not in that province a single Unionist member who did not receive a very large majority, and, taking into consideration the vote polled, Union Government got on the average, in that province, the largest majorities received anywhere in Canada. I may say further that Saskatchewan returned a complete list of Unionist members. Why did the people of Saskatchewan do that? I suppose we have in that province the largest association of agriculturists in the world, banded together in one body. We have some fourteen or fifteen hundred distinct entities in that one organization, and so far as their actions are concerned they are entirely autonomous. It is probably as educative a body as can be found anywhere. Any hon. member who has been fortunate enough to attend our conventions at which we have from fifteen hundred to two thousand delegates, will realize that those people are trying at least to inform themselves. They take this attitude: We have listened to promises long enough; we have, if I may use the phrase, seen the buck passed from one side to the other; we have seen in this Parliament, when one side was in power, the other side would immediately bring up something of special interest to Western Canada. The former Liberal Government, for instance, went into power on the distinct promise that they were going to have a tariff for revenue only, and the West expected great things from them. But when a resolution came from the other side of the House asking for radical reductions in the tariff on agricultural implements, our Liberal friends did not see fit to grant them. The same gentleman who moved the resolution has been on the treasury benches now for a considerable time, but he has not gone out of his way to bring about that reduction although he has a better opportunity to do so. The West has come to the conclusion that there is no use depending on pre-election promises; that there must be something more than that. The reason why the West supported Union Government is because Union Government had been bold enough to do something; they had taken a stand; they said: We are going to furnish sufficient recruits to keep our forces at the front right up to strength. That was doing something that appealed to the people of the West. They said: A Government that has grit enough to take such a stand regardless of consequences is the Government to which we want to give an opportunity to carry on a little further. The Union Government carried out their pledges to the letter, and when the big push came, as it did last August, the forces of Canada were second to none on the Western front. It is recognized that they were the best disciplined, best equipped troops on the field, with every battalion right up to strength, and with a strong reserve, and that they were ready to go into action at any moment.

The Union Government carried out its pledges. That appealed to the West, and the West is prepared to support this Union Government again if it will take the same bold stand in our domestic affairs as it took with regard to our soldiers on the western front. The Government's policy then was no mythical thing floating in the air; it was nailed down in legislation. It is no use for any Government, whether it be Unionist or something else, to appeal to Western Canada again until it has demonstrated its sincerity by taking action.

The West has been spoken of sometimes as unpatriotic, and our schools have been held up to ridicule by some Eastern journals in a very unfair way. I remember that during the last provincial election in Saskatchewan there seemed to be more anxiety in some parts of the East than there was in Saskatchewan itself. A friend of mine in Ontario, for instance, sent me copies of a certain paper which pointed out the condition in which our schools were supposed to be, and told us we were educating our children to be non-Canadians and such stuff as that. Just to show the patriotic feeling amongst the school children of Saskatchewan let me give one illustration— and I could give several. During the war an organization was formed to raise funds for a patriotic purpose from the school children throughout the entire Dominion. The appeal was made to Saskatchewan as to the other provinces, and was enthusiastically taken up by our schools. The result was that $67,000 was collected from the school children of our province. That is not a very big sum, and perhaps we should have collected more, but there was sufficient patriotism in our schools to raise just $30,000 more than was raised in any other province of the Dominion. That should show whether we have been teaching patriotism in our schools or not, and I think that before eastern journals undertake to show us how to run our schools, and besmirch us as this particular journal did, they should inform themselves as to the true conditions.

There is one other point I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members, though I shall not deal with it in an argumentative way. The United States has often been held up to us as a country whose example we should follow in the matter of the tariff. It has been pointed out what a great country they have built up under the high protective tariff. Now, I should like hon. members to see how the comparison works out in two different lines. First, I would ask hon. members to ascertain the proportion of dutiable and non-dutiable goods entering the United States. Next, compare the percentage of tariff as between the United States and Canada. Next, ascertain the percentage of the revenue of the United States, and of Canada, that is raised by the tariff. Then compare the per capita tariff tax in both countries. If hon. members will take the trouble to find out these facts, they will see that the United States is miles ahead of us in every instance. To give just one illustration, the per capita tariff tax of the United States is about $2.11, and of Canada $18.45. And yet, we are told to follow the example of the United States! Well, if this Government would give us a few of the things they have in the United States we should not object very seriously. The agriculturists of the United States get all their farm implements and many other things free. The labouring man also gets his boots and shoes free, and several other things free. I repeat that if the Government would go as far along certain lines as the United States has done, it would go a long way toward satisfying the people of this country.

Now a word with reference to disposing of our agricultural products during the coming year. In my opening remarks I told the House that I thought the proper place for the Prime Minister, and at least the Minister of Trade and Commerce as well, was right where they are now; that it was absolutely necessary some one in authority should be over there for some time yet, and I would add that when the Prime Minister comes back I hope this Government will still leave on the other side of the water one or two or three responsible ministers, for there will be plenty of work for them to do.

In Western Canada we are probably more interested in disposing of our wheat than in anything else. I had the pleasure of being in London for a few weeks a short time ago, examining into the wheat situation. I found the situation very peculiar indeed and very difficult, if not impossible, to analyse. Neither could I find any one in England who would attempt to analyse the situation. England was then fully supplied with cereals, with enough on hand to last for a considerable time, but there were other places in Europe that were not, by any means, in that position. The Continent of Europe has never been a very large importer of wheat; it has been a large producer of wheat. The Russian Empire, for instance, was the largest wheat producing country in the world until the war started, producing from 700,000,000 to 900,000,000 bushels of wheat per annum and Russia exported only to the amount of 200,000,000 bushels per annum. Russia's situation, as near as it was possible to find out, was that her wheat producing areas had been practically wiped out. Her machinery, transportation facilities, and everything else were all completely ruined, when the eastern line had broken everything had been taken from there to the other side, leaving nothing that was of any practical use. Her wheat-producing areas had been utterly devastated. Now, it is obvious that if Russia is not a very large producer of wheat, she is bound to be an importer; otherwise she must face starvation; and from what we can gather, this is the state of affairs in Russia at the present time. Her wheat producing possibilities having been reduced to a minimum, Russia will require large quantities of wheat. But she is not in a position to pay for this wheat, and, even if she could, she has not the facilities for its distribution. The country is so disorganized that it can handle practically nothing. The interior of Russia is in a serious condition so far as food supplies are concerned. Then there are the other smaller nations, like Serbia and Roumania, not very largely populated countries, but still requiring a considerable quantity of foodstuffs. The new allocation of territory will give Serbia a population of probably twenty millions. Now, Serbia has no food of any kind. Her people are merely living from hand to mouth, and must be supplied from extraneous sources. Their producing possibilities are almost nil, as the country has been completedy denuded of all equipment in practically every direction, being destitute of even seed to sow. Rumania is in the same position, while alien countries are in as bad a plight. Germany, with her very large population, was not a considerable importer of wheat. Although she consumes a great deal of cereals, of about 400,000,000 bushels consumed she did not import more than about 70,000,000 bushels of wheat, but she was a large producer of rye, which took the place of wheat. Now we are given to understand that Germany's producing powers are practically exhausted, so that she may be compelled to import large quantities of grain. With all those countries in that condition, with not only transportation and distribution facilities to be secured, but credits to be provided, I believe that Canada will have to provide credits for a very large amount of her exports to them. Therefore, the people of Canada must arrange matters to meet these circumstances, if they are going to dispose of their products. Possibly we could secure credit elsewhere. We might secure it from the United States, and probably that would be satisfactory; but in view of rumours which are current overseas and in Canada, I think the safest course for the Dominion to take is to provide those credits herself, so that there may be no possibility of restrictions in any shape or form interfering with the export of her products. I am not in a position to say definitely that there have been restrictions, but the rumours one hears from time to time might indicate that there has been some difficulty in that direction.

About the beginning of January there was quite a large surplus of wheat in the world. The United States had about 300,000,000 bushels, while India, Argentina, and Australia had probably an equal amount amongst them. But what do we find today? These stocks, so far as the United States is concerned, are going very quickly. At all events, the millers are now offering a premium over the fixed prices to secure this wheat for their mills. That must surely be an indication that the stocks of wheat, so far at least as the United States is concerned, are in demand; otherwise the millers would not be offering a premium for the wheat. Now, if the European conditions are as I have outlined them, there will be a heavy demand for cereals from this country. The United States at the beginning of the year was reported as having sown the largest acreage of wheat in its history. Conditions were almost perfect, and it was thought that there would be a tremendous surplus of wheat on hand when the United States crop should be harvested next year. Well, there may be, but one cannot estimate the crop six months before it is harvested. We might just as well try to figure out the crop of Western Canada, the seed of which is still in the granaries, as to figure out the crop of fall wheat that has been sown in the fall. So that we do not know, and nobody can tell, just what the situation will be, but personally I am convinced that if a satisfactory peace can be arrived at; if conditions can be restored to anything like normal in those countries that I have just mentioned; if transportation facilities can be provided, with an organized government of some form to carry on the distribution—and if credit is forthcoming, we will find a ready market for all of our wheat and our other agricultural products as well. But it will be necessary for this Government to exert every effort. I am certain that our representatives overseas are working on that. They were doing so—at least some of them—some months ago, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) has no holiday, I can assure you, Sir. He is as busy a man as can be found anywhere. I had not the pleasure of meeting the Prime Minister. He was in Paris at that time, but I met the Minister of Trade and Commerce on different occasions, and he assuredly will have all he can do for some time to come, and instead of criticisms being directed at those gentlemen, they should be given every encouragement in order that they may assist in an attempt to remedy conditions to permit of a free export of our products into those countries.

This brings me to the question of what is going to be done with the wheat crop of Western Canada. Different suggestions have been made. There is a request from one of the provinces that the price of wheat should be fixed. I will not say at this stage whether that is a proper thing to do or not, but one thing I will say, and that is, that if we are going to have a stabilized business industry in Canada during the next wheat season from August or September on something must be done.

I have outlined to you the difficulty of disposing of our grain quickly. It is going to take us the entire crop year to dispose of it. We will not be able to rush it out. Storage facilities will not be available for it should we have a fair average crop. Something will have to be done to stabilize the price which will be paid for that grain. If it is thrown open to the world, and open to speculation, and an assurance of equal treatment is not guaranteed for the entire year, the market will simply be glutted early in the season, the price will be forced down to the lowest level, and after all the storage has been occupied and all the money of the country has been invested in wheat, the price will go up and neither the producer nor the consumer will get a square deal. The consumer will have to pay the high price and the producer will have to take the low price. This Government has got to do something; whether it be to fix the price or to absolutely prohibit speculation, something must be done. I think there is only one way to do it and that is by fixing the price. It is a very difficult matter to prevent speculation in the handling of grain. The only successful remedy we have found for it has been the fixing of the price.

With all due respect to the other two provinces, they are not as anxious for a fixed price as we are in Saskatchewan. Their interests differ from ours. They are not the wheat-growing provinces that Saskatchewan is. Our province produces more wheat than all the rest of Canada combined. Consequently, we are very much interested in what is going to be done with wheat. Manitoba has a more varied production in the matter of coarse grains and stock, while from 75 to 80 per cent of the agriculturists of Saskatchewan produce wheat. Almost the entire balance is divided between oats, wheat, and some stock.

Some arrangement will have to be entered into if you are going to stabilize the industry because its effect will be far reaching and will not be confined to agriculture. It will go all the way down through the line to the consumer in more ways than one. It will have an effect on production in urban centres in the same way that it will have throughout the country. If something is not done to stabilize this industry, to give some kind of a guarantee that all who produce wheat are going to receive fair and equal treatment, the area that will be sown to wheat will be decreased to an alarming extent. I have met men—yes, scores of them—who have said that unless something is done to guarantee them a fair return they will not under any circumstances seed anywhere the amount of ground they had prepared for seeding. Seed is very expensive; it costs something to seed in Western Canada and the old saying that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush is going to appeal very forcibly to those people before they are going to spend from $4 to $5 an acre to provide seed for this land.

I want to go back again to the criticism of the farmers of the West that I have heard since I have come down here. I will give one illustration. I have been told: "You fellows come down here to Ottawa with your seal skin coats and your fur-lined coats (and all that kind of stuff); the West must be rolling in wealth." You have only to look at the blue books which are available to everybody to be able to reckon for yourself what the average income has been for western farmers from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains. True, we had a bumper crop in 1915 almost all over the entire West. What was the result with regard to prices? While we had a bumper crop, prices fell on the market and it is doubtful if there was any profit at all in the production of the crop. In 1914 there was practically a crop failure in Western Canada. Eastern industry felt it very keenly. Unemployment existed all over the country, soup kitchens were established everywhere and provincial governments were loaning money to different municipalities to provide employment. I remember that in our own little city thousands of dollars were expended in crushing stone in the hope that it might be used some day for pavements just simply to give employment as a consequence of the 1914 crop having been almost an entire failure in Western Canada.

If there was a little profit in the 1915 crop, which there was, and I am not arguing that there was not, it was largely taken up, and in some cases entirely taken up in meeting the deficit of 1914. What has been the result since 1915?—very moderate crops on the average and in large areas almost total failure. Take Saskatchewan as an illustration. Our entire exportable surplus of wheat from the last crop is about 65,000,000 bushels or, say, 70,000,000 bushels. The proportion of that from Saskatchewan, put it at one-half, would be in the neighbourhood of 35,000,000 bushels. We have in that province roughly speaking 120,000 or 125,000 farmers. We will say that 25,000 farmers were producers of other grain; that is a very liberal estimate. We will take 100,000 was exported. The proceeds of these 35,000,000 bushels of Saskatchewan grain that was exported. The proceeds of those 35,000,000 bushels, providing it was all high grade grain, none of it less than No. 2, would be $70,000,000, roughly speaking. It might average $2 per bushel but no more provided it was high grade grain. Therefore, you have $70,000,000 distributed amongst 100,000 people. What does that mean? That is the gross amount and you can figure it out for yourself. That would only give each man a gross revenue of $700. Out of that he has to take his entire expenses. In the first place he would have in the neighbourhood of $500 or $600 to pay for labour, allowing only one man to each individual farmer, he would have to pay from $60 to $80 and if he employed a married couple he would have to pay from $100 to $125 per month. At the very start he has to pay from $600 to $700 for labour and that would leave him about $900 to take care of all his other expenses. I could go on and give you the actual expenses that this man had to pay, and show you that the average farmer of the province of Saskatchewan did not make one single dollar last year. Indeed, I doubt if he broke even. You have only got to take the actual figures for that statement. You do not need to take my word at all, go to the blue books and find it for yourselves. The conditions in the two years previous were very little better. So that in so far as the farmers of Western Canada are concerned, they have not been making money out of the war. As far as Eastern Canada is concerned, the representatives of the Eastern agriculturists are more familiar with the situation here, and can deal with it themselves. The condition with respect to the West is this: That up to the outbreak of the war, agriculture in Western Canada was at a very low ebb. The tide was flowing the other way; instead of increasing numbers engaging in agriculture, the population was decreasing. There is no question about that; any man who was in Western Canada and was familiar with the conditions, knows that the number of people living on the land was decreasing—they were moving out of the country right along. The war has helped to hold them. There was the prospect at least of securing a good crop and a good price for their grain. They lived in hopes of securing a good crop, and they are still there and prepared for another trial—at least, practically ninety or ninety-five per cent of them are still there. I do not think more than five or ten per cent had migrated from the land; they are prepared to try it again providing they will get at least some return for what they produce. I have placed these facts before the Government and the House in order to show that unless something is done in regard to the marketing of our crop next year, the sowing of an increased acreage in Canada next year need not be looked for, but on the contrary, the result will be much the other way.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (Perth, North): Is there any remedy to be found in shipping to the United States?

Mr. MAHARG: We are prohibited from shipping there now.

Mr. MORPHY: But ordinarily the market there is open?

Mr. MAHARG: It will be open on one condition, and that is if the production of the United States is below their requirements.

Mr. MORPHY: Who shut you out?

Mr. MAHARG: The United States Government, on account of the war conditions. Now they have got an abundance of wheat there for themselves, the price of which is guaranteed by the Government, and they are not going to purchase the surplus wheat of Canada, and take a chance of disposing of it again. They have got sufficient wheat of their own to look after, without taking ours.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in conclusion that Western Canada is watching this Government very closely. It is also watching this House, and individual members of the House very closely, and unless something is done,—I want to be very clear and emphatic in this statement,—to attempt to remedy conditions in so far as the West is concerned, you will at least have a number of by-elections on your hands before this House meets again next session.

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, a born citizen of Quebec city cannot let the occasion pass without paying a last tribute to the memory of our late leader, the member for the electoral division of Quebec East, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

To speak on behalf of electors, whose confidence and admiration in Sir Wilfrid Laurier have never faltered, my first impression was to use the French language. It is the language that Sir Wilfrid loved the most; it is the language he spoke at home, it is the language spoken by every one of his former electors. In speaking French I would feel more at ease, but I realize that in making use of the English language, it may demonstrate that with very little effort and good will, one can be made to speak both languages.

I have come to the conclusion that in being courteous to the majority in this House, I am but following the example of my revered leader. If, Sir, at this time, the whole country is in mourning, no part of Canada regrets more the loss of this illustrious statesman than the electoral division of Quebec East. Sir Wilfrid began to serve his country as far back as 1871 in the Provincial Legislature of Quebec. A few years later he had already reached distinction as a statesman both in the Parliament of Canada and outside, to such an extent that he was offered, and accepted, a portfolio in Mackenzie's Cabinet. An election had to take place and the newly chosen minister had to go before his constituents of Arthabaska to have this choice ratified, but Arthabaska turned him down. In an instant, a nomination paper was prepared in St. Roch and St. Sauveur, and a delegation succeeded in bringing to Quebec East the then down-hearted and disappointed young minister. From that time this constituency has enjoyed the honour and privilege of having been faithful to one of the very best public servants this country has ever had. Of him it may well be said:

> In youth a student, and in old age a sage,
> Lover of freedom, of mankind a friend,
> Noble in aim from childhood to the end,
> Great is thy mark upon historic page.

Among those who then affixed their signature to the nomination paper for the election of Quebec East very few are alive today. Their names were given lately in the press, and I shall quote them in the order in which they were published: S. N. Parent, Chas. A. Parent, M. Coleman, J. B. Laliberté, Jos. Gauthier, J. E. Martineau. It is these men who jointly with the members of the district of Quebec have been claiming the right to bury their distinguished compatriot in Quebec city where a reverent population could come and pray by his grave. Their desire was a true expression of their love and devotedness, but when they realized how painful, not to say cruel, it would have been to impose a second separation upon Lady Laurier, the accomplished and beloved wife who for over fifty years had been the best companion of her husband, the claim was given up.

It is not my intention to make a full review of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's career. Laurier will sleep forever in a cemetery of the province of Ontario and, to use the expression of Archbishop Mathieu, of Regina, he lies as a connecting link between Ontario and Quebec, the two large provinces which during a lifetime he has tried to see united in perfect harmony. Unfortunately, Sir, his teachings have not been successful in the province of Ontario, and he died at a time when the racial and religious prejudices have in that very province reached possibly the limit. Let us hope that a reaction will soon occur for the general benefit of the community.

We find, from the speeches delivered by members in this House and from expressions that have lately appeared in the press, that a reaction is certainly taking place. No province would more gladly welcome a change than the province of Quebec. Educated by Laurier and following the broad principles for which he stood, it will gladly join with those who have at heart a sincere desire that the Dominion shall enter upon an era of progressive reconstruction and readjustment.

These two words, Sir, cover a great deal of ground; they involve a consideration of various problems connected with the situation created by the war. I shall glance rapidly over a very few of the most important of those which I find mentioned in the speech from the Throne.

The consensus of opinion is that nothing is too good for the soldier, especially the returned soldier, and that steps should be taken at once to enable him to enter into civil life under the best possible circumstances. I need not say that every policy having such an aim in view should meet with unrestricted support. I am not very conversant with things pertaining to militia or military matters, but I have heard remarks made to justify the assertion that unless a distinction be made between officers and men who remained in Canada and officers and men who have actually gone to the front, troubles will surely arise. It may be true that certain officers knew so much about certain things that their services were more valuable at home than they would be abroad. Unfortunately, the soldiers who have been overseas do not seem to think so. What this Government, therefore, ought to do, is give to returned men positions that have been filled by men who have done no actual fighting. In various departments, not only in Ottawa but in many cities all over Canada, the very best situations have been held during the last four years or more by men who did not—so far as we can judge, at any rate—make what could be called a real sacrifice in connection with the war. It was said that their services were so valuable that they could not be dispensed with—that was always the excuse given when it was desired to keep a man in a job of some sort.

But as soon as the soldiers return from the front, the very first thing they say when they see an officer who has not been overseas, is: "This man will soon disappear; we will see that he disappears and that we take his place." If you want to facilitate the re-establishment of the returned soldiers into civil life, one of the first things to be done is to replace by returned soldiers men who have remained in the country during the last four years. The soldiers want it, and I believe they are entitled to it. Of course, this may not meet with all views; it may not be in line with all purposes. Evidently the Government, however, has realized some of the necessities of the situation, because in the speech from the Throne certain things are mentioned, the carrying out of which will likely have the effect of helping the soldier to re-enter civil life. Among these are two which I have specially noticed: the construction of highways and the provision for better housing conditions.

I have heard some criticism of the proposal for the construction of highways. I have heard men say that to some extent this is an infringement upon provincial rights; that whatever moneys go from the Dominion Government for this purpose should be handed directly to and be spent by the provinces themselves. There may be a good deal in that suggestion, but from the resolution as it appears on the Order Paper—of course, the resolution has not yet been moved—it seems to me that there is not much danger to be apprehended in this connection. I am much inclined to congratulate the Government upon inaugurating this policy for the construction of highways. I know of no other province where the policy of improving roads and highways has been so well developed as it has been in the province of Quebec, from which I come. That being the case,

I am interested in supporting a policy of that kind. Although in Quebec that policy has produced good results, there is yet something lacking. We find in certain places that our highways are disconnected because of the absence of bridges. It would be a good thing if some of that federal money could be spent on the building of bridges at certain places, for instance to complete a break in the road connecting Ontario and Quebec by building a bridge at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, so that the people of the two provinces may pass back and forth in automobiles instead of by train, and so that they may not be separated as they have been in the past. I suggest that if some of that money be spent in that way, much good will result. Besides, we find that throughout the country, industries which were formerly engaged in the manufacture of munitions have now stopped work. If bridge building is carried on these industries will have something to do, soldiers and ordinary labourers will find employment, and one more step will be taken towards re-establishing the soldier in civil life.

Then, the speech from the Throne mentioned some steps to be taken to provide better housing conditions. I have heard a good deal of criticism of that from gentlemen on the other side of the House, but in itself the policy is not so very bad if it is properly applied. Of course, we cannot discuss it very well at this stage because we do not know what the Bill will contain. But although we have not the Bill, in a certain little booklet that the Government has spread all over the country, called "Conservation," certain photographs are published. It appears from these that the houses recommended for the labouring classes are to be built in rows, one house touching the other, without any extra land at all. It seems to me that if any moneys are to be spent in that direction, a fair quantity of land ought to be provided for each house to be occupied by labouring men. That would be much better for him and for his family, and would go far towards preventing the bad feeling which may exist among labouring classes who live under such conditions that they have no chance of taking a little fresh air.

Other things are mentioned in the speech from the Throne; I shall not refer to them all. But I believe that the Government should not stop with the proposals mentioned in the speech from the Throne. I think that money devoted to the development of our natural resources would be well spent; and in this respect I share the views of a few hon. gentlemen who have referred to this matter during the course of this debate.

Part of the Northwest is altogether unknown, and in Quebec there is a territory which is unknown and which is said to be probably the wealthiest section of Canada so far as minerals of all kinds are concerned. I am speaking of new Quebec, or Ungava. The iron beds of Ungava are said to be the very best in the world. According to the report made by Professor Low some years ago, there is in that territory immense wealth in reserve for the people of Canada. It is said that the water-powers of the Hamilton river of Ungava will produce as many million horse-power as imagination can conceive.

We have been told that the returned soldiers have been so much in the open air that many of them will not care to return to office work. Here is an opportunity for them. Let survey parties be formed and sent into the Ungava district. There are hundreds of returned soldiers who have experience in connection with aeroplanes, who will be glad to take up this work, and the time is not far distant when aeroplanes will be used for this purpose. His Excellency the Governor General recently made a speech in which he said:—

Obviously, it is not for me, in my position, to attempt to lay down either rules of policy or rules of conduct. But certainly I may say that my experience here—very short but if I may be allowed to say so, my very happy experience in Canada—teaches me that far greater attention ought to be paid than is paid at the present moment to research work and to the development of the natural resources of the country. And I cannot help thinking that, in facing the great problems which lie in front of us those who are responsible for the administration and the conduct of affairs should proceed on these lines. Whatever money is required to be spent that money should only be considered as an investment, and a very safe investment, I believe it will be. Canada provides a very fruitful field for both research work and development. It is almost commonplace to say that the Dominion's resources have only been scratched. Thus we have unlimited opportunities for the future, and it is for all, whether we belong to great institutions like yours, or whether we are engaged in other affairs, to do everything which lies in our power to develop on sound, scientific, and practical lines, the knowledge which we already possess of these great resources.

So much for the mineral and other resources of Ungava. I think the Government will do well also to inquire into the fishing industry in the province of Quebec. The Labrador coast, the Baie des Chaleurs and the Gulf of St. Lawrence can provide the whole of Canada with the best fish in the world, but up to now the industry has been altogether ignored. Strange to say, there was given, a short time ago before the Quebec Board of Trade, a splendid address by a prominent Englishman, Mr. H. C. Thomson, in which he showed the people of Quebec what could be done as regards the fishing industry in that province. To embody what he said, I will put on Hansard the resolution passed by the Board of Trade following the speech delivered by Mr. Thomson:—

Resolved:—That the thanks of this general meeting of the members of the Quebec Board of Trade be expressed to Mr. Harry Cranfuird Thomson, of London, for his most interesting address upon the extent and wealth of the deep sea fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the Baie des Chaleurs and the coasts of New Foundland and Labrador, and that the Board desires to express its conviction of the inestimable value of these fisheries as a source of cheap food for the people of Canada and the United States, made so urgent by the present high prices of all other food. That the experience of Aberdeen, Grimsby, and other fishing ports of the United Kingdom whence thousands of tons of fresh fish have of late years been sent daily in chilled cars to all the cities of England and Scotland, and also that of Gloucester, Mass., whence similar shipments are made to United States centres, and where fish preserving and curing in all its shapes is now being carried on, would seem to point to the advisability of more attention being paid in Canada to the exploitation of this source of cheap food. There would seem to be no reason why Quebec should not become, like Aberdeen or Grimsby, a distributing point for fresh fish brought in by properly equipped iced fish carriers from Baie des Chaleurs and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, destined to all points in Canada and the United States, provided a suitable iced warehouse were erected on the Louise Dock alongside both railway tracks and deep water.

If the Government will take these remarks into consideration and also the requests made by many hon. members to develop the natural resources of Canada, I have no doubt that such a policy will meet with general approval.

With regard to the situation created by the war, I have been very much impressed by the speech that was delivered by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell). I think he stated that the debt this country is facing to-day is over $2,000,000,000, and that our expenses cannot be less than $300,000,000 per annum. He stated that our revenue is not expected to be more than $195,000,000, so that we are short $105,000,000, and the Government at last puts this question: Where are we going to find the money? I must congratulate the Minister of Public Works for having boldly put the facts and the situation as it is before the country. I have also been impressed by the speech delivered by the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), in which he made certain statements, and I said to myself: Perhaps the Minister of Public Works could find in that speech a hint as to where he could get a little of the money for which he is looking. I was amazed to hear falling from the lips of an ex-minister of the Crown (Sir Sam Hughes), who was responsible for some of the expenses of the war, the following words:—

We had bad financial conditions in Canada—but of these I do not speak now. At that time, I regret to say certain distinguished members of the Government were not moderate in their views or in their actions. Why, I have had ministers of the Crown bombard me on behalf of different interests and in order to keep this business, that business and the other business from failing, from going to pieces, I was asked to buy a few hundred yards of cloth here, and a few hundred there. The Dominion of Canada was down to such a state in financial matters that we had to practically dole the contracts out, to give some business here, some there, and some elsewhere and this became a very serious drawback.

Let me read a little further. The ex-Minister of Militia and Defence tells us that in the very midst of the war, when the lives of our soldiers were at stake, there were grafters around trying to get money out of him. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) stated the other day that for every dollar spent on the soldier another dollar has gone in graft, and it begins to look as if that statement were true To continue the words of the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes):

Sir Joseph Flavelle became head of the Munitions Board, this work having been transferred from the War Department in England to the Munitions Department. Then, following that, we find a certain distinguished citizen obtaining large contracts both in Canada and the United States for the supply of meats and meat products. We have had some evidence in Canada about meat profits, but we have only touched the fringe of it yet, and we have not got anything about what was going on in the United States. I am informed on very reliable authority that upwards of $5,000,000 monthly was handed over in the last three or four years in the United States under contracts with the British Government and other governments to this gentleman, by reason of the position which he held as head of the Munitions Board, which gave him the prestige that enabled him to get all these things into his own hands, little by little, until the whole affair was brought in as an appendage to the business interests run by this Toronto organization. Its estimated profits will be upwards of $100,000,000 in the last four years on these commodities alone.

Sir, if we are short of money, as we are told by the Minister of Public Works, one of the first steps we should take is to get back the money that has been pocketed by these people. There are other ways, perhaps more interesting to the city of Quebec in particular, in which money could be saved by this Government. It is no secret that for a good many years past the province of Quebec has been deliberately isolated by the Government of the day. Still, Quebec is alive just the same, and will probably continue to live. Although we are not receiving any favours from the Government, there are citizens among us who wanted to help on the war and do something for the soldiers. Mr. G. G. Stuart, K.C., a lawyer well known all over Canada, a considerable time ago bequeathed to the Government his beautiful estate of about three hundred acres, to be used for hospital purposes for the Canadian soldiers. The property is situated on the St. Foy road, overlooking the St. Lawrence river, occupying as fine a site as could be imagined. Although this property was bequeathed to the Government over a year ago, the Government has done nothing towards providing a hospital, and not a cent has been spent on the property for the benefit of the returned soldier. On the contrary, the Government has been renting hospital accommodation elsewhere. The Government, for instance, rented Kent House, which is situated on the Quebec Railway, Light & Power Company line, which company is very friendly to the Government, while all the time the property bequeathed by Mr. Stuart was lying idle. Another instance of how the Government is favouring this company is the fact that it has given the company a contract for lighting all the public buildings of Quebec—the post office, the Customs Department, the Revenue Department and the Militia Department buildings—without calling for tenders, and the contract is good for five years. There are other competing companies in the city of Quebec, but they were not given a chance to tender. This was simply another case of throwing away money.

I wish to refer to the Siberian expedition and to correct a statement made by the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) the other day. I understood him to say that all members of the Siberian Force had left this country voluntarily. That is not correct, because I know quite a few young men who, though willing to go and fight in France, deliberately refused to sign any papers for Siberia. And yet those men have been sent. I was very glad to hear the Minister say they would all soon be back. The province of Quebec badly needs these men, and they should certainly be back in Canada for the beginning of the summer. In Siberia, they are of no use to this country or to anybody else, unless, as was suggested by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy), they are there trying to collect loans made by capitalists of Europe.

I was very much interested in the speech of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Peck), and particularly in his defence of Sir Arthur Currie; and one thing which he said in connection with that matter impressed me considerably. He said that when the troops were going through places infested with Germans the natural feeling at the moment was to crush the enemy, paying them back in their own coin. But he said the policy of revenge was not worth a man's life. These words struck me as being very eloquent and compelled a thought which I shall now express, in regard to the last Order in Council passed by the Government that the fathers—for that is what it amounts to—of defaulters under the Military Service Act should be fined at least $250. I do not know what the intention of the Government is; but if it is intended that defaulters should go to jail, I would say, let that Order in Council stand as it is, because with such a fine as that at least eighty per cent of the defaulters would have to go to jail. Now, if the policy of revenge is not worth a man's life, it should not, I think, be worth a man's liberty; and I think that if the Government persists in enforcing such heavy fines it is nothing but revenge. It is ungenerous; and the result will be that a good many young men who were not as guilty as some people believe them to be will be sent to prison. Every one expresses a desire for harmony now. Well, if the Government have the same desire, I suggest that one of the first things they should do is to repeal that Order in Council and leave the whole matter to the discretion of the judges. Our judges have proven themselves capable and honourable throughout the whole history of Canada, and I do not see why they should now be incapable of dealing with this matter. They are familiar with local conditions and should be the best judges under the circumstances—at least better judges than the Government.

In conclusion I will say this: Quebec is not as bad as it has been represented to be. Quebec is well disposed toward the rest of Canada, and will gladly unite with those who have the best interests of the country at heart. It stands for order as against the forces that would make for revolutionary change. Its devotion to Canada's cherished institutions and to the highest interest will continue in the years to come.

Mr. JOHN A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the House and the country must be getting tired of this prolonged debate on the Address. I am one of the old members of the House and I have not yet seen an Address discussed at such length. However, it is just as well, perhaps, that the Government should have the views of its followers and the hon. members of the Opposition upon questions of public policy, so that it may frame its legislation in accordance with such views.

It would be quite impossible for me to offer any tribute as touching or as graceful as those tributes which have so far been offered to the memory of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier who has passed away from his place in this House, and whose face and figure I am sure all of us miss a great deal. I have known him for a great many years, and I always had considerable admiration for him—personally unbounded admiration; although I confess I could not see my way clear to follow him in some of his policies. He had that magnetic quality which endeared him to his followers, and he had filled the place in the public life of this country with dignity, with courage and address; and even his bitterest enemies cannot deny that though he may have erred in his policies, he erred believing that he was doing his best for the country.

Now, it is always painful for a speaker—especially so is it for me—to refer to personal matters; but possibly it might be just as well for me to dispose of these questions at the beginning of my address. Unfortunately, in his speech the other day, the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) made a reference to myself which was calculated to reflect upon Sir Arthur Currie, the leader of the Canadian army in Flanders. In that speech the hon. member left it to be inferred that an injustice had been done to me by Sir Arthur Currie. He said that I was blamed for something for which Sir Arthur Currie was to blame, and that no effort had been made to vindicate me. Now, I am very much obliged to the hon. member for his endeavour to help me fight my battles; although my friends and intimates will admit, I believe, that I am generally quite capable of attending to my own affairs. The circumstance to which he alluded was this. In the second battle of Ypres I had the great honour to be senior officer at Grafenstafel Ridge, and that point, which was farthest east in the enemy's line was held by my battalion, the 15th Battalion, 48th Highlanders, of Toronto. When the war broke out I was in command of that battalion in the city of Toronto. It was considered one of the crack battalions of Canada, and was then 985 men strong which was greater than the number of men in any other single battalion in the country. It was fully armed, had complete field equipment, and was ready to take the field, and when the call to this war came, as a member of this House, and for the dignity of the House, I considered it my duty to leave all personal affairs and go; so that it should not be said by the people of this country that when the call to the war came no member of the House of Commons was willing to go, and that we were all a lot of "safety-firsters." I went to the war, and I do not regret it. I will say further, that from the very moment I landed in England, I felt that there was being made an effort—to use the vernacular—to "can" me. But I behaved myself with becoming dignity, avoided controversies of every kind, kept out of politics, and attended to my own business. I complained only once. When my men were up to their knees in mud and their tents were down, and there was no place for them to warm themselves, or dry themselves, I did write to Headquarters. I told them I thought that in Canada we did better for hogs, than they were doing by the men over there. Nothing was said about that; I was forgiven. The reason I did say it then, or make a kick, was simply because the Canadian battalions had given details of men to build huts for themselves, they had built them, the huts had been unoccupied for nearly three weeks and we should have been allowed to go into them. When I went to France I still felt that I was under observation and that there was some hidden hand behind, I do not know whose, seeking to destroy me in some way or other. I was not mistaken. When we were at Fleurbaix my battalion was very well-behaved and we did not have a crime oftener than once in four or five days. Then commissioners came down from army headquarters to investigate and I was virtually deprived of my command. They wanted to inspect my battalion and they inspected it. They told me that my battalion had been shielding crime amongst the men. They inspected every company and every man, and if the inspecting officer found an "i" that was not dotted, or a "t" that was not crossed, and if every man was not clean shaved and in his proper order and place, I knew what was going to happen to me. Fortunately, the battalion was well-behaved and the commissioners, after they had been around, came and complimented me and said that they were in error, that they did not consider it possible that a Canadian battalion could have such good behaviour, such fine discipline and such clean, well-behaved men as mine. I was permitted to carry on. They could not have found anything else because the men who were with me were amongst the finest boys to be found in the city of Toronto, all well-behaved lads, not such a class as you would expect to be guilty of any crimes.

[Mr. Currie.]

At the battle of Ypres I was placed in a peculiar position. I was the commandant or senior officer on Gravenstafel ridge. That ridge was held by my own battalion together with the Montreal Highlanders; and the 7th were dug in on our left, this being the battalion to which the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Cooper) was attached. The 7th was dug in on the road between St. Julien and Gravenstafel ridge. It was on the morning of the 24th that the Germans attacked my battalion. Early in the morning the gas attack came and my battalion was gassed and it seemed as if every gun in the German army was turned upon us. We were attacked about fifty to one and they flattened our front line trenches, killing and wounding a great many of my men.

I might here say as a matter of explanation that when I came back to Canada I was told by some high military officers that I should have withdrawn my battalion rather than remain in such a dangerous place. If I had had my own way I would have withdrawn to the crest of Gravenstafel ridge and dug in. But we had no option in the matter. On the night before the grand attack word was sent out to every individual company commander by telephone that he was not to move until help came next day. If I had withdrawn my battalion or any of my men before orders came to move, I would have been courtmartialled, and I would have deserved it, because it would have been disobedience of orders. In the morning, however, when the attack came, I was there. The attack occurred about four o'clock in the morning. My men had nothing to do but fight and die in their places or be taken. They could not get out. Three-quarters of my battalion fell, but they sold their lives dearly. Between six and seven o'clock the grand attack was virtually over. My second in command, Major Marshall, had been posted on my left in a reserve trench, with my adjutant, now Col. Dansereau of Montreal, with a machine gun and a platoon of men. At daylight a German Albatross flying machine came over and dropped green flares over them. In a little while several batteries of eight or nine-inch guns began firing into their trench, blowing it to pieces and killing every man in it except seven or eight. I saw Major Marshall emerge between my men and the line of the 7th with half a dozen men and walk in the direction of the dressing station, and I went down to see him in order to ascertain what had happened to the rest of the command. I had seen them bombarded about 350 yards away and I wanted to know what had happened to my adjutant. He told me that my adjutant was killed. Fortunately that did not turn out to be true; he was badly wounded on the top of the head but he managed to crawl out afterwards. At that time the commanding officer of the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Cooper) came over to me. He was a young man, Major Odlum, now Brigadier-General Odlum and one of the famous Canadian officers. His commanding officer had been killed the evening before near Kaiserleer when they went out to reconnoitre the German line. I refer to Col. Hart Maharg. Major Odlum came and asked me if I felt he would be justified in remaining in his position. I asked him what he thought he ought to do, and he said that he thought he ought to stick it. I told him to carry on. He did stick it and the 7th died in their trenches almost to a man. They were dug in between St. Julien and Kaiserleer. The hon. member for South Vancouver says he saw me that day and spoke to me. He said he had seen General Sir Arthur Currie also. If he saw, and spoke to me, it would be at the dressing station and if so he was out of his position or a casualty because he otherwise should have been with his men on the road. I do not recollect seeing him that morning, but if he did speak to me it was at the crossroads in the rear of Kaiserleer at the dressing station. I do remember that scattered units of men had carried wounded men to the dressing station. I ordered them back to the trenches on the reverse slope of Gravenstafel ridge as senior officer and it may be that I did sometimes use language rather more forcible than polite. I believe that one man did write home that I told him and his chum to get into the trenches and that if he moved out without orders he would have his blooming head shot off, or something of that kind. However, that is where I was that morning, and I did not leave that position that morning.

With regard to Sir Arthur Currie, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has placed this question quite clearly before the House already, and as far as he (Gen. Currie) was concerned, there was nothing discreditable either to me or to himself, as far as I can see, in the whole transaction. He was at Fortuin his headquarters immediately south of St. Julien. Our brigade was on his left, and on our left were the French. He had given us the 10th and the 7th to help us out the evening of the day when the battle opened. The 10th battalion was badly cut up that night. That battalion was formed of troops from Saskatoon and Moosejaw. The 16th battalion, the Highlanders from Vancouver, which the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Peck) had the honour to command and the 10th were lined up immediately to the west of St. Julien. They were in reserve and they were lined up on Thursday night after the gas attack on the French. They formed line with fixed bayonets and went forward to meet the Germans at St. Julien wood. There never was a braver bayonet charge than that in the whole war.

They drove the Germans back half a mile and established themselves, and their losses were tremendous. On Saturday morning the 10th Battalion was withdrawn, or at least the remnant of it, consisting of about one hundred and fifty men under Major Ormond. It was sent down to our assistance in the terrible salient, that tract we were in, at Gravenstafel Ridge. Major Ormond reported to me that morning—and his report is in the archives of the Militia Department—to that effect. Sir Arthur Currie was at his quarters in Fortuin. We all expected that reinforcements would have arrived at daylight in the morning, but they did not. The reinforcements did not arrive until hours afterwards, until after noon, or rather late in the afternoon, when the Durham Light Infantry came into that sector. Sir Arthur Currie got tired of calling on the telephone for help, and walked down from Fortuin to Wiltchz, about a mile and a half away, and he had a "head-on" collision with the British commander, General Snow—at least I was so informed, I do not know personally. He wanted to know why they were not sending help to us. I wish to say that if I had not been in the position, the honourable position, that I was in on Gravenstafel Ridge, I would just as soon have been in his position, because there was nothing dishonourable about it, and I think when his report is brought before this House it will establish that fact. Now, as far as the point is concerned where I was located, and the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Cooper), if there was one little spot in the whole world at that moment that the German Emperor wanted, it was that very place, Gravenstafel Ridge. If he had captured it that morning many believe the history of the world would have been changed. We held that ridge, and what is more we did not give it up. The ridge was turned over to English troops, the Durham Light Infantry, who fought and went into action that morning right fresh from England, never having seen a trench before, not knowing the difference between a hedge and a trench. They fought for nearly two weeks in those trenches at the cross-roads, where I had previously been, and held the place. Nobody can cast any reflections upon any of those officers and men in my hearing with my consent. This war has seen a great deal of sacrifice, and it is most unfortunate that some people at home have done nothing but scandalize and slander the living and the dead. Why should I say anything against Sir Arthur Currie? I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that he is a wonder, and the fact that he managed to come through with all the intrigue that I saw going on—not amongst the soldiers, mind you, but there was intrigue going on—the fact that he, a civilian soldier, like myself, a militiaman, came through with the highest honours and led the Canadians to victory, I think is a marvel. It should encourage every other citizen in this country to perfect himself in the study of arms, so that should the time ever come when their country is in danger they will be able, as the old Greeks said, to take their place in the ranks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have covered that phase of the matter. I do not know, Sir, but I trust that we have heard the last of all this talk. I agree with the hon. minister, who suggested that some substantial recognition should be granted to Sir Arthur Currie. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the very first thing this House should have done—and I regret there was nothing at all pertaining to this matter in the speech from the Throne—was, after offering thanks to Almighty God for saving us, was to tender the thanks of this young nation to the officers and the men who have fought so bravely for us in those foreign fields in this great war, and written the name of Canada with victory and with glory. There is no man living in the Canadian forces that I can feel in my heart for one minute would do anything wrong, or anything that might injure his country. If he did wrong—and after all we are only human—it would be with the motive of doing good; and if a man makes a mistake in war when he is trying to do good, I think our forgiveness should be extended to him. But I cannot recall a single case of the kind.

The Canadians have had great losses. The living are coming home, many of them to find their homes virtually desolate, their business gone, and hardly knowing which way to turn. To them we should offer every encouragement. It should not be our part to seek in any possible way to minimize their employment. They fought for this country, and they did so, not because they expected that Canada was going to get any territory added to its already broad acres, or that it was going to have any wrongs righted; they fought because they were fighting for humanity, and making the future of this country sure, making sure that Canada would never become an adjunct or an appendage to any other country in the world. That is the feeling they had, and that is why they went overseas and sacrificed their lives. To these officers and men the thanks of this House are due, and I hope that the leader of the Government will take the earliest opportunity to have the House pass a unanimous vote of thanks to our army, such as the British nation always does after its army is victorious in a great war.

Attempts are made right and left to set the men against the officers, and I have heard remarks in this House, and read statements in the Canadian press, trying to disparage the officers, and saying that the pensions of the men should be the same as the officers, or that the officers should not get more than the men. In my view there is nothing too good for the men, but you must bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the officers of the Canadian army that went overseas in the first place—it is true their pay has been increased a trifle—on the basis of the same pay as the English officers; in fact their pay was less than that of English officers, while our men received four times the pay of the English private. I do not begrudge our men four times the pay of the English Tommy—they were always willing, if necessary, to do four times the fighting of any other man in the field. But as far as the officers were concerned a lieutenant-colonel, occupying the same position as I occupied, in the British army received a dollar a day more pay than I did. And those young men who led the troops over the top, the bravest of the brave, our subalterns, our lieutenants, what did they get? They did not get enough to maintain their wives on, they did not get as much money, Mr. Speaker, as the armourer corporals in the Canadian Forces got in pay. And still there is talk about the big pay of the officers! I trust that this House will not hear any more talk about the difference in pay or pension between the officers and the men. They all did their duty, and they all did it very well. In peace they will be united.

As far as I am personally concerned, it is not very comfortable or pleasant for me to speak of my own affairs, but I will say this: I am not sorry that I took part in the war, it will always be a pleasure to me, even though I got no honour or glory out of it. You would think to hear some people talk that I had made a million out of the war over there, that I had received a peerage, or title, a V.C., and all that sort of thing. I got nothing, I did not want anything, and I do not want anything. The fact that I have the honour and affection of my men, the fact that the "Original" men of the First Division, last year asked me to lead them in the parade on Yonge street, Toronto, on St. Julien day, does not show there is any great reflection on me. I did not seek glory of any kind; I trust, therefore, that the House has heard the last of that and that no further reference will be made to it.

I want to compliment the member for Skeena (Mr. Peck, V.C.) on being in this House and on having secured meritorious recognition; also the other young men on this side of the House who have fought in the war and have been in the actual zones of combat. I am sorry that more of my old colleagues in the House cannot say that they were in the actual zone of conflict. A great many of them volunteered, put on khaki, raised regiments and took them overseas, and just as they got as far as the front received the same kind of telegram to come home that I got. I do not think that I should have ever got to the field of battle unless by some accident.

Two other members of the House of Commons got to the actual zone of combat. One was Colonel Baker—blessed be his memory. He died in action; no finer man ever wore khaki. I trust that some spot in the new buildings will be found where a monument may be placed to remind future generations of parliamentarians that there were men of red blood in the House of Commons in the days of the Great War.

Then, the member for Ontario, Colonel Sharpe, went to the trenches and would not leave them until his health broke down and he was a complete wreck. He died in Montreal—no wonder, when he spent two years and a half constantly within the sound of the guns, constantly in the midst of that great carnage. It was with great difficulty that he got as far as the front, but he was determined that nothing short of illness or death would take him away, because he, like every other member of this House, knew that if he did come back, he would—having my case in mind—"have it thrown into him" for all time to come by those who had stayed at home. But he has gone to his reward, and I trust that a place will be found to erect some monument to his memory. No finer comrade in arms could any man have than the late Colonel Sharpe.

I would like to say a word about those young men who have given their lives for their country. They died in order that Canada might be a great country, and here a responsibility rests upon members on both sides of the House. The responsibility is upon us of making this country great; of avoiding selfishness; of seeking to further not our own personal interests, but the interests of our country. These men have died gloriously in the cause of the Empire and, as Rudyard Kipling has said, quoting Ecclesiasticus, "Their names and their memories shall live forevermore." They have died in a great cause. It is a matter of deep regret that matters should be brought up which will cause the heart-strings of their parents and relatives at home to be wrung again. I know what that means, because for two days my own family lived in apprehension, having been informed after the battle of St. Julien that I was missing, that I had been killed.

We should not offer these parents condolence, because the young men of Canada died doing their duty. We may offer our consolation. They will always have the feeling that their sons did their duty and that of all the people of Canada they stand nearer to the heart-strings of our country than any others. Many of these people will send sons to this House; many will come to this House who have served in the war. You may rest assured that these men will do good service for their King and country and that Canada will never suffer by them.

I have heard it said that the country is afraid of the returned soldier. Mr. Speaker, people do not understand the returned soldier. References of a disgraceful character have been made in the press to the riots at this town in Wales. I am not surprised at riots if conditions were such as described to me in a letter from a friend. I know what it is to be up to the knees in mud, I know what it is to be without coal and to have to buy coal and coal oil out of my own pocket in order to keep my men warm. I know what it is to have the sleet and rain beating down and to hear the men coughing, their physical resistance breaking down, so that one could not sleep at night. There are several hundred dead Canadians in the Netherhaven cemetery who perished from cold and exposure on Salisbury Plains. These men at Rhyl Camp must have been undergoing the same kind of exposure or they would not have rioted. The riot is to be regretted. I trust that the country will forgive them; the only thing I cannot forgive is the loss of life in connection with those riots. Somebody is responsible for that, and sooner or later, when the proper time comes, unquestionably this House will fix that responsibility.

I have dealt with some personal matters to the satisfaction, I hope, of everybody in the House. I trust that this recrimination will cease. We should all be satisfied that every officer and man of all the forces has done his duty to the best of his ability. Many of our boys gave up their lives in the performance of their duty. There are fathers on both sides of this House who have given sons to the great cause. These boys may have died trying to do the impossible, but it was because we did the impossible that the name of Canada is on the map in connection with this war.

I wish to deal at some length with fiscal questions. It is now ten o'clock, and I would ask the indulgence of the House in permitting me to move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the hon. gentleman desires that the debate should be adjourned, I do not think I should be justified in offering opposition, although the hour is not very late.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

Tuesday, March 18, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

PENSIONS.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Council) presented the first report of the Special Committee on pensions, pension regulations, and all matters pertaining thereto.

On the motion of Mr. Rowell, the report was concurred in.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State for the Colonies to His Excellency the Governor General, of the 25th of February, 1919, transmitting copies of the Convention signed on the 16th of January, 1919, prolonging the armistice with Germany, together with copies of the financial Procotol of the 13th of December, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

PRINCESS PATRICIA CANADIAN LIGHT INFANTRY.

ARRIVAL AT OTTAWA—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF MILITIA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Major General the Hon. S. C. MEWBURN (Minister of Militia): With your permission, Sir, I would like, as a matter of courtesy to the members of this House, to remind them that the Princess Patricia Canadian Light Infantry is expected to arrive in Ottawa to-morrow morning. The regiment will detrain at the Central Station at 10.30 a.m., and, on arrival, will receive an address of welcome from the Mayor, on behalf of the Corporation of the City of Ottawa. They will then proceed by Besserer, Nicholas and Rideau streets to Connaught Square in front of the Chateau Laurier, where a platform is being erected, and it is hoped as many members of the Parliament as possible will be present there. I am sure their presence will be appreciated by the regiment. Tickets are being sent down here this afternoon for Members of the House of Commons and the Senate. A short address will be delivered by His Excellency the Governor General, and the regiment will immediately thereafter move along Sparks street and thence by Bank street to their quarters at Howick Hall.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the Session, resumed from Monday, March 17.

Mr. JOHN A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, yesterday evening when the House so kindly granted my request for adjournment, I stated that it was my intention to-day to deal with the question of the tariff and the economic condition of this country. The great war in which our soldiers have been engaged is over, and this country like every other country, is now confronted with the weighty problem of reconstruction. Very few people, when they speak of reorganization and reconstruction, realize the vital importance of those matters to Canada. Such a war as this was an unheard of thing before. In the whole history of the world, nothing like it had ever before occurred. It has swept away old traditions. It has destroyed old institutions, and many preconceived notions. In fact, all the old ideas of public men and of the people generally have undergone a change. This was brought very strongly to my mind the other day as I listened to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), discussing, in the same old tone, in the same old words, old policies and old matters that do not count at all to-day amidst the vital issues that confront us. His speech reminded me very much of J. M. Barrie's play "the Mollusc," which I had the pleasure of seeing not long ago. As J. M. Barrie's plays always contain a moral, this play contained a moral for the politicians as well as for others. According to the play, a mollusc is a shell-fish that attaches itself to a rock or some other object and that never moves. When I heard the hon. gentleman quoting from the speech of President Wilson about the waves and the tides moving on and sweeping things before them, the idea of the mollusc naturally occurred to me. As a mollusc attaches itself to a rock and never moves from that spot, so, many public men holding certain views, are determined to stick to them; never to change their policies; to carry on consistently forever with the same old politics, living entirely in the past. When I heard him speaking of free trade, and also my good old friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), whom I love to listen to, speaking about free trade, at this present moment, knowing the actual condition of the economic affairs of the world, the idea of the mollusc instinctively occurred to me, and I realize that no wave, even of war, pestilence and famine, will move those people one inch from the same old ideas.

Listening to these speeches, one would think for the moment that the whole world had stood still during the war and was starting on from 1914 as if nothing had occurred in the meantime. What are the facts confronting the people of this country? The whole world is, at the present time, engaged, not in a war of arms, but in an economic war. We find that England has slammed the door shut with embargoes on every country; that the United States has closed its doors and embargoed everything; that France has embargoed the foodstuffs and manufactures of the whole world. In fact, there is, at the present moment, no country discussing or even mentioning the words "free trade" except this country of Canada. These are facts. England will never go back to the former state of affairs, so Lloyd George says. England, at the present time, is in exactly the same position as she was in the time of Cromwell. She has Navigation Laws as she had then and Protection as she had then, and that Protection is even more effective now. You cannot get a dollar's worth of your manufactured goods into England, and England has decided that the manufacturers of Germany, the United States, or any other country, can no longer dump their goods into England to the detriment and injury of the English workingman. Not only is that the condition, but the agricultural situation has entirely changed. We listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Maharg) who, last evening, gave the story of the West—and a very fine story it was. If I did not know the actual conditions I should be very much inclined to agree with his view.

Let us first consider the conditions confronting the agriculturists of this country, and then see whether free trade (or in other words economic destruction) is going to assist them. A significant statement was made in this House a day or so ago by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). He is fully aware of the principle of cabinet responsibility, and therefore his statement that he stood for the total abolition of the tariff on agricultural implements, as he did in 1908-1909, was very significant. The manufacturers and working men of the East are forced to the conclusion that this Government stands on that very ground. What are the conditions affecting the agricultural interests of this country? Mr. Lloyd George in one of his great speeches during the last election—I think it was at Manchester—said that in the year preceding the war Great Britain had raised only twelve weeks' supply of her own food, but that last year she had raised forty-two weeks' supply. That was a significant statement. He further stated that Great Britain would never again be dependent upon the outside world for her foodstuffs as she was before the war, and that legislation already existed and further provision would be made guaranteeing the agriculturists of Great Britain protection and a fair price for their product. Can we, therefore, look for a market in England? Can we look for a market in Europe? Russia has been mentioned. Nobody in his senses would propose to sell anything to Russia at the present moment, because she has repudiated her national debt. In fact, all those countries of Central Europe to which it is intimated we are going to sell vast quantities of cereals are seething with Bolshevism, a doctrine, which is founded on the repudiation of national debts. If we sell anything to those countries, can we be sure that we will receive payment unless Great Britain or one of the other big powers guarantees payment? Conditions the whole world over have changed. Every elevator in this country, through the failure of the Government to put an embargo on foreign wheat, is jam full of American wheat and other grains. The result has been that we have not been able to move our own grain from the West, although the people of this country have provided the money to purchase it. Owing to the Government giving way, as a matter of policy, to the cry in the West for free wheat, we now have free trade in wheat with the United States, so far as our laws and treaties provide. But have we really got free wheat? The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) told us that we could not ship a pound of wheat or cereals now to the United States. How is that, when the treaty provided for reciprocal privileges? The reason is because the United States is protecting its own people. It has a protective policy, just as Great Britain has at the present time, and will have, according to present indications, for many years to come. The policy of France, of Italy, and of every other country except Canada is also a protective policy. We are supposed to have free wheat with the United States, but the door of the United States has been slammed shut on our farmers, and I am satisfied that she will have an embargo against our wheat just as long as free wheat between the two countries is on the programme. But free wheat has not prevented the United States from selling us their wheat. According to the returns for 1918 the United States sold us half a million dollars worth of wheat, while we sold none to them. Last year we sold no cereals to the United States, as was admitted last night, but the United States sold us between seven and eight million dollars worth of corn to be used for human food in this country, and we were forced to eat it as a substitute for our own wheat. The result is that to-day every grocer in this country has his shelves loaded down with corn flour and is unable to sell it. It will mean a great loss to those who have bought these wheat substitutes from the United States. What is the use of treaties and reciprocity which are not observed.

I have read all the authorities on free trade and know my Adam Smith possibly as well as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I also know something of Jean Baptiste Say, who, according to the French-speaking members of this House, was an apostle of Adam Smith. He certainly was the apostle Paul of Adam Smith, because he cleared up many things on which Adam Smith himself was not so clear; Now, according to old economic doctrines preached before the war, a great war such as we have had was impossible. It was said that no great power could live in a condition of war with another great power for more than two or three weeks. Nevertheless the great war came and lasted four years, exploding all the fallacies propounded by Norman Angell and others who talked of peace, and whose work we now know was simply a form of German propaganda intended to render us defenceless so that we could be struck down by not being prepared.

Will any hon. gentleman tell me what country wants free trade at the present moment? Germany to-day has all her factories intact; not a wheel has been hurt, and they are ready now to flood this country with cheap manufactures if free trade is extended to them. Therefore, I ask this House and the people of this country soberly to consider exactly what our situation is. Is it not a fact that those who have the interests of this country at heart and our legislators, who know how delicate the situation is at home in our cities and towns, should unite and forget all this ancient babble about free trade? Is it not in the interests of Canada to ask the Government to initiate a policy of embargoes against every country, so that when the economic conference sits in Paris, as it will immediately after the Peace Conference has concluded its labours, Canada will have at least a jack-knife to trade? To my mind, that is the sensible policy. I am fully conscious how difficult it is for me, a manufacturer, to address a gathering of any kind on any question pertaining to the industries of this country. We all know how unfairly the manufacturers of this country are constantly being attacked. The press of this country is fanning the flame of class hatred, so that the manufacturer appears to be a man full of plans of spoliation of treason, strategem and spoils, whose whole aim and object in life is to destroy society and pocket as much money as possible himself.

To give you an idea of the unfair way in which the manufacturers are attacked, I need refer only to my own case. A few weeks ago I addressed a gathering of Liberal Conservatives in the city of Toronto, and at that time the Toronto Globe was preaching far and wide all over this country that Canada had a forty-two and one-half per cent tariff. Now everybody knows that that is not so. If you turn up the pages of the customs returns, you will find a page devoted there to the percentage of the tariff of this country on goods entered for consumption. You will find, on that page, that the percentage is only 16.7, if I remember rightly, for last year. In view of that fact, why should the Globe talk about 42½ per cent? The Globe for forty years has been menacing the industries of the country constantly, in season and out of season, at a cost to the people of millions of dollars. As the leader of this Government at one time said in the city of Toronto, we are living constantly on suspended sentence. That is the chief reason why Canada has not achieved a success equal to that of the United States. If we had not been going around with one arm tied behind our backs, this country of ours would have a population to-day of at least 25,000,000 or 30,000,000. But this constant agitation, I pointed out, had injured the country. I challenged the accuracy of the Globe statement that the tariff was 42½ per cent. As a matter of fact on the goods consumed in Canada that are subject to tariff the duty amounts to something like 27½ per cent, which includes 7½ per cent war tax. We must bear in mind also, Mr. Speaker—and I would like all hon. members of the House to remember this—that the foreign manufacturer exporting into Canada is allowed, whether rightly or wrongly, to reduce the price of his goods below the regular market price in his own country by 5 per cent; so that this country and the manufacturers of this country lose exactly 5 per cent thereby. Now, take 7½ per cent from 27½ per cent and you have 20 per cent; from that take 5 per cent again, and the total protection that this country really has on the goods that are entered for home consumption is only something like 15 per cent. Surely that is not a very high tariff. I replied to the Globe to that effect. The Globe reported me to the extent of a small paragraph, but came out later with a column and a half of a reply. It began by stating that I was president of, or was connected with, a concern engaged in the manufacture of wire; and said by inference that I was virtually a member of a wire or nail combine. Now, I am connected with the Imperial Steel Company of Collingwood, and for two years we have not manufactured and sold in Canada products to the extent of 20 tons. We went into the foreign market and tried to sell goods where the Germans had sold before—in South Africa, India, Ceylon, Java, and other foreign countries. That concern last year sold goods to foreign countries to the value of over $850,000 worth, and paid out over a quarter of a million in wages in the town of Collingwood. I do not think, therefore, that it owes any apologies to the Globe. Furthermore, the Globe stated that a case had been tried in the courts in which a suit had been brought by a dealer in eastern Ontario against a manufacturer of wire, and that the judge, in giving judgment, said that the goods were sold with the understanding that the jobber who purchased them would maintain the "association" price. Therefore, the judge and the Globe said: "You are a combine; you belong to a combine; an association; you are characterized by the courts as being an illegal combine." Now, if the Globe had gone into the facts, it would have discovered that the "association" price was not an association price of the manufacturers at all, because no combination exists, nor has existed for very many years, among the makers of wire nails or wire, nor has there been any gentleman's agreement. The association price referred to was the price of the jobbers' association, and not of the manufacturers. Nor do I belong to any association that is involved in any combine, for that is a very poor argument to put forward, after all is said and done, as the United States is now discussing the necessity of permitting its manufacturers to form committees of trade to deal with the sale of United States goods in foreign countries. Why should such unfair argument be raised? I challenge the Globe to show that I belong or have belonged to the association which has been referred to, and I make that challenge openly and publicly. I do not belong to the Manufacturers' Association, because if I did I would be challenged on that ground also. Ever since I went into public life I have kept out of the Manufacturers' Association. So that, as far as all these things are concerned, I hope the hon. gentlemen who are listening to me will realize that I am not speaking on behalf of any interest of the kind. I am trying to put the industrial side of this question, for the workmen as well as the manufacturers.

Now, the problem before the people of this country at the present time is the demobilization of the soldiers, and the remobilization of our industries. The question of our taxes, which have been added to enormously through the war, also confronts us. On the question of demobilization I do not quite agree with the programme of the Government. Two years ago I expressed my views in one of the local papers here—I said that the soldiers should be returned by units and that the Headquarters of the units should be established in brigade areas here, and that the men should be allowed to have working furlough, and should be kept under pay for six months or a year after they return. I expressed the opinion that when a man returned he should be given a working furlough so that he might obtain a position, and if he did not like it he could go back and drill for a while, and when he became tired of drilling he could go and get a job again. In that way he would be able to find the position that suited him best and in which he could be most useful, because the men who are discharged are in an unsettled state of mind. They are not in their old frame of mind, and when they get a position they do not always realize how good it is, and after a few weeks it becomes irksome, and they give it up and walk around the streets, acquiring habits of idleness. Now, if it is unavoidable that they should be idle at any time, it would be better for them to spend the interval with their unit, where they would be under discipline for the time being. If such were the case the country would not see the sad spectacle of some of these men peddling shoe-laces. The soldier has had very little out of the war. If he was kept a year in this way he would not be getting as much out of it as the man who stayed at home working on munitions. The question is, what are we to do with the soldiers? A programme of land settlement is proposed. The soldier must go into some industry, either in the manufacturing industry or in the industry of agriculture. A few years ago—not ten years, or even eight years ago—we had millions of acres of idle land in the West. We have Colonization Ministers, and Bureaus of Colonization and all that sort of thing, but strange to say, when the soldier returns and a little piece of land is wanted for him, there is no land left. A programme is proposed, a copy of which I have here, which provides that the soldier can purchase a farm costing up to $5,000, the Government assisting him, and that he can borrow $2,000 more for his house, and farm implements. Then he is expected to begin life as a farmer on a hundred, or hundred and fifty acres of land, with a mortgage of $7,000 tied round his neck. I do not approve of that, Mr. Speaker. I think that the returned soldier who has fought in the war is entitled to just exactly as fair and generous treatment as a soldier who fought in South Africa, or those who fought in the Fenian Raid, and I say that adequate justice must be done these men. They should not be allowed to be the dupes of a lot of real estate dealers. The returned soldier is at the mercy of real estate men, and, indeed, at the mercy of everybody. He never will be able to raise his head above water if you put a debt of that kind upon his shoulders.

We know there are millions of acres of land in the West standing idle. Great corporations control between 22,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of the finest land in the West along the railways that never had a plough in it and never a man settled upon it. It would be much better to take that land over at a fair price and give the returned soldier his land free. Give him assistance, if need be, to help him along; supply him with seed wheat, give him a start and do not allow him to become the victim of the real estate sharks. This country surely is not run by real estate sharks. I never saw them do any good to any country anywhere, much less to Canada.

How about the returned soldier in urban districts? I want to tell this House and this Government that if you are going to start closing the industries, if you are going to adopt the policy of reducing the industrial life of the country, if you are going to deprive the present factories of the small amount of protection that they now have, you are going to take away from the soldier the opportunity of employment. As the conditions are now, there is not a manufacturer in this country who will invest a dollar in any industry. Every dollar they have and the employment of their men is menaced by this movement to wipe out protection and to have free implements, and free this, and free that. That means that the United States will be the country that will be manufacturing those things for us, and the workmen that are at the present time employed in the industries of Canada will have to go to the United States.

In the name of God is that going to give employment to our returned soldiers? Not in this country. That, Sir, is directly the opposite of the view we should take in regard to these matters.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) made use of an argument that is constantly employed against the manufacturers. He said that if he purchased a foreign article on which there was a duty of $2 he would pay that $2 into the treasury of this country. Quite right. But if he purchased an article of Canadian manufacture, the Canadian manufacturer would put the $2 into his pocket. Would the Canadian manufacturer put the $2 in his pocket? Go a little beyond that and see how much of that $2 the Canadian manufacturer would actually put in his pocket. The Canadian manufacturer does not earn five per cent on his turnover. The balance of the $2 would really go into the pockets of the men, women and children who were employed in his factory. And they are doing what? They are eating the products of those men in the West who are so much opposed to them.

Let me put the argument to you in another way. There is one thing that the farmer in the West needs, and that is greater markets. He is not only producing far more in the way of cereals than this country, or the United States, or Great Britain, or any other country, will for the moment need. He needs greater markets. He thought that he was going to get a greater market in the United States. Did he get it? Bang! The Americans shut the door in his face in spite of treaties and everything else. That is just in line with what I and other hon. members on the floor of the House said they would do, when we were discussing the reciprocity question. We said that it did not matter what we did in connection with reciprocity; the very moment the United States got it they would slam the door in our face, while at the same time shoving their goods into our country.

The elevators of this country are filled with United States wheat, and it is the duty of this Government to embargo their wheat and grain unless they want this country flooded with their products at any price in the next two or three months, resulting in the price of our wheat being reduced to forty or fifty cents a bushel. They will be willing to take several million dollars loss on last year's crop, and on this year's crop, if they can get rid of it and control this market. That would stop their farmers coming to Canada.

Suppose I were a farmer in the West, and I bought a tractor in Canada and paid a dollar or so more for it because it was a Canadian product—is there not such a thing as nationalism, as love of country? Has all that feeling been taken out of our breasts entirely? I know too much to believe that. But, supposing you do buy an American tractor—every pound of the food that the men who built that tractor in the United States consume is supplied by the growers of American products and you do not supply anything in exchange for the money that you have paid for that tractor. But if you built that tractor in Canada, every dollar that went into its manufacture would go to the men here who were providing a greater market for the men in the West, by consuming their wheat and beef in Canada and God knows we want greater markets.

We want to help the West. The East has never tried, and never will try to injure the West, even in spite of all those new trenches and wire entanglements that they are setting up, and all their threats about what is going to happen to us in the East. We are men of red blood, we are the fathers and brothers of the men who carried Vimy Ridge, took Cambrai, and destroyed the finest units in the German army. You cannot scare us. We never get scared.

My hon. friend the Minister of Colonization and Immigration (Mr. Calder) said that the greatest danger in this country was the politician who was appealing to the soldier. I say that the man who is the most dangerous to the people of this country is the man who is preaching class hatred. The press of the West, with very few exceptions, have been preaching class hatred against the East for a number of years. They have been constantly threatening us and calling upon their people to unite against the East.

What has the East done to the West? The time came when not a pound of western grain could be sent to Europe. Great Britain, with all her boasted resources, had no money to buy grain or flour two years ago. We have heard a great deal about what free trade has done for Great Britain, but free trade had not increased English industry during the twenty years before the war one-quarter as much as protection had increased the industry of Germany, France and other countries. Great Britain was without any money; she was at the end of her resources and the western crop could not be moved. Where was the West to get its wider markets then? There was no money in Europe to purchase grain. The United States slammed its doors tight. In that situation, did the people of this country stand idly by and do nothing to help? The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) asked the people of Canada to buy Victory bonds in order that the crop should be moved from the West and in order that we might provide Great Britain with the credit that was necessary for the movement of that crop. Was there any demur from the people of the East? They went down in their pockets and bought Victory bonds. The men in the factories that the western people want to close up bought Victory bonds. The little girls working in the factories in the east went without winter clothing to buy bonds in order that the people of England might have food, and that the people of the West might get good prices for their wheat. Is it becoming of the West to come down here, threaten these people and say: We want to close up this factory and that factory because they want ten or fifteen per cent protection; we will send the people employed in those factories over to the United States? We want to buy foreign goods, not Canadian made goods.

And I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that as a matter of fact within the next year the people of this country will have to go down into their pockets to buy another crop in the West. Now would it be well for any manufacturer in the East to go round saying to our workingmen, "I would boycott the West, I would not buy any western flour or any western oatmeal, I would not buy Victory bonds to pay for their wheat or do anything of that kind because those people in the West want to close our factories?" That is exactly the kind of class hatred that some of these men in the West are preaching against the East, though there are hon. gentlemen in this House, representing the Grain Growers' in the West, who are big enough and broad-minded enough not to take that stand. But it is exceedingly difficult for them to do so: they are bombarded night and day by telegrams from a lot of men in the West, headed by a man named Wood, who is known to be an avowed annexationist.

An hon. MEMBER: I ask the hon. gentleman to prove his statement in regard to Mr. Wood?

Mr. CURRIE: It is well known that Mr. Wood and his crowd are the people who have been raising such a row because the Germans in the West lost their votes. We have had hon. gentlemen talk in that way here. The German schools in the West, and the Germanizing of the West rests at their door. They are responsible. We know exactly where all this clamour comes from, and we know there is a small clique of these men in the West, so-called leaders of the farmers, there, who are trying to induce them to form Soviets, and councils of agriculture, and this, that, and the other thing which will have the effect of destroying industry and dividing this country. Now I do not pretend, and I do not wish to be so understood to be preaching class hatred of any kind. We have had a little bit of that class, of race hatred between Quebec and Ontario, and nothing has come of it, only perhaps a broken head or two; but the kind of class hatred to which I am alluding touches the life of everybody—it touches the pocket and the employment of all. It is going to tear this country to pieces and destroy its industries—that is exactly what is going to happen. Let me ask hon. gentlemen a question—and I would like them, and the people of this country to ponder well over it—how are you going to get additional employment for the returned soldier in factories if you are going to close those factories? I cannot see how it is going to be done; and to my mind it is disgraceful that there can be found in this Dominion people going about the country preaching class hatred of that kind. I know exactly what I am talking about. Up in my riding a year ago there was a gathering of farmers, and they sent for me to come and direct them. We were taking council together to find out how they could best increase production for that particular township for the coming year to help in the war. I went there and we had the finest meeting possible. Talk about a class meeting, or a religious meeting—there was nothing at all of the kind that could equal it. When the meeting was over and the assembled farmers had decided that they were going to add five or ten acres of wheat each, so many cattle and hogs, and what they were going to do to make up for the boys that were away (they were going to help one another and exchange their labour with each other and do all the good they could) about half past nine a man came in with a grip under his arm and asked if he could be allowed to talk. We said "yes" we were quite willing, and he got up and started in preaching this Bolshevism. First, he wanted to destroy the commercial travellers because he said they were eating up $500,000,000 a year of the money of this country. Then the lawyers came in for criticism. They were the worst of the lot, they were parasites, the names he called them were something awful. Then he started after the other professions and the manufacturers, and the legislators, and it was only a tirade and torrent of abuse. He had been going along in this way for about half an hour when a farmer rose and objected. He said to me, "Are we going to listen to all this nonsense? Where does this man come from? Is he a pro-German?" I said, "I do not know." Then the farmer asked the man himself, "Where do you come from?" The man replied that he came from some place in western Ontario. The farmer then said to him, "How do you come to be here preaching this kind of stuff to us, who pays you for coming here?" The man's reply was, "The United Farmers of Alberta sent down a thousand dollars to carry on this propaganda." There is the whole story. Then a farmer said, "You are not preaching Canadian propaganda—you are a disloyal subject and a pro-German," and four or five of the audience made a rush for him and he had to get out of the meeting. That is the kind of propaganda that is being carried on all over the country, and we might as well face the issue now squarely and fairly, we might as well look it fairly in the face and ask ourselves the question, "Are we going to be subjected constantly to these class hatred programmes, or are we going to listen to such trash for the moment in the presence of our dead, or going to try and build Canada into a great country and be a united people.

Now let us look at the question from another aspect. I saw this programme of the Council of Agriculture. It was very nicely and skilfully drawn up, and a man in my riding, a farmer, said to me, "Did you read that platform?" I said, "Yes, I did." "Well, you know," he said, "it reminds me of the dress my old lady wears in the summer." I inquired, "What is that?" He said, "It is a Mother Hubbard." I inquired, "Why is it like a Mother Hubbard dress?" "Because," he said, "it covers everything." This programme covers everything. There are only two things left out of it that I can discover, the Ouija Board and the Twentieth Plane, nothing else. Very well, let us examine it. What are the tariff proposals? I have dealt with those and I have told the House plainly that if you are going to remove the protection that we have we shall be destroyed industrially. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) put a very pertinent question, and placed his finger on the sore spot when he asked, "Why cannot Canada compete?" That is the whole thing. I say that in the markets of the world we have had to go out and seek business in competition with the Americans during the last few years. In one export business the manufacture of wire, Canadian manufacturers have increased the business from nothing to $9,000,000 last year in competition with the United States and foreign countries. Why can we not compete at home? That is the question. The reason that we cannot compete is because the United States will not allow us a free exchange with them. If we had a free exchange of commodities, of all kinds of manufactured products, with the United States, there is not a manufacturer in the Dominion but would be willing to compete and be very glad to do so. But what has occurred? They never allow us to compete on fair terms. As a matter of fact a great many of the leading manufacturers in Canada to-day have within the last three or four years built factories in the United States, so that when their line of business is wiped out by the western propaganda they can take their workmen over there and find them employment. The United States will welcome them, and protect them with a high tariff. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that fair to our working men? Is that building up this country? Can we compete under such circumstances? Is there any line of business that we can compete in? Can the grain growers in the West compete with United States at the present moment in the article of wheat?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. CURRIE: See where you are at the present moment.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no doubt we can compete.

Mr. CURRIE: You will know inside of six months whether you can compete or not. You know that to-day you cannot compete to the extent of a bushel of wheat in the foreign markets against American wheat.

An hon. MEMBER: We are willing to try.

Mr. CURRIE: Unless, as an hon. member said last night, the Government fixes a price for you in your local market you cannot compete and you have to submit to a loss on the wheat you export for the Americans are going to take a big loss which their government will pay. Who will pay your loss?

An hon. MEMBER: What about seed?

Mr. CURRIE: I do not say anything about that. We bought seed for the West and I was very pleased to support that proposal in Parliament. That is one of the greatest examples of the benefits of a national policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CURRIE: Wait a moment until I get through. I say that was one of the greatest examples of the benefits of the national policy that I have yet seen, when we bought that seed wheat for the West and especially for Saskatchewan. We bought that wheat and gave it to the farmers, and inside of a year or two it resulted in the addition of over a million bushels yearly to the crop of this country. That was national protection. Now, suppose we had adopted the policy of "do nothing" which these gentlemen teach; what would have happened then to the West? I am quite in agreement with the hon. member for Maple Creek when he says that we should fix a price for the wheat of the West. That is in line with the National Policy.

Mr. MAHARG: May I make a correction? The hon. gentleman has made the straight assertion that I asked this Government to fix the price of wheat.

Mr. CURRIE: No, I am wrong there. The grain growers of the hon. gentleman's province asked that, and I will support my hon. friend in this House on that proposal if he will be a good National Policy man and go in for protection. You cannot blow hot and cold in this matter. You cannot get all your manufactured goods free and then ask the rest of the country to fix a price for your products. That is impossible. We should stand together on all these questions. Having regard to the tremendous production of cereals in the United States, it is a question whether we should go in for cereals as strongly this year as we might.

The hon. gentleman painted a lurid picture last night of what was to happen to the farmers of his province. He said that the farmers of a community of 100,000 received only something like $70,000,000, or $700 each, from the sale of their exported grain. But only a few days ago the Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan was telling the assembled farmers there that that province had marketed over $370,000,000 worth of farm products and that the average income from this source of every farmer in the province was over $3,700. Now, who are we to believe? I believe that the people there are not so badly off. I am inclined to accept Mr. Dunning's statement in preference to that of the member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), although I have great regard for that hon. gentleman. I think, however, that in the statement which the hon. member for Maple Creek made, he had reference only to wheat, not to other cereals.

Now, I have given you a picture of what is going to happen. You may say: "What are you going to do about it?" I am going to point out the actual facts of the case. I am going to ask hon. members of this House to forget all this class talk, to remember there are two sides to every question. I sat at the feet of Macdonald and Tupper and other great statesmen. I listened to their arguments, and I became a firm protectionist. I made up my mind that protection does not mean high tariff. It means the assisting of every person in this country when he is in need; it means an effort to build up our country and make it greater to give it a place in the sun. It is not a question of high taxation or low taxation. I am going to deal with the matter of taxes in a few minutes. But let me ask this: Is there anything in the policy of this Council of Agriculture, when you examine it from end to end, which can convince you that the community which adopted that platform has shown any desire to assist in paying the taxes which have been brought about by the great war? The figures will be here in a few days, and I am satisfied that it will then be shown that the people of Toronto are paying more income tax—a form of taxation which all the western members are strongly in favour of—into the Dominion treasury than all the Prairie Provinces are paying. The member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) laughs. He is taking great consolation to himself because the Governments of the United States and of Canada have adopted the income tax. But income tax is only a form of taxation whereby a government raises revenue for its purposes. Various methods of taxation were employed before the income tax was adopted. In South Africa they have a hut tax; a man pays so much on his hut. In England the tax on window-glass was abolished years ago; people did not dare put window-glass in their houses without being taxed for doing so. Then, there were taxes on the wheels of the carts, so that it was found advisable to have carts with two wheels instead of four. Previous to the war Great Britain did not raise the bulk of its taxation by an income tax. Income tax did not amount to fifty per cent of the taxes raised by Great Britain. She now has a large income tax because there was no other way in which the money of the wealthy people could be got at. The leader of this Government was not careful in his provision for an income tax on the people of this country; he did not distinguish between the people who earn their income by personal exertion and those who derive their income from estates that have been left to them or investments. That distinction is made in Great Britain. For instance, a lawyer like the Minister of Public Works (Hon. F. B. Carvell) has, we will say, an income of $6,000 or $7,000; he is taxed on a certain amount of that, while a farmer alongside of him whose income is the same, if not larger, escapes the income tax entirely by saying: "My income is in the nature of wages; I have worked hard with my hands for my income. What I have spent on my family should be deducted and therefore I do not have to pay any taxes." This man is let off, while the hon. member is taxed. That is not fair.

The income tax is very unjust in many ways. Income tax is a field which is or should be reserved entirely for municipalities. In Toronto I pay an income tax of 3½ per cent on the little salary which I get —"indemnity," we call it—from the House of Commons; and other members from Toronto do the same. Then we have to turn around and pay an added tax to the Dominion Government on that same amount. In adopting the system of income tax, the Dominion Government, rightly or wrongly, entered a sphere of taxation which had been reserved for the municipalities. Having done that, it must now go further into it and get after the land sooner or later; then where will our friends the agriculturists come in? The platform of the Council of Agriculture states that tnere should be a tax on land that is not used. Well, go ahead and do that, and in a few years there will be no land that is not used; then where will you get your taxes? The next step will then be the placing of a tax on the farm. After the great Napoleonic War there was a land tax in England of eight shillings on every acre of farm land. Considering the direct tax you would have to put on the farmers of this country if you abolish custom duties, as compared with that imposed upon other classes, two dollars an acre would be a fair amount to impose on farm lands. Every farmer in this country would, therefore, if you are going to adopt the system of directly taxing their property, have to pay two dollars an acre as his share of that taxation. What Government would carry out that idea and live? If you are going to wipe out the industries that are now supplying $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 of this taxation by taxing their output, where will you then go to get your money? The declarations of the Council of Agriculture are revolutionary; they include many of the platforms of the Soviets. If you put the tax all on one thing and thus wipe out that thing altogether, then, of course you wipe out the taxation. How can you get an income out of the factory in the East if you take steps which cause the factory to be closed and it has moved to the United States?

I warn every man, woman and child in this country who earns his living by industry to beware of agitations of this kind. I ask every man, woman or child who owns a Victory Bond: What is going to be its value if this policy is carried out? If the leader of the Government intends to adopt this policy of cutting down protection, to whom is he going to appeal when he again wants to sell Victory Bonds? What will be the result of such a policy? Can he sell his bonds to the Council of Agriculture? This country has only a small population. It comprises a number of provinces and those provinces have many divergent interests. Let me briefly sketch the condition of affairs in each province, and then let me ask the people of those provinces whether they are prepared to adopt an agrarian policy as against an industrial policy?

Let me first consider that province down by the sea which is represented by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie). He could tell me that at the present time hundreds of workingmen are walking the streets of the towns of that province, waiting to see what the action of the Government is going to be in the matter of protection of industries. At the present moment in Canada, all industry is paralysed, standing still. Gentlemen will have to excuse me for using such strong language, because I am not accustomed to doing so; but I am a good patriot—at least I hope so; indeed, I hope we are all good patriots—and when some one introduces such an anti-national policy at such a critical time, it is like a bugler sounding the retreat to our army when the Germans are upon them. That is the position we are in. In my hon. friend's province down by the sea there is a vast quantity of coal; but owing to the policy that has been adopted of taking away the ships from this country and using them elsewhere, the coal industry of Nova Scotia has languished, and instead of Canada supplying South America, Central America and part of Europe with coal, as she could have done if we had been allowed to use our own ships, our ships are taken away from us, no effort is made to replace them, and the collieries are virtually idle. The coal industry and the steel industry of Nova Scotia are great industries and the steel industry will, if it is properly developed, be one of the greatest industries in the world. It is far greater than that of Germany because Germany has lost her iron fields, whereas Canada has her iron and her coal fields there. What can a policy of agriculture to offer to the province of Nova Scotia? It means that if you remove the taxes, the manufacture of agricultural and other implements will fall into the hands of United States manufacturers and there will be less iron and coal needed from Nova Scotia. The result will be that many of those brave Nova Scotians—and in Nova Scotia is to be found the finest class of industrial people on the continent—will start the same old exodus of twenty years ago into the New England States. It is these people who went into these States in the old days who have made their industries what they are. At the present time, if you go into one of the manufacturing concerns in the New England States and ask to see the skilled mechanic, who is running the plant, the master-mechanic, the man who does the designing, you will find what? That he is a Nova Scotian. Recently, I had occasion to go to Pittsburg to consult one of the greatest metallurgists in the world. After we had talked for a while, he said: "You will be surprised to know that I am a Scotch Canadian." I said: "Are you?" "Yes," he said, "my father moved to the New England States when I was a small boy, and I was born in Nova Scotia." Nova Scotia has never had a proper opportunity; it has never had a tin roof put on its industries. Some people, even amongst Nova Scotians, are continually preaching against the industries of that province. What has Nova Scotia to expect out of grain farming? Nothing at all. The country is, to a certain extent, rough, and is not adapted to agriculture; it would barely feed its own population. Nevertheless, Nova Scotia, with all its wealth of coal and iron, can easily sustain an industrial population of 20 000,000. Its coal and iron is on the sea-board, where it should compete with the world.

Let me come now to New Brunswick, and we find similar conditions in its forests and mines. Nothing is being done to develop its fisheries, although there are great fisheries there. If this country had taken the proper stand, so far as the fisheries of that province are concerned, it would have provided cold storage facilities, so that the fisheries of New Brunswick—and the same may be said of Nova Scotia—would have been supplying frozen fish to Europe in competition with the whole world. But they cannot compete. Why? Because they have not the money to provide themselves with the necessary transportation to put their products on the markets of the world. Assistance from the Government is necessary, and a national policy is a policy that would provide them with ships and cold storage and would see that their fish were put on the markets of the world.

In Quebec there are great water-powers, vast iron fields, great forests and large industries. The finest workers to be found in Canada are from Quebec. The people of Quebec are an industrial people, and there is no reason why, with her cheap power, Quebec should not be the Manchester of the whole of North America. In textiles, in manufactures that require power and skilled workmen, she has made tremendous strides. Does the man or woman who works in a factory in Quebec want to have that factory closed? The manufacturers can always, in some way or another, escape disaster; he will cash in, and move to the United States, but the workingman, when the factory is closed, cannot cash in. He has to give up his house, losing what he invested in it. He will have to leave his own parish, losing everything, and go to the United States in order to carry on business there. For many years, while we were fighting for industries in this country, many of the people of Quebec were unfortunately compelled to go to foreign factories in order to earn a livelihood. When the National Policy was endorsed by that great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose seat is now vacant, when he refused to destroy the industries of the country at the behest of some of his followers—and he was a greater protectionist than many so-called protectionists, because they did not practise what they preached—his province began to develop its industries on a greater scale, the workers came back and emigration ceased. These people did great service in this war in manufacturing munitions. If Quebec had not an industrial population it could not do that. If it had not cheap power it could not do that. It has all that is necessary to make a country great industrially. Is there anything for Quebec in a policy that destroys the factory and fosters nothing but agriculture; that wipes out all those great factories and turns them into turnip fields?

I was almost forgetting that little green island called Prince Edward, down by the sea. It is an agricultural island, but still it is a model of thrift, and its cities and towns are gradually acquiring factories. It has a good, sound, well educated population. It is like Denmark. Denmark has no coal and it is the greatest agricultural country in the world, but still one-third of the population of Denmark is an industrial population, employed in factories.

Let us see what resources Ontario possesses. Ontario and Quebec have the cheapest power in the world. This war has taught us at least one thing, and that is this: Coal is power, water is power. Power is everything. The country that has the cheapest power is the country that is going to dominate the industries of the world, if that country is given the opportunity. Coal will never be a dollar a ton again. I used to buy lots of coal for a dollar a ton, but you cannot buy it at any such figure in the United States now. Coal will never go back to a dollar a ton again, unless, perhaps, in Alberta. We have power in Ontario and power in Quebec. We can harness that power on to the belt of a machine at a price equal to a dollar a ton coal. When we do that we can compete with the world, but we cannot compete with the United States in the way its goods are sold in this country. Let me point out one way in which they have, to my personal knowledge, competed with Canadian manufacturers, and I will ask you if such a course is fair. The Globe, in its discussion of the wire industry, stated that a large quantity of wire products had been sold by the United States in western Canada last year. That is true. How does it happen that while we are sending thousands of tons of wire products out of this country in competition with the United States, the United States can compete with us in the home markets? On that class of goods the tariff is very small. This is the method the United States' manufacturers adopt: During the whole period of the war the base price of nails in Pittsburg was about $3.50 per hundred pounds. That was the price quoted on your order. If you were an American and went to Pittsburg for a car of nails they would say: "The ordered price is $3.50 per hundred weight in car lots." I might say that I wanted a carload of nails to sell in Indiana. They would ask me when I wanted the nails. I might say: "Next week, because there are a lot of farmers there wanting to build farm houses." They would reply, "Very sorry, we will book your order, but we cannot guarantee to deliver until after the war." Then you would be stumped and would have to buy "spot" nails. The price of "spot" nails ranged from $5.00 to $5.50; that was the export price to all foreign countries except Canada. The conditions were then, that if you were an American and wanted nails for immediate delivery, you had to pay $5.50, but if you were a Canadian you could have the nails delivered next week at $3.50, the ordered price, because they want to put Canadian industries out of business. The Canadian manufacturers sold nine million dollars worth of wire products in competition with American manufacturers in the markets of the world last year, and at the same time the Americans took our market here. They are doing exactly the same thing with wheat, by putting an embargo on it. That is their policy every time—to drive our industries out of business—and they have no more mercy on a Canadian farmer than for any other Canadian manufacturer; and the farmer is the biggest manufacturer Canada has.

We now come to consider the province of Ontario from an industrial standpoint. We have the largest amount of developed water-power, and we have a thrifty population. Toronto is a great city. Some people call it "Hogtown," but its heart beats true to the people and industries of this country, no matter where they are located. It has just as soft a spot in its heart for the men of the West as for any other people in the world. Why, most of the people now living in the West originally came from Ontario. Manitoba is peopled almost entirely by people from this province, and I know the heart of the West responds to the heartbeats of Ontario. Ontario's policy is to build up everything in this country, so that one day Canada will have her place in the sun with other nations. The province is rich in iron. It has no coal, except white coal, but where in the world can you find more silver than in Ontario, where can you find gold mines greater or better developed than in our province? The Hollinger mine is the greatest gold mine in the world.

I want to tell the House something about the iron mines of Ontario. We have great fields of iron which have never been touched, but there is not a workable area of iron ore in the province an acre in extent that has not been staked out and owned by the alien. In the United States millions of dollars are invested in the iron business; there is more money involved in that business than the value of the whole resources of Canada. These corporations are not interested in opening up iron mines in Ontario. To show how they operate, there are great deposits of iron in Minnesota. A new range had recently been discovered known as the Cayuna range. Some poor men owned that range at first, but later an option was taken on the property by a great iron corporation in the United States, which put in two years diamond drilling on the range. When they got through they said to the owners: "We are very sorry, but we cannot exercise our option as there is no ore there." That is the kind of stunner the people of Canada get who are interested in iron areas, after they are examined by American corporations, unless the property should be of proved value, when it might be taken over and shut down. As it happened, there were men of money on that Cayuna Range and they, the owners, proceeded to develop it with their own money, and last year the range turned out to be one of the great iron areas of the United States. That shows that the iron corporation which had an option on the property was only interested in keeping the iron out of the market. That is what these people would do with the iron deposits of Ontario, just to keep the iron out of our markets. I hope that fresh discoveries of iron will be made in the province of Ontario and, as a good National Policy man, I trust the Government will do something to assist the iron mining industry of this country, and then the province of Ontario will take its rightful place as a great producer if iron.

The province of Manitoba is a great grain-growing country. The farmers of that province have become wealthy and have decided to make their homes there. They have beautiful farms, and houses like the chateaux of France. The city of Winnipeg has cheaper power than almost any city in the world and is destined to be one of our greatest manufacturing cities—greater even than St. Paul or St. Louis. I do not know whether I shall live to see that day, but it will undoubtedly come if the Government adopts the policy I should like to see adopted, because Winnipeg has cheaper power, an active population, and other advantages. The northern part of Manitoba contains untold mineral wealth. In that district is the Mandy mine, one of the greatest copper mines in the world. Rich gold and nickel mines have also been discovered in this province. What is this country doing to assist in the development of those mines? Nothing. I am not one of those who want to see public money thrown away at the present juncture, but I would say that it is the duty of the Government, in the case of mines that have been proved to contain forty to fifty million dollars worth of ore, to build railways to bring out the products of the mines. The late J. J. Hill used to say that one good copper mine in the West was better than a whole wheat county. I do not know whether that is true or not, but if what the best experts in the world say of the mines of northern Manitoba is true we have a wonderful source of wealth there, which will mean a great future for the province of Manitoba and the country as a whole. I hope to see the day when the province of Manitoba will march along with Ontario. Hon. members may be surprised to know that in the particular business in which I am engaged we can buy manufactured goods from the city of Winnipeg and bring them down to Ontario cheaper than we can get those goods from our local mills. We ship our product in jute bags, and we bought those bags in the city of Winnipeg cheaper than we could have got them in Ontario or the East. Our staves we buy from New Brunswick. This goes to show that the industries of this country are closely interlinked together and that there is no inter-provincial divisions. We must all realize that, and not be small and narrow and provincial.

I now come to the province of Saskatchewan. One of the things the people of that province want is the abolition of the duty on cement. Now if there is one business that the West is succeeding in, it is the manufacture of cement. Ontario no longer makes any cement for the West. All the cement the West uses, and it uses a great deal, is manufactured in the West. Saskatchewan has rich fields of clay for cement, and great areas of cheap coal to burn that cement, and is destined to be one of the great cement producing districts in the world.

There is another point. Can any hon. member tell me of any industry involving manual labour and the use of power that has been established in this country without the help of a protective tariff? We all know, if we read the history of the United States aright, that the greatest industry in that country is cotton, and that the cotton industry was not firmly established in the United States for many years until after a stout protective tariff was put on cotton so as to give their own cotton growers a chance against East Indian cotton. Can anybody point to one single industry established in Canada that has not been protected? In Saskatchewan there are great areas of natural gas and coal, and areas of oil that undoubtedly have not yet been discovered in that great province, which I believe will be one of the greatest manufacturing provinces in the Confederation. There are also great mineral resources, such as asphaltum, in the northern parts of that territory. We have been establishing councils of research to see what industries we can establish. Permit me, Sir, to point out one industry which we could establish by a national policy. There is no duty on pottery coming into Canada. We have no potteries. Consider the millions of dollars worth of china that is brought into Canada, yet, strange to say, the china clay, feldspar and all the materials that go to make pottery in the United States are imported into the United States from Canada, and all the cups and saucers and chinaware used there are manufactured from Canadian materials. Why should we let ourselves be robbed of our natural resources in that way? Why should the pottery industry not be established in Canada? I understand there are great deposits of china clay in Saskatchewan. Now, why should not thousands of soldiers who are engaged in potteries in England not be brought to these provinces so that a great industry might be established in this country? There are also vast areas of glass sand in Canada. We had a small glass industry in Canada, but whisky bottles were all that we made, because that was the only line protected. Window glass to the value of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 a year,—and up to even $15,000,000 is used in Canada. But we have no window glass industry in this country because there has been no duty on window glass, and you cannot establish an industry under such circumstances. One half of the wire industry of this country is without protection, and if this Government would place a proper protective tariff on it I am confident in saying that a whole division of returned soldiers could be absorbed in that industry alone. We have not these industries simply because there is no duty. There is no better glass sand than is to be found in the West, and we should be making all the glass windows that are needed for our stores, and for the stores of the Empire, and I believe we could secure the trade of Australia and foreign countries if we had such an industry here. But all the people of Saskatchewan do not approve of this agitation and class hatred, and they are looking forward to the day when Saskatoon and Regina and all those fine cities there will see the wheels of industry running, and every village will have its factories. There is no reason why this should not be so, and why the western farmer should not take his automobile in the evening and go into town and meet his boy and girl at the factory and go to the movies. That would be the proper condition in this country, but you cannot live miles from civilization and make yourself believe that that is right. Why, Mr. Speaker, if I were to believe the doctrine that is being preached by alleged representatives of agriculture, I would not think of advising returned soldiers or any body else to go into farming, for they would be nothing more nor less than slaves. You cannot preach that doctrine to the farmer, because he knows better. The farmers of Ontario are thrifty, having in their houses all the modern conveniences of the city home. They are becoming wealthy land-owners, and have all their money in the Ontario factories; and that is why they voted against reciprocity.

If we took the tariff off and reverted to free trade and that policy came before the people of this country again they would reject it. Now, as regards Alberta, the German Empire has 4.5 per cent of the coal of the world. Alberta has 12½ per cent. Canada has 17½ per cent of the coal of the world, and yet Germany built an Empire on 4½ per cent. Now, if we are really Canadians we will not do one single act in this House or elsewhere that would tend to delay the day when Canada will take her proper place as the greatest manufacturing country in the world, with all the resources we have. I have never seen iron in Michigan or Minnesota to equal that of Alberta. There is in that province everything that goes to make a country great. It possesses the elements to make it the greatest steel and iron producing section of the whole of North America. "That is all right, Colonel," you say, "but why not let all the coal fields there be used to grow wheat? Never mind about the coal." Well, when I was a young man, twenty-five years ago, I was in Colorado. In that state it was all gold mining, Cripple creek was booming and any one who mentioned the iron industry would be run out. The idea of Colorado competing with Pittsburg in the iron or steel business was considered absurd. But what has happened? To-day Colorado has forgotten about Cripple creek and although it is far away in the Western States it has an iron and steel industry that produces great wealth, and is of considerable importance, and will compare with any steel and iron centre in the world. At that time no mention could ever be made of iron. I hope to see the day —if this country adopts a proper system of protection, when the province of Alberta will put Pittsburg and all those iron regions in the United States in the shade. Its coal resources are far greater than Pennsylvania ever dreamed of, it has iron and gas, and all it needs is a policy of protection to encourage investment there, and the building of railroads to connect the iron with the coal fields, and the coal fields and iron fields with the natural gas resources, and Alberta will have a greater iron industry than the world has ever seen. Yet the farmers of Alberta, headed by a man named Wood, want all the industries of the East destroyed, and would discourage the eastern man who would like to go to develop these resources from going West and investing his dollar there. Has Alberta after all staked its all in agriculture? Has Saskatchewan staked its all in agriculture? Agriculture is only one of the dozen eggs they have in the basket. And Manitoba? Well, it does not follow the programme of the agriculturalists when it comes to voting. And let me turn to ask the province by the sea in the west, British Columbia, with its great areas of coal and iron, and its water-powers beyond the comprehensions of the world. No country in the world has such great hidden wealth as British Columbia. It has a great wealth of minerals, a great wealth of coal, and enormous forest wealth, it is capable of producing tremendous quantities of paper.

As to fisheries, no country can equal it. Well, British Columbia is British Columbia and after all British Columbia is not the "West" British Columbia is the place where the east and west meet. If we are going to have foreign trade one of the great channels of the country through which that trade will pass will be British Columbia. Our greatest field for foreign trade is the Orient, and Australasia.

Now, you may ask me: What do you suggest doing? That is the question. If I had the doing, I would immediately place an embargo upon the grain and manufactured products of every other country. Talk about the handling of grain! Those men who talk about grain-growing in the West, those men who control the grain of the West, allow a small coterie of Americans to get in ahead of them and to fill our terminal elevators with grain while they have their grain still in the granaries. It is absurd. The time has come when no alien should be allowed to own any of the granaries or transportation resources of this country. I do not care who he may be, or how friendly he may be. They have now blocked all our elevators with their grain. If the agriculturists of the West had devoted as much of their time to looking after their own interests as far as the elevators are concerned as after the affairs of the eastern manufacturers they would not have allowed their elevators to be stuffed with American grain while their own wheat is still in the fields and granaries.

The hon. member for Maple Creek made reference to the late lamented leader of the Liberal party, and he said that he was the man who first brought the elevators in the West to time. The western elevators are not brought to time. I have in my pocket a report on these western elevators which I might read, but I have no desire to extend my remarks. There are men in this House who are interested in these terminal elevators. Mr. Speaker, will you be surprised when I tell you that last year the overage—that is the amount of grain that was illegally taken from the farmers in the West by the elevators amounted to over $2,000,000. Has there been any kick? Or any row raised about that with the elevators?—No. Why? The Grain Growers own elevators and I understand the earnings of that company last year were 44½ per cent. There is no manufacturing industry in the East that can compare with that, not even Sir Joseph Flavelle's. Let us take the mote out of our own eye before we remove the beam from any body else's.

What would I do? The situation is very grave. Let us drop all this trade controversy for the moment. Let us assist the Government and back it up. Let us insist upon the adoption of a policy of embargo similar to that which every other country has adopted so that when we go into treaty making we will have a jack knife in a trade we will have a jimmy that will force some of our products into the markets of those countries. This is the way to provide foreign markets for our products.

There is only one way to get those foreign markets and that is by providing proper transportation at sea. There has been a great deal of talk about this Government giving contracts for building ships but that is the wisest thing the Government ever did and there is not a ship building on our stocks to-day that could not be sold tomorrow for a great deal more money than it is costing us to Japan or some other nation. That is a fact that everybody in the business knows. Those ships should be put on those lines of transportation, not between Canada and broken down European countries which have been devastated by the war but between Canada, South and Central America, South Africa, India, China, Japan, Australia and New Zealand. What did the export of our manufactured goods last year amount to outside of munitions? It amounted to over half a billion dollars, principally to these countries. If this Government provided lines of transportation so that goods can be transported from Canadian factories to the markets of the world at less than they can be carried from the factories of Germany, France or the United States, we can get the market. We will get them. It will not matter then so much if the Americans come in and sell their stuff here; we can carry on and Canada will become a great manufacturing country and its products will find a market all over the world. The American manufacturers want a market at their door. They are afraid to go abroad in search of markets. It is only the big companies there that seek the foreign markets. The manufacturer in Canada has sought a market for his goods abroad; he has more courage than any other man in the world. When they were asked to make shells the Canadian manufacturers supplied their own money and financed themselves whereas in every other country the manufacturers were financed by the government. If you provide the Canadian manufacturer with transportation they will get the business. You would imagine from listening to those who are trying to stir up class hatred that the Canadian manufacturer is a terrible man. The manufacturer has a heart like any other man. He has a wife and family, he tries to do good in the community. He sometimes goes to church on Sunday. He is not such an awful man as he is pictured. When it comes to the question of patriotism the manufacturer takes no back seat to any grain-grower or any other person in the community. He has given a great deal to the war. What did the manufacturer do when he was asked to make munitions? In England they gave the manufacturer the money with which to put in his machinery and to finance the payment of his workmen. In this country the manufacturer had to go down on his knees and dig and shovel for himself. He did that and he made munitions cheaper than in any other country in the world. Did he not play his part in this war? You would think that it was not the man fighting in the trenches who won the war but that it was somebody away back on a farm or little village who talked politics. It makes me tired to hear such nonsense as that. Let us take a big view of this question. The manufacturer has done his share. He only asks what is fair and square. He does not want the country to adopt a policy that is going to drive his workmen out of his factory and into a foreign country. Nor, does he want to be driven out of the country himself. He wants to be considered a Canadian. His profits have not been as great as those of any other class of the community. I mentioned that the grain growers' profits were 44½ per cent. I do not believe that any of these manufacturers have ever made such a profit as that. Let us forget all that and let us be big. Let us adopt the policy of Canada for the Canadians. Let us adopt a policy that will give employment to our soldiers and to every class of the community. We cannot grow up to be a great nation if one foot—the industrial foot—is bound up like the foot of a Chinese lady who goes limping about. We cannot make this a great country unless it is well balanced. The United States is an example to us in that respect. The United States is a great country and under normal conditions it does not care whether it exports its cereals or not. In case of war the United States could live alone. It is a self-contained country. Germany was almost in the same position before the war. It adopted a form of national policy and aspired to national greatness. One hundred years ago Germany was composed of a hundred very small states but they united and Germany became a great industrial country. She was foolish enough to commence this war in the effort to dominate the world industrially. She made a mistake as a result of which her dream of world power has been shattered but not her industries. Her industries will come back again and her products will seek the markets of the world later on. Are we prepared to give them free trade?

I have put before the House the views of those who look upon this question in the same way as I do. I sat at the feet of the fathers of the National Policy; I have listened to their arguments. I have nothing to go back upon in that respect. I am a Liberal-Conservative. I believe in the National Policy and I do not believe in giving way one inch to sectionalism, to one part of this country in opposition to the interests of another part. My party is not in any sense represented in this Governernment. We realize that. We were quite willing—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CURRIE: Hon. gentlemen need not laugh. I am stating facts. The Conservative party could have carried on. It never needed to ask anybody to come in, but when this war was on, in the greatness of their hearts, there was not a single man of the party that was not willing to ask other members of this House or gentlemen outside who were of the same views as we were in regard to carrying on the war, to come in and take a share of the responsibility. But the Conservative party did not have before it, when that question was discussed, the trade issue. We did not have that before us, and we did not invite people into the Government of the day who were going to adopt the policy that would be destructive in its effects on agriculture or the industries of the country. We did not follow the policy that was adopted in Great Britain, the policy of governing by groups whereby the Unionists have their own caucus and their own whips, the Conservatives have their own caucus and their own whips, and the Liberals who went over to the Liberal-Unionist ranks have their own caucus and their own whips. According to that rule, which is an historic one, we, the Conservatives in this House, should have had our own whips and our own caucus, and be represented directly in the Government by our own ministers. We did not do that, we were big and broad enough not to press for that. The Conservatives in this House have not held any caucus, and have not decided, or taken, any ground as far as any of the policies of the country are concerned —we were quite willing to leave that to the Union Government as an Administration. Other groups have caucused. But if there is going to be a change, if there is going to be deviation by the adoption of any policy that violates the principles of the historic Conservative party, there will be, without question, a caucus and a meeting of the Conservative party of this country in convention. It will foregather and we shall see who is going to have the funeral—we shall have a state funeral of some kind. There is no doubt about . can set that down as being as certain as that the sun rises in the East every day. After all the sacrifices that the members of that party have undergone for the sake of peace and unity and the building up of this country, if the principles which they have fought for to build up this country, and with which we have beaten our opponents again and again—and we can beat them again with the same policies—are going to be violated, and if it is intended to come down to a policy of compromise, all I can say is, "Nothing doing." I come from a race of Covenanters, and we do not compromise. There will be a decision very soon on this matter, and whatever that decision will be, upon it will depend to a large extent the future prosperity of this country. What have our men fought for? What have they died for, for what reason have they written the name of Canada large in the four corners of the whole world, if we are going to adopt a policy of retrogression, if we are going to stand still. It cannot be done. We must march on, and I would ask my friends on both sides in this House, and in all parts of Canada, who are lovers of their country and like to see things moving along, to drop all this piffle about Free Trade that we had before the war when there were no real issues at stake. There is only one great issue before the people of this country at the present moment, there is only one great issue for every man in this House, and that is the future success of Canada. Now that the war is over that is the great subject that confronts us. Let us think of that constantly, let us forget our own personal interest and put the interests of Canada above everything else.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Does not my hon. friend, who has just taken his seat, think it would be wise to give the evidence of a direct quotation before he makes a statement in this House that a gentleman occupying so important a public position as Mr. Wood—the United Farmers' President in Alberta—is an annexationist?

Mr. CURRIE: Unfortunately I have not got the statement here to prove it, but it is well known that during the Reciprocity fight Mr. Wood was trying to preach the doctrine of annexing this country to the United States, or making this country an adjunct of the Republic. He is an American born, and he thought he had all the Americans in western Canada behind him in that propaganda. Unfortunately for him, when the war broke out, and the Americans were drawn into the struggle, those settlers of that nationality in the West gave every evidence that they are just as good and loyal Canadians as the rest of the people of Canada. I have not got the quotation, but it is well known in the East and spoken of everywhere, that Mr. Wood was an avowed annexationist—that his object is to annex this country to the United States. If that is not the case, I am very sorry "to put him in wrong." Until such time, however, as he changes his belief I shall have to adhere to my description of him.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): The House will not expect that in the few observations I have to offer I shall discuss the rival policies of Free Trade and Protection. Opportunity will be afforded during the debate on the Budget to deal with that very important issue; but it strikes me, after having listened to the remarks of my good friend from Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that there is something wrong in his arguments about high protection, and about the future of this country, both of which he has linked together. If I gathered rightly from his remarks, he preached the doctrine of wider markets for Canada, and at the same time advocated a policy of embargo against foreign goods. I am only a layman, I do not pose as an authority on economics, or to have slept with Adam Smith by my bedside—although I admit some familiarity with the works of that great economist—but it seems to me that the Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian Government would have very poor results indeed if they were to place an embargo on the goods of foreign countries.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the hon. gentleman mistakes the purpose of an embargo. There is such a thing as an embargo, and there is also a system of licensing. The embargo would be placed against the goods of foreign countries coming into Canada; the licensing system is applied to goods exported by some countries.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understood my hon. friend to advocate placing an embargo on goods coming from the United States.

Mr. CURRIE: My hon. friend is correct as to that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At all events it is clear in my mind from what my friend said that the high protectionists of Canada all want things their own way, and those who do not share their opinions are to be termed Bolshevists.

I have listened to the lecture which my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) has read his colleagues on that side of the House. I am not impertinent enough to desire to intervene in the quarrel or quarrels that may exist. All these rows, which have taken place in the House since the beginning of this debate, will, I am sure, be transferred to-morrow, if I am well informed, to the caucus. We do not see any latch-string at the door for entrance to that caucus, but I can offer some advice at least to my good friends—if the worst comes to the worst, let them follow the Queensbury rules.

Mr. Speaker, this debate has lasted long enough, and should soon come to an end. I do not intend, therefore, to offer any lengthy remarks this afternoon; I shall make them as concise as possible in order to expedite the business of the House.

First of all, I join with members on both sides of the House in tendering my most sincere congratulations to the two young members who moved (Mr. Redman) and seconded (Mr. Manion) the Address. I think it will be agreed that they are an addition to the debating power of the House of Commons.

I wish also to congratulate my friend the member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) upon the great honour which has been conferred upon him in his selection as leader of the Liberal party during the present session. His fidelity to his late leader and his loyalty to his friends and to the principles which they represent have been tested by his clansmen sitting at your left, Mr. Speaker. He was not deterred by clamour or by passion from doing what he conceived to be right. He knew in days gone by how to steer his course; he was not deceived by false lights on the shore; and that explains why he sits where he does to-day.

The member for North Cape Breton and Victoria succeeds, as has been said by several others, a great leader, one of the great Canadians of the age. It seems to me that in the disappearance from public life of the lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier a giant oak has fallen in the forest. I believe that I express the sentiments of the House when I say of him:

> The Knight's bones are dust,
> And his good sword rust;
> His soul is with the saints, I trust.

Mr. Speaker, Sir Wilfrid Laurier is gone from our midst; but his spirit is still with us. I believe that on both sides of the House we can find inspiration in the noble life and lofty ideals of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Allusion has been made in this House and outside of this House—notably in a manifesto issued by the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Hon. Mr. Fielding) during the last election, when a division occurred in the ranks of the Liberal party—to the "Quebec situation." I admit that there has been a Quebec situation, unfortunately; but time is a great healer and the clash will not last forever. Already I see signs in and out of this House which indicate that the time is not far distant when the estrangement between the old province of Quebec and the rest of the Dominion will be a thing of the past. I say that the clash cannot last, because there are men of good-will on both sides of politics and amongst all races. The extremists, unfortunately, have had sway of late; now has struck the hour of moderation and for moderate men. There was a Quebec situation, as was stated by the member for Shelburne and Queen's in his manifesto; but it was not of our making. It was very easy in 1870 for Bismarck to create a French situation by the sending of a false despatch from Ems. So it was easy in 1917 to create a Quebec situation, which, I repeat, was not of her own making.

I read during my leisure hours the speeches of that great Irishman who is acknowledged as foremost amongst English orators. You will notice that when the Irishmen produce a man of genius, John Bull, who looks always after number one, takes him unto himself. I have always been struck with the following phrase from one of Edmund Burke's speeches, which I would like some of my friends to read and to ponder:

> It looks to me narrow and pedantic to apply the ordinary ideas of criminal justice to this great public contest. I do not know the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people.

Mr. Speaker, as I stated a moment ago, there was a Quebec situation during 1917, but it was concocted, it was planned, it was matured, and it was launched, by expert hands. It was engineered by a patriot, Sir Clifford Sifton, aided and abetted by two other knights of equal fame, Sir Joseph Flavelle and Sir William Mackenzie; and it was worked up to a frenzy by a subsidized press. A clear and far-seeing man like my esteemed friend and ex-colleague, the member for Shelburne and Queen's, might have discovered the eye-wash, the camouflage, because they were of the same creation as those of 1911 which destroyed the policy of my hon. friend, advocated by us during that year. Mr. Speaker, it was given to a plain Scotch "hielander" to discern it. The member for Shelburne and

Queen's stated the other evening
5 p.m. that gratitude was a scarce commodity. Unfortunately it is, but the Liberals of this Dominion and their representatives in this Parliament have not exhausted their supply of gratitude; and that is why at the opening of this session, on the morrow of the death of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, unanimously and enthusiastically they entrusted their political soul to a Scotch Presbyterian whose head is as cool as the snow-capped mountains of the highlands, and whose heart is as warm as the glens of dear old Scotia.

I do not need to import into this House the domestic affairs of the Liberal party. At the beginning of the session the leader of the Opposition held out the olive branch to those hon. gentlemen who differed from us on a single issue relating to the war; to accept or reject it, as they might choose. This friendly offer was undoubtedly the extending of a privilege, if they chose to avail themselves of it, to hon. gentlemen to whom it was made. But it has been a surprise to the members to your left, Mr. Speaker, to hear some hon. gentlemen impute motives and intentions on the part of the leader of the Opposition that we know were not entertained by him when he made this offer out of the goodness of his heart.

May I, therefore, be pardoned if I refer briefly to what was said on this score by my old colleague and esteemed friend, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)? The hon. gentleman gave us a good deal of gratuitous advice in the course of which he coupled up the friendly invitation of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) with the claim said to have been made by some person or persons connected with the Liberal party to the effect that when the upheaval took place in 1917, those who remained true to their leader became the possessors of the Ark of the Covenant of Liberalism. Personally,—and I am pretty well informed on the affairs of the Liberal party—I do not know of any such claim having been made. Thank Heaven! in the Liberal party we respect individual opinions; we can differ and yet remain Liberals. I do, however, know that in repelling the persistent attacks of certain newspapers, when they continuously sneered at us and claimed that we were not real Liberals, but mere Laurier Liberals, we were obliged in self defence to direct public attention to certain historic facts; and perhaps it would be well that I should do so again in order to remove any misconception that may exist in the mind of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's or in that of any other hon. gentleman on this subject.

Estrangements and divisions have taken place before to-day in the Liberal party in Canada and in other countries. It is a common occurrence in the traditions of the Liberal party that at times the members of that party may differ. Take the history of English Liberalism. In 1886, some Liberals of the Rowellian type differed with Mr. Gladstone. If I mistake not, the Liberals who left Mr. Gladstone on the Home Rule question and who joined the Unionist party of the time, became leaders of the Conservative party of to-day. Has not the same thing occurred at a later date? When Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman was the leader of the Liberal party in 1900 there was again a difference of opinion; and I am told, in fact I know, that the Liberals who left him on that occasion, left him for good, joining the Conservative party, and they are at the present time still within the ranks of that party. On those two occasions, therefore, it is historically true that the custodians of the Ark of the Covenant of Liberalism were those who remained true and faithful to Gladstone and to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am sure, knowing my hon. friend's mind, and appreciating as I do that he does not wish to be historically inaccurate, he will permit me to say that in the case of the Liberal-Unionist split, Sir George Trevelyan was one of two Liberal-Unionists who participated in the famous round-table conference for the reunion of the Liberal party. Afterwards, Sir George Trevelyan, on his own initiative, returned to the Liberal party.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I can quote chapter and verse in support of my own opinion. I can tell my hon. friend that Lord Lansdowne was a Liberal until he left Gladstone on the Home Rule question and became one of the leaders of the Tory party in England. Earl Grey, a former Governor General, left Gladstone and became one of the leaders of the Tory party. I may say that Lord Rosebery left Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, and Lord Rosebery is to-day considered one of the leaders of the Imperialist party in England. I could give name after name; but it is true, as a matter of history—and my hon. friend cannot deny it—that those who remained with Gladstone and with Campbell-Bannerman represented the Liberal thought of England.

So it was in Canada at the time of Confederation. Take the example of George Brown. In 1885, in 1890, in 1891 and in 1911—on each of these occasions of political disturbance, the Liberal leader and those who remained true to him were regarded as the custodians of the Ark of the Covenant of Canadian Liberalism. Does the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) contend that the upheaval of 1917 must be considered as an exception to the rule, and that because of the personality of this or that gentleman who then broke with the Liberal party, the records of the past and the teachings of history must be ignored? If so, he will find few to agree with him—more particularly when it is borne in mind that by a statute of this Parliament, the leader of the Opposition is officially recognized. I will say this to my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's that there is another side to the Indian story which he told the House the other day. The wigwam was not lost; the Indian was lost. The Indian left the primeval forest in the morning; he met some white trash, drank some fire water, and in the evening when he came back into the bush, he could not find the wigwam. I would advise my hon. friend to hold another parley with John, the Indian, and say to him: "John, the wigwam is not lost; the wigwam is just where it always was, but the old chief, against whom we took the war path is dead; and so you might as well put away your tomahawk and scalping knife and come in from the war path and lend a hand to those who are trying to restore a free Parliament in order that they may re-establish the ways of peace."

To be serious, let me say this: The Liberal party is greater than any individual. Further, it is our belief that in the general recognition of this truth by Liberals of all shades of opinion will there be found a rallying place for the forces that make for national harmony and national progress, and that only upon such common ground will it be possible to formulate a policy that will make Liberalism the cure for the ills against which the masses of the people are now crying out in words of ominous import.

I remember, when I was a boy here at the University, trying to emulate my good friend the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), the professor would ask me to translate from Pope's Essay on Criticism. I remember the first two lines of that Essay:

'Tis with our judgments as our watches, none
Go just alike, yet each believes his own.

Exactly so. My hon. friend and esteemed colleague the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) believes he is right in his conception of Liberalism. I believe he is wrong. Our watches do not go just alike. We each believe our own. I will make a bargain with him. Your watch, my friend, is not accurate. Perhaps mine is not accurate. Let us therefore turn to the old grandfather clock and set the time by it.

Mr. Speaker, this awful war is over, and I need not say how proud we all are of the record our soldiers made at the front—proud of the living, and prouder still of the dead. If this victory means anything it means the crushing of militarism, not only in Germany, but the whole world over, Canada included. Canadians have played their part in this war. For territorial aggrandisement? No. For the securing of indemnity? No. For a voice in the foreign affairs of the British Empire? No, Mr. Speaker. The five hundred thousand Canadian soldiers who with unfaltering steps faced the grey lines of Germany fought the battles of this war in order to put an end to all wars in the future, so that there might not perish from the earth what was so well defined by old Lincoln as "Government of the people, by the people, for the people." What will be the outcome of this welter of blood? We are told that we are to have a Society of Nations, possibly a League of Peace, but call it by whatever name you choose, I proudly hope that this Parliament of Canada, after all the sacrifices that have been made by our boys, will be called upon to ratify the treaty and the covenant of peace.

I know we are not a sovereign power, but, Sir, I remember two occasions during my parliamentary career when this Parliament—and we were not then a sovereign power—was called upon to ratify foreign treaties—the French treaty and the Japanese treaty. Both these treaties concerned our commercial relations with two foreign countries. Surely, if this Parliament can ratify commercial treaties as a matter of course, it should be called upon, in view of all the sacrifices that have been made by Canada in this war, to ratify the Peace Treaty. We have given unsparingly in men and in money. We mourn the loss of sixty thousand of our bravest, and thousands have come back maimed or wounded. Our country is saddled with a colossal debt, our industries are crippled, and we are facing a future fraught with the gravest perils as a result of our participation in the world war. I claim for Canada, my country, the honour of ratifying the Peace Treaty along with the other Allied nations. Canada has won that distinction. We owe that to the living; we owe it to the dead. True, Mr. Speaker, this may not increase our stature by one cubit. But it may enlarge our orbit. I have no patience with those who claim to be Liberals and are satisfied with the clerks of the British Foreign Office to represent Canada and do our work eternally.

I said a moment ago that this great war was over. The historic parties are aligned anew. I have listened to several addresses by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—all my friends—and I heard them repeat one after another their belief that all parties in this country had gone to pieces, that there were no more Liberals and no more Conservatives. True, my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) declared that the old, historic Conservative party was still in existence.

I turn to my authority, Burke, for his definition of a political party:—

> A body of men united for promoting by their joint endeavours the national interest upon some political principle in which they are all agreed.

Mr. Speaker, the party system has existed in Great Britain for many centuries. We borrow our traditions and our ideals, politically speaking, from the mother of parliaments, and as long as there are two Britishers in the world there will be a party system, and that party system will resolve itself into two groups—a Liberal group and a Conservative group.

What is Liberalism? Liberalism is not so much a policy as a habit of mind. It is the disposition of the man who looks upon each of his fellows as of equal worth with himself. Upon class distinctions in society, rank, wealth, race and creed he wages unceasing war. What is Conservatism? The Tory habitually thinks of his fellow creatures, not according to their individuality, but according to their class, the face value of which, regardless of their intrinsic worth, either entitles or disentitles them to his favour. They either belong to his own class or they do not. The real worth of each is not the standard by which he forms his judgment of them. Every act and utterance, every refusal or protest of another person is referred to the artificial connection or distinction, instead of being judged for itself. In a word, the Tory looks down from the institution to the man; the Liberal up from the man to the institution. That, Sir, is the basic distinction between Liberalism and Conservatism; it is the distinction which exists in all liberty-loving countries, such as those under the rule of King George the Fifth.

Party government needs no justification. Men differ widely in their views, but they can co-operate by subordinating some of their ideas to a general policy. What is the function of parties? It is to crystallize public sentiment, to formulate issues. In 1911 my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) crystallized the policy of the Conservative party in one phrase which he coined in Toronto, "No truck or trade with the Yankees," and my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) crystallized and formulated the policy of the Liberal party—wider markets for Canada.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: May I be permitted to interrupt the hon. member?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I never used such an expression at any time in my life.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am very glad indeed, I am very happy to hear the responsible Acting Prime Minister of Canada deny the imputation that he ever used those words. Sir, it has been repeated time and again; but, of course, ashes only remain of the old buildings, and all our words are buried with the ashes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And should be.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, these words have been repeated. I do not know how many sessions we have had since their alleged use, but it gives me great pleasure, indeed, to hear the Acting Prime Minister of this Government state boldly and emphatically that he never used such debasing language in reference to our great ally to the south of us. The people have a direct voice in deciding public questions and in choosing and controlling the Government. Party government, I will go further and say, intensifies popular interest in public affairs, and promotes stability and order in national affairs. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that as long as we follow the British system of government, and British ideals, we shall have the party system. It is true, parties may be temporarily decimated, but they are bound to revive. In England a few weeks ago Mr. Asquith was defeated—and it was a great misfortune for the United Kingdom that he was defeated; and the Liberal party was absolutely annihilated. Parties may be annihilated for a time, but, I say, they will revive; and only the day before yesterday in a by-election which took place in England, Mr. Lloyd George suffered the severest blow in his political career. In the province of Ontario the Liberal party was annihilated. We had a so-called leader who made an alliance with the Premier of that province in order to prevent public opinion from pronouncing itself on the public issues of the day. But what has happened? The people have taken into their own hands their salvation; and in by-elections which have taken place of late, Liberal opinion has asserted itself in the province of Ontario. I dare say if the Government of the day in Canada were to open some of the constituencies—the good Scotch constituency of Glengarry, the constituency of North Ontario, the constituency of Assiniboia, and Quebec East—I dare say my hon. friend would hear from the people; and the Government, strong as it is, might perhaps learn something from them. Mr. Speaker, you cannot change human nature. You may tell the people not to mention this, and not to speak of that. You may scientifically muzzle the press and prevent it from conveying to the public the real facts of the case. But you cannot change human nature; and already, Mr. Speaker, there is a clamour in this country against the methods adopted by the present Government. Why, Sir, we have that clamour arising from the ministerial benches. We all heard the speech delivered the other day by my hon. friend the member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), and we heard the speech delivered by the prominent Unionist member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). And what do we gather from these two speeches?—to take only two examples. Since the beginning of this debate my sympathies have rather been with my good friend the genial Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White). He has been attacked and badly handled on right and left by his own friends. What did we hear? The hon. member for Victoria—who, I am told, was in his younger days a staunch Grit—he and the editor of the Toronto World one day bore the banners in a procession headed by the late Sir Oliver Mowat. He evidently recalls his younger days, because the other day he was the first to sound that note to the Government: "Restore the rights of a free Parliament;" and that note was re-echoed by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's. We have been told from both sides of the House—and we have heard it especially from both groups on the other side of the House—that Orders in Council should be abolished if responsible government is not to be a by-word. Sir, I say that the latest example that this House has had of lack of responsible government is the Order in Council which came as a bomb the other day in reference to the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific. That we should in the year of our Lord, 1919 clamour for responsible government in Canada is indeed a sad commentary on Unionism in Canada. But this is not all. We have been told repeatedly by gentlemen belonging to both groups of the Government, that the iniquitous War-time Elections Act should be repealed. We have heard that it is a blemish on the statute book of Canada. Oh, it is true, my good friend from Westminster (Mr. Stacey), whom I do not see in his seat at present, said—in order probably to forestall the criticism that might come from this side of the House— that in that election of 1917 the people did not care for the means but were only looking at the end. Mr. Speaker, it is the first time that this doctrine of the end being justified by the means has been proclaimed in the House of Commons of Canada. I have been told—indeed I have read it not once but in practically every issue of the Orange Sentinel—that this doctrine is a sinister Jesuitical one. Mr. Speaker, if that is the policy of the Unionist party as proclaimed by my hon. friend from Westminster (Mr. Stacey), I would ask my good friend, the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell) immediately to appoint a delegate—who should be Mr. Hocken himself—and send him to Rome and have him tender to the General of the Jesuit Order an abject apology on behalf of the Orange party. The end justifies the means, said my hon. friend from Westminster. But what about the charges which were made during the last session? What about the charges that were made, and made so eloquently, by our young friend the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) in which it was established beyond a doubt that hundreds of men were induced to swear falsely as to their domicile in Canada? What about the charges made on the other side of the Atlantic? The Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid), a King's Counsel from the province of Nova Scotia, and a certain colonel from London, Ontario, were said to have had their hands in a plot during the last campaign so as to apportion votes to constituencies where ministerial candidates were not safe. What about these charges? Can we ignore them? If the Government has any honour, and its honour is in its own hands, it is in duty bound to probe the charges which have been made and to investigate every one of them. If the Government does not do it, let it open one or two constituencies even in the province of Ontario and it will learn what the good people of Ontario think of such methods.

The hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Stacey) said that the bond of unity in Canada should be based on honour, truth and toleration. Let me tell him that if the War-time Elections Act is not repealed we cannot speak of honour, truth or toleration in this Parliament. Let me now make a very brief survey of the conditions prevailing in Canada.

The hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) depicted in this House the other day a very roseate outlook. As a result of this great war Canada had participated in the deliberations of the War Cabinet and out of the war there would be evolved a cabinet of governments. He was not very clear as to the constitutional aspect of that change. Then he depicted conditions prevailing in Russia under Bolshevist rule. Sir, I do not think it is necessary for Sir Robert Borden, our Premier, to go to Prinkipo in order to investigate the conditions in Russia under Bolshevism. This Government appointed a friend of their own, Mr. C. H. Cahan, K.C., who was my opponent during the last Dominion election, to investigate the socialistic propaganda in Canada. Of late he has published a pamphlet as to what he found in Canada. He declares that there is in Canada a socialistic and Bolshevist propaganda that in my judgment should be enough to prevent the Prime Minister from running after it in Russia. In the last page of his pamphlet Mr. Cahan says:

> I have endeavoured to give you an idea of the milder forms of the propaganda, which has covertly been carried on throughout Canada, with the evident object of weakening the will of the Canadian people to carry on the war to a successful conclusion, and, more recently, to create difficulties and dissensions within Canada so as to hinder the attainment of a satisfactory peace. I say milder forms of propaganda advisedly; for, if I were to quote at length the quantities of obscene, profane and seditious pamphlets which have been circulated throughout Canada by the social revolutionists, it would only serve to excite your bitter animosity, and perhaps lay myself open to the charge of disseminating sedition, though merely repeating it for your information.

Here we have a gentleman appointed by the Government to inquire into the operations of the Bolshevists and socialists in Canada. His report is full of information on this subject of the most serious nature. Yet we are told by the President of the Privy Council that Bolshevism is operating only in Russia. He did not say it but I suppose the logical conclusion to be arrived at from his speech was that the Prime Minister of Canada was therefore justified in going to Prinkipo. Let us look after our own affairs and let the Bolshevists of Russia look after theirs.

The observations and the ramblings of my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council may be very interesting but we must face, and solve, our own Canadian problems. As the hon. member for Shelburn and Queen's said, let us attend to our own affairs. What is the true situation to-day? I will not give my own opinion. I will give the opinion expressed by a bosom friend of the President of the Privy Council, a very eminent divine belonging, if I mistake not, to the Methodist church. Dr. Bland addressed a meeting a few evenings ago in Toronto and he used this language as he described the conditions in Canada:

> There is no English-speaking country at least so ill prepared for the storm now breaking on the world. Canada is a steamer drifting into the rapids, the crew quarrelling and no captain in sight. We have section pitted against section, race against race, class against class and the soldiers a powerful and unknown factor.

Is that picture too sombre? Is it true that Canada is the image of a steamer drifting into the rapids, is it true that the crew is quarrelling, is there no captain of the ship? Let us look at the situation. That the crew is quarrelling we have no better evidence than what we have had this afternoon, yesterday and indeed ever since the debate started in this House of Commons. That we have no captain is undisputed. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queens told us the other day that the captain was in Paris with three of his colleagues and that he was more needed in Ottawa than in Paris.

This session of Parliament has been delayed for nine months. In England, last year, they held two sessions and had a general election. In Canada we have delayed for nine months the meeting of Parliament. The usages of Parliament have been abridged. I have read the Parliamentary and constitutional history of England as interpreted by the best authors. It struck me that two years ago when we allowed Sir George Perley and two of the parliamentary secretaries to sit in this Parliament and to receive the emoluments of office without going before the people we were seriously abridging the British and the Canadian constitution. We saw a minister of the Crown (Mr. Blondin) defeated in two constituencies, and yet for months afterwards he continued in office and received emoluments as Portmaster General. He had no seat in this House, but finally he was provided with one in the Senate.

The writs for by-elections, Mr. Speaker, are not issued, as you well know. The national debt of Canada is simply staggering in its figures. We are facing a huge deficit. The Minister of Public Works the other day asked the House to look carefully into the condition of affairs, before the coming financial year was over, with a view of seeing what we are going to do in the future, and to look carefully, from a business standpoint, to the question where we are going to get the extra one hundred millions of revenue which we shall require after the present fiscal year. The adverse balance of trade is growing, and growing abnormally. Here is what I read in The Morning Sun, of New York, of March 11th, speaking of the staunch ally, the opulent customer and near-kin that Canada is to the United States:

> In the seven months Canada bought from us a quarter of a billion dollars more than Canada sold us.

This is how the balance of trade stands as between Canada and the United States. And yet for years and years, when my good friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) was the financial pilot of this country the wails of my hon. friends opposite, wails of sorrow and regret, filled the other Chamber. They would speak then only of the adverse balance of trade. Well, Mr. Speaker, this year, after a period of only seven months there is an adverse balance of a quarter of a billion of dollars as between the United States and Canada.

The Civil Service, right here in Ottawa—and if the expression were not a little vulgar, I would say right under the noses of the Prime Minister and the minister responsible for the Civil Service—are up in arms. Labour is arrayed against capital. Unemployment is rife in the large cities. Why, only in the city of Montreal—if I am well informed by my friend the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) who is one of the city commissioners—there are actually twenty-five thousand men clamouring for work and bread. The railway problem is more entangled than ever. The freight rates have been unduly increased, and perhaps the express rates may be also unduly advanced before long. The cost of living is soaring higher and higher every day, and riots are occurring all over the land. Not in Quebec you have noticed, Mr. Speaker —we have riots in Quebec only on the eve of a general election when there is a Unionist Government appealing for support, and those riots are concocted and paid for by the Department of Justice. There have been riots in Toronto—actually in the loyal city of Toronto—and the police of that city, a splendid body of men, had to defend themselves against the returned soldiers. Restaurants were broken into and men were bleeding from wounds. Where was the mayor of Toronto in all that trouble? Alas, investigation does not say. There were riots in Toronto, in Winnipeg, in Halifax, and in Lindsay——

Sir SAM HUGHES: That was over a girl.

Mr. LEMIEUX:—There is mutiny in the camps. We have all heard of what has taken place at Rhyl. I was informed the other day that the Third Division had mutinied because they had refused to be used as a police force against their fellow-workers in Great Britain. I cannot say whether it is true, but it has been asserted to me—of course, the press would not give out that information. Is the steamer drifting into the rapids? Sir, the Government has no policy, no pilot, no captain and no head. Its policy is indecision, confusion, humiliation and anarchy. I may be told that all this is the result of the war. Sir, a Frenchman who came to this country during the war as a trade commissioner coined a very good phrase in my presence as he was delivering a speech in Montreal. He said: France was taken unawares by war, France must not be taken unawares by peace. I agree, Sir, that all the Allied Governments were taken unawares by war, but this Government was warned repeatedly, during two, three and four sessions, that it should not be taken at a disadvantage and should cut its cloth accordingly. In England, Sir, they provided for peace conditions. Two years ago, according to a report to the British Government, a Ministry of Reconstruction was created. I shall not waste the time of the House, but we have in that report the evidence that John Bull, as ever, was prudent, was far-seeing, and knew how to conduct his affairs. In Canada we did not know how to be prudent for the future, and the Government has been very derelict in its duty. All we hear is, words, words, and only words—reconstruction, co-operation, Imperialism, and nothing is done. The truth of the matter is this so-called Union is nothing but a bombast, a fake, a sham. First of all, there is no union; since the commencement of the session we have had that experience. There is no union, there is no Government—we are ruled by factions. Sir Clifford Sifton is the ruler of this country, and he belongs to a Trinity. My friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) said the other day that the Government was owned by Sir Joseph Flavelle. He stated only part of the truth. The Government is owned mainly and really by Sir William Mackenzie, Sir Joseph Flavelle and Sir Clifford Sifton. They are the masters of this Government, and when I say that there is no government, that we are ruled by faction, I am within the bounds of truth, my statement is borne out by the facts. The speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen supporting the Government are not only warnings, but they constitute, in my judgment, the most serious arraignment that was ever made against a government.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was directing attention to the fact that the Government was being assailed not so much by its opponents, which is quite natural, as by its own friends. During the course of this debate we have heard not only very grave warnings, but also charges of a most serious character. The charges laid at the door of the Government by the member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) are among the gravest ever made against a Government. Sir, let me read to you a few sentences from the speech delivered in this House on March 4, by the member for Victoria. I find the following in a letter which he had addressed to the Prime Minister, and which he read during the course of his remarks:

> I have on other occasions drawn your attention to the massacres at Lens, Passchendaele, etc., where the only apparent object was to glorify the General in command, and make it impossible, through butchery, to have a Fifth and Sixth Division and two Army Corps. . . I think the time has arrived when you should assert yourself along positive lines, demand the removal of incompetents and have this needless slaughter—for I can call it nothing else—of our Canadian lads stopped. You should secure returns of the losses by brigade and battalions during each year or tenure of command, and what each brigade accomplished, and it will be found that, in many instances, the brigades and battalions that have accomplished the most have suffered the least.

Bull-head and incompetency are traceable by the horrible casualties rolling up into eight and ten times the total force of a battalion or a brigade.

The hon. member spoke about the attack on Cambrai and the taking of Mons. He said:

I have just this to say about Mons. Were I in authority, the officer who, four hours before the Armistice was signed, although he had been notified beforehand that the Armistice was to begin at eleven o'clock, ordered the attack on Mons, thus needlessly sacrificing the lives of Canadian soldiers, would be tried summarily by court martial and punished so far as the law would allow.

It has been my misfortune to lose my only boy in this war. I would not, as the father of that boy, think for one moment of attacking the General Officer Commanding the Canadian forces. I do not for one moment believe that the charges made by the member for Victoria against Sir Arthur Currie are well founded; it is unbelievable that they should be so. I cannot believe that our boys were caused to be slaughtered and butchered for the sake of a little vainglory on the part of the Commanding Officer. But these charges have been made; they are now public property; they have re-echoed from province to province; indeed they are known throughout the world. The charges are made not by an insignificant person, but by a gentleman who was a member of the Government as Minister of Militia, by a gentleman who more than any one else can claim the credit of having equipped and sent overseas our First Contingent. The charges are made by one who, with all his failings, is known to be a generous-hearted gentleman. Sir, the Prime Minister and his colleagues may deny the charges; brother officers in this House may refute them, and the press may speak of the cruel egotism of the member for Victoria. But there is a sound public opinion in Canada, and whether the charge is well-founded or not, you cannot annul it by a mere denial or a sneer. The fathers and mothers of those who went through the valley of shadow during the great war will not be satisfied by a denial or by a sneer; they will insist, with bleeding hearts, upon an investigation which will probe these charges to the bottom. Indeed, the whole military situation so far as Canada is concerned is but a sad and melancholy tale of the Government's incompetency.

I have spoken of the charges made by the member for Victoria. What about the specific charges made but a few days ago by Brigadier-General Smart, a gallant officer if there is one, who has seen four years' service at the front, who does not belong to the Liberal party, who supports the Government in my native province as member for the loyal city of Westmount? Sir, the day of his first appearance in the Quebec Legislature on his return from the front, he deems it his duty to inform the country of what has taken place and of what is taking place yonder. Let me read in a few crisp sentences the charges made by General Smart. I quote from the Toronto Globe's report of his speech:

I feel it is up to me to tell the people of Canada how the Canadian Medical Service blundered overseas; how patronage, influence, pull, went to paralyse the good work of the medical services.

That is not surprising. During the session of 1916-17 the same charges were made from this side of the House, but we were debarred from the right of having Dr. Bruce's report laid on the Table. You will remember, Sir, how that genial gentleman who occupied my seat at that time, the Hon. Mr. Pugsley, insisted that that report should be laid on the table of the House. We could, however, never obtain that report. General Smart goes on to say:

I perfectly know who is responsible for this state of things; official Ottawa knows it too; Sir Robert Borden does not ignore it, but no one dares tell. And that is why I feel it is up to me to show all the evil that has been done, to show the abuse, the ill-treatment our wounded and sick received overseas at the hands of the improperly managed medical service. The whole trouble is to be traced to Argyll House.

We have heard, during the last few months, a great deal about slackers and time-servers. The farmer or the farmer's son, who was working on the farm, in order that our soldiers might get food, was not a slacker; but I am told that there were thousands of slackers at Argyll House in London receiving high pay. General Smart continues:

And I may add that personally, after seeing all that I have seen, I have not the slightest confidence in those who administer the affairs in England. Sir George Perley had much to do with the management of our medical service. Who gave him the authority to treat our wounded in such a way, be it even for the cause of Imperialism? Well, gentlemen, I tell you, if Imperialism is to be maintained through such a system, I say it is time that it be destroyed. I am as good an Imperialist as any one, but I do not care for this Imperialism at such a price; I care not for Imperialism if it is to be built on the sufferings of our wounded heroes.

Let me tell the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) that such severe language was never used by any hon. members on this side of the House. General Smart says that Brigadier-General Turner is weak-armed. He blames him for the recent riotings at Rhyl and other camps, and he traces the matter back to the abuse and ill-treatment of the men.

General Smart said that many Canadian officers in England had asked him to bring these facts to light. Recalling the death of Major-General Steele, in London—

One of the best Canadian soldiers that Canada ever produced, —he said that the Major General died of a broken heart over these things. He says he will produce correspondence to this effect.

Further he says:

Gentlemen, I tell you, without fear of impartial contradiction, that the medical service overseas was directed in an insensible and neglected way. Our Canadian wounded were afforded a medical service that was absolutely inadequate, and I have seen instances where medical officers, ridiculously inapt to care for the sick and wounded, were put in charge of important hospital units. I have pitied the poor soldiers that were made to travel through the British Isles to far-off hospitals when they passed close to the unit that should have received them for their particular treatment. . . . He stated instances where men medically found unfit in Canada, were, however, sent to England. These men caused hard work and worry to the officers overseas, went through hardships, and are now coming back a charge to the country, for they will be getting pay pension all at the expense of the country. Then General Smart told of what he saw in his own Military District of Shorncliffe. He said he could not criticise the medical officers and nurses. They were up to what he had expected from them, but, he says, I feel I must and do criticise the headquarters of management of this service.

General Smart said that each Canadian hospital had its full staff of competent doctors and nurses, but outside of these hospitals, there had been organized Voluntary Aid Detachments, made up of people of good-will, but who knew little or nothing of medical care, and he stated instances where soldiers were left for definite treatment in these Voluntary Aid Detachments while cots were empty in the regular hospitals.

He stated that, in cases he knew of, men had lost the use of their eyes because of this practice. When such cases reached the proper hospitals, said General Smart, it was too late for treatment to have any effect.

General Smart then mentioned cases where patronage placed in responsible posts men who had not even diplomas of medical studies, while competent men without the "pull" were kept in England or in posts where their science and experience could not be used to succor our wounded and sick.

Talking of the riot, General Smart said that the Rhyl outbreak was not the first of this kind; there had been outbreaks previously at Shorncliffe, Witley, Bramshott, and even at Rhyl before.

General Smart concludes by vindicating the French Canadian soldiers. I must offer General Smart my sincere thanks for that timely vindication. I have noticed that the subsidized press, when the cable despatch telling of those riots reached Canada, assigned the cause of them to the Montreal regiments; but, of course, a denial was immediately forthcoming, and then the subsidized press published another lie in order to cover up the old one. It said that the French Canadians at the Rhyl camp had been seen with Bolshevik flags.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Propaganda.

Mr. LEMIEUX: General Smart said that the Montreal Star's cable that French Canadian soldiers had floated the red flag was a vile insinuation. He said that he commanded French Canadian units and that they were the most orderly and disciplined fighting units. I must again thank General Smart for his vindication of my French Canadian fellowmen. I am rather surprised that this message first appeared in the Montreal Star, because the editor of that paper does not sing the same song as Windermere, the London correspondent. The Star correspondent in London cabled that the French Canadians have Bolshevik ideas and that they displayed the red flag; but I find, in order to rally the support of the French Canadians and of that much despised Quebec to the cause of high protection, an editorial headed "Canada and Quebec," discussing the reconstruction period and pleading that Quebec should be represented in the Government of the country.

The editor goes on to say:

Quebec is slow-going. It is a place of quiet people living placid, peaceful lives—a contented, home-loving, good-living, industrious folk.

Lots of taffy there!

Most of them own land and have a little money tucked away. Of the turmoil of the world outside they know little.

But enough to read Windermere.

The great currents which are uprooting established society elsewhere pass them by. They are "Canadien" three hundred years rooted in the soil, with a sense of mild superiority over citizens of younger growth and a contemptuous distrust of the new social philosophies that would tear old orders down in the vague wild hope that something better will sprout from the ruins.

As low tariff, for instance.

If a red wave of Bolshevism should sweep from overseas—

It means, from the West.

—as some people fear, it would shatter itself upon Quebec's stability as Atlantic surges are shattered on the Gaspé cliffs. But Quebec is a brake on the wheels of progress, some will say.

Maybe so, at times; but a brake is a necessary part of a moving machine and the world never needed brakes so much as now.

Again referring to the West.

Quebec stands for order, for cautious looks before leaping, for steadiness—for the utter opposite of the hysteria that shrieks under the red flag. Canada needs this solidity in her counsels to-day more than she ever needed it before.

We want progress, but progress upward. Better be still a while than rush down steep places into the sea.

So the Star has two voices—one voice screeching from London, and another voice singing in mellow tones from Montreal. In London, the French Canadian is a Bolshevik waving the red flag. In Canada the tender, emotional editor of the Star whispers in the ear of my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) that there is no better citizen than the French Canadian, and that in the reconstruction period he should have his say in the counsels of the Government.

My hon. friend, the Acting Prime Minister, when, in the House yesterday, his attention was called by my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) to the grave charges made by General Smart, denied them in toto. General Smart says that he has the correspondence and can prove every one of his assertions. I do not say that I will not accept the word of the Acting Prime Minister; I am at least as generous as some of the members of the Unionist party who this morning in committee refused to accept the pledged word of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid). I accept my hon. friend's denial, but he must not be satisfied with that. He is the Prime Minister; he is not a civilian; he did not serve his country on the battlefield as did General Smart, and the least he can do for this returned soldier is to give him an early opportunity of proving his charges to the hilt. I concede that General Smart suffers perhaps because of his environment. His charges were made in the Quebec Legislature in an atmosphere, which may not much be trusted by this Government. It is true General Smart belongs to good old English stock; it is true that he represents Westmount, the most loyal spot on the island of Montreal; it is true he has always been classed among the stoutest Imperialists; it is true he has served four years at the front. But he is from Quebec. So now let us hear what the real article, a soldier from the loyal province of Ontario, has to say. Lt.-Col. Pratt, M.P.P., if you please, not speaking within the precincts of the Quebec Legislature, not writing to Le Devoir or Le Canada, but to the editor of the Toronto Telegram, says:

Up to Wednesday last the British had repatriated one and a half million soldiers and 35,000 officers. The United States figures were practically the same. Canada had returned between 50,000 and 55,000 in all. Our men are coming to England at the rate of one thousand per day, and our whole army is on the march from the Rhine. Everything was stopped on Thursday last, and all our men held up because Ottawa imperatively cabled the authorities here not to send big batches of men.

You see, Mr. Speaker, our men wanted to get back to Blighty, but an imperative order came from Ottawa "Keep the men there. Don't send them in big batches. The boats are needed for the Americans." To continue:

In other words the military authorities here are not to use ships carrying over 2,000 soldiers, because our Ottawa civilians are unwilling or unable to handle the men when they reach Canada.

Apparently they will not build a landing camp at Halifax or St. John. Because of these orders from Ottawa it is impossible for us to use the Olympic and Aquitania, which the British had allotted to us, and these vessels have been turned over to the United States.

The whole thing is the gravest possible wrong to our fighting men, and not only may we expect further trouble of the Northland class, but we will be exceedingly fortunate if some of these small steamers are not lost with all on board.

Ottawa is open to grave criticism for the insignificant number so far demobilized. They deserve unmitigated censure for lack of demobilization plans and adequate preparations to handle every man that all ships could land. Nothing can excuse the orders from Ottawa that turned the Olympic and Aquitania to the help of the United States—

Our big brother.

—at the cost of additional banishment of thousands of our homesick boys for many months.

And now, as we used to say in our classical days, in cauda venenum!

If Sir Robert Borden, Sir Edward Kemp, Sir George Perley—

They are all "Sirs"—

—and probably our quartermaster-general in London, could be immediately repatriated, I fancy the army over here would suffer no material loss. Borden is never heard of over here in connection with the Peace Conference, and is useless there.

Which confirms what was said by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens.

He has taken no decided stand for Canada, and is looked upon here as weak and lacking aggressive decision.

I have carefully investigated all the above and what I am writing are hard, cold facts. It seems to me that you may be able to help our soldiers over there by your usual vigorous policy. I am not anxious to be quoted unless you think it necessary.

Sincerely yours,
Arthur C. Pratt.

I was rather surprised, Mr. Speaker, to see that letter published in the Toronto Telegram, as I remembered another article published by the Telegram immediately after the famous election of 1917, referring to the frauds during that election in Toronto. The Telegram said, "We should have denounced those frauds before, but our denunciation might have helped Laurier; but now we are free to speak." So the Toronto Telegram can speak of the military frauds that have been perpetrated at the expense of our soldiers on the other side. I say to my hon. friend the Prime Minister that charges of the gravest character are made, not by civilians, not by political opponents, but by generals and colonels returning from the front where they have served their King, their country, their Empire, well and faithfully. They belong by tradition to the Conservative party, and the least that the Government should do—as it is in honour bound to do—is to probe those charges and punish the guilty. But, Sir, the Government is not only assailed by the military authorities; not only by its opponents, but we have undergone such a revolution during the past few years that the Government is being assailed by one of its own members and can survive the assault!

I am glad to see my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. T. A. Crerar) in his seat. There was held in the city of Winnipeg some time ago a convention of the farmers of the West, but more especially a meeting of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. The platform which was adopted at that meeting was read yesterday by our friend the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) who is, I believe, president of the Grain Growers' Association of Saskatchewan. That platform, Mr. Speaker, contains the tariff policy of the western farmers, and in most of its planks I take great comfort. If it may please my hon. friend, I may tell him that I endorse several of the planks of that platform. As it was read last night, I need not refer to it again; I may, however, add this. I find that besides the tariff question the farmers passed several resolutions on different matters. For instance, they passed resolutions to bring about a greater measure of democracy in government. As democratic reforms, they demand the immediate repeal of the War-time Elections Act, and the discontinuance of the practice of conferring titles upon citizens of Canada. I have always contended, and I still contend, that titles in this country have been a source of corruption. Let me say this further to my Conservative as well as to my Liberal friends, that if they want to keep in their fold their followers, they should pass at this session the timely resolution which I see on the Order Paper, and which was moved last year. Let us abolish those titles, which are only a lure to the weak-kneed. The leader of the House knows whereof I speak. The Government has been assailed right and left, since the beginning of this war, and before the war, by some wealthy friends who were anxious to be knighted; and many of the rumblings which we hear to-day against the Government are no doubt attributable to disappointed knighthood seekers; and I have this confession to make to my Highland leader, that the Liberal party in the old days lost many of its friends because they could not obtain knighthoods from Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I repeat that it is a source of corruption, and I agree entirely with that plank of the farmers platform. But let us proceed. The farmers advocated an immediate reform of the Federal Senate; an immediate check upon the growth of government by order in council; increased responsibility of individual members of Parliament in all legislation; the complete abolishing of the patronage system; the publication of contributions and expenditures both before and after election campaigns; the removal of press censorship upon the restoration of peace, and the immediate restoration of the rights of free speech, the setting forth by daily newspapers and periodical publications of the facts of their ownership and control; proportional representation, etc., etc. Now, Mr. Speaker, that platform is very compact and very substantial. It will play its part whenever the people of this country are called to the polls. But the point I wish to make is this: This is the platform of the farmers of the West; it is a radical platform. Amongst the delegates who drafted the platform and who contributed the material that produced that platform, I find, to my surprise and my astonishment, the name of the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. T. A. Crerar). Yes. I find the name of Hon. T. A. Crerar from Winnipeg, representing the Manitoba farmers; and I am told—my hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong— I am told he presided at the meeting, put the motion to the meeting, and declared it carried.

Hon. Mr. CRERAR: I must correct the hon. gentleman. I did not go quite that far.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, Mr. Speaker, I accept at once the amendment to the statement I made. But, in all earnestness, I will put this one little question: Does he, or does he not, approve of this platform of the western farmers? I will pause for a moment and ask him to answer "yes" or "no."

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. gentleman is rather curious this evening. The platform to which he is referring was not drafted at this meeting in Winnipeg of which he speaks. It was drafted two years ago and reaffirmed at that meeting. I have no hesitation in confessing that, with reference to the platform which was drafted two years ago, I was one of those who assisted in drafting it. I thought it was a good platform then, and I think it is a good platform now.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You will not stay there very long.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would have no hesitation in enfolding within the Liberal party my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. I accept his word: Yes, he assisted in drafting this platform. He was for it then; he is for it now. He has only one thing to do; that is to resign from the Government. This is a very serious matter. Here is a Government where gentlemen are united to carry on the affairs of the country. We have on the Government benches two groups of ministers who differ absolutely one from the other, not on secondary issues, but on the issue of the day. I would be very much interested in knowing what the views of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization are on this question. I know where the able young Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) stands. He stands with my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Currie). I know where my good friend the hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) stands; he stands where he stood in 1911. I know where my hon. friend the Minister of the Civil Service (Mr. Maclean) stands, and I know where my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture stands. He stated it with a plainness and a frankness that I would like to have the other members of the Government practise. Let us, then, test the frankness, the truthfulness, of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration. He said the other evening that he was a Liberal and that nobody could eject him from the Liberal party. He said that he stood with the farmers whom he represented in this House. Here is the platform of the farmers of the three large Prairie Provinces. We have the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that he stands by that platform. I want to know if the Minister of Immigration is the same gentleman who goes out west and whispers to the farmers that he is their friend and that their policy will prevail. Let him speak boldly and proudly this evening. Let us see if he will imitate the good sense and judgment of his colleagues. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to pause for a moment I would like him to answer as the Minister of Agriculture has done.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CALDER: If I may be allowed—

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has already spoken and it is a reversal of the rule and practice of the House that a member who is speaking should interrogate hon. members who have already spoken and who are in their seast.

An hon. MEMBER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are proceeding away beyond the bounds of order in permitting the hon. gentleman to speak.

Mr. CALDER: If I may be allowed just one word, I think that before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) asks me to answer that question he should answer a question himself. He intimated that he agreed with some of the planks of that platform. He has not taken the House into his confidence to the extent of telling it which of the planks in the platform he agrees with. When he asks me the very general question if I agree with every plank in the platform I think he should at least state his own position.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Then I am to understand that that is the plain, unvarnished answer of the Minister of Immigration?

Mr. CALDER: No; the hon. gentleman has no right to interpret my words at all. There will be lots of opportunities during this session to state exactly where I stand on these various questions, and when the proper time comes I will state where I stand. But I do not propose to be moved in that way by him during the course of a debate to state my position in a general way in reference to a great many matters of very general interest.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House will readily see the very difficulty I anticipated when I endeavoured to prevent the minister from replying. The proceeding is unusual and very irregular, and I would recommend that it be discontinued.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a good thing that the Rules of the House should force me to—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was not blaming the Speaker at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What order?

An hon. MEMBER: Order in Council.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think that the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) is questioning the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I did not question the ruling of the Chair. It is an excellent ruling and we had an eloquent but typical answer from the Minister of Immigration. He stands by that answer and the people of the West will judge. In my opinion, he remains true to himself. I was told when he came here that he was a little bit of a trickster and something of a ward politician.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is one word that the hon. gentleman should withdraw and which I call upon him to withdraw, namely, that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization is a trickster. That word is certainly far beyond the bounds of Parliamentary language.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I bow to your decision with pleasure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw, withdraw.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is most amusing that we should have such an aggregation before us this evening—two groups of ministers on the vital issues of the day differing absolutely one from the other. Of course, we shall hear more during the session, and some means will be found to test the principles of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization on the tariff. At all events, the House knows this evening where the Minister of Agriculture stands.

He was not afraid, he did not beat about the bush, he said yes. Mr. Speaker, this is a very vital issue, and it has engrossed the attention of the press of western Canada of late. The farmers of the West sent a representative here some days ago, a gentleman by the name of Rice Jones, and I wonder whether he is an annexationist or not. That gentleman canvassed the opinions of the hon. members who represent western constituences, and according to The Manitoba Free Press of March 15th, here is what he reports:

> The wire sent to Ottawa and the replies received from some of the Alberta members follow:
> Full Board Meeting of United Farmers now sitting at Calgary request that you, while in Ottawa, present farmers' platform to Government, as representing the organized farmers of Alberta in lieu of sending delegates from here with joint deputation from three Prairie Provinces.
> Also make personal demands on each of Alberta members on behalf of their former constituents, that they work and vote for enactment into legislation of reforms embodied in platform at present session. Am mailing copy of platform to each Alberta member.

The following are opinions of western members. I quote from the newspapers:

> From Michael Clark—I have been working along the lines indicated for many years, and you can rely on my continuing to do so.

No beating about the bush in the case of the hon. member from Red Deer.

> J. M. Douglas—I may say that all the Western men are a unit in support of a measure of this kind, and we have strong hopes that something will be done this session.

Of course, "Hope springs eternal in the human breast."

> H. H. Halliday—I can assure you that I fully appreciate the necessity of this action, and am glad to be able to advise you that the members for the three Prairie Provinces are almost—

He had the Minister of Immigration in mind.

> —unanimous on this subject.
> W. A. Buchanan—I can state my position very briefly. I am in entire sympathy with the platform, and have advocated it in my newspaper. I will use my influence as a member of the House of Commons to forward its adoption in the legislature.
> D. L. Redman—I will give this matter my earnest and sympathetic attention.
> Mr. Rice Jones, who has just returned from Ottawa was very pessimistic over anything being done this session on the tariff. The situation appeared to be that while the western Union members were solid on the tariff issue for reform yet they were hesitating to embarrass the Government by coming out and voting for them and thereby possibly defeating the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I leave it at that. I hope that we shall hear from some of the western members, so that we may find out if they really are trying to press forward the adoption of the tariff platform, but hesitate before defeating the Government. My hon.

friend the Minister of Immigration has inquired where I stood on the fiscal question.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: On the whole platform.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: I must say that for my part, with very few exceptions I would readily subscribe to that platform.

Hon. Mr. CALDER: Will the hon. gentleman allow me?

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is not in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is perfectly in order for a question to be put to an hon. gentleman who has the floor, with his consent. I do not think it is proper for an hon. gentleman who has the floor to interrogate various hon. members who have already spoken and who are in their seats.

Hon. Mr. CALDER: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question?

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: Pardon me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is very canny, but he is not canny enough for me. He wanted to know where I stood on the fiscal question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, that was the question. I will tell my hon. friend where I stand, order having been restored. I will quote chapter and verse. The last great message of the former leader of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration, was delivered in this city on the 14th of January last, and his platform has been published, just as the platform of the western farmers, as drafted by my friend the Minister of Agriculture, has been published. I may say for the information of the House that this platform, which was unanimously adopted by the Liberals assembled at Ottawa on the 14th of January last, was prepared under the supervision of the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier. After having recited the many resolutions concerning the tariff, moved whilst he was in office and leader of the Opposition, the platform thus concludes:

> Now therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this Association, not only should the said Tariff increases of 7½ per cent and 5 per cent be immediately repealed, but that there should also be an immediate downward revision of the Tariff in accordance with the above mentioned omnibus resolution moved by the Liberal Opposition in the House of Commons on May 23rd, 1917, in these terms:—
> 1. That wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list.
> 2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.
> 3. That staple foods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and foods therefor be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.
> 4. That substantial reductions be made in the general Tariff on all articles imported into Canada, excepting luxuries.
> 5. That the British Preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general Tariff.

That, Mr. Speaker, is my platform. I shall have an opportunity during the present session to vote for it, and I invite those westerners who represent the three Prairie Provinces to support that policy, because I can assure my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, who drafted the farmers' platform, and I can assure my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and those others who are acting in good faith on the tariff issue, that after the caucus of to-morrow they will know they cannot get anything from the present Government so far as tariff reducions are concerned. Here is where I stand, and I am in good company. I also stand for the fair treatment of soldiers and sailors; for generous care for dependents of the fallen; for the gradual democratization of labour; for the abolition of Government by Order in Council; for the abolition of press censorship; for the repeal of the War-Time Elections Act; and for a League of Nations. There may be some slight differences between the farmers' platform and the Liberal platform. I stand by my leader—I follow his fiery cross—and I stand by my party on this tariff issue. I do not beat about the bush as the Minister of Immigration does.

Mr. CALDER: The hon. gentleman has not stated whether or not he agrees with the farmers' platform on the tariff. I would very much like to be informed as to that.

An hon. MEMBER: What about you, now?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I stated a moment ago where I stood when I read the platform laid down by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. My hon. friend is hard of understanding this evening. He cannot comprehend a plain statement; he abhors truth. I said that there were differences, but very slight differences, between the farmers' platform and the Liberal platform. I stand by the Liberal platform, and I think that the farmers of this country will stand by it, too, when the time comes.

One word about our national ideals. The President of the Privy Council (Hon. N. W. Rowell) in his speech the other day sung the glories of new Imperialism—that Imperialism of the round-table clubs; that Imperialism of the Rotary clubs; that Imperialism of many of the so-called Canadian clubs. The hon. gentleman described what that chesty Imperialism meant to Canada. "We are going to have," he said, "a voice in the foreign affairs of the British Empire." Mr. Speaker, if there is anything for which I should thank the member for Shelburne and Queen's, it is the description he gave the other evening of that form of Imperialism. In this case his staunch loyalty cannot be questioned. He rendered a really valuable service to the country as he unveiled, with a humour worthy of Sam Slick, our nakedness as a nation. The picture which he presented is really a snap-shot of our colonial status, well worthy to be classed with the most famous paintings of the world. That imaginary interview between Lloyd George and Woodrow Wilson with regard to our real position at the Peace Conference is, in my humble judgment, a masterpiece, and that masterpiece—think of it, Mr. Speaker—is signed "William Stevens Fielding," not "Henri Bourassa." The irony of it all is that the President of the Privy Council has endeavoured to establish before this House the great benefits which Canada would derive from that War Cabinet. First of all, he says, we will evolve from that War Cabinet a Cabinet of governments—and then we have succeeded in obtaining new channels of communication. Let us see. Canada was conquered in 1759; the Treaty of Paris was signed in 1763; and through a slow process of evolution we have succeeded at last, according to the President of the Privy Council, in obtaining new channels of communication; hereafter the Prime Minister of Canada will be able to write personally and directly to the Prime Minister of England. What a noble conquest! Have we nothing else to expect, Mr. Speaker? Why, we have sent overseas to fight in the great war an army of 500,000 men; I think it was stated in the House that we had more men in the field than Wellington, Napoleon, and Blucher had altogether at Waterloo. We are saddled with a debt of about $2,000,000,000 and we mourn the loss of 60,000 of the bravest. Let us see for a moment whether we as Canadians have really won something out of this welter of blood.

Take, for instance, the trade mission that went to England on the morrow of the great victory, composed of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), but chiefly of Mr. Lloyd Harris and Mr. Jones, two able men, two bright Canadians. No better men could be found to advocate the cause of Canada.

The member for Shelburne and Queens read the other evening some words from the pen of Norman Lambert. I have read for years Norman Lambert's correspondence in the Globe; he is one of the best informed men in the country. But if you have followed the correspondence of Norman Lambert during the last few weeks, you must have noticed that the member for Shelburne and Queens read only part of it the other day. I hold in my hand one of his latest contributions to the Winnipeg Free Press—and when I read it I confess that I hung my head in shame. He describes there how the trade envoys of Canada have been treated by the clerks of Downing Street and elsewhere. It is true that the trade restrictions against Canada have been removed, but they have been removed only until the first of next September. Our Trade Commissioners have, according to Mr. Lambert, had to read the Riot Act to the British authorities in order to put an end to the policy of discrimination against Canada. In this letter of March 13 he tells us of his interview with Mr. Harris. Mr. Harris said:

> We have waited patiently for some change in policy, which up to the present time has not come. We hope that the effect of our representations may be that a change in policy here will soon be brought about. If we cannot get any satisfaction, I am afraid this whole question will be a serious one for the Canadian Government to consider, as our view is that, being a part of the British Empire, we should at least have equal rights—

Fancy, Mr. Speaker, we were denied equal rights. (Reading):

> —within the Empire, and certainly that there should be no discrimination against any part of the Empire.

And he says further:

> Canada entered the war with Great Britain and immediately her industries were converted into plants for the production of war materials and necessities.
> Any basis of imports from Canada during the years 1914 to 1918, therefore, it is contended by the Trade Mission, must show a discrimination against the Dominion whose people, during those four years, of necessity, enjoyed no other export trade in manufactured goods than those required for war. During the same period, Canada's boats were requisitioned, and it became impossible for Canadian exporters to find the necessary shipping space for cargoes consigned to Britain. Those same boats, in many instances, as Mr. Lloyd Harris stated in his memorandum to Lloyd George, were being operated from the United States to Great Britain, the space reserved for commercial products being used by exporters in the United States.

Mark this. Our ships were requisitioned by the Admiralty; they were commandeered, and then they were sent to United States ports and the Canadian exporters were refused space and preference was given to the American exporters. That is how Canadians have been treated. He says further:

At the earnest solicitation of the Canadian Government, it is said, these industries prepared to equip themselves to engage in post-war export business, and particularly to compete for trade which formerly was held largely by Germany. Now, these companies find themselves in a position where they are entirely prevented from sharing in such business, so far as Great Britain is concerned while neutral countries which were fortunate enough to have established a trade with Great Britain prior to the war, now have the privilege of renewing their old connections. Obviously, this policy of granting import licenses to applicants who must prove pre-war importations, has the effect even of re-establishing those lines of trade dominated by enemy countries before the war.

Mr. Harris says further:

It is deplorable—

In spite of the new channels of communication.

—that so much ignorance exists in the British Government about Canada. The only idea they seem to have is that we should produce agricultural products, while they produce manufactured goods. They do not realize that we have had a very important industrial development, and that we are very rapidly getting into a position where they will have to consider us as competitors.

Here is the situation in a nutshell. Canada, as I stated a moment ago, took a very prominent part in this war. We sent 500,000 men overseas. We have lost 60,000 men and thousands are coming home crippled, maimed for life. Our national debt, as a result of the war, is simply appalling and we shall have an enormous pension Bill to vote for many years to come. On the very morrow of the victory, we send our trade envoys to Great Britain, and you have the result of their mission in what I have just read to the House. The manufacturers of this country should not be surprised at the attitude of England concerning their manufactured goods. Why, this was the policy of Mr. Chamberlain. Mr. Chamberlain, the father of that new Imperialism, which my hon. friend, in his speech the other night, extolled to the seventh heaven, did not, at the Imperial Conference —and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) is my witness—conceal his opinion about Canadian manufacturers. He told them: there are many things which you do not now manufacture, many things for which we have a great capacity of production; leave them to us as you have left them hitherto. That is to say, Canada should be satisfied to export to Britain wheat and raw materials, but as regards manufactured goods, that trade belongs to John Bull.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will my hon. friend be good enough to explain—I do not understand it yet—how our manufactured goods were prevented, by this arrangement, from being sent overseas?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know they were prevented by this licensing system—

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not understand it.

Mr. LEMIEUX:—and by the embargo. We have here the sorry, sad, and melancholy comment of such stout Canadians and Britishers as Mr. Lloyd Harris and Mr. Frank Jones. This is not a new policy. It was the policy of Mr. Chamberlain, the father of that Imperialism; he did not want our manufacturers to compete with the British manufacturers. There is a lesson to be drawn from this last incident. Let us think of Canada, first, last and always. Let us be Canadians inspired by British ideals, but loyal, first, last and always to our native country, Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was fairly intimate with the policy of the late Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain and I never heard him make such a statement. Will the hon. member be good enough to give an example of where Mr. Chamberlain objected to goods manufactured in Canada coming into Great Britain?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will give the example of the "hidden list"—the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens will remember it—a list of manufactured goods which in any preferential agreement with the Mother Country should not compete with British goods. I have chapter and verse and I shall be happy, on another occasion, to convey that information to my hon. friend.

Let us be Canadians, inspired always by British ideals, but loyal to our country. I am not advocating the independence of Canada. I am not hinting at any annexation movement. Far be that from my thoughts. I am a Canadian. My ancestors were in this country three hundred years ago, and I am not going to sell my birthright for a mess of pottage. I am a Canadian and I am a Britisher, but I say that the time has come, after this great war in which we have made so many sacrifices—that, in the words of Sir John A. Macdonald, "we should think of our country always." I remember a speech delivered by Sir John Thompson, on the occasion of the death of Sir John A. Macdonald, and I find these words in appreciation of the career of that great chieftain:

> Sir John's love of Canada and his desire to serve her must be put far in front of all his characteristics. His daily thought might be expressed in Webster's words: "Let our one object be our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country." "Nothing but our country" in the sense that Canada was to be first of all, in every consideration of public policy or personal action. His true and deep Canadianism was the "pillar or cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night," to the hundreds of thousands whom he led as no man could have led by a mere party banner."

That was the Canadian policy of Sir John A. Macdonald. It was also the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

We have responsible Government in Canada and we cannot turn back to colonialism. I do not share the views of my esteemed friend and colleague the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) that we should be satisfied to let the Colonial Office in London manage the affairs of Canada.

I have a little more pride than that. We are not a nation of one million or two million, but a nation of eight million people, and some day when good times come back, when a Liberal administration comes into office perhaps we shall have a population of ten or fifteen million. We have won responsible government. Formerly, England drafted our tariffs, managed our post office affairs, looked after our public works, involved us in her commercial treaties, and defended Canada with her regulars. But we have outlived that policy, and to revive it now would simply be to ignore our national dignity. For eighty years Canada has been working towards greater efficiency, greater self-reliance, and more complete self-government. In matters of defence, we control not only our land forces, but our naval forces also. As a Canadian—I am speaking only for myself—I stand by the policy of ruling our own country and looking after our own affairs. A nation, like the individual, must go forward—not go backwards, crab-like. We must go forward, and I am looking hopefully forward to the day when there will be, not a colony or even a dominion of Canada, but a Kingdom of Canada. That was the view held by the fathers of Confederation. Sir, the fathers of Confederation delighted to proclaim that their offspring was to be a nation, and they did not hesitate to assign to Canada prophetically and proudly, its place and order among the nations of the earth. The Hon. Adams G. Archibald, of Nova Scotia, said that the united provinces "would form a nation which in all the elements that constitute real greatness might be ranked as the third or fourth on the face of the globe." Lt.-Col. Gray, of New Brunswick, said that they "wanted a national union, one which would enable them to take an honourable place among the nations of the earth." The Hon. Chas. Fisher, of New Brunswick, said that the federation "would be the fourth maritime power in the world. England, France and the United States would alone be superior to it." Sir George E. Cartier said that the delegates had "met to inquire whether it were possible for the provinces from their present fragmentary and isolated materials, to form a nation or kingdom." Sir John A. Macdonald said that the delegates had in view "the noble object of founding a great British monarchy in connection with the British Empire and under the British Queen." He said:—

> I am a subject of a great British-American nation, under the government of Her Majesty, and in connection with the Empire of Great Britain and Ireland.

"Confederation," he added, "would give them the national prowess and strength which would make them at least the fourth nation on the face of the globe." He preferred for the title of the new confederation "The Kingdom of Canada," and he desired an Imperial alliance with the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with the Crown as the sufficient bond of union. At another time Sir John A. Macdwonald said that the new constitution "was intended to be, as far as circumstances would permit, similar to that of the Imperial Government, and recognizing the Sovereign of Great Britain as its sole and only head."

Sir, I accept the views of the Fathers of Confederation, and notably the noble views of the late Sir John A. Macdonald. The British Empire must assume this grander character and rise to its higher ideal. I claim that there should be not inferiority, but equality; not subservience, but equipollence; not subjection either of Canada to the United Kingdom now, or of the United Kingdom to Canada, but absolute and unreserved brotherhood, making with Australia, South Africa and other great nations " a galaxy of nations." That phrase was coined by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he spoke in England at the time of the Diamond Jubilee. But in order to attain to the proud position of being a kingdom in the sense that there will be a feeling of brotherhood between all the British Dominions and the Mother Country, we must first of all be a united people. And I think the House will agree with me that the time has come to unite the Canadian people of all creeds, of all races and of all provinces. I remember a great speech delivered by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Nova Scotia at an Acadian convention a few years ago. He told his audience that during his visit to the old country he had admired the noble proportions of some of the Gothic cathedrals of England and of France, and he prophesied that Canada too some day would take the form of a Gothic cathedral. "In that wonderful architecture," he said, " there is marble, and it remains marble; there is granite, and it remains granite; there is oak, and it remains oak; but those materials are blended into a harmonious whole." Mr. Speaker, we have in this country the best elements of which to create the great Kingdom of Canada. The very best races of the world are here—the sturdy Scot, the impulsive Frenchman, the warm-hearted Irishman, and the cool and brainy Englishman. Sir, if these races, representing as they do the loftiest ideals and the noblest traditions of Europe, are blended together after this war in which our men have played such a noble and lasting part, we shall then be in a position to build a great Canadian nationality.

Mr. JOHN FLAWS REID (Mackenzie): I congratulate the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) on the very able manner in which he has held the attention of this House for nearly two hours and three-quarters. I shall not inflict myself upon the House for that length of time. I am sorry the hon. member cannot swallow the organized farmers' platform, but I suppose he is not used to taking pills of that kind unless they are sugar-coated with politics. I understand that my hon. friends came into power in 1896 on a platform as radical in many lines as the present farmers' platform, and it was practically forgotten for fifteen years by my hon. friend and his associates. Now I want to say as a farmer from the prairies that the farmers of the West—I can speak for them—are not as easily caught to-day as they were in 1896; and if my good friend and his associates want to get the farmers' support they will have to undertake, not as a pre-election promise, but at once, a thorough house-cleaning on their side of the House, so that they may say with some degree of truth that they are Liberals indeed.

I wish in passing, Mr. Speaker, to refer to some of the statements made by the gallant colonel who represents the constituency of North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). I shall borrow a phrase for the time being from the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). I am of the opinion that we have two prophets in this House. At all events I am sure we have at least one, representing the constituency of North Simcoe. Unfortunately he is a prophet who predicts destruction. He tells us of the great calamities that will befall Canada if the tariff is interfered with; and that reminds me of a statement that was made in the city of Winnipeg some years ago by a secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, when he said that the Manufacturers' Association of Canada was so strongly organized that, if they saw fit, they could cause the grass to grow on the streets of any town or city in the Dominion of Canada. Perhaps my friend from Simcoe is one of that number. He made the statement in regard to the embargo on wheat, endeavouring to make us believe that it was the American Government that put on that embargo. If I am correct—and I believe I am—the embargo was put on by the Government of Canada at the request of the British Government in order that the foodstuffs of Canada might be preserved for Great Britain and her Allies; and even if the embargo had been imposed by the American Government conditions would not compare at all with those of normal times. Then he states that there was a duty on foodstuffs in Canada of 27½ per cent, but he failed to tell us how this would enable the labourers or mechanics working in factories in the cities to obtain their foodstuffs cheaper. I think he made a mistake when he quoted that figure of 27½ per cent as the average duty on foodstuffs. Next, in dealing with the land policy of the Government he gave some advice as to what the Government should do in regard to the returned soldiers. He said in effect that the Government should give to the soldiers land on the same terms as given to the South African veterans, implying I presume, that they should be issued scrip. Now any one who has been in the West for any length of time knows that very few soldiers who received scrip settled on the land. It was merely a bonanza for the speculators, who bought the scrip at a trifling figure; and as a result many of the scrip lands to-day lie unoccupied. But while the gallant Colonel (Mr. Currie) who has had the honour to represent North Simcoe would like the Government to do well by the returned soldier, I would suggest to him one way in which he might very materially help those returned men who desire to go on the land. I presume he is a member of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Might he not persuade the association at least to give our soldiers who go on the land their implements duty free? That would be a considerable help to those men. The hon. member launched an attack on Mr. H. W. Wood of Alberta, President of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, a man who has been re-elected to that position by acclamation for two or three years. I have known the gentleman myself for a number of years and can say most emphatically that he has a character at which no one can point a finger; and before any hon. member in this House makes any charge against him, he should at least be armed with the proof; and I hope that before very long Mr. H. W. Wood will request the hon. member for Simcoe to prove his words. The hon. member tells us that a concern with which he is connected successfully competed in the foreign market to the tune of $9,000,000. Well, I am glad to know that, Mr. Speaker. The western farmers are glad to know that the Canadian manufacturers are able to compete in the foreign market against any manufacturer in the world, and if they can compete in the foreign market thousands of miles away from home, the query is why can they not compete right at home? He says—in order to scare us, I suppose—that the Canadian manufacturers are commencing to build factories in the United States because there is a fear of the tariff being interfered with. That may be so. I do not doubt the words of any hon. member of this House, but I would like to have the proof of that assertion; and if the manufacturers are doing that, the remedy is quite simple—lower the tariff to the same level as the American tariff, and then our Canadian manufacturers will have access to a field where there are one hundred millions of people, while the American manufacturers will have access to eight millions. I think that the advantages are on the side of the Canadian manufacturers, if they could see it. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) says they cannot see it—but there are none so blind as those who will not see. Then the hon. member goes on to say that the farmers of the West are Bolshevists, that they are stirring up strife. Shortly after that, however, he evidently forgets himself, for he says that the farmers in the West mostly all came from Ontario. Now, if his first statement is correct, that the farmers of the West are mostly Bolshevists, then good old Ontario must be a cradle of Bolshevism. The hon. member says he became a convert to high protection when he sat at the feet of the late Sir John A. Macdonald. I am not at all surprised that the hon. member for North Simcoe became a convert to high protection when he had the great privilege of sitting at the feet of such an illustrious leader; but I am convinced of this that when the late Sir John A. Macdonald was buried, my hon. friend from North Simcoe buried his intellect in that grave and that he had nothing more to learn in connection with tariff. Another of his prophesies is this: he says that if anything is done to the tariff there will be a state funeral. I understand that the hon. member for North Simcoe was one of the foremost men—he was indeed a very prominent man—at a banquet in the city of Toronto where seven of the Ginger group were present. Now, Mr. Speaker, he threatens there is going to be a state funeral if the tariff is disturbed, and, Sir, I am of the opinion that the funeral he refers to will be the funeral of the Ginger Group which he represents. I am of the opinion that the Canadian manufacturers represent the situation for trade in a cartoon which appeared in the Grain Growers' Guide about two months ago. This is a farm scene, Mr. Speaker, and you will pardon me for citing it here. The cartoon pictured a calf about two years old and the farmer trying to wean it away from the cow. It was nip and tuck which one would win—the farmer or the calf. It is my opinion that the longer we give high protection to our Canadian manufacturers, the longer will they want it to be maintained.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. J. F. REID: I am very glad to hear an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House say "Hear, hear." Then the hon. gentleman from Simcoe told us that the manufacturers did not make a profit of five per cent on their turn over. That statement is just a little misleading. Why did the hon. member for Simcoe not tell us what interest they made on their capital invested? Then we would understand what their profit amounts to. To state that they do not make five per cent on their overturn is very misleading. Perhaps he will inform us later on what interest the manufacturers make on their invested capital and also on their watered stock.

Mr. Speaker, in passing, I wish to add my tribute of praise to the late, beloved and lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and in doing so would simply say "Amen" to all the good things which have been said of him who has crossed the bar. A year ago when this Parliament met for the first time we did so under the great cloud of war, and the victory which has since been achieved was still hanging in the balance, and to many of us it seemed that victory was doubtful or at least a long way off, but to-day, as part of the British Empire, we rejoice with her and our Allies that victory has come to us, and the whole world breathes easier and our gallant victorious soldiers are now returning home to us. The task of taking care of our men and re-establishing them back in civil life will be equally as large an undertaking as the prosecution of the war and will bring up many new problems for our Government to handle. As an independent supporter of Union Government, it is my opinion, Sir, that it is well for Canada that we have a Union Government and not a party Government to grapple with the gigantic problem of reconstruction, and, Mr. Speaker, while the remark has been made by hon. members opposite that our Union Government, and especially the Minister of Immigration, was in a state of unpreparedness when the armistice was signed; even if that is so, Sir, I do not think it is very much to be wondered at, because we know that even the British Government, who were very much nearer the seat of war than we were, were of the opinion, and in fact, had made preparations for continuing the campaign for at least another winter. But, Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of the debate I do not wish to occupy the time of the House very long, but I wish to make a few remarks in passing on some of the problems that immediately confront us.

I would like first to say a word on the land policy of the present Government, which also applies to previous Governments, both Grit and Tory. We are informed, Sir, that there are about 15,000 homesteads available within 15 miles of our railways and that only 2,000 of them are fit for cultivation. I am informed we have over 4,000 soldiers at the present time ready and willing to go on to the land. To ask our returned soliders to go beyond the fifteen mile limit to homestead would be a crime, when we have 31 million acres of alienated, uncultivated and unoccupied land lying within the fifteen mile railway belt. This condition, Mr. Speaker, has not been brought about by this Government or by the policy of this Government but by the policies of past Governments, Liberal and Conservative; and we now find that our Dominion Government have got to go into the open market to buy back the lands which were previously sold for a trifle to speculators and corporations. When I say sold I would perhaps express it better if I said were given away for a trifle, for I understand that from $1 to $3 per acre was about the prevailing price received for our lands years ago.

I will now point out to you, Sir, some of the evils of the unoccupied lands. In the first place our unoccupied lands do not contribute anything towards the cost of construction of our railways other than the trifling amount for which they were sold. Then again, miles of railroads must be built past unoccupied lands to reach the occupied lands. While the occupied lands produce traffic for the road, and the exportable products help to pay the nation's debts, unoccupied lands produce no revenue and create no trade for the benefit of the road and further our unoccupied lands do not contribute anything towards paying the debts of the country; they retard the progress of settlement and in many cases prevent the establishment of schools; in many cases also they are not taxable and do not help to build or maintain public highways.

I would like to point out, Sir, to this Government the evil of selling lands to the individual or corporation without duties of occupancy attached. I would recommend to the careful consideration of this Government the selling of lands only to actual settlers. It is not the price obtained by the State by the sale of lands that enriches the state but rather the products of the soil which feeds the population, creates business and the exportable surplus must help pay the debt of our country. I would like also to point out to you the spirit of the West. When famine stared the British Empire and her Allies in the face, and our Government urged greater production, the West responded with a very large increased acreage put under cultivation. This was brought about partly by the fact that small tractors were brought into the country free of duty, and thereby the price was very materially reduced. But, Sir, the West might have taken the stand which Ireland took with the British Empire. We might have taken advantage of the critical time and said to our Government: No greater production and no more production until you give us the implements which we have to till the soil with duty free. But we did not. That is not the spirit of the West. Sir, we believe in a square deal; we believe in a fair fight. We believed that it was our duty to support our Government and to produce men, munitions and food to feed not only ourselves but to feed as far as we possibly could our brothers across the sea and the Allies. Then again, in recruiting the West responded nobly. On account of the very large percentage of foreign element which composes our settlers in the West the English-speaking citizens of the West recruited to a larger percent than any other province in the Dominion of Canada. It must also be borne in mind that a very large percentage of our population in the three Prairie Provinces are engaged in agriculture.

In the matter of prohibition the West today stands as strongly as ever for total prohibition, and I wish to inform you, Sir, that in the first place the Grain Growers' movement in the West was responsible to a very large degree for the bringing about of that policy. I noticed in our daily press that quite recently in the West organized labour in the cities of Calgary and Winnipeg declared that they do not want the liquor traffic re-introduced as it was before.

When the Union Government was formed at Ottawa in 1917 the West laid aside those questions which were considered contentious matters, and sent to Ottawa a practically solid support for that Government, believing that this form of administration was the best adapted to prosecuting the war and carrying on the business of the country. This may be largely accounted for by the fact that our Grain Growers' movement throughout the Prairie Provinces has been putting forward educational propaganda amongst our rural communities, showing our people the errors and the corruption of party government, and setting forth the high ideals of non-party government. The West, Sir, is still of opinion that the ideal is right, and it is up to this Government to bring forward legislation that will prove, not only to the West but to the entire Dominion of Canada, that Union Government is the ideal form, and that the days of party rule and party government are banished for all time.

Now, Sir, I wish to say a word or two in regard to our returned soldiers and some of the things which we should do for them. In the first place, I would recommend to the Government the establishment of a life insurance bureau for the returned soldiers who, prior to enlistment did not carry any life insurance and now find themselves physically unfit and unable to obtain life insurance in the old-line life insurance companies. This is something which I believe it is the duty of the State to carefully consider, and I think it is possible for the Government to establish such a bureau for our returned soldiers as will give them the necessary protection which life insurance affords and which, if economically managed, would be very little extra expense to the State.

Also in the matter of pensions it is the desire of our people that returned soldiers not only privates, but many officers as well, should be on an equality irrespective of rank, and in proof of my contention let me quote one instance. Two architects in the city of Regina enlisted. One of them rushed to the colours and joined up as a private. The other was a little more cautious; he went and took an officer's training. Both men went to the front, one as a private, and the other as an officer, and as good fortune would have it both returned to this country in the positions they had occupied overseas and were discharged from service. They were both entitled to a pension. Now, Mr. Speaker, is it right that the man who rushed to the colours at first, who did not think of what might come afterwards—as to whether or not he would get a pension—but enlisted right off, should only receive the pension of a private, whilst the other man is awarded the pension of an officer? I say most emphatically, no.

The State owes a duty to the orphans of our soldiers who sleep in the battlefields of France and Flanders. The State should make ample provision for these orphans and see that they go to school and receive a liberal education.

As to the soldiers who wish to go on the land, I would divide them into three classes. First, there is the farmer's son and the farm labourer who worked on the farm. These two, I consider, should make a success of farming; they should be encouraged to go on to the farms as speedily and with as little red tape as is possible. Another class is the clerks who have worked perhaps in banks, law offices and stores—men who never did any real, physical hard work, men who previously never did any farming. This should apply also to mechanics. Is it reasonable, Mr. Speaker, for us to think that men who never had any experience in farming—and farming is a science—when they go on to the land will make a success of it from the start? I say, no. It has been my duty and privilege to meet with Great War Veterans' Associations in the West and to address them. I have advised them strongly that if there are amongst them any amateurs who think they want to go farming, these men should take up a training, an apprenticeship of at least twelve months' actual work on the farm. Then at the end of that period they would know whether or not they wanted to go farming, and I venture to say, Mr Speaker, that the amateurs who take that training at the end of five years would be very much farther ahead than the man who might slip through, get his land and his loan and start without any previous experience.

Then again I find that many of our soldiers are apt to believe that they should be permitted to settle in groups or communities. I think, Mr. Speaker, that not only the Government, but those who are conversant with farming should know that the community system is doomed to be a failure from the word go. Each individual soldier should be encouraged to get on to his own land, because if the men are grouped together they will not have the benefit of living alongside a practical farmer—one who has made a success of farming—they will not have the advantage of going out and watching what the other farmer is doing so that they will do their work in the right way and at the proper time.

Now, as to the price of land. This perhaps is one of the most serious questions for us to consider. The price of land to-day in the West has, in my opinion, gone too high to enable wheat to be grown at a profit a few years hence when the price will be down to a normal basis. If I remember correctly Dean Rutherford, of the College of Agriculture in Saskatchewan, has said that $15 per acre for the average wheat land in that province was in his estimation the highest that should be paid. Many of you know that Dean Rutherford is one of the best authorities on agriculture in the West; and many farmers in this House from the West know the struggle they have had to pay for land which did not cost $15 an acre. I would urge upon the Government in the purchase of land for the soldiers to be very careful and not pay a price exceeding $15 an acre. I venture to say that very few indeed of our soldiers will come through successfully if more than that amount is paid for the land.

We cannot do too much for the returned soldier. We cannot do too much for the returned soldier who wishes to go on to the land to build up a home for himself. In purchasing his outfit he will need agricultural implements and harness. In the West the farmers use at least a four-horse team. The returned soldier will need two sets of harness, and he will find that to-day harness is very expensive. I notice that under our customs regulations the duty on harness is 30 per cent. Well, if our Government could see its way to remove the duty from everything that the soldier has to buy in the shape of an outfit, including agricultural implements, it would be one of the best things that could be done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the contentious matter, the tariff. I shall not enter into a long array of figures to show why the tariff should be reduced; I wish merely to deliver a message, first, from the people of my constituency who sent me here to represent them, and, second, from the province of Saskatchewan. I do this as a grain grower and a farmer.

I have lived on the prairies for thirty-six years; I know a little about farming and about buying agricultural implements. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) said in this House last session that he faced his first parliament in 1883. Well, I took up my homestead in 1883. I tried to build a home for myself and my family, and in doing so I was helping to develop the West. As soon as my necessities got beyond the first plough that I bought and I wanted to buy another to break more land and grow more grain and create more trade, what did I find? I was penalized by the tariff, which said to me: If you buy that plough, you must pay so much tariff for doing so. To say the least, it was not encouraging to a man to come all the way from free-trade Scotland into a country that penalized him because he was trying to do something to develop it.

For years organized agriculture in the West has petitioned the Government for relief with regard to the tariff. Now we make a request, and we do so in all earnestness. I will read a wire which I received from the president of the Canadian Council of Agriculture:

> Feeling of Western farmers on tariff very intense. Will not stand for any temporizing. My own opinion is there should be a general sharp levelling of tariff downward rather than undue reduction on a few articles, which will give no real relief. Tell Western members we are in dead earnest and expect them to stand by their guns.

Here is another from my constituency:

The question of ways and means is so basic in relation to all other matters that after much consideration would urge you not to be satisfied with anything less this session than a distinct step toward fiscal programme Canadian Council of Agriculture. If Government balks, let it take the responsibility; the sun will still rise and set.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the West believes that the Union Government will be able to read the handwriting on the wall. This is the ultimatum of organized agriculture. If you do not listen to the members who are here to-day, you certainly will have to deal with the West at no distant date.

I want to say a word with regard to the Canadian manufacturers, particularly the manufacturers of agricultural implements. Why is it, Sir, that our manufacturers will not treat us, the farmers of Canada, the same as they treat farmers in the British Isles, Australia, New Zealand, and European countries, where they sell their machinery in the open market, competing with other manufacturers of the world? I am informed on very reliable authority that the prices at which these implements are sold in Europe, Australia and New Zealand, are very much below the prices at which they are sold to the Canadian farmers. This applies particularly to us in the West. We are Canadians, and we wish to be treated at least the same as farmers are treated in other countries by our Canadian manufacturers. I do not think that is asking too much.

We know, Sir, that our Canadian mechanics are second to none in the world and that our Canadian manufacturers are stronger than many of the manufacturing concerns in the United States. Manufacturers have told us that electrical power in Canada, of which they use a good deal, is dearer than it is in the United States. I have a book issued by a commission in the United States before which Sir Adam Beck gave some very valuable information. I find from it that electrical power on this side of the line is about fifty per cent less than the price in the state of New York.

Organized agriculture does not for a minute want to put the Canadian manufacturer out of business, but we want to see him get down to competition. The wider field for him is the wider market. The necessary change in our tariff laws will open up to the Canadian manufacturer a field where there are 100,000,000 people and enable the American manufacturer to get into a field where there are 8,000,000 people.

The Second Vice-President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Mr. J. S. McKinnon, in an address to one of the clubs in Toronto, said that the Grain Growers wanted to escape practically all taxation. That is not so. If you read the platform of the Organized Farmers you will find that we have set forth a system of taxation which we believe would be suitable to conditions in Canada to-day. The Second Vice-President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association is not a strong high protectionist, as some members of this House are. He says:

The present tariff is imperfect. It has many contradictions and imperfections. As it has not been revised since 1907 and as there have been many changes in our national life since that date, especially on account of the war, it is obvious that the present tariff may not be suited to the conditions of the day. We believe that it should be revised, but revised scientifically.

Referring to the first statement made by Mr. McKinnon, the Organized Farmers' platform clearly sets forth the fact that the Grain Growers do not want to escape taxation; that they are willing and anxious to pay their full share. But we do object strenuously to paying taxes to bolster up the manufacturers under the present iniquitous tariff system. We are willing to pay taxes to the Dominion treasury, but not to the coffers of the manufacturers. Then Mr. McKinnon goes on to prophesy the bankruptcy which will come about in Canada if the tariff is removed. He asks whether the soldiers must wait and possibly be prevented from obtaining employment before the tariff laws are changed. I say emphatically, no. The soldier who goes on the land to farm is just as anxious as any other farmer that the tariff be reduced.

It must be distinctly understood that agriculture, being the basic industry of Canada, is the foundation stone upon which all our industries rest, and if that basic industry is not attractive as well as profitable, our industries will all suffer accordingly. The Government of Canada, therefore, must see to it that our basic industry prospers; if it does not, all industries will come to ruin which the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has predicted.

I pray for the indulgence of this House while I read a short extract from some literature which the Canadian Manufacturers' Association have supplied me with. Before doing so, I will read just two paragraphs from a statement made by Mr. Tom Moore, President of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, in an address which he delivered to the Canadian Club in the city of Toronto yesterday:—

I tell you if you are content to wait until revolution has taken place, you will have the upheaval in Canada as well as they had it in Russia and everywhere else. So declared Tom Moore, President of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada in an address to the Canadian Club here to-day, speaking on the subject of "industrial unrest of the present day."

He further stated:

Mr. Moore declared it was the duty of the Government to set the example for all employers in placing its own contracts. The Government should base its contracts on the best conditions of wages and employment that exists in the country, and not according to the local conditions, which were often unfavourable.

'Labour forces and many employing forces,' Mr. Moore said, 'believe that a greater measure of nationalization of some of the monopolies of the country should take place.'

Mr. Moore touched on the Tariff question. 'Any industry which needs a protective tariff should be prepared to place its books under Government inspections, and the inspection of its workmen and should show why it needs the tariff,' he declared. 'If you leave it to one side, I'm afraid you will have a hard time convincing the workers that a tariff is necessary.'

Let me quote just an extract from the Toronto Globe under date of January 30:

The manifesto of the Manufacturers' Association on the tariff leaves no room for doubt as to the attitude of the association towards the removal of the war tax on imported goods. . . . The issue between the high tariff manufacturers, who constitute what is relatively small proportion of the manufacturing interests of the Dominion and the consumer, is put plainly in the manifesto. An indefinite delay in tariff revision is proposed permitting the continuance of a fiscal system under which three-quarters of the taxation of the country is to be drawn from customs and war taxes upon imported goods and raw materials. A system of taxation so one-sided cannot be continued indefinitely. It oppresses the poor and unduly favours the rich, because the taxation is levied most heavily on food, clothing and household utensils which are as necessary in the homes of the poor as of the rich. . . . The conditions admitted by the Manufacturers' Association in its statement, that customs taxation on consumption yields over 75 per cent of all our federal revenue from taxes, ought not to be continued indefinitely. They stifle Canadian enterprise and overload the shoulders of the bread winner in humble circumstances upon whom customs taxation falls relatively far more heavily than the well-to-do.

Then the Ottawa Citizen says in effect:

The statement issued by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association replying to the platform of the organized Canadian Farmers says that the tariff reform policy of the farmers will revolutionize our present fiscal system. There is nothing to be afraid of in this reference to a possible fiscal revolution in Canada. People should be prepared for it, young people especially; for the time must undoubtedly come when Canada will be again a young man's country, emancipated from the control of the old men who staked everything on a belief in city industries. . . . . Whatever the outcome may be, the organized farmers should press forward with their educational propaganda. There can be nothing to fear from a policy of free trade with Great Britain in five years, and of the other proposed fiscal reforms in the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, provided that Canada is ready to become a young man's country again.

Then the Beacon, a newspaper published in the city of Stratford, says under date of January 31:

The Manufacturers' Association does not want any disturbance in the trade of the country which would be caused by a discussion on the tariff.

This is from the Montreal Star under date of February 5:

Let us get at the facts, promptly, radically, and in a spirit of justice, make a beginning first with the necessities of agricultural production. Let us work out a new national policy based upon the new national needs and freed from the old shibboleths.

Then the Manitoba Free Press has these words to say:

The statement published by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association yesterday in reply to the tariff planks in the Farmers' Platform evinces no desire to find a middle way between high protection and free trade. It admits that a revision of the tariff is due, urges its postponement until after the reconstruction period, and claims that their services to the country and the Allies during the war entitles the manufacturers to a free hand in transforming Canadian industry back again from war to peace conditions. The proposal to postpone even this technical consideration of the tariff until after the period of reconstruction is over shows the manufacturers to be as blind as ever to the real imperfections of the present situation. . . . The complete lack of statesmanlike vision among the manufacturers make more than ever imperative the discovery of it among the political leaders of the country. The farmers have spoken; the manufacturers have replied; and it remains for the Union Government, in its turn, to adumbrate a policy which will by firm reasonableness disarm the potential combatants and enable Canada to turn a united front towards the great task of meeting its obligations while building up a contented and prosperous community.

The Grain Growers' Guide has as usual something to say on the tariff. It has this article on February 5:

The main argument which the Canadian Manufacturers' Association advances against the tariff demands of the Farmers' Platform is that the present is not a wise nor safe time to lower the tariff. This argument may be accepted as pure camouflage. So far as the manufacturers are concerned, there never was and never will be a time when they will be willing to lower the tariff in any way, shape or form. They want the tariff as high as they can get it and to be kept there as long as it is possible.

I will read just one more extract, and that is from the Morning Leader of Regina, Sask., under date of February 1:

The people of Canada have listened to many a wailing appeal from the manufacturers of Canada in the years that have elapsed since the Conservative party, away back in the seventies, committed this country to the pernicious policy of high tariff protection. During a period of over forty years every hint or suggestion of a reduction of tariff, no matter how small, or how restricted it may have been to a few items, has been the signal for the manufacturers to put up a poor mouth, and cry like the infants they at such times profess their industries to be. On other occasions, however, they puff themselves and ask admiring people to gaze upon their strength and greatness, and the pre-eminent place they occupy in making Canada a nation and giving to it its present stability and prosperity. Canadian manufacturers are puny, weak infants when they are clamouring for favours, or when anything threatens them; but they are giants, bold and unafraid, when they are in a position to dictate to the Government and the masses of the people. It is questionable, however, if during all these years the manufacturers ever issued such a palpable, dishonest, snivelling disgusted appeal as that handed out this week by the general manager of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association by direction of the executive council of that body. It is worthy of the despicable, unspeakable Hun, who, having plundered, destroyed and mutilated to the limit of his ability, throws up his hands when the hour of retribution comes, and like a coward shrieks "Kamerad! Kamerad!" The present wailing appeal of the manufacturers indicates how thoroughly frightened they have become on account of the rising tide of national indignation against the present high tariff which is robbing the people and draining the very life-blood of the nation into the pocket-book and safety vaults of the big interest magnates.

There are several other quotations that I could read, but I wish merely to show to the House that the press of Canada is fairly equally divided on the issue. In fact, I believe, if the balance were found, that the majority of the press would be on the side of the organized farmers.

RAILWAY BELT ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. Meighen (Minister of the Interior) Bill No. 3, to amend the Railway Belt Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—issue of patent for land held by deceased settler.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The clause adopted last session permitted the patent to issue in the name of the deceased person, but did not go on to state what the legal effect of that would be. Another clause similar to this was passed with relation to Dominion lands, and did go on to state what the legal effect would be, namely, to vest the land in the heirs and devisees according to the law of the province. The Deputy Minister of Justice takes the view that the legal effect is doubtful under the amendment of last session, and that an amendment should be made to the same effect as in the clause with relation to Dominion lands.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 4, to amend the Yukon Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Council reduced from ten members to three,

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the Minister will give some explanation as to the necessity of this Bill and what its purpose is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill has three clauses. The first clause provides for the reduction of the Yukon Council from ten members to three. The Act of last session empowered the Governor in Council to abolish the Yukon council altogether and establish in its place an appointive body if the Governor in Council saw fit, or an appointive organization of any kind. After conferring with the Yukon Commission, I have come to the conclusion, with the approval of my colleagues, that it would be better to maintain the elective body, but that there is no necessity for so large a body; and it is therefore intended to reduce it from ten to three. It is also intended by clause 3 of the Bill, which I may refer to now, to reduce the annual indemnity from $600 to $400. This is necessitated by the reduction in the estimates, and justified by the reduction of the population in the Yukon.

Mr. DEVLIN: Might I ask the minister if it is the desire of the Yukon council that this Bill should be put through, or if any communication has been received from the Yukon council respecting the Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No communication has been received from the Yukon council respecting the Bill that I am aware of.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: In the early history I stood for an elective council and against the appointive council. I have not changed my views on this important question, and I am glad to see that the elective principle is retained, and that the people will be able to carry on their affairs as they have been accustomed to carry them on, and in accordance with the principles of democracy.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does it not appear to the hon. Minister that any deliberative body managing the affairs of any territory and consisting of only three persons is very small? It seems to me that it would be almost impossible to carry on the business of any considerable country by a body consisting of only three members. It has to be a miniature assembly. It must have a chairman, or a speaker, and that leaves only two men on the floor; and if one moves a motion and the other refuses to second it, there is a deadlock. It would appear to me that there should be at least five men, as the smallest possible number charged with managing the affairs of any province; and I really think the hon. minister should allow this Bill to stand and have a very serious consultation with the representative from the Yukon with a view to seeing whether it is not advisable to make this body larger than is proposed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is true the body is not very large; but while the territory over which it would have jurisdiction is large, the population is very small. The population of the Yukon Territory to-day is only the population of a very small town. I have had the privilege and advantage of a conference with the member for the Yukon on this subject and also with the Yukon Commissioner, who has been for many years associated with the administration of that territory, and I thought it was advisable to reduce the total expenditure to something commensurate with the size of the population; and in doing so I find it necessary to recommend the reduction that is contained in the Bill. This reduction meets with the approval of the Commissioner of the Yukon Territory. Regard must also be had to the fact that it is a very circumscribed area of jurisdiction they exercise. A great deal of the administration under the Act is vested in the Minister of the Interior and in the Yukon Branch of that department.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: May I ask how the members of the council are elected?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is provided for by another section. They are elected by districts.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Does this include Dawson City?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: I might say for the information of the hon. gentleman that it is proposed to have three districts, each electing one member. The city of Dawson will be one district, the gold-producing creeks in the vicinity of Dawson and the Stewart river will be district No. 2, and the country around White Horse will be district No. 3.

Mr. DEVLIN: What is the jurisdiction of the Yukon council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is really a question that would require some study of the Act in order to answer, and it would take some time.

Mr. DEVLIN: Roughly speaking?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have jurisdiction analogous to that of a town council. They maintain a sort of municipal organization.

Mr. DEVLIN: They have roads to deal with, and I presume they must have something to do with the internal legislation of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not very much.

Mr. DEVLIN: Have they a Speaker?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it is a council, not a parliament.

Mr. DEVLIN: It is something in the form of a commission?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very much.

Mr. DEVLIN: And besides the council there is a regular commissioner?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the regular commissioner is an officer of the Government and performs the active functions of Governor of the Territory. The great bulk of administrative work is on him, and he attends meetings of the council.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: Perhaps I can answer the hon. member. The Yukon council is an advisory body. Any Money Bill must originate with the Commissioner of the Territory who is a direct representative of the Federal Government and through whom all moneys voted by Parliament are expended. Money Bills originate with the Governor and he presents them to the council. No money Bill can originate with the council. The council may meet and make ordinances for the good of the country.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Have they got the power to impose taxation for municipal purposes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have a limited power of taxation.

Mr. ROBB: This advisory council was originally composed of ten members and the minister proposes to reduce it to three. What is the difference between the per capita representation as the council originally stood and as the minister proposes to reduce it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not sure that I know the maximum population which the Yukon reached, but it seems to me that it will bear to the present population not far from the ratio of ten to three. The hon. member for Yukon would perhaps answer that question more accurately than I.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: It is very difficult to tell what the population of the Yukon was when it reached its highest point. It was estimated at from 25,000 to 40,000.

Mr. ROBB: Was the council of ten formed at the time when the population was at its greatest?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: When the population was at its greatest the territory was governed by a council appointed by the Federal Government. Judge Dugas, afterwards the Chief Justice of the Territorial Court, served on that council, as did the Commissioner of the Territory, the Controller, the head of the Northwest Mounted Police and the Gold Commissioner. They were all Federal officials. At first the Government permitted the people of the territory to elect two representatives. That was in 1902. In 1904 they were given the right to elect five and at the next election after that they were given the right to elect the whole council of ten. I think that perhaps the population of the territory had reached the apex of the curve by the time the council was made elective.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the hon. gentleman state whether this Bill is satisfactory to him as the representative of the Yukon?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I take the responsibility of saying that it is satisfactory to me after having consulted with the Commissioner of the Territory, a number of people in the territory and the Minister of the Interior. Some people in the territory would like to have the council abolished and an appointive council created under this statute, but as I said a moment ago I could not convince myself that that was quite in keeping with the spirit of the times, and I am glad to know that the elective principle is being maintained.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sections 11 and 12 give power to the Commissioner in Council to impose taxes for any purpose within his jurisdiction; respecting the summoning of juries and the enforcement of the attendance of jurors for the trial of civil and criminal cases; the control and regulation of the sale of and traffic in intoxicating liquor in the territory, which is drawing to its close as no liquor has been allowed in for a time, and the preservation of game in the territory.

On section 2—franchise extended to women for election of council:

Mr. MEIGHEN: That extends woman's suffrage to the Yukon Territory.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister please read the section as it is amended?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 9 as amended in 1908 reads as follows:

> The Commissioner in Council may prescribe the qualifications of those entitled to vote at an election of Members to the Council; provided that only those persons shall be entitled to so vote who are natural born or naturalized male British subjects of the full age of twenty-one years, and who have resided in the Territory for a period of twelve months prior to the date of the election.

This adds, after the word "male" the words "or female."

Mr. McKENZIE: That is universal suffrage?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It puts the female suffrage on the same basis as the male suffrage.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is no qualification except that they shall be British subjects and 21 years of age?

Mr. MEIGHEN: And shall have resided in the territory for twelve months prior to the date of the election.

On section 3—indemnity of councillors reduced from $600 to $400:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This reduces the indemnity from $600 to $400 which is considered sufficient.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: Representations have been made to me from the Yukon that the indemnity should be left as it is; that is to say at $600. The minister has already stated that one of the objects of this legislation is to give a more economical legislature for the territory. However, in view of the fact that we are cutting down the number from ten to three, I think the minister would be well advised if he left the indemnity as it is at $600. They make that suggestion to me. It is only a matter of $600 as between the $400 and $600 for the three members.

Mr. DEVLIN: How long do they sit in a year?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: Like our Parliament here, they do not sit any particular number of days in a year. They sit until the business of the territory has been finished. They sit once a year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do they sit at night?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: Sometimes they sit at night.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: They sit only once a year?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: Once a year, the same as Parliament.

Mr. DEVLIN: As a general rule, how long does the session last?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Have they Orders in Council?

Mr. McMASTER: How long does the session last?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: I think from ten to fifteen days. Three weeks would be a fairly long session of the council. They sat for four weeks one year but from two to three weeks would be about right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In answer to the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) I may say that they do legislate by Order in Council as empowered by the Act of 1908 which hon. gentlemen passed.

Bill reported

STATISTICS' ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN moved the second reading of Bill No. 16, to amend the Statistics Act.

Mr. ROBB: It is now nearly eleven o'clock, and I think we had better adjourn. We have done a pretty fair day's work.

Mr. MACLEAN: The Bill which I am asking the House now to consider is a very short one. I have another which is also very short and will not detain the House at any great length. I should like to make some progress, and I hope that hon. gentlemen will consent to consider these two very short and harmless Bills.

Motion agreed to.

On section 1—transportation returns excepted from operation of section 15 respecting secrecy,

Mr. McKENZIE: Would the minister be good enough to explain the provisions of this Bill?

Mr. MACLEAN: Under section 15 of the Statistics Act, which was passed at the last session of Parliament, it is provided that all returns made by any individual or corporation upon the request of the officials of the Statistical Bureau are entitled to secrecy. That is, any information they may give is deemed to be secret, and cannot be made public by any body in the department. Of course if that relates to private affairs it is a very proper provision. Section 28 of the same Act provides that statistics furnished by transportation companies is merely privileged. But section 15 is held to override the provisions of section 28. The result is that under a strict interpretation of the Act, statistics given by transportation companies could not be published. The purpose of this section is merely to restore the provision which existed in the statute law in respect to transportation statistics, prior to the passage of the Act.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would ask the minister if there have been any steps taken in his department to try and co-ordinate the statistics that go to the different departments, with a view to bringing all statistics under one heading?

Mr. MACLEAN: The Act passed last session, respecting the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, had in mind the very thing which my hon. friend has mentioned. I cannot,

I am sorry to say, inform the hon. gentleman just how far the transfer has been accomplished. I do know that a great deal of the statistics heretofore published by the Customs Department is being transferred to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and it is expected that the railway statistics will also be transferred to that bureau. Our statistical system is being extended, and I think the Act passed last session will have a very beneficial effect in affording to the public a wider ranged and better prepared statistics than we have had heretofore.

Mr. DEVLIN: Statistics, I might remind the minister, would be more useful under the one heading. For instance, under the Dominion Bureau of Statistics the members of this House, and other persons throughout the Dominion, might have one office to apply to in order to get the statistics relating to any particular subject they may be interested in. At the present moment we might apply to that Bureau for certain statistics, and again be referred by it to perhaps my hon. friend's department, or to the Railway Department, for certain other statistics.

Mr. MACLEAN: I might inform my hon. friend that to-day the Bureau of Statistics will obtain for any hon. gentleman any statistical information he requires, no matter to what department it relates. The railway statistical branch has not yet been transferred to the Statistical Bureau, but I trust they will be very shortly.

Mr. DEVLIN: I want to say that Mr. Coats is a highly efficient public servant, and I would like to render him that testimony here.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR: I presume that the statistics referred to include the information obtained in answer to questions sent to manufacturers. Now manufacturers write to me that they have a great many returns to make in connection with their business, that it is becoming an onerous thing, and that some of them have to employ special clerks to look after the returns that the Government call for. I would like to know what use is made of these statistics after they are forwarded. It will be satisfactory to the people who are incurring this expense in compiling and forwarding these statistics, to know that they are utilized by the department and placed before the people in some shape or other. Will the minister tell us what is done in that direction?

Mr. MACLEAN: I am quite aware of the fact that during the latter part of the war, various departments of government were seeking information of one kind or another, and I fear there was a great deal of overlapping, and in some instances our business men were perhaps unnecessarily put to expense and annoyance to afford statistical information to more than one branch or department of government. For instance, the Canada Food Board required at times certain information. Later it would transpire that the Cost of Living Commissioner of the Labour Department might be wanting statistical information along these same lines, and in consequence my hon. friend is quite correct in saying that many business men have been protesting recently against the vast amount of statistical information demanded of them. However, the intention of the Government, and of the various departments, now is to centre in the Bureau of Statistics all work relating to statistics. The Statistical Bureau is attempting to build up statistical information in reference to our internal trade, which figures were never available in this country before. If the Bureau succeeds in compiling reliable information concerning our internal trade it will be of very great interest and benefit to the public. Of course this will mean that the public must vouchsafe on request certain information, but while it may entail some little additional work on the part of certain members of the community, still it will be in the public interest to have that information. However, I can assure my hon. friend from Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that it is the purpose of the Government—in fact that was the intention of the Act passed last session—to centre all statistics in the one branch.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the difficulty in the way of getting railway statistics into the Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. MACLEAN: I cannot answer my hon. friend exactly. There has been some delay. I am not sure whether the Railway Department are facilitating matters very much; and that might be true of any Department—they naturally wish to hold on to their statistical branches as long as they can. I have not had an opportunity of knowing why the railway statistics have not already been brought under this statistical bureau, but they will be very shortly.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: We have been collecting these statistics now for some time. Is anything being done in the way of utilizing them?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, a great deal of statistical information has already been compiled. I hope that the report of the Bureau will be presented to the House shortly.

Mr. ROBB: The minister is aware of the trouble and expense that business men have been subjected to in providing statistical information for different departments of the Government. As he has truly said, the country is sick and tired of it, and this is a good time for the minister to make a reassuring statement to the country that, the war being over, business men will no longer be required to employ extra labour in the compiling of these statistics. Moreover, when this information comes into Ottawa an army of employees is required to dig it out and put it into shape. Great economy would result, not only to business men throughout Canada but to the Government as well, if a good deal of the statistical information that has been required during the past year could be done away with.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The purpose of the passing of the Statistical Act of last session was to centre in one branch of the public service the compilation of all statistics. The Bureau created for that purpose should be able to co-ordinate the work and minimize the demands upon the public for information. I think I can very sincerely assure my hon. friend that henceforth demands made upon the public for statistics will be very much less than they have been during the last year or two. Statistics were required from the public for many reasons during the last two years, but with the ending of the war the need for obtaining much of this information has passed away.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is the Food Board still calling for returns from the business people?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think not.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: What is the estimated cost of establishing this Bureau?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bureau of Statistics, in a certain form, has been in existence for a long time. The Director of the new Bureau of Statistics was the Census Commissioner.

Mr. MURPHY: Prior to that, editor of the Labour Gazette.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think so. Last session the Dominion Bureau of Statistics was established, under the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is intended that all statistics shall be compiled in that Bureau.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Do you propose to extend the work of that Bureau?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: What I want to get is the difference between the cost of the present system and that of the new system which it is proposed to establish.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall endeavour to give my hon. friend that information. The expenditures of the Customs Department, for instance, in compiling their statistics will be very much lessened by the work of this Bureau.

Mr. ROBB: The complaint is not that information is sought; it is that there is duplication in this respect, with resulting duplication of expense both on the part of the business men throughout the country and of the Government. The minister has said that the Bureau of Statistics was established with a view to gathering all this information, but since that Act was passed the Government of which he is a member has authorized other departments to seek information and has made the business men of the country liable to penalties if that information is not supplied. That is what we are complaining of; we wish that these penalties be withdrawn.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Prior to the establishment of the Bureau of Statistics, the Canada Food Board, the War Trade Board and other war organizations were established. Properly or improperly, they thought they required certain statistics and demands were accordingly made upon the public for the information. In the meantime, the Bureau of Statistics was not completely organized; as a matter of fact it is not fully organized yet. When the organization of the Bureau is complete, so far as I know there is no reason why any demands should be made on the public for statistical information except through this one body; therefore duplication should be eliminated.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand that the statistical information gathered by the officials of the Railway Department—I am taking the Railway Department as an example—is now passed on to this Bureau of Statistics; and that the information thus obtained will appear not in the report of the Railway Department, but in the report of this Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is the intention. The Railway Department have a Statistical Branch which publishes a blue book of railway and transportation statistics. In a short time that branch will pass over to the Bureau of Statistics, the publication now issuing from the Railway Department will cease, and that information will appear in the general statistical book to be published by the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. MURPHY: In other words, a person requiring information regarding statistics of any character will apply not to the particular department with which that information is connected, but to this Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, for instance, in reference to customs statistics, it is expected that the Bureau of Statistics will have more complete and fuller information than is to be found in the customs return I think it is likely that the Customs Department will continue to publish an annual blue book showing the customs duties paid upon importations, but the Bureau of Statistics will take the customs returns and interpret them in a different way and make them more valuable to the public.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What did this Bureau of Statistics cost last year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I could not give that information to my hon. friend. That will be made available to him when the estimates relating to the Bureau of Statistics are before Parliament.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is there a large staff?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should not like to venture an answer to my hon. friend. The staff is probably larger now than it was at the close of the last session of Parliament. It shall likely grow, I cannot say.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Who is at the head of it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Coats, who was formerly Commissioner of Census.

Mr. DEVLIN: I do not want to prevent the minister from getting his Bill through, but he has, I take it, given to the House the assurance that the statistics now going to the Railway Department will in future go to the Bureau of Statistics. Am I right?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: Without wishing to anticipate any of the work of the session, might I ask if there is not in the Railway Bill that is at the present moment going through the Senate a clause with an amendment to it to the very effect that that branch of statistics will go to the Railway Department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand that an application will be made to strike those clauses out. They were in the Bill, I understand, as originally introduced, and I think at the last session of Parliament, either in committee or in the House, they were struck out, but the Bill was republished with those clauses incorporated.

Mr. DEVLIN: They will be struck out?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hope they will be struck out. I intend to ask that they be struck out.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—dates of making and forwarding transportation returns changed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The purpose of section 2 is simply to change the year for which transportation statistics may be collected. The year required by the Act as at present is the old Government fiscal year ending on June 30, and it is proposed by this section of the Bill to change it to the calendar year, as this corresponds with the financial year of most transportation companies.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why not attempt uniformity in the financial statistical years of the Government? Our financial year at present ends with the last day of March. Would it not be very much easier to get information for men who take an interest in such matters, if we had all our years coterminous; that is, if our statistical year, our financial year and all our other years in the business of the Government ended with the same day? It is confusing that one year ends with the last day of March, another ends with the last day of June, and another ends with the last day of December. If they could be co-ordinated and systematized so that when we were talking about a statistical or financial year in Government matters we would all have in mind the same period, it would be much better.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I quite agree with the leader of the Opposition that it would be very desirable to bring about the end he suggests, but that is, of course, impossible. The section of the Bill which we are now considering refers merely to transportation statistics, and as these are always controlled by individuals or private corporations, we must accept their fiscal year; at least it makes it less difficult for them if we adopt the calendar year as the period for which they must furnish the annual statistics. That has been the experience of the Bureau of Statistics. Nearly all the railway companies have their fiscal year corresponding with the calendar year, and this will promote the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Robb), because it will make it easier for transportation companies to give this information at the end of the calendar year which corresponds usually with their business year.

Section agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Have the statistics obtained by the Canada Registration Board been transferred to the Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They have been, or will be transferred.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is the Canada Registration Board still in existence?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, it has passed out of existence and all the information gathered by that board, which was according to the card system, has been or will be transferred to the Bureau of Statistics and will be available there for any information which it contains. I do not know whether that information will be of very much interest hereafter or not, but I remember that Mr. Coats, Director of the Bureau, told me the other day that he could tell, by reason of the information gathered by the Canada Registration Board, how many farmers or how many carpenters there were in any county in Canada. Whether such information will be helpful in the future or not I do not know.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I read the other day in one of the Montreal newspapers that the bachelors of that city were protesting very strongly because the Canada Registration Board had sold to the city or to the commissioners of Montreal, for the sum of $500, or a little more than that, the statistics which they had gathered, in order that the city might collect a tax from the poor, unfortunate bachelors. Is that the case?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is a case in which the Dominion will be assisting in the assertion of provincial or municipal rights.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: But the rule of secrecy will, in that case, have been broken for a price.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not know that that information was given under the secrecy clause of the Statistics Act or not, but we shall allow the bachelors to raise that question.

Mr. ROBB: Will the next census be taken under the direction of the Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Bill reported.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. McKENZIE: What business shall we take up to-morrow?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Questions first, and notices of motion next. I assume that will exhaust the day, but if not we shall proceed to Public Bills. The Resolution that will be taken up first will probably be the one standing in the name of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) relating to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to make a suggestion to the minister who is leading the House, which he might take up with his colleagues. In the British House of Commons, on Thursday of each week, the minister who is leading the House gives a statement of the business for each day of the following week. I think the Government might very well adopt that practice. It would enable members and people throughout the country who are interested in a particular item of legislation to know when it was coming up in Parliament.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall be very glad to call the attention of my colleagues to my hon. friend's suggestion as it will appear in Hansard to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 19, 1919.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

ESTIMATES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1920.

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1920, was presented by Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

3. 2,444.

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

In the statement given to the House on the 25th of April, 1918, in connection with the number of volunteer enlistments by provinces, were the men belonging to the counties of Pontiac, Hull and Wright, included in this statement, credited to the province of Quebec or to the province of Ontario?

Major-General MEWBURN:

In April, 1918, separate figures not being available, they were included with total reported by Military District No. 3, which is in the province of Ontario. As soon as separate figures were obtained, they were credited to the province of Quebec.

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

In the statement given to the House on the 25th of April, 1918, in connection with the number of men who were recruited by virtue of the Military Service Act of 1917, were the men belonging to the counties of Pontiac, Hull and Wright, included in this statement, attributed to the Province of Quebec or to the Province of Ontario?

Major-General MEWBURN: In April, 1918, separate figures not being available, they were included with total reported by Military District No. 3, which is in the province of Ontario.

As soon as separate figures were obtained, they were credited to the province of Quebec.

4. Were any goods belonging to merchants of the district lost when the wharf collapsed?
5. Have any claims been made to the Minister of Public Works or other members of the Government for payment for the loss of these goods?
6. Is it the intention of this Government to give any recognition to such claims?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. Yes.
5. Yes.
6. No.

ROYAL NAVAL CANADIAN VOLUNTEER RESERVE.

Mr. MAYRAND:

1. Did the British Government at any time during the war make any request or suggestion regarding Canada recruiting or sending overseas a division of the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve?
2. If so, by whom was the request made and when?
3. Was the request acted upon?
4. When was the division of the R.N.C.V.R. sent overseas?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): 1, 2, 3, 4. In the spring of 1916 Imperial authorities suggested that recruiting be carried on in Canada for service in the British Navy. The British Admiralty sent Captain the Hon. Rupert Guinness to Canada in charge of a recruiting party. As it was not feasible to recruit for entry in the Royal Navy owing to the different rates of pay in the Imperial and Canadian services an agreement was arrived at between the Canadian Government and the British Admiralty whereby a division of the R.N.C.V.R. should be recruited for overseas service to form a part of the total forces that Canada proposed to put on active service in the war. Captain Guinness delivered addresses at different points throughout Canada for the purpose of stimulating recruiting. Between the spring of 1916 and December 1917, 1,715 men were enrolled for the R.N.C.V.R. Overseas Division.

Mr. MAYRAND:

1. At any time during the war did the Hon. Rupert Guinness visit Canada for the purpose of recruiting a division of the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve?
2. Did the Hon. Rupert Guinness bring a request from the Admiralty or British Government asking Canada to recruit a division of the R.N.C.V.R.?
3. If so, was the request acted upon?
4. Did the Hon. Mr. Guinness tour Canada?
5. If so, what was the purpose of the tour?
6. Did the Hon. Mr. Guinness make any report regarding the enlistment of a division of the R.N.C.V.R.?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): 1, 2, 3, 5, 6. In the spring of 1916 Imperial authorities suggested that recruiting be carried on in Canada for service in the British Navy. The British Admiralty sent Captain the Hon. Rupert Guinness to Canada in charge of a recruiting party. As it was not feasible to recruit for entry in the Royal Navy owing to the different rates of pay in the Imperial and Canadian services an agreement was arrived at between the Canadian Government and the British Admiralty whereby a division of the R.N.C.V.R. would be recruited for overseas service to form a part of the total forces that Canada proposed to put on active service in the war. Captain Guinness delivered addresses at different points throughout Canada for the purpose of stimulating recruiting. Between the spring of 1916 and December 1917, 1,715 men were enrolled for the R.N.C.V.R. Overseas Division.

ST. LOUIS ROAD PROPERTY.

Mr. POWER:

1. Has the Government taken possession of the property situated on St. Louis Road, bequeathed by the late Gustave Stuart, K.C., of Quebec?
2. For what purpose was this property bequeathed?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to make any use of it? If so, what?

Mr. CLARK (Parliamentary Secretary):

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

WELLAND CANAL LOCK TENDERS.

Mr. FRASER:

1. What are the names and what were the former occupations of the various lock tenders appointed on the New Welland Ship Canal since April 1, 1918?
2. By whom were these men recommended?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The new Welland Ship Canal is under construction—no lock tenders have been appointed and will not be until canal is completed for operation.
2. Answered by No. 1.

CASH SUBVENTIONS TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. What is the gross amount expended in cash subventions to aid in the construction of railways in each of the provinces of Canada since 1867?
2. What is the gross amount expended on Government owned railways in each province of Canada since 1867?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The Dominion Government, up to 30th June last, had paid $111,428,695.38 in cash subsidies to railways; but it is quite impracticable to show the distribution of that aid among the various provinces.

2. This question cannot be answered in a practical manner, except as shown in the following statement:

BOARD OF PENSION COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. What appointments in connection with the Board of Pension Commissioners have been made by the Civil Service Commission since the coming into effect of the Civil Service Act of 1918?
2. What number have been made by the Pension Commissioners?
3. How many of these positions have been given to returned soldiers who have served in the actual theatre of war, and how many to men who have not?
4. What are the aggregate and average salaries attached to the positions mentioned in questions 2 and 3?

Mr. CLARK (Parliamentary Secretary):

1. 193.

2. 8, all approved by the Civil Service Commission.

3. 190 returned soldiers (zone of service not available); 11 civilians.

4. Question 4, aggregate $23,600, average $2,700; Question 3, aggregate, $309,800, average $1,630.52.

QUEBEC ORIENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Are negotiations pending for the acquisition by purchase, lease or otherwise, of the Quebec Oriental Railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway as feeders and branches of the Canadian National Railways?
2. If so, with whom are these negotiations carried on?
3. Has any decision been arrived at? If so, what is it?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

BOARD OF INTERNAL ECONOMY.

*Mr. BUREAU:

1. Did the Board of Internal Economy meet during the last session, or at any time since the beginning of the present parliament?
2. If so, why have not the minutes of these meetings been laid on the table of the House, as prescribed by Rule 9 of the rules of this House?
3. Is it the intention of the Speaker to lay them on the Table in the near future?
4. If the Board of Internal Economy has not yet met, what are the reasons?

Mr. SPEAKER:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. Partly because the bulk of the business of the commissioners was in connection with the staff of the House, matters now almost altogether in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, partly because no important matter arose to be dealt with, and partly because the pressure of business upon the ministers in consequence of the war has been very heavy, and the Speaker did not feel justified in calling the commissioners together except for very important business.

I have to thank the hon. member for calling my attention to Rule 9 of the House, as there was a meeting of the commissioners in February, 1917, which should have been reported to the House last session. My attention had not previously been drawn to the rule, and so, by inadvertence, the necessary report was not made. I now, however, lay the report upon the Table.

INTERCOLONIAL PENSION FUND.

* Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has the Honourable the Minister of Railways received applications, petitions or letters from the superannuated employees of the Intercolonial Railway between Montreal and Halifax for an increase of pension over their present allowance?
2. If so, is it the intention of the Honourable Minister, during the present session, to take favourable action upon such requests and grant increases respecting the minimum and maximum amounts of pension now granted?
3. Is the Honourable Minister aware that the present rates of pension respecting the minimum and maximum amounts granted are based upon salaries paid many years ago when the cost of living was much lower than at present?
4. If so, does the Honourable Minister propose to increase the contributional rates to pensions fund with a view to enable present and future pensioners to receive a reasonable allowance in keeping with present-day necessities?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. Yes.

2. The Intercolonial Railway is now being operated as a part of the Canadian National Railway System. This matter will be considered and dealt with by the management of such system.

3. Yes.

4. Answered by No. 2.

STEAMSHIP HOCHELAGA.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Was the Steamship Hochelaga purchased by the Government during the period of the war?
2. If so, from whom?
3. What was the price paid?
4. Was the Hochelaga employed in connection with the Naval Service work?
5. What have the refit repairs to the "Hochelaga" cost each year since being purchased by the Government?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Yes.
2. Randal Morgan.
3. Seventy thousand dollars ($70,000).
4. East Coast Patrol.
5. On purchase, $22,642.18; 115-16, $19,650.10; 1916-17, $10,214.29; 1917-18, $29,547.44.

CANADIAN OFFICERS IN GRAND FLEET.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Did any of the Royal Canadian Navy Officers, graduates of the Naval College of Canada, serve in the British Grand Fleet during the period of the war?
2. If so, how many?
3. Are these officers with the Grand Fleet at the present time?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to bring these officers back for duty in Canada?
5. Have any communications been exchanged with the Imperial authorities with regard to these officers?
6. Have the Imperial authorities signified their desire to have these officers remain with the Royal Navy?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Yes.
2. Fifty.
3. Yes, except 7 (5 who lost their lives and 2 now serving in Canada).
4. When required.
5. Yes.
6. No communication has been received from the Admiralty on this point.

LIFE SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. How many life saving stations in Canada are directly under the supervision of the Canadian Naval Service?
2. In what condition are these stations at the present time?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Twenty-nine.
2. These stations are regularly inspected and suitably maintained. At the present time many of them are closed down for the winter.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. During the first month of the war, August 1914, was the H.M.C.S. Canada despatched to a point off Glace Bay, N.S.?

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

2. If so, who gave to Canada the instructions to proceed to this point?
3. Was the Ottawa Naval authorities informed of any trouble at Glace Bay at that time?
4. If so, what was the nature of the trouble?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Yes.
2. Department of the Naval Service.
3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.

H.M.C.S. CANADA.

Mr. DUFF:

Referring to the Report of the Auditor General, 1916-17, page ZZ 262, item of expenditure charged to H.M.C.S. Canada paid through the High Commissioner for Canada, British Admiralty, Welsh coal at $8.45 per ton —$561.41.

1. From whom was this coal purchased?
2. When was it received on board the Canada?
3. At what port was it received?
4. Who negotiated for the purchase of this coal?
5. Who signed vouchers for its receipt?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1, 2, 3, 4. This coal was not specially purchased for the "Canada," but was drawn from the large stock of Welsh coal maintained in Halifax dockyard by the Admiralty for the use of their own cruisers calling at that port. The issue price was the Admiralty contract price plus freight to Halifax and handling costs. The superintendent of the dockyard authorized the issue for special duties to be performed. The date of issue was June 28th, 1915.

5. Alfred Ross, engineer.

NEWFOUNDLAND RATINGS IN NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. At any time during 1917 and 1918 were any Newfoundland R.N.R. ratings serving in the Canadian Naval Service?
2. If so, how many?
3. Why were they taken in preference to Canadians?
4. Were these Newfoundland ratings, while serving in the Canadian Navy paid Imperial rates of pay?
5. Did they at any time receive Canadian rates of pay?
6. If so, when?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Yes.
2. 188.
3. They were not taken in preference to Canadians but were entered at the same time as the Canadian ratings to make up the required number of trained men.
4. No.

5 and 6. While serving in the Canadian Navy they were paid Canadian rates of pay.

PROCLAMATIONS BY SIR ARTHUR CURRIE.

Mr. PROULX:

1. How many proclamations were issued by General Sir Arthur Currie to the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force and to the people of Canada during the year 1917?
2. How much has been expended by the Government to have these proclamations cabled to Canada?
3. How much has been expended for their publication in Canada?

Major-General MEWBURN:

The following cable has been received from the Overseas Minister of Militia and Defence:—

Your 1964 Proclamation. General Currie states answer to first question is None. Second question is answered by Number One. Third question answered by Number One.

NAVAL COURTS MARTIAL.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Since the outbreak of hostilities how many courts martial have been held in connection with the Canadian Naval Service?
2. How many Canadian Naval Officers have either presided or attended as members of the court at these courts martial?
3. At what time and at what place were said proceedings held?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Eighteen.
2. At 15 Courts held in Canada one Canadian officer sat as President and four other Canadian officers sat as members on each Court.
3. At Davenport, Eng., 14tn Jan., and 6th May, 1918; at Halifax, N.S., in 1918, 8th May, 12th June, 25th August, 25th September (2); 4th October, 18th December; in 1919, 29th January, 30th January, 31st January, 4th February. At Sydney, N.S., 6th August, 15th August, 15th September, 31st October, 1918. At Bermuda, 18th November, 1918.

INCREASES OF PAY IN CANADIAN NAVY.

Mr. DUFF:

1. In view of the fact that officers and men in the British Navy have recently received a substantial increase of pay, is it the intention of the Canadian Naval Department to correspondingly increase the pay of the officers and men serving in the Canadian Naval Service?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: The matter is now under consideration.

CANADIAN SEAMEN AND PRIZE MONEY.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Do the officers and men who have served or are now serving in the Canadian Naval Service participate in all prize money the same as officers and men serving in the Royal Navy?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

BOYS IN CANADIAN NAVY.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Are there any boys now undergoing training in the Canadian Navy Service?
2. If so, how many?
3. Where are they undergoing this training?
4. What rate of pay are they receiving per diem?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Yes.
2. Eighty-three.
3. H.M.C.S. Shearwater, on the Atlantic coast.
4. Fifty cents per diem.

CANADIAN VESSELS IN ACTION.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Have any of the vessels of the Canadian Naval Service ever been in action?
2. If so, when and where?
3. Did the steamer Hochelaga during the month of August, 1918, sight or believe she sighted an enemy submarine?
4. If so, what was the action of her commanding officer?
5. Was the commanding officer tried by court martial?
6. If so, under what charge?
7. Was he dismissed from the service in disgrace?
8. If so, was any additional punishment meted out to him?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Yes, on 25th August, 1918.
4. He altered course and steered towards his senior Officer's ship.
5. Yes.
6. That he did not from negligence or other default, on sight of a ship of the enemy which it was his duty to engage, use his utmost exertions to bring his ship into action.
7. He was dismissed His Majesty's service by sentence of court-martial.
8. No, the Naval authorities have no power over an officer when he has been dismissed the service.

MR. J. K. FORAN.

Mr. HOCKEN:

1. Is there a person employed in the House of Commons named J. K. Foran?
2. If so, how long has he been in the employ of the Government?
3. What is his salary or other remuneration?
4. How many days was he present at his office duties between 15th October, 1917, and 20th February, 1919?
5. If absent, did his pay go on during his absence, and what was the cause of his absence?
6. Is the above J. K. Foran the party who organized the Sein Fein meeting in Montreal on the 9th February, and took the chair at the said meeting?

7. If the allegations in question No. 6 are true, what is the Government going to do in the matter, seeing that the above meeting was of a rebel character?

Mr. SPEAKER:

1. Yes.

2. Since June 1, 1902, permanently.

3. $2,800 per annum.

4. There is no record showing the exact number of days, but he was absent most of the time during the session of 1918.

5. Yes. Leave of absence was granted him on account of illness of his wife and two children and the state of his own health in consequence.

6. He did not organize the meeting but he was chairman.

7. The Government has not considered the matter, but as soon as I saw the newspaper accounts of the meeting I expressed very strong disapproval of any officer in the employment of the House taking an active part in any meeting which could be considered as of a political character, and directed that Dr. Foran should be at once ordered to resume his official duties. The matter will be considered at the first meeting that is held of the Board of Internal Economy of the House.

In justice to the official who is the subject of the question, I feel that a letter which he has written, addressed to myself, ought to be in possession of the House. It is somewhat lengthy, and perhaps not of such importance as to call for its publication in Hansard; I therefore lay it on the Table.

COMMANDERS THURSTON AND SEDDON.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. During the summer of 1917, were Flight Commander Thurston and Wing Commander Seddon, of the Royal Navy Air Force, detached to Canada with two baby seaplanes and entire equipment for the purpose of protection duty in Canada?

2. If so, by whom were these two officers sent?

3. Were they sent at the request of the Canadian Naval Service?

4. Did the Canadian Naval Department utilize their service?

5. If not, why?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. These officers were sent to Canada in March, 1917, to advise as regards a seaplane service in Canada. No information is available as to what equipment they brought with them.

2. By the British Admiralty.

Nos. 3, 4 and 5. Yes.

[Mr. Hocken.]

SERVICE OF CANADIAN NAVAL RATINGS.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. At any time during the war, did the Government of Canada make any requests to the British Admiralty to be allowed to send Canadian naval ratings to serve in the British Grand Fleet?

2. Did the Government attempt to disband the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserves at Esquimalt shortly after the outbreak of hostilities in 1914?

3. Did the Government disband a company of R.N.C.V.R. in the city of Quebec shortly after the outbreak of hostilities in 1914?

4. If so, what officer gave the instructions for the disbandment of these reserves?

5. On whose instructions was the officer acting?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. In the spring of 1916, Imperial authorities suggested that recruiting be carried on in Canada for service in the British Navy. The British Admiralty sent Captain the Hon. Rupert Guinness to Canada in charge of a recruiting party. As it was not feasible to recruit for entry in the Royal Navy owing to different rates of pay in the Imperial and Canadian services, an agreement was arrived at whereby a division of the R.N.C.V.R. should be recruited for Overseas Service to form a part of the total forces that Canada proposed to put on active service in the war. Captain Guinness delivered addresses at different points throughout Canada for the purpose of stimulating recruiting. Between the spring of 1916, and December, 1917, 1,715 men were enrolled in the R.N.C.V.R. (Overseas Division).

Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5. No.

STEAMER BAYFIELD.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Has the Government a boat by the name of Bayfield?

2. If so, what department has control of this boat?

3. Was she at any time turned over to the Pilot Commission at Halifax, N.S.?

4. If so, on whose recommendations, and on what conditions?

5. Is the Bayfield now in commission?

6. If not, why?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Yes.

2. The ship is owned by the Department of the Naval Service.

3 and 4. The ship was loaned temporarily to the Marine Department in April, 1918, for pilotage duties at Halifax upon the request of the Marine Department.

5. No.

6. It is now at Halifax awaiting refit and is to be returned to the Naval Department for service in the Great Lakes upon the opening of St. Lawrence navigation.

STEAMER HOCHELAGA.

Mr. D'ANJOU:

1. Did Lieutenant Jarvis, R.C.N., at any time during the war, make a report in regard to the condition of the steamer Hochelaga, purchased by the Government?

2. If so, is a copy of that report on file in the department?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

VOLUNTARY ENLISTMENTS MAY-DECEMBER, 1917.

Mr. D'ANJOU:

What were the total voluntary enlistments for the Canadian Expeditionary Forces during the months of May, June, July, August, September, October, November and December, 1917, respectively?

Major-General MEWBURN:

The total number of voluntary enlistments in Canada for the Canadian Expeditionary Forces during the months of May, June, July, August, September, October, November and December, 1917, were as follows:

May	6,406
June	6,314
July	3,871
August	3,110
September	3,512
October	4,871
November	4,012
December	3,909
	36,005

OYSTER CULTURE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Are there any indications that there will be, this year, an increase in Eastern Canada of the areas reserved for the artificial culture and cultivation of the oyster? If so, in what provinces?

2. Has any progress been made in this work lately and what has it consisted of?

3. Is the condition of the oyster industry in Canada deemed satisfactory at the present time?

4. Does the Government intend assisting it by new methods? If so, what is proposed to be done?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1 and 2. The Department of the Naval Service has no information. By virtue of agreements made under the provisions of section 61 of the Fisheries Act, Chapter 8, of the Statutes of 1914, leases for the private culture or cultivation of oysters in the three Maritime Provinces are granted by the provincial authorities.

3. This is a matter of opinion and the Department of Naval Service does not wish to express an opinion on a subject which is controlled by the provincial authorities.

4. The Federal Government is not in a position to do more than assist by affording information and advice to those desiring it, and to prosecute investigations into the life history of the oyster, etc., which are being done.

FISHERIES JURISDICTION.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. What progress, if any, has been made since last session towards a final settlement of the questions of control of fisheries claimed by the Dominion and the provinces?

2. Is any legislation to be introduced this session on this subject?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. This question has been settled by the Privy Council decisions of 1898 and 1913 on Fishery References, except so far as the province of Quebec is concerned. It is expected that the appeal from the decision of the Court of King's Bench (appeal side) in the Quebec Fisheries Reference, will be heard by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council during the next July session.

2. No.

LOBSTER HATCHERY, PORT DANIEL WEST.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Is the lobster hatchery at Port Daniel West, Quebec, to be operated this year? If not, why?

2. If so, who is to be placed in charge?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1 and 2. No. Experience and investigation have shown that lobster hatching is not the best method of developing and maintaining the lobster fishery. Consequently all the lobster hatcheries have been closed.

EMPLOYEES ON GOVERNMENT VESSELS.

Mr. MARCIL:

(a) Is it the intention of the Government during the present session to accede to the request made to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on April 6, 1914, in a memorandum relating to their salaries sent him by the captains, deck officers, wireless operators and engineers employed on the vessels operated by the Government. (b) And will such employees be brought under the operation of the Civil Service Act?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

(a) Since the receipt of the memorial in 1914 the salaries of nearly all the officers and crews of the steamers operated by the Marine Department have been increased. (b) It is not proposed to bring the crews of the ships under the operation of the Civil Service Act.

RESTIGOUCHE INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has any application been made within the last twelve months for the purchase or alienation of any portion of the Micmac reserve at Restigouche, Que.? If so, by whom?

2. Has any action been taken? If so, what is it?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. No.
2. No.

CIVIL SERVICE CLASSIFICATION.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to lay on the table of the House, at an early date, the report of the classification of the civil service employees of the Dominion, made by the special commission appointed last year?
2. Is it the intention of the Government to give effect to the recommendations of the said Commission?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. It is anticipated that the report on classification of the civil service will be laid on the Table of the House during the Session.
2. The recommendations will be submitted to Parliament for approval.

M.S.A.—SOLDIERS IN ACTIVE SERVICE.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many soldiers enlisted under the provisions of the Military Service Act, 1917, were in active service in France before the signing of the armistice?
2. How many were killed or wounded?

Major General MEWBURN: 1 and 2. This information is not available.

OFFERS OF LAND TO GOVERNMENT.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Have any individuals or companies owning or holding land in Western Canada offered to sell same to the Government?
2. If so, what are the names of said companies and individuals?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: The Department here has no information on the matter referred to. Presumably the information could be obtained by a very prolonged and laborious process of searching every office of the Department throughout the Dominion; but no record is kept in such form as would enable the information to be produced easily. Being at a loss to know of what service it would be at the present time, I would like to suggest to the questioner that perhaps if he has any specific case in mind he might put the question in that form, or not press the question further. It would mean considerable expense to obtain the information.

DEFAULTING RECRUITS.

Mr. LESAGE:

1. How much did the registration of the defaulting recruits cost per head in Military District No. 4, from January 20, 1918, to May 1, 1918?
2. To which Department of the Government was the control of such registration given?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

These questions are open to various interpretations. The term "defaulting recruits" may mean all apprehended unregistered defaulters of physique or apprehended unregistered defaulters of physique that warranted their being put and kept on military strength, or it may mean Group III. defaulters, that is, registrants who disobeyed Registrars' orders to report for duty. The expression "registration" of defaulting recruits is not understood. Does "registration" as used in this connection mean apprehension or does it mean the registration of registrants who later defaulted Registrars' orders? Does the term "cost" used in this query mean the cost of apprehension, that is, police cost, or is the enquiry for the total expenditure under the Military Service Act distributed per capita over the total number of "defaulting recruits"?

Part 2 of each question cannot be answered unless meaning of "registration" and "defaulting recruits" is defined.

SHIPS BUILT BY GOVERNMENT SINCE 1917.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie):

1. What is the total number of ships built by the Government since 1917?
2. What is the total tonnage?
3. How many of these were steel ships?
4. What was the cost per ton?
5. How many were wooden ships?
6. What was their cost per ton?
7. Were they built by contract or day labour or on a percentage basis?
8. If by contract, what steps have the Government taken to prevent profiteering?
9. What steps have the Government taken to ascertain the total cost of labour for construction, total cost of material used, total overhead expenses, gross profit and net profit, respectively?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. F. REID) in mind an inquiry in respect of the ships now under construction as well as those that we have constructed?

Mr. J. F. REID: Yes.

Question stands.

BUILDING AT DORVAL.

Mr. LEDUC:

1. Has the Hon. the Minister of Public Works called for tenders for the erection of thirty-four buildings at Dorval, in the province of Quebec, of which one-third was to have been erected in sixty days and two-thirds in ninety days?
2. Has the Hon. Minister received any tenders therefor with cheques accompanying same amounting to ten per cent of cost, respecting said buildings?

3. If so, how many tenders were received, and what are the names of those who tendered?

4. Has the contract for such erection of buildings been given? If not, for what reason?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Seven tenders were received as follows:

Quinlan & Robertson, Montreal.. ..	$389,000 00
	*2 00
The Atlas Construction Co., Montreal..	439,500 00
Russell-Navin Construction Co. Montreal..	439,700 00
The U. Pauze & fils Co. Montreal..	448,000 00
Bate, McMahon & Co., Ottawa...	455,427 00
	*1 50
The James Shearer Co., Montreal.	476,000 00
	*1 25
(Alternative offer of 5 per cent commission plus costs.)
Leger, Charlton & White, Montreal.	557,471 52

*(Price per cubic yard for grading site.)

4. (a) No; (b) It was found that the buildings were not required.

FOOD BOARD REVENUES.

Mr. KAY:

How much money was collected through licenses issued by the Canada Food Board in 1918?

Hon. Mr. CRERAR: Amount collected, $366,261.69.

PENSIONS BOARD EMPLOYEES.

Mr. PREVOST:

1. Does the staff of the Military Pensions Board, for the District of Montreal, use the two official languages?

2. If so, how many of such staff can becomingly speak and write the French language?

3. If not, is it the intention of the Government to remedy the situation so as to enable the Board to furnish the information requested in French, and have better knowledge of the conditions which are of interest to the French-Canadian families, who very largely make up the population of the vast district where such Board has jurisdiction?

Hon. Mr. CALDER:

1. Yes.

2. Total staff, 35. French-Canadian born, 16; English with a working knowledge of both languages, 14.

3. Answered by No. 2.

INCOME TAX EXEMPTIONS.

*Mr. PREVOST:

1. Has the Government received payments under the Income Tax from persons who are being paid superannuation pensions, namely, retired judges, magistrates or officials of any category?

2. If so, what were the amounts received from the judges of every jurisdiction?

3. What is the annual payment of each member of the Government, based upon salary received?

4. What amount has been received by the Finance Minister from each of such members?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. Yes, to the extent to which they were legally liable.

2. Subsection 3 of section 27 of the Judges Act provides that,—"The salaries and retiring allowances or annuities shall be free and clear of all taxes and deductions whatsoever imposed under any Act of the Parliament of Canada."

3. The amount determined in accordance with the rates and exemptions provided for in the Income War Tax Act, 1917.

4. All members of the Government have paid the amount assessed against them with the exception of one who is overseas. In the case of another minister who has been ill it has not been possible to finally adjust and make the assessment owing to his illness.

WAR TAX ACT INCOME EXEMPTION.

*Mr. PREVOST:

1. Were any persons exempted, during the last fiscal year, from paying the income tax under the Act of 1917?

2. If so, who are such persons? What is their occupation and where do they reside?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. Yes.

2. Section 5 of the Income War Tax Act, 1917, enumerates the persons whose incomes shall not be liable to taxation under that Act.

COAL USED BY GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. How many tons of American coal were used on the Government Railway east of Montreal during the year 1918, and what was the cost per ton?

2. How many tons of American coal were purchased and used by the Department of Marine and Fisheries east of Montreal during the year 1918, and what was the price paid per ton?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. To be answered by State Department.

2. The steam coal used by the Department of Marine and Fisheries during the year 1918, was purchased from the Dominion Coal Company, whose head office is at Glace Bay, N.S., and the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, whose head office is at New Glasgow, N.S. The department has no information as to where the coal was mined.

Hon. Mr. REID: 1. 366,393 net tons American coal for the calendar year 1918, were used on Government railways east of Montreal. Cannot give the exact cost of this coal per ton; but the railways purchased from companies 516,624 tons of coal at a total cost of $3,837,216.76, which will give average price per net ton $7.43 f.o.b. cars on line of Government railways, this price includes freight duty and war tax and cost of discharging from boats to cars at Levis.

FUEL CONTROL.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX:

Is it the intention of the Government to maintain the present commission on fuel control?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to ask if copies of these answers are being supplied to members as formerly.

Mr. SPEAKER: As far as I am aware, I have not had my attention called to the fact that answers were not being supplied.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mine are in duplicate.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Mine also are in duplicate.

Mr. MARCIL: I am informed that two copies of the answers to questions are sent to the officers of the House. One copy is sent to Hansard; the other goes to the Votes and Proceedings Office, but none are furnished to members. It was the custom in past sessions to supply members with copies of answers given to questions. If this practice is carried out, answers will have to be prepared in triplicate instead of duplicate, for the reasons which I have given.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall make inquiry, and if the custom that obtained heretofore is not being complied with, I shall endeavour to see that it is.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS DIRECTORS.

Mr. COPP:

PRINCESS RADZIWELL.

Mr. JACOBS:

1. Is the Government aware that a woman, calling hersolf Princess Radziwell, is presently touring Western Canada delivering lectures, in which she charges Jews generally as being in alliance with the Bolsheviki?

2. Is the Government aware that the woman in question is a convicted felon, and served a term of imprisonment, at the time of the South African war, for forgery and attempted blackmail, and that her victim was the late Right Honourable Cecil Rhodes?

3. Is the Government aware that the delivery of lectures such as those mentioned above, in districts where Jews reside, is calculated to stir up strife and produce breaches of the peace?

4. Will the Government state why the woman in question was permitted by the Immigration authorities to enter Canada?

5. Does the Government intend to take steps for the expulsion from the country of this so-called princess, should the matters hereinbefore cited, after investigation, be found to be correct?

Hon. Mr. CALDER:

1. No.

2. No.

3. No.

4. Information was received by the department on the 10th of January last that Princess Catherine Radziwell, accompanied by a maid, would apply for entry to Canada at Niagara Falls, with the object of lecturing under the direction of Ellison White Dominion Lyceum. It was stated that Princess Radziwell held a permit from the British Government. This information was conveyed to the Immigration Inspector-in-Charge at Niagara Falls, Ont., but so far as the department is aware, Princess Radziwell did not enter Canada at that port and there is no information available showing when or where Princess Radziwell entered Canada.

5. If Princess Radziwell is shown to have entered Canada illegally, or if, having entered, she is shown to have conducted herself in such a way as to bring her within any of the deportation provisions of the Immigration Act, her deportation will be considered.

STRIKES IN CANADA.

Mr. POWER:

1. How many strikes have there been in Canada during the year 1918?

2. How many men were involved?

3. How many working days were lost?

1. 196.

2. 68,489, approximately.

3. 763,341, approximately.

GOBEIL-SIMARD INVESTIGATION.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the Order of the House issued last session, on the 24th of April, 1918, for the production of copies of all documents and correspondence, concerning the Gobeil-Simard investigation, held before Mr. Justice Duff in December, 1917, in Ottawa, been complied with?

2. If not, why?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to lay before the House these documents at an early date this session?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. The papers may be laid on the Table to-day.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

COLD STORAGE ON STEAMERS.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

How many steamers are furnished with cold storage apparatus?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: To what steamer does the hon. gentleman refer—Government steamers or privately owned vessels? If Government steamers, what department has the hon. gentleman in mind?

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

WIRELESS ON GOVERNMENT STEAMERS.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome) moved for a copy of all papers and correspondence concerning the installation of wireless equipment upon the steamers built or to be built for the Government, as well as a copy of all tenders submitted and contracts executed in that connection. He said: It has been suggested to me that I should amend this motion as it would cause too much inconvenience in the preparation of the information asked for in its present form. I am willing to amend the motion by adding the words "since 4th August, 1914," if I am in order in so doing.

Mr. SPEAKER: There cannot be any objection to the resolution being so amended.

Motion as amended agreed to.

VESSELS ENGAGED BY GOVERNMENT.

Mr. TOBIN moved for a return showing the number of boats rented, loaned or chartered by the Naval Department during the period of the war, giving the name of each boat, from whom it was purchased, rented, loaned or chartered, the purchase price or the rental paid, and the total expense for refits and upkeep for each boat, and on what service employed while in the service of the Navy Department.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like to ask my hon. friend if he would be content to have his motion combined with the one moved by the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). They really cover the same ground, although strictly speaking, the present motion asks for some additional information.

Mr. TOBIN: I am quite satisfied for that to be done.

Mr. SPEAKER: The information brought down will be in answer to both the motions combined.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS AND PICTOU STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve and Gaspé) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, petitions and other papers concerning the steamer service between Magdalen Islands and Pictou, N.S.

He said: We are peculiarly situated in the county of Gaspé, which comprises the peninsula on the Baie des Chaleurs and the river St. Lawrence and also the Magdalen Islands in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, about one hundred miles from the coast. The Magdalen Islands were, in former years, served by a steamer running between Pictou and the islands, touching en route at two or three ports of Prince Edward Island. Twenty years ago we had a weekly service, and I had that service changed into a semi-weekly one. For many years we had an excellent steamer—I forget the name now,—for passengers, mails, and freight. At the beginning of the war the steamer was chartered by another company and was, I think, finally sold to the British Government. There is, on the Magdalen Islands, a very interesting fishing population, comprising about 7,000 people who are living and prospering there. Since the war began the service has unfortunately been exceedingly bad. I do not wish to blame the Government at all for the steamer service to the islands since the outbreak of the war, because the Government called for tenders and had to accept whatever boat was offered. During the winter season, which begins generally around Christmas, and continues until the end of March or the beginning of April, there is no navigation between the mainland and the Magdalen Islands. It is, therefore, important that during the early spring, the summer months, and the fall of the year, there should be a regular service of the best kind for that population of 7,000 Canadians.

During the last four years it is regrettable, but it is not the fault of the Government, that the islanders have had practically no steamer service. A very small boat was put on the route, but it was not of sufficient capacity to transport the freight and the passengers. So much was that the case that I had to appeal every year to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to be so good as to divert from its service the steamer Stanley, a good ice-breaker, or the steamer Laurentian. And I must offer my sincere thanks to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who, last year and this year, was kind enough to send the Stanley and the Laurentian, much to the advantage of those islanders. During the last fall, on account of the influenza which broke out on the Magdalen Islands, the situation was very difficult and awkward. I, therefore, appealed to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and he sent on board one of his steamers, doctors and nurses, and also a supply of medicine. Even during that time the regular service was maintained, but it is such a poor service that it is of no advantage at all to the islands. Many articles of consumption are imported into the Magdalen Islands from parts of Canada, chiefly from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. When there is a poor steamer service, as there has been during the last four years, the Government must rush to their rescue, and during the two or three weeks before Christmas, the Stanley or the Laurentian has to make several hurried trips, and even then at times, on account of weather conditions, the goods cannot be landed. Therefore, having conferred with the leaders on the islands, I have come to the conclusion that it is time for the Government to give to the islanders a steamer service controlled by the Government themselves. I do not believe in privately-owned steamers. A large subsidy is paid for the carriage of the mails, and there is general dissatisfaction as to the way in which those private owners conduct the service. That has been the case during the twenty years I have had the honour to represent the islands. I would ask the Government to treat the Magdalen islands, with their population of 7,000 people, as they treat Prince Edward Island. There is a regular service between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, and the Government could well afford to put a steamer on the route between Pictou and Magdalen Islands.

I have not the figures before me, but the islanders are great producers in this sense that they are splendid fishermen, and the best fish of the Dominion comes from Magdalen Islands. The Government should take into consideration the fact that during several months of the year the islands have no communication whatsoever with the mainland, and, during the season of navigation the best service should be given to those taxpayers. I appeal to the acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Maclean) again to put the Stanley or the Laurentian on the route, because I have received from the warden of the county, Mr. Gaudet, a telegram which I have referred to the deputy minister. On the 8th of March last, this telegram was sent to me:

3 p.m.

Have wired O'Hara—

The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce.

—to-day as follows referring yours fourth instant. Delay in collecting freight was caused by goods having been landed at different points of these islands other than their intended destiation and the difficulties of communication from one island to another at that particular season. The goods have not yet all been delivered, but people are paying their freight in the regular manner as they get delivery of their goods. I can definitely state this to be true as I am the freight agent at Amherst Island notwithstanding any report you may have received. The trip of the Stanley is urgently required and there would be no justification for your department to refuse sending her for reason quoted. Therefore our request being so much needed we hope to have a prompt and favourable answer. Please use every effort to have Stanley sent down.

(Sgd) A. J. Gaudet, Warden.

I have received ten such telegrams from the different merchants and business men of the Islands. Surely, it is not fair to exclude these seven thousand people from the favours of the Government. They should have good and frequent communication with the mainland, as early as possible in the spring. We are unable to get an ice-breaker for the Islands, as the Stanley is in the Government service. I trust that the Government will do for the people of Magdalen Islands what they are doing for the people on the north shore below Quebec. I spend the summer at Murray Bay every year, travelling by the Intercolonial to Rivière Quelle; and from there an excellent service is provided by the steamer Champlain which plies between the north and the south the whole year round. I think it would be an easy matter for the Government to put one of their best steamers on the service between Pictou and the Magdalen Islands. I would again urge upon the Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries the absolute necessity of sending the steamer Stanley at the earliest possible moment to carry the goods which were left last fall on the wharves at Pictou, and to distribute the freight among the different ports of the Islands.

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (Kings, P.E.I.): I am interested in this particular service, as it touches two ports in my riding. It is a very important service, as a considerable amount of business is done on this route, particularly between Prince Edward Island and the Magdalen Islands, and between Pictou and Prince Edward Island. Prior to the war there was an excellent steamer on this route, but during the war the Government have not been able to provide us with a suitable boat. Last year the Enterprise, a small steamer which had formerly plied between Pictou, Georgetown, and Murray Harbour, was put on this route, but she was too small for the service. The Government also sent the Stanley in winter time, and she certainly did wonderful work. I am glad the hon. member for Maisonneuve

(Mr. Lemieux) has brought this matter up, and I trust the Government will provide the people of the Islands this year with a suitable boat large enough for the business. There are ports other than those of the Magdalen Islands which would be served by such a steamer. The service is of very great importance, indeed.

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: I am sorry I am not at the moment in possession of such facts as would enable me to inform the mover of the resolution (Mr. Lemieux) as to the probable service that will be provided this season between Pictou and the Magdalen Islands. Of course, no objection whatever can be taken to his statement that this is an important route. During the war the subsidized coastal steamship services have been very much demoralized, and it has been impossible to keep them up to normal. I trust, however, that in the near future the services will be restored to something like their pre-war standard. There is generally considerable difficulty in the spring and fall of the year in securing suitable boats to carry to the Magdalen Islands the freight required at those particular seasons. It is also true that a great deal of the difficulty is due to the fact that the merchants of the Magdalen Islands postpone until a very late date getting in their goods; but I suppose there may be a very good answer to that from their standpoint.

Let me say on behalf of the Department of Trade and Commerce that we are very heartily in sympathy with the observations made by the mover of the resolution, and we shall do everything possible to give a proper service between Pictou and the Islands. I shall be very glad to confer with the hon. member privately with respect to this matter. I know that there has been a request for the steamer Stanley or some similar boat to convey certain goods from the mainland of Nova Scotia to the Magdalen Islands, the goods consisting chiefly of fishermen's supplies which will be required for their fishing operations in the course of the next few weeks. The Department of Marine and Fisheries and the Department of Trade and Commerce are doing everything possible to meet this request of the people of the Magdalen Islands. I assure my hon. friend we shall give this matter constant attention, and if at all possible this request will be complied with.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I must thank the minister for his sympathetic hearing of my request. The Islanders, as I stated a moment ago, are very grateful for what the department has done during the last two or three years. For the present I shall content myself with urging upon my hon. friend the necessity of providing a boat early this month to relieve the present situation. Will the department or the Government also consider favourably the suggestion I have made that in order to obviate difficulties in the future they undertake that service themselves, as they do between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I think that would be the only satisfactory thing to do for that population.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think there is a great deal to say in favour of the suggestion of my hon. friend and between now and the time when the Supplementary Estimates are before the House possibly I may have an opportunity to give fuller consideration to the suggestion.

Motion agreed to.

REPRESENTATION ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Mr. Stacey, Bill No. 2, to amend the Representation Act of 1914, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand the hon. member in whose name the Bill stands is not present. I do not think we should proceed with the Bill until he is present, and I therefore beg to move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

SEED GRAIN—SECURITY FOR LOANS.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior), the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

That it is expedient to make provisions respecting advances for the purchase of seed grain, and to provide, on such terms and conditions as may be agreed on with any bank advancing moneys for the purchase of seed grain, that a guarantee by the Crown may be given to the said bank for the payment of the principal sum of such advances and interest thereon at five per centum per annum; and that upon payment of the principal sum, or any part thereof remaining unpaid, the security held by the bank shall be endorsed to the Minister; and further, to prescribe the nature of the security to be taken for loans, the rate of interest thereon and date of payment thereof, the form of application for loans, and the officials to whom application is to be made and by whom the application shall be verified and approved, the commission to be paid to the banks, and such other provisions as may be necessary for the better securing of the advances.

Mr. McKENZIE: We should have a very full explanation from the minister of the necessity for this action on the part of the Government and the steps that they propose to take in connection with it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, hitherto, and for many years, the Department of the Interior has advanced moneys which were essential in necessitous cases to the holders of unpatented lands for seed grain purposes. In each case they have taken security on the unpatented land which was still in their possession; that is to say, on the Government title which the entrant had not yet earned. In the year 1915 the Dominion Government was compelled to extend its activity in seed grain distribution to the holders of patented lands as well taking in that case the same security upon the title under the authority of the provincial legislature. When the subject had to be attacked for the year 1919, it was my desire that the Government of Canada should confine its responsibility to unpatented lands only and that the responsibility for providing seed with regard to patented lands should rest upon the local or provincial authorities. At a conference of the representatives of the Governments affected an arrangement to that end was made. Thereupon, we being concerned only with unpatented lands, it occurred to us that a better arrangement could be made by co-operation with the banks for the distribution of this seed grain and particularly for the collection of the returns, than under the system which had hitherto prevailed whereby we advanced the money ourselves and took the means and the responsibility of collection. Consequently an Order in Council was put through ratifying an agreement which was to the effect that wherever seed grain was necessary on unpatented lands, the homesteader would make application to the agent of Dominion Lands within whose district his homestead lay. The agent of Dominion Lands, if necessary, would send a homestead inspector to ascertain the facts. If it was not deemed necessary he would certify without such investigation. Upon his certificate being presented to the bank as to the amount required and the character of each grade, certifying such requisites as the form prescribed, the bank was authorized to advance to the homesteader the money and take his note and a seed grain lien in accordance with the Bank Act as security therefor. The Government guaranteed the bank that the money so advanced would be returned with interest at five per cent. The note itself, and the lien, bore interest at seven per cent which amount the bank were authorized to collect and which they had the security for. The arrangement also provided that in so far as the bank collected, they would receive one per cent on the amount collected; consequently, when the bank collect, they get eight per cent. Where the bank does not collect it gets five per cent. This is an arrangement resulting in a very considerable inducement to the bank to collect the money. It eliminates from the Interior Department the rather expensive mechanism by which we have endeavoured in the past to collect these advances. Of course, as yet, it cannot be said to have been fully tried out, but we hope that it will result in much better collections and at much less cost to the country. The resolution authorizes legislation looking to the implementing of the Order in Council passed and the provision of such machinery for the future on a permanent basis.

Mr. NESBITT: I think that the minister explained that the Government have the right to take over the security given and he said that the security would be in the form of a note and a lien taken under the Bank Act on the seed grain. The Government take a lien on the land, do they not? The banks cannot take a lien on the land? Therefore, the Government are dropping that portion of the security that they otherwise had.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the land is unpatented land; consequently, we hold the land as security just as before if we take it over.

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is necessary that there should be some limitation of the amount. This appears to give a blank cheque to the Government, or to grant authority to advance for this purpose an unlimited sum. It may be that there is something in the preceding legislation to limit the outlay of the Government. I only draw the minister's attention to it. This is an authority to pay or guarantee money and there must be some limitation to the amount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the previous legislation is different in that respect. I have not the exact terms of that legislation in my mind, but it enables the Government to advance money on unpatented land. Necessarily, we will have to have a vote of Parliament to pay the amount. The amount advanced in each case must be limited as it is only to be for the seed, certified by the agent of Dominion Lands, required for a man's homestead and not for any other purpose.

Mr. FIELDING: It may work out that way as between the department and its officials but when my hon. friend says that you would have to have a vote of Parliament I answer that this is the vote of Parliament. This gives unlimited authority to guarantee advances for that purpose.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Last year the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) brought in legislation asking for an unlimited amount for railway equipment. The amount was not mentioned and when the question was raised by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) he withdrew his resolution and came back with a stated amount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is very different. One might estimate what would be required to acquire a railway.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was for railway equipment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whatever the case may have been, but we do not know what amount will be required to provide seed grain in any particular spring. It all depends on the conditions of the previous year and the condition of the farmers in any district. It has varied from year to year. I do not presume there has been anything like uniformity. I know there has not been. We have had to advance amounts beginning with almost nothing and running up to $12,000,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Cannot you suggest an average?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The average would be $5,000,000 but I would never suggest to Parliament that it would amount to $5,000,000 in any one year. I do not think the amount can be suggested.

Mr. NESBITT: The wording here is: "Any part thereof remaining unpaid." How long a time are the banks authorized to loan for?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The notes all fall due on or before the first of January.

Mr. NESBITT: In the succeeding year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the succeeding year and the bank has a certain time, unless it is extended by the minister, within which to call upon the department for payment. If the bank calls upon the department for payment, it then gets five per cent.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My recollection is that when we embarked upon the policy of advancing money for the purchase of seed grain to western farmers we were told that it was to be temporary and only to meet an emergency. It seems now to be renewed every year. I would like to know what view my hon. friend takes of the matter. Is it intended that this shall be a permanent advance, year after year, or is it only for a limited time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first question my hon. friend raises has reference to the advance of 1915, which was on a wholly different basis from any other advance. That was on patented and unpatented lands, and reached a total of between twelve and thirteen million dollars. Every year for I do not know how many years—I have no doubt for thirty—advances have been made on unpatented lands—that is on our own lands—to homesteaders, and that is all this legislation contemplates. Consequently there is no change at all. As to the second question, namely, that relating to repayments, I can answer that in so far as the large advance of 1915 was concerned. We have met with very considerable delay and not wholly satisfactory results in repayment. The sanguine hopes of many have not been met, and at the same time the pessimistic expectations of others have been surpassed. Of that $12,000,000, I think I am safe in saying, we have received between eight and eight and a half millions; it is not below that figure, it may possibly by this time have come up to about $9,000,000. That money, however, was not wholly advanced for seed grain—I will give the exact figures to the House at any time—it was advanced, to the extent of I think about five millions, for relief, the other seven millions being for seed grain. The relief money has been the most difficult to collect. All the security we were able to get was a lien on the land, over and above all registered liens at that time, therefore the difficulty in collecting. The lessons we have learned as the result of our experience in connection with seed grain liens has resulted in my decision to try this experiment.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it the intention of my hon. friend to continue the payment of 3 per cent for the collection as formerly?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no rate of 3 per cent, and there never has been.

Mr. MURPHY: I understood my hon. friend to mention 5 per cent and that 3 per cent was collected in addition to that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All that the farmer pays is 7 per cent, no matter to whom he pays. If he did not pay the bank the bank calls upon the department, and the department collects 7 per cent from the farmer.

Mr. NESBITT: The Government only pays 5 per cent to the bank?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The department guarantees 5 per cent to the bank, and for what it collects the bank receives 1 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Is there any intention on the part of the department to handle seed grain throughout the country? For instance, the Department of Agriculture has a commission buying and handling seed grain. Has that any relation to the policy now under discussion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The commission in connection with the Department of Agriculture—I know something of its operations, as I was Acting Minister of Agriculture for a time—has to do with the selection of seed grain and its distribution for cash to municipalities and others. It has nothing to do with the distribution of seed grain to homesteaders on liens. It simply selects, tests and issues when the seed grain from a germinating standpoint is good, and sells that seed grain at the price paid for it—sells for cash.

Mr. ROBB: Or less?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the only occasion of which I am able to speak definitely, on account of the rise in the price of grain, the department came out very considerably ahead, although that was not intended.

Mr. CAHILL: I think the objection of the member for Queens and Shelburne is worthy of some consideration, and might be met by the minister making an estimate of what he expects will be required in the coming season. There is no doubt this matter should be brought before Parliament from year to year, and the amount voted which is expected to be required or to be guaranteed. It seems to me that the present system is rather loose. In the first place, the Government is a very poor collector at any time. The inducement of the bank is not very great and its responsibility is nothing at all; the bank simply lends the money and is guaranteed 5 per cent in any event, the same as if it were making advances to the Government. I think the bank should be made responsible in some way and assume some share of the responsibility if it is being guaranteed the money. It has a chance to make 8 per cent if it looks after the collections, but it gets 5 per cent in any event. I think it would be better if the bank were made responsible for the collection of this money. It will not sue any person under this arrangement, and there is no provision for it; it simply hands over the security when it gets tired of the arrangement to the Dominion Government, and leaves it to the latter to collect. If the Government were to guarantee the bank 80 per cent of the advances made, and stipulate that there should be no interest paid on what it did not collect, it would have some chance of getting a little better security and loaning it to a better class of people. If this were limited to the homesteader it might not involve so much money, but there is nothing in this regarding unpatented lands. A friendly immigration agent would manage to get a good deal of money at 7 per cent invested in Canada at the present time. If the banks loan money, and are not saddled with any greater responsibility than is here provided and can hand their securities over to the Dominion Government for it to take action at some future time, it seems to me such loans would be pretty easy for the banks to make, and the fellow who gets the money is not in any worse position but in a much better position than ever before.

Mr. SHEARD: May I ask the minister if he can give us any idea of the losses which have been incurred by the Government in connection with those advances?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is virtually no loss with respect to advances on unpatented lands, because in every case we have the land, and if the homesteader abandons it the seed grain lien is charged against it and must be paid by the next entrant. I know I am safe in saying that there is no need for consideration on the part of the House of the question of loss so far as our past history is concerned. There will be losses in connection with relief and seed grain advances on patented lands, particularly with relation to relief. Personally, I am very confident that loss will amount to a very small proportion, and even if we lost a substantial share of the sum that was advanced in 1915 the investment on the part of Canada would well have been an excellent one because the results to this country were pretty nearly in the Scriptural proportion of a hundred fold. I would like to meet the point raised by the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne, if I could see any way of doing so, although that was not what was really discussed by the hon. member for Pontiac. I do not see any way to do so for this reason: Presuming we were to fix a figure, say of $1,000,000, and when the spring came that amount would not provide seed, thousands of acres of land are going to go unseeded, or else we would simply have to take the money by Governor General's warrant; we could not do anything else, we could not possibly stand by and see the land go unseeded. Therefore no very great object would be gained by fixing an amount for such a peculiar cause as this. However, if the resolution passes I will give further thought to the question, and when the Bill is before the House there will be an opportunity for an amendment to that effect.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and concurred in.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24, respecting advances for the purchase of seed grain.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 7, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the explanation of this Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can give no explanation of a general character that would be of advantage to the committee. The Yukon Placer Mining Act was passed in 1906 and has never been amended. This Bill makes certain amendments of more or less technical character. I do not think any of them are of major consequence, but they are considered important by the Yukon branch of the department. Each amendment will have to be discussed upon its own merits.

On section 1—definition:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is merely to take care of the case of one stream meeting another and the intention of the Act that no claim shall extend over 500 feet. Further, the special meaning attaching to "base line" in mine surveying is given.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—side and end boundaries:

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): This is to provide for the running of the base line up the creek valley, but not the side lines, as the Act now provides. It has been found that the base line itself is sufficient. The end lines of the claims may be run at right angles to the base line, but it is not necessary to put the Government to the expense of running three lines parallel to the base line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As a consequence of that, section 24 of the Act has to be repealed; and this is done by section 3 of this Bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—size of discovery claims:

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): As it stands, the Act penalizes discoverers of mining claims if there are more than two in the party. If there are two in the party they are entitled to 1,250 feet each, but if more than two, each member of the party is entitled to only 1,000 feet. It is the wish of the people of the territory that discoverers get 1,250 feet each for the claims which they locate. The idea is to induce prospectors to go into a new territory and discover new mines.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—right to relocate after forfeiture.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is to enable the former owner to relocate a claim after the lapse of a year. Under the law as it stands he cannot do that.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—appeals.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon) This section is self-explanatory. There is no court en banc in the the Yukon Territory at the present time. The court en banc has been abolished. The only court to which appeals may be made is the Territorial Court.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the meaning of the expression " court en bac?"

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): My hon. friend is a better authority on that than I am.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We always call it the full court.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, court en banc. That makes a great difference. The word "bac" means a certain kind of boat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The word should be "banc," not "bac."

Mr. McKENZIE: I have not had very much time to look over this Bill. Does it provide for an appeal? If so, where?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is in the Yukon only one judge, Judge Macaulay. It appears that at one time, when the Act was passed, there was a court en banc. That was abolished. This is simply to strike out the words in the Act.

Mr. McMASTER: This discussion may be interesting and even amusing to those who are taking part in it. We, however, sitting at the back of the Chamber have not the pleasure of understanding what is going on.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—when owner does not renew claim, claim may be relocated, etc.

Mr. ROBB: This appears to be a section which may work great hardship at this particular time. We have been told by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. 4 p.m. A. Thompson) that many men from the Yukon went overseas. I can see where a soldier having gone overseas and abandoned his claim temporarily, may return to find some other person in possession of it, and it may be a valuable claim.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): My hon. friend will see, a little later on in the Bill and in these amendments, that soldiers' claims have been protected by the Bill.

Mr. ROBB: What section is that?

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): Section 10, of this Bill, subsection 45, under the heading "co-owners, one of whom served in war." This amendment provides simply for payment in the event of expenses having been incurred because of the claim owner's neglect to renew. It was drafted as the result of the experience of the Gold Commissioner, the man who administers this law.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to ask a question as to the latter part of section 4 with reference to advertising. Is the advertisement sufficient to give every person notice? The section does not state what the extent of the advertisement shall be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The section provides for the survey being published in the Yukon Official Gazette for twelve successive issues, and remaining unprotested during that period.

Mr. NESBITT: Not in any local paper?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. McMASTER: There is no Yukon official record?

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): There is a Gazette.

Mr. McMASTER: There is no Yukon official record similar to the Canadian official record?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the people there can expect comforts of that kind.

Mr. McKENZIE: I notice provision is made here for the reinstatement of a person who may have lost his right to a mining claim, provided that he pays certain expenditures that may have been made by the parties who took over the claim. I find no provision for the adjustment of those expenditures. The man who made the expenditures may say that there were very large, and the man has to pay them may say that they are not just. Unless there is some provision already in the Act, there should be some competent authority to adjust the amount of those expenditures, that is to fix the amount that a man would have to pay in order to be reinstated, whether those expenditures are for betterments of the claim or anything else in connection with it.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): I am not sure whether this was specifically provided for in the original Act, but the way it works out is this, that the Gold Commissioner sends his inspector out to measure up the work done on a claim, and as the value of work done on these claims is fairly well-known, no trouble has, so far as my knowledge goes, occurred as the result of that method. Of course, with regard to the cost of relocating a claim, the fees and travelling expenses are easily verified. I think the Gold Commissioner himself determines the amount.

Mr. McKENZIE: I can readily understand he would be the proper authority to do so, but whether he has that jurisdiction I do not know. If not, I think we should insert in the Act a clause that the claim should be adjusted by the gold commissioner.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): I feel sure the gold commissioner has that power, and from his decision there would be an appeal to the Territorial Court.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—proportionate contribution of work, etc., in case of co-owners:

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister understand this section to be of practical value?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act as it stood provided only for payment by co-owners of their share of the fees. This provides that each co-owner must also do his share of the work, and in the event of a co-owner not doing his especial work, the interests of the defaulting co-owner shall pass to those co-owners who remained and performed his share of the work.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): I may say that in order to hold these claims certain fees have to be paid and certain work must be done annually. The Act calls this work "representation work." As the law now stands, there is no provision for dealing with the owner who refuses to pay his share of the renewal fees, but only with the owner who fails to do his share of the work. The proposed amendment makes it necessary for a co-owner not only to do his share of representation work but also to pay his share of the fees. In the case of a defunct interest the intention is to give the claim to the co-owner or co-owners who actually did the work of the co-owner in default, and not to those co-owners who performed and paid only their portion.

Mr. McMASTER: Is the decision of the gold commissioner final? I can easily imagine a case where a man might be absent from his claim on business for some time, and when he comes back he finds that his two co-partners have in the meantime done certain work and paid certain fees, and in consequence have been vested with the whole claim by the gold commissioner. Now there might have been an arrangement made between these three men before this particular man went off, and what I want to know is whether the decision of the gold commissioner is final, or whether the matter could be opened up judicially or otherwise by the returned co-owner who had lost his interest.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): Of course, these amendments do not affect whatever rights of appeal there now are from the decisions of the gold commissioner to the Territorial Court. This Act has been in operation for many years, and, as in the case of all other Acts, certain defects have been found in its operation. The defects were discovered by the gold commissioner and his officers, and the proposed amendments are the outcome of the experience of the gold commissioner and his staff in administering the Act for a number of years. Ordinarily, there is an appeal from the gold commissioner to the Territorial Court, and I feel sure there would be the right of appeal in the case my hon. friend has suggested. The decision of the gold commissioner is not final in any of these matters. Subsection 3 is rather important. In the past a man holding a claim has sometimes been able to prevent a dredge working up or down on either side of his claim, and I might say just here that the dredging industry is a very important one in the Yukon at the present time, most of the gold being won by that method. This subsection is to prevent a man from holding up dredging operations, on either side of him. It makes it possible to assess the damages occasioned by going across the claim. It gives all the gold extracted to the claim owner, and provides for an appeal from the gold commissioner's findings to the Territorial Court.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Does this appeal provided for in subsection 4 apply only to subsections 2 and 3, or does it apply to the original section which is now subsection 1? In the original subsection there was an appeal to the Board of Arbitration, and now the appeal is abolished by the present section.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): The practice of appeals to the Board of Arbitration to which the hon. member refers has been found unworkable, hence this amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this dredge a local dredge?

Mr. THOMPSON: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have in the province from which I come a law—although not in connection with gold mines—very much like this, in connection with other minerals. Our law provides that a man through whose property one has to pass, or on whose property he has to perform certain work, will be asked for permission, and if he refuses then there is an application. I think it would be well, unless provision is made already, that the permission should be obtained, and in the event of refusal, notice could be served on the owner that upon a certain day an application would be made before the commissioner; so that the owner of the property would be given an opportunity of being heard when that application was made; and if his property should be passed through, it might be done at a place where the least damage would occur. I think the general common law principle should be observed, that no person's property shall be interfered with without his permission; and there should be some provision that the owner of property through which passage is to be made should have an opportunity of being heard when the application is being made before the Gold Commissioner.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): That is a fair criticism, and perhaps it might be well to insert a time clause, within which the dredge owner should notify the claim owner.

Section agreed to.

On section 12; subsection 1.—Board of Arbitrators to determine disputes.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Winnipeg): No provision is made as to what form the notice shall take, and I think it might leave the operation of the Act open to a good deal of dispute in some cases as to whether or not notice was given. Nothing is said about written notices, and I think the words "in writing" should be inserted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see no objection to that. The section as it stands provides for notice, but does not provide that it shall be notice in writing. The purpose of this amendment is merely to express more clearly the intention of the old Act. No difficulty has arisen in the past with regard to notice, or the Gold Commissioner would undoubtedly have recommended the very amendment my friend proposes. I see no objection to accepting the words "in writing," because I cannot conceive that it could have been the practice that notification should be given in any other way.

Mr. ANDREWS: Whatever the other Act may have contained, it is now repealed, so that there is no provision of any kind except what is contained in this section; and it appears to me that difficulties might possibly arise. A man might claim that he had given notice, say, last Thursday at the hotel, and a denial might follow, and I think it would avoid any possibility of such a difficulty if the form of notification is definitely fixed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to the words "in writing" being inserted, but I am a little apprehensive that in some other section of the Bill it will be provided that all notices shall be in writing.

Mr. McMASTER: I suggest that it might be advisable to make provision at the end that all notices shall be in writing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think we had better leave the matter for the present, and if there is no provision for notice in writing I shall move it by way of amendment in the third reading.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

On section 15—Powers of Commissioner over property of deceased or insane owners.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): As the Act now stands, if a miner owning even a small fraction of a claim dies the whole claim is exempt from renewal. Advantage has been taken of this section to hold very large blocks of ground. It is to prevent this sort of thing that this clause has been drafted.

On section 16—assignee of property of deceased or insane owner to apply for grant within two months:

Mr. MORPHY: What provision have you for giving notice in a country like the Yukon of an enactment of this kind so that the public may understand it? This is a most drastic section. A man may be out of the bounds of civilization and yet by the terms of this section he may have his claim taken from him without reasonable notice whatever.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Reference to the original Act as it stood will show there is nothing more drastic in this clause than in that for which it is substituted. It does sound, of course, somewhat drastic. But the working of it must have shown that it is necessary. In the Act as it now stands there is no penalty prescribed for a person who refuses or neglects to apply for a renewal of his claim. The amendment does prescribe such a penalty. Otherwise, it merely makes clear the law as it is.

Bill reported.

IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, to amend the Irrigation Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is possibly a new subject to most of the members of the House and perhaps the minister might give us an explanation of the Bill before the House goes into committee upon it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Inasmuch as this Bill contains only individual and isolated amendments, there is no general explanation that can suitably be given. While I am on my feet, I might as well explain the first section. The Irrigation Act has been in effect, of course, for many years. Canada, by that Act, asserted its control over all waters which might be utilized for irrigation purposes. Virtually, it asserted its control over the power to divert water within the area covered by the Act. The Act just covers a certain defined area in western Canada. Clause 1 of this Bill makes the following provision:

No person shall divert or use any water from, and no person shall construct or cause to be constructed any dam or other works for the impounding of water in any river, stream, watercourse, creek, spring, ravine, canyon, lagoon, swamp, marsh, or other body of water, otherwise than under the provisions of this Act, except in the exercise of a legal right existing at the time of such diversion or use or construction.

While the Act as it stands prevents a diversion, the Justice Department has given the opinion that it does not extend to cover a dam, or work in the nature of a dam, for impounding water, although in one sense it is a diversion and, I think, was intended to be covered by the Act. This is to take care that the purpose of the Act shall not be defeated by the impounding of water by means of dams unless the right to do so existed at the time of such diversion or construction.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. McKENZIE: The last part of subsection 2 appeals to a lawyer as likely to create some difficulty about the existing legal rights. Will the minister make clear what is meant by "existing legal rights?" For instance, one man has a legal right to erect a dam, and somebody else has no right to do so. Wherein consists the legal right of the one over the other?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would presume that there might be a Crown grant by provincial or other authority of such legal right placing the man in a position to build the dam irrespective entirely of the rights of proprietors downstream or upstream. At all events, whatever it may mean, if the builder—the diverter by means of the dam of the water—is able to establish that he had the right to do so by a specific grant, or otherwise, he of course is free. But if he has not, then this prevents him doing it, and makes him subject to the penalties of the Act if he does it, and does not leave the matter merely to the action of some one else, by way of injunction, who may have an interest.

Section agreed to.

On subsection 2—grant of lands not to convey water rights.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to the reason for this I have not the explanation before me, but I can remember it, I think, accurately. The Act was first passed on the 23rd July, 1894, but subsequently, on the revision, that date was not carried forward as the date of the prohibition, and it has been held that the date fixed in the revision, or rather the date not fixed, but the date of the Act after the revision, is the date which takes effect. This is to make certain that the original date prevails and the prohibition dates from the date the Act was passed.

Mr. McMASTER: Should there not be some saving of any rights acquired meanwhile?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There could not have been any legally acquired.

EXCESS CIRCULATION CHARTERED BANKS.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the proclamation dated the third day of September, 1914, made under the authority of the Provisions of the Finance Act, 1914, and Published in the Canada Gazette of the fifth day of September, 1914, except paragraph (c) thereof (hereinafter specially provided for) shall continue in force and effect until the end of two years after the conclusion of peace on the termination of the present war, unless an earlier date is proclaimed for the termination thereof; and that the provision of paragraph (c) of the said proclamation authorizing the chartered banks to issue excess circulation, as in the said Act defined from the first day of March, 1915, to and including the last day of August, 1915, shall apply to the period from and including the first day of March, 1919, to and including the last day of August next ensuing, and to the same period in 1920, and the chartered banks may issue such excess circulation accordingly, subject to termination on the same date as is proclaimed for the termination of the operation of the said proclamation.

Mr. McKENZIE: Surely the Government should offer some explanation as to the necessity for this resolution.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: During the war, and at the present time, certain provisions of the Finance Act of 1914 have been in operation under the authority of a proclamation issued by virtue of that Act. That proclamation authorized the making of advances by the Government to the chartered banks, and to certain savings banks, by the issue of Dominion notes upon the credit of securities deposited with the Minister of Finance of such kind and amounts as should be approved by the Treasury Board, such advances to be repayable at such times as the Board might determine, with interest at a rate of not less than 5 per cent per annum.

The proclamation also authorized the chartered banks to make payment in the bank notes issued by such banks, instead of in gold or Dominion notes, the total amount of notes of any chartered banks in circulation at any time not to exceed the amount of its notes issued under the provisions of the Bank Act. It also authorized the several chartered banks to issue excess circulation, from and including the first day of March in any year up to and including the last day of August, to amounts not exceeding fifteen per cent of the combined unimpaired capital and rest or reserve fund of the respective banks as stated in their monthly returns to the minister for the month immediately preceding that in which the additional amount is issued.

Under the provisions of the Finance Act of 1914, the proclamation to which I have referred may be issued in case only of war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended, and in case of any real or apprehended financial crisis. Now, when the war is officially declared at an end the provisions of the Finance Act in respect of the matters I have mentioned cannot be brought into operation unless there exists a real or apprehended financial crisis. But in view of the length of the war, the demands which it has made upon the resources of all countries and the unsettled conditions which it has produced, it is advisable that this legislation be continued in effect until conditions become normal. It is estimated that conditions will become normal in two years. We hope it will be earlier than that, but for a long time to come financial and economic conditions will be very greatly unsettled throughout the entire world. This legislation is necessary in order that the present conditions under which the banks are operating, and which have been found so effectual during the war, may be continued.

It may be of interest to the committee to know something of the conditions of our bank and Dominion note circulation at the end of the war. Comparing it with that of other countries, to me it is an exceedingly gratifying one. On January 31, 1919, the Dominion note circulation amounted to $319,315,689. That represents the total amount of outstanding Dominion notes. The percentage of gold and securities held against that total issue is 88 per cent; the percentage fully covered by securities is 51.8 per cent. The percentage of the balance of the issue covered by gold is 75·2 per cent, and the percentage of gold held against the total issue, irrespective of securities also held, is 36·2 per cent. Dominion notes to the extent of $82,275,000 are outstanding against securities under the Finance Act. The securities held against those notes are as follows:

Imperial Treasury Bill Certificates	$82,650,000
Dominion of Canada Treasury Bills	6,393,000
Municipal Bonds and debentures, Province of Nova Scotia Debentures, City of Toronto Bonds, Province of Ontario stock, City of Three Rivers Bonds, Province of Ontario Treasury Bills	1,189,333

This makes a total of over $90,000,000, in round figures, of the highest class of securities held against that amount of Dominion notes.

Then, we have Dominion notes issued against railway securities under legislation which was passed in 1914, to the amount of $16,000,000. The securities held are Grand Trunk Pacific 4 per cent bonds guaranteed by the Government, $7,500,000; and Canadian Northern Railway Company 4 per cent bonds guaranteed by the Government $12,500,000, making a total of $20,000,000.

In August 1917, in order to meet the very serious situation which arose in this country affecting imperial finance and to enable the Imperial Government to buy our cheese and other agricultural products, we made an issue of $50,000,000 of Dominion notes against securities to the total par value of £15,000,000 and to the stock exchange value of £11,000,000, deposited by the Imperial Government for account of the Dominion with the Bank of Montreal in London.

Now, the net result of what I have said is this: We hold against our Dominion note circulation—in addition to gold—Imperial Government, Dominion Government, provincial and municipal securities to the amount of $90,000,000, Railways securities guaranteed by the Dominion to the extent of $20,000,000, and securities owned by the Imperial Government and lodged with the Bank of Montreal for account of the Dominion in London to a market value of £11,000,000. Then, the Dominion holds gold against Dominion notes at the present time to the total amount, in round figures, of $120,000,000. The last named figure compares with $91,000,000 of gold which we held against circulation on July 31, 1914. It will be observed that the Dominion Government has in hand to-day $30,000,000 more in gold than it had on July 31, 1914. The total Dominion note circulation in 1914 was $112,000,000. That has been expanded during the war to $319,000,000.

I stated the percentage of gold in relation to total Dominion note circulation as 36 per cent. In order to give the committee an idea of what has happened in Great Britain and the United States—

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the minister leaves that point, will he explain to the committee how the percentage of gold as compared with the circulation of Dominion notes in 1914 compares with the percentage of gold as compared with the circulation of Dominion notes to-day?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In 1914, Dominion notes outstanding were, in round figures, $112,000,000. The total gold held against those notes was $90,000,000. The per centage would be about 80 per cent, but there were not other securities held against the note circulation at that time. While the note circulation has been expanded, a considerable portion of that expansion is due to the loans that have been made to banks on high class securities, to the loan which was made in Dominion notes to the Imperial Government upon the securities that I have mentioned, and to the loans made to the railway companies in 1914, which transaction was validated by legislation passed in that year by the House, amounting to $16,000,000.

Let me give the committee an idea of what has happened in other countries. Great Britain, of course, was in the war at the beginning. I asked the Bank of Montreal to make inquiry for me as to the percentage of gold held against the currency note issue of the Imperial Government. The committee realizes how stringent were the provisions in Great Britain before the war, that note circulation should be covered by gold. The position is as follows: Currency notes outstanding, £314,800,000, against gold £28,500,000, and treasury bills for the balance. The Bank of Montreal memorandum states that the ratio of gold against sterling notes outstanding is 9 per cent.

I asked the bank also to obtain for me the figures in the United States. The United States have been in the war since April, 1917. The information that the bank has obtained for me is as follows:

Federal Reserve Notes outstanding	$2,599,715,000
Gold held	1,381,125,000
United States notes of all varieties outstanding	1,886,204,720
Gold held	1,015,179,000

The total therefore of notes of the Federal Reserve banks and of the United States Government, outstanding, amount to $4,485,917,720, against which gold is held to the amount of $2,396,304,000. The percentage of gold held to notes in circulation is therefore 53 per cent.

Mr. CAHILL: Did we not, at the last session, make a permanent extension of credit to the banks, or something similar to this? The Government is proposing now to give them a fifteen per cent increase in circulation. Last session, it seems to me, we made a fifteen per cent increase in circulation permanent, the expansion being for the purpose of moving the crops. The Government is now proposing to give them authority to inflate the currency further by another issue of fiat money. Our gold deposits are small enough as against the note circulation we have now, and we are simply adding to the difficulty by increasing the issue of fiat money, because this does not seem to be anything else. It means increasing the high cost of living, making money cheaper and commodities dearer.

I should also like to ask if there is still an embargo on gold going out of Canada, and if it is still against the law for the banks to pay out gold. If so, how long is this provision supposed to last, in order to regulate our exchange?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon. friend must have reference to action taken to continue the provisions of the Finance Act in operation last year. The Finance Act, as I pointed out, contains provisions which can be invoked only in time of war or real or apprehended financial panic. The proclamations which have been issued and the action taken so far would come to an end with the official conclusion of the war. The result is we should be where we were before the war broke out in 1914. For the reasons that I have mentioned, the general unsettled financial conditions of the world and the necessity of conserving gold reserves, it is undesirable that we should revert to that condition. We, therefore, ask that the measures which have been so effectual during the war—and they have been exceedingly effectual and in the national interest—should be continued for a period not exceeding two years after the war, subject to being terminated by Order in Council at such time as we think they are no longer necessary. I think it is undoubtedly in the national interest that this legislation should be passed.

My hon. friend speaks of fiat money. I have no hesitation in saying that of all the belligerents that have been in the war since the beginning, the financial position of Canada is undoubtedly the best. There is no question about that. The United States, as I pointed out, was in the war for nearly two years. The position of the United States with regard to its circulation is as I have indicated, but I do not believe it is more favourable than that of Canada in that respect.

My hon. friend has asked with regard to the regulations against the export of gold from Canada. Those regulations are still in effect, and will be continued in effect so long as we think it necessary to protect the gold reserves of the country. At the present time gold would be shipped to Asia or to other parts of the world where it might be in demand, for the purpose of building up gold reserves, and it is very necessary, by reason of the expansion of note issues in Great Britain, the United States, and this country that gold should be conserved. Generally speaking, with regard to restrictions and regulations, it has been the policy and is the policy of the Government to cancel them just as rapidly as in our judgment the national interests of the country will permit. Almost immediately upon the declaration of the armistice we removed the restrictions against issues in our market by provincial and municipal governments. A little later we removed all restrictions upon issues, when the Government no longer needed the market, and when it was clear that those issues would be made without any detriment to the national interest. I can assure my hon. friend that no one desires more keenly than I do to get rid of all restrictions imposed by Order in Council, and I am sure that would be the view of other ministers, because one effect of these Orders in Council is to increase our administrative duties. With regard to gold and silver, for instance, applications are made for license to export, and these applications have to be considered and decisions given upon them. My happiness as a minister will be greatly increased when all restrictions are removed. There is no object in the Government keeping in force any Order in Council a day beyond the time it is actually needed in the national interest. I realize, of course, there may be a difference of opinion as to just when an Order in Council should be cancelled, but the Government must exercise its discretion with regard to that having in view the national interest as it sees it at the time.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member for Pontiac seems to be under the impression that the facilities of the banks for issuing circulation are being increased by this legislation. I do not understand it to be so. What I understand is that the emergency provisions ought to be extended for a period after the war, and, speaking generally, in view of the very uncertain conditions prevailing and the large business enterprises that will have to be carried out in the reconstruction period, I think it is well that the power of the Government to assist the banks in that way—it is not a new power—should be extended for a reasonable time after the war. Did I hear my hon. friend read, amongst the securities against which we issue Canadian notes, Canadian treasury bills?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, but not owned by the Dominion of Canada; owned, let us say, by a bank.

Mr. FIELDING: Issued by the Dominion Government, and coming back to us as the property of others?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: Otherwise, it would be tantamount to a man putting his own note in the safe and thinking he was richer. With regard to the fifteen per cent excess circulation, the origin of that goes back some years, I think to 1907, when there was a very disturbed financial condition in the United States, and for a while it seemed as if we would have a very disturbed financial condition in Canada, particularly in the West The banks were largely restricting their credits, business men were becoming very much alarmed, and altogether the situation was very dangerous At that time, the Government of the day took upon themselves—straining their authority, I admit—to issue excess circulation, not bank circulation, but Dominion circulation, and to loan it to the banks if they wished to have it to meet the demands of the occasion, particularly with regard to the moving of the crop in Canada. My recollection is that the amount authorized to be issued, if you call it authority, was $10,000,000, and of that I think little more than half was actually issued. It was another case of the old lady who heard the bank where she deposited her money was in trouble and went to the bank and asked for her money, and when it was given to her, said: "Now I know you have it, I don't want it." When it was known that the Government of the day had the facilities and were willing to help the banks, the banks themselves loosened up and there was no need to issue the full amount proposed by the Government. Of course, it was a straining of authority, and at the following session of Parliament legislation had to be introduced to authorize and indemnify those who were concerned in the issue of those notes. But out of that experience wisdom was learned. We learned that while our arrangements for circulation as between the Government and the banks were satisfactory for ordinary business, in the case of stress or emergency there was need of some greater power, and the result was that at the following session an Act was passed to provide for what might for convenience be called emergency circulation. In that case it was proposed that the circulation should be issued by the banks. In the actual transaction that had taken place just previously the circulation was issued by the Government. It was proposed that the banks during a certain period of the year,—the crop period,—should be allowed, in addition to their ordinary powers of circulation, to issue excess circulation to the extent of fifteen per cent of their combined paid-up capital and rest. That worked out, I think, very well. Some bankers at the beginning did not like it. I remember one very eminent banker who said that no self-respecting bank would ever use it, but I think his own bank saw fit to use it afterwards. I understand that the Finance Minister is proposing to continue for two years after the war that scheme, which was only intended in the first place to meet the emergency of the crop season. I think it is very desirable that the extension should not be made for a longer period than is absolutely necessary, but I do think the minister is wise in keeping this power in his hands in view of the very disturbed financial conditions which may reach us in the reconstruction period.

Mr. ELKIN: I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that the American Government are trying to gather in all the gold they can. Not long ago I had the experience of taking some gold across into the United States, and at the border the gold was taken from me, as it is from everybody else, and American bank notes were given in exchange for it. The security may be just as good, but the object of the American Government is to strengthen their note issue by gathering in gold from every one who is passing into or out of their country. I do not see any effort of that kind being made in Canada, though possibly Americans are bringing across gold to this country and taking it over to Europe with them. There are no doubt many of our people who are holding a certain amount of gold, perhaps two or three hundred dollars, which in the aggregate would amount to quite a lot if we gathered it in to strengthen our gold reserve as the Americans are doing.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am interested in what my hon. friend has said. Perhaps I should inform the committee as to the gold holdings of the banks, before the resolution passes. I have pointed out that the gold holdings of the Dominion have increased from $97,000,000 in July, 1914, to $121,000,000 at the end of January of this year; an increase of $24,000,000. The gold held by Canadian banks has also been substantially increased. In July, 1914, it amounted to $54,000,000 roughly speaking. On January 31st, 1919, it amounted to $91,000,000, an increase of $37,000,000. So that we have come through the war, both the banks and the Dominion Government, with a very substantial increase in the gold reserves which we hold.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

CURRENCY ACT 1910 AMENDMENT—BRONZE COINS.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved:

That it is expedient to amend the Currency Act, 1910, by providing for the standard weight, fineness and remedy allowance of the bronze cent, and that bronze coins heretofore struck by authority of the Crown shall continue to be current and a legal tender; and those provisions shall come into force upon such date as may be prescribed by proclamation issued by the Governor in Council.

He said: The Bill which this resolution precedes provides authority for the issue of a one-cent piece, smaller than the one at present in use. It has long been pointed out to the Finance Department that the present cent, while a beautiful coin, is too large, and that it is very desirable that a smaller one should be substituted in its stead. I had the matter under consideration some time before the war, but during the war owing to pressure of other matters I did not go on with it. The weight of the present one-cent piece is 87½ grains, and it is proposed to make the weight of the new piece, 50 grains. For the information of the committee I may say that 80 of the present one-cent pieces make an avoirdupois pound, on which a remedy of 140 grains is allowed. Of the new pieces at 50 grains each, 140 would make an avoirdupois pound, and the same remedy of 140 grains will be provided by the Bill. A similar practice in regard to remedy is followed by the London mint. The proposed new piece will approximate in size the American bronze cent, the weight of the latter being 48 grains. It is not precisely similar to the American piece, but it approximates it. The weight of the American bronze cent is 48 grains and it is thought by the mint that a weight of 50 grains would be more convenient for handling. It is a little larger than the ten-cent piece, and thicker, so that it can be easily distinguished from that coin by touch. The Bill will also provide that the present one-cent piece will continue to be a legal coin as at present. The Act which we have in mind will be brought into force by proclamation. For the information of the committee I have had my office prepare a statement showing the total issue of bronze coins in Canada, less the smooth and mutilated coins which have been redeemed. From that statement it appears that up to January 31, 1919, there have been issued, less coins redeemed, an aggregate of $1,578,904 in bronze coins. As to the amount of bronze cent coinage struck in recent years I find that in 1896 the amount was $20,000; in 1906, $41,000; in 1911, $54,480; in 1914, $35,100; and in 1918, $112,200. I thought that was all the information the committee would require to enable them to consider the resolution.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the committee would like to know something about the intrinsic value of these coins. There is a certain value in a cent. The metal composing the present cent has some intrinsic value apart from its being a coin. Perhaps the minister can tell us if there is any difference in the value of the two coins. Would one be as valuable as the other? The minister no doubt understands what I mean as to value. Our five-dollar gold piece might be changed in such a way that it would not have the amount of gold in it that it has at present. Of course, the change from one-cent coin to another is on a very much smaller scale, but it might be asked if the intrinsic value is there.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With regard to gold coins, of course they are full value, and legal tender in ordinary times really is based upon gold standard, and gold or Dominion notes may be asked for. But with regard to the subsidiary coinage, silver and bronze, they do not represent the intrinsic value which they appear to have in gold. It is desirable they should approximate, particularly in the case of silver. The value of silver, of course, fluctuates from time to time, and the intrinsic value of our fifty, twenty-five, ten and five-cent pieces is not at any time equal to their face value, much less are our bronze one-cent pieces. The smaller coin has less intrinsic value; but having regard to the fact that it is in general circulation, and is a convenience to the public, I think no serious question is likely to arise on that score. Of course, reducing the amount of bronze in it reduces its intrinsic value, but I do not think that is a serious objection to the change which we propose. Ours weighs a little more than the American bronze coin. As my hon. friend is interested in the subject when the Bill comes for second reading I shall obtain information as to the intrinsic value of the one-cent piece, if it is possible to estimate it, as I think it is. It is not intended to withdraw the existing coins. The Bill will provide for their continuance as legal coinage of Canada, and only as they become smooth or mutilated will they be redeemed. They will remain in circulation, for the reason I have mentioned, until they gradually disappear.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a two-cent piece?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That suggestion has been put forward but I have not thought it necessary. There may be a difference of view as to that but it occurs to me that if we improve our one cent piece by making it smaller, as proposed in this resolution, we shall have a very excellent coinage. It has been put forward for consideration from time to time by some that the five cent piece is too small. I think there is something to be said for that but I like the five cent piece myself. Our ten cent, twenty-five cent and fifty-cent pieces, seem to me to be beautiful silver coinage. I am not prepared to say that it cannot be improved upon but I should not like to change the five cent piece except for good reason and it has not appeared to me up to the present time that there has been any public sentiment in favour of the change.

Mr. JACOBS: It does not go far enough.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The five cent piece?

Mr. JACOBS: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: George Washington could not have thrown it as far as the silver dollar that he threw across the Delaware. I think the five cent piece is a pretty good coin. There is another feature here. It is undesirable, unless for good cause, to change your coinage at all. It is not well to meddle with coinage unless for reasons strongly in the public interest. My view has been that though we might improve the one cent piece, our subsidiary coinage is very good indeed. But I would be prepared to hear the views of hon. members as to the desirability of any further change.

Mr. JACOBS: Might I suggest that if we are going to strike new coins they be made more distinctively Canadian than in the past and also that the artists who are employed on the work be Canadian if available.

Mr. FIELDING: What is wrong with them?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister say that a new issue of coins will yield a profit to the department?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is a certain profit called seigniorage on subsidiary silver and bronze coinage. There is a certain profit on our silver coinage because it is not worth in terms of gold its face value. That is more the case in regard to bronze coins on which there is also a certain profit. But the total circulation of our bronze coinage is so comparatively small that the amount of profit is not a serious consideration.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Sir Thomas White moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 25 to amend the Currency Act, 1910.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

RECLAMATION OF DOMINION LANDS BY DRAINAGE.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9 to authorize the reclamation of Dominion Lands by drainage.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the Bill is read a second time, perhaps the minister will explain whether he thinks it desirable in view of the large quantities of land which we are supposed to have in this country, to go to any very great expense for reclaiming land. Perhaps the minister would explain whether this is going to be an expensive process or whether it is desirable, in view of the very large tracts of land which we have, to go to any large expense in reclaiming swamp lands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not the purpose of the department to go into the reclaiming of swamp lands on an extensive scale; at all events, at first. I do think it desirable though that we should commence now to do some work in the way of reclaiming our reclaimable lands that are not at present in use by reason of their water content. The area of our land available for farming purposes while great is not so great as the terms in which we have been accustomed to speak of it. The amount of land found available, or immediately suitable, for Soldiers' Settlement is indeed rather disappointing. But aside from the question as to the amount of land available the country should, in so far as it is our duty, as distinguished from the duty of the provincial authorities, endeavour to reclaim and make available for cultivation any lands of this character that can be economically dealt with in this way. Very often they are situated in districts whose development is retarded simply by reason of the fact that these swamp lands are there and that the duty of reclaiming them, on whomsoever it may rest, has not been undertaken.

The United States of America has, through its Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, thrown out a very large programme as being under contemplation at least by that Government. We do not contemplate a programme as extensive as that contained in the manifesto of Mr. Secretary Lane. The way this Bill comes to be introduced is this: We have constitutionally, and we have asserted it, by our Irrigation Act, passed many years ago, control of the surface water and that control we have exercised in Alberta, Saskatchewan and the added portion of Manitoba. While we had that control, the control of drainage and the whole jurisdiction as to drainage were in the hands of the provincial authorities. As a consequence of that dual control the development of the country through drainage has been held up in the districts in which the Crown lands were ours. I may say as a premise, now, that the cardinal principle that I keep before me in this discussion is that our duty in regard to drainage arises by virtue of our ownership of the Crown lands.

Under those circumstances certain conferences were held before I was Minister of the Interior, between the authorities of the three Prairie Provinces and the Dominion, with a view to arriving at a division of responsibilities with respect to the various classes of drainage projects between the provincial governments and the Dominion Government. As a result of those conferences the drainage projects were divided into four separate classes. I might denominate those classes as follows: First of all, small drainage projects involving an expenditure not exceeding $2,000—merely the drainage of say small lakes. The second were a class covered within the scope of a drainage project by a provincial government looking to the construction of highways—such drainage work as was necessary in its highways programme—and which drainage affected Dominion lands and could not be done unless provision was made either for a charge against the Dominion lands, or for some other arrangement that would get over the difficulty. The third class were those that were on a scale that should best be taken care of under the drainage district laws of the province—not under the highway laws, but under the laws which provided for the establishment of drainage districts, in which, of course, the Dominion had certain lands. The fourth class were those in which the Dominion owned the great area of the lands, and consequently upon the Dominion would be the great body of responsibility. A division of duty was arranged between the provinces and the Dominion with regard to those four distinct classes, and certain legislation became necessary, both on the part of the provinces and on the part of the Dominion, to carry out the arrangements agreed upon as the result of the conferences. The province of Alberta responded to its duty in this respect by the passing of its Reclamation Act in April, 1917. The province of Saskatchewan took similar action in, I think, December of the same year, and also by certain amendments to its Highways Act. The province of Manitoba has not yet acted, but its Government has now appointed a drainage commission whose duty it will be to report on this as on other drainage matters. The Government of the Dominion, on its part, first of all provisionally accepted the arrangement by an Order in Council, and then last session passed legislation amending the Dominion Lands Act so as to enable sales of Dominion lands to be made to the provinces for the purpose of embracing those lands within drainage schemes, and thereafter selling such Dominion lands on certain terms. That legislation was in accordance with the arrangement arrived at as to the disposition of the second and third classes of drainage projects that I have just described. All that now remains for us to do, in order to carry out the full intent of the agreement arrived at, is to pass legislation to enable the Dominion to assume its responsibility with respect to that class of drainage projects where we initiate and carry out the enterprise—that is to say, in those cases where the great area of lands is ours, and consequently where the great benefit is ours. What is necessary is to enable us to come in, just as a private person or as a district would, and operate under the drainage laws of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan—and Manitoba also when the requisite legislation has been enacted—and to reclaim land thereunder. That is the purpose of this Bill. I may also say that provision is made for assessments against privately owned lands that come within the purview of any scheme of reclamation we may undertake—assessments against them for their share of the cost of the undertaking—and likewise provision whereby we can take advantage of the provincial laws that look to the maintenance of the works after they are completed.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex): I should judge from the explanation of the minister that the purpose of this Act is to secure land for the purpose of settlement,—to some extent, at any rate,—by returned soldiers, and farmers as well?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That enters into the object, although I do not wish to hold it out as the immediate object, because land for settlement cannot be very quickly got by reclamation measures. It will take some time for this to become fit land for settlement.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex): That is the very point upon which I desire to get information. Some time ago I read an editorial in the Globe which gave some figures purporting to have been used by Premier Martin in connection with land settlement relating more particularly to the soldiers, and, as far as I can recall the premier's statements, there were available in the surveyed area of the Dominion only about twenty-three million acres of land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Available where?

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex): That there were only about twenty-three million acres of land available in the surveyed area of public lands. Premier Martin went on to point out that of over 200,000,000 acres of surveyed land, so much was granted to railways, 8,000,000 acres were covered by water, 5,000,000 acres were under grazing leases, and so on. I can see, as the minister says, that any reclamation scheme of drainage is going to be very slow in its operation. I would therefore ask him if any policy is to be adopted by his department whereby lands can be reclaimed more quickly. I understand that certain representations were recently made to him, as head of the department interested, under which lands would be reclaimed for the purpose of settlement by the soldiers in a much more rapid way, by taking areas that had been burned by forest fires, or in other ways, and which settlers would not like to take up at present on account of the unclean condition in which the land was left. I understand it was pointed out to the minister that by the department adopting a scientific system, and at the proper time of the year, these areas, which are very extensive, could be very rapidly reclaimed and made available for settlement by soldiers and farmers. I presume that this Bill does not cover that sort of reclamation at all. Therefore I would like to know if any steps are being taken by the department over which he presides along the lines suggested by the Dominion land surveyors.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is right in his view that this Bill does not contemplate that class of reclamation. That subject, however, has been under consideration. There are areas of land that have been burned over that, in the opinion of many who should be in a position to judge, can be more quickly and expeditiously made available for actual and immediate settlement by means of a system of burning. But there is a difference of opinion as to that. I may frankly say there is a difference of opinion among the officers of the department as to the wisdom of undertaking such an experiment. I know of no method that has been suggested except a re-burning, and there are scientific methods of doing that. Against those who say that it can be done at this season of the year,—because we are now approaching the season when that should be done if it is going to be undertaken,—it is argued, and argued very strenuously, that on account of the nature of the material that will be deposited on the ground,—that is now deposited there, and would be deposited in greater quantities by a system of slashing,—but heat produced by burning would consume or remove material, and so would affect the value of the soil for farming purposes.

As between the two schools of opinion I have not come to a conclusion. I do not like to launch upon an experiment of that kind unless I feel the ground very safe beneath me, and I do not feel it safe just yet. There may be differences of opinion between members of the House on this subject, and I am sure that there are other members whose views based on experience, would be more valuable than mine.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex): Does the minister propose to undertake investigations along that line immediately?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have the land selected and the men selected to go, but authority to go has not been given, for the reason which I have stated.

Mr. GREEN: The Dominion owns a large belt of land in the Peace River district in British Columbia, as well as a railway belt. It is possible that lands in these sections of the province might come under the category intended to be controlled by this Bill. Has the minister considered the question of extending the authority of this Act to British Columbia?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The conference took place only between the Governments of the three Prairie Provinces and the Federal Government. I am disposed to think that the same principles could scarcely be made to apply to British Columbia. I do not think any progress has been made toward an arrangement with the Government of that province, nor can I speak very hopefully as to the likelihood of our being able to make such an arrangement. At all events, this Bill does not contemplate doing work in British Columbia. If an arrangement with the Government of British Columbia would be possible, we should be very glad to come to that arrangement. At present, however, I think we have quite enough in front of us. I would like to make a success of the undertakings we have in mind in Alberta and Saskatchewan before going further.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it worth while beginning at this late hour? We cannot possibly conclude now. Besides, quite a number of members may wish to take part in the discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I accede to my hon. friend's suggestion. Perhaps I should say further in reference to the question put by the member for West Kootenay (Mr. Green) that the Irrigation Act applies only to Alberta and Saskatchewan and to the added portion of Manitoba. We have never asserted control of the surface water of British Columbia, nor do we control the land of that province except in the Peace River block and in the railway belt. I scarcely think that any Act analogous to this could be considered with regard to British Columbia.

Mr. NESBITT: In my experience, the cost of clearing up burned-over land is greater than the cost of drainage.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex): The Dominion Land Surveyors say that is not so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Dominion Land Surveyors, or such of them as I have come in contact with, are in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross).

Progress reported.

The House adjourned at six o'clock.

Thursday, March 20, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER: I beg to draw the attention of the House to the following Address of the Senate, which was delivered to me during the recent recess:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the table of the Senate a return of copies of all papers, letters, telegrams, memorials, petitions or other communications or documents in the possession of the Government or in that of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons, which may be available, in connection with the recent delegation from the farmers of Canada to present certain public and national questions and issues to the attention of the Cabinet and of the Parliament of Canada.

It appears to me that this Address constitutes a breach of the privileges of this House, and that if it is obeyed without protest it might be treated as a precedent that would in the future be a source of inconvenience and embarrassment. I would point out that the authorities on parliamentary procedure are all agreed that where one House of Parliament desires communication of any papers or documents belonging to the other the proper course is to send a message asking to be supplied with the papers in question (see Bourinot, 4th edition, pp. 281, 282; May, 12th edition, p. 563). This practice, too, has, as far as I can ascertain, been invariably followed in all similar communications between the Houses. I beg to submit, therefore, for the consideration of the House, whether it would not be proper to send a message to the Senate drawing attention to the Address, pointing out the uniform practice that has hitherto existed between the two Houses, and stating that the Address, being a breach of a very important privilege of the House, might, if unobjected to, form a dangerous and objectionable precedent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

Whereas this House having been informed by the Honourable the Speaker of an Address of the Senate of the 22nd May, 1918, which was delivered by His Honour during the recent recess of Parliament and which is as follows:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the table of the Senate a return of copies of all papers, letters, telegrams, memorials, petitions or other communications or documents in the possession of the Government or in that of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons, which may be available, in connection with the recent delegation from the farmers of Canada to present certain public and national questions and issues to the attention of the Cabinet and of the Parliament of Canada.

Resolved,—That a Message be sent to the Senate drawing the attention of their Honours to the uniform practice that has hitherto existed of transmitting a request by Message to the House of Commons whenever their Honours desire communication of any papers or documents belonging to the House, and that the issuing of an Address praying that his Excellency the Governor General will cause copies of papers and documents in the possession of the Speaker of the House of Commons to be laid upon the table of the Senate is a breach of an important privilege of this House which might, if unobjected to, form a dangerous and objectionable precedent.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to see a copy of the decision which you have submitted to the consideration of the House, and I may say at once that I fully concur in the conclusions which you have reached in respect to the order which was passed by the honourable the Senate. It is, of course, of the highest importance that each Chamber should maintain its full and absolute autonomy, and that there should be no encroachment whatever by one body upon the rights, privileges, powers and immunities of the other. It is also equally true that nothing in the way of obstruction should exist which would prevent the members of either branch of the Parliament of Canada from obtaining the fullest possible information respecting any public matter. If that object can be attained—and I think it can—without any infringement of the rights of either, and without the creation of any friction between the two great bodies which govern the country, it is of course proper and well that the ends sought to be attained should be reached without difficulty, and that there should be no clash between the two Houses. As the practice in the past has furnished ample provisions for the obtaining of such information, and as there is no precedent for refusing any request that has hitherto been made by the Senate upon this body, or by this body upon the Senate, there is no reason to believe that anything but the greatest possible harmony will exist in future in regard to the supplying of such information. And I know that the Government and the officials of this House and yourself, Sir, will always meet any reasonable and proper demands that shall be made for such information as may be sought by the Senate. Knowing that the machinery in existence, and the constitution and rules which have been recognized hitherto have been ample for such purpose, I think it would be well to stand by these old rules; and I am of the opinion that your decision, Sir, is proper and constitutional, fully conserving the rights and dignities of this Chamber.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (York, South): Mr. Speaker, the question raised to-day has a good deal of width and breadth to it, to my mind, and that is, that in a formal manner we are objecting to an invasion of the rights of this House by the action of the Senate. I want to take the opportunity on this occasion to say that the people of Canada think that the Senate of Canada has invaded in a very important way the rights of the people and of this Chamber, and the question may come up later on. The pretension has been put forward—and the people of Canada think—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The people think, Sir,——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is going far beyond the question before the House. It is not competent for him, neither is it desirable, that he should now enter into a general discussion as to our constitutional relations with the other Chamber. He will please confine his remarks to the motion before the House.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I bow to your decision in that respect, Sir. But it has been stated in the remarks to-day, and probably in the resolution, that a dangerous precedent was being created. Later on I may address myself to the House on that subject, but I take advantage of this opportunity to say that when a dangerous invasion of the rights of this House, or of the people of this country, is made by the Senate, it ought to be corrected, and I am going to vote for this motion before the House to-day.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Copy of an Order in Council passed on the 14th of March, 1919, in reference to separation allowance in the Canadian Naval Service.—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 26, to amend the House of Commons Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is designed to correct an abuse which has existed for many years in this country, whereby the Government in power can keep an electoral seat vacant as long as it suits its purpose. Unfortunately, this abuse cannot be attributed entirely to the present Government because Governments that have preceded it have been equally guilty. It is proposed by this Bill that within sixty days after a seat is declared vacant a new writ shall issue for an election. The rule in England is exactly in line with this. As many hon. members know, within a remarkably short period after a seat is declared vacant, I think it is three weeks in England, the writ issues for a new election. By this Bill it is proposed that sixty days shall be allowed before the election takes place. Because of geographical conditions we cannot very well fall in line with England and prescribe a similar term; otherwise I would have moved to introduce the same law, as to the delays.

Another provision of the Bill is that no member of Parliament may sit for more than one seat. There is a standing order of the House that no member shall sit for more than one seat, but, as Bourinot remarks, it is a rule that is honoured more in the breach than in the observance. This Bill proposes to make a statutory enactment that no member may sit for more than one seat, and that if he persists in doing so, he shall incur a penalty of $200 a day. It is provided further that he is not to make election, or declare his option, until the delays for protesting his seat have expired, because, without such a provision, a member might escape an investigation into the manner in which the election was carried on. After the delays have expired for protesting the seat, the member must declare his option in order to escape the penalties mentioned in the Bill. I am sure that the Bill will appeal to the good sense of the House, and I hope to see it carried.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

EXCESS CIRCULATION CHARTERED BANKS.

PROCLAMATIONS UNDER FINANCE ACT, 1914, TO CONTINUE IN FORCE.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to provide for the continuance in force of certain proclamations made under the Finance Act, 1914.

He said: The Bill is founded on the resolutions which were adopted in committee yesterday.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks).

GOVERNMENT SHIPBUILDING PROGRAMME.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie):

1. What is the total number of ships built by the Government since 1917?
2. What is the total tonnage?
3. How many of these were steel ships?
4. What was the cost per ton?
5. How many were wooden ships?
6. What was their cost per ton?
7. Were they built by contract or day labour or on a percentage basis?
8. If by contract, what steps have the Government taken to prevent profiteering?
9. What steps have the Government taken to ascertain the total cost of labour for construction, total cost of material used, total overhead expenses, gross profit and net profit respectively?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. One vessel in commission; 6 vessels will be ready for commission by the end of May, 1919; 38 under construction in various stages.
2. 263,950 tons dead weight.
3. All.
4. The attached schedule, which is official, gives in detail the costs per ton dead weight of the various types.
5. None.
6. Answered by No. 5.
7. Steel vessels built by contract.
8. (a) By inspection in order to determine if the specifications are being adhered to.

(b) All steel materials are purchased by the Marine Department.

(c) All other sub-contracts let by builders are submitted to the department for approval, these wherever possible, being confined to the Dominion.

[Mr. Jacobs.]

9. The total cost of labour for each branch and the total cost of material entering into construction is estimated by the technical officers of the department before contracts are awarded. To the above is added overhead charges of the various firms, in some cases estimated, in others known from audited returns, to which is added approximately 10 per cent for profit. Extra allowances are made for British Columbia districts where labour and other conditions differ from conditions in Eastern Canada.

FRENCH-CANADIAN CASUALTIES.

* Mr. PREVOST:

How many soldiers of French-Canadian nationality belonging to the Canadian Expeditionary Force have been killed at the front, or died of their wounds, since the beginning of hostilities?

Major-General MEWBURN: This information is not available, as the attestation paper of a soldier does not state positively whether or not he is French-Canadian, and to judge from the spelling of the names would be very misleading.

CANADIAN TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. ROBB:

1. Who are the members of the Canadian Trade Commission?
2. Who is the Chairman of said Commission?
3. What salary is paid per annum to the Chairman, and what salary is paid per annum to each member of the Commission?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. Sir Charles Gordon, Mr. H. B. Thomson, Mr. C. B. McNaught.
2. Sir Charles Gordon.
3. The salaries have not yet been fixed.

PAYMENTS TO SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS.

Mr. VIEN:

1. Have any separation allowances or assigned pay been wrongly paid to dependents or relatives of soldiers or other persons?
2. If so, to what amount, during each of the years: 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Yes. Assigned pay and separation allowance have in some cases been paid (a) improperly; (b) in error, to dependents or relatives or other persons. This may be caused through (1) incomplete records; (2) wrong or incomplete information furnished by or on behalf of applicants; (3) loss of records at sea; (4) clerical errors; (5) payments made in England and France while payments were being made in Canada. In most cases they are being recovered, and separation allowance to all dependents other than wives is now authorized by the Pay and Allowance Board, who carefully consider each case individually.

2. It is not possible to collate this information at present, as records are in England, in Headquarters files, and in all the military districts throughout Canada. Any over-payments which the Pay and Allowance Board consider should be refunded are being recovered, but the percentage of over-payments is very small. As announced in the House last session, all these over-payments are being transferred to suspense account, and an Act will be submitted to Parliament when the work is completed.

MAPLE SYRUP AND SUGAR.

Mr. BOYER:

1. What was the total number of samples of maple syrup analysed during each of the years: 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918, respectively?

2. How many of such samples during each of the years were found (a) pure; (b) normal; (c) doubtful; (d) adulterated?

3. How many prosecutions were instituted by the Government during each year against those persons who transgressed the law?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1.

PROTECTIVE WORKS IN BATISCAN.

Mr. DESAULNIERS:

1. Has the Government been made aware that a portion of the Parish of Batiscan, in Champlain County, is being threatened with complete destruction on account of the waters of the St. Lawrence river, which are wearing away the bank opposite the village properties?

2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to construct, this year, some protective works which would prevent such destruction?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL:

1. Yes.

2. This work does not come under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT EXPENDITURE.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. What is the total expense incurred to date in the administration and enforcement of the Military Service Act, 1917?

2. What is the total amount of claims yet unpaid in connection with the said Act?

3. Will any further expense be incurred in connection therewith?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. To January 1, 1919, $3,661,417.20.

2. Practically none.

3. The wages and expenses of the Military Service Branch and the outside Registrar's offices which have been cut down to skeleton staffs, but which have to be kept open for the present for the purpose of furnishing information required by Parliament.

CHARGES AGAINST BISHOP BUDKA.

Mr. BLAKE:

1. Is the Government aware as to whether or not Bishop Budka (Ukrainian), resident at Winnipeg, was charged with sedition at Hafford, Sask., in July, 1918?
2. Has the Government any knowledge of any accusation being made against the said Bishop?
3. If so, has the Government taken any steps to inquire into such accusations?
4. Has the Government taken any steps to prosecute the said Bishop for his said alleged utterances?
5. Has the Government any intention of deporting the said Bishop? If not, why not?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Yes, but the charge was subsequently withdrawn.
2. He has been accused of disloyalty on several occasions.
3. Investigation has been made but no evidence to substantiate the accusations has been submitted.
4. No grounds disclosed to prosecute.

ROYAL AIR FORCE AND SOLDIERS' BUTTON.

Sir SAM HUGHES:

Are Canadians who have served in the Royal Air Force and who have also been at the front, entitled to wear the "Returned Soldiers' Button?" If not, why not?

Major-General MEWBURN:

Canadians, members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, seconded to the Royal Air Force, are awarded War Service Badges in the same manner and under the same regulations as members of the C.E.F.

Canadians who are not members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force but who joined the Royal Air Force directly are not, under the present regulations, eligible for Canadian War Service Badges. They are eligible for badges issued by the Imperial authorities.

The question of issue of Canadian War Service Badges to Canadian citizens whose service has been exclusively with the Imperial Forces has received extended consideration. There were a number of objections to issue of Canadian badges to soldiers whose services was not with the Canadian forces; the principal one being that no record of service of such soldier is available at Militia Headquarters.

These difficulties have, however, been met, and an Order in Council which provides among other things for award of Canadian badges to those Canadians who resided in Canada on August 4, 1914, and who served in the Imperial Forces and have returned to take up their residence in Canada, has been prepared and is expected to be passed shortly.

[Mr. Meighen.]

RECRUITS FOR NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens):

1. Was any person employed in Prince Edward Island in 1917 or 1918 to secure recruits for the Naval Service?
2. If so, what is the name of such person?
3. When did such employment begin?
4. What salary or remuneration was paid for this service?
5. Is such person employed in this service now?
6. If so, what salary does said person receive?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. Yes.
2. George H. Holbrook.
3. December 1, 1916—November 30, 1917.
4. $150 per month.
5 and 6. No.

REBATES OF CUSTOMS DUTY.

Mr. ROBB:

What was the total amount of duty refunded or rebated during the years ending December 31, 1917 and December 31, 1918?

Hon. Mr. REID: Amount paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund on account of Refunds and Drawbacks: 1917, $17,720,-925.84; 1918, $10,334,691.96.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Are all the provisions of the Military Service Act, 1917, still in force?
2. If not, how many of the said provisions have been abrogated?
3. If any of the provisions have been abrogated, how and when was the Act so amended?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Certain M.S.A. Regulations have been suspended.
2. Regulations and Orders in Council bearing on seven important provisions connected with the enforcement of the Military Service Act have been suspended.
3. P.C. 3090 December 16, 1918, suspends the Regulations and Orders in Council referred to in "2."

COMMISSIONS CREATED BY GOVERNMENT.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the Order of the House issued last session, on the 25th March, 1918, for a return showing all commissions created by the Government since 1911, been complied with?
2. If not, why?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to comply with the said order at an early date this session?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: The return asked for was tabled yesterday.

ALCOHOLIC CONTENT OF MEDICINES.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is it the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to pass a measure respecting patent medicines, repealing the Act which is now in force?

2. If not, is it the intention of the Government to efficaciously inspect the preparation and sale of medicines which contain basic properties of copious doses of alcohol and other ingredients to produce abortion?

3. If so, will the Government appoint a Committee to be composed of physicians, irrespective of politics, and not associated in the manufacture of patent medicines, except in the case relating to the preparing and revising of said proposed measure, before presenting it to Parliament?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. No.

2. Yes.

3. It is proposed to establish a board qualified to pronounce finally upon the character of patent medicines as regards the content of alcohol and their toxicity.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. DUFF:

1. What amount, if any, was paid by the Government for advertising to the Moncton Transcript, Acadian Recorder, Morning Chronicle Halifax Herald, and Evening Mail, during the year 1918?

2. What amounts, if any, were paid to the said newspapers during the same year for printing?

Mr. FONTAINE:

1. How many men of military age have been condemned to terms of imprisonment for infractions of the Military Service Act 1917, in each of the nine provinces of Canada?

2. How many of the said men have been released from prison before the expiration of their terms?

3. What are their names, where were they imprisoned and what was the length of their respective sentences?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. What quantity of soap was purchased by the Government from the Palm Olive Company in 1917 and 1918?

2. What was the price paid for same?

PRACTICE IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER: At the last sitting of the House the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) put a question to me with respect to the practice in bringing down answers to questions. I have had the matter carefully inquired into, and I find that practically the custom for years has been only to bring down one copy of the answer, and only one copy is called for under our rules and practice. It has, however, been usual for ministers to present an additional copy, and in the past it has been the general practice where members desired immediately a copy of an answer to have it prepared by the sessional clerks. I can see that it would be a great convenience to members if a more uniform practice of having an additional copy of the answers brought down could be adopted, and I shall take the matter up with the various ministers and endeavour to see if that cannot be done in future.

STATEMENTS OF LT.-COL. PRATT, M.L.A. —THE HIGH COMMISSIONER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Government has given consideration to the statements contained in an interview published in yesterday's papers alleged to have been given at Halifax by Lt.-Col. Pratt, Conservative member of the Ontario Legislature, in which certain severe strictures are passed upon members of the Government, particularly upon the High Commissioner for Canada? Is there any connection between the statements in that interview and the report in to-day's papers that the High Commissioner is about to resign? Further, is it a fact that the High Commissioner is about to resign, or has resigned?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The statement to which my hon. friend refers has not come to my attention. I can assure him that so far as I know the High Commissioner is not about to resign, nor do I know that his resignation has been suggested.

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Has the Government come to any decision with regard to the re-enacting of the daylight saving legislation? As a change in time is to be effected in the United States at the end of the present month, this matter is one of much interest to the people generally.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The matter has been and still is under consideration by the Government.

DISEMBARKATION OF CANADIAN SOLDIERS AT PORTLAND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): Press reports say that returned Canadian wounded soldiers are to be disembarked at Portland instead of at our own Canadian ports. Is that correct?

Major-General MEWBURN: I do not think that is quite correct. During the last month we decided to transfer to Portland two hospital ships with cot cases, owing to the congestion at Halifax and Saint John, and to the fact that these cases can be moved from Portland to Montreal in twelve hours as against thirty-two hours from Halifax, and at a considerable saving. We are transferring to Portland only two hospital ships a month, as a temporary measure.

INQUIRIES RE ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. POWER: I wish to call the attention of the House to an answer given to a question which appeared on the Order Paper yesterday. The question is as follows:

1. Has the Government taken possession of the property situated on St. Louis Road, bequeathed by the late Gustave Stuart, K.C., of Quebec?
2. For what purpose was this property bequeathed?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to make any use of it? If so, what?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not in order for the hon. gentleman, on the Orders of the Day, to enter into what would in effect be a discussion of an answer to a question. He will have opportunity of doing that in due course, when the Estimates of the department concerned are before the House.

Mr. POWER: It is a question of privilege. The Government has given me two answers to the same question; one, "Yes," and one "No."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not competent for the hon. gentleman to enter into this question on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Will the leader of the Government define the principles on which questions are answered? A good deal of doubt exists in the minds of the members whether they should, in particular cases, move for returns, or ask questions. A return is a very slow process; the minister has presented returns to-day that were moved for a year ago. On what principle do the ministers decide whether the information sought should be given in the form of a return or in the form of an answer?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would take quite a year for the Government to obtain the necessary information to enable them to answer properly some of the questions on the Order Paper. It is the desire of the Government to answer all questions, if it is possible to obtain the information. If some inquiry is necessary, involving considerable delay, the Government, in its discretion, is entitled to ask that the questions stand as orders for returns. I do not think it is possible to lay down any hard and fast rule. The desire of the Government is to answer the questions, if it is possible to do so properly, within a reasonable time, and without extended inquiry.

INTERVIEW WITH LORD SHAUGHNESSY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: May I avail myself of the desire just expressed by the Acting Prime Minister to ask whether his attention has been drawn to an interview with Lord Shaughnessy at Montreal with reference to the presence of his colleagues overseas, and, if so, whether the Government has any statement to make with regard to Lord Shaughnessy's criticism?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry that Lord Shaughnessy's statement has not come to my attention; therefore I cannot make any comment on it.

Mr. MURPHY: I will send it to my hon. friend.

ENTERTAINMENT AND OCCUPATION OF TROOPS AWAITING EMBARKATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I desire to read the following message from the Overseas Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp):

Following are some of the things provided for entertainment and occupation of troops whilst awaiting embarkation.

General training. Upon cessation of hostilities it was immediately decided to eliminate the more particularly offensive training from the syllabus. Maintenance of health of troops and their preparation for demobilization became paramount thought. Syllabus has been laid down for daily physical training, discipline, ceremonial parades and route marches to limited extent. Remainder of time has been taken up in instruction by Khaki University of Canada in all areas and sports and athletics with object of maintaining health and contentment of troops as far as possible and fitting them for their civil duties.

Education. A concentration camp in connection with the work of Khaki University has been opened at Ripon for the purpose of assembling and giving instruction in more advanced educational work to suitable students. Establishment of this camp has proved very popular, and keen competition has been apparent to gain admittance. At present there are in session between 750 and 800 students. Approval has been given for attachment of officers and other ranks who have studied for at least two years at a University in Canada prior to enlistment, to enable them to continue their studies. This privilege has been extended to some 300 students with creditable service overseas. Total attachment to date 307. Battalion schools organized for men seeking elementary education comprise elementary agriculture and commercial arithmetic, etc., area colleges in each area for men to study who have studied higher matriculation, etc. At concentration camp, Ripon, matriculation first and second years arts, applied science and first year pre-medical studies is given. Men attached to British Universities who require third and fourth year work in graduated studies.

Literature is distributed amongst Canadian troops, such as Booklet number 2, information regarding land settlement and agriculture. Copies Canadian Government pamphlet entitled "Canada and her soldiers," have been despatched to France for distribution to Canadian troops.

Athletics. Teams selected from Canadian personnel in England and France will compete in International events in England during spring and summer of this year, embracing boxing, pushball, baseball, soccer, football, lawn-tennis, and athletics; field and track events. Sub-committees have been formed for each sport comprising officers and other ranks. Canadian boxing championship, O.M. F.C. in British Isles was held at Witley on February 27, before a very enthusiastic audience. Sum of five thousand dollars has been authorized from a special fund in connection with expenses incurred in training of Canadian teams buying surplus sporting equipment, extra messing where necessary. Sunday travelling expenses, etc.

Activities of Canadian Y.M.C.A. An officer has been placed in charge of athletic work in interests of Y.M.C.A. and prepared to co-operate fully in matters of athletic programmes. Distribution of boxing gloves and footballs, etc., has been made to all Canadian areas. Complete list of sport equipment it is expected will be required to carry out extensive athletic programme contemplated during coming summer; has been prepared to cover wants of Canadian troops in British Isles. In each area there are from four to six Y.M.C.A. huts which are supplied with concert parties, luxuries, cinemas, table games and free stationery. There are also canteens in each area selling various goods such as cleaning kits, etc., etc., at cheapest rates. Pamphlets on citizenship have been distributed among troops numbering approximately fifty thousand copies. During the year 1918 the sum of sixty-eight thousand dollars was expended out of Y.M.C.A. fund in purchasing equipment for troops in England, total comprising England and France amounted to one hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars.

In London a Leave Bureau has been established to take care of Canadian soldiers in England on leave who have no homes on this side. Man is put up for six days in London, including bed, meals, tour every day of city, four theatres and comforts of private home twice during this period for two pounds, five shillings or eleven dollars. About twenty thousand men per month pass through Leave Bureau. Free coffee bars are established in England at points at which troops arrive from France, where they are supplied with free coffee and food. On board ships a Y.M.C.A. officer is supplied to each conducting staff. He has with him magic lanterns and slides for entertainment purposes, gramophones, tables, games, athletic material, writing paper, etc., and organized entertainment on board.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 7, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act, was read the third time and passed.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

RESOLUTION TO APPOINT A RECEIVER.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister) moved: That the House do go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to ratify and confirm,—

(1) The Order in Council of the seventh day of March, 1919, which provides as follows:—

"Whereas under the authority of "The Appropriation Act No. 2, 1918," the Governor in Council advanced the sum of $7,471,399.93 or thereabouts to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for certain purposes in said Act defined, including the meeting of "deficit in operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System," such sum being in addition to other large sums previously advanced under previous authority for similar purposes.

"And whereas a letter dated 4th March, 1919, from the Vice President of said Company was received by the Minister of Finance, as follows:—

"I am instructed to inform the Government that in view of the fact that the increased rates applicable to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway have not been sufficient to meet the increased operating expenses, it will not be possible for that Company to continue its operations when the present funds have been exhausted, which will be about 10th instant. May I ask you to be so good as to acknowledge receipt of this letter."

"And whereas should the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System be discontinued, great detriment to the public interests would ensue, and the intention of Parliament in authorizing the said advances would be defeated.

"And whereas the continued operation of said system is essential in the present position of Canada resulting from the war, which has not yet been terminated by Peace, especially in connection with the transport of returning Canadian Troops and of supplies and equipment and freight, and other services made necessary by the war.

"And whereas for the protection of the public interests and for the purposes aforesaid, it is essential that the operation of said system should be continued without interruption.

"And whereas the duty of continuing such operation is thrown upon the Government of Canada inasmuch as there are no effective provisions in existing laws whereby such continued operation could be otherwise secured.

"And whereas immediate action by the Government is imperative.

"Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under the authority of the War Measures Act, 1914, and of all other authority in that behalf, is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered as follows:—

"1. In this Order, unless the context otherwise requires:—

"(a) 'Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System' means and includes (1) the lines of railway and their appurtenances and the undertaking and works of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, of the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company and of the Grand Trunk Pacific Saskatchewan Railway Company, (2) the lines of telegraph and their appurtenances and the undertaking and works of the Grand Trunk Pacific Telegraph Company, (3) the steamships, vessels and their appurtenances and the undertaking and works of the Grand Trunk Pacific Steamships Company, (4) the properties, hotels, and appurtenances and the undertaking and works of the Grand Trunk Pacific Development Company.

"(b) 'Officers' means and includes Directors, President, Vice-Presidents, Managers, Secretary, Treasurer, Clerks, Servants and employees.

"(c) 'Books and papers' means and includes books of accounts or of entries relating to the business or operation or maintenance of the said lines of railway or telegraph or steamships, vessels, hotels, properties or works, or any of them, or any part thereof, also records, statements and documents relating to such business, operation, or maintenance or any part thereof.

"(d) 'Exchequer Court' means the Exchequer Court of Canada.

"(e) The singular number includes the plural and the plural the singular, the male gender includes the female, and the female the male.

"(f) 'Person' includes corporation.

"(g) 'Government Receiver' means the Receiver appointed by this Order.

"2. The Minister of Railways and Canals is hereby appointed Receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System, and such Receiver shall have and exercise with respect to the said system and every part thereof and to the companies included therein, powers and duties similar to those of a receiver under section 26 of the Exchequer Court Act.

"3. On the application of the Government Receiver the Exchequer Court of Canada may make such orders respecting such Receiver and his powers and duties and the carrying out thereof including the issue of Receiver's Certificates, as the Court may deem necessary or expedient in the public interest.

"4. Subsections 5 and 6 of section 26 of the said Act shall apply to the Government Receiver and to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System and every part thereof and to the companies included therein—except that no remuneration of the Receiver shall be fixed by the Court.

"5. The Government Receiver may, on or after the 10th day of March, 1919, or on such earlier day as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, or any Company included in the Grand Trunk Pacific System, may cease to operate efficiently its undertaking and works, or any portion thereof, take possession of such undertaking and works, and the Exchequer Court may from time to time make and enforce such orders in aid of the Government Receiver with respect to taking of such possession or otherwise as the Court may deem expedient for carrying out of the provisions of this Order according to their true spirit and meaning.

"6. Each Company included in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System and its officers shall facilitate the carrying out of the powers and duties of the Government Receiver, and all books and papers, real or personal property of each of the said Companies, in its possession or under its control or the control of its officers or any of them, shall without delay be handed over to the said Receiver or his nominees or placed under his control in such manner as he may direct.

"7. Any officer of the Company included in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System, who obstructs the Government Receiver in carrying out his powers and duties, or fails to hand over to him or his nominees, or to place under his control, any book or paper, real or personal property in accordance with the foregoing provisions, shall incur a penalty for each breach of said provisions of the amount hereinafter stated, viz., in the case of a President, a Vice-President or a Director, the sum of Ten Thousand Dollars ($10,000); in the case of a Manager, with the authority of or similar to that of a General Manager or of one acting for or assisting a General Manager, the sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000); in the case of a Secretary or of a Treasurer, or of one acting for or assisting a Secretary or Treasurer, the sum of Two Thousand Five Hundred Dollars ($2,500); in the case of any clerks, servant or employee, the sum of One Thousand Dollars ($1,000).

"8. Any penalty incurred under the foregoing provisions may be sued for and recovered, with costs, in the Exchequer Court, by suit or proceeding in such Court instituted by the Attorney General of Canada.

"9. Nothing in this Order contained, and nothing done or to be done under the authority hereof, shall render the Government of Canada or the Government Receiver, or any one acting under the authority of the Government Receiver, or of the Exchequer Court, liable to the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, or to any Company included in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System, or to any creditor, or holder of any bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other securities of the said Companies or any of them, for any claim by reason of the making of this Order, or of anything done or to be done under the authority hereof, or under the authority of the Government Receiver or of the Exchequer Court, nor shall afford any defence to, nor shall prejudice any claim, action, or proceeding of the Government of Canada which the Government might lawfully make or take had this Order not been made.

"10. All Officers except the Board of Directors of any Company included in The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System shall continue to discharge for the Government Receiver, till further orders or directions by him, duties in connection with the operation and management of the undertakings and works of any Company included in The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System, similar to their present duties, so that no interruption in the operation and management thereof may occur.

"11. Nothing herein contained or done, or to be done hereunder shall prejudice the exercise by the Exchequer Court or by any Court of any Province of Canada of its present jurisdiction under the Exchequer Court Act, or under any other law of jurisdiction to appoint a receiver or to order or decree a sale or foreclosure of any railway, or section thereof, or other property affected by this Order; provided that before any such sale or foreclosure is ordered or decreed or any Receiver is appointed by any such Court, notice of the application shall be given to the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada, and he, or counsel for him, shall be heard upon the application; and the Court in granting, or refusing or postponing the application, shall take into consideration the public interests involved, and shall make such order as shall in the opinion of the Court protect the public interests.

"12. The Minister of Railways and Canals mentioned in this Order means the Minister for the time being, and upon a vacancy occurring his successor shall become the Government Receiver. The powers and duties of the Government Receiver may be exercised by such member of the Government as may from time to time be the Acting Minister of Railways and Canals.

"13. Should it be made to appear to the Government Receiver that any book or paper is or has been used for the purposes of the operations of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, as well as the operations of any company included in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system, and that for such reason the same should not be handed over to the Receiver or placed under his exclusive control, the Government Receiver may, on such terms and condition as he may deem necessary, allow the joint use of same to be continued. The Government Receiver may open such books and accounts as in his opinion may be necessary, to separate and transfer from any such book or paper, jointly used, accounts and entries relating to any of the companies included in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System, and may so separate and transfer the same; and the said Receiver shall keep the accounts of his receipts, expenses and disbursements in connection with each of the companies included in the said System and their works, undertakings and properties, or parts thereof, in such manner that one may be distinguished from another, and that the interests of the various parties interested therein may be ascertained.

"14. The Governor in Council may, from time to time, under the Order of the Exchequer Court, and upon the security of Receiver's Certificates, or otherwise, advance to the Government Receiver such sums as may be required to enable him to exercise his powers, and to perform his duties as Receiver; the sums so advanced shall be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

"15. No transfer of any shares in the Capital Stock of any company included in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System shall, after the appointment of the Government Receiver, be made, and no such transfer shall be entered on any register or transfer book. Any transfer contrary to this provision shall be null and void; provided that the Government Receiver may, on the application of any person interested, or of his own motion, permit any transfer to be made or completed."

(2) And also the Order in Council of the thirteenth day of March, 1919, which provides as follows:—

"WHEREAS through inadvertence, there were omitted from the definition of 'Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System,' in Section 1 of the Order passed by His Excellency in Council on the 7th of March, 1919, providing for the appointment of a Government Receiver for the said System, the necessary words relating to Grand Trunk Pacific Terminal Elevator Company Limited;

"THEREFORE, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered that the said Order in Council of the 7th March, 1919, shall be and the same is hereby amended by inserting at the end of the definition of 'Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System' in Section 1 thereof, the following:—

'(5) The properties, elevators, terminals and appurtenances, and the undertaking and works of Grand Trunk Pacific Terminal Elevator Company, Limited.'

"AND His Excellency the Governor General in Council is further pleased to declare and doth hereby declare that the said Order in Council of the 7th March, take effect from the passing of the said Order of the 7th March, 1919."—The Minister of Finance.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): As this resolution is a very important one, I think it is proper for me to point out that, while we may agree to this resolution going through, before the Bill is introduced, there should be furnished to hon. members of this House certain information in connection with the very important transaction with which this resolution undertakes to deal. The railroad referred to in the resolution is an enterprise in which the Canadian people have taken a great interest, ever since the first steps for the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific took place in 1903 during the various years down to the present time. Now that this railway is getting into these financial and other entanglements, it is proper that the Canadian people, whose money has, to a very large extent, entered into this enterprise, should have from the Government the fullest possible information as to its exact condition. Therefore, as this is a new Parliament, I think, before the Bill is introduced, every member of this House should be furnished with a copy of the original agreement, which is not a very long one, between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Government; that is the agreement under which the company started in 1903, and the Government of the day undertook to furnish certain moneys and to comply with certain conditions in respect thereto. This agreement was, if I remember correctly, further amended in 1904, and a statute was passed confirming that agreement. I presume the agreement as finally confirmed and ratified in 1904 is the agreement that hon. members should have an opportunity of perusing. We should also be put in possession of the correspondence which passed between the former Government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and that company, or at least any such correspondence as has a bearing upon the resolution now before the House, and also all the correspondence which passed between the Administration of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden and that company, in particular in reference to the section of the road that is now concerned, and also the section of the road between Winnipeg and Moncton. It is alleged that the Government of the day have not complied with the agreement entered into in 1904, and that they have made it impossible for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to carry on the enterprise. For those reasons, I think that before we deal with the question, the particulars I have enumerated should be put at the disposal of hon. members. We should also have a statement of all the financial aid, by endorsation, or guarantees of bonds, or otherwise, given by this Government or the former Government to this company, also a statement of the cash subsidies or aids granted by the different governments, from 1903 to date, to this company. The Government should give the House as clear a statement as possible as to the financial standing of the company on the 10th day of March, 1919, the date on which the Government, as I understand it, took charge.

I do not at all agree with the steps taken by the Government in regard to taking charge of this company. The War Measures Act was never intended to be used for purposes of this kind. That Act was intended only to be a ready instrument in the hands of the Government to carry out any purpose for which there was no legislative provision on the Statute Books of this country. That was a proper and necessary thing to have. But now that the war is over and there is no urgency in connection with the measure; when we have a statute of our own solemnly passed by the Parliament of this country and acted on practically since Confederation in connection with cases of this kind; when the courts of this country have a well established practice and procedure in connection with putting bodies of this kind into liquidation, it is an innovation of a most undesirable character to start a proceeding of this kind, which is bound to create entanglements and difficulties which are far-reaching and which the Government may, later on, find it very hard to remedy.

The only section in the War Measures Act that could possibly be used for an action of this kind is section 6. This section of the War Measures Act, which is Chapter II of the Statutes of Canada, 1914, reads:

> The Governor in Council shall have power to do and authorize such acts and things, and to make from time to time such orders and regulations as he may by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection deem it necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the Governor in Council shall extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:—
> (a) Censorship and the control and suppression of publications, writings, maps, plans, photographs, communications and means of communications;
> (b) Arrest, detention, exclusion and deportation;
> (c) Control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada, and the movement of vessels;
> (d) Transportation by land, air or water, and the control of the transport of persons and things;
> (e) Trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture;
> (f) Appropriation, control, forfeiture and disposition of property and of the use thereof.
> 2. All orders and regulations made under this section shall have the force of law, and shall be enforced in such manner and by such courts, officers and authorities as the Governor in Council may prescribe, and may be varied, extended or revoked by any subsequent order or regulation; but if any order or regulation is varied, extended or revoked, neither the previous operation thereof nor anything duly done thereunder, shall be affected thereby, nor shall any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued, accruing or incurred thereunder be affected by such variation, extension or revocation.

All these powers could be exercised by the Government in view of the immediate danger of war. Fortunately, Sir, the danger of war is over, but the machinery was at hand whereby the Government, upon a motion before the judge, could have had a receiver appointed by the Exchequer Court instanter. That was the proper way to deal with a matter of this kind, for I submit, with all due respect to the body of men who are here to govern the affairs of this country, that this Parliament should not usurp the functions of a judge or court. I repeat, an order could have been made by a judge of the Exchequer Court and a receiver appointed in a twinkling, and when that course is followed, both the party moving for the order and the party going into liquidation has an opportunity to be heard. But in this case the company has not had an opportunity of being heard. The company was thrown into a receivership whether it liked it or not. For these reasons it is a very grave question for the members of this House to consider whether they will sanction this method of procedure, which is drifting away from the well-established rules that have been observed in this country at least for the last fifty years. I trust that before the Bill is introduced and we are called upon to decide whether the Government has taken the proper course in connection with this company, full information will be given to the House and ample opportunity provided for digesting its various phrases.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): The request of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition for correspondence or other information relating to this resolution, and the Bill to be founded upon it, is reasonable, and before the Bill is introduced we shall be glad to produce such correspondence as we may find which is relevant to the proper consideration of this question.

With regard to the agreement to which he has referred, namely, that which was entered into in 1903 between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Government of Canada, hon. members will find that agreement in the statutes of 1903, chapter 71, an Act respecting the construction of a National Transcontinental Railway. The agreement which had been entered into is found in a schedule to that Act. In 1904, further legislation was introduced into Parliament validating an amended agreement, and making further provisions with reference to the transaction. Therefore, such members of the House as may desire to familiarize themselves with the legislation, and with the agreements between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government of Canada, will find all necessary information in the statutes of those years.

It had been my intention, on consideration of this resolution to give a brief résumé of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway transaction, and to furnish to the committee a considerable part of the information for which my hon. friend has properly asked.

In 1903 an agreement was entered into between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Government of Canada for the building of what is known as the National Transcontinental Railway. That National Transcontinental Railway embraced two divisions: the Eastern division from Moncton to Winnipeg, and the Western division from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert. The Eastern division was built by the Government of Canada upon plans and specifications agreeable to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and was built through a commission. The intention was that when that Eastern division from Moncton to Winnipeg was completed, it should be leased by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, which was to construct, own and operate the Western division, that is to say, the main line from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert and the subsidiary undertakings. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was to lease the Eastern division from Moncton to Winnipeg for seven years, and was to pay no rent, but only the operating expenses. After a period of seven years it was to pay three per cent on the cost of construction of the Eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway, the lease being for a period of fifty years altogether.

With respect to the Western division of the National Transcontinental railway, the construction of the line was to be financed by the sale of bonds guaranteed by the Government of Canada and by the sale of bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company; and here I may say that the proprietary interest of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, which was to own and operate the Eastern division, and lease that division, was in the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada was to own all the stock, and does as a matter of fact own all the stock, of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. So that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and indeed the entire National Transcontinental railway, became a part of the Grand Trunk Railway Company's system. The Western division was, as I have said, to be financed by the sale of securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, guaranteed by the Dominion Government, and guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The Dominion Government was to guarantee bonds of the Prairie Section (which, roughly speaking, extended from Winnipeg to Edmonton) to an amount not exceeding $13,000 per mile.

The Dominion Government was to guarantee the securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company required to construct the Mountain Section, extending roughly, from Edmonton or thereabouts to Prince Rupert, to an extent of three-quarters of the entire cost of that Mountain Section. The Dominion Government was given first charge upon the undertaking from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert, the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company which I have referred to, guaranteed by the Dominion, being secured by trust mortgage covering the enterprise. Next after that charge came the securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, to an amount of about $20,000,000. The House will, therefore, readily grasp the plan of finance which was to ensure the construction of the National Transcontinental railway. Just let me summarize.

The Dominion Government was to build the Eastern division from Moncton to Winnipeg. With respect to the Western division, the Dominion Government was to guarantee bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific secured by first mortgage. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada was to guarantee second mortgage bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and it was thought at the time that the proceeds of bonds so guaranteed would be adequate to construct the Western division. As it transpired, the proceeds of the bonds mentioned were not sufficient, and in 1909 legislation was introduced into Parliament whereby the Dominion Government made an advance of $10,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company upon the guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The proceeds of that loan were found not sufficient, and in 1913 a further loan of $15,000,000 was made by the Government of Canada to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company upon the guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The proceeds of that loan were found not sufficient to complete the enterprise and here a departure took place. The Grand Trunk Railway Company, which, as I have stated to the House, has a proprietary interest in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, declined to guarantee any further loans made by the Government to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for the purpose of its completion. It was put forward that the finances of the Grand Trunk Railway Company would not permit the Grand Trunk Railway Company to increase its guarantees of loans made by the Government to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. It was considered desirable in the national interest, and having regard to the fact that the enterprise had been carried on so far, that the undertaking should be finished, and a further loan made by the Government. And in 1914 a loan of $16,000,000 was made by the Government of Canada to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, such loan not being guaranteed, as had been the case with the two previous loans, by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The proceeds of that last loan were adequate to complete the line, which was finished at the end of 1915.

The position then was that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company had completed its enterprise by the financing which I have mentioned. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada owned, and still owns, all the stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. The Grand Trunk Railway Company then, through its president, notified the Prime Minister that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to use his own terms, had "come to the end of its tether," as far as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was concerned. In 1916, in order to provide for the payment of interest upon securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and to provide for deficit in operating expenses—because there has been, with the exception of one year, a continuous deficit in operating expenses on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company,—the Government voted in the Estimates the sum of $8,000,000. That was in 1916.

Now, I desire to point out to the House that the Dominion Government, since the original agreement was entered into, and without being obliged to do so under the terms of the original agreement, in 1909 made a loan of $10,000,000, guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company; in 1913 made a loan of $15,000,000 guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company; in 1914 made a loan of $16,000,000 direct to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company; and in 1916 Parliament voted $8,000,000 for the purpose of providing for the interest upon the securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company,—guaranteed not only by the Dominion Government but by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada,—and, further, to meet deficit in operation expenses, the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada taking the view that they should not be called upon to furnish any money for the operation of that railway company. In 1917, the situation continuing as it was, Parliament again voted the sum of $7,500,000 for the same purposes. Of that sum about $5,000,000 was expended. Last year Parliament again, at the instance of the Government, voted the sum of $7,500,000 for the same purposes.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Were these loans or gifts?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: These three I have last mentioned were loans—$8,000,000 in 1916; $7,500,000 in 1917, of which $5,000,000 was paid out, and $7,500,000 voted last year.

These were loans to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company secured by blanket mortgage upon their enterprise.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Were these advances also made on the expectation of the Grand Trunk being able to carry out its original agreement with Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government has never expected any thing else than that the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada would carry out the bargain which it entered into with the Government of Canada. At the same time, the present Government of Canada, like the Government which preceded it, has been desirous of assisting in the completion of the enterprise and adopting a generous attitude not only towards the Grand Trunk Pacific undertaking but towards the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada itself; the Grand Trunk being a pioneer company whose operations have meant much to this country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was the interest always paid?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The interest was always paid but it was paid from the money which Parliament voted. Parliament voted the money which paid interest upon the Grand Trunk Pacific securities, guaranteed by the Dominion Government and guaranteed by the Grand Trunk, and paid also the deficit in the operating expenses. The interest has been paid only because the Dominion Government, over and above any obligation which they had under the agreement, have provided all the money for the purpose.

Mr. CAHILL: Was this $8,000,000, $7,500,000 and $7,500,000 guaranteed by the Grand Trunk?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, it was a direct loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific, not guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but secured by a blanket mortgage on the entire enterprise. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company has not been able to pay its fixed charges with the exception of one year, and then only to a small extent. There has also been a deficit in operating expenses, which is to-day and will be for the coming year a larger amount than it was last year.

In order that the committee may understand the attitude of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada towards its obligations with respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific, I desire to refer to what is known as the Drayton-Acworth report. The Government saw the railway situation developing in a way that required attention and action, and in 1916 they appointed a commission to look into the entire railway situation of Canada and make such recommendations as they thought proper respecting the transcontinental railway systems. That commission consisted of Sir Henry Drayton, chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, Mr. Acworth, an eminent London financier and railway authority and Mr. Smith, President of the New York Central Railway System. They made a report, Mr. Smith dissenting from the conclusions of his colleagues.

The Drayton-Acworth report has been before the House and is available to any member who may desire to read it. To those who take an interest in the railway situation in Canada and especially those who want to know something about the problem before us, I cannot too earnestly commend this report of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth in respect to the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway situation. The report deals, amongst other things, with the question of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and with that of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, which, as I have stated, is a subsidiary of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. At page 26 the report calls attention to the fact that the chairman of the Grand Trunk Railway, writing to the Prime Minister, states "they are at the end of their tether," and that "it is quite impossible for them to meet the extra liabilities arising from the Grand Trunk Pacific Company." That is to say that Mr. Smithers, who is the chairman of the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, wrote to the Prime Minister, as I stated a little while ago, to the effect that they were at the end of their tether and that it would be impossible for them to meet the extra liabilities arising from the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. What these liabilities are, I shall explain to the House in a moment. At page 26 of the report I find a statement expressing the opinion of the commissioners upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada towards their liability with respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. The commissioners say:

"We cannot think that this is a reasonable proposition, or one that we could advise the Government to accept——We think the Grand Trunk Company cannot thus escape the consequence of its own action. We quite agree that the Grand Trunk Company cannot meet its Grand Trunk Pacific liabilities. But, if the Government is to relieve the Grand Trunk Company of liabilities which it voluntarily incurred, but which it now finds impossible to meet, it is for the Government, not for the Company, to fix the terms."

To show further the attitude of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, I read from the report an extract from the examination of Mr. Chamberlin, who was president of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and also of the Grand Trunk Railway Company:

Sir Henry Drayton—Doesn't it really come down to this that the statements in your letter mean that in your view, in order to protect the finances of the Grand Trunk, and as a corollary to protect the finances of the country the Government ought to relieve the Grand Trunk in regard to its investment; isn't that the whole thing?

Mr. Chamberlain—That is the whole thing.

Sir Henry Drayton—There is nothing else to it?

Mr. Chamberlain—Nothing else.

That clearly shows that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, proprietors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System, had come to the conclusion that they would not continue to be responsible for the payment of the interest upon the securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific; that they would not be responsible for the deficit in its operations but would cast the entire burden of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company upon the Government of Canada; in other words, wash their hands of the entire transaction.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister think that the Grand Trunk Railway could by any ipse dixit, or action of their own, relieve themselves of their responsibility under the original agreement?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Legally they could not and I shall come to that a little later on. But if the Government of Canada continued, as they requested them to continue, to vote $7,500,000 a year, that question would not arise because the $7,500,000 that we would vote would relieve the Grand Trunk for the year in which it was voted from the necessity of finding any money to pay the interest upon the securities which it had guaranteed, and which the Dominion Government had guaranteed, and any deficit in operating expenses. So long as the Dominion Government will introduce measures into this House providing for an annual payment of $7,500,000, or $8,000,000, a year the Grand Trunk would not be obliged to find any money in respect to its subsidiary undertaking. But the point I am making now is that the Grand Trunk Railway directorate have fairly put themselves upon record as having washed their hands of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and intend, if they can, to pass the burden of its operation and financing upon the Government of Canada. That is to say, the real proprietors of the system, the company owning the stock in the subsidiary, intended to cast upon the Government of Canada the entire burden of its financing although the company was not only not paying its fixed charges but had, as it has to-day, a deficit on its operating account. Now the commissioners, referring to this attitude of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada and to the condition—the precarious condition—of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company by reason of its financial position, made certain recommendations. They say:

The Grand Trunk Company's Board of Directors is 3,000 miles away. We cannot think that the state of affairs which our investigation has disclosed could have arisen had the board been on the spot.

They referred there to certain defects in the management of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada itself. They continue:—

We are forced to the conclusion that the control of an important Canadian company should be in Canada. But this cannot be secured as long as the Grand Trunk Railway is owned by shareholders in England. We have come to the conclusion, therefore, that the control, not only of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, but also of the Grand Trunk Company of Canada, should be surrendered into the hands of the people of Canada. We recommend that the chairman of the Grand Trunk Company be informed, that it is only on this condition that the Government is prepared to relieve his company of the obligations which it has incurred in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

Therefore the Drayton-Acworth Report recommended to the Government of Canada that before it considered the question of relieving the Grand Trunk Railway Company of its obligations in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific, that the Grand Trunk Railway should be surrendered into the hands of the people of Canada. Now the Drayton-Acworth Report has taken, as I think it properly should have taken, a generous view with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The commissioners were not in favour of exacting the pound of flesh, as the saying is, nor has the Government been desirous of doing so. Let me read what Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth say respecting that. They refer to the average amount paid in dividends yearly for a period of ten years by the Grand Trunk Company; they are stating the position of the Grand Trunk Company with respect to net earnings. They say that the average amount paid in dividends has been $3,600,000 per annum. Then, after referring to the fact that the company has to face immediate liabilities of over $5,000,000 per annum in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, and that, on the statement of its own officers, a capital expenditure of $30,000,000 is immediately required on its own line to put it into proper condition to do existing business, the Report says:—

It can still less be contended that the dividends are maintainable.

Then the Report goes on further:—

Even if the Government were to relieve them entirely, as suggested by their president, of their unfortunate Grand Trunk Pacific venture, and as we have already said, we cannot think that this request can be reasonably justified,—it is evident that the Grand Trunk Company is not, and will not be for some time to come, in a position entitling it to pay out any money at all in dividends. We regard the entire share capital of the company as being intrinsically of but small value at the present time. On the basis of present value of maintainable income the fair compensation would be very small.

Now let us consider what the commissioners had in mind when they made that statement. They considered the net earning power of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada over a period of ten years averaged $3,600,000 a year, although the commissioners questioned the propriety of the payment out of dividends to that amount on account of the requirements of the road for maintenance and other purposes. But they pointed out that the liability of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific was about $4,000,000 a year. That liability the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada desires to place upon the Dominion and continue paying dividends from net earnings to their shareholders. The two commissioners, Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, took the view that if the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, were taken into account, to use their own language, "the intrinsic value of the share capital is small at the present time," and they go on to say, as I have stated, that on the basis of the present value the maintainable income would be very small.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Grand Trunk Pacific?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Grand Trunk Railway. That is to say if the Dominion Government took over the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, and strict regard was had to its legal liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the amount which should be paid by the Government in compensation to the shareholders would, in the language of the report, be very small.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not paid by the Government, paid by the company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Commissioners are discussing here the question of the Dominion Government taking over the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, and they say that if regard should be had to the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the amount which the Government of Canada should be called upon to pay for that stock would be very small. But the Board of Commissioners took a rather generous view of the situation, as the Government of Canada has taken and is prepared to take of the situation. Neither the Commission nor the Government has ever had it in mind to deal harshly, to exact the pound of flesh, as the saying is, from the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. Now let me read to the House what the Commissioners said on that point:

But we do not think this is the only basis on which the people of Canada should proceed. We think this is a case for generosity rather than strict justice. Canada is under obligations to the Grand Trunk shareholders, who, in the early days, with but small Government assistance, and in competition with the railways of the United States, with their vastly greater resources, built up the first Canadian railway system. In later times the Company has had further to meet the competition of heavily subsidized Canadian rivals, and it cannot be said that at any stage of its history the shareholders have obtained excessive profits on their enterprise. On the whole we recommend that on condition of the surrender, by the Grand Trunk Company of their entire share capital, guaranteed, preferred and ordinary, the trustees grant a certain annuity, charged as a working expense on the whole undertaking of the Dominion Railway Company, for the first seven years, increasing at the termination of that period by something like 40 or 50 per cent. We have left the figures blank, as there will be questions of cash in hand, value of stores, etc., which must make the precise figures subject to negotiation. But our meaning is that the first figure shauld be a moderate but substantial percentage of $3,600,000 (the average dividend payment for the last ten years).

The Commission say, from a strictly legal point the share capital, by reason of the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company toward the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, has but very small value, but dealing with them generously they recommend that for the period of seven years there should be a moderate but substantial percentage of $3,600,000, increasing at the termination of that period by something like 40 or 50 per cent.

In order that the Committee may realize the financial interest which the people of Canada and the Grand Trunk had in that Grand Trunk Pacific enterprise, let me make a statement with respect to its financial position.

Mr. CAHILL: In any action which it is taking with regard to the railroads of this country, is the Government being guided by the Drayton-Acworth report?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I stated at the time the Commission was created, when the same question was put by the former Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Graham), that it would be for the Government of Canada to exercise its discretion and judgment as to what policy would be followed. We appointed a Commission, but we did not give them plenary power to determine the policy of the Government. Nevertheless, the report is an exceedingly valuable one. In the three years which have passed since that Commission was created and in the two years since the report was made, I have come more and more to the conclusion that the Drayton-Acworth report is one of the most valuable reports that has ever been made upon railway matters in this country. I am perfectly satisfied, speaking for myself, that in the administration of railway enterprises which come under the control of the Dominion Government, the machinery recommended by the Drayton-Acworth report will be utilized. In my opinion, it is the best for the purpose.

Now, I was going to show the financial position of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The figures are staggering. The members of the House are generally familiar with the situation, but the public do not understand it, and I am satisfied that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company do not understand it. I do not believe that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company have been made fully aware of the extent of the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company towards the Grand Trunk Pacific enterprise. I will give the figures slowly so that hon. gentlemen can dwell upon them, because they are very large indeed.

The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company—which has about 1,700 miles from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert and about 1,000 miles in the Grand Trunk branch lines system; and which has also its subsidiary Development company, owning lands, hotels, steamships and other assets—has outstanding securities guaranteed by the Dominion Government to the extent of $84,000,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who are the holders of those securities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That $84,000,000 includes the securities, to which I made reference earlier in the course of my remarks, guaranteed by the Dominion Government and secured by a first mortgage upon the line from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert. It includes also a portion—I think, speaking from recollection, about $7,500,000—of the $16,000,000 issue of 1914 guaranteed by the Dominion Government. But the $84,000,000 are bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific bearing the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada.

My hon. friend asks who holds these securities. The Dominion of Canada holds $33,000,000 of them; they are in our vaults. We took them under what is known as the implementing agreement, which the Committee may recall; and instead of having them sold on the market at a low price, the Dominion Government took them at par. It is a good thing we did, because of the $84,000,000 outstanding we hold $33,000,000 ourselves. Nevertheless, they are outstanding; the money was advanced; the interest is payable; the legal liability on the part of the Grand Trunk Pacific exists precisely as if these securities were in the hands of holders in England, United States or Canada. The remainder of the securities are in the hands of bondholders in Great Britain principally; I think comparatively few of them are held in this country.

In addition to that $84,000,000 the Dominion Government made a loan of $10,000,000 in 1909 and another loan of $15,000,000 in 1913, a total of $25,000,000 guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. One would think that that guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada would be sufficient to relieve the Dominion Government from any anxiety with regard to the $25,000,000. But the Dominion is concerned in that $25,000,000, because it loaned the money, notwithstanding the fact it is guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. I have mentioned the votes which were loans secured by mortgage—$8,000,000 in 1916, $7,500,000 in 1917, of which $5,000,000 were paid; and $7,500,000 in 1918, a total of about $20,000,000. So that the Dominion Government, on top of the figures I have mentioned, is interested to the extent of $20,000,000 further by reason of votes made by Parliament during the last three years.

In addition, the Grand Trunk Pacific lines in Alberta and Saskatchewan have issued bonds to the extent of $13,000,000 guaranteed by Alberta and Saskatchewan. Just consider the amount of public credit that is involved there. $84,000,000, $25,000,000, $20,000,000—$130,000,000 represents the extent to which the Dominion Government is, by its guarantees or by the obligation of the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Grand Trunk Railway Company as guarantor, interested in the finance of this system.

Mr. NICKLE: Has the Minister not omitted to mention the $16,000,000 issue in 1914?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is right; I have inadvertently omitted to mention that. If you add the $16,000,000 to the amount which I have mentioned, you get a total of $145,000,000 of interest which the Dominion Government has in the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and in the guarantees which I have mentioned of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. ROBB: Is it the intention of the Government to take over the branch lines and pay the provinces for the amounts guaranteed by them?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that a little later.

Mr. McKENZIE: Suppose the guarantee or endorsement of the Grand Trunk Railway Company is good; what is still our direct liability in respect of our own guarantees?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That can easily be calculated. The Dominion Government would be liable as guarantors in respect of $84,000,000, upon which the interest charged per annum would be about $2,400,000.

Those are, I think, the figures shown in the Drayton-Acworth report, but there must be added the interest on the loans made during the last three years for the purpose which I have mentioned, and the rate of interest being high, there would be a substantial increase—in round figures, I should say a total of $3,000,000 at least. In addition to the Dominion Guarantees in respect to this enterprise, I desire to place the committee in possession of information respecting the guarantees of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada has guaranteed securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to a total amount of $97,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: That does not overlap the Dominion guarantees?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, it overlaps only the $25,000,000 I have mentioned. I will tell my hon. friend how this is made up. There is $20,000,000 of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company secured by second mortgages on the western division, guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, and $25,000,000 representing two loans made, one in 1909 and the other in 1913 by the Dominion of Canada, guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. That makes $45,000,000. In addition to that there is $48,000,000, representing debenture stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. In addition to that, there is some further liability which makes a total of about $97,000,000. That $97,000,000 means an interest liability of about $4,000,000 per annum on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada in respect of its guarantee. There is some overlapping, and in order that the House may not be confused by the overlapping, I should say that the total securities outstanding of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company guaranteed by both the Dominion Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, aggregate something over $200,000,000.

I think I mentioned the fact that there were guarantees on the branch lines by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. That brings us down to the present year. We had the Drayton-Acworth report, recommending that in order to meet the difficulties of the railway situation, the Government of Canada should take over the Canadian Northern, as we did, and should also take over the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.

Early in 1918, there were some negotiations with respect to the matter, but they came to nothing. Last year when the Prime Minister and certain of his colleagues were overseas, the question was taken up with the Grand Trunk Railway Company which, I may say, desired some assistance from the Government about July of last year. It transpired afterwards that they were able to arrange otherwise; but the matter was taken up with Mr. Smithers and the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, by the Prime Minister and his colleagues overseas.

I desire to inform the House as to the offer which was then made by the Government of Canada and as to the counter-offer which was made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The House will then understand the situation practically down to the present time. As I said to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) if, when I have concluded my remarks in the course of this discussion upon the resolution, there is further information that he requires and I can get it, it, of course, goes without saying that I shall be only too glad to give it to the House. I do not know what correspondence there was in the time of the Government which held power up to 1911, and personally I cannot see that it has much bearing on the question before us to-day, because agreements were entered into which were validated by legislation. It, therefore, appears to me that the legislation discloses the situation, and the correspondence would not be helpful. If, however, my hon. friend has in mind any particular correspondence, I shall be glad to endeavour to get it. This is the offer made on behalf of the Government of Canada last July by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). It is a little long, but I hope the House will have patience:

Dear Mr. Smithers:—Some time ago the Government of Canada was informed on behalf of the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company that this company would not be able, without Government assistance, to meet certain maturities falling due on the 1st and 15th of the present month.

It was thought of advantage that representatives of the Government should, on the occasion of their visit to England, to attend the Imperial War Conference, take the opportunity of conferring with yourself and your directorate on the general subject of Grand Trunk obligations and finance. Accordingly, the Hon. Mr. Calder and myself have had four conferences with you, at two of which you were accompanied by certain associates on the Board.

At the last conference you suggested that I should lay before you in writing the position taken by the Government and, in as definite a form as possible, its concrete proposals.

It may be assumed that the difficulties in which the company now finds itself arise from two main causes:—

(1) The obligations into which the company entered in 1903 and 1904 with respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company;

(2) War conditions as to operation and finance.

As to the latter cause it is not unfair to say that its incidence has fallen chiefly, if not wholly, in the years 1917 and 1918. On the contrary, the difficulties of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which are the direct outcome of its Grand Trunk Pacific obligations, are of much longer date. This latter company is in every sense subsidiary to, and its stock is wholly owned by the Grand Trunk Company. To this subsidiary company the Government of Canada came, by way of assistance, as far back as 1909, with a loan of $10,000,000. Another loan of $15,000,000 was made in 1913. A further loan of $6,000,000 was made in 1914 on a pledge of bonds. Its securities were further guaranteed by legislation of that year to the extent of $16,000,000. In 1916 a loan of $8,000,000 was made. In 1917, a loan of $7,500,000 was authorized and advanced, and in the spring of this year a further loan of $7,500,000 was authorized by Parliament. Meantime, the ever-increasing interest obligation binding on the Grand Trunk Railway Company towards its subsidiary company were not paid by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but were taken care of out of the proceeds of loans thus made by the Government of Canada. These obligations at the present time amount to very considerably over $5,000,000 per annum and in January 1923 increase to over $7,000,000 per annum.

Those are the figures given in the Drayton-Acworth report.

In the same conjunction it must also be remembered that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company has not assumed or attempted to discharge its rental obligations to the Government of Canada with respect to the National Transcontinental Railway, which obligations while not formally assumed by the Government, have in practice been shouldered by the Dominion. This extra burden is a matter of very considerable magnitude.

I refer to the outstanding facts related in the preceding paragraph for the purpose of indicating what has through recent years been the attitude of the Canadian Government and people toward Grand Trunk enterprises.

It is at this point that the Canadian Government is invited to enter upon a still wider field of assistance by assuming the liabilities in respect of Grand Trunk securities themselves.

We had been asked to render some assistance in July.

Through the course of the various steps recalled above, public opinion in our country has become more and more opposed to a continuance of the practice of assisting financially railways that were in private hands. Consequently, at the opening of our negotiations we stated to you that we did not believe that continued further assistance under present conditions could be justified.

In order, however, that there might be reasonable opportunity for negotiations, we recommended to the Minister of Finance that funds be provided to enable the company to meet maturities falling due in July. This has been and is being arranged.

I may say that it was not necessary to go on with it.

Throughout the negotiations and indeed prior thereto, it has been made clear to your Company that the obligations of the Grand Trunk Company to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company could not be ignored and that the Government could not undertake to assume the indebtedness of and to operate the Grand Trunk Pacific and branch lines thereof, and to relieve the Grand Trunk of responsibility therefor, while the Grand Trunk Railway itself, as a subsidiary of which and indeed as an extension of which the Grand Trunk Pacific was built, remained in independent hands. Accordingly, in the month of February last, after careful consideration and in pursuance of the recommendation of what is commonly known as the Drayton-Acworth Report, there were made to your Company the following proposals:

(1) The Government to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and branch lines and the Grand Trunk Railway Company; to acquire all assets, and to assume all obligations of both Companies.

(2) The Government to make annual payment of $2,500,000 for the first three years, $3,000,000 for the succeeding five years, and $3,600,000 annually thereafter; such sums to be distributed by the Grand Trunk management, as they might determine, among holders of 4 per cent Guaranteed and other stocks.

It was intended that the taking over should be by rental over a long period of years, as might be agreed, with a provision for purchase.

Should such terms not be accepted, it was suggested that the amounts in question might be submitted to arbitration. These proposals met with no acceptance.

Our present conference, extending over the past months have resulted in little progress—the only practical step being indeed the assistance referred to above as advanced by the Government. As intimated above, such assistance cannot under present conditions be continued.

We are now prepared to abide by the proposals submitted to you in February last as to acquisition or we are prepared on behalf of the Government to submit the entire question of remuneration to a Board of Arbitration on the following general terms:—

(1) The Board to consist of three persons; one to be appointed by the Grand Trunk Company, one by the Government of Canada, and the two so appointed to select a third, or, if they fail to agree, the third to be selected by a majority of the following: the Judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Chief Justice of the Province of Ontario.

(2) The Board to have full power as to the procuring and acceptance of evidence

(3) The award to be by way of annual rental for a term of 999 years; the Board to have power to vary the rental for two or more periods of years. The Government to have the option of purchase on the basis of and during the term of the final rental at the end of any year and on one-year's notice at twenty-five times the annual final rental.

(4) Conditions arising or that have arisen out of the war not to be taken into account in determining the rental value.

Should the Company desire, the Guaranteed Stock may be treated as an obligation in the same way as the Company's Bonds.

I would be glad to be advised whether the above specific proposal is acceptable or if not, whether the general terms of arbitration outlined above are satisfactory. Should either alternative be favourably received we may then enter upon discussion and negotiation as to further necessary details.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) Arthur Meighen.

Alfred W. Smithers, Esq.,
Chairman of the Board of Directors,
Grand Trunk Railway Company,
9 New Broad Street,
W.C.

That was the offer of the Government of Canada—an offer along the lines suggested in the Drayton-Acworth report. But in addition to that, in case that offer was not acceptable to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the Government of Canada offered to leave to arbitration the question of the rental to be paid. I have seen some reports emanating from London to the effect that the Government was not dealing as fairly with the Grand Trunk as with the Canadian Northern. Well, the Government had the question of what it should pay for the stock of the Canadian Northern determined by arbitration, a maximum being fixed as a safeguard against an unduly high award. But here we are not setting any maximum amount; we offered to arbitrate as to the price we should pay.

On August 8, 1918, the counter offer of the Grand Trunk Railway Company was received. Mr. Smithers writes:

Rt. Hon. Sir R. L. Borden, Savoy Hotel,
Strand, W.C.

Dear Sir Robert Borden,—At the meeting yesterday between you and Mr. Ballantyne and General Mewburn and a Committee of my Board and myself, I made a proposition which, after a long discussion, you asked should be put in writing.

I think in order to put it in its true perspective, I should just put down the propositions that have passed between the Government and the Company. You have all the particulars of those propositions, and therefore I only shortly put down the bare figures.

At your request on the 25th January, conveyed through the High Commissioner, asking the Board to say on what terms they would recommend the sale of the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific to the Government, I replied with a statement of terms which at the end of 1930 would have resulted in an annual payment by the Government of 1,609,000 pounds.

About $8,000,000.

On the 7th March you replied on the part of the Government, with an offer which at the end of eight years would have involved an annual payment by the Government of 739,000 pounds—

About $3,500,000.

—or you were prepared to leave the whole question of the amount to be paid to arbitration. At our meeting yesterday I proposed that the Government should pay a net annual sum of 977,000 pounds—

About $4,500,000.

—being the amount of net earnings for the year 1913, the last normal year before the war, and thus following the course pursued by the British Government towards the British Railways, and leave to arbitration what further sum if any, the shareholders are entitled to in respect of the prospective value of the undertaking that must arise from the development of the Dominion. This offer I now repeat. But, it was also suggested that an alternative offer should be made of a definite sum without arbitration, and I am authorized to say, the Board would recommend to the shareholders the payment of an annual sum of 1,163,000 pounds.

Or over five million dollars.

Let me summarize those two offers. The Government say: "We will offer you $2,500,000 for the first three years, $3,000,000 for the succeeding five years, and $3,600,000 annually thereafter. We will assume all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk and all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific." What does Mr. Smithers say in reply? You will observe there is not a word in his reply with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company or the obligations of the Grand Trunk in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. He takes the net earnings for 1913. He does not say whether they should be applied toward making good the obligations of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific, but he wants the Government to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific and assume all its liabilities, and he wants the Government to pay an annual rental of £1,163,000 or over $5,000,000 a year.

What would be the position of Canada with regard to Government ownership of roads supposing we had accepted that offer? Deficits on the Canadian Northern; all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific, amounting to at least $8,000,000 a year; $5,000,000 a year in respect of the Grand Trunk Railway, although that road is not earning more, or very little more, than its fixed charges to-day. The Government would then have the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk, and the Canadian Northern, with deficits on the Canadian Northern and deficits on the Grand Trunk Pacific, and it would be paying the Grand Trunk shareholders $5,000,000 a year, without getting any net earnings from the Grand Trunk, or at all events, very small net earnings at the present time, to reimburse the country for any part of that rental paid out.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Was the offer made by the Government intended to relieve the Grand Trunk of their obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was so stated. The Government said: "We realize the Grand Trunk Railway Company cannot meet its obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific." Everybody realizes that. The Drayton-Acworth report says so; it says: "Deal generously with them." We say so too. The Government said: "We will assume all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company (and, remember, we have been carrying them), assume all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, take a lease for 999 years and pay you the amount mentioned in Mr. Meighen's letter by way of rental; or, if you are not satisfied with that, we will arbitrate."

The Grand Trunk said, " No, we will not do that, but we make you a counter offer in which we ignore altogether our liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific; we want the Government to take care of that, and, in addition, to pay us on the basis of what we regard as the value of Grand Trunk shares, without the slightest regard to our liability towards the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway." Now, the negotiations ended. I read to the House the other day the correspondence which had taken place with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company with respect to two matters: First, default which was apprehended on March 1, and second, the discontinuance of the operation of the Grand Trunk Railway system.

Mr. CAHILL: That is default in payment of interest?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was apprehended. Now, let me say with regard to the last vote of $7,500,000 made last year by Parliament, that the Government, after Sir Robert Borden and his colleagues had returned, and after we were aware that an impasse had been reached, felt they must continue to pay that $7,500,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, because it had been voted by Parliament. It would have been legal on the part of the Government to have discontinued payment under that vote last fall, because all votes made by Parliament are really subject to the Government paying them out. But when Parliament votes a certain sum the view that governments take—at least, the view that I have always understood they should take—is that Parliament intended that the money voted should be devoted to the purposes for which the vote was made. Therefore, the Government has paid out to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company the $7,500,000 which was voted last year, tthe proceeds of which have not been entirely used.

Mr. ANDREWS: May I ask if you deduct from the $7,500,000 the interest charges for which the Grand Trunk was liable for the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, the $7,500,000 paid the fixed charges on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company; that is to say, the interest upon the securities guaranteed by the Dominion Government and guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, and also the deficit up to the time the vote was exhausted. The $7,500,000 was not sufficient for the past year. In February the vote was exhausted and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company notified the Government that they apprehended they would have to make default on March 1 in respect to interest upon securities maturing due in London, and called the attention of the Government to the serious situation which would arise if funds were not provided for that purpose. The reply which I made to them is contained in a letter which is on Hansard. We stated that the last of the money, about $1,000,000, had been paid over to meet deficit on operating expenses in accordance with the certificate of the Grand Trunk Railway officials themselves, approved by the Deputy Minister of Railways, and that no question could arise as to that money being properly applied to meet deficit on operation before application was made of any part of it to meet interest upon securities; and I said further that it would be for the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to consider what were their responsibilities towards that interest which was falling due in London upon securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company which they had guaranteed. Now, the Government was prepared for default, if it had occurred, because we had made up our minds that as long as negotiations with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada —to use the language which I employed— "remained in their present unsatisfactory condition," the Dominion Government would not ask Parliament to vote any further sums.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We had taken that view, not hastily. The matter had been under deliberation for weeks and months and the Government had come to the conclusion, and had notified that conclusion to the responsible officers of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, that when that money became exhausted the Dominion Government would not bring down a further vote, as had been done during the last three years, by way of loans to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for the purpose of meeting fixed charges and deficit on operating expenses.

Mr. ROBB: The inference from the letter of Mr. Smithers, in January, 1918, is that the Government at that time, in January, 1918, had opened negotiations with the Grand Trunk Railway to purchase the Grand Trunk Railway and all their system. Was that the unanimous policy of the Government in January, 1918, to purchase all those roads?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Having regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific situation and the liability which it involved, and the fact also that we had been asked for assistance by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, in July negotiations were taken up. But at an earlier date, in January, 1918, the Prime Minister had made an offer to the Grand Trunk Railway Company practically in pursuance of the Drayton-Acworth report.

Mr. ROBB: Negotiations were opened by the Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company were coming every year to the Government and saying, "Vote us $7,500,000 or $8,000,000 to keep the Grand Trunk Pacific going, but don't call upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company for anything." Now, that could not go on, and the Government therefore opened negotiations with a view to clearing up the entire situation. The Government had been bearing all the responsibility of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada expected it to continue bearing all the responsibility. The situation had to be cleaned up. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) says he thinks there was a communication from the Grand Trunk Railway Company prior to our offer. I shall inquire as to that; but at all events, I do not know that it is indispensable to the discussion of the matter because the situation speaks for itself.

Mr. CAHILL: Before you get away from the responsibility of the Grand Trunk, may I ask, how did they get relieved of responsibility with regard to the Transcontinental?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am coming to that. I will summarize later. That interest was paid on March 1st, I believe—I did not hear anything to the contrary, and I should have heard if it had not been paid. Now, that difficulty was overcome, and the next thing that happened was, without any previous intimation or discussion at all, a notice—which I described in a cable to Mr. Smithers as peremptory—a notice on Thursday, I think, that on the following Monday, by reason of the fact that the freight rates in the West were not high enough to enable the Grand Trunk Pacific to operate without a loss, they would have to close that system. Without any discussion, without any previous intimation, the ultimatum was served upon the Government. "We are going to close down the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system unless—" it was not so stated, but the inference is irresistible— "—unless the Government does what the Government said it would not do, namely, give us a further vote to enable us to carry on." Now, it is a pretty serious thing to close down a transcontinental railway system of 2,700 miles of main line and branches. The notification was in explicit terms: "We cannot go on." They knew that the Government had taken the view that it would not recommend to Parliament to vote any further money. What was the Government to do? I am frank to say that I do not believe the Grand Trunk Railway Company officials, or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway officials believed that the Government had power to deal with the situation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not like to impute motives, but it is my opinion that they did not realize that the Government had power to deal with the question, notwithstanding that Parliament was in session. Why do I say that? In adverting to that, I reply to the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition about the courts affording an adequate remedy. We did not overlook the courts, but the courts afford no adequate remedy to the cessation of operations on a system such as the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. If my hon. friend, who is a good lawyer and who has been a judge, will take the trouble to look at the legislation upon the subject, and upon the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, he will find that what I have stated is absolutely correct. He will find further, that even as to the jurisdiction, if it does not exist in the Exchequer Court as to the appointment of a receiver, it must be on an application for foreclosure and sale. Before application can be made for foreclosure and sale of a railway company, default must exist, and a certain time elapse under the provisions of whatever mortgage or other instrument has been taken as security. The Dominion Government was not in a position to make application to the Exchequer Court for a receiver, because it could not prove default. The position was then that the Government could not resort to the Exchequer Court. The Exchequer Court would have no jurisdiction to make an order.

We had to consider what we would do to prevent a great railway system from closing down with inconvenience not only to the people of the West but to the people of Canada generally. We did not hesitate to make a clean-cut case of it, and the Dominion Government fell back upon the War Measures Act, which gives jurisdiction in the matter of railways, and appointed my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) a receiver.

Why did we appoint him a receiver? To ensure the continued operation of a system so essential to the convenience and welfare of the great communities which it serves. Let me say further to the leader of the Opposition that the Exchequer Court has no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver of a telegraph company. Embraced in a system such as the Grand Trunk Pacific there is not only the railway system itself but the telegraph system, the development company with the assets I mentioned previously, the steamship company, and all those other auxiliary or subsidiary enterprises.

There is a great lack in the railway legislation of Canada which some day will have to be remedied by this House in regard to the jurisdiction of the court to deal with a system as compared with an individual railway. Some day that will have to receive attention.

Now, the Government appointed a receiver. Lest it should be thought that further negotiations would have resulted in bringing about an understanding——

Mr. McKENZIE: How does the minister understand this section 6 of the Winding-up Act, which says:

"This Act applies to all corporations incorporated under the authority of an Act of the Parliament of Canada."

I would suppose that would be sufficiently comprehensive to include a telegraph company, or any company incorporated by this Parliament, or under the authority of this Parliament, and that this company would come within a section of that kind.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am informed on the highest legal authority that there is no jurisdiction in the Exchequer Court to deal with the question of a receivership for the system. There is this further consideration: Supposing that in several of the provinces of Canada applications were made to the courts for the appointment of not a receiver, but many receivers, for a railway system of this character and for all its subsidiaries, what a situation you would have! It would paralyse the operation of the system. There is not to-day any existing legislation providing for any effectual remedy through a receivership for a railway system such as the Grand Trunk Pacific and its subsidiaries.

In order that there may not be any doubt in the minds of any of the members of the committee that the Grand Trunk intended that notice to mean that they would close down by reason of lack of funds, I may state that I received a further cable from Mr. Smithers, in which he stated—I am afraid I cannot lay my hands on it just at the moment—that the fact that they had no funds made it necessary that they should notify the Government as they did. There is no question about it; the issue is clear-cut—the Dominion Government to furnish the money or the Grand Trunk to cease operations.

That brings us down to the present time and to this resolution that is before the House. Although the Government has plenary jurisdiction under the War Measures Act, action having been taken when Parliament is in session, it is of course proper that Parliament should deal with this Order in Council, validate it, approve it, and translate it into an Act of Parliament, in order that no question can arise whatever with regard to its validity.

Let me summarize the National Transcontinental railway situation including the Grand Trunk Pacific railway which is embraced in it:

An agreement made in 1903 to build a line from Moncton to the tide-waters of the Pacific—a great enterprise.

The Government of Canada to build the line from Moncton to Winnipeg, which cost in the neighbourhood of $170,000,000 without interest.

The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to construct the lines and its subsidiaries from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert.

The Grand Trunk Railway Company to lease the eastern division of the National Transcontinental railway for a period of 50 years after seven of which they were to pay an annual rental and also any deficit on operating account. That was to be 3 per cent upon the cost which would amount to about $5,000,000 or 3 per cent on $170,000,000. Let us say $4,000,000 to be conservative, because it may be said that I have overstated the amount. I do not think I have but I do not desire to raise any controversy as to that.

The Grand Trunk Railway Company would be the proprietor of the entire system by holding all the stock in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

What happens? The Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company as a party in the matter, say: We cannot lease the National Transcontinental railway. They put it on various grounds but the ground is perfectly obvious; they could not lease the National Transcontinental railway and pay the rental of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000. They simply could not do it. The Dominion Government gives its guarantees, the Grand Trunk gives its guarantees, the western division is built at a cost of something all together, if you include deficits and fixed charges for the past three years, over $200,000,000. The Dominion Government is interested in this to the extent of $100,000,000 and the Grand Trunk's interest almost a like sum. The Grand Trunk Pacific had said to the Dominion Government: We cannot lease the eastern division of the National Transcontinental railway. The Grand Trunk Railway Company say to the Dominion: We want to assume no responsibility for the Grand Trunk Pacific; take the whole thing off our hands from Moncton to Prince Rupert That is the statement. Now I do not believe that this is a position which the Grand Trunk Railway Company can hold.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: It should not be allowed to.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not believe that is a position the Grand Trunk Railway Company should hold. The Government and the people of this country are very friendly to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, as they are to all British enterprises in this country so far as I know. But the people of Canada, I believe, will not support the Government in continuing the generous policy which it has pursued during the last three years of loaning seven and a half or eight million dollars yearly to pay off the liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific, including the interest upon the securities guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company—I do not believe it. That is the position to-day. The Government is in possession as receiver. The resolution indicates the powers and duties of the receiver, and enlarges the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court to deal with whatever situations may arise. It is not the intention of the Government to bring down a further vote while, as I stated in my communication to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the negotiations between that company and the Dominion remain in their present unsatisfactory condition. It seems to me that the next move is on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the hon. gentleman closes his very clear and excellent speech, would he be good enough to tell the committee what the Government proposes to do? The Government has taken the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway—the hon. gentleman has dealt with that fully in his speech—but what does the Government propose to do now that it has the line in its hands, or what is it thinking of doing?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What we are doing now is passing this resolution, but my hon. friend wishes to know what will be the policy of the Government?

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The policy of the Government, speaking frankly to my hon. friend, will be what it has been in the past. There have been negotiations between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada and the Dominion, and in our view the attitude of the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Company has not been a reasonable one, because they have steadfastly refused to recognize the liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway; and I say that negotiations with the Grand Trunk Company are not possible until that company's liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway are regarded as a factor, an important factor, in those negotiations. I do not go the distance of saying—I have never gone so far as to say so—that this matter should be looked upon in a hard and fast business way; that is to say that we should set off against any net earnings of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, actual or prospective so far as we can estimate, the full amount of the deficit for fixed charges and operating expenses of the Grand Trunk Pacific, because if we did, it would wipe out absolutely all equity in Grand Trunk Railway shares. We have never taken that view.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister did not answer my question. What I meant is what is the Government going to do now that it has the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway in its hands?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We are going to carry on.

Mr. McKENZIE: What are you going to do?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I repeat that we are going to carry on.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are you going to own the railway?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We are carrying on as receiver at the present time. We are maintaining the service upon which great communities of this country depend from day to day. That is the immediate reason for the appointment of a receiver. What we shall do later on will be as we may determine, but I may say to my hon. friend that unless a satisfactory situation ensues the Dominion Government will be obliged to have recourse to whatever legal remedies it may have, and it has many.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: And it may be a receivership for the Grand Trunk?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I pass no opinion as to that. I have endeavoured to expound to the House as clearly as I could, and I am afraid at too great length, the situation, because this is an important transaction. Do not let me give the House or the country the impression that the Government desires to deal harshly with, or to exact the pound of flesh from, the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada; we have not done so, and we do not intend to do so; but we do not intend to negotiate upon a basis in which all the prospective earnings are to be capitalized, for the Grand Trunk, and all the liabilities of that company, in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific, are to be ignored. As I said the next move is from the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. EULER: The hon. gentleman has stated that the next move should be on the part of the Grand Trunk. It seems to me that the Government should hold the Grand Trunk Company liable for the obligations which it has not met in the past, and therefore the next move should be on the part of the Government, in order to hold the company to its obligations which the hon. gentleman states it has absolutely ignored.

Mr. CAHILL: The action taken by the Government so far, does not seem to be very consistent. It passed an Order in Council and took possession of the railway before it had actually made default.

An hon. MEMBER: Done deliberately.

Mr. CAHILL: The receiver stated that he had taken possession on the morning of Monday, March 10, at one o'clock, and the company had notified the Government that it might default on and after the 10th of March.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman is wrong. The company notified the Government that it would default on or before the 10th of March.

Mr. CAHILL: Was it not on or after the 10th?

Mr. REID: No, on or before the 10th.

Mr. CAHILL: But the Government did not give the company any opportunity of ceasing on the 10th. It took possession before, and this makes it appear to the overseas investors that the Government is adopting summary action and trying to force the company's hand. It looks very much like a horse trading operation, where one side is trying to take advantage of the other.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CAHILL: It looks very much like it. The Acting Prime Minister referred quite frequently to the Drayton-Acworth Report and advised all hon. members to read it, and I think it is very good advice. I think that Report should be read by all of us; there are very many passages in it that are well worthy of careful perusal. The Acting Prime Minister said the commissioners recommended that the Government should take this road over, but he omitted to read one further paragraph. I will supply the omission:

1. That the Government do not acquire or undertake to operate any further railways; but

2. That these three railways, Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk, and Grand Trunk Pacific, be transferred by Act of Parliament to an independent Board of Trustees (incorporated as a company), constituted as we shall hereafter describe.

These recommendations, from our point of view, hang together and must be regarded as inseparable. We do not recommend the transfer of the three companies at all, unless our recommendations as to the method to be followed are also substantially accepted. That the Government should itself take over the railways, and they should then be operated under the control of a Parliamentary Minister of Railways, is a policy which in our judgment would not be in the best interest of Canada.

The commissioners pointed out in various places through the report that they would not under any consideration recommend the Government taking over the road and operating it. I think the Prime Minister is somewhat in error in saying that the Government railways are being operated as recommended by the Drayton-Acworth report, because they are actually being operated by a board of about fifteen directors, whereas the recommendation of the Drayton-Acworth report was that the directorate should consist of five members. The operation is carried on as a political proposition. The directors are appointed by the Minister of Railways, and I think I am safe in saying that one qualification all possess is that they supported the Union Government at the last election. There is not a known railway man in the whole aggregation of directors, outside of Mr. Hanna, Mackenzie and Mann's appointee, who was associated with Mackenzie and Mann in practically all their undertakings in this country during the last twenty years. Mr. C. M. Hamilton, of McTaggart, another of the directors, is a farmer, and I believe, a very good man; but I understand also that he made way for his Conservative opponent in the last election and was a supporter of the Union Government. Apparently this is his reward. Mr. Thomas Cantley, of New Glasgow, and Mr. Barnhill, of St. John, N.B., are presidents of steel companies. Sir H. Laporte, of Montreal, who is on practically all the Government commissions, is a wholesale grocer. Mr. Jones, of Montreal, is in the cement and steel business. Then there are Mr. Bell, of Ottawa, Mr. Riley, of Winnipeg, a broker; Mr. Hobson, of Hamilton, president of a steel company there. The others were the former directors of the Canadian Northern.

The grabbing, as it were, of these railways does not solve the railway problem of Canada. The great difficulty is that we have not sufficient traffic to make the railroads pay, and the reason why we have not sufficient traffic is that we have not sufficient population.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Why did we build them?

Mr. CAHILL: That is a question I would like the Government to answer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHILL: The Drayton-Acworth report says:

We may put the same thing in another way. The growth of the mileage has far outstripped the growth of the population. In 1901, with a population of 5,371,315, Canada had 18,140 miles of railway in operation; roughly, a mile of railway for every 300 inhabitants. In 1911, the population had increased 34 per cent to 7,206,643, while the mileage had increased by 40 per cent to 25,400 miles; a mile of railway to every 284 inhabitants.

Mark you, in 1911 we had a mile of railway to every 284 people. There was an election in that year. The report goes on to say:

Since 1911, the population has, it is understood, not much increased, but the railway mileage open and under construction has grown to 40,584 miles. In other words, Canada has today, taking the present population as 7,500,000, only 185 inhabitants to support each mile of railway. Taking the four western provinces by themselves, there are only two-thirds of this number for each mile of railway.

That refers to the period between 1911 and 1916, in respect of which hon. gentlemen will not attempt to put the responsibility for railway conditions upon members on this side. It may be said that before 1911 a railway policy had been inaugurated, and so on. That is quite true as applied to the period from 1896; but at the same time a policy of immigration and colonization was carried out by the Government which went out of power in 1911. That policy, which caused the country to be settled as railways were built, continued from 1896 to 1911. The railways did not get ahead of the population, nor was the population much behind the railways; the ratio was properly preserved. But between 1911 and 1917, hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to forget all about the immigration and colonization policy, and they constructed railroads all over the country. The friends of railway operators and contractors were in power at that time.

It does not make much difference whether you hand this money over to the Grand Trunk Pacific and let them pay it out to cover operating deficits, or pay it out yourself. The difficulty is that you may pay a great deal more to operate the road as a Government undertaking. The question for us to solve is: How are we to handle those railroads? The first consideration should be: What management do you propose? How do you hope to manage these roads? The Drayton-Acworth report goes very fully into that; in no sense does it recommend that the roads be taken over by Canada if they are to be operated by the Government. The report recommends that they be operated by a commission, and points out how the commission should be formed. I do not say that I agree with everything in the Drayton-Acworth report, but apparently the only things in that report that the Government agree with are the things that suit them and their friends. There is no mention in the report of paying the Canadian Northern people $10,800,000 for a portion of their stock; on the contrary, that stock was condemned as of no value. We have the farce of an arbitration proceeding in Toronto which decides that we shall pay out this $10,800,000; yet we have not acquired all the stock; we do not know who are the owners of ten per cent of that stock. It is understood, however, that this stock is owned by some of the friends of the Mackenzie and Mann interests.

Last year the Prime Minister announced that negotiations were to be started for the taking over of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Various members of the Government carpet-bagged back and forth across the ocean last year; our esteemed friend Clifford Sifton also was on these tours. If that speaking tube that he uses so well could tell a tale, it could inform us very much better about this railway situation than we have been informed this afternoon.

The chief trouble in connection with our railway situation is the land question. The Canadian Northern runs through millions of acres of vacant lands held by speculators throughout Western Canada and by competing railway companies. If our railroads run through vacant lands and produce no traffic, necessarily we must lose money on the operation. Until this land question is satisfactorily settled, the roads which run through these unoccupied areas cannot possibly make money. Even the tariff enters into railroad operation. If you sweep the tariff wall away in Western Canada and inaugurate a sane land policy, causing the land held by speculators in the West to be put into use and to create traffic for the roads which we own, we would have very little trouble with the railway situation. If you have people on the lines of the railways, the railways will take care of themselves. We have one prosperous railway system; the Canadian Pacific is making money. In fact, we are forcing money on them that they do not require. They are earning so much that we expect to get part of it back, because they are earning more than the country is supposed to allow them. But that line runs through territory that is developed. We have not too much railway mileage; we have too little population, and no policy which would have the effect of increasing it.

If the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) would spend more time in looking after the colonization of the country and less in convincing himself that he is a Liberal, it would be much better for the railways of this country. On the Transcontinental east of here, from Cochrane east, all through the province of Quebec, there is the poorest kind of service, a service that is heart-breaking to settlers going into that country. The pioneers going into that country cannot get cars to handle their wood. Here is an undertaking that cost from $50,000 to $60,000 a mile to build, and sufficient rolling stock is not provided. The road is well built; the country is fairly well settled; but how can the road ever hope to pay if you do not handle the traffic on it and do not encourage the traffic there. If the Minister of Immigration and Colonization would take a trip through that country if he would look after the traffic of that country and see that the railroad gave proper facilities for handling the wood and other products of that country, instead of losing thousands of people from Quebec and Northern Ontario. If that were done, that road, instead of losing a great deal of money would, in a few years, prove a profitable enterprise. But if you start out with the avowed intention of killing the settlement, of course, the road cannot pay. That is bound to be the result if you will not give a proper service, and people are, therefore, afraid to go in. I know of instances on the Transcontinental last year where people drew out wood, having been promised that they would get cars. The wood was worth $5 a cord. They took out the wood, but they could not sell it, because there were no cars to take the wood away. In the spring of the year, the brokers and lawyers came along and bought that wood at from $2.50 to $3 a cord, and a few weeks afterwards they were able to secure cars. Such occurrences will kill settlement in any country. There has been no attempt to give service on the Transcontinental since it has been built, and unless you give service——

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The Grand Trunk undertook to do that.

Mr. CAHILL: The Grand Trunk undertook to do that, and the Dominion Government, of which my hon. friends are members, relieved the Grand Trunk of their responsibility, and when they relieved them of that responsibility, I think the Grand Trunk was quite justified in believing that they would also be relieved of the Grand Trunk Pacific responsibility.

Mr. NICKLE. Why?

Mr. CAHILL: The Transcontinental is the connecting link between the old Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk are now in the position of owning a railroad in the west with no connecting link from Winnipeg to the East. That connecting link was taken from them by the Government of this country, and when that was done, I think the Grand Trunk were quite right in assuming that the Government were also going to relieve them of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MANION: Does the hon. member think that the Grand Trunk should be relieved of its liability or not?

Mr. CAHILL: I am not debating the point whether it should be relieved of its liability or not. If it should not be relieved, the Government should have taken action when they relieved that company of the Transcontinental. They relieved the Grand Trunk of the connecting link. It is a debatable question whether they should be relieved or not. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada have not received from the Dominion of Canada $10,000,000 altogether for the construction of railroads in Canada. The Grand Trunk was a pioneer road during its whole career. It is owned by British people in the old country who invested their money here for the development of Canada. The Canadian Pacific came along and got in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000 from the Treasury of Canada. The Grand Trunk got a few million dollars to build a conecting link from the boundary line down to Portland.

Mr. NICKLE: They got £3,000 a mile from Montreal to Toronto.

Mr. CAHILL: The report here will show that they did not get anything which they did not pay back except a few million to build a road from Portland to the boundary

Mr. LALOR: They had assistance from the municipalities through which they went, and they did not pay anything back.

Mr. CAHILL: I am not speaking about the municipalities; I am speaking about the Government. My own county of Pontiac has assisted roads by bonuses, and I do not think that is quite the right thing to do. I think it is a mistake. But we are not speaking about the assistance they got from the various municipalities; we are speaking about the assistance they got from the Government. As they have not received nearly as much assistance from this country as the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian Northern has, I think they are justified in asking for fair treatment in this matter. I think they are justified in asking that they be released from the Grand Trunk Pacific obligation, especially as they have been released from the Transcontinental obligation, as that leaves them without any connecting link whatever. We are rushing into this thing haphazard with apparently no policy. The Government say that they are being guided by the Drayton-Acworth Report, but, apart from the matter of taking over the road, they are not following the report in regard to management or operation or payment for the road. They are simply taking the road and throwing it into the hands of the Canadian Northern crowd, the Mackenzie and Mann outfit, who apparently want to grab the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. If there is an obligation on the part of the Grand Trunk, that obligation should easily be determined between the railway company and the Government. It is only in connection with the Grand Trunk guarantees, and has nothing to do with the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself, because the Gr nd Trunk Railway Company claim that they are able to operate. They have never made default in their operations or in paying interest on their bonds. The only operation they are being " crowded " on is their guarantees of the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds. It seems that the Government think the Grand Trunk should be relieved of that—and the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) apparently thinks so himself, because he says the Government offered them a certain amount of money which would relieve them of the obligation. He says: If they insist on taking up the Grand Trunk Pacific obligation, they have no equity whatsoever. Yet he says that they should be relieved of the responsibilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. CAHILL: Well, it is practically that, is it not? The Acting Prime Minister says that the Grand Trunk, if they are held responsible regarding their obligations to the Grand Trunk Pacific, have no equity. Yet he says that the Government is willing to pay them an equity in the road. And he also says, if I understood him correctly, they would claim the relieving of the liability so far as the Grand Trunk Railway Company was concerned.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend misquotes me. I did state that if the liability of the Grand Trunk in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific were taken fully into account, the value of the Grand Trunk shares would be practically nil; and I said, and said it with emphasis, that in our negotiations with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, their liabilities in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific must be regarded as an important factor bearing upon the question of what we shall in our generosity allow them.

Mr. CAHILL: If the Acting Prime Minister admits the principle that the Grand Trunk have no equity in the Grand Trunk Pacific, then why does he offer them this money at all? It seems an unreasonable proposition that he should offer them some $3,000,000 a year for something in which they have no equity, unless he admits the principle that he should relieve them of the Grand Trunk Pacific liability; and if he admits that principle, then I think they can justly state whether they want to sell the Grand Trunk Railway to the Government or not. I think they would be justified in saying: We will put a price on it, or we will not, just as they see fit, so long as they are not in default. The Grand Trunk themselves are probably anxious and quite willing to get rid of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and I think that, by this action taken by the Government, they have done so, because the Government have jumped in summarily and taken possession, without the Grand Trunk making default. I think before the Government gets through they will find they have relieved the Grand Trunk of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and they will have no further hold on the Grand Trunk.

With regard to the earnings, the minister says that it will take from $7,000,000 to $8,000,000 a year to pay the deficits. I have here a statement of the Canadian Northern gross earnings. For September, 1918, the gross earnings were $4,050,700, as compared with $3,341,500 for the same period in the previous year—an increase of $709,200. Operating expenses were $4,109,000 compared with $2,915,800 for the year previous, so that net earnings of $425,900 for September, 1917 have been turned into a deficit of $58,100 for the same month of 1918. The operating expenses work out on a similar basis. So I think it might have been better to wait a while and leave the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the Grand Trunk until some amicable arrangement had been arrived at whereby the Grand Trunk would acknowledge their obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific or be relieved of them.

At six o'clock the committee took recess

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CAHILL (resuming): Mr. Chairman, with regard to the public ownership of railways, the point that I am most particularly interested in is the policy of the Government with regard to the management of the road. Reading again from the Drayton-Acworth report, I find this:

> The railway touches the life of the country at innumerable points. It can almost make one city and unmake another. It vitally affects the question whether an industry in one place is more or less profitable than in another. Every city wants to become a railway centre, to have railway works located within its limits. And the local member invariably wants it too. Every citizen wants the railway station placed where it best suits his own personal convenience, and wants that every express train shall stop at it.

I have in mind a case which I think will apply to this condition. The Canadian Northern had at Calgary some twenty or twenty-five engines operating from Calgary on the Goose Lake line. The company transferred them to Hanna for some unknown reason. They also transferred some seventy-five employees of the road. They took them from Calgary where they had every convenience as regards water supply, coal facilities and facilities for the men, and transferred them to Hanna where they are hauling water some fifty miles to supply the engines. There may be a sufficient reason for this transfer there, but it is not apparent to the people along the line. It seems to be an additional cost to the service; and it might account for some of the figures which I have quoted of the earnings and expenditures in connection with the running of the road since the Government took it over. I am not opposed to public ownership of railways, although there has never resulted any great success from such ownership, principally for the reason that the roads are always brought into politics; and if the great railway systems of this country are to become a political football and a patronage outlet for the Government we shall undoubtedly lose a lot of money. It has cost a great deal more to run the Canadian Northern this year, than before the Government took it over, and no doubt it will take more to run the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Drayton-Acworth report specifically says that it will under no consideration recommend railways to be taken over and managed by the Government, and suggests that there should be a commission appointed, and this seems quite reasonable. There are a great number of people in this country who are very anxious to have public ownership, but apparently there are very few who are giving any attention to the question of management. I fear that we will be confronted with difficulties, after we have expended a lot of money, and find ourselves in deeper water in this railway problem. We had an instance in the Railway Committee the other day. The Grand Trunk were asking to be allowed to sell some more securities, many of the members of the committee objecting strenuously. Some other promoter had a railway starting from nowhere in particular and ending anywhere, and there did not seem to be an objection to his getting an extension of time. There are some one hundred or one hundred and fifty railways projected by promoters who hope at some future time to unload them on the Dominion of Canada; and just as soon as these railroads are allowed to pass the Railway Committee, get a charter, and get organized, and sell their securities, and get a subsidy from the Dominion Government, there will be difficulties. I think the whole question should be seriously considered by the Government and the entire system worked out on some basis of public and private ownership. It seems to me that the ideal condition would be to have our present public-owned railways properly managed and leave the Canadian Pacific railway as it is. I think the Canadian National railway might form a working arrangement with the Grand Trunk that would save the country from taking over that end of it. A traffic arrangement might surely be made with them. They need the outlet in the West, just as much as the western lines need the outlet in the East; and there might be some arrangement by which the Grand Trunk and the Government railways could co-operate. They would have as competitor the Canadian Pacific railway. We would then have a private-owned road and a Government-owned road, and we could test the two plans and ascertain which is the better. But apparently the Government has given this matter no thought whatever. The Prime Minister at the last session said that it was his intention that there should be a commission, and that this matter should be taken as far as possible out of politics. Since that time, however, we find that ten new directors of the Canadian National railway have been appointed, and I have been unable to find any special reason for their appointment. So far as I can learn they had no qualifications to recommend them as railroad men. This undertaking is a large one. It embraces some 15,000 miles of railway and something over a billion dollars of investment, and should therefore surely merit the most earnest consideration of the Government. The whole problem must be carefully worked out if the situation is to be saved. There can be no advantage in taking over these railroads if the cost of operation will be more than at the present time. The people of the Dominion must pay the charges no matter whether the railways are privately or publicly owned. If the Grand Trunk Pacific as a company system cost only $7,000,000 of the people's money to run, and it would cost $10,000,000 as a public-owned proposition, we would be losing some millions. It cannot be an asset if it is a losing proposition, and it would be just as well to leave it as it is; and until we realize the importance of the management and work out a system whereby we shall get the best possible results, we shall continue to lose money. I fail to understand why a grocer, and a broker, and a steel magnate, should be directors of a railway system; and I think that we might follow the Drayton-Acworth report and appoint the best railway men we could get in Canada, giving them a free hand and paying them good salaries. I think also it will be necessary to adopt some system of co-operation with the employees of the road, some profit-sharing system, in order that we may obtain the best service from the employees. As things are at present, under political management, they are uncertain as to the future. There may be changes of government, of management and of directors, and, naturally changes of employees, unless we can take these roads out of politics. The question of the extensions of the railroads should also be taken into serious consideration. There are places where the railroads must be extended, and there are places where we have too many roads already; and that question should be dealt with by some other body of impartial men who would not be at the beck and call of a member for any district. A road may be needed for the development of territory where it will not yield interest charges and operating expenses at first. There should be some system by which such a road could be subsidized to a certain extent, after it had been passed upon by some independent body. We should also establish the capitalization of these roads. We have the Intercolonial without capitalization, and the Canadian Northern with heavy capitalization. We should establish the capitalization on which roads within a reasonable period of years would be in a position to earn money. Hand the roads over to a commission and let them state to the Government, if you will, what they expect to require in the way of cash assistance from this country in order to put them in good shape, and what they expect to require before they can be made to pay, and how long they expect to operate before getting any returns. If we go on in our present haphazard way, however, reaching out and taking a railway here and another there, we shall certainly have difficulties. The last night of last session, about ten o'clock at night, there was brought up the question of some four or five railroads. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid), a great public ownership man, turned to his friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), who was more or less of a private-ownership man, and with their co-operation we gobbled up four or five railroads.

I do not know how much work has been done on them since, nor what system has been adopted to put them into shape. The railway situation will never work itself out until we adopt a policy of colonization to get people along the lines of road and to get the land that is being held out of use into such a condition that people can go and settle upon it and produce traffic for the railways.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. the member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) but I cannot agree with him. I am an absolute believer in the public ownership of railways in this country. I came into this House on that doctrine. I have seen it expand and grow and take possession of the hearts of the people. The people are determined that the old system must end forever and a new system take its place. That new system is public ownership. One of the first war measures of the Mother Country was to take over the railways of Great Britain. They will never part with them. The United States have taken over the railways. They have had difficulties, but they are trying to surmount them. They are co-ordinating the roads, they are licking them into shape, and while they have not made any profits, and people say it has been expensive to run them, the real fact is that the roads had been allowed to run down and they required immense expenditures to restore them to a profitable basis.

The people of the United States have justified that expenditure. They have a body in the United States called the Council of Agriculture. That council, represented by its chairman and prominent members, waited upon the Senate Committee, discussing the railway situation, and said: We come here representing the farmers of the United States who, in their organized capacity, are in favour of public ownership and who believe that this is the only way of getting substantial relief from their transportation difficulties. They are going to continue public ownership in the United States. They have it, as a matter of fact, in England although there is some legislating yet to do. Germany held her predominence in the war largely because of her state-owned railways, all Europe has been converted to state-owned railways and no country there proposes to abandon the principle of state ownership.

We believe in it in the province of Ontario. I have watched closely the development of public opinion on that question, I know what the people there are thinking and I have no hesitation in saying that they are in favour of public ownership. We have a provincially-owned railway. It is doing good work, it is well administered and it has opened up a new portion of the country. While it has not paid any dividends yet, it is a splendid asset for the province. We have also another fine example of public ownership in the Hydro-electric system of Ontario, which supplies the people with heat, light and power. They have made a great success of it there, and they are going to extend it to local radial railways.

I was up in the West taking part in a little campaign on that question. Those who fought the idea of public ownership in connection with the radial system were not in it when the votes were counted. The workmen and farmers in Ontario are all for public ownership when they are asked to pronounce upon local proposals of that kind. When the next election comes around the people will demand by their votes that we shall have a well-established system of public ownership. So far we have had to take the lean ends, the failures, and the roads that have been exploited by capitalists of all kinds. After the capitalists and contractors have made fortunes for themselves, and the public have spent immense sums of money, the people are compelled to come along to recover these roads and take them over.

What have we paid for this whole adventure in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific? Not less than half a million dollars—$500,000,000 has gone into this railway proposition extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Then, when we take it over, we will have to pay $25,000,000 a year, which means $5 for every man, woman and child in this country, notwithstanding what we have already spent on the road. It has not been organized, it is not serving the people, although the money has been paid out. Somebody has got a lot of money, but we have to pay for it. We not only had to pay for it the first time, but now we have to take it over and do the best we can. There must be no more of that kind of thing. If any one comes into this House while I am a member of it and tries to get the people's money paid out for the construction of a railway, which railway will sooner or later be dumped on the public to be taken care of by them, I am not going to vote for it. Nor will I ever vote for another dollar of public money for any privately-owned railway.

They talk about the public not being able to administer a railway. Was there ever such incompetency in the history of the world as that which has been disclosed by the record of the railways in the United States and Canada under the management of private companies? Nearly every one of these roads has become bankrupt? Nearly every one has gone through the profits, has failed, and the people who put their money into them have been looted and ruined by the so-called executives of these railways. The public have never been served. Competition never did anything for the public, but the money was spent. The exploiters had control. They did the contracting in one way and another, with the result that the roads have been wrecked. The net result on the American continent is that private ownership has wrecked the railway systems of United States and Canada, with the single exception of the Canadian Pacific.

My opinion is that the people of Canada have determined that there shall be no more exploitation of the public in this respect, and least of all are they prepared to take the advice of the hon. member for Pontiac, who says: Appoint another commission and allow this thing to continue; let us find out what we can do. The thing is to do something now.

Mr. CAHILL: The hon. gentleman is misquoting me. I said: Appoint a commission to manage the present Canadian National Railways instead of the Government managing them.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I know that the hon. gentleman is no advocate of the proposition before the Government. But, we have to deal with this question now. We cannot go out, get information and appoint a commission; we have to deal with the facts before us. Here is a great railway system in default. The Government and Parliament must deal with it, and the Government have come forward with a proposition. My only criticism is that they are not going far enough. When we are winding up the Grand Trunk Pacific is the time to wind up the old Grand Trunk. Perhaps that will come in a few days. That, I expect, will be the result of the provision which is being made now. I also agree with the hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) when he says it is up to the Grand Trunk to say something and do something now. The next move is theirs.

But in the meantime we are going to put an end to all this exploitation in connection with the old Grand Trunk Pacific. We will take it over if we have to. We will join it up with the Canadian Northern, and will take over the ragged ends. As I said before, if we take the Grand Trunk Pacific we want the old Grand Trunk, which, if joined up to the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Transcontinental and the other roads that we have taken over, will make a Canadian national system which can be linked together and co-ordinated, and all unnecessary trackage perhaps thrown out. If that is done a great saving can be made. When we begin to do things like that we will really have public ownership, and we will find people in this country who can administer railroads. The people of this country will stand no longer for an administration of the public railways being made a part of a political machine—the day for all that has gone by. They administer the railways in England without politics, and for the time the Government had them they did so in the United States under the administration of Mr. McAdoo. There was not much politics in connection with the administration of the railways there, and there will be no politics in the administration of the railays in this country: we will find the men who will administer our railways properly.

Mr. McKENZIE: How does the hon. member propose to have responsible government, and yet have the management of the railroads not responsible to Parliament?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I do not think there is much in that point. We will have the railways administered by public ownership, perhaps by commission. Parliament must take the responsibility, under our system of government, eventually, but that does not mean that there will be any interference with the men who are administering the railways. I will undertake to find people in this country—any one would undertake to do so—who can run these roads. What a pitiable situation it is to se in this country the railroads already in existence —the combinations that are in existence (and they are always conspiring); they want to see public ownership defeated. That great system, the Canadian Pacific, which has been a success, what is it doing to-day? It is doing its best to prevent the Government from getting hold of the Grand Trunk. It does not want to see a success made of a national system of railways, for it knows that is coming and that it will be here in a very short time.

I approve of this Act of the Government in dealing with the Grand Trunk Pacific, but I think it must be followed a little later on by taking over the Grand Trunk and consolidating it with the railroads we now have. I would be prepared now, and I believe the people of Canada largely would be prepared, to take over the Canadian Pacific and give it a reasonable arrangement whereby we would have one national system. We are a poor nation, Mr. Speaker, after what we have done from a national point of view—from the point of view of fighting, and one thing or another—if we cannot run our own railroads in the interest of the public. I hate to hear men in public life talking about putting the administration of our railroads into the hands of politicians. I propose to put them into the hands of Canadians, I propose to have them take the administration of the roads and make a success of it. It has been made a success in Australia, in New Zealand, all over the continent of Europe, and the British Government are doing it all over Africa. India has national railroads, France has national railroads, and there is not a country which is preparing to depart from that principle. They are all coming to it, and we are coming to it—we have arrived at it. Here in Canada the people are in favour of it, and I hope it will not be long before we have, not only the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the Grand Trunk proper, in our national railway system.

Now who is it that objects to taking over this Grand Trunk adventure, after the enormous expenditure in connection with it? You will always find there are three interests in connection with railroads. First of all there is the public that is served; then there are the people who have their money invested—the shareholders or the investors—and there are always another clever lot who have the executive power in their hands. And that comes home to the men in London who have been administering the Grand Trunk for a great many years. They do not care for the public, or for the shareholders; they have been exploiting the shares of the Grand Trunk in its various forms for fifty years in the London market; and they would like to keep that power as long as they can, they would like to dabble in Grand Trunk securities, and they would like to have the patronage and the handing out of the contracts in connection with the Grand Trunk. Therefore I do not take any stock in this objection to public ownership of railways that comes from the executive of the Grand Trunk. I would make this suggestion to the Government: If it wishes to make this campaign effective, the first thing it should do is get a list of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk and send them a copy of this debate, and let the shareholders of the Grand Trunk know what has been concealed from them, so far as I can gather—that is the actual commitments to which those shareholders have been pledged by this, so-called, executive in London. How many of them know what this country has already paid for that road—what we have paid on their account, and what commitments and obligations they have failed to perform? They do not know it. Instead of that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk in England have been told that in some way the people of Canada are robbers, that we are confiscating their property. All we have asked the company to do is to make good their undertakings. Why do they not make good their undertakings? We loaned them money, and the credit to build the Grand Trunk Pacific. The money has been spent and the roads are there, but the steel is rusting, and the farmers want the service which these railways should provide. Let us give them that service. Let us help to open Quebec and Northern Ontario with this great transcontinental system. How many millions were put into the Quebec bridge? Was it thirty millions? And the expenditure is not yet over. That is an adventure, that was not done by public ownership—that is an adventure of private ownership connected with politics. That has all got to stop. Now that we have paid the money and got these roads, we should tell these men who have made a mess of things to step down and out, and let the people run these railways.

Could there have been a worse mess than the Grand Trunk magnates in London have landed this great Grand Trunk Pacific railway into? I have heard what the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier said some time ago with respect to that scheme in which he took so much interest. I saw him introduce the project into this House, and I have followed it from its inception to the end. Apparently Sir Wilfrid put his faith in one individual, in Mr. Hays, for the carrying of it out, and when Mr. Hays died, Sir Wilfrid said it would have a bad effect on the fortunes and the future of the road. But whether that be so or not the fact remains that the people of Canada put half a billion of money into this one proposition. They put up the money, they signed the agreements, and yet these magnates in London, who made those solemn agreements, are dodging the responsibility, are trying to evade it—they want to leave the baby on the doorstep of the people of Canada. Now there is to be no more of that in connection with our railroads. We will take them over, we will try and run them, and we will put these railroads on their feet.

An hon. MEMBER: On wheels.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Very well, on wheels—and we will make them serve the people, but we want no more adjournment of the matter, and no opportunity given to the Grand Trunk to continue its plotting.

Now here is what is going on in Montreal largely: The great thing that I read in the papers there is that in some way we should not wreck this poor old Grand Trunk and we should not confiscate this property. While that argument is advanced, two things are going on: First, the Canadian Pacific has been trying for months to get control of the old Grand Trunk. I do not think anybody will deny that. The other thing that has been observed going on is that the Canadian Pacific would like to see delay in the nationalization of the railways, they would like to see it fail, and they would like to see Canada loaded up with the poor ends like the Canadian Northern, the Intercolonial, possibly, and the Transcontinental, which some people say goes through a wilderness. But now that we have paid this money, give us one good railroad in Ontario, where the main mileage of the old Grand Trunk is to be found, and let the people run it. If you do, it will be a success; it will help to carry the other roads along, and you will have a good national system of railways.

I have heard the grievances of the farmers in connection with the tariff. I have studied the tariff question, and I have studied also the transportation question. You can give real relief to the people of the West, you can settle up that part of our country, you can bring about lower freight rates, by the establishing of a national system of railways better than you can in any other way. And we must also own a national system of transportation on the sea; we are coming to that. Every time the railway commission get a reduction of freight rates for the farmers, the men who control our steamship services, especially the Englishmen, who have no special regard for this country, jump up the ocean transport charges. We do not get the benefit of reduced freight rates or of the money that we vote to secure railway competition. But when we have a national system of railways devoted to serving our people, opening up settlement and reducing the rates of transportation, our country will go ahead. If the member for Pontiac wants to see the back country in Quebec opened up, I suggest that he appeal to the Government to take over not only the Grand Trunk Pacific but the whole of the Grand Trunk system and run it as a great public service.

Railways are only one factor in our transportation problem. Associated with railways are our express and telegraph services; and we are also trying to build up a parcel post system. We should give our people national telegraphs and a national express system, combining cheap rates with good service. In the default of the Grand Trunk opportunity has come to us to get not only the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the old Grand Trunk line as well. Other countries can make a success of national ownership of railways; why not Canada? I am tired of hearing people say that in some way public ownership will be exploited by politicians and boodlers. We are running the post office fairly well; we are running a good many things fairly well. More and more the administration of these services must come into the hands of the people. If there is one thing that the new world is preaching to-day it is that a great many things must be owned and controlled by the people, not by individuals. In England they are taking over even the coal mines, because they are recognized as a national industry which can be best administered by the people. That idea is spreading all over the world as a result of the great war. It has got into the United States. You could not pry the railroads away from public ownership there; they are to have a period of three or five years in which to find out how the control of the numerous lines there can be consolidated. The farmers of the United States have declared for public ownership. The farmers of Canada are for public ownership, and particularly the farmers of the West. What they want to-day is action. I do not want to see any more delay in this matter; I am sick and tired of hearing pledges made—even since the Conservatives came into office—in connection with the public ownership of railways. The policy is always one of putting off or waiting a little, or taking the poor end of our railway systems. First we had the Transcontinental, where there were few settlers; then the Canadian Northern; now we have to have the Grand Trunk Pacific. But the Canadian Northern is a splendid asset. It will be three times the road it is now, when it has proper connection with the Grand Trunk in the East, where the traffic largely originates. The Government should act quickly in this matter. If the Grand Trunk must go into liquidation; if the Government must liquidate it, let them do so. The Grand Trunk Railway Company are in default. They have not kept their promises and pledges; they have taken our money and spent it right and left—whether wisely or not, I will not say at the moment. It is surprising to see the press of Ontario supporting a policy of: Do not hurry; let us wait; treat the poor shareholders of the Grand Trunk decently. We are treating them decently, but they must treat us decently in return. The Government proposes to give them $100,000,000, as I understand it, for the surrender of something that some have said is not worth anything. That is more than reasonable treatment, but it affords an opportunity of arriving at a settlement of this matter and giving public ownership a fair trial. I want to see public ownership tried out with the Canadian Northern and with the Grand Trunk. I want to see it tried out in Ontario and Quebec. If we decide to do this I should not be surprised to find the shareholders of the Grand Trunk, who I understand are to meet in London to-morrow, taking a more reasonable view. I hope somebody will tell these shareholders about the commitments that have been made in their behalf by those who have been directors of the road for fifty years. The old Grand Trunk did a good deal for our country, and I give them credit for it. The shareholders never got much return from their investment, but the reason was pointed out this afternoon—the fact that the management of the Grand Trunk Railway System has been over in England. Canada started to go ahead from the day that it was first governed by its own people at home; that was the beginning of Canada's progress. But we had to fight for our emancipation in that respect, and we are fighting for something much the same now in connection with our railroads. These people have been running this road from London for fifty years, and they have failed; they have "stuck" us for a lot of money. Now we propose home government, home administration of our own railways. We have the men in Canada who can run them, and they will succeed. But let us give them a chance. Let us, once and for all, stop dallying with these people, stop toying with them; let us bring them to time.

The Government is bringing one of them to time—the Grand Trunk Pacific. Let the Government bring the other one to time, and then we shall see what public ownership, given a fair opportunity, can do for the people of Canada towards the solution of their transportation problems in the way of building up the West, and most of all, of building up that great stretch of country comprising Northern Ontario and Quebec as far the Atlantic. I appeal to my hon. friends from Quebec to support this proposal and get that country, with its minerals and water-powers, settled and developed.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): I trust the members of the House will not begrudge me a certain satisfaction, in rising this evening, that the inexorable march of events has taken us not a few miles nearer the goal that I said must inevitably be Canada's, when I spoke of the railway situation in 1914. Those of the members of this House, who, at the time, were privileged to be members of the then House, will remember that I said that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would never be able to operate the National Transcontinental, because the cost of construction had been so excessive, that the Grand Trunk Pacific would swamp the Grand Trunk, and inevitably the Grand Trunk, the parent company, would become insolvent and the Canadian National, the Canadian Northern then, had been so constructed and so badly managed financially, that it was only a question of years before that railroad would have to be taken over by the Government. But, Sir, in a discussion of the problem that is now before the House, it is of little concern what I thought in 1914, because, in politics, events are not measured by prophecy, we must deal with conditions, and the problem that confronts us to-night is what is the best thing for Canada to do in face of the railway situation as it is in Canada in 1919 and not as it was in 1914.

As I hinted on rising, it gives me great satisfaction to say that I thoroughly approve the resolution submitted by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), and I think it will have the cordial and enthusiastic support of the people from one end of this country to the other. I was a little surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) this afternoon. I could hardly make out whether he was defending the Grand Trunk administration, or whether he was condemning it. I could hardly reach a conclusion as to whether or not he was in favour of Government ownership, or whether or not he was in favour of the ownership we have had in this country for some time. His defence of the Grand Trunk reminded me of a story that was told me by the manager of a company, the result of whose financial operations had not been satisfactory. On his going to a meeting of the shareholders, one of them proposed a vote of thanks to which he spoke in a very half-hearted way; and on being asked as to what treatment he had received, and intending to say that he had been damned by faint praise, the general manager said that he had been praised by faint damns, and that is about the position of the Grand Trunk Railway as defended by the hon. member for Pontiac.

It is the old wail we have had in reference to that railway since 1859 or 1860. If the hon. member for Pontiac is interested in railway legislation and railway progress in this country, let him read some of the old reports of the Grand Trunk Railway, and the pamphlets that were published in the early days as to the administration of that road in Canada. It began on the distinct understanding that it was to have a Government subsidy of £3,000 per mile, and Peto, Brassey and Betts undertook to construct the railway and find the necessary capital beyond that amount. They held out alluring schemes, of dividends of 10 to 12 per cent, but it took only a few years to demonstrate that their estimate had been excessive, and the Government were then called upon to advance a loan of $15,000,000, which has never been repaid to this country, not even interest.

In speaking this afternoon, the member for Pontiac said that little or no aid had ever been given by Canada to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. If I remember his figures correctly, he said that this country had not given to the Grand Trunk Railway Company more than $10,000,000, and I corrected him by saying that my remembrance was that much more than that amount had been given. If the hon. member will turn to page xvii in the Drayton-Acworth report he will find the following:—

Government Aid to Grand Trunk.

According to Government reports, the roads now comprised in the Grand Trunk Railway Company's undertaking have received aid as follows:

(1) Subsidies:
Dominion Government	$3,423,699
Provinces	4,077,233
Municipalities	5,502,128
Total	$13,003,060

(2) Loan:
The Dominion Government made to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, many years ago, a loan, interest on which has never been asked for or paid, amounting to..	$15,142,633
Total..	$28,145,693

That, I think, sufficiently refutes the position taken by the hon. member for Pontiac. Then he says: Who is responsible for the railway situation in Canada to-day? I do not know that it very much matters who is responsible. The railways in Canada, like the poor, we always have with us; but there is one thing perfectly certain, and that is that neither the Unionist party nor the Conservative party were in power in 1903, when the contract between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Dominion of Canada was made that led us into the difficulty in which we find ourselves. Nor were the Conservative party in power in 1911, when the Canadian Northern Railway system, by a subsidy granted by the then Minister of Railways, Hon. George P. Graham, was permitted to leave the Western Provinces and get an eastern connection, and to take the first step towards making what had been a local railway system into a transcontinental railway system. But I want to be just; I do not want to endeavour to place the responsibility altogether on hon. gentlemen opposite, because if they were responsible in 1903 and again in 1911, there is one thing quite sure, namely, that the Conservative Government of later years were, in my judgment, responsible when they permitted the Canadian Northern Railway system to be extended from Winnipeg to the coast, because it was a national crime to allow the parallelling of the Canadian Pacific from Kamloops to the Pacific coast along one side of the Fraser and Thompson rivers while the Canadian Pacific ran down the other side. But who were to blame? We were all to blame, because the people of Canada allowed themselves to be bribed with their own money. We were to blame because the people of Canada were led to believe that this railway expenditure and development were going to make good times, and the majority, or a great number of the people of Canada thought there was going to be something in it for them. The people allowed themselves to be bribed with their own money, and fate brought them to punishment, and we are paying to-day for our irregularity and our weakness of a few years ago.

The construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific brought great industrial activity in Canada; the recognition by the Government of 1911 of the right of the Canadian Northern to become a transcontinental railway brought further great development, and between them we had competition in expenditures. Wages rose and the cost of materials rose. Instead of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental being built at the estimated cost of those who had launched the schemes, prices were greatly enhanced. The original estimate of the National Transcontinental was about $61,000,000. The real cost was approximately $160,000,000, $99,000,000 over the estimate, or 150 per cent.

The Grand Trunk Railway engineers had the right to draw the specifications, they had the right to supervise and the right to inspect, and yet this country in the inauguration of a public-owned system of railways is burdened down with part of a national transcontinental railway at a cost of $99,000,000 beyond what it should have cost. Now, Sir, I have said that the inflation and the competition between the two railroads tremendously increased the cost, and the members of this House have a right to ask: "How does he know it? Why does he say it? Is it a fact? Can he prove it?" I think those are fair questions, and I want to prove it, not by any isolated fact that I might produce of my own knowledge, but out of the mouth of Mr. Chamberlin himself. There is one unfortunate thing when a man takes an oath and swears to tell the truth—that is, unfortunate, possibly, from his point of view when the evidence turns against him—and that is he has no reason to complain when the people believe him and have reason to suppose that what he said was a fact. What did Mr. Chamberlin of the Grand Trunk Railway Company say when he was giving evidence before the Drayton-Acworth-Smith Commission in Montreal on the 24th February, 1917, as to the cost of the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental? He said—Page 82:

> Mr. Chamberlin: In the first place, all our estimates were made on the basis of $1.50 for labour, $1.75 to make it safe. Labour is the principal part of the construction of a railway. The result was that with the other road working right alongside of us, especially west of Edmonton, we had to pay $3.50 a day right along, and even then the men would not work. If we tried to crowd them and make them work, they would simply climb over the fence, so to speak, and go to work for the Canadian Northern.
> Sir Henry Drayton: But your position would be no worse in that respect than that of the Canadian Northern.

Mr. Chamberlin: Not in that respect. Still, it tremendously increased the cost of the road. In addition to that, all material was increased in price. The Canadian Pacific Railway was constructing feverishly all the time to keep up with the other two. That increased the cost of material away beyond any expectations. There were also duties put on everything after that contract was made—

That is the contract for the construction of the two roads.

—such as $7 a ton on rails. So you see everything counted.

That simply goes to prove that the construction of those two roads at the one time created an inflation, increased prices, and made the cost infinitely more expensive than had originally been estimated

But the hon. member for Pontiac still seems to be willing to excuse the Grand Trunk. As I said, I want to be fair. I want to view this thing as if I were to an extent a shareholder in the Grand Trunk Railway Company. As a shareholder in the railroad I should feel myself estopped by the conduct of my management, and although I had made a loss I do not believe I should be justified in saying that what the management had done and what I as a shareholder had approved, I now had a right to claim to be freed from. When the Grand Trunk came to the Government of this country—I want to emphasize this point: the Government of the day, Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government, did not go to the Grand Trunk and ask them to build this railroad, but the Grand Trunk came to the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and endeavoured to enter into a contract to permit of the building of the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, because the Grand Trunk Railway wanted a western outlet, wanted a long haul and a western connection—when the Grand Trunk came to the Government they asked the Government only for a railroad from North Bay westward. That was a sound policy and probably if that arrangement as contemplated by the Grand Trunk had been adhered to, the difficulties we have had to contend with in this country might not have arisen. But the Government of the day—and I say it advisedly, because I think history will prove it, and certainly the facts will not disprove it—the Government of the day, and the members of the Parliament of that day, for political reasons insisted that the arrangement as contemplated should not be carried out, and they insisted on the construction of a railway away down through the northern part of this country and across the Maritime Provinces to Moncton. They loaded the Grand Trunk down with a load it could never hope to carry, but the Grand Trunk knew before they signed the contract what the contract was to be, and I do not see how it lies in the mouth of the Grand Trunk Railway to come to this country now and say that we are hard and unreasonable when we ask them to live up to the contract they made. And the Grand Trunk do admit that the contract they are asked to live up to is a contract that cannot be lived up to. You ask me why I do say this. I again turn to the sworn evidence of Mr. Chamberlin at Montreal—page 79. Mr. Chamberlin had been giving evidence as to why the Grand Trunk should not be asked to live up to its obligations, and after he had given his first reason Sir Henry Drayton said to him:

Sir Henry Drayton: Your second ground is that of impossibility?

Mr. Chamberlin: It is an impossibility.

Sir Henry Drayton: If it is impossible now, it was always impossible.

Mr. Chamberlin: It was always impossible.

In other words, the Grand Trunk Railway Company entered into a contract with the Government of this country which Mr. Chamberlin says was always impossible for that railroad to carry out.

What reason has the Grand Trunk Railway to come to us and ask to be relieved of its obligations? What reason has the Grand Trunk Railway to come to this country, which has done much more for the Grand Trunk Railway than we ever promised to do, and say: "You are treating us harshly. Relieve us from our obligations."

You listened this afternoon, Sir, to the very excellent summary of the Acting Prime Minister, and what did it show? It showed that the outstanding liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific to-day are approximately $200,000,000; that in 1909, beyond our original agreement, we gave them $10,000,000 of a guarantee, the Grand Trunk also joining in that guarantee; that in 1913 we gave to the Grand Trunk Pacific a guarantee of $15,000,000, the Grand Trunk also joining in the guarantee; that in 1914 we guaranteed $16,000,000 more, in which guarantee the Grand Trunk did not join; that in 1916 we gave $8,000,000 of a loan; in 1917 we gave $7,500,000 of a loan; in 1918 we gave $8,000,000 of a loan. In other words, Canada has given to this undertaking by way of loans and guarantees $63,500,000 more than this country ever promised to give, and we have paid out $99,000,000 more than we estimated for the construction of the Transcontinental. And yet people had the audacity to say to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway that we are confiscating their property, dealing unfairly with them, demanding our pound of flesh and repudiating our national obligations. The hon. member for Pontiac said this afternoon that this country was clubbing the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Clubbing the Grand Trunk Railway? It would be as reasonable for my gardener, if I caught him stealing my vegetables, robbing my fruit trees, taking my silver and forging my name to a cheque, and if I told him to go because I was getting another gardener to look after my interests—it would be as reasonable for him to say "You are clubbing me." This country has been singularly generous to the Grand Trunk Railway. I am not as tender with that corporation as the Acting Prime Minister would be. To my mind, an obligation entered into solemnly is an obligation to be respected. Confiscation? There has been no confiscation; there has been generosity. Let us see what Mr. Chamberlin says in regard to confiscation in his evidence given at Montreal:

> Sir Henry Drayton: You speak of confiscation in your letter Mr. Chamberlin. No person is thinking of confiscating the investment that I know of. If you can afford to carry it you will be allowed to carry it. That was not really meant, was it? Suppose you are left to yourselves the thing crashes, no one confiscates it. Isn't that right?
> Mr. Chamberlin: To a certain extent, yes.
> Sir Henry Drayton: To every extent, isn't it?
> Mr. Chamberlin: To every extent.

If the venture turns out to be a success the company shall have the cream of the undertaking; while if the undertaking turns out to be a failure, the country shall have the water. That is not my idea of confiscation. My idea of confiscation is that you do something by the passing of an Act that you have not a legal right to do; but you do not confiscate when you live up to the full purpose and intent of your obligation and more, and ask the other man to do the very thing that he should do under his agreement. As I said when I rose, I approve of the Order in Council. Why? For the reason that I have endeavoured to elucidate, that I believe that the rights of the people should be maintained and respected. If I were to give advice to the Government—it is not likely they would take it—I would say to the Government: "Just leave the Grand Trunk proper alone." If I were going to synopsize my advice in a very few words I would say, "Leave it alone, and it will come home, bringing its debts behind it." The Grand Trunk Railway to-day is hopelessly insolvent. There is no possible way, unless the Government comes to its aid, in which it can pull itself out of the position in which it now finds itself, and where it has got simply because the original management of a few years ago was short-sighted and did not show business acumen. But, Sir, I do not like the suggestion made by the Prime Minister to the Grand Trunk people in London last year. I do not like this idea of a 999-year lease. As you know, Sir, I am a government-ownership man, and have been a government-ownership man since 1914. I said in 1917 in this House, speaking on the railway situation:

> To give the House some idea of the progress Government ownership and operation of railroads has made, I might direct the attention of the House to the fact that in 1880 there were in the world only 10,000 miles of railways under Government operation and ownership, whereas at the present time there are 225,000 miles of railways under Government operation and ownership. Sweden, Germany, Italy—practically all—in all 55—the great countries of the world now own or operate their railroads. I would be wrong if I were to say that they all do, because I would leave out the two great countries of the world that have not yet adopted a policy of government ownership.

I went on to explain how Great Britain and the United States had not at that time adopted government ownership, but we have gone a long way since 1917. I remember in 1916 being in England at a luncheon given at Hadfield Works, when Sir John Hadfield, in replying to the toast of his company, rose and said he believed that if England were to hold her place in the industrial world after the conclusion of the war it was absolutely essential that Britain should own and operate her own roads, and have control of transportation. And Mr. Lloyd George, in addressing the people of England some time prior to the last election, emphatically stated that the Government policy was one of government ownership. The United States has also gone some way since 1917. The experiment there has not been perhaps just as successful as we might have desired it to be, but I think that a close student of American politics and affairs will reach the conclusion that possibly one of the reasons was that those who were in railway administrative control in the United States were not sympathetic with the desire to make government ownership a success.

With regard to arbitration—and that was another suggestion that the hon. Acting Prime Minister made to the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway—I must say that my faith in arbitration, if I may use a slang expression, got a bit of a jolt as a result of the Canadian Northern Railway award. The upset price, without any evidence apparently being adduced, was too close a guess at the award to just meet my approval as to its being accidental. I always had a feeling that possibly political and extraneous conditions were not altogether eliminated by the arbitrators but were treated as being something to be taken into consideration when one values a road as a going concern. I therefore do not look quite as favourably as I did in 1917 on the idea of taking over railways by arbitration.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, rather than lose the Grand Trunk, if we had to adopt it, I would be willing to consent to arbitration because I would like to have these railways taken off our national back as privately operated. I am not quite as tender towards capital as the Acting Prime Minister appears to be. I know that he is a gentle, sympathetic, courteous gentleman, but when he talks about that peremptory letter and you realize that the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company would have stopped operations and left the people of the western part of the country without railway connection probably in the hope that such a hue and cry would have been raised that pressure would have been brought on the Government to come to the aid of the Grand Trunk, I am at a loss to understand why he is quite so sympathetic toward the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk proper.

My experience has been that as a rule capital will take care of itself. I would care for capital in relation to the Grand Trunk with just the same tenderness as capital was prepared to take care of Canada when it was prepared to leave our western people without accommodation. Because I am just as satisfied—without being able to prove it as a fact—as that I stand on my feet in this House to-night, that the Grand Trunk people forgot the War Measures Act; and I am not criticising them therefor as being unskilful business men, because, unless one had had the privilege of reading the War Measures Act, no one in the world would have imagined that Parliament would give such powers to any government as we in 1914 gave to the Government of this country. Yet, I want to add that I am extremely glad that we did give them that power. That power has been well exercised by the Acting Prime Minister and the Government in the present case in being used for the purpose of taking over this road. The action which the Government have taken, I believe, will redound to the advantage of this country in the long run; because Canada must finance these roads and if to the Grand Trunk Pacific we can add the old Grand Trunk Railway we are going to have a great Government-owned system.

Some one may say: That is all very well but you are an enthusiast in regard to Government ownership and you see nothing but the bright side of the picture. He might say: Leave the Grand Trunk alone; take hold of the Grand Trunk Pacific but give the Grand Trunk a chance to work out its own destiny. Would that be a wise thing for Canada to do? The wise thing to do, if the Government is going to take over railways, is to take them over in such a way as to enable them best to work out the destinies of the country. Suppose we take over only the Grand Trunk Pacific, leave the old Grand Trunk under the control of its overseas management and let them work out a scheme. I say they could not do it. Their credit is not good enough to finance it. What Canada wants is to get the very best railway system that it can get, and Canada must take whatever steps are necessary to get that system. The reason I say that the Grand Trunk Railway cannot work out its system is this: I refer again to the Drayton-Acworth report which is a sort of railway bible, at present much endangered by higher criticism. At page xxxiii the commissioners say:

> Grand Trunk Maintenance Expenditure.
> Further, the Grand Trunk Railway has not been and is not being adequately maintained. No depreciation fund has been created for equipment. Mr. Chamberlin's view, as shown by his evidence, is that 5 per cent on the cost of equipment ought to be annually charged under this head.
> He says:—Take engines and cars, they are either worn out or out of date in twenty years.
> This item, according to his evidence, would have required an annual sum of $2,750,000. He also states:—"If we had $25,000,000 now, it would put us in fine shape."
>
> The Vice-President in charge of operations, Mr. Kelley, has direct responsibility for the plant. On Mr. Chamberlin's evidence being put to him, he agreed with it. He has since submitted to us a full report on the question of deferred expenditure. "Deferred expenditure" means, in plain English, expenditure which has not been made, but which, in the view of those charged with the duty of maintaining the plant, ought to have been made.
> We give below Mr. Kelley's summary in tabular form, but we do not think it necessary to reproduce all the supporting tables.
> Grand Trunk Railway System—Summary of Deferred Expenditures.

That must be met to cover the additional expenditure on maintenance account.

Grand Trunk Capital Expenditure Required.

The $21,000,000 dealt with above represent the money which the responsible officers of the company estimate to be required to put the existing plant into good normal condition. This is a revenue liability. But the existing plant is quite inadequate for existing traffic and requires large additions, for which new capital must be raised. The estimates of necessary capital exepnditure submitted to us are as follows:—

Requirements for rolling stock, shops and machinery..	$26,150,000
Requirements for automatic block signals (main line in Canada only)..	3,533,000
Requirements for installing rock ballast crushing plant..	467,500
Total..	$30,150,500

Putting together revenue and capital expenditure, we find that the Grand Trunk Railway, in the opinion of its own officers, requires over $51,000,000 spent upon it to put it into a position to meet the requirements of its to-day's business. We see no reason to expect that under existing conditions this necessary money will be provided.

Now, Sir, to put that into short metre, it means this: That we have given the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, by loans and guarantees, $63,000,000 more than we promised them. We have taken over the National Transcontinental, which stands this country at $161,000,000,—$99,000,000 more than it was estimated the National Transcontinental would cost,—and the Drayton and Acworth report says $50,000,000 is required to put the Grand Trunk Railway system in adequate operation and so maintain is as to give satisfactory service to Canada. And yet the member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) hesitated this afternoon in saying that the time had come when Canada should act, not only to save her credit, but also to secure an adequate railway system for this country. I do not believe that is the opinion of the people of Canada. If I can read aright the policies we hear enunciated from the Atlantic to the Pacific, it is that the time has come when Canada is to cease subsidizing railroads, that we are going to own what we pay for. If we have got to pay the costs in any event, then we are going to have the profits if there are profits. But just here, Sir, I would like pause to make one remark. I said if there are profits we are going to have the profits. But as a Government-ownership man I want to have a fair chance, I want unnecessary paralleling of lines eliminated, I want the whole of the system co-ordinated, and I do want the additional capital that has been absorbed by these undertakings through improper construction, fraudulent specifications, inadequate checking, and all that we summarize in the cost of irregular and irrelevant construction, eliminated from what I might call the capital charges against the venture. I do not want the Canadian national system of railroads loaded up with the interest on $100,000,000 of overhead charge through the unfortunate cost of construction of the National Transcontinental. I do not want the system loaded up with all the cost of paralleling lines that never should have been built. Government ownership in this country must get a fair show, and then it must stand or fall on its merits. But if it is to have a fair show, there must, as I said, be co-ordination of the various lines, there must be an elimination of waste in management, there must be the squeezing out of all the water represented by improper, and, as I said, irregular construction and flotation.

Somebody has said that you cannot have government operation and administration of railroads, because you cannot get men to run them honestly. I may be an idealist, I may look forward to Utopia, but in the eleven years I have been in public life there is one thing that I have learned, and that is that we are making a tremendous advance along the line of the willingness of big men to do public service. When the war broke out we saw men for an ideal go to the Front, willing to sacrifice their lives for $1.10 a day,—I was going to say, remuneration. No, they did not go to the Front to sacrifice their lives for $1.10 a day; they went to the Front moved by that enthusiasm which makes men realize that to die for one's country is sweet; and I believe, Sir, that the aftermath of this war will bring Canadians to realize that if it is dear and sweet for a man to die for his country, it is equally sweet for a man to live for his country. And I believe the time is coming, if the time is not already here, when great men may be had in Canada to run our national railway system. Not great business men, simply because they have succeeded in a business that is not a railroad, but great men who have mastered a railroad system, great men who understand railway operation, experts in railway administration. I may say, Sir, that I agree with the hon. member for Pontiac that the present system is a long way from being ideal. I would no more think of taking a grocer and asking him to run a dry goods store, than I would think of taking a man from managing a steel plant or running a cement works, and asking him to run a railroad. What I should like to see this country do is to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific—we have already the Intercolonial, Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern systems—take over the old Grand Trunk—because it is insolvent and cannot finance itself—press the water out of the system, get the best railway men that the country can produce; and if Canada cannot produce the men let us get them from England or the United States, but let us secure the very best men we can get. Let us have a railroad system owned by this country and operated by independent, courageous men, and let us demonstrate to the world that Canada can do, and successfully do, that which she determines to do well.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I would like to make one or two comments on the railway situation as it has developed out of the resolution before the House. First of all, I would congratulate the Acting Prime Minister and the Government on the resolute action they took when the Grand Trunk put them with their backs against the wall, so to speak, with their ultimatum that the Grand Trunk Pacific would stop operating at 1 a.m. on the 10th instant. Speaking in this House last Session I put on Hansard a set of figures with regard to the National Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, that so far have not either been contradicted or disproved. I pointed out at that time—I am not going to weary the House with the details, any one who wishes can find the figures on Hansard—that through the construction of the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific railways, for all of which the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada was either directly or contingently liable, and for all of which the people of Canada were either directly or contingently liable, $260,000,000 had gone into something that was not the construction of a railway. We are not going to get anywhere if we start in to throw bricks at each other as to who is responsible for that, but the fact remains that $260,000,000—not $100,000,000, as my hon. friend has told us on the National Transcontinental east of Winnipeg, but $120,000,000 on the National Transcontinental east of Winnipeg, and $130,000,000 on the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Winnipeg—went into something that was not the construction of railways. That was not due to any wrong estimate, or to any increase in the wages paid to workmen, or the cost of steel or anything else, but was deliberately applied to some other purpose. In support of that statement, take the construction of the Canadian Northern, which was carried on side by side with it, and you will find, by simply estimating, the value of the physical assets of each, that what I say is absolutely correct. Now the point is simply this: As has been emphasized—and I think it should be re-emphasized in order that the people of this country may not be misunderstood by those who have put their money into the Grand Trunk Railway Company, or by English or European investors who may have put or or may hereafter put their money into any industry in Canada—the Canadian people are not responsible for anything more than they did themselves on the National Transcontinental east of Winnipeg. Let me repeat again what I said in this House last year, that if the Canadian people are willing to assume the responsibility for what they themselves threw away east of Winnipeg, there is no logical reason why the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada should not be responsible for what their officers threw away on the construction west of Winnipeg.

I agree with the Acting Prime Minister that we should be reasonably generous, but I do not agree that we should be generous to the point that has been suggested. It is not a difficult matter to estimate the value of a railway. It is just as easy for a railway man to determine what a railway is worth as it is for a builder to determine what a building is worth. All you have to do is to measure the railway, take stock of its physical condition, the number of locomotives and cars of all descriptions it has, and you can determine its value without the least bit of trouble. Not what it cost. If you are going to build a house you are not going to ask the owner how much money he has sunk in schemes of architecture, but you will endeavour to find out what the value of the building is.

A railway is simply worth its mileage valuation, assuming that it was properly projected and reasonably constructed. And that is the situation with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway system. But, that we have to take it over and assume responsibility for it has become evident to everyone who has studied the railway situation ever since we became loaded up with the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Now that we are going to do it, as the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has said, let us do it in such a way that there will be reasonable probability of our making the thing a success. I said last year in this House—and I was questioned very pertinently from both sides in this regard—that we should squeeze the water out of the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the National Transcontinental. And somebody must squeeze $750,000,000 out of the capitalization, as given to us by the officers themselves, of the Grand Trunk Railway system. The figures may be found in the Drayton-Acworth report.

You will find in that report that the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, Mr. Chamberlin, was asked specifically by Sir Henry Drayton during the course of his examination why it was that during the number of years when, by his own statement, the railway was depreciating in value, a large sum of money had been paid out in dividends, and why that money had not been used to keep the rolling stock and locomotives, the general physical condition of the road, as it ought to be. In effect, Mr. Chamberlin's answer was this: We were contemplating going on the London market with a block of bonds in connection with putting in a further amount of capital, and in order to stabilize that market we wanted to have a good record in the payment of dividends; in other words, we wanted to pay to ourselves annually over a number of years money that should have gone into the road, in order that we might induce the public to think that this was a good investment and that they should buy our bonds. If any one of us did that, we would find ourselves behind prison bars within a very short time. But that is what the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada said his company did instead of putting the money into ties, rails, locomotives, cars, and everything else that was necessary to keep the road operating. However, we are faced, not with a theory, but with an actual situation. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have come to the point where they say they cannot carry their obligation any further and are going to stop operating the Grand Trunk Pacific. a part of their own system that they themselves brought into existence; and that we may take it or leave it, as we like. In the most direct way possible, the Government of Canada should take the Grand Trunk Railway system at their word, acquire the property, co-ordinate it as quickly as possible and get rid of all unnecessary lines. Certain lines of railway in Canada are built side by side with other lines. We might as well make up our minds to tear them up. I have heard people say: "Why, that piece of railway cost ten, fifteen, or twenty millions." Suppose it did; if we can get three or four millions out of the rails or make use of them somewhere else where they are really required, why should we continue to operate lines of railway where they never could earn anything and where the country through which they run is already amply served? I told the Minister of Railways in this House last year that I could show him where he could get $10,000,000 worth of steel rails that will never earn money enough to keep the rust off them; that run parallel with other lines which serve all the purposes for which a railway was ever designed. It looks like bad housekeeping on our part, but we went into these things with our eyes wide open, and we have to take our medicine. Whether it looks well or whether it does not, action will have to be taken if we are to co-ordinate this national system of railways and make it a complete success.

Some of the things that I have said in this House may have led hon. members to think that I am an out-and-out advocate of the public ownership of railways. In that respect I disagree with the two hon. members who have preceded me. If some one could show us a method by which we could get out of the tangle in which we find ourselves and get back into the position we were in fifteen or twenty years ago, I would hold up both hands for it. The only reason why I support the idea of taking over these lines and co-ordinating them into one national system is because I cannot see any other way out. It is a tremendous problem to take these railways and put them into such a condition that they can be successfully operated. Notwithstanding all that has been said with regard to the large number of men who can be found whose ideals of service will cause them to give their time efficiently and conscientiously to the public, and all that kind of thing, I submit that human nature is human nature and will continue to be so. So far as I can see, the one bright spot in the horizon is the presence in Canada of one complete, well-equipped and splendidly managed system of railways. The possibility of success lies in linking up all the other lines and operating them in competition with that efficient system, saying to the men whom we put in charge: Here is your line of railways capitalized at not a dollar more than the one you are competing with; your physical conditions are on the same plane; you can bring the mileage of the national railways up to exactly the same cost value as the Canadian Pacific railway by eliminating the results of wasteful expenditure; simply look upon the sums of which this country has been virtually robbed as money that we spent while on a spree, so to speak; and charge the railways up to what they should have cost, approximately $65,000 a mile, brought up to 100 per cent efficiency. If we do that, appoint a Board of Management of practical men and operate the national railways in competition with a system that is run on practical lines, there is, I believe, a possibility of success. Then, these railways, instead of being a continually recurring burden, will earn their own way and give the people what they are looking for—service.

The member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) referred to the success of Government ownership of railways in all parts of the world. If he will take the trouble to investigate he will find that in no country under the sun, except in the United States, is a ton of freight carried a mile as cheaply as it is in Canada. The Australian system of publicly-owned railways has been held up to the world as a model, but for twenty years it has cost two and a half times as much to move a ton of freight a mile on the railways in Australia as it has cost on Canadian railways. The effort made in the United States by the Government to co-ordinate all their railways has been referred to as a great success.

It was not so much of a success last year when boats were held up in the harbour of New York for ten days at a time, when the railways could not get coal in there for them. It was not even a success from the standpoint of operation. The very first thing the United States Government did when they undertook to co-ordinate the railways of that country was to do the very thing they had been refusing permission to the railway companies to do themselves. The United States had been developing a policy that made it utterly impossible for one railway to assist another in the movement of its traffic, it mattered not what the conditions were. But apart altogether from that, the operation of the United States railways in 1918, when one takes into consideration the excess freight rates and the deficit involved, cost about $1,250,000,000, and the co-relative effect of that is that every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada is paying, in the year 1919, $9 for freight and railway services more than they were paying before. We are, however, talking simply along theoretical lines. We might discuss this matter all night and we would never get the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific off the backs of the people of Canada. Our business is to put these railways in such a condition that they can operate successfully in competition with the best managed and best equipped railway under the sun to-day, namely the Canadian Pacific, the one railway system in the whole civilised world that never broke down during the whole period of the war through which we have passed. Had it not been for the service which that railway company, privately owned and managed, rendered, this country would not have been able to do the big things we did in this great war.

May I repeat: We should get a Board of Management—I do not care what you call it; I do not like the present arrangement in connection with the Canadian National railways. I do not like the name. Instead of making the Canadian Northern a part of the Canadian National railways, we have made the Canadian National railways a part of the Canadian Northern. I would call the system the National Railways of Canada. I do not like the Canadian Northern mixed up in it at all. Do not misunderstand me in connection with that. When the Canadian people got the Canadian Northern at the valuation at which they got it, they got the cheapest railway ever built on the North American continent, mile for mile and dollar for dollar. The Canadian people can spend $190,000,000 on the Canadian Northern, on improvement of the roadbed, construction of terminals, purchase of rolling stock and all the things that go to make up a standard railway, and they will have it on the same valuation as the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it the valuation of the Drayton-Acworth report?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I do not know anything about the valuation of the Drayton-Acworth report. I am speaking about the value of the railway. Take the railway as it is; you can spend $190,000,000 on it and my hon. friend, if he will look up Hansard of last year, will find that there is a margin of $50,000,000 for contingencies over and above the estimate required to bring that railway up to 100 per cent efficiency, which $50,000,000 we may never have to spend. If we do spend it, we shall have $190,000,000 over and above what was paid for the railway, every dollar of which is to link that up with the other system, co-ordinating them properly, eliminating the waste mileage and putting them under proper management. In that way we shall be able to complete the system and give the people the service for which they are asking.

Let me say this final word to the Government: Get busy and do this just as quickly as you can. There is no problem facing the people of this country in a physical sense that is so vital as the railway problem. We got into it with our eyes open; now let us get out of it. The country will be able to carry the burden and the railway will give us good service.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): The debate this afternoon has developed the idea that it is the policy of the Government to have public ownership of the railways as soon as possible. The Acting Prime Minister, in presenting his case so well as he is able to present it, made the admission that negotiations for the ownership of the Grand Trunk Railway, not the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, were started by the Government in a communication to Mr. Smithers. It is, therefore, quite apparent that the Government, having acquired the Canadian Northern Railway, which turns out unprofitable, now find it necessary to acquire the old Grand Trunk Railway in an effort to make the Canadian Northern pay. I take it that the Government are not unanimous upon this question. No later than last summer, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), speaking before the Canadian Club in Montreal, left the impression with the business men of that city, that the Government were not favourable to public ownership. It seems to me that the House and the country are entitled to some better reason than has been presented this afternoon as to why this change of policy occurred. The Minister of Public Works comes from a province where the people have had many years' experience of Government-owned and operated railways, and his statement of the case was that Government ownership was disastrous to the country. We all know that the Maritime Provinces have suffered from Government ownership. Those rich provinces have not been developed as they should have been developed had they had the advantage of private capital and private enterprise pushing out its branch lines here and there where they would bring traffic to the main line. I feel that the policy of this Government in rushing into public ownership will have the same disastrous effect upon the great prairie provinces as the ownership and operation of the Intercolonial railway has had upon the Maritime Provinces.

I notice also that the Government have changed their ideas as to the powers that they have under the Order in Council passed under the War Measures Act. I have in mind that in 1917, on a trade measure, the reciprocity in wheat, hon. gentlemen who are now members of the Government criticised that Order in Council, claiming that it was illegal, and stating that when peace came the Order in Council would cease to have effect. Those gentlemen are now members of the Government, and apparently they have convinced the Minister of Finance—who was then certain that under the War Measures Act he had all the powers necessary to enact the reciprocity measure, and that the same authority that enabled him to pass the Order in Council, made it law just the same as an Act of Parliament—that his views were wrong, because he now comes before Parliament to ratify this Order in Council.

The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who has argued in favour of public ownership, has told us that if we cannot find in Canada men capable of making Government ownership of railways profitable, we shall go down to the United States. The hon. gentleman, who is a student, has surely not forgotten the experience of the United States during the past year. That experience was pointed out by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) who made his speech against public ownership, but wound up by declaring himself in favour of it. Government railway operation in the United States has been disastrous to the people of that country. The whole system broke down last year in the transportation of coal. It has cost the people, as was pointed out by the hon. member for East Algoma, $150,000,000 of a deficit in operation, notwithstanding the freight rates which cost the people of that country almost $1,000,000,000. Therefore, the Government should go very carefully in their policy of Government ownership. It may be that Government ownership suits a certain section of this country, but the issues are clean cut. It is not a question of taking over the Grand Trunk Pacific; it is a question of gradually approaching the nationalization of railways. If I stand alone upon this question—and it is not a party question on this side of the House— I am opposed to public ownership and operation of railways, because I believe it is not the best thing for this country.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): As one who has taken a great deal of interest in the railway situation and transportation generally, I followed very closely the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) in his admirable speech this afternoon when he laid this matter before us and showed us exactly the position of affairs. It is certainly one that causes every thinking man to use the best powers he has to decide what it is best in the interest of this country to do at the present time. I have had the pleasure of hearing only two hon. gentlemen opposite express their views, and neither of them has made it at all clear to me what they would do in the situation. Our good friend, the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), who is an excellent business man, has not told us what he proposes to do with regard to the Grand Trunk's failure to meet its obligations. The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) tells us that if this action was to be taken at all, it should have been taken long ago. He tells us that when the Grand Trunk failed to take over the Transcontinental and carry out the arangements, then was the time for the Government to step in, and I am rather inclined to think that is the best remark and the best criticism he made. The Government would, at that moment, have been justified in stepping in and telling the Grand Trunk management straight: You are under an obligation from which you cannot be relieved, and unless you live up to it we propose to take over the road and your shareholders will suffer accordingly. That is business. It may be hard-hearted, but in order to be just to the people of this country we sometimes have to be a little hard-hearted. And I am not sure if the Acting Prime Minister has not a little more tenderness of heart than he ought to have towards the Grand Trunk, which we all love so much.

I remember very well hearing about the Grand Trunk since I was a child. I think it came into existence about the time I was born—I trust hon. members will not look up the date, or they will know how old I am. It is an object of affection to me. The Grand Trunk has done a great deal for Canada. I am only sorry that the company has run its head into a noose with its eyes wide open and finds that it cannot now get out, and this country cannot afford to let it out. The hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean), I think said that we were going to get hold of a going concern. I think we may go further and say that we are going to get hold of a coming concern, by the look of it. I cannot see that anything else is possible. The Grand Trunk have undertaken obligations amounting to $125,000,000 or $150,000,000 with their eyes wide open. They have induced this country to put in two or three hunderd million dollars that never should have been put in. Do not say that I am a prophet after the event. I opposed that with all my might in 1903 and 1904. I fought it to a finish in that election and finally won out on that issue alone, namely, that it was a monstrous burden to put on the shoulders of the people of Canada. I said that it was a gigantic white elephant that would eat hay day and night if we are not careful, and that is what has happened since then. In the first place, the railway was built far in advance of its time. Everybody knows that Canada cannot reasonably support three transcontinental railways. I do not think it is possible to make them pay; and even if the suggestion of my good friend the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) were carried out and the capital were reduced to one-half, I doubt if it could be made a success on that basis, because it is far in advance of its time and it may not pay even for the running. But the Government was forced to take action. The Grand Trunk gave notice that on a certain date they would cease operations. What would one do in such a case? Several thousands of miles of railway are going to come to a standstill and hundreds of millions of dollars of the people's money are invested in them. Are you going to allow that road to cease operation? Are you going to allow all the freight to be thrown out and the passengers to go afoot? Such a condition of affairs could not be thought of. This Government was forced to take action. I find fault with my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) that he did not tell the Government what they ought to do. One gentleman says that the Government did not take action early enough; the other one apparently is blaming the Government for taking the action now. In my judgment the Government should have taken action in the first place. That was business. But the Government wanted to be lenient, and it often happens that leniency is interpreted into one's being a dead easy mark. That is apparently what the Grand Trunk thought. They thought that this Government was a dead easy mark, and that as they had unloaded 1,000 miles of comparatively worthless railway on to them, it would be just as easy to unload 1,500 or 2,000 miles in the same way and slip from their obligations, and apparently forget all about it, because, in a letter which the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) read this afternoon, the Grand Trunk Railway forget altogether that their name is on this paper. They are calmly oblivious of the fact that they have obligated themselves to pay to this country, in round figures, $125,000,000 to $150,000,000. I, for one, am not at all disposed to let the Grand Trunk out. I agree that they helped this country at a time when it sorely needed assistance; but they, as a corporation, have undertaken obligations that they now, in an honourable way, as business men, are called upon to carry out. Unfortunately the shareholders are over the water, and, as too often happens, they may think, because they do not know the facts, that we are acting unjustly. I think this country has been most remarkably lenient with the Grand Trunk. We have delayed too long. I am only sorry that the action has to be taken now when the tremendous financial burdens of the war are confronting the Minister of Finance. I am sorry for him and for the country. I am, in a large measure, in favour of the nationalization of railways; and in spite of the fact that it has not paid in some countries, I believe they may be made to pay in Canada. I am sorry, however, that this Grand Trunk question has come up at this moment when we are submerged by financial obligations in other directions. But it had to be faced because the wheels of commerce were slowing, and this Government has, I think, at last taken heroic steps to meet the situation.

I do not know whether they have fully observed one fact, and I want to call special attention of the minister to it, namely, that the Grand Trunk, which may possibly come into our hands sooner or later, has a large mileage in the United States. Both its eastern and its western terminals are in the United States, beginning at Chicago and ending at Portland, Maine. I do not know whether the Dominion Government is competent to run railways in the United States. Probably the Government has looked into the matter. I have not heard the minister make a statement in reference to the question, but it is one that is worth while looking into. Will the United States allow the Canadian Government to run railways within their borders just the same as they would a private corporation, or will the Canadian Government be under some special obligation that a private corporation would not be under? Is it necessary to take out special charters under which those lines may be operated? There is also the question of the Port at Portland and the terminals at Chicago which have to be dealt with. I think that is a very important matter and that it must not be overlooked in the taking over of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. NICKLE: There are branches of the Canadian Northern in the United States.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not think there are many branches there. There are thirty or forty miles of road running through the corner of Minnesota, but it is a very different proposition from the Grand Trunk.

Mr. McMASTER: It is the same principle.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That may be, but our Government was not running the Transcontinental until very recently: I do not know whether they have struck any snags with regard to it. I am pointing out that I did not hear the minister say anything with regard to that phase, and I hope the matter has not been overlooked because it is of great importance. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has given us some very interesting figures, as he did last year. He is a new member, but I think he has put on Hansard the best exposition of the railway situation given by any man in the House, bar none. I am not speaking of his speech to-night so much as the one he made a year ago in this House. I have perused it often and he certainly put on Hansard an enormous amount of material. I do not know whether he prepared them all himself, but if he did he is certainly an encyclopedia on figures. Be that as it may, as he stated to-night, the figures have stood the test of time. I have not heard a single hon. member endeavour to prove incorrect the figures he gave. His speech last year was very valuable, and if any hon. member has not read it and desires to be seized of the railway situation in Canada, he could not do better than read that speech because it hits the situation off admirably.

One point I have not heard mentioned, to-night is the earning powers of the railways per mile and I think that is important. I see by page xii of the Drayton-Acworth report that the old Grand Trunk is earning more per mile than any other road in Canada, its earnings being $10,983 per mile. That is a very respectable earning, but unfortunately, as so often happens, there is something else to be taken into account which makes the road one of the poorest paying railways, instead of one of the better paying railways, and that information is given on the bottom of the same page. It shows that the Canadian Pacific cost in round numbers $68,000 per mile, the Canadian Northern $44,000 per mile, and the old Grand Trunk $127,000 per mile. The Grand Trunk was built in pre-war times when everything was supposed to be mighty cheap, and yet it cost more than double either of the other roads.

Mr. McMASTER: They must have charged a large amount to capital which should have been charged to maintenance.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not think so. I think their maintenance is in rather poor shape. What I believe is that the directors, living in the Old Country, did not have their eye upon the road when it was building, and some contractors got rich while the railway got poor. I think that is a far more likely explanation. The Grand Trunk has always been a poor-paying enterprise and has never yielded a commensurate return to its shareholders on the money invested. In the final analysis the return on the investment is what justifies, or otherwise, the existence of a road. The Grand Trunk has not paid, and now the time has come when we must face the situation. The hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon said the Government had been forced to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific in order to make the Canadian Northern pay. How on earth he could make a statement of that kind in the face of what has happened, I cannot imagine. The hon. member is certainly a business man, and has been plainly told that notice was served on the Government that the railway would not run beyond a certain date. If we are losing money on every mile, how on earth he expects we will make the Canadian Northern pay by taking over the Grand Trunk passes my comprehension. That certainly would be one way of getting all the railways of Canada; the more miles we have the more money we shall lose, according to him. I believe the railways of Canada can be made to pay, but I agree with the hon. member for Kingston that we want the right kind of men to run them. It is early in the day yet, and I do not want to criticise anybody, because I have a lot of friends on that board—indeed I hope they are all my friends—but I am not sure that we have got the right kind of men. However, I did not have anything to do with the appointing of them, and I do not suppose I shall have anything to do with the dismissing of them, but I think perhaps in some cases better men could be got. I am told that it is the policy to have on the board a representative of each province of Canada. I do not think that is wise. If we can get the railwaymen, in the city of Ottawa five or seven men, right here who will prove to the satisfaction of the Civil Service Commission—that they can make all these railways pay, I would say, give them a chance, because I want to see the thing done. It is true it has not been done in other countries. It may be that our passenger and freight rates will have to be revised. I think freight rates have been too cheap in Canada, although shippers who are paying a large amount each year in freight will not think so. But the fact remains that under existing operating conditions, even with the advance in freight rates that has been granted, the railways do not pay. That being the case, I say that we should be ready to pay a little higher passenger and freight rates per mile, because we must put the railways of Canada on a paying basis.

Nationalization of railways is not a new thing. It is being carried on in almost every enlightened country in the world. It is true the United States did not make a great success of it during the war, but notwithstanding that, although I am not a great admirer of the United States in many respects—I see the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) shaking his head; I am only telling him the truth—I am a great admirer of the United States in some other respects. I believe they are among the smartest railway people in the world, if not actually the smartest. I believe railway enterprise has reached its greatest height in the United States. I am an admirer of British enterprise, but so far as railways are concerned, I think the Americans have trimmed the British out of their boots. In the first place, they can build a railway in the United States three times as fast as they can in Britain, and for about one-third the price.

Mr. McMASTER: They have not so many hills in the United States.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: They have a good many mountains. They cross the Rockies, and they are pretty hard to cross. They do things in the United States on a quicker basis. That was well illustrated during the war. I remember the Prime Minister of Canada (Sir Robert Borden) telling a story in the House with regard to what Canada had done in the building of railways at the front. When he came back from the front two years ago he said that after Vimy Ridge was taken a certain piece of railway had to be built. The British railway experts were asked to look over the ground and say how long it would take them to do the work, as it was wanted in a great hurry. They said it would take six weeks to build that road. The British generals shook their heads and said "That is no use to us. We must have something better than that." And some one told them to get Captain Jack Stewart. He was sent for, and came and looked over the ground and said: "Give me two battalions of railway construction men and I will build the road for you in a week." They took him on, and what did he do? He had the road all built in four days. That is on Hansard, and was put there by the first Minister of Canada. Therefore I say that we know how to railroad in both Canada and the United States. We know how to build; we can build as quickly and as cheaply as any nation in the world. I am firmly convinced of that. We have the class of men that can do it, but we must secure them. I am not sure that we have all that we should have in the Commission to run all the railroads the Government purposes taking over, but I think the Government are well advised in taking this step; and if they are to be criticised they are to be criticised for being slow, not for being too fast. They have been long-suffering with the Grand Trunk. In my judgment these people have been defaulters for the past two years. It is a strong term to use, but the moment they said that they did not propose to carry out their agreement with regard to the Transcontinental, I think they broke their agreement absolutely, and every business man, I believe, will say so. This is the second time, and apparently they thought their bluff would work. Fortunately the War Measures Act was there. I think it is the salvation of the whole situation. I do not think the Grand Trunk expected what has happened, but they are up against it, and we have to see it through, and that money has to be raised to do it. As I said, I am sorry it has come at this time, but, I, for one, am willing to support the Finance Minister in this matter, and I think we can be defended in the country, and that the people of Canada, once they realize its absolute necessity, will say, "The Government has done wisely. Go ahead and win out and we are with you," and will help all we can to make the great national enterprise of Canada in the railway business that success that I feel sure it ought to be, and can be, if managed properly by the right men.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince): I want to say a few words along some new lines. I really consider that the action that the Government has taken, and has been taking, in this matter involves some of the most serious questions that to-day confront Canada —questions far more serious than repatriation, remobilization or reconstruction. Far more serious than any of these things is the present railway situation in Canada. I desire to draw your attention to the fact that the Canadian Government railroads have adopted the McAdoo scale of wages and time limit, with the result that some of the conductors on the railroads to-day are getting $5,000 a year, and the highest-paid workers in all Canada to-day are the railroad employees. The railroad runs from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with hundreds of thousands of employees, all of whom are bound together in one solid brotherhood; and when you adopt a rate of wages borrowed from a politician in the United States who is looking for the Presidential nomination, and give that rate to our railway employees, is it not obvious that you have produced, not a military despotism but a railroad despotism which will be a chain around the neck of fair Canada and will drag her to her grave unless you are extremely careful? How will you lower the wages of these men? They are linked together in one great brotherhood, and can hold up the whole railway system and can make any government get down on its knees within half an hour. It seems to me it must follow that all wages must go up proportionately, and I think the high cost of living will have to be maintained on that basis, because these things follow one another from mathematical necessity; and so long as that condition of things obtains, just so long will the high cost of living continue. The cost of transportation has doubled, and in some cases more than doubled. That may be very well in war time but how is it to be remedied in peace time when you have produced such a purely artificial condition of things? As I said last session, I am personally in favour of government ownership of railroads provided they can be managed the same as private corporations. The question whether government ownership is good or bad all depends on the management, and that is one of the most serious problems in connection with the ownership of railroads. Indeed, I think it is the most serious question before the country to-day. We have suffered very much from our government railroad system in the province of Prince Edward Island. Our province has sold itself body and soul; it has sold its birthright for a mess of pottage, a narrow-gauge railroad, as crooked as a ram's horn. However, that does not enter into this question. The whole question is, how are you going to overcome the difficulties confronting this Government, or any other government, with regard to the adoption of the McAdoo scale of wages? A man who is representing a constituency through which a railroad under this system runs, should he dare open his mouth,—as I am doing to-night,—and call the attention of the public to the danger of the situation, is apt to be roughly handled by these railroad employees when he goes to the country again. It is only one man in a thousand who will dare open his mouth if the railroad goes through his constituency. However, I have a public duty to perform, and I do not care very much whether I come back or not. If I have to run, I will take my chance and will "hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may."

Mr. NESBITT: I do not know anything about the legal aspect of the question, but I do not see how the Government could do anything else, from a business standpoint, than pass the resolution. Whether, from a legal standpoint we are in a good position or not, I am not prepared to say. As a matter of fact, the Grand Trunk, I understand, did not default. Therefore, that puts them, I should think, in a better position than otherwise they would be in. As to the future of the Grand Trunk, the only question, to my mind, is whether it would be cheaper and better in the interests of the country, owing to the position in which the Grand Trunk finds itself, to make a contract with them to deliver freight to our Transcontinental road on a certain basis, or whether it would be cheaper for us to operate the road ourselves. These lines run all through the northern, central and southern parts of Ontario. They are able to feed the transcontinental railways whether they be the Canadian Pacific or the Government Railway, and give them very good service. Many of these branches of the Grand Trunk are not paying, and cannot be made to pay within any man's lifetime. Whether it would be wise for us to operate these roads in face of the fact that they cannot be made to pay, or whether it would be better for us, now that we are in possession of the Grand Trunk Pacific, to make a traffic arrangement whereby they should deliver freight to us for the long haul, is a question for this House to decide.

The legislation does not propose to take over the old Grand Trunk. It proposes to take over and operate the Grand Trunk Pacific. I do not see, from a business standpoint, what else the Government can do. My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) spoke about the cost of the Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk cost more than any other railway because it was built through the Canadian wilderness. They had to carry their supplies at an enormous cost by ox teams and other means of transportation. The old Great Western Railway, now part of the Grand Trunk, had to be chopped through the country that it traversed. I do not wonder that it cost more than it would in modern times because in modern times in building railways you have the benefit of the railways in existence, to a certain extent, to haul your supplies.

With reference to the Canadian National Railways, it is absurd to have so many men on the directorate, and it is equally absurd to appoint men who know nothing about railways, no matter what their other business experience has been. My experience has taught me that if you have been brought up in a certain line of business and you go into another line of business you know nothing about, and invest in it, you are liable to lose your money. There is nobody who is capable of doing everything, and the man who makes a success in one line of business, whether it be farming, manufacturing, or merchandising, deserves success because competition is very keen. Why you appoint men as directors of these roads who know nothing about railroading is more than I can comprehend. It is not what the late Government promised us when the Canadian Northern Railway was taken over. I think the directorate of the Government road should be dependent upon Parliament itself. The directors should be chosen regardless of price from amongst capable railway men who know their business. If the Government own the railways, if they cut out all duplications, especially duplications of terminals, and run them from a practical business standpoint, there is no reason on earth why the transportation system of this country should not be made to pay.

With reference to the statement that the government operation of railways in England has been made to pay, we read in the paper the other day that it had not paid during the war. Yet the railways in England were conducted on the very best possible basis. They appointed the managers of all the great railways in England to operate them during the war. We know that the German system of railways paid but they paid much lower wages and they charged twice as much for transportation. Some person said to-night that we had in Canada cheaper transportation than any country in the world except the United States. And he might as well have said, "including the United States."

In so far as the operation of the railways by the Government of the United States is concerned, anybody who has travelled since the taking over of the railways in the last two or three years knows that the accommodation given to the public is nothing like it was before. The inconvenience to the public is disgraceful on many of the roads in the United States. There never was such a glut in freight. I do not blame them for that because it was an exceptional time, the weather was very severe and there were some things that went against them. But the United States Congress voted a revolving credit of $500,000,000 and recently they asked for another $750,000,000 revolving credit. They did not get it. They owe in rentals on the properties taken over something in the neighbourhood of $700,000,000. That would not, in my judgment, be an argument against the Government operation of railways in the United States. Had they been operated by a man who understood the business there might have been a better showing. No matter how good a Secretary of the Treasury Mr. MacAdoo may be, he did not know anything about the operation of railways. He thought he did. He is just another of those men in this world who think they know something about everything and who try to make a success of some business other than their own but end up by making a failure. It all comes back to the same principle; if we are going to operate railways, we must operate them on business principles and we must have men who understand their business practically regardless of price. If we do not follow that plan we will not make a success of them. The reason I got up was to suggest that we might find it cheaper, in place of taking over the old Grand Trunk, to make a running arrangement with them, whereby they would feed our railways, and do it cheaper than we could feed them ourselves.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Chairman, I have heard hon. members on the other side of the House say that no practical proposition or plan had been suggested on this side of the House as to what should be done. I will take the liberty of giving my humble opinion to the Government as to the policy that should be pursued.

Now, I am considering this as a mere business proposition, and regarding the Grand Trunk Railway proper, and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway as individuals who have contracts with the Government. Here we find three parties to a contract or obligation. One party is the Grand Trunk proper. The Grand Trunk proper has assumed the responsibility of running the Grand Trunk Pacific according to a contract, or a lease which has been referred to and sufficiently explained. Suddenly the Grand Trunk Railway fails to fulfill its obligations, and serves a notice to that effect upon the Government, just as a man who signs a note at the bank advises the institution three days before the note matures that on the date fixed for its payment he will be unable to meet the obligation. Under the circumstances the bank would be justified in taking all necessary means to protect its interests, and this is what the Government has been doing in the present situation. Because the interest of the Government in this matter is twofold. One is the general interest of the country;—the Government owes it to the country to see that these roads continue to run, because that is absolutely necessary; the soundness of this everyone will admit. The other interest which the Government has in this matter is a pecuniary one, because it has endorsed the notes of the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific Railways. One of the parties serves notice upon the Government that he is not going to fulfill his part of the agreement, and at once the Government take advantage of the War Measures Act and puts this railroad into the hands of a receiver. To my mind, there was nothing else it could do. However, this is not a solution of the problem, and all that we have heard so far has been a plea on the part of the Acting Prime Minister that the Government acted properly in placing this road in a receiver's hands. For the time being, I quite understand, the Government had to face a situation which could not be delayed, a situation of urgency, and it took control of the railway. So far I am satisfied with the stand that the Government has taken. But what is it going to do with the railway, now that it is in possession of it? I have one suggestion to make. In my opinion the Government should go direct to the Grand Trunk Railway Company and tell it: We will give you so much time to fulfill your obligations; if you do not do so, if you have a white elephant on your hands, you need not expect that the Government will relieve you of it; if you entered into a bad business proposition, that is no reason why the Government should relieve you of the responsibility; the Grand Trunk Railway Company has got to discharge its obligations and should be called upon to do so; if it does not do so then it must assume the responsibility and will be held strictly accountable for it.

Now, there is a way of doing that. The Government has a mortgage on the Grand Trunk Railway properties for the money which the Grand Trunk owes to it. Very well, the Government will act in the same way as an individual does towards another person who owes him money and does not pay it. The Government will take control of the road and then it will have the two railways, and it will be a bad proposition for it because the Government cannot make money out of operating railroads. It may be a bad proposition for the time being, and this leads me to the point which was argued at length by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), viz: Is it a good or a bad policy for the Government to own and administer railroads? I do not think it is a good proposition for any Government to own railroads when it can avoid doing so. If it cannot avoid it, but is forced to assume the ownership and operation, it must continue to administer and own them until it can dispose of them. If, later on, it transpires that the Government, in some way or another, can dispose of these roads, then so much the better for the country, because I do not think that that Government will ever make any money out of Government ownership of these railways. If the Government cannot avoid doing otherwise, it is better for it to take hold of the Grand Trunk Railway now, than to assume control of that railway in one or two years. It would have been better for the Government not to have loaned money, not to have guaranteed the loans of the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, as it has been doing for the last three or four years, or perhaps longer. When the Government found out a year ago, or two or three years ago, that these railways could not be successfully operated, and that it was only a question of time before they would pass into the receiver's hands, I think it should have taken the pill then and saved the money which has been expended in the period which has elapsed since that time. Every one admits, I believe, that the Grand Trunk Railway will never be able to meet its obligations. If the Government is now convinced that it will not be able to do so, then it should take control of the Grand Trunk as well as the Grand Trunk Pacific; it will lose less money by taking control of the road now than it will do in a few years from now.

The Acting Prime Minister told us this afternoon that the Government wanted to be lenient towards the Grand Trunk, and not exact what he called "the pound of flesh." I do not think that is proper. This is a business proposition, and the Acting Prime Minister, no more than any one else in the Government, has any right to give up one dollar of the people's money. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company owes money to this country it should pay every dollar of it. That is my contention. The Government and the country is sufficiently in need of money to warrant the collection of every cent that is owing to Canada.

At any rate what are we going to do now? The Government has a deficit of $100,000,000 a year, taking the financial situation as it now stands. We have to tax the people of this country in order to meet our obligations by means of an Income Tax, which is equivalent to taking money out of the people's pockets directly. However, no one will blame the Government for doing so because it is an unavoidable procedure. We are not in a position to give anybody a present. It is the duty of the Government to force the Grand Trunk to fulfil its obligations to the letter. If the Grand Grand Trunk cannot fulfil its obligations, then let the Government take possession of the system and do now what will be even more difficult to do a year or two hence if this matter is delayed.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): On February 28, 1919, the Prime Minister was informed that the Grand Trunk Railway Company did not intend to carry on the operations of the Grand Trunk Pacific after the tenth of March. There must have been some previous conversations or correspondence between the officials of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government, and before the Government is compelled to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system without giving the matter further consideration, I think the Acting Prime Minister should tell us, if he is in a position to do so, what conversations took place and what correspondence was exchanged between the officials of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I placed that information on Hansard the other day when I made my statement to the House respecting the passing of the Order in Council.

Mr. VIEN: What has been placed on Hansard is not exactly what I want. The letter which my hon. friend read must have followed correspondence, or at least conversations, between representatives of the Government and officials of the company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understood my hon. friend to refer to the letter of March 4, in which the Government was notified by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company that, in view of the fact that the increased rates applicable to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway had not been sufficient to meet the increased operating expenses, it would not be possible for the company to continue its operations when the present funds had been exhausted, which would be about the 10th instant. There had been no conversations relating to the cessation of operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and in my cable to Mr. Smithers, which I presented to the House, I stated that this notification was of a peremptory character, without previous intimation or discussion. To show my hon. friend that there would have been no use in attempting negotiations with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, unless the Government decided to change its opinion and decision and to make further advances to the company, I wish to read the following cable from Mr. Smithers, dated March 11, 1919, in reply to the message which I had sent to him:

> In reply to your message I assure you nothing peremptory was intended. Government having taken position in message received here March 3rd that they would not render further assistance and Grand Trunk Pacific working cash being exhausted owing to heavily increased expenses beyond power of company to control, we had no alternative but to notify Government of our inability to continue in order to prevent inconvenience to the people of Canada served by Grand Trunk Pacific. Special general meeting of Grand Trunk Railway Company has been called for Friday, 21st.

I place that on Hansard in order to give my hon. friend all the information we have respecting the matter.

Mr. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Is it the intention of the Government to assume all the liabilities of this road?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The position of the Government is that of receiver. The Government is not assuming the responsibilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Application will be made by the Government to the Exchequer Court for the issue of a receiver's certificate to meet any deficit in operating expenses, and the Government will, of course, be obliged to meet the interest upon Grand Trunk Pacific securities which it has guaranteed. But with regard to other securities, its position is merely that of receiver.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the Government took over the Canadian Northern they took also all its liabilities and paid for the equity of redemption, some $10,000,000. I cannot see much difference between the Canadian Northern Railway Company then and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in this case. In the former case the Government established a certain precedent, and I wanted to know whether the Government intended to follow that precedent in this case.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What I understood my hon. friend to suggest was that the Dominion Government, instead of being merely receiver, should assume all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and relieve the Grand Trunk Railway Company of them entirely.

Mr. McKENZIE: Oh, no. When the Government takes possession of this property nolens volens unless they get clear of it by an Act of Parliament they are responsible, as a matter of law, to the owner of these securities.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not concur in my hon. friend's view. The Dominion Government is receiver under an Order in Council which has the effect of a statute or an order of the court; and a receiver is not responsible for the liabilities of a company. The position of receiver appointed by a court is that of a custodian to continue the operation of a business subject to and pending further orders of the court from time to time. This legislation makes the Minister of Railways the receiver in this case, with the duties and the powers attaching to that office. The resolution defines the position of the Government in respect of the system in express terms, indicates the duties and powers of the receiver and expressly states that the Dominion Government is not liable to the Grand Trunk Railway Company or to any other creditor. When this Order in Council is approved by Parliament it will become of the validity of an Act of Parliament, and its effect will be determined in accordance with its provisions, and not otherwise.

Mr. McKENZIE: I quite understand the minister now. The position which I take, speaking for myself alone and not for any party, is this: I do not for one moment admit that the Government have any jurisdiction to do what they have done in this matter, unless we validate their action by Act of Parliament. The Government are simply mortgagees in possession and are in exactly the same position as a mortgagee in possession would be in without foreclosure. If the third, fourth, or fifth, or even the first, mortgagee goes into possession without foreclosure he assumes all the encumbrances on the property. Every lawyer sitting around the Minister will admit that that is good law and unless we validate by Act of Parliament the action of the Government, I am afraid that any judge would say they had assumed the responsibility when they took over the property. For a creditor of the Company might say: If you had let the Company go on it would have paid off my liability, but as you have prevented that you must pay the money that is owing to me. Of couse if there is to be legislation whereby we put ourselves in the place of a receiver and take all our instructions from the judge, that is a different matter. If the Government are going to put the road up to auction and will only pay what the road brings at auction that puts it in a different light entirely. But the Minister did not in his very excellent speech this afternoon tell us that that was going to be done. If the Minister will tell this House that all the steps that a receiver would take under the orders of a court of this country are to be taken by the Minister of Railways and Canals, and that the country will only pay for this road what it brings at auction, I have no fault to find. But I do feel we had no business to step in and take hold of this property and make ourselves liable for $200,000,000 when, as hon. gentlemen have frequently told us, the property is not worth it. With the liabilities away above what the property is worth we are certainly not making any bargain.

Mr. ROBB: This afternoon I drew the minister's attention to a statement he made with regard to branch lines, as to whether the provinces had prior rights over the Dominion. The minister promised to clear the point up and let the House know where we should stand in regard to branch lines that are a part of this system. I think he forgot to mention that this evening.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The position of the Minister of Railways is receiver for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, including the branch lines. His position is not different from that of a statutory receiver, and the rights of all parties are preserved. The rights of the provinces as guarantors are preserved and remain under the several instruments or trust mortgages under which they can claim. The receiver must take his orders from the Exchequer Court. Just as the rights of all other parties are preserved, so are the rights of the Dominion Government preserved. It is open to the Dominion Government to enforce, by permission of the courts, any rights which it has as creditor, or as guarantor, or as mortgagee under the first mortgage or afterwards. There is no question as to the Receiver's position. His duty is to conserve, operate, and act under the orders of the Court. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition this afternoon called attention to the Winding-Up Act. The Winding-Up Act concerns the liquidator. It is the duty of a liquidator to bring a business to a termination and to sell, but the duty of a receiver is to conserve, operate, and carry on.

If hon. gentlemen will observe the terms of this resolution, they will find the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court is really enlarged, the intention being that the operation of this railway system, being, as it is, in the national interest, shall be continued under the orders of the Court, and that in all orders which the Court shall make it shall have regard not only to property rights but to paramount national interest.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. Is there anything to prevent the provinces which have priority rights on branch lines from foreclosing and selling the branch lines to others, thereby leaving the Grand Trunk Pacific without feeders?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If default occurred under the terms of the mortgages securing the issues which they have guaranteed, the provinces could make application to the Exchequer Court, of which application they would have to give written notice to the minister, who would appear by counsel at the hearing. The Court in determining what should be done would take into consideration, under the terms of this order, which will be validated by our legislation, not only the property rights involved, but the national interest. The intention of this order was to ensure the continued operation in the public interest of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system, and it was not possible to accomplish that in any other way than the one we have taken.

Mr. VIEN: There is some further information required to complete the minister's statement. When the Grand Trunk failed to accept that portion of the line which was constructed by the Government from Moncton to Winnipeg, was any written agreement made between the Government and the Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. VIEN: Then was the company put in default?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government claim they are in default, but the company set up various grounds on which they consider themselves not liable. In reality, the cost was so great that the objection was really on that ground. The interest at three per cent on $170,000,000 amounted to about $5,000,000 a year on a line which does not meet its operating expenses.

Mr. VIEN: Was any agreement made at the time of default between the Government and the Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. The Government stepped in because it had built the line. The title was in the Government. The Grand Trunk Pacific having declined to execute the lease which under the original agreement we claim they were bound to execute, the Government had to provide for the operation of the line, and has been in possession since.

Mr. VIEN: But as the Government did not put the company in default when they failed to take up their obligations it may have given up its right under the agreement to compel the company to do so.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think all rights are preserved.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Sir THOMAS WHITE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, to confirm an order of the Governor General in Council respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Friday, March 21, 1919.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That the name of Mr. Reid (Mackenzie) be added to the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines and struck off that on Privileges and Elections; and that the name of Mr. Wright be added to the select and standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization and struck off that on Standing Orders.

He said: I understand this matter has been made the subject of arrangement.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is only by unanimous consent that this motion may be put.

Motion agreed to.

IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion for the third reading of Bill No. 8 to amend the Irrigation Act.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): On the motion for the third reading I desire to ask that the word "lake" be inserted after the word "watercourses" in sub-clause 2 of section 1. I believe this can be done on the third reading if there is no objection on the part of the House. If there is any objection, I will move the House back into committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: That amendment can only be made by unanimous consent; otherwise, in the ordinary course, the practice would be to move the Bill back into committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: There can be no objection to the amendment.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY.

Bill No. 5 to authorize a further extension of time for the completion of the St. John and Quebec railway between Gagetown and Westfield—Hon. Mr. Reid—read the second time, considered in committee—Mr. Boivin in the Chair—and reported.

AID TOWARDS ELIMINATING LEVEL CROSSINGS.

The House in committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the sum of two hundred thousand dollars per annum be appropriated and paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for ten consecutive years from the first day of April, nineteen hundred and nineteen, to aid actual construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public in respect of highway crossings of railways at rail level, in existence on the first day of April, nineteen hundred and nine.—Hon. Mr. Reid—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): This simply extends for a period of ten years the provision in the Railway Act which expires on April 1 next. There is no change whatever except as to the extension of time. The Act was passed ten years ago and expires in April. It is necessary to pass a Bill founded upon this resolution in order that the Board of Railway Commissioners may continue paying the Dominion Government's proportion on any crossing that they may decide it should pay.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Can the minister give us any information as to the number of crossings towards the elimination of which aid has been granted?

Mr. REID: No, I have not that information. We will have this question up again when we have the Railway Act before the House. In the Consolidated Railway Act, which we shall have before the House in a short time, it is proposed to amend the present Act by increasing the Government's contribution to twenty-five per cent of the cost of the actual construction work, but it shall not exceed in any such case the sum of $15,000, and no such money shall be applied in any one year to more than six crossings on any one railway in any one municipality, or more than once in any one year to any one crossing. If the Consolidated Railway Act were in existence it would not be necessary to pass the present Bill, but as it may take some time to enact, we deem it well to bring down the present Bill.

Mr. ROBB: Is there a fixed policy which the Board of Railway Commissioners follows, as beween the railways, the municipalities, and the Government?

Mr. REID: The Board of Railway Commissioners determines what proportion of the cost should be paid by the municipalities, the railway companies, and the Dominion Government respectively.

Mr. ROBB: Is there a fixed policy that governs throughout the country, in the country districts as well as in the cities, with respect to this matter? What is the policy of the Government in connection with new roads that are constructed? Is the construction of such roads allowed to go on, regardless of the level crossing arrangement, subject to that being fixed up afterwards, or is there a definite policy that governs before construction is undertaken?

Mr. REID: I could not say what the policy of the Railway Commission is. It is left entirely to the Board to decide in each particular case. I do not think the Board has any general policy that a certain percentage shall be paid on every crossing, whether it is in a rural district or in a city; each case is considered on its merits. If the matter is brought to the attention of the Board prior to the road being built, it, of course, has power to take action.

Mr. MURPHY: Does it rest with the Board of Railway Commissioners alone to determine where and when the crossings shall be constructed?

Mr. REID: No, the charter granted by Parliament entitles the company to run through any part of the country unless appeal is made to the Board of Railway Commissioners prior to construction having been commenced. If the road has been constructed the Board can take action.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend did not catch the nature of my question. I inquired whether it rested with the Board of Railway Commissioners alone to determine where and when railway crossing such as are mentioned in the motion are to be constructed.

Mr. REID: I cannot answer my hon. friend explicitly, because I am not fully aware of the powers of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. MURPHY: The date mentioned in the resolution is first of April, 1909. Should that not be the first of April, 1919?

Mr. McMASTER: Might I suggest that the hon. members who are on their feet should speak louder, and that those hon. gentlemen who are seated should either converse less audibly or not at all?

Mr. REID: The resolution provides the present Act expires, and this Bill is to continue its provisions for another ten years. I think the date should be 1919.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: What amount has been paid by the Government under this Act?

Mr. REID: I will answer that question when we are in Committee on the Bill. If hon. gentlemen desire any information their questions will appear in Hansard and the information will be on hand when we go into Committee on the Bill. When the House is considering the Bill in Committee I will have an official from the Railway Commission here to afford all the information hon. gentlemen desire.

Mr. ROBB: The law at present as I understand only applies to railways already in existence, and the new legislation will enable assistance to be given to new railways.

Mr. REID: It is not proposed to deal with anything more than continue the law as it stands at present, until the Consolidated Railway Act comes into effect, which, of course, will nullify this legislation. If the present Bill is not passed, and the Consolidated Railway Act is delayed for some time, or even if it should not pass the House this session, we shall be powerless to continue this subsidizing of railway crossings.

Mr. FIELDING: If these provisions are taken from the original Act I have no objection to offer, but I should think the language might be made clearer.

Mr. NESBITT: The minister says that the date should be 1919. Is it intended to cover the railways that were built previous to 1909? I think he will find that the Railway Board has power now to deal with crossings constructed since that date.

Mr. REID: The hon. member from Russell drew my attention to the last date in the resolution which appears as 1909. This refers to all level highway crossings in existence ten years ago. I see no reason why the date should not be changed to 1919, thus making the resolution applicable to all highway crossings in existence at the present time.

Mr. NESBITT: The Minister had better look the matter up before he makes the change.

Mr. REID: We can amend it, if necessary, when the Bill is in Committee.

Mr. VIEN: Is this to apply only to railways incorporated under federal charter?

Mr. REID: Yes.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. VIEN: If the Government determines upon the nationalization of Canadian railways, we shall have only two great railway systems, the Canadian Government Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not see why we should now determine for a period of ten years the policy of the Canadian Government in the matter of aid in the construction of highway crossings, particularly in view of the fact that our railway policy is not yet finally decided. The Canadian Pacific Railway can construct without assistance such crossings as are required by the regulations of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I suggest, in view of all the circumstances, that this proposed legislation be not extended over a longer period than one year, or two years at the outside.

Mr. REID: My hon. friend suggests that under a policy of the nationalization of railways there will be only two great railway systems in Canada, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways; that the Government would in any case pay for crossings constructed on its own lines, and that we should not assist the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the construction of highway crossings required under the regulations of the Railway Commission. The Canadian National Railways are now practically all under the direction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and whatever should be done for the Canadian National Railways should also be done for every road that is under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission. Otherwise, you do an injustice to the Canadian Pacific or to any other privately-owned road which is subject to the regulations of the Railway Commission. No partiality should be shown to the Government roads; all should be treated on the same basis.

Mr. VIEN: I agree that all these lines should be on the same footing, but I would do away entirely with the granting of aid in the constructing of highway crossings. So far as the Canadian Government Railway system is concerned, it does not matter much whether or not we aid the construction of highway crossings, because if we do so we simply transfer money from one department to another. I repeat that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are financially strong enough to look after the building of highway crossings on their own lines without assistance. They come under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners; let that board decide what share the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should contribute and what share the various municipalities interested should contribute towards the construction of highway crossings. In view of the fact that our railway policy is not finally settled, it might be advisable to aid the construction of highway crossings for a year or two, but I fail to see how we can justify the laying down of a policy of this kind and providing that it shall be carried out for a period of ten years. The period of the proposed aid should be limited to two years at the very extreme.

Mr. SHEARD: Is this proposed legislation to have an obligatory and mandatory effect regarding all the crossings that were in existence prior to 1909? I hope it will have that effect, because the matter particularly concerns large centres, which suffer probably quite as much as any other part of the country in this respect. It is in the interests of the Dominion at large that these level crossings be done away with. If an appropriation will assist in bringing this about, it is certainly very desirable that the appropriation should be made. I should like to know clearly from the minister how generally this is going to be applied to low level crossings.

Mr. REID: When a complaint is made to the Board of Railway Commissioners, they can, if they so desire, order the change to be made. They have power to order that any crossing which they consider dangerous shall come under this measure and be removed.

The point raised by the hon. member opposite(Mr. Vien) as to doing away with this payment altogether is one that may be considered by this House. But the Act which was passed in 1909 was passed for this reason: There are crossings which are considered dangerous; in fact, I have in mind crossings at which people have been killed, and the Act of 1909 was passed for the purpose of assisting in removing all those dangerous crossings. The aid was given in the public interest to save life, and so as not to put the whole cost, which is sometimes very heavy, on municipalities which could not afford to pay the full amount for which they might be assessed. In the same way, it was felt that it would be a great hardship on the railways to make them pay their full share. Therefore, it was decided at that time that the Government should give aid to the extent of 20 per cent of the cost. The hon. member wishes us to do away with the payment of this 20 per cent and to put the Board of Railway Commissioners in this position, that if a complaint is made that a crossing is dangerous, the board shall have the power to order that a subway or whatever else is necessary to remove the dangerous crossing shall be constructed, and that the cost shall be assessed on the railway and the municipality concerned. There are cases where such a course would be a great hardship on other railways than the Canadian Pacific, and it would be a great hardship on some municipalities to construct a very large subway. As the railways are operated in the public interest, it was considered desirable that a small amount should be paid to assist in removing dangerous crossings. The amount, $200,000 a year, is not very large, and as the removal of dangerous crossings has saved many lives, I think the amount is worth the purpose for which it is appropriated.

As we now own one-half of the railways in Canada, this aid, in so far as the Canadian National railways are concerned, is only taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another. I feel that the Canadian National railways, being owned by the Dominion Government, should not be treated in a different manner from any other railway that has received a charter from the Government of Canada. The Canadian National railways should continue in the same position, so far as the Board of Railway Commissioners is concerned, as they did prior to the Government becoming the owner of them, and they should compete, just as though they were privately owned, with the other railways. Therefore, I feel that if this proposed appropriation is passed, it should be extended to the Canadian Pacific and the other railways just the same as before. It would be a bad thing if we were to cease rendering this assistance at the present time. We should continue rendering it in order to remove all these dangerous crossings as quickly as possible. If the members of this House feel that this proposed appropriation should be struck out, then we shall have to bring it up again in connection with the Railway Act which will be before the House and a subcommittee as soon as we can reach it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: As this is a very small amount to cover all the crossings in Canada, and as there will be many applications for assistance, what percentage is to be devoted for doing the work on a certain crossing? Is it to be ten, twenty-five, fifty or one hundred per cent, and is this to apply to radial roads as well as to steam roads? In my constituency there are many dangerous level crossings which are run over at high speed by radial roads, and accidents have occurred there. I think the sum is entirely inadequate to cover the number of crossings demanding attention. What share of this proposed expenditure is to be applied in each section of the country? I believe there are from fifty to a hundred or perhaps more accidents caused by level crossings in a year. I have known five or six people having been killed and many injured in one accident in my district. This is a serious matter and we want to encourage the minister in every possible way in dealing with it.

Mr. REID: The only railways that come under this measure are those under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Would that cover radials?

Mr. REID: Only those that have a Dominion charter and are under the Board of Railway Commissioners. The manner in which the money is distributed is this: It does not matter from what part of Canada an application is made to the board to remove a dangerous crossing. If a complaint is made to the board by any individual or corporation or municipality, in regard to a dangerous crossing, the board investigates, makes a report, and, if it so decides, passes an order compelling the railway company to remove the dangerous crossing by constructing a subway or otherwise, and assessing the proportions that the railway, the municipality and the Dominion Government shall pay under this measure.

So far, the appropriation of $200,000 has been a sufficient amount each year for the past ten years to cover any sums the Dominion Government has been called upon to pay, and that is the reason why I have continued that amount in this resolution. If in any year this amount should not prove sufficient, we would have to ask Parliament that the Act be amended increasing the amount.

Mr. NICKLE: I might suggest to the Minister of Railways and Canals—and I feel sure he will not consider it an impertinence, as he is not a lawyer—that he do not change the figures "09" in the last line of his resolution to "19," because I think the resolution is correctly drawn. If the minister will refer to the statutes of 1909, section 7 of chapter 32, he will find that in that year the principle was introduced in Canadian legislation of a certain amount, $200,000, I think, for five years being set aside to be administered for the purpose of assisting municipalities and railways in getting rid of dangerous level crossings. At the same time that section 7 was passed enunciating that principle, section 6 was also passed which amended the Railway Act and declared the principle to be that any railroads constructed after 1909 should, at their own expense, take such steps as might be necessary to protect the public.

That this House may be more fully conversant with the legislation, let me read the two sections of the Act, which was assented to on May 19, 1909. Section 6 reads:

> The said Act is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 238 thereof:—
> 238A. In any case where a railway is constructed after the passing of this Act, the company shall, at its own cost and expense (unless and except as otherwise provided by agreement, approved of by the Board, between the company and a municipal or other corporation or person), provide, subject to the order of the Board, all protection, safety and convenience for the public in respect of any crossing of highway by the railway.

Section 7 reads:

> The said Act is further amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 239 thereof:—
> 239A. The sum of two hundred thousand dollars each year for five consecutive years from the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and nine, shall be appropriated and set apart from the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the purpose of aiding in the providing by actual construction work of protection, safety and convenience for the public in respect of highway crossings of the railway at rail level, in existence on the said first day of April.

If the minister should yield to the suggestion of the hon. member who sits on my right that the word "nine" should be changed to "nineteen," the effect of his resolution taken in conjunction with the legislation on the Statute Books might be that this country should assist in construction work, by way of subways or otherwise, in respect of all railway crossings in existence on the 1st day of April, 1919. Now that is not what this House wants to do at all, if I understand the purport of the minister's resolution. I take it that what the minister is endeavouring to do is to place at the disposal of the Railway Commissioners a specific sum of money that may be used for bettering conditions in respect of railway crossings that existed on the 1st day of April, 1919, but not to relieve the railway companies from responsibility in respect of crossings constructed since that date. But if he were to adopt the suggestion made by the speaker on my right the effect might be to relieve the railways of this country of all responsibility in respect of crossings constructed during the last ten years. I do not believe it is the intention of the resolution so to do.

Mr. REID: The hon. member is right. However, I have already said that the point will be considered when we get into Committee on the Bill.

Mr. NICKLE: Leave it at 1909 for the present.

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: The minister has not answered the objection I made with reference to the ten-year period during which this appropriation is to be made. All he said was that an expenditure of $200,000 a year was a comparatively small amount, and we need not bother very much about it. I think the time has come when we should cease talking in millions. During the war an expenditure of $500,000,000 was a small amount, and hon. members on this side of the House never unduly obstructed votes of money required for carrying on war. The other day the Minister of Public Works told us that there would be a deficit in the coming year of something like a hundred million dollars, and he did not know how that deficit was to be made up. I think that the time has now come when we should consider a yearly expenditure of $200,000 as a matter of importance. If the House will only enter upon a policy of thrift, and cut down this item as a start, I am confident that the Estimates can be reduced very considerably. In 1911 when hon. gentlemen opposite were talking of the extravagance of the Laurier Administration, they characterized an expenditure of something like $125,000,000 a year as wholesale extravagance. This Government now presents Estimates for $437,000,000, and the Supplementaries are still to come, and the Minister of Railways tells us this afternoon that an expenditure of $200,000 is not worth discussing. That does not harmonize very well with the statement made by the Minister of Public Works the other day, to the effect that he did not know where the $100,000,000 was to be raised to make both ends meet. The minister has said that the Canadian Government Railway system should be on the same footing and run in the same way as a private-owned railway corporation. But that does not answer the objection that I made, that the Canadian Government Railway system and the Canadian Pacific Railway system are both in such a strong financial position as to be able to carry out without any difficulty any orders the Railway Commissioners might make with regard to railway crossings. In so far as the municipalities are concerned, I think it would be much more equitable to have the full amount paid by the railways. The railways make their own financial arrangements, and in addition receive assistance from the Government, and I do not see why a railway which is seeking the privilege of crossing a certain portion of this country should not be compelled, by law, to build the road in such a way that it will not be a public danger. If the responsibility for making the crossings safe rests upon any one, surely it rests upon the railway companies, and I think they should be called upon by the Railway Commissioners to make such changes as are required to make the crossings safe. The minister has failed to explain why this blanket authorization should be given for a period of ten years.

Resolution reported, read a first and second time and agreed to.

Mr. Reid thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 29, to amend the Railway Act, (aid for railway crossings.)

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

COMPENSATION TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES WHO ARE KILLED OR INJURED.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways and Canals) the House went into Committee on the following resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Act to provide compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duties, chapter fifteen of the statutes of 1918, and to provide that no employee of the Canadian Government Railways who is an employee within the meaning of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act and becomes permanently disabled from following his usual occupation in the service as a result of injuries received while on duty and actually at work in the service shall be entitled to receive compensation, under the provisions of the Act hereby proposed to be amended, for such injuries unless he elects to accept prior or subsequent to the injuries such compensation in lieu of the allowance payable under the provisions of the Provident Fund Act, section twelve, Class D, and gives notice in writing of such election both to the management of the Railways and to the Provident Fund Board: Provided, however, that the dependents of any such employee who has been or is killed subsequently to the passing of the Act hereby proposed to be amended and who has not elected to accept compensation under the said Act as aforesaid, shall nevertheless be entitled to compensation under the said Act as though such employee had so elected; and further that any compensation or costs awarded under the said Act be paid by the Minister of Finance out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, or the Minister of Finance may from time to time take such amount of money as may be authorized by the Governor in Council from the Consolidated Revenue Fund and deposit such money with the Board, officers, authority or court authorized by the law of any province to determine compensation cases, from which deposit such Board, officers, authority or court may pay any compensation and costs awarded under the provisions of the said Act; and in any province where the general administration expenses of maintaining such Board, officers or other authority or court are paid by the province or by contributions from employers, or by both, the Minister of Finance may pay out of any unappropriated money in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada such portion of such expenses as is fair and reasonable and is authorized by the Governor in Council.—The Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. REID: I think it is necessary to make a few explanations. Last session I presented to Parliament a Bill, which was passed, entitled, "an Act to provide Compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duty," in order to bring the Canadian Government Railway employees under the Compensation Acts of the several provinces throughout Canada. It applied to all Government employees, but it was passed at the request of the employees of the Government Railways. I consulted with the representatives of the Provident Fund of the Intercolonial Railway employees, and before the Bill passed a representative of the employees pronounced the opinion that it protected those who were receiving benefits under the Provident Fund Act. I stated in the House at the time that if the Act did not work out satisfactorily to those who were receiving benefits under the Provident Fund, we would amend it. Sub-section 4, of section 1, of the Bill passed last year does not work out in practice. The employees do not elect before injury, and therefore cannot claim under the Compensation Acts, nor can their dependents. The object of the present amendment is to enable a man to elect after injury, when, of course, he will take the more favourable of the two funds, either the Provident Fund or the Compensation Act. It places the employee, if he has been injured, in the position of choosing that one which is more beneficial to him. If an employee is killed and has not elected prior to the accident, then his dependents cannot apply under the Compensation Act. The present amendment is intended to cover these points. In order to be able to assure the House that the employees of the Government Railways were perfectly satisfied with the amendment, I requested the solicitor of the railway to have them sign their approval to it. If the House desires to know the names of the heads of ten different organi-

4 p.m. zations who have signed the document, I can furnish them. I have their signatures to show that they are perfectly satisfied. I repeat what I said last year, that if we find that the amendment proves unsatisfactory, we shall have to come back to Parliament and seek another amendment.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The resolution as it stands now, I think, is acceptable to the employees. It seems to have changed its form since it was first put on the Order Paper.

Mr. REID: I do not think so.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I think so. It strikes me that the Provident Fund should be eliminated from all consideration in this connection. The Provident Fund was organized for the purpose of paying old age pensions. It had been found on the Intercolonial that when men had got up in years they were almost useless to the road and it was difficult to turn them off without doing something for them. A Bill was introduced in 1907 for the purpose of retiring men who had become unable to carry out their duties on the road. That was the main purpose of the Provident Fund. The fund itself is made up from contributions by the employees amounting to one and one half per cent of their monthly wages and a similar amount paid by the Government. This money is funded and from it the old age pensions are paid. These are ridiculously small. I do not see how old employees can live on $20 a month. The question of dealing with this Provident Fund, I think, should engage the attention of the minister. This is a good opportunity because while the Provident Fund makes provision for paying a monthly allowance to the man who is totally disabled, that was not the original intention of it. As the minister is making provision now to deal with all cases of accident, through a Compensation Board, there is no reason why the old age pension system should be mixed up with accidents at all. It strikes me that the proper course would be to devote the Provident Fund altogether to giving pensions to retired employees of the road. Provision, in this resolution, and in the Bill that will be introduced, is made for all kinds of accidents, so that there is no necessity for a man who is injured in an accident having anything to do with the Provident Fund.

There is another fund called the Relief Fund which is also made up by contributions from the wages of the men and by a small allowance from the department. In case a man is injured by a slight accident, he gets the small sum of about $3 a week while he is kept out of work as the result of that injury. The minister has not told us what he intends to do with that fund. It strikes me that it is unnecessary that that should be carried on at all if we are going to vote the railways under the compensation boards of the various provinces. I am not familiar with the compensation boards of the other provinces but we have in Nova Scotia a very well equipped, and active, compensation board. All the industries in the province, divided up into twenty classes or more, contribute to the fund. All the accidents that happen throughout the province are provided for out of that fund.

The minister has power under this resolution to pay to the funds of the various provinces a certain amount, but he has not told the House whether he intends to do so or not. Are we to understand that the Government railway will submit itself to the jurisdiction of the local boards in the various provinces and that, according to the mileage of the road in any particular province, a certain number of dollars will be paid into the fund? Is it proposed, whether there is an accident or not, that money will be paid into the fund and kept there to provide for any accidents that may occur? Is that the plan that the minister has in his mind, or does he propose simply to pay such allowances as are made from time to time by the board?

This is a matter that created a great deal of interest in the province of Nova Scotia when the Bill was introduced last year and the legislature of that province passed a resolution in regard to it at the last session approving of the proposal to bring the Government railways under the board but insisting at the same time that they should submit to the jurisdiction of the board and pay in to the fund like any other industry. Is that what the minister intends to do?

Mr. REID: The Dominion Government subscribes a certain amount per annum towards carrying out the purpose of the Provident Fund. What I said to some of the employees in connection with the Provident Fund was this: When the Government were operating the Intercolonial alone, there were certain funds, such as the Provident and Relief Funds, and they could be dealt with by the Government and the employees because there was only the one road. Now, the Government has taken over other roads including the Canadian Northern. On each of these roads they have similar relief organizations or pension systems. My own feeling is that we should let matters rest until we get the whole railway situation straightened out. Then I believe we should have a Dominion compensation system that would apply to the whole of the Government railways, and to all railways if possible, but at all events, to all Government railway systems, so that if any employee was injured in Nova Scotia, he would get the same compensation as an employee would get if he were injured in British Columbia or any other province. It should be uniform from one end of the Dominion to the other. I do not see how we can carry out that system by having different organizations on the Government railway system. I believe that those who are operating the railway system for the Government will have to take up and consider as soon as possible some policy which will be universal and which will apply throughout the whole system. The Provident Fund on the Intercolonial railway may be more advantageous than a similar organization on the Canadian Northern system, or vice versa. I do not think it will be in the interest of the railway to have one organization at one end different from another organization at the other end. My own feeling is that we should let matters go on in so far as these different organizations are concerned until we get the railway organizations all working together harmoniously and then try and see if we cannot devise some scheme whereby an employee in Vancouver will get the same treatment, and the same relief, as an employee in Halifax or in any other part of the country.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is it proposed to eliminate the feature of accidents from the Provident Fund altogether and apply the fund to old age pensions?

Mr. REID: I am not changing the policy that has been in existence for some time, and I would not feel justified in changing this law at present. Possibly, before the session ends, there could be a change made that would apply to the whole system. In the meantime I think matters should continue as they are.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): There is a definition of what constitutes an employee of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways. Does that include all the employees on those railways?

Mr. REID: It includes all those that are members of, or subscribers to, the Provident Fund—only those that would receive any benefits under that Fund, and they must subscribe and pay their contribution to the Fund.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Then this Act does not apply to any employee who is not a member of the Provident Fund?

Mr. REID: It does not. The hon. gentleman asked whether the Government intends depositing a certain amount with the Central Compensation Board to meet a portion of the working expenses. What the Government now does or rather the provision which has been made in the other Act, is, to pay whatever amount of compensation, or award, the Board may decide upon with respect to an employee. We felt that it was not necessary to deposit any money with the Compensation Board, and I think the Board is not pressing that demand. It was brought to my attention, however, by some of the different compensation boards that there was no provision in the Act whereby we could pay a portion of the cost of operation of the compensation board, and I felt that it was only fair and just that the Canadian National Railways should pay their proper share of whatever charge would be involved under the operation of the provincial Act in a particular province. Therefore I added this last clause in the amendment, which reads:

> And in any province where the general administration expenses of maintaining such board, officers, or authority or court, are paid by the province, or by contributions, from employers, or by both, the Minister of Finance may pay out of any unappropriated money in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada such portion of such expenses as is fair and reasonable and is authorized by the Governor in Council.

That covers the point that the different compensation boards are interested in. The boards now receive their share as if they were a private corporation, and when an award is made the Department of Finance will pay it out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: As regards the employees who are permanently disabled as a result of an accident, I think the proposed law is sound, and I do not agree with my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that we should not take into consideration the Provident Fund at all. That fund applies to two cases—an employee who retires on account of old age, and an employee who retires on account of permanent disability. It would not be fair that the same employee should get a life pension under the Provident Fund, and also a life pension under the Compensation Act. With respect to employees who are killed as a result of an accident, I congratulate the minister upon the change he is now making. We told him last year that the position of the dependents of such employees would not be improved as a result of the Act then passed. Of course, the dependents of an employee who was killed in a railway accident could not have any right to the benefits of the Provident Fund at all. The Provident Fund provides a pension for a disabled employee, or an aged employee, but nothing for the dependants of an employee who is killed. It was absurd, therefore, to require that such employee should waive his right to something that he was not entitled to. His dependents could not be granted anything from the Provident Fund, and surely we could not require that the employee should waive his rights. Yet that is what we did last year. As a result of that Act, I had in my practice the cases of two men named Senechal and Frève, who were both killed in a railway accident. The Railway Department refused to pay compensation on account of the clause in last session's Act, which was absurd. I am glad that the resolution as it reads will have a retroactive effect in the case of the dependents of those men, and that they will now be entitled to pensions.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Is the minister making the provision retroactive?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Retroactive as far as last year's Act is concerned?

Mr. REID: It is retroactive as regards last year's Act. The hon. member (Mr. Lapointe brought the point to my attention, and I saw the injustice of it. It is because of the hon. member's action in that regard that I am now making the provision retroactive so that its effect will be as though it had been enacted last year.

Mr. GAUVREAU: We are all satisfied if that is the case.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: There is another feature of the Act of last year to which I desire to call attention. Last year a clause was added stating that Orders in Council would be passed defining the service that should be made on the Crown, that is against which party the writ should be issued, whether against the commissioners of the Canadian National Railways, the Minister of Justice, or the Crown. I wrote to the Department of Justice a few months ago, and they told me that no such Order in Council had been passed. I would like the minister to take the point into consideration before the Bill is passed, so that we may know exactly the method of procedure.

Mr. REID: I will do so.

Mr. WIGMORE: Is it intended this year to bring in a resolution to increase the superannuation? That amount was fixed about ten years ago at $20 a month. It might have been possible at that time for a man to exist in some way on that amount, but it is really out of the question to-day. I think some provision should be made for an increase of the amount, and I would be glad if the minister would take the matter up in connection with any changes which he may be here contemplating.

Mr. REID: I might say to the hon. gentleman that the employees themselves contribute a certain amount towards this fund; it is not entirely furnished by the Government. We subscribe a certain amount, I think $100,000 per annum, and the employees themselves make up the balance of the fund. Therefore we could not increase the allowance of those who have already been superannuated, or who may be superannuated in the future, without the consent of those employees who are interested. That is one of my reasons for considering that we should have some new arrangement applicable to the whole Government Railway system. When that is taken up and gone into, some arrangement might be made with regard to the position of old employees. We do not control this fund; it is the employees who decide how much shall be paid to those who are retired. The Government have only one member on that Board, and it could not increase the pensions to employees without taking the matter up with the whole Board.

Mr. WIGMORE: If a petition were sent to the Government and the Government decided to adopt its suggestions, an Act would have to be passed along these lines, would it not?

Mr. REID: No, the Provident Fund Board regulate the amount of the pensions. All we do is subscribe to that regulation.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I placed on the Order Paper the other day a question with regard to this very matter. Is it the intention of the minister to press this new board to deal with this question? The employees who come under this fund want an increase of pension; those who contribute to the fund are ready to increase their monthly contribution to the fund provided they are eligible for a higher pension. Is the minister going to do anything for these employees?

Mr. REID: The matter is referred to the management of the Canadian National Railways in order to obtain a uniform policy throughout. I suggested that an effort be made to have one organization for the whole Canadian Government railway system, which would include the Provident Fund relief organization on the Intercolonial and the Canadian Northern. I do not think it would be well to have one end of the system under a different organization. The only reason there can be for delay in the matter is that which is found in the whole railway situation, and that cannot be taken up and dealt with as the hon. member knows, for some little time.

Mr. COPP: I think the minister is on the right track in this matter. I have had considerable correspondence from employees of the Canadian Government railways on the subject. Some days ago I had an interview with the solicitor for the Department of Railways and I drew his attention to a number of matters brought to my attention by railway employees. I think that the minister has adopted in the resolution some remedy for the grievances that have arisen and that have been placed before the departmental solicitor and himself. But I am not sure that this resolution goes quite far enough. I have before me a letter from a member of the Compensation Board of New Brunswick drawing my attention to a number of matters of interest in connection with this resolution. I assume that the different Compensation Acts passed by the provincial legislatures are not all alike. In our province a certain fund is placed in the hands of the Compensation Board by the contributing employers and when an employee is injured and reports have been submitted in due course by the employer, the employee, and the attending physician, the Compensation Board begin at once to pay weekly compensation to the injured person. These payments continue until evidence is adduced before the Compensation Board and a decision rendered. As soon as the man is reported as having been restored to health, the whole amount of compensation is paid over directly by the board. Now, under this proposed plan it is necessary that a certain amount be placed in the hands of the Compensation Board by the railway company or by the Government to enable it to make payments by way of compensation to railway employees along the lines that I have stated. There is a provision in the resolution in regard to that, but it says that the Minister of Finance "may" do so and so. I think it should go further and say that the Finance Minister must see to it that in each province where the Compensation Act provides for the weekly payment of compensation as soon as the report is laid before the Board, funds should be provided to enable the Compensation Board to pay that weekly indemnity. Railway employees should be placed in as good a position as employees of any other kind.

Mr. REID: Under this resolution we have power to do that. The object of the resolution is to make everything work satisfactorily and harmoniously in co-operation with the Compensation Boards in the several provinces. We are taking power to pay them their share of the cost of the operation of the board, and we can easily deposit from time to time small amounts to facilitate the carrying out of the work of the Compensation Board. We have been working very harmoniously with the board; of course, we had to act in accordance with the legislation passed last year. If this resolution is passed and a Bill founded upon it adopted, I feel sure that there will be no trouble or difficulty either with the Board or in connection with any employee that may be injured or killed.

Mr. COPP: As I said at the outset, I feel that the minister is on the right track and is endeavouring to meet fairly all the points brought up by the Compensation Board. But while we are doing this, let us see that everything is absolutely understandable by the Compensation Boards and by the men to whom this legislation is intended to apply

Under the resolution before the committee, if the intention of the minister is to see to it that the funds are placed in the hands of the Compensation Board; that will be very satisfactory to the different associations representing the employees of the Intercolonial railway.

In answer to a question put by the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) as to whether a man employed on the Canadian National Railways must be a member of the Provident Fund before he can come under this Act, I understood the minister to say that he must be a member of the Provident Fund and contribute to the fund before he can come under the provisions of the Compensation Act.

Mr. REID: Any employee of the Canadian Government Railways, say of the Intercolonial railway, who is not a member of the Provident Fund, comes, in any case, under the Compensation Act. But if he is a member of the Provident Fund, he must, of course, elect under which he will come.

Mr. COPP: That is not the way in which I understood the minister to answer my hon. friend.

Mr. REID: Perhaps I did not understand the hon. member.

Mr. COPP: An employee comes under this Act whether he is a member of the Provident Fund or not?

Mr. REID: Every employee of the Intercolonial railway comes under the Compensation Act whether he is a member of the Provident Fund or not.

Mr. COPP: Then this resolution and the Bill to be founded thereon would cover the case about which I wrote the minister a few days ago. I refer to Mr. Edward Gould who was killed at Aulac station on the Canadian Government Railways.

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to add my approval of the suggestion made that something should be done for those old men who retired from the road some years ago. The compensation that they receive now of $20 a month is entirely inadequate. In fact, I know of several cases in which there is a great deal of hardship. The minister has stated that this is a general scheme by which all these matters may be dealt with, but there is great danger that those men may be dead before their case is considered. I would urge, with other hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this point, that this matter should be dealt with as soon as possible, and that relief should be brought to those men who are getting such small salaries, who could not have foreseen that the cost of living was to be so high as it is now, and who, if they had thought there would be no decrease in the cost of living, would have made some further provision for their old age. I hope the minister will realize that there are a number of cases of hardship suffered by those poor men who have given their days of usefulness and activity to the road and who are not now able to work. They should be provided for in any case by the institution to which they have given the best part of their lives. It is too bad that a man who has given good service for twenty years or more to the Government, and who, under this scheme, has retired, should find himself in want and unable to supplement his means by any other kind of employment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does my hon. friend support a general superannuation scheme for Government employees to which they should contribute; or is this somewhat along the lines of a provident scheme?

Mr. McKENZIE: I would be in favour of anything suggested by the minister for those who are now able to contribute towards a fund of that kind. But what I am particularly directing my remarks to is the case of men who gave their days, during which they were able to work, to the service of the railway, and who were making, as they thought, sufficient provision for their old age, but who found that as the cost of living has risen in this country, that provision is not anything like sufficient for themselves and their families. Under such circumstances, this country whose employees they were, should not see them in want, and some steps should be taken to better their conditions.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I hope the minister will take that matter into consideration. Wages have increased largely in recent years. An employee on the Intercolonial railway gets a much higher wage now than he did ten or fifteen years ago, and consequently, the percentage that he pays is considerably more, because he pays into the fund one and one-half per cent of the wages that he receives. But the amount paid to the employees out of the fund has not been increased. The ordinary employee gets about $20 a month as a retiring allowance whereas with the increased cost of living the increase in the amount that he pays in month by month would seem to indicate that he should, when he retires from the railway, get a larger amount than he gets at the present time.

Another matter that I should like to draw to the attention of the minister is the administration of the Provident Fund. I have complaints from employees of the road that the administration is too stringent. I knew a man who had a right to participate in this Provident Fund, who had removed in his old age to British Columbia and who was requested to come back to Halifax in order to be examined by a doctor in that city before he could make his application to go on the Provident Fund. He had to take the journey all the way across the continent to be examined by the doctor in Halifax, as the officials would not consider his case at all unless he was examined by that particular physician. When he arrived in Halifax, he was unable to get in touch with the doctor in question, and so he got another prominent doctor to examine him and certify as to the condition of his health. He then went home to British Columbia, but the board would not consider the certificate of his doctor, because the man did not happen to be examined by the special doctor that they had appointed. Regulations of that kind are impossible to be carried out, and I would like the minister to take some interest in the matter and see if the regulations imposed upon employees by the people in charge of the fund are not too stringent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The regulations are administered by the employees themselves.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Partly.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Wholly.

Mr. REID: There is a representative of the Government on the board administrating the fund. Of course, the board, as a whole, would control the situation.

Mr. MICHAUD: Can a railway employee elect to bring his case before the Compensation Board of the province in which he works? In that case, can he avoid paying his monthly dues to the Provident Fund?

Mr. REID: I hardly understand the hon. member's question. All permanent employees of the railway are supposed to be members of the Provident Fund. Of course, if an accident should happen, the case of the employee should and would come before the Compensation Board in the province in which the accident took place. He can elect under which Act his case shall come. If it is the Provident Fund Act, the board would take up his case and deal with it.

Mr. MICHAUD: Supposing the employee, in case of an accident, elects to have his case come under the Compensation Act, would he still have to pay his dues to the Provident Fund? Has he the power to choose between them?

Mr. REID: Yes, he has that choice.

Mr. MICHAUD: But he would have to pay his Provident Fund dues just the same.

Mr. REID: The purpose of this legislation is to provide for employees who have to retire through being permanently incapacitated. The Provident Fund makes provision for those who are only temporarily disabled.

Mr. FIELDING: Is there any appeal from the decision of the Provident Fund managers with regard to the compensation allowed? I am reminded of the case of an old official of the railway who has received some allowance from the Provident Fund, but who thinks he has been very unjustly treated. Is there an appeal to the Government from the Provident Fund's decision?

Mr. REID: There is an appeal to the minister, and his decision is final.

Mr. FIELDING: The deputy minister has had this particular case under consideration and I take for granted that probably there may be good reasons for not giving this man larger compensation. At all events, I will mention his name and perhaps the minister will look into the matter. I am not saying for a moment that he has any grievance, but he thinks he has. His name is Mr. George Laird, resident in the neighbourhood of Truro. He was severely injured in the station yard at Truro. Perhaps the deputy minister to whom I gave the facts of the case a short time ago has already given the case all possible consideration. All I care to do now is to mention the matter to the minister, so that if there has been any omission to do justice to this man, his case may be looked into.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Hon. Mr. Reid thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, to provide compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duties.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RECLAMATION OF DOMINION LANDS BY DRAINAGE.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 9, to authorize the reclamation of Dominion Lands by drainage—Hon. Arthur Meighen—Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

On section 2—power to reclaim land by drainage works:

Mr. ROBB: This work is apparently to be done under Reclamation Acts passed by the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. I notice that section 6 provides for the appointment of a Director of Reclamation Service. It seems to me the minister is providing the most expensive way of doing this work. If the work is to be done under the Provincial Acts, would it not be more economical to use the provincial officials? Is not this appointment simply to provide a good fat job for some one to roam around the country and make reports to the minister which will probably be shelved?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am rather surprised the hon. gentleman should suspect anything of that sort. A Director of Reclamation Service has already been appointed; he has held office in the department for a great number of years, being appointed, I think, some fifteen years ago. The work is not to be done by the provinces at all. As I explained to the House on the second reading, this Bill is to take care of the work that the provinces do not do. Certain works in the way of drainage are done by the local authorities, following the arrangement that was arrived at between the representatives of the provinces and the Dominion. The second two classes of drainage projects are undertaken by drainage districts, or by the provinces themselves, and the actual responsibility for the drainage work is theirs. We are providing here for taking care of the fourth class. Where the Dominion owns a great tract of land, we do the work; we undertake the engineering, and actually construct and operate the drainage works. In doing so, however, we operate under the laws of the provinces passed for the purpose, in just the same way as would a company that undertook to construct these works. We come in as the Dominion Government. We actually do the work, but in doing so we follow the regulations and laws passed by the provinces.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Do you do it under the Interior Department, or the Public Works?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the Interior Department. The lands are themselves under the administration of the Interior Department. The Crown Lands of the Dominion, which are administered in the Interior Department, are the lands that are mainly to be affected by the work.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the hon. minister expect the work to be confined to these two provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We cannot operate anywhere else, but there is a clause in the Act providing for the extension of the work should any other province pass an Act under which we could come in.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like the minister to outline what he proposes to do under this Act, and what expenditure he thinks the Government will find it necessary to make. It is a new venture, and at a time like this, when it is difficult to find funds to run the ordinary business of the country, it strikes me that it is hardly a proper time to embark on this project unless it can be shown that there is some good reason for it. There is a reference here to the fact that the land may be turned over to the Soliders' Settlement Board, but I do not think the soldiers will agree to settle in these low swampy places. We would therefore like to know what the hon. minister intends to do, and how much he expects to spend under this Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has no very pretentious plans on foot. The United States Government has launched a programme of reclamation along this line involving an expenditure of $100,000,000. What we do contemplate in the Interior Department is what you might describe as an experimental undertaking, at all events, an initial undertaking. What we have in mind is the reclamation of Waterhen lake. If we go ahead with that first, it will require about $120,000. Something in the neighbourhood of 12,000 acres will be reclaimed—land that at present, I understand, is absolutely valueless; not only valueless in itself, but its remaining in its present condition impairs the whole district and renders less valuable much land in the neighbourhood. That project is recommended to us by our engineers as perhaps the one we should undertake first. The lands adjacent to the lands that would be reclaimed are worth to-day from $30 to $50 an acre, and there is no reason to believe that these would not be worth the same, not immediately after reclamation, possibly, but shortly after.

5 p.m.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would it not be better to submit to the Provincial Act and pay in proportion the amount required to drain these lands? I understand the Provincial Act applies to all lands where drainage is required and operations are started under the Provincial Act, it would be better for the Dominion Government holding lands in that area to submit to the jurisdiction of the province, and pay their share of the lands they own.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That alternative was very carefully considered. In it is involved the question of the jurisdiction of the province to tax Dominion lands; indeed, not only the question of jurisdiction but of the wisdom of submitting to taxation at the hands of the provinces; and it was deemed best to solve the difficulty in another way. In cases where the bulk of the land is privately owned, or in cases where the province wants work done for the sake of roads, then the province or the local authorities undertake it, and if we have land within the area affected we have arranged to sell that land to the province, at a certain fixed rate, and the province, after the land is reclaimed sells by public auction, and out of the proceeds of the sale the cost of reclamation is first taken. Over and above that, the surplus comes back to the Dominion. Where we have a great body of lands the province takes the ground that the work is ours, and, we think, properly so. We undertake the work, the provincial legislation provides provincial officers, assesses the proper share against private lands, and we just pay our share; and upon the sale of that land we are recouped for the expenditure we make. Of course, as respects our own land the surplus is ours.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it the intention of the Government to turn these lands over to the province before the next election?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not really think that the hon. member was thinking of the next election. I have not yet given it a thought at all, and I am afraid it would take me some time to come to a conclusion on that point.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Sale of reclaimed lands.

Mr. ROBB: Will the minister explain subsection 3 of this clause which reads:

> The minister may, instead of selling such lands, lease the whole or any part of the same, and may also lease any land unsold.

Does that refer to lands other than those that are reclaimed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no, that could only refer to lands included within the area of reclamation, lands affected by the reclamation scheme. It means this: An upset price will be fixed on the valuation before they are offered for sale at public auction. If the upset price is not bid we are empowered to rent the lands in the meantime until they are otherwise disposed of. It strikes me that possibly it would be wise to have power to rent the land before offering it to public auction, because lands reclaimed by drainage do not reach their full value for some time. It takes cultivation and exposure to the sun to free the land from that moisture that has been in it for so long. I think the best time to sell these lands would not be immediately after reclamation.

Mr. ROBB: I should have read the whole clause to the minister. There seems to be a confusion of words. Why this distinction? It would look as if it referred to two different classes of land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that the words are unnecessary.

Mr. MURPHY: Would the insertion of the word "such" before "land" meet the hon. gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might make it clearer. I understand that the point of the hon. gentleman is that the words are surplusage?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it is intended to have this legal effect, that the minister may, instead of selling the land, lease the whole or any part thereof. It might be held that the minister could elect whether he could lease or sell, but once having elected, could not change. We want to make it clear that while he may elect to sell he may lease.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): According to subsection 1, the minister may sell the lands subject to the conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council According to sub-section 2 he may transfer them to the Soldiers' Settlement Board at a valuation to be fixed by the Governor in Council. But under subsection 3 he may lease the land at any price he may see fit to ask. Why not make the rental under the lease subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, as well as the price in case of sale?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not have any objection. Of course, the rental in leasing is not so vital as the price on a sale. Indeed, as we had the Bill at first, the Governor in Council was not required to assent even to the price on sale. So much goes before Council——

Mr. McMASTER: You will be bringing some of it before Parliament pretty soon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will be very sorry for Parliament if it all comes before it. The only effective and practical way is for the minister to handle it. I have no objection to it going before Council. It is something of a protection for the minister, but anybody who has been a member of Council knows that the deliberation is not increased a great deal.

Mr. MURPHY: Might I suggest to my hon. friend that special legislation affecting these lands after reclamation should be unnecessary in view of the fact that the general land Act would apply to such land in the absence of a special provision. Is there any necessity for this special provision, inasmuch as the land would become ordinary land after reclamation, and, if so, would not the ordinary law apply to it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but the general law does not permit of sale except in very rare cases. The power of the minister to sell land is so limited that it would not be sufficient to leave this to the operation of the general law. He can sell fractions of quarter-sections, and only a certain amount and under certain conditions. We want to sell this land by auction so that we can recoup the treasury the cost of improving it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is there any provision made in the Estimates for the coming fiscal year to administer this Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not yet.

On section 4—Payments for land, how to be made:

Mr. MEIGHEN: These are the alternate terms of payment in case of sale by auction, but the House must observe that the previous section provides that the land can be turned over to the Soldiers' Settlement Board for disposition by that Board. In that event these terms do not apply. In the event of an ordinary sale the terms that are applicable to the operations of the Board would not come into play.

Mr. ROBB: Does that mean that you will accept those ten or twenty year terms and nothing short of them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not recommend anything shorter than ten years. The price would be affected adversely if we did. School lands are selling on a ten year term. There is considerable agitation to make it more than ten years but there is no question but that the school land fund is to-day at a much higher figure than it would be if a shorter term were fixed.

Mr. MURPHY: Could sales not be made for cash under the clause?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Cash could be paid and a man could get title but I would not be empowered to offer land for sale for cash by auction. I would not be prepared to make the term cash. On the other hand, if a man purchased land and afterwards desired to pay cash he could do so. But, according to the terms, a man will not be asked to come in and bid at auction against another man who is able to pay cash.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the practical application under this last section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For example, John Smith buys a section of land at auction on the 20-year amortization plan. Then the minister is empowered to allow John Smith to pay the whole thing right off or any part of it at any time.

Mr. McMASTER: The last paragraph of the section says:

> The Minister may give such privileges of prepayment of instalments as he may deem fit.

Would that go so far as to allow the minister to give a heavy discount on prepayment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I would never give any discount at all. I do not think I would be empowered to do so.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—application to Dominion lands in Manitoba:

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): What legislation is contemplated by the province of Manitoba?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not like to say than any legislation is contemplated. That would be for the government of that province to say. But if they pass any legislation it should be legislation under which we could undertake works of this kind.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): That is what is called "the necessary legislation" in this clause?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It means legislation similar to the reclamation Acts of Saskatchewan and Alberta—any legislation under which we could operate.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Do the swamp lands in Manitoba belong to the Dominion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My recollection is that they once belonged to Manitoba, that we bought them back and paid a very large sum of money for them. Now, we propose to drain them at the expense of the Dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They belong to the Dominion. We cannot under this Bill, unless they pass an Act, do anything in the way of drainage. There were representations made to myself that it would be well to investigate the possibility of draining one of the larger lakes of the province.

An hon. MEMBER: Lake Manitoba?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Lake Manitoba. We have not seriously considered it as yet, because there is no Act in force in that province under which we could operate. The opinion is also held that there are other surface waters in that province that should be drained first, and that it would pay us to undertake inasmuch as the lands are ours.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The minister referred yesterday to the added territory of Manitoba. I did not quite catch the connection in which the reference was made, and I was wondering if that part of Manitoba was affected differently from the rest of the province?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did draw a distinction between the jurisdiction of the Dominion in respect of the older part of Manitoba and the added territory, and the distinction is this: Under the Irrigation Act, passed in 1894, the Dominion asserted control over the surface waters of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and the territories now embraced within the added district of Manitoba. That control the Dominion asserted and now has in respect of those territories. The Dominion also has control of the Crown lands in the old portion of Manitoba, but none over the surface waters. We could, however, do reclamation work in the old portion of Manitoba if there were adequate provincial laws under which we could operate. The only difficulty is that the old Irrigation Act does not apply to the old portion of Manitoba.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Does subsection (b) of section 5 apply to lands in all the provinces of Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it is intended to apply to the work that is gone on with in any province by arrangement with the Provincial Government. That is the intention. I would not like to indicate that it was likely any arrangement could be made, or that it would be wise to make it. This Act is for the purpose of reclaiming lands in the Dominion of Canada for the benefit of the Dominion.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Will the minister say in what year the Dominion purchased the swamp lands of Manitoba?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Dominion took back the swamp lands in the year 1912. That was part of the terms of the settlement of 1912, by which the subsidy provisions applicable to Manitoba were raised to the standard of those of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It seems to me that we incurred a liability at that time that we were not expecting. Prior to that date the swamp lands belonged to the province of Manitoba, and it would have been better for us, perhaps, if, as was insisted at the time by hon. members on this side of the House, the Government had left the title of those lands in the provincial government instead of vesting the title in this Government. It was done, as I understood at the time, as a pretext to enable the Dominion Government to give some money to Manitoba, to conciliate Manitoba by handing out to it Dominion cash. In that way we incurred the liability of looking after those swamp lands, which has now come back on us and is going to be a bill of expense for some years to come.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman should not get the impression that because the lands are capable of improvement they are a liability. If they were not capable of improvement they would be a liability, but the very passage of this legislation is an assumption that the lands are capable of improvement. The great part of the swamp lands of Manitoba are valuable; and I have not the slightest doubt that they are much more valuable than they were in 1912 when taken over by the Dominion. If this Bill passes it will make them still more valuable.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My object was to point out to the hon. gentleman that the policy advocated on this side of the House at the time was to leave those lands to Manitoba to drain and look after. By refusing to accept the course advocated by hon. gentlemen on this side, the Government has assumed the ownership of these swamp lands, and we are required to spend large sums of money in making them fit for occupancy, which liability should have been undertaken by the province of Manitoba.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will get the money all back, perhaps a hundred or two hundredfold more. What will the hon. member say then?

Mr. McMASTER: Does the minister say two hundredfold?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps a hundred or two hundredfold, I would expect so. If these lands are worth $25 an acre, the price at which some of the lands in the neighbourhood are sold, it would represent two and a half times the estimated cost of reclamation.

Mr. KAY: Where reclaimed lands are sold by auction, is it intended there shall be an upset price?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, always.

Mr. MURPHY: Has anything been done towards the drainage of lake Manitoba, or is it intended to do anything of that nature in the near future?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing has been done, nor can I say that anything is intended immediately in that direction. It is possible that Manitoba may pass an Act which would enable us to operate in that province, in which event we would take into consideration the possibility and the wisdom of draining that lake, among perhaps other experiments that may be tried. For myself I would not like even to indicate an opinion that it would be the part of wisdom to attempt to drain the lake.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Director of Reclamation Service.

Mr. ROBB: Who is that officer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Drake, who is sitting in front of me.

On section 7—Annual Report.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I do not see anything in this Bill which authorizes the expenditure of money. Is there any limit to the amount which the Government should spend? Will the minister point out the clause bearing on this point?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the first subsection of subsection 2 providing for defraying the cost "out of moneys set apart by Parliament for that purpose."

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will there be an estimate brought down?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

UNITS OF ELECTRICAL MEASURE.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, Bill No. 17, respecting the Units of Electrical Measure, was read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

On section 2—ohm, ampere, volt:

Mr. DEVLIN: There is a word in this section which I do not understand. It is the word "ohm"—it sounds German. Would the minister tell us what that word means?

Mr. MACLEAN: The definition is in the Act. Technically speaking, the ohm is the method of measuring the resistance of electricity as it proceeds through the conductor. I think the word is of German origin. In 1893 a conference was held at Chicago to fix electrical standards—the standard of quantity, which is known as the ampere, and the standard of pressure, which is known as the volt. The international arrangement reached at Chicago in 1893 was put into the form of legislation, in 1903, I think, and is to be found in Chapter 53 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. In 1908 another conference was held at London and the standards of electrical measurement adopted by the Chicago conference were amended in a few respects, chiefly technical. The standards adopted at the London conference in 1908 were adopted by all the leading nations of the world there represented. Since that time these nations have put into the form of legislation the standards adopted at that conference, and the purpose of this Bill is to put into statutory form in Canada the agreement reached respecting the adoption of electrical standards of measurement. This Bill should have been introduced in 1911. At that time the Department of Weights and Measures was under the Inland Revenue Department, and someone facetiously remarked to me to-day that the reason why the Bill was not introduced before was because ministers were leaving that Department so frequently that there was no time to gain even a passing acquaintance with the matter. The Bill is in the same form as that adopted by England, United States, Germany and all the leading countries of the world.

Section agreed to.

On the schedule:

Mr. McMASTER: Can the minister explain the algebraic formula given at the top of page three of the Bill? It is beyond me.

Mr. MACLEAN: I would rather promise to afford any hon. friend an opportunity of having that explained privately by the technical officers of the Department. I shall be glad at any time to make an arrangement with him to that effect.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT.—LOBSTERS.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, (Acting Minister of Naval Service), the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Meat and Canned Foods Act, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1907, as amended by chapter thirty-three of the statutes of 1917, by providing for the more exact definition of dry lobster meat, for the sizes of cans for canning lobsters, and the amount of the contents thereof.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister explain?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I purpose merely advancing this resolution another stage, and later on, it will be taken charge of by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), when he returns to the House. I shall, however, give a brief explanation of it. The purpose of this resolution and of the Bill which will be founded on it, is to determine the weight of dry lobster meat in the various sized cans. In 1917, the weight of dry lobster meat contained in cans was fixed by Statute. I am reading from section 12 (d) of the Act of 1917:

Cans of lobster shall contain the following minimum amounts of dry lobster meat:—

1 lb. can, 14 ounces, avoirdupois; ¾ lb. can, 10½ ounces, avoirdupois; ½ lb. can, 7 ounces, avoirdupois; ¼ lb. can, 3½ ounces, avoirdupois.

It is further provided that:

No other size of can shall be packed unless the written permission of the minister has first been obtained.

At the last session of Parliament, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries introduced a Bill for the purpose of amending the section which I have just read. That Bill, I think, passed the House of Commons, but was defeated in the Senate. It is unnecessary for me to state the provisions of that Bill inasmuch as it did not become law. There was apparently a great deal of opposition in the eastern provinces, which alone are interested in the lobster canning industry, to the provisions of the Bill which was introduced last year. Since the close of the last session of Parliament, a conference was held during the summer of 1918 at Halifax. That conference was, I believe, quite representative of all those interested in the lobster canning business, and a conclusion was reached by those interested, and the fishermen, or producers of the lobsters. The conclusions arrived at are embodied in this resolution. The Bill, which I shall introduce on the passage of this resolution, provides:

There shall be four sizes of cans for canning lobsters. The cans of each size shall always contain not less than 3 ounces avoirdupois, 6 ounces avoirdupois, 9 ounces avoirdupois, and 12 ounces avoirdupois respectively, of dry lobster meat.

No other size of can shall be used for packing lobsters without first obtaining the written permission of the minister. Such written permission shall state the minimum amount of dry lobster meat that is to be packed in each size of can so authorized.

That will give to the committee substantially the purpose of the legislation which will be founded upon this resolution. After the Bill is printed, hon. gentlemen will perhaps find the proposed measure much easier to understand, and it will remain upon the Order Paper for some time yet, at least until the return of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the House.

Mr. COPP: I understand that in 1907 an Act was passed making regulations in regard to the weight of lobster meat to be packed in each of the different sized cans used in packing lobsters. That Act was amended in 1917, and I think the weights were increased. The matter was discussed by a special committee of which I was a member. We recommended that the weights be 14 ounces, 10½ ounces, 7 ounces and 3 ounces respectively, as contained in the Act of 1917. Does this resolution purpose bringing the weights back to what were provided in the Act of 1907?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think my hon. friend is substantially correct. At least, it reduces the weight of lobster meat in each can as compared with the weights provided for in the Statute of 1917 as originally introduced.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. COPP: Does it bring the weights back to the same as provided for in the Act of 1907?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have not that Statute before me just at the moment, but I think my hon. friend is right.

Mr. COPP: The minister says that there was held in the city of Halifax a meeting of those interested in the packing of lobsters as well as the fishermen. I do not see how the fishermen are interested because they sell their catch to the canners at so much a pound, and then the canners pack the lobsters into cans and the minimum amounts in the different cans are provided by Statute. I remember very well that, during the discussion before the committee in 1917, a great deal of evidence was adduced to show that, as regards the lobsters which were packed by the different lobster packers throughout the Maritime provinces and which were placed on the market, the consumer was paying for a pound of lobsters, but was getting only twelve or thirteen ounces. The committee, from the evidence adduced before them, came to the conclusion that the consumer was not being fairly treated in the matter, and they made the recommendations which are contained in the Act of 1917. We should have some very good reason before consenting to reduce the weight of the can which is supposed to contain one pound of lobster meat from fourteen ounces to twelve ounces.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: No. We want some explanation on that point. It is quite true that there was a meeting of canners in Halifax, but the consumer was not represented; and if it is proposed to reduce the quantity from fourteen ounces to twelve ounces and require the consumer to pay for a can of lobster the same price that he was paying before, I am opposed to this resolution and would like to have from the minister some explanation as to why this change is being made.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Apparently one of the reasons which induced the members present at that conference to arrive at this conclusion, was that they were endeavouring to ascertain and declare the exact content of the cans now used by lobster packers. That seems to have been the principal reason for the change. As I said before, I am putting this resolution forward just one step, as I want to get the Bill printed so that hon. gentlemen may have an opportunity of studying it. I purpose circulating it in the Maritime Provinces which are the only provinces interested in the matter, and I would like the committee to permit that to be done. It will be another three or four weeks before the next step will be taken.

Mr. MURPHY: While the committee appreciates the position of the minister in charge of the resolution, the point raised by the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough is so important that it is questionable whether the committee should advance this resolution any further. If by the Bill to be founded upon it we shall be enacting legislation whereby the consumer will get less for his money than he previously got, surely legislation of that kind ought not to commend itself to hon. members.

Mr. LOGGIE: I was present at the meeting in Halifax. The object of this legislation is to have a uniform weight in the cans. It was found that some of the packers were not putting fourteen ounces in the cans. It was contended by some that a half-pound can would not hold seven ounces. Personally, I took the opposite view, and I do to-day. I think also that a quarter-pound can will hold comfortably three and-a-half ounces. However, the large packers, including Roberts, Simpson & Company, and O'Leary & Lea, who are the principal exporters of canned lobster in Canada, were practically unanimous in contending that what is known as the one-pound can would not contain fourteen ounces of dry meat,—that is, the meat after the fluid has been drained off. Of course, it is essential that the net contents should be on the label for the Canadian and American markets. The law, however, provides that cans can be exported without a label, and it is up to the legislators of the countries to which these cans are exported to protect their consumers. I do not think the consumer is being deceived, because the Canadian and American consumer can plainly see by the label what the can holds, and if the can is reasonably full, there would be no loss to the consumer. To have a can capable of holding more than is put into it is simply a waste of money. Nevertheless, the large packers were practically unanimous in asking for a standard weight of twelve ounces for what is called the pound tin. A one-pound tin does not mean that the tin contains one pound of meat. The two-pound corn can, for instance, contains only from one and-a-quarter to one and-a-half pounds net weight, so there is no greater deception in the case of these lobster cans than in the case of any other can; so long as the net contents are plainly shown on the label. As to the consumer paying more, I do not think my hon. friend's argument is at all applicable. The price is regulated by the law of supply and demand. The market regulates the price, and I do not think the change in weight will have any effect on it. Certainly, if the packers put three and-a-half ounces into a can, they should receive a higher price than for a can containing only three ounces.

Mr. McMASTER: I understand there are fourteen ounces of lobster meat in a one-pound can. What do the other two ounces consist of? Preservative?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The other two ounces consist of a liquid which is absolutely necessary to preserve the lobster meat. The lobster packers contend that the cans can not contain the quantity of lobster meat prescribed by the legislation of 1917. Many of these canners have machinery for making cans of particular sizes, and they say that, to comply with the law, they would be compelled to instal new machinery for turning out cans of a different size. That would put them to very considerable expense, and would also place them at a disadvantage—the facts have not been clearly put before me—as compared with packers in Newfoundland. The packers contend that, although the cans they are now using will not hold the quantity prescribed by law, they will hold the amount prescribed by this Bill, plus the liquid required as preservative. I might give the statutory definition of dry lobster meat:

> Dry lobster meat means the meat after a can has been opened, turned upside down so as to permit free escape of the liquid and allowed to drain one minute.

Mr. McMASTER: The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) says that there is no danger of fooling the American or Canadian consumer because the label will show the contents of the can, but apparently in the case of cans exported no questions are asked and no lies told. A can will go across the sea to the Irish consumer, for instance, without any indication of the weight of meat inside the can. It would seem to me to be in the interests of the commercial reputation and progress of this country to show plainly on the label the exact amount of edible meat contained in the can. I do not think that would put the lobster exporter at a disadvantage, but rather the contrary, because the consumer would know exactly how much edible meat he was buying.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That really was the position of the lobster canners last season. Although the cans indicated a net weight of fourteen ounces of lobster meat, the packers contended they could not possibly get that amount of meat into the one-pound can.

Mr. McMASTER: It does not make very much difference how much meat there is in the can, so long as the amount is plainly stated on the label. That would protect the commercial reputation of Canada.

Mr. LOGGIE: This matter was before the House five or six years ago when the law was being amended, and it was then pointed out that lobster for export was demanded in plain cans. The buyers in France use their own labels, and I think they have laws protecting the public in that country, as we have here; and the finding on that occasion was that for export it was allowable to let the cans go without any labels, as it would very materially interfere with the canned lobster industry if we were compelled to put labels on here, and these labels had to be taken off and the buyers' labels put on on the other side of the Atlantic.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I do not think the minister should press the resolution without some further consideration. The reasons do not appeal to me at all. We are told that in Newfoundland the can is smaller, or the quantity is smaller. The Dominion of Canada is the largest lobster packing country in the world; and why should we change the size of the can to suit the little island of Newfoundland? There is no good reason for it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not say that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Where does the uniformity come in? No lobsters are packed in the United States. We have a monopoly of the packing business outside of Newfoundland. There is no lobster packing in Europe, as far as I know. If the idea is to aim at uniformity, let us make it uniform here, without raising any question about any outside place. If we say the quantity of lobster to be put into a can must be 14 ounces, it will be uniform as far as we are concerned. It is also said that the machinery that the packers have for making their cans is not adapted to the quantity that is now put into the cans.

[Mr. McMaster.]

That is not a good reason. It may be a reason for one season, or for some temporary arrangement, but it is not a sufficient reason for the passing of an Act. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) says that changing the weight would not affect the price. That is quite true, but it affects the quantity you get out of the can.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think this is in the interests of the consumer, because he will know the exact quantity of lobster meat he is buying. Heretofore he was deceived, because lobsters were sold by the pound can, three-quarter pound, and half-pound cans, and naturally the purchaser believed he was obtaining 16 ounces of lobster meat in the pound can, whereas it was impossible for the can to hold 16 ounces, since it had to contain a certain amount of liquid preservative. The purpose of this Bill is to fix the number of ounces of lobster meat that will be contained in the can. It is in the interest of the consumer just as much as of anybody else, because every provision is being put into the Bill to safeguard the consumer. With regard to the lobster canner, I think the position he takes is perfectly sound. The law required him to put a certain amount of lobster meat into certain cans, which he could not do. Now, I do not see who will be injured by this Bill. I think it is eminently wise legislation and that the committee should accept it.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT.

The House resumed consideration in committee of the whole on the resolution to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. COPP: Mr. Chairman, it is not my desire to offer any factious opposition to the resolution, but I feel that the minister has not given a sufficiently satisfactory argument to this committee why it should be passed at the present time. He tells us that some time last summer the lobster packers of the Maritime Provinces, in conclave at Halifax, had come to the conclusion that some change should be made in the Meat and Canned Foods Act by decreasing the amount of dry lobster meat that they should be required to place in a pound, three-quarter pound, half-pound, or quarter-pound cans. During the dinner recess I looked up the Act of 1907 which provides for making regulations in regard to canned meats and foods. In that Act I could not find any regulation by which the container, or can, should contain a certain number of ounces of dry lobster meat.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There was no legislation prior to 1917.

Mr. COPP: During the session of 1917, as hon. gentlemen who acted on the Committee of Marine and Fisheries will remember, and at the time when Sir Douglas Hazen was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, this matter came before the committee and we were very much surprised, if not astounded, to learn that when we were buying what we supposed to be a pound of lobster we were getting not more than from ten to thirteen ounces instead of sixteen ounces as everybody naturally supposed. The explanation made at that time by those who were interested in the lobster packing business was that it had got to be a sort of unwritten law amongst themselves that they would not put sixteen ounces in a pound can but they would put whatever the packer saw fit. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries of that day, realizing the importance of this matter, took a very great interest in it and, coming as he did from the Maritime Provinces, he had a very general knowledge of the situation. He and his staff at that time realized the importance of putting on the statute books a legal definition of what should be known as a pound, three-quarter pound, half pound and quarter pound can of lobster, so that the buyer might really get the amount specified in the can. That was only reasonable and proper. What happened? That committee sat day after day during a large portion of the session. Finally they agreed upon the matter and recommended that what was known as a pound can should contain fourteen ounces, a three-quarter pound can ten and a fraction ounces, and so forth. When the committee recommended this the lobster packers pointed out that owing to the fact that it was getting along in the spring and they were preparing for lobster fishing, they having to prepare their cans a year ahead, they were going to have a lot of those cans upon their hands which would be a waste and a loss to them. To meet their views the committee placed a rider in the Act saying that the Act should not come into force until December 15, 1918. Therefore, this Act has never come into force at all because there has been no lobster packing in the Maritime Provinces since that date. Then what happened? The lobster packers meet and say: We are not going to have this put in force at all; it will not affect us now, and we will apply to Parliament and have it changed and put back to where it was prior to the introduction of this legislation in 1917. This Parliament after due and careful consideration legislated upon this subject, placed before the public what a can of lobster should contain and delayed the operation of the Act until the 15th day of December, 1918.

And now, only three months after that law was to go into effect, legislation is proposed to do away with it altogether. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) tells the Acting Minister of the Naval Service, this afternoon, that he attended that convention in Halifax, and, as a practical lobster packer, stated that he was not in favour of reducing the weight of the dry lobster meat in these cans; some argued that the cans they were using for the purpose were not large enough to contain sufficient liquid to preserve the lobster properly while it was in transit and before it was sold to the consumer. The hon. gentleman, from practical experience, must know that the can is sufficiently large, because he advocated this afternoon that what is commonly termed the pound can should contain fourteen ounces of dry lobster meat. I am sure there is not a man in this House who has a better understanding of the conditions of the lobster packing industry than my hon. friend from Northumberland, and yet he says he advocated, at the convention of lobster packers referred to, that the weight of the can should remain as specified in the legislation of 1917. Having come to the conclusion, after considerable investigation and inquiry, that the Act placed upon the statute book at that time was a proper one, why the necessity for this change? That Act was not to come into force until December 15, 1918, which gave the lobster packers every opportunity to prepare themselves for the required change. They have made no preparation, so far as I can see, and yet they come back and ask—I presume they have asked, although we have had no evidence that they are making any particular demand, except the minister says that the packers met at Halifax and thought some change should be made for some trifling reason, which to my mind is not satisfactory evidence—that we should make this change at the present time. If there is any evidence in favour of making the change my mind is open to conviction. But, Sir, although I come from a constituency in which a large number of lobster packers operate, not one of them has spoken to me in reference to this proposed change. All the evidence in support of it that we have is, simply the Acting Minister of Naval Service coming forward and asking for the passage of this resolution. I say candidly that in my opinion better evidence and more conclusive arguments should be advanced before we are asked to undo what we did in 1917.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: If my hon. friend thinks that the conclusion reached by the Fisheries Committee in 1917 was a wise one, he should criticise quite severely the legislation which was then passed, because the Act does not embody the conclusions of the committee. In 1917, for the first time, a Bill was introduced defining what should be the quantity of dry lobster meat in the several cans. Cans of certain sizes had been in use in the lobster industry for a great many years. They were known as the pound can, the three-quarter-pound can, and the half-pound can, and it was known to the public—at least to everybody in the trade—that these cans did not contain sixteen ounces avoirdupois of lobster meat. A Bill was introduced into the Commons by the then Minister of Naval Affairs providing that a pound can should contain thirteen ounces of lobster meat; a three-quarter-pound can, nine and three quarter ounces; a half-pound can six and a half ounces; and a quarter-pound can three and a quarter ounces.

Mr. COPP: When was that Bill passed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill containing those provisions was introduced by the minister in 1917. It was referred to the Fisheries Committee and was there amended to the effect—so I am instructed by the officers of the department—that the pound cans should contain sixteen ounces of dry lobster meat.

Mr. ROBB: Had not that been the custom for many years, that there should be sixteen ounces to the pound can?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There never was any legislation whatever upon the subject prior to 1917.

Mr. ROBB: But sixteen ounces was in accordance with the custom of the trade?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A standard can was in use in the lobster canning industry, but there was no statute requiring that there should be any stated number of ounces of lobster meat in the can. That was required for the first time in the legislation of 1917. I am informed that the Bill, as amended by the Commons, went to the Senate, where it was again amended to the effect that a pound can should contain fourteen ounces, which apparently was one ounce more than was demanded by the Bill as originally introduced. Apparently, the fourteen-ounce provision was a compromise. Now these cans, while selling as pound cans of lobster, never did contain sixteen ounces of meat. The Department last year purchased a great number of cans in order to determine the average quantity of lobster meat which each can contained. I will give the Committee the weight of dry meat in six cans that were purchased, these being the products of Canadian canneries.

No.	Weight of contents.
1	12·38 ounces
2	11·89 ounces
3	13·41 ounces
4	11·57 ounces
5	12·38 ounces
6	11·38 ounces

It will therefore be seen that the average content of the pound lobster can was about twelve ounces —sometimes a little over, sometimes a little less. In Newfoundland the average weight in a can of lobster is just about the same as in Canada. That was an undesirable condition of affairs, and I cannot understand how any hon. gentleman can argue that it is at all proper, from the public standpoint, or from the standpoint of the consumer, who has a right to know the exact content of any container in which food is placed. The purpose of this Bill, and it is quite in harmony with recent legislation, is to provide that there shall be four sizes of cans for canning lobsters. The cans of each size shall each contain no less than three ounces avoirdupois, six ounces avoirdupois, nine ounces avoirdupois, and twelve ounces avoirdupois respectively of dry lobster meat. Further, each can must have a label giving the name of the packer, and the exact quantity of lobster meat that the can contains. Now, we have never had legislation before to that effect. I think that such legislation is eminently desirable and proper.

Mr. DUFF: If these cans are marked, will they be marked "1 pound" or "12 ounces?"

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They will be marked 12 ounces, 9 ounces, 6 ounces, 3 ounces. Heretofore the cans have been known as pound cans, three-quarter-pound cans, half-pound cans and one-quarter-pound cans. These designations have been misleading to the consuming public, for the cans do not contain that exact amount of lobster meat, for the reason that in the export trade the cans must contain a certain amount of liquid as a preservative. The principle of the legislation is, therefore, to compel canners to use not more than four different sizes of cans without the written permission of the minister. These cans must contain a definite minimum amount of lobster meat, the amount to be stated on the label. Therefore, from the standpoint of the public and of the consumer, the legislation is fair and should have been enacted long ago. My hon. friend says that the Bill of 1917 did not become effective until December 15 of last year. That is quite true, but the legislation was suspended, not for the reason that he gives, but because the canners had on hand a large quantity of labels and wanted to dispose of them before the Act came into effect. The same is true of British Columbia. Certain canning industries there are compelled by virtue of the Canned Foods Act to print upon the labels additional matter; they still have on their hands a considerable quantity of old labels and they desire that the application of the Act be postponed until the labels which they now have on hand are used.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the weight of the dry meat is to be stated on the label, the present labels would not be suitable; they would have to be re-printed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, if the legislation is changed, new labels will probably have to be printed. However, that is not important. Under the statute of 1917, every canner of fish must apply to the can a label setting forth a true and correct description of the contents of the can, including the vernacular name and the minimum net weight of the fish in the can plainly printed in a conspicuous manner, and stating the name of the place where the same was packed. Now, the canners have been using a standard can for a long number of years. That standard can is known to the Canadian trade and to the export trade, and naturally the canners do not wish to change its size. They say—and I believe it is true,—that they cannot get into this can fourteen ounces of lobster meat without doing danger to the meat. It may be done in some cases, but in the majority of the cases it is not done, and the purchaser thinks that he is buying sixteen ounces of lobster meat. The canner asks that he be permitted to place in these cans the amount of lobster meat which the can will reasonably hold. The public are protected in the fact that the canner must state upon the label the exact amount of lobster meat in the can.

Mr. McKENZIE: Did the request for this legislation come from the exporters, or from the consuming public?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Well, I suppose it originated with the lobster canners. I have informed the committee of the action of the fisheries convention at Halifax, at which it was decided that legislation should be introduced as set forth in the resolution. It cannot be said that this legislation is in the interest of the canners only; it is equally in the interest of the consuming public.

Mr. COPP: Apparently my hon. friend has misunderstood my argument in regard to this matter. I understand that this proposed legislation, except in so far as it reduces the amount of dry lobster meat to be placed in the cans, does not change the legislation of 1917. My hon. friend's suggestion that we should have this legislation in order to secure uniformity, is not an answer to my argument. The point I make is that we now have this legislation on the statute book; why make the change?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: For this reason: The statute of 1917 provided that a pound can should contain fourteen ounces of lobster meat; the trade says that is impossible. If the trade is right in its representation, the amendment is a proper one.

Mr. COPP: What evidence can the minister give the committee that the trade is right in stating that fourteen ounces of lobster meat cannot be put into a pound can?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have already given my hon. friend the reasons. At a conference attended by the lobster canners of the Maritime provinces and technical officers of the Fisheries Department, it was agreed that twelve ounces would be the proper statutory requirement for the pound can, because the greater quantity could not well be placed there. It may be partly a compromise; I do not say that you could not put twelve and-a-half ounces in the can, or that some packers could not put thirteen in it. But it is better to say that every can of lobster must contain a specified quantity of lobster meat, than to say that a pound can shall contain fourteen ounces, when in all human probability it cannot contain that amount.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend is like myself, not an expert, and he says that the officials in the Fisheries Department are. The officials in the department here who have charge of the fisheries, were before the Committee, and that was not the information they gave, nor was it the information upon which the Committee made their recommendations to this House. Let me quote the words of one whom I consider an expert in the matter—and I am sure the minister will agree with me in calling him an expert—a man who has quite as good a reputation in the fishery business as some of the officials in the Department of Marine and Fisheries. In this House, on September 6th, 1917, the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. Loggie), who has a very great interest in this matter, made these remarks which will be found on page 5426 of the revised Hansard:

> Mr. Loggie: I happen to be a member of the committee to which this Bill was referred but unfortunately I was absent when it was under discussion. I certainly would not have given my assent to the report of the committee as it came before the House, nor to the Bill as it passed the House and went to the Senate. As to the contents of tins, whether they should be 16 ounces of dry meat, or 13, or 14, or 15 ounces, that is a matter of opinion. It has not been the practice to put 16 ounces of dry meat in a pound can of lobster for a good many years.

He does not say that it could not be done, but that it has not been the practice for a good many years. Evidently it must be inferred that, for a good many years, packers of lobsters in the Maritime provinces honestly wanted to give the consumer 16 ounces to the pound, and that for a good many years they did that. But, he says, that for a good many years they have not been putting in 16 ounces. He continues:

> Dry lobsters are not considered as acceptable to the trade as those that have a little juice in the can when it is opened. It has been the practice for many years by most packers to put 15 ounces of meat in a pound can and one ounce of pickle.

If it was the practice for many years to put into the can fifteen ounces avoirdupois of dry lobster meat with one ounce of pickle to preserve it, surely the same can might now be held to contain at least fourteen ounces of dry meat and one ounce of pickle. My hon. friend said that I was altogether wrong with regard to the reason why the coming into force of the Act was delayed until the 15th December, 1918. If I remember correctly, he was not a member of that committee and did not hear the arguments adduced before it. I had the privilege of being present, and I took some interest in the discussion; and while I will not say that the question of labels was not considered at all, I have a very distinct recollection that one of the strongest arguments made for delaying the coming into force of the Act 15th December, 1918, was that many of the lobster packers had their cans ready for that year's operation; further that they had the machinery for making the cans, and it would mean quite a loss to them if they had to change that machinery before another year's operations.

Mr. LOGGIE: Who gave the evidence regarding the machinery?

Mr. COPP: Quite a large number of those who professed to know the lobster business gave the information to the Committee. My hon. friend himself gave some information with regard to it.

Mr. LOGGIE: Not to that effect.

Mr. COPP: And he gave information, as he gave the House information in 1917, that the cans for many years contained fifteen ounces of lobster meat. He advises us now that there should be at least fourteen ounces of dry lobster meat in the one-pound cans. He is prepared to stand behind the recommendation that was made by that committee. He told the acting minister, before the dinner recess, that at the conference at Halifax he advised the delegates not to make application for a change. I am not taking the ground that the cans should not be labelled; that the packer's name should not be on the can; nor that the amount of dry lobster meat should not be stated on the can. My hon. friend apparently misunderstands my position. I say that those regulations are placed in the statute book now and they have never been in operation since Parliament passed the legislation; and now, to suit the whim of a few individuals—and he does not give the Committee the advantage of knowing who is making application for this change—he asks Parliament to change the enactments made in 1917 and not coming into force until December, 1918. He says that we were all wrong then and that we should go back to the time when the lobster packers were imposing upon the consumer a one-pound can which, as my hon. friend stated to-night, contained only twelve or sometimes thirteen ounces. Until we have further information, this committee should not be asked to pass this resolution, nor the House to pass the Bill to be founded on it.

Mr. LOGGIE: I presume the hon. member (Mr. Copp) was a member of the Marine and Fisheries Committee when they asked this House to pass the legislation making the net weight thirteen ounces. That recommendation for a thirteen-ounce can came from the Marine and Fisheries Committee. When it came before this House, I was absent. This House changed the weight, making it sixteen ounces, and sent the Bill up to the Senate. The Senate rejected it, and it came back to this House, and the weight was compromised at fourteen ounces. Thus it became effective on the day the hon. gentleman has mentioned. Let me tell the Committee why this legislation is asked for.

Mr. COPP: That is what we are endeavouring to find out.

Mr. LOGGIE: A number of years ago, Parliament passed an Act to provide that all canned goods should bear a statement of net weight.

Mr. COPP: When was that passed?

Mr. LOGGIE: I cannot recall exactly, but it was quite a number of years ago. I am not sure whether the net weight was to be on the can or not, but the name of the firm was to be set out on the label. On account of that and because of legislation in the United States that compelled all packers to put on the label the net contents of the can, it became desirable that a similar law should become effective in Canada.

Mr. COPP: Was that after reciprocity was defeated or before?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In what year was reciprocity defeated?

Mr. LOGGIE: I can recall in what year reciprocity was defeated, but that has nothing to do with this matter. The reason for this legislation is that the Department of Marine and Fisheries have asked that a standard weight be made law as to the net contents of a can of lobster.

Mr. COPP: We have that now.

Mr. LOGGIE: My hon. friend is asking why this legislation was asked for. I am pointing out that the demand came from the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. COPP: And we answered the demand.

Mr. LOGGIE: The Marine and Fisheries Committee in 1917, recommended thirteen ounces. The House, however, made the net weight sixteen ounces, and in the Senate this was changed to fourteen ounces. The acting minister spoke of six cans the net contents of not one of which weighed fourteen ounces. There is a difference of two ounces in some cases. The object of this legislation is to have a uniform weight. Personally, I have no objection to the law as it now stands, but the majority of the large packers when they met in Halifax decided that twelve ounces should be the standard weight.

Mr. COPP: That is more profitable for them than sixteen ounces.

Mr. LOGGIE: The selling price is based on the net contents. This legislation has been in contemplation for some time, and some of the packers have their labels marked at fourteen ounces—

Mr. COPP: What right had they to assume that Parliament would pass this legislation?

Mr. LOGGIE: Fourteen ounces is the weight under the present law. I have already told my friend that the law in the United States requires the net weight to be shown on the label on every can of lobster entering the United States for consumption there. That has been the law for some years, and when we were getting labels we naturally had the net weight shown on them. So far as the company in which I am interested is concerned, the net weight on the label is fourteen ounces for the pound can, and seven ounces for the half-pound. Personally, I favour fourteen ounces, but I am willing to bow to the wishes of the majority.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend is prepared to lose the money he has spent on labels, because of the extra profit he will make by reason of the reduction of the net contents of the can by two ounces.

Mr. LOGGIE: I am extremely obliged for the hon. gentleman's interpretation. After all, it is not a very serious matter to have the labels stamped. I have been in the unfortunate situation of sending cans into the United States without the net weight being shown on the labels and have had to remove the cans from the boxes and have them stamped—the existing law was not in effect in the United States when we had the labels made. If Parliament prescribes the weight in this case to be twelve ounces, I shall be very glad to conform to the law, although I prefer the fourteen-ounce can. Many years ago there seemed to be a demand for what we call dry lobster, but conditions have changed and the trade now seems to want a lobster with some liquid in the can. The mode of packing is changed from time to time to conform with the public's taste. The hon. gentleman knows that in the lobster itself there is some liquid, and now the packers put in half an ounce or an ounce of pickle, because the can would not be acceptable to buyers without some liquid.

Mr. CuPP: The hon. gentleman has not answered my question with regard to the reduction in the contents by two ounces.

Mr. LEGER: The reasons advanced for this legislation do not satisfy me of its necessity. Why cannot a can be made to hold sixteen ounces of lobster? If the present cans are not large enough, why not make larger cans? In the district from which I come lobsters are bought by the pound, and if the weight in the can is to be reduced to twelve ounces, the consumer will lose two or three ounces on every pound he buys. Furthermore, what consideration is being given to the fisherman? The packers when buying from the fishermen demand sixteen ounces to the pound. It would seem to me that the consumer has been defrauded of a few ounces on every can he has bought for a great many years. I used to think I was getting a pound of lobster when I bought one of these cans, but now I find I was being cheated out of two or three ounces every time. One would think a lobster was one of the precious metals, which weigh twelve ounces to the pound. I think we should fix a standard weight, and if the cans the packers are now using will not hold a pound let them make larger cans, rather than pass eleven or twelve ounces off for a pound.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I do not think the minister ought to press the resolution after the discussion we have just heard. The main reason he gives us is that you could not get more than fourteen ounces, or at least more than twelve ounces, properly into a can. My hon. friend from Northumberland, who is a well known packer and who knows the trade as well as any man in the Maritime Provinces, is able to put fourteen ounces into the can. He does not say you cannot put fourteen ounces in, and his view is evidently directly opposed to that of the minister. We are told that the packers from the Maritime Provinces met in Halifax and decided that a twelve ounce can would be better than a fourteen ounce can. Why? Because they would save that much of the meat. They will not sell that can for one cent less than the can containing fourteen ounces. I have just been making a calculation, and on the pack in the Maritime Provinces, they will save no less than about $400,000 if this Bill passes, while the consumer will lose to that extent. Now, that is why the packers were unanimous in the matter. Of course, they would be unanimous! And next year they might be unanimous in the opinion that ten ounces would be sufficient to put into a pound can. These arguments do not convince me at all, and I do not believe they convince the minister. I think this matter ought to be delayed until further investigation has been made. Questions of this kind are generally referred to the Marine and Fisheries Committee.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend might have patience enough until there is something to refer to the committee. It was my intention, and still is, that the Bill should go to the committee.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: But the resolution?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The resolution cannot go to the committee; my hon. friend knows that. When the Bill is introduced it will go to the committee.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: If we pass this resolution it means that we have consented to the principle of the Bill, and that is the reason I ask that the resolution be withdrawn.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think that inasmuch as a Bill similar to this, when introduced in 1917, was sent to the Committee on Fisheries, it will be only proper that this proposed Bill should go to the same committee. But you cannot manufacture a Bill in a minute. Unfortunately the rules of Parliament demand—and without any good purpose, in my opinion—that a Bill of this character should be preceded by a resolution.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the reason?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Oh, I do not want to go into that question just now; but generally speaking, the reason is because the measure involves expenditure of public money. It is very difficult to 9 p.m. see why this particular Bill should require a resolution. Personally I do not believe that any Bill should require a resolution, and I hope that some day the rule in this respect will be amended.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that any money Bill requires a resolution. That is the practice. But why does this Bill require a resolution? Does it require any expenditure of public money?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This Bill is only emendatory of the Meats and Canned Foods Act, which involves an expenditure of money for inspection and other purposes. If the Bill were to be considered just by itself, possibly no resolution would be required; but it is the opinion of the law officer of the House that the Bill must be preceded by a resolution. Now as soon as the Bill is introduced it will go to the committee. I fail to see why hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed to think that the public interests will suffer by reason of this Bill. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Leger) thinks that it is a very dangerous principle to reduce the content of any can, or rather he expressed surprise that a container contains a given number of ounces. My hon. friend might as well suggest that a barrel of flour which has contained 196 pounds for a number of years should be made to contain 200 or 201, or something like that. There is no particular virtue about fourteen ounces as the quantity that a lobster can should contain. In fact, 12 ounces is a much better weight because it is three-quarters of a pound, and the content is more easily calculated by the purchasing public; and I would say that upon that ground, if I were asked for my personal judgment, it would be better to have a twelve-ounce than a fourteen-ounce can. But I have told the committee——

Mr. ROBB: Would a sixteen-ounce can not be much better and more satisfactory to the public?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Possibly it might; but gentlemen who know something about the business, and who are in a position to speak authoritatively on the matter, say that you cannot get sixteen ounces into the present can, which is a well-established container.

Mr. ROBB: Make the can larger.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: True, you can make the can larger; and you can make the flour barrel larger so as to contain 200 pounds. These are simply standardized measures, and so long as the public know the standard measurement no interest can suffer.

Mr. LEGER: The hon. minister says that the barrel containing 196 pounds of flour might be made to contain 200 or 201 pounds. We never calculate a barrel of flour on more than 196 pounds; it is marked on it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Therefore if a pound can of lobster contains twelve ounces, there would be no purpose in calculating on thirteen, or fourteen ounces or anything else, because it is a standard weight. This Bill proposes to establish the standards of weights in four certain sizes of cans for packing lobster.

Mr. COPP: What would you say if the millers came and asked you to change the law so that they could put 165 pounds into their barrels?

Mr. LEGER: If the committee desire to put fourteen ounces into the can, I would like it to be understood that the fishermen shall get fourteen ounces too.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think we can all agree that the fishermen will get it. Now, as I said in response to the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), it was my intention that the Bill to be founded on this resolution shall be referred to a committee, who, if they see fit, may again have a hearing of witnesses, just as in 1917.

Mr. TURGEON: It has been stated by the Acting Minister of Fisheries that it had been the custom for years to have no special weight of lobster in the can, and that packers placed anywhere between twelve and sixteen ounces of the dry fish in the can, and that the reason why legislation had been introduced was that public opinion compelled it. The public had found out that on many an occasion they had been deceived, and that instead of getting fourteen or fifteen ounces of dry lobster, they were getting twelve ounces and paying for a pound. That, as I understand it, was the reason for the introduction of legislation. The hon. member for Northumberland is one of the largest packers, and controls perhaps over forty canneries in New Brunswick, half of them in the county of Gloucester which I have the honour to represent. We had him as an authority before the committee. He had not been satisfied when the committee originally recommended that sixteen ounces be placed in the can in order to satisfy the public that they were getting value for what they were paying. After an experience of forty years in the business, the largest canner in the Maritime provinces and the keenest of them all, he declared that he was satisfied with the decision to put fourteen ounces in the can, and that decision was accepted by everybody. I have been interested in the lobster industry all my life. I represent the largest lobster fishing county in New Brunswick. I know something about the industry, and I know that if you have fourteen ounces of dry meat in a can you have a better quality of lobster than if you have only twelve ounces. That does not matter so much to the lobster packers, if they can get a regulation adopted which will permit them to put twelve ounces in a one-pound can. The people will pay the same price for the can containing twelve ounces of dry meat as they paid for the can containing fourteen ounces. The statute passed in 1917 was not to go into effect until December, 1918, and now we have the minister asking that we cancel that legislation. The canners have no excuse now for asking that the legislation be not put into force, because they have their cans made to contain fourteen ounces of dry meat. A can containing twelve ounces of dry meat will not appeal to the public. I do not see why this resolution is brought in. The hon. member for Northumberland is willing to stand by the minister now, but in the testimony which he gave before the committee in 1917 he expressed himself as ready to accept the provision which was then made. Public opinion will be against this change, and will be more strongly against it when it is put in operation. I advise my hon. friend, as strongly and as urgently as I can, to withdraw this legislation. It will have a bad effect upon the people.

Mr. LOGGIE: In the list of cans packed that we have here, there are two that are under twelve ounces.

Mr. COPP: When were they packed?

Mr. LOGGIE: I do not know.

Mr. COPP: They were packed before there was any regulation regarding the weight at all.

Mr. LOGGIE: No, I do not think so.

Mr. COPP: There was no Act at all before the 15th December, 1918.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would not make any difference.

[Mr. Turgeon.]

Mr. LOGGIE: I do not know that it would make any difference.

Mr. COPP: I do not see why it would not make a difference if they were not packed according to this law. They were packed according to the old law, and there was not any regulation whatever.

Mr. LOGGIE: There was not any regulation until this law came into force. But the large packers, meeting at Halifax, discussed the matter fairly and openly, and contended that more than six ounces of dry lobster meat could not be put in the present half-pound can without crushing the meat too much. As for the public interest, personally I do not see how it is not protected. When I pack a can of No. 2 blueberries the net contents are not more than twenty ounces, and yet this is known as a No. 2 can to the public. In the United States they compel us to put the net weight on. The Canadian Government is doing the same thing now. The object is to make the law uniform, that tinned goods must have the net contents on the label. The Robert Simpson Company of Halifax and O'Leary & Lee, of Halifax, are by all odds the largest handlers of canned lobsters in Canada. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) has referred to the output of our firm. It is only a fraction of that of the Robert Simpson Company of Halifax. The representatives of these two leading firms, at the convention in Halifax, came to the conclusion that twelve ounces was the proper weight of dry meat.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend said this afternoon that he opposed that idea.

Mr. LOGGIE: The hon. gentleman had better understand what I did. I did not oppose that idea at Halifax; I did not take any part in the discussion. I opposed it on the floor of the House, as the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) pointed out. I said when they proposed thirteen ounces that if I had been present at the committee on Marine and Fisheries and they had suggested thirteen ounces I would have opposed it. I also said that if I had been present on the floor of Parliament when they changed it to sixteen ounces I would have opposed that. I agreed with the compromise of fourteen ounces when it came back from the Senate. That is all I said upon the matter.

Mr. TURGEON: If the hon. gentleman was satisfied with fourteen ounces at the time why is he not satisfied now?

Mr. LOGGIE: As far as I am personally concerned I am satisfied, but the majority of the packers are not satisfied.

Mr. TURGEON: If the hon. gentleman, with all his experience, was satisfied with fourteen ounces, why does he now tell the House that fourteen ounces is impracticable. The moment you put in four ounces of pickle you reduce the efficiency of the pickle to the extent of the water that you add. You may put in as much as you like but you reduce the quality of the fish. We have had water-soaked bacon upon the market. It makes it heavier but it does not improve the quality. The same thing applies to lobster.

Mr. LOGGIE: I presume from the remarks of the hon. gentleman that he is an expert, and it is fair to infer that Robert Simpson and Company, O'Leary and Lee, and the other large packers, do not know what the effect will be when there are only twelve ounces in a can instead of fourteen ounces.

Mr. DUFF: I suggest to the hon. member the effect will be that Robert Simpson and Company and the other packers will make a lot of money.

Mr. LOGGIE: I differ from the hon. gentleman. I think these goods will be sold on their merits according to the standard weight of the can; the public interest will be conserved, and no interest will suffer, in my judgment. As far as I am concerned, however, I am quite willing to abide by the decision of the committee, and I would suggest that the resolution be passed, as the minister has suggested, and that experts representing such firms as Robert Simpson and Company, and O'Leary and Lee, be sent for. Let them give their evidence before the Fisheries Committee, and then let the committee pass judgment, having heard the evidence. I have already given mine as far as I could do so.

Mr. DENIS: I strongly support the advice that has just been given by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) who has urged the Government to withdraw this resolution. My information is to the effect that when the old Parliament Buildings were burned, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) was making a speech on the lobster industry, and I think I should have the unanimous support of the committee in saying that we should now do everything in our power to avoid a repetition of that disaster.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think we ought to follow the advice of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) who has also given us the opinion of other lobster packers throughout the Maritime Provinces. My hon. friend expresses the opinion that fourteen ounces ought to be put in a one-pound can, whereas others say the contents of a can should weigh twelve ounces. To settle the matter I would suggest that the committee adopt fourteen ounces as the weight, and leave the matter as it stands now.

Mr. FIELDING: I once got into trouble —I may have mentioned this before—by saying I represented more lobsters than any other man in the House, because it so happens that the constituency from which I come is very largely interested in the lobster industry. Besides, I was present during a portion of the proceedings of the Halifax convention, although, unfortunately, I was not there at the moment when this particular subject was discussed. I understood, however, that there were some differences of opinion, and that finally the convention came to a unanimous decision in line with what the minister is now proposing. Of course, it would be fair to say that it was largely a packers convention, but it was not called as a packers convention, but as a convention of all the fishing interests. But the average fisherman in my constituency can hardly afford to separate himself from his work and travel up to Halifax to spend two or three days at a convention. Consequently such a convention, although not invariably, becomes a convention of the large operators, and it was so there. Still, a man may be a large operator and a fairly respectable individual notwithstanding, and many of the gentlemen who were present at that meeting are known to me as business men of high rank. My hon. friend from Northumberland mentioned one or two of them here, and I am quite sure the motives they had were excellent. Now there is more room for controversy in the matter than I had thought there was. I was of opinion that a settlement had been reached after the action of the Halifax convention, but it seems to me now that the proposal of the Minister that the Bill should pass in its present stage, and then be referred to a Committee where evidence can be heard, is necessary in order to meet the wishes of the House.

Mr. DECHENE: We have heard a great deal about dried fish and dried lobster. I would ask that the Committee be told whether the process used for drying lobster is the same process that is employed by Sir Joseph Flavelle for drying bacon.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there a standard measure for lobster cans?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The cans are not standardized by law, but by practice. Cans of certain sizes have been in use in the lobster industry in Nova Scotia for a great number of years.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would strike me, Mr. Chairman, that when we legislate that a can shall contain fourteen ounces and then discover that a can which has been in use for a great many years is not big enough to hold that quantity, the logical thing would be to insist upon a larger can and not cut down the statutory weight. What is the good of saying in our legislation that there must be fourteen ounces of lobster meat in a can, and then drop the legislation and say, "Oh, we forgot, the can is too small?" I think it is altogether illogical.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The statutory requirement was to the effect that a one-pound can should contain fourteen ounces avoirdupois. That is rather paradoxical in itself, and anomalous, because the public would be very apt to expect sixteen ounces avoirdupois in a pound can. When the statute referred to a pound can, what was contemplated was the standardized can in use in that particular trade in the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland. The House of Commons and the Fisheries Committee knew that it was not possible to get sixteen ounces into a can. My hon. friend is quite right as to the desirability of making the can larger so that it would hold very much more meat. The question therefore is, will you prescribe the exact weight of lobster meat which can go into the standardized can, or will you change the standard can and put in more lobster? I am quite content to have the committee settle the matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: What my hon. friend says reminds me of a case in which I was trying to help a man to get a little money to build a better house, and I was giving as an argument that the man's wife had to get down on her knees to go through the door, and the reply was made: "That would not bother me; let him get a shorter wife." I think we should be logical about this matter and protect the consuming public. There are comparatively few packers and exporters, and there are millions of people who buy cans of lobster. As protecting this very large number of people we said, "When you go to the store to buy a pound can of lobster you will get fourteen ounces of meat." Well, the public have a right to believe it because we have put it on our statutes, and there it is. Our only excuse is that we have found we made a mistake, that the can is not big enough, and we cannot make a bigger one. But the public will not accept that as a logical protection to the man who is consuming this very excellent and useful food. I think myself we will have to acknowledge we have made a mistake and should never have passed that statute, or else we should live up to it.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is done away with by the evidence of the member for Northumberland, who states that he has been able to put fourteen ounces of lobster meat in his cans. The can now used by the lobster packers in the Maritime Provinces has been in use for many years. The member for Northumberland has the reputation of being a good packer, and one of the reasons why his goods are in demand all over the country is that his cans contain honest quantities. It has been contended by the packers that a can should not contain sixteen ounces of lobster meat because there must be some liquid in the can in order to preserve the meat, and the quantity of liquid necessary was arrived at as two ounces. The experience of the member for Northumberland corroborates that; two ounces of liquid is sufficient in his business, leaving fourteen ounces of dry meat. The size of the can, therefore, has nothing to do with this legislation; we are making this change simply because the lobster packers have asked us to do so. The only question now before us is this: Is the House of Commons going to surrender to a lobster combine?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If this matter is considered by a committee, it will be competent for the committee to have packers and consumers appear before it, and judge of the merits of the case. Surely it is not asking too much to suggest that we pass the resolution so that the Bill may soon come before the Marine and Fisheries Committee.

Mr. DUFF: Why is it necessary to call the packers and the consumers here at great expense to themselves and to the country when we have the evidence on Hansard now? It would be better for the minister, when he brings down his Bill, to make the amount fourteen ounces instead of twelve.

Mr. LOGGIE: The quantity decided upon by the Marine and Fisheries Committee was thirteen ounces. The change was made by Parliament, not by the Committee.

Mr. DUFF: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the Marine and Fisheries Committee decided on fourteen ounces, and that Parliament afterwards made it thirteen.

Mr. LOGGIE: The hon. gentleman is mistaken; I said nothing of the kind. The finding of the Marine and Fisheries Committee was thirteen ounces, and this was changed by this House to sixteen ounces. The Bill went to the Senate; the Senate changed it, and this House made the quantity fourteen ounces.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPRESENTATION ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, the House proceeded to the consideration of Public Bills and Orders.

The House again in committee on Bill No. 2—Mr. Stacey—to amend the Representation Act, 1914, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. STACEY: I have but little to add to the information given to the House when this Bill was introduced. It is simply to provide that the name of my constituency be changed. It is now known as the "Electoral District of Westminster District," a somewhat cumbersome term, which is much confused with that of the adjoining district known as New Westminster. The Bill asks that the name "Electoral District of Westminster District" be changed to "Electoral District of Fraser Valley."

Mr. CAHILL: Are my hon. friend's constituents in favour of the change?

Mr. STACEY: I am pleased to say that the change is desired by all concerned, irrespective of party affilliations or relations. "Fraser Valley" is the proper and suitable name for the constituency. I am sure that hon. members on both sides of the House who know the situation are unanimous as to the suitability of the term.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, the House proceeded to the consideration of the order; "Questions."

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. What was the gross postal revenue derived from newspapers for the year 1918?
2. What is the estimated expenditure for the same year in so far as newspapers are concerned?
3. What is the average daily weight of newspapers carried in the mails?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. $291,539.21.
2. The department has no data on which a close estimate of the expenditure involved in handling newspapers can be made, except that newspapers make up about 65 per cent of the bulk of the mails. The total expenditure for the carriage of mails and the cost of mail bags during the fiscal year 1918 was $8,293,515.24.
3. 239,731 pounds.

NEW CARLISLE POSTMASTER.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Has a postmaster been appointed at New Carlisle, Quebec? If so, what is the name of the appointee.
2. Who were the applicants for the office, how were applications asked for, and how was the selection made?
3. What is the salary attached to this office?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes. Private Bertram Wilfrid Blois.
2. Pte. Bertram Wilfrid Blois, Sgt. Lionel Caldwell, Albert Mathew Caldwell, Lee R. Caldwell, Pte. Richard Flowers, George Milne Kempffer, James Octavius Shearer, Pte. M. Wheelhouse. When the office became vacant, the Civil Service Commission was asked to make a new appointment, and the selection of the new postmaster was made by the commission.
3. $1,410.

CARLETON MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Who is the contractor for the mail service at Carleton, Quebec, for the service between the railway station and Carleton, Carleton Centre and Point Bourque offices?
2. What is the amount paid, and what is the duration of the contract?
3. Has any change been made in the last two years in this service?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. N. LeBlanc.

2. $359 per annum under contract expiring 31st December, 1921.

3. Ex-Contractor Landry refused to continue the service unless granted an increase in his rate of payment. Tenders were invited in October, 1917, and a contract, dating from 24th January, 1918, awarded to N. LeBlanc, the lowest tenderer.

CANADA REGISTRATION ACT.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many persons were registered under the Canada Registration Act?
2. What is the total cost to date of said registration?
3. Are any claims yet unpaid?
4. What is the total amount of same?
5. When may the claimants expect payment?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. 5,245,606.

2. $631,230.89 including cost of compilation.

3. Yes.

4. About $15,000.

5. When the claimants have complied with the regulations, and submit necessary vouchers in support of their claims.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INFORMATION.

Mr. KAY:

1. What has been the total cost to the country of the Department of Public Information from its inception to the end of 1918?
2. How many employees are at present in the Department?
3. What is the present total cost of the department per month?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the operations of this department?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Total $81,414.84.

2. 25.

3. $4,400 per month exclusive of cost of printing and cables, which varies from month to month. At the present time these expenses paid by the department are running about $7,400 per month.

4. The matter is under the consideration of the Government, and an announcement will be made in due course.

Mr. PROULX:

1. What is the total cost from March 31, 1917, to March 31, 1918, of the Department of Public Information?
2. How many persons were employed in this Department on March 1, 1919?
3. How many branches of work are being undertaken by this department?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. The total cost of the Department of Public Information from its inception to March 31, 1918, was approximately $18,000.

[Mr. Marcil.]

2. 25.

3. Two branches, one comprising press publicity and related subjects; the other platform publicity and subjects related thereto.

CANADA REGISTRATION BOARD.

Mr. KAY:

1. Is the Canada Registration Board still in existence? If so, how many employees has it and what is the monthly cost to the country?
2. What was the total cost of registering the men and women of Canada in the summer of 1918?
3. What practical use has been made of the information secured by this registration?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. No, the services of the last employee were dispensed with February 12, 1919.

2. $491,900.44.

3. (a) Approximately 107,000 volunteers for agricultural work were secured, and names and addresses given to provincial authorities, who drew largely from this supply;

(b) A complete list of the names and addresses of French, Belgian and Italian citizens in Canada of military age was prepared, at the request of the Consuls-General, for recruiting purposes on completion of the conventions between these countries and Canada, which were in process of negotiation.

(c) The names and addresses of approximately 66,000 Russians in Canada were on application furnished to the Department of Justice.

(d) A complete tabulation, by ages, was made, showing all men physically fit, of every nationality; thereby providing accurate information as to available man-power for military purposes for use had the war continued and further drafts been necessary.

(e) Various other tables of important information gathered from the registration statistics showing the number of male persons, British born, British naturalized and of alien birth or naturalization, by constituencies, have been tabulated and will appear in the board's printed report.

(f) Tabulated information respecting the number of workmen available and skilled in various trades, to enable the best possible distribution of labour, would have been prepared had the Armistice not intervened, thereby rendering the expense of compiling this information unnecessary.

CANADIAN DAILY RECORD.

Mr. VIEN:

1. Is the Canadian Daily Record still published and distributed?

2. Up to the 1st of March inst., how many numbers have been published?
3. Where can the complete file of this Government publication be had?
4. Why is that Canadian Government publication not distributed to the members?
5. Why is not a complete file of this publication available in the members' reading room?
6. How much has the publication of this paper cost the public up to the 1st March, 1919?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.
2. 658.
3. At the office of the Director of Public Information, Hope Chambers, Ottawa.
4. The Canadian Daily Record has been printed solely for the use of Canadian soldiers overseas and copies have not been distributed in Canada. Any member of Parliament may have copies regularly addressed to him on request.

MESSRS. BRODERICK AND SOWDEN.

Sir SAM HUGHES:

1. Did Michael E. Broderick and Felix M. Sowden, of the Post Office Department, enlist for the war and go overseas?
2. Have they since returned to the Post Office Department at Ottawa?
3. Have they participated in the regular promotions which have been made in their Department?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. Promotions in the Inside Service can only be made when vacancies occur in the higher grades and are not made at regular intervals. The officers mentioned have, however, received the regular statutory increases of salary each year since they enlisted.

DORCHESTER POST OFFICE.

Mr. CANNON:

1. Has the Government opened any post offices in the County of Dorchester during the year 1917?
2. If so, where and on what dates?
3. What salary does each postmaster receive?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.
2. Anvers—Township of Cranbourne, opened January 24, 1917; Drouin—Township of Standon, opened January 25, 1917; Dijon—Township of Standon, opened September 11, 1917.
3. $60 a year.

DORCHESTER MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. CANNON:

1. Did the Government make any new contracts for the conveyance of mails in the County of Dorchester during the year 1917?
2. If so, to whom were they given, and for what routes?
3. What amounts have been paid to such mail contractors?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The following statement gives names of routes, names of the several contractors, the amount paid per annum, and the date in 1917 on which new contract went into effect and from which contractor was paid: Anvers and Culdaff, R. Bolduc, $156.50, 25th January; Cadrin and St. Anselme, A. Royer, $100, 1st January; Chemin Nelf and Standon, J. Bouffard, $160, 20th September; Dijon and St. Abdon, J. Vachon, $125, 11th September; Drouin and Standon, C. Corriveau, $190, 26th January; Fir Grove and Frampton, D. Lacasse, $930, 1st April; Frampton and Springbrook, D. Lacasse, $100, 1st April; Genest and St. Bernard de Dorchester, N. Nadeau, $49.75, 1st July; Guindon and St. Prosper de Dorchester, A. Grenier, $175, 1st October; Lacasse and Standon, P. Brousseau, $96, 1st January; O'Farrell and St. Malachie, F. Pare, $200, 1st January; Poliquin and Ste. Rose de Watford, J. Lacasse, $100, 1st October; Ste. Aurelie and St. Prosper de Dorchester, A. Vachon, $550, 22nd October; St. Bernard de Dorchester Rural Route No. 2, A. Laflamme, $425, 16th July; Ste. Henedine Rural Route No. 1, A. Royer, $400, 4th June; Ste. Henedine and Railway Station, J. Labbe, $200, 1st October; St. Prosper de Dorchester Rural Route No. 1, P. Nolet, $939, 2nd May; Ste. Rose de Watford Rural Route No. 1, L. Morin, $362, 1st April.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, the House reverted to Government Orders.

GOOD ROADS.

AID TO PROVINCES FOR HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways and Canals) the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Nickle in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that for the purpose of constructing and improving highways in Canada, the Governor in Council may authorize the payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada of the sum of twenty million dollars during the period of five years from the first day of April, 1919; which sum shall be allotted and paid as follows: (a) eighty thousand dollars each year to the Government of each province, and (b) the remainder of such sum to the Governments of the respective provinces, in proportion to the populations of the said provinces respectively, as determined by the latest Federal census of each province; and the said payments shall be subject to the following conditions: (a) any highway for which aid is granted shall be constructed or improved, as the case may be, in accordance with the terms of an agreement to be made by the minister with the Government of the province, which agreement shall contain such provisions as to cost, description, specifications or otherwise as the Governor in Council may approve; (b) the aid to be given in any case shall be forty per cent of the amount which in the opinion of the minister is the actual, necessary and reasonable cost of the construction or improvement of such highway, as the case may be; and further that regulations may be made for giving effect to the objects and purposes of this proposed legislation, and an annual report thereon shall be laid before Parliament.

Hon. Mr. REID: This is a very important resolution. If it becomes law, it means the expenditure of a very large amount of money on a very important work. I would like to have the resolution passed and the Bill introduced, and when the Bill comes before the committee we shall, of course, have a discussion as to its merits. The resolution is important for this reason: We all know that for many years the Government have been expending large amounts of money on railways and waterways, and we feel it is now necessary to expend money on our highways in order to provide proper transportation facilities for the public. A good deal has already been done towards improving our highways, but much more must be done. A very large amount of money will have to be expended almost immediately in order to bring our highways up to the proper standard. In this connection the Government have taken into consideration the necessity of providing employment for our returned soldiers as well as for other labour throughout the Dominion that is at present calling for employment. If Parliament passes the Bill to be founded on this resolution, the Dominion Government will pay a portion of the cost of the highways, the construction of which we agree to assist. The several provinces have divided their roads into three classes, which they call respectively first class, second class and third class.

The first-class roads are the main highways which carry the greatest amount of traffic. The second-class roads are the ones leading to the market centres, which do not bear so much traffic. The third-class roads are those leading up to the other two.

The intention of the Government is to assist only in the building of the first-class roads. The second-class roads are built by the provincial government and the municipalities, and the third-class roads by the municipalities.

Practically all civilized countries have received assistance in the building of roads from their central governments. In the country to the south of us, the different states of the Union started to build roads of their own accord, but afterwards the Government at Washington came to their assistance, and now a large amount is being spent by the federal government in the building and upkeep of the main highways. There are many reasons why we should have good roads. First, I believe that good roads will be of great assistance to our rural population. They will decrease the cost of transportation from the farm to the market. To-day, at certain seasons of the year it is almost impossible for farmers living twenty, or thirty, or forty miles from any large centre, such as Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton or Montreal, to reach the central markets by road. Good roads will enable them to take advantage of these central markets. Furthermore, the building of these roads will provide employment for a great many of our citizens, and particularly the returned soldiers, for whom employment must be found. Good roads will also facilitate passenger traffic between different parts of the country. In the United States quite a lot of passenger traffic is done on their main highways by means of the automobile. The value of land in the sections through which these roads will run will also be very greatly increased —to a degree, I believe, almost equal to the amount of money expended on the construction of the roads. Then we shall have a great many tourists coming to Canada, and they will naturally leave a great deal of money in this country, and many of them will no doubt like Canada so well that they will make their home here. Good roads will also save our rural population a great deal of money by the slower depreciation of their vehicles, and will add greatly to the convenience of country life. Practically the whole rural population of Canada at the present time have the telephone. Now, in case of sudden illness, with good roads and the telephone a physician could be summoned to any part of the country and could get there in quick time. I have travelled over a great many miles of the good roads of the United States, and the people there are unanimous in saying that the roads which the Federal Government has constructed are one of the greatest assets of the country.

Hon. members will remember that the House of Commons passed similar legislation to this in 1912, but that it was rejected by the Senate as that Chamber did not think public opinion would approve of money being spent on highways at that time. The Bill was passed a second time by this Chamber, but was again rejected by the Senate. At the last election the Prime Minister reaffirmed the Government's policy of assisting in the construction of national highways.

We would like to have this Bill passed for the purpose of giving employment to those who are in need of it at this time. The principal reason for it is not so much to give employment as that the work is of the utmost importance and should, we think, be proceeded with in order to facilitate transportation. If hon. members can see their way clear this evening, I would like to have the resolution passed so that the Bill may be read a first time and printed. I do not wish to urge the Bill, after it has got its first reading, until hon. members have had time to consider it and thoroughly understand what it intends.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister kindly tell the Committee if the policy of the Government in regard to this matter is the same as it was when they first introduced the Bill in 1912?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, this is not exactly the same.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the difference?

Mr. J. D. REID: The distribution of our contribution is different from what it was at that time. However, so far as that is concerned, I am willing, when it comes to the Committee, if necessary, to amend it in any way.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I really wished to ask the minister is, does the Government still adhere to the policy it adopted in 1912 as to the class of roads upon which this money is to be expended?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes; the intention at that time was to expend money only on first-class roads, and that is the intention now.

Mr. PROULX: Are the roads classified by the officers of the Dominion Government or by officers of the province?

Mr. J. D. REID: The roads will be classified on specifications to be agreed on between the Dominion and the province. After the road has been located and specifications have been agreed upon the Dominion Government will have an inspector who will see that the road is constructed in accordance with the specification, and the Dominion Government will not agree to make expenditures except on first-class roads.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER (East York): I understand that about three years ago a measure somewhat similar to this was before the House. I believe it was for the purpose of building a transcon-

10 p.m. tinental highway of a high standard, and the responsibility was to be entirely with the Dominion Government. Now you have changed your attitude somewhat by placing the responsibility of this Government upon the provincial government; that is, I understand this $20,000,000, to be spread over five years, is to be divided amongst the various provinces. Three standards of road construction are mentioned. I do not know what the specifications or standards are, but I venture to say that the standard of even No. 1 would not be sufficient for a transcontinental highway of the standard that should be built. We have a standard in the Toronto-Hamilton highway which is the best and highest of any construction in Canada, but I do not think that even that construction, if we are going to build a transcontinental highway with the increased traffic between the various centres, would be sufficient. This Government should adopt the best standard, looking to the future. They should take the responsibility, if they adopt the policy of the transcontinental highway, of the expenditure of that money. Why should we divide up this money and hand it to the provinces, whose system is one of patronage, as we know? This Government knows no patronage, and the experience with the Toronto-Hamilton highway, which was built under the provincial government, was that we got only about 60 or 65 cents on the dollar of that construction. Where did the other 35 cents go? I would say, perhaps in the way of patronage, or bad management, or lack of experience; but at any rate we did not get 100 cents on the dollar in value on that construction. Then, if that is the experience in connection with provincial work in the past, why should we hand more money over to the provinces and get only 60 cents on the dollar for the money we are going to expend? If we are going to adopt a policy of highways that means a large expenditure spread over some years, then let us have our own equipment, our own engineers, and act on our own responsibility, and see that we get full value for the money spent. There will be no patronage if the Dominion Government spends this money, but under the provincial system there is unlimited patronage, and you know what that means, so far as getting value is concerned.

I think the idea of spending money to give work to the unemployed is commendable if you can really give work to the unemployed, but as I said the other day, I am afraid that this undertaking of spending $20,000,000 by this Government will not accomplish what we would like to see accomplished. It has been stated that this is to give employment to the returned soldier. I said the other night, and I say again now, that the returned soldier is not looking for pick and shovel work, he is not going to respond to the call for that kind of employment. Then if the returned soldier does not respond, whom will you call on? The next class of unemployed are the men in the large cities. There are thousands in the various cities, but will you get any response from them? The unemployed in the cities, where they have their families and homes, will not, I think, go twenty, or thirty, or fifty miles for employment. And what class of people are they? They are not labourers; they are mechanics, and perhaps clerks, men who are not used to the pick and shovel. I venture to say they will not respond to the call to that kind of work. Well, if that class does not respond, where will you draw from? It is said that we have prepared specifications and so on and are prepared to go on with the construction. If we are, we must get men; and who will respond to the call for that work. It will be the men in the villages and towns. It is surely not our intention to spend $20,000,000 to draw men from the farm when we want them to produce and to help to reduce the high cost of living. You are going to increase the high cost of living by drawing labour from the farm. The farm labourer will say: Work on the highways will mean shorter hours and a larger amount of money for me than I can earn elsewhere. He will then get $3.50 or $4.50 a day, while on the farm he will get $2 or $2.50, and he will work on the highways eight hours a day, whereas on the farm he will work ten or twelve. You are going to draw from that class of the community. We should be very careful in handling this matter and making this expenditure.

I think there is another method that might be adopted and by which we would get very much better results. Instead of saying that we are going to spend this money on highways to give work to soldiers and to the unemployed in the cities, from whom you would not get a response, spend $10,000,000 or $15,000,000, buy tractors and farm implements and say to the returned soldiers who are offering to go on the land: We will supply you with tractors, ploughs and the necessary implements to enable you to carry on your work. The Government will purchase these. They will send practical operators to run the tractors. They will break up the land and they will thus be producing and encouraging young men to take up farming. After a young man has broken up 100 acres of land and has got through his first year, the Government might say: We will sell you a tractor and the necessary implements to continue your work. I venture to say that if he is successful in the first year in producing a crop he will be in a position, with reasonable conditions, to buy these implements. Such a policy would help to increase production. On the other hand, you are not increasing production and you are drawing the producer away from a productive occupation to one that is going to be unproductive from the standpoint of increasing the food supply of the country and reducing the high cost of living. I think the subject is of such importance that the House should give it thorough consideration, should debate it from A to Z, and see whether this is the right thing to do or whether we cannot do something better than what is here proposed. Therefore, if we hand this large amount of money over to the municipalities who are not responsible to this Government, and if highways are built that are not up to the standard, the public will hold this Government accountable. That is the way the Government do things; they hand their money over to somebody else to spend for them, and they only get value representing fifty or sixty per cent. I do not believe that is good business, or that it will produce the results that hon. gentlemen have in mind.

Mr. GUSTAVE BOYER (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): I have listened with much attention to the statements made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals in explanation of the resolution relating to the improvement of highways, and I congratulate the Government upon this new policy. The improvement of highways throughout the different provinces is now a predominant question and I venture to say that this is a very joyful piece of news to every one interested in the progress and welfare of this country.

I understand however by the explanations given by the hon. minister that the law only provides for the construction of roads, and that no provision is made for the construction of bridges. Being greatly interested in a project which is already quite old, namely: the construction of bridges between Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Isle Perrot and Vaudreuil, I beg to ask this honourable House to allow me to draw its attention to this most urgent improvement. It is assuredly a good practice to construct roads, but this practice will always be incomplete if no bridges are built over the rivers which have to be crossed to travel on the highways. And in order to give a better explanation to my statement, I will quote the following extract from the report of the Montreal resident engineer of the Department of Public Works, dated 1st April, 1913, on these projected bridges:

"Communication by a great highway between the Island and the city of Montreal to Ottawa and Toronto and intermediate points cannot be accomplished without the construction of these proposed bridges.

"The work in question, although not strictly a national enterprise, has surely a character of general interest and can be considered as a federal work, taking into account of the great interest engaged in the province of Quebec and Ontario."

This question of the construction of the Isle Perrot bridges is not a recent one. During the session of 1910, a delegation composed of eminent citizens of the counties of Vaudreuil and Jacques-Cartier came to Ottawa, met the then Prime Minister, the late Rt. Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and urged the construction of those bridges; the citizens of Isle Perrot specially had shown the essential importance of this means of communication with the mainland. I am in a position to say what happened on that occasion as I was at the head of the delegation. We obtained a most satisfactory answer from the Prime Minister, and the delegates returned home hopeful. Afterwards, an interview was granted to me, by the Prime Minister, who gave me reason to believe that, at the coming session (1911) —the matter would take on a more cheerful appearance. From then on, I decided to press the matter before the Government at the following session; I spoke to the then member for Jacques-Cartier, the late Hon. Mr. Monk, who was equally anxious to see that the construction of these two bridges was carried out, owing to the fact that our constituencies were adjoining and separated by the Ottawa river. The hon. member for Jacques-Cartier who became, afterwards, Minister of Public Works, promised me, with enthusiasm, his co-operation which was to be of a great help to me in Parliament, when, suddenly, Parliament prorogued.

Then the elections of September 1911 brought a change of Government. Before the following session, 1911-12, I had reason to believe, for some time at least, that hope was not lost. Seeing that Mr. Monk had been appointed Minister of Public Works, I felt sure that he would not forget the hearty co-operation that he had promised and that he would give new life to the matter, and I am bound to think that if this gentleman had lived longer, the project would be much further advanced than it is to-day.

I can safely assert these things, as, on several occasions he had given me the honour of a hearing with respect to it. Under date of the 28th August, 1912, Hon. Mr. Monk wrote as follows to the Prime Minister of Quebec asking to what extent his Government was willing to contribute towards the constructions of the two bridges:

The need has been felt long ago for a bridge connecting the Island of Montreal to Ste. Anne de Bellevue, and another between Ile Perrot and Vaudreuil, allowing continuous travelling by foot and conveyance from the great centre of Montreal to the main road leading from the Province of Ontario to Vaudreuil. The most convenient place for the construction of these two bridges appears to be near the Canadian Pacific Railway and Grand Trunk Railway bridges which cross the Ottawa River at Ste. Anne de Bellevue and Vaudreuil.

The construction of these bridges or connections would be less expensive were they laid between the two existing railway bridges at the above named localities and supported by their pillars. Estimates of railway engineers which I have obtained providing proper passage and a swing bridge above the Ottawa River at Ste. Anne would cost approximately between $200,000 and $250,000.

My aim in writing is to ascertain if your Government would contribute half the cost of this improvement so necessary to the need of the population of Montreal and outskirts. Not being a provincial one in its nature and character, I would recommend to the Federal Government the granting of a subsidy covering half the costs, provided the Provincial Government undertake an equal proportion. While the Federal Government only subsidizes interprovincial construction or other works of a national interest, it would, I think, in this instance in view of the importance of the undertaking and the general convenience resulting from it, feel favorably disposed towards this suggestion. The preparation of the estimates for the ensuing year being under way, I would respectfully request an answer at an early date.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will readily realize, as stated by Mr. Monk, that the Government was then inclined to give the project serious consideration. Under date of September 5, 1912, the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec replied to Mr. Monk in the following terms:

I must inform you that the Government of the Province of Quebec will be disposed to contribute to the cost of the construction of the bridge joining the Island of Montreal and Ste. Anne de Bellevue with Ile Perrot and the other bridge joining Ile Perrot to the mainland at Vaudreuil.

But we would like that the municipalities interested contribute to these works. As was done in the case of the bridge of St. Jean d'Iberville. If you will insert in your estimates the amount you mention, I am inclined to believe that we could bring the interested parties to do their share. The Government of Quebec, on the other hand, will surely do its part.

Under date September 9, 1912, Hon. Mr. Monk again laid the matter before Sir Lomer Gouin and wrote:

You state that the Government of the Province would be disposed to contribute to the cost of these works, but that the interested municipalities contribute their share, must I infer that the Government of the Province will contribute only if the interested municipalities contribute themselves. What are the municipalities interested and are they themselves disposed to contribute?

As we are at present preparing the estimates for the next fiscal year, I would like to have a definite answer regarding contribution, as if they give us the support I have mentioned in my previous letter, I personally intend to ask the Government to contribute half of the cost of those works so much needed in the public interest.

On the 14th September, 1912, the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec further assured Mr. Monk in the following words:

As regards the Government of Quebec, I must assure you that we are ready to do our fair share. Kindly insert in your estimates an amount of fifty per cent of the probable cost of those works, and I have reasons to believe that we shall persuade the interested municipalities to do their share. The construction of those bridges is too important that we should not do our utmost to carry it through.

And on the 16th September, Mr. Monk wrote the following letter to the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec which appeared to close the matter:

I have received this morning your letter of the 14th instant with regard to the proposed bridges of Ste. Anne and Vaudreuil. I thank you for having given this most important question the prompt attention given by your reply.

I would have appreciated from you a definite assurance which would have permitted me to show that the Government of the Province was disposed to do something in the matter. Meanwhile, I am satisfied of your intimation that if we contribute 50 per cent, your Government will do its share.

Under date of September 11, 1912, the members of the county council of Soulanges, assembled under the presidency of the prefect, Mr. Ovila Besner, adopted a resolution requesting the Hon. Mr. Monk to come to a conclusion with the provincial government regarding the construction of the bridges between Vaudreuil and Ste. Anne de Bellevue and crossing Ile Perrot. This resolution was signed by the following mayors: Messrs. Ovila Besner, St. Polycarpe; Jos. Menard, St. Clet; Oscar H. Besner, Coteau-du-Lac; Frenore Lalonde, St-Zotique; Elzéar Deguire, M.D., Coteau-du-Lac village; Edouard Goyer, Les Cèdres; Léon Daoust, St-Polycarpe; L. P. Delage, Coteau Station; J. F. Bissonnette, Coteau Landing; Napoleon Sauvé, Rivière Beaudette.

Under date of October 1, 1912, the then Minister of Public Works, answering to the above request, said that he had had correspondence with the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, and had been assured by him that the provincial government would do its share, but that the interested municipalities should also contribute. He further promised his most careful consideration to the request as it called for the construction of bridges, which would be of such a general utility. On the same day when referring the petition to his deputy minister the Hon. Mr. Monk said: "In preparing your estimates for the province of Quebec, this matter should be taken into consideration." On the 7th of October of the same year, an order was given to the resident engineer of the Public Works Department, at Montreal, in connection with the said bridges, in the following terms: "Kindly make the necessary examinations and let me have a report on the work required with estimate of its cost, as soon as possible." Therefore, it is clear from this correspondence that the matter was practically decided at that time. However, the retirement of Mr. Monk came suddenly.

These steps were the preliminaries. Now, let us see what took place afterwards and what are the considerations which militate in favour of the construction of these bridges. The proceedings that I have already pointed out were purely local. They originated in the counties of Vaudreuil and Soulanges. Up to that time we might have been lead to believe that the advantages derived from these proposed bridges would be solely confined to the residents of that region. I will endeavour to show that such is not the case. If the arguments in favour of the construction of these bridges are not, owing to the geographical position, such as to justify their being called interprovincial bridges, they are certainly strong enough, having regard to the general convenience to be derived from them for the benefit of the whole of Canada, to justify the Federal Government in making the necessary provisions for their construction. The fact that the request for these bridges comes from everywhere in Ontario as well as in Quebec further supports the move advocated. On the 20th of January, 1913, a group of prominent citizens of Montreal and elsewhere held a meeting at the Windsor Hotel, Montreal, under the auspices of Interprovincial Highways and Bridges Committee, to create considerable and fruitful agitation in favour of the construction of these bridges. Among the gentlemen present I may mention, as far as I can remember, the following: C. E. Ranger, Mayor, Dorion, P.Q.; F. L. Wanklyn, Mayor of Senneville, P.Q.; Andrew J. Dawes; Eugene Tarte; Lt.-Col. A. E. Labelle, president of Chamber of Commerce; Dr. L. de L. Harwood; W. C. Murray, Vice President Dominion Commercial Travellers' Association; L. A. Sauve, Coteau; E. D. Maguire; A. Arthur Ross; H. Pilon, M.L.A., Vaudreuil; C. A. Harwood, K.C.; F. H. Anson, Chairman of Good Roads Committee and Bruno Lalonde, Mayor Ste Anne de Bellevue, and many others, as well as myself. After discussion, it was unanimously resolved:

That it is of the greatest interprovincial importance and necessity that bridges be constructed at the earliest possible date, one from Ste. Anne de Bellevue to Ile Perrot and another from Ile Perrot to Vaudreuil, so as to connect the Island of Montreal with the mainland, and establish a highway connection between Montreal and Toronto, and with that end in view that this meeting undertake at once to solicit the support of the Federal and Provincial Governments, as well as the co-operation of the municipalities and county councils situated between Toronto and Montreal.

This resolution was forwarded to the Hon. Mr. Monk who acknowledged it on the following day in the same encouraging terms of his previous correspondence. On the 22nd of January, 1913, the Montreal Board of Trade passed the following resolution which was also forwarded to the Government:

Resolved that the need of bridge communication between the Island of Montreal and the roadways to west points thereof has been felt long ago:

That, because the connection of the provinces by good highways is a matter of public convenience and promotes business, the Council hereby prays the Dominion and Provincial Government to join in providing the much needed road communication between the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario by the construction of bridges across the Ottawa River at St. Anne's and Vaudreuil.

(Signed) Geo. Hadrill, Secretary.

This period marks the beginning of a movement which has increased almost daily ever since. A large number of the members of the City Council of Montreal also brought up this question, and especially Alderman Joseph Elie and one of our colleagues in this House who is an ex-alderman of the said city, Mr. L. A. Lapointe. These two gentlemen had a resolution passed recommending the construction of the said bridges. This shows the importance that the city of Montreal attaches to this question. Several delegations to the Quebec Government composed of citizens of Montreal and of other parts of the province had the result of causing Sir Lomer Gouin and his colleagues to decide to co-operate largely in furthering this project. Other committees of citizens are actually taking steps to bring about a favourable conclusion to this enterprise which can be rightly considered as being a national undertaking. In order, Mr. Speaker, to show that the need of bridges over the Ottawa river at the points indicated is not only a local one, I shall read a resolution adopted by a number of municipal councils and boards of trade who have no particular interest in Vaudreuil or Soulanges:

Whereas a general movement in the province and in the country at large is being manifested for the improvement of roads and bridges and more facilities of communication between important localities in the province;

And whereas a strong movement has been inaugurated for the improvement of the highways and bridges between Montreal and Toronto and Montreal and Ottawa;

And whereas such highway and bridge improvements would facilitate the means of communication between the said cities and the intermediate districts;

And whereas also such highways and bridges would be of great advantage to trade and commerce in said cities, and in the rural districts lying between said cities;

And whereas it is advisable that all public bodies should concur in this movement;

And whereas especially to carry out the said project, a bridge is required to connect the Island of Montreal with the mainland at a point in the County of Vaudreuil;

Be it therefore resolved that this Council is favourable to the improvements of this great interprovincial and national road between Montreal and Ottawa and Montreal and Toronto, and that it asks the Local Government of this province and the Dominion Government to take immediate and necessary steps for the establishment of such a road between Montreal and

Toronto and Montreal and Ottawa, and further that the said Governments adopt such means as they may judge fit to give effect to the same, and also give such aid and vote such sums of money as are necessary for the establishment of said highways and bridges, including the necessary expenses for the establishment of bridges and crossings, and more especially for the establishment of a bridge to connect the island of Montreal and the mainland at a point in the county of Vaudreuil and this Council assures said Government that any efforts made in the above direction will be fully appreciated.

This resolution was unanimously passed by the following corporations: Montreal Board of Trade, city of Toronto, Cornwall Board of Trade, Prescott Board of Trade, Brockville Board of Trade, Belleville Board of Trade, Kingston Board of Trade, Dominion Commercial Travellers' Association, Chamber of Commerce, Montreal, the Motor Import Co. of Canada, Automobile Club of Canada, Ontario Motor League, township of Cornwall, town of Cornwall, municipality of Brockville, municipality of the city of Belleville, municipality of Charlottenburgh, municipality of town of Prescott, municipality of township of Osnabruck. In addition to these, this same resolution has been passed by 23 other adjoining municipalities.

These resolutions were brought to the attention of the Minister of Public Works at Ottawa on the 8th of April, 1913, by a distinguished and numerous delegation, which was organized by Mr. Geo. A. McNamee, the active and devoted secretary of the Canadian Automobile Association. It was composed of two hundred persons at least, representing the cities of Montreal, Toronto, Brockville and others, many counties, towns and parishes of the interested regions, as the counties of Vaudreuil, Soulanges, Jacques-Cartier, Glengarry, Prescott, Cornwall, etc., who came to meet the then Minister of Public Works (Hon. Robert Rogers).

Amongst the delegates composing this delegation were Lt.-Colonel W. N. Ponton, Honorary President of the Ontario Board of Trade; Thomas Church, Mayor of Toronto; Huntley R. Drummond, A. D. Dawes, of Montreal; The General A. B. Labelle, G. A. MacNamee; Controllers Macdonald and Godfrey, of the city of Montreal, representing the city council; F. L. Wanklyn, from the Executive of the Canadian Pacific Railway; W. C. Murray, Vice-President of the Commercial Travellers' Association; Eugene Tarte, of Montreal; the mayors of all the municipalities of the counties of Vaudreuil and Soulanges; the following members of Parliament, Messrs. Northrup, Fripp, Proulx, Broder, McMillan (Glengarry), MacDonell (Toronto), Ethier, Sexsmith, Lafortune, Lapointe (St. Jaques), Papineau, and others. I was one of this delegation, and I remember the answer of the minister to the delegates. This answer has always been impressed in my mind. It was so typical, especially when uttered before such a distinguished and representative delegation. As far as I can remember, the answer was as follows:

We have at the present time a Bill before the Senate, providing for an expenditure of $10,000,000 for the improvement of highways. The Senate has been requested to pass this measure but are now taking objections to it. Then, it is up to you, delegates, to join together and see the honourable members of the Senate, and try to convince them of the necessity of ratifying this Bill. And, if a result is obtained, the Government will see afterwards, as to what is to be done.

We are all familiar with the tribulation which this law was subjected to. After having been passed by the Commons, it was amended by the Senate and sent back to this Chamber. The Government not desiring to accept the amendment passed by the Senate, this Bill as a result of such action, has remained a dead letter ever since. The amendment brought by the Senate to the Highway Bill was simply as to the manner of distributing the ten million dollars. It stipulated that the money voted by virtue of the Bill would be spent by each province on the pro rata of their population, such as is done each year in the distribution of subsidies to the different provinces. The opposition to the Highways Bill in the Senate at that time was fully justified, as it only asked the Government to give each province the right to improve and to construct its own roads.

As I have already stated, instructions had been given, on the 7th October, 1912, to the District Engineer of the Public Works Department to prepare plans and make an estimate of the probable cost of this bridge. The Engineer made his report to the Chief Engineer as follows:

I beg to inform you that after a careful examination and study of the matter, I came to the conclusion that the best site for the proposed bridge, at Ste. Anne de Bellevue would be between the railway bridges by connecting the piers of said bridges with sufficiently strong cross girders and proper tunnels at both ends.

This scheme would meet all the requirements of the traffic and cost some $80,000 less than an independent bridge built on piers.

In view of this, I have communicated with the officials of the C.P.R. and G.T.R. companies for permission to use the piers of their respective bridges for the proposed rural bridge.

I expect their answer in a few days and will then report to you fully on the matter.

Under the same date the District Engineer of the Public Works Department wrote to the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and to the Vice-President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company the following letter:

> Being called upon by the Honourable the Minister of Public Works to prepare plans and estimates for the erection of rural bridges between Ste. Anne de Bellevue and Ile Perrot, and Ile Perrot and Vaudreuil, I beg to say that after a careful study of the matter, I came to the conclusion that a bridge at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, between the C.P.R. and G.T.R. bridges with a roadway between the two embankments leading to a subway near the C.P.R. station, as shown on the accompanying plan (blue print), is the best site. This will permit the suppression of the present level crossing near the C.P.R. station which is of great annoyance to the railway companies and dangerous for the public.
> To this effect will you kindly inform me if your company will have any objection into permitting the use of the piers of its bridge to place upon cross girders as shown on the plan.

Through its President, Lord Shaughnessy, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company answered in the affirmative. As for the Grand Trunk Railway Company not giving an immediate consent, it would be an easy matter for the Government to decide upon it for these objections are only based on matters of fact which can be easily settled if I can judge from the answer of Mr. Howard C. Kelly, the President of the Company. The Grand Trunk Company expects in the future to widen its road and this proposition, they say, would be prejudicial to them. On the authority of a competent engineer, this question is debatable, as the Grand Trunk Railway can always widen its road on the opposite side, and moreover they could not widen their road without widening the bridge at the same time. This will not happen for a long time and also if this decision should be arrived at it could only be widened on the opposite side of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This points out clearly that the construction of a metal span between the two bridges would in no way interfere with their plan.

In studying the report of the late resident engineer Michaud of Montréal, under date of April 1, 1912, I find that this engineer suggested two plans.

Plan No. 1—Between Ste. Anne de Bellevue and Ile Perrot—which consists of placing a metal span between the bridges of the Canadian Pacific railway and Grand Trunk railway, making use of the pillars of those bridges. Those bridges would have a length of 1,134 feet and width of 20 feet for the traffic and 4.8 feet for pedestrians. The estimated cost was $118,986.

Plan No. 2—On the same side to construct a bridge 60 feet below the Grand Trunk bridge, down stream, but parallel to this one. The length would be 1,234 feet with a width of 20 feet for traffic and 4.8 for pedestrians. The cost would be $192,000. As regards a bridge on the north shore to join Ile Perrot with Vaudreuil, the same engineer made only one plan for bridge which would be located on the south of the Grand Trunk Railway bridge. This bridge would measure 1,094 feet in length by 25 feet in width—that is, 20 feet for traffic and 4.8 feet for pedestrians. The estimated cost was $113,000.

Therefore, from the estimates of the engineers these two bridges in making use of the pillars of the Canadian Pacific Railway and Grand Trunk Railway bridges would cost $118,986 plus $113,000 or a total of $231,986. The other plan would cost $305,000 or a difference of $74,014. However, I note that on the Vaudreuil side no estimates are furnished for a bridge between the two railway lines but simply one for an independent bridge on the south side of the Grand Trunk Railway tracks. The main objection to this scheme is in the fact that the entrance and abutments of this bridge would be nearly on the same level as the railway tracks, I may state that this would not be an insuperable objection, especially if it results, as I am convinced, in reducing the cost of the bridge by half. The entrance to the Victoria bridge on the Montreal side is on a level with the railway. This would necessitate more care, that is all.

Besides the plans prepared by the engineer of the Federal Public Works Department, I believe that there are two other sets of plans prepared for private corporations. One plan, drawn by Mr. L. A. Beauchemin, engineer, of Montreal, appears to be very complete. The hydrographical survey made on that shows that the construction of this bridge would not be even a difficult undertaking. It would be built without using the railway bridges. The piers at deep water would only be eight feet above the bed of the river. The cost of these two bridges, made of concrete with a metal part on the Ste. Anne side, including the adjacent land would come to $300,000. Another sketch was made by one of the engineers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and I was informed by a competent authority of that company, who is always at the head of progress, that this passage between the two railway bridges could be done at a reasonable price.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) has before him all the estimates and plans,—but according to the new law the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) is also concerned in this question, as he has under his control the Public Highways' regulations. The main sketches are drawn and the minor ones are easily made. There is only one thing to be done by the Government now, viz.: To provide the necessary appropriations for the enterprise. According to the Good Roads resolution the Government has the right to question the mode of expending subsidies granted to the provinces. It seems to me that this is the proper time for the Government to take up this proposed construction of bridges with the Quebec Government and to arrive at an immediate solution of this long-standing problem. The Provincial Government of Quebec must contribute with the Federal Government in the construction of these bridges, but in what proportion? There is already a law authorizing the Quebec Government to make a payment of 33⅓ per cent of the cost of bridges of relative importance. Nevertheless, I understand that the Ile Perrot bridges do not come under this category, because the budget of the province of Quebec for the construction of bridges in the whole province is much smaller than the amount requested for the construction of the Ile Perrot bridges. I am positive, however, that the Quebec Government is ready to do largely its share. A very short time ago, the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, Minister of Public Works at Quebec, from his seat in the Legislature, reiterated the good intentions of the Quebec Government towards the project to Mr. A. Pharand, M.L.A. for Soulanges, Mr. H. Pilon, M.L.A. for Vaudreuil, and Mr. Henry Miles, M.L.A., Montreal-St. Lawrence, who had raised an interesting debate upon this matter. In many instances it was said that the municipalities of the counties of Vaudreuil and Soulanges should contribute to the construction of those bridges. I do not think it would be fair to make such a demand upon the municipalities affected, especially when these municipalities would not be alone to benefit by those two bridges. The municipalities of the counties of Vaudreuil and Soulanges, for example, should not be accused of parsimony if they ask the two Governments to pay the entire cost of those bridges, especially when each of these two counties, with a total population of only 20,000, spent nearly $1,000,000 for the construction of their roads, and their expenditure to complete this improvement will amount to $1,500,000 three years from now. I consider that this effort made towards the progress of good roads by these two counties should be considered as a very large contribution in the construction of those bridges. By the construction of those bridges, the traffic on the whole of this country will be far more considerable, and consequently, the maintenance of the roads will be more onerous. The population of my region is well disposed to make all reasonable sacrifies, but on the other hand it would be hardly fair to expect them to make too many sacrifices, especially when so many of the population of Quebec and Ontario, and others, will share the benefit. In my humble judgment it would be unjust to expect the local municipalities to bear a part of such an expenditure. The people understand that the construction of the Ile Perrot bridges can not be considered as being a question of local improvement useful only to those residing in the vicinity, and they claim it to be an enterprise of national advantage in which the two main provinces of the Dominion are interested. I submit that the Government should give due consideration to the claims of the people of my region when this matter is before them. I would not say that the municipalities of the counties of Vaudreuil and Soulanges, in order to hasten the construction of those bridges, would refuse to guarantee a certain amount of debentures, which would be payable by a sinking fund taken out of the yearly revenue of the bridges; but, in this case, these bridges would become toll bridges until full settlement of obligations. I might add that the Victoria Bridge is a toll bridge.

The cost of those bridges will amount to $300,000 or $400,000. Suppose the Federal Government pays half of it, the Quebec Government two-thirds of the balance, and the municipalities one-third. In such a case those bridges could be constructed and administered by a commission composed of one representative from each Government, one representative of each interested municipality, one representative from each of the important public bodies of the city of Montreal, and one representative from the counties affected. This commission should exist in virtue of a Statute and would be in every way responsible to both Governments. In other words, this commission would serve as a connecting link between the two Governments and as an intermediate agent between those Governments and the municipalities. But this organization would be necessary only if the Government wants to make it an essential condition, that the municipalities are to contribute to the cost of those bridges. However, I hope that the Government will act more liberally, seeing that the construction of these bridges is so important. The Quebec Government and the Ontario Government agreed to undertake a large interprovincial road joining the four principal cities of the Dominion; Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa. The Federal Government to-day, with its good roads policy, greatly encourage this laudable scheme. The only obstruction to the proposed interprovincial road is the bridges over the Ottawa river at Vaudreuil-Ste. Anne de Bellevue. All the public bodies, from Toronto to Montreal, Ottawa to Montreal and vice-versa, are asking for these bridges. These bridges will join the two great provinces of Canada. And who knows it, if this enterprise would not be a salutary accentuation to the noble movement of the Bonne Entente. In order to effect a speedy consummation of the Bonne Entente, one of these bridges could be christened John Haig and the other Ferdinand Foch.

Mr. J. R. WILSON (Saskatoon): I was somewhat disappointed that the minister, in introducing the resolution, apparently did not give the committee any idea as to the policy to be pursued. I should judge, although the statement has not been made, that this is a scheme of promiscuous road construction in the provinces, the money to be turned over to the provincial governments without any outline being given as to what points the roads are going to run between and as to how the work is to be done. When this country, from ocean to ocean, is making a grant of money for the purpose of building roads, such roads should be of a national character; that is, they should lead from some place to some other place. In other words, they should be interprovincial, or possibly a road should be built from coast to coast. It was at one time advocated that we should build what may be termed a national highway, possibly as a memorial to commemorate the heroism and services of our gallant soldiers in the great conflict which has just been concluded. There does not seem to be any particular need for making improvements to our roads. In any case, as a matter of principle, if this scheme is only for the purpose of constructing better roads throughout the province, that is a matter that should be attended to by the several provincial governments.

It would be another thing if we had the ambition to build a national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific over which we could travel in an automobile. In view of these considerations and in view of the heavy expenditures which the Government has intimated will be made this year, I think it is hardly advisable to undertake an expenditure of twenty million dollars unless we can be assured of very good returns from our investment. The minister in introducing the resolution said that it would provide employment for the returned soldiers. Personally, I do not think that is the kind of employment we should offer to our returned men, but if we do wish to offer them that kind of work, the railway building to be done in the West will provide such work for the men who wish to undertake it—the building of roads is not very much different from the building of railways, so far as the nature of the work is concerned. I have made a mental calculation since the minister introduced the resolution, of how the scheme would work out in western Canada. Of this twenty million dollars to be voted, $80,000 is to be allotted to each of the provinces at the outset. That would mean an expenditure of $720,000 for the nine provinces, leaving $19,280,000 unexpended.

Mr. CARVELL: The expenditure is $80,000 per province per year.

Mr. J. R. WILSON: Perhaps I did not read the resolution closely enough. I figured that this year for the three western provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, with a population, as near as I remember, of about 1,600,000, about a million dollars would be appropriated. What we need in western Canada to-day more than anything else is the extension of the Canadian National system of railways. This would afford needed relief to farmers who are living many miles from the railways, and would save them quite a lot of money by transporting the grain from their doors.

With regard to furnishing employment, the Minister of Public Works knows how much I have been badgering him ever since I arrived in Ottawa for a federal building in my city, and the excuse he has been giving me is that the Government cannot spend any more money in western Canada beyond what is to be spent on the railways. Now, if some of this $20,000,000 was devoted to erecting federal buildings in different cities in western Canada that are really in need of them it would furnish the kind of employment we need for our returned soldiers. Those of our returned soldiers for whom we need employment in western Canada are the mechanics, and unless there is considerable building going on in our cities we cannot furnish them with employment. These men would not work at road building.

Summing up, it seems to me that in view of our present financial condition it would not be wise for us to undertake this expenditure on such an indefinite promiscuous scheme of road building, not knowing what parts of the country are to be served by these roads.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): I think there is a misapprehension as to the real meaning of the resolution or it has not been read closely enough by some hon. members. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. T. Foster), who is not in his seat just now, assumed two principles which do not exist at all. I will admit that from his standpoint his argument was very logical. He assumed that the Government was contributing $20,000,000 towards the building of a national highway throughout Canada. If that were true, and the Government was going to build the road, it ought not to hand the money over to the provinces, but handle it itself, just as in the case of the building of a railroad or any other public work. But that is not the intention. It may be we are wrong in not building a national highway, however, we do not propose to do that, we propose to contribute a certain amount of money during the next five years to assist in the construction of better roads in Canada than we have at the present time. Now, we cannot build every road in Canada, because that would probably take a hundred million dollars, and then we should not have covered the whole ground. But we propose to grant $20,000,000 during the next five years for the purpose of assisting in the betterment of the road systems in every province of Canada. The hon. member also contended that if the money were handed over to the provinces there would be patronage and inefficiency, and that not more than sixty or sixty-five per cent of the money would be spent on the roads, the balance being squandered amongst politicians or in graft.

Mr. CAHILL: He was thinking of Ontario.

Mr. CARVELL: I think his remarks applied to all the provinces, although I confess he made a pointed reference to the province of Ontario. There, again, my hon. friend did not properly read the resolution which we are discussing. There is no doubt things like that have happened in the past, and there might be an attempt to do the same thing under these provisions. Again, if we were proposing to pay all the costs of building any portion of a road in any part of Canada, not being a portion of the national highway, then certainly we should build it ourselves. But we are not doing that. We are proposing to contribute forty per cent of the cost of constructing a certain piece of road; and the location of that road, the specifications, its character and all the conditions must be agreed upon before a dollar is expended. There must be a contract between the federal and the provincial governments as to all these matters before anything is done.

Mr. MORPHY: I would point out that the very important word "location" does not appear in the resolution.

Mr. CARVELL: I admit it does not, but there is another word in the resolution which means the same thing. The resolution says:

> Which agreement shall contain such provisions as to cost, description, specifications or otherwise as the Governor in Council may approve.

Now you could not make a contract very well unless you knew the location.

Mr. MORPHY: That is the weakness of the resolution.

Mr. CARVELL: Perhaps it should be amended to that extent, but I assure my hon. friend the word was not left out with any deliberate intent.

We consider the words "description, specifications or otherwise" sufficient to cover it; because it would be impossible to make a contract for the construction of a road if you did not describe it.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: If no agreement is made by this Government with the government of any province, will the citizens of that province be taxed for works in the other provinces which are strictly provincial?

Mr. CARVELL: If the provinces cannot raise the money they cannot take advantage of this proposal.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: But if no agreement is made by this Government with the government of Ontario, for instance, will the citizens of Ontario be obliged to pay their share of taxation for work done in other provinces?

Mr. CARVELL: No, there is no such proposal as that. Unless the province of Ontario make a contract with this Government by which they agree to furnish 60 per cent of the cost of the roads mentioned in the agreement, they cannot get our 40 per cent, and the whole thing goes for naught as far as Ontario is concerned.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: But the other provinces will get the money if they come to an agreement with this Government?

Mr. CARVELL: They will get their share.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: And the citizens of Ontario will be taxed to pay that money?

Mr. CARVELL: Well, in so far as we take it out of the consolidated revenue funds. It goes the way of taxation.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it proposed that the terms shall be uniform in all provinces?

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly. But there again I am answering what perhaps I cannot answer definitely. It will be such a road as the federal Government can agree upon with each of the provinces. I do not say it will be exactly the same kind of road in all the provinces. Take my own province, for instance, I have no doubt the road will be different in the western part of New Brunswick from what it will be in eastern New Brunswick, for the simple reason that in the western part we have splendid gravel which makes a good road. In the State of Maine, in the past five years, they have built a beautiful road, of gravel. But on the eastern side of New Brunswick, where they have no gravel, they would no doubt have to use crushed stone. The construction will be the best and most economical for the part of Canada in which the road is constructed. In the western provinces, where they have no stone or gravel, I do not know what the construction will be. They will no doubt have to import their material; probably it will be broken stone or asphalt.

11 p.m.

I was saying that if we were paying all the expenses of building any one of these roads we would of course take into our own hands the construction of the road, but we do not propose to do that. We think the provinces should contribute something towards the construction of the roads because they will be the people to benefit in the end. Such being the case, either we must build the road or the province must build it. Well, I do not think we would ever get any province to hand 60 per cent of the cost to the federal Government and say, "You build our roads." Therefore, we hand the money to the provinces and allow them to do the building, but with this condition, that before a dollar can be expended a contract must be entered into between the two governments, as I have explained, for each road. There may be a half dozen roads in one contract.

Mr. McKENZIE: Was this question discussed at the provincial conference?

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Take my own province. Is there a request from the province of Nova Scotia for this money?

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot remember what each representative stated, but I know there was no dissent, and it was strongly urged upon this Government that we should embark upon this policy. It was urged by all the representatives of the local governments present, and this is a direct result.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I am sure the provinces will be glad to get the money.

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly, and this is the result of their request.

Mr. FIELDING: Were the terms of the resolution discussed in the conference?

Mr. CARVELL: No, but the general principle was discussed of assisting in the construction of roads. Now, to get back to the general thread of my discourse, I pointed out that either the Federal or the Provincial Government must build the roads. There must be no divided responsibility. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Foster) suggested that if the money were handed over to the province, 35 per cent would be squandered. That, however, cannot happen, for it is provided as follows in the resolution—and will be similarly provided in the Bill—> —the aid to be given in any case shall be 40 per cent of the amount which in the opinion of the minister is the actual, necessary and reasonable cost of the construction or improvement of such highway.

The Government has appointed a gentleman who has been well known in Canada for a number of years in construction of highways—Mr. Campbell, former Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals—to have charge of this work, and he will have power to appoint engineers. There will be inspecting engineers over every road constructed in Canada, and the very moment our engineer suspects any collusion, politics, graft, or the wasting of public money, all he has to do is to report that to the Minister of Railways and Canals, who will have the right to say whether he will allow the 40 per cent or not; and until they construct that road according to the minister's satisfaction that the money has been actually, necessarily and reasonably put into the construction, the grant will not be allowed. It is therefore impossible for anything in the way of incompetence or waste of public money to occur.

Mr. COPP: Will the expenses of the engineer come out of that 40 per cent?

Mr. CARVELL: There is nothing in the resolution, but I presume not, although all might be charged up to the cost of the road. However, if I have anything to say about it—and possibly I may have—no roads will be built unless there is a competent engineer overseeing them, and no money will be paid out until the engineer reports that the work has been properly and reasonably carried on.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Why don't you make it "fifty-fifty" like the Union Government?

Mr. CARVELL: The Union Government is "fifty-fifty" when it comes to doing business.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Could it not be raised to fifty instead of forty?

Mr. CARVELL: Well, that is a logical question, and one for discussion. I hardly think so myself. I know it has been urged upon the Government strongly that we should contribute one-half of the cost of construction of the road. Personally, my view is that the Federal Government should not adopt the policy of road building in Canada, but that we should assist the provinces in the construction of roads. Without some assistance I do not believe we will get the roads we require.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where are you going to get the money?

Mr. CARVELL: Well, I think we can get it as well as the provinces can. It has to be raised by taxation, and we can devise a method by which we can get the money. I have a great belief in the necessity of good roads. I believe they are of the greatest importance to the prosperity of the country, but I do not believe the Federal Government should start out building highways. We have therefore laid down this principle, that we will pay forty per cent to assist the provinces in the construction of roads but to assist them in such a manner that there will be nothing that is not perfectly straight and that there will be no money wasted in the construction of these roads.

Mr. CAHILL: I want to know if the regulations will make any provision for roads in sections that are not between centres. What will govern the selection of the road that this money is to be expended upon? If the provincial government will apply for the money to build any kind or portion of a road and say that they are willing to pay sixty per cent of the cost of that road, does that mean that the Dominion Government will be willing to pay forty per cent of the cost?

Mr. CARVELL: No; I can answer that right off. The intention of this legislation is to build highway roads—roads leading from centres to centres. I cannot tell you any two points in Canada between which a road will be built or where we propose to build a road under this legislation. But we certainly do not intend to agree to the construction of roads out of this money in what we may call byways. We want this money to go to the construction of what we might call main arteries. I think I can say right off that there should be a road from Montreal to Ottawa, that there should be a road from Montreal to Toronto, and a road from here down to Prescott. Anybody can pick out places of that kind and say that it is roads of that class that must be subsidized. I have no doubt that there will be some friction between the federal and provincial authorities as to the roads which shall be built but I do not think it is impossible to overcome these difficulties. I think that ordinary business principles will prevail and that the result will be that the money will be expended upon what would be really the main arteries of commerce or highways in Canada.

Mr. I. E. ARGUE (Swift Current): Mr. Chairman, I do not very often take up the time of this House, but I think I should say something on this question of highways. We are proposing to-night to spend $20,000,000 to build highways in Canada. I notice that the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) mentioned Ottawa and said that it would be a good thing to have good highways around here so that farmers within 25 or 30 miles could bring their produce in to market. That will be very nice, but

I come from a district where we need more than highways. We need railways. I could take you out to places where farmers have to haul their grain from 25 to 60 miles, sleep out two nights under their wagons and spend four days on the trip in order to get their grain to market. I had a telegram to-day stating that a petition is on its way down asking for a branch line. That petition is signed by 1,632 farmers who have under cultivation 293,000 acres of land, who, in the years 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918 averaged 22 bushels to the acre and who have to haul their grain from 24½ to 42 miles to market. If we have money to spend to build highways, for the purpose of giving employment to the people in Canada, and, as the minister said, to bring people into Canada, I can tell the minister and this Government that if they do not supply some of these branch lines they will not be able to keep men in Canada who are here now, because they have stayed just about as long as they can afford to stay and haul grain that distance. We would like to have highways but we must give those settlers who have been eight or ten years in those districts some facilities for marketing their grain. The money spent on railways will give the same amount of employment to men as if spent on highways. We are expecting our returned soldiers to go out into the western country and take up homesteads; and yet in many of those districts there is not a railway within twenty-five or thirty miles of settlement.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Use motor trucks.

Mr. ARGUE: They cannot use motor trucks, because we have not the money to build the roads, and this money is not supposed to be used to build anything but main highways. I want to make these few remarks at this stage of the game, but when the Bill comes before the House I propose to have something more to say on the matter.

Mr. CARVELL: I appreciate what my hon. friend (Mr. Argue) says. I think we all realize the importance of railways. I do not know if the Estimates state the locations where we expect to build railways during the coming year, but my recollection is that $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 is going to be provided to build new lines of railways and every mile of that railway construction is west of the Great Lakes. We appreciate the need as well as my hon. friend does. If the Government had $100,000,000 to spend it could not satisfy all the demands for public works, and I do not say that offensively. The demands are so great—and they are necessarily great—that the Government must pick out what in their judgment would be the best places in which the money could be expended. I do not know whether the district represented by my hon. friend is included in the provision for branch lines or not. He may or may not have investigated it.

Mr. ARGUE: Yes I have investigated it.

Mr. CARVELL: There is something to be said further. When all the money for the construction of branch line railways is being expended in Western Canada, you cannot run away from the fact that the people in Eastern Canada have some rights as well as the people in the West. During the last three or four weeks I have listened to so many demands for public works that, while many of them may be necessary, I am still driven to the conclusion that there is a good deal of provincialism about the ordinary member of Parliament. Not a few of these requests have rather surprised me. I have had members of this House in the last three or four weeks tell me frankly that they wanted a work constructed because they wanted the money spent in their constituencies. I do not accept that doctrine at all. I believe that the Government should spend money where it is necessary, and not for the purpose of expending money in any particular constituency. I have no doubt that a railway in necessary in my hon. friend's constituency, but if we attempt to build a railway in every section of Western Canada where it is necessary I suppose we would require to have $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 in the Estimates instead of $10,000,000 or $15,000,000. The whole country must be considered to some extent in the expenditure of public money. I hope my hon. friend will appreciate the point and I think he will see the reasonableness of the position that the Government takes.

Mr. BOYCE: I think the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) is to be congratulated on this move for the improvement of roads. We have heard some speakers say that the money should not be expended if it is going to be spent for a purpose other than the building of highways. It is for the Government to take care that the money shall be properly spent. We have heard hon. gentlemen from the cities tell us that we do not want the roads but that we would have been better off if we had some public buildings in our cities. I was very broad-minded when I came into the House a year or so ago, but I am beginning to get a little bit narrow. I have heard gentlemen from the West say that if we do not give them free trade they are going to get out and go somewhere else; that if we do not give them good roads they are going to get out and go somewhere else, and that if they do not get the earth and all that is on it they are going to get out. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Argue) is perfectly right in keeping up the end of his country as well as he possibly can but he tells you about the thousands of acres of land that they have under cultivation, the thousands of settlers they have and the 22 bushels of wheat that they are raising to the acre.

If we could raise 22 bushels of wheat to the acre in Ontario we would build the highways ourselves, and the railroads also. There is no doubt we want the railroads, but we want the highways as well. In Ontario we have for the last sixty years puddled through the mud and made roads as best we could. During the last ten years, however, our counties have spent a large amount of money in improving a great number of roads, and within the last year or two the Provincial Government has taken in hand the task of putting the roads in a still greater state of efficiency. I am pleased to see that the Dominion Government is going to bring in a Bill to assist in the improvement of highways. It does not make any difference which Government does it, as long as we get the improved roads. If you want to ascertain the value of a district just drive through it, and if the schools and the roads are good, undoubtedly you have a good country and a progressive people. I trust no hon. gentleman in this House will raise any obstacle to the voting of this $20,000,000 for the improvement of our roads. As far as Ontario is concerned, we do not wish for anything more than our fair share of that expenditure. I do trust, however, that the money will be expended in the improvement of roads, and that great care will be exercised in connection with it. I think perhaps that before entering upon it, it might be well to have a conference with representatives from our province and ascertain exactly what it is proposed to do. I know that in Ontario a survey has been made with very great care, and it is a very reliable one. If that survey is carried out it will be a great benefit to the province and to the country generally. We in Ontario have never made any demands upon the Government. As the late Sir John A. Macdonald said, on one occasion, the farmers never got anything. I suppose that was because they did not ask for it. We are very glad that we did not have to speak for this expenditure, and that the Bill to be brought in is going to assist so much in the improvement of our roads. Motor cars are now in very common use, and with the improvement of the roads this is going to greatly reduce the cost of production. With good roads and modern methods of transportation, products from the rural district will be brought more expeditiously to our cities and distributed in a far better manner than ever before. I repeat that I trust no objection will be made to the voting of this money and its expenditure in a judicious manner for the general benefit of the country.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am very glad that this discussion has taken place, and that we have had the views of a number of hon. gentlemen. As the hour is getting late I will move that the committee rise and report progress, so that we can take the matter up again at some other date.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Monday, March 24, 1919.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The member for Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) asked me the other day when the report of the Auditor General would be available for presentation to the House. I have a letter from the Auditor General to this effect:

I am informed by the Superintendent of Printing that Volume II of the annual report of this office will be ready for presentation on Wednesday and Volume 1 on Friday of this week.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

PROVINCIAL SUBSIDY.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

What rate of provincial subsidy per head of the population was paid to each of the provinces of Canada respectively in 1918?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Subsidy payable per head of population under the British North America Act, is eighty cents.

LETTER POSTAGE RATE.

*Mr. FRIPP:

1. Is the Government aware that the two-cent letter postage rate, and the one-cent "drop" letter postage rate, are to be restored in the United Stated on July 1, next?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to adopt similar letter rates for Canada this year?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.

2. Announcements respecting taxation are made only in the Budget Speech.

MATAPEDIA AQUEDUCT.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Is the Government aware that the aqueduct from which drinking water is drawn for the village and railway station at Matapedia, Quebec, is in a very unsatisfactory condition and that the water is very unsanitary?

2. Has the Government been asked to see that this state of affairs is investigated and remedied?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No.

2. Yes. Some months ago complaint was made by the agent at Matapedia about water coming from our reservoir. The reservoir was completely drained out and nothing was found to hurt the water. Complaints were still made, and a sample of the water was sent to the Canadian Inspection and Testing Laboratory at Montreal for analysis. The report stated the water was suitable for boiler and drinking purposes. The second complaint was made by John A. Ryan, one of the eight parties forming the Matapedia Water Supply Company, to whom we supply water at the rate of $60 per annum. That company now owe us one year's rental. No further action is being taken in regard to this reservoir.

PROTECTION OF CANADIAN COASTS.

Mr. MAYRAND:

1. At any time during the war did the Government of Canada make any requests for the despatch of the Japanese fleet to the west coast of Canada?

2. At any time during the war did the Government of Canada make any requests for the presence of the Australian fleet on the east coast of Canada?

3. At any time during the war did the Government of Canada make any requests to Great Britain or the United States for naval vessels to assist in protecting the shores of Canada?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. No.

2. No.

3. See reply to inquiry of the ministry by Mr. Mayrand re assistance in naval defence of Canada by United States.

Mr. MAYRAND:

1. During the war did the Canadian Government make any requests asking the United States Government to assist in the protection of the Canadian coasts?

2. Did the Canadian Government request the British Government to ask the United States Government to assist in the protection of Canadian coasts?

3. Did the United States Government at any time during the war assist in the naval protection of Canada?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. The Canadian Government made no request asking the United States Government to assist in the protection of the Canadian coast. A joint conference between Canadian, Imperial and United States naval officers convened by the Commander in Chief, N.A. & W.I. Station on the 22nd April, 1918, recommended that the United States navy should take over the coastal patrol, sea patrol, protection of traffic and offensive action against enemy submarines as far east as the 65th meridian (Lockeport, N.S.) including the outer part of the bay of Fundy. This proposal was approved by the Canadian and other Governments concerned and carried out. This was done with a view to the United States having an outlying base for patrols covering the approaches to their posts in Maine. At the same time it was proposed that the United States navy should lend personnel and machines for the Canadian Naval Air Service until such time as Canada could train men and provide machines. This proposal was also approved by the Governments concerned and adopted.

2. The Canadian Government did not request the British Government to ask the United States Government to assist in the protection of the Canadian coasts. On 3rd January, 1918, the Admiralty stated that they were approaching the United States naval authorities with a view to their providing six destroyers. This was referred to at the joint conference held in Washington in April, 1918, when the United States Navy Department informed the British naval officers that destroyers could not be provided, but that two torpedo boats and six submarine chasers would be sent to Halifax.

3. The United States navy lent two torpedo boats and six submarine chasers for duty with the Canadian naval patrol on the Atlantic coast in 1918. They also lent some sea planes and personnel for the same purpose. Other United States vessels also assisted in the patrol of the seas adjacent to Canada, protecting their own fishing interests, etc.

C. G. S. CANADA.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Has the Steamer Canada been employed in the work of the Naval Department since the outbreak of the war?

2. What have the refit repairs to the Canada cost each year since the outbreak of war?
3. In what condition is the Canada at present as regards efficiency for long steaming periods?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. Yes.

2. 1914, nil; 1915-16, $14,435.63; 1916-17, $13,283.12; 1917-18, $30,572.53; 1918-19, $6,-122.12.

3. This vessel is able to carry out long steaming periods at moderate speeds, but she is at present due for refit and cannot carry out long steaming periods at maximum speed.

CANADIAN TRAWLERS.

Mr. DELISLE:

5. What are their names?
6. What has been the refit cost of each of these trawlers built by the Polson Iron Works?
7. Have they at all times been ready for patrol service?
8. If not, what was the cause of the laying up during the summer of 1918?
9. Can a copy of the log of each trawler be obtained showing the number of hours these vessels did at sea?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. Twelve.

2. Yes.

3. Six.

4. $176,194.65.

5. Messines, Ypres, Vimy, St. Julien, St. Eloi, Festubert.

6. Cost of refits: Festubert, $3,987.92; Messines, $5,373.83; St. Eloi, $3,987.70; St. Julien, $3,960.34; Vimy, $3,869.95; Ypres, $5,705.58.

7. No.

8. Certain repairs were necessary to these vessels, the carrying out of which was protracted, due to the scarcity of labour prevailing at that time.

The repairs were due in part to the disaster of December 6, 1917.

As soon as repairs were completed the vessels were brought forward for service.

9. Yes.

2. How much has been paid for the use of the vessel to date of return to owners?
3. On what date was she returned to owners?
4. What service was she employed at?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. July 7th, 1915.

2. Total hire to 7th February, 1919, $14,800.

3. February 17th, 1919.

4. Gate vessel at Halifax.

SS. TUNA.

Mr. DUFF:

1. On what date was the steamer Tuna acquired by the Government?
2. What was the purchase price?
3. What did the refits and repairs cost from the date of her commissioning to the date she was sold?
4. To whom was she sold?
5. What was her sale price?
6. Did the Government own the Tuna at the date of her sale?
7. If so, on what date did the Government issue a cheque in payment?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1, 2 and 7. The vessel was donated by J. K. L. Ross to the Canadian Government and was taken over by the Naval Service Department on the 24th September, 1914.

3. $44,885.

4. C. Brinster & Sons, Ltd.

5. It was sold as a hulk after machinery and fitting had been removed for $800.

6. Yes.

LT.-COL. ALFRED THOMPSON, M.P.

Mr. D'ANJOU:

1. What remuneration or salary, outside of Sessional indemnity and travelling expenses connected therewith, did Lieutenant-Colonel Alfred Thompson, M.P. for Yukon, receive from the Government for services rendered in connection with the work of the Military Hospital Commission, or in any other capacity, during the fiscal years 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918?
2. What were the total amounts paid him for expenses during the years 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918 other than his travelling expenses as a member to and from the Yukon?
3. What were the amounts of money paid him for his travelling expenses as a Member of Parliament to and from the Yukon for the years 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. As Medical Superintendent of the Military Hospitals Commission he was in receipt of pay of rank as Lieutenant-Colonel, $7.50 per diem from March 27, 1916, the date of his appointment. His duties with the Military Hospitals Commission terminated on March 31, 1918, on which date he was in receipt of pay at the rate of $7.70 per diem, amount of subsistence allowance having been increased as from November, 1917. The total amount paid to this officer by the Military Hospitals Commission was $5,542.70.
2. For travelling expenses incurred as Medical Superintendent of the Military Hospitals Commission $1,522.06.
3. 1912, $750; 1914, $630; 1915, $420; 1916, $630; 1917, $630; 1918, $675.

NAVAL SERVICE RECRUITING.

Mr. D'ANJOU:

1. At the outbreak of hostilities did the Government receive requests asking permission to recruit ratings for the Canadian Naval Service?
2. If so, from whom were these requests received?
3. Did the Department grant the requests?
4. If not, why not?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. Yes.

2. H. C. Wetmore; Wm. Sunley Riley; A. R. Dable; A. Angstrom.

3. No.

4. The department was able to obtain the services of a sufficient number of trained men to man H.M.C. ships then in the Canadian Naval Service without availing itself of the offers of these gentlemen.

ONTARIO AND QUEBEC COLONIZATION.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is it the intention of the Government, during the present period of reconstruction, to promote colonization in those parts of Northern Ontario and Quebec through which the Transcontinental Railway is extended?

2. In this connection, could not the colonists or settlers be given travelling rates at one cent per mile, or even free transportation in the case of delegates who organize groups of intending settlers from the older districts of Canada?

3. Could not the Government also arrange to have settlers' effects, farm and forest products transported at such a reasonable rate as would stimulate production and clearance of land?

Hon. Mr. CALDER:

1. The Government will co-operate in every way possible with the Provincial Governments concerned to secure the end referred to.

2 and 3. These questions involve matters of policy worthy of consideration. Any decision reached would have to be made applicable to all parts of Canada. The matter will receive early attention.

TRANSFERS OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS OFFICIALS FROM MONCTON.

Mr. COPP:

SESSIONAL INDEMNITY.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to make advances to the members of the House of Commons on account of their indemnity at the rate of $10 per day payable at the end of each month as in former years?

2. If so, why are the required attendance forms not placed in the parliamentary Post Office as heretofore?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government is not aware of any change in the practice which has prevailed with regard to the matter referred to in this question.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INFORMATION.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Who is in charge of the Department of Public Information?
2. How much did the said Department cost during the year 1918?
3. What is the total outlay in connection with the publication of the Official Record to date?
4. Who is the editor, and what salary does he draw per annum?
5. With reference to the fact that a speech delivered by the Hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization at Toronto on January 10, 1919, was published in the Canadian Official Record, are the columns of the above named journal open for the publication of a speech by a member of the Opposition?
6. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the publication of the Canadian Official Record? If so, how long?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. M. E. Nichols, Director; Dr. Geo. H. Locke, Associate Director.
2. Approximately $79,000
3 To March 1, 1919, $21,980.
4. The Official Record is under the direction of the Director of Public Information. The News Editor is Mr. Roland Hill, salary $200 per month.
5. The address of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, as also certain other addresses, were published in the official record in order to give the public information as to the plans and procedure adopted by the Government in carrying out the work of demobilization, repatriation and land settlement. It is not the intention to publish further addresses by members of the Government.
6. The matter is under the consideration of the Government.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Are the locomotives, material, buildings, stations, sheds for cars, locomotive trucks, workshops, and elevators of the Intercolonial Railway insured against fire?
2. If so, for what amount, in what companies, and by whom was the said insurance placed?
3. What is the amount of earnings of traffic, passenger, merchandise, Royal Mail, express, and other earnings?
4. What are the gross earnings of the Intercolonial Railway?
4. What are the gross earnings of the Government Railways for the last three years?
6. What was the cost of exploitation of the Intercolonial Railway traction wagons, keeping the upkeep of the roadbed, station, etc.?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

[Sir Thomas White.]

3. Intercolonial Railway for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1918, $18,758,186.41.
4. See answer to No. 3.
5. Gross earnings of Government Railways for fiscal year, 1915-16, $18,427,908.66; 1916-17, $23,539,758.61; 1917-18, $27,240,956.87.
6. Cost of maintenance of equipment, way and structures is as follows, for the fiscal year 1917-18; maintenance of equipment, $3,660,110.34; maintenance of way and structures, $3,996,415.23.

MR. J. K. L. LAFLAMME.

*Mr CASGRAIN:

1. Is Mr. J. K. L. Laflamme still private secretary to the Postmaster General, the Honourable P. E. Blondin? If not, why were his services dispensed with?
2. Does he occupy any position in the Government service at the present time? If so, what position and what is his salary?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Not presently. His temporary transfer has been requested by the Department of Public Information as editor of the French edition of the Canadian Official Record.
2. Chief clerk,1-B, of Post Office Department at $2,800.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION PAPERS.

*Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Are the examination papers for the Civil Service Commission printed in their own offices?
2. Who is in charge of the printing plant of the Commission?
3. By whom, and upon whose recommendation was the Commission's confidential printer appointed?
4. Who was Secretary of State when the appointment was made?
5. Who previously held the position of confidential printer to the Commission and why was he removed from office?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes.
2. John Joseph McCann.
3. By the Governor in Council under the provisions of Section 21 Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission.
4. Hon. Charles Murphy.
5. Mr. Chas. Hudson was sent by the King's Printer to install the printing plant and his services were loaned for the printing of the papers for the examinations held in the months of March and May, 1909. When a permanent appointment became necessary Mr. McCann was selected and appointed to the position.

"TI-NOIR" DESJARDINS.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the Order of the House issued for the production of a copy of all correspondence and documents exchanged between the Minister of Justice and his department and their representative in Montreal, in connection with obtaining the release on bail, and arranging bail in security for one Charles, alias Ti-Noir Desjardins, been complied with?

2. If not, why?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to deposit before the House these documents at an early date this session?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: The order referred to in this question was laid on the table of the House a few days ago.

ADMIRAL SIR JOHN JELLICOE.

Mr. BELAND:

1. Has the Canadian Government been informed of the early visit of Admiral Sir John Jellicoe to this country?

2. If so, is the visit official?

3. Whether official or unofficial, will one of the objects be the question of the Naval Defence, Canadian or Imperial?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

SALE OF TRAWLERS.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. Were the seven trawlers reported to have been recently sold in Halifax the property of the Government or of any department thereof?

2. If so, to whom were they sold?

3. What was the price obtained?

4. Were tenders asked for by public advertisement?

5. Were they sold to the lowest tenderer?

6. What was the initial cost of these vessels?

7. How much was expended in repairing these vessels while owned by the department?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1 and 2. Seven vessels owned by the Department of the Naval Service and known as P.V. Nos. 1 to 7 were recently sold to Msesrs. Hayes & Anderton, 50 Broad St., New York, N.Y.

3. $40,000 each for 6, $30,000 for 1; total $270,000.

4. Yes.

5. No. As the offers received were too low they were rejected. By negotiations the department obtained the above quoted prices from the firm indicated who were one of the original tenderers.

6. $704,955.51.

7. $134,917.22 for alterations to fit them for service conditions. $64,359.60, repairs.

DEEP BROOK POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. What is the name of the postmaster at Deep Brook, Annapolis County, N.S.?

2. What is the name of the assistant postmaster, and if there is more than one assistant, what is the name of each?

3. Have all the parties acting as assistants been duly appointed, and have they complied with the post office regulations?

4. Have any of the following parties been sworn as assistants, namely: George Litmars, Miss Adams, Henry Sales, Vera Litmars, Harry Vroom?

5. If so, what are names of such as have been duly appointed and sworn?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. James R. Ditmars.

2. The Post Office Department does not appoint assistant postmasters, except in the case of city post offices, and has, therefore, no record of the names of assistant postmasters in rural post offices, such employees being appointed by the postmasters themselves, and paid by them.

3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 2.

CHINESE STUDENTS.

Mr. STEVENS:

1. How many Chinese students have been given free entry to Canada through the ports of the Pacific Coast during the years 1917,1918?

2. What is the definition of a student under the regulations of the Immigration Act?

3. Has the Government been advised, or is it aware that large numbers of Chinese are entering Canada as students who are not bona fide students?

4. Has the Government recently received any requests from representatives of the Chinese Government in Canada or from other sources to enter into such arrangement with the Chinese Government as will result in voluntarily restricting Chinese emigation to Canada?

Hon. Mr. CALDER:

1. 1917, one; 1918, three.

2. The definition of "student" under the Chinese Immigration Act is as follows: "Students coming to Canada for the purpose of securing a higher education in any Canadian college or university or other educational institution approved by the minister."

3. It has recently come to the notice of the Government that a number of Chinese, who entered Canada within recent months, declaring themselves to be students, are not now attending school. These Chinese were not admitted as exempt from the head tax, but paid the head tax, declaring at the same time that they would attend school in Canada.

4. No.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

during the years 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919, for having been found in possession of, or for selling, adulterated maple sugar?

2. What were the amounts of the fines in each case?

Mr. BOYER:

1. What are the names of the one hundred and twenty-seven persons who were prosecuted during the years 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919, for having been found in possession of, or for selling, adulterated maple syrup?

2. What were the amounts of the fines in each case?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

For a return giving the name and rank of all military officers receiving pay in Military District No. 6, on December 31, 1918, also setting forth the rate of pay in each case, and the total amount paid during 1918, including allowances of every description, also the number of days leave of absence in each case during the year 1918.

Mr. CHISHOLM:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence, petitions and other documents in any way referring to the appointment of a postmaster at Port Hawkesbury, during the years 1918 and 1919.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, order papers or other correspondence in any way connected with the discharge of cargoes of the vessels, J. M. Rafuse and W. F. Davidson, in the year 1918, in New York Harbour.

MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS.

On the Notice of Motion.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of the papers and correspondence exchanged between the Governor General of Canada, the Government of Canada or any of its members or Departments, with the Officers Commanding the Canadian Militia overseas and the British authorities concerning the war, its conduct, its termination and also concerning the sending of the Canadian troops overseas within the last four years.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I hope the hon. member, in whose name this Notice of Motion stands, will be good enough to withdraw it. The Government does not regard it to be in the public interest that the information called for should be brought down.

Notice of Motion dropped.

On the Notice of Motion:

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a return showing the number of commutations of sentences accorded by the Department of Justice to prisoners condemned to be hanged, where the crimes were committed, and the sentence imposed after commutation, within the last four years, showing in what cases the report of the Judge sitting at the trial was favourable to the accused.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: The words of the proposed motion from the word "showing" in the fourth line down to the end, and reading as follows—

Showing in what cases the report of the judge sitting at the trial was favourable to the accused.

—should, in deference to the practice of this House, be omitted. It has never been the practice, nor do I think it is in the public interest, that the confidential reports of judges in capital cases, or, indeed, in any cases, should be brought down. With that amendment I have no objection to the motion passing.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved:

For a return showing the number of commutations of sentences accorded by the Department of Justice to prisoners condemned to be hanged, where the crimes were committed, and the sentence imposed after commutation, within the last four years.

Motion agreed to.

ALIEN ENEMIES—TREATMENT OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. H. S. CLEMENTS (Comox-Alberni) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the policy of the Government in relation to the internment of alien enemies, deportation of undesirable persons and the treatment of soldiers be clearly defined.

He said: Did I not consider this resolution to be of very great importance to the Dominion at large, I would not take up the time of the House in discussing it. I consider the resolution of such importance that I feel that this Government ought to take immediate and no uncertain action in the matter Before discussing the alien situation, I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am not referring to any man of alien birth who is naturalized, so long as he remains true to the institutions and laws of this country. So far as interned aliens in this Dominion are concerned, I am not in a position to state just what the policy of the Government will be, but I say unhesitatingly that every alien enemy who was interned during the war is to-day just as much an enemy as he was during the war, and I demand of this Government that each and every interned alien in this Dominion should be deported at the earliest opportunity. It is not necessary to wait for palatial ships in order that these aliens may be deported. Cattle ships are good enough for them, and I believe there are enough of such ships to deport the alien enemies at the earliest moment possible.

We have, in this Dominion, another class of aliens, and I regret to say that that class, pro rata according to our population, is probably more numerous in the fair province of British Columbia from which I come than in any other province. We have in this country naturalized aliens who were naturalized for a purpose, naturalized not to become true Canadian citizens and to respect the laws and institutions of this country, but for their own personal profit and to obtain, under that naturalization, advantages which belong first to the returned soldiers and secondly to true Canadian citizens. I shall have much more to say along that line in a moment or two.

The Immigration Department, in the past, especially during the regime of our friends opposite, from the time they came into power until 1911, seemed to have the desire to populate this country with classes of people from whose presence we in Canada are suffering to-day. Immigrants from the Balkan States—the riff-raff of Europe—were paid and assisted to come to this country. Such a class of immigrants should never have been brought into Canada. Our great trouble in the Dominion to-day is not with the true Canadian citizens; it is with the alien who is probably, as I mentioned before, naturalized for a purpose. He is in this country as an agitator, to stir up strife. He has no regard for true liberty, nor has he any regard for Canada. The trouble in the province from which I come is with men of the I.W.W. and the Bolshevisk type.

Instead of working for the splendid wages they could receive and becoming decent citizens, they are causing trouble and dissension and promoting strikes throughout the province of British Columbia, and in this connection I must censure the Immigration Department for its administration during the past two years. Every hon. gentleman knows that the bars have been let down against skilled and unskilled labour coming into the province of British Columbia. We had at one time all the labour we thought we needed in the province, but when war broke out practically every man in the province who was physically fit went to the front and did his duty. It was not necessary to conscript a single man, because they all went without a murmur to fight for you and me. The result was that labour became scarce in the province. At the same time, labour was urgently needed to get out the spruce timber which was required in the construction of aeroplanes for winning this war. British Columbia produces more spruce than possibly any other part of this Dominion, and there was consequently an urgent call for labour. The bars were let down, and there followed an influx of labour of the undesirable type I have mentioned. Most of these people are within the borders of the province of British Columbia to-day, to the regret of every citizen of that province, and I hope, of every citizen of this Dominion. Drastic action is required and I trust that in future the officials of the Immigration Department will closely scrutinize every individual allowed to enter this country, in order to determine as far as they can whether he will make a good type of citizen. Rather than have undesirables such as I have mentioned coming into this country, we can all afford to live the balance of our lives in Canada without allowing the entrance of another immigrant.

There is another matter I wish to mention. I commend the Government for passing an Order in Council recently compelling every person naturalized in this country to affix his photograph to his naturalization papers; but the Government did not go far enough. I strongly urge the Government to make the Order in Council retroactive, so that every foreigner throughout this Dominion shall be obliged to have his photograph attached to his naturalization papers. We in the province of British Columbia know that many of these foreigners look alike, and it is hard to distinguish one from another, and some such step as I have suggested is necessary for the protection of true Canadian citizens. Why do I say that? Well, it does not take one of these foreigners very long to accumulate a little stock of money sufficient to keep him in comfort in his native land, and many men who were naturalized before this recent order with regard to photographs go back home and hand their naturalization papers to some pal, who takes his name and comes out to Canada. The privileges of Canadian citizenship are being usurped very often in that way, and I sincerely trust that the minister will favourably consider my suggestion, which I feel it would be in the interests of this Dominion, and especially of the province of British Columbia, to adopt.

As a Canadian, I wish to offer a few suggestions—and I care not what others may say, except that I hope they may agree with me—with regard to the Franchise Act. The present Act must be amended to a very considerable degree, and amended, first, along educational lines. I say that every one of the thousands of people of the sort I have mentioned who were naturalized for a specific purpose, and were just as disloyal during the war as the Kaiser himself, ought not to be allowed to vote. They ought not to be allowed even civil rights in this country. Hon. members who come from the large centres such as Vancouver or Winnipeg or Toronto may not agree with me, but the situation in those centres is very different. Those cities are properly policed, and this undesirable element of our population is not allowed to preach its seditious doctrines, but in the rural disricts, and for hundreds of miles along the coast of British Columbia, sedition is openly preached: I am sure none of my fellow-members from that province will deny that, and I say it is a disgrace to this country. It is impossible to police these sections of the country, and I think now is an opportune time for taking a census of these undesirables. I care not how it is done. The true Canadian citizen, regardless of his political faith, past or present, would be able to give information as to the number of these undesirables in his own little district, and the census could be taken at a very small cost to the country. It is a disgrace that these people should be allowed to exercise the franchise in this country and usurp the privileges of Canadian citizens.

I come to the returned soldiers' problem for a moment. I am well aware that there are many honourable gentlemen in this House who have been to the front and have acquitted themselves with credit and glory to Canada and who are more capable of discussing this subject than possibly I am, but as I see the situation, the problem is not by any means as serious as many in the country regard it. I think, however, that it deserves the greatest possible attention from every government, whether federal or provincial. The returned soldier is entitled to everything that can be done to make his position comfortable, and I sincerely hope that the Government of Canada, as well as that of every province, will do everything in their power on behalf of these brave men. I fully appreciate what this Government is endeavouring to do for the returned soldiers, and in respect to the legislation which has been enacted, and which will be enacted, this Government deserves a great deal of credit. Undoubtedly there will be individual cases that will not have received the attention they merit, and I trust that such cases will be very carefully considered. In discussing this question with hundreds of returned soldiers from the district which I have the honour to represent, I have discovered that the great majority of them will be perfectly reasonable and sane in their demands. They will not expect this Government to keep them and father them for all time, but what they do expect is a square deal. When patronage was within the scope of the individual member, and when my recommendation might have counted for something, from the outbreak of the war and prior to the abolition of patronage I never recommended any man but a returned soldier, and so long as I live I shall maintain the same attitude towards those who have returned from the front, always having, of course, efficiency and proper service in view. Now, this Dominion brought into the country some 300,000 to 375,000 immigrants per year prior to the outbreak of the war. If the Federal Government and the provincial governments do their duty by the soldiers in placing them in positions, they can absorb a very great portion of the returned men. But as I view the situation, it rests a great deal with the employers of the country. I think that every employer in Canada, whether he employs two thousand men or ten, ought to be patriotic enough to engage a certain pro rata number returned men and I feel the matter has only to be brought to their attention to be favourably considered. There are many large plants, especially in the territory I represent—mining and paper plants—which employ a vast amount of labour. There is a certain percentage of these plants which at present could hardly be manned by true Canadian citizens because foreign labour is essential to their operation. Now, I want to give credit to the aliens who were working in these plants. They realized their position, did their work well, and caused no trouble whatever. But there are thousands upon thousands of other aliens, naturalized in many cases, who are employed throughout the Dominion, and who ought not to receive consideration at the hands of any employer. I could mention plants in which there are employed anywhere from 200 to 500 men, and I venture to say that not 10 per cent of these men can speak English. Would you, Mr. Speaker, ask the returned men to accept employment in such places where sedition is rife? That is a condition of affairs that must receive attention, and I hope that this Government will realize that the alien problem is one of the most serious questions that confront the public of Canada to -day, and if it is not grappled with a strong hand I see trouble ahead. There are many other problems concerning the returned soldier that I feel are not receiving the consideration they ought to receive. I notice the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) and others have resolutions on the Order Paper which will introduce a discussion of some of the questions that I would like very much to see discussed.

One question that ought to be dealt with and dealt with immediately, is the technical education of the men who enlisted from the ages of sixteen and upwards who have returned to this country, and who had not the opportunity of completing their education before leaving for the war. Many of them were studying for various professions, and the continuation of their studies I regard as a serious question which the Government should take into consideration with promptitude. I entirely concur in the resolution which was adopted by the War Veterans of Vancouver recently. I do not think it is necessary to read the resolution, which I feel to be in the interests of the Dominion and of returned soldiers. However, I fully endorse the views expressed in that resolution.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is it? It will be interesting to know what the resolution contains.

Mr. CLEMENTS: It reads:

Declaring that the Oriental was a detriment to Canada, members of the G.W.V.A. last night passed a resolution asking the Government to prevent further immigration of this class for a period of two years. Strong protests were lodged against immigration of Chinese as students. The meeting further went on record with a resolution that foreigners who served with the Canadian Expeditionary Forces overseas be given full citizenship in the Dominion.

Now I come to a question the responsibility of which I feel myself, and I urge honestly, in so far as I am personally concerned, that every individual in this Dominion, man, woman or child, is entitled to the privileges under which he was born. I recall what was done by the Fathers of Confederation. Although the bargain that was made at that time was for the purpose of promoting the best interests of this Dominion, I claimed that some of the arrangements in connection with that bargain are not working to the best advantage of the whole country. What I desire and what I hope every individual member of this House desires, is not only unison of thought but unity amongst the people of the different provinces. I claim that the spread is getting greater and greater since this Confederation pact was consummated. That spread is becoming wider and wider each day. I hope I am not tramping on the corns of any individual member of this House in the observations which I am making in regard to this question. There is not an atom of bigotry within my soul. Every man is entitled to his privileges whether they have to do with his church or otherwise. Whether the people of the eastern provinces agree with me or not, I say that the individual who cannot foresee what the western provinces desire and demand is not very far seeing. What I advocate from my own personal point of view, as being necessary to bring about unison among the people of this country is a non-sectarian national school system from one end of this Dominion to the other.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, the resolution moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements) reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the policy of the Government in relation to the internment of alien enemies, deportation of undesirable persons and the treatment of soldiers be clearly defined.

The subject covered by the resolution is wider than can possibly be answered properly by the minister of any single department because it refers to internment on the one hand and the deportation of undesirables whether interned or not, apparently, and in the second place, and lastly, to the subject of the treatment of soldiers in general, presumably meaning returned soldiers.

The very interesting address which the hon. gentleman has delivered covers even a wider range than that of the resolution and indeed, in the main has a bearing upon the general question of immigration into this country and the revision of our immigration laws. I shall make no reference in the few remarks I shall offer to that phase of the subject inasmuch as immigration has not been under the Department of the Interior since I took charge. But while referring to the first subject raised by the resolution I shall say a very few words in regard to the last.

The policy of the Government in regard to internment of course dates back to the opening of the war. At that time the internment took place on a very considerable scale of persons of alien enemy origin who were interned, not in every case because they were showing evidence of hostility or were in any sense undesirable or misbehaving themselves at that time, but because under the conditions that obtained when war was precipitated, they were out of work and in that state were a menace to the community. There were a number of course who were interned by reason of hostility shown.

As the years progressed the conditions of unemployment that obtained at the opening of the war were very much mitigated and indeed the pendulum swung to the other extreme until there became a need in Canada for more labour and for a larger source of labour supply than the country under these conditions afforded. That being the case, a very considerable pressure was brought to bear to provide for the release of aliens who were interned on account of their being out of work and who had shown during internment no evidence whatever of hostility to the country and no reason to lead us to believe that they would not behave themselves as good citizens if they were released from internment or restraint. A careful examination was carried on as to all those who were the subjects of our internment operations and the greatest care was exercised that none of those interned were allowed to take work except where work was already provided, where labour could not otherwise be obtained and where the men to be released had shown evidence that there would be no cause to regret their being given freedom from internment and restraint. On the 19th December last I asked for a report from Sir William Otter, who had charge of internment work, as to the number in the various camps in Canada, their nationalities, the properties held by them, in so far as we could tell, and also as to certain other particulars covered by the request. The report made by Sir William Otter at that time showed that there were under internment altogether 2,222 men.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister tell the date of the report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The 19th December. It must be remembered in this connection that the activities of the department in relation to alien enemies were not confined really to those interned. The department took a register, in so far as it could be taken throughout the Dominion, which register increased in completeness as time went on until we believed we had practically a record of all the alien enemies in the country. A close watch was kept, and is kept, of their occupations, and activities, and they are all pretty well followed. But, as to internment alone, the report shows a total of 2,222 distributed as follows:

Camp.	No.
Munson	63
Vernon	388
Kapuskasing	1007
Amherst	764
	2,222

Of these 1,700 were Germans, thus emphasizing the fact that the great majority of those interned merely because they were a menace from the fact that they were unemployed, were of the Austrian labour class. There were 1,700 Germans unreleased on that date, 489 Austrians, 11 Turks, 7 Bulgarians, and 15 of miscellaneous origin.

Of the 1,700 Germans, however, 800 were sent here from the West Indies, and were held by us subject to the final disposition of the British Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They would be classed as prisoners of war I presume?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there is any different designation applicable to them than would be applicable to the other 900 of them. They were interned and were in that sense prisoners of war, and in that sense only. Of these 900 there was reason to believe that about 80 per cent of them could be classed as hostile or otherwise dangerous or undesirable. That is to say, in so far as the closest observation of the internment officers could possibly bring them to a conclusion, and that observation of course was assisted by reports, voluntary and otherwise, obtained with regard to these men from various sources in the Dominion.

As to Austrians, there was certain of them, but very few, as to whom there was reason to believe that they were of the dangerous or undesirable class, and this remark would apply to a larger proportion of the very small number who belonged to other nationalities. So summing the situation up, the reports of the officers of the Department seem to lead to this conclusion: that the great body, virtually all, of the Germans interned at that time could be classed as hostile, dangerous, or for one reason or other undesirable (54 of them were insane), and as to the Austrians a much smaller proportion could be so classed.

The question, however, in immediate issue is as to what should be done, and what the policy of the Government has been and is with regard to those men. At the time that report was received I submitted a recommendation to Council, which recommendation was accepted, and I think I cannot do better, in order to give a specific and definite answer to the resolution of the hon. member, than to read it:

"The undersigned has the honour to submit a copy of a report of the 19th ultimo from the Director of Internment Operations giving particulars with regard to interned prisoners of war, from which it would appear 4 p.m. that there are at the various camps throughout Canada in all 2,222, of whom 1,700 are Germans, the remaining 522 being of Austrian and other enemy nationalities, practically all of the labouring class. It appearing moreover that the 1,700 Germans, 800 were transferred from the West Indies, and are held at the request of His Majesty's Government."

I would draw the attention of the House in a special manner to that report, because we kept constantly in touch with the British authorities in order to ascertain to what extent we could secure the deportation of these undesirable alien enemies to their native land.

By Colonial Office despatch of 14th ultimo it is stated that repatriation by way of Great Britain is now possible to a number not exceeding one hundred adult male enemy aliens from the Dominion, and that in the case of each person full particulars should be telegraphed to ensure proper arrangements as soon as possible.

The undersigned considers it desirable that all enemy interned prisoners who may be regarded as dangerous, hostile or undesirable should be repatriated with the least possible delay, and he therefore recommends that it be provided under the authority of the War Measures Act, 1914, that the Minister of Justice shall be authorized to direct the immediate expulsion, removal or deportation from Canada for the purposes of their repatriation of all such interned aliens of enemy nationality as he may consider dangerous, hostile or undesirable persons to reside in Canada, and that a direction by the Minister of Justice under his hand shall be sufficient authority for the purpose aforesaid.

Moreover the undersigned recommends that inquiry be made of His Majesty's Government for the purpose of obtaining directions as to what disposition is to be made of the 800 who were transferred from the West Indies.

As to the property of interned prisoners in Canada, the undersigned recommends that this shall remain subject to the regulations and powers conferred as heretofore, the restitution or ultimate disposition thereof depending upon the conclusion and stipulations of peace, but that in cases where there is money of the prisoners in the hands of the Director of Internment Operations he be authorized to pay thereout to each of such prisoners upon deportation a sum not exceeding $75 as a provision for travelling expenses.

That is to say, their expenses to be covered from their own money.

That was a statement of policy in direct response to the resolution as passed at that date following the report from Sir William Otter, Director of Internment Operations. I may say in this connection that the question of admission of alien enemies to enemy countries, as well indeed to a lesser degree the question of transportation from Canada to Europe, and from European ports to the enemy countries is a subject necessarily under the deliberations of and subject to the disposition of the Peace Conference. The conference, by a press despatch (which I think is correct) of the 22nd of February last, gave answer to the request of the German Embassy that they would not consider at that time its request to permit the return of any of the enemy prisoners of war, the intention being that until peace is finally settled, and possibly longer, the Entente Powers will not take the risk of in any way whatever adding to the manpower of the Central Powers. Consequently, the question of the admission into the enemy countries of interned aliens is necessarily subject wholly for the time being to the decision of the Peace Conference itself, and that being the case the Government of this country can only act when the decision of the Peace Conference is communicated to it. That answer applies wholly and most directly to the resolution that is now before the House. But subject to that overpowering and commanding factor in the situation, our policy is to deport with the least possible delay all alien enemies who have shown themselves undesirable, dangerous or hostile.

The question of transportation comes in as well with relation to alien enemies; and that is the subject of the resolution. The resolution, mark you, bears not at all on aliens, however undesirable, from countries other than enemy countries. But the question of transportation with regard to alien enemies is necessarily a secondary question to the question of repatriation itself, which latter question is under the jurisdiction for the time being of the Entente Powers as collectively represented at the Peace Conference. But in so far as transportation goes, our communications from the British authorities are to this effect: that such is the condition of railway transport in Central and Eastern Europe that even were alien enemies now to be admitted to repatriation to the Central Powers, their transportation could not be secured under present conditions. The Dutch Government has taken the ground that any who land at their ports must be such that they can be transported thence within three days or their landing will not be permitted.

That being the case, the British Government take the ground that they cannot admit into England at this time any substantial number of aliens for repatriation into Europe. Of course, they could admit only a limited number,—as, indeed, they have advised us in the despatch referred to—of enemies for repatriation in Austria and Germany. As intimated in the recommendation which I read, they advised us a short time ago that they had made arrangements whereby one hundred could be transported via Great Britain to the land of their birth. Immediately that number was secured of the most undesirable, as we deemed them, and they were sent over for repatriation.

Steps have been taken with some success to secure the transportation and admission to their home land of a number of aliens, not alien enemies. At the same time, the number is very limited, and can only be secured, I believe, through the ports of the United States. But as regards alien enemies, the primary factors in the problem—indeed, the controlling factors—have been clearly stated to the House, and I know that every member will understand that the policy of the Government can be carried out only in so far as permitted by those two controlling factors.

The resolution then goes on to deal with the question of the deportation of undesirables generally.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the attitude of the British Government and of the Government of the United States in regard to interned alien enemies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman mean as to deportation?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The policy of those two countries is just the same as ours. Of course, the rights of interned alien enemies are subject to our obligations under international law. We give them such rights as international law provides for them; we do not go beyond that.

The question of the deportation of undesirables generally, aside from the matter of internment, is, of course, one that should be dealt with by the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, as well, indeed, as the general subject of immigration dealt with in the speech of the member for Comox-Alberni. As to the treatment of soldiers, that subject is necessarily under the administrative control of several departments of government. The department over which I preside has to do with the treatment of soldiers only to the extent of the provisions of land settlement privileges for them. I do not think the hon. gentleman or the House would expect me to deal at this time with the policy of the administration in the matter of land settlement. A soldier land settlement Bill will be introduced at the earliest possible moment, and ample opportunity will be given for discussion. The review which I shall be able to give at that time will show that in providing land settlement opportunities for soldiers Canada is in advance of all the Allied countries, not only in the extent of the individual provision made, but also in the extent to which the actual administration of that provision has been worked out. I believe we are further ahead to-day than any of the belligerent powers that were embraced within the entente in making this provision. We have not, generally speaking, gone beyond provision for land settlement and vocational training in the way of offering remuneration—subject, of course, to the war gratuity—to our soldiers overseas. The same can be said of every country in the world. But in providing civil advantages for the returned men, I think that in each of the three activites to which I refer—vocational training, land settlement and war gratuity—we are in advance of other countries and it is the policy of the Government to maintain any lead we may have in that regard. If Canada differs from any other nation in her methods of providing for the returned men, she differs by being more generous than any other nation in this respect. The subject is so wide, and must necessarily be dealt with by the House as the several topics come before it for discussion later, that I would not be justified in detaining the House longer at this time. I think that the policy of the Administration with regard to the treatment of interned aliens and their deportation is now fairly well known. As to the passing of this resolution, I have no opinion to offer; I suppose it does not alter the situation whether it passes or whether it does not. It is only right, however, as suggested by the member for Comox-Alberni in his resolution, that the policy of the Government should be fully disclosed to the House.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, I desire to add only a few words to what has been said by the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen), because I feel that my doing so at this time will have a tendency to shorten the debate.

In my judgment, the criticism that has been levelled against the immigration policy pursued in this country during the last fifty years is well founded. Canada is to-day paying the penalty which she deserves to pay for what has taken place in the past. Within the course of a very few days I shall bring down a Bill amending our immigration law, and we shall then have full opportunity of considering this matter in all its bearings. I think therefore, that the discussion of it might very well be deferred until that measure is before the House.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clements) made reference to the admission to Canada of undesirables during the course of the past two or three years. Probably some mistakes have been made in that direction as well, but having regard to the conditions that have existed in Canada during the past two or three years, there is probably some excuse for that. From one end of Canada to the other the cry was for more labour in order that we might carry on our war work. In every field—in farm production, in the manufacture of munitions, in shipbuilding, in all the work that was being carried on in Canada—there was a tremendous shortage of labour. If, therefore, a few people came in who should not have come, probably there was some justification for it. Those phases of the general question can very well be discussed when the Immigration Amending Bill is under discussion.

The Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) has referred to the difficulties that exist at the present time in regard to deportation. All that he has said as regards the deportation of the interned alien enemy applies with equal force to all others in this country who, we think, should be deported to their own countries. There are very great difficulties in the way. The fact is not that the Government does not desire to take action, but that conditions in Europe are, at present, such that it is most difficult indeed. We have in our internment camps over 2,000 interned dangerous enemy aliens, and the only word we can get from the British authorities overseas is that they are able to provide for the admission of 100 of those who are to be sent to their own countries. Until such time as we are able to make arrangements whereby those 2,000 or so alien enemies may be sent back to their own countries, hon. members can understand the difficult position we are in so far as other aliens are concerned.

There are in Canada some thousands of foreign-born people who are anxious to return to their own countries. They are not enemy aliens, but other aliens; many of them are friendly aliens who are, for various reasons, anxious to get back to their homes. If we could only find means for sending them back we would have in a short time a tremendous exodus from this country. But, I think every hon. member will realize the conditions that exist to-day in Central Europe, particularly in Austria-Hungary, Poland and Russia. Those countries are practically paralyzed; their transportation facilities are out of operation; famine is staring them in the face; they have no stable government; there is no constituted authority within them with which to enter into negotiations; their ports are not open. As the Acting Minister of Justice has said, the only port through which some of these people might be sent back to their own country is Rotterdam in Holland, and the Dutch authorities have notified the British authorities that unless they have absolute assurance that these people can proceed in so many days after they land at Rotterdam, they will not be allowed to land at all. At one time we thought we might have some Russians sent to Odessa, but for several reasons we have not been able to use that port. I understand the French troops at Odessa have recently been withdrawn. In addition to what I have stated, general food conditions existing throughout many countries in Europe are such as to cause the Governments responsible for conditions there to say: We simply cannot take those people back; we have not food to put into their mouths. And they ask us: Cannot you make some arrangements whereby they may be fed until conditions here become at least partially normal? I do not think I need point out to the House that conditions are such in Europe generally as to make a solution of this problem an exceedingly difficult one. I do not know that anything further can be said at present as regards the general problem. There is no doubt that, so far as alien enemies generally throughout Canada are concerned, any man who is dangerous, who has been hostile, who has shown himself hostile, who has indicated in some way that he is not desirous of becoming a proper Canadian citizen, has no right to remain in this country. Steps should be taken just as soon as possible to cause him to leave this country, but until we are able to get over these practical difficulties, I can see no solution of the problem.

As the Acting Minister of Justice has intimated, there is another phase of the problem. The whole matter is now a subject of discussion at the Peace Conference, and until such time as the Peace Conference have come to a decision as to what they think should be done in connection with this and other allied questions, it would probably be a little premature on our part to take hasty action. The wise course to pursue, so far as this whole problem is concerned, is to delay final action until we know what conclusions are reached by the Peace Conference. I just wish to assure the House that at a comparatively early date, a full opportunity will be given to discuss the whole question of our immigration policy for the future, as I expect to be able to bring the Bill down within the course of a few days.

Mr. CLEMENTS: I have no desire to bring this matter to a vote, but for the benefit of the House and the country, I desire to amend the statement I made as to the Dominion taking care of 375,000 immigrants each year, the riff-raff of the earth. It was my intention to say that a small proportion of this immigration was the riff-raff to which I referred.

The only other observation I desire to make is to commend the Government upon the policy which I understand they are about to pursue, namely, of distributing the Royal Northwest Mounted Police throughout the province of British Columbia. That is one of the best things the Government could possibly do. The presence of those men is very much needed in British Columbia. It is needless for me to say anything about them, except that they are the finest body of military police to be found in the world. Those men should not be placed in the centres of population. I trust the policy of the Government will be to distribute those red coats throughout the length and breadth of British Columbia, in the fishing centres and so on. If that is done, I feel sure that we shall have no trouble from agitators and others.

Motion withdrawn.

GARDEN VILLAGES FOR SOLDIERS.

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to assist disabled and other soldiers to meet the future with confidence, and with that end, that the Dominion should erect a village in the neighbourhood of a city, in each province, to afford them residences and workshops, where they may engage in the production of goods not hitherto made in Canada, as well as objects of art and literature, so as to afford a permanent source of income in addition to their pensions, and that such communities shall be self-supporting after the initial outlay and consist of homes, not barracks or hospitals; that the occupants shall have an option to purchase; that all buildings shall be architecturally sanitary and beautified, and supplied with electric power; and these homes be also available for widows and orphans of soldiers commensurate with their pensions and means.

He said, Mr. Speaker, this motion brings to the attention of the House the very interesting and, one may fairly say, fascinating subject of the garden city or industrial centre, and the importance of Canada's not being behind the Mother Country or Australia or the United States in the advance that is being made in this great project. I first became interested in the question of garden cities or industrial areas at the time of the visit to Canada in 1910 of Mr. Henry Vivian, then a member of the British Parliament, and I dare say many other hon. members who met him could not have failed to take an immediate interest in the work in which he was then engaged and which has become so fruitful in the Mother Country. As yet, in Canada this project has not been approached from a governmental standpoint. There are, however, large industries which have erected, or are erecting, settlements for the comfort of their men. In Australia, near Sydney, there is the village of Daseyville, of 336 acres; in England, the village of Bourneville (Cadbury Bros.), and Port Sunlight (Lever Bros.), both of these latter being industrial sites. Then there is Letchworth, which has now 30,000 inhabitants; Hampstead; Well Hall near Woolwich; Eastriggs; and Gretna, which since its decline as a marriage centre has risen to be a very important place. In the United States, the Government has voted $110,000,000 for assisting in the erection of industrial towns, and these are in the course of development at Yorkship and Bethlehem in New Jersey, and at Norfolk and Bridgeport in Connecticut. In Canada, at Hawkesbury, not far from here, and at Kipawa at the foot of Lake Timiskaming, the Riordans are laying out village settlements for their workmen, to which we look forward with great hope and confidence that they will improve conditions at those places; because, if there is one thing more than another which has impressed itself upon large employers of labour, it is that the contentment of the men and their efficiency depend very much upon good housing accommodation. At Brantford, there have also been erected within the last year a great many houses in connection with a housing scheme there.

There is this to be said about industrial villages erected by large manufacturing concerns: Some Labour union men object to them on the ground that they anchor men to a certain place and diminish their freedom to strike should a strike be deemed necessary. They claim that it puts the men under a certain amount of obligation to the employer. Whether that is so or not, has scarcely been determined in actual practice; we hope, however, that it is not so, but in any case it is no part of the idea which I am discussing. This scheme of erecting villages in each of the provinces as a beginning, whether they are a success or not, has very little to do with the housing scheme mentioned in the speech from the Throne and which will shortly be before the House, because the Government's housing scheme does not contemplate the erection of new villages in certain communities, but rather the improvement of certain parts of our towns. Consequently, it has not the features which I think should be approved of and put into practice by this House, for instead of reconstructing an anomaly of a settlement, clumsily erected in the beginning and grown without any regard to design or moral considerations, we should try what we can do in virgin soil to improve the condition of the people. In America this distinction was pointed out very recently at a meeting of the American National Housing Association by a prominent New York architect, who said:

"We are not here to prepare the plans and specifications for repairing our ill-begotten cities and our sordid industrial areas, nor to frame compromises, nor to perpetuate fallacies. We are here for the purpose of formulating a statement embodying no less than an ideal with respect to the physical conditions under which men live, to indicate the nature of the problem confronting us in attempting to realize that ideal, and to discuss in broad outlines that policy which will make it possible for every man, woman and child of the nation to live in an environment which will neither stifle nor crush their spirit and make them impotent to render national service in times of war or in times of peace."

So the idea underlying this motion is not to improve or reconstruct, but to start out on a new project untrammelled by former mistakes. Since this motion has been on the Order Paper I have had dozens of letters from the provinces approving of the idea, for there are many in this country who, although we do not hear much of them because they do not like to get into public print, keep themselves informed of current ideas throughout the world, and it is only when a motion like this comes up that they are heard from. In addition to receiving many communications from private individuals, on the whole approving the idea most heartily, I have also received an expression of opinion from that important body of men, the Great War Veterans' Association, who favour the idea. I do not know of any particular resolution—I have not invited any—but the president of one of the principal branches of that association wrote to me enclosing a copy of a resolution passed by the executive of the Great War Veterans' Association for the city of Toronto, which I think it would perhaps be well to read:

Whereas, the housing situation in Toronto and the large cities is such that satisfactory accommodation at a reasonable cost is nearly impossible to obtain, and that the returned soldiers are feeling the effect of this most severely in their efforts to adjust themselves to civilian life.

And whereas, the housing situation after the war will be rendered still more acute by the return of large numbers of our soldiers and also a large influx of ex-Imperial soldiers.

And whereas, those returning from England have seen the great and obvious advantages derived from citizen's gardening the allotments, almost universally allotted to tenants, where they can produce a large proportion of their vegetables.

And whereas, many returned soldiers (a large number disabled), are eager for an opportunity to produce part of their own supplies and to benefit by the work in the open.

And whereas, considerable time is required for the provision of housing accommodation and arranging for garden allotments and supplying transportation facilities.

Therefore, be it resolved, that in the opinion of the York County Executive of the Great War Veterans' Association, the Dominion, Provincial and Municipal Governments should at once seriously consider how the housing problem for returned soldiers can be solved.

As a rider to this resolution, a statement was made that at that meeting that the Veterans did not approve of these communities being confined to returned soldiers only. I myself do not think that they should be. It is true that the motion on the Order Paper does mention them as the persons chiefly to be held in mind, but apparently there is a difference of opinion among the soldiers on this matter. There are soldiers who, by reason of their disablement, have a certain degree of shyness and indisposition to enter society, and who prefer to meet with those who have been afflicted as they themselves have been. But these matters can easily be adjusted in different places. I simply mention the fact to show that I would not argue here that these communities should be confined to returned soldiers. I think it is very well for those who are able to pay the prices of these houses, and who are of like mind, that is, who enter with the intention of making a new community and of being themselves part of a new movement for the betterment of the people. I think these people, and even civilians, should very well have a chance to obtain their settlements. Now, if, generally speaking, my idea was to do something for the benefit of the returned man, it was because last session we voted some $3,000,000 for the obtaining of land for farm settlement, and as the allotment of money for this purpose has now been considerably increased, I have no doubt the vote this year will be very much larger, and while it is of great importance that we should encourage in every way the settlement of soldiers upon the land that they may produce and make Canada the great agricultural country she is bound to be, yet there are others of the soldiers who are not minded to go upon the farms. It is for the purpose of doing something for these that I introduce this motion for the consideration of the House. Many men who have returned and who are expert in mechanics of one sort or another, or in trades, have been partially injured, not only in limb, but in spirit. Many of them have never been on farms and would not face the dangers and rigours of farm life. In fact, some of them would shrink, and their wives and families too would shrink, from moving out of the environment in which they have always lived, to remote distances, not knowing what the future would be. It is for such men as these that I now plead; so that we will be only dealing fairly with all classes of returned men when we help the mechanic and tradesman, as the motion says, to "look forward to the future with confidence," because that is one of the greatest things before his mind which will induce him to become a well man in the future. It is the lack of confidence and the nervousness as to what his future is to be that is retarding the recovery of many a man to-day. Therefore, these communities should be erected not far away from cities, so that they would be suburbs in a way—not too near to make it too expensive to acquire the land, nor afterwards to keep up the town, nor on the other hand too far away to take the men and their families away from the pleasures of the city, the lecture, concert, or moving picture, or any other purpose for which they may wish to come into the city, one of the great objects being that they may not feel lonely or isolated in the places that may be chosen. It is only by keeping that idea in mind at the very initiation of this plan that you will probably make it entirely popular; though I think that once it is adopted it will be popular from the start. The villages should be near radial lines of railway, so that the time taken in getting to the city should not be great, and so that the men who are injured in limb would not have any difficulty in going back and forth. The land, say, six, seven, eight or ten miles from a city, or from most cities, is agricultural land and can be acquired at agricultural prices. I know a farm near the city of Toronto of 300 acres which can be acquired at $75 an acre. I have not gone any further in my investigation, but I imagine that a whole farm of about 500 acres in a beautiful situation near a river, undulating and of good soil could be got at $100 an acre. Well, that is not a forbidding proposal in the way of an establishment. Then if that can be done in Toronto, I suppose it can be done in eight other cities in the Dominion.

I omitted to mention the fact, which is apparent to me anyway, that there is a strong desire on the part of returned men for domesticity. The returned man has been through four years of hell, of misery, and he has been away from his people all that time. If he is not married he wants to become married at once. He wants to become domestic, to bring up a family, and not to be subject to the anxieties which would beset him in a city like Toronto at any rate, as mentioned in the resolution of the Great War Veterans, where he has nothing to look forward to but a few rooms in an apartment house. That strong feeling of domesticity that is pervading the ranks of returned men should, I think, be satisfied by a generous Government, so that the men would know soon how they could be housed, and not only housed for the time being, but given a permanent and a definite home. Then what is to be the life of the man and his family in the industrial suburb? My idea would be that at least 150 houses, or say 200 houses, should be erected in each community, to start with; and if those were taken up, as I am sure they would be very readily, and if there were a family of five on an average in each house, you would have a village community of 1,000 people. Most of these men would be in receipt of a pension, of a greater or less amount; but if they knew that they could supplement that pension by engaging in trades which could be properly conducted in their own homes, or in their own localities, think what an incentive it would be to these men to adopt and try to carry out such a scheme as this! In the old days there were very few factories, or establishments, or works, the reason being that all power was hand power. But now, when power is concentrated and is electric or steam, labour must of course concentrate in one place, and that is the reason for the great works that exist. But that calls for the labour of man and the irksome journey from his home to the works, sometimes several miles on a trolley car, and that in the end will seriously interfere with the partially disabled man in keeping his job. Now, there is at present a strong feeling of gratitude to the men, a strong feeling of loyalty to them, and also the fear that if they are discriminated against, such discrimination will be unpopular. But is it certain that this feeling will always prevail? Industry is a hard taskmistress and certain profits must be made. I have a fear that in a few years the man who has only one arm or one leg, while he is taken on at the factory now, will gradually be looked upon askance by the foreman who is expected to produce certain results and in the end some means will be found for letting him out when the war idea and the war gratitude are over. I wish to avoid that. I want to settle men in positions where they can make a good living for themselves personally without fear in the future of harshness or unreasonableness from the shop foreman.

Now that electrical energy is so widely diffused, there is no reason why men should not have at their own homes electrical power for lathes and other machinery for doing the work which they are accustomed to or which they have been taught by the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Department. There are many of these things which could be done that would supplement a man's income to such an extent that he would have no fear for the future. I am told, although I have no personal knowledge upon the subject, that some of the best and most costly articles in Europe are made in the homes of people. I know there are some who dispute that fact and say that they are not equal to factory made goods but I am told otherwise and that owing to individual and personal care in the production of certain articles a value is imparted to them over and above that of any manufactured article. However that may be, I look to it that they will have the advantage of electrical energy from the city or the power works and that under these circumstances a worker will be placed hereafter in an absolutely independent position. I am convinced that this will so content him and his family that they will enter so into the idea that in the long run it will be greatly to the advantage of the country, and that the experiment will be speedily imitated by commercial concerns and co-operative societies that do not require the assistance of the Government.

[Mr. Mowat.]

The trouble is that the returned man has no capital. We have recognized that in regard to farm employment. The man, I say, has no capital and there is no demand that he should be given capital in money. But, if you endow him with a house, well constructed, where he can do his daily work and manufacture the thing which comes best to his hand, you will be doing him a service of immense value. There are many things that can be done in the home and which do not require part work upon them. I have thought, in drawing this resolution, that it would be best to confine the idea to the manufacture of things that had formerly not been manufactured in Canada. I had in mind stationery, pencils, erasers, and a lot of things like that which are used in writing, which are sold in stationery shops, and which, before the war, we got from Austria. All this kind of work could be done by our men. There is also the industry of toy-making. I am told that this has become an immense industry in the United States and Canada. This industry, which was formerly monopolized by Germany has been taken up by the people of these two countries and there is no mechanical toy or contrivance attractive to children which cannot be turned out in Canada. These things can be done in the home as well as in the factory and a man could get the help of his family in connection with certain parts of the manufacture. All this will tend to make the man a happy, contented man. I am told that there is a great variety of things that can also be made in the homes, as they are in Germany, namely:

Mechanical toys, fans, paperknives, glass-cutting, diamond cutters, enamel jewellery, art metal work, brush and broom making, poultry, gardening, harness, bookbinding, lens grinding, novelty making, sewing machine work, pottery, basket (wicker), furniture, upholstering for motor cars, surgical shoemaking, bench carpentry, strawberry culture.

The idea of market gardens, especially to us who live in Toronto is a very important one on account of the extraordinary profits that have been made by those market gardeners who live near the city and who have added at least ten times to the value of their property. Twenty years ago you could get a market garden of ten acres for between $1,000 and $2,000, which at the present time you cannot buy for $100,000, the profit from market gardening is so great.

The town should be laid out so that the man could do his market garden with every facility. My idea would be not to have the market gardens near the particular house but that they should be in allotment at the other end of the settlement. I would advocate the erection of four houses of good construction, sanitary, architecturally beautiful, not put up like shacks, but well put up by competent architects and built to last, with good wookwork, and located every fifty or one hundred yards. If you had four of these to the acre that would give one-quarter of an acre to each house. One-quarter of an acre outside of the ground occupied by the house would give an ordinary garden plot for a flower garden and perhaps a small quantity of vegetables. Of course, that is not the market garden, but there is no reason why a man should not have sufficient ground in his own back yard for a strawberry patch and a poultry run. A great deal of money is to be got out of the poultry business if a man thoroughly understands the business; if he does not he is in a bad way.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: What would be the value of the house to be occupied by each man?

Mr. MOWAT: To put up a house of that kind should cost $3,000 at the present time. If prices were to drop it would be less. You cannot build a six-roomed house for less than $3,000 to give a living room, dining room, kitchen, or kitchenette downstairs, and three bedrooms, one for the husband and wife, one for the male and one for the female children together with a small bathroom upstairs. That is the limit of a six-roomed house with the accommodations I have mentioned, at the present time, according to what I am told by competent builders and architects. If a man wishes to have his workshop in connection with his home, there is no reason why he should not build against his house an addition so that it might be heated properly by a central stove in winter and thus enable him to carry on his work. This might be done without destroying the architectural beauty of the house and I am told that this addition could be made to-day for $500.

Then if the Government did not feel like financing the scheme at the present time—and I quite see difficulties in the way—I think it should be looked forward to as a thing bound to come in the near future. I am convinced that if bonds were issued covering a proposition of this character, the patriotism of the citizens would easily provide for the necessary money.

Therefore we have undoubtedly got to face an expenditure on, say, 200 houses at $3,000 apiece, or $600,000 odd; add to that the cost of the land $50,000, and add another $50,000 for the construction of sewers and of two or three trunk roadways upon the site. That represents an expenditure of at least $700,000 to be provided for each city; not much, one would say, in view of the expenditure which we have made on other things. This would all be paid back to the Government by instalments or by the amortization plan. The direction of this scheme, it seems to me, will require some consideration. I would say that from the very beginning this must not be considered as a philanthrophic movement at all. If it is philanthrophy, if it is something doled out to a man, no self-respecting man is going to take it. He is only going to enter into it as a businesss proposition, and the only obligation he will be under to anybody will be to repay in time the cost of the house, or such sufficient rent as will reimburse the Government for its expenditure.

Therefore there must be no paternalism about the management of the community; nobody need be under the direction of any other person; but at the same time there must be precaution taken in the construction, and then to an extent in the management, in order to preserve the community life of the village, because women of different kinds will form these communities. Women vary in their housekeeping; some women will keep their houses in good shape and their porches and grounds will always be neat looking, while other women unfortunately, perhaps through indifferent health or other reasons, will become slatternly. That means if there are too many of the latter class the community will not be as popular as it should be, and there must be some guiding direction to see that the people are kept up to their manifest community duty.

5 p.m.

At the same time the municipal government of the town should be left to the men themselves, so that we would have returned soldiers occupying positions in the council of each town. We would have the councillors elected by popular vote of the people themselves, and if there was anything in the management of the town which was not approved of, then the remedy would be in the hands of the people themselves. They could put those men out at the next election and put in men who were more amenable to public opinion.

I think the directors should be about five in order to make it a convenient and workable body. Two of them should be first-class architects, two should be returned soldiers—who by preference should be business men—and the fifth member should be

Mr. Thomas Adams, the Town-improvement Advisor to the Commission of Conservation. In Mr. Adams we have a valuable asset to Canada. He was the secretary, I think, of the town—now the city of Letchworth in England—built on these lines, to enable the suburbanite to reach London, his industrial centre, within a few minutes. This town increased to such an extent that while it cost in the neighbourhood of $1,200,000 to build, in the course of only four years there was an increment of $800,000 in the value of the properties by reason of the demand for those comfortable houses built amid such pleasant surroundings.

Now, if there is to be that increment in the value of the villages which we propose to erect in Canada—at least, I hope we will erect them—it seems to me that all that increment should go to the men themseleves who take upon themselves the chance at the beginning, either by way of reduced rentals or reduced purchase money, and that those who come later and enjoy the enterprise of the pioneers should help pay for that enterprise. The responsibility of running each village must be left to the inhabitants themselves. I think that responsibility is going to be accepted by the returned soldiers. The men who captured town after town in France and Belgium are not going to be behindhand in running towns of their own when they come back to Canada. We will find just as much municipal ability, just as much foresight, and just as much thrift among the returned soldiers who may be the inhabitants of these villages as we will find anywhere else in the Dominion.

Will these communities be permanent, or is this only a fancy idea that we have, and will it be worth while trying? In my opinion it will be worth while trying and these communities will be permanent, because the domestic motive behind the scheme will keep the men attached to the homes which they are going to establish, especially as they will not be the ordinary hum-drum homes of the conventional city or town, but they will be something entirely new, something which will appeal to the aesthetic side of a man's nature and make him proud of his home and loath to leave the community, because it is going to be his own handiwork.

In addition to what I have said as to building, we are going to make the women so well satisfied with this kind of community that they are going to be an anchorage there. As it is now in cities the women are in a constant state of anxiety about the motor car menace to their children. There are no yards or gardens for the children to play in and naturally they go and play on the streets. In the city of Toronto I venture to say that once a week there is a poor little tot of four or five years of age run down by a motor car, no matter how careful the driver may be. The consequence is that woman are in a constant state of anxiety while their children are out. But here we can construct all these homes facing on public squares where the children can go and play free from any vehicular menace, for there will be no necessity for roads at all through these villages. In every plan I have seen there is a landscape arrangement by which there are only one or two, or at most three, public highways, which need not be used at all by the people for foot travel, but are confined to vehicles. The consequence of this arrangement is that the motor car menace is abolished and the contentment of the mothers is assured.

This subject has interested me for some years and I have read a good many books relating to it, and if any hon. member wishes to have a reference to these in order to go into it more fully, I would recommend him to read the books of Mr. Sennitt, an English author, who is a principal writer on the subject, and Professor H. W. Mawson's work entitled "An Imperial Obligation;" that is, the duty of the State to partially disabled soldiers. The book was published last year and the preface to it is well worth reading, because it is by Sir Douglas Haig, and he says: Sir Douglas Haig, right in the middle of the war, had time to write this preface:

> The amelioration of the lot of those of our countrymen on whom the war has placed the dreadful burden of life-long disablement is not only the most worthy to which it is possible to bend our energies, but one which should receive our immediate attention if we are to be ready for the emergency before it becomes overwhelming.

Professor Mawson, in furthering the idea which I have tried to set forth in a sketchy way, says this on page 22:

> There should be a central collecting and distributing and buying and selling centre where materials can be procured wholesale and the finished goods marketed under expert management.

To some of the suggested industries and activities which he mentioned ,he would add agriculture and shop-keeping, market-gardening and flower culture, clock repairing, job printing, shoe repairing, tailoring, telephone operating, typing, model dairy, laundry, village square, post office, bank, insurance office, amusement and public hall, moving picture house, community house for bachelors, baseball and lacrosse ground, park, churches, poultry runs. It is, of course, of vast importance that those who are not versed in the intricacies of commercial life should have some one to advise them with regard to their purchases of raw material and the marketing of their goods. If a man has to sell his own goods he is taken away from his work and into a sphere of activity with which he is not familiar, while an expert in the rise and fall of prices and in the marketing of goods would be able to tell him where he could sell his products to the best advantage.

There is also Thomas Adams' own book on the subject, and "The Housing Problem in War and Peace," of the American Institute of Architects (1918), Ebenezer Howard's "Garden City of the Future," and "Proceedings of the Garden Cities and Town Planning Association."

I think that until the community is well on its feet, the committee of direction would not be an expensive one. I know from conversations with them, that the architects who would act would charge moderate prices, and I am sure that the two returned soldiers on the committee would not exact a large remuneration. We have Mr. Thomas Adams already with us, so that the expenditure for some years to come need not be terrifying to any Cabinet minister.

So that if we establish these model towns, one in each province, to begin with, near some large city, we shall be doing something distinctly to the advantage of the country and definitely beneficial to the returned man. I am told—perhaps other hon. gentlemen in the House can discuss this better than I can—that a man suffering from shell shock—which, I understand, is simply a collapse of nerves, due more to the general life at the front than to any particular shell shock—can best recover his normal health by being in such a community as this, living on the land, engaging in light labour, having no worries. Through the establishment of such a community we could restore to good health many men who have been injured in mind, though not in limb.

In the carrying out of this idea I can see a picture of a clean and well constructed town. I can see a creation of beautiful small homes and holdings, modern in its architectural and sanitary features, beautiful in its lines, wholesome in its life and happy in its amusements. I can see communities where none will be for the party but all for the state, whose inhabitants will give a noticeable example to less favoured regions and cause them to set up of their own accord similar municipalities aspiring to similar achievements. I can see communities which will be under no obligation but that of the liquidation of a temporary loan extended by a generous and thankful country—whose gratitude can never be shown by money alone—with a view to assisting to some extent out of their resources those who saved them from disaster.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will agree that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mowat) has brought to our attention an exceedingly interesting subject. I understand that he does not intend to press the resolution to a vote; that he desires merely to have a general discussion of the subjects he has introduced. I do not intend to follow him in all his arguments. He has undoubtedly given the matter considerable thought and study; personally, I have gained a good deal of information from his address. I wish merely to touch on a few of the points to which he has referred.

In my opinion the whole question of town planning in this country has received too little attention; as a matter of fact, it has received no attention at all. Our towns and villages and cities have sprung up in any old way; we have some very sorry examples of towns and cities throughout the Dominion. If something along this line had been started fifty or a hundred years ago, Canada would be very much better off. The problem is one that should receive the attention of all governments in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, that may be interested in it.

The hon. gentleman referred to Mr. Adams, who came here from the Old Country. I have known of him and have met him occasionally. I am quite certain that if his services could be utilized in connection with our town planning and even with the extension of our municipalities, they would be very valuable indeed. Just in passing, it occurs to me that the work of town planning is a matter in which our provinces, rather than the federal authorities, should take a more particular interest. If I am not mistaken, it comes completely within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

The hon. gentleman referred to the desirability of establishing model villages for our returned men. In dealing with that question we must first consider the chief aim in solving the problem of repatriation. We have had considerable discussion in the House with regard to that problem, and, judging from the opinions expressed here,

I think the idea prevails that the very best thing we can do for the returned man is to place him in a position at the earliest possible time in which he will be self-reliant. In the discussions that we have had, time and again expressions like these have been used: "Leave the returned soldier alone and he will take care of himself;" "the returned soldier does not require any coddling;" "all the returned soldier wants is to get back into civil life." Expressions of that kind were used by many members of the House, and I am inclined to think that is the prevailing opinion among the returned men themselves. What they want is an opportunity to secure employment. They wish to have an opportunity to get back into their ordinary place in the civil life of the community. If that be true, then we must do everything that lies in our power to see that that end is secured with the least possible delay and trouble.

The resolution suggests that one village of a particular class, of which the details are given—and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mowat) has this afternoon amplified his suggestion—should be established in every province. Let me ask if the House thinks, even if we decided upon a policy of establishing villages, that would meet the situation in a practical way. That is, if the Federal Government is going to provide homes, workshops, employment, under certain conditions, is there not just a possibility that every one of those men would say that if you do this for him, or if you do it for one, every other one is entitled to it? Would there not be a tendency upon the part of all to lean upon the State for this purpose? I am merely mentioning that in order that the House may take it into consideration. We have rather adopted the other line of action, that is, of endeavouring in every possible way to make the man self-reliant at the earliest possible date. The question of expenditure naturally comes in. What it would amount to, I do not know. The chances are that if we ever embarked upon a policy of this kind, we would never be able to confine it to a village; it would spread until we would be forced to provide for a very large number of villages of this class.

Just a word with regard to the community idea. I think the hon. gentleman has given voice to the opinion that a good many of the returned men are opposed to a close community composed only of themselves. I think that is true. I have discussed the problem with a great many, particularly in connection with farming, and I am pretty certain that the consensus of opinion amongst those in Canada who have made a close study of the question as to whether communities of this nature composed entirely of returned men would be desirable, seems to be that communities of that nature should not be established, particularly in connection with farms. The hon. gentleman seems to be of the opinion that if villages of this class were established, they should not be confined to returned men alone, but that others should be permitted to live in them. That, however, is a question that might very well be considered by the House.

As regards market gardening, the Soldiers' Settlement Board have that now under consideration. They are making a study in Ontario, Quebec, the lower provinces, and British Columbia, with a view to ascertaining the extent to which a policy of that kind can be adopted, and they have made considerable progress. That would appeal to all returned men who desire to go in for that class of work, but more particularly, I think, to the disabled man, the man who is not in a position to carry on his ordinary avocation. I understand it is expected that a final report will be received at an early date from those who are making that study, and it is possible that the Minister of Interior (Mr. Meighen) may soon have some observations to make to the House.

We must all recognize that while the great body of men who are coming back again will, in a very short time, be absorbed into the civil life of the community, and while the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment is taking care of and providing employment for disabled men—and I understand some 2,000 of them have already been placed back into the civil life of the community—there is certain to be a number of men who will require special care and treatment. Just what that number will be cannot, at the present time, be predicted. I refer to men who, on account of their condition, either physical or mental, will not be able to follow their usual employment, or who, after being retrained for employment, will not be able to continue in that employment. Some provision will have to be made for them, and an enquiry is at present under way to ascertain the extent of that problem and the manner in which it will have to be taken care of by the Government. We all remember that after the Civil War in the United States, there were a great many men who had to be taken care of permanently by the State, not in institutions, but in homes which were provided for them. It is likely that we shall have, in the near future, to do something of that nature in Canada. I desire to assure the House that the whole subject is at present under consideration, and undoubtedly before very long some provision will have to be made for that class.

The subject introduced to the House by the hon. member (Mr. Mowat) is an exceedingly interesting one. I am sure he realizes that it is a matter that should not be pressed at the present time. The Government should have the fullest opportunity to consider the matter in its various details, and I am sure hon. members will desire very full light on this question before committing themselves to it.

Mr. MOWAT: The minister says that the Government will give this subject full consideration; and as I have no doubt that when the House is in Supply on the Estimates of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, the matter can be discussed again, I have no objection to the motion being withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

PROPOSED PROHIBITION ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Immigration laws of Canada shall be so amended as to absolutely prohibit, for a period of 20 years, entry into Canada of all persons of enemy origin who, during the period of the war (a) have been interned in Canada; (b) have been interned in any country being one of the allies of Canada; (c) left Canada shortly before or after the outbreak of war; or (d) have been guilty of conduct, whether in Canada or any other place, which has in any way jeopardized the peace, safety or well-being of Canada or of the British Empire or of her allies.

He said, Mr. Speaker, as this resolution speaks pretty well for itself, I do not intend to discuss it at any great length. There are, however, a few points which I wish to emphasize in connection with it. In the first place, we have heard demands from all over Canada, in great number and great variety, as to the treatment of alien enemies within our boundaries. I therefore realize that any comprehensive resolution on this subject would involve a great deal of discussion, and perhaps justifiable opposition on the part of some. In drafting this resolution I have therefore limited it to certain classes of aliens. First,I have limited it to aliens who have been interned in Canada. It is assumed that a person interned has been interned for cause; that it was desirable during the period of the war that he should be restrained in the interest of the safety and the well-being of Canada. That being the case, if such a person is deported or leaves Canada at the conclusion of the war I contend that he should be kept out of this country for a substantial period. In my resolution I have set a period of twenty years, but that might be changed; in any case, they should be restrained from re-entering this country for a certain length of time.

In the second place, the resolution deals with those who have been interned in any country being one of the allies of Canada. I wish particularly to draw the attention of the House to this, and it would be well for the Government and for the Minister of Immigration to take particular notice of this condition—there have been interned in the United States during the war a large number of troublesome, dangerous Huns. The propaganda they have carried on and their violent outbreaks, destroying millions of dollars' worth of property, are well known to all. When these men are released on the signing of peace a great many of them will undoubtedly take advantage of their liberty to come to Canada, if allowed to do so. In other words, they will find life in the United States too unpleasant for them, because the Americans are almost extreme in many of their views on this question, and will deliberately make life unpleasant for them. Pressure will be brought to bear to such an extent that many of these people will try to come to Canada. These people should be very carefully watched; that is a duty which the Government owes to the country and to itself.

In the third place, the resolution deals with those who left Canada shortly before or after the outbreak of the war. This class also requires our attention. I have in mind a number of this class who lived in Vancouver and were known to be violently pro-German and engaged in espionage for the German Government. There was nothing against them, so far as the Canadian law is concerned, and many of them left the country just before the outbreak of the war. When times quieten down these people will want to come back to Canada, but they should not be allowed to do so, and any of this class now in Canada should be deported.

Lastly, the resolution deal with those who have been guilty of conduct, whether in Canada or any other place, which has in any way jeopardized the peace, safety or well-being of Canada or of the British Empire or of her Allies. The names of these men should be tabulated as international intriguers. Switzerland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Holland are full of them. A black list, so to speak, should be prepared of all these men, and they should be barred from Canada. Just at this point let me draw this to the attention of the minister and of the Government: Perhaps the most effective system of espionage on the part of the German Government was carried on through travelling theatrical companies and German bands. These would give entertainments in different cities, but at the same time would be gathering the information that was desired by their Government. This, of course, is well known to the Government. I say that all these people should be debarred from entering Canada for a great many years.

Hon. Mr. CALDER: From the wording of the latter part of the resolution, I would take it to mean that all persons of enemy nationality are to be excluded. If I am wrong, my hon. friend will correct me.

Mr. STEVENS: There might be some objection to phrasing it in the very broad and plain language pointed to by the minister. So far as I am concerned, I would undoubtedly like to go that length. I realize, however, that many would not care to go so far. My particular object is to keep out of Canada persons who are beyond all question undesirable and a menace to the state. I have received a number of resolutions and letters and memorials on this subject from all parts of Canada, which shows that the public is prepared for some definite action along this line by the Government.

I have just a few words to say in a general way on this subject. We have in the past, and I was very glad to hear the Minister of Immigration express the same opinion, been too generous with our citizenship and the privilege of immigration into Canada. I blame no one in particular for this, because I think it was the sentiment and ideals of the country as a whole, that were to blame. We felt we had a great country, and we wanted to see it settled, with the result that we welcomed almost any one to Canada. Not only that, but we extended the privilege of citizenship to these people. In future I think a great deal more care should be exercised, and it can only be exercised by taking action along the line indicated in this resolution. It is all very well for us here in the House of Commons to talk in general terms about immigration, but action is necessary, and I was very glad to hear the minister say that a Bill will shortly be brought down dealing with immigration. I particularly urge him to consider, in drafting that Bill, the points raised in my resolution. We must not debase our citizenship to the level of the foreigner—using that term in a broad and generous sense—who may come to our country. In other words, immigration should be so restricted that we shall be able to assimilate the immigrant and bring him up to our standard of citizenship, rather than have him debase our own.

I wish to say a word on the question of the possibility of a peaceable invasion of Canada by Germans and persons of alien enemy origin. I notice in one of the latest issues of the London Graphic an article by a well known writer, Henri Bazin. This writer has given the question a great deal of study. The article was written a short time ago in a German town in which he was located with the military forces. In it he describes the entry of a military policeman and a little incident that occurred, and proceeds:

> The same old doctrine of Delbrik law will eaze its way into allied lands in days to come; that is, the doctrine that a German remains always a German, whether he be naturalized or not; that he must group with his fellow countrymen in foreign lands, maintain individual and collective relation with the mother country, and always serve her first.

Now, I think we have had our lesson on the attitude of the German, particularly the German of the present time, the world over. Wherever he has gone, as a merchant or as a settler, he has taken with him his German ideals and his German conception of what his duty as a citizen should be, and sought to superimpose them upon the country to which he came, rather than to adjust himself to the new conditions under which he found himself. This writer points out—and I wish to emphasize it as my own humble opinion at the same time—that a determined attempt will be made by the German people to start exactly where they were a few years ago when the war broke out, and to carry on the same class of propaganda and the same policy of spreading German influence and of attempting to impose German civilization upon the world, just as they did before the war. I think they will endeavour to do the very same thing again in exactly the same manner, and it behooves us to be alive to this danger. Furthermore, I think this country would be derelict in its duty to itself and to posterity if it did not put up the bars, and do everything within its power to arrest that propaganda and that doctrine. The Hun to-day is unrepentant. We need to get that fact firmly imbedded in our minds. We talk about being victors and sometimes we speak as though the whole danger were entirely at an end, and that we should shake hands with the Hun and go on as before. But, Sir, if we read the press reports aright and study the situation from the attitude assumed by the Hun to-day, we must be convinced of this fact, that he is an unrepentant enemy of Britain and of this Dominion, and that his hatred of Britain and the British race is deeper and more bitter and determined to-day than ever before the war; and underneath his hatred is the grim determination to do his utmost in the future to undermine and destroy British influence and British civilization from the face of the earth. He is still a Hun exactly as he was before 1914.

I do not intend to detain the House for any length of time, but I ask the Government to give this matter their most earnest attention. I do not want to be put off—if the minister will permit me to put it frankly —with the statement "we will give it consideration;" but I would like the Government to consider that at this time they have a duty towards the country and towards posterity. It is all very well to say, "We will pass regulations and we will see that our officers are properly instructed;" but my experience is this, Sir,—and I have watched the immigration problem very closely for many years—that regulations are very elastic. What I desire is, to see the policy of the country clearly defined in the statutes, so that there may be no possible mistake either to persons seeking to enter the country, or to citizens at large. It would be far better, in my opinion, to put into the Bill which is to be brought down in a few days, as we are told, a clear declaration that we are going to keep out of this country a certain type of enemy aliens. Let us put that beyond all question. I quite agree that regulations should be made regarding matters that might be considered temporarily desirable; but so far as this question is concerned, I think it should be a well laid down, publicly declared policy and determination of the Government, speaking for the country, in its attitude towards these people. And my resolution, as I pointed out before, is such that no person can possibly question successfully our right to shut out this class of aliens. In conclusion, I would ask the minister and the Government to give these facts their serious consideration and close attention, and to incorporate them in a statutory way in the Bill to be brought down.

Hon. J. A. CALDER: So far as I am personally concerned, I am very glad indeed to have had this discussion this afternoon, and to have learned the views of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. He has brought to our attention a matter in which the people throughout the country generally are very much interested at the present time. There is considerable agitation in connection with the whole subject, and it is a subject that must be dealt with by this Parliament before it rises. As the resolution stands, however, I doubt very much if it would be advisable to accept it, because it is exceedingly sweeping in its character. It will be remembered that I asked the hon. gentleman whether or not it was intended that the resolution should apply to all residents of enemy countries. Well, if it does, and the resolution were approved and made law as Parliament would be expected to make it, we might have a very difficult and complex situation. The resolution proposes, for example, that we should absolutely exclude all persons of enemy nationality who caused us trouble during the past four and a half years.

Mr. STEVENS: The resolution says: "All who have been guilty of conduct, whether in Canada or in any other place, which has in any way jeopardized the peace, safety, and well-being of Canada." I do not think it could be very much clearer.

Mr. CALDER: I have probably taken a rather technical view of the language; but, as I read it, I understood it to mean that the three, or four, or five million people we have been fighting during the last four and a half years have certainly done something to jeopardize the peace, safety and well-being of this country and our people, and consequently I read the resolution to mean that the hon. member proposed that we should establish a law in this country that would absolutely exclude any person coming from any of these countries. I understand, however, he does not mean that, but rather that it is intended to exclude only those—whether they have lived in their own country or elsewhere—who have conspired against the peace and orderly Government of this country. With that explanation we may very well make some provision in so far as that class is concerned. But the whole problem, as the House can understand, is a very difficult one to deal with in so far as European immigration is concerned, because undoubtedly this will be made the subject of very considerable discussion at the Peace Conference, and conclusions will be reached to which we will be parties; and until such time as we know what decisions are arrived at, it is most difficult for us to deal with the question. Some of those who were our enemies yesterday are looked upon as our allies to-day. Take the Bohemians: The new Czecho-Slovak State was established in the city of Washington, and the Czecho-Slovaks in Russia to-day are not regarded as our enemies but our allies. They are sitting in conference with the Prime Minister of this country in Paris to-day. The same is true to a large extent of the Poles, and to a certain extent of the Ukranians. So that these matters will be taken into consideration when we come to frame the policy that will govern the question as to the right or the advisability of admitting certain classes of people to the citizenship of the country.

Undoubtedly later on this Parliament will have to decide the main principles that will have to underlie any immigration policy to be adopted. In my judgment there should be no question that Canada should exercise much greater precaution in the future in admitting people to our citizenship, and see to it that our law is framed with that end in view.

To the suggestion that we should make provision to exclude those interned either in Canada or outside of Canada, I do not think any serious objection can be taken. If there are people who are hostile, dangerous and plotting against this country, there is every reason why we should exclude them. There might be some difficulty in ascertaining who they are and in administering the law afterwards, but if we can ascertain who they are and where they reside we should prevent them from entering Canada. Any person who has plotted against our Government or our country, or who has done anything to injure Canada during the period of the war, should not be permitted to become a citizen of Canada, and it is our duty to prevent them from doing so. I can assure my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) that the subject matter of this resolution will receive further consideration on the part of the Government and that an effort will be made to meet the situation as disclosed by making proper provision in the law.

Mr. STEVENS: Just one word in reply.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is my duty, before the hon. member exercises his right to close the debate, to ask if any other hon. member wishes to speak on this subject.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. STEVENS: The minister speaks with a little degree of unconcern regarding the possible immigration into this country of numbers of Jugo-Slavs, Ukranians, Poles and others. I think the country would not receive a suggestion of that kind with any degree of confidence or satisfaction. On the other hand, he must remember that the first duty of the country at this time is to reinstate our men in the civil life from which they have been ruthlessly torn away and their places taken by the very people that I have mentioned.

Mr. CALDER: I do not wish the hon. gentleman to infer that I was suggesting that we should encourage these people to come to Canada. As a matter of fact, it is only within the last week or two that we have published an Order in Council under the Immigration law absolutely prohibiting people from all these countries, Germany, Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria, from entering Canada. That Order in Council was passed some two weeks ago for the reason that on account of conditions existing at the present time we deemed it undesirable that any of these people should be allowed to come in from any of these countries.

Mr. STEVENS: That is decidedly encouraging to know that the minister and I are very close together on this question. The only thing I desire is that you should make the prohibition statutory. I would suggest that it would be far better for the Government and for Canada to err a little in the direction of shutting out some of these others even at the risk of technically doing them an injury. We could rectify that by amending the legislation if necessary. In other words, let us get into our heads that it would be desirable to stop for the time being all immigration into Canada except that coming direct from our immediate Allies. I think the country would welcome that. If the minister would agree with a proposal such as that I would be very glad to allow the idea more particularly expressed in my resolution to remain over and to be considered at some future time. But if he does not wish to do that then, without any hesitation I say, let us shut out every man of enemy alien origin that we can possibly shut out. I am serious about this; I do not want the minister to think that I have brought this resolution up for the entertainment of the House. I have not done so. I have brought it up in the hope that the Government would take it up seriously—not take it " into consideration." I abominate those words because the way in which the private member is shuffled off by them is well known to us all. This is more serious than the Government actually realize. The feeling of the people is very serious. We have 5,000 soldiers in Vancouver, according to the president of the returned soldiers' association. It is true they are being paid by the Militia Department but that is not what they want. They do not want to be walking around town from month to month with their hands in their pockets. They want jobs; they want to get work. It is very galling to these men to see others holding jobs bringing them $5 to $7 a day who, if they are not actually Huns, are in close touch with them.

Mr. CALDER: I want to make it clear to the House that during the period of the war, for four and a half years, we have prevented any person of alien enemy nationality from coming into Canada. We were working closely in touch with the United States immigration authorities with the result that we kept our own alien enemies in our own country and they kept theirs in their country. My hon. friend's resolution deals with alien enemies or persons of alien enemy nationality but during the period of the war none of that class has entered Canada. Only recently, on account of the conditions existing, we put through an Order in Council, not under the War Measures Act but under the Immigration Act, excluding all persons from enemy countries. Any conditions existing in Canada at the present time do not result from the admission of people of alien enemy nationality during the last four and a half years.

Mr. STEVENS: I was not responsible for introducing the question of the Jugo-Slavs. However, I will simply conclude by urging very strongly upon the minister and the Government to give effect to the spirit at least of this resolution in relation to immigration.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman wishes to withdraw the resolution?

Mr. STEVENS: If the Government desires me to withdraw it I shall do so but I see no object in withdrawing it.

Mr. CALDER: I think the resolution in any event would have to be amended. It proposes to make a provision in the law which should apply without change for twenty years. But, you could not bind any future Parliament. It seems to me that as legislation is to be brought down we should have an opportunity of carefully considering this provision in order to see whether it should be embodied in our new law, and under these circumstances I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. McKENZIE: In dealing with this exclusion question, we realize that during war time we can exclude as much, and as absolutely, as we like. Has the minister considered what our jurisdiction is as a colonial Parliament to deal with absolute exclusion after peace is signed? Does he think we have power to legislate to the extent of the absolute exclusion of people from any country?

Mr. CALDER: I am not certain as to the extent by which we are bound by treaty. I have not looked into that matter but we may be tied up through treaties. On the other hand there is a provision in our immigration law under which by Order in Council we may exclude any race or nationality, or people of any occupation. That provision stands in our law. There may be treaties which stand in the way of our excluding certain nationalities, without getting into very serious trouble if we attempted to do so.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the hon. gentleman refer to treaties to which Canada was not a party?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind hon. gentlemen that the House is not in committee.

Motion withdrawn.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADA'S CLAIM TO WAR INDEMNITY.

Mr. P. R. DuTREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, this country is entitled to an indemnity as a belligerent nation and that instructions should be given to Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of this country, to take such steps as he will deem advisable to claim from Germany an indemnity corresponding to the amount disbursed by Canada in the pursuit of this war, and that, in any case, Sir Robert Borden should be instructed to claim from the British Government such amount to be paid out of the indemnity which the British Government might receive from Germany, and that the whole question should be submitted through the proper channels to the Peace Conference now sitting in Paris.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the most important question in the minds of the people at the present moment is whether Canada will obtain a war indemnity, either from Germany, directly or indirectly out of the indemnity paid to England by Germany, or possibly directly from England. The people are anxious to know what the Government have done in this respect. I am glad to see the acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) in his place; I hope he will reassure the people with regard to this important matter.

The first question we ask ourselves is: Are we entitled to this indemnity? To this we get an answer by turning to the beginning of the war with a view to impressing upon our minds who were the assailants; whether we were the offensive party, or the defensive; whether we were forced into the war against our will. It has been said and repeated often by the Prime Minister and other members of the Cabinet that the first line of defence of Canada in the war was that of the trenches in Flanders and France and that we had to take part in the conflict to defend our liberty, our freedom and our property. For my part, I have many times advocated that Canada should participate in the war to an extent consistent with her condition and her means. I thought that if perchance the Allies had been vanquished and the Germans had been victorious, our freedom and our liberty would have been jeopardized and we would have been penalized by the German people. I considered, therefore, that rather than wait and have before us the possibility of the victory of the Germans, with all the necessary consequences to ourselves, it was preferable that we should defend ourselves now, that we should protect our freedom, our rights and our liberties. It is in all the codes, civil and criminal, that a citizen has the right to take the necessary steps, even if forcible ones, to defend and protect his property. Since the beginning of the world it has been a part of the law, either unwritten or statutory, of all countries that a nation has a right to defend itself and to take whatever steps may be necessary to uphold its liberties and its freedom. If, therefore, we were forced to participate in the war, we have the right, and it is our duty, to claim from Germany indemnification of our material loss. There is another way of considering this question. It has been said that when England is at war we are at war. I believe in that constitutional principle; our status as a colony puts us in such a position that when England is at war, we are at war;—when the whole is at war the part is at war.

[Mr. DuTremblay.]

We may look at the matter of a war indemnity for Canada from two points of view. If we were obliged to enter the war in order to defend ourselves, then Germany should pay us an indemnity. On the other hand, if we took part in the war to help England, England should indemnify us. To me, it is a question of simple justice and equity.

I have said that we should obtain such an indemnity directly or indirectly from what England may obtain. We all know that France will obtain certain advantages following the conclusion of peace. There is no doubt that she will receive Alsace and Lorraine, the two provinces towards which she has looked for fifty years. There is no doubt that the Treaty of Commerce of 1870 under which Germany was treated as the best customer of France, will be denounced. England will certainly receive great advantages. The German navy will disappear. It has cost England a lot of money to build up and maintain a navy of sufficient strength to meet the peril of the German naval policy and the general enterprise of Germany in that direction. This peril now disappears for England. England will receive many advantages in trade and commerce; possibly she will annex some territory.

The same thing might be said of other countries, such as Italy and Australia, that took part in this war on the side of the Allies; but this country neither needs nor asks any annexation or gain of territory. What we desire is to be indemnified for the money which we have spent and the material losses which Canada has suffered in connection with this war. It would mean a great deal for this country to receive an indemnity. To-day we owe about $2,000,000,000, and we nearly went into bankruptcy on account of this war. We have spent on the war about $1,500,000,000, which is a tremendous debt for a population of eight or nine million people. According to a statement made by a member of the Cabinet, we shall be called upon to pay out about $300,000,000 a year to cover interest payments, pensions for our soldiers, and other charges. Since the outbreak of the war we have been taxed in all directions. A heavy burden is to-day upon our people, upon their incomes, upon their profits. A stamp tax has been imposed upon cheques, notes, etc. The tariff has been very largely increased. All this is due to the war. This terrible burden upon the country will remain not only for this generation, but for generations to come. It is, therefore, the duty of the Government to do their utmost to obtain an indemnity for Canada. This Government must have done something in that direction— it would have been criminal negligence on their part if they had not taken some steps in the matter. But until now the people of Canada are not informed as to what has been done. We were not told in the speech from the Throne that some announcement as to what steps were being taken to secure an indemnity would be made by the Government. Nothing has yet been heard of the matter, although it is probably the most important question with which this Parliament has to deal during this session.

The people of Canada are anxious, indeed, I may say nervous, in regard to this question, because we read some time ago a declaration by the Prime Minister that this country would not insist upon obtaining an indemnity, that what Canada had done in this war was done gratuitously. Indeed, we read in an important paper, the Globe, if I mistake not, a declaration that when Belgium and France received indemnities, this country would probably receive nothing. I am sorry that such statements should be made by the Prime Minister, and I am sure, if he is correctly reported as stating that Canada would not insist on receiving an indemnity, he does not voice the opinion of the people of this country.

Some days ago, the federal authorities in Australia took action to support their Prime Minister, Right Hon. Mr. Hughes, in France, in his endeavours to obtain an indemnity for that country. This question is not new; it has been in the minds of the people since the beginning of this war; and the Prime Minister himself announced at the outbreak of the war, that we were forced to go into it, but that Germany would pay the cost of it. Those are not his exact words, but that is substantially what he said.

The object of this resolution is to let it be known to our representatives, and especially to the representatives of other countries in France, that the people of Canada desire and, indeed, unreservedly demand, that an indemnity be paid to this country. I trust that our interests in this matter will not be sacrificed, that they will not be exchanged for titles or marks of distinction, that they will not be exchanged for a mess of pottage. I trust the Government will take this question in hand at once, because the future of Canada depends to a large extent on the securing of an indemnity. That is perhaps the only way to re-establish in this country the necessary stability in financial and other matters. This is not a question of politics, it is a matter concerning the benefit of the country at large. I hope, therefore, the Acting Prime Minister will give an assurance to this country that the necessary steps have been taken, and that we shall receive from Germany, through the proper channel, or, if necessary, from England, the indemnity to which Canada is entitled.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with much of what my hon. friend has said upon the matter of this resolution which deals with a most important subject, I can say that I am in agreement. My hon. friend has truly stated that the cause of the war was German ambition and lust of dominion. If there is anything clear to the world, it is that. It is not open to doubt in the mind of any one to-day that it was within the German intention to conquer the world—I do not say to conquer the world at once and in the war which she had in contemplation in 1914. Her immediate purpose was evidently to strike down France and to crush Russia. Having over-run Belgium and with Holland at her mercy, having defeated France and Russia, Germany would have been supreme in Europe, would have extended her frontiers to the Straits of Dover and the English Channel, would have seized the French seaports, naval stations, and navy, would have exacted an immense indemnity from both Russia and France, and then would have bided her time—one, two, three, four, five or more years—preparatory to her next spring, which would have been against Great Britain and the world. It is not open to doubt that the rulers of Germany and their military advisers had in mind the unparalleled conception of conquering the world. When the war broke out I confess I had hesitation in believing that the German people were behind their rulers in their schemes of world aggrandizement, but as time went on it became clear to me, as I think it became clear to all, that the German people really were behind their rulers and military authorities, were possessed with the lust of dominion, and hoped by the strategy I have outlined ultimately to impose their will upon the entire world. As the war went on, it became apparent to all that it was not a European problem, but a world problem, and that I think accounts for the fact that almost from the beginning neutral opinion ranged itself on the side of the Allies. The neutral nations felt that their interest lay there; they were moved by fear of German ambition, and more than that, I am happy to say, they were moved by the moral issue involved; because from the beginning it was apparent that the issue lay between right and wrong, and ultimately the right was bound to prevail, as it did.

The war is the greatest by far in the history of the world, with a greater outpouring of blood and treasure than was ever before dreamt of by mankind, and after four years of struggle, in which half the human race was engaged, in which millions of men laid down their lives, in which money was poured out on a scale that no financier would have thought possible at the beginning of the war, after the most terrible experiences, disasters and tribulations to mankind, the war by the efforts of the Allies was finally brought to a victorious conclusion, and Germany and her associates were crushed. It would seem to follow quite logically that Germany, having taken the sword and pursued the ambitious designs which she did, having attacked nations that did not desire or even suspect war and that had no policy of aggrandizement to follow, the consequences of the defeat of Germany should be indemnity by Germany to the extent that she is able, and not only able now but having regard to the future, to those nations which have suffered by her attempted world dominion and have been put to the enormous cost that they have in bringing her to her knees. So that, personally, I agree with my hon. friend that there is every reason why Germany, to the extent that she is able actually and potentially, should be made to pay the Allies reparation for the losses sustained by their nationals through her illegal warfare, and indemnity against their war expenditure. I am frank to say to my hon. friend that I have very grave doubts whether Germany actually and potentially would be able to pay in full the colossal expenditures which have been incurred by the Allies in defeating her and those nations with which she was associated, and which also should be made to pay to the extent of their ability. But I lay down the proposition that she should be made to pay, and those in league with her should be made to pay, to the extent that they are able, and no consideration of mercy should enter. It should be a cold, economic calculation as to what Germany, Austria-Hungary and Turkey can pay, and then, in my view, they should be made to pay it. That is one of the questions under consideration at the Peace Conference in Paris. I understand that a committee has been appointed whose duties it is to make careful inquiries and ascertain what Germany and her allies are able to pay not only at the present time but over a course of years; in other words, what would be the maximum exaction which could be demanded from Germany to meet the losses of the Allies to their nationals through the unlawful warfare of Germany and to indemnify the Allies against the enormous war expenditures, including, of course, existing war debts which have been incurred by the nations which have been opposed to her. My hon. friend can rest assured that the claims of Canada have not been overlooked. Sir Robert Borden has been furnished some time since by the Government here with a full statement of Canada's war expenditure (including pensions) and of the losses which have been sustained by citizens of Canada during the war; I refer particularly, but not exclusively, to the losses which have been sustained by owners of craft on our Atlantic coast which were destroyed by German submarine warfare. The representatives of Canada at the Peace Conference have complete information and Canada's statement of claim, I can assure my hon. friend, will be full and comprehensive.

I saw the item to which my hon. friend referred in one of the newspapers. I am satisfied that it must be based only on rumours, and that it has no substantial, official basis. Nothing has come to me from the Prime Minister which would indicate that the claims of Canada will not be pressed, as the claims of the other Allies, for satisfaction to the extent that they can be satisfied in the settlement with Germany. My hon. friend has stated that Canada was brought into the war against her will. If I did not misunderstand him, he meant that Canada had no desire to go to war; that we were a peaceful and peace-loving people. We went to war not only because Great Britain but every part of the Empire was threatened; not only the Empire and every part of it, but civilization itself. And no nation that had a sense of honour could remain out of the war after its issues were truly known. When Great Britain entered the war in 1914 Canada became ipso facto at war. Our coasts became subject to attack. We are part of the British Empire, and, as my hon. friend said, when Great Britain went to war, Canada legally and constitutionally became at war with Germany.

We did not enter the war only for the purpose of helping Great Britain. I believe that Canada would have gone into the war for that purpose; but Canada went into this war from a profound conviction that the cause of the Allies was just. And Great Britain having entered the war, Canada at once intimated—as all parts of the Empire similarly intimated—that we would send our forces forward. Great Britain was threatened; the Empire was threatened; Canada was threatened; and this House of Parliament in August, 1914, without a dissenting voice, concurred in the proposal of the Government, that we should use all our available forces for the prosecution of the war. My hon. friend (Mr. DuTremblay) seemed to suggest that Great Britain had rather leaned upon Canada in the war, and that we might have some right to claim from her some special consideration because we had gone in to help her. If I understand my hon. friend rightly with regard to that, I do not agree with him; and I should like to point out to him and to the House, that of all the nations that have been in this war—and I do not overlook the supreme effort of France—of all the nations, the very shield and buckler, as I said in the debate on the Address, of allied defence against Germany have been the Army and Navy of Great Britain, and her inexhaustible resources of money which she poured out without stint until the war was won. The British Navy alone did not win the war; but the war could not have been won without the British Navy. We have made great sacrifices; but I ask my hon. friend, if he can find time to do so, to consider the sacrifices which Great Britain has made in this war. I ask him to take the population of Great Britain and consider the number of men that she sent to the front, and the number she had on the seas. I ask him to look into the question of her expenditures of money per head of population and compare them with ours, or with those of any other nation, and he will be prouder—I know he is proud to-day—he will be prouder than ever before that he is a citizen of the Empire that has at its head a nation such as Great Britain. Now, my hon. friend has spoken of indemnity. He no doubt means, by that, re-imbursement for the expenditures which have been made by Canada as a nation through her Government in the conduct of this war.

There is another phase of the matter; I believe it is usually called reparation. The situation in Europe is that Belgium was overrun in violation of national law and the rights guaranteed her by the treaty to which Germany was a signatory; Belgium was made a victim of unlawful warfare and her people suffered terribly. Her towns and cities were destroyed, her countryside was ravaged, the property of her citizens was stolen from them and sent to Germany, and many of their industrial plants destroyed, or removed. The same may be said with regard to the northern part of France. The French people also suffered terribly during the German occupation. Apart from the suffering inflicted upon them personally by the Germans and the atrocities to which they were subjected, the money loss was enormous in the villages and towns and cities which were destroyed. The same will apply to other countries (including of course Great Britain) where the nationals have suffered special loss by reason of the unlawful warfare of the Germans. Claims will be put forward by the respective nations for reparation as distinguished from indemnity. Whether such reparation will be made a first charge upon the amount which Germany and her allies will pay, I am not prepared to say; but I should think it probable. That however is a matter for the Peace Conference to determine. I have pointed out that Canada also has a claim for reparation owing to the damage done to property of our nationals through unlawful methods of warfare, and that claim has been put forward and will be pressed.

Now, with regard to my hon. friend's resolution, it is I think inadvisable that this Parliament should put itself on record as the resolution proposes; and therefore, I hope my hon. friend if he agrees with what I say, will withdraw his resolution. The representatives of the various nations, consisting of the ablest statesmen in the world, are giving consideration to this, among other questions, in the settlement which is under consideration at Paris to-day. It is the most momentous conference in the history of the world. It is concerned with the question of the recasting of boundaries, the grouping of nationalities, the determination of modes of government, the amounts, as I have stated, which Germany and her allies can pay to the nations which opposed and defeated her. All these questions are now under consideration at that Peace Conference. It would, I think, be embarrassing—I had almost said improper,—for any Parliament whose representatives are there to pass a resolution, necessarily without the full knowledge which those representatives have, and which might have the effect of fettering or binding them in respect to their decisions. I think this Parliament may well rest assured that the deliberations at the Peace Conference are in very able hands and that the interests of the several nations of the Allies represented there will not in any way suffer.

I should have looked the matter up had I thought this resolution was coming on this evening, but I recall that the British Prime Minister, the right hon. Mr. Lloyd George, or the right hon. Mr. Bonar Law, leader in the House of Commons, stated some time ago that it was inadvisable for any Parliament within the Empire to place itself upon record as to what the representatives at the Peace Conference should or should not do. Therefore, my view is that it would be inadvisable that this Parliament, on the necessarily imperfect information that we have as to the precise situation which exists in Paris, and in Europe, should endorse a resolution of this kind although generally in sympathy with its purport. The wording of the latter part of the resolution is not quite clear. My hon. friend asks:

> That in any case Sir Robert Borden should be instructed to claim from the British Government such amount to be paid out of the indemnity which the British Government might receive from Germany.

I am quite sure that the same principle will be applied to all parts of the Empire; that is to say, that if a certain principle is adopted in regard to reparation for losses sustained by nationals, Canada will be on exactly the same footing as Great Britain in regard to it. I am quite sure also that in the event of Germany being able to pay an indemnity, Canada will be placed in the same position as Great Britain and the other Allies in regard to that question. The principle will be the same. I do not know whether my hon. friend means by the wording of his resolution to claim that if Great Britain gets anything Canada should receive from Great Britain the full amount of her war expenditure. I hardly think he means that. But I can assure him that as far as reparation and indemnity are concerned, the same principle will apply to Canada, Great Britain and other parts of the Empire, and that therefore we shall have no cause whatever to complain.

My hon. friend has called attention to the fact that Canada is not likely to obtain any territorial acquisitions, that France will and that Britain may. My hon. friend has no doubt followed the reports of the Peace Conference. In so far as they disclose what has taken place up to the present time, it would appear that what is known as the mandatory system will be adopted. I am not able to speak authoritatively in regard to that because I think it would be a mistake to anticipate conclusions of the Peace Conference, but if a mandatory system is adopted, no doubt the mandatory nation will hold whatever territories are acquired by it in trust for the Allies, or for civilization itself.

About ten days before the lamented death of the late leader of the Opposition, I discussed with him this mandatory system. It was not very clear to either of us precisely what is meant but he spoke of Great Britain's possession of Egypt and the many and beneficent advantages that had flowed to Egypt from British possession and administration. He spoke with the utmost admiration of Great Britain's justice in dealing with people such as those of Egypt, and he said that if the mandatory system that was being proposed at the Peace Conference would be similar to that under which Great Britain had ruled Egypt, he would feel very easy about it indeed. My hon. friend knows that where Great Britain is administering countries that are not yet self-governing the freest opportunities are afforded the nations of the world for the purposes of trade and otherwise. I think it would be a mistake to assume that if Great Britain, or any other part of the British Empire, should become the mandatory over territory taken from Germany, there will be any direct monetary advantage to Great Britain in that. Great Britain has assumed many burdens in the way of administration and, as my hon. friend knows, her territorial acquisitions have not always represented gain. I feel sure that, in regard to any territory which Great Britain may acquire, there will be an equal advantage to all parts of the Empire in its acquisition. Perhaps I had better not say "equal," but relative advantage; we shall be practically on the same footing and therefore I think it would not be advisable for Canada to set up any special claim by reason of not acquiring any territories if Great Britain or any other part of the Empire should become the mandatory of any territory taken from Germany.

On the whole, I think, in conclusion and by way of recapitulation, that I can assure my hon. friend that the claims of Canada, both for reparation and indemnity are in good hands in Paris and that they have been put forward and will be pressed like those of the other parts of the Empire and of our Allies. I am sure that in regard to Canada Great Britain will desire, as she always has, to act in this matter, as in all others, with the most scrupulous sense of justice and even of generosity.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Whatever conclusion this House may reach in connection with the resolution brought before us this evening by the hon. member for Laurier and Outremont (Mr. DuTremblay), I am sure that we ought to be very thankful to him for preparing and submitting it to the House. First, because he has given us very good reasons in support of it, and has made clear the motives that moved him in bringing this very important question before the House and the country. And second, because the House has had the even greater advantage—I may say without any disparagement of him—of a declaration from the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) upon this most important question.

We have had from the Acting Prime Minister in splendid detail the history of the war in connection with the question, and the various stages through which it has gone, not only as concerning ourselves, but as concerning the various countries implicated in this tremendous war, and we have had the advantage of getting the views of the hon. gentleman on it. Let me tell you, Sir, and the Government, that whatever notions they may have had themselves—and I use the word "notions" advisedly—or whatever opinions they may have had on this question, the country was not at all well informed as to the Government's attitude.

It is a well known fact, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps ten months ago the Globe and other leading papers in this country giving their support and influence to the Government, spoke strongly in favour of, and gave direct reasons why there should be, an indemnity. Among their reasons they stated that Germany herself had established the precedent in exacting enormous tributes from cities brought under her sway during the progress of the war. It was reported that the authorities of some of the great cities which had to capitulate to Germany had the proposition put up to them either to pay enormous amounts of money, or in the alternative the mayor and the clergymen and the leading citizens were to be brought to slaughter. That precedent having been established as the Germans were over-running Belgium and northern France, it was used as an argument, and I think a very strong argument, in favour of the proposition that Germany herself would have to pay a large indemnity when we came to settle our accounts with her. More than that, if we go back to Germany's war with France in 1870, we find that both in money and in land she exacted the pound of flesh. So that, so far as precedent is concerned, there is no ground for complaint from Germany at all, as more than any other nation she has herself established that precedent for the exaction and payment of war indemnities.

Then the question would be largely, if not altogether, whether Germany and her Allies are able to pay the indemnity to meet the expenses of the war. It is difficult to say at this stage what Germany can pay. One thing we can say is this, that while France, Belgium, Roumania and other countries have been devastated, nothing was hurt or displaced in Germany, nor was there much devastation in Austria, nor very much in Turkey, as far as I am aware. They are ready to start anew, their factories and their farms are intact, and all their facilities for general advancement are very well equipped now, and they were very well equipped before the war. On the contrary we are left in the state of devastation in which Germany was able to place us. Consequently I think we must not receive with too much credit any representations that Germany may make as to her inability to pay an indemnity.

The leader of the House (Sir Thomas White) spoke about my hon. friend from Laurier-Outremont, stating that we should get an indemnity from England. That is, he understood my hon. friend to say that we went in to help England, and that therefore, whether there was an indemnity or not, England should pay us. I think if he will read the resolution he will find exactly what my hon. friend from Laurier-Outremont meant, for it is given in the resolution itself. He simply meant that if England gets a lump sum indemnity we should get a share. That is what the resolution says. But my good friend from Laurier-Outremont is not as handy in expressing himself in the English language as is the leader of the House. Therefore he made a slip, and instead of putting it as he did in his written resolution, where he had the time to think it over and write it down, he said that England should give us a straight payment for the services we had rendered. I can assure the House and the hon. the leader, having discussed this resolution with my friend from Laurier-Outremont, that the latter was not what he had in his mind and there was no intention whatever of claiming compensation from England for any service this country has rendered, for he made it abundantly clear, when he stated we were at war as well as Great Britain, that it was our own war, that the battle line in France and in Flanders was the first line of defence of Canada, and that therefore any contributions we gave to that line of defence of our own country. That, of course, was what the hon. member thought and expressed, and I am sure that the Government and the hon. gentlemen of this House will so understand it.

The Acting Prime Minister said that Germany made unlawful war on Belgium. There is no doubt in the world about that. Belgium had a right to suppose that Germany would abide by her solemn treaty; so had France; so had Great Britain; so had every other nation in the world. They had a right to suppose that they had only to make certain defences against Germany at certain places and that Germany would not attempt in an unlawful way to make war on France. Consequently it was ab initio, as we say in the law, an illegal war, started illegally and continued illegally throughout.

When a thing starts illegally, as this war started, it is seldom if ever brought back to a legal basis. Therefore this war was just as much illegal, just as much in violation of treaties, just as much without justification so far as we are concerned as it was so far as any other country was concerned. True, it struck Belgium first. True, Belgium suffered more than any other nation. But the action was just as illegal to us as it was to Belgium or to any other country; consequently in international law our claim for reparation, for indemnity, is just as strong against Germany as is the claim of Belgium or of France.

It is almost impossible to calculate our loss, even in ships, in property, in material things; but in the lives that were lost and in the misery and sorrow brought to our people, it is unthinkable. These losses, of life as well as of material things, the pensions which we shall cheerfully pay to relatives of those who were killed and to others who have been deprived of the means of supporting themselves—these are legitimate claims that should be taken into consideration in determining the amount that we should receive from Germany or her Allied countries as a result of this war. If the war had not been brought on, our men would not have been maimed, and crippled, and killed. Our men have been maimed, and crippled, and killed, widows and orphans have been left on our hands, through the rascality and the brutality of Germany in instituting an unreasonable and unjust war, and she should be held to know the result and significance of her act. Germany started this war without justification, and she is just as responsible for her act as is the man who throws a stone through his neighbour's window for his act. He may not have intended to kill the man inside or destroy valuable things in the house; he may have thought that there was nobody in the house at all. But he will be held to have known that he was going to kill a man; he will be held to have known that he was going to destroy property; and when he comes before a tribunal to make good the loss he cannot plead that he did not know what was going to happen. Properly, legally, logically, even humanely speaking, therefore, we can hold Germany responsible for the consequences of her act. If Germany and Austria and their allies are, or will be within the next two hundred years, in a position to pay this indemnity, arrangements should be made to have them pay it.

I do not quite agree with the Acting Prime Minister that it is a mistake to discuss this matter in this Parliament. I agree that it is not, perhaps, well to pass a resolution in hard and fast terms, or to say to the Prime Minister or the representatives of this country at the Peace Conference that such and such are our hard and fast views. But the representatives of Canada will find their hands strengthened by the stand that this House will take, not necessarily in the form of a resolution, but in the form of expression of opinion by the Acting Prime Minister and members of the Government and by members of the House. Our representatives can then go before the Conference, not with a formal resolution of this House of Commons, not with an Act of Parliament, but with an official representative expression of opinion of the House of Commons of Canada, and say: "This must not be ignored." It is a good thing, therefore, for members of this House to have an opportunity of expressing their views on this question.

I am thankful to the Acting Prime Minister for the excellent address that he made and for having made his views and the views of the Government absolutely clear. I feel confident that the discussion which has taken place and may further take place on this subject will neither be detrimental to the country, nor weaken the hands of the representatives of Canada at the Conference. On the contrary, it will furnish them with a strong, sound argument representative of the views of the Canadian people and of this House of Commons. I have no doubt that my good friend from Laurier-Outremont will comply with the suggestion of the Acting Prime Minister, after such discussion takes place as hon. gentlemen may desire, by withdrawing his resolution.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: In view of the interesting declaration of the Acting Prime Minister, who seems to agree very largely with my views on this question, I shall be pleased to agree with his suggestion that I withdraw my resolution.

Resolution withdrawn.

RELIGIOUS CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, amnesty should now be granted to religious conscientious objectors to Military Service.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to speak at any great length on this resolution. I believe that it expresses clearly the sentiments of those who have any regard for liberty of conscience, a principle which has always been honoured in all countries forming part of the British Empire.

The adoption of this resolution would affect not very many people. I have not the figures, but I am under the impression that only a few dozen people were sent to jail because of their conscientious objections to the Military Service Act. My reason for bringing this matter before the House is involved in a personal reminiscence.

It was my good fortune to see my late lamented leader on the Tuesday before he died, and he reminded me that one of the matters which he intended to bring before the House was this very question of an amnesty for conscientious objectors. He had received many letters from various parts of the country, and to a circular letter addressed by Mr. George Wait to every member and senator, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier sent this reply:

Ottawa, December 14, 1918.

George Wait, Esq.,

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your favour enclosing circular letter addressed to every member of the Dominion Senate and the Dominion House of Commons. The matter therein set forth ought to excite deep sympathy and I consider it to be our duty to take it up as soon as the session opens. In the meantime, I will be much obliged for any details with which you can supply me.

I can, in all truthfulness, state to the House that it was the intention of the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier to bring this matter before this House and to appeal to the mercy of the Government on behalf of conscientious objectors. It is true that, according to our Military Service Act, those who, owing to the tenets of their church or their creed, could not conscientiously undertake military service, were exempted; but as you are aware, Sir, there was no clause which would apply to the conscientious objector not belonging to a special church, like, for instance, the Society of Friends, or the Plymouth Brethren. Therefore, many in this country who did not belong to any of those churches had to present themselves before the military boards. I am not, of course, speaking of the defaulters, or those who did not appear, who did not obey the law. But many conscientious objectors appeared before the military boards and there argued their conscientious objections. The military boards were, however, unable to grant their claim for exemption, and I am informed —at least this circular conveys the information—that those conscientious objectors were sent to jail and even to the penitentiary. As a British subject, as a Canadian, I beseech the Government to be merciful. The great war is over, and to all those who had conscientious objections to military service, I claim that the Government should grant an amnesty. We should only be following a noble precedent. In England conscientious objectors were exempted. In the United States conscientious objectors were exempted. It is a fact that when the question came up in the British House of Commons the conscientious objectors had for an advocate no other than Lord Hugh Cecil himself. He spoke against a resolution for the disfranchisement of conscientious objectors:

Lord Hugh Cecil, on the other side, said that the State could not go into the reasonableness of an opinion. Complete liberty of opinion must be allowed in the interest of truth. He held that view not simply because of his respect for the religious opinions of other people, but because of his own religious convictions also. It was an indisputable part of Christian belief that if a person sincerely thought a thing was wrong, then it was wrong to him. He was entirely out of sympathy with the conscientious objectors, but if they thought it would be doing a wrong thing to fight in the war, he did not want his country to descend to the wickedness of forcing people to do what they thought was wrong, or of punishing them because they refused to do what they thought was wrong.

Lord Cecil boldly denied that the safety of the State was the supreme law. Carried to its logical conclusion, that doctrine would justify the sinking of the Lusitania, or the bombing of women and children. Not the State, but the Divine law was supreme.

State worship is undoubtedly the poison which has affected Germany. "My country, right or wrong " is a popular version of the doctrine that the State has a right to insist upon implicit obedience, but is itself above the law and above morality. By firmly resisting this doctrine, British statesmen are doing more for the cause of liberty than would be gained by forcing a small body of conscientious objectors into the army, or by penalising them for refusing to serve.

Thus, in England the military boards took cognizance of applications made by conscientious objectors. Of course, conscientious objectors were assigned to non-combatant duties. I have here a series of trades to which they were assigned during the war. For instance, conscientious objectors could be utilized in agriculture, forestry, transport, education, public utilities, gas works, fire brigades, munition works, mills, timber yards, oil mills, flour mills, etc. Section 3, subsection 2, of the English Military Service Act, 1915, reads:

A certificate of exemption may be absolute, conditional, or temporary as the local tribunal think best suited to the case, and also in the case of an application on conscientious grounds, may take the form of an exemption from combatant service only, or may be conditional on the applicant being engaged in some work which, in the opinion of the tribunal, is of national importance.

I have here a facsimile of one of those certificates granted by the military boards in England. I will read it to the House:

This is to certify that ———— residing at ————a Christadelphian and a recognized conscientious objector to military service, will not be called upon to join the army provided he is engaged in work of national importance such as agriculture, forestry, mining, transport, education, public utility, or such other work as may be approved of by the Committee on work of National Importance, 26 Abingdon Street, Westminster; and that he notifies in writing that he is so engaged, on the first of every month to the undersigned, at the undermentioned address.

If the holder of this certificate cease to be engaged on work such as stated above this certificate will not be valid, and he will then be called up for Military Service.

Then follows the signature of the officer. In view of the example of Great Britain, I appeal to the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) and to the Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) to be merciful in these cases. There are very few of them, I understand; let us say that there were fifty or a hundred people in this country who on conscientious grounds were opposed to military service, but who nevertheless boldly and in all sincerity presented themselves before the tribunals. It seems to me that it is not good or wise policy to let these conscientious objectors languish in jail any longer. I have received many letters on this subject from different parts of the country, and I say that the least we can do, now that the war is over, and having before us the precedent of Great Britain and the United States, is to act generously. Consider the obnoxious effects that will be produced on these young men by confinement in the penitentiaries! I will say no more. The House will believe me, I hope, when I say that I am sincere in my advocacy of the cause of religious liberty. I am a British subject, and I take pride in my British citizenship. It has always been the pride and honour of Great Britain to lead the world in the matter of religious and civil freedom, and it is on that broad principle of tolerance and of freedom in matters religious that I appeal to the Government to be merciful to these honest and sincere young men, law-abiding citizens in every other respect, who did not default but presented themselves boldly before the tribunals and stated their objections. I leave the case in the hands of the Acting Prime Minister, and hope that he will be generous and British in his treatment of these young men.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General): The question which my hon. friend has just presented to the House is one of some complexity, and of a good deal of difficulty. The law of Canada upon the subject is to be found in section 11 of the Military Service Act, which provides for certain exemptions. Paragraph (f) of section 11 provides:

That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from so doing by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect on the 6th day of July, 1917, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada at such date, and to which he in good faith belongs; and if any of the grounds of such application be established a certificate of exemption shall be granted to such man.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that there is a wide difference between our statute and that passed by the Imperial Parliament in 1916. I do not know what the reason for the difference is, but certainly it was the opinion of this Parliament that exemption should only be granted upon the terms prescribed in our own statute. Now two things had to unite before a person in Canada could be entitled to exemption on the ground of being a conscientious objector, and those two things were, (1) that the applicant conscientiously objected, and, (2) that he was prohibited from engaging in combatant service by the tenents and articles of faith in effect on the 6th day of July, 1917, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada. That is our law. If the applicant objected, and his faith prohibited him from entering combatant service, he had a right to exemption, and exemption was granted on those grounds by the tribunals from one end of Canada to the other. But the difficulty arose in this way. There were a number of the younger generation who had not formally become members of some of the lesser religious bodies throughout Canada, but who had become adherents of one of those bodies. When the applicant applied for exemption he was asked if he was a member of the faith to which he expressed his adherence, and on the rules of the church being produced these men were found strictly speaking not to be members. These cases were taken to appeal and were definitely settled by the Central Appeal Judge, in accordance with the terms of the Act, that a man must be in actual membership of the particular creed or faith on the 17th of October, 1917, which was the date of the first meeting of the various registration boards; and a man not actually and formally a member on that date was not entitled to exemption under the section I have read. I think the decision of the Hon. Justice Duff was absolutely correct and within the meaning of the enactment. We have no conditional exemption such as they have in England. Parliament in its wisdom did not see fit to adopt the British Act. Consequently, a large number of young men in Canada who believed that they were adherents of the various religious faiths which objected to combatant service found that they were not entitled to exemption under the Act, and some very severe sentences were imposed, a great many of them being for as high as ten years in the penitentiary.

There were two classes of conscientious objectors: Those who failed to report at all, some of them thinking that as they belonged to various objecting faiths it was unnecessary for them to report; and those who reported, joined some military unit, and then refused to obey some military command, or to don His Majesty's uniform. These latter, technically, were charged with refusing to obey a lawful command, but their refusal in many cases was based upon a real conscientious objection. Those who had failed entirely to report were merely defaulters or deserters under the Military Service Act. There were no more than "a few dozen" of these cases. My recollection is that there were, all told, 152 conscientious objectors in confinement undergoing sentence.

The sentences varied from two to ten years. Many of these cases had been dealt with by the military authorities, and in these the sentence was almost uniformly ten years. However, these sentences can all be reviewed by the Governor General in Council, and they were all reviewed; and all of the extremely long sentences were reduced to two years. At the conclusion of the armistice, or, to be more accurate, about the first day of February last, the Government appointed a special committee, of which I had the honour to be Chairman, and I had associated with me the Judge Advocate General, representing the Militia Department, and Mr. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, representing the Military Service Board. The question of the sentences which had been imposed upon conscientious objectors, and also upon other military defaulters, was referred to us. After a great deal of consideration of these two classes of cases, the Committee reported that, in its judgment, conscientious objectors who were bona fide objectors and not slackers should be liberated after they had served six months, notwithstanding that many of the sentences were ten years. Up to the present time between 70 and 80 of 152 have been liberated. Twenty cases are now under consideration and, I think, will be disposed of during the present week; and the balance will be disposed of within from two to five weeks, because I think they will all then have served the full six months which is the minimum penalty according to the report of the Committee—which report, I may say, was approved by the Governement. We investigated each case to see whether the man was in reality a bona fide conscientious objector, or was more or less of a slacker. We had cases, for instance, where men claimed to be conscientious objectors, and would not engage in combatant service, but were quite willing to make munitions and earn from eight to ten dollars a day. I do not think that clemency should be extended to such men. For the purpose of gaining information in regard to each particular case, we used the services of the parole officers throughout Canada, the reports of trial magistrates, and in some cases the recommendations of hon. members of this House. If the report shews that a man has been a well behaved citizen, is really and virtually a member of the faith to which he claims adherence, and has been of good conduct in the community to which he belongs, we unhesitatingly accept that, and at the end of the six months' term release him. I think that, comparing our action in this matter with that of the United States, our terms have been extremely lenient. Sentences were imposed in the United States of imprisonment for twenty and thirty years, and in many cases for life. However, since the armistice the authorities there have undertaken a personal investigation of each case. In many of the cases they have ordered liberation; in many others they have refused it. I think about 75 per cent have been granted their freedom, while about 25 per cent have been held to be more or less slackers. Of the 152 cases in Canada, I may say that very few have so far turned out upon investigation to be really slackers. I believe a very large proportion of them are bona fide conscientious objectors. I think that the six months' penalty, which has been resolved on as a minimum, is a moderate one, and it would hardly be fair to grant a general amnesty at the present moment, as eighty who have been already released have been penalized to the extent of six months' servitude or more. However, at the end of the six-month period in these cases, our jails and penitentiaries will be quite free of these unfortunate prisoners. I do not know if my hon. friend desires to press his motion. I think my explanation may be sufficient for his purpose.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In view of the explanation of my hon. friend, I think, perhaps, my motion might be dispensed with. It is unfortunate that we did not, in the excitement attending the discussion of the Military Service Act, frame a clause which would have been consonant with the British Act—a much more liberal one than ours. At all events, the clause was inserted in the Act and the military boards had to act accordingly. I am rather pleased at the statement of my hon. friend that only 152 cases were dealt with by the military boards, because in my opinion it is conclusive evidence that there have not been, throughout this wide Dominion, any undue claims made by so-called conscientious objectors. There were no sham or fraudulent objections, and I believe that the 152 men who boldly presented themselves and sincerely pressed their objection to military service did so in absolute good faith. I think, Mr. Speaker, that in future, if the Military Service Act needs to be amended, a clause might be inserted like that in the law of Great Britain. One of the many contributions to war correspondence which I read lately mentioned the fact that the Quakers in England served in the war not as combatants, but served in the desolated regions of France and Belgium, helping to restore the cities, the villages and the hamlets. The article I read was most interesting. The writer stated that the Quakers, who have an antipathy to participation in war in any form, were ready to do their duty by the state in a non-combatant capacity. I therefore urge upon the Government that if any amendment is thought necessary at any time, our law should conform as nearly as possible to the British law. With the hope that my hon. friend will extend his clemency to the unfortunate conscientious objectors, I will withdraw my motion.

Motion withdrawn.

AID TO PROVINCES FOR HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION.

House again in committee on a certain proposed resolution to provide for the constructing and improving of highways in Canada.—Hon. Mr. Reid—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): Might I suggest to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) that, before this matter is finally disposed of, he should give the House some idea, if he can, of the nature of the agreement which is to be entered into with the provincial governments. I think that if there be any difficulty in regard to the matter it will arise in that respect. Provision is made that an agreement shall be entered into between the Dominion and the local governments but we have no information in detail as to what that agreement shall be. I quite understand that we cannot expect all the details, but if the hon. gentleman has made any progress in the preparation of the agreement it might be very helpful to the committee to have that information before it. It may be possible that the Dominion Government are going to have more control than they are entitled to. They are only going to provide forty per cent of the money, and it looks as if they were going to have seventy-five per cent or more of the control. It would be well if we could have some information on that point.

Generally speaking, the object is one that I very heartily approve of. We cannot ignore the fact that in the past discussions of this measure the impression existed in the minds of many hon. members that the Government at Ottawa were endeavouring to exercise an undue influence upon public opinion in this way. I do not endorse that view. I merely state as a fact that that was the objection that was raised to the measure in this House on a former occasion. I was not present, and I am only speaking from my general reading. If the minister could give us, before the matter is finally disposed of, some information as to the nature of the agreement which he desires to make with the provincial government, it would be helpful. We all recognize, I am sure, that if the Dominion Government are going to make a large contribution to this service, it is reasonable that they should have ample guarantees that the money is going to be applied to road work. There is a possibility, and more than a possibility, of difficulties between the local and Dominion Government in regard to the terms of the agreement. I would suggest to my hon. friend—I do not expect it now but at a later stage when he has made sufficient progress in that direction,—that he should give us some idea of what the terms of the agreement are and the conditions to which the local governments will be obliged to submit.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad indeed to give any information that the House may desire in connection with this matter, either now if I have it with me, or hereafter when we go into Committee on the Bill.

With reference to the point raised by the hon. member, I may say that so far I have not any agreement that would be universal for the provinces. What I had in mind when I prepared this Bill was to decide on the amount to be paid to each of the provinces. First, as the resolution shows, we advance $80,000 to each province; after that we pay so much per capita according to the last official census at the rate of forty per cent of the work to be done on each road. I realize the difficulty the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) has advanced of making an agreement that will be satisfactory to the Dominion Government, and ensure the work being properly carried out. The hon. member will see that the resolution states that the money is to be expended in accordance with an agreement that is to be made with the several provinces. Of course, the provincial governments control the roads, and they will submit a plan showing the location of the main roads or the roads that they suggest the Dominion Givernment shall contribute to. Prior to that we would have to come to an arrangement as to who would control the expenditure.

In my opinion the fair way to do it would be this: Each particular province should select a commission of three of the very best men they could get in the province, men who have knowledge of work of this kind. The Dominion Government should have one representative on that commission. If we had three upright honourable men, men who knew their business, I should think if the Dominion had a representative who would see that the work was carried on honestly and in accordance with the agreement to be made, that would be an efficient body. In addition to that the commission would lay before the Dominion Government their location plans of the roads that the Dominion Government would be called upon to subscribe to. Those plans would have to be approved. After they were approved by the Dominion Government the work would be proceeded with. The Dominion Government would have an engineer for each particular work during its construction to see that the specifications were carried out. In that way, it appears to me, the Dominion Government would be properly protected, its representative on the commission would see that the money was honestly expended, and the inspecting engineers would see that the work was carried out in accordance with the specifications. Fears have been expressed that perhaps this money would not be expended in the way that we would wish, that is, that permanent roads would not be made. But I think we would be fully protected by simply having our man on the commission and our engineers in charge of the work.

I thought that perhaps when the Bill was going through the House I would get suggestions from hon. members either from their own knowledge of the subject of good roads or from information from their several provinces, as to provisions to be made, either in the Bill or in the regulations, that would ensure a full return for every dollar expended. When we get the Bill printed and before the committee I will try to have the form of agreement, for submission to the House, that I would ask the provinces to agree to.

In taking this matter up with the representatives of the different provinces—and they are all anxious that this Bill be proceeded with—I have found that they are all very eager to co-operate in every way to make everything go satisfactorily and to see that the money is expended to the very best advantage. I do not think you will have any trouble if the Bill goes through and I am able to carry out the provisions that may be embodied in it. I shall be very glad indeed to have a discussion on the Bill and to receive any information or advice that can be given.

10 p.m.

Mr. FIELDING: It may be that the municipalities will have to participate in this matter, so I presume the agreement which my hon. friend may prepare will contemplate that, because the roads are municipal matters to some extent. Of course, the municipalities are created by the provincial legislatures, but I imagine that, to make this effective, you would need the co-operation not only of the Provincial Governments but also of the municipalities. Once or twice my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) has referred to "main" roads. Well, I have had some experience in by-gone years in defining what a "main" road is, and my observation has been that every man thinks that the road that runs past his house is the "main" road, and any project which proposes the expenditure of money at some other point is looked upon by him with a great deal of suspicion. However, these are difficulties we shall have to meet and make the best of as we approach them.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): The minister (Mr. J. D. Reid) has asked the House for information in lieu of not giving any himself on this Bill. As I take it, one of the most important things that should be in the resolution is left out; that is, that this Government shall have some check upon the location of the highways which it is going to assist in building. The word "location" is left out. I called the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) to that the other night. He claims that it is in by virtue of the use of the word "otherwise."

Some hon. MEMBER: And "description."

Mr. MORPHY: And "description." Well, strike the whole section out and make it "description and otherwise." I think the most important word of all is "location." I take it that if these roads are to be permanent, they should be, first, provincial; second, interprovincial; and third, national. Location, therefore, is the very essential principle of the whole scheme. The roads must go through one province to meet a highway in another, and so on continuously throughout the country; otherwise the highway would in no sense be a national one. The word "location" should be in the resolution; otherwise it may afterwards be said that this Government never intended to exercise any control over the location—and I think we should.

The minister said the other night that there were to be roads of three different standards as to construction and as to material. The committee should know what standard will be number one, what number two, and what number three. Unless these roads are to be what a good engineer would call permanent highways, the cost of contributing forty per cent to their construction will be wasted money. My mind goes back to rural roads that have been constructed in Ontario under the Provincial Good Roads Law. Ontario has been assisting municipalities in the building of county roads by paying for grading and for gravel of a certain standard and its application to the roads. Forty per cent has been contributed to the roads of Ontario and forty per cent has been blown off by the winds and washed off by the water. They called them "permanent highways," but that expression is a misnomer. The natural cement in the gravel and broken stone had nothing to bind it to the road. and motor cars came along and whisked it off, assisted by the wind. I fear that this Government, unless their agreement with the provinces is such as to protect the exchequer, may fall into the error that occurred in Ontario. The Toronto and Hamilton highway is the only one that I know of in the province that is permanent. It is solid stone; it will last beyond the lifetime of any one living. Millions of dollars have been put into the roads of Ontario, and that is the only one that can be said to be lasting.

Mr. J. D. REID: Has the hon. gentleman any idea of what that road cost?

Mr. MORPHY: It is a pretty expensive road. I had the pleasure last year of going over hundreds of miles of the New York State roads. New York State has spent about $70,000,000 on its State roads, but they are there to eternity. I understand that the cost of maintaining these roads is about five dollars per mile per year. They are of solid stone, solid brick or solid tar macadam. A journey in a motor car or a waggon for a distance of a hundred miles becomes monotonous on any one kind of road. A ride of a hundred miles on a cement or concrete road tires you out, although the road may be as smooth as glass. So over there they have tar macadam for a stretch, vitrified brick for a stretch, and solid concrete, with expension joints every twenty-five feet, for another stretch. Are we going to have roads like that? Are we going to have anything nearly like that? I see the minister smile. I think it is his duty to take the committee into his confidence and tell us exactly what kind of roads we are going to spend forty per cent on. The minister may say that arrangements have not yet been come to with the provinces in that regard. I quite appreciate that. I hope that Ontario will be more progressive in the expenditure of its money on roads. I admit that they have improved their roads, but they have done so more by improving the roadways than by what they put on them. The term "permanent roads" seems to signify the exact opposite of what it ought to mean. I concede that it would be impossible to make roads from one end of this country to another at the tremendous cost that would be required for permanent roads. It is important, however, that we should have a continuous chain of roads so that the Maritime Provinces will connect with a good road at Quebec, Quebec with Ontario, and so on. Through the co-operation of State and Federal Governments and the county authorities, the United States are going to build a road from Port Huron, opposite Sarnia, clear down to the Gulf of Mexico. The superintendent of highways of Michigan stated this in so many words at a convention in Stratford, the county which I have the honour to represent here. He came to Canada for the purpose of asking the people of that district to connect up their road with this one at Sarnia and Port Huron, with resulting advantage to both countries. It is the duty of the Government to be very careful in this matter; they should not entirely surrender the right to say as to the location of the roads in any agreement that they may make. I should like to hear the minister tell us how "permanent" these roads are going to be,—of what they are to be constructed and whether they may be denominated as permanent or semi-permanent roads. I do not want to see under the Dominion aegis what I have seen in Ontario: roads on which the province have paid forty per cent blown to—I was going to say blazes.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Conditions throughout our country vary very considerably. What would apply to Ontario will not apply to Saskatchewan. I have lived in Saskatchewan for fifteen or twenty years; I was connected with the Government there, having been Minister of Highways for about five years, and I think I know the conditions in that province. The road problem was before us all the time. If you suggested the building in Saskatchewan of a road such as exists between Toronto and Hamilton, the people of that province would not stand for it for two minutes.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Is not my hon. friend furnishing the committee with a good reason why the provinces should be left to settle this matter?

Mr. CALDER: That is another phase of the general question. So far as Saskatchewan is concerned, our road problem is so huge, there is so much work to be done, the volume of expenditure that must be carried on during the next ten or fifteen years is so great, that to talk of spending money on a road that will cost in the neighbourhood of $12,000 to $15,000 a mile is out of the question. In our province we have mud roads. There are in that province large sections in which there is no stone and no gravel. Consequently, we have had to develop simply the best system we could of mud roads, clay roads, and in the main, they are serving their purpose fairly well. We can have a fairly high grade clay road if it is properly built and drained. Roads of that class may be considered as of three classes or grades. Therefore, if in the consideration of this measure the House is to determine that in all the provinces of Canada we are to have but one standard of roads, and that the various provinces will not have an opportunity of taking advantage of this measure if they do not conform to that standard, I doubt very much if that will be acceptable to some of the provinces. I think that, if the measure is to be adopted, it must be elastic in its provisions; that there must be sufficient latitude that the Government may make with each province an agreement which will suit conditions in that province.

Mr. ORREN D. CASSELMAN (Dundas): The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) asked for information from the minister (Mr. J. D. Reid) with regard to the class of road towards which the department purposes contributing forty per cent. If I remember correctly the explanation given by the minister, when he introduced this resolution to the House last Friday, he made a division of the roads into classes based on the classification which obtains in this province. If I remember aright, he said that there were three classes of roads, namely, provincial highways, county provincial highways and county highways. That is the classification that is made in Ontario. He stated that it was the intention of the department to contribute only to those roads that were built to a high standard of excellence, namely, the provincial roads. I am heartily in accord with the principle of this measure, and my one objection to the plan outlined by the minister is that he proposes contributing only to those roads known as provincial highways. To my mind, if he adheres to that decision, there will be very few roads that will obtain this grant of forty per cent. I would ask him to contribute to the two classes of roads, provincial roads and provincial county roads. I believe that in Ontario a provincial road is supposed to cost from $8,000 to $10,000 a mile and a provincial county road is expected to cost from $5,000 to $8,000 a mile. I contend that roads of the provincial county class should also be given this grant of forty per cent.

During the time I have been in this House I have noticed that most hon. members commence their addresses by congratulating somebody. I want to be orthodox, and I conclude that I would be extremely heterodox did I not congratulate somebody on something. So I want to congratulate the Government on its decision to enter the field of road building. It is the opinion of those who have given this matter considerable study that the Government should have embarked on this work at a much earlier date. The construction of highways for vehicles in the opinion of many, should have kept pace with the construction of our railroads. Both are public transportation utilities; both are necessary to the easy, economical and rapid distribution of the products of our factories and our farms, and both require the expenditure of large sums of money, too large for the municipalities or the provinces unaided to undertake. We have built our railroads, if not wisely, at least extensively, and I think it may be said that so far as the trunk lines are concerned, we have not only met but anticipated the requirements of our country for many generations. But up to this time, if we exclude the abortive attempt of 1912, nothing has been done by the Federal Government to assist in this great and costly work of highway building. We have had roads of a sort since the days of the early settlers, and since the early settlers found it necessary to undertake the duty of building and maintaining roads, that duty, until recently, has, to a very great extent, been left to them. Indeed, in Ontario, the Crown, in granting titles to farms, made a proviso that property holders should maintain the roads adjoining their farms. Out of this grew the pathmaster system, a system that had many points in its favour and which was, perhaps, the best that could be devised and established in the days of the early settlers. A road was then regarded as a community convenience and it seemed right that the community should provide and maintain that convenience. But the usefulness of highways has broadened. The users are not now only residents of a community; people from long distances use the roads, and it is no longer an equitable arrangement that the property holders should provide and maintain the roads abutting their farms.

I congratulate the Government on attempting to solve this great problem of road-building. It is not a new problem; it was a problem which the people of ancient times had to face. It was a problem more difficult to solve then, in "the days when earth was young," than now, perhaps, and we moderns may with profit copy, if not the methods, at least the style of the ancients in road-building. There are roads in existence to-day, and, indeed, in use to-day, whose foundations were laid before Canada was discovered. You will remember there is an account in ancient history of a road being built at the time the Pyramids were built. Babylon was paved two thousand years before the Christian era, and the Roman Empire began its system of good roads many years before Christ. There will be few who will deny that the great success of the Roman Empire was due, in part, to its remarkable system of good roads.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), in his speech at the opening of the session, laid down the principle that public money must be spent for public works, at this time, to serve two purposes: first, to provide needed conveniences, needed public utilities and institutions; and, second, to afford employment to those who otherwise would go to swell the ranks of the unemployed. I submit that there is no undertaking that will so well accord with the principle laid down by the Minister of Public Works, as the work of highway building. It will provide employment for the unemployed. The objection has been made that not many returned soldiers will wish to engage in this work, but some of them will, and, furthermore, the returned soldiers are more likely to get employment if unemployment is not general. Good roads will aid development and will prove a good investment. Some years ago I had the pleasure of listening to the Commissioner of Roads for the state of New York, and he made an extraordinary comparison. He said that over the ordinary country roads, such as they had in the state of New York before their new state roads were built, and such as we have in Canada to-day, or at least in Ontario, it cost about 25 cents per ton mile to haul a load, but over the roads of their new system the cost has been reduced from 25 cents to 8 or 10 cents a mile. Now, if we can cut in two our haulage cost on the immense tonnage that is drawn over our country roads, we can look with less apprehension on the yearly obligation of Canada to provide interest on our borrowings. The commissioner also made this statement, that it had been found on investigation that there was a loss to each rig used in hauling loads of 12 days per year. I want to present this case from the farmers' point of view, because the farmers' are looking for better roads. There are about 750,000 farmers in the Dominion of Canada to-day. Allowing one rig to each farmer, and taking the statement of the commissioner as true, that there is a loss of 12 days a year for each rig, we have the tremendous loss of 9,000,000 days per year because of bad roads; and if we put the value of each rig at five dollars there is the tremendous amount of money lost by the farmers alone in Canada of $45,000,000 a year. If that amount can be saved by the establishment of good roads in the Dominion of Canada we need have very little fear that Canada will be able to pay the interest on her debt.

The farmers of our country are demanding consideration; they are entitled to consideration, and recent events in the province of Ontario, at least, must convince us that they are able to insist on consideration. They are demanding a condition of affairs that will produce tangible results, making for better conditions of life on the farm. One of the greatest problems that is facing this, and the government of every democratic country is the problem of keeping the boys and the girls on the farms and it is conceded by those who have given this matter study that the greatest chance of success in this direction lies in making farm life attractive; that we can best and most easily succeed in solving this problem by bringing the life and attractions of the city, home to the farm. Good roads, I submit, will help to do this. They will link up the farmers' families, separated by distance because of the very nature of their business. They will link up the farming communities with the villages, and the villages with the cities. They will bring the life and attractions of the city home to the people on the farms. The loneliness of country life, its solitude, the isolation which the students of this question say is responsible for hundreds of abandoned farms throughout this country, will disappear with the inauguration of good roads. Good roads will certainly have a tendency to keep the boys and the girls on the farms, and unless the boys and the girls can be kept on the farm, and unless the right class of people can be drawn from the cities to the farms, the future of our country must be regarded with considerable foreboding. If, then, good roads will tend to increase the farm population, they will increase production, and must, of necessity, reduce the high cost of living.

Some years ago a commission was appointed, in the United States, to investigate the high cost of foodstuffs. The commission, after a lengthy and exhaustive investigation, reported that, in their judgment, 50 per cent of the problem of high prices was the problem of transportation and distribution; and they further declared that the lack of good roads added tremendously to the price of farm produce. Now, there seems to be a general impression that the farmers are rapidly becoming millionaires. I am not a farmer myself, but I have been in close touch with farmers all my life, and I know the conditions that exist on the farm; and I am therefore in a position to say that the idea that farmers are becoming wealthy is a fallacy. The hundreds of abandoned farms throughout the Dominion, and the thousands of farms that are not worked to anything like their full capacity, prove that this is so. The very fact that rural population is decreasing explodes the theory that farming is a profitable occupation. In the last ten years, I am informed, rural population has decreased by about 45,000, while urban population has increased by 2,500,000. That fact, if it is a fact, also goes to prove that farmers are not by any means becoming millionaires. Why, even in Ontario—Ontario that claims to be the banner province of the Dominion, and boasts of being the leader in progressive thought and progressive action—according to Mr. Black, the chairman of the Soldiers' Settlement Board, there are 300,000 less acres under cultivation to-day than there were ten years ago. That very fact is sufficient proof that life on the farm is neither profitable nor attractive.

In conclusion, I shall make a contrast between the part of Ontario that I happen to know well,—the part of Ontario where the representatives from all parts of the Dominion are now gathered,—and the state of New York immediately over the St. Lawrence river. Infinitely better in the character of its soil, with a people fully as intelligent, fully as skilful, fully as industrious, and with climatic conditions equally as good, eastern Ontario, because of its lack of good roads, is leagues behind the state of New York, which, because of the fact that it has good roads and magnificent transportation facilities for vehicles, far surpasses us in productivity and general agricultural development.

I think that the only objection to this Bill is the method by which the money will be distributed. It involves the old principle of patronage; and I am of the opinion that if this Bill is wrecked, it will be wrecked upon the rock of politics, and not on the rock of principle. The Bill proposes to hand over certain amounts of money to the provinces, to be spent by the provinces. The Governments of the provinces must have the confidence of the people; they will be responsible for the money that they expend under this Bill if it passes the House. Surely, we can trust the people; and these governments are responsible to the people. Furthermore, while this Bill proposes to hand over money to the provinces, the money will be paid only after the work is completed; it will be paid only on those roads approved of by the Good Roads Department. Now there has been placed at the head of this department a man who knows roads and road building perhaps better than any other man in Canada, a man who has earned the name "Good Roads Campbell," a man who has given his life to the study of this work. Surely such a man can be trusted to see that the money will not be spent for political purposes, but in a way to give to the people what the people in Ontario and Quebec are clamouring for—good roads. There will be no difficulty in the province of Ontario. We have a Conservative Government in Ontario. There will be no difficulty in the province of Quebec; and Quebec, of all provinces of the Dominion, has gone further in this work and has spent more money to build good roads—and spent it judiciously, as the roads in that province will show—than any other province in Canada And I, for one, Mr. Chairman, knowing the history of road building in the province of Quebec, am quite content to trust whatever government may be in power in that province to spend to the best advantage the money that may be given it under the terms of this Bill.

Mr. EDWARDS: What about Nova Scotia?

Mr. CASSELMAN: I do not know anything about Nova Scotia. But the government of Nova Scotia, like that of every other province, is responsible to the people; and I have sufficient confidence in the intelligence and honesty of the people of Nova Scotia to believe that if the government there spent the money for political purposes, the people would immediately set about turning that government out and establishing in its place one that would spend the money honestly, wisely and well. However, the people of the Dominion must have good roads. They are looking to this government to contribute liberally towards providing them, and I hope that this resolution will be passed and that the Bill that is to be brought down, founded on this resolution, will meet with the approval of the House.

Mr. T. M. M. TWEEDIE (Calgary West): I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Casselman) in which he has expressed such profound admiration for this resolution on which is to be based the Highway Bill which will be introduced into the House. I found the cause of his joy to be practically in the fact that he came from the province of Ontario, and I will endeavour to point out to the House later just what the cause of that joy is. I agree with everything that has been said in connection with this matter, in regard to good roads throughout Canada. But this is a measure which involves the expenditure of $20,000,000 of the revenue of this country, and my first objection to the resolution, and the Bill which will be founded upon it is the method of distribution of the money. The first clause in the resolution provides that each province in the Dominion shall receive a grant of $80,000 each year, and after that the balance remaining to be expended in any one year shall be based upon the population of the various provinces. I think that this principle, to begin with, is very unfair so far as the Western provinces are concerned, and more particularly the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. I cannot see any underlying principle why there should be a fixed amount of $80,000 for the province of Prince Edward Island, Alberta, Ontario, or any other province.

It was pointed out by the Minister of Railways in introducing this resolution that we hoped to benefit the farmers and settlers throughout the country, that we hoped to join the great centres and that the farmers, through these highways, would find communication with the markets in order to dispose of their farms. What will be the amount of the money expended? Will the amount of money which will be allowed to the province of Alberta under this resolution be such an amount as will produce for that province highways which would connect up centre with centre, Edmonton with Calgary, Calgary with Lethbridge, Lethbridge with Medicine Hat, or Medicine Hat with the towns adjoining? If we got the whole $20,000,000 for the next five years it would not be a sufficient amount to construct highways in Alberta alone such as were suggested by one of the speakers here to-night.

I submit that the foundation of the distribution of this money is absolutely wrong and that it is not such as to do justice to all the provinces of Canada. If you want any evidence in support of that I will call your attention in a rough way to the question of population and area in these different provinces. Take the province of Prince Edward Island. Its area is 2,184 square miles, while the province of Ontario has an area of 407,262 square miles. Yet, the province of Prince Edward Island gets exactly the same allowance as that which is given to Ontario and to every other province in the Dominion. That, I think, is unfair to all the other provinces, and supports my contention that the underlying principle is wrong.

When we come to the question of the remainder, we find that $720,000 of the annual appropriation of $4,000,000 will be used up. That leaves us slightly over $3,000,000 to be divided among the provinces, or at the rate of approximately forty cents per head of the population. What does that mean? It means simply that the province of Ontario, which has an area of 407,262 square miles and a population of 2,500,000, will receive $1,000,000 over and above the $80,000 in the original grant. When we come to Alberta, which has an area of 255,285 square miles, or more than half that of the province of Ontario, we find that it will receive, not $1,000,000, but only $200,000 to expend on its road. When we come to the province of Nova Scotia we find that it has an area of 27,985 square miles and a population of about 500,000. Notwithstanding that in Alberta we have an area ten times as great, the population of these two provinces being equal, Nova Scotia and Alberta will each receive approximately $200,000. What does that mean? According to the last figures that I have seen, the road mileage of Nova Scotia is approximately 18,000 miles. Any person in this House who is familiar with those western provinces, who has travelled from the north to the south and from the east to the west of Alberta and Saskatchewan, must realize that we will have ten times more mileage in roads when that country is opened up. Still, because Nova Scotia happens to have the same population, we are asked to accept for Alberta a grant which is exactly the same as the grant given to the province of Nova Scotia. My contention is that the division of this money should never be based upon population, but that it should be determined by what was suggested by the Minister of Railways in introducing this resolution: It should be determined by the needs of the people. We all know that the Maritime Provinces and the greater portion of Ontario and Quebec are thickly settled. We know that along their highways there are thousands of settlers while away out in the West there are only tens. We know that the people who will be served in these provinces will be numerous, but we know that the necessity for the man in Alberta who has to haul his grain twenty, thirty or forty miles is just as great as the need of the hundreds of thousands of people who line the roads down in the Eastern Provinces. If we want development, if we want to assist the farmer, if we want to furnish the settlers who are doing pioneering work with the assistance that they require, we must alter the whole basis of the distribution of this money. Distribution should be based on the mileage of the roads in the various provinces rather than upon population which includes the urban population of the large cities in the East. I would not be doing my duty if I supported the Bill, when brought in, if the money is to be divided upon that basis.

I think this is an inopportune time for the Government to bring in a measure providing for the construction of roads. We must all arrive at the conclusion that this money, when expended, is not going to be expended upon the construction of any national highway which will link up provinces or link up the East and the West, but it is going to be used for the purpose of assisting road work in the various provinces. Every man in this House must realize that the construction of highways is a purely local matter, and that it should be deatl with by the provinces. We all realize that when this Government undertook to regulate certain matters in connection with the sale of stocks and bonds in Canada in times of great pressure and stress, they were promptly brought to task by the provincial governments throughout the country. Those governments would not stand any infringement of provincial rights; they would not allow you to cross the threshold one single step. While personally I am in favour of assisting the provinces in this great work if we can do so, I feel that there are so many undertakings to be carried out by the Dominion Government at the present time that we could not have launched a policy of assisting them in road-work at a most inopportune moment than we have done.

It has been suggested by my hon. friend from Swift Current (Mr. Argue) that this money had better be spent on branch lines of railway, and I agree with him. I think that if we used that money to provide the settlers in the West with the railways that they so much need, we would render a better service to the country than we will be by expending it on road work. I would call your attention to another matter in connection with the expenditure of this road money. What is the position of the province of Alberta?—and the same applies to some extent to the province of Saskatchewan. If, in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, we had control of the natural resources which justly belong to those two western provinces, we would not be asking this Government for assistance in the construction of our roads.

But we have valuable lands held by the Canadian Pacific Railway which are exempt from taxation; we have vast areas of unplanted land held by the Dominion Government which do not contribute one cent to our revenue; we have vast areas in the school sections which do not contribute anything to our revenue. Instead of voting one million dollars a year to the province of Ontario, eight hundred thousand dollars a year to the province of Quebec, and an equal amount to the province of Nova Scotia—which is only one-tenth of our size—as to the province of Alberta, we say you should distribute that money so there will be a quid pro quo to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan for those resources which are withheld from us and against which we cannot levy one cent of taxation for the construction of our provincial roads.

There is another matter which affects the West and has affected it right along. We have heard discussions in the House and in the corridors in regard to the position which has been taken by Western Canada in regard to the tariff. I have been a protectionist, but I want to see some concessions given to the farmers of Western Canada, and when they tell us they cannot give us any concessions on account of the great needs of the country, my answer is that we should not embark upon provincial works and expect to pay for them out of revenues which are derived from the tariff. I would be much better satisfied if the tariff were reduced by $4,000,000, and keep the $280,000 which they hope to give us from this measure of road construction in the province.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Tweedie) has spoken loyally for one of the Western Provinces. His idea is that the money would be more fairly distributed if based on road mileage than on population. After all, I presume roads are built for the use of the people, and if you have not any people in a certain section of the country there is not much use building roads there. We happen to have a greater population down here in Ontario and the eastern provinces. But the western provinces are not the only ones interested in agriculture by any means. May I be permitted to tell my hon. friend that the province of Ontario produces a greater agricultural wealth every year than all the western provinces put together. And when it comes to a question of having a say in the tariff or how the tariff revenue should be expended, it might be pertinent to ask what part of the Dominion of Canada produces that revenue, where is the most of it raised? There again, I say, the province of Ontario comes in for special consideration. This is the province which not only produces more in agricultural wealth than all the western provinces put together, but this is the province where most of the tariff revenue is raised, and this is the province which contributed more than all the rest of Canada put together when it came to raising money for Victory Loans and other war purposes. We are entitled to some consideration, therefore, it seems to me. If you want to build a standard road out to every outlying settler on the fringe of civilization in the provinces of Saskatchewan or Alberta, your money will not go very far. And the hon. the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) has told us that the same class of roads we require in Eastern Canada would not do out in Western Canada. He says there they have mud roads; that there are three standards of roads: mud road No. 1, mud road No. 2 and mud road No. 3. So I suppose No. 1 out in Saskatchewan would be the kind that would have most mud on it, No. 2 road with less mud on it would be entitled to a smaller grant, and the one that has the least mud on it, No. 3, would get the smallest grant.

Now, Sir, I am not going to offer any congratulations to the Government or the minister in regard to this matter until I see the Bill. I am going to be Scotch for the time being and be a little canny. I suppose that more money has been wasted in Canada on railroads than on any other one thing. Next to that I suppose more money has been wasted on highways than on anything else, and I think the chances are very good, from present indications that the highways will out-run the railroads in the matter of waste. I believe that every dollar of money voted by this Government for the building of any kind of road except the kind that is absolutely permanent is money entirely wasted. In that respect I am entirely in accord with the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy). There is no use giving $80,000 to Saskatchewan to pile up a little mud and call it a road; that is money absolutely wasted. They might better have five miles of road in Saskatchewan built properly, five miles of road that will last for all time, than have a hundred or two hundred miles of mud piled up on any road. That is the kind of road they have out there, we are told by the Minister of Immigration. Well, I do not think much of that kind of road. We should not vote the money of this country to the assistance of Ontario or any other province for the building of any kind of road except one built on a proper foundation and properly surfaced, a road somewhat similar to those built on the other side of the international boundary, a road which will be absolutely permanent. Money voted for any other road improvement is money absolutely wasted; at least, it is money from which you will get only a very temporary advantage. For a year or two second class roads will show up very well, but then they will be blown or washed away as the member for North Perth says.

It seems to me that if this Government is to vote forty per cent and the province sixty per cent, the province should have sixty per cent control, not only in regard to road location but in regard to the kind of road they want. If the province of Saskatchewan wishes to have sixty per cent interest in mud for a road, and this Dominion is willing to have forty per cent interest in mud, why, all right, if they can reach an agreement of that kind; but I do not think it is a very good or a very wise agreement.

I also think that if this Government is to vote forty per cent of the money it should have some say as to how that money is to be expended. That is to say, the money should not be handed over to a province, for instance, like Nova Scotia, which will unquestionably use it for political purposes, as they always have done. That is what they use the road money down there for. They do not use it for anything else except election purposes, I am credibly informed. The Government should not countenance any such actions as that; they should not encourage political dodgery in Nova Scotia, even though that province has persisted in following that policy for years. Let them fight elections on their merits, not simply on the expenditure of road money. If we vote forty per cent to the provinces for the building of roads, Dominion engineers should consult with engineers from the provinces regarding the kind of roads to be built. A standard road should be devised and agreed upon by the Dominion and provincial engineers, and the work should be let in sections by contract to the lowest bidder, thus getting it out of political control. Let the contractor build his section of the road in accordance with a standard fixed by agreement between the provincial and Dominion engineers, subject to proper inspection by some one agreed upon by the provincial and Dominion governments. We need better roads in Ontario; we are entitled to them; we are entitled to assistance. Our friends from the West must not forget that they have received a good deal of assistance from Canada as a whole in the building of the railway lines throughout the western country. An hon. gentleman says that the people of the West have paid for it all. Not by any means. The greater part of the burden of expenditure for the building of railroads throughout Canada, particularly throughout the West, has been borne not by the West, but by the eastern provinces. The East has contributed very largely to the prosperity of the West; the East has borne the bulk of the burden of railway construction in the West as well as in the East. Ontario, from every standpoint, particularly from that of population, and more particularly from the standpoint of the fair claims of its agricultural population, is entitled to special consideration in the construction of roads. In Saskatchewan when one of two farmers live twenty miles from market, of course, they need a road. But in Ontario, Quebec, and the older provinces a good many farmers live on a twenty-mile road, and if it is in the interests of the country that one or two farmers in Saskatchewan have a road to enable them to get to the market, it is much more in the interests of the country that the twenty, thirty or forty farmers along the twenty miles of road in the older provinces also have means of getting their produce to market.

Mr. J. S. SEXSMITH (East Peterborough): I am entirely in accord with the proposal that the Government has brought forward. I do not know of anything that will benefit the country more to-day than a good system of public highways. It is evident that if we continued the old provincial or municipal system of road construction and improvement, we should be a very long time in getting proper roads. We have heard a lot about the high cost of living; if we had a proper system of highways within a radius of fifty miles of every city in Canada on which the farmer could run his car into market with his produce, a good deal would be done toward reducing the high cost of living.

In discussing this matter some hon. members have been looking at it from a provincial point of view. I wish to deal with it not from the standpoint of Ontario or in the interests of any one particular province, but in the interests of the whole country. I was surprised to hear the member for Calgary West (Mr. Tweedie) say that the little two-by-four province of Prince Edward Island would get as much under this proposal as his great province of thousands of miles. I would remind the member for Calgary that a few years ago the House provided some $12,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain for the farmers of Saskatchewan and Alberta. I understand that five or six millions of that money have not yet been repaid; yet not one hon. member from Prince Edward Island, Ontario, or any other province has found fault. We should get away from this provincialism and discuss matters of this kind from a national standpoint. If we are going to discuss from a provincial standpoint all matters that come before the House, we shall be looking up the records and finding out what each province pays most in taxes, what each province imports most, what province exports most, and so on. I wish to support this resolution purely from a national standpoint as furthering a system of national highways. When the Bill comes before the House we can go into the matter in more detail. I am not in favour of patching roads; I believe that whatever money is spent by the Federal Parliament should be spent on a system of permanent highways.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Tuesday, March 25, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Shipping report of the Department of Customs containing the statements of navigation and shipping of the Dominion of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Reid.

SUPPLY.

AMENDMENT BY MR. McMASTER IN REFERENCE TO TARIFF REDUCTION AND RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH U.S.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That the House do go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. ANDREW ROSS McMASTER (Brome) moved in amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" be omitted and the following substituted therefor:—

Whereas in order to meet the great expenditure necessitated by our national obligations it is imperative that the labour and capital of this country should be directed to the obtaining of the greatest economic return, and that the energies of our people should be freed in order that the most be made of our natural resources and the strength and intelligence of our people be utilized to the fullest extent; and

Whereas it is advisable in the public interest that taxation should be borne by those most capable of sustaining the burden, and that the proceeds of taxation should reach the national exchequer, and should not be diverted into the hands of the privileged classes of the community; and

Whereas the reciprocal trade agreement negotiated with the Government of the United States in January, 1911, has been accepted by that Government, and legislation providing for its coming into force upon its acceptance by the Canadian Government has been passed by the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas the said agreement, providing as it does for the free interchange of the products of the farm, the sea, the mine and the forest, and for the freer exchange of many articles of prime necessity and universal use offers to the producers and consumers of this country an opportunity which wisdom and patriotism demand should be availed of:

Therefore be it resolved that it is the opinion of this House:—

(a) That the increases of duties of 7½ per cent and 5 per cent enacted by the statute 5 George V, Chap. 3 should be repealed:

(b) That the offer of reciprocity contained in the reciprocal trade agreement now upon the statute books of the United States of America should be immediately accepted in its entirety, and that legislation for that purpose should be introduced forthwith;

(c) That without derogation from the provisions of paragraph (b) hereof, all staple food and food products not now free (with the exception of luxuries), and domestic animals and foods therefor should be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty;

(d) That without derogation from the provisions of paragraph (b) hereof, all farm and garden implements, machinery and tools, including farm tractors; all mining, flour and sawmill machinery and repair parts therefor, as well as the raw material entering into the same; lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free lists—it being understood that the tariff benefit proposed to be conferred upon raw material entering into the manufacturing of the articles above set forth may be granted by way of rebate or drawback; it always being provided that in the event of any difference of duty existing under the provisions of different parts of this resolution, the lower duty or freedom from duty prevail.

(e) That having regard always to the requirements of the public revenue and the necessity of affording reasonable opportunities for adjustment to those affected by the proposed changes, substantial reduction should be made in the tariff with the object of reducing the burden upon the consumer in respect of the prime necessities of life, and with the object of delivering the consumer from the bondage now imposed upon him by the exactions of monopolies, trusts, and combines.

Mr. McMASTER: Possibly I can best introduce what I have to say in explanation and support of this resolution by taking up one by one the various matters embraced in the resolution. I presume it would be well for us in this discussion to find out the greatest common ground on which we are all agreed, in order that the points on which we differ may be clearly set forth. I presume there will be little difference of opinion as to the first clause of my resolution, namely, that the exigencies of the financial situation require that the labour and the capital of this country should be devoted to those lines of activity which will produce the greatest wealth. Where we may differ is in the means whereby this labour and capital can be so applied. A belief which I have cherished for many years is that people generally know their own business better than any government can, and that under the dual influences of free competition and personal initiative and energy, the greatest possible wealth will be acquired. This is always subject to two main exceptions. I take it that it is the duty of the State always to interfere in free competition when one of the parties to an economic bargain cannot protect himself. I believe it is right and proper that the State should interfere to protect women and children who happen to work in factories. I also believe there are certain great natural monopolies and perhaps certain great artificial monopolies which are properly the concern of the State and not of the individual, but with those two exceptions it is my belief that, by allowing people as much as possible to carry on their business in their own way, we shall create most wealth in Canada.

One of the main objections which I have to the protective theory is this: that the Government undertake to direct the labour and capital of the country into certain channels, and the Government is more often wrong than right.

The next point which I wish to bring before you, Mr. Speaker, is that which I have placed in the second paragraph of the resolution: Whereas it is advisable in the public interest that taxation should be borne by those most capable of sustaining the burden, and that the proceeds of taxation should reach the national exchequer, and should not be diverted into the hands of monopolists or trusts or into the hands of the privileged classes of the community which have a direct interest in the incidence of taxation.

That is sound doctrine, and I believe it will be appreciated, though not, perhaps, as fully as it should be on the other side of the House as well as upon this. The next clause merely states a fact—a fact which, perhaps, some people in Canada may have forgotten. The reciprocal trade arrangement —that great and beneficent piece of public work framed by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and the late lamented Hon. Mr. Paterson—is yet open to the Canadian people to accept. It is only necessary for this Government to introduce legislation to have this beneficent arrangement come into effect.

The five steps which I ask this House to agree with me in thinking the best steps to be taken under the present circumstances are: First, the repeal of the statute 5, George V, chapter 3, which places certain increases of duty upon the statute book—an increase of 5 per cent on goods coming from Great Britain, and an increase of 7½ per cent on goods coming from other countries.

This Act was placed upon the statute book as a war measure. But now the war is over, at least, the fighting is done, and I think it is incumbent upon the Government to remove this burden which was placed upon the people merely as a war measure.

The next step which I wish to see the Government take is the acceptance of the reciprocity agreement. Next, the elimination of duties upon foodstuffs. Next, the elimination of duties on the means of production of the great extractive interests of the country: agriculture, mining, fishing, and lumbering. Next, a general downward revision of the tariff, made after careful investigation, and with the double object of relieving the consumer and bringing more revenue into the coffers of the state. The transition should be made very carefully, and be as little onerous as possible on those interested.

It is often well in discussing this subject to endeavour to remove from the minds of one's hearers certain misconceptions which they may have. I believe that many people will ask: How can we make these reductions in duties and still find sufficient revenue to enable us to meet the exigencies of the financial situation? I trust, Mr. Speaker, to be able to satisfy hon. members in that regard.

The increases of 5 and 7½ per cent have brought into the coffers of the State a certain amount of revenue by the taxation of raw material, generally for manufacturing purposes, which formerly came into the country free. But, on the other hand, by adding 5 and 7½ per cent to a tariff already somewhat high, the ingress of other goods into this country has been prevented, and the coffers of the state have suffered in that proportion. Again, if the increases of 5 and 7½ per cent are removed, it is reasonable to argue that the manufacturers, relieved from the tax on their raw materials, will possibly make more money, a certain portion of which should find its way into the public treasury through the Income Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax. Now what will the acceptance of reciprocity mean? Will it involve a great loss of revenue to this country? I do not think so. The reciprocity agreement was negotiated in January, 1911, and I have had recourse to the figures for the year 1910 of the imports into Canada from the United States, and the exports from Canada into the United States, of goods coming under that reciprocity arrangement. These figures, though not for a recent year, are sufficient to be a guide for us. Canada, on the basis of the year 1910, would have remitted duties on goods coming in from the United States to the amount of $2,500,000, and the United States would have remitted duties on goods going into that country from Canada to the amount of just under $5,000,000. But since then matters have changed to a certain extent. A great number of articles then taxed somewhat highly by the United States are now subject to a lower rate of duty. The elimination of duties on foodstuffs would mean a loss of revenue, on the basis of the last fiscal year, of $14,366,000; on agricultural implements, $1,428,000; on cement, $4,376; on saw-mill machinery, $57,530; on fertilizers, $77,224; on oils of all sorts, a little more than $2,509,000. So the loss of revenue by placing these things on the free list would not make any substantial inroads upon the treasury of the country. Indeed, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) said the other night, although I did not entirely agree with him, that ten million dollars here or ten million dollars there was not a matter of first-rate importance.

Mr. CARVELL: Will my hon. friend show me where I said that?

Mr. McMASTER: That is my recollection of what the minister said, and I think Hansard will bear me out. I have not a copy with me.

Mr. CARVELL: I should like you to produce it.

Mr. McMASTER: I think my hon. friend will find that I am right. That was certainly the impression made upon my mind, and I listened to him with all the care and attention which a former political friend should give to his speech. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not dependent in this country upon indirect taxation for our revenue. For many years it was thought in this country that direct taxation was impossible. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) was one of the first to raise his voice, strong and eloquent, in the House and in the country, to show that direct taxation was the proper way in which to raise the revenue. And to-day we are receiving a very substantial amount of revenue, though not nearly as much as we should, through direct taxation.

It will interest the House, I am sure, to learn what proportion of the revenue of the United Kingdom, the United States, and of Canada was raised by direct and by indirect taxation in the year 1917-18. The United Kingdom during that time raised 81 per cent by direct taxation, and only 19 per cent by indirect taxation. The United States during the same period raised 69 per cent by direct taxation, and only 31 per cent by indirect taxation; while Canada, in the period under review, raised 11 per cent by direct taxation, and no less than 89 per cent by indirect taxation. My friend the hon. member for Huntingdon and Chateauguay (Mr. Robb), has handed me Hansard, from which I shall quote in order that I may not rest under the imputation of having misquoted the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell). On the 26th of February the minister said: "It is so big that a matter of $10,000,000 does not matter much one way or the other." So, I do not think I was unfair in the way I quoted him.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to what the United States is doing. In the issue of the New York Nation of March 1, there is a most interesting article by Mr. Thomas S. Adams. Mr. Adams is Professor of Political Economy in Yale University and is War Revenue Expert in the Treasury Department of the United States Government. What he says is so interesting that I will ask the House to bear with me while I read it. He says:

The Revenue Act of 1918—

That is, the Revenue Act of the United States.

—will impress the student of financial history as a signal victory for certain theories of taxation which a few years ago were regarded as "socialistic." Within a quarter of a century Justice Field pronounced an income-tax law socialistic and unconstitutional because it exempted incomes of less than $4,000 from the 2 per cent "burden" which it imposed upon larger incomes; and heated controversy waged about the practicability and propriety of progressive rating. But the Revenue Act of 1918, designed to produce in the first twelve months of its operation $5,788,260,000, will raise more than 80 per cent of this sum from progressive income taxes.

The estimates are worthy of notice. The war-profits and excess-profits tax—a form of income taxation unknown five years ago—is expected to raise $2,500,000,000, or 43 per cent of the entire tax budget. The income taxes proper, individual and corporate, will raise $2,207,000,000 additional or 27 per cent of the tax budget. Ability taxes—

I understand that the word "ability" has reference to taxes placed on those who are able to pay, and not on those who will feel the burden grievously.

Ability taxes therefore account for more than 81 per cent of the entire tax levy. If we add progressive estate or inheritance taxes the proportion rises to more than 82 per cent; and if or 37 per cent of the tax budget. Ability bacco and other luxuries—

I do not know whether all hon. members in the House will regard tobacco as a luxury. Some, indeed, may regard it as a necessity.

—together with taxes on admissions and dues, we account for nearly 94 per cent of this colossal tax bill, leaving only about 6 per cent to be provided by taxes on transportation and on necessary processes of production and commerce.

If I may pause here, Mr. Speaker, to interject a remark, it is this, that we have long regarded the United States as the example par excellence of a highly protected country, gathering into its treasury, to meet its public expenditures, the great part of its income through customs tariff. That day has passed. The progressive democracy of the United States now taxes those who can afford to pay, in order to obtain the money required to carry on the affairs of the country.

Practically no tax is laid upon articles of actual necessity. Contrast this with the tax programme of the Civil War and we find much reason for congratulation. The new Revenue Bill may be full of imperfections, but it represents a striking victory for ability taxation and democratic finance.

The most important feature of the new law is the striking advance in rates. Income-tax rates have, for most taxpayers, been more than doubled. The taxpayer having a wife but no children will pay, on an income of $3,000, $60 under the Revenue Act of 1918 as compared with $20 under that of 1917; on $10,000, $830 as contrasted with $355; and on $100,000, $35,030 as contrasted with $16,180. These amounts are not high in comparison with the similar British taxes. For example, a married man with no children or dependents would pay 3.6 per cent on an income of $5,000 in this country as contrasted with 15 per cent in the United Kingdom; on $25,000, 14.8 per cent as against 35.75 per cent; and on $100,000, 35.03 per cent as against 47.19 per cent. The British rates are notably in excess of our own for incomes under $150,000. The two schedules meet at $200,000, and on larger incomes the American rates greatly exceed the British. An income of $1,000,000 will pay 70.3 per cent in this country, but only 52 per cent in the United Kingdom.

"This country," of course, means the United States. Now—if I mistake not,—a man with an income of a million dollars in Canada does not pay anything like 70·3 per cent. I may say, however, that the author whom I have been quoting thinks that a rate of 70·3 is too high and will possibly lead to attempts to evade the tax.

My next point is this: The United States has a population about twelve or thirteen times greater than our own, and I think I am well within the mark when I say that its annual income or wealth is not more than twenty times as great as ours. That is merely an estimate. There are no figures, but I have checked that estimate with a gentleman who above all others is best able to advise me, and he tells me that, in his opinion, the national wealth of that country is not greater than I have stated.

If we calculate the United States wealth as being twenty times as great as our own we ought to be able, if we adopt the same schedule as they do in the country to the south of us, to raise by direct taxation in this country $235,350,000. It is true that some of us will have to give to the state a great deal more than we have been accustomed to, but I do not mind that as long as the division is fairly done. I say that up to the amount that is absolutely required for a man to live respectably, and to bring up his wife and children respectably, the Government should endeavour as far as possible not to touch that amount. Over and above that amount, however, the Government should be prepared to take, and the people should be prepared to give, a very substantial proportion of what Providence has blessed them with.

Now, I have, to my own satisfaction at least, shown that it is not economically unsound to reduce the customs duties, and it is my desire now to place before the House the way in which the tariff affects the agricultural interests of this country. I have before expressed the opinion in this House —which I believe is concurred in by very many—that most difficult and troublous financial times confront this Dominion, unless we are able to induce to come upon our fertile fields and to remain upon those fields, a very much larger number of people than now live in the rural parts of Canada. I think, Mr. Speaker, that whoever is to blame for it, we are over-developed, as far as railways and urban development are concerned, and what we need to-day is to develop the rural parts of our country. Now, can we expect to induce people to come into Canada, and can we keep people on the farms of Canada, unless we give them substantially as good living conditions as they will obtain in the United States of America, or in other parts of the world? I do not believe we can, and that is the reason I would crave the indulgence of the House while I place before hon. gentlemen the conditions under which the farmer suffers, and perhaps especially the Western farmer, because the latter produces for a world's market. The price of his products, in many instances, is settled not in Canada at all, but in Liverpool, and it is necessary, in order that social and economic justice be done him, that what he requires to buy he should be able to obtain at a reasonable and proper price.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does my hon. friend think that the trend from the rural to the urban centres in Canada, say in the last ten or fifteen years, has been greater than it has been in the United States?

Mr. McMASTER: I am not prepared to say that, but I am prepared to advance the opinion that a high protective tariff has increased the trend of people from the country into the town. I know from my own experience as a member of the Bar in Montreal that, man after man, the leaders of the Bar, are country boys who came into the city because there was greater wealth, and greater opportunities for their ambition, in the city.

Mr. EDWARDS: How does my hon. friend account for the movement in England from the country to the town?

Mr. McMASTER: I will reply to my hon. friend in this way: That the trend citywards from the rural districts has been found in all countries. In the United Kingdom Free Trade was the great thing that built up the cities, and the drift citywards—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: I believe I am correct in what I state; that Free Trade is what built up the cities in the United Kingdom, and I say this—that if the cities had not been built up under Free Trade in Great Britain, the shield and buckler of the Allies would never have had the money to keep the war going that it has had.

What I propose to do is, to lay before the House, as graphically as possible, the burdens under which the Western farmer suffers through the tariff. I know that to read long lists of figures is tiresome for the speaker, and more tiresome for the hearer, but nevertheless, I would ask hon. gentlemen to come with me to the home of the farmer on the Western prairies, and if I make any mistakes, there are those on the other side of the House who will be able to kindly set me right, because perhaps they know a great deal more about the matter than I do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: Let me say this, Mr. Speaker, that those who know more about this matter than I do will be those who will most entirely agree with me. Now the Western farmer gets up in the morning—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: At what time?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McMASTER: You will be glad to know, Mr. Speaker, that my few remarks have developed the keenest sense of humour on the part of some hon. gentlemen opposite. Well, the Western farmer gets up very early, my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. White) tells me, and let us say that he needs woollen underclothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: The woollen underclothing, let us say, comes from England, and it pays a duty of twenty-seven and a half per cent. Let us suppose that the shirt which the farmer is putting on came from a Bradford manufacturer and was invoiced to the importer in Montreal at $24 the dozen, or $2 apiece. On the arrival of the goods in Montreal, the importer pays the insurance and freight, which, let us say, amounts to five per cent, and he in addition advances the duty of twenty-seven and a half per cent. Supposing the shirt costs $2. Very well, five per cent on $2 is ten cents, and twenty-seven and a half per cent on $2 is fifty-five cents, making a total of $2.65. Then the department head of the importing house calculates the profit, and let us say he puts on a profit—my friends in the dry goods business will say whether this is right or wrong—of twenty-five per cent. He calculates this profit, not on the invoice price of $2, but on the $2 plus the cost of freight and insurance, 10 cents, and plus the duty 55 cents, and we therefore find that when the Western retailer buys this shirt he pays $3.30 for it. To that should be added 5 cents to cover expressage, and the shirt laid down in the small town near which our farmer lives comes to $3.35. The Western retailer has to make his overhead expenses and his profit, and in order to do that he adds 30 per cent, so that shirt costs our farmer $4.40. Out of this amount the Government has received 55 cents by way of duty, but the amount by which the duty has increased the cost to the consumer is a great deal more than that, because the importer who advanced the duty in the first place has to have his profit on it, and the retailer who handled it in the second place has to have his profit as well. Therefore, if you work the sum out, omitting the duty altogether, and giving the same profit to the wholesale importer and to the retailer, you will find that there has been 95 cents added to the price of the shirt attributable to duty, and out of this only 55 cents has gone into the treasury of the nation. I submit for the kindly consideration of the Acting Prime Minister and Minister of Finance that that is a very expensive way to raise a revenue. If the goods come from the United States, the duty is higher and the amount of profit realized on the duty, advanced in the first place by the importer, is higher also. Now, putting on his socks——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: ——he finds that they are taxed. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether it is my friends the Western men that are laughing——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think it is, because, if so, they will not laugh very loud when their constituents find out that they turn to derision any economic argument advanced with the endeavour to reduce the heavy burden upon the Western consumers, as well as those in other parts of the Dominion.

Now, to return to the socks, Mr. Speaker. If they came from England they would be taxed 22½ per cent, and if they came from the United States they would be taxed 32½ per cent;—I am mistaken, I have got ahead of my story. I should have mentioned the boots. If they came——

Some hon. MEMBER: You put the socks on first.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Speaker, in a dreary and dry subject like this it would be always a pleasure if my neighbours on the opposite side who have any remarks to make would make them in such a tone that I might have the advantage of them.

Now, the man pulls on his boots. If they came from England they were taxed 22½ per cent; if from the United States, 32½ per cent, and if they were made by a Canadian manufacturer I beg leave to suggest that you will find their price was just a little under what they could have been produced for abroad and brought into the country, freight and duty paid.

Mr. EDWARDS: I should think he had better put on his pants before he puts on his boots.

Mr. McMASTER: After our farmer is up, Mr. Speaker, he steps across a strip of carpet which was taxed 42½ per cent, and then he walks over his linoleum or oil cloth, which came from the United States, each of which is also taxed 42½ per cent; and as a great proportion of the articles used in the Canadian northwest come either from the States or from Eastern Canada, where the price is raised to within speaking distance of the tariff charged goods from the United States, I will make use of the figures of duty as on goods coming from the United States.

He goes to the washstand which is taxed 42½ per cent, and makes use of a jug and basin, which were taxed 27½ per cent; the soap he uses was taxed 40 per cent, and his brushes were taxed 35½ per cent; the towel was taxed 37½ per cent. The water, you will say, was not taxed. Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, it was taxed, because it comes through an iron pipe and has been raised by a windmill. The iron pipe was subject to a specific duty of $8 per ton and an ad valorem duty of 7½ per cent, and the windmill, which came from somewhere in Ohio, was taxed 27½ per cent.

He then put on his outer clothes, consisting of a good ready-made suit, composed largely of wool. It was taxed 42½ per cent, although civilized man throughout the world has rarely got to withstand a more rigorous climate than that on the plains of Saskatchewan. Our farmer felt inclined to make some biting remarks about the eastern clothing manufacturer who taxed him 42½ per cent on his clothes, but then he remembered that that gentleman had to buy the raw material, tweeds, overcoatings, and such things as that, which were also taxed at exactly the same rate, 42½ per cent. The cotton clothes which his wife wore were taxed 42½ per cent, and her woollen garments at the same rate as her husband's. Our farmer was a very excellent man and he went out to do the chores, and while he was so engaged his wife lit the fire in the stove, which was taxed 32½ per cent, and put on an agate ware kettle which was taxed 42½ per cent. She also pushed forward to the front of the stove a double boiler in which the porridge had been cooking the night before while the supper was preparing; they were Scotch folk and therefore thrifty. The porridge was taxed 7½ per cent in addition to a specific duty of 60 per cent per 100 pounds. She fried some bacon, which had been taxed two cents a pound, plus an ad valorem duty of 7½ per cent. Out of respect for the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) I will make no unkind remarks about the price of the bacon. The tea which they used was taxed ten cents a pound plus war duty. The teapot was taxed 37½ per cent. If they had used coffee, Mr. Speaker, they would not have escaped taxation, because in that case if it had directly come from its country of origin it would have had a duty of from eight to ten cents a pound placed on it, with an ad valorem duty of 7½ to 10 per cent. Their table cloth and napkins were taxed 37½ per cent, their knives and forks at the same rate, while their modest display of silverware was taxed at the rate of 42½ per cent. I note, Mr. Speaker, with great satisfaction, that the hilarity of hon. gentlemen opposite has somewhat subsided.

Meanwhile our farmer had proceeded to the barn, and it was a cold dark morning in November he took with him a lantern, on which the duty was 37½ per cent.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Was that the light in the window?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: I will come to the light in the window later. He took with him the lantern, taxed at 37½ per cent, and with his milk pails (taxed at 32½ per cent), over his arm he started to milk the cow. After he had milked the cow he pulled the blanket off the horse, taxed 42½ per cent—that is the blanket, not the horse—led the horse by the halter, taxed 37½ per cent, to the hitching post, where he gave him a good grooming, the curry comb he used having been taxed 37½ per cent. After breakfast his wife washed up the dishes, taxed 37½ per cent, and the beds having been properly aired she prepared to make them. Being a woman of information and education, she was struck with the fact that if the blankets were of pure wool made in England they were taxed 27½ per cent, but if of an inferior quality, such as is used by the poorer people, they were taxed at the higher rate of 35 per cent. She put away her summer things and got out her winter things for the approaching cold weather. The hats she put away had been taxed at 42½ per cent, the fur caps she took out were taxed at 37½ per cent, the gloves at 42½ per cent, a fur coat at 37½ per cent, and a fur-lined coat was taxed at the same rate. The mitts were taxed 42½ per cent, and the new muff, which her husband had given her on the last trip he had made abroad, was taxed at 37½ per cent. Her husband had carelessly thrown aside a pair of suspenders and she remembered that those were taxed forty-two and one-half per cent. The handkerchiefs that she had laid aside for the weekly wash were taxed at the same high rate. Cuffs and collars were at the very peak of the load; they were taxed at 45 per cent, and the very buttons with which they were attached to the shirt were taxed at 42½ per cent. As it looked as if it might rain, she got out some rubber clothing, taxed at 35 per cent; and her soliloquy was: Is there anything under the blue canopy of heaven that is not heavily taxed?"

The meat which she placed in the oven was taxed, and while it was cooking she took out her sad irons.

An hon. MEMBER: What?

Mr. McMASTER: Sad irons, articles which are used by a woman when she wants to smooth out things.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman propose to collect under his system less taxes in the aggregate than are collected under the present system?

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. BURNHAM: Then what is the advantage of it?

Mr. McMASTER: What I am endeavouring to place before the House is the fact that the articles commonly used by the plain and common people are taxed at exorbitant rates. These irons were taxed at 37½ per cent, and had they been plated they would have been taxed at 42½ per cent.

After this had been done she put some mince-meat on some pastry. The mince-meat was composed in part of raisins, spices, peel, etc., all of which were taxed. She also turned out a mould of jelly taxed at 3¾ cents per pound, plus war tax, and laid out a plateful of nuts taxed at 42½ per cent. She had a few minutes left before dinner time—she was an extraordinary woman, as you will all admit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: So she went through her cupboard to obtain a list of articles to give to her husband the next time he went to town, some little distance away. She discovered that she had plenty of cereal foods in small packages, taxed at 27½ per cent; plenty of molasses taxed at $1.11¼ cents per hundred pounds, plenty of catsup taxed at 42½ per cent, baking powder taxed at 6 cents per pound plus war tax, soap powder taxed at 40 per cent. She noted that she would have to ask her husband to buy on his next trip, tooth powder, taxed at 40 per cent, sage, thyme and savoury herbs taxed at 25 per cent. As the children had been particularly good recently she felt that they deserved some chocolate confectionery, taxed at one cent a pound, plus 35 per cent.

While she was so busy, her husband had been looking over his machinery with the idea of putting it carefully away for the winter. He found that his plough was taxed at 32½ per cent, and his harrow at 27½ per cent, his wagon at 32½ per cent, and his harness at 37½ per cent. He made some small repairs to the harness room, using for the purpose tongue and grooved lumber taxed at 32½ per cent. He also did a small job in cement near the kitchen door that his wife had asked him to do weeks before, and noted that the cement was taxed at 10 cents per hundred pounds.

After supper the family gathered round the dining room table on which stood a shaded lamp taxed at 30 per cent, burning coal-oil taxed at 2½ cents a gallon, plus 7½ per cent, and discussed the affairs of the day. Is it surprising that their conversation turned upon the extortionate and exorbitant rates of the tariff on what was used by the western consumer? Their thoughts were rendered none the less bitter because they knew that in regard to many of these articles of prime necessity, through mergers and trusts and combines, competition within the tariff wall had been practically eliminated?

I think that a short study of the tariff will bring one to realize how absurd the tariff is. I crave your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and the patience of the House, because I know that to give the details cannot be otherwise than tiresome. However, I shall try to make it as little tiresome as possible.

Cream separators are free—an excellent thing—but a Babcock milk tester, which is used in every butter and cheese factory throughout the Dominion, is taxed at 32½ per cent, and the earthenware churns in which the butter is made are taxed at 37½ per cent.

If a man needs a bandage for surgical or medical purposes he will find that rubber bandages are taxed at 35 per cent, silk web bandages at 45 per cent, and flannel bandages at 42½ per cent.

If a man is slightly deaf he learns with interest that aurasage for treating the deaf comes in free, but if he is completely deaf he finds that an auriphone, acousticon or artificial ear-drum is taxed at 35 per cent.

Liquid asphalt is taxed at 25 per cent. Asphalt road oil for improving roads comes in free, although road scrapers, road graders and road rollers are heavily taxed.

Citron rinds in brine come in free, but candied peel is subject to a specific duty of half a cent a pound and is taxed up to 42½ per cent.

Barrels come in free sometimes; other times they are taxed. Barrels containing pork, beef, petroleum, or linseed oil are taxed up to 32½ per cent, but barrels containing apples, wheat flour, cornmeal, or beer come in free.

Although seeds are either free or taxed on a low basis, cabbage, cauliflower and celery plants are all taxed at 25 per cent.

Dentists' instruments come in free, but the chloroform that the dentist gives to the patient to ease the pain is taxed up to 32½ per cent. A surgeon has to pay taxes on cotton wool used in dressings.

Although it is of the greatest possible importance that agriculture should be encouraged in every possible way, derricks and stump pullers are taxed up to 35 per cent.

Unset diamonds are subject only to the war tax of 5 to 7½ per cent, but set diamonds are taxed up to 42½ per cent. School maps and engravings for school purposes come in free, but the blackboard and the slate on which the poorer child writes his lessons are taxed, one at 42½ per cent and the other at 32½ per cent. Dormant orchids come in free, but onion sets are taxed at 37½ per cent, and rose bushes pay as high as 27½ per cent.

The tariff seemed to have been framed with the idea of placing a heavy tax on warmth and cleanliness. Woollens and flannels, fur caps, mitts, gloves, and muffs are all taxed, many of them as high as 37½ per cent and even 42½ per cent. Clothes-wringers and clotheslines are all taxed quite heavily. Indeed, at first glance, one would imagine that the tariff had been dictated to Alice in Wonderland by a committee composed of the Mad Hatter and the March Hare.

But closer examination shows that the tariff has been a battle ground not of principles but of appetites. For instance, one gathers from a consideration of the tariff that the woollen manufacturing interests, the biscuit manufacturing interests and the confectionery manufacturing interests must have had excellent friends on both sides of the political dividing line. One is also struck with the burden which the tariff imposes on industry. Let us suppose that a man purposes building a factory in Canada. A modern factory will be composed largely of brick, steel and belting. Brick is taxed as high as 30 per cent; structural iron and steel as high as 42½ per cent, and belting as high as 22½ per cent. It is, therefore, an undoubted fact that the tariff increases enormously the cost of establishing factories in this country. Machinery of all kinds made in Canada is taxed as high as 35 per cent; if not made in Canada it comes in free or at a very much lower rate, and this ridiculous result is obtained: Suppose a man on an inlet up in British Columbia needs some machinery for a factory or a cannery or something of that sort, if there is no factory in Canada making that sort of thing, he can bring it out free from England mostly by water carriage and place it in his factory at a low rate. If, however, there is a factory away down in Nova Scotia making that same article, the machinery is taxed. Is that a reasonable proposition? I do not think so. Lubricating oil which is used in all factories is taxed as high as 27½ per cent. The manufacturer of clothing operates under conditions which give to him a protection of 42½ per cent, but imposes against him practically the same rate of duty on his raw material.

We have gone very extensively into the railway business in Canada; we may have to go into it even more extensively than we have done, and I draw your special attention, Sir, to the fact that the duty on railway cars is as high as 37½ per cent and on locomotives as high as 42½ per cent. If we are going to run the railways of this country economically and well, surely the necessary machinery should not be taxed as high as 42½ per cent.

I would submit for the careful study of all members of this House, a study which would, I know, well repay the time and energy expended upon it, the present protective system as it operates against industry in this country. What remedy do I suggest? I have suggested first of all the removal of the duties of 5 per cent and 7½ per cent, and I have dwelt somewhat fully upon that aspect of the question. I would now ask the House to consider with me what the adoption of reciprocity would do for the Canadian people. What are the great advantages of reciprocity? First of all, in regard to the natural resources of this country, the products of the field and the forest, the sea and the farm, the North American continent would become one economic unit. On the whole North American continent people would apply their energy and capital on the farms to raising those crops that are best suited to their locality, and then there would be free interchange. There is another great advantage which reciprocity would give us. The Americans have, as I shall explain in a moment, very substantially reduced their duties, but they have left certain duties on certain secondary products of the farm, such as butter and cheese. All through the part of the country which I have the honour to represent, men send their cream and milk down to Boston and their cream and milk is allowed to go free of duty over the boundary line, but there is a duty on butter and cheese. What an advantage it would be to be able, if we wished, to ship to the United States, not only the raw products, so to speak, of the farm, the cream and the milk, but also the products of the cheese and butter factories, the cheese or the butter as the case might be. The same thing occurs in regard to fishing. The Americans have reduced their duties on fresh fish, but they have maintained their duties on preserved and canned fish. While the fishermen of Nova Scotia are able to ship great quantities of fresh fish to the United States, they have, of course, to depend on the market day by day as their fishing boats arrive in Boston or elsewhere, but they would be more independent if they were able, when the market was not good, to preserve or cure the fish and ship the cured product to the United States.

What defeated reciprocity when it last came before the Canadian people? It was defeated by base appeals to racial passion and prejudice. It was defeated by arguments unworthy of a great and serious-minded people. It was defeated by an argument such as that it would lead to annexation. Lead to annexation, to trade freely with a neighbouring people! Why, the state of New Jersey has been trading freely with the state of New York ever since there was an American Confederation, and that trading has not led to annexation. People do not want to join another political unit merely because they trade freely with that unit. If that argument was well founded, there should be a strong annexationist feeling in the county of Megantic in the province of Quebec, because the county of Megantic is the greatest asbestos producing part of the world, and I suppose that 80 per cent, if not 90 per cent, of the product of the asbestos mines in that county goes over the border into the United States. Are the people of that county any less attached to the Canadian flag and to the Canadian constitution than the rest of the people of Canada? Such a proposition is absurd. Let me ask the House and the country that when we come to discuss reciprocity, we discuss it as a serious, sober-minded people and not with a lot of hysterical waving of the flag and getting ourselves into a state of perfect want of judgment. One of the arguments raised against the reciprocity agreement was that if we did not enter into this reciprocity trade agreement with the United States, the Democrats who were then coming into power in the United States would give to the Canadian exporter of natural products all the advantages he would get under that agreement. That has proved to be false. The Democrats did very considerably reduce the duties on a large number of things, but I have before me, and I will again crave the patience and indulgence of the House while I read this list, of articles affected, of the present rate of duty in the United States, and of the proposed rate under the reciprocity agreement:

Some western farmer will correct me if I am wrong in the argument I now purpose advancing. I understand that after having, for several years, cropped a field in wheat, you help the land by putting in a crop of barley. If that be true—and I believe it is—then the absence of duty on barley going into the United States would have not only a direct but an indirect benefit upon Canadian agriculture.

Hon. gentlemen will see the advantage reciprocity would have given to us, over the present tariff of the Democratic party in the United States, in the matter of fish.

If one compares the rates of American duties prevailing at the time the reciprocity arrangement was negotiated with those prevailing at the present time, one is bound to admit that the Democrats did reduce the duties very substantially, but not so low in very many cases as would have been the case under the reciprocity agreement. Now what would that have meant, supposing one economic unit for natural products had been established between the United States and Canada? One of the most densely populated portions of North America is found on the northeastern Atlantic seaboard of the United States. In that area we find the great city of New York, and the manufacturing cities of New Jersey and of New England. Now if you will visualize the map of the United States and Canada, and place one end of a pair of compasses, let us say, on the city of New York, and draw a circle with a radius of 500 miles, in that area you will find practically the whole of Nova Scotia, the whole of Prince Edward Island, the whole of New Brunswick, practically the whole of the inhabited part of the province of Quebec, and the province of Ontario as far west as Sudbury. What is left outside the circle? Six-sevenths of the United States itself. The whole thing would have come down to a question of transportation, and as that part of Eastern Canada which I have just mentioned lies within easy water communication of the great consuming centres of the north Atlantic seaboard, one can see the advantage which the reciprocity agreement would have given to the producers of Eastern Canada.

Now one of the arguments which I have advanced this afternoon has been that if we are to attract people to our fertile fields and keep them there, we must give to the agriculturalists of this Dominion as good living conditions as those enjoyed in the northwestern States. We have all of us, I presume, been brought up with the idea that the United States has a very high protective tariff; but I believe that is not true to-day. Certainly, some duties have been retained at a high figure, but a great many duties to-day are ten, fifteen or twenty per cent. In addition to that, the United States have a free list which is very long and very wide. I shall read a list of articles that are on the free list under the American tariff and the rates of duty which these same articles have to pay under the Canadian tariff. I shall read only the rates on goods coming from the United States; the duties on the same goods coming from Great Britain will of course be substantially lower.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that wheat flour and semolina were placed upon the free list by the Government of which the present Government is the residuary legatee,—the Borden Administration. Of course, in 1911 it was said that the Liberals were disloyal because they wanted to trade freely with the United States in wheat, barley and oats. That assertion was made again and again on Conservative platforms in that election campaign, but the Government which came into power, largely through this appeal, thought it quite fit and proper,—and indeed I heartily agree with them,—to place these articles upon the free list. Barbed wire is free on both sides. Certain unmanufactured lumber is free on both sides; but manufactured lumber, even tongued and grooved, is free for the American farmer in the northwest plains of his country, while it is taxed as high as 32½ per cent for the Canadian farmer who lives under very much the same circumstances.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I have been obliged to weary the House at this length with this long rehearsal of tariff schedules; but it was unavoidable. Now, under these circumstances what does this House propose to do? Is the tariff to be left as it is? Is the reciprocity offer, which is yet open, not to be accepted? It is for this House to decide how the Government shall deal with this matter.

After the American war of the revolution had ended, conditions in the United States were in a very precarious condition. One state was jealous of another. The currency was debased. There was financial distress—aye, even armed rebellion in the state of Connecticut—and George Washington made a speech in which he said: "Let us set up a banner to which all honest and wise men may resort."

Mr. Speaker, I propose this afternoon to set up a banner to which all wise and honest men may resort, in the form of this resolution, and I invite all those who agree with me, no matter where they sit in this House, to support this resolution. We have at the present time, Mr. Speaker, a somewhat extraordinary condition of affairs in this House and in this country. The Acting Prime Minister, in his eloquent and masterly address at the opening of the session, said that the ship of state never required more careful and sane handling than it did at the present time. I agree with him, but, Mr. Speaker, what is the condition of the ship of state to-day? The captain stands there with some of his officers around him, and to him enters the quartermaster from Moosejaw (Mr. Maharg). The quartermaster from Moosejaw says to the captain: "I belong to the starboard watch, and if you, captain, are not prepared to navigate the ship as I and my watch want, then we are going to desert the ship after next pay day, and you will have a large number of by-elections on your hands." Then the quartermaster from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) approaches the captain. He is even more—not mutinous, I would not say mutinous—but more truculent than the quartermaster from Moosejaw, and he says: "Captain, I belong to the port watch, and if you are not prepared to navigate this ship as the port watch wants, then we are going to call in our friends who are not on board ship, but who agree with us, and you, captain, and your officers, are going to walk the plank." Then approaches with swift tread the quartermaster from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), and he says: "Captain, I belong neither to the starboard watch nor to the port watch. I believe in party government, a party of one," and he goes on to say: "I tender you, captain, my independent support until I consider it is time for me and my friends to unite and make you walk the plank." I do not know whether I can congratulate or commiserate the Acting Prime Minister, the captain of the ship, for the support he gets from the eloquent and the revered quartermaster from Shelburne and Queens.

But the captain of the ship, the Acting Prime Minister, is in a position which is hardly fair to him, or fair to this House, or fair to the country. I believe in party government. I think that this country will be best governed by a strong government believing in liberal principles, and with the courage to put those principles into practice, but I say this: That if we cannot have a strong Liberal Government, we should have a strong Conservative Government; we should have a government that stands for something. Does the Acting Prime Minister know whether he enjoys the confidence—no, I will not put it that way—does he know whether the views he holds on public questions are the views which his Cabinet holds in its entirety? I do not think he does. Does he know whether the views he holds on public questions are the views which his supporters, sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, hold on public questions? I do not think he does, and yet he is entitled to know that. Our party system arose at the same time as did the system of responsible government, when that great man—because he was a great man, one of the great men of the world—William of Orange, came to be King of Great Britain and Ireland. He, at the beginning of his reign, endeavoured to have in his Cabinet the same balance and proportion of parties as were in the House. He had within his Cabinet both Whigs and Tories. The thing did not work. The House of Commons was broken up into factions, and the Earl of Sunderland devised a simple scheme and it was this: that the King should choose for his ministers those who belonged to the majority party of the House of Commons. Then arose our party government, then arose our system of responsible government; I believe one cannot exist without the other. If the majority of the people of this country believe in high tariffs, believe in leaving things as they are, then the Prime Minister, if that is his view, has got the right to know it, and he has got the right to have their support. But if the majority of the people of this country do not believe in high tariffs, but, on the contrary, believe in low tariffs, then the Liberal party should be in office and should rule.

There are two roads open before the Canadian people. There is first of all the road that leads straight on, which may be called the road of leaving things as they are. It is an easy road to travel on for a while.

You do not have to surmount any difficulty at the present time; you have just got to leave things as they are. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that the time has arrived in the world's history when things cannot be left as they are. I do not say that the time for special privilege has passed, but I say that the time when special privilege will be patiently and silently endured has passed, and the people want a change. I say that that road of leaving things as they are leads downhill, and that there is danger for those who follow it. I say that when the night comes, and the mists will arise the only guide those who travel that road will have will be the flitting lights of political expediency. The other road leads up the Hill Difficulty. It will be difficult, there are things to adjust and hard things to do, but up that Hill Difficulty lies the road that the Canadian people should travel, for up that Hill Difficulty we will reach the Delectable Mountains, from whose summits we can view the Promised Land. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria, Alta. (Mr. W. H. White) in moving the resolution which, Sir, is now in your hands.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we are always glad to hear from the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). He has a pleasing countenance and a vein of poetry which we greatly like to hear express itself from time to time in this practical and prosaic chamber. I think it will be conceded by all that a member who can start his address to this House with a Canadian customs' tariff and finish it with an excursion to the Delectable Mountains of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, is at least entitled to high distinction in the realm of the imagination.

In politics my hon. friend is not only practical, but he is optimistic and decidedly persevering. Only the other night the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. D. D. McKenzie) hung up a light which was to guide the errant footsteps home. Well, the light appears to have gone out, but my hon. friend from Brome, determined to have something by way of attraction, has this afternoon set up a banner; but I think when this discussion comes to an end this afternoon my hon. friend will find that, while the light has gone out, the banner will not wave, and that all the allurements which have been set up on the other side of the House are indeed in vain.

My hon. friend covered a very wide field in his dissertation—political economy, free trade, protection, the fiscal policy of the United States, together with its income taxation system, reciprocity, and finally, and the most interesting thing to which my hon. friend referred this afternoon, his delineation of domestic scenes of Canadian farm life.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Now, I have an advantage over my hon. friend because I was born on a farm, and I am sure he was not from the description of farm life which he gave us this afternoon. I thought as I listened to him that he must have learned what he knows of farming from one of those correspondence schools—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: and if I may—without offence to my hon. friend and in justice to the intelligence of the farming community of Canada,—I should like to correct one indubitably false impression which he has as to the habits of the farmers of Canada, especially in the morning. I should like in all seriousness to point out to my hon. friend that the farmer on rising in the morning does not as he told us, first put on his socks and his boots; there are other garments which have priority over the boots at least.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. McMASTER: Those are the unmentionables.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend did not mention any of the unmentionables. My hon. friend did make one true observation about the Canadian farmer this afternoon, and that was that he got up in the morning. He does get up in the morning, and when I was a boy upon a Canadian farm, quite a small one, I had to get up very early in the morning myself, and I have never forgotten it. The farmer gets up in the morning, and, Mr. Speaker, he gets up too early in the morning, and his representatives in this House get up too early in the morning, to be caught by any want of confidence motion masquerading in the guise of a genuine tariff resolution. Political economy, free trade, protection, American fiscal policy, reciprocity, the constitution and constitutional practice, winding up, as I have said, by an excursion to the Delectable Mountains—Mr. Speaker, what is it all about? What is the amendment of my hon. friend from Brome, and what is the motion before the House? Let us come back from his expedition into the realm of imagination and find out what is the motion before the House, and what is the amendment proposed by my hon. friend to the motion, and what is the effect of that amendment if adopted by this House.

My hon. friend knows perfectly well that this is not the time to bring forward a tariff resolution in this House. The time for a tariff resolution is not upon going into Supply, but upon going into Ways and Means on the Budget. That is the time for a resolution on the tariff, and if my hon. friend genuinely and sincerely desired to put forward a tariff resolution, that is the time when it should be put forward, because that is the only time on which a tariff resolution can be intelligently discussed.

Now, why do I say that? Because it is only when the Budget is brought down that the financial position of the Dominion is disclosed, the needs of the Dominion exchequer are made known to Parliament and the country, and the policy which the Government has to meet those needs is submitted to the House of Commons. The time for a resolution on the tariff therefore is not, as I have said, upon a motion to go into Supply, but when the Budget speech has been brought down and the policy of the Government is before the House.

What is the motion before the House to-day? The motion before the House is, that the Speaker do leave the Chair and the House go into Committee of Supply. Any amendment whatsoever, no matter what its merits or demerits may be, moved as my hon. friend has moved his motion is a motion of want of confidence in the Government. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the adoption of the amendment which he has moved to-day would mean the defeat of the Government upon a vital matter, namely, Supply. Why does the Government move that the House go into Supply? In order that the Government may be enabled to carry on the administration of the affairs of the country. The motion is to go into Supply in order that the Estimates which have been submitted to the House may be taken into consideration; in order that items may be voted—items providing the necessary funds for the payment of members of the Civil Service, to provide effectually for the judicial administration of Canada; to provide for the construction of important national works and undertakings; to provide for carrying on the railway systems owned and operated by the Government; to provide for pensions for our returned soldiers; to vote the sums of money necessary to bring our soldiers back from across the seas. That is the reason why the House is moved into Committee of Supply. My hon. friend moves in amendment that the House do not go into Committee of Supply; therefore his amendment is a motion of want of confidence in the Government, because if the House does not go into Supply, if the items contained in the Estimates are not voted by Parliament, the Government cannot carry on. While my hon. friend's motion is technically in order, as an amendment, it is entirely out of place. I say that with entire respect to my hon. friend, because resolutions of that kind have been moved in the past. But their effect has been precisely as I have indicated; they have always been regarded and must be regarded under our constitutional system as a motion of want of confidence in the Government upon a vital question.

As I have said, my hon. friend should have postponed the moving of this resolution, if he desired to have it considered by the House, until after the bringing down of the Budget, until after the financial situation of the country has been disclosed to the House, and until the Government proposals have been submitted to the House for consideration following the Budget speech. I do not propose, therefore, to discuss the proposals in this resolution because this is not the time to discuss them. They are important proposals; they relate to revenue, to trade, to finance, to international treaties. But I shall not discuss them because, as I have said, the proper time to discuss proposals of this kind is in the Budget debate, not on a motion to go into Supply.

While my hon. friend is a popular member of the other side, as indeed he is on this side of the House, I was interested in observing that no very great happiness was expressed in the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite as he proceeded with his dissertation. Some of them I noted particularly. When my hon. friend was talking about the duty on woollens and might have inadvertently touched on the duty on cotton goods, I looked at the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb); his face seemed grave. That, however, may have been merely a synchronism, not cause and effect. Similarly, the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Tobin) did not look particularly happy until the member for Brome had taken his seat, and the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) by no means reflected the expression of enthusiasm which beamed from the face of the member for Brome when he was putting forward his want of confidence in the Government in the form of a resolution in respect to the tariff.

Now, many members in the House may desire to speak upon this amendment. As I have said, I do not intend to do so except to point out its nature and its effect if it should be adopted by the House. I do not desire to chide the member for Brome. This is a free House, and no one stands more than I do for freedom of opinion and its expression, even in war time. But may I say to him in all seriousness that I think he should have regard for the critical condition of the world to-day; for the fact that the war is not yet at an end; that we are in the midst of war conditions, that we are labouring with the vast problem of bringing back the soldiers who have upheld the honour of Canada in the field abroad. By far the most important thing we have before us is to get these men back, to reestablish them in civil life, and to maintain conditions in this country under which there will be confidence, and such stability as can be created in this trying period. It is, to say the least, inadvisable that my hon. friend should at a time like this bring forward a want of confidence motion the only purpose of which can be to obstruct or to embarrass the Government. Speaking for myself, I do not believe this is the time in which that policy should be pursued. But hon. gentlemen opposite are not taking advice from me in matters of policy and I am the first to admit that my hon. friend or other hon. gentlemen opposite should take such a course as may seem to him or to them advisable.

As this discussion will probably go on, may I suggest that when it does go on, regard should be had to the conditions which exist in Canada and outside of Canada to-day. What I mean to say is that the discussion should be carried on in the light of those conditions. The war is not yet at an end. In the matter of international trade, many nations which have been engaged in the war have to-day restrictions and prohibitions upon imports. Although London used to be the great money centre of the world and sterling exchange was nearly always at a premium, sterling exchange is to-day down from $4.86\frac{2}{3}$ to $4.65, due to the unsettled financial conditions of the world and the effect of the war upon Great Britain and European countries. Then we have the fact that the Peace Conference which is sitting at Paris will not only consider the terms of settlement, so far as boundaries and governments are concerned, but deal with most important economic questions including duties. It is quite possible, even probable, that all existing treaties may be denounced and new treaties entered into amongst the Allies and others who may be parties to the League of Nations. Any discussion which takes place upon tariff matters in this Parliament to-day must, it seems to me, be conducted in the light of those existing conditions.

The Government will bring down the Budget, I hope, early in April. My view would be that if it be possible to wait, it would be advantageous that the Budget should not be brought down until conclusions have been reached by the Peace Conference, and while I would not be disposed to defer the Budget too long on that ground, it is desirable that the international situation should be cleared somewhat before it is brought down. I fully realize the importance of the question of the tariff; no man in this House realizes it more fully than I. I know that differences of views exist with regard to it; that there are extreme views on the one side and extreme views on the other side. The Government has given and will continue to give the closest attention to this most important matter. I believe, Sir, that when the Budget is brought down, and the financial situation disclosed, and the policy of the Government announced, that policy will have the support of the great majority of the members of this House and of the people of Canada. We shall have tariff proposals for the present session and we shall have an announcement to make as to steps to be taken looking towards a revision of the tariff when conditions become more normal.
