House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, February 20, 1919.

The Parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the 20th day of February, 1919, met this day at Ottawa, for the dispatch of business.

The House met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from Lt.-Col. the Hon. Harold Henderson, Governor General's Secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate Chamber at 3 p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion Parliament.

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman-Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And the House being returned to the Commons Chamber:

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy which is as follows:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Since the last session of Parliament events have transpired of the highest consequence to the Empire and to Canada. After withstanding with steadfast valour repeated assaults pressed with the utmost vigour and determination, the Allied Forces, taking the offensive in all theatres of action, advanced to decisive and overwhelming victory. Upon terms of practically unconditional surrender on the part of the enemy, armistices were arranged and are now in effect, under which extensive strategic territories have been evacuated, guns, munitions and other war material and supplies surrendered on a vast scale, and the greater part of the hostile fleets delivered up to the Allies. A Conference is now being held at Paris to determine the conditions upon which peace will be concluded. As the decisions of this Conference will be of vital importance to Canada as well as to other parts of the Empire, it is being attended by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, accompanied by others of my advisers.

In the notable victories leading to the glorious issue accomplished by the arms of the Allies, none of the forces engaged bore a more valorous or heroic part than those of Canada, whose achievements throughout the entire war have won imperishable renown for their country. It is most gratifying to be able to state that, in the final and decisive stages of the mighty struggle, our divisions in the field were maintained at over-strength, and equipped in the highest degree with all the requirements of modern warfare. The appreciation and gratitude of the nation cannot be too earnestly and sincerely expressed to the gallant members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, whose sacrifices, sufferings and heroism have played so effectual a part in vindicating the cause of world-liberty and civilization.

Prior to the armistice, plans and preparations had been made for the return, demobilization and re-establishment in civil life, after the close of the war, of our soldiers with their dependents overseas. These are now in operation, and while this great undertaking presents, owing to after-war conditions, many difficulties and complications, it is confidently expected that it will be accomplished speedily and satisfactorily.

Immediately upon the conclusion of the armistice, which necessarily involved the cessation of operations in the manufacture of munitions and in other essential war industries, steps were taken by my advisers to facilitate the readjustment of business, and to provide employment. Orders in Council embodying the measures adopted will be laid before you without delay.

A Bill relating to the franchise, with such provisions as are necessary having regard to existing conditions, and providing among other things for effectually enabling women to vote, and conferring upon them the privilege of sitting in Parliament, will be submitted for your consideration.

Your attention will also be invited to Bills providing for aid in the construction of highways; for assisting returned soldiers in establishing themselves upon the land, and for promoting desirable immigration and farm settlement.

REVISED EDITION

Bills will also be submitted for the promotion of vocational education; for the creation of a Department of Public Health; for promoting better housing conditions throughout the Dominion by loans made for the purpose to the several Provincial Governments, and for the validation by Parliament of Orders in Council prohibiting the importation and manufacture of intoxicating beverages, and the transportation thereof into any community where their sale is contrary to law. Other necessary legislation dealing with matters, including pensions to soldiers and their dependents, now regulated by Orders in Council, will be laid before you. Further important measures, designed to promote the welfare and prosperity of the people in the new era of reconstruction, social as well as material, upon which the world has entered, will be recommended to your consideration.

After more than four years of war, and notwithstanding the sudden dislocation brought about by the armistice, Canada's industrial, commercial and financial stability has been well maintained. It is the expectation that in addition to business arising from the resumption of public and private undertakings in Canada which were suspended by the war, and needed improvements and betterments throughout the Dominion, Canada will obtain substantial participation in the expansion of export trade following the conclusion of the war, and the liberation of commerce from the restraints which have existed during its continuance. Steps have been taken by my advisers to promote and facilitate such participation.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts of the last and the estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted to you without delay, and you will be asked to make the necessary financial provision for meeting the remaining expenditures arising out of the war and connected with demobilization; also for the establishment of credits for the financing of purchases of our agricultural, industrial and other products.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It is appropriate that we should acknowledge our thankfulness to Divine Providence for the successful issue of the terrible struggle in which for so long a period our armies have been engaged, and for the restoration of peace to the world. Through the long conflict, with its dire vicissitudes and varying fortunes, our people never allowed themselves to doubt that victory would finally crown our cause, which was that of truth and justice. The deeply loyal and earnest co-operation of the Overseas Dominions and Dependencies with the Mother Country must more firmly cement for all time those ties which bind the Empire in indissoluble union. The spirit born of common sacrifice, suffering and heroic endeavour will also, it is confidently hoped, permanently unite the Allies by the bonds of a great memory and tradition, and effectually promote the formation of a League of Nations which will ensure for all time the peace of the world.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, it was ordered that the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration on Tuesday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except the introduction of Bills until disposed of.

[Mr. Speaker.]

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend from Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) will give me the names of members on that side of the House for a special committee to select under Rule 10 the Select Standing Committees of this House, I will make the motion in that regard on Tuesday next.

Mr. ROBB: Certainly.

OATHS OF OFFICE.

Bill No. 1, respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office, introduced and read the first time.—Sir Thomas White.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Joint report of the Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

REPUBLIC OF COSTA RICA—CONGRATULATION ON TRIUMPH OF ALLIED ARMS.

Mr. Speaker submitted a communication conveying to the Clerk of the House of Commons a resolution adopted by the Constitutional Congress of the Republic of Costa Rica, setting forth the joy of the people of Cost Rica upon the termination of the war and the triumph of the Allied arms.

DEATH OF RIGHT HON. SIR WILFRID LAURIER, G.C.M.G.

A STATE FUNERAL ORDERED ON THE MOTION OF SIR THOMAS WHITE, ACTING PRIME MINISTER,

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we meet today under the shadow of a great loss and a deep and widespread personal sorrow. The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, senior member of this House, has passed away, and the entire nation mourns his death. It is my intention later to ask the adjournment of the House until Tuesday next, out of respect to and in honour of his memory. Upon that occasion opportunity will be afforded me and other members of the House who may so wish, to refer in terms more extended than would be fitting at this time to the sad event and to the long and illustrious career of the deceased statesman in the public life of Canada. In the meantime the Government, desirous of paying every appropriate mark of respect, has arranged, with the consent of the family, for a State funeral, which will take place on Saturday morning in accordance with the public announcement which has been made. From eight o'clock this evening the remains will lie in state in this Chamber, when all will have the opportunity of looking upon his face for the last time.

Viewing his vacant desk, with its drapery of mourning, and bearing the floral tokens of affection, it is hard for us to realize that we shall never again see him rise in his place in this House, and that we shall hear his voice no more.

In order that the House may approve and participate in the action which the Government has taken, I beg to move:

That it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the mortal remains of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G., should be publicly interred, and that this House will concur in giving to the ceremony a fitting degree of solemnity and importance.

Mr. JAMES ALEXANDER ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon, Chief Whip of the Opposition) Mr. Speaker: Having in mind that on Tuesday next opportunity will be given to pay tribute to the memory of our late distinguished leader, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I will leave until then and to others better qualified than I am to speak for this side of the House. Representing temporarily His Majesty's loyal Opposition, I desire to thank the Acting Prime Minister and the Government for their kindness and consideration. In every way the Government has manifested a desire to anticipate our wishes in honouring the memory of him who was our leader and, in the truest sense, our companion and our counsel.

In a few minutes all that remains of the honoured Liberal Chieftain and Canadian statesman will lie in this Chamber in state, honoured in death, as he was in life, by all classes and creeds of the Canadian nation. How appropriate at this moment are the words written on the occasion of the death of another distinguished British statesman:

Now is hushed the voice of party,
Grit and Tory both are one,
Joined to praise that wondrous statesman,
Now his noble work is done.

Motion of Sir Thomas White agreed to.

THE LATE LIEUT.-COL. SAM SHARPE, D.S.O.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the last session of Parliament another of our members has passed away. I refer to that gallant soldier, Lieut.-Col. Sam Sharpe, D.S.O. He was elected upon three successive occasions by the people of North Ontario as their representative in this House. Early in his career he had become connected with the Canadian militia and, when the war broke out, he was major of the 34th battalion. After experiencing some difficulty in qualifying as medically fit for active service, Major Sharpe undertook to raise the 116th First Ontario County regiment, with which he went overseas in July, 1916. He was deservedly popular with the rank and file as well as with his brother officers, for all of whom he displayed an almost fatherly regard. He served with great distinction at the front being mentioned in dispatches and winning the coveted Distinguished Service Order. In civil life he was held in high esteem among his associates at the Bar and a wide circle of private acquaintances. He was a member who took a valuable part in the discussions in this House and in the work of important committees. His public career was full of promise and I am sure that every member of this House will join in deploring his untimely death and offering assurance of our deep and cordial sympathy to the widow and other members of his family circle.

Mr. ROBB (Chief Whip of the Opposition): Temporarily representing, and speaking for, His Majesty's loyal Opposition, I desire to join in paying our tribute of respect to the memory of our deceased friend and colleague, the late Lieut.-Col. Sam Sharpe who as a member of this House had a host of friends. The late Col. Sharpe, as has been so well said by the hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) was a most useful member of this House, and one who was remarkable for the industry which he displayed in the performance of his parliamentary duties. Upon the outbreak of war, at the call of his country, he left these legislative halls, unsheathed his sword and went forth to do battle in the cause of freedom and justice.

We, upon this side, deplore his untimely end. We join with the Acting Prime Minister in the expression of admiration for his gallant conduct, and in offering our sympathy to Mrs. Sharpe and the members of his family.

WELCOME TO THE HON. DR. BELAND.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken of the losses sustained by the House in the death of two of its members. I now turn to the restoration to this House of a member long known and well liked. I refer to the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) formerly Postmaster General of Canada. We welcome him back almost as from the tomb; from the living death of German imprisonment. He was made to bear, vicariously, the deep resentment borne by the Hun, on account of the notable part taken by Canada in the prosecution of this war.

Who, of all who knew him, in the session preceding the war; gentle, kindly, popular as he was with all the members of the House, could have imagined that fate had in store for him such strange adventures and such tragic experiences. The story of his visit to Belgium, of his internment as a political prisoner by the Germans and of the oppressive and calculatedly brutal treatment to which he was subjected is known to all the members of this House and, indeed, to all the people of Canada. I assure him that we greatly rejoiced at the news of his liberation, and wholeheartedly we welcome him back to his seat in this House.

Mr. ROBB (Chief Whip of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may we join with the Acting Prime Minister and his followers on the Government side of the House in offering a welcome home to our good friend, the hon. member for Beauce, formerly Postmaster General. His four years captivity in a German prison may have brought wrinkles to his brow and sorrow to his heart but the genial, kindly, Dr. Beland remains and we join with our friends opposite in welcoming him back to this House.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TUESDAY NEXT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Reid:

That when this House adjourns this day, it shall, out of respect to the memory of the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, stand adjourned till Tuesday next the 24th inst.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Honourable Mr. Justice Walsh and the Honourable Mr. Justice Simmons, two of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to "The Dominion Controverted Elections Act," a report relating to the Election for the Electoral District of Bow River, by which the said Election Petition was dismissed.

VACANCY.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that, during the recess, I received a communication notifying me of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of Ontario North, by the decease of Samuel Simpson Sharpe, Esq.

I accordingly issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new Writ of Election for the said Electoral District.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 3.55 p.m.

Tuesday, February 25, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

DEPUTY SERJEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Serjeant-at-Arms, with my approval has appointed Louis Charles Panet, Esquire, to be his deputy during the present session of Parliament.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

Mr. SPEAKER: I beg to present a communication from His Excellency the Governor-General approving of a Minute of the Privy Council appointing Hon. Martin Burrell, Secretary of State; Hon. John Dowsley Reid, Minister of Railways and Canals; Hon. J. A. Calder, Minister of Immigration and Colonization; and Hon. A. L. Sifton, Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purpose, and under the provisions, of the eleventh chapter, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, entitled, "An Act Respecting The House of Commons."

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of the House under Rule 10, said Committee to be composed of Messrs. Reid (Grenville), McKenzie, Carvell, Calder, Middlebro, McCoig and Robb, and that that portion of Rule 10 limiting the number of members of the said Committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

REPRESENTATION ACT (1914) AMENDMENT.

Mr. FRANK B. STACEY (Westminister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Representation Act (1914).

He said: This is not a matter of very great national importance, but it is of considerable interest to British Columbia, and very greatly concerns one constituency in that province. When introducing this Bill a year ago I pointed out that considerable confusion had arisen owing to the title of the electoral constituency in question which it is proposed to change, which confusion still obtains. The purpose of the Bill is to change the name of the electoral district of Westminster to the electoral district of Fraser Valley. The change is eminently fitting, inasmuch as it is not only a geographical designation, but of historical significance.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY BELT ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Railway Belt Act.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The purpose of this Bill is to carry into effect a principle that is already in operation as regards other Dominion lands, enabling the Crown to convey to a deceased entrant.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Yukon Act. He said: The first purpose of this Bill is to amend the Yukon Act by permitting the Yukon Council to consist of three instead of twelve members, thereby reducing the cost of administration. There are other clauses in the Bill of a minor character, but that is its main object.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

DEATH OF RIGHT HON. SIR WILFRID LAURIER, G.C.M.G.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker; I rise to refer to that sad occurrence, the sudden and lamented death of Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier which has cast a pall over the proceedings attending the opening of this session of Parliament, touched the hearts of all his fellow members, and created a profound and melancholy impression throughout the entire Canadian community. In years Sir Wilfrid Laurier had considerably exceeded the allotted span, yet such was the vigour of his mind, the animation of his appearance, the freshness of his interest in affairs, the charm and vivacity of his manner, and above all the great and conspicuous place which he had so long occupied in the minds and affections of his countrymen, that we had almost come to look upon him as immune from the vicissitudes of human infirmity, and, in a measure exempt from the conditions of our common mortality. For this reason the news of his departure has come with a sense of shock as well as of grief to all.

His death removes a most distinguished and commanding personality from the stage of Canadian public life. How considerable a part he played, we may realize when we reflect that he was actively engaged in national affairs at a period before many of us were born, that he was for almost half a century a legislative representative of the people, and for forty-five years a member of this House. He has been leader of the Liberal party for over thirty years, of which he was for fifteen years Prime Minister of Canada. During his long career he has been identified with all the great political controversies since the period of Confederation. His fame has carried far beyond the boundaries of Canada, and in Britain, France and United States, as well as in other countries, the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier has long been known, respected and admired as one of the outstanding statesmen of the age.

With such a career, with such titles to distinction, we of this House, who, next to his own immediate family and intimate personal circle, knew him best, may well upon this occasion, with profit to ourselves and in appreciation of him, examine as to the nature of the political principles to which he subscribed, his characteristics as a statesman, the personal qualities and attributes of the man himself, and the sources of the great power and influence which he exercised within and without the halls of Parliament. I am deeply conscious that there are many within sound of my voice who through longer association and acquaintance with him are much better qualified for this task than myself. Particularly do I wish that the head of the Government, the Prime Minister of Canada, Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, could be here to bear eloquent tribute to his great political opponent and warm personal friend.

It is not my intention to refer to the various controversies in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier during his long career was so actively engaged. Those controversies divided and some of them still divide the people and public men of this country. That is the natural and inevitable result of opposing views, opinions and convictions strongly and honourably held in a self-governing community such as ours. It is not my purpose to attempt to pass judgment upon the attitude of the dead leader towards these great questions. Even if it would be fitting and proper to do so, which it is not, we are too close to the events to make any contemporary opinion conclusive. The ultimate place and fame of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, will, like that of other statesmen, be determined by the impartial and dispassionate judgment of history.

What were the foundations of this man's political creed, the principles which guided his political action? Without pretending to be exhaustive, two or three outstanding facts emerge. Firstly, the man was strongly attached and devoted to the ideals of freedom and liberty, personal, civil and religious. He believed in freedom of opinion, liberty in its expression,—that is to say, free speech, freedom of conscience—that is to say, religious liberty. That these were his views may be gathered not only from his own speeches but from the names of those whom he most admired, Fox, Gladstone, Bright, Lincoln. These names were often on his lips and he had diligently studied their careers and utterances.

From this starting point of attachment to these ideals of liberty and freedom, to which I think most in this country and all in this House now subscribe, he was led to greatly admire the British political system and the security and guarantees for liberty which it embodies and affords. Owing to the influences surrounding him in that troubled period Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then but a young man, appears not to have realized, at least in its fulness, the vision of Confederation. It is, however, to his great and lasting credit that once it was accomplished he accepted the new conditions with whole-heartedness, and in his subsequent career did much in collaboration with other political leaders to develop its structure, interpret its meaning and mould it to the purposes for which it was designed.

He became a strong Federationist, a great admirer, exponent and champion of the Confederation pact and no question interested him quite so much as one relating to or affecting the Constitution. He was a great constitutionalist, an ardent upholder of the principles of free government with all that it involves. As nearly all questions arising out of our constitution have long since been settled and acquiesced in by all political parties it seemed to me at times that in his character of constitutionalist and in his continued interest in the constitution he was the dignified and solitary survivor of that great group of statesmen, giants in their day, who after prolonged and fiery discussion and controversy laid broad and deep the constitutional foundation of Canada's national life. In this connection, and as again emphasizing the part played by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Canadian affairs and the length of years spanned by his career, let us recall that he was minister in the government of Alexander Mackenzie, served as lieutenant to Edward Blake, succeeded him as leader of the Liberal party, and became the opponent of Sir John A. Macdonald, with whom he contended politically for many years.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier was an intense and ardent Canadian. He was a firm believer in Canada and its destiny, which he did much to mould. Particularly did he desire to harmonize the various nationalities of Canada with their conflicting ideals and aspirations. National unity he regarded as of paramount importance in a country of mixed races and diverse creeds such as Canada. He was regardful of the rights of minorities and a strong advocate of tolerance towards the opinions and convictions of others upon all questions whether civil racial or religious. He was a believer in democracy but there was always in him a moderating and restraining influence, a pragmatical respect for experience and for the past which disinclined him to sudden or violent change and exercised a steadying influence in the determination of his policies.

For the British constitution and for the autonomy, freedom and security which it affords to all within the range of its beneficent sway, he had the greatest regard and admiration. In my last conversation with him he spoke in terms of highest eulogy of British administration in Egypt and said that he would have no fear for the mandatory system proposed at the Peace Conference if it would be carried out in accordance with the British mode of government in protectorates.

I am glad that he lived to see the end of the war and the triumph of the Allies—particularly Britain and France.

Coming now to the man himself and the sources of his personal power, we find less difficulty in reaching conclusions. He was endowed by nature with a singularly graceful, picturesque and commanding personality, a stately bearing, a most gracious manner and rare charm of disposition. He had high intellectual culture and much personal kindliness of heart. The combination made him a great gentleman, whose distinction and individuality wrought an indelible impression upon all with whom he was brought in contact. While conciliatory and always a believer in persuasion rather than in compulsion he had a firm will and strong tenacity of his settled views, opinions and policies. This gave him strength which always of itself attracts. He had in marked degree that mystic quality, that innate attribute called personal magnetism or personality which is really the totality of excellences, physical, mental and moral, in its fortunate possessor.

His power of command over men was great. He was a natural leader because of his ascendency in the realm of intellect and of will. When all we can say has been said, there still remains an indefinable, elusive and baffling something which we cannot express, but which gave him an amazing power in attracting and retaining the affection and devotion of his followers and adherents. It was this which caused him to be likened in the minds of many to Sir John A. Macdonald, who had the same notable faculty in supreme degree.

A further and great source of his power lay in his extraordinary gifts as an orator. As a speaker either in the House or on the public platform he took the highest rank. His oratorical achievements were greatly promoted and enforced by his individual characteristics and qualities, for it is an undoubted fact that much of the success of speech depends upon personality.

His style was simple, direct, lucid. It had been modelled upon the best examples of English prose, and had been fashioned and moulded by his study of the classics, which is the best school for literary form. Some of his speeches in this House were notable illustrations of the supreme art of the orator. Those upon the death of Sir John A. Macdonald, the Rt. Hon. Mr. Gladstone and Her Majesty Queen Victoria are among the finest in the history of panegyrical literature.

In the House, where he was a most assiduous attendant and an eager listener, he was always courteous and considerate of the views of opponents and was by them all personally liked and respected.

Such, in most imperfect outline, was Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the principles and ideals for which he stood. He was idolized among the French Canadian portion of our population as their great exemplar and representative on the floor of Parliament and as Prime Minister of Canada for so long a period. They were naturally and justly proud of his high intellectual qualities and the force and strength of his character, his political sagacity and his success as a statesman. But apart from those of his own race he had devoted followers and admirers without number throughout the other provinces of Canada. His private life was simple and blameless, and he leaves behind him a career unsullied by self-seeking or love of gain. To state that he had defects, that he made mistakes at times, is only to say that he was human and what he himself would be the first to admit and acknowledge.

We mourn his loss. We feel that a great gap has been created in this House, that a powerful link with the past has been snapped and broken beyond repair. The spirit of the age has altered since the days when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in his political prime. Times change and men change with them—in appearance, manner, methods, characteristics.

We desire to express our most heartfelt sympathy to that most worthy helpmate, the light of whose life has gone out in the loss of him who was for more than fifty years of happy wedded life her constant comrade as well as husband, counseller and protector. We pray that she may be granted strength to bear the heavy bereavement which has come upon her.

As for our dead friend and fellow member, he has joined the great majority, the unnumbered shadowy hosts of the dead. We shall see his face and hear his voice in these halls no more. He has left these scenes and these voices, and it will be indeed long before we shall look upon his like again.

His life was gentle; and the elements so mixed in him that nature might stand up and say to all the world: This was a man.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, the task that falls to my lot on this occasion is a very serious one and one that I fully realize my personal inability to fulfil as it ought to be fulfilled and discharged. Speaking for the moment on behalf of the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, and speaking, as I believe, for the late Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier's personal friends and admirers throughout this Canada of ours, I wish in the first place, if I may be permitted, most sincerely to thank the Acting Prime Minister of Canada (Sir Thomas White) for the magnificent tribute which he has paid to the great worth of the illustrious dead. The tribute is so full, so comprehensive, so complete, so just, that indeed very little is left to be added to it. It would rather spoil the effect of what has been said so well and moulded so completely to try to add very much to it. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, it comes home to me, as the desk-mate of our late revered leader, and for so many years his friend, that we should from this side of the House join with the hon. leader of the Government in saying something about our departed friend. I stand, Mr. Speaker, by the vacant chair, a chair that will never so worthily be filled in this House or in any other Canadian House within my lifetime and perhaps not within the lifetime of the youngest man here. The leadership of the Opposition and of the Liberal party will some day be filled, but it is no disparagement to whoever may fill that position to say that we have not the mould, nor the man to fill the place of the departed Chieftain of the Liberal party.

As to the love and affection which the people of this country had for him, may I remind you, Mr. Speaker, and my hon. friends, of that great pattern of human love that has been held out to us and which we used to read in our school books and in the Sacred Book itself about David and Jonathan of old; held out to us as the greatest human evidence of love between two men. When David and Jonathan were parting, Jonathan, his brother-in-law, took him fervently by the hand and said: David, I will never see your face again; we are parting now and forever; but to-morrow you will be missed, for your seat will be empty.

The great dead is missed in this House to-day, because his seat is empty and it can never be filled. His place in this House is empty, his place in his home is empty, but his memory shall never fade. We, as his friends, have reason to be thankful, and we are thankful, that his great worth has been appreciated by the people of Canada and presented to this House today in such a magnificent manner by the hon. gentleman who is leading the Government.

I am sorry that the duty of paying this tribute to the departed statesman has not fallen upon some one more capable than I. One cannot help thinking on an occasion of this kind of the masterly eulogies which our late leader has pronounced, and one is apt to say, with the poet: "O, for the touch of a vanished hand, and the sound of a voice that is still!"

The acting leader of the Government has pointed to the many things Sir Wilfrid Laurier has done for the development of this nation, and it is no disparagment to others to say that in bringing this country of ours up to the full measure of nationhood, in bringing it vividly to the attention of the Mother Country and of the home Government, in securing for it as a nation and as a dominion the high position we hold in the commercial and political world, none has done so much as Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Canada has risen to her rightful place as a nation within the great Empire to which we belong. The position which Sir Wilfrid Laurier took at the time of the diamond jubilee of her late Majesty Queen Victoria, and again at the coronation of King Edward VII and of King George V and at the various imperial conferences of the great statesmen of the Empire, did more to bring Canada before the world and to secure for us the position which we now occupy than anything hitherto done by any other Canadian. We have therefore much to be thankful for, both for his life, and for the memories he has left behind not only in Canada but throughout the Empire.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier rose to the very highest position in the gift of the people of this country. As he had often himself said, he was a democrat to the hilt. He was capable of realizing and anticipating every feeling of the people, and almost of every individual in the community, for he had gone through the various stages of life within Canada, and he could see what was necessary for the true welfare of his native land, of which he was so proud. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I repeat, occupied the very highest position in the gift of this country, and I submit that had he lived in any other country of the civilized world he would have occupied a similarly high position. Had he lived in the great republic to the south, with its hundred millions of people, he would have shared in the hearts of the people of that country a place with Washington, Lincoln and Grant. Had he lived in France, the home of his ancestors, I submit that he would have been President of France. Had he lived in our own beloved Mother Country of Great Britain and Ireland, I have no doubt, and I have often heard said, that he would have occupied a similar position to that held by Lord Chatham, John Bright, Gladstone and Disraeli. It has often been stated by men in this Chamber, and not by those in sympathy with him politically, that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier had lived in Great Britain, nothing could have prevented him from becoming its Prime Minister. So we have reason to believe that his talents, although afforded plenty of scope in Canada, did not reach the full limit of their possibilities here, and that he was fully capable of performing higher and more exacting duties if fate had placed those duties as his task.

I think it is sometimes justifiable to use the language of others when it exactly expresses one's own sentiments, and what I am about to quote I would adopt as the language of this side of the House as well as adopting the sentiments so ably expressed by the Minister of Finance. This newspaper was not a supporter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and therefore I quote from it with the greater freedom. It says:

Another Link with the Glorious Days of Canada's Making is Broken by Laurier's Death.

In the passing of Sir Wilfrid Laurier yet another link with the spacious days of Canada's making has gone. There are great names in Canadian history—Baldwin and LaFontaine, Brown, Galt and Tupper, Blake, Macdonald and Laurier, and rightly indeed does the London Daily Chronicle, in its tribute to the dead statesman, say:—

"Laurier's name will be permanently associated with some of the most important phases in the development of the British Commonwealth. Not only will Canada always rank him among the great builders of her nationhood, but he will hold his niche in the temple of world history."

Apart altogether from the political views which he held, and advocated, the testimony is universal that Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the truest sense was a great man. He belonged to the Empire, and for many years he was the most considerable figure in Greater Britain. A French Canadian with unquestioned devotion to that race and its traditions, he yet accepted as his task the establishment of a better understanding and a closer union of the two races of the Dominion, and though it was a task which has not yet been completed, Sir Wilfrid had the satisfaction of achieving a marked advance. No need of Canada has been greater and none has lain nearer to the statesman's heart than the removal of discord between the different races and tongues and creeds which comprise the Canadian Confederacy. To have attempted a task of such magnitude and hedged with tremendous and critical difficulties, is in itself an eloquent testimony to his essential greatness.

Former political opponents are one to-day in voicing their ungrudging admiration and unqualified recognition of his undoubtedly great gifts. Though not blind to his political failings and to views which they believed to be detrimental to Canada's truest welfare, yet as one man they express the highest regard for Sir Wilfrid's strict personal probity, his untarnished character and the years of strenuous and devoted service to the Dominion.

As an orator Sir Wilfrid Laurier occupied a unique position. As one writer in the English press has said—'He was gifted with unusual personal advantages. His appearance alone was worth a handsome fortune. His figure, lithe and straight as a larch; his face unwrinkled; his glance clear and searching, made up a personality that wielded a strange fascination for his hearers. He spoke as well in English as he did in French—his mother-tongue. Among the many gems of Sir Wilfrid's oratory, the following, delivered in Paris in 1897, is considered one of his finest utterances—a speech touched with a prophetic fire:

The citation from the speech referred to by this writer, I quote:

"It may be that here in France the memories of the ancient struggles between France and England have lost nothing of their bitterness, but as for us, Canadians of whatever origin, the days we hold glorious are the days when the the colours of France and of England, the tricolour and the Cross of St. George, waved together in triumph on the banks of Alma, the heights of Inkerman, the ramparts of Sebastopol. Times change; other alliances are made, but may it be permitted to a son of France, who is at the same time a British subject, to salute those glorious days with a regret which will perhaps find an echo in every generous mind on either side of the Channel."

This quotation which I have taken the liberty to read, conveys to you, Sir, and to the House, my own views, and perhaps puts them better and more concisely than I myself could. Let me conclude by saying that we appreciate what has been done in the country, and what is now being done, to honour the memory of the great departed chieftain. We acknowledge, with thankfulness, what has been done by the Government in honoring his mortal remains, and we are thankful for the tribute that has been paid to his memory by the leader of the Government to-day. We on this side of the House, and his friends generally, particularly those of his own party, might say, as has been said by a wise man of old, " Our Father, our Father, the chariots of liberalism and the horsemen thereof," and may I say, with one of old, to my friends and the public at large, " Know ye not that this day there has fallen in Canada a prince and a great man."

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve and Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, the Shadow of Death has stalked through this Chamber; a chair stands vacant. As we gaze upon the flowers strewn about us, which, by the morrow, will have withered away, more deeply than ever do we understand the baffling brevity of this life's span, the specious vanity of each and every thing. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is no more.

The mellow voice which for so long enthralled this assembly and stirred the enthusiasm of all who heard it, is silent.

The trumpet's silver voice is still
The warder silent on the hill.

The last survivor of a great generation, he whose imposing stature, whose eagle eye and whose white plume recalled those noblemen of the eighteenth century, such as we meet them still in medallions of olden times, is sleeping his last sleep.

An illustrious ancestor has passed away. Let us incline our heads with respect in the presence of this grave: its closing writes 'finis' to a whole epoch of our history.

Death is a law and not a punishment. No one better understood this profound truth than the eminent statesman whose loss we mourn. He had long since made his preparations for the voyage from Time into Eternity. Without bitterness the old gladiator saw himself disarmed as he was about to descend once more into the arena. His spirit passed gently, serenely, as though 'midst the darkening shadows of life's falling night the Faith of his forefathers had already revealed the gleam of dawn, presage of Eternal Day.

Speaking here in the name of my colleagues of the old French province who counted him her most distinguished son, and whose idol he became, it does the heart good to recall that throughout his entire career he was ever faithful to his origin and to the finest traditions of his race.

"I love," he was wont to say, "I love France who gave us birth, I love England who gave us liberty, but the first place in my heart belongs to Canada, my country, my native land."

This striking formula was, if I may speak thus, the Ideal, the Polar Star which guided his public life. Affectionate gratitude towards the nation, resplendent among all nations—whose sons we have the honour to be— the splendour of whose glory lights up the highest summits; unswerving loyalty towards that great and generous nation who inherited the administrative genius of the Romans and of whom Tennyson could say that hers was the classic land of liberty. But, first and foremost, Laurier was a Canadian. To his French inheritance he owed his golden tongue, his keen intellectual vision, the boldness and the grandeur of his conceptions. To his contact with the great English school, the school of Burke, Fox, Pitt, O'Connell, Gladstone, he owed his deep practical knowledge of British institutions and it may be said without exaggeration that it was by assimilating the teachings of these parliamentary leaders that Sir Wilfrid Laurier made for himself a lasting niche in the Hall of Fame.

At the time when he stepped through the threshold of Parliament, the memory of the great Papineau still hovered over the country. And the image of Lafontaine, whose profound wisdom had saved many rights from the wreckage of a storm-tossed sea, was becoming greater as time went by.

In those days Cartier and Dorion represented the two different channels of opinion in our province. The one, dashing, impetuous, disdained all obstacles; the other, calm, of proverbial integrity, possessing a mind of very high attainments, trusted to time to dispel hoary prejudice. If it be true that, in a certain way, Laurier was the disciple of Dorion, events made him the fortunate successor, rather the direct heir, of Lafontaine's policy—the policy which strives to soothe all hurts, the better to build on a solid foundation; the policy of conciliation for the sake of unity; the policy of the golden mean; the best, the true, the sole policy which can obtain in our country.

Sprung from a vanquished people, but a people who, in their turn had themselves made the conquest of Liberty, his dream was to unite the two races on the only rational basis: equality of rights, mutual respect and tolerance. His political vision moved him to seal anew the pact entered into by Lafontaine and Baldwin in days gone by and so bring fresh strength to the work of the Fathers of Confederation.

Was this majestic vision too ambitious? History, that impartial judge of men and events, will say whether or not he brought it to realization, but what we of his time may uphold from this moment is his untiring perseverance, his steadfast courage, his invincible faith in the ideal he set out to attain from the very start of his career. However, he was too well versed in psychology not to realize the difficulties which beset his path.

In 1887, hardly a year after that historical debate when, at one flight, he had risen to the greatest heights of parliamentary eloquence, when the English-speaking press had acclaimed him as the "silver-tongued orator," the Liberal party, helpless after the retirement of Edward Blake, was casting about for a leader. The French Liberals formed a minority in this party, as they formed a minority in the country. Let it be said to the honour of the English Liberals, it was Edward Blake, it was Sir Richard Cartwright, it was David Mills, who selected the leader, and the unanimous choice fell upon Wilfrid Laurier. What was the answer of the young member for Quebec East? Ah, Mr. Speaker, our great countryman, despite his marvellous endowments, did not covet the honour offered him. He well knew the burden he was assuming; already he could catch a glimpse of the obstacles which lay in wait for him, and the answer of this man who, beneath a stolid exterior hid very deep emotions, his answer was a sob.

Thus, unable to escape the earnest entreaties of his English-speaking friends, he undertook to lead the Liberal party, determined to steer the ship of state towards progress and liberty, to bind together, by conciliation in both word and deed, the heterogeneous elements which go to make up Canada. He had often said that the national sentiment of a country is worth no more than the pride which it inspires in its sons. He knew this country was overflowing with strength and vigour, full of activity, of ambition.

He loved its distant childhood; its history, every page of which he knew; its legends; its fertile, majestic natural beauty; he loved this country especially for its ethnic duality which showed him the children of the two greatest races of Europe, henceforth fellow-wayfarers towards a common destiny in the boundless spaces of the New World.

By healing the wounds of days gone by and rallying all for the development of our immense resources, he opened a new era, he anticipated the day when he could declare in the presence of his Sovereign: "Sir, Canada is a nation. The nineteenth century belonged to the United States; but the twentieth century will witness the expansion of Canada."

The 23rd of June, 1896, was a memorable date in our political annals. The member for Quebec East had just been borne into power by a majority of the electorate. He became Prime Minister of a Dominion which had been guided by the genius of Macdonald. The old Tory chieftain had passed from the stage some five years before and the memory of his bewitching magnetism bordered on the legendary. People anxiously wondered if the orator from Quebec would reveal himself a statesman of sterling worth. Would he have the necessary firmness? Could he grapple with our intricate problems? Would he prove himself an experienced helmsman and steer the ship safely through shallow shoals, flinging into the teeth of the gale, to ride at anchor in the port beyond? My answer to all these apprehensions, already distant and, mayhap, forgotten, is that which John Morley made, one day, regarding Gladstone. The occasion was the unveiling of the statue erected in honour of the Grand Old Man, but a step or two from Lincoln's Inn. "The stalwarts of finance, of the city, looked with misgiving upon the idealism of Gladstone and smiled at his supposed incompetence in matters of money and business. I wonder added Morley—and I still see him, his finger pointing to the monument—I wonder, whether after Gladstone's long and brilliant career, the Bank of England itself would not feel honoured by the presence and strengthened by the counsel of the orator?"

As I have just said, it is only in the cold, calm light of impartial history that the part played by men in the great events of their time, can be duly appreciated. But I think I am within the mark in stating now that in Laurier's optimism, in his power of assimilation, in his incessant and untiring toil, in his boundless faith in the future of our country, may be seen and reflected the powerful impulsion given to Canada from 1896 to 1911, her wonderful ascent towards economic progress, her marvellous development. How often have I not heard him whenever grappling with some difficult problem repeating the lines penned by André Chénier, the great French poet:

"L'illusion féconde habite dans mon sein, J'ai les ailes de l'espérance!"
"In my bosom dwells fruitful Illusion
On the wings of hope I soar!"

He had to the fullest extent mastered the sense of the Constitution; he had an insight into its jurisprudence and genius, and he loved it.

He ever advocated adherence to the federal pact, in its integrity. To his mind, any change, any departure or new orientation involved a danger. He was an apostle of Autonomy, like Blake and Mowat.

His political creed borrowed its inspiration from British liberalism. He believed in progress grounded on order; he believed in the advent of democracy through evolution, not through revolution, but never did he allow himself to be carried away by his love of liberty beyond those two limits laid down by conscience and human reason, that is to say, rights and duties.

From a national standpoint, none of the two great ethnical elements of the country was to predominate or to be domineered. Equal justice, equal rights for all such, was his motto. He deprecated isolation, because as he said, for an ethnical group to isolate itself is tantamount to stagnating in inferiority. Let me add that he always advocated harmonious relations between religions and liberty, by means of a loyal alliance. In a country like ours so hard to govern, and owing to the fact that the opinions and creeds of the various ethnical groups have to be taken into consideration—a policy of exclusiveness is not properly speaking, a policy, but a blunder which must prove fatal to minorities. Love of justice and of freedom, tolerance, loyalty grounded upon autonomy, patriotism, such his ideals. And with what mastery did he expound them! Those who will read his speeches in which the scholar always controls the tribune, checks his outbursts, chastens his language, will no doubt find in them the lustre of fancy coupled with the magic of style but they will first of all discover loftiness of thought combined with an unerring judgment, and the intuition of the right course to steer through the windings of Canadian politics. And this constitutes a lofty ideal, and it was this ideal which fashioned Laurier into the great Canadian that he was. But in appreciating his career, it is on his firm and dignified attitude in the relations of Canada and the Mother Country that our attention must be focussed.

None more than Laurier admired the majestic institutions of the British Empire, where liberty wrought this miracle of a Gavan Duffy, a Wilfrid Laurier, a Louis Botha, respectively governing Australia, Canada, Africa, with intense loyalty and devotedness to the interests of the Crown.

In this connection may I be allowed to add that after the Transvaal war, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was consulted in turn by Campbell Bannerman and by General Botha as to the contemplated South African Union and that both these statesmen benefited by his vast experience. I shall never forget the words uttered in my presence at Cape Town, in November, 1910, by the Boer General: "In South Africa, two names are particularly dear to us, that of Campbell-Bannerman and that of Wilfrid Laurier. To those two men we owe an eternal debt of gratitude."

At the several Imperial conferences which he attended—and we all know what a brilliant role he played in them—Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose fiscal policy had tickled the pride of the Mother Country, had nevertheless to withstand the new wave which was just then beginning to roll from London into the Dominions. This brilliant dream of a vast Empire, whose centre of action would be Westminster, could, forsooth, seduce the leaders of British politics, but Laurier was a Canadian first and last. Our country having disentangled itself from the bonds of Colonialism, had gradually conquered its political freedom, through the extension of the principle of autonomy. Knowing the exact extent of our rights and duties, he boldly and sincerely proclaimed the principle of Imperial unity based upon local liberties.

That virile attitude was to him, no doubt, the source of disappointments. But the old Premier was too much of a philosopher not to realize that impulses cannot play the part of reason, and that popularity is a poor substitute for arguments.

Were I called upon to define the outstanding qualities of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as a statesman, I would say that his moderation was a driving power in itself, his gift of expression a shining light, and that, with this master of oratory, sound judgment and common sense, outweighed his very eloquence.

His worthy manner of living, his thorough honesty, his perfect equanimity through the worst ordeals, his devouring intellectual activity, his unimpeachable righteousness, his home life imbued with such charm and beauty, his loyalty to friends, his discreet charity, but, above all, his eloquence exerted in behalf of the downtrodden, all these recall in many respects some distinctive characteristics of Gladstone and Lincoln.

We shall no longer have before our eyes those refined and aristocratic features of Laurier, whose most amiable smile went to the plebian, the needy, the humble, the lowly and the feeble; but his memory made immortal in works of bronze and marble will pass on to coming generations as one of the greatest embodiments of virtue in public and private life, as one of the finest products of human-kind in the last century.

We, his followers, his admirers, find solace in the thought that he died in the way he had wished to die. As the Norman knights of old, it was clothed in his armour that he appeared before the Supreme Judge. Death, the soother of all suffering, was to him like the declining hours of a beautiful day.

Before closing his eyes to things terrestrial, he had the supreme joy of seeing the Allies victorious. Enamoured of freedom and justice, he witnessed the downfall in Europe of autocracy and its instrument, militarism, and the founding on their ruins of the League of Nations.

As of yore at Inkerman and at Sebastopol, he saw our two great mother countries clasping hands and joining their forces on the battle-field, and our sons rushing with a light heart to meet together a glorious death and take their full share of sacrifice and victory.

Yes, he was granted that supreme consolation of seeing France, France which was branded as frivolous, because she was cheerful, standing before the whole world as an example of endurance and fortitude, and show herself to the oppressed what she had ever been, the shield of civilization, the champion of right. He beheld England, that country deemed cold and self-seeking, set out all her sails, spend lavishly of her wealth, call to arms all her children to rescue the world from oppression.

The alliance of these two great powers, sealed by the purest of blood, was especially dear to his heart. To him it appeared like the rainbow which breaks through the clouds, and which is described in the Holy Writ as a messenger of peace, a presage of better days to all men of good will.

Oh Laurier! should there remain something to be done towards the fulfilment of that triumph of harmony and good will which you have so persistently striven to bring about, then those younger Canadians whose teacher you were will in turn take up the work and carry it to its full completion. They will pride themselves in following in your footsteps along the rugged and endless path of duty which you have opened and pointed out to them.

And now, with this last farewell, allow us to mingle the expression of our deep sense of gratitude. We are thankful to you, Laurier, for having ever remained worthy of the part entrusted to you by Providence, since from the palaces of our sovereigns and from the most humble farm house, from the towering cathedral as well as from the smallest country church, there ascends towards heaven the same hymn of gratitude.

We say Farewell and we thank you. We thank you for having thus gathered around you your own people, the descendants of those Canadians of old, the last to give up the fight in that last battle, who, with souls anguished by defeat, escorted the Marquis of Montcalm from the gates of Old Quebec to the Château Saint-Louis, on the night following the battle on the Plains of Abraham. We thank you for having lifted them up to you and invited them to share your glory.

We say Farewell and we thank you. We thank you for the shining memento which you bequeathed to the historian at large. Its brilliancy will not fade. It will be a guiding light which the tempest-beaten mariner will look to. It will be as a pillar of fire which will guide, on their march towards the promised land of a better Dominion, all sections of the Canadian people, reconciled at last to one another and linked together by the bonds of an "Union sacrée."

Farewell. Close to your resting place, amid maples and poplars, adorned by the coming spring with luxuriant foliage, we shall, many of us, congregate to pray in the tongue of your ancestors. The field wherein you lie, whose tender embrace you received, will be light to you. For it is part of that native land whose history is three centuries old and whose motherly womb will some day cover our meanness with its vastness and shroud our nothingness with its perennity. Adieu!

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY MOVED BY MR. REDMAN, SECONDED BY MR. MANION.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. DANIEL LEE REDMAN (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I wish to tender to the Honourable, the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), my humble thanks for the honour which he has conferred upon me and upon the constituency which I have the honour to represent, a constituency which, in enlistment and other war efforts, has made an enviable record. I had the honour to serve for a short period in a small way in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, I have been for some time in association with returned soldiers and their organizations, and I have no doubt that, in choosing me to move this important address, the Government wished to do honour to our soldiers generally. In their behalf, if it is not presumption on my part to speak for those splendid Canadians, I wish to express gratitude and appreciation.

I can assure you, Sir, that I enter upon this task with a keen sense of my temerity, and I ask for the kind indulgence of you, Sir, and of this House, in listening to the brief remarks which I intend to make. Great honour has been conferred on this Dominion in giving to us as our Governor General the head of a House which, for centuries, has taken a leading part in ruling our great empire.

His Excellency, the Duke of Devonshire, can be well assured of the high estimation in which he is held by the Canadian people, and of their deep appreciation of the painstaking and able manner in which he performs the arduous and important duties which devolve upon him.

I must pause here, as indeed this nation has paused, to pay my humble tribute to the great man who has died. I can add very little to the eloquent tributes which have been paid by honourable members on both sides of the House. As a new member of this House, I consider it a very great privilege to have witnessed the closing years of his great and illustrious career. His memory will always remain as an inspiration to those who love Canada.

In each of the last four years Parliament has been opened under the cloud of a great war. A war entailing enormous effort, unlimited sacrifice and great sorrow, and requiring the undivided attention of the nation to the exclusion of all other national problems.

To-day, the cloud has lifted and we stand on the threshold of an assured and, I believe, a lasting era of peace. Our great epoch of struggle and sacrifice is ended. A glorious, a victorious peace has crowned the efforts of our Empire and its allies. The armistice has been signed on our own terms. The enemy is utterly demoralized. The menace of militarism and autocracy has been crushed, we trust forever, and democracy and representative institutions have been preserved to humanity.

The British empire, of which Canada has the increasing honour of being an important member, has played an outstanding part in this war. Her matchless navy made victory a certainty. The splendid tenacity of her army made defeat an impossibility. Her lofty aims and unbending adherence to the principles of fair play and international justice attracted numerous nations to the side of the allies.

The British Empire has been preserved to itself and to humanity. Hundreds of millions of human beings are assured that they may continue to live safely under its beneficent laws. Its ideals, its institutions, have been preserved, and will continue for the good of the world, we hope, for many centuries to come.

The co-operation of the British Empire and the United States of America in this war should result in the happiest relations between these two great Anglo-Saxon nations—relations which shall not only be beneficial to these two nations, but which should enable them, acting in unison, to exert an excellent influence in world affairs.

Representatives of each of the Allies are now assembled at Paris to settle the immediate differences between all belligerents, and to plan, as far as may be possible, to make war impossible in the future. Great conferences have been held in the past with these two objects in view, notably the Assembly at Vienna in 1814-15, and the Conference at Berlin in 1878. But progress has been made since those memorable days. The right of peoples to choose their own form of Government has been recognized. The horror of war is greater to-day than ever in the past. This Conference is attempting to settle the differences of nations on such a basis as will remove possible causes of war, and it regards the prevention of future wars as its most important problem. This Dominion has been recognized as a nation entitled as such to representation in any league of nations which may be formed. The presence of the right honourable the Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Robert Borden, with several of his ministers at this conference is most fitting, having regard to the great sacrifice which the Canadian people made in the war, and Canada's international duty as a nation among the nations of the world. The Prime Minister has distinguished himself at that conference. He has been entrusted with important and difficult work, and he is reflecting great honour on this Dominion.

The people of Canada may, now that the tremendous burden of effort and sacrifice, imposed on them by the war, has been removed, pause to review with pride the excellent record which they have made under the leadership of the Prime Minister and his cabinet. Only through untiring efforts and sacrifice can the character of an individual or a nation be strengthened and achieve greatness. Canada, in this war, has made and proven itself a great nation. The achievements and sacrifices of its soldiers and sailors have, and of right do, overshadow all its other efforts. Over 600,000 of its manhood enrolled in its service; over 200,000 casualties have been sustained; over 55,000 have given up their lives in its behalf. Canada has raised for war purposes, from its own people, under the able direction of the Minister of Finance, in excess of the fabulous sum of $1,300,000,000. Canada has manufactured and sold to the Allies over one billion dollars worth of munitions, being in excess of one-fourth of all the munitions used by Great Britain and the United States in the war. Agricultural products of enormous values have been sold to the Allies. Its business and economic fabric is stronger and on a larger scale than ever before in its history. Its people generally during the period of the war submerged petty prejudices, personal ambition and their own convenience, and devoted their energies to war work, notably in connection with Red Cross, Patriotic Fund and kindred efforts. The women of Canada bore a great and inspiring part in the struggle. The stoical patriotism with which they sent their sons to war; the suspense and bereavements which they suffered, the splendid influence which they exercised over our soldiers cannot be too highly commended. They took the places in business of thousands of men who went overseas and added to our economic capacity.

But our main inspiration was given by our soldiers overseas. How nobly have they upheld our honour thousands of miles across the sea; their discipline, their resource, their initiative, their irresistible dash in attack, their stubborn tenacity against heavy odds, has made Canada a name to conjure with. Not only have they upheld our traditions but, far surpassing them, they have established for us new and loftier standards; new and more illustrious traditions. They have made a magnificent reputation for our country on those hard-fought fields where, before the eyes of all the world, manhood is tested and reputations are irrevocably lost or made to endure throughout eternity. Those who risked all, and especially that 55,000 who gave all, have left us a great heritage, but have also left us great responsibilities and great duties. Let us, as Canadians, now look well to the duties which lie immediately before us so that we may not be untrue to those who have sacrificed so much for this country, and so that the principles and ideals for which they died may become actual institutions in this country, to be enjoyed by the people of Canada and posterity, for whom we, at this crisis, are trustees.

But while it is pleasant to pause and reflect upon the achievements of the last four years, so pressing and so vital are the problems which immediately confront us that we must face them now and devote to them all the ingenuity and concentration which we possess, looking backward only for the purpose of obtaining inspiration. And surely the adaptability and ingenuity shown, and the success achieved, by our soldiers, our statesmen, our manufacturers, our workmen, our farmers and our people generally during the period of the war should make us confident of successfully solving them. Let us then undertake these problems patriotically and unselfishly, inspired by the lessons of sacrifice which we have received from our army overseas.

During the war we had the stimulus of a common enemy, the excitement and the fever of battle. This has now been removed. In order to attain the concentration and efficiency the present situation demands, we must have something to take its place. What is undoubtedly required is a high sense of patriotism, a strong concept of public duty and responsibility on the part of all our people, and such a desire to work for the common good as shall overshadow all party prejudice, all class struggles, all personal selfishness and unworthy personal motives. Consider the example which has been given us by our army overseas. There a Conservative was supported by a Liberal,—a millionaire stood side by side with a labourer; there were no class distinctions no party differences; each was willing to sacrifice himself for the other; all were willing to sacrifice themselves for Canada. The problems before us to-day are equally great and vital. Let us face them confidently, strengthened by our economic success during the war, and unselfishly inspired by the splendid traditions given us by our Army.

The Government has had the problems of reconstruction under its consideration for many months. The uncertainty of the date of peace has added to the difficulty of the work. I venture to say, however, that no country was better prepared to meet these problems than Canada.

It is gratifying to note that the Government intends to present a bill to establish a department of Public Health. It is essential that we should preserve and foster our greatest resource, the vital energy of our people, which nature, by the vigour of our beneficent climate, gives them in such abundance. During the recent great struggle there has been a greater mortality among children in Canada from purely preventible diseases than the number of our casualties in the war which enables us to appreciate the necessity of legislation of this character.

The proposed Better Housing Bill will be acceptable to the entire country. Anyone who has wandered through the tenements of great cities cannot fail to be impressed with the absolute necessity of government assistance and supervision. Happily in this new country we are able to institute this measure more in the nature of a preventative for the future, than as a corrective of present conditions.

The Government is to be congratulated in presenting a Bill to assist in vocational and technical education. This is a move in the right direction and a work which will assist materially to the earning power of our people.

A measure will be presented to encourage better highways. Such a measure is essential to improve living conditions in rural localities, and to assist agriculturists and others to market their products without unnecessary cost and inconvenience.

The new Franchise Bill, providing as it does for more effectually enabling women to vote, and conferring upon them the privilege of sitting in Parliament, is a happy measure. The splendid work done by women during the war has entitled them to every power and privilege of citizenship, and has assured this country that their advice and assistance in legislation will be of inestimable benefit.

The Bill to be presented, dealing with desirable immigration, is vital to our national life. It is inconceivable that we should allow further immigration of enemy aliens. From my knowledge of the feelings of our soldiers, I can assure this House that the direst consequences will ensue unless some such measure is enacted. With the sentiments of the soldiers, I heartily concur. We must keep this country British, let our growth be fast or slow. While our soldiers have been beating back the Germans from our front in France, they do not propose that any one shall open the back door admitting them into this country.

All the measures enumerated tend to the creation of better and fairer living conditions for all classes in Canada, and the Government is to be congratulated in moving unfalteringly in this direction.

It is essential that we face squarely the feeling of unrest that prevails throughout the world, a spirit of change which eludes constituted authority, and crosses frontiers at will. I believe we can look at this phenomenon optimistically. We must believe that the curve of human evolution is an ascending curve. We should, instead of defending ancient institutions, turn our efforts towards guiding the new spirit, and be alert to do everything practical to improve economic living conditions for all classes. It seems to me that reconstruction must not stop when we have reached our pre-war basis of stability, but the lessons and inspirations of the war must be capitalized, and our people must receive the benefits to which their sacrifices during the last four years have entitled them.

Unfortunately a creed has risen in Russia which has become an actual menace to civilization. It aims at destroying all industry, all representative institutions, and to substitute autocratic and non-productive rule by a single class. In my opinion, Sir, the new creed is just as dangerous as the one that we have been combatting during the last four years. Canada is happily practically free from this evil, but we should be prepared, should it raise its head in our country, to stamp it out even more ruthlessly and thoroughly than we crushed German autocracy, because it is equally autocratic, and is absolutely opposed to civilization and our representative institutions. Our returning soldiers have already given evidence that they are fundamentally opposed to this doctrine, and can be relied upon for any assistance which might be required if this menace should ever arise in this country.

The most immediate problem which confronts our Government is the demobilization of the returning soldier and his absorption into civil life. This, while an arduous duty, should be, and I am sure is, a pleasant one. A grateful country will wish to do everything reasonably possible to assist its soldiers. I think I can say with considerable assurance that all the returned soldier desires, is to receive such assistance and encouragement as shall enable him to take his place in our economic and social life, freed, as far as possible, from any loss or handicap which his service overseas may have imposed upon him. That I think is not asking a great deal, that much the returned soldier expects. Otherwise I am sure it is his desire to be as good a citizen in peace as he was a patriot in war. The Government has grappled vigourously with this problem. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment has, in my opinion, done its work exceedingly well. The various regulations are constantly improving and the administration of the work is gradually becoming more efficient. However we must take the most punctilious care to see that the soldier is fairly treated, and that he has an opportunity to enter, unhandicapped, into our economic life. Nothing less will satisfy the people of Canada.

It must be remembered that our soldiers are changing from a life under a simplified administration, where necessary changes are made instantly in a general order, and results obtained, to life under our complicated and sometimes unnecessarily slow civilian system, where what he may desire and indeed, what he may be absolutely entitled to, cannot be obtained without endless delay. Possibly the influence of the returning soldier, trained in a speedy, simplified, clarified form of administration, may have a salutary effect on some of our government departments, and on our system of life generally.

Every precaution should be taken so that needless and harassing delays should not be imposed on our returning soldiers, who are anxious to get adjusted into civilian life as quickly as possible. Our soldiers should not be hampered and irritated by red tape and unnecessary rules. These are purely matters of procedure, but are equally important in their results with questions of principle or legal rights.

The immediate and pressing question is that of employment. Canada owes an absolute duty to its soldiers to furnish them with employment as soon as they are ready for it. All problems centre about this one. Among our half million soldiers are men capable of filling every position under the control of any government. Every opening in every government service, be it military or civil, should be filled by a returned soldier. Provision must be made, and in the Government's building programme is being made to furnish additional employment. Each lesser governing body should have a similar policy and programme, and each employer of labour should, if he is worthy of citizenship, make every possible provision to employ soldiers. Many civilians employed in the place of soldiers should, if necessary, be dismissed.

In this I feel that I am not stating the case too strongly but am simply enunciating the principle that our soldiers have an absolute right to be absorbed into our economic life, and to have an opportunity to be respected and useful citizens, without any handicap on account of service overseas. This principle cannot be too clearly understood by the people of Canada.

The Government is to be congratulated on the recent Order in Council dealing with land settlement. Our great resource is our undeveloped agricultural land. We wish this land developed by patriotic Canadians, not by the people of other lands who are not in sympathy with our national ideals, and I hope that any scheme presented by the Government to make available our western lands will made adequate reservation for not only our soldiers, but the soldiers of other parts of the British Empire. In Western Canada, especially, there are hundreds, if not thousands, of returned soldiers ready for the development of the Government's scheme, and I hope that it will be proceeded with with all possible speed.

The Government will present a Bill improving and consolidating the Orders in Council dealing with pensions. Many laudable improvements were made in the recent Order in Council passed in January last, and doubtless additional improvements will be included in the coming Bill.

I feel that this Government should be congratulated on the splendid manner in which they directed the energies of the people during the last four years of war and on grappling so vigorously with the problems arising in this period of reconstruction But no Government alone could successfully solve either the problems of the war or the problems which are at present before us. During the four years of war they had the co-operation and assistance of all the people of Canada, and I believe that they may rely on similar support and assistance now.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for your courteous attention and for the patience with which you have listened to my remarks.

Mr. ROBERT JAMES MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the duty has devolved upon me, though I fear that I shall all too feebly perform that duty, of supporting my hon. colleague from Calgary East (Mr. D. L. Redman), who has moved the presentation of an Address in reply to the speech of His Excellency the Governor General.

I should first like to congratulate the previous speaker on the very eloquent and able manner in which he performed his task. Then I wish to thank the Acting Prime Minister and the Government on behalf of my constituents in the district of Fort William and Rainy River for the signal honour which has been conferred upon them in the choosing of their representative to second the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne.

Sir, it has been the general custom in past Parliaments of Canada since Confederation, though not the invariable custom, that the seconding of this motion be given in the French language. This custom has however, been deviated from on quite a few occasions, the most recent being in the Parliament of 1906 when the Address was moved by Mr. W. E. Knowles, representing West Assiniboia, and seconded by Mr. Wm. Chisholm, representing Antigonish. Previously the custom had not been deviated from since 1896, when Mr. Powell of Westmorland moved the Address and Mr. McGillivray of North Ontario seconded it. Nevertheless, I greatly regret that owing to my limited knowledge of French I cannot permit myself to mutilate the beautiful language of Moliere and Racine in a laboured attempt to live up to tradition. I express these regrets in all sincerity, for I should greatly have desired, as a compliment to the French-speaking members of this House, and also as a small offering in the cause of unity, to have performed this duty in French. I hope that the wish may be accepted for the deed, for I am deeply convinced that the establishment of a real entente cordiale in this country should be the desire of all true lovers of Canada. The man, Sir, whether he be a French-speaking Canadian or an English-speaking Canadian, whether he be a Catholic or a Protestant, who wilfully fosters antagonisms of race and creed in this country is neither a true friend nor a loyal citizen of the land we love.

This brings me to say a few words regarding the late lamented leader of the Opposition, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one whose greatest desire was the promoting of harmony between the two races in Canada. After the eloquent tributes paid here to-day to his memory I feel that anyting said by me will be almost superfluous. I think I may say that I had the honour of being a friend of his for some years, but for many more years I had the honour of being an admirer and a follower of his. My command of the English language is too poor for me to express adequately my deep feelings of sympathy for his widow, and my regrets that Canada has lost so distinguished a son. What we say of him here to-day will not long be remembered, but his great statesmanship cannot soon be forgotten. Intellectually, socially, morally, and politically, his was a personality that might well serve as an ideal for the ambitious youth of our land for generations to come. Because of his matchless qualities of heart and mind, Canada has lost in him one of her most illustrious leaders. It is my privilege to-day to join that vast multitude of Canadian people of all religions, nationalities and political creeds who are bowing their heads in reverence to the memory of a departed but still beloved leader.

As set forth so simply in the speech of His Excellency, Canada has much to be grateful for to-day. During the last session of this Parliament there were anxious days when the hordes of Attila seemed to be sweeping all before them, and victory for us seemed at least in the dim and distant future. But suddenly, to both our amazement and our joy, the tide of battle turned, due no doubt in great part to the unified command under Marshall Foch, the valorous armies of the Allies swept the enemy toward the Rhine, and almost before the realization could dawn fully upon our minds, the war had been won. That military genius, Napoleon, on one occasion made an epigram to the effect that the gods fight on the side of the stronger armies; but, Sir, over long periods of time the God of truth and justice usually takes sides, as He did in this case, and sees that the cause of right, not might, is victorious.

The armies of the Allies had for over four years withstood tremendous losses; they had sustained immense reverses; they had encountered the cruel atrocities, poison gases, and unfair tactics of their barbarian opponents, yet they always came up smiling with their faces toward the foe, until at last overwhelming victory crowned their courage, their tenacity, their cheerfulness. And among all those noble armies of the Allies no corps has gained greater renown, no men have brought greater glory or fame to the land of their birth, than the Canadian corps has brought to Canada. Their achievements are inscribed on the most glorious pages of the history of mankind. It is not necessary that I should enumerate the many battles fought and won by the Canadians. It is sufficient to say that, on every occasion on which they were called upon to accomplish a task, even when opposed to overwhelming numbers of the flower of the Prussian army, the citizen soldiers of Canada were victorious. They have placed Canada proudly among the nations of the world, and that should be the epitaph of those of them who lie out there in Flanders fields. It is due to their valour that to-day at that august body, the Peace Conference at Paris, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden sits in equality, as he should sit, with the representatives of the other nations of the Empire and of the world. It is due to them, Sir, that to-day Canada and the other Dominions have taken the position of being nations within the Empire, nations absolutely independent in every detail, bound together alone by the ties of sentiment, by common aspirations and ideals. And that is the surest and most lasting foundation upon which the Empire can be built.

These men who have performed all these wonderful deeds for Canada are now returning in tens of thousands to our shores to display to us in peace the same noble virtues that they have exhibited in war. Now that they are coming back to become once more a part of our civil life, it is our bounden duty to do everything possible to aid them in becoming citizens of peace, and I am glad to see that the Government is doing a great deal with this object in view. For example, the increase of the post-discharge pay up to six months is admirable, as this gives the men an opportunity of resting their nervous systems after the exhaustion due to the turmoil and excitement of battle, and much other legislation already passed has objects akin to this and so deserves praise. I believe that in these matters the Government has done as well as any Government elected by the people of Canada could have done. There has been a great deal of criticism in many quarters, much of it destructive criticism, a great deal of it unjust, some of it, perhaps, just. But so long, Mr. Speaker, as the governments of this world are made up of human beings, mistakes are occasionally inevitable, and so criticism will sometimes be just. The governments of the next world are, no doubt, perfect, but even the most learned of theologians can give no absolute proofs to that effect.

Mr. Speaker, as the Speech from the Throne speaks of the accomplishments of Canada as a whole in the war, let us look for one minute at what this little country of Canada, little in population although large in area, has done. This country, Sir, which for over one hundred years has known nothing of war, and which has been celebrating in history, song, and story, so-called battles in which a few platoons on either side were the extent of the armies. Here we have a country which, in 1914, had lived in peace and fraternity with its great neighbour to the South for over a century, and which considered a militia force of 3,000 men and a few Mounted Police quite sufficient defence for all possible contingencies, and yet this country of less than eight million people, in the four years and three months of war, performed the following almost unbelievable feats of patriotism, the figures given being in round numbers, but being approximately correct:

Canada enlisted, voluntarily, 465,000 men, under the Military Service Act 85,000 men. Add to this Reservists, and a few others, and we have a total of nearly 600,000 men, of whom nearly 418,000 proceeded overseas. Our casualties were over 200,000, and our deaths unhappily almost 60,000.

Honours granted to the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, including Victoria Crosses, Distinguished Service Orders, Military Crosses, Distinguished Conduct Medals, Military Medals and a few foreign decorations, number about 12,000, and over 3,000 more were mentioned in despatches.

In shipbuilding, including ships built to the order of the Imperial Munitions Board and other private contracts, we built 103 ships, with a dead weight carrying capacity of 367,000 tons. We built for the Imperial Government over 700 small armed trawlers and drifters of various types; for the French Government over 40 armed trawlers, and coastal patrol motor boats. Why, Sir, in my own inland port city of Fort William, 1,500 miles from the Atlantic coast, up there on the shores of Lake Superior, which were explored 200 years ago by French voyageurs and coureurs des bois, we built for the native land of those Frenchmen 12 armed trawlers, which sailed down the lakes and rivers of what was originally New France, on their way to the shores of Old France. What a historical romance for the pen of a Parker!

In financing our record is as good. To think, Mr. Speaker, that this new pioneer country raised, in domestic loans from its people, the enormous sum of nearly $1,500,000,000, or about $200 per head for every man, woman and child in the country, and yet, at the conclusion of the war our savings deposits were approximately $400,000,000 in excess of those of August, 1914. We established credits of over $700,000,000 on behalf of the Imperial Government.

The Imperial Munitions Board placed orders to the extent of $1,200,000,000, the bulk of which was spent on goods which had never before been made in Canada, such as shells, cartridge cases, fuses, and aeroplanes. Why, Mr. Speaker, the vast majority of the people of Canada had never heard an artillery shell explode, or seen an aeroplane, let alone manufacture them.

Then, Sir, on top of all this, the people gave voluntarily to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds, Belgian and Serbian Relief Funds, Y.M.C.A. and Knights of Columbus Hut Funds, contributions amounting to a grand total of some $95,000,000.

This is just an outline, the details of which I have left unmentioned, but take into account only these things I have spoken of, and I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a record that we may look at in open-eyed amazement, and ponder over with unbounded pride.

It is announced in the speech of His Excellency that the Government is going to carry out many needed public works thus providing employment for the returned soldiers and for those who served in the civil army at home. The Government is to be congratulated upon this, for it is a necessary measure. But the Government can, in its public works, supply only a small portion of the ranks of labour with employment. It must get the co-operation of the provincial legislatures, the municipalities, and the private corporations of the country. For with the huge number of returning men, and the other huge numbers of men thrown out of work, from munition and other factories, the labour market is likely to be glutted with men. The employment bureaux which the Government has aided in establishing will help the situation; but with the prices of the necessaries of life still high, and the labour demand lessening, the situation demands all that the Government can do. To-day in Russia Bolshevism reigns supreme, in Germany conditions are chaotic, and in Great Britain labour troubles are more pronounced than ever in the past. These upheavals are all more or less due to the same cause. And if we are to avoid having our beloved country here become a victim to the same appalling conditions it will be necessary that provincial and municipal governments, corporations, and even individuals, co-operate in assisting the Dominion Government not only to supply work, but to aid in eliminating profiteering, thus helping to control the prices of the necessaries of life.

Fortunately this Canada of ours is blessed by Providence with almost unlimited natural resources, the development of which will aid in re-establishing our country on a pre-war basis. Now that the war is over, raw materials will rule the world of commerce, and Canada possesses these raw materials in abundance. We have millions of acres of fertile land, we have eighteen million horse-power of potential electric energy in the waterfalls of Canada, we have fisheries on all sides, pulpwood in abundance, and minerals of all varieties. Most of these mineral resources are being gradually developed. Our output of silver, nickle, gold, and coal is large. There are large quantities of products from our blast furnaces and steel plants, the only regrettable fact being that our blast furnaces and steel plants use nearly altogether imported iron ore. Iron and steel, Sir, are the basis of all industry; they are the basic elements of commercial progress. If you will look over the development of any of the great commercial countries of the world—England, France, Germany, or the United States—you will find that their trade development was directly in proportion to their production of pig iron and steel. Among our natural resources I believe that we have hundreds of millions of tons of iron ore in Canada, scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the development of which, when that development does take place, will be another great step toward our commercial prosperity.

It is pleasing to note in the speech from the Throne that the Soldiers' Land Settlement scheme is being whipped into shape. It is gratifying to know that the Government intends to obtain all necessary lands adjacent to the railways to satisfy the longing of any of our soldiers who wish to go back to the land. And that is as it should be, for it would be cruel if the men who risked their lives in the cause of civilization should be denied the opportunity of going upon the land, because, through the mistaken policies of past governments, the needed lands were held idle in the hands of speculators and corporations; and that, Sir, in a country like Canada, which has twice the area of the whole of Europe, leaving out Russia, and yet has a population of only 8 million, as compared with Europe's 300 million.

For we must remember that the real heroes of this war are not that gallant soldier, Sir Arthur Currie, and his staff officers, not the officers commanding battalions, companies, or batteries, not the medical officers, but the common private soldiers who fearlessly went over the top facing death in all its forms that you and I and our children, and our children's children, might continue to enjoy the blessings of liberty. If I were a sculptor, Mr. Speaker, and were asked to carve a marble masterpiece emplematic of the real heroism of the war, I would erect a statue of a common soldier and the woman that he loved, standing side by side and hand in hand, and looking out upon the world with eyes that knew no fear.

I cannot pass on without offering to the women of our land some slight acknowledgement of the patience, fortitude, and nobility of mind which they have displayed during the war. Perhaps I can offer no higher or more sincere compliment than to say that the wives, mothers, sisters, and sweethearts of our fighting men are more than worthy to take their places by the side of their mates, their sons, and their brothers in accepting the gratitude of the civilized world. Under these circumstances the proposal in the Speech from the Throne that women are shortly to be admitted as members of parliament can hardly be open to criticism.

As a medical man the proposal to establish a federal department of public health appeals to me, and has appeared for many years something to be desired. Material prosperity either of a man or of a nation is of little avail if the health be not guarded. All the arguments appear to me to be favourable to this project. As a Canadian, the idea that all future immigration be on a selective basis also seems greatly to be desired. In the past the methods of attracting immigrants to our shores have been all too loose, and so to-day many undesirables are numbered among Canadian citizens. It appears to me that in the future we should especially encourage to our country immigrants from the British Isles and from the United States, that great republic to the south of us whose people have studied the same history as we, speak the same mother tongue as the majority of us, and who respect the same free and democratic institutions as Canadians do.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude my remarks I wish to congratulate the Government upon a good deal of constructive legislation which has been put into force, such as the increased post discharge pay for the soldiers, the free transportation given to the soldiers' wives and dependents home to Canada, upon the fact that constructive plans are to be put into execution in needed public expenditures; this, of course, depending upon those works being justly and fairly distributed for the benefit of Canada. The congratulations of the whole country are due to the Minister of Finance because of the great response given by the people of the country in reply to his appeals for loans.

The three paramount duties devolving upon the people of Canada at the present moment, in addition to paying homage to our heroes who lie out there under little wooden crosses in France and Flanders, are, first, to repatriate in a proper manner the heroes who are living. History has told us that in past wars heroes and their heroic deeds are soon forgotten. Canada must belie history. Second, to see that governments, corporations, and individuals cooperate in putting Canada back to a peace footing,—a peace footing from an industrial and labour standpoint, and from a cost-of-living standpoint. And, third, that we foster in this country a united Canadian national spirit. Probably, Mr. Speaker, the greatest of these three is the last, for to-day, owing to the diverse nationalities and religions of our people, and owing to the great breadth and extent of our country, antagonisms of race and creed, diversity of views of east and west, are combining against national progress. A house divided against itself cannot stand. Representing as I do a constituency midway between the east and west, let me extend a hand to each. The essence of democracy is compromise for the good of the whole, for the greatest good to the greatest number. Let all endeavour to do away with race and creed antagonisms; let the demands of the west be tempered by the rights of the east, and let the extremists of the east remember that the west deserves justice; let labour and capital bear in mind that they are interdependent, not antagonistic, and let them rather cooperate than do battle; and, finally, let us see that our returning heroes are given justice in every way, are given their reward for the high courage, tenacity, and nobility of character which they have displayed on the battlefield. But at the same time let the returning soldier remember that the vast majority of those who did not go to the front performed worthy and needed services here at home, and not having abdicated their rights as Canadian citizens, also have some claims upon the country.

Sir, if these precepts are acknowledged and practised we will without doubt in the years to come build up on the northern half of this continent a great Canadian nation.

If in this country we sow the seeds of disunion, dissension, and intolerance, we will reap defeat; but if, on the other hand, we sow the seeds of unity, confidence, and enlightenment, we shall garner the fruits of a happy, prosperous, and united nation. Only by following the nobler of these two courses, Sir, can we justify the acts of those great Canadians of fifty years ago, the Fathers of Confederation. I have the honour, Mr. Speaker, to support the motion for the Address.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, this being my first appearance before this House as the leader of the Opposition for the time being, I think it is only proper that I should explain briefly my position. Those of you who read the newspapers, and you all read the newspapers, I suppose, saw what was done yesterday—that by a unanimous vote I was asked for the time being to lead the Opposition in this House until a proper opportunity is given in the most democratic way possible for the Liberals of all Canada to choose their leader. Until that is done, I am by the request of my friends the recognized leader of the Opposition in this House and responsible for the sayings and doings of that body to some extent. I do not think it is out of place for me to thank my friends on this side of the House for the great honour they have conferred on me. I fully appreciate it, and can only promise that whatever ability I possess will be placed at their disposal, and in a proper way at the disposal of the House. I am now getting to be an old member. I have always had the greatest regard for this institution, which is the highest institution in our country, and I trust that in the future and particularly while I occupy this position of responsibility, I shall so demean myself as to do credit and respect to this institution of which we are all so proud. If there was one characteristic which more than another distinguished the great leader into whose shoes I have stepped it was his great respect for Parliament, for the rules of this House and for everything that went to the upbuilding and maintaining of the best parliamentary traditions. As his successor for the time being, I hope that as far as my capacity will permit me, I shall follow in his footsteps. I feel assured of the sympathy and respect of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I hope I shall do justice to the position which I occupy, and shall conduct myself in such a way as to command the sympathy and respect of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as well.

Let me, Mr. Speaker, at once address my hearty and earnest congratulations to the two young hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address. I am particularly proud of the way in which they have acquitted themselves. Their speeches were not too long, but they covered the ground very well; they were full of good material, and well expressed. We are glad to recognize that each of these young men is full of promise for the future. It is a great thing to know that coming up behind us, who are beginning to get old, are young men offering such talent and promise to the service of this country. The part of the speech which particularly attracted my attention was the reference to the returned soldier. These two gentlemen, as I understand it, are themselves returned soldiers. Let me say for the Opposition and for the people generally, that we have in our hearts a very warm spot and the greatest respect for every returned soldier of this country. They have done great things for us, for which we are proud and glad and thankful. I hope we shall not be remiss in our duty to show a proper appreciation of what they have done for us by looking after their interest in a proper and becoming manner. These two young gentlemen were bold enough to rather find fault with the way in which things were done. They may not have meant that, but I, as an ordinary plain blunt person sitting on this side of the House and watching the performance rather closely, reached the conclusion that they were not quite satisfied with the way in which the Government was moving, and rather suggested that a little speed should be put on, if that could possibly be done. To my hon. young friends, who no doubt are alert to their own interests and to the interests of the country, and full of youthful animation and ambition, let me say—not by way of discouragement at all, but by way of helping them along,—that if they have any stimulant to stir up this Government to do something within the life of any man that is living to-day I shall be very glad indeed if they will apply it. We on this side of the House, in our own mild way, have been coaxing them along; we have been offering them every inducement and every promise that we can offer, consistent with our position in opposition, but they do not seem to take our bait. But our good friends are returned soldiers, and possibly the Government had better beware lest some of the means which soldiers use to produce results may be used in their case. There is a warning given to them to-day, and I trust that something will be forthcoming before very long.

I do not wish on this, the first occasion of my addressing the House as leader of the Opposition, to be unduly critical, but the Government has thought proper to place in the Address the subject of dealing with returned soldiers. We heard of the Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment Department last winter. We were very hopeful that something would come of it, but so far I have not been able to hear of any particular establishment, except, forsooth, the salary of the minister—I suppose that is established. We have in this House a distinguished young member from the Province of Nova Scotia, full of business and enthusiasm, and a capable man. Because of his enthusiasm, his business tact and ability he was chosen to be a very material part of that establishment. Yet I find, to my astonishment, that he does not remain there. He would be the last man in the world to unduly find fault with this Government. He has been wedded to them as closely as human being could possibly be. He was willing to bear their sins of omission and commission, and to be, if necessary, the scapegoat for them on many an occasion. But matters have come to such a pass that he has written a letter to the public press of our province, announcing his resignation from that institution because nothing was done. Mr. Speaker, now is the time and the place for us to make a mild inquiry, how it comes, when we have an establishment of this kind, instituted at the request of the Government, backed up by Parliament, supported by all the necessary money and means and services and support, that the man who, I believe, was next in importance to the minister, has had to resign because nothing was being done.

I call this to the attention of the young gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address so that they, having the advantage of being supporters of the Government, may make inquiry and find out where the weak spot is, try to brace it up and see that the proper things are being done in the interest of the returned soldier. The returned soldier is not expecting anybody to unduly look after him. I remember our good old friend from Dundas, Mr. Broder, whose memory we all revere and who is much missed by the House, speaking once upon a time about the farmers. He said: The farmers of Ontario do not want anybody to take off their clothes and put them to bed, they are able to look after themselves; all they want is a square deal and fair play. I believe that the returned soldier who has come home in such a physical condition that he is able to look after himself, does not require, and does not want, anybody to take off his clothes and put him to bed; all he wants is a square deal. Of course, there are others who have been mutilated and maimed in the war to such an extent that we must look after them carefully and tenderly and to whom greater attention must necessarily be given than to those who came through safe and well and in regard to whom we thank God that they escaped the fate of the others. Without following this subject any longer, I will merely say that I trust and hope that the Government have at last reached a conclusion as to what they are really going to do and that something substantial will be done. I might remind my enthusiastic young friends again that there is one divine attribute in connection with this Government and that has reference to the question of time. To them one day is as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day. They must not lose sight of that fact. Further, they have a good many lawyers among them, and keen lawyers too, and they have always taken care that time is not of the essence of any contract they enter into.

As far as making provisions for the country generally, the soldiers and others, is concerned, the great thing for us as a Parliament, and for the people whom we represent, is that we should try and make Canada a good, comfortable country to live in; that we should so marshal our forces that the best results shall be obtained; that we should so utilize our opportunities that our people may become productive. One of the great curses of over protection in this country has been too much crowding of people into our cities and towns and the neglecting of our farms. We have too many people in the factories and in the towns and too few people producing in the country the food that is necessary for those who are crowding into the towns.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman wish to reduce the number of factories?

Mr. McKENZIE: If there are too many factories—yes, certainly. I am not in a position to speak as to that, but I am saying to my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) that what has been happening in our part of the country is that people have been rushing to factories, steel works and all that sort of thing, and neglecting the farm entirely. I am not blaming any Government particularly for that but I am simply saying that that is the condition that exists and that the party in power will, to the best of their ability, have to deal with it. If there is anything that can be done to make the farm more productive than it is, to induce young men to stay upon the farm, and the people who come into this country as immigrants to go upon the farm instead of crowding into the factories and towns, if such a condition can be brought about that at least two blades of grass shall grow where only one grows now, we shall be moving in the direction of greater production and of reduction in the cost of living. That is what I have had in mind all the time. There is no great benefit in a man being able to get $5, or $6, a day when everything that he buys for the support of his family is three times more expensive than it was when he was getting $2 or $3 a day. What I want to impress upon the Government is that if there is anything they can do to make this a cheap, free and comfortable country to live in, and to carry on our industries as they have been going along in years gone by, that is a consummation greatly to be desired.

I want to say something about the glorious achievements of our soldiers. The part played by our gallant Canadian soldiers in this great war is something that should not be lost sight of. This is the first time really that Canadians have had a wide opportunity of distinguishing themselves in this way. Canadians have distinguished themselves in other walks of life. They have been great theologians, doctors and lawyers, and they have played an important part in the industrial world. It has only been in this war that they have had the opportunity of proving themselves great upon the field of battle. They have distinguished themselves in such a way as to render glorious for all time to come the history of Canada in connection with this war. I thank and congratulate our boys, our generals and our officers upon their achievements in this great struggle. I want, on behalf of the Canadian people, and as far as I can do so, to thank our Allies for the position that they have taken and the splendid victory that they have achieved, for justice, right and humanity. I wish also to thank our neighbours to the south, our great American friends, for the position which they have taken and the marvellous help they have given us in connection with the great victory we have won.

I hope that the hon. gentlemen who have spoken so well and so eloquently this afternoon will continue to stir up our friends of the Government and to see if there are no means that they can be induced to take to establish some sort of machinery that will produce something else than Orders in Council. Of those they have been producing a surfeit. I would say to my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) that that is one factory that I am willing to stop.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few things with respect to the subjects dealt with in the Speech. The first thing that caught my eye was the reference to a Franchise Act. In this country we are all interested in the franchise. Every man wishes to be enfranchised, and the desire of every province is that everybody who is entitled to exercise the franchise in this country should be given that privilege. It is a new and striking revival, it is a hopeful sign, that this Government is talking of extending the franchise to anybody. Formerly the policy seemed to be the contraction of the franchise and the disfranchisement of as many as could possibly be struck off the lists. But now that sunshine and prosperity are ahead of us the Government is willing for a season—for a season, I say—to give us the franchise again. I would point out to the Acting Prime Minister and to the Government generally, that not one cent of money should be unnecessarily expended in this country at the present time. We had one experience with a Dominion Franchise Act during the years from 1885 to 1898, when there were revising barristers to carry out the Act. In every province of the Dominion, I believe, there were two sets of voters' lists: one list prepared by the revising barristers in question for the election of members to the House of Commons at the expenditure of hundreds and thousands of dollars, and another set of lists for the election of members to the various provincial legislatures and to the municipal councils in the different towns and cities. That I think was an unnecessary waste. However, in 1898 the Dominion Franchise Act was repealed, and we reverted to the old system of one voters' list for the election of members to the Federal, the provincial and municipal bodies. I submit that if it is the intention of the Government, through the medium of the promised Franchise Act, to reintroduce the expensive method of preparing voters' lists which prevailed in years gone by, it is making a mistake, because it will mean not only the expenditure of a large amount of money but the imposition of unnecessary labour and worry upon the people in getting their names, not on one, but on two lists, and of fighting battles to get those two lists into shape, whereas there should only be one. If my advice is any good to the Government I suggest there is one course whereby duplication of lists and machinery can be avoided. In the province of Nova Scotia we have a very simple way of preparing these lists. In the cities of Halifax and Sydney, and in other towns of that province, there are registrars to whom any one, who wishes to have his name placed upon the voters' list makes application. In every place there are what is known as "revisers" through whom names are placed on the list. These revising boards are composed of men appointed by the municipal councils, which in turn are elected by the people, so that the appointment of these revisers is really in the hands of the electors themselves. Now, if the Government is not satisfied with the work of these boards, if it thinks that the appointment of these boards to revise the lists is too much in the hands of one party, whichever party may be in power, I would suggest that a mixed board be chosen composed of members representing equally the Dominion and local authorities, and let that board compile the voters' list and avoid the duplication of which I have complained. We have such a body in the educational boards in the province of Nova Scotia, and it is working very well. On the Educational Board there are three gentlemen representing the municipal council —for example, take the town of North Sydney where I live—and two other gentlemen appointed by the Government. The Government grant is watched particularly by the Government representatives, and the educational affairs of the town are especially looked after by those appointed by the town council. I submit, Sir, that if any difficulty or danger is apprehended in connection with voters' lists—and there should be none so far as I know—the difficulty will be overcome by a mixed or united board such as I have spoken of, and the enormous expense which would otherwise be incurred would be avoided. There is another phase of the franchise question, and I cannot at all understand why it is introduced. Throughout the Dominion, as far as I know, the franchise has been extended to women with perhaps the solitary exception of the province of Quebec. If such be the case I see no great necessity for duplicating legislation, unless it is intended to provide more complicated machinery for the placing of names on the voters' list than obtains under provincial statute. That, Sir, is all I have to say with respect to the franchise. I maintain, and I say it in all good faith, that in the present condition of the finances of this country, and when there are so many useful and vital objects calling for an expenditure of public money, we should not spend ten cents for any purpose that can be avoided.

As far as the public highways are concerned, there are hon. gentlemen now sitting on the Government side who had a great deal to say in connection with the Road Act which is now contemplated when it was introduced on a former occasion, and I do not think that their passage from this side of the House to that would change their views, speaking constitutionally, upon this question, because there is a constitutional question involved in this matter. Expenditures for highways, as for education, are entirely within the jurisdiction and scope of the provincial legislature—they are under provincial laws and provincial control. If, regardless of the terms of the British North America Act, we are going to encroach upon provincial jurisdiction, where are we going to stop? Until the power regarding this question is taken away from those in whom it is at present vested, I think we should observe the terms and conditions of the constitution and leave to the different provinces the expenditure of moneys on roads. The provincial authorities have road Acts, road inspectors and road machinery, and they have men who are versed in the technique of building roads. If we have money to give away for this purpose, I have no objection to dividing it in a proper way between the different provinces. Perhaps there are only two ways in which that could properly and equitably be done; either according to the mileage of public roads in each province, or on the basis of population. Whichever method would be the most equitable should be adopted, but in any case I would say, if you have money to spare for this purpose give it to the provinces themselves and let it be expended in a constitutional manner. That, Sir, is about the only observation I have to make upon the subject of roads. If Dominion moneys are to be taken and expended by officers of the Government under the control of this House upon the roads of the country, I would strenuously object to it, and I would recall to certain of my hon. friends opposite the stand which they took upon this question on a former occasion, and unless conditions have materially changed, I would invite them to stand by the faith of their fathers, and to adhere to the position which they formerly took.

Now, there is the question of public health. The member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) who, I believe, is a doctor, was enthusiastic in his support of the proposal for a department of Public Health. All I have to say about that is that I am not in favour of duplications; I am not in favour of conflicting authority between provincial and Dominion institutions. Strangely enough, the provisions of the British North America Act would seem to permit duplication on this point, but up to now the Federal Government has not dealt very much with public health. But a doctor appointed in Ontario by the Dominion Government is no better than a doctor appointed in Ontario by the local government. If you had one set of doctors appointed by the local government to deal with matters affecting public health in a particular province and another set of doctors appointed by the Dominion Government to deal with the same question in the same province, the result would be a conflict of authority and a state of affairs that would not be desirable. Let this Government, if it is going to deal with the matter of public health, take complete control of it. Let public health be under one control; do not have two bodies representing the same people doing the same thing and spending the money twice when spending it once under proper control would bring about better results. I am warning the Government in the most friendly way to avoid this duplication and suggesting that they make arrangements with the provincial authorities whereby this matter shall be taken in hand either by the Dominion or by the provincial authority and dealt with by the one body only.

We are invited in the Address to deal with vocational training. The Government of the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1910 or 1911 appointed a Commission to look into the matter of vocational training and technical education and to see what ought to be done, or whether the Government ought to devote any money to that purpose. A most searching inquiry was made. An able body of men went all over the country and got all the information they could, and Dr. Robertson, the Chairman, made a report to this House recommending the yearly expenditure of a certain amount of money for the purposes of technical education. If there is any difference between technical education and vocational education, the distinction is very fine; either is an education to be given to men in different walks of life in manufacturing and in industry, and what applies to the one applies, as I understand it, to the other. We on this side of the House have established our position in that matter; if moneys are properly expended in technical or vocational education, I imagine that no fault will be found by hon. gentlemen on this side. We hope that speedy action will be taken so that, under the present conditions of reconstruction, our people will be trained to take part in the many activities that we hope to carry on but which we had not been obliged to engage in during the war. I hope that the training our people receive in these educational or technical schools will enable them to secure advantage from following the avenues of trade that will be opened to us by reason of the war or by reason of German trade being, for the present, at all events, cut off.

The Government have to deal at this time with very vexed questions. They have to deal with the soldier question, which has been brought to their notice. They have to deal with the question of capital and labour, which is in a very disturbed condition. I do hope that some action will be taken by the Government that will bring about a better understanding between capital and labour. Since the war began, even before the war began, while this Government were in power, they did not do anything to better the conditions existing between capital and labour in Canada. I trust that they will now be able, through the Department of Labour or in some other way, to create a better feeling between capital and labour in this country than prevails to-day. It is a question that requires education, and a proper understanding. A difference between these two factors in our national life is like a disagreement between the two wheels of a carriage or cart. If one says: I cannot go with you, and the other says: I will stop and you can go without me, the cart will not go. Similarly, it is absolutely impossible to carry on industrial pursuits without co-operation between capital and labour, and for that reason the very best energies of the Government and every agency that can be utilized in that direction should be directed to an intelligent and effective effort to bring about the best possible understanding between those two great factors in our national life. It would be improper for me, as well as a waste of time, to dilate upon the relation between capital and labour, because this body is too intelligent to require any explanation of that on my part. You all know the conditions that are existing in the country, and while the Government may not be able to do very much, they are the representatives of the people, they are charged with responsibility, and they must leave the factory for a day or two and try to do something.

I do not think that there is much else in the Address besides what I have referred to. It is an old stereotyped complaint to say that there is not much in the Address, but it does not follow that because there is not a great deal in the Address, other measures will not be brought down, and we trust that something substantial and something in the interest of the country will be brought down and carried forward.

Some of my friends sitting behind the treasury benches said to me to-day: "Well, McKenzie, we hope that we will have a short session." I was hoping that that would be possible, but when I see, in looking over the Address, that we have to deal individually with the Orders in Council that have been passed during the last year, all hope of a short session vanishes.

Let me hope that the Government, even at this rather late day in their existence, will see to it that whatever moneys are to be expended are expended properly, economically, and in the best interests of the people. The complaint throughout the country to-day is not that we have expended money on the war—we are pleased and proud to expend money on the war,—but that we have expended money on the war, and on things incidental to it, absolutely recklessly and without proper return. I wish, therefore, to urge upon the Government that any moneys spent after this shall be spent for value. I am not able to go into the details of the expenditure in connection with the war, it is too big and would take too long. But in our part of the country, we had, particularly in connection with the Naval Department, expenditures which were criminally extravagant and useless, and I hope that some day those things will be brought to light and that the Government will be taught a lesson that henceforth hangers-on are to be cut off, and that expenditures for the purpose of pleasing party heelers will never find place or part in the exercise of Government functions in this country. Those are things against which I wish to register my complaint, and I hope that everybody in this House or out of it who has anything to do with the public expenditures will see to it that public moneys are appropriated for public development. There is plenty of room for it.

A moment ago I said that it was desirable to have this a cheap country to live in. By cheapness I do not mean anything that would reduce the standard of living in this country in all its bearings and relations, but I mean a country in which men can live comfortably, and in which the wage that is paid to our workers shall be sufficient for the proper sustenance in comfort of themselves and their families. We have great food resources in this country; we have magnificent fish resources, grain resources, potato resources, and the finest fruit in the world. Yet in many places, those resources, particularly the fisheries, are not developed to their full extent and capacity because of the lack of public facilities for the handling of them, such as railways, wharves, etc., and those facilities ought to be furnished by the proper expenditure of money.

Having said this, and having congratulated ourselves that the war is over and that peace is restored, let me say that for more reasons than one, I, as a leader on this side at the present and as a humble Liberal, am glad that the war is over. I am glad that the war is over because our wandering boys who are here and there throughout this House can now wend their way home to the dear old place which they have left.

In conclusion, let me tell my good friends that the war is over. The light is in the window for you; the latch string is on the outside, and you are all welcome.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I desire to offer my congratulations to my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) and his associates upon the other side of the House upon his selection and appointment as leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition. The hon. member is an able and experienced parliamentarian and I wish to assure him of my desire to extend to him every courtesy and facility by way of information and to co-operate with him in the despatch of the public business which comes before this House. The hon. member and myself are in a sense in the same position. We are both exercising unaccustomed and temporary duties of leadership. Let me trust that a fellow-feeling will make us wondrous kind.

The hon. member in his remarks has exercised moderation, and in that I shall be glad to emulate his example. I concur most heartily in what he has said by way of compliment to the mover and the seconder of the Address. Seldom have there been heard in this Parliament at any opening two such excellent or thoughtful speeches upon the Address. The remarks of the two members in question and the sentiments which they have expressed come from them with added force and appropriateness because of the notable services which they have rendered at the front. The tribute which they have so eloquently paid to the courage, sacrifices and achievements of the Canadian Expeditionary Force will be proudly and gladly responded to by the people of this country. From Ypres to Mons, an unbroken series of victories, often against the most desperate odds, attests the valour which has won the unstinted admiration of the world, and which will for all time be the most cherished tradition of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, when this House prorogued in May last, it is not too much to say the destiny of Canada, of the Empire, of the world, and of civilization as we understand it, hung visibly in the balance. The enemy, after his successful attacks with massed and overwhelming forces in March and April, was pressing down the Somme towards the sea. It was clearly his intention to throw the British troops into the Channel,—to roll up the French line upon Paris and, as he thought, to bring the war to an end with one stroke. That was what the German Emperor had in mind when, a few months earlier, he predicted a victory for the German arms and, as he termed it, a good German peace. We all know what kind of peace that would have been. How serious the situation was, how nearly the plan came to realization, may be known to members of this House when I say that, at the time when the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues visited England in early June, Allied strategists were carefully studying the problem involved in a possible evacuation of the channel ports and even the withdrawal of the Allied line to the south of Paris. But in July, by one of the most sudden and extraordinary reversals of fortune in all military history, the change came, and at the second battle of the Marne, under the genius of Marshal Foch, there was established a new turning point in world history, and the Allies in all theatres of action were able to take the offensive.

Then followed in dramatic succession the unconditional surrender of Bulgaria, the collapse of Turkey, the capitulation of Austria-Hungary, and finally, after most desperate and sanguinary fighting, the surrender of Germany on November 11, 1918. Without any desire to boast, we must not fail to bear in mind the mighty part played by the British Empire in this great struggle. It is not too much to say, Mr. Speaker, making all allowance for the efforts of the other Allies, and particularly that of France, whose courage and heroism have been sublime, that the very shield and buckler of world defense against Prussian tyranny and aggression have been the naval and military forces of Great Britain. The casualties, Mr. Speaker, show the degree of participation of the Allies in the closing battles of this war. It was, according to Marshal Foch, the illustrious and magnanimous generalissimo of the allied forces the hammer strokes of the British army, including the Canadian divisions, which broke through the Hindenburg line and brought Germany to her knees, and it will be an eternal source of pride to the people of this country that the first troops to enter Cambrai, which was the great bastion of German defence on the west wore the uniform of Canada. It will also be a source of noble pride to the people of this country that on the last day of the war Canadian troops entered Mons from which the British forces at the beginning of the war had been driven by overwhelming enemy forces. The old saying holds true, that Great Britain always wins the last battle in any war in which she is engaged.

It is a great thing, Mr. Speaker, to be a citizen of the British Empire to-day, and it seems to me that in addition to the pride which this war must give us in our British citizenship there must also be a distinct gain in the sense of Canadian national unity by reason of our achievements in this war, and particularly those of our Canadian expeditionary forces overseas. The heroism, the sufferings, the sacrifices and common endeavours of Great Britain, of Canada, of Australia, of New Zealand, of South Africa, and of India, must also it seems to me bind together for all time, as with links of steel, those component parts of the Empire in loyal, loving, and indissoluble union.

Mr. Speaker, the war is over, and the Peace Conference is engaged in dealing with the most momentous questions which have ever come before a congress of world's statesmen. It would be premature to discuss the conclusions to which that conference should arrive. Suffice it to say that there are seated there the ablest statesmen in the world to-day. Canada is represented by the experience and wisdom of her Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, and those of his colleagues who accompany him. The task is, indeed, a heavy one—the settling of the terms of peace, the recasting of the boundaries of European countries, the re-grouping of nationalities, and the establishment of guarantees and securities for that permanent peace of the world which is necessary if civilization is not to be wholly destroyed. There are, however, two observations which I desire to make.

In the first place, it is clear that this was a wholly unnecessary and avoidable war. All the bloodshed might have been spared. All the treasure which was spent, all the prodigious effort which was put forth, might have been devoted to the higher purposes of advancing civilization. All the suffering on land and sea, all the unspeakable anguish of wives, of mothers, and of families, need not have been. What caused this war? Who is responsible for this war? It is clear that responsibility for this war lies with the German people in their lust of dominion, and in the criminal and insane ambition of their Emperor and the military caste surrounding him. And if this is so, must not justice be done? I put forward the view that if those who are responsible for this war are not brought to punishment it will be the greatest failure of retributive justice in the history of mankind. The indictment before an international tribunal of those in authority in Germany and the other countries allied with her, before and during the war, their solemn trial for conspiracy against the liberties of nations, for breach of public law, and for the barbarities and atrocities which have been perpetrated by land and sea, would in my view do more to prevent the possibility of repetition of an attempt at world dominion on the part of any nation than any league of peace that can be devised by the genius or resourcefulness of statesmen.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, and that is that Germany and her allies by reason of their responsibility for this war, should be made to pay to the extent that they can pay for the war expenditure to which the Allies have been put, and I am glad to observe that that is the position taken by Great Britain. Canada did not desire to enter this war; we were forced to take part in order to save ourselves and to assist in saving the world. It seems to me therefore that those who are responsible for the war should be made to pay to the extent that they are able to pay for the expenditure to which Canada has been put. There is no sign, so far as I can observe, of repentance on the part of Germany to-day. On the contrary, there seems to be a certain degree of arrogance by reason of the fact that Germany was not invaded. A war indemnity spread over a long period of years would do more than anything else to bring home to the German people the enormity of the offence which they have committed against civilization. That is an argument which I am sure they would understand.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the armistice having been declared, the Government of this country, like the governments of all other countries, was at once confronted with the problem of reconstruction. The Government could not, of course, forecast events. But we had taken concerted measures, to be put into effect immediately after the conclusion of peace. Those measures related to two principal things, demobilization and reconstruction. The problem was a great and difficult one. In one sense it is easier to get from a peace basis to a war basis than from a war basis to a peace basis. We have a longer time to get to a war basis from a peace basis than we have to get from a basis of war to a basis of peace after the war. We had four years to mobilize,—four years to organize the industry, the agriculture, the commerce, the trade and finances of the country, upon a war basis. We have had a few weeks to demobilize and reconstruct, so that the country may be once again upon a peace basis. Consider the problem involved in demobilization. We have over 300,000 soldiers overseas, and 50,000 dependents, to be brought home, all naturally desirous of returning to their homes and their dear ones as soon as possible. It has been the policy of the Government, notwithstanding the economic problems involved, to bring those men home just as quickly as possible, in order that they may again meet their friends from whom they have been separated for years. That has been the policy of the Government, and since November, 1918, over 50,000 soldiers have been returned to this country, and some eight or ten thousand of their dependents. In addition, there have been demobilized in Canada, struck from off the strength of units here, some 50,000 additional. So that there have been demobilized, since the conclusion of the armistice, over 100,000 of the troops of Canada, and many thousands of their dependents. Consider the situation,—the scarcity of shipping, troops to be returned, not only to Canada, but to Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India. There are forces still in all the principal theatres of war. Transport is required for supplies for those forces. There is a great shortage of world shipping. Notwithstanding that, notwithstanding the fact that it is winter, that we have but two ports on our Atlantic coast, that we have limited railway facilities, we have been bringing back our men at the rate of 25,000 to 30,000 a month. In addition to that, many convalescents have been brought back. Many thousands have been treated in our hospitals. The problem is a great one, complicated by after-war conditions, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, to this House and to the country, that it is proceeding quickly and satisfactorily. Then, consider the question of reconstruction. Canada had engaged in munitions and in other war industries some 200,000 men and women. Immediately after the armistice was declared 120,000 or 130,000 of those immediately lost their positions, and became unemployed. They were engaged in munition industries and in other war industries, which necessarily ceased as soon as the war came to an end. The problem for the Government was to find business to replace business represented by the output of the munitions and war industries which had come to an abrupt cessation. In addition to the 120,000 or 130,000 out of employment there were returning, as I have said, some 25,000 or 30,000 soldiers per month. It was winter. The problem which the Government has had to deal with has been to find, so far as possible, employment for all those men and women who lost their positions and for the soldiers who are returning home. That is the problem to which we had to address ourselves. I appeal, Mr. Speaker, to the verdict of results. I do not know of any country to-day, whether it is Great Britain, France, the United States or any other country, that is in a better position, or has less industrial unrest within its borders, than Canada to-day. The hon. gentleman who preceded me referred to the labour situation in Canada, and I desire to say this, not only as showing the efforts which the Government has made, but the attitude and loyalty of labour, that there have been, I believe, less labour disputes in this country since war broke out in 1914 than in any other country in the world. Take the situation in Great Britain to-day, take the situation in Belgium, the situation in France and the situation in the United States—there is great industrial unrest. We have, Mr. Speaker, considerable unemployment in this country, but I believe that when the measures of which I shall now inform the House are in full effect and operation, as they will be within the next few weeks, all the slack of unemployment will be taken up, and that there will within the next two or three months be an actual shortage of labour in many parts of Canada.

[Sir Thomas White.]

What are the measures which the Government have taken in its reconstruction problem. Let me mention a few of them. When the munition industries ceased our steel plants found themselves without a market for their product. We at once took up with the railways of Canada the question of placing orders for steel rails, and within a short time after the conclusion of the armistice, orders had been given by the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Canadian National Railways, on behalf of the Canadian Pacific and on behalf of the Grand Trunk system, for 200,000 tons of steel rails at a cost of $13,000,000, as the Minister of Railways (Hon J. D. Reid) informs me. We took up also with them the question of placing as many orders as they could for rolling stock and locomotives, irrespective of the question of expense, because it was an immediate and urgent matter, having regard to the labour conditions. The Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Pacific railway are manufacturing their equipment in their own shops. The Government railways have given orders for 2,500 cars and 25 locomotives. That will keep our car equipment industries, with those businesses that are allied and associated with them, very busy. In addition to that, the Government will present to this House within the next few days, estimates providing for an extensive programme of railway betterments and improvements and the construction of branch lines, especially in the West.

To give an idea of the amount of money which will be involved in the programme which I have outlined, it will be sufficient to say that it is estimated that there will be required $35,000,000 for rolling stock and material such as steel rails. In addition to that a sum exceeding $20,000,000 will be needed for railway extensions and more than $10,000,000 for betterments and improvements. The Government lost no time in taking up these important plans which are useful and advantageous from the national standpoint in adding to our national railway plant and equipment and which will, at the same time, provide employment for thousands of men.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, the Government provided by an Order in Council, for a loan of $25,000,000 to the provincial governments for the purpose of promoting better housing conditions throughout the Dominion, and this action Parliament will be asked to approve. I am happy to say that the loan will be taken advantage of by all, or nearly all, of the provincial governments.

I have been so advised. It will not only materially improve the living conditions and the health of the people but in carrying out that policy there should be provided work for thousands of those who lost their positions when our munition and war industries came to an end and of our soldiers returning from overseas. In addition to that the Government at once resumed the great public work of the construction of the Welland Canal and the completion of the Trent Valley canal. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) will tell you, when he addresses the House, of the programme which he has in view and of the preparation of the plans and specifications in anticipation.

Then, in order that Canada may be in a position to participate in the export trade arising out of reconstruction in Europe the Government promptly constituted a Canadian trade mission in London, with its counterpart, a Canadian trade commission in Ottawa. It is necessary to-day, and it will be necessary possibly for some years to come, for Canada to provide credits to a large extent in connection with the business which we shall obtain overseas. In order that our agricultural and manufactured products may be sold, it will be necessary, owing to the condition of exchange between Europe and America, that Canada, like the United States, shall provide credits from which our products shall be purchased. We have actively and continuously taken up the question of furnishing credits for the purchase of our agricultural products, of our wheat, our meats, our cheese and our other products from the field. In addition, we have offered to provide credits whereby France, Belgium and some of the Balkan countries, shall be placed in a position to buy of the products of Canadian agriculture and industry. The figures involved in these transactions are large. I desire to say that I agree with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in his expressions regarding the desirability and the necessity of spending no money wastefully or unnecessarily, but I also desire to say that for the next year, two years, or three years, those in charge of the Government of this country will require resourcefulness and courage to raise whatever money is necessary to establish the credits which will enable this country to market its products. The people will stand behind the Government in that. It is absolutely vital to the continuance of our agricultural and business prosperity.

I have spoken of several of the measures which the Government has taken in order to meet the situation which has arisen owing to the sudden conclusion of the war. The speech from the Throne indicates the further measures, all of a constructive character, which we are taking for the purpose. A Bill is to be presented providing for aid in the construction of highways. I do not know of any more useful or immediately productive public work that could be undertaken by the Government than the improvement of the highways of Canada. This is a country of enormous resources, the greatest being agricultural. The significance and importance of good highways in connection with our farming communities are too well known to this House to make it necessary for me to refer to the matter at any length. A large amount of money will be provided by the Government for the purpose of aiding, by way of subsidies, the several provinces, in the improvement of their highway system. That will not only be beneficial to the country itself, but it will provide a great deal of work for those who need employment.

It will not be necessary for me to speak on the other features of the speech from the Throne—the department of Public Health, to which reference has been made by hon. members who have spoken before; the measures which we shall take in the interest of returned soldiers, and the other policies indicated in the Speech. These matters will all be taken up in due course when they come up before the House for discussion.

My hon. friend has spoken about the Franchise Act. He is evidently of the opinion that there is machinery in all the provinces whereby women are enabled to vote. I think he is in error as to that. In Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island I believe they do not have that machinery. Further than that, I understand that the measure brought down at the last session of this House was declaratory of the principle and that it does not provide the machinery which will effectually enable women to vote in Dominion elections. There is another reason why a Franchise Bill is necessary at this session. The War Time Elections Act was to last during the war and during the period of demobilization. It should remain upon our statute books until a satisfactory Act takes its place.

Mr. Speaker, I was impressed with what my hon. friend said in regard to the importance of taking our duties in this House with high seriousness. The world has come through one of the most terrible periods, if not the most terrible, in all its history. There is world-wide disorganization of business and of trade, and much agitation of society. If there ever was a time when it was necessary that the Government, or Parliament and the people, should maintain steadiness, it is now. It is a time for wise, sane, and cool action. The country has done so well during the war that to my mind it is the best earnest for what we shall do to meet present conditions and the future, whatever it may hold for us. Personally, I have the greatest confidence in the resources of this country, and in the intelligence and enterprise of its people. I feel satisfied that Canada's position will be assured, and that when the war is officially at an end, and when trade resumes its natural channels, this country will go forward with a greater impetus than ever before. We have the natural resources—Canada is one of the greatest countries in the world in that respect—we have just laws, and I am satisfied that no matter what happens to other parts of the world—and I am sure we are all looking forward to the restoration and permanence of peace—no matter what happens elsewhere, I am satisfied that everything will go well with Canada.

With regard to the League of Nations, which has been so much discussed and is now almost an accomplished fact, I have this to say—that I think it feasible; but there must be more on the part of the peoples of the world than the aspirations for peace. Permanent peace in this world will depend upon the attitude of the peoples of the world towards each other, towards life and towards civilization. In the last analysis permanent peace must rest upon an ethical basis. In the meantime, that the peace of the world may be restored and may be maintained, it seems to me that there must be the sanction of force, actual or potential, in order that the decrees and decisions of the powers who are parties to the league may be enforced, and all nations must in that connection realize their duties, obligations, and responsibilities.

My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has spoken about the political situation, and he has welcomed back some hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House, telling them that the light is in the window and the door upon the latch. Well, I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this House, like the people of this country, are not thinking very much about party politics at this time. The problems that we have to face are so vast, so complicated and so important, that matters that used to be of interest to us now take a secondary place. When the ship of state, after this world tempest through which it has passed, is equipped and refitted, and sails once again into smooth seas with the prospects of favouring winds and a prosperous voyage, it will be time enough to consider the old party conditions that used to engage our attention to so great an extent. This war, Mr. Speaker, has almost destroyed civilization. What we need in this country to-day is a spirit that seeks not the individual or the sectional gain, but the welfare of the country as a whole. With that spirit in Canada I feel that this country, with its resources, and with the intelligence and patriotism which it possesses, can meet with faith and with confidence whatever vicissitudes the future may hold in store for us.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, when a death occurs in a family the sympathy of friends is always precious, and to the Liberal family sitting on this side of the House the sympathy extended by our friends, irrespective of party allegiance, is a very dear and precious thing, and I wish on behalf of hon. gentlemen sitting to your left, Sir, to tender my sincere and hearty thanks.

To the eloquent eulogy to the work done in the field by our Canadian army offered by the leader of His Majesty's Government, I say, Amen and Amen, but may I be allowed to add something else. There is another side, alas, to the medal: during the last four years we have often thought of John Bright's great saying, when, speaking in regard to the Crimean War he said:

> The Angel of Death is abroad in the land. One can almost hear the beating of His wings.

To the members of this House, and to the men outside the House—aye, and the women too—who have lost their dear ones, I think it is only proper that the representatives of the people at large should give their humble, their hearty, their sympathetic condolence, and the prayer that the Comforter of all will comfort them in their grief.

I was delighted to hear, Mr. Speaker, the adherence of the leader of the Government to the plan of a League of Nations, because I believe that without a League of Nations, without some international organization for the enforcing of peace, we are likely to have a recurrence of war. I agree with him when he says that the immediate cause of this conflict was the boundless ambition of the German empire and its military caste, and the desire for domination of the Prussian people. Yes, that was the immediate cause, but there were underlying causes deeper than that, Mr. Speaker. There was first f all this fact—that we lived in a world where force was the ultimate arbiter, and until we live in a world where force is not the ultimate arbiter, that is to say force used by one nation against another, wars are almost bound to occur. It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that before the war broke out the civilized world was like a western mining camp, where each man was dependent for his own safety and security upon the revolver or the bowie-knife he carried. But in a western mining camp the good sense of the community revolted at such a condition of affairs, because it always led to murder and sudden death. Therefore, they erected Judge Lynch's Court, and Judge Lynch called upon the respectable citizens to band together and put down the outlaw, the bandit and the desperado. That is the situation in the world to-day. Judge Lynch's Court, the League of Nations, is in process of formation, and it is for all the well-intentioned peoples of the world to rally round a league to enforce world-wide peace. And it is something to be said for the North American continent that the great protagonist of that idea comes from this side of the Atlantic. I refer to the work of Woodrow Wilson, whose name will go ringing down the ages as that of a man who tried to reconstitute the world on a better basis. He has been supported by nearly all the great men of the Motherland—by Lloyd George, by Lord Robert Cecil, by Viscount Bryce. Viscount Bryce said in a letter which he wrote to a great meeting for the purpose of promoting the ideal, "we must destroy war or war will destroy us." Not only was the fact of force being the only arbiter one of the causes of war, but there was the vast interest which certain classes in every civilized nation had in manufacturing armaments; there was a personal interest in keeping up international friction in order that private gain might ensue. And last, but perhaps not least, was secret diplomacy, the international relations of practically every country in the world being conducted not by the representatives of the people, but by a small group in each country. Time after time this was the case; instance after instance might be cited where the different civilized nations of the world did not know to what their governments had committed them.

I have a suggestion which, in view of the financial experience of the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) and my own inexperience, I offer with a good deal of diffidence, but it has such a common sense ring about it that I believe he and the rest of the members of this House will regard it as reasonable. We have a vast expenditure outlined. I do not believe that the Canadian people know to-day in what financial position we are, and I suggest that the Acting Prime Minister, who carries also on his broad shoulders the heavy burden of being Finance Minister—a burden which, I am sure, is grievous to bear these days—will bring down and place before the House at the earliest possible moment a succinct statement of the liabilities of this country. It is quite true that we may have to spend vast sums for reconstruction and in order to provide employment during the term of reconstruction.

But we must be careful about it. A large amount of this money will be borrowed. If we borrow too much the lenders will begin to look askance even at our boundless resources and even at the ability of those who are conducting the affairs of the country, and say: We cannot lend you any more money. That would be a sad condition; so I think it would be proper and fitting that such a statement be laid before the House at an early date.

We all hate taxation. In a few days I will have to write a cheque, with great regret, to the order of the Receiver-General of Canada for income tax. Although personally I am glad that it is as small as it is, as a citizen I know that it should be a great deal larger; and if I may offer advice at this time to the Finance Minister it is that the income tax of the country should approach the scale of the income tax in the United States and in the United Kingdom. So far, the rates of taxation imposed on large incomes in Canada have been away below the rates imposed in the United States and in the United Kingdom.

It has been stated that the War-Time Elections Act should remain on the statute book of Canada until it is superseded by some other Act. I take issue with that statement, and I believe that my feelings will be shared by many sitting on the opposite side as well as by those sitting on this side of the House. The War-Time Elections Act, Mr. Speaker, is a blot on the statute book of Canada. I am not allowed, I believe, to characterize as iniquitous, legislation passed by the House of Commons and the Senate and signed by the Governor-General. But I will take the words of the minister (Mr. A. K. Maclean)—now, there are so many ministers that I have forgotten what department he is in charge of, but, he acted as Minister of Finance last session, and in bygone, happier days he acted as financial critic of the Opposition. He said, when this War-Time Elections Act was under consideration that it was a horrible Bill, and I believe that the Minister of Public Works (Hon. F. B. Carvell) who sits beside him, characterized it in even stronger language. I call upon these men and I call upon every man who loves liberty and justice and British fair play to see to it that this War-time Elections Act is wiped off the statute book of Canada at the earliest possible moment. It was passed for the purpose of winning an election. It was a tampering with the electorate by a body of men who proposed to appeal to the electorate after it had been tampered with. It goes to the very root and to the very basis of our representative institutions. I ask the Acting Prime Minister to be worthy of himself; I ask him to be worthy of those high ideals which he has placed before us with such eloquence and, I believe, with such sincerity, and not to allow his leadership to be sullied and besmirched by the retention of this Act upon the statute book of Canada.

Now I pass to a more agreeable task—I would far rather be complimentary, Mr. Speaker, than denunciatory. It is, perhaps, presumptuous for me, a member of the same age as the member for Calgary (Mr. Redman) and the member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), to attempt to say anything about their remarks. But their speeches were of such high quality, so eloquent, and breathed such a true spirit of harmony and unity and proper national aspiration, that I must be allowed to give them a meed of praise. Their tone was admirable. Both asked for national harmony and national unity, and the member for Fort William and Rainy River, who showed that the Surgeon in Arms is as eloquent with his tongue as with his pen, told us, almost in the words of Abraham Lincoln, that a house divided against itself cannot stand. May I continue the quotation. Abraham Lincoln went on to say that this house shall not fall; it shall cease to be divided.

There are divergent influences among the Canadian people. There is a difference of faith; there is a difference, apparent rather than real, of economic interest, and there is a difference of tongue. All these differences lead to misunderstanding. The French have an expression: De tout comprendre est de tout pardonner—to understand everything is to forgive everything. What can we do to bring the nation together, to promote understanding?

As far as religious differences are concerned, the solution is very easy. We have only to put in the background everything that divides us and to put in the foreground everything that unites us. Although I come of Scotch Presbyterian parentage, I do not pretend to be a theologian, but I suppose some remnant of theology is in my blood, and I submit that the things upon which we are in accord are infinitely more important than the things upon which we differ. I, therefore, imagine that the way to get over the unfortunate differences which have existed between Roman Catholics and Protestants in the past is to think more of our common Christianity and less of the differences in our creeds which divide us. As far as our economic differences are concerned, those differences would be better got rid of by the application of the principle of liberty and freedom than by the application of the principle of restriction. As far as the language difficulty is concerned, why, it is no difficulty at all. I am very familiar with that part of the province of Quebec where French-speaking man and English-speaking man live side by side on neighbouring farms, and there is no difficulty. Why is there no difficulty? Because they understand each other. I remember once being called upon to visit a small place lying on the boundary between Quebec and Ontario. I went into a Scotch woman's house, the house of a Scottish Canadian. I was talking to her son, and he was not only bilingual, but trilingual. He spoke French and he spoke English, and he had the Gælic. I say this, Sir, that never have I come in contact with English-speaking people living right amongst French-speaking people but I have found that both not only respect but like each other. Why? Because they know each other. I would suggest, as one means of healing all breaches which may have existed in the past, in order that we may go on rejoicing to that future which I hope Providence has in store for us, that we English-speaking people should endeavour as far as possible to learn and have our children learn French, as the French-speaking people in this country learn and have their children learn English.

The statement is made that Labour is not altogether satisfied in this country. I agree with the Acting Prime Minister when he says—and he does honour to the workers of Canada when he says it,—that during the war there was less labour disturbance in Canada than in any other country in the world. But is the worker entitled to be dissatisfied as things have been in the past? I put this to you, Sir. Before the industrial revolution, when the man,—the journeyman and the apprentice,—worked side by side with his master, the man, as a general rule, had a modest sufficiency to eat and to wear, and he lived on a basis of more or less equality with his master. Then came the industrial revolution, and mankind harnessed the power of steam, and afterwards harnessed the power of electricity and he increased his power of creating wealth ten times, aye, I think, twenty times. But what resulted to the worker? The worker did not live with his master; he did not work side by side with his master; but he was depressed into a mere "hand," and the master became the great factory employer or great manufacturer. The worker, although by his skill, aided by electricity and steam, he was able to create twenty times the wealth that he did before, remained very little better off than he was before the industrial revolution began. That is to say he had a fair, but not an adequate sufficiency of clothing and of food; and before, by the force of trade-unionism, he raised his pay by combining against his master, he was not as well off as he was before the industrial revolution occurred. Now, the workman feels that he is living in a new world. The British workman, the French workman, the Canadian workman, each feels that his sacrifices on the field entitle him to expect that the world will be a better place for him to live in; that no longer will the great portion of the most arduous work in the world have to be performed for a bare pittance. I, for one, do not blame him. I, for one, want to see the workman get a greater proportion of the wealth which his labour has created. There will, in this connection, have to be co-operation, and I feel certain that members interested in this subject, as well on the Government side as on this side of the House, will be glad to study the Whiteley report in which is outlined the system of industrial councils in which men representing the masters and men representing the workers will sit for the purpose of a common management of the industries in which they are engaged.

The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Redman) spoke in somewhat severe terms of the Bolsheviks. The popular idea of a Bolshevik is a wild-eyed anarchist looting a bank. I am not sure whether the common view taken in this country of the Bolshevik is altogether correct. I think that perhaps there is another side to the question, and as this is the great forum where truth and exact knowledge should be brought before the people, I take the liberty of referring the House to some articles which are appearing in the Manchester Guardian from an eye-witness from Russia. I think the Manchester Guardian will be admitted by all to be one of the very great organs of public opinion in the old land. The writer of the articles which appear in the Manchester Guardian was, since the autumn of 1916, engaged in relief work under the auspices of the Society of Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee, and he spent a large portion of his time in Russia, learned the language completely, and has a great deal of interest to tell us. I believe that the House will be interested if I read a short extract from an article which appeared in the Guardian on the 22nd of January of this year. It is entitled "A Rural District under the Bolsheviks." The writer says:

> Of all the industrial and economic enterprises in the district none suffered less change than the Co-operative Society, which had been started before the war under the old regime, and which continued unchanged under the Provisional and Kerensky Governments, and enlarged its membership 500 per cent under the Bolsheviks. In the time I speak of the Co-operative Society had virtually become a monopoly, and had either put out of business or absorbed the small traders. It could get credit from the Soviet, was recognised by the railway officials as a Government department, and could undertake purchasing operations on a large scale and look to guarantee of transport. It had an organisation of sub-branches in nearly every village, and could distribute and sell its goods without having to get permits and licenses from the Soviet. The Government decided to purchase wheat and rye in Siberia for seed and consumption.

If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) is here, he will see that when he bought seed for distribution and consumption in the Northwest, he was acting just like a Bolshevik.

> —and naturally placed the order with the Co-operative Society. Purchase of medical requirements in Moscow for the numerous Soviet hospitals was done through the same channel, members of the Soviet often travelling with the buyers in order to guarantee good faith.
> The profits of the Co-operative Society, which were reduced to minimum, but which on the millions of roubles of turnover amounted to a considerable sum, were devoted to educational purposes. Evening classes were started in modern languages, geography, history, and the Russian language; in bookkeeping and business training; subsidies were granted for agricultural colleges and schools, and scholarships were founded for the gymnasia (secondary schools.)

The educational programme of the Bolsheviks was ambitious, but it was this ambitiousness which commended it to the people. The Bolsheviks aimed at starting a school in every village and increasing the number of gymnasia in the district and founding a university, but in this project they were stopped by lack of teachers.

The article goes on to say:

Under the stricter days of the old regime the Boy Scout movement was not permitted in Russia, but latterly was allowed a certain amount of liberty under police supervision. Under the Bolsheviks, however, it flourished, and troops were formed in many of the cities and department towns.

It will be interesting to those who live in the dry province of Ontario to know how the Bolsheviks dealt with the illicit liquor traffic:

The Russian public had not been accustomed to reliable law courts or a just police administration. Under the Bolsheviks, as under the Provisional and Kerensky Governments, the villages appointed their own police when necessary, choosing the oldest men as those most likely to have wisdom and discretion in human affairs. As an instance of this may be mentioned the way in which the old regime and the Bolsheviks dealt with illegal vodka distilling. In the days of the Imperial police anyone caught in the act was arrested by the police, but, as everyone knew, each offence had its price, except that of political propaganda, and a sum of money amounting maybe to several hundred or several thousand roubles, would settle the matter, and until the time of blackmail came round again the business could continue unmolested, however much the public might be against it. Under the Bolsheviks a man found distilling vodka would not be punished but his still would be taken from him, the public would be informed of his guilt, and the amount of grain which the food committee would allow him to buy would be limited to that needed for his own domestic use.

I am placing these facts before the House, not because I am here to defend the Bolsheviks, but because I think it is well to realize there may be two sides to every question, and we should not be carried off our feet in denunciation of other people before we really know what they are doing. As I understand it, Bolshevism is a form of socialistic government in which the lower classes—I should not use that expression because it is obnoxious in this country—in which the manual workers have assumed to take the whole control of the government to the exclusion of the intellectual and trading classes. I think that is morally wrong because it is government of the people by only part of the people, and I think it unwise because it eliminates from the government classes which might have a considerable contribution to offer. It has been suggested that Bolshevism must be put down. What is meant by that? Does it mean we are to send more men to Russia for the purpose of fighting? If that is so, I would say first of all that it is a course the wisdom of which is very doubtful. Outside interference may tend to solidify the people under the Bolsheviki, and perhaps in endeavouring to put down disorder we may possibly trample on liberty.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, the situation at the time of the French revolution. You will remember how the French revolutionaries were denounced, and properly so, not only for their excesses but for other things as well by the civilized countries of Europe. You will remember how kings banded themselves together for the purpose of putting down the French revolution and how the revolutionary spirit of France, the free spirit of old France, enabled the barefooted armies of the republic to conquer all their enemies, and they were not conquered until the first republic had become an Empire and until Napoleon had seized the reins of power and turned the enthusiasm of the French revolution into channels for his own imperialistic benefit. And therefore I say, we come to this: We have Canadian soldiers today fighting in Russia; we have sent Canadian soldiers to Siberia, where they are fighting. I do not propose at this moment to condemn the Government for sending them, but I say that the Government must at the earliest possible moment let the Canadian people know why Canadian boys have been sent there. Certain explanations which have been given do not explain. It has been suggested by some one that they are sent there for the purpose of promoting Canadian trade. I for one would rather that in all the future history of Canada we never sold a single mowing machine or any other article of manufacture or commerce there than that the blood of a single Canadian lad should be spilled in vain.

There is another matter in this connection which must be inquired into. It is a relatively small force that has been sent. I do not know whether my opinion is right or not, but I believe I am right in saying that this force was so small that it could have been recruited through the voluntary system. I believe I am right in saying that drafted men who expected to be sent to fight the enemies of civilization in France or Flanders have been sent off to the snows of Siberia to fight other men, who, it is a strong chance, are also fighting for freedom, but in their own way. Without fuller investigation, I shall say nothing further on that matter but this: It is the duty of the Canadian people in Parliament assembled to have the reasons for this expedition set before us as early as possible, and I say that it would have been proper and fitting before this expedition was sent at all that Parliament should have been convened in order that the people's representatives might have been consulted.

How are we to overcome the dissatisfaction and unrest in this country? First of all, let the Government, at the earliest possible moment, get rid of their Orders in Council. Let us re-establish parliamentary government at the earliest possible moment. Do hon. gentlemen on the Government side realize that the Canadian people, and in fact all people, are looking with a searching eye to representative government, to authority of all sorts, and the Government which will meet with their approval is a Government which will truly represent them. Constituted authority is on trial. They had an election in England recently, at which about fifty per cent of the people voted, and during that election, and I believe since, what has happened? They are having direct action in England. People are not looking to Parliament for redress as they did in days gone by, but are taking the law into their own hands. That is a very sad condition. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that some organization—I forget which, for the moment, but I think it was the Socialists—wished to hold a meeting in Albert Hall. At all events it was a meeting of an organization which did not please the owners of Albert Hall, and they cancelled the contract with the Socialists; they broke their agreement. Then what did the Union of Electrical Workers do? The representatives of that union went to the owners of Albert Hall and said, " Unless you keep your contract with our friends of such and such a union or Socialist organization and let them have the hall we will see to it that you have no electric light when you have the great Victory ball on such and such a night.

The owners of the hall thought it best to keep their word with the group to whom they had leased the hall. But that is a bad business. Those people were imposing their will, in a right cause, it is true, on that occasion, but that is direct action. That is the sort of thing we want to avoid. You know these orders in council have not increased the prestige of the Government in this country. My friends from the Maritime Provinces will agree with me when I say that a ship beating into harbour, especially a fore and aft ship, is a beautiful sight, as it beats in, tacking with the wind, taking advantage of every slant in the wind, by the action of the skilful helmsman. It is a grand sight to see it at first go-off on the starboard tack, and go round and get into the eye of the wind, and then go off on the port tack. But, Mr. Speaker, a man or a party proceeding to an objective in that manner is not a beautiful or dignified sight. What have we had? We have had orders in council galore. As a matter of fact, we have had so much information by way of orders in council, and such like, given us by the Government, that the Government felt that the old vehicle, the Official Gazette, was too small to enable them to do justice to the situation, and therefore we have at this time, when economy should be the slogan, the Canadian Official Record, a small paper, and strange to say it is exactly the shape of an American publication of the same sort, and it contains some priceless articles of information. They reproduce things which are already in the Canadian Official Gazette, and then they will tell us that Sir Robert Borden greatly enjoyed a nine-penny lunch that he had in England at such a time, or that James Jones, of Richmond, Que., has had his bakery establishment closed for three days for allowing two batches of dough to go bad and be wasted. That is the sort of thing the Canadian people are regaled with, in order to keep up their interest in the war.

I come now to the last subject of my remarks. I wish to speak concerning the matter to which the acting Premier referred when he concluded his eloquent remarks. He said he believed that a party government should be set aside for the time being in Canada, because he believed the problems which we had to face were so complex and so difficult. I agree with him that the problems are complex and difficult, and just because they are complex and difficult there are bound to be differences of opinion upon them, and if we are going to have good government in this country, we must have party government, if those who are at one on the principles along which the Government should proceed are in one party, and those who believe that the Government of the country should be carried on along other principles are in the other party. We have had a great dividing line between the two parties in Canada for more than a generation, and we have those who believe that the tariff of this country should be a low tariff, primarily intended for the purpose of raising a revenue, and we have those who believe that the tariff should be a machine for protecting the manufacturers and other interests in the country. There is room for differences of opinion. Honest men may be on both sides of the question, but I say that now, when we have returned to peace, cleavage in opinion is bound to arise. What is the situation in Canada to-day? We are face to face with an appalling debt and before the war we had pushed our urban railway development to such an extent—and here I will not ask you to decide with me, or discuss who is responsible for pushing it to that extent—that we had outstripped, I think, by a generation our rural development. We built railways, and several of those roads are bankrupt. We had last session to consider the taking over of the Canadian Northern railway, which was a tremendous liability on the back of the country, a railroad which will not carry itself for years to come, and, by the way, we had to spend $8,000,000 for the privilege of taking over that liability. We find to-day that the Grand Trunk Pacific is not paying its way, and that the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, the parent company does not want to implement its obligations in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific. We are face to face with this situation: that our financial and economic future is in danger unless we augment by fifty to one hundred per cent, the rural population of this country. That is the way to look at it. It is not a question altogether of high tariff or low tariff; to use an expression time and again given me by safe and sane men, "It is a condition and not a theory that confronts us." Now, how are we going to increase the rural population of this country? Good roads are a good thing, better schools are a good thing, and co-operative societies are a good thing; but what we need more than anything else is to give to the agriculturists of this country as advantageous conditions under which to operate as are given in any other part of the world, and notably in the United States. In order to do that, we must so arrange our tariff that what our agriculturists require to buy, they can buy at a reasonable price, because certainly, as far as our western agriculturist is concerned, he has to take the world's price for what he has to sell, and it is not fair that he should have to pay a quarter or a third, or in some cases almost half as much again, as the natural price for what he has to buy. I say that that is the first great argument in favour of the lowering of the tariff, and I do not think that, with all the best will in the world, the interests represented, and ably represented by gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, are prepared to go that far with me in regard to the tariff question. There is an issue between us, and there will be a healthier condition in Canadian public life when that issue is practically admitted. Then I say that protection is merely State aid given by a community to certain industries. You cannot tax yourself into prosperity any more than you can pull yourself up by your boot straps. It imposes a tremendous burden on the consuming public of this country, and that burden is a good deal greater than the amount of money which finds its way into the treasury. There are those in this country—and I think their number is increasing from day to day—who say that the tariff should be swept away altogether. Although I believe thoroughly in the principle of free exchange, I do not think that would be fair or wise. It would not be fair to invested capital, and it would not be wise, because a very moderate tariff should be retained as a means of collecting revenue, but a 42½ per cent tariff is not a means of increasing revenue. It is a means of keeping goods out of your country. I hope I shall not be accused of pro-Germanism in advocating the policy and practice of free exchange. I saw during the recess a speech made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) in which he said that if the war was on he would accuse those who advocated a lower tariff of pro-German feeling. It is somewhat difficult for me to follow the mental processes of the monopolists of this country because I had been taught that Great Britain was the great example of free trade and that Germany was one of the great protectionist countries of the world. Every protectionist government in the last war, with the exception of that of the United States, which had a vast internal area of free trade, had to have recourse to the necesssity of borrowing for the purpose of meeting its debts while Great Britain financed not only herself, not only her incomparable effort in the war on land and sea and in the air, but financed her Allies and her dependencies very largely through taxation raising from a quarter to a third of the amount spent on the war out of the pockets of her own people.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did not Great Britain borrow four billion dollars from the United States of America?

Mr. McMASTER: She did. She borrowed very heavily. I do not pretend for an instant that she did not have recourse to borrowing, but the main point is that Great Britain borrowed less and raised by taxation more than the other countries that have followed the protectionist practice. Why should the lamp shine in the window, why should the latch string be on the outside of the door, because we know that there are men in this House who differed from us on the question of how best to raise men for the Canadian army? They had the right to their opinion. We had the right to ours. I would, on this occasion, follow the generous example set by the leader of the Government who said in substance that where he differed from the late, lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier on public questions, he would leave it to history to decide, that we were too near events perhaps to arrive at a proper judgment. We will follow that example and we will leave to history to decide whether the way of raising an army advocated by gentlemen on that side or the way advocated by us was the proper and better way. But that day has passed. That question is settled, please God never again to be raised in our lifetime.

The great question before the Canadian people in this era of reconstruction is going to be the tariff. Some people say: Leave the tariff alone until we have reconstructed. What a ridiculous suggestion that is! Here is a house that has been blown down by a cyclone. Some people say that the house should be built of wood and others that it should be built of brick. Those who want to built it of wood say: Do not discuss the question of whether it shall be built of wood or brick until we have built it again of wood. That is the position of people who advocate that reconstruction should ante-date the decision of this question.

What is the attitude of the Liberal party on the question of the tariff? I know that an hon. member from Alberta and an hon. member from Manitoba were somewhat critical in their remarks upon the success which the Liberal party had achieved in reducing the tariff. I frankly admit that I wish that during the years from 1896 to 1911 we had reduced the tariff more. But you saw, Mr. Speaker, just as soon as the guiding hand of the Liberals was taken off the tariff how the duty was increased by 7½ per cent even in war times. We are just and fair, and, of course, as former Liberals, you cannot help being just and fair. You will also remember that there was a great reciprocity campaign. Some bird has whispered that the loss of some of those who were identified with the Liberal cause prior to 1911 was due to that reciprocity campaign of 1911. Be that as it may, you remember that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party went down to defeat on the issue of reciprocity in natural products with the United States. After all, my friends, if the Liberal party is not giving satisfaction in the direction you would like, there is no reason why you should hang back with the crowd that is going in the other direction altogether. This is the view of the tariff taken by the Liberal party and voted upon by every member of this House on the 23rd of May, 1917:

> That wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list.

I do not know whether trading in wheat with the United States is quite as disloyal a thing as it used to be because I understand that not so very long ago an Order in Council was passed allowing trade in wheat with the United States. But then, shortly after that, I think the millers will tell you, there was some sort of an embargo placed upon this trade which prevented the carrying out of that Order in Council.

> That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.

Of course, there will be the retort in some Unionist's mouth: We have put tractors on the free list. Yes, tractors have been put on the free list up to $1,400, but if you put the tractor on the free list, why did you not put the plough, which has to be pulled by the tractor, on the free list? How could you logically differentiate between the tractor and the plough? Surely it is not because it is only the comparatively well-off farmer who can afford to have a tractor while every poor fellow who goes on the land requires a plough? Surely that is not the reason? I do not believe it is. It is just due to that fact that I described before; there was just a little wind rising in the west and the helmsman took advantage of it to throw the boat's head a point or two to starboard. But, let me continue:

> That staple foods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and foods therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

That substantial reductions be made in the general tariff on all articles imported into Canada, except luxuries.

That the British Preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff.

I say to my separated brethren: Go to the Acting Prime Minister, who is also the Finance Minister, place the Hansard containing my few humble remarks before him and say to him: Now, Sir, are you willing to go as far as the Grits will go? Then govern yourselves accordingly. Do you remember that old story in ancient writ of how the prophets of Baal and Elijah worked together one day on Mount Carmel? You remember how Elijah said: "If Baal be the Lord serve him, and if Jehovah be the Lord serve Him." If your principles are for liberty and low tariff you know on which side of the House you should sit. If protection and high tariff be your God, then stay where you are.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member will not further transgress the rules of the House, but that hereafter he will address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): May I ask the hon. gentleman if he has the number of votes cast in that division, and if he can tell me how many members of the then Liberal party voted for that resolution?

Mr. McMASTER: I have not that information. I was not then a member of the House, but I am sure the information is within the knowledge of my hon. friend.

Just one other remark and I shall have finished: There are perhaps those who are exercised in their minds what they should do. Perhaps a feeling of loyalty—mistaken, I think—to an absent leader may have some effect upon them. To them, through you, Mr. Speaker, I address these words: Let it be not said of them, as was said of Lancelot by Tennyson:

> His honour rooted in dishonour stood,
> And faith, unfaithful, kept him falsely true.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Carvell the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Wednesday, February 26, 1919.

The House met at Two o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Militia Council for the year ended March 31, 1918.—Hon Major-General Mewburn.

Copies of General Orders, Appointments, Transfers and Promotions in the Canadian Militia promulgated between January 1, 1918, and February 1, 1919.—Hon. Major-General Mewburn.

Copies of all Routine Orders of the Canadian Expeditionary Force promulgated from January 2, 1918, to February 22, 1919.—Hon. Major-General Mewburn.

Report of the Minister of Public Works for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Carvell.

Dispatch from the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies to His Excellency the Governor-General transmitting copies of a parliamentary paper containing extracts from the minutes of proceedings of the Imperial War Conference, 1918, and papers laid before the Conference.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Report of the Postmaster General for the year ended March 31, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Appropriation Account, 1917-18, Royal North West Mounted Police.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Orders in Council with reference to the work of the Director and Associate Director of Public Information.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Fifty-first Annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

Statement of Harbour Dues collected during the fiscal year 1917-18.—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

Statement of leases of wharves, piers and breakwaters under the control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

Statement of fees received on account of Sick Mariners' Fund during the fiscal year 1917-18.—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

Orders in Council passed on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce since the last session of Parliament.—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

Copy of an Order in Council dated the 14th August, 1918, passed under the provisions of the War Measures Act, 1914, relative to the certificates of Masters and Mates—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS AND JOURNALS.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That a Special Committee composed of Messrs. Pardee, Nickle, Lemieux, and Currie be appointed to consider and report upon the question of systematizing the work of compiling the Votes and Proceedings and Journals of the House of Commons with a view to economy.

He said: A committee was appointed last session to consider and report upon this subject. Not having had time to consider the question fully, it reported on the 21st of March, 1918, and recommended that during the recess the Chief Clerk of the Journals Branch should work out the details in connection with the subject. This has been done, and it is now proposed to appoint this committee immediately to consider the question again and to report at its earliest convenience in order that the change, if approved, may be carried out without delay.

Motion agreed to.

SAINT JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to authorize a further extension of time for the completion of the Saint John and Quebec Railway between Gagetown and Westfield.

Mr. McKENZIE: Explain.

Hon. Mr. REID: It is simply to extend the time for completion until the end of the present year. The time expired in December last.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are the operations proceeding now?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, the work of construction has been going along. Not much is being done, of course, in the winter, but the work will be completed during the present year.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Tuesday, February 25.

Hon. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I first want to congratulate the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne (Mr. Redman) and the seconder (Mr. Manion) on the manner in which they fulfilled their duties yesterday, and in doing so I assure them that this is no perfunctory compliment. I felt that rarely in my somewhat lengthy experience in this House have I heard the mover and the seconder of this motion take such lofty grounds or grasp as intimately as they did the great problems confronting the country.

After all, the greatest problem which this country has ever faced—I assume that the same is true of all those nations of the civilized world which have been engaged in the great war—is that of getting back from a war basis to a peace basis. One would be surprised if he could sit at the Council table and listen to the demands and complaints and suggestions that are coming in every day from every part of the country, due entirely to the condition in which we find ourselves on account of the war and on account of its having terminated much sooner than most people anticipated. Fortunately, the Government—and when I say "the Government" I mean the country, because the people must do their part as well as the Government—were in a fairly good position to get back to peace. Probably no warring nation outside of the United States was in a better position than that in which Canada found herself on the cessation of hostilities—I am even somewhat doubtful that the United States were in a better position than we were at the close of the war.

But very great problems must be faced and very great difficulties must be overcome in getting this country back to a peace basis. In my judgment, it will be years before we get back, if we ever do, to exactly the same conditions as existed before the war. One hundred years ago, when the great European war of that period was brought to a close, no doubt things looked blacker to the people than they look to us to-day, although the financial obligations of the nations of the world were then as nothing compared with what they are now. The war which has just ended has been the greatest medium for the expenditure of moneys that the world has ever known and probably ever will know—we all hope so, anyway. The world, therefore, has a different problem to solve from that which faced it a hundred years ago. But in the peoples of the world there is a wonderful amount of vivacity, a wonderful amount of recuperation, and just as the people of old overcame their difficulties, so shall we, in the course of a few years, overcome ours and get along just as well as we got along before the war. The only thing I want to talk about to-day, therefore, is what is involved in our getting back from a war basis to a peace basis.

It is idle for any one to say that abnormal conditions do not exist throughout the country. We hear it said that the wounded or disabled soldier who returns from the battlefields is in an abnormal condition but while that may be true, he is not alone. There are just as many other abnormal people and I think a good many more in Canada to-day as there are amongst returned soldiers. An abnormal condition exists in the minds of a very great body of the people of Canada. It is called by various names, varying, I presume, to some extent according to the degree to which they are abnormal.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not in the Government, though.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no, not in the Government—I am speaking now about the rest of the people. Just here in passing, while I do not know that this has much to do with the Address, may I say that I was somewhat surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) last evening in discussing certain matters, because I may say he and I are not very far apart on many of the subjects discussed by him. I wish to refer to this statement that the popular and erroneous idea of a Bolshevik is a wild-eyed anarchist looting a bank. Well, if he had gone a little further and said that a Bolshevik was a wild-eyed anarchist looting a bank, shooting down all the Bourgeois or property owners in the country and carrying off their wives and children, he would have come nearer to the definition of a Bolshevik than he did. He says that this parliament is the great forum where truth and exact knowledge should be brought before the people. He gave us very frankly the Manchester Guardian as the source of information from which he derived somewhat lenient definition of a Bolshevik. I can only say that is not the information which I have, and I think there are very few people who have any personal knowledge of the Russian situation to-day who will agree with the definition of the Manchester Guardian. During the last month we have had before the Government people who have been in Russia, who have lived there since the revolution, who know the condition of affairs, and they give us a very different idea from that given by the correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, from which my hon. friend quoted yesterday evening. The conditions which are depicted to us as existing in Russia are such that, in my judgment, Russia is a proper place to keep the Bolsheviks in for some years to come, and the only thing that worries me is how soon we can get some of their ilk back to their fatherland, where they may enjoy some of the benefits of the new civilization set up by Lenine and Trotzky, men who, the moment they attained power in Russia, did not hesitate to turn their backs upon the Allies, upon the great civilized nations that had been trying to save Russia from the barbarism of Germany, and upon the civilized nations which had furnished the people of Russia with war material and had put them, in the spring of 1917, in a position to have carried this war on as they never were in a position before and, I believe, to have brought the war to a close in the summer of 1917 if Lenine and Trotzky had not proved traitors to the Allies. If those be the men whose ideals we should follow, then I shall part company with my hon. friend so far as that is concerned. But I am sorry to say that we have, in a very large degree amongst certain classes of people in Canada, a state of unrest—I do not call it Bolshevism, but I believe if such people were in Russia, they would go further than they dare go in Canada—and it is to meet this condition of unrest that the Government has, since the armistice was signed, been bending its energies. And, we intend bending our energies in this direction as long as it is necessary, in order to do everything which we can reasonably do to get Canada back to its normal condition.

The speech from the Throne has told in a general way what are the proposals of the Government. The Acting Prime Minister yesterday referred to a good many of the measures which are being put forward by the Government as a means of meeting this condition of unrest. He referred to the tremendous amounts of money which th Government purposes asking Parliament to vote in order that it may be expended upon railways, highways, and certain other public undertakings, but he did not refer to one great expenditure, which is to be incurred, in the building of ships. As the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), in whose department this is, is not here,—and we shall all be glad, I am sure, when his health enables him to return to the House—I may be pardoned for referring to it. The Government is spending a large amount of money this year—I am not sure as to the exact amount, but I imagine it must be twenty or twenty-five million dollars—and it expects to spend about thirty million dollars during the next fiscal year in the construction of steel ships in Canada. I know there will be criticism of this; at least, I assume there will during the session, because criticism has already been launched in the public press, and, so far as I am concerned, I want to meet it here and to give my views very plainly. It is always a very easy matter to be wise after the event. A year ago there was nothing which the civilized world needed so much as shipping. A year ago shipping was more vital to winning the war than were men or shells or anything else. The greatest cry of the allied armies a year ago was for ships, ships to carry American soldiers across the ocean and ships to carry food to the allied armies. The Canadian Government decided to undertake a shipbuilding programme which involved the construction of fifty-two ships varying in size from 3,500 tons dead weight to 10,000 tons dead weight. Some of those have already been completed and are in service. I do not deny—I do not for a moment try to conceal the fact that those ships are going to cost more than they would have, had the Government gone out into the open market after peace was declared and bought the ships. But buying the ships after peace was declared would not have helped furnish ships in order to carry on the war; and if the war had continued, as most people expected it would, over another winter and another summer, two-thirds or at least one half of those ships would have been at the service of the country. Even to-day, while we admit that the war is over and the crying necessity for those ships has ceased to exist, the construction of those ships plays an important part in many portions of Canada in furnishing labour to the unemployed, a task which I look upon as the paramount duty of this Government and of the government of every province and every municipality at the present time. So far as I am concerned, —and I can speak for my colleagues, so far as we are concerned collectively,—in the allocation of the public moneys we have taken into consideration practically altogether the probable requirements to take care of unemployment in the labour world generally rather than the advantage which a particular work or expenditure of money will be to the people in the vicinity in which the work is done or the money expended. That has been the underlying principle in the making up of the estimates. The ships are being built to-day at Montreal, at Toronto, at the head of the Great Lakes, at Port Arthur and Fort William, and at Vancouver and Victoria. Were those works not going on in those localities, especially on the Pacific coast, you would find a very different condition of affairs from what exists to-day. I, therefore, make no apology. No apology is required. I am simply pointing out that we are doing this in order to try to meet the pressing requirements of the moment and to place the country in a position to get back to a peace basis.

The Acting Prime Minister referred to another matter to which I desire to give a small amount of consideration, and in doing so to give it my heartiest endorsation. I refer to the highway policy which will be laid before the House by the Minister of Railways and Canals. I fear that my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) had not carefully read the resolution which is on the Order Paper before making his remarks yesterday evening. I remember quite well a former occasion when a proposal was made in this House to grant assistance for the building of highways, and my hon. friend was quite justified in the reference he made to some of his former colleagues, but if he will read over the resolution which is on the Order Paper to-day and was there yesterday, if I mistake not, I think he will come to the conclusion that it is as fair a proposal as could be put forward. In case he has not read it, I want to state to this House, and I hope it will get to the country, that the proposal put forward by the Government is that during the next five years the Government of Canada shall grant to the several provinces the sum of twenty million dollars for the purpose of building practically permanent highways, at the rate of four million dollars per year. The money will be expended by the provinces in the way suggested by the leader of the Opposition last night, namely, by their organizations and through their officials, but before any of the money can be expended an agreement must be entered into between the Federal Government and the Provincial Governments setting forth the character of the road to be constructed and giving a general description, specifications, and practically the location of the road, although I believe the word "location" is not included in the resolution. The word "description", however, is included and before a dollar can be expended the location of the road, its character and description, and the specifications, must be agreed upon, and after that has been done the road must be built under the inspection of engineers of the Federal Government as well as of the Provincial Government. All these safeguards must be carried out before the money is payable, and when they have been carried out I have no fear whatever there will be anything but an honest expenditure of the public money. The money will be spent on the roads on which it should be spent, not on by-ways by any means, but on highways —the great arteries of the country— and I know of no other manner in which public money could be better expended during this reconstruction period. I need not argue the necessity of good highways, for there is hardly a man in this country to-day who has business to do or who seeks pleasure who is not aware of their necessity.

Reference was made yesterday to the highways in the state of New York and other states of the Union. I do not know that we can hope to reach the degree of excellence of their roads within the next five years, but we can do something towards it. I had the pleasure last year of travelling over a part of the highway in the province of Quebec constructed by the Provincial Government in recent years, and I can only say that if we extend that class of highway through every province in Canada we shall have accomplished wonders. My hon. friend had evidently not read the resolution, because he did not seem to realize the method of distribution. He is right in saying there are only two possible methods. One would be on the mileage basis, and the other on the population basis. Both of these methods were considered, and it was decided to distribute the money on the basis of population, but in view of the tremendous proportion of the population of this country located in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario it was thought unfair to the smaller provinces— and I use the word simply with reference to their population—to make the distribution simply on that basis, and therefore we have set aside eighty thousand dollars per year for each province, large and small alike. In this way about twenty per cent, or $720,000, of the four million dollars per year will be appropriated, and the balance is to be divided among the provinces according to the last Dominion census; that is to say, according to the census of 1911 for the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, and according to the census of 1916 for the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to figure it out, I think they will find the Government proposal to be absolutely fair, and it ought to satisfy everybody. I only hope that every province in this Dominion will take early advantage of the proposal, not only for the benefit to themselves, but because this work will provide a tremendous amount of employment for the unemployed in different portions of Canada, and that, after all, is a matter of very great importance.

I have been talking about other departments, and it would be a very logical question for some one to ask, "What is your department going to do?" That is a question which, in view of the tremendous number of inquiries which have been put to me in the last three months, I think I ought to answer. I am afraid when the Estimates are brought down, as they will be at the close of this debate, there may be some minor disappointments in the minds of members and greater disappointment in the minds of municipal bodies and different organizations in Canada who have been looking forward to the construction of public works throughout the country to a very large extent during the coming financial year.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the Public Works Department is concerned I am adhering strictly to the principle which I laid down some few minutes ago, namely, that we are not constructing public works simply because they would be a good thing for the community, but we are constructing them primarily because they will provide employment for the unemployed, although of course they will also be of economic value. We are going to start work in the large centres, where we know unemployment now exists, at the earliest possible moment. We intend to start the construction of public buildings in the cities of Montreal, Toronto, Calgary, and probably Hamilton, within the next ten or fifteen days. I said "probably" with regard to Hamilton, because we may not be able to make just as early a start there as in the other places, but there will be only a few days difference.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Where is Hamilton?

Mr. CARVELL: Somewhere on lake Ontario, I believe. I am also going to take the responsibility of starting these works before the money has been voted by Parliament, because I believe Parliament will concur in our views and vote the money in order that we may relieve a certain amount of the unemployment that already exists in the large centres. It is the duty of the Government to relieve that unemployment as far as possible.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will these works be constructed by the Government, or by tender and contract?

Mr. CARVELL: By tender and contract, most certainly. Perhaps I should qualify that statement to this extent: there may be some buildings which will have to be torn down to clear the site for the new ones. That work possibly might be done by the Government, but it would only be a small proportion of the work to be done, and so far as the main works are concerned that will be done by tender and contract.

Mr. ROSS: What is the nature of these buildings?

Mr. CARVELL: In Montreal, an extension to the Custom House. One-half of the Custom House there was built some years ago and the foundation prepared for the other half, we are now going to complete the building. In Toronto the building will be—I don't like to use the word "Custom House," as I do not like the term—but it will be a general Federal building which will include the Custom House, and the same may be said of the building at Hamilton. In Calgary, the building will be for a post office primarily, but it too will be a Federal building to be used for Federal offices like the buildings in the other cities. Not only will these particular works provide employment, but the buildings are actually required to house the public servants in the cities I have mentioned. I wish I had sufficient money to erect buildings of this class in every large city, because one of the things that has surprised me greatly since I took charge of this department has been the rentals we are compelled to pay for offices for public services in different parts of the country. The rentals are simply tremendous. It would be a good business proposition, if we had the capital, to erect buildings in very many cases other than those I have referred to this afternoon. In the other branch of the Public Works Department, the Engineering branch, we are doing repair work and maintaining the works. There were some places, particularly down in the lower St. Lawrence, where tremendous damage was done by storms last year. In such cases repairs must be made, but I may as well tell the House that we are not putting in new works of a very extensive character. simply because we believe we can expend the money on other work, such as highways, railways and canals. shipbuilding and such things as these which will produce better results and give more employment. Yet I think that hon. gentlemen will see from the estimate I have given that due regard has been had to maintaining the public service. If hon. members will consider the statement made by the Acting Prime Minister yesterday as well as the statement made by myself to-day, they will perceive that we are launching on a programme which involves the expenditure of a tremendous amount of money. We are asking Parliament to commit this country to $20,000,000 for roads during the next five years. We are asking also for $25.000,000 to be spent on the housing programme to which I have not referred, and to which not much reference has been made. This programme means, so far as we are concerned, only loaning the money to the provinces at 5 per cent. We are pledging the credit of Canada in order that the provinces may be able to carry out this much-needed work. I do not know that the time has arrived in all parts of Canada when it is necessary that a public body should go into an extensive housing scheme, but there are, without any question whatever, conditions existing in some of the big cities which must be ameliorated. Perhaps unsanitary and improper housing conditions are the greatest breeders of unrest and anarchy which can exist in any country, and I think there are places in all Canada where conditions of this kind exist to a greater extent than they should. If the Dominion, the provinces and municipalities can do anything in these troublous times to put the people in better living conditions, they will be doing a wonderful work to make them happy and prosperous, and people cannot be happy unless they are fairly prosperous. But it means an expenditure of probably $25,000,000, which sum the Government must provide during the next three or four years for this housing scheme. In addition, there is the educational scheme which has been referred to by other speakers, involving a very large amount of money. My hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister yesterday afternoon referred to the tremendous sums we propose expending on railways during the coming year. I did not figure that up. I thought I had a citation of it before me, but it must amount to $70,000,000 or $80,000,000. It is so big that a matter of $10,000,000 does not matter much one way or the other.

Mr. ETHIER: Is an amount for the construction of the Georgian Bay canal included in the programme?

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is not on the programme for the present year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is there any provision made for the construction of branch railways in Nova Scotia?

Mr. CARVELL: I think not. I would not be positive about that however. I am speaking from memory, and did not expect to be asked about this railway question particularly. There is provision, as I recollect it, of about $10,000,000 for the construction of branch lines in the West. I think that this expenditure for the West will be pretty well confined to lines already partially constructed. Many of these lines have been graded and are only waiting for the steel. In general terms, the idea is to extend those lines already under construction, but, in addition, very large sums are to be expended on betterments over the whole Government system. This will distribute the money all over the country and will provide employment. After all, provision of employment is the great problem which we have to face in Canada to-day.

Having gone over some of the methods by which we propose to spend money, I do not know that I would be out of place if I touched upon the financial situation of the country, although not in the way of a budget speech. I was somewhat impressed by the speech of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) last evening, when he said we ought to take stock, and see where we stand. I think that is a very good suggestion. I think the country and this Parliament could very well afford to take stock and learn our exact position. Mr. Speaker, we have been going through the greatest eruption the world has ever known. Canada has accomplished, in the way of providing an army, what would have been thought an absolute impossibility had anybody suggested it four and a half years ago. If any hon. gentleman had stated in this House in the session of 1914 that armies of half a million men could be raised in Canada in four years he would have been looked upon as a lunatic. Yet it has been done, and it could only have been done by lavish expenditure of money. Therefore, if our public debt has gone beyond anything we ever dreamed of, it is because it had to go; as long as the war was on there was no use in arguing, the money had to be provided. It has been provided. And remember another thing, Mr. Speaker, you cannot carry on any war without wasting money, because war is all waste; money has to be wasted. However, having gone through the war, and I am happy to say having gone through it successfully—I am talking now about the business affairs of the country and not speaking of the war particularly—I think it behooves us as business men to take stock, and see where we stand. I am making these statements first for the careful consideration of the members of the House of Commons, and, secondly, I hope, for the careful consideration of the public at large. If there is one thing that has impressed me more than another since the signing of the armistice in November last, it has been the tremendous demand made upon my department and the Government generally for the expenditure of public money. I wondered at first what it meant, and, even to-day, I am not able to comprehend its meaning, but, having analysed it to the best of my ability, I think probably the war has had something to do with it. You must remember, Mr. Speaker, that for four years the great businesses of this country have been carried on from an entirely different standpoint from that existing before the war. Formerly men had to look after their own business, do their own buying, do their own manufacturing, look out for trade markets, and do their own collecting. But the war came on, and we had the Munitions Board and other Government activities, and the great majority of the banking business of the country has been carried on by the Government. This Government furnished the funds, the manufacturer furnished the goods, handed them over and got his cheque. The manufacturer, the farmer, the fisherman, the producer of all kinds of wealth simply furnished the goods, the Government paid him for them and he got it into his head that this was going to go on forever. He comes along and says: What is the trouble; we are not getting the orders that we got last year; why are these cheques not coming along as usual?

That is the only reason I can give for these tremendous demands which have been made upon the Government for money. We were asked almost to assume the role of commercial travellers as soon as the armistice was signed. It was believed that it was the duty of the Government to go to Europe, to Siberia, and all over the civilized world and get business. We are doing the best we can. We are not getting as much business as the business men of Canada would like us to get, and I might, perhaps, say that if the business men of Canada would do a little more for themselves than they are doing they might get a little more business than they are getting. The time must come when the Government must cease acting as a foster father to the business institutions of the country.

We realize that it will be our duty for the next five or six months, or possibly a year, to do all we can to secure business for the country and we are doing that. But it is not as easy to get business on the other side of the Atlantic as we thought it would be. We thought that all we would have to do would be to go over and say: We have a million feet of lumber to sell; who will give us the most for it? The trouble is not that Europe would not like to buy our lumber and the other produce that we have, but they have not got the money to pay for it. That is the real difficulty. As my hon. friend the Finance Minister stated yesterday, we are compelled to furnish credits: that is, we have to put up money in Canada to buy the goods from our own people, then turn around and sell them to foreign countries and take our chance of getting the money back. We will get it back in time, but it means a heavy financial burden that the Government has to carry.

Now, to come down to the more local conditions, to the demands for public works; I do not know how many millions of dollars I have been requested to spend in the last three months, but I think I would be safe in saying that it would run from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000. That is impossible under present conditions unless the Government and Parliament—because it gets back to Parliament in the end—want to lay down the policy of going out into the markets of the world and borrowing money for the purpose of expending it upon public works of a local character. If Parliament wants to accept that policy, the Government is here to carry out its directions.

But, before we launch upon that policy, I want to make my position clear because I believe it is my duty to lay before the country the condition of affairs as it exists at the present time. I have shown you how our debt has gone up, due to causes over which we had no control. I do not know exactly what the public debt is at the present time but I have no hesitation in saying that when this war is over and when the accounts are all paid and the balances are all struck—because you must remember we have been furnishing a very large amount of money for the British Government in Canada to be used in buying supplies and munitions and the British Government have been paying our troops and furnishing them with supplies and munitions on the other side of the water and this is a question of accounting—I do not think I will be very far astray when I say that our public debt will be $2,000,000,000. Two billion dollars is a tremendous amount of money for a country like Canada and yet an amount of money which we can pay without any trouble, or upon which we can pay the interest, if we do not lose our heads and if we exercise business methods in carrying on the affairs of the country. I am not staggered; I am not surprised at the size of the amount. I am only pointing out that it is there. If I am anywhere near right in my figures this is going to mean to Canada an annual expense of about $110,000,000. Before the war, the interest on the public debt was only $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 and that was something that nobody ever thought about. It played no important part in our financial arrangements and if the Government, or Parliament, wanted to spend $1,000,000 or $2,000,000, or $5,000,000, or $10,000,000, on a public work, they could do so as far as the public debt was concerned. But here you have to face a very substantial sum and I do not think I am far astray when I say that it will mean an annual charge of $110,000,000. That is going to go on as long as you and I are on the earth and probably longer. I do not know whether I am right or wrong in my estimate but I think I am right when I say that pensions will eventually cost $50,000,000 a year. They are going to cost at least $30,000,000 during the present fiscal year and there are to-day in France and England over 20,000 sick and wounded Canadian soldiers who have not even yet been brought home. When those 20,000 men come home a very great proportion of them will be entitled to pensions and no matter what other services in this country are pinched, no matter what other services are going to be pared, pensions cannot be cut down. The men who stood between us and the extinction of our civilization are entitled to fair treatment at the hands of the people of Canada no matter what differences of opinion there may be as to the scale of the pensions. There will be fault found by individual persons because the scale is not high enough. These things will continue but at least the policy as laid down with regard to pensions must be carried out and I do not believe that it will be a dollar less than $50,000,000 a year for years to come.

There is another new source of expenditure in connection with the war, and I am only dealing with war expenditures, which perhaps the people have not commenced to realize. I am sure my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) did not commence to realize it when he yesterday referred in the way he did to the Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment Department. After pensions it is the greatest problem which the people of Canada have to face in so far as the soldier is concerned. I do not know but that it is even a greater problem than that of pensions. A pension goes to a man who is able to look out for himself. He takes his pension and uses it as part of his living expenses. But, we have, unfortunately, thousands of brave men who have been wounded, who have been sickened, who have been gassed, who come back not able to take care of themselves, not able to live even on their pensions and who must be taken care of by the State. The Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment Department has been created for the purpose of taking care of these men, if they are sick and trying to give them some sort of technical education in the hope of enabling them to take care of themselves and, in a general way, acting as a sort of godfather to the whole body of invalided soldiers. It is going to cost next year $25,000,000 to take care of the work of this one department. The amount will probably be a decreasing sum. I believe that as time goes on it will take less money every year but it will go on for the next forty or fifty years because just so long as there is a returned soldier who requires medical treatment just so long must the people of this country provide ways and means by which that man can receive such treatment. Under the regulations as they exist to-day, no matter whether it be this year, or next year, or twenty-five years from now, every soldier who is sick, whether as a result of his war activities or not, is going to have the right to go to these institutions and receive medical and professional treatment. Therefore, these institutions must be kept up.

Now I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, only three items of expenditure which we must face as a result of our war activities, and they amount to the sum of $185,000,000. Think of it, $185,000,000, which we did not have to pay four and a half or five years ago—or perhaps I should say $175,000,000, because there are about ten or eleven millions of dollars of interest included in this estimates—of absolutely new expenditure which we must face. On taking the other side of the account and looking at our income—and I am only going to give you a few of the big items,—I am not enumerating these figures for the purpose of discussing the financial situation from any standpoint except to throw out to the people some ideas which will perhaps set them thinking along these lines and therefore I may not be absolutely correct in my figures—I will state now the receipts from three sources: Customs, Excise, and Income and Business Profits Tax. Customs this year will yield about $140,000,000. I may be two or three million dollars astray, but I am not very far out of the way, and I believe that the Customs receipts this year are bigger than they will be next year. I want it to be remembered that I am not now discussing the fiscal situation of the country in any shape whatever—I am keeping away from that, another opportunity will probably be afforded before next July when these matters can be debated—I am just taking the fact that the buying powers of the people of Canada are greater at the present time than they have ever been in the past, and greater than they will be in the future for some years to come. We have imported more goods than we shall import in the future, and in addition to that everything costs from fifty to one hundred per cent more to-day than it did in the past. Therefore I think when I state the customs receipts as $140,000,000, I am giving you almost the top notch figures which we may expect to receive from this source, and I will be very much surprised if during the next few years they are not very materially reduced from that amount. The receipts from excise during this year will probably run up to $25,000,000. They may go a million or two above that sum, because it is pretty hard to estimate absolutely accurately the receipts from this source, but I think I am not very far from the mark when I place the receipts at the sum mentioned. The receipts from Income and Business Profits Tax I place at $30,000,000, and I think that is as high as we can possibly go. Now, Mr. Speaker, I see no way of increasing these three principal sources of revenue to any very great extent. No doubt the Income Tax can, and will be, increased. I agree with what my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) said with respect to this tax. Like him, I too will have to write a cheque for Income Tax. Like him also, I am glad it is as small as it is, and yet for the country's sake I wish it were four or five times as great.

I am a firm believer in the Income Tax; in fact I am one of those who believe that the scope of this tax should be very largely extended. I believe the scope of this tax should be extended upward and downward so that it might take in practically every man and woman who earns income in this country. I do not mean to say that the Income Tax should be made so great as to become absolutely burdensome; but I would like to see every man who earns $1,000 paying an Income Tax—not a very big tax, but enough to cause him to realize that he is helping to pay the taxes of this country. I know of nothing that will conduce to better government, and the more honest administration of public affairs, than the fact that the common people realize they are paying a straight tax into the coffers of the Government. However, that is only a statement by the way, in speaking as I do I am only giving my own personal views. I do not believe that the revenue from the Business Profits and Income Tax, while it probably can exceed the figures I have mentioned, will do so to any very great extent. Possibly I may be pardoned here, even though the present debate may not relate to the Budget, in stating that I see very grave difficulty in continuing the Business Profits Tax. That tax was all right during war time, but in peace time—I am only giving my own individual views, and not in any way speaking for the Government—it is an improper method of taxation to apply. During war time men make tremendous profits, and should hand back a portion of those profits to the Government. But upon the restoration of peace, I have some doubt whether industry will flourish, whether men will invest their capital to any great extent in the carrying on of business if they see that a very great proportion of their profits is going to be taken away from them in the shape of taxation. Therefore Parliament will have to consider very carefully this question of Business Profits Tax. The question of Income Tax should also be considered very carefully; but be that as it may, the amount of money which we can obtain from these sources is somewhat limited. The three items which I have already given you as representing our three chief sources of income during the present fiscal year are practically accurate, and it is therefore apparent that the moneys which we must pay out each year for many years to come amount to almost as much as the total revenue from the three principal sources referred to. In addition, the affairs of the country must be carried on. All the different departments of the Government must be maintained. The militia, whatever there may be of it, must be carried on. The Naval Department, whatever there may be of it, must be carried on. The railways must be carried on, and from present indications it is going to take some money to maintain and operate those railways in Canada during the next ten years. The public works of the country must be carried on—all the activities of life, in so far as the Government of Canada is concerned, must be carried on; and I want to tell the House, Mr. Speaker, that this cannot be done for less than $125,000,000.

I have shown you that practically the whole liquid revenue of this country will be taken up with the debts, or with demands, directly due to the war. The question then arises which every business man must ask himself—where is the other $100,000,000 to come from? That is the question which I want the people of this country to ask themselves when they demand the expenditure of public moneys because in their opinion it would be a splendid thing to have that money spent in their respective communities. That is put up to me in my own province, it has been put up to me from every province in Canada, and I know it has been put up to every member of this House. There is no question about that, I have the evidence so far as a great many of these demands are concerned. Demands of this character are put up to members of Parliament. Their constituents come to them and say: "We must have a building here, we must have a wharf there, we must have a breakwater somewhere else." I want the people of this country to realize the situation, and I want them to ask themselves the question, "Where is this extra $125,000,000 a year coming from?" If they make satisfactory answer to that question I am prepared to go on and build public works for them. No man who ever occupied the position of Minister of Public Works would like any better than I would to do so, I wish I could build ten times as much as I am building; but I try to look upon governmental affairs as a business proposition; and when I cannot see in sight the money with which to carry out these public works I am compelled to ask myself: Am I justified in going out into the money markets of the world and borrowing money for this purpose, or am I not? That is the question which members of this House must ask themselves, and that is the question which the people of Canada must ask themselves and answer before, as a matter of policy, the Government can reach a satisfactory conclusion on the question.

Now, I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will not consider that I am a pessimist because I have given to the House some little indication of the financial position of this country, because, as a matter of fact, I am not. An hon. gentleman behind me makes the observation that he has heard more cheerful speeches. I want to state, Mr. Speaker, that when I started to make these few remarks I resolved that I would not be an optimist. For that reason I have made the remarks I have this afternoon. I wanted to set hon. gentlemen like my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) thinking. He usually does some thinking, and I hope before this debate is concluded we shall hear some of his thoughts; I am sure he will give us thoughts along good business and economic lines. However, if anybody conceives the idea from the remarks which have fallen from me this afternoon that this country is bankrupt, that it cannot pay its liabilities and cannot go and borrow money if it wishes to, such an impression is wrong. We are in nothing like the condition of European countries. I read in the newspapers—I think it was yesterday morning—that there is very serious talk of repudiation of public debt in Europe.

I hope it is not true, but we see it in the newspapers. There seems to be no doubt whatever that Germany will repudiate her public debt. Personally, I hope that she will repudiate it for about fifty years, until she has paid a proper indemnity to the rest of the civilized world. I am not worrying at all about the repudiation of the public debt of Germany or of Austria. But a very serious condition exists in Great Britain. They have a debt which is so large that one sometimes wonders how they can pay it; but I believe that they can. I am happy to say that Canada is in a different position. Our debt is large, but with our tremendously valuable natural resources and with the possibility of obtaining immigration after things settle down, we shall be all right. We want immigration if we can get the right kind. Those who come to this country must be hand-picked, I admit, but we want immigration; we want to settle our vast fertile areas in the Northwest. When I was in that country last September and October I was amazed at the amount of land that is not being cultivated. I had been there before, but I had never realized the extent of it. There are chances enough out there to double, treble and quadruple the present output of the country, and with that wonderful heritage at our hand I see no difficulty whatever in getting more immigration.

I went over the Transcontinental last year, and I saw people taking up the forest land in the province of Quebec and hewing out homes for themselves in the wilderness! I found the same thing in the northern part of New Brunswick. When I was in British Columbia I visited the copper mines, and found them to be simply marvellous. When we consider the resources of our country, a man would be out of his mind to insinuate for a moment that we cannot pay our debt, and at the same time carry on the public services. But we have to adopt cautious business methods in order to tide ourselves over the next four or five years. We have to consider all our expenditures. This year we are expending money, which, we admit, is borrowed money—borrowed, it is true, from the people of Canada, but borrowed just the same—money which must be repaid, principal and interest. But the expenditure has to be made; therefore I am not halting a moment in proposing the expenditure which we are asking Parliament to vote us for the present year. But I am asking the House to look carefully into the condition of affairs before the coming financial year is over, with a view to seeing what we are going to do in the future, and to look carefully and from a business standpoint into the question where we are going to get the extra $100,000,000 of revenue which we shall require after this fiscal year.

I believe that Canada will go through the reconstruction period in better condition than any other of the warring nations except the United States, and possibly we shall be in as good a position as that country. We have some unemployment, but, I am happy to say, not very much. When all the works which the Government of Canada is proposing and will propose in the Estimates to be brought down in a few days, as well as the works which are foreshadowed in the speech from the Throne, are carried out; when the provinces and the municipalities do their share, and when the manufacturers and employers of labour do their duty, we shall make some progress. I think that here I ought to say what I have said in public on two or three occasions. Hundreds of firms in Canada have grown rich through carrying on war business, and it is their duty to employ every man they possibly can employ during the reconstruction period, whether they make profits or not. I do not say that they should do that to the extent of losing their capital, but if they do no more than break even, it is their duty to keep on employing men, to assist in avoiding unemployment throughout the country. The watchword of the governments, federal and provincial, and municipal; of business men, farmers, and all who can employ labour during the next year or two, ought to be, keep unemployment out of the country if you possibly can. If we keep every man employed who ought to be employed or who wants to be employed, it is a very small question to us what our debt may be or what our method of taxation may be. If we keep our people employed for the next year or two we shall have no Bolshevism or anarchism and many of our difficulties will be solved; we shall have no trouble in getting back to ordinary conditions of civil life, and there is no reason why Canada should not go on and prosper.

Having said this, I have said all that I wish to say; I simply wanted to throw out this warning. I have faith in the ability of our country to overcome all obstacles. I am confident that the people will do their share, and if this Parliament does its duty during the next year or two I have no fear for the outcome; Canada will be back to a peace basis, a richer, prouder and happier nation than ever.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister has invited a question, and before he concludes I want to put it to him. He asked three or four times how we were going to get this $100,000,000. Perhaps the minister, having some inside information, will tell us what he himself thinks about it.

Mr. CARVELL: I think I stated that I was not making a budget speech; that I was simply asking the House and the country to do some thinking. By the time the Budget is brought down, my hon. friend, as well as members on this side of the House, will have had time to give thought to the matter and the question can then, perhaps, be answered.

Mr. McKENZIE: So far, the minister does not know.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate my old room-mate and intimate friend (Mr. McKenzie) on being appointed temporarily to the position of leader of the Liberal party. Knowing him as I do, I feel sure that he will fill the position with great credit to himself as well as to the men who have honoured him with their confidence.

I wish also to be permitted to thank the leader of the House (Sir Thomas White) for the very generous and eloquent tribute he paid yesterday to my departed leader. The speeches yesterday were of a very high order indeed and quite worthy of the traditions of this House. I wish to add a few words on behalf of the old Liberal guard of Nova Scotia. The leader of the Opposition spoke for the Liberals of all Canada, but I want to speak for a moment specially for the Liberals of Nova Scotia as to the loss that we have sustained in the death of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I believe that in no province of Canada, unless it be the province of Quebec, did the departed leader have a more loyal and devoted following than he had in Nova Scotia. Throughout his long career he has been admired and trusted by the Liberal party of that province. Since the days of Joseph Howe no public man has secured the confidence and devotion of the Liberals of Nova Scotia to the same extent as Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He was to the Liberals of that province what the trusted and revered Highland chieftain was in the old days to the clansmen in the Scottish glens.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not want to miss any of the speech of the hon. member. I would like to hear what is said. We cannot hear very plainly, and I would, therefore, ask my hon. friend most respectfully if he would speak a little louder.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I shall endeavour to meet the wishes of my hon. friend. I am not now referring to the leaders of the party in the province of Nova Scotia; I am referring chiefly to the rank and file. In that province, in the farm houses on the hillsides and in the valleys, in the homes of the fishermen in the harbours and coves along our rock-bound coast, in the huts of the lumbermen in the forests, as well as in our more populous towns and cities, there are tens of thousands of men and women who are feeling a deep sense of personal loss in the death of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. If, Sir, you will permit me a personal reference, I have known Sir Wilfrid for a quarter of a century. I had the honour of his friendship, and it was one of my most precious possessions. I have seen him scores of times when he was dealing with questions of more or less difficulty in his own room with his friends around him, or in the secret caucus of the party, where a man is bound to show his hand, and I have never known a single occasion, whether I agreed with him or not, on which I did not believe him to be actuated by the highest and best motives.

He had in marked degree two qualities that every great statesman must possess, namely initiative and courage. In 1911, with two years of his Parliamentary term yet to run, he staked all on a great issue and lost. To be satisfied that he was right was more to him than to be successful, and time has amply vindicated his course in regard to that great question. His followers, when that contest was over, all greatly admired the cheerful way in which he accepted his defeat, and at the age of seventy again hoisted the flag on a new battlefield. He was a good loser. He was great in victory, but he was even greater in defeat. He was a true democrat; was always willing to accept the verdict of the people. His lifelong ambition was to stamp out racial and religious strife from the public life of this country, and to help build up on the northern half of this continent a great, prosperous and united Canada, a land where there would be justice for all, free scope for all, a fair reward for labour and a new home for freedom. He always stood firmly for British connection, but he used to say that loyalty is the child of freedom, and that if British connection is to be built on an enduring foundation, the Canadian people must maintain the right to manage their own affairs.

Many things have been said about Sir Wilfrid Laurier in his time, but no Canadian worthy of the name ever doubted his honour or his patriotism. He was a great Canadian, but he was more than that. His reputation was wide as the Empire itself, and his memory will be cherished by men everywhere who love liberty and admire courage and devotion to duty. He died in harness, with his heart still young and his intellect unimpaired. The manner of his taking off is, I am sure, what he would himself have chosen. Our grief is not for him; it is for his sorrowing, stricken and lonely widow, and for ourselves. He was a diligent student all his lifetime and his mind was well stored with the classics of both languages. His English models were Shakespeare and the Bible. Amongst his heroes in the affairs of State were such men as Bright, Gladstone and Lincoln. He also had great admiration for those doughty reformers of his own mother land, Montalembert and Lacordaire. He had a firm grasp of current literature and current events. I have frequently heard him talk in his own delightful way about books and men and events, and on such occasions I have often thought, what a pity that death will some day come and make an end at one stroke of all this accumulated store of knowledge and experience. The stroke came and left us only the memory of his life and the inspiration of his example; but those are precious things to possess, and we are glad, even in the midst of our sorrow, that we knew him when he was here. We can say of Sir Wilfrid what was said by an English poet of the late Lord Roberts:

Clean, simple, valiant, well-beloved,
Flawless in faith in fame,
Whom neither ease nor honours moved
A hair-breadth from his aim.

And yet from life a new life springs
Through all the years to come,
And glory is the least of things
That follow this man home.

Mr. Speaker, I wish, in referring briefly to the Address, to associate myself with the sentiment expressed in the Speech from the Throne regarding the successful ending of the war. After four years of what looked at one time almost like a hopeless struggle, victory at last came. Our troubles, as the Hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) has said, are not yet over; but it is a splendid thing amidst all our anxieties that the casualty list is closed and the guns are silent. This country has reason to be proud of its record, and it has a special reason to be proud of its soldiers. When their achievements in this war are recorded there will be no more splendid story in the history of this or any other country. Kipling says that this is the first time since creation when the whole world has united to fight the devil, and we have every reason to rejoice that the world has been successful. Prussianism has been beaten into the dust by its own weapons, and its brute force has been overcome by the valour of free men inspired by the knowledge that they were fighting for right against wrong. To my mind, the most hopeful feature of the situation is the destruction of autocracy in Central Europe. War lords never flourish in a democratic country. England was very loath to go to war; so was France; so was the United States. The establishment of responsible Government in Central Europe is the best guarantee that we can have for the future peace of the world. As I have said, we have every reason to be proud of and to rejoice in our victory; but it is not a time to tighten our purse-strings or to relax our efforts, especially in so far as our soldiers and their dependents are concerned. More than ever, now that the war is over, we must make our soldiers feel that we are not indifferent to or ungrateful for the splendid work that they have done for us during the past four years

I would like to be permitted to quote this plank from the platform of the Liberal party in Great Britain, adopted at a conference held in Manchester in November last:—

> This committee pledges itself to secure that our sailors and soldiers shall have the first claim upon the consideration of Parliament as they already have upon the gratitude of the nation; that none of those who have served in the national forces shall be allowed to fall into distress either from lack of employment or from any other defect in our social organization; that those who have been incapacitated from following their old occupations shall be freely assisted to train themselves for new employments, and shall be further assisted by the State in every practicable way to establish themselves in business or as wage earners; that the pensions from the State to disabled men and to widows and children shall be sufficient in amount to secure a satisfactory standard of comfort, and that the Pension Fund shall be generously and sympathetically administered.

This language expresses the needs of the hour so clearly that in my judgment the Liberal party of Canada could not do better than adopt it, and bend their energies to enforce it. I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) in which he informed us that large grants were to be made for certain local improvements, including highways in the provinces, and housing. He told us that the Government intends to control the expenditure of this money, that conditions are to be attached to the expenditure, and an agreement is to be made between the local and federal government before the money can be expended. I wish to enter my protest against that proposal. I do not think there should be any dictation on the part of the federal government as to how the money is to be spent by the local governments. The local governments already have their machinery; they have highway organizations, and highways by the constitution have been placed absolutely under their jurisdiction. If this Government can afford to advance the provinces' money for that purpose, well and good; but I consider it a mistake to attempt to control the local governments in any way in the expenditure of the money that is placed in their hands. To my mind it is an insiduous way of securing control over local affairs. I have noticed in recent years when grants have been made by this Government there has been a tendency to encroach on the rights of the legislatures in the various provinces. There is no reason why this Government should direct the expenditure of highway money any more than the expenditure of money for education. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) has in his way been a sort of champion of provincial rights. He has been claiming for the Western provinces their natural resources.

Mr. McMASTER: But has not got them yet.

Mr. SINCLAIR: But that is his policy.

Mr. CALDER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Now he is a member of this Government. Why, then does he not stand up for the rights of the provinces. Why is he asking for the natural resources to be given to the West? I assume it is in order that the Western provinces may be put in a position to manage their own local affairs. Then why not allow all the provinces to control without Federal supervision the money that is to be expended on their highways? I submit that this policy of attempting to control the expenditure is wrong, and while I do not wish to be understood as opposing at the present time the grant for highways, I say it should be a free grant without any strings to it. If we have money to give to the provinces, I submit, the proper way to give it would be to increase the provincial subsidies and allow the provinces to manage their own affairs. The provinces are not mendicants. They are not asking for money that does not belong to them. The money comes from the provinces in the first place, and the Provincial Governments can be trusted to expend this money just as wisely as the Federal Government possibly could.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does my hon. friend advocate the expenditure of this money?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, but I am opposed to any conditions being imposed by the Federal Government in connection with its expenditure. The Minister of Public Works also referred to the construction of ships. He told us the Government had embarked on a policy of building ships, and that a very large sum of money was to be expended. He admitted he could go into the market at the present time and buy ships cheaper than he could possibly build them. If that be true, why pay more than they are worth? As far as my information goes, I believe that he is paying under these contracts about four times the normal value for the ships he is proposing to build. In normal times ships could be built for about $50 per ton dead weight; but in the contracts I have seen the Government is paying something like $200 per ton. The Government will never see their money again; I fear it is an improvident proposal. It took the Government four years finally to make up its mind to purchase ships. The time to purchase ships if they were to be of service in the war was in 1914 when the war broke out, but the Government waited until the war was about over, and then embarked on a very expensive programme of building ships for which they propose to pay four times the normal price. Such a policy is not at all likely to promote the building of ships in Canada. If the Government could devise a way of promoting and assisting ship-building in Canada, that would be a very wise and proper move to make, but to buy ships at four times the normal price is certainly not likely to stimulate the building of ships by private enterprise. I am not in favour of Government ownership of tramp vessels; I do not think the policy a wise one, and I do not think it will do much to solve the problem of providing employment which I understood the Minister to say was the main reason for its adoption. If that is the Government's object, I can say that I know of no other industry that gives so little employment of labour for the amount of money expended as the building of steel ships. The production of the plates and other material call for a large amount of labour, but the material in the case of the present contracts is to come chiefly from the United States. The Government could easily have found some other industry where they could have employed a larger number of people with a smaller expenditure of money. Is there not something we can do in this country that would bring us in some return? Would it not be better, for instance, to buy tractors and plough up the western prairies and produce wheat?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: We would need the ships to carry the wheat.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am afraid if we make the rates of freight correspond with the outlay on the ships the wheat would be too expensive. Would it not be a saner policy to expend part of this money in building branch lines of railway in Nova Scotia? I can show my hon. friend places in my own constituency where by the construction of a branch line, he would open up the country and encourage production and help at the same time to make the Intercolonial profitable. Building branch lines of railway where they are needed would be doing something for the country, and would be a far better policy than buying expensive ships for which there does not seem to be any future to justify the expenditure involved.

So much for the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. The return of peace creates a new situation in this country, so far as the two old political parties are concerned. The Union Government was formed ostensibly to carry on the war. Thousands of patriotic people voted for it because they believed that to be the real reason back of it. My humble opinion is that these people were deceived. What are the results? Our brave soldiers did their full share toward winning the war, but I am not so sure about the record of the Union Government. What they have done to win the war remains to be shown. If you say they won it by means of the Military Service Act, that statement will require to be substantiated; we have yet to learn that any substantial number of the soldiers conscripted under that Act ever reached the firing line. We on this side were not deceived. We were well aware that the Union Government was formed, not to win the war, but to defeat the Liberal party and win the election. There was a zig-zag streak in it from its inception. It is obvious that if it was a war move it should have come three years earlier. But it came on the eve of the election when it was clear to the Prime Minister and to everybody else that the old Conservative-Nationalist party could not win the election. But even if, for the sake of argument, we say it was formed to win the war, the war has been won and the reason for its formation no longer exists. What is wanted now in this country is a strong and efficient government, with a united party behind it. I do not think any one will pretend that this Government has a united party behind it. The supporters of this Government, like old Gaul, are divided into three parts. There are, first, the Unionist Liberals, a distinct class by themselves. Then there are the Unionist Conservatives, who, I am told, have no great love for some of the Unionist Liberals In the third place, there are the real Conservatives, who, I am also told do not waste any affection on either of the other two. Now on all sides the question is asked, will the Prime Minister, now that the war is over, attempt to keep this ramshackle party together. It is not for me to answer that question. If it is contended that Union Government should be kept together for the purpose of reconstruction I beg to take issue squarely with that proposition. To put forward such a contention would be to take refuge in an indefensible line of trenches. Will any one seriously contend that a Cabinet dominated by the big interests and led by a dispenser of titles is likely to give an efficient lead to the work of reconstruction on democratic lines? Besides this, Union Government is regarded, even by its chief supporters, as a temporary makeshift. My hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) at Toronto, on January 12th, informed his audience that the Union Liberals proposed to remain until the soldiers got home. I understand this to mean that when the last transport ship touches the wharf at Halifax or St. John the whole combination will fall to pieces like a house of cards, and after that it will be every man for himself—and let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that the fate that is said to overtake the hindmost will not overtake any of them. But, speaking seriously, is it reasonable to expect any progressive or constructive legislation from a government with a death sentence like that hanging over it? You know, Mr. Speaker, that a man who is in prison awaiting his execution is most likely to spend most of his time preparing for death. Apart from this, the reconstruction party may well last for four or five years, and I submit it should not be left for a moment in the hands of a government that is not now, and never was, representative of the Canadian people. The Parliament that deals with reconstruction should be a parliament fresh from the people, elected without any switching of ballots, without any aid from the War Franchise Act, and without resort to the rusty tools of the bigot or the fanatic, and without any manipulation on the part of the press or the big interests. The Military Service Act, which was made a pretext for smashing the Liberal party, is no longer a live issue. Its usefulness, if it was useful, practically ended with the firing of the last gun. This gives rise to a new situation. The question arises, what will be the ultimate fate of the Liberals who strayed away from the fold? The question was raised yesterday, will these wanderers come back or will they end up by taking refuge in the bosom of the Prime Minister? These Liberal Unionists will have to decide that question for themselves. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) in his speech yesterday left the latch string out, and a light in the kitchen window. I want to warn these old friends of mine, however, not to make the mistake that the prodigal made, for he stayed so long in the far country that his new master put him to work at a very undignified and menial task. It would be a positive grief to me, Sir, to think that any of these old friends of mine, who sat with me for so many years around the fireside of the Liberal party, should ever be set to work to fatten pork barons or other animals of that class. Permit me to suggest to these gentlemen that if they are coming back, the sooner the better. Besides, there is a limit to the time that the fatted calf may be kept waiting. The Union theory of government has had its day. It has been tried, and I submit that it has been found wanting. In 1917 certain wily politicians, assisted by the newspapers and a few energetic millionaires, spread the doctrine that in politics there should be no party, and that we should all be of one mind and do just what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance told us to do. The result of their proposals was to establish in Canada an autocratic government somewhat similar to the government that existed in Germany before the war. With the help of the War Franchise Act they succeeded. The result is that we have had an Administration that has thrown Parliament overboard and assumed more absolute control over the life and liberties of the people of this Dominion than was ever claimed by the Kaiser of Germany over his people. We must not lose sight of the fact that this country belongs to the people and not to the Union Government. The fact is that to-day in Canada we do not enjoy the blessings of responsible government. We are living under a government of party bosses, who, in secret conclave and behind closed doors, decide among themselves what we shall have and what we shall not have. The members of this Parliament are not masters of anybody. They are the servants of the Canadian people. What would you think, Mr. Speaker, of a servant who would not tell his master what he was doing? They have governed this country by orders in council, a system which has been aptly described as law-making in the dark. Thousands of these orders have been passed, all in secret and behind closed doors. So arrogant did they become that some of these orders in council, of vital concern to the people of this country, were passed while Parliament was in session, without consulting the people's representatives. One of these secret regulations affected the liberty of every workingman in Canada, but it was passed without notice and without any opportunity for discussion. The theory of this Government evidently is that all the people have to do with the laws is to obey them and leave the making of them to their betters. So much for the methods of the Union Government. The old party system may be denounced by superfine philosophers but it is the best guarantee we have for good, clean, honest and progressive government. It has produced the soundest constiution in the world and worked that constitution in the Mother of Parliaments without a serious hitch for over two hundred years. The result of all this is the splendid fabric of British liberty, no part of which can be placed to the credit of the Mugwumps. An alert Opposition is always useful and desirable and is just as necessary in wartime as in times of peace. There is such a thing as checking graft and stopping extravagant and wasteful expenditure by prompt and courageous action on the part of the Opposition. We on this side frankly confess that we regarded it as a fitting thing that while the war was on, and the State was fighting for its life, no pains should be spared to promote a calm and friendly atmosphere and thereby focus attention upon the war and the issues arising out of the war. But even this can be carried too far. Everybody knows now that the easy-going method adopted by the Opposition during the early months of the war produced evil results. Graft became rampant. Millions of money were stolen and millions more wasted and the patronage system had spread so that the efficiency of the army was threatened. Then came the investigations and exposures. These exposures were of immense value to the country. No man can estimate their value. For example, after the investigations before the Public Accounts Committee, and the Kyte charges, and the exposures that followed, the operations of such grafters as Benjamin Franklyn Yoakum and Col. John Wesley Allison became impossible.

These recent experiences warrant the conclusion that an alert Opposition is the only safety and the first requisite of a decent democracy. The man who repudiates the party system, denies the doctrine of the sovereignty of the people.

Reference has been made to the success of the Victory Loan, and it is certainly a matter for congratulation that the response was so cordial. The last two domestic loans aggregated over a billion dollars. The annual interest charge on these loans alone will exceed $50,000,000. This very large sum has been made absolutely free from taxation and in my judgment, improperly so. The large interest rate was ample without this concession, and if the Finance Minister had trusted the people, if he had appealed to the patriotism of the people instead of their greed, he would not have been disappointed. Taxation or no taxation makes no difference to the small investor. It is in the case of the super-tax where the pinch comes. The small investor pays no super-tax. Why then were the bonds made free? There can only be the one answer. It was done to accommodate the plutocrats, or as Disraeli would say, "The paladins of High Finance."

Referring back to the election contest of 1917, what shall we say of a political party that was pledged to the hilt to the conscription of wealth, and when they secured power not only failed to conscript wealth but went so far in the opposite direction as to make wealth free from taxation? The result will be that while the returned soldier will have to pay, the millionaire and the profiteer will be free from the burden of the war. The hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has good points about him but he started wrong. If he will excuse me for saying so. He entered public life, not as the representative of the people, but as the representative of the big interests. Under his management the manufacturers have been treated tenderly; so have the banks, the millionaires and the profiteers. My hon. friend has been at the head of our financial system for the past eight years, but so far as I know he never yet showed any disposition to drive any of the money changers out of the temple. This last act of freeing the war bonds from taxation is quite consistent with his past record and is what the people of Canada had every reason to expect. There appears to be no end to my hon. friend's borrowing. He has become a sort of political Oliver Twist. No sooner does he finish one plate of soup than he begins to clamour for another.

A few months ago he announced that in order to tide him over the year 1919 he would require about $300,000,000. A little later he hinted that he could make use of $500,000,000. By offering an extravagant rate of interest and freedom from taxation, he secured from the Canadian people about $687,000,000. But he was not satisfied. No sooner had he secured this enormous sum of money than he wants more. Without stopping to take breath he organizes a new borrowing scheme by means of thrift stamps. If this abnormal appetite for "more" continues, I suppose we shall have to resort to the old remedy of brimstone and molasses. I am not saying that I object to thrift stamps, but the thrift will be very one-sided if there is no thrift on the part of the Government. Why should we ask the little children and old women in the country to save up their cents and invest their savings in war stamps in order to give money to a Government that will not take care of the money or use it properly when they get it?

Just a word on the food question. People everywhere are asking why the Food Board, which has been in operation for years, has failed to control prices, while the Food Boards in Great Britain and the United States have succeeded. It would be interesting to know the reason. The prices of food have gone sky-high, but only a very small part of the increase has gone to the farmer or the fisherman. The big millers and the pork barons and the middlemen have grown fat and flourished under the very noses of the board. While our soldiers were fighting the Hun in Europe, the Government gave the Hun profiteer at home a free hand to fleece the Canadian people. What does the hungry labourer with a large family to feed, and flour at $14 per barrel and bread at 14 cents for a 2-pound loaf, think when he reads in the papers that the Ogilvie Flour Mill Company has distributed to its millionaire shareholders 12 per cent dividend and 15 per cent bonus last year? When the labourer remembers how tenderly the celebrated pork baron of Toronto was treated after the O'Connor exposure, and when he sees these flour barons pocketing 27 per cent on their investment, while his family is feeling the pinch of these outrageous prices, is he not driven to the conclusion that in some way or other these big interests are under the protection of this Government?

There has been enormous expenditure of money in connection with the work of this Food Board, there have been investigations and cartloads of advice, but I am not aware that any poor man in Canada, or any soldier's wife or widow, has been able to buy a pound of beef, or a loaf of bread, any cheaper by reason of the expenditure of all this money and all this energy. The question is naturally asked, What is there to show for it all. I read a story recently in an English paper that a conservation orator over there was deploring the fact that Great Britain is compelled to import so much timber. "It is my belief," said the speaker, "that there is not a man in this vast audience who ever did a single thing to prevent the destruction of our forests." Thereupon a man arose in the rear of the hall and said: "I beg your pardon, Sir, I have shot woodpeckers." I will not say that the Food Board has accomplished nothing, but considering the money expended, the results have certainly been meagre. The control of prices was the most important task committed to them, and in this they have signally failed. If you want proof of this, I can furnish it from themselves. We have their own admission. On page 5 of the Canadian Food Bulletin of November, 1918, I find the following:

> Plainly, the fixing of prices cannot be done by a centralized control at Ottawa, and it is worth noting that all food orders must, under our Constitution, be made for the whole of the Dominion; the only way to limit their application to one area is to make exceptions of all other areas. That is, the order must be chipped and whittled down negatively to the rer quired size if it is to be localized. If prices are to be fixed in a way which shall not cut off supplies, it must be done by local power. What other power better represents the people than a properly elected municipal council?

There you have it. During the past four years we have this highly paid organization fooling and fiddling over the prices of food, and at the end of it all we have the helpless admission that they cannot do anything at all, and that the only institution that is capable of doing anything is the municipal councils. Now, that may be true, but why, let me ask, go through all this solemn hocus-pocus covering a period of four years, to reach this conclusion? Mr. Speaker, what do you think of this Food Board, and what do you think of a Government that during the whole four years of the war has tolerated this muddling and tinkering with a question so vital to the Canadian people?

Reference has been made in this debate to the prevalence of industrial unrest. I want to make the statement that the chief cause of industrial unrest is the high cost of living, and the general belief in the existence of profiteering. Wages have increased, but wages have not kept pace with the high cost of living. Under these circumstances what should the Government have done? They should have taken these profiteers and middlemen by the throat and compelled them to reduce their demands. What did the Government do? They took a short cut, they went behind closed doors and passed an Order in Council making it a criminal offence for a working man to strike, while at the same time the chief offenders were allowed to go scot free. They did more, they appointed a Director of Public Safety, and organized a force of Dominion Police, so that if the hungry man clamoured too loudly for more wages they could furnish him with a pair of handcuffs. I want to say to my hon. friend the leader of the Government that we will never build the New Jerusalem in this free land of ours by resorting to these Hun methods.

This Administration has claimed a great deal of credit for abolishing patronage and reforming the Civil Service. It would appear that some good people actually believe that they did these things. I have seen a report of a meeting of clergymen where they passed a resolution thanking the Lord that the Union Government had the grace and strength given them to effect these reforms. My own idea is that the Lord had nothing to do with it, and judging from the amount of deception practised in connection with the matter I am inclined to view that it came from the opposite quarter. The trouble with some well-meaning clergymen is that their bump of credulity is abnormally large. The western farmers evidently do not think patronage has been abolished. At their meeting in Winnipeg in November last, they placed the abolition of patronage as one of the chief planks of their platform for the next election. The trouble with the Civil Service is that it was debauched after 1911, and reform is impossible without first cleaning out the stable. It has not been forgotten that within two years after the Administration came into power, they crowded the Civil Service with 25,000 new appointments. There were only about half that number of vacancies made by deaths and dismissals. This new army was not needed, and they demoralized the whole service, 4 p.m. and this condition still prevails and cannot be remedied by organizing a board to make new appointments. If the Government cannot muster the courage to send their unwelcome friends back to productive employment, the only thing to do is to wait for ten thousand funerals before any remedy is possible. Prof. W. L. Grant, who has been studying the situation, suggests as a partial remedy that no new appointments be made for the next five years. In this connection permit me to quote from The Civilian. The Civilian is the only paper in Canada that is wholly devoted to the Civil Service, and should be the best authority on that question. The item I refer to is a report of an interview between the executive of the Civil Service Association and Sir George Foster, relating to the distribution of a proposed war bonus.

[Mr. J. H. Sinclair.]

When the question arose as to what the total expenditure would amount to if this bonus were paid, we find the following statement:

> This, of course was a mere matter of multiplication—so many civil servants at $350 apiece, total so much. But the difficulty is in the first factor in the calculation, for, as was pointed out by Mr. Burling and others, nobody knows how many civil servants there are. The Civil Service Commission is carrying on at this moment a most elaborate inquiry partly with the object of ascertaining exactly what persons are to be counted as belonging to the Service.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, from this item that the chief trouble is that the Government has crowded the departments with employees to such an extent that nobody can say how many civil servants there are, and they frankly confess their inability to count one another. I am informed that the Government actually employed a firm of experts in the United States to count and classify them. We must also remember that this is the condition of affairs in the year of our Lord, 1918, after four years of war; and during that whole period the Government had been crying out about the scarcity of labour and imploring old and young, women and children, to volunteer to work in the fields and factories so as to save the nation and win the war; and all the time they had battalions of chairwarmers in their own offices paid at the public expense to do nothing; and in the very months that the war ended, these employees were still so numerous that they themselves recognized the difficulty of counting one another. All I have to say is that the clergymen who thanked God for what the Union Government accomplished in connection with the Civil Service were satisfied with very small mercies.

Curious things have happened in this country the past year. A certain Rip Van Winkle by the name of Parsons, who, I am told, was recently the official head of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, has been attempting to raise the old, discredited cry of "No truck or trade with the Yankees." That cry, as hon. gentlemen will remember, did good service for him and his associates in 1911. The only explanation of his reverting to that cry now is that he must have been asleep during the last four years. In the face of all our recent experiences to the contrary he again quotes the worn-out remark of ex-President Taft that an exchange of products between the two countries would make Canada an adjunct of the United States. This argument had its origin in prejudice, and found a ready market at the time among men of low intelligence and high credulity. But after the experiences of the past four years I feel confient that even this class will regard it as out of date and refuse to accept it. It was never contended that the reciprocity agreement was not a fair bargain: its opponents frankly admitted that it was absolutely fair. Besides, it contained a clause enabling us to withdraw from it at any time we saw fit to do so. Still, with all these precautions, certain hon. gentlemen opposite, of whom the leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) was one, professed to be alarmed about our fiscal independence. It does not take much to frighten some people. It has not been forgotten that a few years ago some hon. gentlemen opposite used to smell annexation and treason in every potato or codfish that crossed the boundary line. Why? Was it because they did not trust the United States, or was it that the United States, being the stronger, would take an unfair advantage of us? The fact that since that time the Finance Minister went to Washington, hat in hand, to get leave to borrow $100,000,000 in New York shows that he did not really fear any of these things and that the campaign of 1911 was nothing more than a hollow sham. Besides all that, a nation that has been compelled within the last year to submit to the humiliation of depending on the United States navy to protect its coast and its commerce and its fishing fleet is hardly in a position to harbour suspicion as to the good faith of that same power in regard to less important matters of trade and tariff. There is no serious opposition today among the rank and file of the Canadian people to reciprocity with the United States in natural products. There is no serious opposition to it even by the Government; as witness their recent decision to place potatoes on the free list. I doubt if there is a single narrow-gauge statesman in Canada to-day who is prepared to raise the old, worn-out cry of "No truck or trade with the Yankees"; it has been buried in the same grave as their opposition to a Canadian navy and to the British preference. The attempt to stir up ill-feeling between Canada and the United States in 1911 had all the appearance of a skilfully-contrived German propaganda.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who made the first proposal in 1911 for the annexation of Canada to the United States? Was it not made by American speakers?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I never heard of any proposal being made for the annexation of Canada to the United States; it is all news to me. I was saying that the campaign of 1911 had the appearance of a skilfully-contrived German propaganda, and we all ought to be thankful that the conspiracy failed and that our relations with our great neighbour to the south have never been more friendly than they are to-day. Time has amply vindicated the policy of my late revered leader in regard to reciprocity with the United States as well as in regard to that very vital question, the establishment of a Canadian navy.

The question of the franchise has been mentioned in the Address. This is a matter of vital importance. Three attempts have been made in the history of Canada to gain an unfair advantage by legislation in connection with the franchise. The first was what is called the gerrymander of 1882. The second was the Franchise Act of 1885, providing that a revising barrister be appointed in each constituency in Canada to compile the electoral lists. The third was the War-Time Elections Act of 1917. I am happy to say that those three attempts to gain an unfair advantage by legislation in connection with the franchise were all made by the same political party. One of the most serious charges to be laid at the door of the Union Government is this War-Times Election Act—it is known in my province as the War-Time Tammany Act. The leader of the House told us yesterday that this Act was not to be repealed until something else had been provided in its place. I trust that the other thing which is to be provided in its place will be fairer and more respectable and decent than the War-Time Elections Act. This Act is a disgrace to Canada and should be repealed at once. It is customary for the police, when the row is over, to confiscate the sling-shots and the sand-bags and the brass knuckles; why should there be any distinction in this case? The Act should have been repealed last year; every day that it continues on the statute book of Canada, it serves to perpetuate our disgrace. Frankly, I was disappointed last year when I saw man after man, each a Liberal-Unionist, stand up in his place and vote for the continuance of this Act; I thought that there would be some conscientious objectors among them. What is the situation up to date? We on this side of the House stand for fair elections; hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House stand for the War-Time Elections Act. These positions are as opposite as God and mammon; no man can hold to the one without despising the other. I dislike as much as any man to refer to these matters, but it is our duty as representatives of a free democracy to challenge the methods by which hon. gentlemen won the election of 1917.

I want to lay down the principle that absolute fairness in the use of the ballot is the first requisite and the only safety of a decent democracy. Fair play has always been the biggest word in the Anglo-Saxon's creed, and when men outrage that principle, they must take the consequences. It is as much our duty to hold these people up to the public gaze as it is the duty of the Allies to expose the Hun outrages of the last four years. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that red-letter day in the history of Great Britain, when, in November last, a string of German naval ships twenty miles in length steamed slowly up through the North sea and surrendered to Admiral Beatty in the Firth of Forth. No ceremonial courtesies of any kind were paid to the vanquished enemy. Admiral Beatty gives the reason. The following contains an extract from the official order that was flashed across the sky from the flagship of the Grand Fleet the night before the surrender:

> At midnight Admiral Beatty signalled that while courtesy toward the enemy was obligatory, the methods by which the Germans had waged war should not be forgotten, that no international compliments should be paid.

In the same way, it is obligatory upon us to keep before the Canadian people the method by which hon. gentlemen opposite won their seats in 1917. We on this side of the House will follow the example of Admiral Beatty. There will be no ceremonial courtesies so far as the War-time Elections Act is concerned.

Let me quote an editorial from an Australian paper to show what our great sister Commonwealth thinks of the conduct of the election by which this Government came into power:

> Canada stands in the unhappy position of having had her ordinary constitutional government overthrown by what is practically a military revolution.
> The recent elections in Canada were simply a farce and a fraud from a legal and constitutional standpoint, as they were conducted under war precaution regulations, which permitted great numbers of unqualified persons to vote, and denied the franchise to large numbers of legally qualified Canadian citizens.
>
> The ordinary Canadian electoral roll was set aside, and a manuscript roll compiled by specially appointed officials acting under military regulations, was used.
>
> An election controlled by military despots, and carried out in defiance of electoral law, is something quite new in the annals of British constitutional history, and by no stretch of imagination can the present Borden ministry claim to be the constitutional representatives of the people of Canada.
>
> It must be apparent that, from a legal and constitutional standpoint, the recent Canadian election is null and void, and the Parliament so elected has no constitutional authority for its acts.
>
> Our local conscriptionist politicians are now bewailing the fact that they did not adopt the tactics of their fellow-conspirators in Canada, but it would be a dark day indeed if the frauds perpetrated there could be repeated here.
> Canada now stands as the shocking example of what organized force is capable of, even in a British community, and emphasizes the good sense of the Australian people in their refusal to exchange constitutional government for military despotism.

Considering the distance from Canada at which this editorial was written, it is surprising how correctly the writer was informed.

Having said so much about the sins and follies of the Government, let me say that the fact that during this session on which we have entered we have to deal with the present and the future rather than with the past, is obvious to us all. We on this side fully recognize that the task confronting the Administration is not an easy one. The returned soldiers have the first claim on the gratitude of the nation. They must not want for anything that the country can do for them. The dependents of the brave men who have fallen in our service must also be tenderly cared for. The claims for pensions must be adjusted in a generous spirit. Labour problems must be dealt with. Taxation must be fairly and equitably levied in order that money may be found to meet the enormous financial obligations of the country, and it is the duty of every member of the House, I care not on which side he sits, to contribute everything he can to the solution of these problems. But the Government must of course take the lead. The first requisite of an Administration is initiative; the second is efficiency. If the Government fails in those, it fails in everything. The collapse of initiative on the part of this Government is proved beyond doubt by the resignation of the Parliamentary Under Secretary of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Why did the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) resign? He resigned, first, because the Government had failed to grapple with the problem of the returned soldier; second, because the different departments of the Government failed to work together. My hon. friend from Colchester has been careful to use diplomatic language, but his real meaning is that the Administration is incompetent, and he refuses any longer to be responsible for its failure to do its duty. The returned soldier is the greatest problem before the Canadian people, and if the Government cannot grapple successfully with that problem, then it should make way for some Government that can.

So much for initiative. We come now to the question of efficiency. You say that this Administration is an efficient instrument to grapple with the grave problems that are confronting the country at the present time. We say, judging from its past record, that it is not. That creates an issue, and the burden of proof is on you. I submit that in all the speeches that we have yet heard from hon. members of the Government, the proof is not forthcoming. A good example of inefficiency and drift is pointed out by my hon. friend from Colchester in his letter of resignation. When the question of soldiers' pensions became urgent in 1916, the Government had no solution to offer. When pressed to take action, they appointed a committee of private members to take evidence and report. This committee did its duty well and made a comprehensive report which, according to the hon. member for Colchester, the Government pigeon-holed and up to the date of his resignation no more was heard of it. The hon. member for Colchester is not a man who would say or do anything reflecting on his party without having ample and serious reasons for doing so. It is, therefore, for the Government to explain—and it has not yet done so—what justification the hon. member for Colchester had in the action he took.

With reference to the efforts of Great Britain in this war, the remark has been made that in the old land they did every thing but talk. The opposite is the case here. This Government talks, but very little else is accomplished. Everybody knows that there is nothing that weakens a Government so much as bold talk and feeble action. We have been putting our trust in Boards, Committees and Royal Commissions. What we really need is men at the head of affairs who can do things themselves and who have the courage to take the whole responsibility. Nearly every important matter that comes up, instead of being dealt with by the responsible minister, is turned over to some irresponsible commission of busybodies who in turn travel the country, collect information and make a report which is duly pigeon-holed and forgotten while the country has the pleasure of paying the bill. Let me give a few examples:

1. The Trade Mission to London which should have been attended to by the trained experts of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

2. The National Advisory Council for the employment of labour. Where, let me ask, is our Department of Labour?

3. The Royal Commission on Wheat Supply. Have we not a Department of Agriculture in this country?

4. The Department of Public Safety. Has this country ever been so dangerous a place to live in that the Department of Justice could not protect the citizens?

5. The National War Savings Committee, consisting of fifteen men from different parts of Canada selected to deal with the question of thrift stamps. Surely this is a matter that should be dealt with by the Finance Department. What do we keep a highly paid staff of experts in the Finance Department for, if we have to resort to a committee of fifteen from the outside to attend to such a simple matter as thrift stamps?

These are only sample bricks. There are hundreds of these so-called commissions. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) himself informed us in the House that they were as thick as blackberries, and the number is increasing day by day. If everything is to be turned over to irresponsible commissions, what is left to the twenty-one ministers of the Crown and their departments to do? When these gentlemen were elected, the people of Canada who voted for them expected them to be useful as well as ornamental. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) is smiling at that, but that is a fact. Lord Macaulay was right when he said that war could not be carried on successfully by a debating society. The same is true of Government. If the Government of this country is to be of real service to the people in the anxious period that confronts us, efficiency must be the watchword in every department. The work must not be turned over to irresponsible outside committees.

Permit me to say this, that the party that will do the greatest service for this country in the future will be the party that will stand above all for good faith and honesty, and public honour. We have talked so much of late years about tariffs and bonuses and bounties and shipbuilding and wheat and steers that we are apt to run away with the idea that these are the principal things and to neglect the weightier matters, such as faithfulness to our pledges, and even-handed justice between man and man. In my judgment no party can any more succeed in this country that seeks to serve itself. The people will demand not only sincerity on the part of its representatives, but also a frank recognition of the rights of the ordinary man.

I was much struck with a paragraph in Lloyd George's recent election address referring to labour and capital. Permit me to quote:

> I say to Labour: You shall have justice; you shall have fair treatment, a fair share of the amenities of life and your children shall have equal opportunities with the children of the rich. To Capital I say: You shall not be plundered or penalised; do your duty by those who work for you, and the future is free for all the enterprise or audacity you can give us. But there must be equal justice. Labour must have happiness in its heart. We will put up with no sweating. Labour is to have its just reward. And when the whole nation sees that wealth lies in production, that production can be enormously increased, with higher wages and shorter hours, and when the classes feel confidence in each other and trust each other, there will be abundance to requite the toil and to gladden the hearts of all. We can change the whole face of existence.

We can do the same here. Precisely the same task awaits us here in Canada, but when we speak of labour we must include not only the workmen in the factories and the mines and on the railways, but also the tillers of the land and the toilers of the sea. Surely it is not beyond us to develop a system of government by which quiet, industrious men can live and labour and enjoy the fruit of their own industry.

Mr. Speaker, before taking my seat, permit me to say that, representing a constituency that in common with others has made great sacrifices in this war, I am here to support any proper measures looking towards reconstruction. My constituents will expect me to demand so far as lies in my power, honest and progressive administration, and fair and generous treatment for the men who have survived and for the dependents of the men who have fallen in the great struggle.

The only desire of members on this side of the House is to guard the public treasury, to see that Canada plays her part with honour, and to assist in such measures as will establish on a firm foundation in this free land of ours the principles of democracy that our soldiers fought so bravely to maintain.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I desire to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. The task that was assigned to them was a difficult one. As every member of the House knows, the atmosphere in this Chamber in the early days of the session is just a little tense, somewhat frigid, and the task of breaking the ice, so to speak, under those circumstances is by no means an easy one. I am sure every hon. member will agree that the choice made in selecting these two young men to undertake this responsibility was a very happy one. They had both seen service overseas; they had come in contact with conditions "over there," and their experiences I am sure were such as will enable them to speak with authority on many of the questions which must be considered by the House during this session. I am sure we all feel that their addresses will be exceedingly helpful to us in the work of the session.

I wish also to express my thanks to the other hon. members who have spoken both on that side of the House and on this. The session now under way will, I think, prove to be the most important session of Parliament ever held in the history of Canada. The problems that are now staring us in the face are in my judgment the most difficult problems Canada has ever had to deal with, and for that reason it is very desirable and very important that we should have at this early stage of the session the viewpoint of every one on the prevailing conditions. It is quite true we may not agree with all that has been said by our hon. friends opposite. Nevertheless, I think it is very desirable, in order that we may lay down proper foundations for our work this session, that we should have their views, that they should state to this House quite clearly and definitely whatever criticisms they may have to offer, that they should tell us the feeling in the country as they see it, and state whether in their opinion the work that has been done by the Government has been done properly or not. That necessarily is very helpful, and particularly helpful to the members of the Government. I have been connected with public life, not here but elsewhere, for a period of some fifteen or eighteen years, and I have never during all that time objected to criticism or attack. I like attack to be fair, and I like criticism to be constructive, not merely destructive, and I am sure it will be helpful to every hon. member who is desirous of carrying out the responsibility cast upon him at this crisis to get the views of other hon. gentlemen in the House.

Naturally, our friends opposite, particularly the last speaker, have drawn a pretty dark picture. He in particular dipped his brush pretty deep in the browns and the grays and the blacks. To him all is gloom; the whole horizon is filled with dark clouds, with scarcely a gleam of light anywhere. Well, I hope before I get through to say something that will at least assure our friends on this side of the House that all is not so black, that there is a little light somewhere, and that the people of this country may reasonably hope for something.

The great war is ended. Thank God for that! I say, thank God, not because "the light is in the window and the latch string on the outside of the door," but because the curtain has rung down on the greatest tragedy in all history. I am not going to take up your time, Mr. Speaker, in dwelling upon the misery and suffering and sorrow of the last four years. I shall not deal with the causes of the war or the ideals for which we fought. Much as I would like to speak of our own boys and what they did, the battles they fought, how they fought their way through from Ypres to Mons, I am not going to deal with that matter to-day. Those questions have been dealt with by previous speakers. The mover and seconder of the Address dwelt upon them and spoke more fittingly than I could. I wish rather during the time at my disposal to speak of what lies ahead, of the work that confronts us, of the tasks that we members of Parliament must undertake during the months that lie before us. The armistice was signed on the eleventh day of November. Hostilities ceased suddenly. It was not thought that the war would come to a conclusion so early. There may have been a few, very few, who understood the conditions and knew exactly the situation, but, so far as the great majority of the people of this country were concerned, they little expected the war would end last year. I well remember the conditions in Europe when I was over there in the midsummer of 1918. The Acting Prime Minister referred to those conditions yesterday afternoon. When we landed in London in the early part of June, you would scarcely meet a man anywhere with a smile on his face. I never saw such dejection and despondency in my life. In all the circles of government over there, where they had a clear knowledge of the situation on the continent, there was not much indication of the end of the war then. Hon. gentlemen will remember how the fifth army was smashed. You remember the talk of the Huns breaking through to Calais and Paris. That was exactly the situation. The men who were responsible for the conduct of the war at that time were seriously considering the problems that would arise when the Huns did reach Paris and the channel ports. That was the situation then, and was the situation during the whole six or seven weeks I was over there. I went on board the ship, and we were two or three days from shore when we got the despatch that the Germans had renewed their attack towards Paris, and a few days later we heard of the Allied offensive and their successes in driving the Germans back. There was not a soul on that ship who was not very much surprised, and when later on we received the news that the Hun was being beaten back, those of us who had been in England in June and July, knowing the conditions which had been depicted to us, simply could not believe that these things were actually taking place. With our knowledge of the situation "over there," as we saw it in England, and as we were told about it, it seemed to us impossible that there should be any end to the war in the year 1918. At that time the whole energy of the British Government and of the French Government was devoted to devising ways and means to prevent the Hun from reaching the sea, the channel ports, and Paris. So there was not very much talk at that time about preparations for after the war, and we must not be very much surprised in this country if, in that respect, the whole duty of the Government was not completely performed.

There were other things we had to consider, as was the case with the other nations who were very much in the same position as we were. Our Government was intent at that time on doing all they could do in supplying the sinews of war. While some work was done in preparation for peace I must admit frankly that all was not done that might have been done. But hostilities ceased much sooner than had been expected. There is another thought that was also given voice to by the Acting Prime Minister yesterday. The problems that now stare us in the face are, in my judgment, more difficult than the problems of war, and I will tell you why. It took something like four years for Canada to build up her war machine. We were working month after month and the machinery was being added to all the time, growing in size, and it became a huge machine. In the process of making it the people of this country were affected directly and indirectly in a multitude of ways. The problem that now faces us is the unravelling of the conditions created. We must remember that that problem came upon us all at once, and I can assure my hon. friends that the problem is not by any means simple. From my knowledge of the situation at the present time, I am thoroughly convinced that the problems that this nation now have before it, in connection with the unscrambling of our military organization and the re-adjustment of conditions which have arisen as a result of four years of war, are very much more difficult and complex, and the result much more far-reaching than the problems that had to be dealt with during the war period itself. I am absolutely convinced of that, and I desire to impress the fact upon every member of this House. The immediate problems that are confronting us now, staring us squarely in the face, will not wait. These problems, in my judgment, are the most difficult problems which a nation has ever faced, and if they are not attended to properly, unless we find proper solutions for these problems, well, God help Canada; no man can tell what the consequences may be. We have a little unrest and some dissatisfaction, and there is great pessimism in some sections of the country, and it may mean something very much worse. I do not wish to frighten anybody and I do not wish to be over-pessimistic, but right here in Canada we have conditions that are akin to conditions that exist elsewhere, and it is very necessary that every member of this House should understand his responsibility in relation to the solution of these problems.

Very shortly after the armistice was signed, and our people began to think of this new situation, there were a great many who began to wonder, as my good friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), I suppose, must have been wondering, as to whether all was well at Ottawa—whether the Government had made plans and preparations to take care of this new situation. As you know, there were all sorts of rumblings and rumours about our muddling along, drifting along, not being prepared, and all that sort of thing. I do not wonder at that. It is really not surprising that ignorance should exist in the country, as to the actual work of government when we find responsible members of the House making statements such as we listened to yesterday and to-day. We can hardly blame the "man in the street."

The Government from the very first was seized of its duty. We always understood that the war was going to end, that it would not last forever. As I stated, the end came suddenly, but, nevertheless, a good many preparations had been made and a good deal of thought and study had been given to many of the problems that would naturally come up when the war would close. There had been much spade work done. Some of the foundations were laid and in some cases even the superstructures were erected. In other words, we were not all adrift. Something had been accomplished.

I am not going to take up your time to-day in attempting to cover the situation, because that would take too long. Nor am I going into details, but I simply wish, by way of illustration, to mention some of the matters that had received attention before the end of the war came and to touch very briefly upon the relationship of these matters to the problems now existing.

In the first place, as regards demobilization itself. The demobilization of our forces is by no means an easy matter, and careful thought had to be given to the methods by which that could be carried out and the machinery which must be set in motion. We do talk about these things very glibly; we are all inclined to do that. We do not know what the job actually means. Personally, I do not begin to know what demobilization means in the way of creating machinery and seeing that that machinery is operated in such a way as to cause the least possible trouble. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Major-General Mewburn), and his officials, spent weeks over that problem. They went overseas, consulted the British and French authorities and spent further weeks in working out all these details in anticipation of what would eventually happen. You know what has happened. As far as I have been able to learn, the plan has been so well worked out, and the machinery has run so smoothly, that there is practically little or no criticism left in the country as to the manner in which the work is being done.

I am speaking now solely and only of demobilization, of actually getting the men out of the army. The Minister of Militia told me the other day of an instance that occurred within the last three weeks in which some 500 men had been returned. They were taken from the ship to the dispersal area, and within half an hour after these men had arrived at the dispersal area they walked out as civilians once more. That was by no means an easy task. It involved grave study and a careful arrangement of the details in order that it might be done.

We had this afternoon and yesterday some little slam at one of the departments that was created at our last session. I refer to the department of Soldiers Civil Re-Establishment. It was created for a very specific purpose. It took the place of the Military Hospitals Commission. It has been at work for something over a year. Its expenditures for the past year will amount to something in the neighbourhood of $12,000,000. We had a mild intimation to the effect that it was created very largely for the purpose of providing salaries for somebody. That is the usual, old criticism. We have heard it a great many times. I have used it myself. It will be used as long as parliamentary institutions exist. No, that department was not created for that purpose. It was created for a very definite, a very specific purpose. It was created with the object in view of caring for every disabled Canadian soldier who came back to this country. The work of the department has two sides, one medical, the other vocational. As a result of the work, in the first place, of the Military Hospitals Commission and later of this department, we have now, scattered throughout Canada in every province, something like one hundred and fifty institutions. I need not go into the details. The members of the House are just as familiar with them as I am, and they know where these institutions are and what they are doing. Something like 2,000 or 2,500 young Canadian boys, who were " over there " and who were disabled and maimed as a result of the war, have come back, have gone through these institutions and have been refitted for life as far as it is humanly possible to do so through medical treatment and vocational training. Those 2,500 young men are now back to civil life in this country as a result of the activities of that department. In addition, there are something like 2,000 or 3,000 men actually undergoing treatment in these institutions at the present time, and there are some thousands being fitted for new employment. I am now speaking of men who cannot, on account of their disability, their injuries, their sufferings, go back to their old employments. Thousands of them are now undergoing treatment at these institutions.

I do not wish to leave the impression upon this House for one moment that all is well with that department or with any other department of the Government. In the making of war, and in the dealing with these problems of which our country had no experience and for which we were not at all equipped, it must not be wondered at that mistakes have been made. There will be criticism, some of which will doubtless be ventilated here. Hon. gentlemen opposite have even hinted at criticism from within our ranks. Be that as it may, all I wish to do is to leave the idea with the House that the department referred to was created for a definite purpose, and in my judgment it has carried on its work well—not perfectly, but nevertheless well; —and if, as a result of our deliberations during the present session, we can devise ways and means whereby that department's operations may be bettered, I am sure the members of the Government, including the minister who has it in charge, will welcome any such assistance.

Again, Mr. Speaker, time was taken by the forelock some two or three years ago in connection with another very important phase of the returned soldier problem. The matter was taken up at an interprovincial conference in this city called by the Federal Government, at which I was present as a member of the Saskatchewan Government. We sat here for two days with the federal authorities deliberating over the problem of the returned soldier to see if there was any responsibility or any work the provinces could undertake or carry on. After full consideration and full consent by the provinces it was agreed to establish what are known as Soldiers' Aid Commissions, and if I am not mistaken every province has by statute created a body of that character. These have been for some time in operation, and have done splendid work in connection with many of the problems that arise in connection with the returning men. I have visited some of these institutions, and the member for London (Mr. Cronyn) can speak of my visit to the Soldiers' Aid Commission in that city. I talked with the young man in charge, who has a staff of some six or eight persons assisting him, went through the office files, and saw the nature of the work which is there being carried on. Work of a similar character is going on throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, and has been in progress for the last two or three years. These institutions have yielded splendid results. There is a great field of activity for them.

During the session there will doubtless be discussion on the question of soldiers' settlement, a very vexed and most difficult problem. If there was but one Government in Canada in which the ownership of the public domain was vested, the problem would be very much easier of solution, but hon. gentlemen know what the existing conditions are. There are nine provinces scattered over an enormous area, and in these provinces varied conditions prevail, some owning their Crown lands, and others not. I can assure hon. gentlemen that the evolving of a satisfactory soldiers' settlement scheme under such conditions was a most complex and intricate one. I am not going to discuss the subject now, because ample opportunity for that will later on be given, but the problem was one which demanded from the Government very great consideration. We had numerous suggestions—I might say hundreds, and even thousands—from all over the country with respect to the matter; everybody had a scheme professing to afford an easy solution, but most of these suggestions were not very satisfactory because they were not very practicable. So far as I can see the Government have dealt with the question in the only practicable way that could be found.

It will be remembered that last session a Bill providing for assistance to the provinces in connection with the establishment of Labour Bureaus was presented. That action was not taken without due thought and reflection. As a matter of fact, at an interprovincial conference, called previous to last session, that question came up for consideration. It was only after thorough consideration by the premiers of the various provinces, who were accompanied in some instances by a number of their colleagues, it was only after the whole situation had been reviewed in all its aspects and the conditions likely to arise after the war reviewed, that the conclusion was reached, jointly with them, that the best way of handling the problem when it arose would be to make
5 p.m. provision for the establishment of bureaus of this nature throughout the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen opposite must not imagine that we forced this policy upon the provinces, or that we endeavoured in any way to interfere with provincial autonomy in connection with this matter. The subject was considered deliberately, coolly, and calmly with the provincial governments, and it was agreed, with the full consent of the various provincial authorities, to deal with the situation in the manner that I have described. In consequence, last session's measure providing for assistance to the provinces was submitted, and this year, on account of the conditions now prevailing, a very much larger assistance than was anticipated at that time needs to be provided. Speaking broadly, about fifty of these bureaus are at present in existence and all our work in connection with finding employment not only for the returned soldier, but for the civilian in Canada as well, is concentrated in these organizations. The danger was that if some action of this kind had not been taken we would likely have had chaos in this country in regard to the employment problem. While the system may not be working to the entire satisfaction of everybody in this country, nevertheless, so far as I have been able to judge from the representations made to me, it will reasonably meet the existing situation.

We must not forget that in this country—and the Government were thoroughly cognizant of the fact—there are a large number of organizations, patriotic and otherwise, that were simply sitting waiting, willing and ready to undertake any work that might be placed upon them just as soon as the nature of the problems requiring treatment was made manifest. Very shortly after the armistice was signed, the Government realized that the whole situation had changed, and that it was necessary to deal at once with the new conditions which had arisen. As hon gentlemen know, a new committee of the Cabinet was constituted. In this connection I may say that I am not afraid of committees or of commissions. If you have a reason for doing a thing, do not be afraid to do it simply because some one talks about it. We have had a number of committees and a number of commissions, and the great majority of them have done very useful and very necessary work, work that no government and no member of a government could carry on during these strenuous times. Very shortly after the armistice was signed we created a new committee of the Cabinet called the Repatriation and Employment Committee, which was appointed for the purpose of co-ordinating the work of the different departments of the Government and of all the various organizations outside of the Government machinery that had to deal with this problem. We had a pretty busy time for a while; during some six weeks we had a great many meetings. I am free to admit that there was a good deal of overlapping; that a good many toes were being tramped upon, through nobody's fault, by different organizations and by the departments. This committee and those associated with it found it necessary clearly to define the work of the various agencies that were brought into being to deal with the problems of demobilization and repatriation. I have had something to do with the work of this committee. I know a little of its organization and of its administrative activities, and I think I can say truthfully that we have in Canada from ocean to ocean an organization handling this problem of repatriation such as does not exist in any other belligerent country in the world. It is a very complex organization; thousands of people take part in it—it is very necessary that that be so.

There has been a good deal of talk in some countries with regard to this problem. Much has been put down on paper and many fine reports have been got out and committees and commissions formed to enquire into and deal with the subject. We have had to make inquiries as to what is being done elsewhere, and we have gathered some information. When I say that we are well in advance of the other belligerent countries in this work, I think I am stating just what the situation is. The work is not perfect; many mistakes have been made, and perhaps more mistakes will be made. There will still be a good deal of criticism, and there will likely be room for it. There has been no work just like this in history; consequently we have had very little to guide us: The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) referred this afternoon to the great war of 1812, but that war was simply a baby as compared with this giant. You cannot look into past records and get much assistance from them, because the world has never experienced a situation such as this. This war has had far-reaching consequences; it has touched practically every home; it has touched practically every aspect of our national life. To say, therefore, that in dealing with matters arising out of these new conditions mistakes should not be made or cogs should not slip—well, after all, the Government and its agencies and the private organizations that are dealing with this problem are merely human, and these things will happen.

The immediate problems which confront us naturally fall under two headings, reconstruction and repatriation. The term "reconstruction" as used in Europe at present has a somewhat different meaning from that which it has here. Something has happened over there that has not happened in Canada. A smashing and demolishing of things has taken place; there has been a devastation over there, that we have not suffered. I have only to picture in my mind what I saw in the neighbourhood of the Somme to have some little realization of what the building up of that country means in the way of labour and expenditure that will be necessary during the next few years. But the term "reconstruction" has a real meaning to us, a very deep and a very significant meaning. While it does not mean to us what it means to the people over there, nevertheless our people have learned some lessons from this war. They have learned that all is not well in the world; that some reforms are necessary. Our people clearly understand that work is ahead of this nation in that regard. In my opinion reconstruction, as applied to Canada, embraces the adjusting of the affairs of the nation so as to meet the new social and economic conditions that have arisen as a result of the war. Do not make any mistake about it, new conditions, social and economic, have arisen in our country as a result of the war, and we must adjust the affairs of the nation to meet them. Reconstruction involves also a national stock-taking of all our policies and laws that affect the well-being of our people, with a view to placing the nation in the position she should occupy as a progressive, democratic community. Every member of the House will place his stamp of approval on that statement. Reconstruction further means the taking of a long step forward through the adoption of measures and policies truly conceived and effectively and honestly administered in the interests of the great mass of the Canadian people. Reconstruction, if it means anything to us, must mean the adoption of higher ideals of citizenship, the searching for measures that will have an ever increasing tendency to unify and harmonize our many conflicting interests. They are here; we have heard a little about them so far, and I may touch on them myself before I sit down. Above all, reconstruction involves the creating of such social and economic conditions as are necessary to the comfort, happiness and prosperity of our people as a whole. Reconstruction means a going forward, not a standing still. It means progress, not stagnation.

I am but a young member of this House, and I naturally hesitate to give advice or even to voice a warning; and yet I feel that, I must do this if I am to discharge the responsibility that I bear as a member of the House and as a member of this Government. Many people in this country have the idea that our problems consist in getting back to the conditions that existed prior to August 1, 1914. Any man who holds that idea has failed to learn the lessons of the last four and a half years. I have stated on the public platform at two or three meetings that I have held, that Canada will never again be the same old Canada. The people of this country by the thousands, aye, by the hundreds of thousands, have suffered during the last four years. The lessons of this war have been burned into their very soul. The people of Canada as a whole are thinking differently, and let us not make any mistake about it, they are going to act differently when they have an opportunity.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CALDER: My hon. friends opposite applaud. Let me tell those of them who are strong party men as they are, as I have been and as I probably am, that the old ideas and the old ideals of the past are fast passing away. People in this country have been losing their moorings; many strings have been cut. The people of Canada, when the time comes, will support that Government and no other, whatever Government that may be, that has a true conception of what the people of this country demand in the way of progressive legislation.

Our reconstruction problems cover practically the whole range of our domestic policy. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was quite accurate in his statement that the tariff forms a very essential part of that work. Public health; questions dealing with child labour; the question of the control of public utilities, the nationalisation of railways, telegraphs, telephones; the distribution of the burden of taxation,—all those problems are naturally reconstruction problems. We are not going to deal with them in a day, or a week, or a year, or a session; it is going to take time. Many of them will require considerable thought and study. There are going to be sharp differences of opinion in regard to some of them, and as regards others there is a possibility that there will be only one way in which the question of policy can be decided,—that is by a direct appeal to the electorate. I am not going to take up the time of the House in dealing with those problems in detail now. Many of them will be considered during the session; some of them will be dealt with; others will have to be left over.

Just a word or two about another series of questions which we have to consider. I refer to the repatriation problem which is on our hands. What is the problem involved? What does it embrace? During the war we took something like half a million young men out of the civil life of this country. I have heard it stated that they represent more than one-half of the young men in the country. We put them into the army. They have been in the army from one to four years. They have lived under army discipline. They would go where they were told, and come when they were called. Their whole habits have been changed. Their life has been entirely different. They have suffered. Now they are coming back. The whole problem of repatriation involves the question as to how we can place those young men back into the civil life of this country where they can become useful citizens capable of properly maintaining themselves and their families. It is the biggest problem we have ahead of us, the one that is knocking at our door just now, the one that must be solved satisfactorily unless Canada is to reap an irreparable loss. What is the attitude of the men themselves towards this question? I think hon. members will all agree with me that their attitude is, on the whole, splendid. There are some exceptions. These men are coming back as civilians, not as soldiers. The great majority of them are anxious to get back into civil life just as soon as it can be arranged. They are pretty weary of the khaki; they want to get their military uniforms off their backs just as quickly as they can. They expect, and have a right to demand, a proper place in the civil life of this country just as quickly as possible. You know, many if not most of the men expect a little more than before they went away, and they are right in that. Their ideas have been broadened; they have got a broader view of life than they had before, and when they come back they expect to have an opportunity to climb just a little higher than where they were before. I say that they should have that opportunity. We should endeavour to assist them in every possible way to carry out that legitimate ambition. What is the attitude of our people on this question? During the days immediately following the armistice I think it was not just what it should have been; our people were a little indifferent; they did not quite understand the greatness of the task that confronted the nation. But it did not take long for them to find out, and I think to-day we have in Canada, from ocean to ocean, an entirely different spirit. I think our people as a whole are anxious to help solve the problem that confronts us. We have thousands of willing workers in all our chief centres throughout the country doing splendid work, and I know the men themselves appreciate what is being done.

What is our attitude to be in this House? There is no doubt what our feelings are. There is not a single member of this House who does not realize the debt we owe these men who went over there to fight our battle and uphold the liberties and institutions of this and of every other civilized country in the world. We all know that, and we all realize that the debt we owe these men can never be repaid in dollars and cents; the men are not looking for that. It seems to me there is one fundamental idea that we should keep in view in dealing with this problem. Our aim should be to endeavour to create such conditions as to make the returned soldier self-reliant at the earliest possible moment. We should not encourage him to lean on the State, as that would be the greatest wrong we could do him, or on charity or on municipal or other institutions. I have met numbers of these men and talked matters over with them quietly, and the prevailing feeling I have met is a desire to get back into the life of this country just as quickly as they can. It is not charity, not dollars and cents, that they want. What they want is proper employment and a chance to make a home for themselves and their families, and unless this House approaches the problem from that viewpoint we are liable to make very many mistakes and do harm that it will takes very many years to repair.

I do not wish to say something that will be misunderstood, but nevertheless I am going to say what I have in mind because I believe in plain speech—I think we always get farther and act more properly when we speak our minds very plainly, and I just wish to give brief voice to this thought: We shall never deal with this problem properly unless we are very careful about the politician who is abroad looking for votes. I say that advisedly, I say it purposely; and I do not think it will be misunderstood. The greatest danger that confronts Canada to-day in connection with this whole problem is the self-seeking politician who is abroad in the land looking for votes and unless we as members of this House realize what our responsibility is and approach the problem from that angle at this its most critical stage, we are liable to make serious mistakes from which we shall not recover for very many years.

There are just one or two other questions I shall touch on. Almost every speaker except the last (Mr. Sinclair) has referred to the necessity for a united Canada. There has been considerable internal strife in the past, very serious strife. That strife operates against everything that the great majority of the people of this country want. Canada is never going to prosper or develop as she should so long as this internal strife continues to exist, and I desire to add just one word to all that has been said on this question. Unless the public men and statesmen of this country use their heads and their hearts for the purpose of putting an end to these conditions, Canada will never be what it should be, and we can never prosper as we should.

As a western representative, and particularly as a representative of the province of Saskatchewan, I feel I should say one word more. I refer to the conditions existing in Western Canada, where all the elements of disunion exists—A pretty big and serious problem. I am referring now to the tariff cleavage between East and West. You know, we might as well look that squarely in the face and recognize the situation as it exists; there is no use dodging it, that situation is there. What are the people of Canada going to do? Can it be settled in some way or another? Is there a possibility of a settlement? There is no doubt as to the feeling out West. There is no division among the people. All parties are practically united. What is to be done? You will have an opportunity later in the session to consider the question. In the meantime, I simply wish to point out to this House, and to the people of this country, that that is one of the other questions on the horizon that in many ways looks dangerous; at any rate it divides the people of this country and puts them in two hostile camps, fighting against each other all the time. If Canada is to be what we hope it shall be, then an honest and earnest attempt must be made to solve that problem which stares us squarely in the face.

I have just a few words to say with regard to some remarks made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). I speak to him as one of the separated brethren. There are a few of us in this House, there are a good many thousand out in the country. I desire on this occasion to say a word or two, I will not say in their defence, but on their behalf. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) very tactfully I think, threw out an invitation in connection with a statement he made that the light was still burning in the window, and that the wanderer would be welcomed home. My hon. friend from Brome was just a little more blunt, and suggested that some of us should go and see the Finance Minister, and ask if he agreed with the Grits as far as the tariff was concerned, and if he said no, there would be nothing further for us to do except to walk over to the other side of the House. He also intimated that if we Liberals on this side of the House had forsaken our old ideals and were worshipping Baal, the high god of protection, why we could stay just where we were. I am not going over the old story. Everybody knows the history of this country during the past year and a half. People know why this Government was brought into being. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) would say it was conceived in iniquity and all the rest of it. But I think the people clearly understand the issues that were at stake at that time, and the reasons why the Government was brought into being. There was a very important principle at stake, and we differed honestly in regard to it. I have never quarelled with any man because he held different views from mine on that question, and I do not propose to do so. It is a passing question. It has gone and I hope the occasion will never arise again in this country, and that conscription will never be necessary. I wish to say—and I am sure I voice the sentiments of every Liberal Unionist on this side of the House, and of the vast majority of Liberal Unionists in the country—that when we acted as we did we believed we did the right thing. I do not think our friends opposite will quarrel with us when we take that stand. I wish to say personally that I have never had one such regret for the action I took. I have received many letters from my friends, and I have conversed with many of them. They have wagged their heads and wondered what was going to happen—and they were the only people who worried; I have never done so for a minute. I say it was not easy to do what was done, but when a man has a conviction within himself, and the consciousness that he has done the right thing he does not need to worry very much. I have learned a lot of things, Mr. Speaker, since coming to Ottawa. I am not going to mention them all, but I have learned that the problems and difficulties confronting this Government during the past year and at the present time are very great. I have already intimated that, in my judgment, the work immediately ahead of us was more important and more difficult than the work we undertook during the war period. My hon. friend from Brome, if I judge his speech aright, seems to think that there is just one thing to be dealt with at the present time, namely the tariff. In the meantime the home may burn down. We have problems confronting us right now demanding immediate attention, all kinds of problems that must be considered and solved during the next few months, and I wonder if the people of this country are asking us to lock horns just at this moment on a question that has divided the people of Canada for something like forty or fifty years. I doubt it very much. Just let me say that when I joined this Government I joined as a Liberal, and I am a Liberal to-day. More than that, no person can make me anything else. There may be those who would like to drive me out of the Liberal party, but they cannot do it. I care not whether I am in the organization or whether I have any part in the organization—that means very little in times like these. I have had letters from my friends out West saying: For goodness sake, Calder, come over while there is time —as somebody said to-day—or it may be too late. This question of party is a very small thing at the present time, in my judgment. There is something bigger at stake than mere politics at the moment. We have bigger, more important work to do. When the time comes later on there may be those who will desire to play politics in this country. Well and good; let that be done when the time does come. Just now we have something else to attend to.

We have a hard session ahead of us, and probably it will be a long one. We shall have many problems to deal with and probably there are a good many rocks ahead. Canada is facing a very serious situation. I have not any doubt at all as to what the outcome will be. During four years of war the Canadian people played a magnificent part, and they secured results in every phase of war work that no person could have dreamed would be possible of accomplishment. I have not the slightest doubt that in connection with the problems that we are now dealing with, and which we must deal with during this session, our people will be equal to the situation. I am not pessimistic in any sense. Our people throughout the war have shown a genius for organization, and an ability to meet the situation with which they are confronted that will stand them in good stead in the months to come. I have not the slightest doubt at all that we will get safely over the hill; indeed, much more safely than many other countries that are troubled with problems such as we have at the present time.

I might just say, in conclusion, that I did not last session avail myself to any extent of the opportunity of speaking in the House. I think I probably acted wisely in adopting that course. Being new here, I was very anxious to get to know the members and to learn a little about the atmosphere and all that sort of thing. I must thank the House for the indulgence that it has shown to me to-day and the attentive manner in which it has listened to my very rambling remarks.

On the motion of Mr. L. J. Gauthier (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville), the debate was adjourned.

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Thursday, February 27, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Thirteenth Report of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada for the year ended March 31, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Reid.

Certain Orders in Council respecting Housing.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

PROPOSAL TO PLACE COASTWISE AND INLAND WATER VESSELS UNDER RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. MURPHY: Explain.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This Bill is for the purpose of compelling the boats on our inland waters and coastwise trade to come under the control of the Railway Commission. At present the only boats that are under the control of that commission are those that are connected with the large railway corporations in our country. They are compelled to file their rates, tolls, tariff grievances, with the Railway Board, while the other 4,500 boats—because there are 4,500 boats on the Canadian Register—are allowed to charge whatever rates they please, call or not at any dock or port as they please, and are a law unto themselves. When we take into consideration the fact that the people of Canada have spent nearly $350,000,000 in deepening our waterways, buoying and lighting our harbours and rivers, building our docks, piers and canals throughout the country, and then find themselves without any control so far as Government control is concerned, we cannot help realizing that we are placed in a somewhat humiliating position. This is, however, practically the only public utility in Canada that is not under some form of Government control, and Canada is practically the only country in the world that has not absolute control over her shipping on inland waters and coastal trade. I hope, when this matter comes before the House, hon. members will give it every consideration and that it will become law at the earliest possible date. I understand that a Bill for the consolidation of the Railway Act has already been introduced into the Senate, and I hope it will come before the House in the near future. If it does, I trust I shall be allowed the privilege of placing an amendment in that Bill containing the principles contained in this Bill which I have now laid before the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Irrigation Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RECLAMATION OF DOMINION LANDS BY DRAINAGE.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to authorize the reclamation of Dominion lands by drainage.

Mr. BUREAU: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill, which is of some importance, provides for the establishment of a reclamation service for the purpose of reclaiming Dominion lands by drainage. The work contemplated to be done under this Bill is to be done under the Drainage Acts passed in Alberta and Saskatchewan, to which provinces the Bill alone applies. After a series of conferences a division of responsibility as between Federal and provincial governments has been arranged. This Bill is to take care of the Federal responsibility.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS SURVEYS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the Dominion Lands Surveys Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BUREAU: Explain the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I gave an opportunity to do so on the introduction. It is not competent to do so on the first reading.

Mr. BUREAU: You are going too fast.

Bill read the first time.

ALLEGED TRADE DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon): I desire to bring to the attention of the Government a question of national importance. In the Montreal Gazette of to-day, Thursday, February 27, there appears this cablegram from its resident correspondent in London:

> Canada's trade handicapped in favour of the United States. Trade Commission lodges protest with Lloyd George. Change unlikely soon. Until brains of country get back on jobs discrimination will continue.
> London, February 26.—Until the Peace Conference is over, and the brains of this country are back on their jobs again in Great Britain, there is little hope of the discrimination against Canada in the matter of imports being removed, declared I. N. Jones, member of the Canadian Trade Commission, to-day.
> In support of this opinion Lloyd Harris and Mr. Jones have addressed strong representations to Premier Lloyd George and Sir Albert Stanley, president of the Board of Trade, showing clearly where discrimination exists.

I wish to know what is the nature of this discrimination, and whether Mr. Lloyd Harris and Mr. Jones have authority from the Government of Canada to make such representations to the Prime Minister of England direct.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): The news item in question was drawn to my attention only a few moments ago by my hon. friend. I have no official information in confirmation of the report, and I must take the liberty of doubting that Great Britain would discriminate against Canada in favour of the United States or of any other country. My experience in the negotiations which the Government has during the past few months been conducting with the British authorities respecting the purchase of our agricultural and other products has been such as to assure me, if assurance were needed, that Great Britain is doing everything possible to facilitate and promote the trade of Canada with the Mother country. I am unable to say whether Messrs. Jones and Lloyd Harris made any such representations or not. Their powers and duties are defined by the commission which appointed them as Trade Commissioners Overseas. From time to time they take up with the British authorities matters relating to trade, but not having any official information as to the particular matter in question, I am unable to make any further comment. I shall be glad, however, to look into the matter.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

THE PUNISHMENT OF DESERTERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): On the front page of the Ottawa Evening Journal of yesterday, under the heading, "All deserters appear again for heavy fine—minimum fixed at $250, and the new law is to be retroactive" there appears this statement:

> It is further understood that this order in council will be retroactive, that is to say, that any deserter who has already given himself up and been let off with a fine less than $250 can be re-arrested and re-fined at least to the minimum amount fixed in the new order. This will mean that hundreds of Quebec deserters who have been let off with a five dollar fine are liable to re-arrest and re-fine.

I should like particularly to know whether this is a proper representative of the Order in Council, and whether under its provisions those who have already been tried will be subject to re-arrest and re-trial.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): The Order in Council to which the extract refers does not provide for the punishment of any person who has already been punished in accordance with the law. There is a class of cases, however, of those who registered and were refused exemption who subsequently failed to report on being ordered to do so, and for whose cases, in the opinon of the Justice Department, as to which I think there can be no dispute, no provision was made for a fine at all. The only punishment appearing in the regulations which it was open to magistrates to inflict in the cases was imprisonment. It is stated with regard to this class that there have been in many cases convictions where fines have been imposed. The Order in Council is designed to enact that wherever in such cases fines of substantial character have been imposed consistent with the magnitude of the offense—and the limits are fixed at $250 and $5,000—those convictions are ratified as legal. The Order in Council does not go beyond that to ratify any conviction as legal, nor does it make illegal a conviction which when it was made was in accordance with law.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Wednesday, February 26th.

Mr. LOUIS JOSEPH GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon the ground I wish to cover this afternoon it is my intention to make two preliminary remarks. First of all, I wish to tender to the Government of this country, and especially to the Acting Prime Minister, my sincere thanks for their broad-mindedness in honouring as they have done the memory of our late beloved Chief. They have sympathized with us fully in our sorrow, and it is only right that we should proffer them our gratitude.

I also wish to tender to the mover and the seconder of the Address my congratulations for the able manner in which they have performed the arduous task that was allotted to them. Not wishing to risk a breach of the rules of the House by falling into tedious repetition, I shall confine myself to endorsing all the good things that have been said of these two hon. members. Their speeches, which were delivered with masterly skill, showed marks of deep thought.

Coming now to the subject before the House, I shall first answer some of the statements that have been made by two hon. ministers of the Crown, namely the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) and the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder). The Minister of Public Works informed us that numerous complaints were reaching the Cabinet every day about after-the-war conditions, and his message to the people of Canada was to do away with unemployment in Canada. By this remedy, I suppose, he expects to avoid the complaints which threaten to overwhelm the Cabinet, and that peace will replace unrest. Is that a real remedy for the evil? Taking the picture he drew so vividly, with Canada called upon to borrow from $100,000,000 to $125,000,000 for a number of years to come, and with a net debt of two billion dollars, does he believe that his remedy will put a stop to the complaints which are pouring into Ottawa from all parts of the country? Does he believe that the feeling of unrest will cease in view of the policy of extravagance which he has offered to the House, involving an expenditure of money by the millions of dollars? According to his statement, we shall be compelled to borrow every year the enormous sum of from $100,000,000 to $125,000,000. I say, Sir, that we knew the evil as well as he did, but I regret to be compelled to confess that I do not believe the remedy he is offering will cure the situation, or that peace will replace the unrest that he told us existed in this country. This Minister of Public Works made a statement to which I have listened with a great deal of attention. I find, in perusing Hansard this morning, that the sentence he uttered in this House has been altered. It may have been a slip of the tongue, but I cannot, on account of those who heard the statement and who have not read the report, let it pass. I must enter my protest, and I must say to the House that I felt offended to hear an hon. minister of the Crown, on his own responsibility from his seat in this House, telling the members that he had read in the press that France intended to repudiate part of her war debt—France who has done so much for humanity, France with her indomitable courage, with all the losses she has sustained, France who has always been in the vanguard, fighting that right should prevail against might. If she were repudiating a single part of her war debt, she would not be the France we have known, the France we have loved, the France who has been the bulwark of civilization in the tremendous war which has just closed. There was another statement from the Minister of Public Works which has amazed me considerably. This statement I find in Hansard this morning, and I must take it as I heard it yesterday and as I have read it this morning. The hon. Minister of Public Works said last year that ships were more necessary than anything else. In fact he is reported on page 50 as saying—

> A year ago shipping was more vital to winning the war than were men or shells or anything else.

Well, Sir, if this statement is true—and I believe it to be true because I have heard it before in this very Chamber—why did we have conscription? Why did my hon. friend leave his party on that very question? And if my hon. friend thought, according to the advice that he had received from men in high office, that he was led into error when he was told that ships were not more necessary than men, but that men were more necessary than ships and we were compelled to have conscription, how is it he now contends that ships were more necessary than men, and how can be explain his remaining where he is to-day? My hon. friend, in his desire to defend his new friends in the Government in which he holds such a high position, has been compelled to let the truth fall from his lips, as the Book of Wisdom says, "Iniquitas mentita est sibi," "Iniquity has been a witness against itself."

We come now to the other minister of the Crown, the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder). He has invited criticism, and I shall avail myself of his invitation, and I shall try to answer as briefly as possible. The hon. gentleman has uttered a sentence that can be applied to the speech he delivered to the House yesterday. He told us that there had been a good deal of talk by the opponents of the Administration, but there had been nothing done. I believe, Sir, this assertion fits exactly, if some one wished to study it, the speech of the hon. gentlemen and the administration of everything in his department. The hon. minister informs us also that partisanship has disappeared, or is about to disappear. May I be permitted to ask the hon. minister if it is not true that partisanship is still rampant in any department, and especially in his own department? I hold in my hand an official advertisement, and it is my intention to have it printed in Hansard. This is my answer to the assertion of the hon. minister that partisanship has disappeared, or, is about to disappear. Here is a statement issued by Mr. Daly, director of repatriation for the Repatriation Committee. It is in regard to free medical treatment for ex-soldiers and sailors. I regret to have to read such a document. It is contrary to the method in which I generally make speeches in this House, but I hope I will be allowed, for once, to depart from my rule. This is in answer to the assertion of the hon. minister, and, in order to be complete it must be read in its entirety: It reads:

> Those discharged soldiers or sailors who become ill or disabled again as a result of some disease or injury suffered during war service receive free medical and surgical treatment.
> This service is provided by the Medical Branch of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment.
>
> An ex-soldier or ex-sailor who has a recurrence of a war disability should, if he is not too ill, go at once to the local medical officer of this Department.
>
> If he is too ill he should have that medical officer notified at once.
>
> Should he be taken ill in a place where there is no representative of the Department, he should call in a local physician to give him the necessary immediate treatment and ask him to communicate immediately all details of the case to the nearest medical officer of the Department.
>
> The name of the authorized medical representative of this department for each locality is given alongside.
>
> Treatment at the expense of this department can only be secured through these representatives. The Department cannot pay any bills for treatment which have not been authorized by the department.
>
> If the medical officers recommend it pay is given to patients and allowances are granted to their dependents by the department, during the period of treatment.
>
> The established scale of pay and allowances that may be granted depends upon the extent to which the treatment recommended by the medical officer of the department prevents the patient from doing his regular work.
>
> Arrangements for special care of patients of the department have been made with hospitals in all the larger towns and cities from coast to coast.
>
> Sanatoria for treating tuberculosis under most favourable conditions are operated in every province under the direct supervision of the department
>
> H. J. Daly,
> Director of Repatriation.

Here is the list of medical men appointed by the Government. There are some names which are very familiar to us, and I have had information, which I believe to be reliable, which enables me to attach to each name the political proclivities of the appointee. I will give the list to the House as I have received it. The official document says that representatives of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, in addition to this list, are named also constantly. The list is as follows:—

If you take the list you will find that out of 49 medical officers there are only 16 who so far as my information goes are not friends of the Government. I do not accuse the Government of appointing their friends as medical officers for ex-soldiers and sailors, but what is the use of a minister of the Crown coming into this House, speaking from his seat in Parliament on his own responsibility and affirming that partisanship has disappeared, or is about to disappear? The document says that additions are being made to this list constantly. If we take it in the same proportion, we will see that out of over 100 medical officers appointed by this department two-thirds of them are friendly to the Government. I do not object to that; I admit that it is fair, but virtue should wait before praising itself too highly when the Government has such a record as this. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization has also told us that he has been in public life for fifteen years, and he has affirmed that the self-seeking politician is a danger to Canada. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows whereof he speaks. That is his statement. I do not challenge it. He has the experience. He is known as a public man from one end of the country to the other, and when he makes such a statement I believe the statement is true, coming from such a man.

The minister has informed us that the armistice was signed on November 11, 1918. This Government was elected as a win-the-war Government. Now, the war is over. I never could understand that, having beaten the Huns as we have, the world should be expected to accept the camouflage of saying that what was signed on November 11 was an armistice when it was in fact an unconditional surrender. We have absolute proof that Germany, in signing this armistice, was surrendering and that when she signed it the war was over.

If it is true that the problems following peace are more stupendous than those which preceded it, and if it has taken this Government four years to build up their war machine, as the minister has said, do they want to take four years more to build up their peace machine? Why did they not call Parliament together before now? Why have the Government waited three months and why have they shouldered responsibilities that they had no reason to shoulder at all? They were elected to win the war, they believe they have won the war and that should be enough for any set of men even such an honourable body of men as our ministers are. Why had Parliament not been called upon before a few days ago to do its duty and to shoulder its part of the responsibility? I suppose the Government, having built their war machine, want to build, according to their own ideas, the peace machine to be put into operation when the war is over.

The hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) said to the House that there was a feeling of unrest in this country. Could it be otherwise? In a country like Canada, with the peculiar kind of government that we have, is it extraordinary that there should be unrest? Not at all. I shall explain what I mean. Having the confidence I have in the institutions of this country, even if I were alone, I would stand up and make the statement which I shall now address to this House. This Government has been elected by a majority of the people. Whether the lists were right or wrong, we accepted the challenge; we lost the fight, but we are game enough to acknowledge that the ministers represent the majority of those who voted. But, they had a duty to perform. The first duty of all was to call Parliament in session when the war was over because they were elected to win the war and Parliament ought to have been consulted. The charge that I make against this Government is that they have waited for three months after the armistice was signed when they should have proceeded immediately to call Parliament together.

The Minister of Immigration and Colonization has told us that the members of the Opposition are like the man on the street. I have no objection to being likened to the man on the street. The man on the street is a citizen of this country. The man on the street is a voter if he has not been disfranchised by the Government.

The man on the street belongs to the common people. He bears the burden of taxation in peace time, and he risks his life in time of war, and he is entitled to the respect of even of a minister of the Crown. The man on the street, Sir, though he may be humble, modest, poor and even destitute has always been defended by the party which is now sitting to your left, and I am not ashamed to be compared to him. The man on the street is the backbone of the country when he is well treated, but when covered with scorn he is apt to lose his patience and to crush those who think they are powerful because they happen to be temporarily holding the reins of power in the country.

The hon. minister (Mr. Calder) also told us that "he was still a Liberal and that nobody could put him out." I really think, Mr. Speaker, that nobody can put him out of the Government, which he seems to control. The hon. gentleman announces that he is still a Liberal, that he was a Liberal when he entered the Cabinet, and that he will remain one. I shall not enter into any discussion with him on that point. I shall not discuss his motives for leaving the party, it is no business of mine. But speaking for myself, I tell the hon. gentleman I do not regret his exit from our ranks. When the fruit becomes too ripe, Mr. Speaker, it falls from the tree which has given it life and which has brought it to maturity. The tree still continues to grow and to give its own life to other fruit, but the fruit which has fallen to the ground is destined for destruction.

Every hon. gentleman occupying a seat in this House will agree with me, I suppose, when I say that in order that this country may be happy and prosperous we must have stability in Canada, and to have stability our people must have confidence in those who govern them. I submit, Sir, that the present Government is a peculiar one. It was elected to win the war, and the Government still remains in office. It is a Unionist Government without union. Free traders live under the same roof with ardent protectionists. Ministers are the target for the poisoned arrows of their followers and supporters; there is division in their ranks, and the majority of the people of this country who had confidence in this Government when they elected it will, I believe, lose that confidence if something is not speedily done to solve the problems which confront us. To judge from the speeches delivered yesterday by ministers of the Crown, there appears to them to be only one problem to deal with, and that is the problem of how to remain in office. Let me tell these hon. gentlemen that the country is not at all interested in that problem. The inaction of the Government, and the divisions which exist within it, have created that feeling of unrest in the country to which the Minister of Public Works yesterday made allusion.

Among the problems that confront us I find that there are three which require immediate solution, and it is the duty of the Government to submit to Parliament a remedy which will cure the evils which threaten us. It is no use, Mr. Speaker, trying to avoid a solution of the problems which are calling for attention; it is useless to try and postpone the consideration of them. Now is the time for this Parliament to face the situation and to apply the remedy. The three problems in question, to my mind, are: first, the demobilization and reinstatement of our soldiers in civil life; second, the settlement of the question of capital and labour, and third, the agrarian problem. This Government was elected because it raised from one end of the country to the other the clamour that it favoured our boys at the Front. Do you not believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is about time to take care of the boys who are coming from the Front? Do you not believe that those boys should be shown whether those war-time speeches were the true expression of sincere feeling? From my seat in the House yesterday I heard members of the Government telling us what they were doing in the way of meeting the existing problems. Admitting, for the sake of discussion, that the Government is doing all that it can, that it has announced its actual policy in that regard, nevertheless, if that policy fails of results let the ministers have recourse to another. Mr. Speaker, when the boys rallied to the colours we promised to look after their interests. Well, the war is over. If the Government was able to supply ships to send our boys to the Front, let it with equal promptness find ships for transporting them back to their native land. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is a vexing problem, but a Government composed of the giants of the two political parties must surely be clever enough to overcome this difficulty in a satisfactory manner. Anyway, let it make an effort to do so. The policy which it has been pursuing has given rise to criticism and complaint. In all the large cities we hear it asserted that nobody is looking after the interests of the soldiers when they return from the Front. I repeat, Sir, that it is the imperative duty of the Government to provide in a speedy and satisfactory manner for the demobilization of our soldiers and their reinstatement in civil life. They have done their duty at the Front, and they are coming back covered with glory. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Government does not want our soldiers to feel ashamed because it is not performing its duty as well as those gallant fellows did theirs on the field of battle.

The second problem to be dealt with is that relating to capital and labour. I was very much interested yesterday upon hearing the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvelll) tell the financiers and the industrial corporations of this country: "You have made money by the war; put your money into new undertakings even if you do not receive any profit therefrom." Is that a remedy, Mr. Speaker? Capital is timorous; capital wants to feel its way before entering into any new undertaking. Because they have made money, does the Government believe that the financiers should invest that money in new undertakings at a time when the industrial market in Canada is one of such little stability? Not at all. Before plunging into new enterprises, capital wants to know the exact condition it has to face. Our captains of industry have been wise in the past, they are wise in the present, and we rely on their wisdom for the future of our country. It is bad counsel for a minister of the Crown to tell the financiers of Canada to spend their money without looking for any return.

The workingmen also are confronted with a situation the details of which they must understand. I admit that the transformation of our war industries into civil industries is a more or less difficult problem. I admit also that the workingman may not have been as provident as he should have been during the time of war; he was making a large salary and should have saved for the future. I am told, however, that the savings of the workingmen do not amount to much and that during the period of the transformation of our war industries into civil industries, they will have to rely on the credit extended to them by the grocer, the baker, and all those who supply the necessaries of life for them and their families. If the Government does not tackle the problem of capital and labour, the workingmen, when they have lost all credit, will be looking for trouble. It is just as well not to be afraid of what is coming. It is our duty, as a minister of the Crown has told us, to inform the Government of what we know, in the expectation that the Government will do what it should do. The cost of living ought to be lowered. Profiteers should be called to account; they should be punished, not knighted. But I suppose the word of these men is listened to with more careful attention than are the words and the voice of the poor workingmen of Canada.

The third problem is the agrarian problem; it is the last but not the least. The farmers have responded wonderfully to the appeals of the Federal Government and the provincial governments; men have gone back to the farm and have worked to intensify their production. But just at the moment when the farming industry was at its height the war was terminated, and now the farmers are looking for a steady market in which they can sell their produce. They must have this market. The Government is appealing to the soldiers to settle on farms when they return to this country. Many who had been attracted from the farms to our large cities went back to the farm. Is there any sense in appealing to our people to take up farm work, in asking our soldiers to settle on the farms and our young men to remain on the farm, when the agricultural products of our country find no market? The farmers deserve to have the market; there is no use in postponing a settlement of this ques-

4 p.m. tion; it ought to be settled immediately. This postponement cannot relieve the situation; I affirm, with all due respect to any members of this House who do not agree with me, that the postponement of the solution of such a problem as this is an economic error.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Having regard to these troublous problems which confront the country, may I be permitted, without indulging in flattery, to say to the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) that his day is coming? The affairs of the country require wise direction, and the people hope that the hon. gentleman will prove that he has the intellectual, the moral and the political stature to find and offer to the people a solution of these pressing problems which will bring contentment and satisfaction to every home in Canada. This no time for postponing settlement of these questions; a policy must be pronounced without delay.

Notwithstanding the words that fell from the lips of the two ministers of the Crown who spoke yesterday, I contend that in this as in any democratic country a parliamentary Opposition is necessary. We on this side intend to do our duty as the Constitution requires us to do it. We have lost our late chieftain; he has gone beyond the Great Divide, but he has left us his spirit, which still dominates our deliberations; he has left his teachings, which we still hear ringing in our ears, and we have his gospel embedded in our hearts. It is a gospel of tolerance, of justice, of equal rights and of democracy; its foundation is the human soul. That gospel must at the end triumph. It may happen that the men of our generation will not see the hour of the triumph, but the triumph will come, because that gospel appeals to the mind and to the heart of every free man, of every lover of democracy.

Mr. CHARLES SHEARD (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, as a young and new member of this House, I wish in rising to continue the debate to pay my compliment to the mover and the seconder of the Address, and to congratulate the Government on selecting two returned soldiers for that onerous and responsible duty. Not only was I very much impressed by the magnificence of their effort and the manner in which they discharged that duty, but I felt proud that amongst our soldier men we had two who could, upon the floor of the House of Commons, so vigorously, so ably, so splendidly, and with such refinement, in moving and seconding the Address, present the feelings prevalent in this country. The more particularly am I pleased because in the person of the seconder of the Address I have an old professional colleague and friend, one whom I have watched and admired and respected ever since the first day he entered as a student on the study of medicine.

Having said this, I am compelled also to remark upon the conditions under which to-day this House has met and the conditions under which we met last year. Then it was indeed a dark day of deep anxiety for the Empire. Men from this House of Commons went forth upon the streets of our capital with deep concern to study the bulletins outside the newspaper offices so as to know what was the next thing that had occurred, anxious as to what might be the outcome, some doubting, all hoping, yet restless, worried, I may say; and that feeling was but a mirror of the condition throughout the entire Dominion. Those who were not only concerned with Empire but deeply concerned and anxious regarding their loved ones who were in the thick of the fray—aye, night and day, without exaggerating, they were there, living through the very mental anxieties almost of the lost, watching through the night, wondering if the next telephone ring might not bring some sad news, as it has done to many members of this House, to tell them that their dear loved one had unfortunately paid the full price of his devotion. To-day we meet under far happier circumstances. We meet, glorying in the realization that the Allied armies of the world have achieved a great and wonderful victory. We are proud too as Canadians that, in all the fighting, in all the struggling, in all the disasters, in all the uncertainties, in all the trials, the Canadian nation has played a man's part; a part equal to the best in this great, titanic struggle.

To-day we meet to make, in all seriousness, with every impartiality, a plain, honest, retrospect of our progress up to this hour. The hon. member (Mr. Gauthier) said that this Government was elected as a win-the-war Government. That is undoubtedly true and I want to express here my conviction that never before since Confederation has there been a government of this Dominion confronted with such a herculean task, confronted with such multitudinous and Protean difficulties, and that has come out with such a magnificent record of achievement as has the present Government. And, Sir, I am convinced, notwithstanding all the criticism that that is the unanimous conviction of practically all the people of this country.

I desire to say a word or two in the way of kindly admonition and advice, so far as I am able, regarding the work left as the aftermath of this great war and which it is the legacy of this Government still to wrestle with. I conceive it to be the bounden duty of every member of this House of Commons to shed any light that he can upon the difficulties so admittedly numerous which confront us to-day. The great work immediately before us as a lawful and legitimate legacy of this great war is the work of reconstruction. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the arguments that have been put forward from both sides of the House as to the specific proposals upon the question of reconstruction. Whilst the needs and the difficulties have been dwelt upon, I must confess at the outset to some difficulty in laying hold of tangible suggestions, suggestions into which one can, so to speak, get his teeth, that he may know what we are going to do next. I purpose, in my humble way, to offer one or two suggestions.

Our first duty is to the returned soldier. I do not think there is in this House a single man who is not desirous of doing all he can and all the country will, in his judgment permit him to do for the returned soldier. When the soldier comes back, welcomed as he is by his friends, flushed with victory and pride, hailed by his fellow citizens and received everywhere with open arms, may we not, as we cheer him and grasp him by the hand, have something in the hand to help to make his homecoming beneficial to him? For that reason, the first suggestion that I am going to offer to this House is the wisdom of considering an increase in the pensions for the returned men. I believe I am correct in stating that at present the pension for total disability figures are somewhere around $600 for the private soldier, and that a difference is made between the pension for the private and that for the officer. At the outset, speaking for myself, I very seriously doubt the wisdom of creating any such distinction. Whilst I give every credit to the officer, yet I think the magnificent work, accomplished by all our troops has been accomplished equally by the private as by the officer, and the same is true in regard to their record of suffering and sacrifice.

I will face this question fairly and squarely by asking myself, what would I be satisfied with as a pension for total disability so far as the country reasonably can provide? I know there are difficulties in doing all we desire, but after all is $600 under present conditions a very liberal allowance for total disability? Conceive what total disability is! I saw a returned soldier in the city of Toronto who had lost both legs and his left arm. I presume that man would not be ranked as totally disabled and would not receive the pension for that class. Yet what condition is that man in to face life? Would any man take $600 or $6,000 per year and go through life under those conditions? And yet we commence by awarding a pension that is based on total disability, and then our Pension Board figures the degree of disability according to their conception of total disability, and total disability is an uncertain quantity. Some one may say that figures cannot lie. Well, I do not wish to say they cannot, but I know that some figurers can, and I know that when you want to obliterate the truth or cover up a patent and obvious defect, the best way to do it is to take a percentage basis of calculation; and calculating a man's degree of disability on that basis you can start with a very serious handicap and figure it down almost to nothing. I think that is where there is danger of dissatisfaction creeping in almost without the knowledge, and certainly without the intention, of the Government, and it might be held up by some as something which was not creditable and which did not represent an honest endeavour to deal justly by the returned men. For that reason I want to offer the blunt suggestion of raising the total disability pension from the present rate up to $1,000 a year. Some may say: You will bankrupt the country. Not a bit of it; because the number of total disabilities will be comparatively small, and I am convinced that if my suggestion were adopted it would not add a very great amount to our Pension Bill. But it would be a great satisfaction in the future to know that an earnest, honest effort had been made to discharge as far as we legitimately could our duty and obligation to the men who have so gloriously distinguished Canada among the nations. And, Sir, no matter to what height the tidal wave of our generosity may rise we still remain a debtor to our men who by their service have given us that protection which Canada can never fully compensate for.

The next question I wish to deal with is the question of the aliens. The alien question is a very serious one in many of our cities. It is a very serious one in the city of Toronto. Aliens are divided into two classes: the enemy alien, and the ordinary alien. The enemy aliens—and there were, and still are, a number of them resident in the city of Toronto—are individuals, we can hardly call them men, who have come into our midst and fostered the ideas of the Teutons. They have done all they could to injure the loyal citizens of my city; they have connived in every intrigue that they could possibly conceive. They have houses in some cases, and have sheltered within them enemy aliens until they were discovered by the police. They have propagated that rotten system of espionage which has honeycombed the civilization of the whole of this continent. They have been forced into concentration camps, they have been surrounded by guards, they have been threatened with the pointed bayonet, and to-day they are waiting and anxiously hoping that now the war is over they may creep back again and mix with loyal, honest, and patriotic Canadians. I want to say with all the emphasis at my command that I believe I am speaking for the whole of this country when I say it, that the best policy to adopt regarding enemy aliens is to pack them all aboard the first outward-bound ship and see that they go back to the countries whence they came.

While on this question, I am forced to refer to the War-Time Elections Act. I am glad the Government intend to bring down a measure which purports to make permanent some of the provisions of that Act. I hope they will see to it that none of the enemy aliens at least, whether or not they have been implicated as active enemies, will be placed on the franchise rolls of this Dominion for the next twenty years. We can do without them. It was one of the master strokes of this Government, an act which carried with it the commendation of all loyal people, when they decided in the great effort of this war to proceed along the lines of the old British people who came here and laid the foundations of our institutions. I think we can sometimes take a lesson from the great republic to the south of us, and upon this question I agree with the policy of Roosevelt, who declared that as far as he was concerned, speaking as an American citizen, he believed that a country that was good enough to live in was good enough to fight for. I like that sentiment, and I say it is a good one for the people of the Dominion of Canada to adhere to.

But when we have disposed of the enemy alien, we have by no means disposed of the whole alien question. Besides enemy aliens, we have many other aliens in the city of Toronto. We have aliens who have been exempted from military service for international reasons, very largely, and have continued to do business and to take advantage of the situation. I had the privilege when the Military Service Act was being enforced to sit upon one of the exemption tribunals in the city of Toronto, and I will give a concrete case to illustrate my meaning. A young man who was conducting a grocery store in the city of Toronto applied to that tribunal for exemption. His father was an old, feeble and infirm gentleman who had put all his capital into the business in the hope that the son would be permitted to carry it on. The son was of military age, and applied for exemption to the military tribunal on which I sat. We discussed his case very carefully and thoroughly, but we decided that, although his business might be ruined, he would be compelled to go to the Front. As a result of our decision the store was closed, and he had to make the best of the situation. Wishing to know the true facts of the case, I visited the locality, and I was astonished to find that an alien had rented the store next door and had started the same kind of business. I asked him when he came there, and he said: "Oh, I came just now; I know you, doctor; I have no vote, but I do not care about having no vote, if I have the business." There are plenty of men in the city of Toronto who have received, in a smaller or larger degree, an advantage exactly under those circumstances and conditions, until now I think I am within the mark when I say that a large proportion of the small businesses in the city of Toronto are controlled by aliens, I do not say by enemy aliens, but aliens, men who have come into this country within the last few years. Forty per cent of the small businesses and many of the larger businesses are conducted by these people. Incident to the war, their businesses and their profits have increased enormously. We were told by one of the ministers that about 50 per cent of the active young men of fighting age from Canada have gone into the service. Well, you can see what remains. It gives, and has given, these aliens a magnificent opportunity, and they have taken the fullest advantage of it. What I want to say to the Government, and what I would respectfully suggest for their consideration, is the conception of some proper and practical method of taxation, so that these business increases which ensue as a result directly of the war, could be investigated, and the profits that have accrued, shared in by the country; to the end that when the men return and apply to be re-established in civil life, they will not be confronted by aliens who control the business which they wish to enter, men perhaps who very imperfectly understand English or speak it not at all. It is disappointing for them to find that, on their return, after having fought for the liberties of the people, these liberties are being enjoyed by men who are not possessed of British ideals, and who are not in the true sense Canadians.

While on this subject, I wish to say a word or two regarding our immigration. I am not speaking particularly of immigration as administered since this Government came into power, but the immigration system under previous governments. They have, so to speak, permitted the doors to be opened, and everybody who likes can come into the country without question, hesitation, selection, or inspection. I saw not very long ago a statement in one of the Toronto newspapers that there had been a special arrangement by which Mennonites were admitted into the western provinces of Canada, exempt from military service. I do not believe the statement; I am sure it cannot be true, and I do not believe that any member of the present Government would approve of such a thing. Do we not know Mennonites? Are they not essentially German? Have they not German traditions, German literature, German legends? Are they to be permitted, after being hounded from the United States of America, to gain admission into Canada exempt from military service? No, no, hon. gentlemen, I do not believe the Government made any such arrangement, and I do not believe that the Government in the future would be justified in giving any privileges to anybody coming into Canada which the native born Canadian himself cannot enjoy.

I want to say a word or two regarding the Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment Department, and I make my statement particularly as the hon. gentleman on the other side (Mr. Gauthier) said he considered it was only an organization for the distribution of patronage. If at some time the hon. gentleman would come to the city of Toronto and would visit the Davisville hospital or the Hart House or any one of several institutions I can give him names of, he would not only see that it was not for the distribution of patronage, but that it was marvellous in its achievements, magnificent in its ideals, splendid in its efforts, and in the work it has set out to accomplish. I can show him there, where soldiers who had been disabled for two years in the English hospitals have come home, have been placed there under the directions and guidance of masseurs, trained calisthenic directors, and under treatment the paralyzed muscles and the palsied limb have been restored, and the cripple has gone out of the hospital astonished at the splendid results which have been achieved under skilled and scientific direction. I can go further, and show you that in every department of civil life they have, from the ordinary private soldier, evolved experts for almost every line of work. We have stenographers, typewriters, skilled machinists, expert electricians, mechanics, wood carvers, all developed out of soldiers who knew nothing about these trades before. Our men have been more encouraged and more benefited by that work and the examples which they have daily seen developed before them than by any work for the benefit of the soldier that has been done, I venture to say, by any country in the civilized world.

I congratulate the Government upon stating that they had at last decided to establish a federal Department of Public Health. This is to me no new idea. I read a few years ago a most able speech by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) which he made in this House, a speech which was commended very highly by the members of the medical profession throughout the whole country, a speech to which my attention has been drawn since I was elected to this House by no less than 20 medical men in the Dominion of Canada, irrespective of politics or party, and residing in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Therefore I am more than gratified to see that a Federal Department has been at last resolved upon, but, if I understood the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) correctly, he said he could not understand the use of it; he could not see what was the sense of sending a medical man of the federal government to interfere with a medical man of the Provincial Government. Well, if that is his conception of a Federal Health Department work, I am sure, (adopting the words of the last speaker), he will have to linger long upon the boughs of the apple tree to which he is attached before he will on that question be anywhere nearly ripened so as to fall to the ground in the amplitude of his maturity.

I can conceive at this juncture of no department of the public service which any Government could institute more replete with opportunities beneficial to all classes of the community than a public health service, rightly and justly administered.

Let me just, en passant, give you a few thoughts that have occurred to me with regard to that work. First and foremost, it is a great work in connection with the Department of Immigration. We have had in the past, rushing into this country, without restraint, inspection or restriction, the diseased, the mentally defective, the criminal, the unhappy, the uncertain, the infamous. They have come in here to do what? To work? Not a bit of it. They are absolutely incapable of working. They are not skilled workmen, they are not farmers —they never were—and they are not artisans. They have been in many cases chased from one large centre of the civilized world to another, until they have embarked en route to the new world. Probably they have tried the quarantine station at New York, they have been hunted from there, and then they creep around by the sea and come into Halifax. They have done that in the past. I am not blaming the present Government for that; that is a legacy that dates away back, to the time when people of this class were allowed to come into the country.

I have reason to know whereof I speak, for I have had occasion to act in many of their cases. Not only have we to care for them, but we have the legacy which they leave. We have the epileptic, we have the mentally defective. The defective engrafts his progeny upon Canada, breeds in his turn other mental defectives still worse because with every generation the trait intensifies, until, as a result of imperfect and unscientific inspection, we have innumerable cases occupying our asylums, our jails, our reformatories and our prisons, which have entailed upon the Dominion of Canada a cost of untold millions. All you have to do is to study the catalogues and indices of psychologists and those who have checked up the subject to see the percentage of mental defectives amongst our imported population. Tnat is one feature.

Another feature that I want to refer to has reference to the epidemics which occasionally come in this country. We have had an illustration of one in the ravages of the "flu." "Flu" has been very severe in some localities. I was speaking on the subject with a medical man, a Canadian officer, who was located at Gibraltar. As far as he knew, the first case of 'flu in the south of Spain came under his observation and he told me of the investigations that were being made by the French and British Governments when the epidemic broke out. While I admit that no department, under present conditions, is in the slightest degree to blame for the ravages throughout Europe and this continent of such an epidemic, I merely cite that illustration to strengthen the point I have to make regarding this matter. They knew how these epidemics spread and developed and they were able in a large measure to take preventive means which, I am quite convinced, restricted the further ravages of this disease. Would it not be a profitable thing for the Federal Government to have a scientific bureau of investigation where trained men would be able and competent to investigate all these sporadic and serious infectious maladies so that we would be able to deal with the situation before the advent of the infection and thus prevent the wholesale and general infection which is apt to follow if these diseases are not thoroughly and scientifically understood.

There is another point directly in line with that to which I would draw attention. There is the control and supervision of all kinds of quack nostra for the cure of all the ills that flesh is heir to. The men who sell and manufacture them know little of medical science and they care less. All they know is that it pays to advertise and that their sales are proportionate to their advertisements. They have indices of every disease to which flesh is heir and they have a remedy for each. The poor unfortunate invalid as he struggles tottering to the grave is on the list of the charlatan who has a cure-all to sell him. Is it not time that the Government of this Dominion should control absolutely and rigidly the manufacture and sale of patent and proprietory medicines? Is it not time that they tested in the public laboratories of the country every curative that is to be put upon the public market? Is it not time that they left the manufacture of serums to the provincial authorities whose laboratories in the main are excellent for the development and manufacture of these products? Yet they do not.

I want to give to you, Mr. Speaker, by way of illustration, an incident which occurred under the last Government. I am informed that the laboratories of the Public Health Department of the province of Ontario were ready to make Salvarsan, or as it is known, 6-0-6, as a serum cure for syphilis. Before they could distribute that amongst the medical men of the country, they required a Federal license and the officers of the Provincial Board of Health of Ontario came to Ottawa for the purpose of obtaining that license. They were not permitted to get it. They were absolutely refused the license which would have permitted the Provincial Board of Health to manufacture and distribute that curative product. They were opposed by what we may call the interests, by certain men who were engaged in the introduction of other so-called cures for the same thing. Now, I contend that these things should not be and that there is a splendid opportunity for a Federal Department of Public Health which will regulate all that kind of thing. We have been agitating about this matter in the Province of Ontario, and the Provincial Government has appointed a commission for the purpose of investigating venereal disease. The one thing which makes that malady more terrible than it really is, is the hope existing in the mind of the infected that he can secure a cure in privacy, and that by entering his cloister with some patent nostrum and shutting the door he can regain his health, with the result that the last state of that man is worse than the first. Now if these things are true about the human organism, they are equally true about another branch of the animal kingdom, viz: cattle and other domestic animals. They are equally liable with ourselves to infection, and they are equally liable to conditions and troubles which can be cured by scientifically and wisely directed effort. So also in connection with the vegetable kingdom. There are infectious maladies in the case of fruit trees, and various other species and varieties of vegetation, with which it is the bounden duty of the Dominion to deal, and not the duty of any particular province. I am fully aware that health affairs ought to be left to the provincial governments very largely. True they are to a great extent a matter of locality, or are very often modified by local conditions, nevertheless, it is wise that we should co-operate to the fullest, and assist to the utmost of our power in the work, the pioneer work, which has been so splendidly done by the provinces in the domain of public health. But that is begging the question entirely: there is still a large field of activity awaiting the attention of a federal health department. Moreover there are legacies, directly traceable to this war, which the federal health department must needs deal with. There are cases of tuberculosis, there may be cases of venereal disease, there are cases of mental aberration, there are cases of shell shock, there are cases of chronic nervous maladies which will be with us for ten or fifteen years to come, the treatment of which is not a burden belonging to any particular province but should rest upon the shoulders of the Federal Government representing the country as a whole, and should be scientifically and intelligently dealt with. I will not weary you any more by dwelling upon what I might narrate upon this line

I am leading up to the point which I want to impress upon you, that if we are going to have active, energetic, and proper service from this department, which the country needs, we must have a medical mind at the head of it. There is in its administration, as much technicality, as much minute detail, as much complexity as there is in the conduct of the Department of Justice; and yet would any member of this House entertain for a second the thought that a doctor, or a layman could administer, as Minister of Justice, that legal department with any degree of common sense or satisfaction. And yet the Minister of Justice has to deal with man-made laws, whereas in the Department of Public Health the administrator is confronted with the great complex and obscure laws of nature, which it requires long training to apprehend and even then they cannot be understood to the fullest degree. These laws can only be realized by a study in the greatest laboratory of all, in the hospital ward, where we see the varied phases through which the sick are passing, and where we are able, with gentleness and kindness, to make every allowance as we approach with a keen desire to help those cases which command our patience, our sympathy, and our regard. It is for that reason that I urge upon the Government to begin right, to place at the head of the Health Department some man who will command the respect of the whole of this Dominion; a man who is skilled and expert in medical knowledge, so that he can administer that department with the same efficiency and the same comprehension as is displayed in the administration of the Department of Justice. Some hon. gentlemen may say: You are extravagant in your ideas for the period of curtailment and economy which has been suggested by the ministers of the Crown. For my part, I am not altogether convinced that economy is the wisest policy at this juncture. It all depends of course on how we practise economy. The cheapest thing is not always the best, it may be cheap and yet very dear in the long run.

I was somewhat impressed with the speech of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), and I am sorry he is not in the Chamber at present because I wish to say one or two things about him. First of all, the hon. minister said he was not a pessimist. Well, it is hard for me to believe that he is an optimist, and in his speech he drew rather a sombre picture of the future conditions in this Dominion, as to what we were to do for revenue to keep going. To my mind he mixed up his accounts; I would like to have a professional audit of the statements from a financial standpoint. The hon. minister incorporated the expenditures for capital and permanent purposes with current expenditures, as I understood him, and forecasted an outlay something like $110,000,000 per annum. This is the estimate he gave us of the sum which would have to be raised. There was to be a Government building in Montreal, a Government building in Toronto, and I think he said a Government building in Calgary—these, amongst other things, were to be the subjects of outlay. I do not suppose the Government intends to go on erecting great public buildings annually, and I think therefore there was probably an over anxiety on his part in considering the expenditures incidental to the present year. I have great confidence in this Dominion, as we progress in our national development. I have great confidence in our resources, in the agricultural richness of Canada, in its mineral and timber wealth, in the value of its inland seas and fisheries; and I believe that if we wisely direct the development of our resources and see that they are not wasted, we need have no apprehension or anxiety regarding our ability to provide for all that is needed, or for all that the country imperatively desires. At the same time I am not in favour of exempting the great interests from the Business Tax. I know it is very popular to tax incomes and to say: "Let the man who has the money and the income take the taxes. Everybody says: there are few who have it, and therefore if we tax the few we will probably have less complaint from the great majority." But let me ask you as a professional man—and you know that doctors never make any money, they are one class of the community that work night and day and die poor—let me ask you who have been the makers of the great fortunes realized ever since the commencement of this war. I met a man the other day who had made, since the beginning of the war, no less than two and one-half million dollars. There are men who are engaged in certain industrial works to whom war-time conditions brought greatly increased trade. The Government has in the past taxed them, and I hope it will continue to do so even in peace times, because their profits were unduly and excessively large. Let us adopt a broad and equitable policy, so that every man will pay his share. I like a man who will always do his part, who will lift his share of the load, who will pay his share of the taxes, who will carry his burden in common with the rest of us, so that we can all pull together with confidence up the slope, and in due course land the load on the top of the hill.

Now, I want to say a word with regard to the Civil Service Commission. Last session on the floor of this House I supported the Civil Service Commission; I thought that there were great possibilities for good in it. I have not changed my mind; I am still going to support the continuance of that commission. I do not say that it is perfect. I do not say that we cannot make improvements in it. I do not say that it always does the wise thing. There are certain things I want to know. First, I propose, if some one else does not do it, to put a question on the Order Paper with a view to finding out how many appointments made under the Civil Service Commission since it was established were given to returned soldiers. I want to see how in the total sum the returned soldier figures, because I have known instances where he did not get a good show.

I am an old examiner. I have been at the business for thirty years, and I know all the tricks of the trade. One time I had to do with an appointment in Toronto where there were tremendous crowds and very strong influence on both sides, and the appointee had to be a lady, so you can guess what difficulties we were in. The matter should have been dealt with by the municipal council, but the municipal council balked when they saw the beautiful faces and winning ways of the ladies' delegations; so finally, after shifting it from one committee to another, they landed it on my shoulders and said: Let him do the work. Then the deputations began to come before me, and I must confess that several of the recommendees left not much room for choice among them. They all appeared to have splendid qualifications, and I spent some time and many weary hours of thought in studying out what kind of problem I should put up to get the one that pleased me best. I am not a card player, but I understand that the card players say: When in doubt, play trumps. Similarly, when you do not know which side to please, please yourself. That, I think, is a good policy, and it is my policy. Well, in this case I had my own ideas. Some sections of the press were recommending one person and other sections were recommending another, and I said, I will hold an examination and decide the question on its merits. And then the examination proved exactly to go my way; I appointed the one whom I desired to appoint, and everybody was satisfied that the best girl won. I am not saying that the best did not win, nor am I saying that this is what always happens with the Civil Service Commission. But I will give you another illustration.

In London a student who was to be examined at the College of Surgeons had been a special pupil of one of the examiners, and this student was excessively stupid. This professor said to the student: "James, I want you to study the symptoms and pathology of cirrhosis of the liver. Do not bother with anything else, but study that so that you can say it backwards and frontwards until you know it thoroughly." The pupil agreed to do this. In the College of Surgeons in London the examiners work in pairs; one man asks the question and the other puts down the mark. So when this candidate was called in the examiner who had been teaching him said to his co-examiner: "I will ask the question now, if you do not mind, and you can mark him." So he was trotted in and the first question he was asked was: "Now, sir, just tell me the symptoms and pathology of cirrhosis of the liver." Of course, he excelled himself in the readiness of his answer. He did so well that he completed the whole thing before the time limit, and the examiner scratched his head, and, assured that if he asked the candidate anything else he would prove his ignorance, said: "You have done that so well, would you please repeat it?" So I say that examinations are not always a real test of a man's fitness, and when you come to test by examination a man who is already qualified for a technical position you are apt to get just where you do not want to get.

Apropos of this, I want to read a letter which illustrates exactly the question that I am discussing. A Canadian veterinarian of considerable ability who had seen service in Egypt, the Mediterranean, France, Belgium and Britain, who had qualified in the Ontario Veterinary College and had been four years in the war, was desirous, now that he had come home, of carrying on the work that he had given up when he went to the front. He came to me and spoke about applying for a position in the Government. I said: "I have nothing to do with it; you had better write to that Civil Service Commission." I do not know whether there is a place in the Government service at this time for a veterinarian, but this is the answer he got from Dr. Roche—this to the returned soldier, to the experienced veterinarian who had seen four years' active service overseas:—

I have yours of the 5th and am enclosing you a temporary position form, which kindly fill out and return to the Commission, so that we may have your name on file in the event of the Agriculture Department placing a requisition before the Civil Service Commission for additional help in your line.

He did not see that that was going to get him anywhere, so he wrote again, this time to the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission. Apparently more consideration was given to his application this time and a fuller letter was formulated. The next letter he received from the Commission was as follows—remember, this is a case of a returned soldier, a professional man:—

With reference to your application for employment in the Civil Service of Canada, I would say that the work in which you are interested or for which you appear to be qualified, comes under "Special or Technical Positions," usually thrown open to competition and for which an examination is sometimes necessary.

Evidently they have not any fixed rule in the matter. (Reading):—

As a rule such vacancies are not of frequent occurrence, but when they do occur and are not filled by promotion, an advertisement thereof appears in the Canada Gazette. In order that you may receive copies of these notices, your name has been placed on our mailing list.

Well, I think I could have given him my copy of the Canada Gazette and not lost a great deal. However, I do not wish to criticise too severely the Civil Service Commission. They made two splendid appointments of considerable importance in Toronto. They appointed a postmaster and a deputy postmaster in the city of Toronto, and I do not believe there have been two appointments made by any Government since Confederation which have, to so large an extent, received the approval of the people, one and all. They took as their appointees in those particular instances men who had devoted their whole lives to the service. The man who was made postmaster was the former deputy postmaster who had grown up in the service, who knew every wrinkle in the whole office, who knew the very men that were employed there. Even although I was not consulted in regard to the appointment and did not know who the appointee was until after he got the job, I am glad that he was made postmaster. I congratulate the Civil Service Commission and the Postmaster General of this Dominion on making that appointment, because I know that almost irrestible efforts and pressure were exerted by certain political parties in order that that appointment should not be made. Not only was the postmaster appointed in that way, but as deputy postmaster they appointed a man from the ranks, a man who had grown up in the service, a man who had a magnificent and perfect record behind him, a man who thought that by devotion to the service of this country in a civil capacity, he would be justly dealt with and would receive advantages and emoluments which would be worth while. I wish, on the floor of this House, to offer my testimony and express my satisfaction in regard to those two appointments, to encourage the Civil Service Commission and also the ministers by showing them that when they are making good appointments, such appointments will not be forgotten. There is another thing I desire to add to this. A few days before I left Toronto I saw the newly appointed postmaster, and while I was congratulating him upon his work, I incidentally said, "Well, how is the salary now? Is it the same as before the war?" I really do not know what the salary is. "Why," he said, "the salary is the same as it has been for twenty years, but the work and the business have increased over a hundred fold." I have had some experience in work and in getting good service, and I think the poorest policy one can adopt is to underpay officials that have responsible duties to perform. While I am speaking about the post office in the city of Toronto and the whole postal service, I want to say that the postmen are scandalously underpaid in the cities—I do not know anything about outside. I say they are scandalously underpaid, because they cannot live on the pay they get.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is 100 per cent worse in the country.

Mr. SHEARD: I heard the discussion on the floor of this House last year in reference to the rural mail carriers. I heard it stated by hon. members that contracts were actually let at prices that would not pay for the horse feed. I believe that was, to a large extent, true. It ought not to be so. You will never get satisfactory service unless you pay a reasonable fee for it. It is all very well to say: Well, they get so many hundred dollars a year. In all this discussion of labour, somehow or another, people do not appear to have grasped the cardinal thought of the purchasing price of a dollar. A man's pay must be proportionate to the purchasing price of a dollar. What is the use of giving a man $950 a year as a postman in the city of Toronto, when that sum will not pay for his house rent, clothes and fuel—those three essentials? You cannot expect him to be satisfied. We had serious trouble last year. The postmen made representations, so they told me, time and time again, and they did not get any satisfactory answer, so they went on strike. We came down here in the interest of the city to try to get the Government to consider their case. The Government did consider their case; they went into it very thoroughly and exhaustively. I had hoped that they had kindly and generous hearts in the Council, but unfortunately when the returns came in, we were disappointed to find that the Government had given an increase which I think was given with a very mean and stinting hand. I am convinced that it would be good policy to go through the whole Civil Service administration from top to bottom. Let there be a portion of the work of reconstruction applied to it. Let us weed out the useless rot; let us take out the weed crops; let us take out the old decayed roots from the structure, and let us revitalize that which is retained and give strength and character to the Service by paying a decent, generous, liberal wage to the men who have to assume the responsibilities of carrying on the government and administering the work which is, after all, for the benefit of the people. Let us in that way make them satisfied in the knowledge that when they devote their talents, time, energy and years to public trust in the public service, they are serving an honest and good Administration, and will not have to spend their declining days in a workhouse or a home. That is the policy which I would suggest to the Government if I were touching on the Civil Service question.

Unless we can use our public moneys in a proper manner, we may find that we are suffering from the troubles referred to by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), when he spoke of people who lived beyond their incomes, and some governments have in the past been very wasteful. I was impressed by the speech made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) last year, when he referred, speaking in connection with the Canadian Northern railway, to the tremendous, extravagant expenditures which were made to liquidate the liabilities which had been manufactured by Mackenzie and Mann. Let us exercise prudence, forethought and foresight. Let us economize by not assuming burdens that are unnecessary and that will undoubtedly be unprofitable. Let us economize so as to give what we all desire, namely, assistance to the soldier in every way. Let us rise and give him our place if need be. Let him understand that the country is not unmindful of his great sacrifices. We are apt to lose sight of the prospect of capitalizing the greatest asset we have from this great war, that is the patriotism and devotion to service which those men who went overseas, evince. They went without compulsion; they went voluntarily; they suffered, as we know; they come back imbued with the same love of country, if not more so, as they had before they went. They come back sure of their belief that Canada is of all countries the best place to live in, and we want by generous and kindly treatment to develop in that particular an asset of value in them, to make them emissaries and missionaries in every hamlet and town so that they may extol the great advantages of this vast country which belongs to us, the country we live in, the country we love.

Those of us who have had their sons and blood at the front know what I mean, when as I look back upon the war I refer to it as those four long years of hellish night, and we are apt to ask now of our watchmen upon the tower, "Watchmen, what of the night?" The answer comes back: if we have confidence, the night is not so black as it was; there are streaks on the horizon's verge; there is mist in the valley, the sun is rising, there is dawning upon this country and upon this people a new day, a day of peace, prosperity and happiness. Let us all join together with a united effort, without regard to party politics and their narrow divisions, and hand in hand, as one broad-minded, generous, devoted, energetic and hard-working people pray God to grant that in the new day now dawning Canada may be blessed above and beyond all nations, that glorious Canada may rise Phœnix-like from the fire of this great war, triumphant as our boys have been triumphant in Europe, and let us all as Canadians say, God be thanked.

Mr. AIME MIVILLE DECHENE (Montmagny) (translation): Mr. Speaker, among the hon. gentlemen who have paid a tribute to the memory of our beloved chieftain (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), few perhaps have suffered as deep a loss as we younger members of the House.

From our very youth we had grown accustomed to admire the noble and grand figure of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and to follow the advice he was wont to give our seniors; we had made up our minds to do as much, when our turn came, but unfortunately the fatal hour has struck; he has passed away and bid adieu to this world where he played such a glorious role and we, the young members, are left alone to steer the course so well marked out by him, with those great principles of harmony, humanity, union and tolerance. We shall certainly be called upon to put those great principles into practice, and there will be no more striking tribute paid to his memory by the younger members than their faithful adherence to the virtues preached by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. We shall endeavour to follow in his footsteps by promoting the welfare of the country and helping our fellow-citizens, no matter what their language or their race, and to make of Canada a country worthy of the Twentieth Century.

Let us set to work, and to satisfy him of our sincerity let us remain faithful to duty to the very end; let us walk in his footsteps and history will tell that the broad-mindedness of the younger generation was worthy of the broad-mindedness of their beloved leader.

It is now my duty to tender to the mover and seconder of the Address to our beloved Sovereign my warmest congratulations for the manner in which they have performed their task. They have departed from the beaten track of their predecessors and shown real independence of thought.

They have shown themselves the fearless and gallant soldiers that they are. They are entitled to our congratulations and we, the younger members of this side of the House, are happy to express to the younger members on the opposite benches our appreciation of their courage and their eloquence.

Let us hope that in the future they will also walk in the footsteps of our great leader who has passed away; that their minds and hearts will be constantly attentive to the promotion of the welfare of this country and let me assure them that in following this straight and narrow road they will have us with them.

From the very beginning of this session, Sir, we have shown that we were willing to follow in the wake of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. We have accepted with enthusiasm the lead of our present chief and shall endeavour to prove to him that we are the worthy sons of that great patriot, Sir Wilfrid Laurier; we will follow him as thoroughly, as frankly and as fully as our English-speaking friends, for upward of thirty years, followed our great Chieftain who has passed away; we will render him the homage that he, in company with his English-speaking associates, tendered to our own leader by remaining with him through thick and thin. He can count on the younger members as well as on their elders; these last, moreover, have already shown their willingness to do his bidding.

After listening to the speeches delivered so far I have wondered—in company with many others—whether all the speakers were not quite of one mind in demonstrating that the present Government often lacked decision in the decisions it was called upon to make. It seems rather impossible to find a decision which is lacking in decision, but really we have had ministers tell us that they have given the greatest care and attention to our national problems, that they would give more care than ever to the problems brought about by the war. But, Mr. Speaker, during the present session we shall be called upon to work out the difficulties of re-establishment and to decide in what way we can help our returned soldiers to resume their status in civil life. The hon. ministers talked a great deal, for hours at a stretch, to tell us that they had accomplished a lot; unfortunately, they did not tell us what they intended to do later on.

We have not even learned from the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) how many acres had been granted to our returned soldiers; nor how many veterans had applied with the intention of settling on this wonderful land that was promised them. It is all very fine to promise the soldier land, to make a farmer out of him; but, Sir, the offer is conditional: the condition is that the soldier pay full value for what he gets; he will have to pay, in common with all other farmers, the biggest part of the taxes levied after his return. If my information is correct, the Government lends him, to start with, a few thousand dollars, payable in fifteen or twenty years; but the Government, of course, has the prudence to take, as security, all that the soldier-farmer has, so that even he will be unable to get under way immediately. Everything will be mortgaged. And that is their idea of re-establishment.

Have you ever considered, Sir, what it would cost the country if only one-half our returned soldiers asked the Government for the $7,500 it is proposed to lend them? Did you ever consider that the country would have to pay out, a few months hence, between $1,500,000,000 and $2,000,000,000?

At the time of the last Victory Loan the hon. Minister of Finance had many misgivings about its success; but he may feel sure that when he comes again before the country to ask for such fabulous sums he will meet with complete failure because he will be unable to grant to the most exacting any exemption from customs duties such as the people of this country are clamouring for.

He won't perhaps be able to pass Orders in Council exempting from taxation the tractors required by the Western farmers for their ploughs or to enable the farmers of the great provinces which produce potatoes to export them to the United States; without which expedients the loan would have proven a failure in those provinces. It is all very fine for the Minister to have succeeded in financing his loan by such means; but when the question will be to borrow some hundred million dollars for rounding up the budget and the other hundred millions to be loaned to soldiers for buying land and stock and farming implements, do you think, Sir, that the country will still be able to advance so much money? If the Government intends giving effect to this programme of Soldier Settlement—in the West alone, I suppose—it will require at least half a billion, and we may very well ask ourselves if the financiers, if the agricultural classes will be able to supply these funds; with this mind, and in an attempt to shift the burden, the Government invited all the provincial premiers to a conference. They made a decision without deciding anything. This conference took place in Ottawa; it lasted for a few days. The papers informed us that a few of the great premiers had made formidable suggestions, that they were going to get the Government out of the mess it was in. We have as yet been unable to find out just what these suggestions were, or whether the Government saw fit to make use of them, for the reason that we have still to witness any result of this conference. The two hon. ministers whose speeches preceded ours in this debate, told us nothing about it. I suppose that the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario, as well as his hon. colleague from Quebec, offered lands for Soldiers Settlement, too. Mr. Speaker, can you see the position the returned soldier would be in if the Ontario or the Quebec Government gave him land to settle on? Can you see these men who for the last four years, in some cases only three years, have had to dig themselves a hole in the soil of Flanders for shelter against enemy fire, coming back to this country, where, thanks to the present Government, we'll change the spade for an axe and make our soldier into a pioneer; we'll put him into the forest where, on his arrival, his first care will be to throw up some kind of a shack to live in while he is waiting to spread out more and hoping that, after two years or so, he will be able to afford a little stable for his horse and a cow, yes, after two years! Isn't this, Sir, the acme of re-establishment. The Government is full of divine kindness towards the soldiers.

Were not the provinces consulted, Mr. Speaker, as to what they could do to accommodate returned soldiers at home, and if both these provinces—I am speaking of these two only—adopt the idea of giving land to the soldiers, the hero will shoulder an axe, exclaiming: "What a kind Providence we have in this Government."

But that was a neat trick, to have the provincial governments decide what was to be done for the soldier. Unfortunately, here in the east, we have no cleared land; so, the soldier will have to hie himself to the west. In the West, we hear, there are immense stretches of land held for years by certain companies for speculative purposes. We hear a great deal of talk about the generous idea of expropriating these holdings and putting them into the hands of the soldiers. But, Sir, isn't this merely a move to prepare public opinion for the expropriation of lands in the hands of notorious speculators whose gigantic shadow sometimes hovers over the Government. This shadow would leave the great railways and go farther north, towards Lesser Slave Lake, towards Bear Lake, I believe it is, so as to work other lands, not to work the surface—the surface is too remote to be worked in the ordinary way—but to work what is below the surface; and then perhaps we'll need a Minister of Public Health in this district, in accord with the wishes of my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Sheard) so as keep an eye on the cases, not of shell-shock, but of shell-game, that would begin to develop on another scale.

I have just alluded to a word of my hon. friend from Toronto. There are likely many others that I should single out for attention.

In his opening remarks he used an expression so striking that I wish to repeat it here: he said that once more the Government had, during the present war, "played a man's part." I would have liked him to add just what the Government's part has been; probably that of a stripling and not that of a man. He was seeking to protect the Government which claims to have done so much for the soldiers. The morale of the soldier on the firing-line must be excellent, but it must be backed by the morale of those who remain behind at home. Evidently, if we are to judge the morale of our troops at the front by the morale of those who stayed at home, those who supported the man behind the gun by supplying him with all he needed, this morale must needs have been excellent, for the hon. member from Toronto told us a moment ago that he had come across one of our greatest citizens, who, during these four years had amassed $2,500,000. There you have an excellent morale, the morale which supported the Government so as to uphold the morale of the man in the front trenches.

The hon. member also said that the Government had frequently to face herculean tasks. They have had to move the rock of Gibraltar out of the way in order to get anything done in the country.

Certain papers have spoken of a certain rock that certain people want to move, not out of the way, but into one of the important harbours of New Brunswick.

Some ministers refused to pass the contract; then, it seems, the present minister took a hand; we have got the rock as a wharf, the thing is done; and there you have a herculean task; the people pay.

Now, Sir, the hon. member said moreover that the development of this country does not require alien enemy hands; but I wonder where we are going to look for our immigrants if we turn away from the countries whose people we have been wont to consider as our enemies, but whom President Wilson asks us to welcome as our brethren. If we are to put into practice those great principles which are being applied to-day at the Peace Conference, these men, stranded in a ruined country, will want to move to some other country. Therefore if we continue to look upon them as enemies, then ours will be a closed country where only those already within our borders can prosper.

The speech from the Throne tells us that we must recruit immigrants. We shall get them from Europe or from the United States. We must not forget that we shall have to close our doors to certain American citizens whom we consider alien enemies. We can turn to England who has lost a great many of her sons at the front. Undoubtedly we shall witness no great flow of immigrants from Great Britain. There are so few Belgians left in Belgium that those who remain will not care to come to our shores. As regards Germany, her people would perhaps make dangerous citizens. France has never been much given to emigration. Italy might furnish a few; but Italy is entering upon a period of self-development and she will need all her people. Where, then, are we to look for the immigrants mentioned in the speech from the Throne, the immigrants that the Government is after? This is a problem that demands very serious consideration and the hon. ministers in their indecision will either have to decide for once, or give the matter up.

Mr. Speaker, there is something else about our Government which must be brought to your notice; something which is a direct result of their indecision. When a man is at a loss where to turn he tries to get somebody else to decide for him and very often in so doing he has to observe certain niceties; the gentlemen who are at the head of affairs in this country, who make up the Government which exists theoretically if not actually, have found this to be the best means of governing Canada.

We have a great many commissions which exist for the sole purpose of being commissions—naturally, they can be nothing else—and commissioners are appointed so that they may draw commissioners' salaries. A great many of these commissions have shown, so far, that their usefulness went no further. There are no more political parties; everybody is a Whig or a Tory; we all belong to the same party; it is a pity, however, that nearly all the commissioners are Tories. No party spirit there. The Government is merely protecting itself.

Mr. Speaker, no doubt you will allow me to ask you a question: how comes it that in several of these commissions appointed for the promotion of Canadian trade, for the public administration of the State's resources, there are so few representatives of the different provinces?

There is the Canadian Northern Commission. I must admit that it no longer represents the Canadian Northern; but that it has become the Canadian National Railways Commission. The Government could not be so unmindful of the very great services rendered it by this railroad as to forget them in such easy fashion, and so as to have them ever present to the memory and constantly before it's paternal gaze, the Government could do no better than to give to this commission which administers these railroads as nearly as possible the same initials as those which still stand for this notorious railway. Hence the commission was styled C. N. R., or Canadian Northern railway. These things are all one; the same commission administers for others.

The thought was sublime; nothing better could be found.

There is another commission which has just been appointed. The supreme commissioner, the grand commissioner, is the man of petty measures. I do not mean to say that the measures he submits are not broad-minded; no, far from it!—in fact, I wish to say just the opposite: they are very broad. There was talk last session of bringing everything under the same system of measurement; of reducing everything to a general standard. There was to be a standard in this country for bags of cement; another for liquids, still another for wood. Well, Sir, this year we are introduced to another standard which had not been discovered last year. I refer to the standard measure for electricity and we have—this is likely to provoke laughter—we already have on the Order Paper of Parliament a certain thing which is styled about like this: "An act respecting the Units of Electrical Measure." Everything must be measured—the better to tax it later, I suppose. That is self evident.

If we want to tax properly later on, we must begin by knowing just what we have on hand. Well, when the electrical unit has been measured, I wonder just what tax will be levied on it? It is possible that it will suffer no taxation, for it is not the common people, it is not the helpless ones who own the unit; they pay for the unit, but it is the wealthy capitalists who sell electricity by the unit—an irresponsible way of not giving us what we are entitled to—they glance at all these little figures and then say: "Here's the amount of your bill." Exactly like the Government. Just like the hon. Minister of Public Works who was saying a moment ago: it's going to take a heap of money to run the railroads; here's what you owe; fork over.

Mr. Speaker, could you tell me, or some member of the Government in your stead and through you—for it seems that we must speak through the Chairman—just what boon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is going to bring back to us when he returns with the remainder of the Government which is on the other side of the ocean? No doubt we shall learn that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has become enamoured of the metric system and that, next year, once electric units have been measured, he will impose the metric system on us so as to sell to the French things that he would not try to have them buy from us.

Isn't it surprising, Mr. Speaker, to see a Trade Commission leave for Europe so as to look after the commercial interests of this country while the Minister of Public Works was telling us yesterday that he was quite willing to do something for trade but that the commerce of this country should first of all take care of itself.

This Trade Commission, presided over by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce himself, intends visiting France and Belgium, finding out from these people what they need from us, and informing us what we can supply them with. But, Sir, to reach an agreement, in a matter of business, it is necessary to speak both languages; and haven't you wondered why, at least, in this matter, one of our French-Canadian leaders of industry in the province of Quebec was not chosen to represent the French people of this country, so as to allow the province of Quebec, a part of Ontario, even a part of New Brunswick, where French is spoken, the privilege of being represented on that commission by someone who could talk to the folks of these countries in their own language, who understands their way of doing business, and could thus have given an impetus to trade with France and Belgium for the period of reconstruction? Well, Sir, those who were sent can speak nothing but English. And how do you expect them to reach an understanding when they are concerned with systems of measurement with which our English speaking fellow citizens are more or less acquainted not having had to study them as we have?

Is this, Sir, a deliberate slight to those of our inhabitants who speak French exclusively and who go to make up three out of the seven millions of our population; is that the way to strike after the prosperity of our country and obtain for us the share we are entitled to in the trade of those foreign countries when it comes to supplying their needs for reconstruction and for building over their ruins?

Well, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that this is another instance where the Government lacked foresight and that those who represent it on that commission are there for the sole purpose of concealing responsibilities behind which the Government itself is trying to hide.

Mr. Speaker, while I am on this subject of overseas affairs you will doubtless, permit me to take exception to the words of the hon. gentleman who is our Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) yesterday when he said, with a good deal of emphasis, that without a doubt we would receive a war indemnity to bolster up our finances and enable him, our grand treasurer, to meet his liabilities. That, Sir, was the last thing that I expected to hear on the floor of this House from the lips of the hon. treasurer of this country.

If the newspapers, if the Associated Press, if the Canadian Press, supported by the Government, if the correspondents whom the right hon. Prime Minister brought with him to Europe so as to keep us informed back here, if these people have really told us the truth about what is happening at the Peace Conference about what is happening in England, we must come to the conclusion that there will be no war indemnity unless it be, perhaps, the indemnity foretold by the official correspondent of the Canadian Press when he wrote that to fill the coffers of our hon. treasurer we would receive—Greenland and its fields of ice.

Well, Sir, let Denmark keep Greenland; we need no ice in this country save perhaps, to cool—oh, not altogether—to cool off the zeal of certain financiers who are constanly dancing attendance on the treasurer,—attracted by his handsome eyes, no doubt—maybe, by something else besides.

Sir, this brings me to another feature of the Government's policy. The hon. member from Toronto told us a moment ago that he had seen people make millions out of politics; others took advantage of the wholesale exemptions granted by our hon. Minister of Finance so as to entice them, in a roundabout way to loosen their purse strings; still others turn to their advantage the tariff barrier which protects their industries; but the common people have had nothing at all.

If, Sir, we wanted to delve deeper into this feature of our politics we would find, not a policy of partisanship—because the hon. minister has told us that such a thing does not exist—but, at least a policy of favouritism. Why was it, Mr. Speaker, that the Government took such pains to have the wealthy citizen, the man with bulging pockets, subscribe for the treasury bonds which were already paying a handsome dividend, and were so attractive that they persuaded everyone to subscribe, that had the whole country as security, and were supported by all our natural resources—which to-day we boast of as immense, as boundless--why was that little stamp affixed which exempted these bonds from taxation, if not to encourage the big financier to stuff his pockets with them? Because the plain people of this country, the toiler, the man behind the plough, because, Sir, the petty clerk behind the counter, have not been accustomed to buying bonds, because they do not always have a few cents to invest; but they knew, moreover, that our mighty business organizations, our high financiers who are well known to the Government—we are aware of that—would appreciate the value of a bond which could be tax-exempt for fifteen or twenty years and would subscribe to the limit so as to shelter their fortunes from the income tax while we, the plain people, while the farmer behind his plough, the housewife in her home, the school teacher in her class-room, the clerk in the store, the street labourer—who is despised in certain quarters—would continue to sweat taxes all of the time.

And the soldier back from the front who will work hard for his salary; when this, added to his pension, reaches $1,200, he will have to pay an income tax on all revenue exceeding $1,000. The returned soldier, I repeat, will have to bear a share of the taxes while those who stayed at home, making munitions and filling their pockets continue to rush into the money markets of our country to sweep into their vaults all the tax-exempt Victory bonds they can gather so as to enjoy their income in all security. The plain people are the ones who will pay; and the soldier will be called upon once more to bear his share. This man won the fight; he lived through filth and misery in the trenches; he is disabled for the rest of his life; and, Sir, once he has returned to this country and has put away his rifle he will have to get into harness with the rest of us poor people, us plain people, so as to ensure the success of future loans and especially to help pay the billions of taxes that the Government will exact from the people of this country.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. MIVILLE DECHENE (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, I was just saying, when you announced the hour of six, that the policy of the present Government is a policy of favouritism, I mean a policy which favours the vested interests and makes light of the wishes of the common people. The vested interests were given tax-exempt treasury bonds so that they could invest their tremendous fortunes to good advantage. Very few among the working class, very few among the farming class were able to invest a lot of money in these bonds and profit by this exemption. The income tax levied by the Government, and which was increased nearly one-third last year is borne almost exclusively, therefor, by those who are possessed of lesser fortunes and those who earn their livelihood by laborious toil. Since these wealthy gentry, these millionaires—and the Government has quite a few of them among its friends—are safe from this tax, are immune from paying this part of their income tax, the others will necessarily have to furnish the funds required by the country both for the expense of government from day to day and for the payments of interest and principal on our tremendous debt.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is not only—what a sorry admission to make on the floor of this House—it is not only those who work and who worked all during the war in this country, who will have to bear the burden of these taxes. Is it not unfortunate, Sir, that our returned heroes themselves will have to undertake a large share of these payments if they wish to enjoy certain privileges that the Government offers them and accept the loan of $7,500 that will be made them to set them up on a farm.

Have you ever figured out what enormous sums they will have to pay back in the course of the next 25, 30 or 40 years? We, and they, in common will have to pay not only the debts accumulated through the war, but they will also have to pay back the amount they borrow; and we shall all see ourselves forced to pay a national debt of nearly four billion dollars; this means, Sir, that those who won the war, those who shed their blood, will be worse off than if they had lost the war.

The big interests have been promised, so as to enable them to meet their liabilities, that the tariff, that barrier which prevents imported articles from competing with their products, would be strengthened. It is fitting that customs duties should provide enough revenue to permit the Government to honourably discharge its obligations; but these tariff duties must not be made into an impassable wall which altogether shuts out imports.

I remember one of the famous speeches of Mr. Thiers before the National Assembly of France, after the great defeat of 1870. The delegates to the National Assembly had been asked to find the necessary revenue for paying off the five billion francs demanded as an indemnity and to each and every proposition M. Thiers made answer: "But is this article you want to tax able to support even a penny tax without putting a stop to imports?"

We must always keep in mind when levying customs duties the fact that these should not put a stop to imports. M. Thiers' advice was to make each and every article pay to the limit of its capacity, but never to lose sight of the fact that if you shut out imports you kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. And this will be the inevitable result if the tariff is made still higher. If customs duties are increased merely to please a few big manufacturers imports will cease and instead of enjoying larger revenue we will be faced with a growing deficit.

Several of those who spoke before me talked of lowering the tariff, especially to the advantage of the agricultural class. We on this side of the House, Sir, are in favour of tariff rates which will allow the agricultural class to increase production and get some return for their efforts. But we are in favour of this reduction in rates, Mr. Speaker, merely because it pleases a few people. We advocate these reductions because we know, we have proof, that the wealth of the farming community, the wealth of the plain people is the only real wealth on which the country can rely in time of stress. What made France so strong, Mr. Speaker, during the war just passed? To what, in fact, do we owe our own strength, if not to the wealth of the people themselves?

It is not the millionaires, it is not the magnates of big business who are the backbone of the country; for, when a crisis comes, they stop, they stow their millions of dollars away somewhere and the country can't touch them. But when a crisis is upon us the country can always turn to the farmer, to the workingman, and ask him for money. And we are astonished—you yourself were astonished at the time of the last Victory Loan—to find that there was so much money in the province of Quebec, which is entirely an agricultural province; that Quebec had more money than any other province of the Dominion. You refused to believe it, Sir, when we told you on the floor of this House that Quebec was the only province which, during this crisis, had not availed itself of the moratorium; that it was the only province where you could always demand the payment of what was due you, whether it is a mortgage, a note, or what not. Why? Because the Government of Quebec, because the people of Quebec, ever mindful of their ancient origin, did not forget that they were the descendants of the sturdy French race and that the first care of the French peasant, the farmer of the mother-country, is to pile up money at home and not in the banks; not tremendous fortunes, but little savings so that when bad times appear and they are forced to tighten their belts, they always have gold in their pockets. There always has been gold in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, if the Government wanted to be honest with the agricultural class when they published the report of the last Victory Loan, to show the proportion of subscriptions in our province which represents the farmers—they would have given us the amount subscribed by the city of Montreal, which they somehow never put into their statistics. Certain English counties were included and the figure of their subscription credited to Ontario. All this was done so as to cast a slur on the province of Quebec and in thus discrediting Quebec they are discrediting the entire agricultural class. This is an insult to the farmers and we wish to register an energetic protest against it.

Now we come to another consideration. We demand the revision of the tariff on all farming implements, on everything that is a help to farming and to the farmer; we must never forget that it is the man with the hoe who amasses the real wealth of the country, the wealth which does not scamper away to the other side of the ocean once the pockets are full, there to bask around the desks in the War Office or in the quarters of the big English cabinets. That kind of people run away with their millions; but Canada desires its real wealth from the pockets of its farmers. We do not want to see our wealth crossing the ocean. That is why we are criticising the Government to-day for its policy of favouritism towards the big capitalists. In the words of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) this policy is most pernicious for the country.

We have to do not only with a policy of favouritism, but with a policy of despotism. We work for the big fellows, we work for those who are well off, for those who have large fortunes, but what do the poor people get? Nothing. What are they promised? Bosh, soap bubbles. They are promised the moon, but they never get a thing. That is the lot of our poor people; that is what this Government's policy leads to.

Mr. Speaker, we ask the Government to put aside this notorious policy and to remember that the people exist; that these gentlemen are governing for the people and not for a few privileged interests.

Every means have been tried, during the last three years to turn our social fabric upside down, with this policy. We have seen a cataract of laws falling in such rapid sequence and with such suddenness, that we did not have time—even we who are accustomed to keep a close watch on our laws—to know just what was the law of the country, because just as soon as a law had been passed it was immediately succeeded by another law. And what a law! For instance, the notorious Conscription Act. Things that had never been seen, even in Germany, became a part of our life in this country where the Government showed more severity than the very potentates of Germany. Indeed, to our knowledge, the kaiser himself had never acted in such a fashion.

Mr. Speaker, if we want the people to submit it is high time that this state of affairs were a thing of the past; if we do not want the entire working class to rise up in revolt and have a repetition in this country of what is going on in England where strike succeeds strike, and one fine day wake up to find the country we are working for thrown into the abyss where the Bolsheviki have thrown Russia. If things came to that pass we would find in this House leaders who could very well call themselves Trotsky and Lenine.

Were I allowed to offer suggestion I might make a few, but the hon. Minister of Public Works told us that he has had so many that he doesn't want any more. The reason is magnificent! He doesn't know where to turn.

As the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Sheard) said a moment ago: when these gentlemen are in doubt they play trumps. But, Sir, when they play "trumps" the people pay; there you have the biggest proof of their indecision.

The hon. member for Toronto—I feel bound to pay him this compliment—gave to the House some very pleasant and very useful notes that could very well have come from the few ministers who have had the floor.

Since the beginning of the session we have been told that a Department of Public Health is to be inaugurated. We all wanted to know what was meant, and what the emergency was now that the epidemic has passed, and someone made the guess that it was to prevent an outbreak of epidemic among the members of the Government, and that having seen the candle in the window of the Liberal stronghold and heard the murmur that so-and-so was thinking of leaving, some one guessed, I say, that this Department of Public Health is for the purpose of curing all those erring sons who are willing to return; curing them of influenza. Really if the "flu" should break out in their ranks they decidely would need an energetic Minister of Public Health to prevent the complaint from spreading because they are already suffering from a rather severe attack and the Government itself might well be the first to die.

But this Public Health Department, as stated by the hon. member will cover many other diseases beside influenza, and after the epidemic has been stopped, they will have to watch its consequences. The hon. member also referred to matters which, at first sight, I did not think would come under the control of a department of Public Health.

The Minister of Agriculture is having considerable sums of money voted each year, towards checking certain plant diseases and destructive insects in our forests, but according to the hon. member, it appears that it will be within the functions of the Minister of Public Health to do away with all the insects which cause plant diseases. The hon. member may be a vegetarian and for this reason he would like the minister to look after the matter. Do you fancy our Minister of Public Health running through the fields to destroy all the little bugs which are eating up our crops and which, in some of the provinces where they grow a lot of potatoes, practically destroy the crop? Do you fancy him sending engineers in our forests to destroy all the flies that are liable to injure balsam, spruce or white pine trees? Mr. Speaker, is that what they call the public health. The plants as well as the bugs will have their Minister!

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, there is one of the remarks made by the hon. member for Toronto that struck me more particularly. Evidently the Minister of Public Works is not in luck's way. This afternoon somebody told him most disagreeable things which made him frown and grow nervous; now the hon. member for Toronto tells us that the Minister is all mixed up, mingling the assets with the liabilities and the revenue with the interest. But nobody told us where goes the money which we are paying.

Mr. Speaker, did you ever ask yourself, as some of the members of the Government, and specially of the Opposition do, what was the result of such policies? Of course the first conclusion we may draw is that this policy is one of demoralization.

Fortunately the war is over. There is no one, Mr. Speaker, who had a deeper sense of regret at the death of so many brave volunteers in his home town than I, and I must say that out of 45 of our young men who went voluntarily to the front, 42 were killed—forty-two dead who may have had no decorations, but whose death we mourn—and that those who came back are disabled for life. Hail these gallant men and the others who came from the surrounding parishes. Hail these farmers' sons who left the plough to fight in Flanders and died on the old soil of France whence came their ancestors. No one glories more in their supreme sacrifice than I do, neither does any one regret more than I do the futility of their sacrifice. Of what use is it for them to have gone and fought overseas, to have spilled their blood for the land of their birth and for Old France and for their country of adoption, Great Britain, if those who are coming back after winning the war have lost peace at home.

The policy carried on by the Government will necessarily bring about this demoralization. As to the promise made by the Government to the returning soldiers that they would give them the best positions or at least, as a last expedient, the positions which they held before enlisting, we know, at home, what that promise is worth. It means to the returned man that he is sent from one commission to another and delayed until the time when there is nothing to be got. Is it not regrettable to notice how vain are these promises?

I myself happened to apply to the authorities on behalf of a wounded returned soldier who was asking to be re-instated in his former position on a ship. It is with a deep sense of regret that I had to tell him: "My friend, the Government who promised you would get back your job say that they will give you another one on the new boats they will build next summer." Is this the way of re-establishing the soldiers? Here is a man who did his duty, and who is told when coming back wounded: "To fulfil our promise to you we shall wait until next summer when our boats are launched."

How many soldiers received the same reply! They are sent from "Dan to Beersheba," and the unfortunate ones have to struggle without getting anything. Will this help in strengthening the morale of these men? Or is it not rather calculated to raise their indignation against those who remained here and to whom they will say: "While we were working hard, while we were fighting and giving our blood, you were busy making money without providing for us; we had the promises and you had the real thing; now that we are back, we have not even the satisfaction to say that you intend to keep these promises."

A time will come, Mr. Speaker, when these gallant men will be able to speak out, and when that time comes, the hon. ministers who, to-day, are living happy, will be glad to go back to their mansions. Indeed they will be fortunate if the soldiers do not fetch them there and force them to give an account of their conduct.

Hail the Canadian army which showed such valour in the fighting on the various battlefields! Hail the brave ones who have left us, who have sacrificed their all for the triumph of their country of adoption and of their mother country. But, Mr. Speaker, how will you ask them to respect the laws? How will you ask them to abide by the various Orders in Council, when they know that these laws do not represent the wishes of the people for whom they fought? They come from the people, they want the people to rule, or else they will have a hand in it. If they do, we shall help them and the people will have their revenge.

Mr. M. STEELE (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, if I make only some slight reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, I am sure he will not think me discourteous. I have no doubt at all that from his point of view he made a speech which was very excellent indeed, and with that reference I will say nothing more, especially, if I must confess it, because I could not follow the hon. gentleman very closely. I would like to add my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the reply to the Address. Seldom in this House has that task been better performed, but it is especially pleasing that this year it should have been performed by two of our members who themselves played a very important part in the conflict overseas. This is the first time for some years that the House has met under peace conditions, and while it is gratifying that we are able at this time so to meet, we cannot forget the war made glorious by the achievements of our gallant sons. At Ypres, there stood between the great German horde and Calais only a few decimated battalions from the shops and offices and farms of the Canada which they had left a few months previous; but with the Canadian spirit they stemmed the onward march of the German divisions, and Calais was saved. From that time until the last cannon was fired at the capture of Mons on the morning of the 11th of November, the gallant achievements of the Canadian army will pass into history as among the most brilliant that have ever been recorded on the pages of world history. We have to regret that in those achievements so many brave and gallant sons of Canada have fallen. But yet we have in our remembrance the spirit displayed by those men, and that is at least some recompense to the people of Canada for the sacrifices which they made. One of our Canadian poets very beautifully I think puts into a few lines the spirit of the men who in the early days enlisted in the Canadian army. In a brief poem entitled, "He sleeps in Flanders" he writes the following:

> He saw not where his path should lead,
> Nor sought a path to suit his will;
> He saw a nation in her need,
> He heard the cause of honour plead,
> He heard the call, he gave it heed,
> And now he sleeps in Flanders.

The Canadian sacrifice was great—sacrifice of lives which was felt by the mothers of the Canadian sons, the wives of the Canadian husbands, the children of the Canadian fathers; and to-night I am sure that every hon. member of this House joins in the sorrow of these friends of the departed whose memory lives and will remain with us for a long time to come. To our gallant soldiers Canada is deeply indebted. There is no argument on that point. We are indebted to those who have bled and died, and we are indebted to the dependents of those who have fallen. This indebtedness is a sacred obligation. It is a debt of honour that must be liquidated through the agency of this Parliament. We must not allow the dependents of the fallen to suffer. The disabled must be cared for and the returned men restored to civil life. At this point I would like to make a suggestion in connection with the matter of vocational training for returned men. I believe, Sir, that it would be appreciated and would be of very great advantage, benefit and assistance to the returned men if there was placed in the hands of every returned man a brief, concise statement of what the Government is prepared to do for them in the line of vocational training. I do not come across very many returned men, not nearly so many as some hon. members do, but I must confess I scarcely come across one who knows anything about this matter, and I think there are hundreds of young men to-day who would gladly take up the course, if it were brought to their attention and they were informed of the splendid benefits which it offers. The land settlement of the Government is a policy which, I think, should be commended by this House and should meet with the approval of the returned men themselves. It is not easy to carry out any policy of repatriation to the satisfaction of every person concerned. I believe, Sir, that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) will find just as great difficulty in carrying out his policy of repatriation to his satisfaction as the Government may find in carrying out theirs, because, while the hon. gentleman has announced to the erring wanderers from his party at this stage that the light is in the window and the latch string out, within a few hours after that announcement the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), with perhaps the impulsiveness of immaturity, and quite abruptly, made the announcement in effect, "If you men don't think as we do, you can stay where you are."

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEELE: That is the first difficulty, I think, encountered by the hon. leader of the Opposition in carrying out his "repatriation" policy, and I think I can assure him that there will be many more difficulties met with before it is successfully carried out.

Our armies overseas faced difficulties and overcame them; our people at home during the four years of war have faced difficulties and overcome them. With our army returned, and with our people at home united, as they will be, after demobilization, I indulge the confident hope that whatever difficulties arise in this country within the next few years this combined after-the-war army will successfully cope with and overcome. It is gratifying, I am sure, to us on this side of the House, and, I believe to the great majority of the people of Canada, to know that demobilization, repatriation and reconstruction are being carried out by a Union Government. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) this afternoon made the statement that there was no one to look after the returned soldier. I would remind him that Union Government looked after the soldier before he returned and that Union Government looked after the soldier last spring when he was badly in need of assistance and reinforcements. The returned soldier is being looked after by that same Government now with the same spirit and the same success.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe also made a remark referring to the Liberals on this side of the House and compared them to fruit ripened and falling from the tree. I would like to remind him that the ripening of fruit is not the only reason for it falling from the tree. Fruit falls from the tree when the tree becomes blighted, fruit falls from the tree when the tree dies, and is unable to give the fruit that vitality that it requires in order to remain upon the tree.

We enjoy Union Government on this side of the House for many reasons. One reason especially is that we have the privilege of criticising the Government. Hon. gentlemen on the other side cannot appreciate what that means but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the great majority of those who are supporting Union Government feel a freedom that they never enjoyed when they belonged to either of the two old parties. We are free to criticise and in so doing we are free to retain the freedom of men thinking for themselves. I believe that the day of the infallible governments has passed. We have had many of them in Canada. Every government, in fact, has been infallible while it remained in power especially in the eyes of its own supporters. We have not an infallible Government, I am glad to say, and I hope we never shall have another.

I want to refer to one question that is before the Government at this time and which was referred to in such excellent terms this afternoon by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard)—the Public Health Bill. The previous speaker (Mr. Dechene) made the remark, if I understood him, that a Public Health Bill was not warranted by the circumstances. I hope, Sir, that when the discussions which will take place on that Bill during the session are ended, my hon. friend will be fully convinced that the circumstances do warrant the establishment of a Public Health department. He also made the remark in connection with this Public Health department that when the Liberal influenza gets hold of the people it cannot be checked. That may be true, but when it gets hold of the people I believe it will prove just as deadly as the influenza that has passed over Canada during the last few months. I am rather gratified that the Government have at this session announced their intention of organizing a Public Health department. For two years I have brought the matter before the House and it is gratifying to know that at last the efforts that have been made in this House on many occasions are going to bear fruit and that we are likely to get the department which is needed. This is in line with what I believe this Government, as all governments in Canada, will have to do in the next few years—give greater attention to social problems. After all, the importance of our country is determined by our people, and unless we have a vigorous, virile, healthful people, we cannot have a country of the first importance. Universal health conservation is, to my mind, the duty of the nation. Sanitary science has placed within the hands of the State facts which, if applied to the protection of the health of our people, will produce a greater and better nation. The physical care of our people determines to an important degree the mental and moral development; and all combined, the physical, mental and moral, are required to make the best citizens. In Great Britain much attention is being given to the subject. In his first speech of the campaign in the general election of last fall, Premier Lloyd George made this statement:

> The recruiting statistics have revealed terrible conditions as regards the physical health of the nations. This is due not to poverty but to neglect. The health of the people must be the special concern of the State.

The British Labour party have adopted as the first principle of their platform:

> The securing to every member of the community all the requisites of healthy life and worthy citizenship.

What can be done in Canada? In these days we hear much of the burden of taxation which is going to be put on the people of Canada as a result of the war. Every person is looking for a means by which taxation can be lightened. I want to give to this House a possible method by which the taxation of Canadians may be greatly lightened. Irving Fisher, in his work on "National Vitality," estimates that sickness costs each family in the United States on an average $110 per year. If that rate is applied to the people of Canada, it costs the people of Canada $220,000,000 each year for sickness and $100,000,000 at least of that can be saved, or the part of that cost which is due to preventable sickness; sickness which, under an efficient department of health, can be prevented. This tax falls heaviest on the working man.

It is estimated that on the average each working man loses nine days per year from sickness. In Canada we have a million and a quarter working men, which means that eleven and a quarter million days' labour are lost to the country on account of the sickness of the workingmen, a loss in wages alone of at least $35,000,000. Then there is to be added to the wage loss the cost of the sickness, and the cost of the deaths. Not only that, but sickness brings unemployment, which we are all striving to prevent. Unemployment is followed by poverty, poverty is followed by destitution, and destitution is followed by either charity or crime. In Canada, there are every year at least fifty thousand deaths which are unnecessary. This is a tremendous economic loss; let me give you some figures to illustrate. If ten thousand of those who die are wage earners, and each wage earner is worth to the country at least $10,000,—so it is estimated—then, Sir, the unnecessary deaths of wage earners occurring in this country each year means an economic loss to Canada of at least $100,000,000. There is an opportunity for a modern, up-to-date, live Government such as we have to-day in Canada to save that immense burden of taxation to our people. Not only have we great unnecessary loss among the wage earners from deaths, but every year in this country there are dying fifteen thousand infants under one year of age, who can be saved to the state. The blackest page in the records of Canada is the page which contains the records of infant mortality, because that record is due to the neglect, indifference and ignorance of the Canadian people. When a child dies people are often heard to say, "Providence has taken another little one home." It seems to me it is almost criminal dishonesty to place on the shoulders of Providence what our own ignorance and neglect are entirely responsible for.

We have talked of conservation for years, and along some lines conservation has greatly advanced, but we require conservation and yet more conservation. We have for years been applying conservation to our agricultural problems, but why, Mr. Speaker, may I ask, should we conserve the fertility of the soil and not conserve the tillers of the soil? Why should we conserve plant life and not human life? Why conserve animal life and not child life? Why conserve our forests, our iron, our coal, our water-powers, and neglect our people? Thousands are spent every year to destroy the parasites which prey on plant and animal life, but how miserly we become, how miserly the Government has been in the past, when asked to spend anything to protect from similar parasites the citizens of our land. Horses, cattle, hogs, fruits and vegetables, all receive due attention, but thousands of infants are allowed to go to early graves, thousands of wage-earners are allowed to die or become disabled, without any attention from the State, and so generation after generation the health of our people goes neglected.

We have for the past few years been fighting to maintain democracy in the world.

The Canadian Army preserved Canada as a democratic country. Our soldiers made their contribution for democracy; now it rests with the people of Canada to make their contribution by rendering Canada a democratic country fit for a democratic people to live in. Why expound the benefits of democracy to a poor citizen with tubercular chest, slowly fading, knowing well that within a few months, or a year or two, his little family will be left to depend for the essentials of life on the cold charity of the world? Can we interest in democracy the wife or children of a man who can leave as his only legacy to society another illustration that the sins of the fathers are visited on the children unto the third and fourth generation? The only democrat who can appreciate Canadian democracy is he of clear eye, pure blood, robust frame, and well-functioning brain, enabling him to fully enjoy the privileges and liberty which that democracy bestows upon him. To protect our people from the conditions which I have been describing, is to perform work of the highest and most patriotic character, work worthy of the attention of any Government.

To secure the greatest industrial production and development, it is necessary to maintain at the highest efficiency the health of the farmer, the industrial worker, the transportation employee, and all other workmen on whom depend the production and distribution of agricultural and industrial products. For this reason I think the Government is to be commended for its announcement that it is going to give aid to the highways of our country. Great changes have taken place with regard to the highways of Canada in the last thirty or forty years. In the pioneer days practically the only people who used the country road were a few farmers who lived within a mile or two of it. Then we reached the stage where the town or city dweller began to use the roads to a limited extent, and it was found advisable that the counties and the provincial authorities should come to the aid of the farmer in constructing and maintaining in repair the roads which he had previously had to keep in condition solely by his own taxation. But we have passed away from even that stage. The good country highway to-day is a national highway; it is used not only by the farmers living in the district through which it passes, not only by the citizens of the villages and towns or nearby cities, but by citizens throughout the whole country. It is even used by citizens from the land to the south of us, and therefore I say it is becoming that at this time the Dominion should step in and say: We recognize that the main roads of our country are national highways now, and therefore we feel it incumbent upon us to come to the assistance of the farmer in constructing those roads and keeping them in repair.

The speech from the Throne announced that a Bill would be brought in dealing with immigration matters, and I am glad of it. In this connection the Health department can be of very great service. I hope, Sir, that in future only the immigrant of healthy body and sound mind will be admitted into our country.

The great problem of the feeble-minded in Canada to-day has arisen chiefly because our Dominion authorities have been permitting great numbers of feeble-minded immigrants to come into this country. At the inspection of immigrants in New York City it has been found that four out of every 1,000 people applying for entrance into the United States are feeble-minded. I doubt not that the percentage of feeble-minded among those who have been applying for entry into Canada in past years has been quite as great. If so, it means that every year, for a considerable period at least, from 1,200 to 1,500 feeble-minded persons have been admitted into Canada. Let us pause and think of the enormous burden that this places upon our people. Remember, too, that 80 per cent of the offspring of these people will be feeble-minded. As we make this calculation we find that the Dominion, through laxity and carelessness, are admitting and have been admitting into this country every year large numbers of people who ultimately will be a tremendous burden upon each of the provinces. So that from a provincial as well as national point of view it is important that immigration regulations shall be stricter and the inspection of immigrants more efficient.

But in our immigrants we require not only healthy bodies and sound minds; we look for more than that. We have been entrusted with a great country. Perhaps in the past we have been allowing ourselves to run to commercialism. No question to-day would more readily excite a discussion than that of the tariff, and this shows that our minds are still largely centred on commercialism. To my mind, the tariff that was made for Canada in 1878 probably requires a great deal of remodelling in order to make it thoroughly adapted to the Canada of 1920. But this has nothing to do with immigration, about which I was speaking. As a result of the war and of our war work, there is imposed upon Canada the necessity of making of this country a great British nation where the English language shall prevail and where law and order must be recognized. There is no room in Canada for Bolshevism, notwithstanding the apology made for it by the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) the other evening. I should like to read to the House a summary of a report which was made on some of the deeds of Bolshevism, as published in this morning's papers. In a despatch through the Associated Press from Copenhagen, February 26, there appears this statement:

An appalling narrative of inhuman crime is revealed in the official report of the Esthonian authorities on Bolshevik atrocities committed in Esthonia, especially Wesenberg and Dorpat.

The graves of those murdered at Wesenburg were opened on February 17 in the presence of the town governor. Three graves were found to contain 82 corpses. Skulls were shattered, bodies bayonetted and even eviscerated. An eye-witness of the execution who escaped, described the terrible scene when the victims were placed on the edge of the graves and shot indiscriminately, trampled into the graves and finished with the butts of rifles. The vicinity of the graves was littered with torn clothing, brains, fragments of skulls and hair, while the grass was covered with congealed blood.

Similar bloodthirstiness was evinced at Dorpat, where the murdered victims were dropped into the river through holes in the ice. Recovered bodies revealed many arms and legs broken and one with the eyes put out.

The prisoners captured were robbed of clothes and valuables, led to a cellar and killed with hatchets and bombs. Examination of the cellar showed bodies piled up thickly in unnatural positions. The walls were splashed with blood.

Bolshevik fury also raged against the peasantry many of whom were mutilated and murdered. Thirty women were killed at Narva by stones being tied round their necks and being thrown into the river.

Those are the deeds of the people for whom the member for Brome, the other night, tried to enlist the sympathy of this House, and for whom he made a partial apology. There is no room in Canada for Bolshevism, and if there are any evidences of it to-day, we are but reaping what we have been sowing in our immigration policy. We have seen people in Canada during the past four years who have been profiting by the protection of the Canadian flag and of Canadian law, whose hearts were turned against Canada during that conflict, and who were openly professing sympathy with our enemies. I hope that in future our immigration policy will be such as to guard this country against the man who comes to exploit Canada. In the past the desire of the foreigner has been the deciding factor; in future we should have the assurance that the foreigner desires, when he comes to Canada, to become a good Canadian citizen. We need immigrants, but we do not need them so badly that we must accept any one and every one who desires to come. I do not sympathize with the view that in future our immigration policy should be limited only to the Anglo-Saxon countries; I believe that there are many good people in continental Europe who will make most desirable Canadian citizens if our people do their duty by them when they arrive here. But in my opinion, none but those who are able to speak English or the French language should be granted the rights of citizenship until at least eight years after their arrival here. I believe also that every immigrant should be registered on his arrival and that he should be required to have in his possession a registration card such as our own people had to have during the last few months of hostilities, so that a check can be had on him at any time. The eight years should be spent as a period of probation, and if at the end of that time the immigrant has not been living as a well-behaved, law-abiding, industrious, loyal Canadian citizen should live, and if he has not in those years been successful in acquiring a reasonable knowledge of the English language, he should at the end of that time be invited to return to the land whence he came and not be allowed to carry with him all the wealth which he has made in this country. Every one who leaves the land of his birth to settle in another country should feel that by so doing he indicates a willingness to relinquish the language and customs and ideals of that land; and when he comes to Canada he should come with a willingness to adopt the language, the customs and the ideals of this country. Only by the recognition of this principle can we develop a citizenship which is one hundred per cent Canadian.

We should not blame former immigrants for the condition of affairs which has been shown to exist in Canada of recent years. They came here on invitation; they were almost constrained to come. But when they landed here they were ignored. No further attention was paid to them. If blame is to be laid on any person, it should be laid on our Governments, on our municipal authorities, on our educational authorities, on our public men, and especially perhaps on our aspirants to public life who are too often willing to cater to the foreigner in our midst in order to get his vote. Perhaps a share of the blame could be laid on the shoulders of every Canadian citizen, for we have all sadly neglected the newly arrived immigrant. Many of them have left their own countries and have come to Canada in order to escape oppression and to enjoy the liberty which Canada offers them. We desire that they shall enjoy that liberty, but the liberty which they enjoy in Canada must be Canadian liberty, they cannot be permitted to enjoy the liberty which they imagine they might enjoy if they had remained in the land of their birth. Canadian liberty entails a responsibility, and the immigrant coming to this land should be made to understand that. That responsibility is a responsibility to the State, and amongst the responsibilities to the State is the responsibility to defend the State when the State requires defence.

We are at this time emerging from trying experiences. Victory has come to our armies overseas. Victory has also come to our people at home, because we will all, I am sure, admit that the efforts of the Canadian people at home have resulted in splendid industrial and agricultural victories. The combination of these two forces will, I am certain, result in our people courageously facing the difficult national problems of the next few years. Together they will successfully overcome those difficulties, and the achievements of our after-the-war army in industry, commerce and agriculture will be such that there will result a greater and more prosperous Canada than the most optimistic at present can even hope for.

Mr. WILLIAM C. KENNEDY (North Essex): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me have extended their congratulations to the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Redman) and the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) on their speeches on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. May I be permitted to concur in those congratulations, feeling sure that the House will agree with me that in the speeches they have delivered they have given us information, facts and figures that will be not only of service to the House but of great service to the country.

The speech itself was a typical Union Government production replete with promises. If there is one thing more than another that hon. gentlemen opposite do well, it is to promise. In fact, it has been said that no government that has been formed in Canada since Confederation has been so long on promises and so short on performance as the present Union Government. There is, however, one promise that I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will implement, and that is the promise with reference to the War-time Elections Act. That Act should be repealed without delay. There may have been some excuse a year ago for hon. gentlemen defending that measure. They may not have had an opportunity of knowing all the facts and details in connection with the voting overseas, but surely there is in this House no hon. gentleman who has returned soldiers in his constituency who does not now know the disgraceful story of the elections that were held in England in 1917. I am not speaking from hearsay; I have had in my possession the documents dealing with the matter, documents that at all events some gentlemen on the other side of the House have been privileged to see; and I hope, before the session is over, an opportunity will be given not only to the members of this House but to the people of this country to learn the names of those implicated and the methods employed to place this Union Government in power.

The people of this country are to-day in no frame of mind to accept a franchise Act whose only object is to continue in power hon. gentlemen opposite. Not only the Government of the country but the form of government are on trial with the people of Canada. The people are seriously asking themselves if some other form of government would not be preferable, and if a form of government, which, through Orders in Council, permits a small coterie of men to impose their views and wishes on the people of the country, is not inconsistent with responsible government and the spirit of democracy so necessary to our national existence. Let me say—and I am only re-echoing the words of the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair), who spoke yesterday—that in so far as the people of my part of the country are concerned, no halo goes with the position of a Cabinet minister. The Cabinet ministers of this country are the servants of the people and not the masters, and that is a good thing for Cabinet ministers to remember. It is important in the interests of the people that the proposed franchise legislation should be fair and just, so that it will appeal to all irrespective of party.

Amongst other matters dealt with in the Address was one that I thought would perhaps have come in for more attention. I refer to the visit of our distinguished Premier (Sir Robert Borden) and his fellow diplomats across the sea. So far as I have heard, no explanation has been given by hon. gentlemen who have up to the present addressed the House as to what has transpired in Paris or in Versailles, what the Premier is doing, or what he hopes to do for this country. All the information that the members of this House can obtain is what they can gather from the public press. Fortunately, it seems the Premier is well supplied with correspondents because we are able to keep to some extent in touch. I wish, however, to congratulate the Premier, as other hon. members have done, on his finally obtaining some definite standing abroad. I am free to confess that I am not aware just what that particular standing is. The fact remains, nevertheless, that it seems to be perfectly satisfactory as a matter for congratulation, and in these congratulations I desire to join. I notice that the right hon. gentleman is in Paris; I notice also that the President of the United States is in Washington, that the Premier of England is in England, that the Premier of France is incapacitated, and that the Premier of Italy is in Italy. We, therefore, really are represented at the conference, and I trust with credit to this country.

I should like to say just a word or two with reference to the personnel accompanying our premier on his trip across the sea. These gentlemen are probably, from years of experience, distinguished diplomats, and I have no doubt they will reflect great credit upon this country. But may I say that, in view of the trip overseas that was taken last spring by other hon. gentlemen in this House, there was not a little surprise, throughout the province of Ontario at least, that one other hon. member of this House had not been chosen to accompany the Premier on this trip. Those who read the newspapers must recall the magnificent work accomplished by the hon. President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) and the gentlemen who were with him when they were over there last year. I know the papers were replete with information as to what the President of the Council was doing, and how well he was doing it, and it seems to me there must be some very good reason for his having been left behind, or else some very great mistake has been made by the Premier in leaving him off this delegation. Many reasons have been advanced why he did not accompany the Premier. I have heard it said that when the President of the Council was over there last year his presss agents were perhaps a little too vigorous and there were times when the people were not quite sure whether the Premier was in England or in Canada. I likewise heard that he was being reserved for the leadership here in the absence of the Premier. But we see these were all mistakes. The matter did not disturb me at all, because I absolutely knew the reason through having read early in July last year a press despatch from across the seas dealing with matters over there, and I at once saw that it was out of the question for the gentlemen who accompanied the Premier last spring to return with him again this year. If the House will bear with me I will quote part of the despatch; I shall not read it all, as it might prove embarrassing to the hon. gentlemen who are mentioned, although I do not see any of them present at the moment. The despatch appears in the Detroit Free Press of Sunday, July 28th, 1918, and deals with the visit of our distinguished group of diplomats. It describes how busy these gentlemen were in London, and incidentally I am glad to note the landing in England of the Minister of Colonization (Mr. Calder) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). It is reassuring to see that they sailed and landed, because beyond that very little is said in the despatches about them. The despatch reads:—

> They entered into a self denying ordinance on their arrival here. They declined the ordinary social engagements except those directly connected with the operations of the war, refusing almost every offer to speak—

There, Mr. Speaker, was self-sacrifice of a high order. They absolutely refused every offer to speak.

> —despite insistent demands from every part of England. Frequently at the close of a laborious twelve-hour day the ministers would visit some hospital a considerable distance away, talk with the wounded, dine en famille with the staff, and reach home at midnight. Their appearance gives physical evidence of the heavy nature of their work. Mr. Rowell looks years older than when he arrived.

There, Mr. Speaker, you have the reason. Out of consideration for his colleague the Premier refused to add more years to the hon. gentleman's life. A few years, of course, in the young life of the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), or the Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) means nothing. The members of this House must surely be indebted to the Premier for his consideration for the President of the Council, and speaking for myself and on behalf of the Liberals of the province of Ontario I desire likewise to thank the Premier, because the Liberals of the province of Ontario are anxiously waiting for the time to come when they may have an opportunity of showing their love and affection for the President of the Council. It seems fitting that the author of this despatch should have the privilege of being named in this House. I think the gentleman who could pen such a despatch is worthy of that distinction. I am sorry to disappoint my hon. friends, but the despatch was not written by Donald Hunt, it was not written even by Main Johnson, but by a gentleman who by a strange coincidence is named McKenzie, and if I am any judge of names he is a Scotsman. And yet there are people who say that the Scotch have no sense of humour! Mr. Speaker, Bret Harte is dead; Mark Twain has been gathered to his fathers; Bill Nye is no more; but as long as McKenzie lives there is one great humorist alive.

Mr. BURNHAM: What McKenzie is that?

An hon. MEMBER: D.D.

Mr. KENNEDY: No. I have followed with some interest the activities of our distinguished diplomats across the seas, and while I am anxious to do them every justice, yet as I said earlier in my remarks, it has been almost impossible to keep in touch with what they have done. However, in justice to them I wish to call the attention of the House and the country to just what they have been doing so far as we can gather from the press reports. The first really important matter with which the name of our Premier was associated was a dinner given in London on the 27th of December last. Hon. gentlemen may have read of it. It was a magnificent banquet. There were thousands of soft shaded lights. The walls were hung with expensive tapestries. Fifteen million dollars worth of gold plate were spread upon the banquet board. The lackeys were in the costume of the beefeaters of old, bowing low and moving backwards before the advancing guests. Our Premier was there, and he was described in the papers as wearing the Windsor costume, knee breeches and all—democracy pure and undefiled. By a strange coincidence, in the very newspaper that gave an account of this banquet attended by our hon. Premier was an account of the return to Canada of men who had fought in France and Flanders, men who had suffered, and who had put in three or four years in the trenches on the western front—the return of those men on the steamer Northland. Hon. gentlemen, may have heard of it. There were no soft and shaded lights, no priceless tapestries, and no fifteen million dollars worth of gold plate upon the table. No, there was maggoty soup, putrid beef, and foul and ill-smelling rooms for the men to sleep in. Sir, it seems hardly possible that, in the few short months, the hon. gentlemen so soon forget their rallying cry, to back the boys at the front. Let me say, in so far as the boys who have returned from the front are concerned, they have not forgotten, and they are not forgetting. I would suggest to some of the hon. gentlemen opposite that if an opportunity is presented to them of occupying a pulpit and preaching the glories of the Government they might easily find a text for a good sermon in these facts. It would be edifying to the people of Canada and worthy of consideration. Our hon. Premier has likewise received some attention in the papers these last few days, on account of the success that has attained his efforts to loan some $25,000,000 to one of the smaller European nations. The hon. gentleman deserves every credit for that, and I am quite satisfied there will be no difficulty in furnishing the manufactured products to take care of the $25,000,000, because it is a mighty nice arrangement for the manufacturers to have their money guaranteed. I have no doubt many of us regret we are not in some line of business where we would be absolutely sure of selling our goods at a fat profit and having our money absolutely assured, as is being done in this case. In this connection may I say, it is about time, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen should change the name of these trade commissions floating around the different countries. The business men of this country are not deceived about these trade commissions. These dollar-a-year business men who—perfectly legitimately of course (and I emphasize that point) have run their dollar into a million or more in the course of a year—are keen, smart business men and trade commissioners. These gentlemen are contract-placers, and they see that these contracts for manufactured products go to pretty much the same line of gentlemen in nearly every instance. You have only to take the connection of some of these gentlemen with these large manufacturing establishments, and take the directors, the vice-presidents and the president and see who they are, and you will find that there is not much going outside of a certain circle. The average business man in this country is not being very much fooled by what you call trade commissions. I think it is about time that the Government took the matter in hand themselves. It is about time that the Government had a Department of Trade and Commerce that could look after the affairs of the country without the assistance of outside commissions. As to the Department of Trade and Commerce, I have not a word to say with reference to the right hon. gentleman who occupies the important position as head of it. He is overseas, and he has given the best years of his life to Canada. He is a gentleman for whom I have the greatest respect. He is entitled to anything he wants in this country. That is what I think about the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. But I say he is not the man to occupy such an important position at this juncture in the history of the country. We should have a bright aggressive up-to-date business man looking after the trade and commerce affairs of this country at this time. To me the present system is simply nonsense. If we had such a man as I suggest, we could do away with all these absurd, foolish commissions which are floating about this country, with secretaries to burn, and keeping up offices here, there and everywhere. The Government themselves should take the responsibility of conducting their department, they should have men there who are capable of conducting it, and these men should conduct it. That is what responsible government calls for.

That is where the government of hon. gentlemen opposite is falling down in the opinion of the people of this country. In this connection, may I say, only the other day one of the important firms of the city which I have the honour to represent wrote to the Department of Trade and Commerce that they were anxious to do business in England and asked for an English tariff, so that they might know what competition they had to meet. They did not get it; the department did not have it. That is not the way to run the department. You talk about developing the trade and commerce of the country. There must be some intelligence in connection with a department, if you are going to be successful and business men are entitled to some consideration. They are paying taxes directly and indirectly and every way you can get them, and they are willing to pay them, but they should have something for the money they are paying into this Government for administration purposes. If hon. gentlemen will bear with me for a minute I will read a letter which I have received from the secretary of the Board of Commerce in our city in connection with this matter. He encloses me a copy of a letter received from Mr. F. C. T. O'Hara, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, which says:

> I may say that we have always had much trouble in supplying information with regard to the British and foreign tariffs, for as you know, all tariffs are subject to Treasury decisions and changes of which we frequently are not advised for months afterwards. From our own knowledge of the Canadian Customs Tariffs you will know that experts in the Customs Department of the country itself alone are able to give information in many cases. Since the outbreak of war all our International Customs Bureau publications which were issued at Brussels have ceased, hence many of our tariffs are out of date, and no means exist for obtaining this information at present for all the countries of the world, translated as before the war.

That does not apply to England. We have over in London paid officials of this Government. Surely there should be somebody there who would keep the Department of Trade and Commerce in touch with conditions over there, so that we could do business with that country. The letter continues:

> Personally I have relied largely on Kelley's Customs Tariffs of the world, which is published annually but this department cannot hold itself responsible for any tariff information supplied respecting foreign countries.
> We have another trouble to contend with, and that is lack of space and lack of a sufficient number of officials to compile such tariff information as we can from time to time.

It does not seem possible, if one goes through the buildings in Ottawa, to believe that there is any lack of officials. You simply fall over them, no matter which way you go. To me it is almost inconceivable that the business of the country should be held up because there are no officials obtainable in Ottawa. It is a matter I am sure the hon. gentleman will have no difficulty in remedying.

> All our Customs Tariffs as received before the War went down to the Bureau of Statistics when our Trade Division was transferred there, but I had had in mind, as soon as accommodation could be supplied in the West Block, to place the tariff matters under the Commercial Intelligence Branch, but up to the present there has been no room made available for that purpose.

Yet, the hon. gentlemen who spoke on the Address told us about the magnificent efforts that were being made to extend the trade and commerce of this country. Surely, Sir, I am justified when I say that the time has come when some bright, progressive, alert, smart, business men should be placed in charge of the organizations that we have in connection with the affairs of this Government and of the country.

The right hon. the Prime Minister of this country (Sir Robert Borden) seems to have come into a good deal of prominence in connection with the Russians that were to meet on Prinkipo in Prince's Islands. In this connection I want to say a word in justice to my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster). I listened attentively to his remarks the other evening, and I did not gather from what he said that he used language which could in any way be construed as denoting approval of the Bolsheviki. On the contrary, I understood him to say that there were possibly two opinions and to substantiate his argument he quoted from the Manchester Guardian, which took the side of the question opposite to that taken by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell). I have here the report of the remarks of my hon. friend from Brome, as contained in Hansard, and I think it is only just to him, in view of what the hon. Minister of Public Works said, and also in view of what the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) said this evening, that his words should be repeated. My hon. friend from Brome said:

> I am not sure whether the common view taken in this country of the Bolshevik is altogether correct. I think that perhaps there is another side to the question, and as this is the great forum where truth and exact knowledge should be brought before the people, I take the liberty of referring the House to some articles which are appearing in the Manchester Guardian from an eye-witness from Russia.

That is not endorsing by any means the Bolsheviki, and I think it is unfair that my hon. friend should be placed in that position. So far as I am concerned, may I say that I heartily agree with the Minister of Public Works. I have exactly the same idea of the Bolsheviki that he has, and it was a matter of extreme regret to me to see the Prime Minister of this country placing himself in the position of opening communications with them and inviting them to meet decent people. I thought it was hardly fair to the people of Canada that they should have to assume that role. Anxious as some of the great powers were that there should be a settlement in Russia, none of them was willing to assume the responsibility of accepting a rebuff from one or other of the Russian parties. But, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada was made of sterner stuff, and, without a moment's hesitation, according to the despatch from Mr. Dafoe of the Winnipeg Free Press, he put forth the idea which he had conceived of inviting the Bolsheviki to meet at Prince's Island. Apparently the decent element among the Russians refused; so far there has been no meeting, and the matter has been dropped. I think it would be fair for the Minister of Public Works and the hon. member for South Perth to communicate with the minister and give him their views in reference to the Bolshevikis in order to prevent anything of that kind occurring in the future.

Of course, it may be that the Prime Minister was better informed with reference to the Russian situation than we were. It may be that he had some inside information in reference to the matter. I am quite willing to admit that it would have been a wonderful diplomatic victory to have achieved if he had brought peace to Russia. I can well imagine how the newspapers of the whole world would have acclaimed him as a great diplomat, and I believe that if he had been successful he would have been entitled to have been so acclaimed. It may be that the Prime Minister, with perhaps more vision than most of us possess, looked a little ahead and saw that in the event of being successful some recognition would come to him from the powers that be. In the olden times he would have been given broad lands, but now the League of Nations seems to have nailed the land down pretty well. There would be nothing left to give him but a title, and if he had been successful we in the Dominion of Canada could have had the pleasure and privilege of welcoming him back, not as the right hon. Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, but as the Earl of Prinkipo, because he would be entitled to that proud distinction in view of the great diplomatic victory that he had achieved at that island. The time has about arrived in the history of this country when some of the right hon. gentleman's colleagues should tell him that he was elected, and selected, to manage the affairs of Canada, in Canada, and that the seat of Government is Ottawa, not London, not Paris, and not Prinkipo. Somebody should tell the right hon. gentleman on one of his intermittent visits to this country that it is far more important to the people of Canada to have the tariff settled satisfactorily than it is to have the boundaries of the Balkans settled. Somebody should tell the right hon. gentleman that it is far more important to the people of Canada to have the railway situation straightened out than it is to decide who is going to police Constantinople.

I would like to go further and say that the newspapers of Canada to-day are filled with stories of returned men who are not receiving the treatment they should receive. It is far more important to the people of this country that we should have a government that is looking after Canadian affairs and far more important to them that the Premier should be here directing public affairs, which is his first and most pressing duty, than that he should determine who should have mandatory powers over the Hottentots. That is the position of affairs insofar as we are concerned, and the sooner the right hon. gentleman comes home, bringing his entourage with him, and permits the absent gentlemen to fill, even if only temporarily, the positions of Minister of Customs, Minister of Justice, and Minister of Trade and Commerce, the better it will be. Because that is what the people of the country are paying them for. The Cabinet ministers are paid officials. It is not necessary that a man should be a wizard to be a Cabinet minister; the day for that sort of thing has passed and gone. The duties of Government consist largely of taking the money of the country and disbursing it wisely and well, of administering the affairs of Canada in the interests of its people. That is where hon. gentlemen opposite are falling down. They are in the clouds, their minds are given to everything but the duties of their offices; and the time has about arrived when somebody should direct the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada to come home—he was elected for a specific purpose, and the taxpayers of this country expect him to be here and attend to his business.

The Acting Premier (Sir Thomas White) said the other day in the course of his remarks, that there was absolute need for steadiness amongst the people of the country to-day. I quite agree with him in that statement, but I desire to point out that the lead must come from the Government. The people must have confidence in the Government, they must feel that they are being governed intelligently and well. There must be a return to responsible government—not government by order in council, but government for the people by the people. That was the obligation undertaken in behalf of the Canadian people when Confederation was formed. But hon. gentlemen opposite have not been carrying out that obligation, and that is the cause of the unsteadiness and unrest which prevails throughout Canada to-day.

I wish to refer to the subject of the Siberian Expedition. Canadians have not been vouchsafed very much light as to why they are being represented in Siberia. I could understand, Sir, that if we were still at war there might be need for the presence of a Canadian military force in Siberia, but I cannot understand why, once the armistice was declared, our soldiers should still be sent from Vancouver to Vladivostok. The people of Canada are equally at a loss to understand this, and it is one of the questions that hon. gentlemen opposite will find very difficult to answer when they appear before the public. Personally, I do not believe we have any more business in Siberia at the present time than we have in Mexico. Why should Canada be the policeman for the world? As a matter of fact, apart from the humanitarian reasons that are actuating some of the Powers, a good many nations are influenced by the fact that they have loaned large sums of money to Russia at extortionate rates of interest. That being so, why should we be the money collectors for Europe? Surely it is up to the creditor nations to collect their own investments.

There are certain other matters I wish to take up, and one of them has reference to a letter which I received from a returned soldier. Unfortunately I do not know under whose department it comes. It is difficult for a comparatively new man to determine just who is responsible for the administration of the many public departments of this Government. However, Mr. Speaker, with your permission I will read the letter, and if there are any ministers present who are interested in the department affected I shall be glad if they will take cognizance of it. If not, perhaps they will mention it to some of their colleagues, if it so happens that those colleagues are in this country. The letter in question is dated, "Windsor, Ontario, February 12th, 1919," is addressed to "William C. Kennedy, Esq., M.P., Windsor," and reads:

H. A. B. Aikman,

Formerly No. 7109—1st Battalion Can.

Board of Pension Commissioners, No. 13314.

Sir,—I have the honour to submit for your consideration the following facts which represent an occurrence in which I figured in connection with the Board of Pensions Commissioners for Canada and the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Toronto.

In compliance with their request I reported in Toronto on Tuesday morning, February 4th, 1919, at ten o'clock at the latter department, from which I was transferred to the Military Hospital for medical re-examination, where I (with others), waited until about twelve-thirty, noon, when we were told to go away, get our dinner and report again in the afternoon. Two or three of us stated we had no money, so we were given our dinner there. Probably about four o'clock, I, with others, was told to report again next day. I said that I, for one, would not report the next day, as I had come from Windsor, had already lost two days and to Windsor I was going that night and requested transportation together with my expenses. The officer who imparted the suggestion of reporting next day, did so in very crude language, had dishevelled hair, moved with uncertain gait and the expression of his eyes was such as I have seen produced by the immoderate use of liquor, and while I am not prepared to say definitely that that condition existed, his appearance implied such was the case.

It was then found possible to give me an examination, which occupied probably twenty minutes. At its conclusion I requested transportation and expenses and was told these would be supplied me at the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, where I had once before been. Reporting at this latter point again I was told that they could not supply my demands for transportation and pay and that I would have to go back to the Military Hospital for it.

I was suffering from lumbago, in addition to a shrapnel wound in the groin, the distance was between one and two miles and another trip was an impossibility for me. I thereupon flatly refused to do it. They then issued me return transportation to Windsor and, as is customary in the army, I signed a receipt for my pay and expenses, in advance. The clerk, who took my receipt, returned in a few moments, took my Windsor address and informed me cheque would be mailed to me the next day. This was eight days ago and I am still looking for this cheque, which I have already signed for, but have not received.

The amount involved is not large, but the principle of the thing, or shall I say, the lack of principle, is not only worth some consideration, but matters of this nature are things that we returned men in various stages of crippled condition, and impaired earning power, cannot financially afford to stand, especially when the amount is considered, of the pittance the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada sees fit to dole out to us.

Let me say further, that at the time of this visit to Toronto, I was informed that arrangements would be made for my return to hospital (Whitby being suggested), for further treatment, of which I am in need.

I am likewise still waiting for these latter arrangements to be perfected as well as for repayment for money and time expended by me.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Yours respectfully,
(Signed) H. A. B. Aikman.

There is the story of a returned man, and that is one of the matters that I refer to when I say that there is a feeling everywhere throughout the country that the affairs of the people are not being conducted by the heads of the respective departments as they should be; that we are not getting the government that the people are paying for, and that the time has arrived when hon. gentlemen should take charge of the departments for which they are responsible to the people, administer them in a businesslike way, and do away with these useless commissions that have been sapping away the financial life-blood of the country.

Another matter that I wish to take up is, perhaps, local in a sense, but it has a bearing on what I have said. Situated on the border, I have known many cases where men working in the city of Detroit were drafted or volunteered for military service and whose positions in various business houses of that city were reserved for them. Their employers said: You are Canadians; you are going to fight for your country. We honour you for it; you shall have your position as soon as the war is over. It was generous, and it was decent; but that is the spirit the Americans have always evinced—I say that after having lived for years on the border. Well, what happened? The armistice comes. Many of these boys who were drawing from $1,500 to $3,000 a year in the positions which they held before they went on military service, are working at $1.10 a day in London, filling clerical positions, some unimportant, and some important, perhaps. Their employers write them as soon as the armistice is signed, saying: The war is over; your position is waiting for you and we shall be glad if you can come at once. In the meantime the American boys who gave up their positions and went overseas are returning to the United States and if the Canadians do not come back and take their old positions, the first thing we know the Americans will take them and we shall increase to that extent the unemployment in Canada which the Minister of Public Works told us we were to spend millions to avoid. That was a case not of half a dozen men, but of a hundred men or more. When that situation confronted me I immediately took the matter up with the Minister of Militia. In justice to that hon. gentleman, I want to say that he met me more than half way. He appreciated the fact that my arguments were sound. I maintained that if the Government needed clerical assistance they should go into the open market and engage that assistance, and thus avoid jeopardizing the future of these men by preventing them from taking the positions which they could never get again. The Minister of Militia wrote me very kindly saying that he had instructed the commanding officer of the London District to give heed to my suggestions, and, where possible, to meet them. I took the matter up with the Commanding officer of the London District, General Shannon, a very fine gentleman, and I found him kindness itself. He, too, was anxious to help where he could, and he wrote me to say that where it was possible to dispense with the services of these men he would be very glad to do it. But these requests of mine were transferred from one department to the other and by the time the matter got back to General Shannon it was almost impossible to accomplish the object in view. In many instances I got the men released; in many others I could not, and in many cases the positions were lost. But picking up the paper one morning I read about the Repatriation Committee, and decided that here at last was a place when I could obtain some relief, because they asserted that they were anxious to find employment for returned men. I wrote to the chairman of the Repatriation Committee, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) telling him what the conditions were. He wrote me a very nice letter agreeing that my argument was sound and that what I had suggested was absolutely the right thing to do. He said that he was turning the matter over to the Secretary of the Repatriation Committee, who would write me later. In the course of a week or ten days I received a letter from the Secretary of the Repatriation Committee, in which that gentleman thanked me for the suggestion, saying that it was a very valuable one and that he would take it up with his committee and advise me at a later date. That was on the 20th of January, but unfortunately the committee, I take it, has not met since, because up to this time I have had no further word from the secretary. So you will see the way things are passed from one department to another. Nobody seems to be running the departments, and one can get no satisfaction from correspondence with them. You cannot get decisions and that is what the people want. What good is it to these boys who before going on military service had worked up to the point where they were of such service to their employers that they were getting $3,000 or $4,000 a year,—what good is it to them if I get a letter a month from now from the Secretary of the Repatriation Committee telling me that they are glad to comply with my request? The job is gone then. That is not what we want—we want action, and that is where hon. gentlemen are falling down in handling their departments.

I have other matters to take up, but I shall deal with them before the session is over when the issues with which they are connected come before the House. I shall not hesitate to express my views as to what I believe to be the proper thing to do in the interests of the country. I accept the statement of the Acting Prime Minister that it is the duty of everyone to assist the Government, and to do what he can in bringing our country through the crisis that prevails to-day. I have done my share in every matter that has arisen in connection with the war and I propose to do my share in the work of reconstruction. I want to help, but I want to help intelligently. The people want to feel that they are receiving intelligent assistance from the men who lead at this juncture and who compose the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot resume my seat without saying a word or two with reference to one who recently left us. Last year I had the first opportunity of serving under the stainless banner of our departed chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. To me it was a proud distinction, a distinction and an honour that I shall cherish to my dying day. His was always a fight for the people, and although he is gone, his spirit lives. In the words of Beecher on the death of Lincoln::

> Even he who now sleeps has, by this event, been clothed with new influence.
> Dead, he speaks to men who now willingly hear what before they refused to listen to.

Our Chieftain is gone; but Liberalism is not dead, and I very much mistake the temper of the people of this country if, when the opportunity offers and we appeal to them once more, they do not show their appreciation of Liberal principles.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join in the congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address. It is a long time since I have listened to what I presume we may dignify by the name of a speech by an honourable member such as we have just heard, because it strikes me as being an adaptation of the writings of the Fenian press of the United States in their attack on President Wilson for attending the King's banquet. I may, however, be doing the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy) an injustice, and lest I should do him an injustice in the budding moment of his distinguished career, I should like to ask him if he disapproves of Sir Robert Borden's accepting the invitation of the King of England and of the British Dominions overseas to that banquet to which he so caustically referred. Will the hon. gentleman answer me that question?

Mr. LANCTOT: No.

Mr. BURNHAM: If he had, it would have been about the only original part of his speech. The rest I have read in the flamboyant Fenian press of the United States which has been forwarded to me at different times to show me what they could do along the border. I am inclined to think, to do justice to the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), that he will administer some slight and significant rebuke for that display of politics. The light which has been held out by the Opposition is, I presume "The Light that Failed." To me it is a very singular thing that the sum total of the brilliance of the Opposition, the attraction indeed for all those erring ones, should consist in an old candle stuck in the back door of the Opposition cabin. That, to my mind, is not doing justice to the attractive power of the Opposition, and it certainly does not look well in this country, nor does it look well to leaders abroad who will suppose that all that can be handed out by way of an attraction is something stuck in the back door of an edifice of that description.

I wish, however, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, to turn to something more important. The chief question now before this country, and, indeed, before the world, is reconstruction. I will, however, confine myself to one phase of that, namely, to the standard of living, to the living wage, to that wage which the lowest, simplest form of honest labour should receive in order that it may maintain the standard of life to which we all agree it is entitled. The wage earner has evolved from a long historic post. In the early days of England, he was a member of the family, when the work performed by the family was done in the family. By and by he became a member of the clan, when the work was done by the clan, by the blood relations. Afterwards this was extended to the guild, to those associations of men who united for the purpose of prosecuting industry. And so it advanced from time to time until the period of the plague in England in 1346-47, when nearly one-half of the people of England died of the plague, and this so upset the industrial conditions of England at that time that the labourer as he was known then, wandered in an unorganized and indefinite way over the country, so much so that the Statute of Labourers was enacted which compelled him to root himself once more to one spot and to confine his exertions to that area and which also compelled him to accept a certain specific wage. As time went on, however, the consideration of the people for each other changed. What was regarded as strictly an economic question dawned upon the people as an ethical question. It was not so much a question of poverty as it was a question of life, and it has grown to be that more and more, so that we have to-day in England, in France, even in the United States, in Australia and in New Zealand, legislation of a character that has gone very far in elevating the condition of what is known as the common people. Canada has unfortunately hitherto lagged far behind. The reason of that is no doubt that we are a young country with great natural resources and much prosperity due largely to our abundance. That has probably not yet caused a condition which would warrant the measures that have been made use of in the older countries; but if the seeds of poverty, if the seeds of disintegration are here, it only requires time to bring them into growth, and it is well for us to provide against such a contingency by learning from the experience of other people. The most singular thing is that in a country like England, of such Conservative tendencies, there should have been such haste to remedy the errors of the past.

The British people are, of course, a kindly, well-intentioned people, and so soon as it was brought home to them that it was necessary for them to improve the condition of the people, and to show some interest in them, they hastened to do so. We had, first of all, the Notification of Births' Act in 1907, by which for the first time in England it was compulsory, in all cases of births, for notice to be sent to the district medical officer, in order that registration might duly occur and some notice be taken of the birth. This had the effect of enabling the medical official, and through him the Government, to know exactly the condition in which those children were born, and to render the children and the mothers some assistance. This worked a miracle in England. Thousands and tens of thousands of children who would have died at this period through neglect and ignorance were for the first time taken care of by an intelligent Government.

Then there was the Education Act, another far-reaching Act, under which the school children in the cities were provided for the first time with play grounds or breathing spaces. Then we had the system of national insurance, insuring people against unemployment, against sickness, and even against under-employment. I am citing these measures simply to show how very attentive the British people are at the present time to the elevation of the common people from the low standard of life at which they have lived for so long. It is recognized now for the first time that the common people—the unskilled labourer, the man who is compelled to take what he can get—are entitled to something better. The lowest form of honest labour, if it is to be recognized at all, and it surely must be recognized, ought to receive some consideration on the ethical basis of a proper standard of life.

I have here a report of the American Federation of Labour which represents the most intelligent ideas of labour in America and, very largely, the ideas of labour the world over. Their ideas are summed up as follows:

> There is no such thing as good wages without the cost of living in decency and comfort equalize the wages received. There must be no reduction in wages; in many instances, wages must be increased. The workers of the nation demand a living wage for all wage earners, skilled or unskilled, a wage which will enable the worker and his family to live in health and comfort, provide a competence for illness and old age, and afford to all the opportunity of cultivating the best that is in them.

It seems strange indeed that anybody should rise in this House and endeavour to call the attention of hon. members to the simple principle here enunciated. The principle, it is true, has been acknowledged in theory, has been made use of in disquisitions in the pulpit, but beyond that it has not been made use of at all. The principle of a living wage, of a decent standard of life for the lowest form of honest labour, has never yet been recognized in this country as necessary recompense of all forms of labour, but when that day comes it will mean something new for labour. It will mean hope. There is nothing unreasonable in the contention of labour, because once this zero mark has been ascertained, they are quite willing that labour above and beyond that mark shall be allowed to take care of itself. Above that mark wages will be paid according to the skill and competence of the labourer. That proposition seems to me entirely reasonable. Those who are below that mark are either weak or wicked, and have to be taken care of. They come under the denomination of the unemployed, the under-employed, the criminal or the wastrel. What is to be done with them is another matter; that is a question of reform in connection with detention farms and kindred schemes for their improvement. But that is not the question I am considering to-night, since it involves the consideration of the weakness of the people, and that does not come under a business arrangement. If it is once practically recognized by the people of this country that the lowest form of honest labour is entitled to such a wage as will maintain it in efficiency and in decency, then the point is gained, and the greatest stroke of reconstruction that could be accomplished with regard to labour will have been accomplished. Permit me to repeat that it is such a self-evident proposition that it seems singular anybody should wish to call attention to it, but, practically, the principle has not yet been admitted. But when that time comes, in that one simple fact as set out by the American Federation of Labour, and as set out by all the recent authorities on political economy which I have been able to consult, will be found the solution of the problem. Trades unionism up to a few years ago was a criminal offence; but that the people should have the right to combine for the consideration of their own affairs and for their own protection was so self-evident that at last it was allowed. Then the time came when, to the wonderment of our people here, there was introduced in the old country by no less a man than Lloyd George himself the revolutionary measure of imposing a tax upon the site value, the unearned increment of idle land being appropriated by a supertax to the use of the state, in order that the fundamental principle of the worthiness of work should be finally recognized.

One thing more is necessary. I have here a Bill passed by the Imperial Parliament prescribing a minimum rate of wages during a limited period and repealing certain provisions of the Act relating to workers on war munitions. A Bill of that description fixing a minimum wage would be considered in this country such a tremendous step in advance that it would cause a great deal of trepidation. The minimum wage, however, has been discovered not to be the solution of the difficulty, for if a man receives ten dollars a day that is of no consequence if it does not provide him and his family of three children which is usually taken as the unit, with a proper standard of living. On the other hand, if he receives only one dollar a day and that provides him with the proper means of existence, it is enough; so that a minimum wage has really nothing to do with the case. The sole and only contention is that the lowest form of labour, since we must begin from some definite point, shall be considered entitled to a proper standard of living. That proposition is not only economically sound, but surely all decent and Christian people will agree to it; and when it has been incorporated in legislation, as it undoubtedly will be in course of time, labour will have achieved what it has been striving for. It is trades unionism that is the hope of this world against Bolshevism. The trades unions are fighting Bolshevism. The trades unions are an organization of sensible labour men doing their level best. It was the trades unions that furnished more than half the men who fought the battles of this war. The Bolshevik would upset all organized labour of any kind. Therefore, it is time for the Government to pay due and proper attention to the contentions of the trades unions and endeavour to place them as nearly as possible upon a thoroughly sound and economic basis. But that basis must have in it the pure ethical spirit, for if it is going to be simply an economic system, if it is going to have simply the principle of taking what you can get—the old system of plunder—it is simply the curse of modern and industrial conditions known as profit. It seems to be a very absurd thing that anybody should speak against profit as I have done so many times in this House, but profit is the taking of that for which no equivalent is given, and the man who takes that for which he does not give an equivalent is a Bolshevik. We are asked to eliminate from the world these conditions, and to do away with that spirit of plunder, and in our dealing to restore a fair equivalent in trade or exchange. The establishment of so simple a thing as a standard of decent living for all honest, sensible men—for all these have to be fairly considered units of humanity, units in the industrial world—and the doing away with the desire to take what we can lay our hands on without regard to the justice of the case, means the making of a new world.

On motion of Mr. Duff the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid the House adjourned at 10.37 p.m.

Friday, February 28, 1919.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the report was concurred in.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That the Select Standing Committees of this House shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records, with the exception of the Committee on Debates and that on the Library of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz.: Messrs. Bowman, Brouillard, Buchanan, Burnham, Cardin, Charters, Clark (Bruce), Clarke (Wellington), Crowe, Currie, Fontaine, Hocken, Hughes (Sir Sam), Keefer, Maclean (Halifax), Michaud, Murphy, Prevost, Reid (Mackenzie), Richardson, Shaw, Verville, White (Victoria), Wilson (Wentworth), and Wright, will act as members on the part of this House on the said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to inform their Honours that this House has appointed Messrs. Andrews, Beland, Borden (Sir Robert), Boyer, Chaplin, Clark (Red Deer), Cooper, Copp, Cronyn, Crothers, Foster (Sir George), Harold, Lapointe (Kamouraska), Lemieux, Meighen, Myers, Pardee, Rowell, Sheard, and Whidden, a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker, in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Motion agreed to.

THE PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That Messrs. Douglas (Strathcona), Steele and Stewart be appointed to assist the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant, in so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours therewith.

ALLEGED TRADE DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to draw the attention of the Government to a matter of national importance contained in a special despatch published in yesterday's Toronto Globe, and to ask a question with reference thereto. The despatch in question reads:

London, Feb. 26.—Overseas representatives are interested in John Bull's slashing article. "Shall We Lose Canada?" in which the editor protests against the price being paid for the support of America and condemns importation restrictions which give advantages to Scandinavia and the United States. The article contains a number of specific instances which apparently could be obtainable only through official Canadian channels, and which give point to the renewed attempts of the Trade Commission to have the restrictions removed.

Canadian Feeling Bitter.

The Globe correspondent finds that the feeling among some of the Canadians is bitter. They are urging Sir Robert Borden to take official action to bring the situation to a crisis and have a general clearing up. But there is still hope that this can be brought about without a quarrel in the Imperial family.

There have been some ludicrous incidents, such as the refusal to admit certain business calendars for free distribution, the printing of which had been refused here owing to war limitations, and which the authorities were consequently compelled to print in Canada. On their arrival the British authorities decided they could not be admitted for two years, and the matter is still under consideration.

There are other instances, such as Canadian boots, wallpapers, and other articles which are refused admission, but American and Scandinavian goods are coming in without stay. Canadians feel that if the regulations applied generally to all there could be no protest, but as now enforced there is real discrimination against them.

I desire to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the Government has any information regarding the matters referred to in the despatch, and if so will the hon. gentleman impart that information to the House?

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would direct the attention of my hon. friend to my answer yesterday to a question asked by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), dealing with the same subject. The Government has no official information respecting the matter in question, and I am satisfied, as I stated yesterday, that Great Britain has not discriminated and will not discriminate against the interests of Canada in regard to trade relations.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the hon. gentleman made inquiries since yesterday?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I despatched a cable last evening asking for any information that would bear on the subject but have received no reply.

DEATH OF AUDITOR GENERAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Can the Acting Premier tell us when we may expect the Auditor General's Report?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The deputy minister informed me only yesterday that he has a letter from the Auditor General explaining to the House why it would not be possible immediately to lay the report of the Auditor General on the Table. I am very sorry to have to announce to the House to-day that we have received word that the Auditor General has passed away. He went to Florida a short time ago for his health and died there.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session resumed from Thursday, February 27.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg.) In rising to address the House, Mr. Speaker, on the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Redman) and seconded by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), I feel my inability to deal with the subjects contained in the Address from the Throne, but as a representative of the people of this country I feel it my duty to call the attention of the House to certain facts. Before doing so, Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me, I would like to add my word of praise for the able, eloquent and moderate manner in which the mover and the seconder of the Address placed their views before the House. Before proceeding with the subject matter contained in the Address from the Throne, as delivered by His Excellency the Governor General, would you allow me on behalf of the loyal citizens of Lunenburg county, which I have the honour to represent in this House, to convey to His Excellency the great joy expressed by the people of that county on the success of the Allied armies at the front.

May I also place on Hansard the deep and profound regret of the people of that district at the loss to the country of that eminent statesman, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. As so many fine tributes have been paid to his worth and memory by all classes and creeds in this great country, it is not necessary for me to reiterate what has already been enunciated. As has been well said, his life has been an ideal which every Canadian boy should endeavour to emulate, and if they follow his illustrious example the next generation will be a higher type of men.

During the past few days I have received a number of telegrams and letters from different parts of Nova Scotia, asking me to convey to the hon. gentleman from North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. D. D. McKenzie) the congratulations of the Liberals of Nova Scotia on the honour which has been done them by his selection as leader of the Liberal party. In one of the letters which I received I find the following, which I think is worth reading to the House:

> How sweet the name McKenzie sounds
> In every Liberal's ears,
> It soothes our sorrows, heals our wounds,
> And drives away our fears.

There has been a good deal said in some of the reptile press of this country during the past few days as to what happened when the Liberal party assembled in caucus to select our leader. I do not wish to divulge the secrets of that caucus, but I wish to say that the stories in these papers are untrue. The utmost harmony prevailed, and I say—and I think I speak on behalf of the English speaking Liberals of the Liberal party of this country when I say it—that we feel that we owe to the French Canadian Liberals of this country a debt of gratitude for the action which they took at that caucus. I never shall forget the fairness, broadmindedness and sense of justice of these gentlemen, and I am pleased to call the French Canadian Liberals in this House my brothers.

Mr. Speaker, I now turn for a few moments to the speech delivered by His Excellency to the honourable gentleman of the Senate and the honourable gentlemen of this House and I wish for a few moments to discuss some of the matters contained therein. We are all in perfect accord with His Excellency's remarks with regard to the conclusion of the war. For more than four years the Empire was in the throes of the greatest war the world has ever known and the prayers of a thankful people went up to the Most High when the telegraph wires on November 11 conveyed to many anxious hearts the news that the armistice had been signed. Of Canada's part, Sir, in that great struggle, other honourable gentlemen have told us and I am in perfect agreement with the eloquent remarks on this subject as expressed by the Acting Prime Minister, Sir Thomas White.

The Acting Prime Minister, in his well timed remarks, paid just tribute to the work of the British, French and Canadian forces, and his remarks especially with regard to the Canadian Expeditionary force were in good taste. I was rather surprised however, Mr. Speaker, that no mention was made by the honourable gentleman of the great part which another nation took in this struggle, and it seems rather strange indeed that the Acting Prime Minister, speaking as he really did not only for the Government of this country but the people of this country, that he did not pay a just tribute to our sister nation to the south. Without being caustic in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the honourable gentleman has not gone back to the position which he took in 1911 when he did not desire "any truck or trade with the Yankees." The United States financiers treated the honourable gentleman with the greatest courtesy and respect when he was compelled to go to them a few years ago to borrow money to finance this country and her war effort and I trust his omission with reference to the United States' part in the war was not due to the fact that the financiers of that nation at last refused to grant us further advances. Since the honourable gentleman has not dealt with the great part played by the people of the United States in the last few years, might I, Mr. Speaker, for a few moments speak of what they have done. It is true there was some criticism of that great country, because she did not at once plunge into the war after the sinking of the great liner Lusitania with the loss of so many lives. Previous to that, however, the United States had been doing a great work and in the first two years of the war and in fact during the whole period of the war, if it had not been for the whole-hearted support that that country gave the Allies in supplying them with munitions, guns, food, etc., the issue might possibly have been settled in a way which none of us desired.

It is not for any of us to criticise the actions of that great man and that great democrat, Woodrow Wilson. He had a difficult task to perform and when the time was ripe and when practically the whole nation was at his back, he gave the word with the result that hundreds of thousands of gallant American lads were hurried to France to fight in the great cause in which the allied countries were engaged. We must take off our hats, Mr. Speaker, to that great country. I am not saying too much when I say that no other country in so short a time placed so many men on the field of battle. It is quite true that the first expeditionary force from England, the old contemptibles, was in the fighting line three weeks after war had been declared, and here I might also have a word of congratulation for a previous Minister of Militia for the expeditious manner in which he despatched the first contingent from this country. To show the appreciation of the English people for the help given by the United States, I have much pleasure in reading the following from the London Morning Post:

> The London Morning Post states that the arrivals of American troops during the past few days have eclipsed all records. It is a shipping feat which has never been equalled in maritime annals. General March, the Chief of Staff of the American Army, is the authority for the statement that there are now over eight hundred thousand American troops in France. That probably means that there are well over a million men overseas. The despatch of troops from the United States during the last three months has been limited only by the shipping capacity. Every ship that sails which is at all suitable for carrying troops is loaded down with soldiers. During a recent month, as many as two hundred and fifty thousand men were despatched from American shores, and American papers state that soon the last of the sixteen National Army Divisions will be overseas, or on the way. It is the knowledge the Germans have that this great army, the pick of America's young manhood, is on the scene ready to replenish the Forces of Freedom which is forcing Hindenburg to make his desperate and costly attempts to win a decision.

Hhe above, Mr. Speaker, is only a just tribute to the people of that great country, and I only regret, Sir,—

Mr. SPEAKER: I, with exceeding regret, feel it my duty to direct the attention of the hon. member to a rule of this House which is as old as the House itself, and which says that the reading of speeches is not permissible. I think the House will bear me out in saying that the Chair has always been inclined to be exceedingly lenient in the matter of copious notes being used by members, but the hon. gentleman is going far beyond the bounds in reading his speech verbatim. I must ask him to put himself in order and to adhere more closely to the rule of the House in this regard.

Mr. DUFF: I submit to your ruling, of course, Mr. Speaker, but I have only been following the example which was set by the hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), who read closely from his written speech, and also the example of the mover and seconder of the resolution, who did the same thing. However, I shall endeavour, Mr. Speaker, to carry out your wishes as far as possible. I am only sorry that my capacity for public speaking does not permit me to express my thoughts in a manner which would do justice to the American heroes of Chateau Thiery and the other battles in France and Flanders in which the American armies took part. We are proud to pay a just tribute to these gallant men and the people of both countries feel that the blood which was spilt during the last two years in France has cemented the English-speaking people in a bond which will never be broken. Of the noble part played by our own heroes in this great war enough cannot be said. Their efforts were appreciated by every allied nation and Canada has taken her rightful position in the sun on account of their gallant deeds.

It is gratifying to me, Mr. Speaker, as it is gratifying to every Canadian, to know that steps will be taken to properly protect these heroes. Especially should this be true of the wounded and sick who are coming home now on every steamer. It is our country's duty to see that during the remainder of their lives proper protection is given them and Canadians will vie with one another in placing these wounded heroes in a position where they will not feel that Canada has not appreciated their noble efforts. As to the boys who are returning physically fit, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that after conversing with a number of them I have come to the conclusion that they deeply resent anything which would tend to make the public think that they are objects of charity. These boys who have fought for four years in the muddy trenches of France have endured terrible sufferings and discomforts and are able to take their place in civil life with the best of us, and I feel confident that after they have been discharged and have returned to civil life that we may expect great things of them. "They have finished the fight, they have kept the faith," and they have made the world safe for democracy.

Before concluding my remarks with reference to the returned soldiers, I would like to address a word of advice to the gentlemen in charge of the department which has to deal with demobilization, and I do it not in a critical spirit, but in the best interests of the soldiers and our country. There is a great deal of complaining amongst the soldiers disembarking at the port of Halifax on account of the fact that they cannot get their discharge in a few days after their arrival on this side of the water, and this fact, Mr. Speaker, is creating more unrest than perhaps the hon. gentlemen of the Government realize. As a frequent visitor to the city of Halifax, I have come in touch with a number of the boys who have this complaint to make, and if you will allow me for a few minutes I would like to tell of one specific case.

[Mr. Duff.]

Five weeks ago a young man returned on the Aquitania. He got permission from the authorities at Halifax to go to his home for a week. He came to see me about a business matter and said that he had a chance to purchase a business and that he was going to Halifax to endeavour to get his discharge. About three weeks after that while walking on one of the streets of Halifax I happened to see this young man and he was still in khaki. I asked him why he had not received his discharge and he said he did not know. He explained that he had applied to the authorities four times but he had got no satisfaction. It seems that the men were paraded every morning at nine o'clock, the roll was called and they were then free to wander through the streets of Halifax until nine o'clock the next morning. The business that the young man was anxious to acquire was purchased by somebody else and to-day he is out of a position. Shortly after having spoken with this young man in Halifax, I happened to meet one of the officers who has charge of the demobilization and I made it my business to ask him what good reason there was for these soldiers being kept for three weeks or a month after they came home. His reply to me was: "In the first place there is too much red tape. In the second place, sometimes when a steamer arrives the necessary documents are not on board, and we have to wait until the arrival of the next steamer from the Old Country." I said: "That does not seem to me sufficient reason; is there any better explanation?" He replied: "There are other reasons," and he gave this as one of them: "Sometimes," he said, " the men when they arrive in this country have overdrawn their monthly pay, and they are kept by the Halifax military authorities in Halifax until such time as they have worked the overpayment off." Another case he told me was to this effect: A young man arrived, and when he reached the demobilization station he was minus his rifle, which was worth $35. The authorities kept that man there thirty days, and in addition to paying him so that he could reimburse the cost of the rifle, this country had to feed him. Mr. Speaker, is this not a ridiculous state of affairs to have in connection with the demobilization of our troops? I draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to these facts in order to see if he cannot speed up the present procedure.

The speech from the Throne announces that a Bill relating to the franchise for women, and conferring on them the privilege of sitting in Parliament, is to be introduced. Such an Act as that, Sir, meets with my humble approval, and nothing will give me greater pleasure than to have at some future date one of the fair sex as a desk mate.

The leader of the Opposition in his remarks dealt in suitable terms with the War-time Elections Act. I submit, Sir, that this Act should be repealed before any other legislation dealing with the franchise is introduced. Regarding the proposed Franchise Act, I am entirely in accord with the remarks made by my leader when he referred to the Franchise Act which was in force in Canada for a number of years previous to the enactment of the War-time Elections Act. That law has worked very well in the province of Nova Scotia, and if you will bear with me for a moment, Sir, I will explain to you how voters' lists are made up in that province. The lists are compiled in the towns, cities and counties in this manner. In every town there are three revisors appointed, who may be one year in the proportion of two Conservatives to one Liberal, and in the following year in the proportion of two Liberals to one Conservative. In the rural districts the municipal council appoints a revisor for each district. As you know, Sir, in political matters in Nova Scotia we are pretty evenly divided, and consequently every year one party has as many revisors as the other. These men get together and prepare the voters' lists. When they have performed that duty the list is submitted and if there are any complaints, or if there is any person who wants redress, he can apply to the sheriff of the county, to have his name placed on the list, or to have other names, which should not be there, struck off. This system has worked very well in the province of Nova Scotia for the last twenty-five years. Indeed so satisfactory has its operation been that in my county I cannot recall any application in the course of twenty-five years to the sheriff for redress. Under the circumstances, Sir, to depart from such a system as that would, in my opinion, be a waste of public money. After the lists are made up by the local revisors they are placed in the hands of the municipal clerk for every county, from whom the Secretary of State receives a copy of the list for federal purposes. The county clerk receives for his trouble one-half cent per name, so that it is quite apparent that the prevailing system in Nova Scotia is a very cheap and effective method of preparing the lists, much cheaper and better than the method adopted in the last election. I respectfully submit, Sir, that a large amount of money will be saved for the tax-payers of this country if the federal authorities will adopt that system and I am sure that every citizen of this country, who is interested in safe-guarding the financial interests of the country will want to have this work done as cheaply as possible.

With respect to the announcement that a Bill providing for federal aid towards highways is to be introduced, I would like to say that any moneys to be voted by the House for this purpose should be gifts outright to each province, and that no string should be attached thereto. A year or two ago some of our newspapers were advocating the construction of a national highway. That, Mr. Speaker, might be a very wise thing to do under happier circumstances if the condition of the national finances permitted, but, in my opinion, nothing like this should be done at the present time. Any money granted by this Government to the different provinces should be expended on the present highways in order that the great farming industry might enjoy better roads on which to transport their products to the different markets.

The speech from the Throne declares that Canadian financial and commercial stability has been well maintained. To that statement, Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to take exception. I feel that a great many people in Canada are not at all satisfied with the way in which the Government has handled the public money. In their minds unnecessary expenditures have been made, and new departments created which have not been a benefit in any sense of the term. A previous speaker has referred to the fact that an hon. member from a Nova Scotia constituency was appointed Parliamentary Secretary to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, but resigned in disgust after holding the office for a few months. After tendering his resignation to the Government the hon. gentleman in question issued a statement which makes very interesting reading, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have that statement placed on Hansard. It is taken from the Halifax Herald, and reads as follows:

Why F. B. McCurdy, M.P., Resigned His Position.

Too much delay and too little Progress made in preparing for Rehabilitation of our Overseas Soldiers and Solving Problem of their Return.

Halifax, November 28.—F. B. McCurdy, M.P., returned yesterday from Ottawa where he has been serving the government in various capacities. Formerly Mr. McCurdy was parliamentary secretary of the Militia Department. After the formation of Union Government his activities were transferred to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment. Mr. McCurdy tendered his resignation on September 17th last. Yesterday when asked for his reasons, he stated that in his opinion the department was not making sufficient progress in developing a comprehensive plan for dealing with the returned soldiers' problems and as the scope of his authority was indefinite and undefined, he could not consent to continue in a nominal office and be held at all responsible for the failures, if any, of the department that might result. In the opinion of Mr. McCurdy, the problems of the department, which are increasing daily, have not been sufficiently anticipated and provided for. Where the work of that department needed the co-operation and assistance of other departments, he believes, there has been insufficient co-ordination.

The Parliamentary Committee's report on Pensions, for instance, has not been heard of since it was presented to Parliament in May last, and "I doubt," said Mr. McCurdy, "if my colleagues on that committee will consider such inaction on the part of the Government as justified or in the best public interest. In resigning and registering my objections, I have felt that this view might be emphasized to the ultimate advantage of invalided and returning soldiers and the public generally."

Mr. McCurdy says that he fully recognized the grave difficulties and problems with which all departments were faced, and that in retiring, he had no recriminations or criticisms of a personal character to offer. He felt, however, that greater and more satisfactory results could be had by facing and promptly solving our problems with courage and despatch, and by anticipating the future more than has been the habit in some departments.

"One of the lessons of the war," Mr. McCurdy said, "has been the need of preparation in all public matters, but we now find that the problems of demobilization and reconstruction have come, after all, with embarrassing surprise to many departments, as will be evident shortly if our battalions are not to be kept unnecessarily long in public service and pay.

"The general preparation for peace conditions," Mr. McCurdy added, "has not, in my opinion, received sufficiently earnest attention at the hands of the Government, and this fact must be disturbing to business men and labour, besides being embarrassing to the Acting Prime Minister. In Ottawa, it is freely stated that the cabinet committee formed for the express purpose of trade development or reconstruction on a peace basis has not made progress. Now, taken by surprise, trade commissions are being hurried to London and other commercial centres but it must be disturbing to Canadian industries and business men generally that so much valuable time has been lost. As Dr. Cutten, of Acadia College, so well stated recently: 'In time of war prepare for peace'." It has been known that peace was coming; only its time and terms were at all uncertain.

In concluding his statement, Mr. McCurdy said: "While willing to serve in any capacity assigned me, I have come to the conclusion that I can in the circumstances better serve in a private capacity, and from the point of view of a citizen and a business man, it will be my duty to urge the Government to greater activity and courage in all things."

The foregoing is Mr. McCurdy's statement, Mr. Speaker, and there must have been something very wrong to have induced so strong a party man to tender his resignation. Under the circumstances, it seems to me that an explanation is due from the Government.

Another position, Mr. Speaker, was created, and another hon. member from Nova Scotia who was taken into the Government received that position and became known as the chairman of the Reconstruction Committee. To me the word "reconstruction," used in that sense, is a misnomer. Reconstruction means the rebuilding of something that has been destroyed; if a house burns down, it is reconstructed or rebuilt. Nothing has happened since this gentleman was appointed to justify the creation of such a position. The Acting Prime Minister referred to this position in connection with the returned soldiers. I can unde stand that there are conditions in the country which require readjustment, but there is no occasion for reconstruction, unless it be in connection with the explosion in Halifax, which was the result of the gross negligence and carelessness of the naval authorities of that port and which destroyed half the city and killed or injured from 20,000 to 30,000 people. If the chairman of that so-called Reconstruction Committee wants something to do, I would respectfully direct his attention to the fact that the claims of some of the people of that city are not being settled as fast as it is desirable. I understand that businessmen who suffered heavily through the destruction of cars of goods which were loaded to be sent out of the city and cars which had arrived have not yet had their claims adjusted. As every businessman needs every dollar due him, immediate steps should be taken by the Government to see that these claims are adjusted and paid. With reference to the appointment of that gentleman who is acting as chairman of the Reconstruction Committee it is evident that he is not worked very hard in that department. During the past nine months, or ever since his appointment, he has been acting minister in practically every branch of the Government. One newspaper writer referred to him as the maid-of-all-work. Well, I do not want to say anything about him quite so harsh as that, but knowing him as I do, I know that he is a good-natured gentleman and it is too bad that they have been taking advantage of his good nature by sending him from "Dan to Beersheba."

I wish to refer for a moment to another department of the Government—or another branch of a department, I do not know which. My attention was directed to this by an advertisement which I saw in the Truro Daily News. When I received this paper I noticed that on the margin, close to the advertisement, the following words were written: "Can't you stop this nonsense?" I will read to the House this advertisement as it appeared in the Truro Daily News, and probably in every other Unionist paper from Vancouver to Halifax, at considerable cost to the ratepayers of this country. It is as follows:

The "Why" in Fish Prices.

"Why is the price of halibut so high?" The question is often asked.

The public is itself responsible. It has put halibut into the luxury class. Many people never bought red cod, flounder, plaice, witch or drill in their lives, nor asked for them.

Each of these is as delicate and as satisfying as the fish of their choice and habit.

From 30 to 40 per cent of the catch on halibut lines is cod that has to be thrown away. The cost of a sea fishing cruise has to come out of about 70,000 pounds, where it might be spread over 400,000 pounds if all fish taken were used and eaten. Retail cost would slump at once.

You cannot blame the fisherman for throwing away cod and other fish for which the public do not ask. He has to gratify the public: it is a fickle master.

The Canada Food Board aims to end this waste by making facts known to the people.

Meanwhile "there's plenty of good fish in the sea."

Canada Food Board,
Ottawa.

For the Government, through their Food Board, to issue such ridiculous nonsense is a matter of great concern. It shows conclusively that some person connected with the Canada Food Board has insulted the intelligence of the people of this country. Any one who ever heard tell of a codfish knows that it is one of the most valuable and most palatable fish caught in the Atlantic. The person in the employ of the Government who sent that notice to the public should lose his job within twenty-four hours; he is not fit to hold it.

I noticed also an editorial in the Yarmouth Herald referring to another statement sent out by this Food Board, and I think that this editorial should find a place on Hansard. The editorial reads as follows:

Recently a report was sent out, signed by a member of the Canada Food Board in which it gave the public the positive reason for the high cost of halibut and which displayed unpardonable ignorance regarding that fishery. It stated that the sole reason why the price of that food commodity held so high was due to the fact that the fishermen in the prosecution of the halibut fisheries were very sorely hampered by the smaller fish such as cod, haddock and other shack, all of which had to be returned to the sea. In consequence only small fares of halibut were taken at a trip and the high prices were necessary to assure the fishermen a paying return. That report was issued several weeks ago, and owing to the absurdity of the statement was probably thrown to the waste baskets with little or no comment. The report so published no doubt started a thought of just where the officials preparing such statements may have come from, for it is hard to conceive of a man of Canadian birth signing such a statement. Yet it was done, and only a few days ago the following statement was issued by the Food Board, which also shows that the department is gaining little or no enlightenment re Canadian Atlantic coast fisheries:

"As an instance of difficulties under which the fisherman of Nova Scotia are working this winter," says a Canada Food Board statement, "the loss of gear on the codfish banks by trawlers catching their trawl nets on vessels sunk by German submarines last fall may be cited. Many cases have occurred since fishing was resumed on the codfish banks off the Nova Scotia coast, and fishermen are very bitter, as while the sunken wrecks remain, these banks will be impossible to fish. When trawls are lost in this way, it means an amount of about $3,000. Despite this discouragement, however, Nova Scotia fishermen are endeavouring to increase production of codfish this winter, and the Canada Food Board urges a greater consumption of this staple Canadian fish."

Can any reader, with the slightest knowledge of the fisheries, see through such a statement? Of all the vessels which fell victim to the German submarines, there were not more than ten acually sunk directly on the fishing banks, and even if they were, what difference would their wreckage make to trawl gear? Absolutely none whatever, yet the Food Board in ignorance of the real facts allows such statements to be published and given to the public. With such reports going broadcast over the Dominion the fishermen, we feel, have a stronger plea than ever before for the appointment of a Fisheries Commission to be composed of men who have all their years made a study of the fisheries, not only from a scientific basis but from a practical standpoint as well. Not until such is done will it be possible for the ministers at the heads of the departments to be in a position to deal with the many difficult problems which from time to time confront them on the fishery question. It is also a matter which the fishermen should most urgently demand, for the publication of such absurd statements as the above makes a huge joke out of one of Canada's most important industries.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the Canada Food Board has served no useful purpose, except it be the fact that for the last six months it compelled the people of this country to eat a great deal of bran and middlings. It is also quite true that they made a poor Chinese restaurant keeper in this city pay a fine of $100 for placing a bowl containing sugar before one of his guests, while they took no steps to reduce the price of the bacon which the restaurant keeper served to the same guest. "One law for the Chinese, and another for the bacon hog."

Then there is another department which is known as the Department of Public Information. This department, a great many people are of the opinion, was created to boost the Government, and to show what some of the people of this country think of the work this department is doing, I read the following clipping from one of the Toronto papers:

"The Department of Public Information is another fountain of wisdom which showers blessings on a large number of unattached or lightly attached journalists. It began with large ambitions which have been considerably whittled by circumstances. It had no less a purpose than to hand out all the news to all the newspapermen—scientifically predigested, of course—and thus to control the press of Canada. What upset this little scheme, which had its origin in the teeming brain of Leader Rowell, was the objection of certain newspapers to taking coloured news from anybody, and a similar objection by the Ottawa correspondents to this rubber-stamp way of doing their work. Moreover, jealousies arose in the Cabinet. The ministers objected to any one man, however pure, giving the thing his own slant.

So the Department of Public Information drew in its horns. Occasionally it makes a feeble gesture when it hands out a parboiled despatch from Argyll House, but mostly it contents itself with keeping a scrapbook for the Cabinet ministers and printing a weekly "Official Canadian Record" which nobody takes, although the subscription is nothing a year. The "Official Canadian Record" is made up of stale news scalped from the dailies, bum puffs of the Government, blue book hash, and rose-water statistics. Once in a while it offers a bit of owlish advice, as, for instance, the last number, which admonishes sufferers from the "flu" to keep their windows open. A good tip. Let us all keep our windows, our bowels and our minds open, and we shall be a happy, healthy people, Union Government or not."

Another costly experiment for the people of this country was the Canadian Registration Act. It was a useless expenditure of public money and had no beneficial results. This has been acknowledged by every well-thinking person in Canada, and I wish to place on Hansard the opinion of the Montreal Gazette with regard to this costly farce:—

The Canada Registration Act has been suspended. Announcement to that effect comes from Ottawa. It will no longer be necessary to carry a registration card. Any man or woman happening to have one of those interesting souvenirs is at liberty to destroy it. The Registration Act, like the no-strike order, has, it is assumed, 'served its purpose.' The value of this registration business was questioned at its inception. As an inventory of manpower it was as useless as the previous count made by the National Service Board, and for the same reason, namely, that it provided no means whereby the information obtained could be put to practical use. There was, it is recalled, the sapient suggestion that the registration would facilitate the enforcement of the Military Service Act. The hope that it would so operate was based upon the theory that slackers who had determined to evade the draft would walk meekly into the office of the nearest registrar and confess their eligibility. One hopes that this confidence was not misplaced. What is recalled of the registration is that it put the people of Canada to considerable inconvenience, that it created much confusion, that it imposed upon the population an extra and useless obligation at a time when necessary restrictions and regulations were sufficiently numerous, and that it involved the country in a doubtful expenditure when every dollar of public money was urgently required for war purposes. The people registered on the assumption that they were contributing to the country's war effort. They have yet to learn of any substantial practical purpose having been served by the registration. The suspension of the Act may have been necessary as a formality. It makes no difference otherwise.

This article, coming from such an important newspaper as the Montreal Gazette, a newspaper which supported the previous Government, that is the Borden Government of 1911 to 1917, and which has supported this Government since then, deserves serious consideration on the part of the Government.

The hon. member (Mr. Redman) who moved the resolution in support of the speech from the Throne referred to the fact that the Prime Minister was at present in France attending the Peace Conference. Conflicting reports have come to us as to the value of the services being rendered by the Prime Minister in this connection. I am not in a position to state as to what is the Prime Minister's status at this great conference, but it is quite evident
4 p.m. that some of the newspapers in this country are not carried away by the work which the Premier is supposed to be doing. There is a story in the Good Book which tells of a man who sat by a certain gate waiting for the "crumbs which fell from the rich man's table," and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has been placed in that humiliating position by the members of this Government who are at present in Paris.

I submit, Sir, that our case would be very much stronger if it had been submitted in writing by the Prime Minister to Premier Lloyd George, setting forth our claims, and that after he had discussed the matter fully with the Premier of Great Britain he could have returned to Canada and looked after and attended to the government of this country.

A short time ago a report was published in the newspapers that the Premier was engaged in settling the boundary lines between Greece and Rumania. That, to my mind, was no compliment to this great country, and it is to be hoped that the day is not far distant when the different members of the Government, who are at present in a foreign land, will return and look after the business of their departments.

I was greatly interested, Mr. Speaker, in listening to the statements made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) in his speech on Wednesday, relative to public expenditures which are proposed by the Government. It is certainly a very large order, and in the expenditure of such large amounts I trust that the minister will act as the "watch dog" of the treasury. Part of the programme as outlined by him, is one of shipbuilding, and I wish to protest strongly on the floor of this House against the Government's going into the shipbuilding business. It seems to me that they are developing political hysteria, as they would never think of such a project in view of the fact that it is doubtful if there is one member of the Government who has any practical knowledge of this great industry. I also doubt if there is one of the members of the Cabinet who knows the cathead of a ship from the dog watch, the cow's tail from the horse pipe, the ring stopper from the wheel box, the port watch from the chronometer, the jump stay from the stop water, the royal yard from the foot ropes, the ratlines from the mousings, or the cats paw from the thoroughfoot; and yet these hon. gentlemen propose to enter a business, a knowledge of which it takes years to acquire. Then, again they should remember that when the war started and when Lloyd George told us that the demand was for ships and more ships, in addition to the shipyards already in Canada, old shipyards were re-opened, and the business men and shipwrights of Canada proceeded to do their bit in winning the war by carrying out the wishes of the Premier of Great Britain. They did not ask for any favours from the Government, but they have established their businesses on a business basis, and have sold their ships in the open market. Is it fair, Sir, that after these people have invested large sums of money and established their business, the Government should now come in and propose to interfere with them? I would think that the bungling and the gross extravagance on the part of the Naval Department in the last few years, in purchasing ships, should have sickened the Government when one of their members made such a ridiculous proposition. I can only say, Sir, that "they know not what they do."

The Minister of Public Works, in outlining his policy, declared that his own idea was to provide work for the labourers of Canada. It is evident that he has had a change of heart since August last when he threatened the mine and steel workers of Nova Scotia with the importation of coolie labour. The following is an extract from the Halifax Herald of Tuesday, August 30, 1918, from which it is quite evident that the labour people did not agree with the Minister of Public Works:

Halifax, August 30.—The labour leaders' attitude towards the pronouncement of Hon. Frank Carvell favoring the introduction of coolie labour was emphatically stated to The Herald last night by Tom Moore, general representative of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters, who is in the city acompanied by P. M. Draper, secretary of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada: A. Bastien, union organizer, of Montreal, and H. J. Halford, of Hamilton, vice-president of the Barbers' Union of America. They had just returned from a thorough investigation of conditions at the mines in Cape Breton.

Our answer to Mr. Carvell, said Mr. Moore, is that coolie labour is not needed, and the minute a Chinaman or Coolie enters a mine to work, that moment the miners of Cape Breton down tools and walk out. Continuing, Mr. Moore said, that Hon. Frank Carvell should have informed himself of conditions at the mines before as a public man, condemning the miners as unpatriotic. Mr. Moore said we have personally visited the mines in Cape Breton, and discussed the situation with hundreds of the men. We found that in the smaller mines of the Dominion Coal Company that the men claim there is sufficient help to work to capacity the present rooms. In the large pit head, known as Dominion No. 2, more men could be employed. The situation there, however, is that owing to lack of transportation, the coal at present being produced cannot be handled and taken away, and unless something is done immediately the possibility is that a very large proportion of the present help will have to be laid off during the winter months when there is no water-borne freight.

The labour leader explaining the reason for this serious outlook, said: At the present time there is between 200,000 and 300,000 tons of coal banked at the mines, and considerable fear is entertained by the management that it may become a total loss through spontaneous combustion, and measures are being taken to open up the heap so as to ward off disaster if possible.

What this enormous pile of coal means may be gathered when it is understood that the average production of a miner working at the face head is from 7 to 12 tons per day, but when the surface help and other labour is included, the coal produced does not represent more than two tons per day per head of the men employed at the mines.

Therefore, if you take 200,000 tons as the minimum of the pile, and it certainly is more, that represents 100,000 working days for one man, or 100 working days for 1,000 men. In other words it represents the output of 1,000 men for over three months. In the past this pile has always been cleared away in the summer when there was plenty of transportation by rail and water—and then the men were kept on all winter producing coal for another pile, which would be moved in the spring, when navigation was resumed. If the present pile is not removed the outlook is that the mines will have to close down this winter, and instead of importing coolie labour, Hon. Frank Carvell will have to find employment for the miners of Cape Breton.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we were all interested in the address of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), and it was certainly a work of art for fence straddling. Following a course not unskilfully indicated by the Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Immigration deprecated party politics. As I understand his attitude, politics is a game which, when the country is progressing favourably and peacefully may be indulged in, but which is out of place in times of stress and strain. It is to be regretted that this minister of the Crown, with such a long experience in public life, has such a low idea of politics. It does little honour to himself and surely less than justice to the political atmosphere in which for a number of years past he has lived and moved and had his being, of which indeed he receives the credit of having been in large measure the mainspring and the real, if not the apparent leader. He does less than justice to that atmosphere, I repeat, because during the last few weeks we have seen a minister of the Crown in another province, Mr. Motherwell, leave the responsibilities and emoluments of office and resume the rank of a private member, rather than remain among those from whom he differed on public questions.

No, Mr. Speaker, the old ideas of public life are not dead. Some men will inevitably welcome, and others instinctively shrink from, reform; others by nature love, and others distrust, liberty. The ideals of honesty and sincerity and loyalty are as dear as ever they were in the mind and hearts of the Canadian people—perhaps all the dearer since the ugliness of the lack of these qualities has so recently been so clearly demonstrated.

We are somewhat amused on this side of the House by the assumption of superior political virtue by the Minister of Immigration, and his lofty superiority to the political game. May we, Mr. Speaker, from this side of the House say this to him: He may regard, if he likes, the strife of political parties as a game—if so for many years he has been a player—but that is not the view of those sitting on your left, Sir. We believe that we are here for the purpose of advancing the public interest along principles which we hold in common, principles dear to the heart of Baldwin and Lafontaine, of Howe and Brown, of Mackenzie, Blake and Laurier.

We regret that these principles are poor outworn things to the Minister of Immigration, but we venture to assert that notwithstanding the loss of his adherence thereto, their longevity will not be impaired.

The Minister of Immigration regrets that there has been considerable internal strife. His remedy is that the public men of this country use their heads and hearts for the purpose of putting an end to these conditions. Noble sentiments, certainly! But the minister omitted to place the blame for this internal strife where it really belongs, and that is with a section of the press of Canada for the attitude they have adopted. Was his omission due to the fact that that portion of the press has been largely subsidized and is controlled by the present Government?

After his confession of faith and the reason given by him for the retention of his portfolio, although the war is over, it is quite satisfactory to the gentlemen on this side of the House if it is satisfactory to his Conservative friends of the Union Government. My own view of the matter is that "Ephriam is joined to his idols, let him alone."

We on this side of the House, Sir, await with interest the information to be submitted by the Government containing the accounts of last year and the estimates for the next fiscal year, and I can assure you Mr. Speaker, that as far as we are concerned on this side of the House, we will vote any moneys necessary to carry on the business of the country in connection with the soldiers and their dependents with the mobilization and the other necessary services of the Government. Let me, however, say to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) that the strictest economy must be practised and that owing to the regrettable financial condition of the country at present, we must ask them to go slow. Eternal vigilance should be their watchword, and we will hold them to strict accountability for every dollar spent which is not necessary.

We are living in serious times, and it behooves every member of this House to safeguard the interests of this country, and when we have done this, Sir, we can return to our constituents for the summer recess and they will say to us "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Mr. WILLIAM FOSTER COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address on the very creditable manner in which they have acquitted themselves. I also desire to concur in all the encomiums that have been passed upon our departed friend, the late leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

This is an after-the-war assembly, and we are called upon to deal with present-day conditions. We have won the war, and the boys are coming home, and bringing with them problems that will have to be dealt with in a manner which will require the best thought of all political parties and of all members of this House. We have many causes for rejoicing and thanksgiving when we remember the cloud under which we foregathered a year ago and the auspices under which we now meet. A year ago the horizon was dark and forbidding as a result of the most strenuous campaign of the four years of war. The enemy was not only as strong as ever, but according to report was stronger in man-power than at any previous time during the war. An immense army had been mobilized during the winter, and the Canadian boys along with our Allies were facing a foe ready for all eventualities, it was supposed. It was indeed a time in which our cause, so to speak, hung more or less in the balance. Thanks to the valour of our troops and to the Divine help that we believe was vouchsafed to our armies, things soon began to brighten, but we certainly had to pass through dark days. It is not many months ago that the famous message of Field Marshal Haig rang out to his troops and to every part of the civilized world—"Men, put your backs to the wall. Die at your post rather than retire." That message will be handed down through the ages with the great message of Lord Nelson a hundred years ago at Trafalgar—"England expects that every man this day will do his duty." Both these messages are in the same high rank. The traditions of our forces and those of our Allies certainly justified all the faith we placed in them. They won out. But at what a price! While we mourn the departed statesman to whom I referred a moment ago and one or two others whose places are empty in this House, I want to offer a word of sympathy particularly to those members who have had their family circle broken by this terrible war. There is many a vacant seat around many a splendid fireside in the Dominion of Canada to-day as a result of this war. Our young men have died, however, for a noble cause, and had they lived a thousand years it is a question whether they could have died in a greater cause.

They displayed heroism, devotion and self-sacrifice. Those are among the highest qualities that humanity can display. They are taught in the good Book, and I can only say to those who mourn the broken family circle, that they have good cause to believe that the great Master who gave His life for others will not forget the sacrifice of the boys of Canada who gave their lives in so great a cause—humanity, civilization and religion. Some people, it is true, have been worried about the final destiny of those who have been called to leave the earthly house of this tabernacle and pass to the great beyond. We know not, but we believe the Judge of all the earth will do right, and I, for one if it is any satisfaction to gentlemen whose family circles have been broken, am prepared to say that, so far as I read the Scriptures and interpret them, the Judge of all the earth will see that those men who have given their lives, who have not hesitated to lay down their lives for others will be found at the right hand, "where loyal hearts and true stand ever in the light, all raptured through and through, in God's most holy sight." I believe that we can leave those heroes in the hand of the Judge of the earth, knowing that he will do right. We know, Mr. Speaker, that this war has only been won as a result of great efforts. It caused a great deal of trouble in this land to raise the army that was raised and keep it up to strength until the finish, but that was accomplished, Mr. Speaker, and it was only accomplished by great sacrifices and denial of one's own inclinations in sending to the front the splendid boys who went there, and keeping them up to strength. That, however, has been done and when the war came to an end, be it known and be it spread abroad to all the earth, that Canada was going just as strong at the finish as she went at the outset. The guns that spoke at Mons commenced the war, and the guns at Mons finished the war, because if you take it from Mons to Mons you have the whole history of the war. That is where the British guns first spoke. But they came back to Mons, thanks to the splendid generalship and heroism of men in the providence of God, though driven from Mons and kept out of the battle line there for four years. The Canadians were back in Mons when the last gun was fired. The Canadians were there to fire it, and we have the testimony, not only of laymen but of military men who know whereof they speak, that the one division or the one army corps that Canada had at the front was the strongest fighting unit not only of the British Empire but of all the armies of the Allies, none was equal to the splendid fighting Canadian boys that were left at the front the day the last gun was fired at Mons. That is something to be proud of, and that is some reason to rejoice, but I say this has only been accomplished by self-denial not only on the part of the members of this House but of the people of Canada, and of the sons of Canada, both those that were at home and those abroad. All this has been accomplished by immense effort. During this debate, Mr. Speaker, we have had remarks addressed from the other side of the House to our separated brethren. Perhaps it would not be inappropriate for me to say a few words as a counterpart of that, and address myself more particularly through you, Mr. Speaker, to the united brethren. We have separated brethren and we have united brethren.

Mr. MULLOY: Manufacturers.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Yes, manufacturers and farmers all sitting happy and contented over here at the present time. Separated brethren! How you must dislike that word, hon. gentlemen—"separated." Indifference, lost friendship and all such things come back to you, whilst on this side of the House you see united brethren. You behold them smiling. See how happy and contented they are here, and we are making them welcome. We are giving them a home of which they will take full advantage, and I, for one, trust they are going to stay with us for many a day. It is far better to speak about unity than it is to speak about separation, and I cannot but think that our friends on the other side that invented that term, "separated brethren," will hear the echo ringing down for weeks and months and years, in such a way that they will wish they had not thought of separated brethren, because the separated brethren are united with us, and we are inviting them to stay, and we believe they are going to stay. We have much more to offer them than friends opposite have, and for a very good reason. What was the reason that your separated brethren left the doctrines you preach? It was because your doctrines were not sound. It was because you were preaching a doctrine that would not save the country and the Empire and that would not win the war. These gentlemen who came from the other side and united with us came over for a reason, and that reason, Mr. Speaker, was to win the war, and the best answer we can give to you to-day is that the war is won, and that those men had something to do with winning it, and if they never do anything great in their lives in the future history will not forget every man jack that came out and became a separated brother for a short time. But he was taken into a far better fold, at any rate, and their names will be handed down as men who sacrificed something in order that the war might be won. The war has been won, and what has been the result of the winning of the war? The winning of the war, Mr. Speaker, is the greatest thing that has ever been done in all the ages since Adam delved and Eve spun down to the present time. Never was there so great a cause. Never was there so much at stake, and never was there more brilliancy won than that which has been won on the battlefields of Europe in the last four years. It was worth while. Humanity has been saved. Christianity has been saved. The right of small nations to live, the right to enjoy justice, freedom and order, not only in the great lands, but also in the small lands, has been achieved, not only among great people, but also among the minor classes. Those are only some of the things that have been won. Why, Mr. Speaker, the prophets and kings have desired long to see the sight that we see now and have not seen it, and to hear the things that we hear this day, and have not heard them. We have to-day practically a ransomed world as a result of this war, and those gentlemen who came out from the Opposition have given up what we all know is very dear to them, party unity and party ties. I have been a strong party man myself, and I know what that means. I say, all honour to these men, who, in the face of all this, were ready to come over to us, who are ready to sacrifice, it may be, their own outlook and their own advantage in order that the best effort of the Dominion of Canada should be continued and that our troops at the front should be increased. That has all been done and the result justifies the means. In addition to all these things which have been saved to humanity, I may point out a thing that has not often been mentioned in this House, and which is too frequently overlooked in the country, and that is not only has civilization and Christianity been placed in comparative safety as a result of the war, but the great Holy Land which, for a thousand years has called for the best efforts of the nations of Europe, for which many a crusade was undertaken, for which many a spear was sharpened, many a sword ground—the land of Palestine, with its capital, Jerusalem the Golden, the Holy

City, has been wrenched from the hands of the Turk, the infidel, and to-day the British flag floats over Jerusalem, the ancient city of the Jews, about which so many promises have been made and about which cluster so many glorious memories. The Holy Land and Jerusalem have been saved to civilization, and I trust that, after all the blood and treasure that have been expended, never again will these holy places pass into the hands of the Turk and the heretic. That is something that has been accomplished by the war. All honour to the men who came out from the other side and joined us in order that the best that Canada could do should be done in the interests of civilization and humanity.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that mistakes have been made, and, no doubt, have been made by the Government. It is true that some things might have been done that call for criticism. I am not so strong a party man, even a Unionist or a Conservative, that I do not see there are some things that might be different. I am not going to spend much time in criticising the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, but before passing from this particular part of my address, I want to take exception to some remarks which were made by at least two hon. gentlemen opposite, both comparatively new members of the House, and who, I am sorry to see, are not in their seats at the present moment. I am not going to say anything in their absence that I would not say if they were here, and I want it to be understood that any references I make are more to the matter of their speeches than they are personal with regard to the individuals with whom I am called upon to deal. I regret to say that one of these hon. gentlemen, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), made what I conceive to be one of the most damaging statements that was ever made in this House, and that is a good deal to say. I believe that perhaps he did not intend that it should be considered as seriously as I look upon it. But, his reference to the Bolsheviki and his defence of them, in my judgment, was the most serious offence that has ever been committed in this House in my hearing.

I think it is time that this country knew the danger of the Bolsheviki and their doctrines. It is time that they should be put down. It is time that the laws of Canada should be enforced against those who have come over from the old lands, have found sanctuary here and do not appreciate it any more than to preach doctrines so subversive of all law, order and decency as the Bolsheviki have done in Russia, and as they will do here if permitted. In a free country like Canada no such doctrines as those are justified. In a free country no such company should be introduced, and I regret that the hon. member for Brome found it necessary to enter into a defence of a doctrine that I conceive to be absolutely indefensible.

An hon. MEMBER: What is their doctrine?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: You have it there in Hansard, and you are a better authority probably on it than I am. I understand that the hon. member for Brome draws his inspiration from the Manchester Guardian. I am a bit of a Lancashire man myself, I know the Manchester Guardian fairly well and I tell the hon. member for Brome that I consider that he is drawing his inspiration from a very bad and unsafe quarter

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Oh, yes—I say a very bad quarter and a very unsafe quarter if he is guided by the Manchester Guardian. The Manchester Guardian up to August 4th was pro-German and if the Manchester Guardian had had its way Britain would never have sent a man across the channel. That was the doctrine of the Manchester Guardian. The Manchester Guardian has had a hard job to keep straight even under the Defence of the Realm Act. It is an unsafe guide for gentlemen opposite to pin their defence of the Bolsheviki too. I am going to take the risk of saying that I do not believe that this country will ever lie down to such a doctrine as the Bolsheviki preach. What have they done? Did they get elected to power? Not at all. They seized the reins of government. Seized the reins of government, by what?—by the ballot?—no, but by force—absolutely by force, and where do they draw the line? They announce a doctrine which says that you shall shoot down every man who wears a white collar, or a white shirt. They attack women, carry off everything valuable, and disrupt the country. In what way do they convert a man? At the point of the bayonet and at the rifle's mouth. Strong arguments indeed! Yet, we find in this Parliament some hon. gentlemen uttering a defence of that doctrine. The people of Canada will never allow such a doctrine as that to prevail here. You may try to cause a rift between capital and labour, between the so-called classes and the so-called masses, but I tell you that in my judgment there are enough level-headed men in Canada in the working classes, in the fields, in the mines, in the factories, everywhere, who will say you may count me out if you want to make a distribution of this world's goods on the basis of the Bolsheviki. It means the absolute denial of every law of God and man. If I could conceive that the men of this land will not save us from the doctrine of the Bolsheviki I will tell you who will and I think I know what I am talking about. If the men will not defend us from the Bolsheviki doctrine, the lately enfranchised women will save the country from it. The women know what it means, you had better believe. The women have read the history of recent events in Russia. I am glad that the hon. member for Brome has come in. I am just endeavouring to elucidate the doctrine of the Bolsheviki which I understand the hon. gentleman was backing. I say that that doctrine will never prevail in Canada. I say that if the men of Canada will not defend the country against Bolshevism the newly enfranchised women will. The women know when they have got a fairly good thing and they are not going to let it go until they have got something better. Bad as some husbands are, irreconcilable, unconvertible as some of them may be, the woman with a fairly good man in this country and that she can exercise her influence upon is not going to give him up. The women are allowed to rule in this country in a way in which they could not rule were the doctrines of the Bolsheviki to prevail and they are going to say: "While we have some evils at home, we had better bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of." The member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) may rest assured that his defence of the Bolshevik will not prevail in this country, because that doctrine is one of the most dangerous and seditious that could be formulated here.

That brings me, Mr. Speaker to a point where I have to criticise the Government, and I am sorry to be compelled to do so. The Government has passed a good many Orders in Council, perhaps too many.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That of course, is a dangerous fault.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: But there is another fault, far more dangerous, in my judgment, and that is to pass more Orders in Council than are carried out. The Government has passed an Order in Council declaring that to put out seditious literature of the class prepared and distributed by the so-called Bolsheviki in some of our large cities and towns merits punishment by fine and imprisonment, and yet when these penalties have been imposed by our magistrates in accordance with law, the condemned men have been released long before their sentence was completed. I say that this is wrong, and in that respect I condemn the Canadian Government. The Minister of Justice is absent, and therefore I do not know who is responsible for this leniency; I do not know who should shoulder the responsibility. I desire to say that the release of those fellows who were in possession of Bolsheviki literature, and distributed it in this country over and over again—we had this thing in our own town as well—should have been punished to the utmost limit of the law, both by fine and imprisonment, and they should not have been set at liberty until they had served their sentence. That is my opinion of the Bolsheviki. I now call upon the Acting Prime Minister to see that in future when a man is condemned under the Order in Council referred to he shall be kept in custody until his sentence is served, which sentence is all too short for a man holding and spreading such dangerous doctrines.

I am sorry to have to call my good friend the hon. member for Brome to task, because he is the essence of good nature, but I hope that he will accept these criticisms as good-naturedly as I have endeavoured to make them.

I cannot pass over without criticising the remarks of another hon. gentleman, who I regret to see is not in the House. This hon. gentleman is a particular friend of the member for Brome, and defended him in his references to this same vile doctrine last night. I refer to the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy). The hon. gentleman was elected to this House only recently, and last session made a very favourable impression. I was not in the House when the hon. gentleman spoke last night, but I have his speech as reported in Hansard. I want to say that the hon. gentleman made a very grievous mistake in that speech, and, if I am any judge, it is one that he would like to-day to recall. The hon. member for North Essex not only defended those who upheld the Bolsheviki, but he went further and delivered what I call a "sneering" speech. Such a speech as that never gets a man very far, and never secures him a following of the best class. The hon. gentleman sneered indirectly at His Majesty the King, the Ruler of the British Empire, and sneered indirectly at the Prime Minister of Canada for attending a function that was given by His Majesty, and which was also attended by President Wilson, perhaps the greatest democrat in the world to-day. I ask, Mr. Speaker, is that a great offence, or is it a matter for ridicule? While the doctrine of the Divine right of kings, and all that rule and are in authority, does not obtain here, I want to say, and I do so without the slightest fear of contradiction, that among the kings, rulers and emperors the world over no better example of heroic Christian duty, fortitude and regard for the welfare of his subjects was given by any ruler than our splendid King George V displayed during the last five years. It is not necessary for me to enter upon any defence of His Majesty. The King is above reproach; he has been a man of the people; he has not failed to go to the front, to the extent even of exposing himself to and receiving injury there, and his sons have served in the danger zone the same as any of the King's subjects. The King had led us in a noble way, and his devoted Queen equally so, and I say all honour to these rulers of the Empire that they have displayed such splendid and noble traits to their people. I therefore think it ill became the member for North Essex to cast any slurs in that direction. I am very sorry indeed that this incident has occurred. The King was giving a banquet to President Wilson, I am reminded.

Mr. McKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. It has always been a rule observed in the House that no comments should be made about His Majesty the King or the Governor General. I am sure that no member of the House would say anything that would reflect in the slightest degree on His Majesty, or his representative in this country. Therefore, I think in his remarks the hon. gentleman is getting very close to forbidden ground, even if he has not actually encroached upon it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Mr. Speaker, I think I know the rules of the House fairly well, and I do not think that I have violated them in any respect whatever. I am only endeavouring to refute an imputation that was indulged in on the floor of the House, and which appears in Hansard respecting a function at which His Majesty the King was the host, and at which President Wilson and others were guests.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read what was said.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The words to which I object are to be found in Hansard, and if I have placed any false interpretation on them I am willing to retract my criticisms. But as far as I am able to gather such was the language of the hon. gentleman to whom I refer. I desire to go a little further. I regret the occurrence of this incident, but we cannot pass it over unnoticed. We had a right to expect better things from the hon. member for North Essex. He represents the city of Windsor, which enjoys the same name as the King's palace. We have a right to expect that the hon. gentleman should live up to the loyal traditions which that name suggests, and if the hon. gentleman's remarks accurately reflect the sentiments of the people whom he represents, that community should change its name to something more suitable.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Change the member.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That would be a good deal easier. I think that is probably what they will do—change the member; but I am saying that if the inhabitants of North Essex hold the same views as their representative enunciated here last night, the name of Windsor should be changed to a more suitable title. That name was doubtless bestowed upon the town by its founders to commemorate the historic Windsor over the sea, and the great palace that exists there, the place where His Majesty the King frequently takes up his abode. If there is one place more than another that should live up to Windsor traditions, it is the people of Windsor, and the member they send to Parliament. Nevertheless it is the very gentleman who represents Windsor who comes here and makes a sneering reference to a function given by His Majesty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is all in Hansard —the references to the Windsor uniform, and the flummery——

Mr. McMASTER: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that loyalty is increased by love of a Windsor uniform?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: A Windsor uniform does not always consist of gold trimmings. A Windsor uniform may be composed of other materials, but it ill befits any hon. gentleman to utter such sentiments as those to which I have alluded. Whether a man is wearing a plain brown coat made in Windsor, or a Windsor uniform, such language ill becomes any man coming from that city, and I believe there are a great many people in that community who will tell the hon. member for North Essex when they next see him that they do not approve of his language last evening. Futhermore I have this to say, I do not believe the hon. gentleman will commit the same offence again.

Mr. GAUVREAU: He will have a chance to be knighted now.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think he will be benighted rather than knighted. It is never pleasant to make references of this kind, but I do so without any personal animosity or bitterness against either of these gentlemen. The remarks, however, to which I have referred, are objectionable as being uttered in the House of Commons; not only are they damaging to our reputation as intelligent legislators—but they are calculated also to do a great deal of injury in Canada. For that reason I felt called upon to refer to them.

I regret that, among other things, some slight reference was not made in the speech from the Throne to labour conditions, the hours of labour, and the wages paid in this country. I am often accused of being a hard-hearted employer, but in my judgment the very best that we can do for labour and for the working man should be done. In order to do that, we must have conditions that justify giving these shorter hours and these high wages. I do not think that either of these things can be brought about in the way the member for Brome suggests. The member for Brome has a tearing down rather than a building up policy. It is easy to criticise. It is easy to pull down the old structure, but it takes a better and a stronger man to put up something better in its place. While we may deplore the difficulties surrounding Canadian trade and Canadian labour conditions, after all, Canada is a fairly happy country for the workingman, and conditions have materially improved during the war. Personally, I trust that we shall not go back to where we were before the war; getting back to pre-war conditions is not my conception of living up to all that we should do. We should stay where we are in so far as we have made advances; we should not make a retrograde step. At any rate, I for one hope that wages will never get back as low as they were. I trust that labour conditions will be modified and that if it is possible to grant a seven or eight hour day, that will be done. I trust that the captains of industry and all those employing great forces will see to it that the workingman is relieved so far as possible from adverse conditions.

Our trade and commerce has been flourishing during the war; the tremendous strides that have been made have far surpassed our most sanguine expectations. But we have come to the end of the war; and in order to deal successfully with after-the-war conditions we shall have to be pretty sound in judgment; otherwise we shall strike snags. If there ever was a time in the history of Canadian trade when the best judgment should be used, it is now. Many tremendous problems face us which it is going to be very difficult to meet successfully. We must not be pessimists, but optimists. I heard a pessimist desribed the other day as a man who, having the choice of two evils, took both. There is a good deal in that; some pessimists choose both evils; they see nothing but blackness and darkness and tempests before them. Canada is all right. We have a big debt, and it is going to be bigger, but we can take care of it. We have enough resources and enough wealth in Canada to take care of it; all we want is a satisfactory method of reaching the people who have the money. If the member for Brome wants to write a bigger cheque next year, I shall be glad to accomodate him. I am glad to hear that he is ready to write a bigger cheque for the Minister of Finance next year. His suggestion in that respect is a good one; we must pay bigger taxes individually. We must pay bigger income tax than we have been paying. We have not been paying under the income tax very long. I suppose it has worked out all right, but I want to say to the minister who enforces it that there is room for improvement. There should be a date on which all men should pay. I had the privilege of paying my income tax nearly six months before some people got their papers. I do not know whether the hon. member for Brome, when he spoke of paying his income tax, was writing a cheque for last year or for this year. If he was writing his last year's cheque, he was six months behind the time; if he was writing this year's cheque, he was a little in advance of the general public in his own province.

Mr. McMASTER: It was last year's cheque.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Well, my hon. friend is six months behind the times. In view of the intelligence and generosity of the member for Brome, I think that he should pay up the seven per cent interest that the rest of us were threatened with if we did not pay on time.

Mr. McMASTER: If my private affairs are to be looked into, I may say that the time at which interest accrues has not yet arrived? I assure the member for Brantford that if I am late I will add the seven per cent.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The hon. gentleman has been dealt with very leniently. I hope he is appreciative of his being forgiven the interest that a great many of the rest of us were told we would have to pay if we did not send in our income tax earlier.

Taxation is never very pleasant; it always causes pain. I am sure, however, that our good friend sitting in the front benches (Mr. McKenzie) will back me up in this; that as long as a Scotchman does not have to pay any more than his share and does not have to pay it ahead of the other fellow, he is ready to do his share as well as the rest of them. In passing, may I say that in my opinion not as many bouquets have been bestowed upon the new leader of the Opposition as there should have been from this side of the House. I suggest that the gentlemen who follow me throw a bouquet to our good friend. He is not so bad; he is all Scotch—

An hon. MEMBER: And no soda.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: A little soda. However, we may be able to say more about that after we have dealt with the prohibition measure that is to be brought down.

Having dealt with taxation and trade and commerce, I suppose I would be accused of shirking the issue and not being the valiant man I profess to be if I did not say a word about the tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I see that my friends are all beginning to sit up and take notice. Now, I shall try to be very circumspect in the few words that I say in regard to the tariff.

To begin with, I do not think that the tariff is very far wrong as it is. I do not say that it is perfect or that in some respects it might not be pared down. I do not think that in all the years I have been in this House any hon. gentlemen have asked me to give it any particular boost. Though I am called a high protectionist, I have never asked, so far as I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that any great amount of protection be passed over to any industry with which I have been directly or indirectly connected. But if, as a general policy in this country, you are going to rip up the tariff and to unhinge everything now when the boys are coming back, you are going to have not only unemployment but absolute stagnation. There may be those who do not agree with me, but I think I know something about tariff and trade matters as I have been engaged in that line for thirty or forty years. I know that the tariff has inequalities; I know that it can be improved in some respects and I for one am ready to make concessions. I do not expect to get all I want. The whole world goes on compromise. The members of this House are really only a board sitting down here managing the affairs of the nation. Any one who has served on a Board—I am speaking now of an Industrial Board—knows that every matter that comes up is dealt with by that body analytically, it is thoroughly discussed and often men disagree strongly on the smallest point, and a compromise is reached on matters of policy in regard to directing a small company. If that be the case, is it not likely that in a body such as we are, sitting in this House to debate the affairs of the nation and to decide on what is the best policy to pursue, we shall not all see eye to eye. That is not to be expected, but with that fairness and liberality that are to be found in the average man if he is approached aright, I believe there is a way out of all those difficulties and that a wise solution can be arrived at. I would, therefore, not be surprised if after the Minister of Finance has presented his Budget Speech and after he has had the sage advice of the members of the Opposition as well as of hon. members on this side, he will bring down a tariff that will be suitable to my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) who I know is one of the hardest men to please on that side of the House because he thinks everything about a tariff is wrong. The tariff may be considered a plague by some, but it is going to stay with us for a long time. We must have revenue; we must have a lot of revenue in order to pay our way. It is, therefore, up to those who do not like this method of raising revenue to point out a better method by which that object may be attained. I think we are going to have a severe shortage of revenue for some years to come; but we have resources, we can handle it and we will handle it. What has been done before can be done again and I believe that the Minister of Finance after he receives the advice of his friends on both sides of the House—because I believe all the critics on the other side are his friends in the bottom of their hearts; they do not want to be hard on the minister although they may hold divergent opinions—he will bring down a tariff that will suit everybody.

Before I sit down I want to make a brief reference to the Peace Conference. That may be considered a little aside of our functions in this House—

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. COCKSHUTT:—but as it is a matter of such great moment, I think I would be justified in venturing just a very few remarks upon the Peace Conference and its likely outcome. Sir Robert Borden, the leader of this House, is over there and is, I believe, trying to represent Canada to the best of his ability at one of the greatest gatherings that has ever in the history of the world been assembled. The destinies of nations hang upon it. The map of Europe is being changed. The limits of almost every country in Europe are being defined. Questions of race, creed—everything of that kind are being settled. The whole of Europe is in the melting-pot, as well as a good deal of Asia and some of South Africa. Thank Heaven this continent is free, but the territories of a large portion of the nations of the earth are in the melting-pot, and the maps are being made. We are desirous that all things should be settled on the best and surest foundation, so that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may prevail through coming generations. That is the desire of everybody, although it is going to be very hard to reach it. President Wilson of the United States has gone across the water—a thing that has never been done before by any President of the United States since that confederation became a reality. It has always been considered to be beyond the prerogative of the President of the United States to leave his country while occupying the presidential chair. President Wilson has broken through that rule on account of this being the most important call that any President of the United States has ever had and he has gone across the ocean. He has taken with him certain ideals. All honour to those who have splendid ideals, and President Wilson has really splendid ideals. I do not desire to belittle all that the United States have done in this war; the heroism with which their boys have acquitted themselves at the front, the splendid speed with which they got them across the water, the way in which they got out the arms and munition and equipment and furnished an army of almost 2,000,000 men inside of twelve months. All honour to the splendid effort they made, but President Wilson has an ideal and an idea that a league of nations can be formed that will preserve peace in the world for ever more. Far be it from me to cast any doubts upon the success of this great enterprise. I hope it will be all that is expected. I am free to confess that in my judgment it is too idealistic to meet the spirit of the times yet; that the millennium is not sufficiently near at hand to justify anyone in believing that we shall never have any more wars in the world. I understand that General Pau, who is in the city of Ottawa—I have not yet had the pleasure of hearing him—has made the statement that it is useless and idle for us to believe that all wars are at an end. That was my view before General Pau made his statement and his statement only goes to confirm my opinion in that respect that wars will yet be; that while the world exists wars will not cease. We are told so in the Scriptures. I believe that to be the case and that wars and rumours of wars will continue to the end as long as humanity is as frail as it is, and constructed on so frail a foundation as many of us stand upon. This is not an ideal condition, but I believe it is one that is going to stay with us, and believing that I submit that it would have been wiser for the nations assembled at the Peace Conference to frame a safe and lasting peace treaty and sign that first rather than to endeavour to make a league of nations which may take a few months or longer to work out and which may in the end not prove a success. I submit that only as a criticism of the work that is being done. I simply profess to be a poor, humble layman in that respect and cannot see so far as those men who are assembled there; but my desire is that a lasting peace shall be obtained and that we shall not be robbed by politicians of the work that our men have done in the field. Their heroism has done its share. I have pointed out in the beginning of my speech and I cannot do better than to conclude with the same words, namely, that the boys at the front have brought all honour and glory to this country by their splendid heroism on the field. They were acknowledged to be the spear-head of the armies at the front. They were saved for all the knotty points, for every critical occasion; the Canadian boys were there, and in the final stages they never went after anything that they did not get. I say that in this respect this House and the country have every reason to rejoice that our boys have displayed all those characteristics that make them physically, morally and mentally the equal of any people in the world. What has been accomplished by Canadians on the battlefield, what has been achieved by heroism, self-denial and devotion to duty on the field can be accomplished in this House and in this country if we are as alive to our duties as the boys overseas have been to theirs. If we are as loyal to our duties as the boys overseas have been to theirs, every one of these mountains in our way that now seem insurmountable will be swept away, and we shall stand a united, contented, and a Christian people that need take a back seat to no other nation in the world.

Mr. ETHIER (Two Mountains) (translation): Since prorogation of Parliament, last May, great and momentous events have happened through the world as well as in Canada. We have witnessed the triumph of Justice and Right, the crushing of Prussian militarism, Hun barbarism and German autocracy. Under the command of the illustrious Marshal Foch, the Allies have vanquished the Teutonic hordes, broken through the impregnable Hindenberg line, and forced the German armies to beg for mercy; they have brought about the downfall of the haughty and snarling kaiser and obtained, on November 11 last, the armistice ending the hostilities and putting a stop to the atrocities of this frightful war which appalled the world for over four years.

While at present holding a conference, the Allies are making use of all the talents and energies of their greatest statesmen, and are calling upon all the resources of diplomacy to lay the foundations of a durable peace, which shall open a new era of progress and civilization and make the renewal of the war an impossibility.

As mentioned in the speech from the Throne, none of the troops who took part in the struggle proved to be more valiant and daring than the Canadians. Their heroism throughout this war has won for their country undying fame.

I take pride in the bravery and gallantry of our soldiers; our men have behaved like heroes. Let us honour the memory of those who fell on the battlefield. May we respect and protect, without delay or faltering, those who were spared from the shells, shrapnel and gases of the Germans.

However, the glorious events which I have just alluded to have made way, here in Canada, to a very sad and sorrowful occurence, which our hearts and minds are loath to accept as an accomplished fact. The empty seat here before me, the laurel wreath which adorns it, are more eloquent than any panegyric of the undying fame of him who has departed. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is no more . . .

As one of the last survivors of the Liberal group elected at the time of Sir Wilfrid's glorious accession to power in 1896, I feel, it seems, more than any one else the immense gap which his death has created in this House. I find, however, satisfaction and consolation in the thought of always having remained true to him, through bright and dark days, in triumph and defeat, in power and opposition, and it is not for me to feel the pang of remorse at having, at the last minute, proved unfaithful to the greatest, most noble and illustrious Canadian in the social, economic and political history of Canada. Aye, great all through his life, he proved still greater in death; always and everywhere his actions and words were noble and generous; and impartial history will reveal his career to future generations as having been illustrious both at home and abroad.

May those who lived in his days and those who will come after him never forget the high ideal towards which were bent all his energies from the very beginning of his public life—the establishment of union and harmony between the two great races of this young country.

In his lifetime we loved him, we admired him and we respected him; under his wise direction the ship of state sailed clear of dangerous rocks put in the way by unscrupulous adversaries who were very often blinded by their hatred of all that is French and Catholic. Let us hope that death has disarmed those despicable foes and that the pact of Confederation, that our lamented chief has always safeguarded like the apple of his eye, will be maintained in all its integrity by all Governments to come.

The main idea that runs all through the Governor General's speech that is now before us, is that of the industrial, financial, commercial and economic reconstruction of Canada. In other words, Parliament is invited to solve the entangled problem of the after-war policy of this country. It is a problem the importance, of which the Government failed to grasp if we are to judge by what has been done since the cessation of hostilities and the signing of the armistice. In the year 1917, the slogan of the Government was supposed to be "Win the war," but was in reality "Win the election." To day, that slogan is "Remain in power" —a power obtained over the ruins heaped upon the country by appeals to hatred and prejudice.

Not satisfied with having saddled the country with the iniquitous Military Service Act, in spite of all promises to the contrary; not satisfied with having administered the law with the utmost harshness, especially in one province, the Government has entrusted its high executioner, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) with the task of persecuting the young men who, through ignorance, misunderstanding or oversight, failed to comply with the provisions of an act which got through Parliament only after the brutal application of the gag.

Even at this day, now that Parliament is in full session, the cabinet is still passing orders in council of the sternest nature, in order that the Government may keep on prosecutions and gratify their spite against young men who are anxious to work for their country and their family, and do their share in the upbuilding of the nation.

Under the circumstances, those who institute judicial proceedings under the provisions of an Act that has lapsed, and would impose a fine of $250 to $2,000, or imprisonment, are open to the suspicion that their motives are not commendable.

The tribunals have been sitting continuously for several months. Decisions have been given, under the Act concerning the deserters and defaulters. Part of these decisions are from the province of Quebec and have been given by Justice Langelier of Quebec and Justice Lanctot, of Montreal, amongst others. The public naturally supposed that the law had been complied with. But what happened in the meantime, if we are to credit current rumors? During the week, an order in council has been passed fixing a minimum fine of $200 and a maximum of $5,000 against those who failed to comply with the provisions of the Militia Service Act. In a certain number of cases judgments had been given imposing fines from $5 up to $25, and other supposed transgressors have even been discharged.

Under this new order in council, the decisions given by Justice Langelier, of Quebec and Justice Lanctot, of Montreal, are said to be null and void and the accused are to be arrested anew. Is that a proper understanding of the armistice? Is that the means of fostering feelings of brotherhood throughout the country? But such feelings the Government, as I said before, seems to ignore for reasons that we are not at liberty to state in this House. I think the general feeling of our people is aptly expressed in an editorial appearing this week in La Patrie, under the heading "The Defaulters." With your kind permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall read to the House the editorial in question.

The Defaulters.

Turning a deaf ear to the appeals of reason, the Government, if we are to believe the ministerial newspapers, are prepared to persist in prosecuting defaulters, making use to that end even after the war is over, of the extraordinary powers that have been temporarily delegated to them by Parliament, for the vigorous prosecution of the war.

A new Order in Council, it is said, has been passed by the Cabinet, providing that defaulters in every case shall be condemned to pay a fine of not less than $250 and not exceeding $5,000 and that the said order shall have a retroactive effect. That is to say that the defaulters who have already been dealt with more leniently, will be arrested a second time and put through the ordeal of this implacable justice.

As probably there will not be in the English provinces, as well as in Quebec, a defaulter in a hundred able to pay a fine of $250 or more, the Government will no doubt endeavour to put them all in jail.

Need it be said that in such occurrence those who govern us are not impelled by a patriotic feeling. We have proved already that society has nothing to gain by those drastic measures, that on the contrary it will be deprived of the productive labour of thousands of workers.

When so many serious problems claim their attention, as Mr. Calder and Mr. Carvell justly observed in the Commons, is it possible that our ministers will waste their energy upon a task so evidently fruitless as those punitive enactments applied to defaulters under the military Act.

Parliament is now in session. The need of remedying this ridiculous situation is pressing Parliament must understand that the country has been governed long enough by incoherent and arbitrary ukases.

And, by the way, that even the authorities of the department of Justice did not understand or were ignorant of.

The first duty of Parliament is to take away from the Government the plenary powers which they misused to such an extend.

And, as to the offenders against the military Act, there is a pressing need that Parliament settle their case once for all, and according to the dictates of common sense and reason by passing a general Act of amnesty.

Yes, if ever amnesty was justified, it is indeed in this instance. May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to pray the Acting Prime Minister to put a stop to such a state of things, to restore in this country that peace which the conference of the Allied nations strives to secure for the whole world. Let us bring back confidence in the heart and mind of every citizen; let us forget the mistakes and faults of a few young men who defaulted, it may be, but who are Canadians above all.

Another question comes to my mind, although the speech from the Throne makes no mention of it. I refer to the censure which, it seems to me, is of paramount importance under present circumstances. Seeing that war is ended and truce has been signed, why do they maintain that system of stifling the voice of public opinion? Do the Government fear the disclosure of unspeakable and unavowable deeds; do they fear the outcome of inquiries which would throw light upon the administration of the several departments of the commonwealth?

During the last conference held at Ottawa, in January last, Sir Wilfrid Laurier demanded the abolition of the censure, and following the example of the great departed one, I pray the Government in the name of the whole electorate and, may I not say without exposing myself to criticism, in the name of the press of this country to free us from the censure and to rid of it those mouthpieces of public opinion.

A Bill concerning the franchise is to be laid before the House. Let us hope that the first thing to be done in that direction will be the repeal of the War-time Elections Act, that Act conceived in iniquity whose only outcome was the disfranchisement of British citizens duly qualified to vote, and which resulted in the avowed stealing of the last elections. According to the speech from the Throne, one of the purposes of this Bill is to allow the women to vote, to confer upon them the privilege of sitting in Parliament. I do not intend to deal now with its principle, reserving my right to do so when the proper time comes.

I shall only say that in my humble opinion women have a greater and nobler role to play, a part more worthy of them than that of lobbyist and politician, and I consider that their place is not upon the floor of this House or upon a husting, but at home and everywhere where they can practice mercy and self-sacrifice, qualities which are of their essence and of their nature.

The policy of the Government involves Bills concerning highways, vocational training, the creation of a department of public health, prohibition and public works to be carried on.

A better roads policy was inaugurated by the Quebec government and it was such a success that the other provinces were stirred up and included that plank in their programme. And the most eloquent testimonial to its efficiency and expendiency is to be found in the words of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) when he tells us :

> I had the pleasure last year of travelling over a part of the highway in the province of Quebec constructed by the Provincial Government in recent years, and I can only say that if we extend that class of highway through every province in Canada we shall have accomplished wonders.

I concur in that opinion of the Minister of Public Works.

The explanations which the honourable gentleman has given the House as to the fulfillment of his programme and the apportionment of moneys, have only been touched upon. We cannot yet, so far as I am concerned at least, pass judgment upon the expediency of special subsidies by this Government to the provincial authorities in favour of goods roads.

I understand that Parliament will place a sum of 25 millions at the disposal of the Government to be spent on highways throughout the various provinces of the Dominion; but will this amount be divided as provided for in the plan set forth by the Minister of Public Works, according to the census of 1915, in some of the western provinces? If it is distributed by the provincial governments themselves, without any interference or influence on the part of the Dominion Government for the political purposes, and if the works are carried out under the supervision and control of the provincial authorities, then I approve of the plan and I shall support the bill to be presented to that effect. Otherwise, I am against it.

We talk about giving employment to returned soldiers. The people complain about the ever increasing number of unemployed. Well! let us carry out that policy of good roads throughout the country, which will enable the respective provincial governments to give some work to the unemployed, and at the same time to supply the country with highways, thus promoting its advancement and the welfare of the people, particularly of the agricultural class. I am in favor of it, but only on that condition.

As regards vocational training and education, I trust that the measure that is to be brought before this House will not be along the lines of the resolution which I see on the Orders of the Day, under No. 16 in the notices of motion, in which the honourable member for Frontenac (Mr.

Edwards) expresses the opinion "that it is desirable that the British North America Act be amended with a view to establishing a system of national and non confessional schools throughout the whole Dominion of Canada."

I hope that such utopia will not appear in the bill to be presented regarding vocational and educational training. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether this question of education is well within the province of this Parliament or whether it is not within the scope of provincial jurisdiction, in virtue of the Confederation Act. This is a matter to be cleared up later.

The Governor General's speech also mentions the establishment of a Public Health department. At this particular time, following a war which claimed so many victims, the public health, in every way, certainly requires to be looked after, and the people should be protected against contagious diseases which are the outcome of such wars. History mentions outbreaks of plague following wars, which caused more deaths than the wars themselves. As Dr. Osler, a prominent physician, stated regarding the danger of contamination from soldiers returning from overseas, it may be advisable to look to the future and protect our young women and families. But again I wonder whether the establishment of a Public Health Department is within the purview of federal or provincial jurisdiction. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that such a department would conflict with the boards of health in the respective provinces, and with those established by the municipalities in the cities and in the rural districts. I fear so, and this measure suggests difficulties that invite criticism and which ought to be avoided.

I believe the only way out is to leave the matter of Public Health in the hands of the provincial and municipal authorities.

There is another matter which I was forgetting. The honourable Minister of Public Works announced that millions must be expended to procure work for the unemployed, namely $25,000,000 for the building of highways and $20,000,000 for better housing, the latter being connected with the Public Health department. These $20,000,000 for better housing will be loaned by the Dominion Government to the provinces at the rate of 5 per cent; then the provincial governments will distribute the moneys according to regulations to be adopted for that purpose, thus improving the health and comfort of the workers and their families. Furthermore, there is to be an expenditure of $75,000,000 for the building of new railway branch lines, in the western provinces only. In reply to a query from the honourable member for Antigonish (Mr. Sinclair), the hon. Minister of Railways stated that there was no provision for Nova Scotia. Everything is for western Canada. We are not jealous, but let us not forget that the Canadian Northern is running through that part of the country; that Mackenzie and Mann have large interests there.

Is there a nigger in the pile or are Mackenzie and Mann and others going to profit by this expenditure of $75,000,000, such as the profiteers, who made millions during the war—the bacon lords?

The hon. Minister of Public Works stated that considerable sums were to be spent in public buildings at Hamilton, Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. But I am surprised at the reasons which he brought forth in explaining such an outlay of public funds. Here is what he said in his speech in regard to these works which involve such enormous expenditure; he did not seem satisfied as to its usefulness:

> I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the Public Works Department is concerned I am adhering strictly to the principle which I laid down some few minutes ago, namely, that we are not constructing public works simply because they would be a good thing for the community, but we are constructing them primarily because they will provide employment for the unemployed.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe this is an added suggestion: It it not on account of the usefulness or desirability of such expenditure on buildings that millions are being squandered; it is simply to provide employement.

I realize that the view so expressed commends itself from a certain point of view; but is there no other departure more profitable to the country and of better service to the community than spending money just for the sake of giving employment? I say: yes.

I put a question to the hon. Minister of Public Works, the other day, whether the Government intented to resume the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. He answered negatively. The people and, I am sure, this House, expected to get an answer at least favorable to the idea that these works would be undertaken and carried on. No, absolutely nothing of the kind. However, is there a better occasion for our Government to achieve a good action than that of resuming the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, a national undertaking which would procure work to the unemployed who are assailing the Government with requests and complaints? Is there a more fitting time to acquiesce to these requests by employing thousands of these workers in the construction of the great waterway—I would say the great national waterway—to be used for our national trade? In reference to the matter, I read this morning in Le Canada an appreciation of the building of the Canal, which I believe it is my duty to have inserted in Hansard, in order that the people may become acquainted with this great undertaking. The article reads as follows:

The Government who pretend to be taxing their ingenuity in order to find out the means of securing employment for thousands of unemployed have not far to go to find one.

The construction of the Georgian Bay canal which has been advocated for over a quarter of a century by all our public bodies, would have furnished employment to thousands of men and solved the great problem of restoring the welfare of the workingmen.

Then, the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, as set forth in a Senate report in 1898, would bring about the development of an immense lumber, pulpwood, and pulp industry and other industries. It would open up a new country to colonization and agriculture. It would be likewise the means of working out the problem of the re-establishment of our returned soldiers.

Moreover, as stated in the report of the Senate, the Canadian trade would be greatly benefited by the construction of the Georgian Bay canal; it would open up a new water route for the transportation of western freight to the seashore by way of Montreal and Quebec. "While being a shorter and more direct route, that canal would reduce the cost of transportation of those products." The western wheat and cereals would be carried by that route to the east. The eastern coal could be shipped that way and the cost of food and coal would be materially reduced.

The construction of the Georgian Bay canal would develop enormous waterpowers along that route for the purposes of electricity, for the mining of iron ore and other minerals that are plentiful in the Ottawa valley. Such development would result in reducing the cost of lighting, while furnishing work to many hundreds of other workers.

As will be seen, the construction of the Georgian Bay canal would help more than any other work in solving the great after-war problems.

Neither can the Government allege by way of excuse that the exchequer is empty, as the people have subscribed hundreds of millions to national loans, without mentioning all the other taxes which they are paying into the treasury. Besides, the Georgian Bay canal would yield millions of dollars to the Government, as stated by Sir Robert Perth in his paper of February 3, 1914, read before the Royal Society of Arts, in London. In his opinion, the traffic of the canal would yield, on an average, $9,000,000 to the Government. Then, how much revenue would not the country indirectly derive from the building of that canal? Just as the building of the Canadian Pacific railway has improved millions of acres of uncultivated land, so will the Georgian Bay canal improve the value of that territory. Moreover, western farms from what experts tell us, would realize a yearly profit of $9,000,000, on the transportation of their grain.

Truly, the Government have no reason to deny to the country the opening of the Georgian Bay canal, unless they prefer to give way before the opposition of the Yankees and the pressure from the large financial interests of Ontario which have always been alone in opposing the scheme.

And the newspaper goes on:

The future of our country and the fate of its population are at stake.

According to my feeble notion that is the most eloquent plea in favour of a national enterprise which by itself would almost suffice to solve the post-war problem of the idle and unemployed. And not only would we have the satisfaction of having employed men for the pleasure of putting them to work, but we would have the satisfaction of having endowed Canada with a national enterprise which would redound to her credit.

Now, Sir, the speech from the Throne touches upon another question—prohibition. I am for temperance, but against prohibition. And I hope that when the proposed measure will be submitted, there shall be in the Bill intended for every province of Canada a proviso authorizing the provinces to permit the sale of light wines and beer, if they are inclined to do so.

As the honorable senator Dandurand said yesterday in the Senate, as long as it is not shown to me that the consumption of beer and light wines is detrimental to humanity and injurious to my health, I shall go on drinking wine and drinking beer if I have a liking for them. I humbly submit that it is an attempt against individual liberty.

At this moment, General Pau entered the House and having shaken hands with Mr. Speaker, he was welcomed by Sir Thomas White, acting Prime Minister, and by honourable Mr. Burrell, Secretary of State and took a chair to the right of the Speaker.

The hon. members who were present at the sitting rose spontaneously and enthusiastically cheered General Pau.

Mr. Ethier, having interrupted his remarks, then addressed Mr. Speaker in the following words:

Sir, seeing that it is my privilege of having the floor when enters the illustrious man who hails from overseas, that worthy cousin from France, will you allow me to pause in order to greet the illustrious General Pau gloriously maimed in 1870, one of the greatest victors of the war that has just ended. The shades of our brethren of Alsace and Lorraine who fell in 1870 must rejoice at seeing the man who defended them so gloriously then treading the soil of New France inhabited by the brothers and the sons of those for whom he fought so well.

With your permission, Sir, I will conclude these few remarks by shouting with you all: Long live France.

I have but a few words to add to the remarks I was making when General Pau came in.

I was dealing with prohibition in this country and I contented that as long as it is not shown to me that the consumption of beer and light wines is detrimental to humanity and to the consumer who uses them considerately, I shall oppose any drastic Bill purporting to prohibit the manufacture and importation of those wines and beer. As to importation, I do not know whether under the circumstances it would be expedient to put an end to, abrogate and annul a treaty signed by France, England and Canada at a time when that celebrated entente cordiale was entered upon by the two countries, France and England; I wonder whether it would be wise at this moment to prevent the importation of French wines into the French province of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have but a few more remarks to make, but I beg the permission to move the adjournment of the debate, which will permit me to conclude them later on.

Mr. ETHIER moved that the Debate be adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER: There might be some question as to whether the hon. gentleman would have a right to proceed when the House meets again, but I think, under the circumstances, no question will be raised.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 6 o'clock.

Monday, March 3, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Statement of superannuation and retiring allowances in the Civil Service during the year ending 31st of December, 1918.—Sir Thomas White.

Statement of Civil Service Insurance account.—Sir Thomas White.

[Mr. Ethier.]

Statement of Governor General's warrants issued since last session.—Sir Thomas White.

Report of the Royal Society of Canada for the year ended 30th April, 1918.—Sir Thomas White.

Report of the National Battlefields Commission.—Sir Thomas White.

Statement of expenditure on account of Miscellaneous Unforeseen Expenses from 1st of April 1918 to 21st February, 1919.—Sir Thomas White.

Statement of temporary loans outstanding.—Sir Thomas White.

Report of the Ottawa Improvement Commission for the fiscal year, ending 31st March, 1918.—Sir Thomas White.

Copy of the Treasury Board Overrulings of the Auditor General, and accompanying correspondence.—Sir Thomas White.

Public Accounts of Canada.—Sir Thomas White.

Copy of a cable (in extended form) received by His Excellency the Governor General from the Secretary of State for the Colonies on February 14, 1919, giving a summary of the League of Nations Covenant presented to the Peace Conference by the League of Nations Commission.—Sir Thomas White.

Report of the Secretary of State for the year ending 31st March, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I desire to communicate to the House a letter addressed to me by the Assistant Auditor General:

Auditor General's Office. Canada.
Ottawa, March 3rd, 1919.

Sir,—I am informed by the Printing Bureau that they expect to have the first three volumes of the annual report of this office ready for presentation as follows:—Vol. III, Wednesday or Thursday; Vols. I and II, probably next Monday.

As far as this office is concerned all the matter for Volume III. was signed off and returned to the Bureau on February 25th. All the proof for Volume II. was returned to them on the same date and the proof for Volume I. on Saturday.

I am writing the King's Printer again calling attention to the delay.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,

E. D. Sutherland,
Asst. Auditor General.

Hon. Sir Thomas White, K.C.M.G.
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS APPOINTED.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to consider the question of pensions and pension regulations and all matters pertaining thereto, and to prepare and submit a Bill dealing with pensions for the consideration of this House; and that Rule No. 11 be suspended; and that the following members be appointed to compose such committee: Messrs. Andrews, Béland, Clark (North Bruce), Cronyn, Devlin, Green, Lapointe (St. James), McCurdy, Nesbitt, Nickle, Pacaud, Pardee, Power, Redman, Rowell, Ross and Sutherland.

Mr. SPEAKER: This cannot be passed without the unanimous consent of the House, no notice having been given.

Motion agreed to.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I could not catch the names of those nominated to be members of that committee, but if he has not already been named I would suggest that Mr. Lang be added to the committee, as one who understands the matters to be dealt with.

Mr. ROWELL: I should be glad to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes). But as this addition to the committee would probably necessitate another member from the other side, I would suggest that the arrangement be made through the whips.

STATISTICS ACT AMENDMENTS.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, to amend the Statistics Act. He said: The purpose of this Bill is to change the year for which transportation statistics are to be collected. The present Statistics Act makes the year for this purpose the same as the former fiscal year—ending 30th June. It is proposed to adopt, instead of this, the calendar year, thus making it conform with the year adopted for the gathering of our other principal statistics.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

UNITS OF ELECTRICAL MEASURE.

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, respecting the Units of Electrical Measure. He said: This Bill is very technical in its terms, and at the moment I can give but a brief explanation of it. The three fundamental units of electrical measure are the ohm, the ampere and the volt. These were established generally in 1908 by an international conference called by the British Government and attended by delegates representing all the great nations of the world. The purpose of the legislation is to give effect in Canada to the conclusions reached at that convention.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE PRIME MINISTER AND HON. MR. CROTHERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): I would ask the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) to be good enough to lay upon the Table any correspondence he may have setting forth the changes that have taken place in the Government during the recess, and the reasons therefor. I have particular reference to the resignation of the former Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) and the resignation from office of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy). I think the Acting Prime Minister will agree with me that the traditional practice of Parliament calls for the laying upon the Table of such correspondence.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I think my hon. friend is correct in his statement of the practice of Parliament in such matters. I have under my hand the correspondence that passed between the former Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) with respect to the resignation of the former. I had intended to present this after the conclusion of the debate on the Address, but as the question has been raised I would ask leave to read the correspondence, and I may say that I have the permission of the Governor General to do so:

Ottawa, November 4th, 1918.

My Dear Sir Robert,—I hereby resign my position in your Government as Minister of Labour.

Faithfully,

(Sgd.) T. W. CROTHERS.

Rt. Hon. Sir R. L. Borden,
Premier of Canada,
Ottawa.

Ottawa, Ont., November 5th, 1918.

My Dear Mr. Crothers,—I beg to acknowledge the letter conveying to me your resignation as Minister of Labour which, under the circumstances disclosed to me at our interview, I must accept but with great regret. You told me some eighteen months ago that your health was not good, but that you hoped to continue your duties until the end of the war. I expressed to you my desire and my hope that your strength would prove sufficient for that purpose and I realize the unremitting labours which you have since discharged with great ability and devotion to the public interest.

During the period of more than seven years in which you have been at the head of the Department of Labour you have been confronted from time to time with many difficult questions; and this has been especially true during the past four years. It must be a matter of great gratification to you, as it is to me, that during that period there have been fewer labour disturbances in Canada than in any part of the Empire. This is a tribute not only to the moderation and patriotic spirit of organized labour, but also to the wisdom and ability with which you have discharged your duties as Minister.

May I venture to express my hope that the well earned holiday which you are about to take will prove most beneficial and that although you find your strength unequal to continuing the labours incident to the head of the important Department over which you have presided you will still take an active and energetic interest in public affairs.

Believe me, dear Mr. Crothers,

Yours faithfully,

Hon. T. W. Crothers,
Queen's Hotel,
Toronto, Ont.

I shall make inquiry as to the correspondence in the other matter referred to by the leader of the Opposition.

ALLEGED TRADE DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: I desire to bring to the notice of the Acting Prime Minister a matter which has on two former occasions been brought up in this House—once by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntington (Mr. Robb), and on the second occasion by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy).

ALLEGED TRADE DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: This morning I received from London this cablegram which I wish to read to the House:

London, March 3,

Surprised cable statement acting-Prime Minister. Every one here knows trade regulations discriminate against us as compared with the United States. I assert this positively.

(Signed) Macdonald.

This cable was sent to me by a former member of this House, Mr. E. M. Macdonald, who is well known to us all, and I think it proper to bring it to the notice of the Acting Prime Minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) I may say that we had been dealing with this matter upon newspaper reports. Last week, as I recently stated to the House, I despatched a cable to Sir George Perley, High Commissioner for Canada, with the view of ascertaining the facts. I have not received a reply. When one comes to hand I shall make a further announcement to the House in respect to the subject. I observe from the cable which has been read to the House by my hon. friend, that surprise is expressed at the cabled statement of the Acting Prime Minister. My statement on Thursday of last week was to this effect:

I have no official information in confirmation of the report, and I must take the liberty of doubting that Great Britain would discriminate against Canada in favour of the United States or of any other country.

In private communications that I have received from time to time from the Prime Minister, I have been made aware that representations were made by him and his colleagues, and by Messrs. Harris and Jones, to the departmental heads and to the chairmen of important committees, in respect to the matter of the removal of war restrictions upon trade still existing. The restrictions referred to were general in their character. It has not been intimated to me in any of the correspondence which I have received that there has been any discrimination against Canada. I have had a good deal to do with the finance and trade of Great Britain connected with this country since the outbreak of the war. I have known of the great difficulties under which she has laboured and the situations with which she has been confronted from time to time, and I desire to say that I believe that to the utmost of her power she has endeavoured to assist Canada in her trade, and that in all matters connected with our commerce during the war her intentions towards us have been of the most friendly and generous character.

On the Orders of the Day:

FARMERS' SONS OVERSEAS.

Mr. MURPHY: Might I ask the hon. the Acting Prime Minister a question? Correspondence has reached me, as I have no doubt it has reached other members of this House, from farmers in western Ontario and elsewhere, pointing out that seeding time is only about six weeks away and that they are confronted with a serious shortage of labour. Only to-day I received letters from points in western Ontario in which, among other things, I am given an instance of one man with 200 acres and his only son overseas, and of another man with 250 acres, one son at home and another son overseas. This condition prevails in different parts of the province as well as in other parts of Canada. I am requested to ask the Government if some provision cannot be made to bring these farmers' sons home in time enough to take part in putting in the next season's crop.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy), I may say what has already been said in this House in this debate, that every possible effort is being made by the Government to bring home, as speedily as possible, the Canadian Expeditionary force. I think that within the next few months very rapid progress will have been made—indeed, much more rapid than we and, I think, the people of this country, anticipated at the time of the signing of the armistice.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session resumed from Friday, February 28th.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Laval-Two-Mountains) (Translation) (Resuming): Mr Speaker, before resuming my speech which was so fortunately interrupted, on Friday last, by the visit of the illustrious mutilated hero of the war of 1870, General Pau and the distinguished friends who accompanied him I deem it my duty to convey to you, Mr. Speaker and to my hon. colleagues to your right and to your left, the expression of my regret at having perhaps been unable to rise to the emergency and to show myself equal to the task imposed by the circumstances; but let me tell the House that what I said was prompted by the heart and the sincere and frank expression of my feelings. My words conveyed the sentiments of a loyal British citizen and betrayed the love of a descendant of old France for his ancient mother country. I am fully rewarded for it and I am glad to avail myself of the opportunity which is afforded me of conveying to and placing before the House the expression of the emotions stirred in General Pau's heart, on the occasion of his visit to this House, the other day.

Allow me now, Mr. Speaker, to read a letter which I have just received from this illustrious man whom the country is acclaiming to-day.

French Mission. French Republic.
Montreal, March 2, 1919.

J. A. C. Ethier, M.P., Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

Allow me to tell you how happy I felt, the other day, in hearing you, when, together with the Mission, I was granted the honour of the sitting in the Federal Parliament. By good luck a French-speaking member was then addressing the House—

La Presse, of Montreal, in its issue of Saturday last, pointed out this very same circumstance.

—need I tell you how happy I felt in hearing our mother tongue echoing within the precincts of the House? Need I add how deeply moved I was by what you said with regard to me and respecting France? These are memories which will never be wiped out of our minds but will ever remain green in my heart and in the heart of my colleagues.

Believe me, Sir,

G. Pau.

There is nothing to add to such a letter and to the proof of esteem conveyed to me personally, Mr. Speaker; but my hon. colleagues are quite aware that those congratulations are a tribute paid not to myself but to all my colleagues.

When I had the honour of moving the adjournment of the debate, which is going on to-day with your leave, Mr. Speaker—and let me say, from the very outset, that I do highly appreciate the favour you conferred upon me in relaxing the Rules of the House and allowing me to resume the debate under such circumstances—I was dealing with prohibition. It is up to the Government to legislate on that question which is now being debated by the provincial assemblies, that of Quebec and the no less important one of Ontario. I hope that the Government, in approaching that question, will bear in mind the threat hurled across the line by Labour, which is spreading throughout Canada: "No beer, no coal." This is, a pregnant argument, and I hope the Government will bear it in mind, in proper time and place.

Labour and reconstruction seem to preoccupy the mind of the Government; and yet those important questions do not receive the degree of consideration they are entitled to.

The honorable member from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) in the course of a few remarks more or less expedient which he made on Friday last, has taxed his ingenuity in order to represent my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) in the shape of a Bolshevik. In his opinion, the Russian Soviets and Bolsheviks find in my hon. friend from Brome a zealous and doughty champion of their doctrine. He protested against the propagation and distribution of Bolshevik literature, without mentioning the names of those papers and while he was denouncing them, I wondered whether he had in mind the Orange Sentinel. I wondered if he meant the Jack Canuck or the Calgary Eyeopener, which are protected by the Government and which are circulating under his paternal eye.

But employment must be found for the unemployed, we are told by the Government; public health has to be protected; reconstruction and the re-establishment of soldiers have to be provided for; and post-war problems must be solved. But what are you doing for the farmers? The tariff question is passed over in silence in the speech from the Throne. In his opinion, the tariff is a negligible quantity and you have but to do the bidding of the manufacturers and the capitalists and follow the lead of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt).

The other day, my hon. friend expressed a wish or rather suggested a compromise, in saying that he would be in favour of paying a bigger income tax. That is quite easy for him, as he derives his profits from the farmer, and so he will take in the pocket of the farmers the money he will pay to the Government.

In their recent Orders in Council, passed during recess, the Government have put the tractors on the free list. That is all very well but if the tractors are useful to the wealthy farmers of the West who can dispose of enough money to buy those implements, it is quite, quite another thing with the other provinces.

What does the farmer want now, if you really wish to protect him? Put not only farming implements on the free list but also raw material.

An hon. MEMBER: Take off the duty off ploughs.

Mr. ETHIER: Is my hon. friend from Brantford in favour of placing on the free list the agricultural implements which he is manufacturing and selling at such a profit? The hon. gentleman spoke smoothly, on Friday; he held out the olive branch with one hand, but with the other hand, he lays the burden of taxation on the farmer. My hon. friend lacks sincerity; he always advocated in this House high duties on ploughs.

My hon. friend from Brantford tried to bring into ridicule the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Kennedy) when speaking of "separated brethren" and with a gesture which he deemed eloquent, he pointed out the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who was approving him with a smile.

An hon. MEMBER: That does not mean much.

[Mr. Ethier.]

Mr. ETHIER: No, it is no great matter, because behind that smile lurks a mental reservation. Those "separated brethren" referred to by my hon. friend for Essex, who have been invited by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) to go back to the fold, saying that the door of the Liberal party was wide open, and who smiled approvingly at the remarks of the hon. member for Brantford, may not always smile, when the tariff question comes up. He did not tell us what transpired at the caucus of the hon. gentlemen, last Thursday; he did not tell us whether the smile was as sweet and as bright as the one he was wearing, when referring to the hon. member for Brome. I do not think so. And when the tariff question is brought forward, I shall ask the hon. member for Brantford what he thinks of the statements of the Minister of Agriculture and of the resolutions passed in the West by the Grain-Growers and approved by the Minister of Agriculture. The smile of the hon. gentleman may not be as sweet and pleasing as the smile of the hon. member for Red Deer, Friday last.

Such are the important matters which the Governor General's speech does not mention and which the Government does not care to deal with.

However, they have had taken great pains in spreading out the importance of the presence of the Prime Minister in Europe. When you read the Government's organs you would believe that Sir Robert-Borden's services there are primordially useful. The President of the Republic to the south of us is nobody, neither is Lloyd George, Prime Minister of Great Britain! Sir Robert Borden must remain in France. We see the President of the United States coming back to Washington to deal with the labour conditions and other questions of the hour. The British Prime Minister is crossing the Straits and goes to England to watch and endeavour to solve the labour problem which actually threatens the Imperial Throne. But Mr. Borden is of such consequence that he had to be assigned a position in which Canada is going to play a great part: they are sending him to the Marmorean Sea, to Prince's Island to confer with the Bolsheviks in order that he may become acquainted with their doctrine which the hon. member for Brantford thinks he has detected in the views expressed by the hon. member for Brome. But supposing, Mr. Speaker, that this mission, which I hold is of minor importance, were justified, and that the Prime Minister of Canada would have-had to play a preponderant part in that meeting with the Russian Bolsheviks in Prince's Island, it is all over now that the Bolsheviks have refused to meet him. Why then should we not have the privilege, the pleasure and the great honour of seeing Sir Robert Borden in this House to-day? We would be pleased under the circumstance to behold his important and commanding personality as presiding over the proceedings of this House. Alas! no; he is overseas, and, according to press reports and rumors, seeking an embassy, perhaps in the United States.

The gentlemen who, in 1911, impeached the United States, and denounced a commercial treaty and reciprocity with that country and refused to make any financial or other transaction with them, now solicit the honour of being ambassador of Great Britain in the Republic which they so despised! This is a singular contrast.

The Government complain that they cannot, under the present circumstances, as stated by the hon. Minister of Public Works, answer all the questions and satisfy all the demands which are put forth with a view to solving the post-war problems.

The hon. Minister of Public Works says that we may expect each year from now on a deficit of $100,000,000. This year we are going to spend $20,000,000 for better housing; $25,000,000 for highways; $75,000,000 for new railway branch lines in the western provinces, and then after having increased the debt to $2,000,000,000, we shall still have a deficit of $100,000,000.

The Government seem to have a queer liking for the Bolsheviks. They allowed the Prime Minister to go and confer with the Bolshevik leaders in Prince's Island, then they sent troops to Siberia to fight the very people whom the Prime Minister was asked to pacify.

With regard to this expedition to Siberia —which the press has spoken so much about—may I ask what right had the Government to spend millions to send, without any authorization, that regiment there? Why were those soldiers asked to go to Northern Russia where, unfortunately for them, they are exposed to severe cold as well as retaliation on the part of the Bolsheviks ?

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have dealt with the different problems which concern public opinion. I may have gone beyond that which is mentioned in the Governor General's speech, but I could hardly leave aside such questions as that of the tariff, the censure and the enforcement of the Military Service Act as regards the defaulters. I thought it was my duty not to ignore them and to call the attention of the country and of the Government to that which the latter have probably deliberately left aside.

I trust that in the few remarks which I made I kept within the limits of parliamentary discretion, and that they will be accepted in the right spirit by the members of the cabinet and my hon. friends on the other side of this House. I believe that the unexpected visit of General Pau ought to be sufficient to let you forget the other part of my speech. At all events I submit it, with the hope that the Government will seriously consider the various questions which we are discussing and will consider my remarks in the spirit in which they were made.

Mr. GEORGE BRECKEN NICHOLSON (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I be permitted to add my word of commendation with respect to the manner in which the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Redman), and the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), presented the resolution which we are now considering. I particularly congratulate the latter hon. gentleman on his declaration with regard to national unity. It seems to me that if there is anything to which men of all classes, whether in public life or out of it, in this country, should direct themselves, it is to an effort to break down the unnatural prejudice that exists amongst many of our people on racial, religious and social lines. I wish to say, Sir, that if this country of ours is ever to reach the position to which we think she is entitled, it will be when men who deem themselves to be patriotic Canadians get together, work out a common ideal, and go forward to the attainment of that ideal. As long as we are divided as we now are, we can never achieve real national greatness.

The speech from the Throne submits a programme which, if we give to it the attention and consideration it deserves, will provide this House with work for a very considerable period. It is not my purpose to go at any length into any of the specific problems before us. I would, however, ask the liberty of referring to one or two very briefly.

The first question has to do with the returned soldier. Personally I do not like to hear it referred to as the problem of the returned soldier: it grates on my ears to hear the returned soldier referred to in any sense as a problem. For my own part I look upon the returned soldier as the greatest asset this country has, or has had. There is a problem confronting us in connection with our relationship to the returned soldier. The problem is simply this: it is our duty—it is your duty and it is mine—to see to it that every soldier who went overseas to fight the battles of this country in Europe, is given an opportunity to get back into civil life just as quickly as he can, and into a position at least as good, if not a little better, than he had before he went overseas. With regard to the returned soldier who comes back to us broken in body and mind, it is our duty to leave nothing undone that can be done to render his position in life just as good as it can possibly be made. We can never restore him to his former condition; we can never make the world for him the same as it was before; but we can, as far as we are able, alleviate his condition and make life at least tolerable. Then there are the dependents of those who have fallen, and in that regard I merely say this: If ever a woman or child in this country is permitted to suffer because of some Canadian citizen who has given his life in this war, then some one will be criminally responsible, and will be held to account for that responsibility.

Another point touched on in the speech from the Throne, to which I would refer briefly, is the housing question. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that I am now treading on somewhat delicate ground, because I do not believe that the present policy is universally acceptable. However, I am not going to discuss the matter in detail, because when it comes before the House later on we shall have an opportunity of reviewing it from all angles; but before we make up our minds too firmly that the housing proposition is not a good one, let us just ask ourselves, and if we can do so answer the question, whether there is a town or city anywhere in Canada, of any considerable size, where a workingman, an ordinary workingman and his family, can secure a suitable house, such as a Canadian workingman and his family should be permitted to live in—one containing five rooms and a bath—at a rental that a workingman can pay? If there is such an one, I do not know where it is, and I would like to have the opportunity of visiting it.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, many times during this debate that there never was a time in the history of this country—in fact there never was a time in the history of the world—when we were face to face with so many problems, upon the solution of which will to a large measure depend the kind of civilization that the next generation, at least, is going to have; and it behooves us all to approach these problems with calmness, and at least a measure of reasonable consideration.

There is the question of the labour problem—or the relationship of capital and labour, of labour to capital—of employer to employee, if you will. And let me say, notwithstanding the admiration that it would appear some members of the House hold for the system of the Bolsheviki, I am one of those who believe that the relationship between employer and employee will be a factor, so long as this dispensation lasts, in some form or other. It is our business therefore to try to work out a relationship between employer and employee that will be reasonable and that will give to every man without discrimination the right to earn at least a decent and respectable living. That is the basis of the whole problem—to enter upon a detailed discussion of the subject would occupy too long a time at this particular moment.

Another question that we must face in this country, and face in the very immediate future, is the final solution of the railway problem. We have gone some distance towards finding the solution, but we have very many difficulties to overcome yet, and the sooner we get busy and arrive at the best way of overcoming these difficulties the better it will be.

Another problem to be dealt with is the tariff, and again I almost feel as though I were treading on holy ground when I mention this particular subject. People will tell you the question is so difficult, that there are such diverse views of the tariff. That is perfectly true, but the fact that the question is a difficult one, and that people have diverse views of it, is one reason why we should tackle it. I am somewhat in harmony with the view of the hon. member for Brome that we should tackle the tariff problem now; that we should not undertake to reconstruct the superstructure that has been torn down until we shall have re-established the foundation. We shall not have industrial stability until we have determined what the fiscal policy of the country is going to be. I have my own views with regard to the tariff. If I and the other members of this House in turn took the whole afternoon in discussing the tariff we should all go away in just as much a state of chaos as we are in at the present moment. We shall never reach a solution of this matter by discussing the tariff across the floor of the House; it will have to be taken hold of in a more scientific, businesslike manner. I do not believe that we could exist industrially under a policy of absolute free trade. Other hon. gentlemen in this House may say just as emphatically that we can; I am not going to quarrel with them; they have the same right to their opinions that I have to mine. But I do believe that there is room for a fair and reasonable compromise between the extreme views that are held with regard to the tariff. I have not even a glimmer of an idea of what may be in the mind of the Government or in the mind of the Acting Prime Minister with regard to this question. It may be that we shall find in the Budget a complete solution of the tariff problem—at least, I hope that will be the case. But I pass along a suggestion; it may be taken for what it is worth. It is that the Government appoint a commission—I hope that no hon. gentleman opposite will collapse in his chair because I use the word "commission"—to take hold of the question of the tariff; that the United Council of Agriculture, the Grain Growers of Western Canada, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the United Boards of Trade, transportation organizations and organized labour, be requested to appoint their own representatives to make up that commission; and that these representatives sit around a table and see if they cannot work out a compromise on the tariff that will stabilize Canadian industry.

I would like the privilege of referring briefly to some of the criticisms that we have heard from the other side of the House. First, I wish to refer to a remark made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr McKenzie)—I sincerely trust that he will pardon my presumption in doing so—with regard to the Department of Labour. If I understood him aright, he intimated that the Department of Labour was, to use a common phrase, simply lying down on the job and doing nothing to bring capital and labour or the employer and the employee together. I hold no mandate for the Minister of Labour (Hon. G. D. Robertson) although I have the greatest admiration for him and had the greatest admiration for his predecessor (Hon. T. W. Crothers). I would however suggest to the leader of the Opposition that he spend an hour some day in the office of the Minister of Labour. If he has not time to do that, I will undertake to introduce him to two or three representatives of organized labour in order that he may find out what was done by the former Minister of Labour and what has been done by the present Minister of Labour with a view to harmonising the differences between the employer and the employee. I wonder if the leader of the Opposition ever heard of Board of Adjustment No. 1, upon which is represented all the railway organizations in Canada and all the employees of railways in Canada, an organization under which such a thing as a strike on the great transportation systems has become a practical impossibility. It seems to me that we have gone a long way towards harmonising the differences between the employer and the employee, and if the lines that have already been laid down can be followed in the future, I have great hope that it will not be long before such a thing as a strike or a disruption between the workingman and his employer will be an unheard of thing in Canada. I know that that is the end towards which the Minister of Labour is working, and in that regard he is receiving a great deal of assistance from employers and employees.

One other matter that was briefly touched on by the leader of the Opposition was the franchise. I am not going to go into that, nor am I going to discuss the War-Time Elections Act. I simply say this: if hon. members have it in their minds that by wiping the War-Time Elections Act off the slate they are going to enfranchise enemy aliens in Canada, they have another guess coming to them, because the people will not stand for it.

I listened to the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) in his reference to the Bolsheviki. I listened also to the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Ethier) in his references to Bolshevism, but I regret that I could not follow him very closely, therefore I will not deal with what he said. But I was amazed and shocked to feel that any member occupying a seat in this House should so prostitute his privileges as to stand up and offer a defence of Bolshevism. When the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) was referring to this matter on Friday afternoon an hon. member on the other side of the House called out: "What is there in the doctrine of Bolshevism to which you object?" Let me ask hon. members what they think of the nationalization of woman, one of the doctrines of the Bolshevik, under which an innocent girl is torn from her home and turned over to some brute of a man—what for? For no other purpose but the express intention of propagating the species, and that the children born of such an unholy union shall be not the God-given heritage of their parents, but the property of the state, the same as any other animal. Yet we are asked to associate the words "truth" and "justice" with the Bolshevik. It gives one a bad taste in the mouth even to utter the word "Bolshevik."

The member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier)—I regret that he is not in his seat—undertook to fasten on the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. J. A. Calder) a charge of partisanship in connection with the appointment of medical officers to look after returned soldiers in Canada. If the member for St. Hyacinthe had contented himself with dealing in generalities he might have been able to make out a very good case, but unfortunately he became specific. I assume that I am correct in saying that if there is anything the matter with the appointments made under the regulation that was read by the member for St. Hyacinthe, it is that the proper persons were not appointed, or that improper persons were appointed. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) read a list of medical men in the different towns and cities throughout Canada who had been appointed by the Repatriation Committee. Amongst the number he mentioned Dr. James, of the town of Mattawa; Dr. Bell, of North Bay, and Dr. Cook, of Sudbury, and as he mentioned each name he referred to him as a Tory political heeler. I do not know whether the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville knows the town of Mattawa and Dr. James, or the town of North Bay and Dr. Bell, or the town of Sudbury and Dr. Cook; but I am prepared to pay the hon. member's expenses to each of these towns and to introduce him to each of these doctors for the privilege of seeing what will happen when he says to their faces that they are Tory or any other kind of heelers.

Mr. PROULX: I remember very well that the hon. member said that Dr. James was a Unionist.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Hansard says "Tory." Dr. James is not and never has been a Tory. If he has any political affiliations, he is an out-and-out, strong Liberal. Dr. Bell, of North Bay, has never been identified with a political party of any description. Dr. Cook, of Sudbury, if he has any political affiliations whatever, is a Liberal. Let me say further that if the Government had fine-tooth-combed this country from Halifax to Vancouver, they could not have selected three men more outstanding in their professions than Doctors James, Bell and Cook. Yet these are the men who are held up to ridicule in this House as political heelers because they have been asked to do a work for the returned soldier. Since July, 1914, they have been spending fifty per cent of their time in the interest of the soldier, and they are willing to continue doing so.

You will remember, Sir, that I referred a few moments ago to the appointment of a commission. One of the parrot cries that we have heard from the beginning of this session—and we hear it also outside of the House—is this cry with regard to the appointment of commissions. The Government have been appointing too many commissions. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy) went as far as to say that it was time for the Government to get rid of all these commissions, to take off their coats and get busy and do the work themselves. These are not the hon. member's exact words, but I think they are a fair implication of what he said. This leads me to the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite either do not understand the meaning of the word "commission," or do not understand the functions of government. To illustrate what I mean, let me put the matter in this way. If I employ a man to drive a team of horses for me in a log camp and tell him that I am going to hold him responsible for doing that work, he has my commission to go ahead and do it. If the board of directors of a business organization tell the general manager to look after their business, he has their commission to go ahead and do the work. If one of the railway companies sends out a superintendent to take charge of one of their divisions, he has their commission to do the work. I think that is a fair statement. What then is the function of government? Is it not that the members of the Cabinet, the ministers of the Crown, shall spend their time in directing the affairs of this country in the interest of the people; that they shall take charge of their departments; and that they shall employ whatever assistance is necessary to carry out the policy of the Government as expressed by Parliament in the interest of all the people? Are not these the functions of government? If I understand hon. gentlemen opposite aright, their idea of the functions of government is that the ministers of the Crown, to use the terms of the hon. member for North Essex, shall get rid of all these assistants, take off their coats and do the work themselves, and whatever they cannot do themselves leave undone whether the people suffer or not. I purpose putting hon. members opposite to a test in connection with this. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), who was one of those who declaimed vigorously against these commissions, the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy) and the hon. member for Laval, Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) are each of them, I am convinced, literally consumed by an ardent desire to place their services at the disposal of a needy, although perhaps, unappreciative State. There is an opportunity awaiting them. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) told the House a few days ago that he had in contemplation an extensive programme of public works involving some work to be done under force account. Supposing these hon. members who are so anxious to see the country get rid of commissions and who are also so anxious to serve the State would take the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) as padrone of the group and go up to the city of Hamilton and pull down some of those buildings which the Minister of Public Works wants to remove. They would be accomplishing two things at the same time by doing so; they would be proving the utility of their own theory with regard to the functions of Government and they would be serving the State to just about the limit of their capacity.

I would like to refer briefly to a statement made by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains. I regret exceedingly that I was not able to follow the hon. member through the whole of his speech, because I do not understand the beautiful language of France. On Friday afternoon, we had the very great privilege of having with us for a few moments that grand old man, General Pau—a privilege that I believe every member in this House appreciated to the fullest possible extent. When General Pau entered this Chamber the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains was speaking English and with fitting courtesy he ceased speaking in English and continued his address in French. I believe that I am well within the mark when I say that every member of this House felt that it was a very happy coincidence that when General Pau entered the Chamber there should have been on his feet an hon. member capable of speaking the French language. But what did the hon. member say when he proceeded with his speech? Did he utter any gracious compliment to that great country which General Pau represented? No, he entered a specious plea on behalf of the liquor interests of this country. He intimated that if we abrogated the Treaty under which French wines come into Canada we might disrupt the Entente Cordiale existing between the two peoples. There sat the battle-scarred veteran who has been the personal witness of the greatest vicarious sacrifices that humanity has ever been able to give to the world, listening to a declaration that it would require a traffic in intoxicating liquor to keep intact a bond of unity that has been cemented by the outpouring of the life-blood of sixty thousand Canadians and ten times sixty thousand Frenchmen side by side. Must that old veteran not have shuddered to his very soul at the utterance of such a sentiment? I am not going to pursue the hon. member's argument further than to say this, that if the interests for whom he was pleading have no better argument to put before the Canadian people than that, then their case is, indeed, a sorry one.

I wish to refer very briefly to something said by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy) in his address the other evening. He apparently deemed it fitting to hold up to the ridicule of this House and of the country His Gracious Majesty King George the Fifth because of a complimentary banquet given to President Wilson at Windsor Castle; and judging by the applause with which his remarks were greeted by the hon. gentlemen sitting around him, I was forced to the conclusion that the sentiments he expressed were very largely concurred in by His Majesty's loyal Opposition. I have no means of knowing whence the hon. member derived his inspiration, but his remarks followed so closely along the line of a similar attack on President Wilson published in one of the pro-German organs in the city of New York that I at least was forced to the conclusion that minds with like ideals have an almost uncanny aptitude for finding expression in similar words. To refresh the minds of hon. gentlemen, I shall quote what the hon. member for North Essex said with regard to this banquet:

> It was a magnificent banquet. There were thousands of soft shaded lights. The walls were hung with expensive tapestries. Fifteen million dollars' worth of gold plate were spread upon the banquet board. The lackeys were in the costume of the beef-eaters of old, bowing low and moving backwards before the passing guests. Our Premier was there, and he was described in the papers as wearing the Windsor costume, knee breeches and all—democracy pure and undefiled.

I know nothing of the details of the banquet, but I venture to say this: bearing in mind the splendid example of self-sacrifice and service His Majesty King George the Fifth and every member of his family have given to us during the last four years, the banquet was in perfect harmony with the occasion. What was that occasion? The hon. member for North Essex would have us believe that it was a mere vulgar example of medieval self-indulgence and flunkeyism; at least that was my impression. Mr. Speaker, since the days when the Pilgrim Fathers first set foot on the continent of North America there never was an event or an occasion fraught with greater possibilities for good for the whole human race than the occasion which the hon. member for North Essex held up to the contempt of this House and country. It was the occasion when for the first time in history the head of the great British democracy was permitted to entertain in his own home the head of the great democracy of the United States of America. What does that signify? Let hon. gentlemen cast their eyes back to the summer of 1914 and ask themselves what it was that saved civilization when the war lords of Central Europe opened the flood gates of Armageddon. We have heard a good many explanations of how the world was saved, but I say without the slightest fear of successful contradiction that the underlying reason, the only reason, in fact by which it was possible for civilization to save itself was the "Bonne Entente" between the Republic of France and the British Empire brought about by the matchless diplomacy of the late King Edward VII. Had it not been for that Bonne Entente the hon. member for North Essex would not have had the privilege of speaking in a free parliament in this or any other country. The Huns would have taken care of that. And if King George never does anything else but lay the foundation upon which can be built up a similar understanding that will draw together the English-speaking peoples of the great democracy of the British Empire, that commonwealth of free nations, and the great democracy of the United States of America, he will have given cause to mankind the world over to sing with a new meaning that grand old anthem "God Save the King."

Reference has been made to the absence of the Prime Minister from this House, and the matter was brought to a direct head the other evening by the hon. member for North Essex who demanded that the Prime Minister return to his duties and do the things which the Canadian people are paying him to do. That demand met with such apparent approval by hon. gentlemen opposite sitting around the Speaker that I was again forced to conclude his opinions were concurred in by hon. gentlemen opposite. That leads me to ask this question: Can it be possible that even at this late date hon. members have utterly failed to comprehend the true meaning of the times in which we live? During the past four years, sixty thousand of the flower of Canada's manhood have poured out their life's blood on the battlefields of Europe; one hundred and fifty thousand more are coming back broken in body, some of them in mind, bearing scars that will be to their glory as long as they live; two hundred thousand others have with them gone into and come out of the very jaws of hell itself. What for? Simply in order that the world might be made a fit place for decent people to live in. There is now sitting in Paris, the centre around which that holocaust raged, a conference of the heads of the allied nations. The first minister of each allied country is there together with such of his colleagues as he deemed necessary. They are meeting in Paris for what? In order that a constitution may be framed for mankind that will make it impossible for a similar world catastrophe to occur again. Yet we have hon. members in this House saying that the Prime Minister of Canada should leave all that, leave the things for which our boys bled and died, and come back to attend to some matter of parish politics. I will not pursue the subject further except to say this, that if the Prime Minister of Canada was anywhere else than where he now is or doing anything else than the business he is now attending to he would be unworthy of being the Prime Minister of Canada.

Before concluding, I desire to say a word or two with regard to what our boys did in France. We have heard described in accurate detail the position the world was in when this House rose in May last. At that time the hearts of our people were almost standing still in strained anxiety, watching the bulletins day after day, and hour by hour, to see what next was going to happen. Was that human line, extending from the North sea to the boundary of Switzerland going to be able to hold? It did hold. It bent in places, individual links were stretched, but it held. It held until that moment when the great General Foch, in collaboration with our own great General Haig, General Pershing, and the other members of the Allied high command, determined that the time had come to strike. And they struck. They struck with such effect that in four short months they rolled up the German forces, brought the Hun to his knees and compelled him to cry for peace.

What part did our own boys take in these events? For the first time in the whole war the four Canadian divisions were brought together in one army, with the addition of one British division, and were held in readiness for a fixed purpose. Near the end of September the time came for them to strike. They struck, and the first blow broke the Hindenburg line and they crossed the Dracourt switch. I will not undertake to follow in detail their course from that to the end of the war. Suffice it to say, they covered more than one hundred miles; they released hundreds of cities, towns and villages; they met thirty-four German divisions, almost seven times their own number, and defeated them, putting four of them practically out of existence. They took more live prisoners than the total number of their own casualties; they captured 1,200 heavy guns, and over 3,000 machine guns. And they finally planted the flag of the Allies in the city of Mons on the very day the armistice was signed.

What spirit did our boys display through that terrible time? Was there any complaint? Never a word. May I be permitted to quote to this House one sentence from a letter written by one of these boys to his mother, written on the eve of the taking by the Canadians of Valenciennes: "Mother, as we pass through these liberated towns and villages, and look into the faces of the women and children who have endured four years of Hun barbarism, we feel that after all what we are doing, little as it is worth, is worth while."

I have listened, Mr. Speaker, to men on public platforms in Canada dilating on the wonderful country we have, the glorious heritage handed down to us by our fathers. And these orators have usually brought their message to a climax with something like this: Will the sons of Canada be worthy of their forebears? That question can never be asked again. But there is a question that you and I must ask ourselves: Are we, the fathers and mothers, the men and women of Canada, going to be worthy of the sacrifices that these boys have made for us?

Mr. P. R. DuTREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, in the name of the county that I have the honour to represent in this House and which bears the name of "Laurier-Outremont" I wish to express our most sincere regrets and affliction and sorrow for the great loss sustained by this country through the death of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I am sure that in no part of the Dominion has his death created more sorrow and affliction than in this constituency bearing his name. He was admired and loved to the extreme limit. His name and memory will live forever. For my part it was a great privilege to have known this illustrious man for more than twenty years. I had the advantage of appreciating his kindness, his refined and princely manner. In politics he meant about everything to me. He was the wise adviser, the great friend, the Chief. He had all my confidence and respect. His sweet memory will be cherished in my heart and soul as long as I live. On this occasion may I offer to Lady Laurier our sentiments and expression of our sincere regret and sympathy for her immense and irreparable loss.

It is with satisfaction that I note that in the speech from the Throne mention was made of the glorious deeds accomplished by our gallant officers and soldiers at the front; they have rendered great services to this country and to the world during the four years of the war. The glory that they have cast on Canada is so great that I had anticipated that the speech from the Throne would contain a vote of thanks in the name of this Parliament addressed to the officers and to the soldiers, and some recognition offered to these officers and to the soldiers that have most distinguished themselves; a grant of money or a sword of honour could have been offered to the general in command, Sir Arthur Currie. Such a step has been taken previously in England and in the Congress of the United States. A nation honours herself in honouring her heroes and her great men; it has been done by England to Wellington, to Lord Nelson, to French and to Marshal Haig. I am sure that the people of this country will resent such an omission. I consider it is a mistake. While I am on this subject, I may say that I am surprised that this Government, through the military department, has not seen the advantage of presenting medals of honor to our soldiers and officers who so well deserved them; it is true that some of our men have received distinctions from England and from France, but surely this country should be in a position to recognize the services of our soldiers in this manner and necessary orders should be given at once and should have been given before. Also while speaking on these matters, I may say that the people of my province and the soldiers of this country speaking the French language were highly disappointed by the refusal of this Government to organize a French Canadian brigade. You will remember that at the last session I had the opportunity to put this question before this House, and after hearing the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Minister of Militia and Finance (Major General Mewburn) we had nourished the hope that such a brigade would be formed and organized in due course. We had in Europe all the elements to organize such a brigade, we had the officers and the men, we had more than enough men to keep at the full rank this brigade; it would have been a great stimulant and a great reward for these men and officers to obtain this recognition on the part of this Government. I have myself cabled to the Prime Minister of Canada while in England to again call his attention to this matter. For reasons unacceptable to me, this just demand was refused. It will be written in the history of this country that this Government, supposed to have been elected to take the best means to carry on this war, preferred to play politics and did not take the best means for the advancement of victory; it will be written that this Government was unfair towards the province of Quebec, has committed a great injustice to the men speaking the French language and who have fought bravely and gloriously with the other soldiers of Canada in this war. In their name, once again I desire to protest energetically against such a wrong done to my province.

As you are aware, this country is passing through a period of uncertainty and crisis. Industry is stagnating, a great number of labourers are unemployed, leaders of industry are looking around hoping for practical direction from this Government, the large class of agriculture—the basis with industry of our wealth and prosperity— are also looking anxiously toward the future. They fear a lack of markets for their products. Our soldiers are coming back by thousands from Europe. The present situation is unsettled and it is a dangerous one.

The future prosperity of the country depends on the legislation to be passed mostly at this session. The Canadian people were expecting, and they had a right to expect, that this Government, through the speech from the Throne, would bring forward, in plain language, solutions for these problems; that a direction would be given to promote the commercial and economical position of this country with the object of bringing about prosperity, reducing the high cost of living, and producing peace and contentment. The farmers are hoping for a market for their products. They know well that in the future the artificial markets due to the war will be closed for them. It is to be regretted that the policy, if any, mentioned in the speech from the Throne does not give us much hope. During the last two or three years the Government have been notified again and again to prepare for the time coming after the war, for reconstruction and readjustment. I am sorry to say that not much has been done. In fact I would be justified in saying that nothing very practical has been done for this country. While new markets have been prepared and opened by our neighbours to the south, new policies and new methods of business have been adopted in England and in France, while a new understanding has been arrived at in England between capital and labour which has given satisfaction to the latter, here in this country a great unrest exists; we are to-day unprepared for this big problem of reconstruction and readjustment, we have no new markets offered to us or proposed to us by this Government and no practical policy suggested.

The position of this country is quite difficult and we have an immense task before us. We have to be careful in what we do. Our net public debt, five years ago, was about 335 million dollars, it is now about two billion dollars. When the army is demobilized and our different obligations are met, it will be above two billion dollars, this not taking into account our responsibility for our railroad liabilities, which reach more than 500 million dollars. It is a large debt for a population of eight millions; more than $230 per head, and represents an increase of about six-fold as compared with the figure at which it stood before the war. To meet the interest and the sinking fund, we will have to exercise great economy in many departments and find large sources of revenue. We are thinking much too easily in hundreds of millions to-day and the public credit is endangered. Before the war the interest on our debt was about 12 millions, while to-day it will be about 100 millions. Then the military pension list may reach 25 million dollars or more, the deficit of the Government railways will represent another large amount, and over and above this amount is the cost of the general administration of the country, which may represent 140 millions, and perhaps more. This brings the total expenditure on current revenue account to the enormous amount of about 300 million dollars, which represents about $37 per capita, or, for a family of five persons, it means that this family is taxed for $185. This will be met only if business activities and general prosperity continue. The last fiscal year has given us a public revenue of 261 million dollars. This amount will necessarily drop with the actual mode of taxation; prohibition of the liquor traffic will cut into both excise and custom receipts; prices of goods will recede and come to a reasonable price. To date, our revenue is based on, income tax, business tax, business profit tax, increased postage rates and additional custom and excise taxation. We have to reduce the custom tariff for the cost of living is too high. This Parliament has to remodel our system of taxation and revenue. At the same time, we have to carry out certain public works and spend large sums of money to put this country on a basis to compete with the outside world in foreign markets. I refer to transportation and promotion of home and foreign trade. We must also spend large sums of money upon soldiers' lands, settlement and re-establishment. The Government has to see also that there is if possible no unemployment of labour and of capital. The prosperity of this country is based upon its exports. Our exports are to come from agricultural products and manufactured articles; we have to look after these two items so as to keep prosperity at home. Capital, labour, resources, transportation and markets; these constitute the factors of trade and commerce. Business will have to go on as before. During the last two years of the war the value of our exports has increased to an enormous sum of money, due to the fact that the people of Europe needed at any cost our farm products and our war material. Canada was in the position of a firm that had a monopoly of certain goods and was selling those goods to a firm that had to buy and pay or otherwise go out of business. The price received for agricultural products and the market that we had were artificial owing to the demand due to the war conditions; but this market and these conditions will disappear with the end of the war. More than that, I would dare to say that it is likely that England will buy from us less farm products than before the war, because, as you are aware, they have increased enormously their capacity for producing farm products since the beginning of the war. They have improved their methods of agriculture and according to the figures shown to me, the agricultural production of last year in the British Isle was four times more than before the war. In England, the farms produced last year enough for forty weeks, while in the pre-war period they were not producing more than enough for ten weeks. There is no doubt that the English people, practical as they are, will continue these improvements which were new to them. You are aware also that great economy has been taught to the English people during the last war. They will therefore be disposed to buy less and live with less expense and luxury. The result of this will be that the English market, which was one of our largest agricultural markets, will be greatly restricted for us.

We have to bear in mind that under the present conditions Canada cannot manufacture for large export on a permanent basis, and this system has to be changed, for industry as well as agriculture are and must be the two main sources of our wealth. We should have always in our mind the fact that the basis of our wealth in this country will be the development and the selling of our agricultural products and large manufacturers' products. We have to produce more on our farms, we have to develop our agricultural lands; we have to put more farmers on our lands, and we have to find new markets for the agricultural production of the country. Where shall we find these new markets? We have one close to us, separated from our country by only an imaginary line. This market is the United States. It is our natural market. In consequence, I could summarize the new policy that this Government should follow, for one important part, and this is the revision of our tariff with the United States. We have to open new markets for our agricultural products; we have to encourage agriculture; produce more and more, and have more and more good farmers. Then the Government must from to-day, and to-day is the time, make a step further in establishing a new economical and commercial system. I submit that the basis of our economical system is entirely wrong and not adapted to our conditions, taking into consideration our geographical position, our population, and our raw material.

For a long time in this country it has been the custom to protect certain industries by imposing a high tariff. This meant that certain goods necessary to life, analogous to those manufactured here—had to pay a high duty. The people of this country paid from their pockets for this protection and I say to-day, in this era of democracy and of justice for all, it is time that certain of these taxes imposed on the necessaries of life should disappear and a revision should take place.

To-day these manufacturers are not in the position they were some years ago. They are rich. I submit the principle that the industries that should be specially encouraged in this country, and what can add to the wealth of this country, are the industries that can work on raw material from our own country. Industries manufacturing on imported raw material cannot compete, as a general principle, with the industries of other countries that manufacture on their own raw materials. When factories manufacture and work upon imported raw material, the only practical market for the product is the home market and not the foreign market, because they cannot compete with other countries. Therefore the people of the home market pay high prices, according to the protective tariff given to such industries. If an industry cannot compete with foreign industries, it is bad for manufacturers, it is not sound for a country to have it; it is better that it should disappear.

Of course this policy of encouraging industries that work on our raw material is laid down as a principle and must be worked out gradually. A practical commission should be appointed to study these matters. What I am suggesting to the Government is a policy of reconstruction, not of destruction. The actual position of our different industries should be studied, taking into consideration the position also of the mass of the people, and gradually the effort of the Government should tend to the improvement of this policy. Many industries can support competition to-day. Maybe all the industries in this country, with proper management and reasonable profits, could support competition without protection. Competition will give life to these industries, they will be contented with less profit but they will produce more and probably they will get a better result. There will be more employment in this country because we will produce more; the cost of living will be less, articles manufactured here, and for which we pay high prices due to the high tariff, will cost less and therefore, the cost of living in all lines will be reasonable and within the reach of the ordinary people.

We all know, and it is not a secret, that the price of manufacturing goods in this country is fixed by the manufacturers according to the protection or tariff imposed. It costs a huge sum of money to the people of Canada every year. Hundreds of millions of dollars are paid by the consumers to allow the Government to receive 50 or 75 millions of customs duty. The Government should impose larger taxes on large incomes, and large fortunes, but only at the same time as they decreased the tariff.

It is to be deeply regretted that the Victory Loan Bonds are exempted from duties. It may prevent the Government to a certain extent from following this policy. This does not necessarily mean that we are, or will be, in a bad position. On the contrary, Heaven has given to this country immense resources of raw material, and what this Government has to do to-day, if it desires to bring prosperity and wealth and the proper business basis, is to begin anew. It is time to see and encourage industries that can employ our raw material so that we can sell to other countries these manufactured goods. People of this country have paid enough to protect those industries that will not bring wealth to this country. We have not the population, and we are not in a position to continue such extravagant and foolish methods. With this policy of encouraging agriculture, of developing our own raw material, of encouraging our factories working on our raw material for exportation, we will establish this country on a sound business basis; living will become cheaper, we will have plenty of work for our labourers and at good and permanent wages.

Establishing free trade in farm products with the States will open a large market, will encourage our farmers and will help to develop our unproductive lands. In connection with these principles and this policy, the Government could:

1. Bonus the agriculture.
2. Conserve and increase forest production. This policy is carried on in the province of Quebec, in France and in different countries of Europe with great success and much promise;
3. National supervision of water-power;
4. National supervision and development of the raw material in this country;
5. Bonus and assist factories that use our raw material;
6. Subsidize and build cargo boats and open markets for our agricultural and manufacturing products;
7. Develop an export trade in frozen meats and have refrigerator boats;
8. Open new markets in the United States and South America, etc.

Again, in connection with agriculture, we were surprised some time ago to read that this Government or commission appointed for this Government found out at the end that they had not sufficient land on which to establish the soldiers coming from the front. I must say that it is regrettable that governments in this country have seen fit to give to different private firms large tracts of agricultural lands. It has been said to me that great quantities of good land, untilled or badly cultivated, belong to private firms, railroad companies and so on. Some land is in the hands of investors looking for profits. I would submit that these lands should be taken by the Government by some legal means according to justice and equity. Those that retain these lands should not retard the progress of this country in the hope of making profits. Strict stipulations should be imposed, and if these lands are not put into bona fide activity, they should be confiscated.

I hope the Government will do its utmost to attract the soldiers and give them the advantage of establishing themselves on farms. It will be for their future happiness and prosperity. This Government must be careful not to buy lands that are not good for agriculture. Most of the lands in the West are in the hands of speculators and the expectation that the Government is to buy these lands from them is looked upon by them as a piece of great luck. The Government should be careful, buy direct and take the responsibility.

A very important question to be dealt with is the labour problem. A new epoch begins in the civilized world regarding the position of the labouring class, and after the splendid effort and sacrifices made by this class during the last war it is just and right, as it has always been just and right in the past, that these men should be dealt with and treated with more justice and equity: action along these lines should have been taken before. It will always be a stain on the civilized world that a better policy has not been followed in the past. I am in hopes that during this session some practical laws and regulations will be passed securing better relations between labour and capital. The capitalists and the employees are looking for a common ground of understanding, and while the employees claim a just compensation for their sacrifice and an amelioration of their condition, the employers understand that it is impossible that the present state of affairs can continue. It is hoped therefore that laws will soon be passed by Parliament permitting the employees, under certain conditions, and in accordance with the principles of justice and equity, to be represented on boards of directors so that they may have a voice to explain to these chiefs of industries their needs, not only from a monetary standpoint but with a view to moral and intellectual betterment. More effective results every one admits will be attained by conciliation and a better understanding between capital and labour. If this is done I am sure that capital will yield better results and labour will be better pleased. The Government must, however, face the problem at once and in a serious manner without delay. I had the opportunity some time ago to hear a very good address on this subject delivered by Hon. Mackenzie King at the Reform Club at Montreal. If the Government will refer to this address it will find all the necessary food for thought, and the elements and policy calculated to give satisfaction, according to my mind, to the Canadian labour world. Some such policy must be adopted; it is only a question of justice, and of good management on the part of the Government. The Government must also in this connection subsidize and open technical schools in this country, so that we may have in Canada skilled labourers to work in our factories. I know that at present, in many of our industries we have to hire skilled labourers from other countries. This should not be the case because it is detrimental to our trade. I would also warn the Government to be careful as to immigrants admitted to this country. Immigration is a very good thing if the newcomers are of a good class. They are very careful with respect to these matters in the United States where strict examination of each arrival is made. What we need here is farm immigrants and I hope this Government will see to it that men of a type likely to cause trouble and disruption are excluded.

We will need capital in this country and to obtain investment of capital, the Government should take at once proper steps to ameliorate our financial and trade relations with the United States. To attain this aim:

1. A Canadian commission should be appointed at Washington;

2. An advertising propaganda should be instituted to advertise this country as a source of raw materials; in short, to make us thoroughly known in the States, so that the investors from that country will know what prospects exist here in trade and finance. The Government was able to finance its war policy through the patriotic good will of the banks of Canada and the people of Canada.

The Government last fall borrowed a huge sum of money, over 500 million dollars, in the Victory Loan. The undoubted security, the interest offered and the promise connected with it that no future tax would be imposed on it all contributed to making the response a great one; the subscription was over 600 million dollars. In this connection, I am sorry to say that this Government has offered such interest, 5½ per cent, and especially that they have promised solemnly and obliged themselves not to impose duties on these bonds in the future. This Government at the beginning of the war has helped many people, many of their friends, to enrich themselves, and to-day they are millionaires. We have many millionaires in this country now and in the first years of the war, if I remember accurately, in the second year, no duties or taxes were imposed on their profits. This country having to pay heavy taxes, cried aloud that the rich, those that had big revenues, large incomes, those that had made money out of the war, should pay, but the Government was there, and after having enriched those men, this Government wanted to help these friends again so that they could keep their fortune intact, and the Government found a way out for its good friends the millionaires in offering them bonds at a high interest, guaranteed by this country with the promise that they would remain intact, without for the future any tax to pay on their money. I say that this is a great drawback in this country for the future. In the States, no such promise was made, and still the Victory Loan was only at 4½ per cent. I say that it is a great injustice done to the majority of the population of this country. To pay our debts, our interests and to have the money for our needs, our public enterprises, the Government should in the future tax heavily those that have large revenues, because a day may come in this country with the Government that will succeed this one soon when the custom duties will drop considerably or disappear, when we will have free trade, which has given wealth to England, and when that day will come the Government may have to depend mainly on duty imposed on income, as is the case in England.

If this Government is really sincere in its reconstruction, it will act, I submit, according to the principles submitted, and I hope, nay, I am sure, there is a great prosperity and happiness in store for us in this country. If this Government continues to tramp on the same ground as it did since the armistice, I have great fear for this country.

There is another important question that I wish to deal with, and that is the war indemnity which this country should receive. Some days ago I read in the newspaper an alleged declaration by Sir Robert Borden that this country would not especially insist upon an indemnity being paid to Canada. If the Prime Minister said that, he did not voice the opinion and the desire of the people of this country, because I am sure that Canada wishes to receive an indemnity equal to the amount of money which she has disbursed in the carrying on of the war. Take into consideration, Mr. Speaker, the taxes that the people are paying to-day which were imposed by the Government after the outbreak of war. We are paying on income and on profits; we are paying extra postage on letters; we have to affix stamps to notes and cheques; we pay a tax on drugs; the tariff has been raised on certain commodities to the extent of 7½ per cent. Our debt has increased from $335,000,000, which it amounted to before the war, to about $2,000,000,000. This generation and future generations will be called upon to meet the heavy interest charges on this huge debt. The other day a member of the Government told us that we would have to find about $300,000,000 in order to carry on the business of the country during the current year, and that we owed about $2,000,000,000. We do owe about $2,000,000,000, and that does not take into consideration our liability in respect of our railways. The debt of Canada is about $240 per capita; but it costs about $140 per capita to carry on the affairs of the country. A man with a family of five pays about $200 a year in the way of taxes imposed by the Federal Government and about the same amount in the way of municipal and provincial taxes. That means that every family of five persons in Canada has to pay $400 a year in taxes. It is most important, therefore, that the Government insist on our receiving a proper indemnity from Germany. I was surprised that in the speech from the Throne no reference was made to any steps proposed to be taken by the Prime Minister through the proper channels to obtain such an indemnity from Germany. If we cannot get the indemnity direct, we could get it through the indemnity that the British Government may receive. Some of the belligerent nations will receive compensation or indemnity through the annexation of territory or through the securing of advantages in trade or commerce. We shall not receive anything of this nature. We do not need territory; what we have here is enough for us. The only way to obtain compensation for our material loss is to receive an ample indemnity from Germany; therefore I hope that the Government will take this matter in hand, recognizing it as one of the most important questions we have to 5 p.m. deal with. I am sure that the people of Canada will resent any inaction on the part of the Government in this matter.

The speakers who have preceded me have made an appeal for union in this country. I am sure that they are sincere in their appeal, and I hope that such union will exist in fact. My last wish is that the leaders of this Government will look higher and seek a purer aim than hitherto; that they will endeavour to render justice to all the people of this country, to all individuals, all classes, all nationalities, remembering that we all belong to the same country; and that they will put into practice the sound policy followed and worthy example set by our great statesmen since Confederation. The real prosperity and development of this country can only be attained by Government action and Government methods based on mutual understanding and confidence. This is justice and true democracy. I hope that "rights to whom rights are due" will prevail; that racial appeals and prejudices will cease; that sinister influence for purely party ends which prevents national unity and obstructs the progress of this country, will cease. In this connection allow me to read to you the following short quotation taken from a paper, regarding the position existing in Belgium:

> Far different is the spirit of the Belgian rulers. In his speech from the Throne, King Albert of Belgium, on his triumphant return to his capital after an enforced exile of four years, set an example which Canadians might well emulate. Coming from the Yser, after passing through liberated towns and hamlets which have been swept by the war, King Albert's first thought was for the unity of Belgium. That part of his speech which deals with the differences in race and language in Belgium might well be applied to Canada, so close is the resemblance in the relations between Fleming and Walloon with those that obtain here between French and English-speaking Canada. His words should be printed in letters of gold and hung up in every school-room in the Dominion. It is as follows:
> The necessity of a fruitful union demands sincere co-operation and collaboration between all the children of the same mother country without distinction of race or language. In the domain of language the strictest equality and the most absolute justice will inspire the drafting of a Bill which the Government will presently lay before the national representatives. Thus will be brought about a concord destined to perpetuate the unity and indivisibility of the country, affirmed during the war by the sacrifice of so much precious blood.
> The Government, in every department, must be permeated by the reciprocal respect for the interests of Fleming and Walloon and bestow upon each the certainty of being understood in his own tongue, and, moreover, assure him full intellectual development, particularly in the higher branches of education. The interests of the whole country demand that each of our two peoples shall be able, each in its own tongue, fully to develop its individuality and originality in both industrial and artistic expression and production.

I hope that these noble sentiments, so well expressed by the ruler of Belgium when he entered his capital, will prevail in this country. I am sure that if the Government follows those principles and acts upon some of the suggestions that I have put before the House this afternoon, there will be in store for this country contentment, prosperity and happiness.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I desire to add my congratulations to those that have been tendered to the two gallant young soldiers who have moved and seconded the Address. They have given us evidence upon the floor of this House that they are quite as able to serve their country here as they were brave and resourceful in serving their country at the front. It adds distinction to this session that two men who had gone overseas and taken all the chances that were involved in the service there should be those to open the debates during this session.

I also wish to offer my congratulations to the Government which has in my judgment, shown a great deal of courage and a good deal of wisdom in dealing with the difficult conditions that have confronted it during the past four years and particularly during last year. A certain amount of criticism has been levelled at the members of the Administration because it is charged that they have not been quite quick enough in providing for the demobilization and repatriation of our men. It may be that everything we desire has not been accomplished, but we have had an exhibition of good judgment, resourcefulness and courage on the part of the Government in facing and solving these problems. I believe I am within the fact when I say that, so far as demobilization is concerned, no country is in advance of the Dominion of Canada. While it is too much to expect that the Government can please everybody, all reasonable men will, I am sure, agree with me that they have shown a real desire to meet all the problems confronting them in the same earnest way that they have succeeded in carrying this country through the war.

There is a great deal in the programme for this session, but there are some things that I am sorry are not there. Before, however, referring to that, I would like to make a very brief reference to the war as it has been presented to our attention by the remarks of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). In a very kindly spirit, the hon. member endeavoured to furnish some consolation to those who had suffered bereavement by the loss of some member or members of their family in the war, and he gave as his judgment that those who died would be looked upon with favour by the Almighty and that their future immortality was assured. I find myself unable to interpret the characteristics of divinity, as I understand them in any other light, for if ever men died in a high and a holy cause it was the gallant gentlemen whose bodies to-day lie in France. It is most repugnant to my mind to think that their sacrifices should go unrewarded; for as I see the great issue that was before the world, it was this: the Germans, during forty years, had succeeded in driving Christ out of their country, and if they had won this war they would have attained their ambition which was to drive Christ out of the world and all that Christian philosophy means for the welfare, happiness and prosperity of the people of the world. Surely the men who fought for such a cause as that, and especially those who were called upon to die for it, will have a reward that will compensate them for their sacrifices. I offer this thought to those who have suffered the loss of some one very dear to them.

The item, Sir, in the Speech from the Throne that impresses me most is that which promises us a Department of Public Health. The phraseology might be improved; and for my part I would like to see it described as "The Department of Public Welfare," which term would include not only health, but many other things that ought to come within the purview of this Government. There was a time not long ago,—and I think the idea persists still with some men in representative positions—that Government ought to deal solely with roads, bridges, and tariffs. That has been the idea largely in the past; but during the last decade, particularly upon this North American continent, an entirely new principle, and one which is going to be recognized more fully in the future, has been adopted by many governmental bodies. That principle is that Government is concerned not only with making roads to travel upon and providing other means of transportation, but in looking after the personal welfare of those who are left in such a position that they are unable to take care of themselves. You may call that paternal government—it makes little difference to me what it is called—but those who have done their part and have done it like men and like women are entitled to such aid as may be necessary to enable them to carry out to the full their duties as citizens, and especially those duties appertaining to their children and their home.

One of the things that I would like to see this Department of Public Welfare take up is the question of mothers' pensions. I think we are to be condemned that we have come to this period in the history of the world and still impose upon a woman who has lost her husband the necessity of going out to daily labour in order to earn money to provide bread for her children. She is suffering through no fault of her own. She has been a good wife, and she is a good mother or she would not go out at seven o'clock in the morning and toil until six o'clock at night that her children may have bread. All the circumstances surrounding her life proclaim her to be a woman to be admired. Yet by our social system or our governmental system, we place her in a position so difficult that I wonder it has been allowed to continue so long. I can cite instances of women of my own acquaintance, in my own city, who have four or five children, all of them too young to do anything for their own maintenance, and the mother left by the hand of death to take charge of them, to care for their physical comfort, and to try, in some way, to bring them up as good citizens. We have imposed on her a task that is practically impossible of accomplishment. If we should be concerned for any class of our people we should first of all look after the young, and if a mother has to go out and toil all day, leaving her children to their own devices, how is it possible that they can get the care needful to train them to be good citizens? How, under such circumstances, can she take care of their morals and look after them in all the thousand and one ways in which a mother does look after her own children? We have departments dealing with neglected children in our provinces to take the children away from a mother who neglects them to find foster-homes for them, and to educate them; but except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba no effort has been made to assist the widowed mother who herself does take care of her children. Surely she is deserving of more consideration than the mother who does not. Aye, Sir, such a good mother is deserving of every encouragement from the State, for she is carrying on the duties of both mother and father to those who in the years to come, and not very many years, will be the citizens and the voters of Canada. I hope, therefore, that a Department of Public Welfare will be put into operation speedily, and this particular phase of public duty undertaken.

There is another sphere of welfare work in which I think we should follow the example of our own mother country, whence we derive so much of our inspiration; I think we should establish an Old Age Pension scheme. Take the case of a man who has served his day and generation until he is sixty-five years old. At that age, because of the severity of his employment, he is perhaps an older man than others are at seventy-five; he is beyond the age at which he can find work and take care of himself. Is it fair that we should say to his children: You who are making only about enough money to maintain yourselves must assume this additional burden; all the service that your father has given to his country, in industry and in citizenship generally, shall receive no recognition from the State? I submit that a man who has worked as long as his physical fitness will enable him, and has used every dollar he could get through his labour to maintain himself and educate his family, when the time comes that he cannot take care of himself it is the business of the Government to look after him. That duty has been recognized in Great Britain and in other countries, and I hope the day is not far distant when it will be recognized in Canada.

I offer another suggestion, and that is that in addition to an Old Age Pension Fund, we should provide insurance against unemployment. There is no sadder sight in the cities and towns of this or any other country than to see a man who is able and willing to work, walking around the streets unable to find employment, until he and his are suffering the pangs of hunger; not through any fault of his, but simply because, owing to existing conditions, he is unable to use the only capital he has—his labour. This duty, too, has been recognized elsewhere, and I think a Department of Public Welfare, such as I hope to see established in this Dominion, should take the initiative in these things, and give a lead to the whole Dominion. If some of these matters ought to be looked after by the provinces, let that be arranged with the provinces, but at all events the present state of affairs should not be allowed longer to continue. I have known men to walk the streets seeking employment, until their last dollar was spent and then have to depend on the charity of their neighbours and friends. Surely there must be some remedy for this state of affairs, and it must be found if we wish the labouring men and artisans of this country to turn deaf ears to the appeals to unrest and Bolshevism which are being made to them by the foreign population of this country. We have to recognize the fair and legitimate demands of the workers of Canada, and I want to say that in no country in the world will you find men more sane, more sensible, and more intelligent than the men working on the lathes and machines of our factories in Canada. I am one of those who believe in trade unionism. It was my good fortune to belong to a trades union at one time, and I want to see the trades unions strong, for my experience has been that wherever a trade union is strong the particular industry with which it is identified is more likely to be operated with certainty and regularity than if the union is not strong. I happen to be engaged in a business which is regulated, so far as the employees are concerned, by the strongest international union on the continent of America, the International Typographical Union, which I think is the most closely organized and most intelligently managed of any trades union. As a result, that particular industry has carried on for nearly twenty years without strikes or lock-outs. I say that the views of these men who have intelligence enough to organize their free parliaments as they do must be considered, and I am glad to know that the capitalists of this country realize their responsibility in this regard and are showing greater interest in the welfare of their employees.

I wish to say a word on the Government's housing programme. One hon. member has said that in no city in Canada can a man get a house to-day at a reasonable price; and I think he was very near the mark—at all events that condition applies to the city of Toronto. Up to a year or so ago, almost every artisan in Toronto was able to live in a self-contained home, with a front lawn, and back garden. But now these artisans have to rent out rooms, lessening the privacy of their homes, in order to meet the demands of the landlord. That is a state of affairs which it is the duty of the Government, of some government, aye, of all governments to rectify, and to rectify as quickly as possible. It was my good fortune at one time to be mayor of Toronto, and during my term of office many American visitors came to the city. The thing I had most pride in, and which I always took a visitor to see, were those streets, of which there are hundreds in Toronto, where our working people live; every man in his own self-contained home, where he was able to bring up a family under splendid conditions, and give them a good start in life so far as ideals are concerned. I was proud of the fact that more than half of the men who toil in the factories of Toronto are their own landlords, and because of that fact, are better citizens than they otherwise would be. Any man, no matter whether he is a clerk in a bank, or a book-keeper, or a blacksmith, who owns a little piece of land with a house on it—it matters little what the size of the mortgage is; once he can be called the proprietor of that property and is entered upon the assessment roll as the owner—has a very much better and higher outlook on life. Owning a home helps to develop the finest type of citizen. It conduces, Sir, to alert and honest municipal administration, and from that alertness in the municipal sphere must surely come greater alertness and interest in the citizens in provincial and Dominion spheres. I submit that nothing can be done for the working man that will tend to make him reliable and steadygoing, a steadying influence in the country, like giving him his own home. So I was glad to see that this Government, although the question of housing may be a little out of its realm, was prepared to take the action that has been indicated in the speech from the Throne. I think the Government has adopted a policy that is eminently sound from every standpoint. The responsibility for the spending of the money which the Government intends to lend rests entirely, in the last analysis, with the municipality, where it ought to rest, and where the expenditure can be most closely checked. The action that the Government has taken puts every municipality in a position to deal with the housing question. But for that assistance many municipalities would have found it extremely difficult to deal with that question at the present time. You will appreciate that when I tell you that in our city the people last year paid $4,000,000 in taxes on war account, and they are paying $3,500,000 this year on the same account. All of that, or nearly all, was spent upon objects that should have been financed by this Federal Parliament. With a load of debt like that last year and this year totalling something like $12,000,000, it can easily be understood that the finances of our city are somewhat strained. And what I say of our city pertains, I think, in practically every other city in the Dominion. Their credit needs assistance, and where shall we look for such assistance if not to the province or to this Government? The province itself has undertaken very large expenditures, and the natural place to look for the necessary assistance is right here. It has been a pleasure to me to see that the Government has risen to its responsibilities in this regard. I hope that Parliament, when this matter is worked out finally, will insist as far as possible upon the principle of personal ownership. I have no great sympathy with the building of rows of houses to be rented. That is better than nothing, of course. But I think that those who are in charge of this programme or plan should make every effort to render it possible for each individual to buy the house he lives in. That may require some extraordinary measures, but when you consider the advantages involved in the increased efficiency of the men as workers and their improved status as citizens, I think that extraordinary measures are fully justified. Take the man working in any of our factories who goes home to a crowded house—two or three tenants living under one roof as we find in many cases. It is impossible for that man to have the privacy and restfulness that he would have in his own home. He goes back to work next morning not quite so efficient a man as he would be had he been able to go home to his own little house where he could, perhaps, work in the evening in his garden, and where he could sit in the cool of the evening on his own doorstep without having tenants accompanying him. These are considerations in connection with the Government's policy on housing to which I would ask the ministers to give consideration.

We are promised legislation to deal with pensions and assistance to returned soldiers. What I think we need more than anything else is that the men whom we have appointed as commissioners to deal with pensions, or demobilization, or repatriation should be men with human qualities strongly developed. I find myself dissatisfied with hard and fast rules as to how much a man shall get. One man may find a measure of disability not nearly so serious a handicap to him as would another. I know that there are difficulties in dealing in a different way with two men whose conditions are superficially similar. I think that the men who have come back to us maimed and partly disabled should be treated more as the sons of the country and not as citizens merely. Suppose that a son, a very dear son, had come back broken, wounded, partly disabled—what would you do in your own home? That is the question that we should ask ourselves in this House, and in asking it we should see to it that the man who is given authority in this matter of pensions should have more than a merely official interest in the welfare of the men with whom he has to do. I would like, if possible, to have engraved before every man who is dealing with the soldiers the statement made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. If we can keep in mind what our boys have done for us, if we can keep in mind the things they have endured, I think we shall not carp or haggle at generous treatment, and more than generous treatment. I would like to put upon record what Lloyd George has said concerning what our boys have done. He was speaking of the boys of Britain, but surely what he said of them applies to our own boys who were in the thick of it, just as much as to any troops that fought in this great war. He said:

> To this hour I cannot think of the heroism of our soldiers without wonder—without wonder and reverence. There has never been in the history of mankind such a courage as theirs. Never! Think what it was. The least of us is capable of a flash of valour. In a sudden emergency the meanest of us might be brave. Once or twice in his life a coward might do noble things. But think what these men did. It was not for an hour, nor for a day, nor for a week, nor for a month, nor for a year that they did fine things.
> Year after year their life was a fine thing. It was not valour they displayed; it was not even heroism; it was something so new and terrible, so undreamed of, that man has created no word for it. I try to find some word to define it, to suggest it; I can't. The nearest word I can get is Endurance. They were in hell every day of their lives; and they endured. They were in peril of death, and worse than death, day after day, night after night; and they endured. They were exposed to all the nerve-shattering rage of artillery, artillery which rived the soil like an earthquake, which hurled the bodies of the dead into the air, and flung the bodies of the living into a deeper sepulchre; and they endured. They went out into the darkness to storm the trenches of the enemy, to destroy machine-gun nests, to break a line of fire the very thunders of which deafened the men; and they endured. But something more. That is what haunts me. They endured for all these years a manner of life utterly unnatural—utterly unnatural, and horrible beyond the expression of words.
>
> Our people are the cleanest in Europe; to keep their bodies clean is one of their joys, a part almost of their religion; and think how they lived! They lived in mud, and worse than mud; they lived in unutterable filth, breathing an air that choked the lungs with disgust, their young bodies attacked by vermin, their feet sinking into squalor, their hands touching at every turn things which one dare not speak about. And our people are the most domesticated in Europe; our climate has forced us into making indoor life the very heart of existence; and these young men were exiled from their homes, were forced to live almost entirely without the grace and charm and consolation of women, were obliged to herd together in great companies in a foreign country, and not only a foreign country, but a torn and blasted country from which the sulphurous flames of Satanism had scorched the leaf of the meanest weed.
> There they lived, always in the presence of death, always in the midst of horror, always on a rack of torture, a rack which stretched and tortured not the muscles of the body, but every nerve, and the whole mind, and the entire soul, and they endured. Yes, they endured, endured inexpressible agony with patience, even with humour, and at the end flinging themselves upon the enemy, they drove him headlong, they drove him out of his trenches, sent him flying, beat him, beat him to his knees. There has been nothing like this in the history of the world.

Mr. Speaker, that picture should be in the mind of every person who has to do with the men of our Canadian regiments. If it is kept in the minds of those commissioners in whose hands lie largely the destinies of our broken men I will be satisfied that they will get good treatment. But if we forget what these boys have done for us, if we forget all they suffered and endured for us, we will be unworthy of the sons who fought and died for us. I want to express my agreement with the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) in one of his opinions. He said that at least $1,000 a year pension was little enough for a disabled man and that to offer him anything less than $1,000 would be a disgrace. You cannot get a mechanic to work to-day for less than $25 a week, and yet we are offering to men who have gone to the war, who have lost their ability to earn their own living a pittance of $600 or $700 a year.

I am inclined to go farther than my friend from South Toronto and to say that

$1,000 is not sufficient. A man who has lost his physical strength and is unable to earn his livelihood should at least enjoy an income equal to that of a mechanic, and $1,000 is not equal to a mechanic's wages in this country at the present time. There is no likelihood that the mechanic's wages will ever be decreased. Twelve hundred dollars is as little as any man can live upon, and if he is a totally disabled man and has a family of four or five children, a less amount will subject him to the pangs of poverty in addition to the suffering entailed by the loss of his powers. Surely, if there is any gratitude in this country, if we realize what these men did for us, what they endured in doing it, if we realize what they saved us from, we can afford to be generous and not pare down the amount which is to be paid to them as compensation for their losses.

Another matter of importance is the War-times Election Act. I want to join with my colleague from South Toronto there again and to say that, in my judgment, it would be a calamity for this country to restore the franchise to men who have shown themselves to be alien enemies during the war. If Canada is to realize its possibilities, it must be governed by men who appreciate British institutions and ideals. If you fill your voters' lists with men who come from Central Europe, and who will still tell you that blood is thicker than water, you will find that very shortly political combinations will be made that will place the government of the country in the hands of those who would have handed Canada over to the German tyrant. We have been very patient in the province of Ontario. We have been neighbours to thousands of foreigners, some from neutral countries and many of them from enemy countries, who laughed in our faces when our boys had to go and when the way was opened for them to take their places in positions in civil life.

If ever there was danger in Bolshevism in Ontario that was the time. I am glad that time has passed. There is no danger of a Bolshevist uprising in Ontario, but if ever we had a condition which would have justified some kind of a protest or uprising it was the condition that existed under the Military Service Act in our own city when men, young, strong, of military age and capable of bearing arms, came before our military tribunals and, with a smirk on their faces, said: We are not naturalized. And because they were not naturalized they were left at home to reap the profiteering rewards that were incident to this great war. Now that the war is over, now that our men are coming back, are we going to stand for that in the industrial centres of Canada? Are we going to allow these men who laughed in our faces when we could not help ourselves, when our first duty was to carry on and win the war, to usurp the places that ought to be filled by the men who went overseas, men who left their positions in factories and workshops and wages of $5, $6 and $10 a day to go out for $1.10 a day and live under the conditions I have just described. Are we going to allow the men who were left at home to remain in their places? If it is Bolshevism to put these men out and to put our own men in, then I am a Bolshevist, because I submit that no decent manufacturer in Canada will keep in his place men of that type while there are soldiers seeking employment.

There is an awful lot of unrest in this country. It could not be otherwise. Could you expect anything different? We organized our whole system of industry upon the basis of war and we have to suddenly turn around and organize for peace.

There are factors entering into this situation that we never had to deal with before, and I hope we shall never have to deal with again, but under the circumstances, which are apparent to every intelligent man, unrest is absolutely unavoidable. It is for us who appreciate the situation, and it is equally for the British-born artisans and workingmen of Canada to see to it, and they will see to it, that these foreigners who advocate dangerous doctrines get no support from the intelligent English-speaking, and I hope French-speaking, people of the Dominion. We have a right, Mr. Speaker, to make an appeal to labour, and to say to the man that works: The governments and the municipalities of this country are going to do for you the very best that can be done. What we want from you is that your efforts, individually and collectively, shall be applied to increased production. If labour responds to that appeal there will be no danger of lower wages, no danger of permanent unrest, and this country will go on to a period of prosperity.

I have a few more remarks to make, and they pertain to a matter that was discussed in this House last session. At that time I said that the Civil Service Act was badly conceived, and in its operation would work out in filling the Service with the friends of officials. I hardly expected, Sir, that in ten short months my prediction would be so fully realized. I have not the gift of prophecy, but I think that any man examining the Bill when it was before us last year could realize that the result of its enactment that the Civil Service would be handed over to be filled by a group of officials with their friends. That is what has happened, and that is what is happening right along. My hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Sheard), in his speech the other day, approved of the appointments to the Toronto post office. I want to associate myself with him so far as the choice of postmaster is concerned; the appointment was made promptly with the best man available. But when it came to the position of deputy postmaster, what happened? The postmaster, who had worked with the present deputy for twenty-five years, sent the recommendation to Ottawa for his appointment. That appointment was held up in this city for months. It was held up until I instituted inquiries to ascertain the reason for the delay, when I was told that it was due to the Civil Service Commission endeavouring to ascertain whether the official recommended was the senior man. It was none of their business, Mr. Speaker, whether he was a senior man or not—he was the one best qualified for the position. As it happened he was the senior official, but the Commission refused to accept the recommendation of the postmaster, who knew all the men that were available for the position, and spent some time before consenting to make the appointment. Why? Because the next man in seniority was a friend of a friend of the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission.

The same thing happened in regard to filling a position in the Custom House at Toronto. A hardware appraiser was needed there, and the collector of the port forwarded three names from which to make a selection. But, Sir, these three names were taken by an official in this city, and cast into the wastepaper basket, and the Civil Service Commission appointed a man in the city of Victoria, B.C., to come to Toronto to take the position of hardware appraiser. The commission passed over three qualified men recommended by the collector of the port, who knew each man's capability. He was aware that the three men nominated by him were fit for the position, and that the Toronto public would be satisfied with the appointment of any one of the three. But a friend of the official was appointed over the heads of the three qualified men recommended by the collector who had known the men and their qualifications for years. Does that instance prove what I said last year, that the Service would be filled by the friends of the officials, or does it not? The official to whom I allude is a very prominent man in the Civil Service in the city, but what did he care for the recommendation of the collector of the port? He had a friend, and even though his friend may be a good man—

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): Were the members of Parliament, the men who are officially responsible for the riding, consulted in regard to that appointment?

Mr. HOCKEN: Not to my knowledge, but I have no grouch about the matter. I was not consulted, and I do not want to be consulted.

Sir SAM HUGHES: You should be though.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, I was not consulted, and I was not aware of the circumstances until the appointment was made. Here you have a city of half a million people yet a man qualified to act as hardware appraiser could not be chosen there but has to brought from three thousand miles away. If that does not prove that friendship and not fitness is operating in filling appointments to the Civil Service, I do not know where you can look for evidence of it. To my mind there could not be a more striking proof of my contention.

But, Sir, the same thing is happening in practically every quarter, and advertisements are only sent out as a matter of routine.—A man is picked for the job before the advertisement of the vacancy goes out. He is picked by somebody in this city, some official in the department. Why, Sir, I have an advertisement here calling for a man to take charge of the fruit inspection for the district of Western Ontario, under the Department of Agriculture, the salary to be $2,000 per annum. The candidate is required to have a thorough knowledge and experience of fruits and vegetables, from the standpoint of both growers and consumers, and to possess the confidence of the fruit trade generally. The man who had been acting as the local fruit inspector in that district had recommendations sent down to Ottawa by the score and he was qualified in every way for the position, but before the advertisement was issued a man was selected. What kind of a way is that to make appointments? Is that the method of appointment we were led to expect would be adopted when appointments were placed under the Civil Service Commission? As I say a man was selected for this position and he was appointed temporarily. He was kept on for six months, then his term was extended, and afterwards the advertisement was issued because the Act requires it. The man chosen had been an American citizen before the last election in Canada and could not vote in that election. True he was Canadian-born, but he went across the line and was naturalized there. He returned to Canada, and was not entitled, as I say, to vote at the last election, but he happened to become naturalized here since. Then he takes precedence of men who have lived here and have been serving this country, men who never ran away and were naturalized in a foreign country. This person is placed over qualified men because he is a friend of the officials. The understanding is that the late Mr. Johnson desired this man to be appointed. That is the way the Civil Service is operated.

An hon. MEMBER: Was he a returned soldier?

Mr. HOCKEN: He was not a returned soldier, and had never been near the scene of hostilities. He told a friend on the streets of Toronto that he had the job. "I have the position," he said, and that was sometime before the advertisement was published.

An hon. MEMBER: What was his profession?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not know what his profession was, but the facts are as I am stating. This man came over from the United States, and was immediately taken on the staff of the Food Board. He worked on that Board as long as there was a job for him, and when the Food Board was dissolved, another position had to be found for him. He had some friends in the service and he was elected to the position in question. His name is Mr. J. R. Hastings.

We have over the signature of Mr. William Foran, the chief guide of the Civil Service Commission, the statement that when the time limited for receiving applications has expired, the applications will be submitted to a competent board of judges, who will select a man who is in their opinion the best qualified for appointment. Is that the way, Mr. Speaker, we understood that this thing was to be worked out? Are these commissioners Civil Service Commissioners, or are they not? Have they power to appoint a committee which immediately becomes an unofficial Civil Service Commission without any responsibility? We were not told, and I do not think any person believed when this matter was before us last session, that the Civil Service Commission could hide behind a committee of three whom they might name to make appointments. The responsibility of these three men to the House and to the country is just as little as it could possibly be; yet an appointee to the important position of Chief Inspector of Fruit for Western Ontario is to be selected by a committee. In the natural order of things, Mr. Speaker, who would form that committee? Would they not likely be friends of an official who was interested and who was close to the Civil Service Commission? If I appoint three of my friends to decide whether or not I am fit for a job, I shall have a pretty good chance of getting that job, and so would anybody else under similar circumstances.

And this is the very principle that was adopted when a Superintendent of Penitentiaries was to be appointed. The Civil Service Commission had not the knowledge or the intelligence or the courage to make an appointment, and they selected three men to deal with it, at least one of whom was known to be hostile to the best qualified man in Canada for the position of Superintendent of Penitentiaries. What chance did he have? Among one hundred applicants his qualifications were the best; but this committee says: None of these candidates are quite satisfactory; we throw them all out and we will advertise afresh. You see how they double-cross the soldier; how they whipsawed a qualified man who is a returned soldier, who fought with the Canadian army at Courcelette, who was promoted on the field of battle to the rank of Brigadier-General and who had had twenty-six years of experience in the very work for which applications were being sought. No one need tell me that the people are going to stand for that kind of treatment. That man's application goes in and it is thrown aside; he has not a friend on the committee; there is no official anxious for his appointment. Is there any other conclusion, Mr. Speaker? I do not think that any other conclusion is possible.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. HOCKEN (continuing): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose, I was directing the attention of hon. members to the method by which the Civil Service Commission delegates its functions to committees. I do not think that was ever intended by the Act, and it appears to me to be a most reprehensible way of doing business. If my memory serves me aright, the Prime Minister last year promised or intimated in some way that it would probably be necessary to appoint provincial branches of assistance for the Commission. Our experience, as far as we have gone, proves the necessity of providing some kind of assistance for the Commission. When they have to appoint a special committee to decide so many questions on so many appointments, it is evident that they are not capable of performing the functions which the House expected them to perform when they were appointed. Perhaps that is not surprising when we face the fact that the chairman is a man who is not in very good health and that one of his fellow members is in the South and has been there for a considerable time owing to ill health. And then there is Mr. Larochelle. But if these men are unable to perform their duties, it is not proper that their duties should be delegated to some group of men who have no authority, no responsibility, and who may shelter themselves behind the Civil Service Commission. I hope the Government will take that into consideration and take some steps to see that if this Act is to remain in force, the men who fill these positions shall at least be responsible men.

I have another case that goes to prove just what I said before, namely, that there seems to be a man selected for every position before it is advertised. Let me read this advertisement which has been sent out by the Civil Service Commission. It says that they want:

> An Assistant to the Chief Clerk of Files and Records under the Soldiers' Settlement Board, at a salary of $1,600 per annum. Candidates must have five or six years' experience with files and records in a Government department, and must be thoroughly familiar with such a system.

That seems to be a most astonishing requirement. I am informed, and I believe, that a man can begin and complete his studies in medicine in five years; that a man can begin and complete his studies for the bar in four years; but to be an efficient and capable filing clerk, a man apparently requires five or six years' experience. Is there any intelligent man in this House who will say that that length of experience is requisite for that kind of a position? In the first place, it cuts out every returned soldier, because most, if not all of them, have been away for over four years. It absolutely eliminates that particular class of men to whom this country owes most; and yet this is a position that I venture to say at least a thousand capable young officers, who may be suffering partial disability, could fill. A man without a leg could fill that position. There are young officers coming back so broken that it will be impossible for them to take up their former avocations, and it is the business of this Government and of this country to see that they are offered opportunities of this kind. Let us assume a case. A young officer may come back who is fifty per cent disabled. Under the present scale he will get somewhere about $500 a year as a pension. Here is a position at $1,600 a year that he could fill, and it would give him, along with his pension, a decent livelihood; but such a man as that is cut out, he is prevented from even applying for such a job because it requires five or six years' experience to know how to file records.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the job, please?

Mr. HOCKEN: Assistant to the Chief Clerk of Files and Records. My deduction is, I think, reasonable, namely, that a man, who is now in the Government service has been picked out for that position. The job is practically filled before the advertisement is put into the newspaper. Is there any other possible conclusion than that? Not only officers, but privates by the thousands who will be on our pension list could fill a position of that kind, and it will take a good deal of argument, I think, to convince any intelligent member of this House that five or six years' experience is necessary before a man can file records properly. I venture to say there are young men coming back from the front who could learn that work in as many weeks, because many of those young men have had a liberal education; they have certainly had their powers of initiative and application developed by this war. If we have a Civil Service Commission that is going to cut men out of all opportunity of obtaining such positions what is the use of putting in the Act the statement that the returned soldier shall be given a preference? Is it not a fact that there is no place for the returned soldier except at the bottom? I presume they put a good many soldiers into such jobs as messengers or elevator men or some menial employment of that kind, but I stand here to protest against that sort of treatment for the returned soldier. Nothing is too good for him and, I care not how important the position is, if he has the qualifications to fill it, he should get it before anybody else. This Commission which was to produce such reforms, in the filling of positions in the Government service, is being used to pay debts of friendship or something of that kind by putting into jobs men who are not as well or not better qualified than the men who are coming back. But what I protest against with the greatest vehemence is that men are selected for these positions before any advertisement is issued, and I think my contention is borne out by what I have said this afternoon and what I say now.

This afternoon, I gave an instance of a man who was so certain of obtaining a position as Fruit Inspector that before the advertisement was printed he told a man in Toronto that he had it. Here is a case from Halifax. On February 3, Mr. McCoy telegraphed to Michael Dryden at St. John advising him to return to Halifax as he had been appointed Superintendent of one of the employment offices. The applications were to be in the hands of the Civil Service Commission on February 18, but Mr. Michael Dryden gets a telegram on February 3, that he had been appointed. What do you think about that, Sir? That is just in line with the case of Mr. Hastings and practically in line with the case I quoted in connection with the Toronto Customs House. They select a man; in many cases they put in the advertisement qualifications that nobody else can fill and in some cases qualifications that no man can fill, as in the case of a publicity agent, and then they appoint some man who is a friend of some high official in the Civil Service or a friend of some one in the Civil Service Commission. We are in danger of filling up the Service with not merely unqualified persons, but dishonest persons.

I am credibly informed that in this city of Ottawa there is a certain school. Nobody knows where this school is unless he is directed to it. It does not advertise; the name is not on the door, but candidates who are fortunate enough to be directed to this school are always able to pass with the highest marks. The system has been explained by one of the pupils, a young lady, in this way:

"I was there three weeks and all my time was taken up being drilled in three subjects." And, do you know, when she came to write her examination, the questions were confined to the very three subjects in which she had been drilled. Now, is that a coincidence? Or has the man in charge of the school powers of divination? Does he use a Ouija board, or is he a spiritualistic medium or a clairvoyant? I do not believe he is any of these things, but I do believe that by some method he knows the subjects that will be dealt with in the examination. How he gets that information I am not prepared to say tonight, but it must be evident that if the only three subjects on which his pupils are examined are the ones in which they have been drilled there must be a nigger in the woodpile somewhere. I have been informed that the method is this. Let me say, first of all, that this process of getting through the Civil Service examinations has passed its primary stage, and is now at the second stage. I do not think it has yet reached a state of perfection, but I have no doubt it will, if given time. The first arrangement was for the party trying the examination to work out the scheme in the room where the examination was being held. The candidate carried into the room a book similar to the book given out by the presiding examiner, containing the answers correctly written therein. This plan, however, has since been improved upon to meet all the emergencies that might arise, and this improved plan has for its final act, if necessary the substitution in the Examination Department of the Commission of papers having the same number as that given to the candidate by the examiners in the examination, but with the correct answers written by an expert. If an expert wrote the answers he must have had the examination papers before him. We are not left in any doubt as to that being possible. In fact, we can speak with the utmost certainty; we say that it is not only possible, but that it has taken place. There was a case only last week where a Mr. Joseph Peticlerc was caught red-handed with examination papers in his possession by the chairman of the Civil Service Commission. Where did he get them? If there are no leaks, how can the papers get to him? And if they can get to him, they can also get to the principal of this school. The whole thing can be worked out in a scientific manner and a regular tarffic set up in examination papers. According to Mr. Peticlerc's own statement he was to pay $310 for the papers, but he was not to pay that sum for two months. The reason for that is that all examination papers are kept by the Commission for two months and then destroyed. After that, there is no possibility of getting evidence against candidates, and it would therefore be safe for Mr. Peticlerc to pay the $310 when the two months had expired. Strange to say, although Mr. Peticlerc had been caught red-handed, when the facts were brought to the attention of the secretary of the Commission, Mr. Foran said,

"Now that is very singular, because recently a young lady passed an examination with the highest marks, and her success was so astounding that the nuns of the convent told me there must be something wrong, because she was their most backward pupil." These good sisters were amazed at the proficiency of their most backward pupil, and no wonder, when we know that some of their brightest pupils also wrote on the same examination. One would have thought that when this case was brought to the attention of the secretary of the Commission he would have done something more than make a cursory examination. But all that was done was to bring the young lady before the Commission, and as no proof could be secured the case was allowed to drop. Now that young lady is a next-door neighbour to the man who was caught with the examination papers in his possession, and if that case does not arouse suspicion I shall think this a very credulous House of Commons. When Mr. Peticlerc was caught, he said, "I got the papers from General Delivery at the Post Office." Now, if a candidate can get the examination papers in advance from General Delivery, why any person can pass the Civil Service examination. I have no doubt I could pass it myself under such conditions, at least, I would venture a small bet on it. But afterwards, Peticlerc tells a different story. He says, "I got these papers from Mr. Robert" who is also a clerk in the Service. When this story became current, newspaper reporters went to the Civil Service Commission, and whom do you think they saw? One would have thought that they would go to the chairman of the Commission, but I assume they knew that there was some person even more influential and more likely to have the information than the chairman. So they went to Mr. Foran, who made a long explanation, in which he said:

> We are doing all we can to get at the facts of the case, and I am satisfied that the leak is not here in the Commission. The only man who handles them is our confidential printer, and he keeps the papers in a vault, of which he alone has the key. When they are sent to other parts of Canada they are despatched in sealed boxes by express when the quantity is large, and by registered mail when the quantities are small.

One explanation offered by the secretary of the commission was that the examination papers must have been taken out of the registered mail. That is an accusation about which I think the postal authorities should have something to say. It should be established whether or not it is possible to tamper with the registered mail of this country. I do not know whether Mr. Foran still adheres to that view, but that was the view he expressed when the case was brought to his attention.

What did Mr. Foran do in the way of investigating? He had Mr. Robert arrested, and he was charged with handing the papers to Mr. Peticlerc. Let us assume the case goes into court. The evidence of Mr. Robert would probably be that he did not hand Peticlerc the papers, and the evidence of Peticlerc would probably be to the contrary. The chances of getting a conviction when conflicting evidence is given by two witnesses is practically nil, and the result would be that the man under arrest would be discharged and the case would be allowed to drop. That would be the end of it, except that the conspirators would go on to perfect their system, so that such a bungle would not occur again. But if the Commission had arrested the man who had the papers in his possession they could have secured a conviction against him, because he was caught red-handed. But they did not want that. I say here, Sir, they wanted to close the matter up without getting the facts. I submit that if that were not the case they would have arrested the man whom they knew to be implicated and from whom they were likely to get better evidence than from any others. I do not know what has been said to him, but I am sure the Commission will not get anywhere under the form of investigation they are holding now. I make that prediction with the same confidence as I made the prediction last year that it would work out as it has done.

Where are you going to place the responsibility for this? Surely it must be upon the secretary. He is the chief executive officer of the Commission and the custodian of the examination papers. If there are clerks under him who are handing out these papers for a consideration—they would hardly do it if there were no consideration—he is the man who must be held responsible. If in your own business, Mr. Speaker, you had a man upon whom you depended, a man whom you had placed in the chief position of responsibility with regard to a thing of this kind, would you go all down the line and pick out the office boy for dismissal? Or would you go to the man who was primarily responsible? In this case that man is the secretary of the Commission. As I said before, do you expect the people of Canada to stand for this method of filling the Civil Service? If you do, I say with entire confidence, that you will find yourself mistaken. We want the Civil Service reformed; but this is not reform, this is establishing a system under which the grossest corruption is practised to the detriment of fair-minded, honest young men and women who are desirous of serving the country in the Civil Service. We have heard the patronage system cursed up and down the country, and a good deal of opinion has been manufactured against it; but the patronage system at its worst was better than this. If you are going to continue this system, you are going to have not only an ineffective service but a service filled with people upon whom you cannot depend. For the man or woman who would take means such as these to secure an appointment is not fit for a place in the Civil Service.

I have just one suggestion to make in closing, and that is that the Civil Service Act should be amended at a vital point. I would have every position in the Outside Service filled upon the recommendation of the man who sits for the constituency in which the appointment is to be made. I do not want the annoyance of patronage, I would like to get rid of it all; but I would rather face my responsibility in this regard than see the present method continue to be employed in filling the Civil Service. There is no man so well qualified to speak as to the character and general attainments of one applying for a public place as the member for the constituency, who knows the applicant, knows his family and his antecedents. By consulting this representative you are on much safer and sounder ground than you are to-day. I have felt it my duty to bring these things to the attention of the House and of the Government. I have only touched the fringe of the subject. There is not a member of this House, I venture to say,—I should be surprised if there were one—who could not relate to you incidents of a similar character to those which I have related. I have one thing to say about the Commission, and that is they have shown remarkable impartiality. In Ontario they have appointed to Civil Service positions more men and women who supported the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the last election than those who supported the Union Government. Now that is a form of impartiality which I think is a little strained. I would give my hon. friends opposite the right to nominate in their several constituencies every man and woman appointed in the Outside Service; but I would give to the men on this side of the House the same privilege. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is a fair system and that it will work out better than the present one,—that there will be less inefficiency in the Service, and more satisfaction in the country. I do not want any man or woman appointed to the Civil Service of Canada who is not needed. That is where I begin. I do not want any man or woman appointed who is not qualified. When a recommendation is made by the member of the constituency—perhaps two, or three or four names sent in—let the Commission test the efficiency of the candidate in any way they think necessary. But let the appointment rest on the responsibility of the man representing the constituency and you will have a much better result than you will ever have under the law as now operated.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): My desire on this occasion, Mr. Speaker, is to make briefly a few observations on the important questions referred to in the Address. Before going into my subject let me refer to the death of my late honoured chief, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Sir Wilfrid Laurier during his long political career was animated by the one desire to promote the welfare of his country; and never was a great life more nobly spent in the accomplishment of such a great purpose. His career has been recognized as a most useful one, and the last tribute paid to his remains is but one mark of esteem and appreciation manifested by the whole Canadian people.

But, Sir, this country is mourning the loss abroad of other good citizens who have given up their lives within the last four years for the cause of liberty. Widows and orphans are turning their eyes every day towards Europe, towards the fields of Flanders and the soil of France. They have been left in this Dominion of ours with few resources, and without much assistance. At this time they look towards this capital of the Dominion where we are assembled as representatives of the people and they are asking us if what we have done thus far is all that we can do, and they pray that we should take a deep interest in their welfare. Our returned soldiers to-day are turning their eyes to the capital of Canada and they are asking us whether we have done our duty to them. We must put aside all personal interest and devote our energies to the task of doing justice to the men who have so distinguished themselves on the field of battle.

It is true that several of the different classes of people who compose the Dominion are able to take care of themselves. The capitalists met in Ottawa during the war as well as since the war. The farmers met in Ottawa last year and we know what kind of a reception they had from this Government. They were told by the Prime Minister and his colleagues to go back home and work on their farms. They went back home with the remembrance of what they had heard and seen in Ottawa and with the determination that in the near future they will be heard by those who will take the places of the Government who refused to listen to them. They will not only be heard at home but they will be heard in this house. The labour men came to Ottawa and met the Ministers of the Crown. The returned soldiers came to Ottawa and submitted their grievances to the Government but very little has been done for them. Commissions were appointed during the war and many also since the signing of the armistice in order to make provision for the returned soldiers. Let me make a suggestion to the Acting Prime Minister. It is this that every commission appointed by this Government during the last four years should be required to make a report to this House. The Acting Prime Minister should inquire into the details of these reports and we, the representatives of the people, should have these reports before us so that we would be in a position to discover what is lacking in the provision made by the Government for our returned soldiers.

There has been a slowing up of business since the armistice was signed when we should have had an entirely different condition in a country such as this. This is one of the richest countries in the whole world. The enemy was kept away from our firesides and everybody in this country is ready to help to build up the country's best interests. One delegation came to Ottawa to present the claims of their respective industries but the Government did not welcome them too well. But, prompt and wise measures must be taken by the Government if we are to restore our industries to the position which they occupied before the war. We should invite the capitalists and the workmen to meet at Ottawa. We will never succeed in re-establishing our industries until we get the capitalists and workmen to understand one another. Let me read a paragraph showing what has taken place lately in England:

> Committee of 60 members to probe the labour conditions. British way is to have 30 Capitalists and 30 Laborites thresh matter out and report.
> London, Feb. 28th.—After an all day session devoted to airing the various phases of labour unrest, the industrial conference called by the Government and in which Government Ministers, labour leaders and representatives of the big employment interests participated, adopted a resolution presented by Arthur Henderson, Laborite, for the appointment of a joint temporary committee to be composed of 30 Laborites and 30 Capitalists to make a thorough investigation into the question of hours, wages, general conditions of work; unemployment and its prevention and the best means for promoting the relations between capital and labour and report back to the conference which will reassemble on April 5th.

It is not necessary for me, Mr. Speaker, to repeat that we must bring about a better understanding between capital and labour before we can re-establish pre-war industrial conditions.

Very little has been said in reference to the great and noble work that was done by the young girls and women of Canada during the war. We are perhaps not sufficiently appreciative of the magnificent example of devotion and patriotism set by our young girls and women both at home and across the ocean. They have splendidly seconded the efforts of our gallant soldiers.

The mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne were very wise in their statements. I followed their remarks very closely and I noted that they preached unity in this country. I understand what unity means. Brought up in an English-speaking province and being a French Acadian by descent, I have learned from my big neighbour the meaning of toleration and good-will. The sun shines upon the head of every Canadian. This country is big enough for every one of us whether we speak one language or the oher. We are all true Canadians and we would like to remain so.

My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) stated in his address the other day that several millions of dollars will be spent on highways. The policy of building good roads in Canada has been well established and I believe that the money that will be spent on highways, as well as on railways, will contribute greatly to the development of the country.

In my own province within the last two years highways have been improved a great deal and there is no province in the whole Dominion where according to population so much money has been spent for this purpose. Our provincial Minister of Public Works and his colleagues have spent a great deal of money and I am glad to see that this Government has seen fit to trust the provincial government in each province with the money that will be devoted to the purpose of improving highways. I hope that this policy will produce the result that is expected of it.

We are asked to economize. We had to do so in order to meet our expenditures during the war. We are at the same time asked to build more railways in Canada. I do not agree with the policy of the Government. Let us stop for a while building railways in Canada. We have enough of them. Let us take care of the railways we have already on hand because we have more than we can afford to attend to. We have bought a number of branch lines and very few are left that are not controlled by the Government. I hope the Government will buy those that it has not already taken over, but, Sir, no more new lines of railway for the present.

On the question of the tariff, Mr. Speaker, let me say that this country will be unable to maintain the indispensable industry of farming if the tariff is not lowered in this country soon. Before long the farmers will have to sell their products at lower rates than they are selling them for now, and, though deriving a diminished revenue from their farms they will be called upon to pay high prices for their farm implements. They will be debarred, if the tariff is not modified, from selling their products in the highest markets, and compelled to pay the highest prices for their farming implements. Sir, this question will present itself again at a later date and therefore I shall not further discuss it at the present time.

Now let me deal with another point. During the last three or four years posters were conspicuously displayed—in public buildings, on the streets, and on the cars carrying our soldiers to the ports of embarkation for the front, not only the volunteers, but the conscripts, also—bearing this motto: "Your services are needed." Today the bodies of many of those soldiers are lying on the field of battle, but their widows and orphans in Canada need to be cared for. Let me express the hope that that care will be ungrudgingly bestowed, and in a manner worthy of those who gave up their lives for their country.

The restoration of our industries to the strong position they occupied two or three years ago is a task that must be undertaken. What are we going to do in that direction? I am not considering those industries which yielded immense fortunes to their owners out of the manufacture of war munitions and materials for war purposes. The gentlemen who accumulated millions of dollars in this country from these sources during the progress of the war, in my opinion, should be required to make a return to the Minister of Finance of the immense profits which they derived and contribute to the public chest some portion of those profits, whereby a long step might be made in the direction of re-establishing our national revenues. If we could receive only a percentage of the immense sums which have been earned during the war-time period, beyond all question we should be in a much better position to administer the affairs of Canada.

Mr. WALTER DAVY COWAN (Regina): Mr. Speaker, as an humble supporter of that party which the Canadian people by insistent demand brought into existence less than two years ago, permit me to express my extreme gratification not only at the many compliments which have been paid to the mover and seconder of the Address, but also the compliments paid by the leader of the Opposition and some of his supporters to the members of the Government and to other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The compliments paid to the mover and seconder of the Address were certainly deserved, and as a westerner I feel exceedingly pleased at the manner in which they presented their case. I have travelled a good many times east and west in this country in the years that are gone, and I have never yet discovered where the East stopped and the West began. I do not want ever to see that line marked out. At the same time we cannot help but feel that those who belong to Fort William and the West are realy westerners, and if the speeches delivered by the mover and seconder of the Address are to be taken as an example of what is to follow on the part of hon. gentlemen from the West, I think Eastern Canada will soon have to sit up and take notice. But apart altogether from such considerations, I was exceedingly pleased at the compliment paid by the leader of the Opposition to the members of the Government. The latch string that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) spoke of is pretty well worn out, and it is rather dangerous perhaps for me to refer to the sentiment, but I am sufficiently old to recall the early days in this country when the latch string was very commonly in use. I can recall quite well the class of people that were invited to make use of that latch string, but I never saw a highway tramp or a person of disrepute in the neighbourhood invited to lift the latch string and enter the domicile; it was always genial souls whose friendship was desired; those who were considered worthy and well thought of. Those were the only people who were ever invited to lift the latch string and walk in. Therefore I can quite understand the new leader of the Opposition, desirous as he is of building up a new political organization, entertaining the desire that hon. gentlemen from this side of the House should go over and help him. Indeed I fancy that when he looked around, with that instinct of Scotch canniness and prudence of which he is possessed, he surveyed the material on his own side, and he lost no time in issuing the invitation to this side, "Come over and come over quickly."

But, Sir, while gratified at the compliments bestowed by members of the Opposition on gentlemen on this side, I must confess to a feeling somewhat of resentment at the tone of the speech delivered by the member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy). That hon. gentleman rather attacked the Prime Minister of Canada—in fact, he tried to mix him up with Hottentots. I do not know just how the hon. gentleman did that but he told us that the Prime Minister had no business being where he was, and that he ought to return to Canada and attend to the business of the country. It was a matter of wonder to me how the hon. gentleman in question, standing as he did behind the seat of his former leader, could so soon forget the lessons taught by his old chieftain. Several years ago, probably ten or twelve, in a political campaign which we were fighting in Western Canada, when I was a bitter opponent of the Liberal party—for I have always been a very ardent Tory and I am not ashamed of the fact—I remember the assertion being made throughout the country that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had made Canada a nation, an assertion I found it exceedingly difficult to combat. A great many people believed the statement when it was made, and the great majority of them are still of that opinion. I quite agree with those who say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier did splendid work in assisting to make a nation of Canada, but, Sir, what was the good of the late lamented Liberal Chieftain helping to make a nation of this country if it is not to play its part as a nation? And, Sir, what is a nation's place? Is it to surround itself with a fence and have no truck, trade or treaty with the other nations of the world? Or are Canadians to take their place, as other peoples do, in discussing with the rest of the nations of the world great international problems, and assisting as far as they can in their solution? To me it seems that the proper place of the Prime Minister of Canada at the present time is where the other nations of the world are at work helping to solve the great problems that are pressing for settlement.

What have we in this country been doing for the last four years? We sent four hundred thousand troops to Europe to do their part in fighting for us and helping to settle international questions. That was assisting Canada to play its part as a nation, just as Sir Wilfrid Laurier wanted Canada to do, and be a nation in every sense of the word. After we have done this, after our troops have assisted in winning victory, are we to bring back our whole army from the front and leave the fruits of victory to be enjoyed by other nations? I have, of course, no right to speak for the Government because I do not know what it intends to do, but interpreting future action by past events, I should say the policy of the Government of this country should be, that wherever Canada has business to attend to, we are going to have men there to look after that business. Wherever the interests of Canada have to be watched, there we are going to have delegates or representatives, whatever you may choose to call them, to look after those interests. I say this to the Government: If they do not attend to business where it ought to be attended to, they need not expect any support from me. I want the business of the country to be done where it has to be done and when it has to be done, and I want it to be done promptly. If hon. gentlemen want these things done in some other way, they will have to get into power and do them. But of all the people on this earth to suggest that Sir Robert Borden should be called back to Canada, hon. gentlemen opposite are the very last. What has been their policy? As an old Tory I should not be at all afraid to leave the settlement of these questions in the hands of the Imperial authorities. But if we bring back our Prime Minister before his work over there is finished, where are we? What must happen? One of two things: Either our interests must be neglected, or we must look to the Imperial authorities to protect our interests. Hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly their late leader, have been very insistent in maintaining the principle of Canadian autonomy and the right of Canadians to look after their own affairs. That is exactly what we purpose doing—look after our own affairs just as soon as we can. We are quite capable of looking after the affairs of Canada, even though four or five members of our Cabinet are at present overseas attending to overseas affairs. For four long years 400,000 of our best men have been in Europe fighting our battles for us. Did we, while they were away, play the part of cowards, sit down and say: Well, Canada must drift, because our boys are away? Not at all. The very fact that Canada to-day is more prosperous than any other nation and that we have less industrial disturbance than is to be found anywhere else proves conclusively that the Canadians who were left behind knew their duty, were able to do their duty, and did it. While we should like to have these Cabinet ministers back —I for one would be pleased to know that their duty was done, and that they were back with us,—we must carry on the business of cur country while they are away—and I feel satisfied from past events that that will be properly done.

Why is it that Canada is to-day in such a prosperous condition? The speech of the member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy) contained a wealth of bitterness and was singularly free from anything in the shape of suggestion; it accomplished nothing. Bitterness is the last thing that we should have in Canada to-day. What has been the policy of the Government?

Has it been one of bitterness? I fancy not. To me it seems that they have invited co-operation throughout the whole of the Dominion, and, what is better, they have succeeded in getting the co-operation which they desire. I remember quite well the time when it was considered to be a proper thing for the provincial governments to be at the throat of the Federal Government and to be causing as much political unrest as they possibly could. Is there any dispute to-day between the provincial governments and the Federal Government? I have not heard of any in the far East, and I know that the people in our part of the country are exceedingly gratified because of the splendid co-operation which has been brought into existence. I do not know who is wholly responsible for it, but I feel satisfied that one of my old political opponents, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. J. A. Calder) is very largely responsible for the feeling of harmony and co-operation prevalent in Western Canada. He is an old Liberal, as he told you the other day, and I am an old Tory, as I tell you now; and we have fought many a battle in the past. It may have been necessary for him to tell you that he is a Liberal still; he does not have to tell me that, for I sadly know it by experience. But although he is a Liberal and I am a Tory, there is a common platform on which, on occasion—and the occasion exists to-day —we can unite, and that is, the common interests of our nation. As long as he and other members of this Government stand on that platform, I shall be glad to support them. We have, of course, in Western Canada a few—you could count them on the fingers of one hand—who are bitter and narrow partisans. Yet I speak for the great bulk of the people out there when I say that we desire harmony, co-operation and unity. I am satisfied that the policy of the Government is in that direction, and I am confident that they will continue it; at any rate, I urge them to continue the policy of co-operation which they have so well established.

To me it seems that four bodies ought to be invited to unite with us in this spirit of co-operation to decide what is best. First, the provincial governments, in highways, in housing problems or whatever problem it may be, and then, our Great War Veterans—their organization should be perfected and they should be asked to co-operate with us to the limit. When I say that their organization should be perfected, do not misunderstand me. This Government should not take any part in the organization of that body. Let the Veterans choose the organization they wish; let them create the machinery; let them elect their own officers; let them determine their own policy. But give them every encouragement and assistance in order that they may make it as perfect an organization as they can from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There are some, I know, who say that this is a dangerous organization and should not be encouraged. There is no question about the fact that if it is but half formed and if ill-managed it will be a menace to our country, but if it is—as it will be; we cannot stop it—perfectly organized from the Atlantic to the Pacific it can be of inestimable value to all the governments in the Dominion. I would urge the Government, therefore, to assist as much as they can in this respect in order that we may have the benefit of the advice and assistance of this organization at an early date.

I do not think that we should attempt to come to a final settlement of the problem of the returned soldier—if you call it a problem; some object to that term—until all the men shall have returned. I do not think it would be fair to those men who are yet overseas to make a settlement before they have had an opportunity of being consulted in regard to it. Let us continue to do the very best we can for the men who are here to-day, leaving the final settlement until the time when all these men shall have returned, and then this entire body, its organization perfected, will be able to assist our Government, and a satisfactory settlement of matters affecting their interests will be assured.

Then, I think we ought to ask our press to co-operate with us a little more than they have done. I know that during the four years of war they were subjected to the censorship, and some of them smarted under it—perhaps justifiably so; but it had to be. Now that that ban has been lifted, we ought to ask them to give us every possible assistance; the Government should take them fully into their confidence so that they will know what policy should be pursued. One thing which is being done by one of the committees through the press and which, I think, is of inestimable value to Canada, is the publishing of advertisements by the Repatriation Committee. Those advertisements are enlightening our people and our returned soldiers as nothing else ever has enlightened them. They are clear, concise, definite; our people know exactly what that Repatriation Committee is doing. In that respect I think that the Repatriation Committee differs very much from the Food Board, whose publicity was the worst conducted thing I ever saw in my life. It caused confusion in the minds of the people, we knew not where we were at all. But this body is doing it splendidly. The member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) the other day took up one of these advertisements and held the Government up to ridicule on account of them. He read a long list of gentlemen who had been appointed to certain positions, and he said: "Has patronage been abolished? Look at this: Tory, Tory, Tory, Unionist, Unionist, to whom patronage has been extended." But if that hon. gentleman had looked at this military or semi-military organization from the inside instead of through a long-distance telescope from the outside, he would have appreciated the position much better than he did.

What is patronage? To my mind it is something which contains a profit. Is there any profit to these medical men in the work which the hon. member told us about the other day? Why did the hon. member not tell us the amount that these men were getting? Instead of that, he simply held them up to ridicule. I know whereof I speak, because I belong to an allied profession and have been in a service where I could see what occurred. These medical men throughout the Dominion of Canada who have been and are to-day serving the Government are doing it for one-third the amount of money they could make if they devoted their time to civilian medical practice. As paymaster for the Army Dental Corps in my district, I have had exactly the same experience. I have issued cheques every two weeks to the men under my command; I had previously issued cheques every two weeks to the same men in my own office, and I know that both the medical and the dental profession in this Canada of ours have been and are to-day serving for one-third of what they could get in civilian practice anywhere in Canada. It is a common thing in western Canada, because of the dearth of medical assistance, for medical men to make from ten thousand to twenty thousand dollars a year, and I doubt if any one of them is making less than $5,000 now. Let the hon. gentleman procure a list of the salaries paid to these men and compare them with what they could obtain in civilian practice, and he will see that it is patriotism and not patronage that is moving them, and that he owes an apology to them.

I want to come now to one or two things of probably a more practical nature. The Government has submitted to us a housing scheme and asks us to accept it. The first question that comes to my mind is this—Is a housing scheme necessary? I say most unhesitatingly that something of that nature is necessary, because, go where we will, our people cannot find places in which to live. If that be the case now, what is going to happen in the future? I am told on fairly good authority—I do not know just whether it is right or not—that some fifty thousand of our men overseas have married while in Great Britain. That is a large number; it seems so large that it is almost incredible. If it be true there are so many, I must say that either the English girl is an exceedingly good-looking girl or there is a matrimonial agency of some kind in Great Britain. But be that as it may, a great many of these women are coming for the first time to Canada, strange people in a strange land. Most of them come from comfortable homes, and if they come to Canada and if the Canadian homes are not comfortable we are going to find a great deal of dissatisfaction in a very short time, because Canada is a cold country. There is no getting away from that. If our homes are comfortable there will be no trouble, and the question is to get good comfortable, modernized homes. Have we them? Unquestionably we have not, and we cannot at present accommodate these people. What, then, is to be done? While I support this scheme I sincerely hope this Government can bring sufficient pressure to bear upon the municipalities to induce them to give the entire amount of money for the housing of our returned soldiers. I think none other should be allowed to share in the benefits of it. I would also like to make this suggestion to the Government: In our part of the world a new condition of affairs altogether has come into existence. In the province of Saskatchewan particularly for years and years our farmers have raised nothing but grain, and grain requires no stabling. In the last three or four years they have changed their methods and have now gone into stock raising to an enormous extent. The progress which has been made in that direction in the last three or four years is surprising. What does that mean? It means that thousands of our farmers to-day require more commodious stabling or entirely new stables. If they started to do the building that they should do and want to do and will do, if conditions are satisfactory, we shall not require anything at all in the way of a housing scheme to assist in furnishing employment. In addition to that, many of the farmers are now, I am pleased to say, in a sufficiently prosperous condition to be able to afford to have better homes. What is their complaint? Their complaint is that the cost of lumber is prohibitive; that if they go to work to-day and build a house or a stable —and the same thing is true in the cities—and if in a year or two the cost of lumber and other building material goes down, they will lose a substantial amount of money upon their investment. Therefore they hesitate, they say: It will probably be better for us to wait until the price of these commodities comes down. Building hardware has, I understand, already fallen considerably in price. But I would suggest to the Government to do would be this, although my suggestion may seem radical to some of my Tory friends:—in view of the tremendous amount of building that can and will be done in that section of the country if conditions are made satisfactory, the duty should, temporarily at least, be taken off lumber so that some reduction may be made in the price of it. It will not, I fancy, be a sufficient reduction. In addition to that, therefore, because a reduction in the tariff will not accomplish everything, I would suggest to the Government that for this year they try to make some arrangement with the railway companies so as to get a lower freight rate on lumber from British Columbia into the Prairie Provinces. In that way they will assist the lumber industry in British Columbia and they will also assist in reducing unemployment in the Prairie Provinces. If they will do that, then the problem, apart from that of the returned soldier, will solve itself, and if we can induce other people to do things for us, there is no sense in our doing them at all. My idea would be to hold out this inducement so as to get the farmers and others to engage in that work.

I am not going to hesitate to discuss the question of a reduction of the tariff. Probably some hon. members may, but being an old Tory and a believer in protection, as I have always been, I have no hesitation in discussing this question.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That's the stuff.

Mr. COWAN: But my hon. friend and I may fall out when I utter my next sentence. The other day the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), speaking about the removal of the duty on tractors last year, tried to ridicule the action taken by the Government, and he said: If they take the duty off the tractor, why is it not right to take it off the plough? That is logical; that is the proper way to state your case; but the attitude of the western farmer—and I suppose it is the same in Ontario—is that every Government, Liberal as well as Conservative, has been protectionist and the former Liberal Government was just as protectionist as any other government in Canada. I may tell my hon. friends that to-day there are more protectionist Liberals in Eastern Canada than there are protectionist Tories in Western Canada. The attitude taken by the former Liberal Government is this: They removed the duty from the minor article and leave it or increase it on the major article, the result being that they give you one dollar and take away ten dollars. This Government took an entirely different attitude. They said: We will remove the duty from the major article; we will give you ten dollars, and it will cost you only one dollar. The western farmer says: Keep on at that rate and we shall be entirely satisfied with you. I would suggest to the Government that they ought, at as early a date as they possibly can, make a substantial reduction in the duty on the major article, namely, on agricultural implements.

Just a word or two in regard to the statement made by the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Michaud). He said he was opposed to the Government's building any more railways in Canada at the present time. I do not know what part of the country he lives in, but I can assure him that there is more profit to the Government in building branch lines, or laterals, as we term them, in Western Canada today than any other enterprise they can embark upon, and I was pleased at the statement made, I think, by the Acting Prime Minister, that the work done in Western Canada this year would be chiefly in building branch lines.

Let me draw attention to the conditions which prevail out there. In the south and southeastern parts of Saskatchewan there is one block containing if I remember correctly 220 townships without a single foot of railway in any one of them. There is a settlement there of good substantial farmers who are raising lots of grain, and in many cases they are from twenty to thirty or forty miles from a railway. The consequence is that they have to team their grain that distance to market. Some people say the farmers are profiteering with wheat at $2.20 a bushel. I would ask those who say that to team grain for thirty or forty miles and see how much profit there is left with wheat at $2.20. These farmers cannot get to market with one load and back again in less than three days. There is really no profit in it at all. The section I am speaking of lies along the Montana boundary line. Thousands of these farmers, in fact the great bulk of them, are Americans who have been brought up where marketing conditions are splendid, and naturally they do not appreciate the conditions on this side of the line. As a result, with a railway on the American side of the line built much nearer for the farmers to use, they send their grain to the American market, because you cannot have enough police out there to stop it; and the farmers buy the goods they need on the other side of the line, so that Canada loses the trade both ways. Such a condition seems to me to be entirely improper, and I think it should be remedied as soon as possible. Northeast from that there is a block of 190 townships, in which there is not a foot of railway, and people have been in there from ten to fifteen years, twenty and thirty and forty miles from a railway. Women have been in there ten or twelve years and have not seen a railway during all that time because they cannot leave the children and the stock, and the husband is the man who must go to the nearest town to transact the business. In the place I speak of there are good stores, and the storekeepers are using continuously two, three, and four-horse teams hauling their merchandise from twenty to thirty miles. The result is that they add the cost of that teaming to the price of the goods they sell, and you can quite understand that the price the farmer has to pay makes him feel he has a grievance.

What are the conditions along the north bank of the South Saskatchewan river? There is a railway on the south side but none on the north, and this winter I am informed that there are hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat still lying on the north side because the farmers cannot get it to market. There is a ferry there which runs in summer, but there was just enough ice there this winter to prevent it running, and not enough ice to allow farmers to haul across the river. Their grain is still lying on the north side as they are unable to market it. And then people wonder at the farmers being discontented and seeking a remedy at the hands of the Government.

I understand that this Government is going to build laterals to make connections with the main line, and I hope that when this is done they will see that the Canadian National railways get the biggest portion of the business because the Canadian Pacific has had forty years in which it could have entered that territory, and as it has not seen fit to do so, it should not receive very much consideration at our hands. Furthermore, in the building of these laterals, there should be no parallel roads within a few miles distance of each other. It should be compulsory for the roads to be built a certain distance apart, so that we shall not have a condition where a certain number of farmers will have two lines of railway two or three miles apart, and another lot of farmers will be condemned to live fifteen or thirty miles from a railway for some years to come.

I wish to compliment the Government upon the re-establishment of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. Some people might ask: Why do you require a large body of police in Western Canada? Are you going to use force and keep the people of Western Canada in subjugation? After forty or fifty years knowledge of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, it is my opinion that there is not a body of men on earth who can maintain peace with less exhibition of force than the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, they have a prestige which no other body of men on earth possesses. Let me illustrate. I was a defeated Tory candidate in a Regina constituency in 1911 and I was given that cursed patronage for the district. Thank God that has been done away with; I do not want any more of it; I have had enough. A deputation came to me from the village of Ceylon which lies near the Montana boundary, and asked if I could have a detachment of the mounted police sent to their town. I asked what they wanted a detachment of police for, and they told me that there were a number of outlaws and roughnecks coming across the Montana boundary and getting drunk in the village, and things had got so bad that the women had made up their minds to leave. I called up Commissioner Perry on the telephone. I knew him sufficiently well to know that when I laid a case before him and he said he would attend to it, it would be attended to, and I need not bother any more about it. So I told him the facts, as given to me, and he said he would look into it. About a month afterwards the head of this delegation came to my office in Regina and said "I have just come up here to thank you for cleaning up our place and sending the police down there." I asked if Commissioner Perry had sent a detachment down there, and he replied "No, he only sent one man." I asked if that one man did what was needed, and he said that the outlaws and roughnecks vanished on the night this one policeman with his red coat appeared on the scene. The sight of his red coat was enough, and that is the case all over the West. The prestige of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police is such that at the sight of the red coat lawlessness immediately stops and force is not required, because everybody knows that if force is necessary force is going to come, and come effectively; there is no nonsense about the Mounted Police. For that reason, because of the confidence which our people have in the force, I am very glad indeed that the Government has decided to re-establish it. As soon as this became known the people out West on all sides expressed their satisfaction.

I hope the Government this session will continue to carry out their promise of last session. I have reason to believe they have already started to solve the problem of the coal supply in southern Saskatchewan. Last session $200,000 was voted for the purpose of conducting experiments, and experiments have been made in connection with briquetting lignite, of which we have fifty-nine billion tons in southern Saskatchewan. I hope there will be no departmental sloth in this matter and that the Government will expedite the completion of the briquetting plant because our people are anxiously awaiting it. The people in southern Saskatchewan and southeastern Manitoba feel that they are being bled unmercifully by the coal barons, who have no right to rob us as they are doing. We feel it is the biggest robbery in western Canada to-day and we think the problem can be solved, and solved easily, and in a way that will tend to develop our own resources and furnish employment to a great number of our workmen. The coal is there by the billion tons, and all that is required is to put it, as it can be put, into a marketable, commercial shape, and there will be a ready market. I urge the Government to expedite that matter so that we may as quickly as possible have the benefit of this great natural resource.

The Government, I understand, intend to bring down a Bill to establish a Health Department. That was opposed by one of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I thing it was the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) who said—but I may be mistaken in attributing the remark to him and I do not want to accuse him of that of which he is not guilty—that we did not want more duplication in our public service and that this would be a duplication. I cannot see duplication in it, but I can see direction, and much better direction than we have now, in matters vitally affecting the interests of the Canadian people. There are several defects in the British North America Act, defects which must be overcome by co-operative action on the part of the representatives of the people. There is a defect with regard to the medical profession, with regard to the dental profession, with regard to the veterinary profession. Under the British North America Act these are made provincial, with provincial bounds. As a professional man, if I go into Manitoba to practice my profession, I become a criminal. And so throughout the Dominion we have these limitations in the handling of a problem affecting the happiness and welfare of all the people. Does not my hon. friend know that the importance of public health has made tremendous advance in public estimation of late? Take the case of the Red Cross. That whole world-wide organization is shortly to meet, I understand, in Geneva. And for what purpose? To arrange that their body may engage as a world wide organization in peace work, in other words in the education of the public in regard to health and its preservation. And in Canada we find our Red Cross meeting no longer ago than last Saturday, determining to petition Parliament to allow them to engage in the same work throughout the Dominion. What are we, as a nation going to do? Are we going to see these great organizations undertake this work voluntarily and give them no national assistance? To my way of thinking provincial bodies cannot all properly undertake this work. In the great province of Ontario where they have unbounded wealth, or in Quebec where they have so much, they may be able to establish laboratories and provide for the research boards to gain the necessary information to establish the best practice in matters of public health. But can we expect the same of the little province of Prince Edward Island? I say we cannot. Yet, are we to regard the health of a Prince Edward Islander as of less importance than that of a citizen of Ontario or of Saskatchewan? I strongly believe, therefore, that it is necessary for the Government to take this problem in hand on national lines, and, by means of a research council and a system of publicity and advice, to enable the provinces to combat epidemics and everything that would menace the public health. I think that the address of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) was a most admirable one, and I would like to repeat every word he said on this subject.

I will not detain the House any longer. I feel that up to the present this Government, as was said in the admirable speeches of the mover and seconder of the Address, has done exceedingly well. If it continues to do as it has done in meeting the demands of the people in a sensible energetic way, and in giving to our returned soldiers that which is coming to them, I, for one, am prepared to continue my support. Their treatment of the soldiers in regard to the war service gratuity, I think, was exceedingly commendable. I regard that war service gratuity as compensation in part,—a recognition of the fact that we owe these men something. As to whether or not that compensation is sufficient, I am not going to say—except, that I do not think it is. I think we shall have to do a good deal more than that. We shall have to bring a portion of our men who served in England, but who nevertheless gave good service, within the operation of the war service gratuity. We receive a great many demands from the several units of the Great War Veterans' Association who are probably not so completely organized as to be controlled as they might be. Some of them are making elaborate demands. The other day the Great War Veteran meeting in Calgary requested that the men who served in Canada only should get $1,000, those who had served in England, $1,500, and every one who had served in France, $2,000. We owe it to them, there is no question about that, if we put it on a basis of the difference between what they earned as soldiers and what they could have earned in Canada. But we must face this thing in a sensible way. Is it possible for us to give them this amount of money in cash? The aggregate amount would be about $750,000,000. I wish I could think there was that much money in Canada. But it may be possible for us to capitalize the amount and pay them, after the expiration of the war service gratuities, for their service, and without regard to rank, extending over a period of time, and in that way really effect a final settlement. But what I do think is that we should as soon as possible take these men into our confidence and let them know where we stand. Immediateness is their pressing demand. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been complaining because some of our Cabinet ministers are overseas. I would like to see one more cabinet minister leave his post here and go off upon another mission, right here in Canada. If there is unrest to-day among the great war veterans, it is due to the fact that the Canadian people have not been sufficiently candid and frank with them, and they do not quite understand the situation. I think that the best thing we could do to allay that unrest would be for one of our ministers to jump his job here and spend three months in meeting the Great War Veterans in their own halls. I do not mean that this minister should go to Halifax or to Calgary and stay there in his private car or in his hotel room and ask two or three men to meet him to talk the situation over. Not at all, the minister should go plump into the Veterans' own rooms. He will find them a sensible body of men, ready to discuss things in a sensible way. I have been at their meetings, and I have never heard men discuss affairs more intelligently or with less tendency to be extreme. But what they do want is to meet somebody in authority with whom they can talk. They will not be bothered with understrappers—no use sending such people, for these men will not listen to them. But if any member of this Cabinet will go out and meet these men as I have suggested he will perform an excellent service. A great deal of this unrest arises out of merely minor things. These veterans see a piece of land held by a speculator and they think they would like to get it, and want it right away. Or they see two or three townships held for quarantine purposes, and they do not see why they should not get that. If one of our ministers would go and discuss the matter with them as soon as possible, and would give them to understand that the people of Canada intend to do them absolute justice, we should find the unrest cease. I do not know that the suggestions I have made are of value to this House, but at least I have had the satisfaction of mentioning some of the things that I think ought to be dealt with.

Mr. C. A. FOURNIER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, hon. members have listened with admiration to the many eloquent addresses that have been delivered thus far. I am sorry to be the first to break the line. As you know, I have not the distinction of being a man of letters; neither have I the privilege of being a lawyer. I am a farmer and the humblest of all the hon. members here. If I cannot favour the House with an academic dissertation, I can assure hon. members that they will not be compelled to listen to any lengthy remarks.

As I look to the vacant chair, may I be permitted, in my own name, and in the name of the people of Bellechasse, whom I have the honour to represent, to express our sentiment of the deepest sorrow that the greatest of statesmen is no more. We loved the great Canadian because he believed in Canada and the Canadian people, because he had an abiding faith in the future destiny of Canada, because he had a high conception of what this great, new country should be and because he followed out that ideal with loyalty and truth. He spent his long life in teaching unity, the most powerful lever by which the rights of all classes are to be respected. He was the soul of personal honour and integrity. He wore manhood's great and noble crown. We trusted him because we were safe with him. We well nigh worshipped this great Canadian living, and true to him to the last, we will continue to honour and reverence him with an unchanging fidelity in death.

I desire to offer to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) my best wishes and I must say to him that I will be a Highlander in my loyalty to him and to Liberalism. I desire to join with the hon. members who have previously spoken in tendering my most cordial congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. While I am on this side of the House and while I may differ from them, I may say that the lofty views to which they have given expression and the manner in which they have presented them, assure them of the brightest parliamentary careers.

This Government has taught me, as it did the rest of the farmers, to be a little suspicious of what it does and says. I do not suppose it expects that I shall say that it has done exceedingly well. I shall not dwell upon the effort that Canada has made during this war. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) in a public meeting, made the statement that Canada was the only allied country that had maintained its divisions at the front to their full quota. Therefore, as far as men are concerned, Canada has done her duty. As far as money is concerned, our debt furnishes the answer.

I desire to say a word with regard to the failure of the Government to make adequate preparation for meeting after-the-war problems. The Government knew well that the war would end some day. The Government refused, practically speaking to confer with the representatives of the people to assemble Parliament. They preferred to deal with Orders in Council—all of them autocratic and arbitrary—and one of the greatest of them was, if I remember well, "work or fight." The fight is finished, Mr. Speaker, but the work is left. Orders in Council will not produce work where the positions do not exist. Therefore, we have unrest in this country due to the failure of the Government to prepare for the after-the-war problems. Far from the seat of hostilities the war has created problems and these problems must be solved.

It was the fashion at the outbreak of war to prophesy smooth things of these post bellum conditions. They, we are assured, differ materially from those before the war. I confess I am not convinced. In a war which, if prolonged, can end only in the ruin of the vanquished and the exhaustion of the victors, I find it difficult to believe that the havoc and destruction wrought in human life and property can be repaired except by much travail and privation. I find it hard to believe that the industry of this country can be lightly turned from the arts of war to the arts of peace, from forging swords to beating ploughshares, or its foreign trade restored to its former volume and channels without long and painful effort.

Nor am I comforted by those who assume that by the simple expedient of increasing the national debt we can transfer the burden from our own shoulders to those of posterity. I believe that to be a delusion.

It is present capital that is being destroyed, and it is the present generation that must repair the loss or go without the capital. A national debt, in so far as it is raised within the country, is a device for transferring money from private purses to the coffers of the state. The state becomes a competitor in the market for capital, and every increase in the rate of interest which it is obliged to offer tends to withdraw capital from more and more productive enterprises. It is inevitable that capital should become scarcer and dearer, and the surplus available diminished. The material welfare of Canada in the last four years has been maintained by the war. The same influence that has depopulated the country has also, by reason of higher prices for all kinds of agricultural produce, and by reason of the industry arising out of the manufacturing of war materials, supplied the means of financing the nation's affairs at home and abroad. But the real testing time for Canada is after the war, when the present abnormal conditions affecting values have passed away, and we are brought into full competition again with all nations in the markets of the world. Canada has not yet been wholly and severely tried economically. We were prosperous during a period of ten or twelve years before the war because of the commercial activity created by borrowed capital. Money has always been coming into Canada for purposes of development. These sources will not be open now, and we must rely on ourselves. This will be the testing time.

I come to the burning after-the-war problems of demobilization, reinstatement of our valiant sons into civil life, and reconstruction. The Acting Prime Minister said that demobilization was progressing rapidly. I think it is a little slow yet, and I see the statement in the press that the big ships that used to take our soldiers to England were withdrawn because the port at Halifax was not equipped to receive big ships.

Now, Sir, it seems to me that the same vessels which conveyed our soldiers overseas could very well convey them back to Halifax, or some other Canadian port. The circulation of any contrary statement without challenge in the press must be a great injury to this country, and most certainly to the port of Halifax.

Now as to the reinstatement of our soldiers into civil life I have a very warm spot in my heart for these brave men. Much has been said of their patriotism and their sacrifices. Nothing can be too good for them, and if it rests upon my vote, Mr. Speaker, they can have all they want. But I must say this it has come to a time where soldiers cannot live on compliments. You cannot stuff them any longer with compliments; it is a diet, Mr. Speaker, that neither you nor I would exist very long upon. The soldier needs something substantial to subsist on, and we are told that he is to be settled on a farm. Nobody quarrels with land settlement. In America it always was the basic scheme for absorbing soldiers in civil life; how good the scheme may be it depends how it is worked out. It is not my desire to make premature criticism but in my opinion, this plan, as far as outlined by the Government, bristles with potential troubles and dangers for the man who has no practical land experience, and especially who has been dazzled by promises that he would be lent money and established on a ranch, or its eastern equivalent, a farm. I see great dangers ahead, in connection with the scheme, and great care should be exercised to prevent individuals disaster and to the country as well. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the first thing to do is to get behind a returned man's mind and find out what, under his own power he elects to do, and not to tow him into anything that will mean a failure. Failures we must prevent, and we must assure the returned men success. There are just as many discontented men on farms to-day as in any other business, and the farmer is the poorest remunerated lot, and since the armistice, the farmers were the first to suffer losses. I am of the opinion that the enthusiasm displayed at the Hun line, will not be of the same nature in pulling out stumps. It is well advisable that the returned soldier, before he is allowed to drift to civil life and to root for himself, should be dealt with with the greatest care in order to assure his success. So much for the man. Now let me consider the land. As far as I am informed speculatively held land is to be bought by the provinces with money lent by the Dominion, the buying to be done by the province—in plain words the provincial government is to handle the provincial speculator. He is the bone of contention. I submit, Sir, that great care should be exercised in connection with this scheme. Speculators and land sharks have been praying the Lord for such an opportunity to be rid of their holdings. It is not my desire to say that the land the speculators own is all bad, but in our simple trust and innocence let us not go and pay for orchard land the price of mixed farming lands, otherwise the soldier settler and the country will get stung. I do not impute impropriety to any government or its member, but speculator's influence is strong, and they know it. In my humble estimation the Government has no right to delegate the buying of lands for returned soldiers to anybody; in so doing it is taking a chance which it has no business to take involving expenditure of Canada's money and the future of Canada's fighting men. Canada at this juncture has no money to fritter away on half-baked schemes, and it is well to look sharply to a possible land speculator's long deferred clean up. Let the Government examine into this just as quickly as the Minister of the Interior would make a Franchise Act.

This brings me to that subject which is contained in the Address. The War-time Elections Act was an Act born of desperation and it served the most reprehensible purposes. It disfranchised all those citizens who had been teased, coaxed and towed into this country under the solemn guarantees of rights and liberty. It has been a base deception and despicable persecution of foreign settlers, and a direct violation of the State's promise, and it should be wiped off the statute-book, for it is a shame that it should remain one minute longer. The new proposed franchise mentions the admission of women as members of Parliament. My views on the matter are well known and are recorded in last session's Hansard. I may say that I am not a "rapid change artist," and I see no reason to change my mind and principles. Nevertheless I say this, if the proposed new Franchise Act is to create another hand-picked electorate to rob another election, that, Sir, will demonstrate beyond controversy to my mind, one thing, and that is if the word "hypocrite" should be lost to the English tongue, the word "Unionist" would stand in its place.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that we shall be judged not by the prowess of our fighting men, but by the sacredness of our pledged words.

Now, as to reconstruction. My utterances on this subject, Mr. Speaker, may be a shock to my hon. friends the high priests of protection. Tariff reform is a part of reconstruction. The member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) who spoke this afternoon, said that when you speak of tariffs you are walking on sacred ground.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Holy ground.

Mr. FOURNIER: I may be a little bold, Mr. Speaker, but I am going to walk into the sanctuary of protection, and without putting on a pair of gloves I am going to deposit on the altar of protection something which represents this principle: I am an advocate of free farming implements. Farming is fundamentally the industry of Canada. The farmer must rely on machine power if he is to increase his production and to decrease the cost of living. The removal of the duty on farm implements must no longer be kept in abeyance. Shall we be able to reconstruct if we do not meet the requirements of the people? Shall we be able to reconstruct if we decrease the value of farm and other landed property? Shall we be able to reconstruct if we oppress the masses for the enrichment of a few?

The Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. J. A. Calder) in his remarks the other day told us that many people had left their moorings during the war. That is true, but the farmers and the labourers have not quite left their moorings. A few Liberals have left their political moorings, and, though still claiming to be Liberals, are to be found on the Treasury benches. They have ceased to defend the masses, and now they prefer to listen to the endearing tones of the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) and hear it stated that their former Liberal doctrines were unsound. They prefer to listen to him now and to accompany him in the excursions which he has been in the habit of conducting personally at every session, unfolding to hon. members the delightful panorama of flaming furnaces, belching smokestacks and the hum and whir of busy machinery, singing the sweet song of the millionaires and Tory prosperity. The member for Brantford has told the House that the newly-united separated brethren had been provided with a home. I think his words were these: "We have given them a home, and they are taking full advantage of it." I have no objection to that; I am glad that they are happy and contented. But I say this to them: Tariff reform shall not be kept in abeyance very much longer. The member for Brantford said that the separated brethren were united on tariff reform; that tariff reform would be carried out by a cheap compromise—a compromise, at any rate, and I know that it will be cheap. The separated brethren with their new friends may stand united, but the farmers are telling them this: "Hang together or hang separate, we do not care; but if you do not separate pretty quick you will all hang together."

It is not my purpose to champion the theories of any set of doctrinaires. A lot of theories are apt to become lost in the shuffle of argument. Will any one in this House deny that Canada is best suited to the production of foodstuffs? 10 p.m. Our vast areas of arable lands furnish the answer. Will any hon. gentleman deny that Canada under peace conditions failed to hold her own in manufacturing, save in a few special lines, with the rest of the world? The paucity of factory made goods exported before the war furnishes the answer. I am willing to pause for a crushing rejoinder from some hon. gentleman to this effect: What are we going to do with the factories which have represented the wealth of this country? We must protect our factories during the period of their infancy. In reply I ask this question: Some one has to pay the bill for protected industrialism; can that some one keep on paying the bill and at the same time pay the foreign obligations of the country? Tariff reform is a burning question, but it must be faced; and, in the words of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, when you have anything to do, do it. We want cheaper farming implements, and if the Government forgets the farmers, the farmers will not forget the Government.

It is argued by hon. gentlemen opposite —if you can call it an argument; it always comes from a Tory—that in this respect the Liberals, when they were in power, did not do anything. While it is always a pleasure to listen to a Tory, it is quite unusual to get an explanation from him in which he has not recourse to recrimination. My friends the Tories are admirable gentlemen, but I do not know what to admire most in them, their wealth of imagination or their shortness of memory. My friends the Tories seem to forget that their leader while in Opposition bitterly denounced the policy of handing over to the Prairie Provinces the control of their natural resources. But although their leader has been Prime Minister for over seven years, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan still remain the wards of the Dominion, not yet to be trusted with the management of their own property. Oh, the Tories—their memory is so short.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be cruel, but my friends the Tories seem to forget that their leader in 1911, in Opposition, bitterly denounced the Laurier naval policy, called it disloyal, made references to the tin-pot navy, and all sorts of things. Yet we are told that Sir Robert Borden in his many pilgrimages to the Imperial fount has committed the Canadian Government to a naval policy.

Again, my friends the Tories seem to forget that their leader when in Opposition bitterly denounced the trading and trucking with the Yankees. It was disloyal; we on this side of the House were branded as traitors. But now we find ourselves doing more trading and trucking with the Yankees, and we are doing it by Order in Council. Free wheat, that was an abomination formerly, is all right to-day.

Another argument, if you can call it an argument, put forward is that when the Liberals were in power, no sensible tariff reform ever took place. Recrimination is no argument.

I come now to another problem, namely, that of the high cost of living. Last session we listened to a report from Commissioner O'Connor on the cost of living. He denounced the speculator and the profiteer. I was surprised, a few weeks after I reached home, to find that another report on the cost of living had been sent to the Minister of Labour. I was amused. If that report is in any sense to be relied upon, the remarkable metamorphosis which has occurred in the cold storage business in Canada is an example of a regeneration unsurpassed by any convert even of the wonder working Billy Sunday. The cold storage plants which, not so many months ago, were disclosed by Commissioner O'Connor to be centres of profiteering and speculationn are now painted to a bewildered public as an angelic aggregation comparable only to the beauty of a social service organization for purely altruistic purposes.

It is a little strange that after the man who disclosed the abuses existent among our great food profiteers should have been dismissed, a report should be presented by his successors wholly at variance with his findings and giving something closely resembling a whitewash to the cold storage kings. Is it possible that since the sleuth O'Connor was pushed out of his sentry box, the cold storage operators all vowed to lead a new life and depart from the ways of evil? Or is it more possible that with the sleuth O'Connor gone, the profiteers have been able to present a plausible statement to a friendly and none too inquisitive successor who has been more anxious to hold his position than to ferret out truths unpalatable to those in high places? Which is the more probable? The absolutely altered tone of the report on the cost of living, the old devices of blaming all the high prices on the war, the deprecation of any suspicion of profiteering, all this marks such a radical departure from the reports of Commissioner O'Connor, dismissed for his zealous service, that one is inclined to wonder if the millenium has arrived over night, or whether Sir Joseph Flavelle is still the cock of the walk, and with him we could all sing the following song:

Is there a profiteer so dead
Who never to himself hath said;
"This is my own, my native land."
I've got this country by the hair
In what they eat and what they wear,
I'm glad the boys are over there
Upon a foreign strand;
And so I'll bleed this country white,
They're suckers all, and they will bite,
I'll help myself while others fight;
I'll own my native land.
The price of living so complex
It even master minds doth vex,
So soak the plebians in the nex
Before they understand.
And then when home the boys are come
I'll wave the flag and beat the drum,
And if they're good I'll give them some
Of this dear fertile land.

I do not care a rusty pin,
So long as I can save my skin,
Preserve my well-clad self.
Why should I care, alas, alack,
While shysters shyst and slackers slack,
If I can make more pelf?

Why should I care who pays the price
And gets their heads packed up in ice,
As long as I can smile?
I hardly care who wins the war,
As long as I can make some more
Additions to my pile.

I do not care a tinker's cuss
Who goes and cleanses up the muss,
And loses all most dear.
I shall be, if I riches get,
A knight, or p'r'aps a baronet,
Cos' I'm a profiteer.

And then when I am gone and dead,
Upon my tombstone shall be said:
"He helped himself while others bled,
For this his native land."

I would like to refer briefly to these wholesale visits of our Cabinet ministers overseas. There are two aspects from which these visits of Dominion politicians and ministers of the Crown to London may be viewed. The first is that they go to give advice on Imperial matters. This is the usual interpretation of Imperial Conferences, and in so far as this is their function they form a fitting superstructure to the organization of our splendid Empire. Well and good. I do not want to reproach Sir Robert Borden for being overseas at the present moment, but I do object to so many ministers going across when there was no need for it. But there is the second aspect. Our Dominion politicians may go to London for the purpose of giving advice and conclude simply by receiving it. Instead of exerting the influence of the Dominion upon Imperial matters, the influence of Downing street may be exerted upon the affairs of the Dominion. Unless our Canadian politicians are possessed of a hardy, indigenous national culture, those perennial peregrinations to the Imperial fount are likely to exert a centralizing effect upon their policies not entirely in keeping with the feelings of the people generally, who have not the advantage of yearly pilgrimages to the shrine at Westminster. A more steady policy can be developed only on Canadian soil.

My hon. friend, the Acting Prime Minister, has said that an indictment before an impartial tribunal of the guilty, the wholesale murderer in this war, would be a good lesson to prevent a future recurrence of war. I fully concur in that, and I hope that the breeze will carry the utterance of the Acting Prime Minister to the ear of Sir Robert Borden. If the Kaiser, the guilty, the wholesale murderer, cannot be punished, or if they do not punish him over there while the conference is going on or after it has concluded its labours, I would like to suggest that Sir Robert Borden and his honourable colleagues should get the Kaiser away from the castle in which he lives in such splendour, bring him to Canada and compel him to live on an average Canadian pension.

I know that the problems that confront us are very serious, but I do not like to hear the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) say that mistakes have been made and that more will be made. That reminds me of a story. In the antebellum days a well-known family physician in a southern city had for a coachman an old darkey who by reason of his long service with the doctor was considered by the community as an authority on matters pertaining to health. One day this darkey was accosted by a passer-by, who asked him "who has died in the next block?" The old darkey straightened up, gazed intently in the direction indicated and breaking into a broad smile replied "I do not know, sir, he is none of our killing." I understand, of course, that mistakes will occur, but we should try to avoid mistakes.

I cannot resume my seat without making an appeal to the Press of this country. As an aid to civilization and human fraternity, there is no greater force existing in the world than the Press, if its best powers are employed for the noblest purposes. The Press ought to resemble a mighty ship which with brave, true men at the helm moves over a straight course, clearing the waters of darkness and error and making direct for the highest shores of peace and promise. But it must be a ship indeed, grandly built, nobly manned, and steadily steered; not a crazy, water-logged vessel, creaking with the thud of every wave, or bobbing backwards and forwards uncertainly in a gale. The Press is a great educational force. In its hands is the social moulding of a people and the dignity of a nation as represented before other nations. There could hardly be a nobler work; there can never be a higher responsibility.

My hon. friend who seconded he Address said that an antagonism existed between the two great races in this country. For my part, I should like to see all antagonisms submerged. Providence has put us here side by side, and in that relation we must live whether we like it or not. We all have faults, but let us be men and say "The faults of our brothers we will write on the sand, and their virtues on the tablets of love and memory."

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, rising for the first time seriously to address this House, I ask the kind consideration which any man placed in this embarrassing position needs, and which I feel will be gladly accorded by every hon. member. I wish first of all to pay my humble respects to the late leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Though differing with him on many matters of principle, as most of us did on this side of the House, we recognized in him a great Canadian, and a great man. He had passed some forty or fifty years on the political stage of Canada, sometimes tasting the sweets of office and at other times the bitterness of defeat, but on every occasion he played the part of a great Canadian. We were proud of the way he represented us on the occasion of the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria, and at the coronation of King Edward VII. Now, in the fulness of time, he has passed to the peaceful bosom of eternity, honoured by peasant and king, and we mourn his loss. He was unique in the sense that he belonged to a departed school of statesmen. He was a scholar, gentleman, and statesman, and as the poet says, lived—

> . . . . to clutch the golden keys,
> To mould a mighty state's decrees,
> And shape the whisper of the throne.

I wish also to congratulate the hon. member who is at present leading the Opposition (Mr. D. D. McKenzie). Whether he occupies that position for a long or a short time, on him has been conferred a great honour, and I can only hope that so long as he leads his party in this House he will be worthy of the great leaders of the past and build for himself a monument worthy of the honour which has been conferred upon him.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, we must all be impressed with the changed conditions under which we meet this year. A year ago our great Russian ally had ceased to be a factor in the war. Rumania had been forced to make peace, and the Germans reinforced by two million men on the western front had broken our lines and were fast marching to the channel ports and the strategic positions commanding Paris. Those were indeed dark days for us, and we remember only too well the sadness with which we used to scan the bulletins and read that fateful message of Haig's to his men to stand and die facing the foe. Then, as if by Providence, in the early days of July things began to brighten. Peace loomed up on the horizon, and by November 11th had wrapped the whole world in his glory. To-day there are sitting in the beautiful palace of Versailles representatives of all the great nations of the world, in an endeavour to establish a tribunal which will forever do away with war.

I have also been impressed with the change in the attitude of hon. members of this House from a year ago. Then the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) rose from his seat and with all the eloquence which he possesses said to certain members on this side of the House, if not in so many words, at least in effect, "Depart from us ye workers of iniquity. We need you not." I leave it to the House if I am not right when I say that on that particular occasion it was the ambition of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) to bury Caesar, not to praise him.

Then, this session, we have had the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), arising in his place, and with all the prestige of his position, telling them that the banquet is prepared, that the light is in the window leading them to the fireside where they can all sing, "Home Sweet Home." Truly, that is a marvelous picture. I know not whether it was the intention of hon. members on that side of the House to seek some political leader to lead them out of the political wilderness, or whether the hon. member for Russell wished to exercise his ability in playing the part of Mark Antony and to make a funeral ovation over the hon. member for Durham. But I believe it will all be in vain. I believe the hon. members who heeded the Scriptural injunction, "Come ye out from among them," feel that their duty to their country is not yet performed and will not cease until that task is completed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say something in reference to a statement by the last speaker (Mr. Fournier), a statement which was made also by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy), and that is that the Premier of this country has no right to be sitting at the Peace Conference at Versailles. I want to say, Sir, as one who got pretty close to the Huns on several occasions on the battlefield, that I think I can speak for others when I say that we consider the place of the Prime Minister of this country to-day is in helping to settle the great questions in Europe, and we think he should stay there and attend to that duty until it is accomplished. I can readily understand that the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), who carries the terrible burden of the country's finance on his shoulders, may well wish to have the Premier back; but I think the affairs of this country can be carried on successfully during the Premier's absence. In this connection I must make a passing reference to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). He told us with great emphasis, that the War-time Elections Act was a blot upon the fair name of Canada. Well, I hope to have the privilege, before this session closes, of voting to keep the German and the Austrian from ever again having a voice in the selection of members of this Parliament. We did not go and fight them on the battlefield—60,000 boys of Canada did not lay down their lives on the sunny fields of France—that there might be handed back to the Austrians and Germans power to control the affairs of this country and I cannot see why in the name of reason there is anything unfair in depriving our alien enemies of any such power. I couple with this the hope that I may have the privilege of voting for the disfranchisement forever of all the slackers and deserters in this country. I believe that a man who refuses to fight for his country should have no part in the direction of its public affairs. I hope the Government will have the courage to bring in a Bill to disfranchise such people for the rest of their lives.

Now, I desire to refer for a moment or two to a few things spoken of by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell). I quite agree with him that this country is heavily in debt. Two billions is truly a colossal debt for a population of eight millions of people. I also agree with the statement made in this House that when a nation, as when an individual, is in debt, there are just two things to be done—produce more and save more. But I would like to draw attention to something which previous speakers seem to have passed by, and that is that we are in an entirely different position from any of the European countries. Take France, for example, every inch of her land is under cultivation, and her population overflows. The same is true of Great Britain, of Belgium and of other countries of Europe. But in Canada we have a country capable of supporting hundreds of millions, and up to the present time we have a population of only eight millions. But those eight millions of people last year had on deposit in the chartered banks and savings banks something like two billions of dollars, a sum about equal to our national debt. Last year we had field crops worth $1,367,000,000; live stock worth $2,000,000,000; fisheries, $52,000,000; dairy products, $93,000,000; minerals, $189,000,000. Yet our natural resources are almost untouched. We have roughly speaking one thousand four hundred million acres of land, of which practically one-third can be cultivated. But of this cultivable land less than twelve per cent is under cultivation at the present time. If twelve per cent of our arable land can produce wealth in the quantities I have just indicated, what may we not hope for the future, especially—and this is a very important part of it—when, as I strongly believe, we are to have population coming into this country by the million? The advertising that Canada has got in this war through the work of our army, and what the people over there think the extravagant way we paid them, is going to attract to our shores untold millions of people. I do not believe I am wrong in saying that within the next fifteen years the population of Canada will double. If that population is wisely directed towards the development of our natural resources, I think that Canada can get through this war and the liability connected with it better than any other nation on earth, and I believe we shall. What we must do is to produce more, not only from our soil, but in our factories, and in every industry of the country. We must find some place, if possible, to market our products. In this connection I think we should congratulate the Government on the step they have taken in giving to the countries of Europe a line of credit. I wish they could double or treble it, and thus bring to this country orders to keep every factory and machine shop going, and thus solve the labour problem to a very great extent.

Along with this we have—and it is a very big problem—the repatriation of the soldiers. Some people object to it being called a problem. I think it is one of the greatest problems we have. I would like to call the attention of the authorities to the fact that the problem is partly, and mainly, psychological. That remark is not original with me. It has been made by many, particularly by Col. Molloy whose reasoning is absolutely good and sound and who points out that until this country gets into the way of considering the problem in that light and of replacing what it has taken out of a man it cannot expect him to start off from where he was before. For three or four years we have trained a man for one thing and that was to destroy the enemy. We have never allowed him to think for himself. We told him when he should rise, when he should go to bed, how he should dress, what he should eat, and so on and for four years we have treated him in such a way as to have driven out of him practically every ounce of originality. Then he comes back and we immediately expect him to start off from where he was when we took him four years ago. To my mind, Sir, that is, in many cases, impossible. We have to restore the initiative in that boy, the desire for self-preservation, for creating a home, for creating an estate of his own and along that line I think there should be some serious thinking done.

I want to say a few words with regard to the treatment of the returned soldier. The first thing that I want to touch on is the question of pensions. We have a scale of pensions which, I was going to say, is disgraceful. Probably that is not too strong a word. You draft a boy into the army, or he volunteers for active service, he goes over to France, he comes back with both of his eyes blown out, or he has lost both limbs or perhaps both arms and legs and we have fifty or sixty of those cases in Canada. Is it creditable to the country that we give him $600 a year? That is not the price of one meal per day in a first class hotel in Canada. Canada cannot afford to treat her soldiers in that way. They have earned better, they should get better and I believe the people of Canada want them to get better. Then, too, there are many things connected with them that are not right. Canada has taken the stand that she will not stand by the examination of her own medical officers when soldiers enlisted. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that is grossly unfair and there are those to-day who have volunteered and given their services for Canada who are going around begging for a living. I have taken cases along that line before the Pension Board and they say that they can do nothing under the regulations. I only mention these things to bring them to the attention of the House, feeling that this is all that is required to have them remedied, but, I think they should be remedied.

Then, I must touch upon the matter of promotion and of appointment for returned soldiers. I agree with the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) that they deserve a little better than the average person. Are they getting it? I do not think they are. I have not been able yet to get the figures from the Civil Service Commission, but if what I have heard is true the soldier is not getting very much sympathy there. I would like to say too, Mr. Speaker, that as far as the Militia Department is concerned, I do not think the returned men are getting what they ought to get. I would like to see the different positions in the military centres of this country filled by returned men instead of those men who have never been out of Canada. I do not believe, excepting a few men who have special knowledge and fitness, that the men who have been performing these duties are as good or as capable as the men who could be got from amongst those who served in France. As far as the medical fraternity are concerned, it does appear to me that those who got nearest the Hun in France are kept farthest from places of emolument when they return to Canada. It would appear almost as though their service was like the blood on the lintel and door posts of the Israelites: a sign by which they were to be passed over.

I would like to draw the attention of my hon. friend to the condition of the tubercular patients who have returned to this country. I think it is a great mistake to put these patients in civilian institutions. These institutions have been overcrowded for years. We medical men could not get room for our own patients. Now, the military authorities come along, and, instead of looking after the military patients, as it is their duty to do, and as I believe they will have to do, they simply pass them on to the provincial authorities, pay them a certain price and ask them to look after them. I have visited many of these institutions from the Atlantic to the Pacific and I have not yet seen one of them where I considered these men were under the very best, or even fairly good, conditions. I think it is the duty absolutely of the Dominion Government to shoulder the responsibility of organizing proper institutions for taking care of those patients.

I would like to mention one or two things in the speech from the Throne that met with my very hearty approval. One is the announcement of the Government's policy with regard to public roads. I do not know of anything that will so add to the comfort and convenience of the people in the north country especially as the building of real good roads. It is hard to realize what life means to some of these men. They, are away in the back woods, they get a mail once a week, they have no neighbours, they are there week in and week out trying to hew homes out of the backwoods, and if we wish them to stay there and to build up this country we must make things pleasant and convenient for them. I do not know of anything that will do more in that direction than the building of good roads, giving them a good mail service and possibly a rural telephone. I wish that the Government could see its way clear to give twice the amount of money to the different provinces in order that these ends might be accomplished.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is legislation promised to create a Department of Public Health. I do not think the Government, late as it is, could have found a more appropriate time than the present in which to introduce that Bill. As I have already stated, I believe you are going to have mlilions of people coming to this country before long, and they will bring with them many of the diseases of Europe. Those people will have to be very carefully scrutinized and examined, and therein lies great work for the new Department of Public Health. Then there is our infant mortality to be considered. More children have died from preventable causes during the last four years than there were casualties resulting from the war. Again there is the great tubercular problem, the great white plague, that scourge that is passing through this country claiming its victims by the thousands and tens of thousands. These are problems worthy of the consideration of the best minds and the best men that can be got for that position. I agree with the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) that in order to get the best results, the best medical minds that can be got in Canada must be placed in charge. I hope the Government will do that; it is not a department that can be run by laymen and run successfully. Furthermore, we have our great international waterways. We know how they are contaminated from time to time, and the plagues of typhoid and other diseases that spring from polluted sources of water supply. These are problems, affecting the health of the citizens of Canada, which the Department of Public Health, administered by the very best minds available, must deal with.

With respect to the admission of women to this House, it does seem to me that if the enormous amount of labour and suffering our women have gone through during the last four years, has fitted them for anything, it has certainly fitted them for admission to the legislative halls of the country.

In conclusion, I cordially agree with what my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) has said with respect to the real heroes of the great war and I hope that the people of this country will ever keep those heroes in mind, because forgetfulness is so easy once a service has been rendered.

The man who has lived for three or four years in the trenches in France and Flanders is entitled to our best consideration. He has gone over the top time after time into the very mouth of hell, and sixty thousand of them have laid down their lives on those blood-soaked fields. This country should remember with all reverence those gallant boys who saved the honour of this country, and who helped to maintain intact the integrity of the British Empire, and the civilization of the world.

On motion of Mr. Pedlow the Debate was adjourned.

RESIGNATION OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table of the House copies of the correspondence relating to the resignation from office of the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment asked for by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) yesterday.

ADJOURNMENT OVER ASH WEDNESDAY.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That when this House adjourns on Tuesday the 4th day of March instant, it do stand adjourned until Thursday the 6th day of March instant, at Three o'clock p.m.

He said: The occasion for this motion is the fact that to-morrow will be Ash Wednesday.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion can only be passed by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH. ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session resumed from Monday, March 3rd.

Mr. ISAAC PEDLOW (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the discussion that is now before the House I might be permitted to pause for an instant to place on Hansard a verbal wreath from the electoral district of South Renfrew to the memory of our distinguished leader, the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose empty chair is a daily reminder to the members of the House that this great, this grand old veteran statesman, is with us no more. His Canadianism was in a class altogether by itself. It was of the purest type, moulded on the world's best standards of patriotism. He ranked while living with the world's greatest statesmen and now that he is no longer with us in the flesh we unconsciously associate his name with those most prominent in world history—with Macdonald in our own land, with Gladstone and Disraeli, as well as with a host of other great and shining lights who have graced——

Mr. Pedlow's speech was interrupted by the entry to the Chamber of Col. C. W. Peck, V.C., D.S.O., member for Skeena, B.C., who had just returned from active service. The House paid a tribute to Col. Peck's distinguished war record by hon. members rising in their places and cheering as he took his seat.

Mr. PEDLOW (resuming): As a parenthesis in the remarks that I was proceeding to make when the distinguished officer, the hon. member for Skeena, B.C., entered the Chamber, I pause to express our sense of the great honour that he has conferred not only on Canada but also on this House. He has, like many another soldier:

"Trod deadly road to deadly toil
Thickly strewn with dead,
Where noon-day sun and midnight oil
Light the soldiers' tread.

I am delighted to have the privilege of welcoming him to this House to-day, and I trust that his distinguished career will be continued, to the benefit of this country, for many years to come.

When the distinguished hon. member (Mr. Peck) entered the House, I was about to call attention to some of the qualities of our late lamented leader who has passed beyond that bourne from which no traveller returns, and I was associating his name with those of some of the men most prominent in the world's history—with Macdonald in our own land, with Gladstone, and Disraeli, as well as a host of other great and shining lights who have graced the brightest pages of history, in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe, as well as of Lincoln and others in the great nation to the south of us, all stars of the first magnitude, as Laurier undoubtedly was. The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier's wonderful and many outstanding graces endeared him to all who had the pleasure of coming into his presence. To know him intimately was to love and admire our old chief beyond my power to express in words. Alas! this striking, unique personality will grace these halls no more in the flesh, that great masterly intellect is stilled for all time to come, but the work he was permitted, during his fifty odd years of political activities to do for his own beloved country will live forever more as an everlasting monument to his life and memory:

Short days ago
He lived, felt dawn, saw sunsets glow,
Loved and was loved, but now he lies
In yonder fields.
To you from falling hands he threw
The Torch—be yours to hold it high.
If you break faith with him who died
He shall not sleep though roses grow
In yonder fields.

My next duty, Mr. Speaker, is to refer to the leader of our party who has been selected to occupy the place of our late lamented chief. While performing our duty to the memory of our late chief, we, on this side of the House at least, are not forgetful of our duty to his successor, and the loyalty we owe to him. It is with the very greatest of pleasure I assure him to-day publicly, as I have already assured him privately, of my loyalty in the very important position, both in the party and in the country, to which he has been elected, with so much unanimity by his fellow members in the House. His Majesty's loyal Opposition has at all times a very important part to play in the affairs of our nation—never greater than at the present moment, and the person filling the trying position of leader of the Opposition deserves, and will have, in order to induce good government, the united, wholehearted assistance of every one of his followers in this Parliament.

The entrance a moment ago to this deliberative assembly of the distinguished officer (Mr. Peck), to whom I made reference, reminds one forcibly of the fact that the war is over, and we thank God for it. After four long weary years of incessant appeal to the god of battles he has heard and answered our cry, and the prayer for peace is no longer heard in the land. In its place we have songs of praise out of grateful hearts, instead of the spirit of heaviness, for national salvation, and the greatest victory in freedom's cause ever fought and won, bringing in its train the dawn of a new era with such startling suddenness that we hardly knew how to give the thanks that we actually felt the occasion demanded of us. It is not with the slightest desire to dim the sword of Foch and his gallant fighting men, or to take from it the slightest touch of its power and glory, but I would say with him, and all the great commanders associated with him on both sea and land, in the words of Richelieu:

Let us own it; There is "one" above
Sways the harmonious mystery of the world
Even better than prime ministers.

Napoleon once claimed that the Lord was on the side of the cause with the greatest number of battalions, yet he, too, although almost a world conqueror, met his Waterloo. But with us the eternal question today is, how was the invader of Belgium held in check at Liège and in Northern France at Mons, and from Mons to the Marne, until the cause of right was able to secure the greater weight of arms and men? Was the ability to struggle on against tremendously overwhelming odds simply and solely based on the dogged human pluck of men, or was it not that there was something greater than mere material will power, something inspired? Was there not that something behind the arm speaking through the souls to the minds and muscles of the men? Kitchener's little army of contemptibles, in order to stem the tide and onrush of the German hordes, fought every inch of the way from Mons to the Marne and buried themselves in everlasting glory by the thousand in France and Flanders' fields. And so, Mr. Speaker, let us to-day with a new vision repeat once more, and with an added meaning, the prayer of Kipling's Recessional:

Lord God of Hosts be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget.

Now, Mr. Speaker, turning more particularly to the matter that is immediately before us on this occasion, the speech from the Throne, I have much pleasure, in common with all who have preceded me on both sides of the House, in tendering my hearty congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. The hon. member from Calgary East (Mr. Redman) certainly acquitted himself most excellently in the effort that he put forth on the occasion of his address, and as to the effort of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), nothing else was to be expected than the able and eloquent speech which we had the pleasure of listening to from him. I was rather interested though in some of the remarks of these hon. gentlemen, and I feel satisfied, notwithstanding the fact that they acquitted themselves well, that there was something held back, something that they did not care to lay before the House as coming from them, notwithstanding the fact that they claim to be the representatives of the returning men, and all honour to them because they themselves are returned men, but a fellow-feeling should make them wondrous kind. And for some unknown reason these hon. gentlemen seemed to hold back the information that they possessed, and failed to name the conditions that they wished to present to the House. For instance, the hon. member for Calgary East stated that the returned soldiers should not be hampered and irritated by red tape and unnecessary rules. That, Sir, indicated to my mind that the hon. gentleman from Calgary East knew more than he cared to put on the pages of Hansard. I have evidence here to prove that there is considerable red tape in connection with the return of our soldiers from overseas. There is much uneasiness in the minds of returned soldiers; they are not at all satisfied with their treatment on coming back to Canada, having in view the fact that before they left Canada for the front they were assured that nothing would be too good for them when they came back. We find that the conditions on some of the transports which brought soldiers home were not any too good. We find also that when the men return here they do not receive at the hands of the Government the consideration that they deserve. I have in mind one case of a young man who at the age of sixteen volunteered as of an older age to serve the British Empire in the South African war. Immediately on the outbreak of the war on August 4, 1914, that same boy, who was then an employee of the Government in Ottawa, volunteered for service overseas and spent three years of his life in the fighting line in France and Flanders. He returned to Canada and again took up a position in the department from which he had retired to go overseas. I would expect the member for Calgary East (Mr. Redman) and the member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) to champion the cause of such men, but they did not rise to the occasion, although I feel sure that they had the evidence at hand. After spending three years overseas on military service, this young man finds himself out-distanced and outclassed by men who failed to volunteer for service and who have been holding down positions in the Civil Service of Canada during the war. This returned soldier is in receipt of a salary of $1,500, while those who were his juniors when he left for overseas are receiving $1,900 and $2,000 for similar services. From the evidence which is placed in my hands from day to day, it seems to me that the returned soldier and the returning soldiers are not receiving at the hands of this Government the treatment that they were assured they would receive, not even the treatment that they deserve.

I have here a letter of another character. Two boys of the same family volunteered for military service immediately on the outbreak of war in 1914, and both are still overseas. In the early months of the fighting one of them was taken prisoner and was in captivity in Germany for over three years. When the armistice was signed he was a prisoner in Holland. On November 22 he was returned to England, and since that date he has been so moved about from pillar to post that he has become lost in the "machine" over there and we cannot find any trace of him. I will read a letter which he wrote to his mother, dated at London, February 3, in which he states:

I am back in London; it is not that I want to be here, but that I got frozen out of the camps. I have been down at Witley since December 5th, trying to get sent home, without any success. They sent us from Witley to Seaford last week, and then sent us out on pass again. I was never so fed up in my life. We were sleeping on the floor, with only our blankets, and only enough coal to last for about two hours and the wind whistled through the cracks in the floor, and we got up in the morning as stiff as old men. Besides this, they took my pay book two months ago on December 5th and I had not the price to buy a cigarette or a piece of soap.

On that date this young man was promised that he would be returned to Canada by Christmas, and they took his pay book from him. Here is one of the men who volunteered early in the fighting and for whom we said that nothing was too good, with not a cent of money in his pocket during a period of two months. The letter goes on:

But I managed to get $5 when I came up here, and it took me two days hanging around the pay office to do that. I was more miserable for those three weeks than I ever was in Germany, as we expected that kind of treatment over there but thought we were coming to something better. But it is army system over again.

I direct the attention of the House to the position that this young man finds himself in. After he had succeeded in prying loose this five dollar bill from the Pay Office in London, he spent most of it in cabling his mother to send him fifty dollars to keep him going until the Pay Office or the machine in which he seemed to have got lost would get unscrambled again.

I have another letter which I am induced to read by reason of some of the remarks made by the member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) last night. That hon. gentleman said that originality had gone from the soldiers. The following letter, which covers that point completely and proves conclusively that the very reverse is the case, is from a young man who has been in France for two years, and it is addressed to his mother. It reads, in part, as follows:

You will doubtless be wondering what I am thinking of doing on my return. It has given me a lot of thought, as it has all of us out here. This game has changed us—swung many of us so far out of the old channels that it will be impossible for many to return to former pursuits. By the time we return, most, if not all of the vacant places will be filled either by surplus men created by the closing of munitions factories, or by the latest crop of university and collegiate graduates, or by the returning conscripts. The employers of labour are essentially practical, and the resumption of normal business conditions cannot long hold vacancies in the name of patriotism. The war and the shouting is all over now, and so human nature turns to the urge of the dollar and the daily bread. It is well to recognize this fact. We, out here, are under no illusions about it and what it means to us. And it means this:

The average employer (I say the average employer—there are worthy exceptions), does not fancy the returned man in his business. He may not admit it openly, he will be profuse in his plaudits of our war achievements, but he is human and demands instant efficiency or his business suffers in this competitive age, and the fighting returned man is going to have a hard struggle adapting himself. We out here recognize all this and make allowance for it in all our calculations. In short, we realize that the big employers, in any line, do not want men who have been spoiled by the war.

All any of us want is an opportunity, nothing more. We are not looking for anything soft or easy, but we do demand an opportunity, with as few handicaps as possible. It makes us smile sort of wearily to see the erroneous impressions formed in certain quarters, officially and otherwise of the returned man. We read long articles of what is being done for us in the way of receptions and training for civil life. You would think that we were either shell-shocked imbeciles or wild children who must be petted, amused, and sort of tolerated for a while—and then put to light work in a kind of kindergarten. Instead, we are alert, keen-minded human beings, somewhat battered and tired, but who are all set to "pitch in" and carry on where we left off.

This is a sentiment which, he assures me, prevails not only with this individual, but with all his associates.

When we heard the news that we might have to stay here for nearly another three months, everybody was in an ugly mood.

Another bit of complaint we have against the Canadian Government is the fact that throughout the war, either consciously or unconsciously, they have attempted or permitted to have Canada's fighting manhood dyed in Imperial tints, and our colour will not blend. We are proud of our distinctive Canadianism, of our acknowledged fighting record, of our independent action; and we will not be robbed of this —our birthright. We belong to the British Empire, but we are Canadians, free and independent, and we never did relish close contact with an out-of-date English Imperialism, convention and old army discipline. We realized the necessity for united effort and discipline in the operations of the war, and so submitted to it voluntarily, but there was no military necessity for such petty orders as trying to make us in the artillery take down our maple leaf collar badges and substitute grenades of Imperial design. It was such small things as this, too numerous to enumerate, that riled us. We even had difficulty in getting Canadian buttons for our tunics and had to wear the ugly Imperial design. You can see how passionately Canadian we were. The Australians and New Zealanders had distinctive uniforms; the Canadians had not. All through the war our wounded and sick rarely reached Canadian hospitals where they could hear the sweet sound of real Canada—a sure tonic for homesickness. No, it was to English hospitals that we were usually sent.

Premier Hughes spoke out in meeting several times for Australia when he thought the Imperial authorities were mishandling Australian affairs or interfering too much and General Smuts equally championed South Africa; and the reason, we all think, for Sir Robert Borden's advertised popularity in England is that he appeared to be more English than Canadian. He never protested; tamely took all that was handed out, and was a good little boy. The same with Perley, who made a fine pink-tea artist in the Empire's drawing room. Meanwhile the Canadian Corps gave to Canada first place in action.

And so on. I shall not read to the House any further extracts from this most excellent letter, but I read these to show that it is absolutely necessary that the special representatives of the War Veterans' Association should get busy on the job and try to induce those who are responsible for this condition of affairs to improve their methods. Is it any wonder, as admitted by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) the other evening, that there is a great deal of unrest amongst the soldiers in the West and elsewhere. The Government was supposed to have land and everything else ready for them on their return, but we find, from the reports that are handed out to us from day to day, that these soldiers are still waiting for the land that has yet to be procured for them.

I come now to another important subject, one that has received a great deal of attention at the hands of speakers on both sides of this House. I refer to the matter of "the latch string," which has been referred to by almost every speaker so far, and the setting surrounding it and the invitation extended by our esteemed leader on this side of the House. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) objected to the invitation being offered and to the setting surrounding that invitation. The light was, in his estimation, not strong enough, but he lost sight of the fact that we on this side of the House are modest people, and the setting was quite proper for the occasion. No doubt the leader of the Opposition staged the setting to suit the tune and the song:

> In the gloaming, oh, my darling,
> When the lights are dim and low,
> Will you think of me and love me,
> As you did once long ago?

The tune has apparently not appealed so far to members opposite. Possibly it was the scale of music to which it was set that failed to please, but I am assured that on another occasion, when our leader produces the same song, he will bring the bagpipes along, and then the music will have a sweeter, more appealing sound, because, you know, the music even of bagpipes has "charms to soothe the savage breast."

In this chamber, the other evening, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) made a manly defence of his position, and I am still wondering how he can reconcile his position in this House with the position taken by him on that occasion. He claims that he is still a Liberal and he will not be driven out of the ranks of Liberalism. I do not know that any one on this side of the House has any desire to drive him out of the ranks of Liberalism. And how could we? He is not at the present time in the ranks of Liberalism. But, Sir,

> Maidens like moths are ever caught by glare,
> And Mammon wins its way where Seraphs might despair.

It is quite evident that there is, on the other side, something special to attract hon. members and to hold them there, notwithstanding their loud professions regarding Liberalism and Liberal principles. However,

> While the light hangs out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return.

There is in this House a former member of the Liberal party to whom a good deal of attention has been given during the debate. I refer to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). In a letter issued by him on October 18 last, and published in one of the newspapers in Halifax, on November 7 last, we find the hon. member making this statement, and with your permission, Sir, I will place this before the House also:—

> When the war and its immediate business are over, a new situation will arise. Then, I think, the Liberals may reasonably ask for a new deal, in which, in all probability a united party would place a Liberal Government in power at Ottawa.
> The record of the Conservative Party under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden remains, and a time will come when it can again be discussed with propriety. Some features of it have been too deeply impressed in the Liberal mind to be easily obliterated. The alliance with the Quebec Nationalists in 1910 and 1911, which was largely the foundation of the trouble that arose in that Province; the abandonment of the Laurier naval policy, which, if adhered to, would have given Canada war vessels to protect our ships and seamen from the depredations of German submarines; the election campaign of 1911; the fomenting of hostility to our neighbours, the people of the Great American Republic; the cry of "No truck or trade with the Yankees;" the misrepresentation and defeat of a fair Reciprocity agreement, a measure which was a realization of the desire of every Canadian Government, Liberal or Conservative, for more than half a century; the partisanship of the Conservative Government for three years of the war, culminating in the passing of the War-Times Election Act; these are things not likely to be forgotten—things which must yet be discussed before the bar of intelligent Canadian opinion, in the light of the abundant vindication of Liberal policy which time has brought.

Considering these views held by one of the leading statesmen in this House to-day, Hon. Mr. Fielding—I do not see how either he or other hon. members who left the Liberal party in the fall of 1917 can remain where they are any longer. While we are willing to concede the ability of these men to help the Union Government to carry on, we do not see any reason for their remaining where they are now when they can perform just as effective service with the assistance of their associates on this side of the House. We are working to-day under a new leader, and I should like just here to repeat that splendid congratulatory message telegraphed to him the other day:

> How sweet the name McKenzie sounds
> On every Liberal's ears.
> It soothes our sorrows, heals our wounds,
> And drives away our fears.

This Union Government is said to have been born in sin and shapen in iniquity, but my opinion is that it was born in a servile press propaganda and shapen in the city of Toronto for the express purpose of winning an election. As soon as it had succeeded in winning the election it proceeded to act as if it owned the country. It is now governing by Order in Council, and making partisan appointments, which latter were referred to at great length last night by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). The Government is guilty of extravagance without limit and there is chaos in every department of the service. Of this state of affairs the hon member for West Toronto is well aware. The Unionist party in my judgment is nothing more than "a thing of shreds and patches." We have the real Tories, we have Liberal-Conservatives, we have Unionist-Conservatives, and Unionist-Liberals; we have the Ginger Group, the Rogerites, the Rowellites, the Hughesites, and the followers of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark). But on this side of the House there is an absolutely united party. True, the membership is not so large as that of the party on the other side of the House, but good things are sometimes wrapped up in small parcels. We are here at all events, for better or worse, and there is a great work ahead to be done, and all too few men to do it. No time should be lost in "haggling" over trifles; there is no question of surrendering rights at all; it is simply a case of recognizing the task ahead and doing it with a will.

Let us try and eliminate the bitterness of party strife in this country. I think now is the time to bury the hatchet on many things that have torn the various sections of this country asunder in days gone by, and for that reason I notice with regret a resolution on the Order Paper by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) which I am afraid will not have a tendency towards creating peace and harmony in this country. Confederation was only made possible in Canada by a give-and-take policy, but the resolution to which I have alluded contains a proposition that is bound to keep up the old race and creed trouble in this country throughout the years to come. I think it is time for us to bury the hatchet on matters of this kind. We are labouring for to-day, not for yesterday, and we are labouring for to-day so that to-morrow will be a better day. The resolution of the hon. member for Frontenac—

Mr. A. L. DAVIDSON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is, I submit, not in order in discussing the subject matter of a motion which is on the Order Paper, and which will be discussed at a later stage of the session.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: I think my hon. friend has finished discussing that matter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The point of order is well taken. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) is certainly anticipating the discussion of a motion which is on the Order Paper. A passing reference might be allowed, but I trust he will refrain from discussing this matter further.

Mr. PEDLOW: I bow to your ruling, Sir, but at some later date I shall certainly discuss this matter.

I should now like to place before the House the Liberal platform as enunciated at the Liberal convention held in the city of Ottawa on January 14th last. It includes: Fair treatment for returned soldiers; generous care of the dependents of the fallen; restoration of the British preference to its pre-war status; reciprocity in food stuffs; gradual progress towards freer trade; the democratization of labour; the abolition of government by Order in Council; the repeal of the War-time Elections Act and support for a league of nations.

The achievements of the Liberal party when in power from 1896 to 1911 will be within the memory of some of the members of this House. They were briefly as follows:

> In 1897 there were 48 articles added to the free list and duties were reduced on 147—including farm implements.

In 1904 there were 14 more articles added to the free list and duties were reduced on 14 others.

In 1907 the duty on harvesters, mowers, reapers, and self-binders and binding attachments were reduced from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent.

To Great Britain there was given a preference by way of deduction from the general tariff amounting to 33⅓ per cent.

With the United States an agreement was effected in 1910 whereby the minimum tariff under the Payne-Aldrich Bill was applied to Canada while the maximum tariff under the same Bill was applied to other countries by the United States.

In 1911 the Liberal Government of the day negotiated a Reciprocal Tariff Agreement with the Government of the United States, under which when effective certain natural products were to be admitted free into both countries, and the duties on a limited number of other articles were to be reduced.

On submitting its policy to the people, the Liberal Government was defeated and was replaced by a Conservative-Nationalist Administration under Sir Robert Borden.

After the Borden Administration attained office, the duties were increased on certain specified articles, and a further general increase of 7½ per cent was placed in the Tariff on all commodities coming into Canada from outside Great Britain, and an increase of 5 per cent was placed on the goods coming in from Great Britain.

Besides opposing the said Tariff increases of 7½ per cent and 5 per cent respectively, the Liberal Opposition on different occasions since 1911, and more particularly on January 28th, 1914; on February 10th, 1914; on March 11th, 1914; on April 23rd, 1914; on April 28th, 1914; on March 16th, 1915, and on February 23rd, 1916, moved in the House of Commons for reductions in the tariff on specified articles, and on each of the occasions mentioned their motions were defeated by the majority supporting Sir Robert Borden.

On May 23rd, 1917, the Liberal Opposition in the House of Commons moved an omnibus resolution embodying practically all the proposals for tariff reduction previously made by them in Parliament and defeated as in the next preceding paragraph mentioned.

The said omnibus resolution of May 23rd, 1917, was also opposed and defeated by the Borden Administration.

The election manifesto issued in November, 1917 by Sir Wilfrid Laurier as the Leader of the Liberal Party, contained a declaration as Tariff Reform in these words:—

"In further mitigation of disadvantages to Agricultural production, I would immediately remove the duties on Agricultural Implements and other essentials, as demanded by the western farmers. A general well-considered reform of the Tariff for the purpose of helping Canadian production and relieving the Canadian consumer would also be an object of my administration."

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this Association, not only should the said Tariff increases of 7 1-2 p.c. and 5 p.c. be immediately repealed, but that there should also be an immediate downward revision of the Tariff in accordance with the above mentioned omnibus resolution moved by the Liberal Opposition in the House of Commons on May 23rd, 1917, in these terms:—

"1. That wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list.

"2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.

"3. That staple foods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and foods therefor be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

"4. That substantial reductions be made in the general Tariff on all articles imported into Canada, excepting luxuries.

That is the platform on which the Liberal party stands four square at the present time. I make mention of it in order to show that it is in line with the demand of the community in general and especially of that portion of the community but feebly represented in this House at the present time—I refer to the united farmers of this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having dealt at so great length with many questions, let me deal as briefly as possible with another matter, one with which I am more familiar, perhaps, than with any other subject in the list; I refer to the matter of finance. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), on Wednesday evening last, sang a most doleful dirge over our federal finances, or at least his words certainly were not such as to make one very enthusiastic over the situation. He led us through an intricate maze of figures on into the slough of despond and left us there, without indicating how we were to make our way out—he left us to work out our own salvation in fear and trembling. His main query on the subject of Dominion finance was not exactly that made famous at one time in Ontario provincial politics, "Where "did" the money come from?"—but his query was: "Where "will" the money come from?" The position in which he landed this House on this question was enough to make pessimists of us all. To use an illustration that has been made famous, the hon. gentleman considered the doughnut and saw nothing but the hole—not a glimpse did he catch of the ring around the hole. He told us, among other things, that the public debt of this country in 1914 was $336,000,000, whereas it is now about $2,000,000,000. Five years ago our interest charge on public debt was about $10,000,000 or $12,000,000, but now that charge has increased to the enormous sum of $110,000,000. This charge upon our resources, he tells us, will remain, if not forever, at least during our lifetime. Turning to the other side of the ledger he pointed out that our customs receipts would amount to $140,000,000; excise $25,000,000; income and business profits tax $30,000,000, a total of $195,000,000. I have already said that he estimated our interest charge at $110,000,000 then there would be pensions, which we must go on paying for the next fifty years, amounting to about $50,000,000 a year, besides which there will be large expenditures in connection with Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. In all, the uncontrollable expenditure he estimates at $185,000,000. This leaves a balance of only $10,000,000 to provide for all the other expenses in connection with the public service, the maintenance of the civil departments, the administration of railways, militia, navy and public works. These will entail an expenditure of $125,000,000. That is to say our annual expenditure will amount to $310,000,000 with a revenue of only $195,000,000 to place against it. In the Toronto Globe of 4 p.m. September 10, last, I find a statement, said to be given with the authority of the Minister of Finance. It showed that additional military expenditure would be required, as follows:

November 30, 1918, to March 31, 1919	$222,000,000
War outlay after March 31, 1919	300,000,000
Total	$522,000,000

This is in addition to the sums that are mentioned by the Minister of Public Works, and obviously will have to be met with borrowed money. A friend beside me suggests that this is an expenditure on public works. I take it to be for the return of soldiers from overseas and their maintenance in the meantime.

We still have to face the question of where the $125,000,000 a year is to come from to carry on the Government and maintain the public service. My answer is: from direct taxation. Professor O. D. Skelton of Queen's University has issued a bulletin on the subject of Canadian Federal Finance which gives some illuminating figures on the incidence of taxation in Canada, Great Britain, and the United States: In Canada, in the five-year period 1913-18, of a total revenue of $721,300,000, the amount collected through the income tax was only $37,000,000, leaving $684,300,000 to be paid by the consumer. That is to say the consumer paid 96 per cent of the revenue collected in this country, while only 4 per cent was collected from the income tax and property owners. In Great Britain during the same period, the total collections amounted to $1,771,000,000, of which $1,216,000,000 was collected from the income tax and property owners, while only $555,000,000 was collected from consumers—37·6 per cent from the consumers and 62·4 per cent from the income taxes and property owners. In the United States for the three years 1916-19, the total sum collected was $13,199,000,000, of which 44·8 per cent was collected from consumers and 55·2 per cent from income tax and property owners. Contrast the 4 per cent collected from income tax in Canada with the 62·4 per cent in Great Britain and 55·2 per cent in the United States. Actually less was collected from 45,000,000 people in England than was collected through the customs from 8,000,000 in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the fact that in Canada during 1916-17 there was practically nothing collected from income taxation, whereas in 1917-18, the last current year of which we have a record, eleven per cent only of the revenue was derived from income tax. In Great Britain we find a different story. In 1914-15 they collected 48 per cent of the entire revenue from the income tax, whereas during the last year 81 per cent was collected from the income tax. They collected all but 19 per cent of the expenditure of the Government from the income tax. In Canada the Government has considered it advisable to put the major portion of the burden on the consumer, while the capitalist, the wealthy man and the manufacturer goes practically scot-free. The hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) on Wednesday evening last informed us—and no doubt he knew whereof he spoke—that hundreds of firms had grown rich in Canada carrying on war business. My conclusion from that, and in view of the statistics to which I have called your attention, is that the Government has not been collecting the proportion of the revenue it should have collected from these industries and the capitalists. They have gone scot-free, while the poor labourer and the artisan have been paying the heavy end of the shot all the time.

True, Canada is not bankrupt, but if we continue spending at the rate of $125,000,000 a year more than our revenue, or, as stated, if we continue from year to year spending borrowed money that must be paid, principal and interest, some time, where is the money to come from? We have been told that the Government can reach a satisfactory conclusion on this question. Mr. Speaker, I am reminded forcibly in this connection of Wilkins Macawber's philosophy of economics, and in order that the House may appreciate its exact significance on this occasion I would ask to be permitted to read this extract from David Copperfield:

"My other piece of advice, Copperfield," said Macawber, "you know—Annual income, £20; annual expenditure, £19.0.6d.—result happiness; annual income, £20; annual expenditure, £20.0.6d; result misery. The blossom is blighted, the leaf is withered, the god of day goes down upon the dreary scene; in short, you are floored forever."

I would like to call the attention of the House to another feature of this subject and the methods that have obtained so far in connection with the revenue. In the past three years the surtax has taken $110,000,000 out of the pockets of the Canadian consumers. Yes, more, because the consumer has to pay ordinary profit on this part of the original cost of the merchandise, which would mean an additional 25 or 30 per cent, and which, added to the above, would amount to a total of about $137,500,000, equal to $17.20 per capita of the population of Canada. The surtax, I understand, is not wanted by the manufacturers because it increases the cost of their raw material. I read recently a statement by a manufacturer in which he said that the surtax was put on not because it was wanted by the manufacturers but in spite of them. If that is the case, I am at a loss to understand their position in regard to it at the present time. They are up in arms against any suggestion made either by the Government, or by the members on this side of the House, regarding any interference with that tax. If you will read the resolution passed by the Liberal Association on January 14 last you will see that it is the policy of the Liberal party to demand the immediate withdrawal of the surtax. We would also go further and reinstate the preferential clause as relating to imports from Great Britain. We would also favour a general revision of the tariff on many of the articles that are imported. For instance, my contention is that the tariff as it at present stands bears more heavily on the workmen and the consumer than it does on the wealthy people. Take the question of diamonds. They are imported free into this country. The only duty that has to be paid on them is the five per cent war tax. It is undoubtedly the privilege of wealthy people to wear silk. Silks are admitted into this country at a duty of 20 per cent, under the special French treaty tariff, whereas woollen goods coming from Great Britain pay a duty of 42½ per cent. There again we have a tax in favour of the wealthy as against the poorer people who have to buy the less expensive materials. The same criticism applies to furs and other articles of luxury.

I understand that the Grain Growers' Association are up in arms against the tariff situation and the manner in which tariffs are made in this country. Here is an article from the Grain Growers' Guide of February 19th, 1919. I received this extract only this morning from a friend in one of the western provinces, and it reads:

Inside Information.

Tariff-making at Ottawa, in the past, has been a secret proceeding. The manufacturers have consulted with the Government in advance and have arranged what the tariff will be, and the public has known nothing about it until the finance minister makes his budget speech. Apparently, the same process is being continued. In the Montreal Gazette, of January 30th, appears the announcement: "There will be no general revision of the Tariff at the next Session of Parliament, for the sufficient reason that time does not permit." In the Financial Post, of Toronto, January 18th, appears the following: "The Government is disposed to let the Tariff alone during the coming session. This is the advice of the Financial Post's, Ottawa representative, upon a matter which is to-day very important in the commercial and industrial situation." These announcements by two of the journalistic apostles of high protection are significant. They indicate that the protected manufacturers are on the job and are getting the Government properly licked into shape to do their bidding. However, both these journals admit that the war tax of seven-and-a-half per cent and five per cent may be withdrawn if, as the Post says "The low Tariff element which is dominated by Western Canada sentiment can make a strong enough case." This is the crux of the whole situation. The Tariff will come down only when the people in sufficient numbers rise up and demand it.

I fancy we will see another procession to the city of Ottawa like the one last spring when the farmers of Canada invaded the city as well as the precincts of this House. They demanded admission here but were refused.

One would think from the attention paid to the subject that the manufacturers were the only class in this country entitled to special consideration—the privileged class, if you please. But I would like to call your attention to another class hammering at the doors of this House, and, according to the facts I am about to quote, are fully justified in demanding to be heard, and heard right away—I refer to those engaged in agriculture. Taking up Sessional Paper No. 10, page 16, 1918, I find that exports of agricultural products of this country, consisting of grain, cereals, animals and their products, in the five-year period 1914-

18, amounted to $2,054,915,245, and that manufacturers' exports, which included war material, during the same five-year period, amounted to only $1,499,020,143, showing a difference in favour of agriculture of $555,-895,102, and proves conclusively that the agricultural community is the bone and sinew of this country, the foundation stone on which this country must build its future.

I find, also, from the Official Record—and, by the way, this is a paper that was established by Order in Council during the past year, I do not know for what purpose, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and myself hunted the library and reading room of this building a few days ago without succeeding in finding a copy of that publication; it was supposed to be established for the purpose of informing the public generally, but there was not a copy of it in either place mentioned, at least not then. However, I succeeded in obtaining a copy eventually, and from that publication I have taken these figures: Table I, National Wealth of Canada, $19,002,788,125. Of this total $5,216,117,000 is derived from agriculture, or over twenty-five per cent. I commend this fact to the notice of the House to establish further my contention that the agricultural section of our community is the foundation rock on which we must build the future progress of this country. We cannot, we must not, depend entirely on manufacturing concerns for our progress in the days to come, because these industries do not produce quite fifty per cent of as much of the wealth of the country as does the agricultural class. Now, the manufacturers claim that it is impossible to continue in business in this country and succeed, unless they are doing business behind the high tariff wall. If you continue building up this tariff wall you certainly will protect the manufacturers, but at the same time you shut off the Customs revenue of the country. But let me give a case in point to explain my contention that it is not absolutely necessary that the manufacturers should receive the attention and consideration they demand. I have in mind an institution organized in the town of Renfrew for the manufacture of cream separators in the year 1910. I might just state that cream separators were placed on the free list in 1897. There were none made in Canada prior to 1897. A few only were assembled prior to that year, but not made in this country. The concern I refer to was established in 1900, that is the Renfrew Machinery Company. It has gone on successfully doing business in this country until its output covered the market from end to end of this Dominion. Not only that, Sir, but it has entered the United States, and is competing successfully for business with the best producers of cream separators in the United States and in the markets of the world.

There is another matter I would like to call attention to while I am on this subject, and that is the duty levied on motor cars. A car costing $500 in the United States, costs, laid down here $712.50. A car costing $1,000 in the United States, costs laid down here $1,421. A car costing $1,500 in the United States, costs laid down here $2,137.50. To the Canadian price must be added a duty of thirty-five per cent, plus seven and a half per cent, or forty-two and a half per cent in all.

Now, Sir, if you want to make the farmers satisfied with their lot in life, if you want to improve their surroundings, one of the best methods would be to supply them with motor cars at the lowest possible price. If you continue to collect the revenue that I have referred to on these necessary items for their service and use then, Sir, you will delay and retard the farmers in their operations and make them dissatisfied with their surroundings and life. Now what are we to have in Canada? Are we to have stable industries based on sound business principles, or are we to continue the maintenance of industries that require twenty-five, thirty-five or forty-two and a half per cent protection for ever more? I claim, Sir, that the time has arrived—nay, it is past due—for a revision of the tariff, and that it is not in the best interest of Canada that this House should pass over that important subject to a more convenient season. The country is up in arms against delay in the matter.

The Minister of Immigration the other night seemed to think that there was no need for alarm, but he certainly has not been studying the press of the country, especially the western press, or he would have a different opinion. I have heard of alarming conditions obtaining in the Western Provinces, on this subject—tariff reform—and I have read of extensive demands being made on representatives from western constituencies who are members of the Union Government. Such being the case I think the Government should address itself to the subject of tariff revision at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Speaker I have transgressed at great length upon your patience, and the patience of the House, and I now beg to thank you for your kindness and your attention.

Lieut.-General Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) on succeeding to the seat so ably and so long occupied by the distinguished and worthy statesman who has recently departed this life. I think possibly the leader of the Opposition will be frank to admit that in years gone by your humble servant contributed a good deal towards placing him in the position he now occupies. We used to have great delight in the olden days in annoying the hon. member, getting him to display his talents and his ability, and in that way he became skilled and polished and has risen to the high position which he now holds. May we promise him that we will endeavour to test his temper occasionally again? I am sure that discharging the high and distinguished duties which he is now called upon to discharge, he will not hesitate to respond as he used to in the olden days.

The mover and seconder of the Address have distinguished themselves, not only on the floor of the House but elsewhere. The mover of the Address (Mr. Redman) in his dogged, determined, fearless manner, gives the key to why the Canadian position stood at St. Julien, and held back twenty times their number of the enemy. He was one of the lads who won distinction there. He got knocked to pieces a bit, but he is still able to hold his seat in Parliament and to do nearly as well as those of the community who did not go to the front. As for the eloquent seconder of the Address, (Mr. Manion) I was thinking while he was speaking, Sir, that if he had not kissed the blarney stone himself, he had either followed in the footsteps of some person who had, or had been conveniently near to some pretty girl who had performed this picturesque feat.

His address was a model in many ways. But, Sir, lest the public should think that these are the only two members of the House who have been to the front, permit me to draw your attention to the fact that a distinguished soldier has taken his seat in the House to-day. I refer to Colonel Cyrus W. Peck, the member for Skeena, who has won the Distinguished Service Order, with a bar, and also the Victoria Cross, the coveted highest honour of the Empire.

I wish to take the liberty of giving the names of other distinguished soldiers who occupy seats in this House, as well as of members of the House who are the fathers of distinguished soldiers. The list which I am about to furnish may not be complete, and I shall be very glad to receive any additions that may be offered. I trust that there will be no opposition to adding to the Hansard record any odd name that may be left out, because I think it is important that the complete list should go down on the record.

First, I find the name of a gallant lad who went over to the front, young Andrews, of Winnipeg. His father is Major George William Andrews, member for Winnipeg Centre. I remember one morning in the year 1915 when I was passing down the trenches—the German trenches were about 80 yards away—I came across the familiar face of my dear old friend Andrews. He had a rifle over his arm and he looked just as he used to look in the old days at the Dominion of Canada Rifle matches when he and thousands of other Canadian boys learned the art of rifle shooting, which they so aptly applied on the Germans when it came to facing them at the front. I asked Major Andrews what he was doing and he said that he was instructing snipers. As I passed, however, one fellow whispered to me saying that Andrews himself had "picked out" five that morning. I think that five a day was about Andrews' average. Father and son did their duty at the front fearlessly and well.

Then, there is the name of Colonel James Arthurs, of Parry Sound, whose son also was at the front. Colonel Arthurs went over in command of his battalion, reverted, went to the front and fought in the trenches in a subordinate position.

Colonel C. C. Ballantyne, a member of the Government, took his battalion over and did his duty fearlessly and well.

Another name on the list is that of Willis Keith Baldwin, member for Stanstead.

Robert James Ball, of Grey, has a son at the front.

I need not say that Hon. Dr. Beland spent long, weary months in prison in Germany. Two others, step-sons, fought in the Belgian service.

Dr. Matthew Robert Blake, of Winnipeg North, was in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, but he did not get across, through no fault of his; the fault was mine.

A case of distinguished service comes next. Mr. Ferris Bolton, member for Lisgar, had three sons who went overseas, and all three are to-day buried in Belgium.

Dr. Samuel Bonnell, of Kootenay, served at the front. Dr. John Wesley Brien, of South Essex, who had the distinguished honour of being born in the riding which I represent, also served faithfully and well at the front.

Our good friend, Mr. John Hampden Burnham, of West Peterborough, threw off his mufti, donned the uniform, took his training and went over to the front and did fearlessly and well his duty as he was called upon to do it.

Colonel Chabot was also in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, but owing to the condition of his health I did not feel that I should let him go to the front.

Dr. Michael Clark, of Red Deer, sent three sons to the front, one of whom fell. One of those boys went away with the Princess Pats. When I was over there in 1915, I called the regiment out and inspected it. I asked how many of the original regiment were there, and I found that there were only nineteen. Talking to the boys, one after the other, of the original Pats, I came across a lad by the name of Clark. I looked at him and knew in a moment that he came from Red Deer. I asked him what he was doing there, and he said that they were going over the top every time they were called on. The Officer Commanding told me that Clark was the only man in the entire battalion who had never missed once going over the top—a chip off the old block.

Hon. Frank Cochrane had two sons at the front, one of whom has since died.

Mr. William Foster Cockshutt of Brantford had three sons at the front. I think that two were wounded, and I believe that one of them was wounded twice.

Major Richard Clive Cooper, member for Vancouver South, served at the front and was severely wounded.

Mr. Walter Davy Cowan, of Regina, has a son at the front, and was himself on duty with the Canadian Expeditionary Force at Regina.

Major Hume Cronyn, of London, had two sons at the front.

Hon. Thomas Wilson Crothers had one son at the front.

Robert Cruise of Dauphin, has two sons at the front, one of whom, I believe, has fallen.

Colonel John A. Currie, member for North Simcoe, served at the front with distinction at the Battle of St. Julien. I want to point again that the name of Colonel John A. Currie has been confounded with that of another, and deeds have been attributed to him that have not been creditable and that have absolutely no connection whatever with Colonel John A. Currie.

Mr. Arthur L. Desaulniers, member for Champlain, has a son at the front.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Mr. James McCrie Douglas, of Strathcona, served with the Canadian Expeditionary Force. He did not get to the front, but that was not his fault.

Dr. J. W. Edwards, member for Frontenac, has a son at the front.

Hon. W. S. Fielding has one son, a very gallant young lad, who served at the front from the beginning.

Colonel Evan E. Fraser himself served at the front and also two of his sons.

Mr. Charles Arthur Gauvreau, member for Témiscouata, sent two sons to the front, one of whom is second in command of a torpedo boat destroyer and has been in active service for four years. He has been captured by a black-eyed Irish girl, but in spite of all drawbacks he has done magnificent service.

The daughter of Mr. Samuel Francis Glass is at the front as a nurse.

Mr. Robert Francis Green, of Kootenay, has a son at the front.

Mr. William A. Griesbach, member for Edmonton West, is a Brigadier-General. He went over in command of the 49th Battalion and has done splendid service. I regret that he is ill in hospital in England, and was not able to come home recently, as expected.

Hon. Hugh Guthrie has two sons at the front.

Mr. John Harold, member for Brant, has two sons at the front.

Mr. William B. R. Hepburn, familiarly known as "Barney," member for Prince Edward, went to the front and has been one of the surprises of the war. He has proved a most efficient officer, and has done his duty on every occasion to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. He has risen to the rank of Brigadier-General.

Mr. H. C. Hocken, of Toronto West, had one son at the front who fell at the battle of Cambrai.

In my own case, I traversed the entire front from the North sea to Verdun in 1915 and 1916, and the only son I have served at the front four years.

Mr. Norman Lang, member for Humboldt, commanded a battalion, went over, reverted, and did splendid service in the trenches.

Mr. Auguste Theophile Leger, member for Kent, N.B., has two sons at the front.

Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, had only one son. I remember the young lad very well when he was too young to go in for training. He got his training, however, went to the front, and fell. There is a little hardship in connection with his service. He was in an attack and his company came out with very few remaining. His officer commanding told him that he would receive the coveted Military Cross. The next day when the remnant of the battalion were coming out and he was informed that his tour of duty was ended, he persisted in going in again because they were short of officers, and he fell.

Mr. Samuel Charters, of Peel, sent two sons to the front.

Colonel H. B. Tremain served himself and sent one son to the front.

Mr. William Stewart Loggie, member for Northumberland, N.B., is not a very warlike gentleman, but I can say I was never more proud of any man than I was of Mr. Loggie in the beginning of the war. Two of his sons and others of his family were only too anxious to serve and did serve at the front.

Colonel Herbert J. Mackie, member for North Renfrew, was not at the front fighting, but he was in military service testing Russian shells, and he did yeoman service during the war. I am particularly interested in this young man, because I had the honour of having him as a comrade during the South African compaign, when we rode many hundreds of miles together across the veldt. If he has any bad habits, I claim the credit for them.

Mr. Francis M. McCrea, member for Sherbrooke, had, I understand, two sons at the front.

Major Peter McGibbon, member for Muskoka, who delighted the House last night with his address, went overseas and joined the Berkshire regiment in England. In one of the earlier engagements, when they were shot to pieces, there was only one officer of the battalion left, and the little, nervous chap that we saw last night, when he came to face the Germans, did not hesitate to take charge of the battalion, and they drove the Germans completely out of the trenches.

Mr. Alexander McGregor, member for Pictou, has one son at the front.

Mr. D. D. McKenzie, leader of the Opposition, has a son at the front.

General Hugh Havelock McLean, member for Royal, was most anxious to go to the front, offering his services in every capacity; but he had at the front two, if not three sons, besides a brother. One son is a member of the English House of Commons now, having fought through the war and been wounded, and he has proved himself a splendid soldier. Nothing is too good for that branch of the McLeans.

Colonel Harry Fulton McLeod, member for York-Sunbury, took his battalion over and did splendid service at the front.

Dr. Molloy, member for Provencher, lost a brother in battle.

Captain Robert J. Manion, member for Fort William and Rainy River, the gentleman who so ably seconded the Address, served with distinction at the front in both British and Canadian services, and has now returned none the worse for wear as we can all see. He has, if he remains in parliamentary life, a great future ahead of him.

I might mention that I am taking only this year's list. I might have referred to members of the last Parliament who fell for example, Colonel Harry Baker, whom all hon. members knew well and who distinguished himself in the affair at Zillibeke in June, 1916, where he fell with a great many of his men, having conducted himself as a true British soldier.

Mr. Joseph Edmond Marcile, member for Bagot, has two sons at the front.

Mr. J. A. Maharg et Moosejaw has a son at the front.

Thomas McNutt himself an old veteran, has a son at the front.

Major-General, the Hon. Sydney Mewburn, Minister of Militia, lost his son doing his duty gallantly and well at the front.

Mr. H. B. Morphy, member for North Perth, had two sons at the front, one of whom made the supreme sacrifice.

Mr. Donald Nicholson, member for Queens, P.E.I., has one son and two daughters, nurses, at the front.

Mr. George B. Nicholson, member for East Algoma, who delighted the House yesterday with his charming address, lost his only son at the front just a day or two before the fighting was over.

Mr. William Folger Nickle, member for Kingston, might be expected, if he had a boy, to have him at the front. You could bet your bottom sixpence that Billy Nickle's boy would be at the front, and he had two sons there. One was wounded three times and the other once.

Colonel Cyrus Wesley Peck, member for Skeena, the worthy member who has just taken his seat to-day, was twice wounded at the front. He has won the Victoria Cross and the Distinguished Service Order with bar.

Mr. Edward Guss Porter, member for West Hastings, lost his only son, his only child, at the front.

Mr. Charles Gavan Power, member for South Quebec, not only was at the front himself and fought well with a good Toronto regiment—and he has had a liking for Ontario boys ever since that—and he had two, if not three of his brothers also fighting.

Major Daniel Lee Redman, member for East Calgary, who moved the Address, fought and fell at the battle of St. Julien and has risen again.

Mr. John Flaws Reid, member for Mackenzie, had one son in the overseas service

Mr. James Alexander Robb, member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon, Chief Whip of the Opposition, had at the front a young lad whom he raised.

Dr. Charles Sheard, member for South Toronto, tops the list with four sons, three of them overseas and one in the home service, all in the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. William Smith, member for South Ontario, was too old to go to the front himself—he wanted to go, but I would not let him—but his son, a gallant young lad, did his duty fearlessly and well.

Mr. Edgar Keith Spinney, member for Yarmouth and Clare, has one son in the overseas service.

Mr. Frank Stacey, member for Westminster district, had at the front three sons, one of whom has made the supreme sacrifice.

Mr. Donald Sutherland, member for South Oxford, had one son at the front who served in France and Flanders, and later in Egypt and Mesopotamia. His son has done yeoman service in the Flying Corps as well as in the Engineers.

Mr. Alfred Thompson, member for the Yukon, served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force although he did not go overseas.

Mr. Levi Thomson, member for Qu'Appelle, has one son at the front.

Mr. Simon Fraser Tolmie, member for Victoria city, has one son in the flying corps but he unfortunately contracted serious illness and was unable to take part in the fighting.

Our good friend, Mr. O. Turgeon, member for Gloucester, N.B., has a son at the front.

Major Thomas Vien, member for Lotbinière, lost his brother who was killed at the front.

Major Thomas Wallace, member for West York, had three brothers at the front.

Dr. Howard Primrose Whidden, member for Brandon, had his son at the front doing his duty fearlessly and well.

I think I drew attention to the son of the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, did I not?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: This is the list as far as I have been able to get it, and I think it is proper that it should be placed on record. If there are any omissions, they are unintentional, and I am sure the House will permit me, if necessary, to amend it at any future time. I am very pleased to correct some omissions already.

Mr. E. W. Nesbitt, member for North Oxford, has his son at the front.

I am also told that Mr. W. D. Euler, member for North Waterloo, has a son at the front. I do not know whether Mr. Euler has German blood in his veins, but I am prepared to pay the very highest tribute to Canadians of German origin who went over with the first contingent and who fought as fearlessly and well as any of our men for Canada.

To these let me add the name of Col. Sam. Sharpe, who commanded the 116th Battalion at the front and rendered gallant service.

I had the honour, the same as many others, of being elected a member of this Parliament at the last general election. Long before Union Government was ever heard of, long before there was an election, I was pledged to do my duty as in me lay for the upbuilding of the cause of human liberty and the over-throwing of autocracy in Germany, Austria or any other part of the world where it might raise its hydra head.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman has overlooked the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin).

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am dealing only with the Commons. I would be delighted to add his name. We have from the Cabinet the distinguished names of General Mewburn and Mr. Ballantyne, both of whom I regard as my boys. I am sorry, however, that the Cabinet is not better represented, however few of the ministers have sons of military age to send.

I was elected a member of Parliament to help win the war, and I pledged myself on the platform as well as in this House to support this Government or any other Government in power, in every effort that might be made towards the successful prosecution of the war. In the session previous to the last general election, the Military Service Act was passed. I did not publicly criticise the Act, but I did speak to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and other members of the Cabinet about it. I pointed out the rocks that were ahead of them. That man certainly had very little political sagacity who did not see in the Military Service Act a first-class opportunity for every man who wanted to stay at home to do so. That is what I pointed out to the Minister of Justice at the time, and I have never seen any reason to change my opinion of that Act since. I repeat, I was elected to support every measure for winning the war. I shall not here discuss whether the Government since the election has taken the action it should have taken towards winning the war, but I shall simply point out that I am not satisfied that they have done their best.

There are various forms of government, but to my mind there is only one form that should be encouraged in any country, and that is responsible government—government by the people, through the people, for the people. Under this form of government the leader of the party winning the election is chosen Prime Minister and selects his Cabinet, not from those pledged to oppose him, but from among those who travel along the same political lines as himself, and he stands or falls by his responsibility. In 1878 we had a Union Government in this country. It was not a machine-made affair, but went to the polls as a Union Government. The platforms of the opposing parties were laid before the people, and the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald was returned to power with a following thirty-five per cent of which was composed of former Liberals. That was a constitutional coalition. It was not a coalition of labels, but a coalition of ideas. In 1896 the Liberal party was returned to power by a large majority and twenty-five per cent of its following was composed of men from the Tory party, a great many of them being Orange-Tories who had been humbugged on the Manitoba school question. But whatever may have been the cause of that union, it was a legitimate coalition on constitutional lines. Then, in 1911, it is claimed there was a coalition between the Liberal-Conservative party and certain gentlemen in the province of Quebec who did not label themselves Liberal-Conservatives, to defeat the Liberal party in that election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am narrating history, not talking politics, although I am ready at any time to show that almost any coalition would be justified in uniting to defeat the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. The Nationalists in the election of 1911 simply took the speeches delivered by the old-time Liberals in days gone by, adapted them to suit the times, and used them against the Liberals.

Mr. MURPHY: Plus the money for circulating Le Devoir.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understood that was my hon. friend's organ.

Mr. TOBIN: The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) will tell you about that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I shall deal with the coalition of 1917 at another time. There is no doubt whatever that in 1917 the great bulk of the Liberal party in many of the provinces would have cast in their lot with the great Liberal-Conservative party coalition or no coalition. I believe that every one of the former Liberal members of this House who have joined us on this side would have supported in any case the great Liberal-Conservative party at the last election. There would have been a natural coalition, instead of this patent machine-made affairs of Sir Joseph Flavelle, of the city of Toronto.

I have observed all the Orders in Council passed by the Government under the War Measures Act and I have yet to see any necessity why the Government should have clothed themselves with these powers, except to guard themselves from the members of the House of Commons and from the people at large. I have yet to see any solitary Order in Council passed under the War Measures Act which has advanced the interests of the country in the slightest degree; I have said that before, and I now go further. I have yet to see where the Food Control Board was of any use to Canada, instead of being, as it was, a confounded nuisance to all the country. I have yet to see what good the Fuel Controller has done, except to add from two to five dollars per ton to the cost of coal. I have yet to see the necessity for any of these repressive commissions that have been set up under the War Measures Act. They were not necessary in the administration of the affairs of this country and have done no good. I have not yet seen any justification for departing from the usual form of responsible government in war time. Any argument that can be used in support of all this repressive work in war time, to my mind, can be used with double force in peace time, and if we are going to have autocracy in time of war, let us have it in time of peace, too, and send for the Kaiser to run the country. I challenge any man in the Dominion of Canada to show me the necessity for one solitary act done under the War Measures Act.

There are a great many people who go around saying "I am not a politician. I take no stock in politics," and so on. I have never seen such a man who did not require careful watching. I can well remember the time when Sir Joseph Flavelle, the owner of this Government, delighted in pointing out that men in politics were quite unworthy of recognition, that one engaged in politics was to be loathed, or at least avoided, side-stepped. I have been a careful student of human nature all my life, and I say that I have never seen one of these gentlemen, whether preacher or citizen—well, I will not say preacher—who was not worth watching with both eyes open.

I am delighted to see such an independent House. There is a spirit of independence on this side, and I believe on the other side as well. I do not think for a moment that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) can lead that array of talent, beauty and ability just in the way he chooses or just in the way that a caucus may decide. He will find a spirit of independence abroad in his following such as he has never found on that side before. And I know that I can speak for the leader of the Government when I say that the Government realize that they will have their hands full if they try to cajole, butter down, or side-track the gentlemen on this side of the House who have just causes of complaint to bring forward. This is not going to be the old-time patronage game. Those in authority are going to move, or the boys will know the reason why. I happened to be looking over an old magazine the other night and came across a picture of sturdy, staunch old John Bull, typical of British manhood. There was no camouflage about old John Bull, no particular attempt at courtesy, no preaching of "moderation" and all that sort of thing. Unfortunately the attempt is made to set up another type in place of the staunch old man, something of the Oscar Wilde type, the smooth, oily, pussy-footing type of statesman. But, thank God, the war has driven him out and re-established plain, staunch John Bull as typical of British manhood. And Canada has been represented by the type of Jack Canuck, a stalwart young fellow—hat on, sleeves rolled up, collar open. I hope there will be no attempt made to replace him with the frock-coated, silk-hatted Jack Canuck as there seems to be some reason to dread in connection with Canadian public life today. I recall very clearly an expression I heard years ago. A gentleman called at our home, and when he had gone, my mother said, "Watch him; he is too smooth to be wholesome." Now, I do not want any of the present Cabinet to take that to themselves—not necessarily. Of course, if the cap fits any of them they can put it on. I see two or three of them blushing. My good friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) is partly hidden behind the Minister of Militia (Major General Mewburn), but I can see the mantling blush steal over his features; while the acting leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) is bland as ever, but his cheeks show slightly heightening colour. I do not wish these gentlemen to think that I mean them; but, as I say, if they think the cap fits them, they can put it on.

Now, let us pass along. The acting leader of the Government commends moderation. I am delighted at his change of manner. In 1914 I had the honour, as Minister of Militia to be raising the forces, at a time when consternation bordering almost on paralysis pervaded the land. A government and people inexperienced in the art of war were brought face to face with the gigantic struggle of the ages. There was wide-spread lack of confidence on the part of the people in their own powers. And let me say, Sir, that that was one of the great things I had to do—to get our boys to feel that they could measure up with these machine-trained Germans. I knew what our boys could do. I had marched for years beside the Germans in manoeuvres, and had studied them; and I felt that, old and awkward as I was, I could handle any dozen of them. And I knew what our stalwart young fellows at home, the free-born sons of Canada, could do, even though they lacked training. I knew that they could do just what they have done—trim the Germans to a finish every time they got the opportunity. That is the great thing I found necessary—to work up the confidence of the people in their own power to fight. You all remember that. There was dread of the very name of German—like the dread inspired in France in the old days by the name of "Malbrouk." The clank of the German sword sent a shiver through our people. But, thank God, there were hundreds of thousands of our boys for whom the clank and jangle of the German sword was a challenge that roused them to instant action.

There was prejudice, and envy, and jealously, on the part of one or two of my colleagues and of some others. There were some few attempts at favouritism. There was criticism and fault finding galore, but in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred when traced up it was found to come from interested sources. Then I had to contend with the general reverence for the British model. I had the honour of telling one of the most distinguished soldiers in the British army—and communicated the information to the Prime Minister of Canada (Sir Robert Borden) a few minutes afterwards—that the halo had gone off the British officer as a model many a long day ago, so far as I was concerned, and that the boys from Canada were going to be trained and managed according to modern ideas—my ideas. Then there was the other tradition that we must have men three years in training before they would be of any use in fighting. It was the old question: Regular versus irregular. But I realized what the French citizens had done in the revolution, when they defeated on many a hard-fought field the best professional soldiers of Europe—machine trained soldiers. I had been an athlete and on many occasions I had met with my companions trained professional athletes, and I never knew an occasion when our amateurs could not work them off their feet without much trouble. I felt that the same could be carried out in war. It was carried out in South Africa, and I took part in it. And in this war it has been carried out by soldiers not only from Canada but from New Zealand, from Australia, from South Africa, from Britain—these irregulars are able to hold their heads high in the company of the best British regulars. I do not wish to say a word to depreciate the British soldiers, the regulars. For next to the second battle of Ypres, which we call the battle of St. Julien, where our boys won a victory never to be forgotten, the first battle at that point, where Rawlinson's splendid corps held the position with only one man to the yard against twenty-five Germans to the yard and succeeded in defeating their foe, stands out in history as one of the great battles of ages.

Then, I had to maintain Canada's rights. Nearly every one thought our soldiers were merely British regulars. I had to fight that out single-handed. I am sorry to say, for the Canadian High Commissioner seemed to consider it his duty to thwart every move I made for the advancement of that cause. We had bad financial conditions in Canada—but of these I do not speak now. At that time, I regret to say, certain distinguished members of the Government were not moderate in their views or in their actions. Why, I have had ministers of the Crown bombard me on behalf of different interests and in order to keep this business, that business and the other business from failing, from going to pieces, I was asked to buy a few hundred yards of cloth here, and a few hundred there. The Dominion of Canada was down to such a state in financial matters that we had to practically dole the contracts out, to give some business here, some there, and some elsewhere and this became a very serious drawback. But this matter will come up at some future time and I shall not go into details farther than to say that in 1914 the German propaganda was being put forward, peace was being talked all over the country and all of these matters were being raised in order to stop action on the part of the Government.

I found myself from the outset handicapped by the attacks of certain newspapers, the Montreal Daily Mail and Evening News, the Toronto Telegram, and another serious infamy was the course pursued by the London correspondent of the Toronto Telegram.. I was persistently maligned without the facts of the case being given and this course was pursued to the detriment of the Canadian service. The same gentleman who edited the Montreal Daily Mail and Evening News has been promoted and is now, I understand, head of the Canadian Official Record, I presume, as a reward for the attacks which he so persistently made upon me in the columns of the Daily Mail and Evening News. He has the honour of being a brother of the Minister of Finance.

I was in Toronto one evening away back in 1916 and I found that a number of the leading citizens—of course they were Tories—had been meeting at the hotel. They had been at the meeting, and they said there was a discussion as to the candidate in a certain division in Toronto and that some politicians not of their number would have to go to Ottawa to get a man with a special brand of politics to run in the constituency. There was a certain distinguished statesman whom it was desirable that they should get. But no one could be found to endorse the proposition. I was amazed. Next day I had the honour of speaking at the Empire Club. My staff officer, Col. Williams, came to me and said: There is some mistake about this because the distinguished statesman who was being reported last night as being unable to get a nomination in Toronto is in everybody's mouth here today as the man who should succeed Sir Robert Borden. They say that the Prime Minister is a fishworm,—no backbone, not a strong enough man,—and that he must make way for this great statesman. I said: "That is very strange." I could not understand it. But I asked who was So-and-so, and I found that there were eight canvassers in the audience representing the various insurance companies, financial organizations and other business interests carried on under the auspices of Sir Joseph Flavelle who were busy passing through that audience, canvassing as far as they could against Sir Robert Borden as Prime Minister and demanding that he make way for another man. That opened my eyes.

I remember the conspiracy of 1915 to get rid of dear old General Bertram and Colonel David Carnegie, to whom the British Government and humanity owe much, who did such splendid work in connection with the production of munitions in this country. I remember that in 1915, in every restaurant, in every smoking compartment in a car, wherever one went, all over Canada, there was an agent of one kind or another, and when we came to trace that up we found that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they were agents of this organization to which I am referring and they were canvassing against General Bertram and demanding that the Shell Committee should be reorganized. I remember that as part of the conspiracy.

Sir Joseph Flavelle became head of the Munitions Board, this work having been transferred from the War Department in England to the Munitions Department. Then, following that, we find a certain distinguished citizen obtaining large contracts both in Canada and the United States for the supply of meats and meat products. We have had some evidence in Canada about meat profits, but we have only touched the fringe of it yet, and we have not got anything about what was going on in the United States. I am informed on very reliable authority that upwards of $5,000,000 monthly was handed over in the last three or four years in the United States under contracts with the British Government and other governments to this gentleman, apparently by reason of the position which he held as head of the Munitions Board, which gave him the prestige that enabled him to get all these things into his own hands, little by little, until the whole affair was brought in as an appendage to the business interests run by this Toronto organization. Its estimated profits will be upwards of $100,000,000 in the last four years on these commodities alone.

Then, having obtained control of the Munitions Board and having obtained large contracts, these gentlemen turned their attention to politics. Their political ambitions were as yet unsatisfied. I remember one Sunday morning entering a hotel and seeing seated at a table Sir Joseph Flavelle who had always tabooed politics, Mr. A. E. Ames of Toronto, who had never been a party man of any great standing, Mr. Rundle—I am not saying a word against these gentlemen; they are all very good fellows in their own way—Mr. Rundle of the National Trust, who succeeded the hon. the Finance Minister, Mr. Gundy, a nice little fellow who has evidently an eye to business whether it be in connection with the handling of munition contracts or the Victory Loan, at least these are the names given me—I found these gentlemen and some others seated at a table. Probably Sir Joseph had obtained a respite from Gabriel during this short time on Sunday morning to talk matters over with these gentlemen. I do not know whether they had any other unction or not. But at all events it would not make any difference whether they had or not.

These gentlemen then proceeded to carry on their work of saving Canada. They went to the residence of Sir Wilfrid Laurier by arrangement at 12 o'clock and I understand that the luncheon was very fine. They stayed there until four and they tried to induce this worthy old statesman to join in a Union Government with them. They were going to be content with Sir Wilfrid Laurier remaining Prime Minister for six or nine months, or a year, then he was to make way and was to be succeeded by one of their friends not a thousand miles away from the seat occupied by the Finance Minister to-day. The wily old statesman sent them away and they returned to the hotel to consult some of the lesser lights of the Liberal party. An arrangement was made, I understand, that a meeting of the warriors of the Liberal party should be held the next afternoon. The Premier of Quebec happened in and I do not know whether it was a patriotic reason or not that brought the hon. gentleman who is now the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) but he also blew into the city on that day. I do not know whether he figured as the second lieutenant or as the first lieutenant. I could not say what part he played, but he was in town. Nothing came of it. At all events the result was that the wily old statesman declined to have anything to do with it.

Let me recall the circumstances to you. Let me recall to your minds what had happened. There was a speech made in Ottawa some time before that in which the statement was made by Sir Joseph Flavelle that whatever government was formed the French element must be dominant in it, must have a voice in it—in fact, all the peculiar elements in Canada must be represented in that great Cabinet. The following Monday, I understand, there was to be a speech delivered in Toronto by the hon. the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White). It had been placarded, and thousands—some say tens of thousands—of cards of invitation had been sent out by friends in the city of Toronto to come and hear this address, that there was to be a very important message delivered. But the awful correspondent of the Toronto Globe in Ottawa happened to send a despatch that night showing what the game was—that Borden was to be thrown out, or disposed of in some way. He and Bennett were away on a junketing trip in the West at this time, but Borden was to be thrown out, and the mantle was to fall on the shoulders of the young gallant and handsome Finance Minister. Whatever happened, the important message was never delivered. A wet blanket fell on the meeting, and it was said that it was one of the deadest shows that ever took place in the city of Toronto, excepting the meeting addressed by the Prime Minister and Mr. Bennett later on, the following month, when they had to hustle down three battalions of soldiers from the Fort in order to make an audience at all for them. Well, Sir, a change of scene occurred a little later, when, failing to wheedle Sir Wilfrid Laurier into the leadership of this new party, they turned around and the cry became very vociferous to condemn Quebec. She must be ostracised, and all the enemies of Canada and of the Empire must be disfranchised in the coming election.

We were asked sometimes by people in our ridings what this Government had done. Well, to make as nice a story as I could, I always told them: "They have appointed, the Knights of Columbus have appointed, somebody to some job in the riding, and things are going on very nicely; I am relieved of patronage, and I have no more to say in matters of government, but they are getting on very nicely." One of the questioners came to me one night, and said: "They are adopting high-handed methods by the suppression of free speech, they are shutting out all criticism. Knowing a young gentleman who was to speak in the city of Winnipeg, but was held up as if he had been worse than a German, I can speak in the interests of Canada. They are trying to build up an oligarchy in Canada, and the Government is being run by orders in council." He said further: "The Acting Prime Minister may as well take a packet of poker chips in his pocket and let the rest of you all go home."

Now let me deal with certain measures that have been enacted. The Dominion Registration Act, one of the most infamous laws ever enforced, has been borne by the people with more than patience. In other words, we are in thorough training for Kaiserism. The Military Service Act, and the Registration Act, I shall not discuss here, nor the provost marshal and military police work. All this, and the detective work in connection with this class of thing, is contrary to the dictates and wishes of a free people. The press, by means of sweetening, and also by censors, has been worked with conspicuous zeal. In the shape of sweetening we find that $50,000 was given the Canadian press for wiring intelligence from coast to coast, although I do not object to that at all. But there was the fixing of the price of news print at $50 a ton on November 19, 1918. That was extended to January 14, until after the elections had taken place, when the price was placed at $69. Then there is the cost of advertising the Victory Loan, and the advertising connected with registration and repatriation. The Government has been very good in buying 250,000 copies of The Veteran, the organ of the veterans, to send to the boys. Again there is the cost connected with maintaining the Director of Public Information and the Canadian Official Record to be added to the expenditures which I have enumerated—in other words, the sweetening of the press. That is very nice and I suppose the press is supposed to be paid for all this propaganda and camouflage work, and so on, of the various ministers. Let me refer in this connection to certain very interesting procedure which took place. It seems that one of the ministers was getting too much prominence on the front page of this Canadian Official Record every week. A solemn protest was accordingly entered on behalf of the other ministers by a certain gentleman, and it seems to have been heeded, because if you look at the Canadian Official Record now you will see that formerly the Minister of Finance was given front page recognition for weeks in succession, and it was too much for the other ministers. Now one week attention is paid to the Acting Minister of Justice and the Minister of the Interior. Another week it is the President of the Privy Council, and so on. They are distributing the moneys, these gentlemen who are running neck and neck, for publication purposes, and that gets them notoriety before the public. If you watch it, you will see the official organ going out along these lines regularly now. I do not know whether it does any good or not, but that is neither here nor there.

Now, Sir, the Dominion of Canada trained an army of free men. That army has distinguished itself, and it needs no commendation here or elsewhere. I challenge the world to show where any soldiers in the world have conducted themselves better as soldiers than the men who composed this army. They spent months and months training in Canada, they went to the front absolutely under control, absolutely well trained, absolutely the best shots that could be found, and in no solitary instance, barring one or two affairs of liquor, has there been a solitary case that would be worthy of police court record in the whole Dominion of Canada. The force sent overseas by Canada is something that any country might be proud of. I therefore feel more or less out of touch with the ordinary feeling that is expressed in this House and the country about these soldiers, as to what we must do for them when they return, and how we must coddle them up. I do not think, Sir, that that is the right attitude to take at all. What should be done I will deal with in a few minutes when I come to the question of demobilization and re-establishment. What I want to point out is this: I recommended, while in office, to the British Government and to the Canadian authorities, certain suggestions with regard to the composition of our forces. After building up one division, we had two divisions formed. After creating two divisions, we had four divisions formed, and that made a corps. I wanted to have three divisions in a corps, and three brigades in a division, with an extra battalion in each brigade, besides the divisional corps. The plan was adopted in Germany, it was adopted by the British, but it was not adopted by the Canadians at the front. The obstacles to the adoption of that policy I shall not discuss here further than to say that the two Ministers of Militia—the gentleman here and the gentleman in London—ran foul of each other.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

There was no co-ordination between the two departments, there was no co-ordination between the Militia Department in the Old Country and the High Commissioner's Office—one seemed to be thwarting the other. They tried to thwart them then as they tried to thwart matters in my time. There was a vendetta practically between the boys in England and the boys at the front, there was Government favouritism, and interference, and unworthy ambition on each side of the Atlantic. This handicapped the thousands and thousands of gallant fellows who were anxious to do their duty. However, this little intrigue went on until 1919. My information, which has been borne out by every man who has returned from the front, was such that I wrote to Sir Robert Borden on January 14, 1918, as follows:

Ottawa, Ontario, January 14, 1918.

Dear Sir Robert,—There are a number of important matters—now that the elections are over—which I think should be laid before you for consideration and action, and it has occurred to me that it would be advisable to talk these matters over first before they would be placed in concrete form in detail, or brought up in the House.

They concern such matters as,

1—Six divisions and two corps instead of four divisions and one corps.

2. Little intrigue regarding the supplanting of Haig by Byng, and the action of certain Canadians therein.

3. Appointment of senior officers.

4. Potent influences affecting senior promotions and appointments in the Canadian army.

5. Lens, and somewhat similar massacres—and the object in each.

6. Condition of AFFAIRS IN BRITAIN, and the causes thereof.

Will you please address your reply to Lindsay as I am leaving for home to-night.

Faithfully,

(Signed) SAM HUGHES.

The Right Honourable,
Sir Robert L. Borden, G.C.M.G.,
Prime Minister of Canada, Ottawa.

In reply he told me that he hoped to meet me towards the end of the month, and I came back on three different occasions. On two of them I could not see him; the third time he was away. Following that came the great disaster at St. Quentin. On March 25, 1918, the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons—page 116 of Hansard—after reading the reports from the front:

So far as one can judge, the Germans are undoubtedly throwing absolutely their full force into this attack. It seems to have been met with great success as was anticipated from the first. It is beyond question that very much depends upon the issue; and I know the heart of the people of the whole country will be lifted up in intercession that the right may prevail.

I then said:

Intercession is very proper, but with the view in a slight degree possibly of helping on the cause I desire to ask the Prime Minister the following questions:

1. Inasmuch as Canadians are engaged in the titanic struggle now going on for the preservation of human liberty, is the Government taking necessary steps to maintain to the highest degree the pride, the courage, the resolution, the steadfastness and the confidence of the splendid and gallant soldiers of Canada, as well as of the Empire at large in this struggle?

2. Have the Government taken precautions in the management of the forces, the appointment and the promotion of officers therein and the granting of honour, awards and decorations thereto, that favour from female society, creed or other undue influences, shall not prevail, but that all shall be awarded on the one basis of merit and fitness alone?

3. Does the Government purpose doing anything to prevent panicky and sensational despatches which merely cause nervous excitement among soldiers and population in Canada and overseas, from being issued by a few mentally epileptic newspaper reporters from overseas?

4. Has the Government any explanation of why the allied forces, splendidly armed and equipped, and in chosen positions of their own, made up of the best men in the world, and numbering from seven to ten men per yard of front—

It is estimated that I was considerably under the proper number. (Reading):

—recently gave way before an enemy not their equal in manhood nor superior in armament, even though they numbered thirty men to a yard of front in attack?

Then came the secret session. Without divulging anything that happened at that marvellous, blue-ruin session, I may point out that my attitude was this: Although we occupied the lowlands, there was nothing to prevent our defeating the enemy with the greatest of ease provided we had the heart, the resolution, the courage, and the organization. We had better men, we had better armament, and our cause was just. I pointed out on that occasion what Rawlinson had done and what the Canadians had done at St. Julien, and contended that with the necessary degree of resolution restored to the British forces, before many months they would be doing exactly what they did do—driving the Germans back over the same ground from which our forces had retired a few days previously.

A short time after this the Prime Minister suggested that I talk over with him some of the matters that I had referred to. I pointed out, however, that the blow which I had sought to avert had fallen, and that it was therefore useless to discuss the matter. On the last day of the session the Prime Minister sent for me and asked me to communicate to him any suggestions that I had to make as he was leaving for England. I pointed out to him that I was not any longer his adviser, and he repeated the question, but I declined to comply with his suggestion. I gave as my reason the fact that the gentlemen with whom he was associated in the Old Country would undo whatever he might of himself be willing to do; that the officer in command of the Canadian forces in the field and the Canadian High Commissioner, who has exercised a malign influence on the Prime Minister ever since the formation of this Government, and others in the old land would exercise this malign influence over him and that it would be useless for me to do what he suggested. He then asked me to give him the names of any Canadian officers whom he might consult. I asked him what his object was; whether it was to have certain gentlemen still further hunted, driven from the forces and ruined, as had happened to every man who was known to be a friend of mine in connection with the service. So I declined. I did speak to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. J. A. Calder) who, I was confident, would keep his mouth shut unless it was advisable to give out the facts. I did give him a few pointers, but I did not feel that I was called upon to give them anywhere else. Every pointer that I gave turned out to be absolutely correct.

However, on February 25, 1919, Sir Thomas White said—p. 33 of Hansard:

It will be an eternal source of pride to the people of this country that the first troops to enter Cambrai, which was the great bastion of German defence on the West, wore the uniform of Canada. It will also be a source of noble pride to the people of this country that on the last day of the war Canadian troops entered Mons, from which the British forces at the beginning of the war had been driven by overwhelming enemy forces.

Well, Sir, from the outset of this war I am on record as standing for the saving of the lives of our boys unless it was absolutely necessary that they should be sacrificed. This wasting of gallant lives went so far that on one occasion I notified the British Government through Field-Marshal Sir John French that this petty nibbling, these foolish attacks—"stunts," they called them—should cease, and that if these movements were to be carried on, the Canadian forces would lose hundreds of men with no possible advantage as a result. They fought the battle of St. Julien without having gone through any of these stunts for training purposes, and they had smashed the German forces to a finish.

They did not need those stunts, the killing off of our boys and the wounding of them day after day for no useful purpose. I told them that if this thing continued I would send them Texas steers instead of soldiers. The Texas steers would afford the German machine gunners practically as much amusement as our poor boys would, and an odd steer might get through the wire entanglements and gore the enemy, while our boys never could get through. But they stopped it. I also demanded that our boys be taken out of the Ypres salient. At this suggestion there was a good deal of sneering and much criticism came from various sources, but the British Government were only too glad to straighten the salient out and adopt the line that I had laid down with Kitchener in 1915.

Now, about Cambrai. I know Cambrai well. General Mewburn has seen Cambrai, and I venture to say that he would not waste the life of a Canadian soldier under his command in attacking that town. I would not, anyway. It is a dirty, little, one-horse town, with narrow streets, an ideal spot for machine gun positions and booby traps. Why any man of common sense would send soldiers in there, unless it were for his own glorification, I cannot comprehend.

Our men were driven back on the 29th and 30th of September, 1918, and the next morning I wrote to Sir Robert Borden, thinking that we might be in time to save some of the lads, though, of course, they were nearly all wiped out that day. Officers who went in with a thousand men came out with 44, 50 and 60. Sons of members of this House went in to this attack and never returned—all through bull-headed stupidity. I wrote to the Prime Minister on October 1 as follows:

Dear Sir Robert,—

Once more I desire to draw your attention to the useless massacre of our Canadian boys, as has needlessly occurred at Cambrai. Mark you, I am not one who thinks wars can be won without the loss of human life, but General Foch has shown the world, what I have always claimed, that mind conquers matter.

I have on other occasions, drawn your attention to the massacres at Lens, Passchendaele, etc., where the only apparent object was to glorify the General in command, and make it impossible, through butchery, to have a Fifth and Sixth Division and two Army Corps.

In the present case, however, around Cambrai, it seems simply a case of "bull-head" and sending up our gallant lads against positions swarming with machine guns, and without our boys being properly supported by tanks, or guns, to destroy these machine gun positions. You may remember I have suggested repeatedly, this sort of thing—guns to destroy machine gun positions—since the outset of the war.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

I have no details other than general and special reports, but I know the locality thoroughly and any General who would undertake to attack Cambrai by suburb or street fighting, should be tried by court-martial. The only way is to "go around the darned thing," as the American attache said to General Buller at Colenzo.

I think the time has arrived when you should assert yourself along positive lines, demand the removal of incompetents and have this needless slaughter—for I can call it nothing else—of our Canadian lads stopped.

You should secure returns of the losses by brigade and battalions during each year or tenure of command, and what each brigade accomplished, and it will be found that, in many instances, the brigades and battalions that have accomplished the most, have suffered the least.

Bull-head and incompetency are traceable by the horrible casualities rolling up into eight and ten times the total force of a battalion or a brigade.

Any ass can sit back and simply order battalion after battalion to go forward to certain death.

General Foch does not want that sort of thing, neither do the people of Canada.

I might point out in this connection that just after the taking of Cambrai, an officer was ordered with his battalion to take a certain village and the country surrounding it. When he went forward, he found himself up against machine guns by the hundreds. He realized that the casualties were very heavy during the first few minutes he tried to advance, so he drew back his men, sent half of his battalion under cover of the contour of the ground right up the valley, until they came suddenly on the men holding the cross-fire, and before the Germans knew it, he had half of his battalion behind their line. It was a case of "hands up," and the Germans surrendered instantly. He lost only two men and had a couple or so wounded. Yet he was brought up and reprimanded by one of the staff officers for not dashing forward as he was commanded, although had he done so, he would not have had a man left.

I might cite another instance of an officer who was ordered to advance where he had three-quarters of a mile of flat, marshy ground to cross, with a muddy little river with "back" water running through the middle of it. He saw his opportunity; he used his brains, and in place of marching his men three-quarters of a mile across the plain, subject all the way to the artillery and machine gun-fire of the enemy, he brought his men behind a bend in the river put them in the river and marched them more than three-quarters of a mile under cover of the bank until he got them under the ridge of the hill and out of the line of fire of the Germans. In short, he was within fifty yards of the German guns before the Germans knew he was there. He accomplished his task, and yet he was brought up two days later and reprimanded for not having crossed the plain and flats and having himself and his men, perhaps, all shot to pieces. This is the sort of thing that is breaking the hearts of the boys, and thousands of them who are coming back are corroborating these facts.

I do not know what Sir Robert Borden did with my letter. He was out of the city up the Ottawa valley somewhere when I mailed it to him, and I mailed him a copy. I also sent copies to General Haig, General Foch and Mr. Lloyd George. They must have learned what had happened as well as I did; at all events General Foch would know it, and after Cambrai, two weeks later, the cities and towns, such as Valenciennes and others, were passed by and the booby traps were left to be disposed of in other ways.

I have just this to say about Mons. Were I in authority, the officer who, four hours before the Armistice was signed, although he had been notified beforehand that the Armistice was to begin at eleven o'clock, ordered the attack on Mons thus needlessly sacrificing the lives of Canadian soldiers, would be tried summarily by court martial and punished so far as the law would allow. There was no glory to be gained, and you cannot find one Canadian soldier returning from France who will not curse the name of the officer who ordered the attack on Mons. What was in it? They did not take the town, which was only a little one-horse town anyway. It had no strategic value, and the attack was only a bit of bravado as the Canadians had already passed it. What should have been done was to go around these places and take the Germans prisoners, and then make the Germans go in and remove the booby traps instead of having our boys blown up in hundreds as they were in Cambrai.

I have matters of this kind by the ton, but I will not detain the House now with them.

I must hurry on. The question of demobilization and repatriation has been taken up in the House. In the four years prior to the war, Canada absorbed and assimilated, without a ripple, through one little immigration office in Ottawa, 1,462,631 immigrants as follows:

1912	354,237
1913	402,432

I think I know the Canadian soldiers and I think they know me as well as any man in Canada, and I want to tell this House and the country that if they are let alone, 99 per cent of the returning soldiers will demobilize themselves, but they must be given an opportunity and people should not run around and coddle them up and give them pink teas here and there and something else there. Let the Government get a move on and create opportunities for these soldiers. That is the way to absorb men into civilian life. That is the way in which immigrants should be absorbed. Create the opportunities; let the situation hunt the man rather than the man hunt the situation. The boys who are injured, those whose health has been broken, who are maimed, are the wards of the Government and the Government must act promptly in regard to them. Let me say in all kindness, because I do not want to be offensive to this Government: I have been silent here for two long years; I will give the Government every opportunity; but I can assure them that in many of these little matters concerning the soldier they must get an active move on in a very short time or the people of this country will make inquiries and take action to see that the Government attend to this work. There is no object in camouflaging and humbugging the people with propaganda and all that sort of thing. The duty of this Government to the soldier has not been done, or the complaints that have been made here would not have been heard of. I am not blaming this end of the show so much as I do the other end, although there are certain things here that should have been attended to in the interests of the soldier. How many survey parties has the Government in readiness to send out in the spring to survey the great Northwest? Why should there not be a thousand aeroplane parties scouring our great Canadian Northwest and the northeastern part of Canada during the coming year? Why not send all these parties out this summer?

I might as well give a little detail of some of my ideas in regard to demobilization. Why not create opportunities for labour of every description in the country? So far as aliens are concerned, I would punish every one, Allied or enemy, found guilty of treason or who helped the enemy. I would let employers give to the returned soldiers the good places now held by alien enemies and slackers. I would also let the Dominion Government, as a large employer of labour, take the lead in this matter, and not, as is charged, fill these places up with slackers. I saw by the papers the other night that that was being done in Ottawa. I am not blaming the Government, as this may be due to some sub-agent or heeler, but the Government must assume the responsibility. I have no use for Civil Service Commissions for the purpose of filling jobs. I have every faith in the Civil Service Commission for the duty for which it was constituted. But, in years of service in this House, I stand now next to my good old friend the hon. member for Grenville (Hon. J. D. Reid), I have never dodged my responsibility. I have always held that the member or the defeated candidate should be responsible for the patronage of his riding, because some one must be the responsible head in every riding to look after the patronage. I have never evaded my responsibility, and in my county I have never made an appointment with which any fault was found. Under this Government, we cannot assume the responsibility and this dodging, pussyfooting and side-stepping must cease. This is a democratic Government, a responsible Government; and as a member for a constituency, occupying a seat in this House, I shall insist on the responsibility being exercised by some one other than irregular organizations such as the Knights of Columbus and associations of that kind in the riding that I have the honour to represent.

Mr. TOBIN: The hon. member may leave the Knights of Columbus alone.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Oh, no, I treat all just as they come. In regard to demobilization, the first thing is to get population. I like to look back on the development of the Great Northwest. I see gentlemen occupying seats in this House who will remember the days long ago when one would travel hundreds of miles throughout the Northwest without coming across a house. In 1895 I had the honour of drawing Sir Clifford Sifton's attention to the fact that those places were fit for settlement. Sir Clifford Sifton pushed the roads through, and great credit is due to him for developing that part of Canada. He may not have done it to suit everybody, but he has done it well. The men from the Northwest have been a credit to the British Empire and a credit to Canada.

First of all, get population; get people with money. Develop the country. Build railways and get people to settle on the land and produce, and then you will have banks and churches and schools and lawyers' offices and every other kind of activity. There are hon. members of this House from the Northwest who remember when they went in there ten or fifteen years ago the country was unsettled; but to-day it is all settled, and thirty years from now the portions of the great Northwest that are unsettled to-day will be dotted with cities and towns that are now never dreamt of. I would build railways to new sections opening up. I would give the people drainage facilities. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) said the other evening that upwards of a million people could be settled in a certain district out west if they had proper railway facilities. I would build wagon roads alongside new railways. I would also build river bridges. I would build coal roads from the Rocky Mountains to the city of Winnipeg, and on to Ontario, Quebec and from Nova Scotia. I would use four roads for this purpose from the Rocky Mountains to Winnipeg so that every section could be served, and I would have the tracks so arranged and the cars so constructed that one engine could haul as big a trainload as the ordinary steamer. I would develop the fish industry, by providing trawlers, ocean cold storage for fish, refrigerator cars, cold storage houses, and utilize fish offal. The fish industry has great possibilities. I would also develop our timber, both hard and soft, and develop water-powers. I would have central municipal coal yards with control over distribution and prices. I would develop the minerals from the Mackenzie river to Ungava, and would have harbours on the new coast. I would build a railway to the Klondyke, and buy a sea coast strip from the United States. I would have a study made of the chemistry of natural and other products. I would settle the soldiers on the land as far as possible, and afterwards sell land to settlers other than soldiers. We shall need millions of men, instead of a few hundred thousand. These soldiers returning to Canada will not be content with second-rate Civil Service jobs. It has been my privilege to look in the faces of thousands of our boys. I saw in Detroit not long ago a man with a cork leg walk five miles without a whimper. These men do not want coddling. They will tell you themselves " For God's sake, get them to let up on this coddling business. What we want is an opportunity to earn a living. Give us that opportunity, and we will not pester you for elevator and post office jobs." Give the boys a chance to open up new country, and you gentlemen sitting around me who went to the Northwest ten or fifteen years ago not so wealthy as you are to-day will find your success duplicated by our soldier boys in the years to come. The soldiers are the best men we can get. Physically, some of the poor fellows are not what they should be, but mentally they are better than they ever were. They are more stern, more serious than they were. The war has added twenty years to their lives. As an illustration, I would point to the Mowat family. Sir Oliver Mowat's father was an old soldier. Sir David MacPherson was also an old soldier. In fact, the ancestors of most of the big men of a decade ago were old soldiers who had had stern training and brought discipline and seriousness into their home life. This same serious spirit will be carried into the homes of our soldiers. An odd soldier here and there will go wrong, but so does an odd preacher; but why blame the soldier any more than any one else? Why cannot a soldier have a good time once in a while if he wants it? I am not here to defend that sort of thing, but humanity is the same the world over. But that is no reason for coddling the soldier. Give the boys a chance. They have conducted themselves nobly as soldiers, and before they went overseas and will do so in the future. I do not share the fears of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), who the other evening seemed to apprehend some sort of danger from these returned soldiers. I have not yet found one of them who was not a law-abiding and thoroughly good citizen. I know that there has been trouble in Toronto over aliens, and in my riding also, where some aliens have as much as six or seven thousand dollars in the bank and a big roll in their pockets. When our boys come home, practically incapacitated many of them, and see that sort of thing and the alien wanting to hold on to his job they do not like it. In my riding we have taken precautions to make the employers understand they had better get a move on. I understand that one minister of the Crown has been told to get rid of the aliens at his factory in Toronto and give the returned soldiers a fair show. The soldiers do not want to be coddled; they want an opportunity. Let us give them the opportunity to create new cities and towns and homes and farms, and they will gladly accept it in preference to a second or third class job in the Civil Service. If given the opportunity, our soldiers will prove themselves fit for the very highest jobs in the land.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Lieut.-General SIR SAM HUGHES (resuming): Before the House rose I was discussing the question of re-establishment. But during the recess my attention has been drawn to the fact that a number of the officers of the House and the men who formerly occupied places in the Press Gallery left their positions and marched with the boys to the front. Some of them have fallen, and all have done uniformly good work. I pay tribute to such of these men by name. Here is the honour roll:

Major Bowie, Sergeant-at-Arms.

Major John Lewis, Montreal Star, killed in action.

Captain Ernest Cinq Mars, Croix de Guerre, La Presse.

Captain Maurice Arby, Le Temps.

Private Rènè Chevassu, Le Canada.

Lieut. John MacCormac, The Gazette, Montreal.

Corporal Charles Gauthier, Le Droit.

Lieut. Rodolphe Girard, Croix de Guerre, Le Temps.

Major John Bassett, A.D.C., Montreal Gazette.

Private Vincent Pask, Ottawa Free Press.

Captain Charles Askwith, Ottawa Journal.

Captain Clem King, Military Cross.

Sergeant Benson Guest, Montreal Mail.

Private Allan B. Hobbs, Ottawa Journal.

Private J. W. Gibson, page, from 1908 to 1915.

Captain Irwin B. Johnston, Canadian Daily Record.

Captain James Hanratty, Canadian Daily Record.

Lieut. Charles Cavers, Toronto World.

Captain William Wallace, Military Cross.

I hurried in the hope of finishing my address before six o'clock, and in my haste I did not say fully what I wished to say on one point about the returned soldiers. We need not have any fear whatever of the returned soldiers, if they are anything like properly used. Otherwise it is hard to say what we may look for. I anticipate—and I think the future records of this country, when they are written, will bear me out—that our returning soldiers, four hundred thousand or five hundred thousand are going to be the greatest thinking and acting asset of the Dominion of Canada in the years to come. Like all old soldiers they will be steady, hard men. I believe that the history of all the victorious and Allied countries will show that we are entering upon the Periclean, the Augustine

Age, the Renaissance, the Elizabethan period, the Reformation period, of our time, to be marked by a great outburst of literature, art, and general progress.

Now, I will only take a few minutes to touch upon an aspect of the case more practical than theoretical—the financial aspect. I would refer hon. members to the report of the Department of the Treasury in Washington, of 2nd December, 1918, the report of Secretary McAdoo to the House of Representatives. I have here the official document, but I read from copies that have been made. He refers to the raising of great loans and the advancing to allied countries of a sum upwards of $9,000,000,000 in cash. He said:

The fundamental fact underlying these great economic achievements has been the inflexible spirit and purpose of America to secure for the world the blessings of that kind of liberty and justice in which America was conceived, and without which neither America nor civilization can exist.

Speaking of the third Liberty Loan he said:

(1) With the bonds of previous loans selling below par and industrial and other securities yielding a return much in excess of the interest rate on Government bonds, the question of the rate of interest on the new bonds became acute. It was the general banking opinion that the rate should be 4½ per cent and few believed that it would be possible to sell the necessary large amount of bonds at a lesser rate. The Treasury on the other hand stood firm in the belief that,

1—The rate of interest would not of itself maintain Liberty bonds at par in the financial market.

2—That the price of Liberty bonds, even though quoted at less than par on the exchanges, would not deter the American people from buying at par the same bonds when offered by their Government to secure the necessary funds to carry on the war.

In other words, they would show themselves patriots, not grafters.

3—That the patriotism of the American people was not measured by interest rates nor determined by the fluctuations in the market prices of Government bonds on stock exchanges.

The situation was very complex. There could be no denying the fact that existing issues were selling below par, nor could there be any refutation of the claim, except by actual experiment, that the investing public would not buy the new issue at par when the same bonds could be bought in the open market below par. The Treasury felt, however, that to raise the interest rate to 4½ per cent would mean a corresponding increase in the cost of the war and force still higher interest rates on future issues of industrial and other securities as well as further to depress the price of existing long term bonds. On the other hand, it seemed clear that the time had arrived when every effort should be made to stabilize the interest rate on Government bonds and to reach a point where there would no longer be expectation of further increases in rates.

It was decided, therefore, to recommend that the Congress authorize the issue of a 4¼ per cent nonconvertible bond or an increase in the interest rate of one-fourth of 1 per cent instead of an increase of one-half of 1 per cent. Such a bond, it was believed, would result in accomplishing two things, 1—The stabilization of the interest rate as far as it was possible to stabilize it in the extraordinary circumstances then existing.

and,

2—The elimination of the conversion privilege, which had become no longer necessary for the sale of the bonds and which in itself had a tendency to create a demand for a constantly rising rate of interest on successive issues.

Speaking of the fourth Liberty Loan Secretary McAdoo said:

I have sought to avoid the issue of bonds at such a rate and upon such terms as might result ultimately, when the war is won, in the accumulation of great wealth in the hands of a relatively small proportion of our population, carrying interest at a high rate and exempt from taxes.

The oversubscription of this largest of all loans was the greatest financial achievement in all history and a wonderful manifestation of the strength and purpose of the American people.

The loans made to foreign governments as shown by this report were as follows:

RE LOANS TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

Country.	Credits established.	Cash advances.
Belgium	$ 192,520,000	$ 173,380,000
Cuba	15,000,000	10,000,000
France	2,445,000,000	1,970,000,000
Great Britain	3,945,000,000	3,696,000,000
Greece	15,790,000
Italy	1,210,000,000	1,051,000,000
Liberia	5,000,000
Rumania	6,666,666
Russia	325,000,000	187,729,750
Serbia	12,000,000	10,605,000
Total	$8,171,976,666	$7,098,714,750

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

These amounts were advanced by the people of the United States through their Government by way of loan.

Regarding these loans, there are two viewpoints: One is that of the country, the people; the other is that of the broker or the investor. It depends on the viewpoint how you are going to regard it. One distinguished member of this House said of the $75,000,000 New York loan: "Just look at the most sucessful loan in history; it went up to 103." It was sold at $94.94 or practically 95 and because it went up to 103 it was regarded as the greatest issue in history. If he was a buyer he could afford to cheer but I do not see how the people of Canada, who were losing $8 per $100, could be interested in any such deal as that. The great trouble in connection with that loan is that the Government fixed both the buying and selling price; that is they fixed both the rate of interest and what they would get for the bonds. I have no hesitation in saying that had the Finance Minister gone to New York with that $75,000,000 loan and said: "Gentlemen, here is a loan; I am paying 5 or 5½ per cent interest on it; what will you give me for it?"—he would have had an offer of 102 quicker than lightning. As it was he said: "I am going to fix the price of $25,000,000 worth at 99 and something and $25,000,000 at something else and the price of long term, or the gilt-edged, part shall be $94.94, practically 95." Of course, it went up. The question that the people are asking themselves is: Who were the underwriters that got the difference in the price at which it was issued through Morgan & Company and the price of 103 to which it rose? Who got that $8 out of every $100 is something that the people of this country are interested in knowing. From the investor's viewpoint it may have been a successful loan if $8 out of every $100 went to the broker or speculator. From the people's viewpoint they were robbed of $8 out of every $100. If the interest had been higher, of course, the price would still have been higher. It is a very convenient way of estimating a loan.

If the Federal Government advance the rates of interest, the people of the province, the municipality, the business man, the farmer, have to pay correspondingly higher rates with the result that this burden will affect every business transaction in the country. As pointed out by my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon), at the outset Canada had lying idle and drawing no interest whatever, or very small rates of from 3 to 3½ per cent, two billions of dollars in the savings banks and banking institutions of this country which could have been made available. Why then, when these loans were made, did not the people grab their money and invest it in Government bonds bearing 5 and 5½ per cent, especially when the conditions of the loans carried the exemption clause? Why did every one keep his money at 3 and 3½ per cent with no tax exemption instead of investing at 5½ per cent with exemption? Canada's loans since 1915 have all been issued at from 5 to 5½ per cent. The total loans aggregate upwards of $1,500,000,000, and the issue prices have been from 94.94 to par.

The difficulty of locating the amounts paid for commissions is made greater by the fact that one cannot get the actual figures for anything except three of the loans. The Auditor General's Report and the Public Accounts are not printed yet for this year. I have been unable to get anything except the figures for three of these loans which are found in the Auditor General's Report for last year. The conversion privileges are very valuable. The Minister of Finance, in answer to a question of mine last year agreed that there would be $150,000,000 conversion on one loan. Then, as has been pointed out on many occasions, these bonds have been sold as low as 91, 92, 92½, 93, 94 and 95 all over the country. They had undoubtedly been picked up by brokers who evidently knew what was coming; they picked these up and transferred them, having purchased them at lower rates, for 97½, or par, and they got the accrued interest upon them. In that transfer they made from $6,000,000 to $9,000,000 on that $150,000,000 transaction alone. That was not allowed in the United States Liberty Bond issues.

In regard to the exemption of Canadian loans I have a statement issued by a firm—I think—Daly and Company of Toronto. On $1,000,000 there is an exemption of $499,157 and on $1,500,000 there is an exemption of $863,000 and so on right down. The exemption amounts to a very large sum. The cost of the first year's administration of these Canadian loans runs from $113.50 to $111.75 exclusive of the last two loans for which figures cannot be definitely had. The Auditor General's Report gives the figures for three loans, that is the 5 per cent Public Service Loan, 1916, the Dominion of Canada War Loan, 1915, and the 5 per cent Dominion of Canada War Loan, December, 1916.

The figures are startling. They are as follows:

"5 per cent Public Service Loan" in New York, 1916 ..... $ 75,000,000
Cost, $4,098,580, or $5.46 per $100.
The "Dominion of Canada War Loan," 1915 ..... $100,000,000
Cost, $3,408,358, or $3.41 per $100.
The "5 per cent Dominion of Canada War Loan," October, 1916. $100,000,000
Cost, $3,539,410, or $3.54 per $100.

These figures are taken from the Auditor General's Report. Thus, for $275,000,000 the Dominion of Canada has paid upwards of $11,000,000.

Let us turn to the United States and see how they have dealt with their Liberty Loans. The cost of these loans has been as follows:

First Liberty Loan, 1917, two billions of dollars, rate 3½ per cent interest, cost, $2,762,536, or 13 9/10 cents per $100.

Second Liberty Loan, 1917, $3,808,766,150, rate 4 per cent interest, cost $5,539,062, or 14 3/10 cents per $100.

Third Liberty Loan, 1918, $4,176,516,850, rate 4½ per cent interest, cost $8,293,519, or 19 cents per $100.

Fourth Liberty Loan, September, 1918, $6,989,047,000, rate 4½ per cent interest, cost $8,727,658.

The final figures for this loan are not to hand, but an estimate can easily be made of what it will amount to, 19 or 20 cents, the same as for the other loans.

Mark you, Sir, this—and I have the detailed reports here if any hon. members wish to see them—this cost includes about eleven millions of dollars of allotments to Federal Reserve Banks, for which no accounts have been rendered, or if rendered have not been examined, classified and approved. There will be a great many of these accounts which will undoubtedly be rejected, but I am putting them all in, and it makes a total United States loan of $16,974,330,000 at a cost of $25,322,775, or 15 cents per $100, as against $275,000,000 Canadian loan at a cost of $11,000,000.

The thing, Sir, is unreasonable. It is incomprehensible how so much money has been spent on the Canadian loans as has been. Contrast 13 cents per $100 with $5.46 for $100. Contrast 3 per cent to 4½ per cent Liberty Loan with from 5 per cent to 5½ per cent Canadian loans. Why have the Canadian loans cost from thirty to fifty times as much as the United States loans? You can say they are a more highly developed country, they are a larger country. Consider that 21,000,000, nearly 22,000,000 of people in the United States of America—that is one out of about every five—subscribed dollars and cents to their last Liberty Loan, knowing that it would go below par, knowing they would lose interest on it, knowing they would only get 4¼ per cent—and yet that number of people subscribed to these bonds. That, Sir, is patriotism. There was no organization in every polling subdivision, in every district all over the country—possibly for future political purposes; there were no agents, or friends of the Government there to organize and collect subscriptions, or a whole body of sellers on commission, such as there were in the case of these Canadian loans. Last year the Acting Finance Minister admitted that the 1917 December loan would cost upwards of five millions of dollars. Now I have never yet got the figures. I have tried, and I have inquired dozens of times from the Finance Department and the Auditor-General's Department, from all the departments interested, and I have not got the figures yet, but there is a report that the figures will be nearer seven millions of dollars than five when they are all in, and that will not include the cost of administration, which, of course, is very heavy, as you all know, solicitors and clerks having to be employed in this work. This loan is for $398,000,000; the United States Liberty loan for ten times the amount, cost only $5,539,000. Canada has raised for war purposes about $1,500,000,000. This was drawing, we will say, from 2 to 3½ per cent interest without exemption. Much of it is drawing nothing at all. The average interest will now be nearly 5 to 5½ per cent. The Government should have issued the loan, seeing that these moneys were not drawing anything higher, at from 3 to 3½ per cent. Thus, an annual saving of 2 per cent, or $30,000,000 on the investment would have been the result to the people of Canada. And the people who have had their money invested, if they had been patriotic, should have been satisfied with the same interest as they were getting. They would have had the same security as they already had, and would have been that much money in pocket. That way, some $30,000,000 would have been saved to the country. The annual interest on $1,500,000,000 at an average of 5 to 5½ per cent will be $75,000,000 to $80,000,000. This sum is exempt under the income tax rule, viz.: The exemption clauses prevent any revenue from interest on this sum. Thus fully twenty millions more are lost, or a grand total of about fifty millions of dollars annually added to the people's burden for the benefit of the speculator. The war profits tax, and high rates of interest inworking out, will counter-balance the ordinary rate and will amount to at least twenty to thirty millions more, which means a total of forty to fifty million dollars that this country could have been in pocket if proper financing had been indulged in. Indirectly, the province, municipality, the business man, the farmer, will all pay correspondingly higher rates. One dollar now thus invested in fifteen years becomes two dollars. The purchasing power of one dollar now will equal two dollars in a few years. Therefore, one dollar now of this money will equal four dollars, as far as the purchasing power of it is concerned.

Who are the real profiteers, Sir? Much has been said against profiteers in this country. I want to say here that I had a good deal to do with the munition makers in the early stages of the war and I think I kept my eyes fairly wide open in the latter stages of it. As I figure it, about twenty-five per cent of them made money, fifty per cent broke even, and twenty-five per cent of them lost nearly all they put in, and yet you will find the people going up and down the country condemning the munition makers. The munition maker that went into this business on his own responsibility and took the risk is entitled to all the credit that can possibly be given him. They are the men who saved Canada from bankruptcy, and put bread and butter into the mouths of hundreds of our people, people who in the early stages of the war were practically starving. They are the men who re-filled the coffers of the country, and practically made Canada able to carry on the war. They are the men, too, Sir, who made the shells that at the battle of St. Julien—where our good friend, the mover of the Address, and others, were bowled out—were obtained from a station ten or fifteen miles back and brought into action, and helped to stand off the advancing German hordes at the crucial moment. These very shells helped to win the war in Europe, and I say that the munition makers who went into the business on an even field and a fair footing deserve every credit. The munition makers who went into the business on a speculative basis deserve no credit. Like the gentleman I have referred to, in selling goods to the Old Country, they were guaranteed against loss and were not interfered with in their profits. I would like, before people too widely condemn the munition workers as profiteers, to consider the case, and find out whether these gentlemen stepped in at the proper time, at a time when it was essential to get the industry started, and what did they make. There are institutions, however, in close connection with the gentleman who headed the Munitions Board, in which millions and millions of dollars have been made, and the strange part of the business is that other men in the industry at the same time were getting such prices that they were unable to carry on.

There is another thing I would like to point out: When the United States came into the war, no matter how, their Government and people wanted to get shells made in Canada. The Munitions Board of Canada objected to their being made in Canada, and let me point out here, there has not been one shell, not one bit of munition work made in Canada for a long time that could not have been made in England just as well. Britain gave the orders to Canada in order to preserve her credit, keep times good, and help things on here, the condition being that Canada should put up the money and it would be counted as collateral on advances made. Therefore, the manufacture of munitions for Britain could have been stopped because Britain had the factories to make them, lots of them. We could have taken the manufacture of American munitions, and I have no hesitation in saying we could have had two billions, if not three billions of American work by merely asking for it. However, permission was refused to make American munitions here.

They were refused permission to manufacture here. The contractors in Canada were not allowed to take these contracts, so they sought to move their machinery to the United States and manufacture there. The Munitions Board interfered and stopped that, and it was only after a number of us had painted the atmosphere a vermilion colour that we got action taken to permit the manufacture of Yankee shells in this country. Had this thing been properly looked after, had a business-like policy been followed in the matter, instead of our having an adverse rate of exchange and trade balance with the United States, these would have been largely in our favour, and the credit to us would have been upwards of a billion dollars rather than Canada being debtor to the United States. These things are worth noting in passing.

I do not know how many similar cases there are, but I know of one case where a gentleman had $5,000 to invest. A friend came to him and said: I want you to invest your $5,000 in Victory bonds. Oh, said the other, I am going to invest that in my business. But, said his friend this will not interfere with your business at all. You can invest in Victory bonds and we will take the bond as collateral and advance you all the money you want to carry on your business. So he said: All right, I will take $5,000 in Victory bonds. Said his friend: Oh, no you will take $100,000. "But I can never pay for it," said the prospective investor. "That is all right," said the other; "the Government guarantees the bank, and the bank will carry you." So the gentleman takes $100,000 in bonds. The Government puts up the money, the 5½ per cent bond interest balancing the 5½ per cent interest on the loan, as I am informed, and the gentleman is guaranteed that at the end of the year this long term Victory bond will sell at 105 or 107. At all events, I understand that he can sell to-day at nearly 103, make $3,000 on his investment and still have $5,000 to the good. If it goes up to 107 he makes $7,000 in selling the bond, and if he keeps it until the end of the term the chances are that he will be able to pay off the $100,000 and have the bond for himself. In short, there is a general opinion abroad among those who look into the matter that this Victory bond issue is for the benefit of the speculator, and not for patriotic purposes. Five and one-half per cent is a little high for patriotism on loans of this description, with the exemption clauses as they are here stated.

Now, Sir, I want to support this Government. I have not opposed them yet. I am only stirring them up a little now. I am drawing aside that camouflage veil to let a little light in on them, and I can assure them that more than the veil will be thrown aside later unless these gentlemen get a move on and see that this sort of speculation does not go on under the name of Victory. Imagine the absurdity of the placards that were distributed about the country: "Help our boys in the trenches," when there is hardly a man of them who has a son in the trenches. The thing is absurd on the face of it. It is camouflage; it is propaganda; it is deceiving the public, and so far as I am concerned I shall not be a party to it.

In connection with the re-establishment of the returned soldier, it is up to the Government to create good times, to create opportunities, to get population in here, to get money in from the United States. It is up to the Government to sell land to returned soldiers and let them bring their families in; it will build up cities, it will build up railways and canals and open up new avenues of life not only to the 400,000 soldiers who are returning, but to ten times 400,000 in the very near future.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I am like Othello; my occupation is gone. The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) had the temerity to stand up and say, in so many words, that he would support a Government which he has shown to be the most contemptible Government that ever administered the affairs of Canada. A more terrible indictment of any government in this country has never been delivered from the Opposition benches, much less from the side of the House on which the members of the Government sit. If I did not know my hon. friend to be an honest man, I would have commenced my discourse by saying that " when thieves fall out, honest men come by their own." But the hon. gentleman will have to be replied to from his own side of the House, and from the front benches of his own side of the House.

Unfortunately for Canada, unfortunately for the soldiers, particularly, the indictment that my hon. friend has made of the Government is only too true. It is lamentable. One of the last things that he pointed out was that in the floating of the Victory loans $50,000,000 were lost to the revenues of Canada. Any one who will analyse the negotiations in connection with the Victory Loan and the other war loans of Canada, and who will look at the success of the United States people in negotiating their war loans, cannot help coming to the same conclusion as that which my hon. friend has reached. Whom does this $50,000,000 fall upon? It falls upon our soldiers, those men over whom hon. gentlemen on the other side and some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have been slobbering for the last four or five months. People have been saying what they were going to do for our brave boys when they came home; but upon whom are these terrible war taxes going to fall more than upon anybody else in this country? Upon our soldiers. When our soldiers come home and settle down they are the nucleus of future Canada; 500,000 men who, by reason of their youth, possess the generative forces of future Canada in a very much greater degree than all the rest of us put together. They, then, are to be the future people of Canada on whom this great debt will ultimately fall. When we are talking about what we are going to do for the dear soldiers, the best thing we can do for them is to stop this terrible expenditure, this throwing away of the people's money, the public money of the country. There never has been a grosser or a more scandalous piece of maladministration in the history of any country than there has been in Canada during the last four years.

The revelations of the hon. member are simply marvellous, and I want, on behalf of the honest people of Canada and the honest members of this Parliament, to thank the honourable gentleman for having the courage of his convictions in standing up on his own side of the House, because those revelations will have a more far-reaching effect than if they had come from me, as in that case motives, political or otherwise, would be imputed.

I was astonished yesterday or the day before to hear an honourable gentleman opposite state that this was one of the greatest Governments that we had ever had in Canada. He made that statement in the first part of his speech, but he had not got very far before I saw he perceived the mermaid's head, although he did not see the dragon's tail. He was telling us about the great necessity there was in the Dominion of Canada for a Health Department, and he discovered before he got through that more than one person was looking for the job of head of that department.

One of the most terrible revelations that my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) gave to the House and to the country is something that will come out directly in history. I refer to the terrible sacrifice in Canadian life that has taken place in France and Flanders for the glory of certain individuals over there. That is something that is coming across only in little drib-drabs through the returned soldiers, but when we get it from the ex-Minister of Militia, who knows the circumstances, it is one of the most terrible indictments that was ever made in any parliament on the character of the men who were supposed to be looking after our military affairs.

We all knew that the Canadian boys were made the spearhead of the terrible offensives in France and Flanders. What do we find this Government doing now that the war is over? What gratitude has there been for Canada? The great altruistic, idealistic President of the United States had gone over to Europe and had mystified the European chancelleries with his high idealism. One would think it was the second coming of the great Nazarene to bring peace on earth, good will to men, coming to bring the millennium, producing the beautiful precept of the great Master: "If a man strikes you on one cheek, turn the other." That beautiful precept is, of course, meant for an ideal for people to live up to, to strive for, but is quite impracticable. "Sell all you have and give it to the poor"—a beautiful ideal to be lived up to. Our great southern President,—I mean the President of the United States—was over there and was acting the part of the great idealist, but he kept guard on his nose when he was showing first one cheek and then the other; he took mighty good care to guard his solar plexus. No sooner was the armistice signed than Mr. Hoover the Food Controller of the United States, was taken to Europe and he was put in charge of the feeding of the famine-stricken districts of Europe to fatten the larders of the people of the United States to the exclusion of Canada. What did we find in this country? We found that in the last week of January, the price of coarse grains, oats and barley, dropped, in a single week, twenty-five per cent, the result being that hundreds of hundreds of merchants throughout the country were ruined. What was our beautiful Government doing at that time? Where was our Food Controller? Instead of our Food Controller or some one else of some ability, some one who had enough business capacity to be able to buy and sell a cambric needle intelligently, being sent over, he was kept in Ottawa, and the result has been that we find some individual American firms getting $200,000,000 contracts while our people have been putting up money for some contracts down in the Balkan States which are still under blockade. That is the condition of things which we are up against. That is the satisfaction, that is the gratitude which Canada gets for being made the spearhead of the terrible offensives in Europe. It is enough to break a Canadian heart.

I want to say a few words about Union Government. Hon. gentlemen who occupy the front seats on the Opposition benches are, I believe, with a few exceptions, honest men.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Name the exceptions.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: But it is an unfortunate fact that the laws of nature have not provided for such a thing as Union Government unless it be for some single special purpose. When that single special purpose has been consummated, Union Government is an anachronism; in the nature of things, it does not fit the times. If you superinduce magnetism at the one end of the needle, the opposite magnetism takes places at the other. There is, in nature, no such thing as halfness that has any good to it. All nature is double and so is every one of its parts. You cannot have light if you have no darkness. You cannot have an "up" if you do not have a "down." You cannot have an attraction if you do not have a repulsion. If I went to pull my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) out of his chair, I would have to push as much with my feet as I pulled with my hands. I have said that all nature is double; and so is every one of its parts. A Union Government is an unnatural combination and comes into being only for a special purpose. But this country has more interests involved in its government than one. To win the war was one great purpose, and for a time overshadowed everything else. If the Union Government had been formed to win the war, and if the war was the only thing to which it was absolutely necessary for the people of Canada to apply themselves, then Union Government would be all right so long as that condition lasted. But the moment the armistice was signed and the war over Union Government was no longer fitted for the conduct of the affairs of this or any other country. Let me illustrate from history. The Province of Prince Edward Island has the second oldest responsible government of any community in North America. The local Government of Prince Edward Island is older than the American government, older than the governments of the Canadas, older than any other government in North America except Nova Scotia. Once, the province of Prince Edward Island had a coalition or union government on the school question. Hon. Sir Louis Davies, now Chief Justice of Canada, was premier of Prince Edward Island, and formed a coalition government on a fifty-fifty basis—not the promise of a fifty-fifty basis which was broken, but a real fifty-fifty. No sooner had this coalition government passed the legislation for which it was formed than a cleavage set in and the coalition ceased to exist almost immediately. Only one of the ministers of the Conservative persuasion changed his politics; the rest remained true to their old party. In the nature of things such a thing as a coalition government cannot exist. There is no co-ordination between our friends on the other side of the House, and it is no wonder they cannot do anything. The Government of this country has developed into an autocracy; there is no such thing as a democratic government in Canada to-day, and the most unfortunate thing about it is that we have got to keep this Government in power this session. So I was not at all astonished when I heard the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) say that he was still going to support this Government. I am going to support them too—that is, to the extent of giving them the best advice I can, and criticising them, of course, when I think they are wrong. But there is this to be said. We cannot have an election until the boys come home, so there is no use talking about turning this Government out yet. We have to submit to the inevitable; we have to submit to the results of the conspiracy of 1917—a conspiracy that will go down in history as one of the most diabolical acts of a class of people called politicians.

Now I am going to give my hon. friends on the other side of the House some advice. I shall give it in all sincerity and without the slightest tincture of either a partisan or a politician; I mean that kind of politician that gets glass eyes and seems to see the things that are not, which is Shakespeare's definition of a scurvy politician. My advice to the Government is this: Announce to the House on Thursday that at the end of this session this Parliament will be dissolved and a mandate sought from the people to conduct the Government of this country as a democracy, which we claim to be, and which we believed we were. That is the only way I see out of the terrible difficulty which the country is in at the present moment. With the House in session, and the suspension of Orders in Council in the interim, and the acceptance or rejection of Orders in Council that have already been passed, surely we can keep the Government going for this session, and when the session is over most of the soldiers will be home. In the meantime, I hope an amended Franchise Bill will have been passed, and I do also hope, in the interests of common decency and common honesty, that the Government will bring down such a Franchise Bill as will permit the electors of this country, men and women, to record their votes for their choice, instead of mutilating their votes as the War-Time Elections Act did.

I should perhaps have begun my speech by congratulating the mover and the seconder of the Address. For young men, they certainly did credit to themselves and honour to the House, and I sincerely congratulate them. But I must take issue with them both on some of the statements they have made. Much of what they said was all right, but notwithstanding their splendid effort, in my judgment they both erred. The mover of the Address (Mr. Redman) amongst other things talked about the deportation of alien enemies. Have we alien enemies in this country? If we have, they should have been deported long ago. But are the people whom we have subdued our enemies? Is that the spirit in our brave soldier boys who have brought honour to Canada and to the British name? Do our soldiers hold in their heart that terrible revenge that would jump upon a man when they have got him down? That is not what we in our part of the country consider bravery or justice or honour or anything that is good. I would ask hon. gentlemen who preach the doctrine that we ought to destroy these unfortunate people whom we have coaxed and cajoled to this country, and to whom we have given the right of citizenship, shall we be like the Prussian Kaiser and consider that citizenship a mere scrap of paper? I would suggest to these gentlemen that they should be a little careful; otherwise, perhaps they may run foul of the British Royal Family, for they are of German descent. Our great and good Queen Victoria was a beautiful German lady in her young days. Why, the very word "Anglo-Saxon," which to a great many people represents the ne plus ultra of race superiority, is taken right from the German. We are descendants of the German race, those of us who are of English descent, as I happen to be. But I thank Heaven I am a Canadian. My people for three hundred years have been born on this side of the water, and I am a typical Canadian. And for about three hundred years before me, my people have lived, and raised their families, and died under the British flag on this side of the water. As to these aliens, if there are disloyal people among them, send them home; they have no right here. But, if we have loyal German and loyal Austrians here, if we have loyal Turks here, let us make good citizens of them. For thirty years of my life I was " monarch of all I surveyed." During those years I was a commander of men—Canadians, Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen, Greeks, Germans, Dagoes, Negroes, and all the rest of them. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that of all those classes of men the Canadian was at the top—he was the best man of the lot. But I found this, Sir, that the Canadian, after all, was only an improved Englishman, Irishman, Scotchman or German. And, travelling around the world I found that the people who most readily lent themselves to assimilation, who were most ready to establish themselves completely in their foster country, were the Germans. I found this to be true whether they settled in Brazil among the Portuguese, in the Argentine Republic among the Spaniards, in the United States among the Anglo-Saxons—or Anglo-Celts if you like—or in Canada. And I would draw the attention of the House—and I do this simply because I can afford to do it; the hon. members from British Columbia or from some of the Western Provinces could not afford to do it for political reasons—to the fact that some of the worst characters we have in this country are old-country Englishmen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I hear a great deal of dissent. Mr. Speaker I know what I am saying to be a fact.

Mr. EDWARDS: And some of the best.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Sure! I would go even further and say perhaps the best. They are so bad because they have the qualities to make them the best. And remember this, the best things on earth, the best things that God has given us, are those that can be most abused. Take a woman as an example. Take whiskey as an example. Take brain power and intelligence as an example. Why, Sir, the worst character we have in Canadian public life—the worst we ever have had—is a man who was once a member of this House, a man so able that there are few to equal him. I am not mentioning any names—everybody will recognize the portrait. Intellect, when debased, becomes the greatest curse we have. These Englishmen to whom I have referred as among the worst characters we have are dangerous for the very reason that they have ability —superability. They take hold of these western dagoes and western Germans, and lead them into all sorts of Bolshevism. They are the leaders of Bolshevism in British Columbia, for instance. On the other hand, as I have said, some of the best men you have in this country are old-country Englishmen. There are good in all classes, and bad in all classes. It cannot be said of men, as the Scotchman said of whiskey,—he said that some whiskey was better than other whiskey, but all whiskey was good. All men are not good. Therefore, I urge these hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred not to discriminate against our citizens, no matter from what nationality they have sprung. Be just and honest; do what is right; and do not let this war hysteria longer permeate your hearts and brains. Get down to a reasonable basis and try to do some sane thinking and acting.

I want to pay my respects to the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder). I am sorry he is not in the House. The hon. gentleman the other day showed some signs of repentance. His claim to be a good Liberal is an outward acknowledgment of inward shame.

Hence I feel that he should be with us as it is only the hypocrite's tongue that speaks without the heart. I hope my hon. friend cannot be considered an incorrigible hypocrite. Repentance may avert evil. Repentance is accepted remorse. Repentance ends the suit which passion begins. Repentance should be accompanied by reparation and amendment; otherwise, it is like continually pumping an old ship without stopping the leak. I was going to tell my hon. friend that he was a deserter and that desertion is a disgraceful fault. The deserter has the spirit of a coward. He who at the approach of evil deserts his post is branded with cowardice. He who will desert a friend or cause for a price, be that price gold, place or power, will desert again when he gets a bigger price. So, I hope my hon. friend with proper purpose of amendment, can firmly force his jarring thought to peace as Burns has said in his beautiful epigram on Remorse which I quoted in the House last session.

I hope he may see his way clear to follow the light that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia saw to-night when he was looking at the darkness on the other side because, after all, knowledge is relative. Where you see a dark, black cloud there is a silver side to it. There is the antithesis, the opposite, and consequently I can fancy that I hear my hon. friend singing "Lead Kindly Light."

There is just one more point I want to take up and that is with regard to our soldiers. I owe a duty to the soldiers perhaps more than a great many other hon. members of this House, a great many of whom have been soldiers themselves. During the voluntary campaign I went out through my part of the country and explained to the boys that this fight was our fight, and that it was for the maintenance of our present democracy and civilization. I induced hundreds of those boys to go to the front as volunteers. I would not be discharging my duty to those boys, much less to all the soldier boys, if I did not give what appears to me to be the light that is in me to the Government and to the public generally.

In my opinion, the worst service that we can give our boys is to destroy their self-reliance, to destroy their character, to make them imagine that they are paupers, to make them think that they are the wards of the state, when, as a matter of fact, they are the state, and when, as I pointed out before, they are the future fathers of the families of this country. As the ex-Minister of Militia pointed out, all they ask is fair play and a fair show. Of course there are those who have been lamed and maimed, those who have been damaged in one way and another and the state should make reparation to them. The resolutions that I have seen passed by the War Veterans' Associations say that they do not want any charity, that they are not looking for charity, that they do not want to be slobbered over and they do not want the caresses of the politician. What they are looking for is their just due and the best and noblest thing we can do for them is to curtail the expenses of this country as far as possible; that is to say, not to waste money by extravagant expenditure and not to waste it on non-productive employment.

I want to say a few words on the question of non-productive employment. It is an unfortunate thing, perhaps, that a great many people think that if a man is paid for doing a piece of work he is earning something. That is not always the case. You can pay a man to carry bricks from one side of the yard and put them over on the other side and you can pay him to carry them back. There is only one element of virtue in that, and that is the element that makes him imagine that he is earning something. But he is earning nothing. It is only taking money out of one man's pocket and putting it in another man's pocket. It is not increasing the wealth of the world or of the nation. If this Government undertake to construct any public work that is not productive they are wasting money just as much as if they threw it into the Rideau canal or the Ottawa river. Labour represents capital and every hour that a man puts in at labour on an unproductive work represents so much waste. The only virtue in paying him is to prevent him from feeling that he is a pauper. But, from the economic standpoint, it is absolutely extravagance and waste. As the ex-Minister of Militia has pointed out, there is any quantity of work in this country that is productive and will provide labour not only for the returned soldiers, but for as many more if the Government will be careful to find out what these things are and put the men to work in these employments.

There are a lot of little iron trawlers that the Government used for patrol purposes during the war. I understand they put them up for tender a few days ago and that they have withdrawn the advertisement. very good; that is the proper thing to do if they see that they are not going to sell these vessels for nothing as they sold one the other day for $20,000 less than they could have got the day after.

If we took some of those trawlers, and hired, or chartered, them to some companies, or operated the vessels themselves under Government control, and employed some of the young fishermen who were volunteers, to catch fish in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and in the Atlantic ocean on the banks, that would be furnishing employment that would pay cent for cent. That would not only be productive employment, but yield a revenue in excess of that. Then too, men sent out to explore the country, as the hon. ex-Minister of Militia pointed out, could also be placed at productive work. That is to say any explorations of the north lands of this country, if they are carried out efficiently and intelligently, would more than likely pay cent per cent, and even more, as compared with the outlay that would be involved.

But, Sir, if the Government is going to build ships at $200 a ton, ships that cost in ante bellum days $25 a ton, what will be the result? There is going to be a great deal of non-productive employment, because no ship costing $200 a ton can compete with a ship that costs $100 a ton. Let me draw the attention of my hon. friends on the Government benches to this fact with regard to ships, because I am now discussing a question that I know something about. I have been to sea a long time, but I want to say that to-night I am more at sea than ever. Let me point out that the cost of a ship, other things being equal, has everything to do with the earning power, for this reason: we have got to insure a ship whether it costs $100 a ton or $200 a ton. They carry the same cargo, and if you insure a ship costing $200 you are out the insurance on $100 as compared with the vessel of cheaper cost. In other words, the one ship cannot compete with the other. The same thing is true with regard to the question of wear and tear, which is a very large element in shipping, and is a percentage wear and tear. Consequently, you see that it is absolutely necessary, in order to have ships that pay, that they shall not cost more than the ships they are competing with, otherwise they are bound to be a failure. I am not going to find fault with the Government for starting to build ships last year. When it undertook the construction of ships last year, it did not know that the war was going to end so suddenly. However, we want to get clear of these contracts just as soon as it is humanly possible to do so, and not give orders for the building of any more at these exorbitant prices. If you want to give occupation for the benefit of the men needing it, to prevent unemployment and unrest in this country, put them at works that are productive, and then nobody can find fault.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friend on the other side of the House, to whom I have already referred, told us he was a Liberal I knew "the word was on the lip, but the condition was in the soul." A man who says he is a Liberal is not one unless he acts as a Liberal. The man who last year voted, for instance, for the conferring of titles is not a Liberal, because every man in the House and in the country knows that the minute you confer a title on an ordinary individual he ceases to be a Liberal, he becomes an aristocrat, a plutocrat, he is no longer a democrat, and if he is not a democrat he cannot be a Liberal. Another thing that pained me: When my hon. friend the seconder of the resolution, which we are discussing to-night, made that splendid effort of his, and developed and discovered to the House his fine ability as a speaker, and as a thinker, I was sorry to recollect that he was one of the young men who did not—although he faced with all the courage of a Canadian the Hun gas and the Hun gun—have the courage of his own convictions, because last year he talked against titles and voted for them. It was a lamentable thing, but it was not half as bad as the case of the hon. gentleman who made the motion when the right hon. leader of the Government came in and offered what he called an amendment, but which was not an amendment, which actually nullified the original motion, because it accepted the original motion and added in substance after the word "Canada" the words, "except His Majesty shall resign or hand over his prerogative to a party politician in Canada." In other words the right hon. leader of the Government was usurping the power of the King in the conferring of titles, and the hon. gentleman to whom I refer did not have the courage to defend his own motion, but darted around behind one of the back pillars of this Chamber and dodged the vote. The ex-Minister of Militia, in the course of his speech, spoke about the wonderful exhibition of independence there was in this House. I thought to myself, "If that is what you call independence, dodging a vote upon your own convictions, I do not know what the independence of Parliament means." There are a lot of hon. gentlemen in this House who, as I said last session, sit and listen to the front benches like a lot of young robins, or young crows, with their mouths open, ready to receive worms, shingle nails, or anything else they drop in. That is the kind of food they swallow, and the result is moral and political dyspepsia. But that is not independence. Each man ought to think for himself, and if you want to have good government in this country, I don't care what the question is before the House, every man ought to record his voice and his vote according to his honest conviction. Of course, compromises may be made, I understand that, and there may be cases where a man in order to retain his seat may have to vote for the Government whether he thinks right or not, but the doctrine I have laid down certainly should apply. But that certainly should not apply to the members who sit in this House apart from the Cabinet; it is questionable whether it is even good political morality on the part of members of the Government itself.

So much for independence. I now want to say a few words about this Victory Loan. Any one—I do not care who he is, even if he is a member of the Government—who voted for the exemption of the Victory Loan from taxation is not a Liberal; or if he is he is voting against his conscience. He may be considering that he is choosing the lesser of two evils; that is the only moral ground on which he could rest a vote of that kind. If any Liberal principle was violated more than any other in connection with the Victory Loan, it was the principle which was violated by that clause exempting the loan from taxation. What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? It means that you are exempting from taxation the millionaire, the man who has idle money, with the necessary result that the taxation that ought to be paid by the millionaires is going to fall upon the poor people, the working people. The men of business, the men of affairs, the men who are doing the work of the country, will have to pay the taxes while the big interests who contributed to the Victory Loan will draw their interest and sit like a bump on a log, doing nothing for the good of the country, living on their money and paying no taxes. Yet these people will be protected in their life, in their property, in their liberty, by those who have to pay the taxes. That is not Liberalism. If a man stands up on the floor of this House and, while saying that he is a Liberal, votes for a thing like that, it may truly be said that the words are on the lip but the condition is in the soul—and it is not a Liberal condition.

Away back in 1326 or thereabouts our forefathers waded to their knees in blood in order to draw from old King John the Magna Charta of our liberties, the Habeas Corpus Act, the Bill of Rights that was handed down to us as the palladium of our liberties, and we were asked to guard it with our lives. But this Government, Sir, violated the Habeas Corpus Act. It is true that they got the Supreme Court to whitewash them—and they paid them well.

Men who have sat on the other side of the House, calling themselves Liberals, who have not repealed the 7½ per cent war tax on goods, are not Liberals, because Liberalism stands for equal rights. Liberalism stands for freedom of trade and for opposition to the protecting of and catering to special privileges and the granting of special privileges. The only way my friends on the other side, who say that they are Liberals, can show that they are true Liberals, is to renounce their Toryism, repent and make reparation.

> While the light holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return.

There is some talk about a new party, the Farmers' party. I want to say that the Farmers' party and the Liberal party are one and the same thing. It is not one name for different things, like the Union Government; it is two names for the same thing. I have here a letter from our great chieftain addressed to myself; probably one of the last letters that he wrote on a political question. I shall read a few words of it to show that the farmers and the Liberals are one and the same party. I had written to Sir Wilfrid Laurier to learn what his policy would be when he called the convention which was, as he said, to meet next summer. This is his reply:

> You have noticed that in Wilson's fourteen conditions for peace the third provides for 'the removal so far as possible of economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.'

That was the third clause of President Wilson's conditions for peace. Sir Wilfrid's comment on these words was as follows:

This is in line with the accepted doctrine of the Liberal party and seems to me a condition sine qua non for the removal of war possibilities between the nations. In so far as we in Canada are concerned, the most essential policy would be the largest possible measure of free trade between us and the United States. You have seen that the Western farmers have put that plank in the forefront of their platform as recently formulated. It is simply a reiteration of their old policy which they have never ceased to advocate. This will be equally acceptable to you in Prince Edward Island.

I want to say that it is. To those gentlemen who come from the West, may I point out that while some of the western papers and some of the western members talk about the East being against them, so far as my province is concerned our interests are identical with those of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. We stand to a man for Liberal principles and free trade, and although I should hate to see my good friend over there beaten, we will send to the next parliament a solid phalanx of Liberals. With regard to the tariff, I want to say that, notwithstanding what Sir Wilfrid Laurier has said, namely, that we cannot settle finally the tariff question until peace is signed because the conditions of peace may make all the difference in the world, what we can do and ought to do at the first opportunity the Government can give to the matter is to accept in its entirety the reciprocity agreement that was offered to us by the United States in 1911. It is the more important that that should be done immediately because the Congressional elections in the United States last fall went Republican and Republicans are, as hon. members know, not overly enamoured of free trade principles. But if it is once upon their statute books and our statute books, after the way in which the Canadians have served the United States and the Empire so well in this great war, because we were fighting not only for the Empire but for them and ourselves, and for them particularly, because they were laggards in getting to work at the war, I do not believe they would have the temerity to change the reciprocity agreement, for that would be looked upon, at least by us, as an unfriendly act. Therefore, let the Government take the 7½ per cent super-tax off at once; let them have the reciprocity agreement ratified immediately, and then at the next session of Parliament, which should be summoned as soon as possible, let them take up the question of the tariff. While I am sorry that this Government has been so prolific in its production of useless commissions—and I am told that the expenditure on them per day is about $8,000 for nothing—at the same time I think the Government would be justified in creating a commission to take up the whole tariff question, such commission to be composed of equal numbers of Liberals and Conservatives, or, if you like, of high tariff men and low tariff men, men above reproach, men who cannot be bought, because unfortunately, in this country there are on the one side of this question the big interests and on the other side the poor unfortunate ratepayers. If you can get a commission that will give fair play, they can determine, in the meantime, what tariff reductions should be made and how far we can go with free trade without injuring the vested interests of anybody in this country. Somebody is bound to be hit in any change of tariff. You cannot make a change in the tariff without hitting somebody, and you are going to hit even people who will eventually be benefited, because in the readjustment that is bound to take place after the tariff is either lowered or raised, somebody has to suffer who may eventually benefit by the change that is made, either up or down.

Mr. HOWARD PRIMROSE WHIDDEN (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the motion that is before the House, I find myself in somewhat of a predicament lest, after we have passed from rather dark tragedy to high comedy, there be a shading away into melodrama.

I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion that is before us, not in any formal or stock phrase, but because of a personal appreciation of the words uttered by those gentlemen as voicing the strong and sound sentiments entertained by them, sentiments which have grown out of experiences which many of us would have gladly shared along with them.

I would not be doing the thing that would express my deepest thought if I did not also pay a tribute of respect for and appreciation of the great leader of the Opposition party whose chair is vacant before us. It was my privilege, just before leaving home for this city, in standing before a group of young people, to speak with honest conviction of the worth and work of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. With all due respect to the consistency of the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Jos. Read), I do not think the fallen chieftain was really the less a Liberal when he accepted his title.

My impression is that the Government has not in this debate so far suffered severely at the hands of the Opposition. In fact, the pin-pricks have been most mild, and furthest from the presenting of any thing in the way of a constructive contra, there has been but the time worn attempt to belittle the things that in themselves may or may not have been of conspicuous importance. I had hoped to pass on immediately to emphasize two or three things that appeal to me as being of outstanding value in the suggested programme as contained in the Address, but I must refer to one or two matters brought up partly this evening and partly on previous occasions by members of the Opposition.

The hon. member for Prince has, in my judgment, gone out of his way this evening to cater to the aliens.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: There are no aliens in my constituency.

Mr. WHIDDEN: I am sure hon. members on this side of the House will take second place to none in our recognition of the genuine citizenship of foreign born people who have really been willing to be Canadianized.

But as to those who are not willing either outwardly or inwardly, save under the pressure of threatened penalty, to accept the Canadian standard and to believe in the things for which our nation stands, I am satisfied that we should be untrue to the men who have gone overseas to represent us and untrue to all of our gallant allies, if we were not willing now that the armistice has been signed to assume that attitude toward the alien enemy in our land—the man who is alien in spirit—which true freedom-loving Canadians have a right to assume, and a right to retain until the aliens change their attitude or go home. There are still some alien enemies in Canada who are very much in the position of one of their number, who in a western city a few years ago in connection with the taking of some local census called at the door of a settlement worker of great intelligence and of fine patriotism and asked who resided there. On being told, he attempted to put the name down in his book and then asked what the householder's nationality was. This man with many United Empire Loyalist forebears drew himself up and sought to convey the idea in his soul to the little foreign Canadian in his presence. He used the word "Canadian" more than once in trying to explain what his nationality was and the census man said "Oh, Canadian, Canadian! not many of them people around here." We should all be Canadians around here.

Mr. Speaker, until the word "nationality" ceases to be used in the press and in the clubs and in private groups by men of foreign birth as applied to themselves and their own blood—immigrant groups—not until then will it be possible for us to accord to them the welcome which the hon. member who has spoken before me (Mr. Read) seems so willing to extend to them. There is only one nation in Canada. This is not an aggregation of British American Balkan states and please God it never will be. The attitude of the average man who has gone over and fought our battles, the man of the deep passion and also of the deep sense of the difference between right and wrong, as he represented it and as he found it over there, is having something to say to us to-day and will continue to have something to say to us on the question, what shall constitute Canadian citizenship? We shall hear his voice and in the main I am satisfied that he will speak the right word concerning the people within our borders of foreign birth. We welcome them to continue in our midst if they have caught the soul of Canada, if they are willing to try to understand the meaning of that soul as it has been newly fired and newly shaped during these epoch making days of the past four and a half years. I could not quite understand the combination on the opposite side of "our President" and the questionable fault finding of our gracious Majesty King George in his attempt to entertain "our President." This is surely a new combination for the floor of the Canadian Parliament.

Just a word with regard to "the light." It seems to be sinking lower. Whether the oil is failing or the wick is not being sufficiently cared for I am not prepared to say, but the light does not seem to have the charms that those who placed it in the window seemed to think it would have. In fact I am inclined to believe that it serves more as a warning light in its spluttering and dying moments. There are no sinners on the Government side for whom we need to be ashamed. It is true that there may be need for a choir to chant the good old words "Lead Kindly Light," but pray Heaven may give us an angelic choir, and not the choir put up by the Opposition in the present Parliament.

The returning soldier is not going to be patronized, coddled or paternalized by the present Government. The plans of this Government are fully as far advanced as those of any of the governments of the belligerent countries at the present time, and in many respects they are further advanced than the plans of some of these countries. I believe that one of the great things is for the people of Canada at large to understand the returned soldier's mind. No government can do all that needs to be done for those who have fought for us and are returning to their homes again. The people generally must recognize that the soldier is anxious to become a civilian as speedily as possible and I hope that the splendid officers who are now returning home after having served so gallantly in leading our troops overseas will help to show every private and noncommissioned officer once they have returned to civil life that we are a democratic people, that we are all one. The men who have fought and are returning home are equally worthy of our best recognition and regard. Let no distinctions be drawn; let there be no false ratings; let one and all be the men we know they are—our bravest and our best. The Government is planning for the returning soldiers courageously, thoughtfully and scientifically and these good soldiers will soon find that though some of their old places in the business world may have been filled up that there is still a large place for them, and that upon their soldiers here in the home land there will still rest obligations to live for Canada though they, first and best of all, were willing to die for Canada on foreign soil.

Among the many conspicuous items in the Address which suggest to us in the briefest possible way the Government's programme there are two or three that stand out above all others; and they are what might be called the human or social-agency elements. The war has caused confusion, but it has brought about also new alignments. Let there be no mistake, this is the natural outcome of such a period of conflict upon political affiliations in the best sense as well upon the thinking of intelligent citizens. As a result of what men have fought for there is the emergence of a new thinking, the evidence of a new emphasis, of willingness on the part of men and women the wide country through, and of our Government, that the things that count are the things to be legislated upon first while the things that concern the material can take second place. This has not been a battle for land, or for any material thing; as has so often been said in the press, on the platform and in Parliament, it has been a battle of ideas, it has been a conflict of the spirit—the spirit of the right against the spirit of the wrong. And there is abundant evidence, to all eyes that are willing to see, in the programme which is suggestively set before us in the Address, of the recognition of the fact that the war has produced a greater willingness than ever before in the history of the country for government to legislate for the interests of all the people in building up a nation that will endure. I mention first, good housing. We may have our parish ideas about that. Some of us may naturally feel that we do not need any more good houses where we live, and that the Government is making a mistake. But then no one of us lives in all parts of the country at the same time. I suppose that even those who come from the West, if they were able to live longer in the East, might see some things here that it is hard for us to see on our hurried visits. And I am sure that if eastern Canadians were to spend more time in the West they too would find conditions other than they have supposed. The housing proposal of the Government is an evidence that the representatives of the Canadian people are keeping abreast of the other democratic members of the Allies—and they are all democratic.

The Government, wisely, and in due recognition of the sociological law and economic conditions, has proposed to bring down legislation to put into force for one year after peace is declared the terms of the Order in Council with regard to the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. Let none of our people in Canada be afraid that Canada is going to be a back number in this respect. The back numbers among the nations are those who ignore the demands of the best thinking, the highest conception of the development of the life of the individual and of the state as a whole. And is our Government proposing to do anything that does not recognize to the fullest the right of every Canadian citizen to have a say in this matter? It is certainly intimated that after the soldiers are all home there shall be a vote taken on this question, that the Canadian people shall once more put themselves on record with regard to this important, this vital problem. And I trust when we do take up the proposed legislation in this Parliament, the Canadian people as a whole, while making use of the opportunity afforded in the publicity which may be induced, will not forget the fact that Canada stands next door to a very populous, prosperous and wealthy nation which has just taken a new stand, and that if we forget or ignore that condition it might mean that, instead of prosperity and individual freedom on a larger scale being ours, we should become the dumping ground of the worst elements and the worst type of business men that the North American continent could send through our open door.

The proposal for a Department of Public Health has been received with some words of commendation and some words of criticism. There are undoubtedly in this House many who believe that it might be possible to broaden the scope by changing the word from "Health" to "Welfare." But, even if the term "Health" is retained, there still may be possible the co-ordinating of a great many activities, agencies and officials to operate for the best interest of the people and the safeguarding of physical life in relation to coming demands to be made upon it. Let no hon. member of the Opposition imagine for one moment that some unpatriotic physician is looking for an easy task. I hope that some outstanding physician will have something very real to do with this Department when it is established. I am satisfied that the new department will benefit the little children and the older children as well, of our great cities and of all the districts of western Canada. Canada peopled by a foreign population, who if they knew how and were placed under more advantageous domestic conditions would do better for the little ones that come to their home, that come to them in such large numbers as a general thing.

If the schools of our country are to mean all that they should with regard to the mental development of the coming generation, the children of all the provinces of Canada need to be under the constant thought and regard of a great department which shall have a care for them and for all that concerns them as valuable assets of this country in the coming years.

Just a word as to the other social feature that stands out prominently in the Address—that is the proposed legislation in regard to vocational education. I am satisfied that a great deal needs to be done along this line for the young mechanics, and for the children of the older mechanics in our great industrial centres in connection with thoroughly modern and up-to-date instruction in night schools. I am satisfied that a million dollars a year or thereabouts will be a slight beginning in the right direction in order to meet the situation as it is today. We are already aiding agricultural education in a limited way. I venture to suggest, Sir, that at a very early date, possibly during this session, the Government should consider the advisability of widening its interest in, and its contribution to, the work of education.

If our material resources are to be developed as they should be by our Canadian people themselves in relation to the building up of a future great and good country, we, as a Canadian people, must have more provided for us in the way of technical education generally. Is it not rather a shame, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time one technical institution across the line in the great republic to the south of us has a larger yearly budget than the combined budgets of all the technical departments of our Canadian universities and technical schools from coast to coast.

This is not a purely provincial matter and I for one do not believe that the members of this House or the Canadian people are going to be afraid of any difficulties in connection with the British North America Act in relation to it. Let us have the splendid beginning that it is proposed to make in the interest of vocational education this year and let that give place to a larger, and increasingly generous and important programme for technical work in order that our young men and young women may have placed within their reach the possibility of securing instruction along lines that have been so splendidly organized and provided in the Motherland and that we too must provide in the immediate future if we are to meet the demands that will be made upon us in the days of expansion ahead. Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in supporting the motion before the House and I am satisfied that the country will learn with satisfaction that measures are being introduced, and that legislation will be enacted, that are in the interests of the great body of returning heroes and in the interests of the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. JOSEPH E. S. D'ANJOU (Rimouski.) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to join the honourable members who have spoken before me, in expressing my humble but most earnest sympathy on the occasion of the demise of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose whole life was identified with the noblest traditions of his race and whose disappearance from the political arena of Canada is so deeply regretted, not only by the whole province of Quebec but by the whole Dominion. In fact, he was the idol not only of the French Canadians, who acknowledged him as their best friend and their most zealous vindicator, but also of the English-speaking Canadians, who admired his genius, the broadness of his views and his spirit of justice towards all the races inhabiting our beloved country.

The Liberal party in Canada has just lost, in Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the most illustrious and most respected of its chieftains; the province of Quebec, the greater and most distinguished of her sons, and Canada, the man who converted this colony, small though it were before 1896, into a happy and prosperous nation. Therefore, scarcely had the eminent and regretted chief of the Liberal party breathed his last when the people began to talk of erecting monuments to his memory on our public squares. Surely a monument will be erected in every part of the country to the memory of the man who was the greatest of us all. But at this very moment thousands and thousands of monuments are being erected in order to perpetuate the remembrance of the remarkable man who has been removed from our sight, and those monuments, Sir, are to be found in the heart of every Canadian worthy of the name and holding remembrance in veneration. Laurier is no more, but his shadow hovers forever in this House, whose chambers have so often resounded with his powerful and eloquent voice.

Laurier has not died entirely, his mind remains with us and will continue to inspire us so that we may always follow the path of honour and of justice from which he himself never deviated throughout his long and fruitful career. From beyond, our great fellow-citizen will keep his eyes on us, and will be pleased to witness that we are not giving up the good battles which he so gallantly fought during the whole of his life for the defence of the rights of the Canadian people, for, as it was written by Sully Prudhomme, "beyond the graves, the eyes which we have closed, do yet see."

The life of Laurier, made wholly of simplicity, honesty and untiring devotion to his country is, for us of the younger generation a model to be followed. Let us love our country, let us work for our country as Laurier did and we may bear witness to ourselves that we have been useful to Canada, our common country.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. They proved equal to the task and showed a spirit of true independence which bids well for the future. But while I am glad to congratulate the hon. members, I regret, Sir, not to be able to tender my compliments to the Government for having ignored the rights of His Majesty the French language in the present occurrence. Truly, there is no reason to justify their attitude and I protest with the utmost energy against such an outrage upon the rights of the French language in this House and in the Dominion. I may be told that there have been precedents. I care not. Precedents do not eliminate rights which were acquired and formally recognized and sanctioned. It is not a question of begging for justice, liberty and right, for the French language is one of the two official languages of this country, and as such must be respected. As the hon. Premier of Saskatchewan said in the course of a speech which he delivered before the legislative assembly of that province recently, the French language is the tongue which was used by the first inhabitants of this Dominion, by the missionaries who soaked its soil with their blood and opened this country to civilization and Christianity.

The Government had among its supporters a member who was perfectly qualified to second the Address in French. I mean the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Mackie), who would surely have appreciated the honour and would have fulfilled the task successfully. The language which they persecute and wish to see eliminated from this Parliament is nevertheless the language spoken by the great Marshal Foch and by the famous General Pau whom we had the privilege to greet here a few days ago, and by all the French poilus who, by their obstinate courage, have contributed more than any other to the preservation of civilization and liberty. It is also the language spoken by the famous 22nd French Canadian Battalion which won eternal fame at the front and whose splendid achievements there are innumerable. Moreover it is the language spoken by nearly three million Canadians, the inhabitants of this country who, though loyal subjects of the British crown are first of all, primarily and always Canadians, following the motto of our late lamented leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and respectful of the rights of other nationalities but mindful of their own, and ever ready to firmly require that they be recognized and respected.

While on this question, may I be permitted to read an extract from a letter addressed by one Mr. Phalen to the Ottawa Citizen recently, in which the writer made the following right observations on the failure of fanaticism:

> No wonder the educated class in Great Britain has given up the narrow idea of "one flag, one language, one school." They are nearer the horrible demonstrations than we are. The Poles, the Zecho-Slovacks and the people of Alsace-Lorraine are not far from London; and to bring us still nearer, the British Parliament, in July last, adopted the principle of bilingualism for Scotland—a victory for the beautiful old gaelic language.

It will not be long before Canada finds itself all alone still clinging to the discredited policy of unilingualism "One flag, one language!" This sounds well until the time when you remember that in all the countries where it was applied, the "one flag" has given way to several flags and the number of languages has remained the same.

Five years ago, there were two or three flags in Europe, the preservation of which based on the suppression of a dozen languages. The flags are gone, but the languages have remained.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of this House, and of those who are now listening to me, to the pitiable expression on the faces of the hon. members opposite the other day, when the hero of 1870, the renowned General Pau honoured us with his visit.

That was another illustration of the merits of bilingualism, but unfortunately our friends on the other side were unable, on account of their ignorance of the French language, to appreciate the eloquent remarks made by the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) on that occasion. As they thought probably that the hon. member was resuming his criticism of the Government, they dared not applaud the words of welcome addressed to the glorious wounded of 1870.

Once more, Mr. Speaker, as a member of this House and on behalf of the people whom I have the honour to represent here, I wish to be placed on record as protesting most energetically against the action of the Government, who, deliberately and without any justification renounced an old tradition and seriously impaired the rights of the French in this Parliament and the whole Dominion.

I do not intend to deal with all the matters mentioned in the Governor General's speech. For most of them were discussed on their merit and justly criticised.

However, I must say at once that I look askance at the new franchise measure enabling women to sit in Parliament. There may be found somewhere people who shall think that I am wanting in gallantry towards the ladies; that is of no consequence to me and will not alter my views.

Last year, when the bill enfranchising women was discussed, I gave my opinion upon the principle of the Bill and you may rest assured, Sir, that I still hold the same opinion. To-day as yesterday, I am utterly opposed to any dabbling in politics by women. They do not love their country those who invite them to exceed their attributes and who offer them an opportunity to enter the political arena. The passing of such a measure would necessarily and inevitably destroy harmony in Canadian homes. This is an unpatriotic measure and one detrimental to Canada, and I wish you to believe that I shall oppose it with all my might when it comes before the House for discussion.

The speech from the Throne is especially interesting on account of the matters which are not even mentioned. For instance, nothing is said concerning the policy of the Government as to the abolition of the censure which gags the press of this country. The retention of censure is a nameless outrage and the Government should not wait to be compelled to suppress it. In the name of outraged popular liberties and of all lovers of freedom, I beg the Government to do away at once with censure. With censure removed, we should also witness the ending of the shocking abuse of Orders in Council. For the present Government shall be known in after ages as having ruled by Orders in Council. During a single year, they have had the prodigious audacity to pass more Orders in Council than all the Governments who ruled the country since the time of Confederation up to 1916 had passed during that long period of time.

For more than four years they said war was waged in defence of democracy and freedom among nations. Canada also took part in that horrible struggle in order to ensure the victory of democracy against autocracy, of freedom against bondage, according to the disunion Government who rule the country by Orders in Council and through countless commissions. Notwithstanding which Sir, there is probably not a country in the world enjoying less freedom than Canada at the present time.

We have responsible government no longer and the most sacred rights of the people are trampled upon by a combination of men reflecting the acme of fanaticism and having but one aim: to oppress the people and to get rich at their expense.

The present Government committed enough encroachments to stir up ten revolutions in our country.

To rule the country by means of Orders in Council is an intolerable and revolting policy. However, that is what the Government has been doing since the last elections. They even passed many of them when Parliament was sitting. Such conduct fully savours of Hun methods and deserves the reprobation of every honest man, of all those who are fond of freedom and would like to see it grow once more on Canadian soil.

I am desirous of calling attention to another encroachment, also a most serious one: the sending of our soldiers into the snow-bound mountains of Siberia. Have our present day potentates taken the advice of the people; have they consulted the Canadian Parliament before deciding upon such a course? No, Sir. As they always do, they disregarded the rights of the people and added another outrage to their record, disreputable as it was. And who are those that were sent in the distant regions of Siberia? Were volunteers enlisted for an expedition of that kind? No; poor conscripts were compelled to go to a place where the Military Service Act of 1917 was putting them under no obligation to go.

The conscription Act was passed in order to maintain our military strength at the front, that is in France. Consequently, the Government have no plausible reason to give in explanation of that silly military venture in Siberia. Such encroachments may involve the most serious consequences for our country. Surely the people will get tired at last and say at no distant date, appropriating to themselves the stinging reproach of Cicero to Catilina:—"How long, O! Borden, wilt thou take advantage of my forbearance?" Unfortunately, when we shall have reached that stage, it will be too late, and our self-styled Union Government having sown the wind will reap the tempest.

Among the hon. members who addressed this House, several raised the question of military defaulters. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I shall say a few words on that very delicate matter.

If a few young men neglected to report for military duty, it is because they thought they would be more useful to their country and to the Allied cause in doing so. Most of them were farmers or sons of farmers. They believed it was better for them to remain here and work on the land, thus contributing to the success of the Allies in supplying them with food which they needed so much to feed their soldiers. The tillers of the soil played an important and praiseworthy part throughout that dreadful war which, thank God, culminated in a complete victory for our armies. Therefore the Government ought to show themselves more lenient toward the defaulters and pardon them all with a full amnesty. After all, these men were not altogether wrong in remaining on the land to work, in order to supply the Allies with food, as the hon. Minister of Public Works stated in his speech on the Address that, in 1917, the transportation of agricultural products was more useful than that of soldiers. These products were obtained through the exertions of these young men, who thought they were also helping the cause of the Allies in digging trenches in the ground to reap larger crops and prevent our soldiers from dying with hunger.

As a member of this House and representing a county, which supplied hundreds of volunteers, two of whom were awarded the Victoria Cross, I beg the Government to stop persecuting the defaulters and to grant them peace henceforth.

However, Mr. Speaker, there are people in this country whom the Government ought to punish, and their reason for abstaining is probably that they are nearly related to them. The men whom the Government ought to punish, either by a fine or imprisonment, are not the defaulters or deserters, but the profiteers, who enriched themselves here during the war, while our boys were giving their lives in Europe in defence of liberty and civilization. Those men like Flavelle and many others whose names I forget just now, were selling their "bacon" and all their goods at exorbitant prices, exploiting the people and reaping the profits, while, over there, our poor soldiers many a time were starving and giving their blood and making the supreme sacrifice for the triumph of civilization and democracy. I believe those are the individuals whom the Government ought to punish. Perhaps the jails would not be large enough to keep them all. Instead of obtaining titles and peerages for them, the Government should rather send them to the penitentiary for a few years at least, if not for the remainder of their lives.

The present Government assumes on all occasions the attitude of a benefactor, of a friend and a father to the soldiers, to those who went voluntarily and fought on the soil of France and shed their blood with the poilus to ensure the triumph of democracy over autocracy. This Government, while pretending to patronize the young men who, volutarily and without the need of a coercive measure, went and fought on the battle fields, either do not know what is going on, or their organization is defective.

In the county of Rimouski, one of the counties which supplied the largest number of volunteers in the Quebec district, we glory in having two soldiers who fought with such bravery that they were awarded the Victoria Cross. Among others in the city of Rimouski, there is a family which gave three sons voluntarily to the war. One of them was killed; the two others were wounded. One of the three is back from the front and the Government saw fit to give him some kind of a job. They appointed him caretaker of the armoury at Rimouski. This man who is married and has one child gets a salary of $45 a month, along with a monthly pension of $5. Up to now, the young man did not complain, but to-day the Government informs him that if he does not carry on the work for $10 a month, the position will be given to somebody else. However the brave boy is completely disabled and unable to earn a living as he used to do before enlisting.

I belive, Sir, that a Government who, as we know, secured power by exalting the patriotism of our soldiers, who promised everything to them, who used to say in this Parliament as well as on the hustings that there was nothing too good and too fine for our returned soldiers, ought to care a little more now for these men who left voluntarily and did their utmost, many of whom have sacrificed their lives or have returned incapacitated forever, thus being unable to resume their pre-war activities.

The other day, the hon. Acting Prime Minister told us that the War-time Election Act may be expected to remain on our statute books. I take it, Sir, that this Act is the most iniquitous piece of legislation that was ever imposed by a Government on any country in the world. It has enabled the Government and the party in office to steal the elections, and it is the most bare-faced robbery that was ever perpetrated or recorded in history. They have disfranchised Canadians who have been living in the country for fifteen or twenty years, who had been invited to this country by the former Government, who had been granted letters of naturalisation and upon whom had, at the same time, responsibilities and rights had been conferred. And not the least among the rights was the franchise. Those men had perhaps cast their votes at several elections, but because they were of German or Austrian extraction, and the Government thought they would record their vote for the Opposition, they have been disfranchised.

Now the war is over—perhaps too soon to the liking of our hon. friends on the other side who would have rather see it protracted—but, after all, it is an accomplished fact; peace is about to be signed and this Government who were returned to power only for the war, should repeal all the Acts passed for the duration of the war. I take it therefore that the Government is recreant to its duty in letting that Act remain on our statute books. But what can we expect from a Government composed of men who have banded together not for winning the war, but for winning the elections and making money. What else could be expected from a Government who have climbed into office by the means we are all aware of and who will leave no stone unturned to get a new lease of power. Mr. Speaker, all the speeches we have listened to from the hon. gentlemen on the other side were so many appeals to union and harmony in this country. It is all very well to appeal to union but it would be still better to put it into practice, and if those hon. gentlemen are sincere in their professions and really wish peace, harmony and concord to revive here, let them take the means of realising it. Let us put a stop to that campaign of fanaticism and hatred that is being carried on in Canada; let the different ethnical elements of our population come to a better understanding, if we want peace to prevail in our Canadian homes. If we want the unrest referred to by the hon. Minister of Public Works which really exists in this country to disappear and peace and quiet to be restored, let the Government give up administering the country by Order in Council. Let grievances be redressed and liberty have full sway, if we want our country to resume its march onward towards a bright future, and to work out its destinies and occupy the place it is entitled to in the council of nations. That state of things should cease, and as the late hon. Mr. Mercier said: "Let us put a stop to our fratricidal wrangles," and we ought to remember that we are all Canadians, whatever may be our extraction. Loyal as we are to British institutions, we love above all Canada, and it is the duty of members of Parliament, of those who exercise some influence over their fellow countrymen to preach that doctrine and especially to put it into practice. And to the men who will have devoted themselves to that task the country will owe a debt of gratitude.

There are some Ontario people who understand us. There should be more. There are also some to be found in the other provinces, but let us all realise that before being French, English or Scotch, we are Canadians, and that through love of our country it is our duty not to arouse religion or national animosities, and not to revive the conflicts of the past by heated appeals to racial and creed prejudices. Let the policy of our revered chieftain who has passed away, a policy of peace and harmony which he advocated in his lifelong career, but which he did not see brought to realization, triumph and be carried out.

Let us hope that in the great beyond he may see in a near future all the citizens of every race and religion joining together in an united effort, clasping hands and working together for the happiness and prosperity of our common country, Canada.

On motion of Mr. Michael Clark the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 11, respecting The Central Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. McMaster.

Bill No. 12, respecting W. C. Edwards & Company, Limited.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 13, respecting The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Morphy.

Bill No. 14, respecting The Lachine, Jacques Cartier and Maisonneuve Railway Company.—Mr. Lemieux.

Bill No. 15, respecting The Western Dominion Railway Company.—Mr. Morphy.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Burrell the House adjourned at 10.50 p.m. until Thursday.

Thursday, March 6, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

List of persons permitted to take intoxicating liquors into the Northwest Territory during the year ended December 31, 1918; Statement showing land sold by the Canadian Pacific Railway during the year ended 30th September, 1918; Annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs for the year ended March 31st, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

Copy of correspondence between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and His Excellency the Governor-General relating to the gift of two submarines to the Canadian Government.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Report of the Committee appointed under Order in Council to examine into the conditions of the Printing Bureau.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

BANKRUPTCY ACT.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General): Moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18 respecting bankruptcy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The principle of this Bill is embodied in a somewhat similar Bill introduced in this House last session. That Bill was referred to a Special Committee of members of the House, which Committee dealt with the subject somewhat exhaustively, and reported a measure to the House, but at a time when the session had so far advanced that it was impossible to make further progress. The present Bill embodies very largely the same principle which was contained in the former Bill, which in the interval has been pretty generally distributed among the various commercial and mercantile associations. There are one or two radical changes in the present measure which I would like to have the opportunity of elaborating to the House when the Bill comes up for its second reading.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ALLEGED TRADE DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST CANADA.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Preliminary to asking the Government a question I desire to draw attention to two cablegrams which appeared in the Montreal Star, the first in the issue of February 4, in these terms:

> London, March 4.—Sir George Perley, at the luncheon inaugurating the tour of the Canadian officers to the industrial centres in England, organized by the Federation of British Industries, urged this most powerful Imperial commercial body to use its influence to obtain changes in trade restrictions in order to allow Canada equal opportunities with other nations.
> He gave the impression that there was no intention on the part of the authorities to favour the United States or Japan. The regulations, however, were not working as expected, and many protests are now being made to bring about a speedy change.

The second cablegram appeared in the Montreal Star of March 5th in these terms:

> London, March 5.—A deputation of British M.P.'s, members of the Unionist Business Committee, which influences about one hundred votes in the House of Commons, made strong representations yesterday to the president of the Board of Trade respecting practical discrimination against the Canadian manufacturers in the present working of the British import restrictions.
>
> The deputation strongly emphasized that by granting import licenses to United States goods, which were denied the Canadian manufacturers, the British officials were running directly counter to the policy of Empire preference, as formerly adopted by the Imperial War Cabinet.
>
> Lord Shaughnessy, who returns to Canada on Saturday, in discussing the question with the Star representative, said he had no belief in a trade that comes as a result of sentiment. Canadians were ready to go into the open market and face competition. That is the only road to success.

But Canadians have the right to expect, all things being equal, that goods should be ordered by Britain from the Dominion overseas in preference to other countries. This was not asking favours, but fair play.

Lord Shaughnessy added that he had no knowledge of any strong reason in favour of the present practical discrimination. " The whole thoughts of the British people, in Parliament and outside, seem centred in home affairs, and fail utterly to grasp the existence of a great Empire and what it means," he concluded.

I desire to inquire whether the Government continues to be without information on the subject referred to in these two cablegrams, and, if not, whether such information as the Government has received will be imparted to the House.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the matter referred to was first drawn to my attention on February 27, I despatched this cablegram to Sir George Perley:

"Despatch in yesterday's Montreal Gazette from London stating that Harris and Jones have protested to Lloyd George against discrimination by Great Britain against Canada in favour of United States and neutral countries. Please take up matter and cable me particulars of discrimination and what protest has been made and by whom."

To this the following reply has been received from Sir George Perley:

"Have telephoned Harris who knows nothing of interview. Jones is on the ocean. Harris wrote you fully February 14th regarding restrictions under license system."

As to information in the possession of the Government on this important matter, I desire to say—as I intimated, I think, upon the last occasion on which I spoke with respect to it in the House—that the Prime Minister, Sir George Foster, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and Mr. Lloyd Harris, have been in continuous touch with the heads of important departments, and the chairmen of important committees, with regard to this general question of trade restrictions. As I stated the other day, it has not been intimated to me in the many communications which I have received, that there is any discrimination. Further than that I have no information. The question undoubtedly arises out of the system of restrictions of import licenses which Great Britain, for reasons which appeared wise to her, has recently adopted, and which sometime ago were publicly announced. Should any further information bearing upon the subject come to my attention I shall be glad to make communication to the House.

[Mr. Murphy.]

GOVERNMENT PRINTING BUREAU.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Secretary of State): I would like to refer to a matter of some importance connected with a document I have just laid on the Table, which is the report of a committee of experts appointed to inquire into the conditions of the Printing Bureau. I direct attention to this matter because this morning's paper contains nearly a couple of columns concerning a meeting held by the employees of the Bureau last night. I desire to say that there have been various matters under discussion between the employees of the Bureau and the Minister of the Department, which have been looked into from time to time, but which have not yet been dealt with in their entirety because a year ago last March an Order in Council was passed suggesting that the conditions at the Bureau were so complicated that it was deemed necessary in the interest of the country to have a committee of experts appointed to examine into those conditions with a view to efficiency and economy. That report was only recently received, and it was laid before the Government by the Civil Service Commission who were empowered to make the appointments. The report was placed in the hands of a sub-committee of the council, who now have it under consideration and the employees of the bureau were informed by the King's Printer of this. Having in view the nature of that report—which was to the effect that in various branches of the bureau there was such great inefficiency and such an amount of overmanning in the service, and that the cost of the whole operations of the bureau were so excessive—it seemed to me impossible, and I so directed the King's Printer to inform the men, that the minister could recommend to the Government, or that the Government could take any action at the present moment, in respect to either adjustments of wages, or hours of employment, or the settling of any grievances, until the report had been fully considered by the Government. The Government now has it under consideration; in the meantime, I have laid the report on the table of the House.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session resumed from Tuesday, March 4th.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should satisfy neither my conscience nor my heart if I participated in this debate without at least a brief reference to the passing of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, notwithstanding the ample justice that has already been done to his memory.

Sir Wilfrid's position in the life of Canada was so unique and so unapproachable that the suddenness of his death struck the entire nation like a cataclysm of nature.

I have mourned in my time with two entire peoples. Nearly twenty years ago the people of the United Kingdom assembled day by day to sympathize at the bedside of William Ewart Gladstone during a lingering and painful illness. It is equally true that on that fateful 16th of February, just passed, the whole of Canada and millions beyond her bounds came by common consent to wait until the end, by the bedside of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Not since I saw Gladstone pass for the last time from Westminster Hall have I witnessed such a tribute as Canada paid a little over a week ago to her mighty dead, and I shall never look on such a spectacle again.

There were striking parallels between Gladstone and Laurier. Each was a remarkable man to look upon, and in both, external form bore an exact proportion to internal qualities. Each was the foremost orator of his nation,—one would not be far wrong, perhaps, if one said, of his time. Both had that which was so well characterized by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) as the indefinable something called personality. Both had a generous and unsurpassed general culture. Both had tremendous versatility of talents, and these various qualities gave to both in an unexampled degree the almost slavish loyalty of their followers and in an unexampled degree also the unstinted admiration of entire nations. Both were favoured by Heaven with the greatest of its gifts: a happy home life. While, of course, our sympathy goes out unstintedly to Lady Laurier, I am not at all sure, Sir, that she is not deserving of receiving equally our admiration for the magnificent courage with which she supported her helpmate in life throughout his entire activities and followed him to the last moment when she could look upon what was left of him above the ground.

And so these men stand out before us and will stand out in history as the exemplars of a full-orbed manhood.

I will permit myself one word more about Sir Wilfrid. I do not think I should be far wrong, Sir, if I claimed that the remarkable attachment of his fellow-countrymen to him was produced more by his qualities of heart than by any other of his great achievements or characteristics. Some one has said that disposition is more than intellect. Burns states the same thought inimitably when he says:

> The heart ay's the part ay
> That makes us right or wrang.

And a higher authority than Burns tells us that "out of the heart are the issues of life." It was the characteristics of this great heart of a great man that attracted people to him. He had that simplicity of heart without which, Macaulay says in his essay on Chatham, there can be no real, true greatness of character. That simplicity was nowhere more manifest than in his wonderful hospitality in his own house. I think he was a man possessed of the truest hospitality that I have ever met—the truest hospitality for this reason: that he possessed in a degree I cannot remember in any other man of his class the power of making the visitor feel as easy as that visitor would have felt if he had been in his own house. Sheer human kindness was the quality of his heart. I have seen him, Mr. Speaker, when he did not know a human eye was upon him, give a moment of the time of the Prime Minister of this great Dominion, which is as valuable as gold, to pat upon the head and suffuse with blushes and smiles the face of a little child, causing one to think that he could only do it because he had himself the heart of a little child.

And he had that great quality of heart, magnanimity. He once said to me: you cannot afford to have resentment in politics. The House will forgive me, perhaps, for mentioning that I myself had a touching evidence of the fact that he remembered his creed—when I had the misfortune, with thousands of others, of losing a son in the war last September, quite the kindest and most perfect letter I received amongst many scores of letters was written by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

He is gone, and we in this House know, perhaps better than it can be known elsewhere, what a gap he has left. He was happier than Gladstone in the manner of his death. He died as he would have wished to die—quickly, suddenly. It was as if he marched up to the gates of the Beyond with the same stately tread with which he had walked his whole pathway, and it requires no great amount of imagination to catch the voice coming to him: Enter, grand, old warrior, veteran of a hundred fights; good and faithful servant, as thou hast served most thy Crown will be of the brightest.

It is a relief to the mind to think with a feeling of profound thankfulness that we have, in the mover and the seconder of the Address, evidence that all that was best and brightest in Canada did not remain in France and Flanders. Our losses there were very heavy. Fifty-five thousand young men taken from a country like Canada is a terrific toll upon our much needed manhood. We should be the more thankful that we have in the mover and the seconder representatives of that much larger body of Canadians who have come or are coming back, upon whom more than anybody else, perhaps, the Canada of the next generation depends. I join with the other members who have spoken in congratulating them upon their ability and also upon their achievements. It is pleasant to look on lives so full already of performance and so full of promise for the future.

It has, in the course of this debate, became a trite remark that we meet under different circumstances from those under which we met for the last session of Parliament. We have reached the end of the war—at least, it is hoped so. I do not see the possibilities of an immediate revival in any of the Central powers for war purposes. Now that we have reached the end of the war, I want to claim for Union Government a place which I believe history will give it in increasing degree, and for the Government that preceded the Union Government: that they knew from the beginning and until the end what their objective was; they knew the difficulties, and they did not shrink by one hair's breadth from the sacrifices that were necessary to reach that objective. When men go about an objective in that spirit, with the right cause and with the blessing of divine Providence, they are very likely to reach it. And it is a matter of profound congratulation that we, to-day, in Canada stand right abreast with the Allies, having reached our objective. How complete was the victory of the Allies is illustrated by two incidents. It was a remarkable spectacle, there has been no such spectacle, I think, in the history of the world as to see the Kaiser leaving his own country by the back-door, so to speak; to see him of the shining armour, him of the flaming sword, him of the mailed fist, going cap in hand for security and asylum to one of those little nations that just by accident escaped being one of the nations which his great nation had crushed at the beginning of the war. That was, I think, a complete enough victory for the most revengeful of mankind. But if we needed more satisfaction for our feelings, I think it was afforded on that day when into a Scottish port—Scotland was sure to be around when there was anything to be picked up for nothing—there sailed, like a few summer canoes, all that remained of the German fleet, while every German on that fleet gave silent assent to the old song: Britannia Rules the Waves.

Canada's participation in the production of these results was early; it was ample; it was continuous, and it was there at the very end. The Princess Pat's were the first colonial regiment to put their foot upon the soil of France, and when they wanted troops to lay the foundations for the breaking of the Hindenburg line, they specially trained the Canadian troops for the purpose. And on that second of September—a date which some of us have good cause to remember—there could not be a Canadian heart that did not swell with pride when he read of the fight in which the Drocourt-Queant switch fell before the onslaught of a detachment of the British army which was composed largely of Canadians, and the Hindenburg line crumbled from that moment.

Reference has been made again and again to the fact that our men were in Mons at the end, recalling to us the fall of Mons early in the beginning of the war.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, to offer every man in this House with French blood in his veins my gratulations that these magnificent results and achievements of the Allied armies were brought about under a commander who has added one more shining name to the long list of the illustrious marshals of France. I should like to point a moral which I think this circumstance is calculated to carry to the minds of all of us. If one compares Foch with Hindenburg, it is a case, almost, of comparing mind with matter. That comparison is sufficiently suggestive to remind us that after all the subtle and imponderable influences of mind and spirit, the powers behind right are greater in this world and surer to prevail than the forces behind mere physical power. I hope I have laid well to heart the philosophy of the lines:

> The moving finger writes and, having writ,
> Moves on; nor all your piety nor wit
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
> Nor all your tears wash out a word of it.

There is little to be gained by fighting over again past political battles, but I want just at this point to claim that the conscriptive draft which brought about such a change in the political condition in Canada, did three things for Canada and for the world.

In the first place, at a crucial moment in those fortunes and in the history of the war, the general election held on the draft was decided in such a way that Canada's voice went to the hearts of friends and foes alike as the voice of a people who knew what business they were about, knew its tragic and drastic nature, and knew how to stay with that business until the end.

In the second place, the draft enabled my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) to stand in the great heart of the Mother Country, in the city of London and tell our own people, as he told the people of the Old Country, that every Canadian battalion was going into those last fierce fights at full strength. That is not a thing for which Canada has any apologies to make or regret to express. There is not a man in this House who in his heart is not proud to join with me in congratulating the country and the Government that that was the case.

In the third place the draft to my knowledge enabled the Government to bring home earlier than they otherwise could have done numbers of weary, war-worn sons who had been in this fight since the very beginning, and who in other circumstances would have been nursed to go back to the fighting line when they were not fit for it. I am content to leave to history, just at that point, the political battles of Canada for the last few years.

And now we come to a new era. We come to what is being referred to almost ad nauseam as the period of reconstruction. Well, it would be impossible for me, Sir, to contemplate that period for a moment without remembering that I am one of those who are sometimes referred to as Liberal-Unionists, and who were referred to by my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) the other evening as "separated brethren." On this side of the House we have been content for a year and a half to know ourselves as Unionists. In fact we came very near being a united Canada a year ago last December. But I cannot overlook an invitation that was first extended to us by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), whom I congratulate upon an eminence to which he has attained by the possession of many excellent qualities—and perhaps a little by some even of his faults. I am nearly sure he looked straight at me when he gave that invitation, and I should feel myself guilty of rudeness if I did not respond to it. At the same time, however, that we received an invitation to go, my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) extended to us an invitation to stay. Well, this is extremely flattering, but slightly embarrassing. I am sure I do not look the part but I never felt so much like a coy young lady with two ardent suitors, and I think it is the part of the coy young lady in the meantime to continue for a little the double courtship, and not to run the risk of those who marry in haste of falling upon a swift and disastrous divorce.

There are several things implied in the invitation coming from the other side of the House. In the first place, it would seem to imply a belief on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that we took the wrong road in our national history a year and a half ago. Well, we do not admit that. I associate myself most fully with my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder), who, in that excellent speech he delivered to the House the other day, said that he had always had the support of his conscience in what he had done, and he did not confess to being at all a sinner in the matter. We do not admit that we took the wrong road, and if hon. gentlemen opposite are suffering from a delusion of that kind I should just like to argue the point with them—and I never saw my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in such a condition in this House that he was not prepared to argue any point on which he did not agree with me. I would argue it in this way: I would just put to them one simple and pointed question: If Great Britain, if France, if the United States, if Italy, had pursued the war by the method which found favour on the benches opposite—I shall not characterize it otherwise—would it have been over now? If it would not have been over, it would still be going on. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will not dispute that proposition. But then, if it had been going on because a wrong method of prosecuting it was followed, upon whose shoulders would have been the blame for the extra loss of life and treasure? I always like to defend the course of my action on grounds of logic, and I take it that that is a fair attempt at logic anyhow. I am almost sorry that the leader of the Opposition has already spoken, because he always tries to be logical—whatever his success may be.

Now that is the first implication in the invitation of hon. gentlemen opposite, and what is their second? It is not only implied in this invitation that we took the wrong road, but it is very freely implied, and indeed it is stated, that we left Liberalism.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I think I hear a mild "Hear, hear" from an hon. gentleman opposite. Well, if the point I have already made has anything in it, it would be so much the worse for Liberalism. But did we leave Liberalism? Whence have we to derive our Liberal traditions? It would be no use asking my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy), who takes an intimate and well-informed interest in old country politics, to derive any inspiration from Mr. Lloyd George, because I am quite sure that Mr. Lloyd George does not possess a particle of his confidence; but surely the case of Mr. Asquith is different with him, and Mr. Asquith was at the head of the Government in the old country which introduced compulsory military service there. I differed from my hon. friends opposite on the question of compulsory military service; I also differed from them, and was almost alone on that side of the House in that respect, on the question of the extension of Parliament. But Mr. Asquith was responsible for several extensions of Parliament in the old country.

He protested against an election up to the end of the war, and kept on protesting against an election even in the early days of reconstruction. So, after all, if I have fallen from the grace of Liberalism I have fallen in very good company, for I still have the company of Mr. Asquith and the entire Liberal party of Great Britain—and that is not a bad record for a Liberal who was raised in the atmosphere of British Liberalism. We do not admit that we left Liberalism—not for one moment.

There is a third thing implied in this invitation that has been extended to us from the opposite benches, and that is that we should turn to those on this side who were formerly known as Conservatives and say to them, at this moment in our country's history: We joined you amidst the storm, the strain and stress of a danger the most violent that ever threatened the world; we have weathered the storm with you; now that the sky is clearing and the sun is peeping out again, without a moment's hesitation or notice, we take leave of you. Would hon. gentlemen opposite respect us if we took that course at this moment? We are not built that way. We left our friends opposite for what we believed to be the national good, which the old poet Virgil described as the noblest motive that could guide the citizens of any country. And when we make another alignment it will be because that same guiding star leads us. We joined these others, and if we can we will stay—if we cannot stay we will leave, but always for the good of our country. That is our Liberalism.

There is another implication—and it would be a most important one if there was anything in the invitation to go over—and that is that there is something to go over to.

Mr. McMASTER: The portfolios are all on the other side.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I did not catch my hon. friend's remark.

Mr. McMASTER: You say you have nothing to come over to. I say, the portfolios are all on the other side.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I have no portfolio. And I did not say even that I have nothing to go to. I said there was an implication that there was something to go to—I was stating the opinion of my hon. friend, not my own. He had better not reply to mine until he hears it; he might show less temerity after hearing it. I have tried to image to myself that little home shack that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition drew to our attention, with the latch, and the string, and the light. I followed the description, for I listened carefully to every word of my hon. friend's speech. I am bound to say, having regard to that speech from the point of view of constructive ideas or political policy, that I think he ought to have added to his figure—when he told us that the lamp was burning in the kitchen and the string was on the outside of the door, he ought to have added the warning: "Bring your own provisions."

Now, I ask any hon. gentleman on either side of this House to read the speech of my hon. friend if he has forgotten it and to find out what constructive planks of Liberalism were set forth in that speech. Why, Sir, there is far from being a fatted calf awaiting those who return.

Little Mary was rich by comparison, for she at least had a little lamb.

What was the main feature of my hon. friend's speech? It was: Why does not the Government do something? He seemed to find some complaining tones in the speeches of the mover and seconder of the Address, and he asked: Why does not the Government do something? That was not a new cry on his part. We on this side can remember him saying that same thing at any time when it occurred to him while the war was on. He demanded to know why the former Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) did not do something. I suppose that hon. gentlemen pleased him in the end,—he left his portfolio to some one else. Why does not the Government do something, was his plaint during 1917. And the Government did something; they brought in the Military Service Act during that session. Then the hon. gentleman changed his question to: Why in the world did you do it? On this side of the House hon. gentlemen did not want to have an election; they thought it was not good for the country. I was alone on the benches opposite in supporting that view. The Conservatives on this side of the House were the true Liberals according to the Asquith view, for they did not want to distract the country with an election during war time. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) said: Why don't you do something; have an election anyway. Well, he had his election, and no doubt while that election was going on, down on the rocky coast of Cape Breton he repeated his plaint to the sad sea waves: Why doesn't the Government do something? Surely, they did plenty during the election; I believe my hon. friend himself only held his seat by the skin of his teeth. And now we re-assemble in the second session of the new Parliament, and again he says: Why doesn't the Government do something? Why does not he tell the Government some of the things he would do? Has he done what every fair opponent should do—and I do not wish to attribute unfairness to my hon. friend; he has been extremely good-tempered and well-conditioned in his new position—has he informed himself of what the Government is doing? Was it nothing to do, as I have said, to stand by the Allied forces until the end? Do these hon. gentlemen opposite think that these shiploads of men are being brought with unexampled rapidity overseas, demobilized and sent to their homes, without the Government doing something? Is he informed as to what the Government are doing in the noble and God-like work of looking after the maimed and the blind, and fitting for new occupations many who can never work at their old trades again? I cannot recall that the hon. gentleman in his speech even gave us an opinion on what the Government proposes to do as outlined in the speech from the Throne. I may be doing him an injustice, but I cannot recall that he said a word about building ships, about constructing roads, about building houses for our people. I am not now either commending or condemning these various projects; but at least when the Government is taking these new departures in the life of the nation and making these proposals, it is not in order to come and say: Why does not the Government do something?

Now, my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster), who made an interruption just now the relevance of which I fail even yet to see, furnished us with a kind of plank. He made some considerable reference to the tariff, and indicated, what I am very glad to know, that he has low-tariff ideas. Well, I will say to my hon. friend that, portfolio or no portfolio for me, or for him in the future, he had better get busy and instruct his own leader about the tariff. I have been in this House for ten years with the leader of the Opposition; I have listened to nearly all the speeches he ever made and I cannot remember ever having heard him say "tariff". He probably has done so but this is a subject that he fought shy of. There is a reason and my hon. friend from Brome knows it. He will not get up in his place now and assert that there is quite the enthusiasm for tariff reform manifested in the speech of the leader of the Opposition that there was in his own speech. On the question of the tariff, in my humble judgment—and I have tried to inform myself—those who represent what was formerly the Liberal party occupy a less advanced position than did the whole Liberal party of a quarter of a century ago, so far as their policy has been stated up to the present time. What was the policy of the Liberal party over twenty years ago? I think I can state it from an authority that will not be disputed. I want to give a few extracts, if I am permitted, from some speeches delivered in the year 1893 or between 1893 and 1896, and that is just about a quarter of a century ago:

> I submit to you that the ideal fiscal system is the British system of free trade.

That was a statement of the policy of the party that would at once have attracted all British Liberals under its banner.

> "Let it be well understood that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their ideal is protection; our ideal is free trade.
> "I come to expose to you the policy of the Liberal party. Let me tell you that the policy may be summed up in the good Saxon word 'Freedom,' in every sense of the term—freedom of speech, freedom of action, freedom of religious life and civil life, and last, not least, freedom in commercial life."

"I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage; yes, bondage, and I refer to bondage in the same manner as American slavery was bondage; not in the same degree, perhaps, but in the same manner. In the same manner the people of this country, the inhabitants of the city of Winnipeg especially, are toiling for a master, who takes away, not every cent of profit, but a very large percentage, a very great portion of your earnings for which you toil and sweat."

That was the official statement of the policy of the Liberal party given more than twenty years ago by an authority that no one can dispute. Is that their policy to-day? My hon. friends opposite are silent. Is that the policy of the hon. member for Brome?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: But my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) said that he was in favour of tariff for revenue. He is a product not of a quarter of a century ago but of the intervening period when the policy which had formerly been enunciated was lost sight of or not pursued with any great degree of enthusiasm. Now, I mention this as showing that I was rightly informed when I stated that the invitation of hon. gentlemen opposite implied that there was something to come to.

As a matter of simple fact, Mr. Speaker—and this is a statement which I make very deliberately and of set purpose, and it is important that it should be made in this period of the history of Canada—the great majority of the people of that part of Canada from which I come have been able to see, in the history of the last twenty-five years, very little difference, if any, between the records and performances of the two parties. Difference in profession there has been but in performance there has been very little difference and the sooner that it is authoritatively stated, so far as I have the authority derived from constant observation to state it, the better. That is the view of a large majority of the people of western Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: What about reciprocity?

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend, of course, and I, supported reciprocity. We did not get a chance of performing on it. But, has not the present Government performed on it; has it not given free wheat and free potatoes; so that, as I hinted, the profession was on the one side and the performance on the other.

Mr. PEDLOW: May I may be permitted to interrupt the hon. gentleman? I would like to know——

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend has already spoken in this debate at considerable length. I listened to him for an hour and a quarter without interruption and I must ask him—although I do not want to be discourteous—to give me time to get out of the way for another fellow. I do not want to go at any great length, or at any length at all, into the programme which the Government has put before us. But I would like to be permitted to lay down what I conceive to be important principles that ought to guide us irrespective of all party names in the very serious work of trying to "reconstruct" Canada—if you will allow the word. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid, from the speeches to which I have just made reference, that hon. gentlemen opposite are more concerned about the reconstruction of a party than about the reconstruction of the country; I am afraid so. I wish I could think it otherwise, but there has been a good deal of evidence that that is their frame of mind. That was the meaning of the invitation to which I have referred at such great length.

We, on this side of the House I claim, are more concerned about the reconstruction of the country, and let me say to my hon. friends opposite that there is no earthly chance of their getting the high encomiums and support of the people of this country until they change their policy if I have rightly diagnosed and described it. In the months and years immediately ahead of us, the first principle of reconstruction that I would lay down is, that we ought to endeavour to keep up the same patriotic fervour as we displayed during the war. If it was then worth while getting fervid about sending our sons by the hundred thousands across the seas to fight for great principles and to fight for liberty, it is worth our while in Canada surely to be equally fervid about fighting and struggling for the good of our own country.

And, let me say at this point, that I think we ought to cultivate the sacrificial spirit of the men who went across the seas—we ought to cultivate the spirit of those men. Mr. Speaker, there is a frightful moral chasm between nearly all of us who stayed at home and enjoyed in varying degrees the prosperity of war times, and those boys who went across the seas to die, if need be, for $1.10 a day. They have done their work. It is now up to us, as civilians, to do ours; and if, for the rest of our lives, we have to make sacrifices in this country from the humblest workman to the richest plutocrat—if we have to make sacrifices of the very strongest and most drastic kinds—our shrinking flesh should suffer all that is coming to us in that regard.

With that spirit of sacrifice should go the spirit of helpfulness, and here I would like to make an appeal to my hon. friends opposite. I do not intend to specify members, but there have been hon. members opposite who seemed to me to have pursued an unworthy line of talk in this House. One wonders what is their motive in saying words here which can possibly arouse discontent among our returned boys and their relatives. Some one talked about Canadians having been made a spearhead in the recent war. Why, Sir, that is surely an unworthy thing to suggest. I have met lots of men from the trenches, the best of the world's manhood, and I have not found that in the trenches there was the slightest jealousy, or envy, or rivalry between the sons of Canada, and the sons of Ireland, Scotland, and England. I have not found anything but unstinted praise on the part of Canadian soldiers for what Tommy Atkins did in the war, and I am perfectly sure that Tommy Atkins has been equally generous to Canadians. I should be glad for the sake of the fair name of our country, that there was no more oratory of that particular kind. I do not for a moment fear the political consequences of such talk, because no one will be quicker than our returned men to recognize that there might be just a shade of suspicion about such solicitude expressed in such terms by men, who, to say the least of it, were not too enthusiastic to keep these same men, when in the fighting line, from being overrun by the Huns. I do not think it will be easy to infuse a doubt into the minds of returned men as to the willingness of those for whom they voted in such numbers in the last election,—because they knew that they were behind them in this fight without a doubt, and to the finish—I do not think it will be easy to infuse a doubt into those minds as to who is willing to do the best, the very best that the country's resources will allow us to do, for these men now that they have come back to our shores.

Now, if I might, I would like to say to the Government, and to the members of this House, irrespective of the side upon which they sit, that I think those of us who really want to face reconstruction intelligently and wisely, should be prepared to remind ourselves, and our entire people, that the great problem of reconstruction is a world in debt,—not a nation only, but a world in debt. That is the problem that to-day faces us and all the belligerent countries. And I think that if we can keep that in mind it will modify the relationships between parties in this House, it will modify the asperity of the criticism which we might be inclined to heave at the heads of the Government when they are not doing what we think they ought to do. It will modify the attitude of the various classes of the community in presenting the claims of their particular class upon the Government and Parliament of the country; it will modify the strength of the application of men for an immediate raise in their salaries; it will help our national life all round, and will help to our higher and better citizenship if we can keep it continually in mind that the nation and the world are for the moment heavily in debt.

If I were to venture to undertake to say a word of advice to the Government, I should say that they would be wise if they avoided palliatives and half-measures; they would try as Parliament ought to help them to try, to get down to the roots of things, and to look for a period—which perhaps we have not quite arrived at yet,—when we shall undoubtedly have industrial depression and great economic and national difficulties to face. I do not think there is the remotest doubt about that. If we do not have it, Mr. Speaker, then history has taught me nothing about the economic consequences of war.

I am not going, as I said before, to mention in detail the measures referred to in the Speech, and I am at least to that extent following the example of my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition. The legislation with respect to roads, and these other matters that I have spoken of, it will be the duty of this House to discuss; and so far as this side is concerned, I think I can guarantee my hon. friends opposite that all these measures will be discussed with a degree of independence that will surprise them, because we are not dominated by party spirit on this side. That does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that we are prepared at a moment's notice to vote this Government out of power until we see something to take its place—I put in that saving clause. So far as my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Joseph Read) is the particular spokesman of my hon. friends opposite, he declared the other night—contrary to the spirit of a year and a half ago—: "We cannot possibly have an election until the boys come back." So up to that extent, I take it, hon. gentlemen opposite are in absolute agreement with me. I do not want to go into these things in detail, but I might for the sake of illustration say, that, in my judgment, the making of roads is not a basic occupation. That is true of the building of houses, it is true even of shipbuilding: the basic, economic occupations of a country are those which go down into nature and take the wealth out of the soil, out of the timber, out of the rivers and the lakes, and the oceans; if you like, out of the mines. Those are the basic occupations of this, or any other lands.

There is another principle of reconstruction that I am sure we want to deal with in this House—I shall do so at any rate, and I think we all of us favour free discussion of public questions, and in this respect I agree with my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) that this talk of shelving the tariff, or not speaking of the tariff, can only be compared to the man who wanted to build a house without discussing the materials of which he was going to build it. I am a hundred per cent with my hon. friend from Brome on that subject. I am not going to try to anticipate the Budget, but I am going to refer to some of the fundamentals of reconstruction, and to do so by the use of a few words which will suggest thoughts and show how absurd it is to think that for any length of time we can avoid the discussion of the tariff or any other subject.

Whether we are going to supply pensions and look after the sick and maimed and the injured and mutilated, whether we are going to supply employment to all our people, I think it will be agreed that one of the things we must do in the face of our great national debt is to produce wealth in the country. Now, no one will have the temerity to say that the tariff has nothing to do with the production of wealth. We may take one view or another of what the effect of the tariff is upon the production of wealth, but that it has a bearing on the subject I think every one will agree who thinks about economic subjects at all. It is, of course, open to any hon. gentleman to argue that Great Britain in this war—and we must learn the lessons of the war—was a remarkable example of financial failure under free trade. I do not know that any one who would argue that would carry the mind of his hearers very far. It is equally open to anybody to argue that Germany was a remarkable example of financial success under protection. But whatever we may think about that point, I want to make it clear to the House that if we are to learn the lessons of the war we cannot postpone the discussion as to which view is right along those lines.

[Mr. M. Clark.]

Allied to the question of wealth is surely the question of trade. Now, our trade has been remarkable during the war. What is the lesson of the war on the question of our trade? What was the economic cause of the extraordinary amount of trade we did during the war? It is possible to answer that question in one word: markets. We did the business because we had the markets. We produced to an extraordinary extent; we got the prices; we had safe customers in the shape of foreign governments; we had the markets, and we did the trade. I never could see it myself, but I suppose it is a debatable point whether you will do the most trade with obstacles or without obstacles. The member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) believes in the obstacles, to a certain extent; he believes in a tariff for revenue. Well, the tariff is an obstacle to trade whether it is for revenue or for any other purpose. I am one of those who is advanced much further than the member for Brome on the trade question. I am innocent enough to believe that you will trade better, just as you will run a race better, if you do not have obstacles. But whatever the views of other hon. gentlemen may be, we cannot avoid discussing that question.

Then, about the industries of the country. We have been told that tariffs are necessary to build up our manufacturing industries. Why, Sir, this war afforded the remarkable spectacle in Canada of industries turning their plants around to produce things that they had never produced before, producing them in enormous quantities, and selling them at tremendous and immediate profits. Why were we able to do that during the war? The answer is the same as I gave a moment ago in regard to our trade; we did it because we had the markets. That is to say, the exigencies and the pressure of the war overcame the obstacle, or any obstacle that there was in the way of the tariff. I take it that is the lesson of the war on this particular point.

The Government are interested in shipping. I do not blame them. We have to discuss shipping on the estimates of the Minister of Marine during this session, or on some other occasion. I have always believed that shipping is in the same position as these other matters to which I have referred. If you have a purely protectionist country, I think it must be evident to the most casual observer that you do not need any ships. If you have a perfect wall around your country and cut yourselves off thoroughly from other nations, it is obvious that however you might need cathedrals or jails or anything of that kind, you would not need ships. Well, the converse also would seem to be true; if you want to have successful shipping you will not put up a wall of that kind. But this may be my insular stupidity which I have brought from England with me. It appears so simple to me that a child would accept it for the truth the moment it was presented to it. I wish hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House would, on this question as on the others to which I have referred, cultivate the teachable spirit of the child.

I suppose we shall have to discuss taxation, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid so; it will be a prominent subject of debate for many a long year. And it is absurd to talk about discussing taxation without gradually coming to discuss the tariff, because, for better or for worse, the tariff has been our main method of taxation in this country. We shall have to discuss tariffs when we come to taxation, or else we shall be parliamentary ostriches, and that would not be complimentary to us.

The cost of living is a question which this or any other government and this or any other parliament must tackle in the immediate future. Notwithstanding the large wages which have been prevailing in this country, I am afraid it is too true that a considerable number of our people have been living from hand to mouth in spite of the artificial good times that have been created by the war. If you cut down the cost of living, you would help conditions very much all round; you would lessen the rapacity of people for large profits and increased salaries. That question must be attended to; it is vital, and its solution would solve very much besides.

We are going to discuss the possibility of settling soldiers on the land. The tariff has a direct bearing on that question. It was argued by those who had carefully studied the question before the war that it was impossible to produce the splendid wheat that we produced in western Canada at a paying profit, at the price we were getting for it. Wheat in southern Alberta was then, I suppose, bringing about 65 cents a bushel, and having regard to the price of implements and the price of land, it was argued by many economists and men in the business that wheat could not be produced at that price to pay. If there be anything in that contention—I see that my hon. friend the President of the Grain Growers' Association of Manitoba approves of what I am saying—then at the very threshold of land settlement for soldiers we are met with the question: Are you justified in putting soldiers on the land to produce wheat or to produce any other agricultural products under these conditions? We must not try to settle any of these problems on war conditions—and war conditions as to prices largely remain at the present moment—because it is impossible that war conditions in these regards are to continue.

I have mentioned these things just to indicate some of the questions that will be before us in this period and to try to guide the House, independent of any old party affiliations, to right lines of thought. I cannot forget, Mr. Speaker, that I come from western Canada It is impossible to hide from our eyes the fact that in western Canada at the present moment there is this remarkable state of opinion to which I have referred. A few days ago I had a letter from a valued constituent touching on many subjects. That letter began with the statement to me, for my guidance as his representative, that in the part of the country in which he lived he rarely met a man who described himself either as a Liberal or as a Tory. That is a remarkable indication of the state of flux in which the opinions of men are in this country. The fact of the matter is that, perhaps, the most important thought for our guidance in this whole reconstruction period is this: that while it is a truism to say that the external forms of government and external conditions of countries have been tremendously affected by the war, it is quite as significant that everywhere men's thoughts are in a state of revolution; they are everywhere prepared to accept new ideas. And that is the frame of mind in which we should, either as members of the Government or as members of Parliament, approach public questions.

When I say that I am from the West, I want to add this: that I am no sectionalist. I could not be as a western man, if I wished at the present moment, because one of the most remarkable features of our internal politics just now is that the West is rapidly making converts to its views in the province of Ontario.

I notice that my friend from Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Joseph Read) who has very large way of doing things, said the other night that there was no distinction between the farmers' movement and what he called the Liberal party. That is not my recollection. I think the hon. member was speaking outside the patent facts of comparatively recent political history. Long before the reciprocity pact, the farmers of the West were asking for free agricultural implements, but the reciprocity pact, if I remember it correctly, proposed a reduction of 2½ per cent on agricultural implements which would not have meant very much to anybody. There is a great difference between free implements and a reduction of 2½ per cent from fifteen per cent, so I shall not allow my hon. friend to mop up, so to speak, this support of the farmers. It would be a very convenient way of doing party business, but my hon. friend says he is a patriot and stands for the nation first, and I am not sure that he was not thinking of a party when he made that statement, because it is not quite correct. I do not stand for any section in this country. Our boys fought for a united Canada and I believe in a united Canada. I believe in this nation from shore to shore, and I believe that we shall fight our difficulties as a united people just as our sons have fought the battles across the sea. But I think all the same that if I were in the cabinet, or even if I were an eastern manufacturer, I should keep a sharp outlook on what the West is doing.

I want on this head to make a special appeal to the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White). He knows I have a great affection for him, and when we sat on opposite sides of the House, I had such an affection for him that I undertook his tuition in economic affairs. And he is by far my most promising pupil. He is not only my most promising, but is my most influential pupil. I need scarcely tell him to keep a sharp lookout on the West because he has already shown in his brief but brilliant political career, that he does keep a sharp lookout everywhere and that he has a teachable mind on these economic matters. He is sometimes a very much traduced man. We hear it said sometimes that he is connected with corporations. I have known some of the people that threw these stones, and one would want to throw a good brick back at them one's self if one wanted to go into that kind of politics. I wish, however, to claim for my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) that he has as free a mind as I have found anywhere in the public life of Canada. I have great pride in my pupil's mind. It is a penetrable mind, and it has been penetrable to western ideas. That is why I talk to him at this particular juncture. It would be no use my starting on a hard case like the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie). At the beginning of the war, I myself, was responsible for bringing western economics into this House in a very pointed form, and I told my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) to put on an income tax. That was new to my hon. friend and he did not see his way to do it, and he made some speeches, saying what was quite true, namely, that it was a difficult tax to collect and you could not jump at these things like a bull in a china shop. But my hon. friend came on, and he told us in several speeches that an income tax was, he feared, impracticable, but not impossible. Why, the fact now is that he remains a member of the Government which imposed an income tax, and the head of the department which did it, and I believe he is very proud of it now. I was, therefore, not wrong in describing the Acting Prime Minister as being a teachable and penetrable man and being my most hopeful pupil. It is no discredit to him to change his mind. The man who, in the course of a great war, does not change his mind, has no mind to change. It is only hon. gentlemen opposite who held false ideas of Liberalism to the point at which they joined a choir with the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) as choirmaster, and chanted "As it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be." And they thought, when they were doing it, that they were Liberals. That is the chant of the oldest fashioned Tories.

Mr. McMASTER: It is in the English church prayer-book.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: When Sir Robert Peel, one of the greatest financial leaders of the nineteenth century, was elected in England in 1841, he was elected to maintain the Corn laws. In 1846, without again going to the people, he abolished the Corn laws. Like a wise statesman, he saw the conditions changing, the country needing different things—just as those of us who left my hon. friends opposite saw what these hon. gentlemen could not see—and he abolished the Corn laws which he was elected to maintain. So my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) is in apostolic succession to some of the greatest statesmen. Lord Beaconsfield, when Mr. Disraeli, was member of an administration which destroyed the Liberal Administration of that day on the question of franchise, and then within a year he came in and introduced a franchise more drastic than the franchise of the Government he had destroyed. Disraeli changed even more rapidly than did Sir Robert Peel.

Mr. McMASTER: Pardon me, the hon. member is hardly right. He accepted an amendment proposed by John Bright. That is the way "he dished the Whigs."

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: My hon. friend is dealing with a later period in history than that with which I am dealing.

Mr. McMASTER: 1868.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: 1867. In 1868 there was a general election in which Mr. Gladstone was returned to power. My hon. friend must study history a little more before he is so cock-sure of himself. We will, however, accept the phrase and take our history as being roughly correct, and my hon. friend is not disputing that Disraeli did "dish the Whigs" and that he did change his mind. I am not scoring any arithmetical success, as two and two is four and one is five; I leave those phases of politics to my hon. friend.

Well, now, these changes of thought are not put down in history to the detriment of the reputation of the statesmen who changed their views. On the question of free wheat my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister also showed that he had an open mind. He delivered a long speech in which he said that during the war he did not believe in giving free wheat; but he remained a member of the Government that did. I have very great hope that I do not appeal to him in vain to keep his mind still open. Let the western breezes blow through it; they will blow away some of the cobwebs he picks up in Toronto, and he will do clearer and better thinking and proceed to a position in Canadian statesmanship that he has not yet attained. I feel sure of it. I feel most hopeful of my hon. friend, for he is not only a statesman with a capacity for changing his mind. I cannot think he is absolutely impervious to political conditions. I am sure that every man in Government and Opposition circles must have regard to this fact about the people of the West; they can demonstrate on occasion their ability to stand as one man when the national good requires it. They stood as one man in December 1917, and if I were an eastern stateman or an eastern manufacturer I would say: "These are people that we had better keep our eye upon; they are worth watching; they are a factor of increasing numbers and increasing strength in the political life of Canada, and we must watch what they are doing."

There is another consideration about the West that I want to urge. The West wants no special favours whatsoever. We are asking for no special or class privileges. I hear people talking as if the farmers of the West were selfish men who wanted the Government to do something for their particular industry. On the contrary we are so confident of our ability to build up our own industries that we defy and challenge the world. We produce better wheat in western Canada than they can produce elsewhere in the world, and we are prepared to sell it against all comers. The same is true of our beef produce. Anything we do in the West we do well, and we defy competition. We want no special favours, and I take it that in that respect we are good Canadians. I do not understand the Canadian who says: I cannot compete. When I was quite a young man in the Old Country I remember a sculler named Edward Hanlan coming over to England and beating the Englishmen so easily that he stopped in the middle of the race to scoop some water out of his boat. He did not say he could not compete! Did the men in the trenches in the recent fighting say they could not compete? They were never content unless they were right at the front. They did not complain of being made a spearhead. You could not help them being spearheads. That is the kind of Canadians I believe in, and that is the kind of goods we produce in western Canada. The Canadian who says, I cannot compete; I must have special help, special pap from the Government is a kind of Canadian that should be put in a glass case and exhibited in the British museum. He is not in full line with the manhood of Canada. I am sorry if that seems an extreme view, but after all it does not seem a very special request to make of a Parliament or Government to ask that we be put on exactly the same footing as others and that others be put on exactly the same footing as us.

And if I may speak for western Canada I of Canada will come to my views all at once. I have far too good an understanding of the difficulty of making progress to expect that, but I do say that I have brought before the House considerations which are well worth the attention of both parties in this House.

And if I may speak for wesern Canada I would say: Take off our shackles, and give us the freedom that our boys fought for. Our courage and our energies are as great as our prairies are wide, and we believe that our economic views are as clear as our atmosphere. Regardless of our political future, when occasion required it we in the West stood as one man and voted as one man behind the men who stood in the breach for the world's liberty.

We are grateful that we share in Canada to-day, through the providence of the Almighty, the security and the freedom which has been purchased by blood. We want to go into the future animated by the same spirit that has animated us during the war, and we in western Canada will be found giving unstinted support to the men who are prepared with courage and with clear-sightedness to build an edifice of happiness, prosperity, and the highest manhood on the foundations laid at such tremendous cost.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased indeed to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address on the ability and success with which they have accomplished their task. In this I only endorse the unanimous opinion of this House and of the press of the country.

I desire also that my first words should be words of thanks and congratulation to the brave soldiers of our Canadian army. I yield to no man, not even to my eloquent friend from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) in my admiration of the boys who have represented us at the front. In the terrific struggle which the victory of the Allied armies has now ended, our soldiers have heroically done their duty, and more than their duty. Always in the front line, amongst shells and bullets, amidst clouds of deadly gas, under a rain of iron and fire, they have unceasingly given to the Canadian nation and to the whole world numberless examples of collective and individual heroism. The gallantry, moral energy and physical courage of the Canadian soldiers have become a tradition in the Allied armies. Our soldiers have written a glorious page of history. To the families of those who have fallen on the field of honour —and my hon. friend from Red Deer is the head of one of those families—let us extend our deep sympathy. Our dead heroes rest in a far-distant land, but we must not forget that they are not buried on foreign soil, for it has been well said that every man has two mother countries—his own, and France.

In order that the terrible sacrifices which have been made shall not be in vain, statesmen are now assembled at a Peace Conference to frame policies and devise means to prevent a recurrence of such a cataclysm as we have just passed through.

I am glad indeed that the speech from the Throne refers to the founding of a League of Nations, and that the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has declared himself in favour of such a league. The democracy of the world is rallying behind President Wilson in support of that great project, and in some cases doing so despite rulers and kings, and compelling the doing away with the old order of things. The peace that is to be achieved must be a peace that regards the future instead of the past; it must not be only a lull in the storm, as was said by one of the Allied statesmen recently. This war, as we have often been told, was a war to end all wars, and wars cannot be ended unless the old system is changed. The mere fact that the Turkish state, a disgrace to civilization, had to be maintained to ensure what was called the balance of power is, to my mind, a sufficient reason to discredit the old system. Some fear that by entering a league, nations may lose part of their freedom and even their separate entity. They say that internationalism will replace nationalism. That is a mistake. You cannot be an internationalist unless you are a nationalist; there cannot be a League of Nations unless there are nations. The control of armaments will inevitably mean a certain limitation of national freedom of action. But where will be the change? Who shaped the British naval policy before the war? Sir, the naval programme of Britain was determined by the naval programme of Germany. The British tax payers had to submit to larger taxes at the whim of the Kaiser and Von Tirpitz. Likewise the military programme of France was dictated by the military programme of Germany.

The hon. Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) said that to assure the power of the league a military force will have to be maintained. I should have liked my hon. friend to be more expliicit. It will be a sad disappointment to many if military expenditures have to be maintained after this war. Sir, the people of the world are to govern themselves. For some of them the period of transition will be a period of struggle, of agitation, of chaotic disorder, but they will adjust themselves to the new conditions, and order will ultimately prevail. Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Germany were the only remaining absolute monarchies in Europe. They lie in the dust. Their disappearance makes international agreements possible between people and people, and the democracy of the world will see to it that no "scrap of paper" shall again be torn. The peace of the world will be guaranteed, not by military power, not by naval power but, I hope, by the supreme moral power, which in democratic countries is public opinion. The evils of war are great enough to warrant great efforts to free the world from them.

The hon. Acting Prime Minister also stated that Germany must be compelled to pay the fullest indemnity, and he very properly referred to the fact that Canada did not desire the war, and that her war expenditures ought to be reimbursed by the German people. I should be glad indeed if the wishes of my hon. friend could be realized; but I cannot think that the Canadian people ought to rely too confidently on the payment of that indemnity. The indemnity as stipulated to be paid is not merely an arithmetical operation, it is not a mere arrangement of figures. A large indemnity such as that which Germany would have to pay if Canada's claim is to be considered—for we can only come after the devastated territory of France and Belgium have been repaired—cannot be paid in cash. Germany could only pay by producing and exporting goods that would otherwise have been produced by England, France, or some other country. Mr. Lloyd George said during the recent British elections that Germany must pay, but she must not be allowed to dump her goods upon England. But she must dump goods upon England or dump them upon neutral countries, and so displace the British goods, or the indemnity payments cannot be made.

The hon. gentleman said that the ablest statesmen of the world are assembled at the Peace Conference. Let me here express regret for one thing and the sad circumstances under which we meet this session induce me to speak with the greatest moderation. There was a great Canadian statesman who should have been at the Peace Conference. Sir, President Wilson has amongst the members of his deputation there a political opponent. On the main committee the British Empire is represented by Sir John Simon who was defeated on December last as a political opponent of Mr. Asquith and who has been throughout the war a consistent opponent of conscription in Great Britain. But here of course we have a "union" Government, and only friends of that government were qualified. The fact remains that minority parties, parties not actually in power, are part of a nation and should have a voice in decisions which will affect the rights of those nations for generations after their existing governments have given place to others.

While I believe that Canada has to be represented at the Peace Conference, I just as strongly believe that the Prime Minister of Canada should be at home now conducting the affairs of the country. The Prime Minister of a country is not an ambassador. Last year, Parliament had to be prorogued somewhat early to allow the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues to proceed to London for the Imperial Conference. We were told that there was urgent need of their immediate departure. Important business was hurried on in this House without due consideration, so much so that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) had to register a vigorous protest. Our distinguished representative had to wait for weeks before the Conference actually met. True, the wires were kept busy recording their very strenuous work there for a time, especially that of my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) whom I see taking his seat. At times there was not much to report. We were told that the President of the Privy Council was getting older every day, and that the Prime Minister of Canada was impressing England by being favourable to that now almost extinct garment, the frock coat.

This year our representatives left Canada when the armistice was announced. I am not sure that the armistice was actually signed when they left. They were the first representatives to arrive, but their presence did not prevent Mr. Lloyd George from running an election campaign or the President of the United States from conducting public affairs at Washington for many weeks after our representatives had crossed the sea. The Prime Minister has had all the time and opportunity necessary to press his views on the Conference, and he should now come home to look after the tremendous task which confronts him. Surely, one of his colleagues might be left there to meet the Bolsheviki if the conference finally takes place. I would respectfully suggest that the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) should have the appointment. He would be the best man to handle the situation if they tried to put up any raw deal over on him. The Montreal Star was telling its readers some time ago that the Prime Minister was coming home for a holiday. I hope his colleagues will persuade him to work here and go holidaying elsewhere.

This leads me to a subject with which I desire to deal briefly. In the absence of the Prime Minister, the Acting Prime Minister should give us a full and comprehensive statement of the history of the constitutional changes which have been created by the formation of the Imperial War Cabinet and by the adoption of various policies formulated at the last Imperial Conference. The press of this country, supporting the Government, is not in agreement as to the meaning and functions of the Imperial War Cabinet. The Toronto Globe, which has still a modicum of Canadianism left in it, contends that it is a mere consultive body and not at all an executive body. The Toronto News, the organ of Imperialism in Canada, states that it is an executive body. Speaking at London before the Imperial Parliamentary Association on June 21, 1918, the Prime Minister said:

> A great step in the constitutional development of the Empire was taken last year by the Prime Minister—

That is the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

> —when he summoned the Prime Ministers of the Overseas Dominions to the Imperial War Cabinet.

Later on he said:

> If I should attempt to describe it, I should say that it is a Cabinet of Governments.
> I venture to believe, and I thus expressed myself last year, that in this may be found the genesis of a development in the constitutional relations of the Empire that will form the basis of its unity in the years to come.

Ambiguous as the language of the Prime Minister is it conveys the meaning that a constitutional change has effectively been made since he says that a great step in the constitutional development of the Empire was taken last year when the Prime Minister of Great Britain summoned the Prime Ministers of the Overseas Dominions to the Imperial War Cabinet. Furthermore, we have been told that the functions of the War Cabinet would not cease with war but that this body would remain a part of the constitutional structure of the Empire. If that be so what right and what mandate had the Prime Minister of Canada to accede to this scheme? Canadian policies have been framed and decided upon in Canada since the days when responsible government was granted and they must continue to be framed and decided upon in Canada. Is it that Canada's policies are to be decided in London by a body of men in which Canada would have one representative out of twelve? True it is that the decisions arrived at would have to be ratified by the Canadian Parliament but that is a somewhat illusory safeguard as it would be open to the Prime Minister to use his influence to place the decisions of this body upon the Statute Book of Canada and he might always rely on his parliamentary majority to enable him to do so. The words of the Prime Minister that the new body upon the statute-book of Canada and loquent catch words, and nothing else. There is no such thing as a cabinet of governments. According to strict constitutional rules and practice there cannot be a cabinet unless there be also a parliament to which that cabinet is directly responsible. I do not wonder that the Round Table should be delighted and should regard that new scheme as a distinct advance, for they fully realize that an Imperial cabinet cannot exist without an Imperial Parliament and that is their ultimate game. Sir John Willison is a consistent advocate of Imperialism. The following quotation from a letter written by him is very significant.

> My imperialism means equal citizenship for Canadians in the Empire. That we have never had. That we have not yet secured. Nor do I believe that we can acquire such citizenship through War Cabinets or periodical Imperial Conferences. For the time these are useful as means to an end, but we know that, after all, actual ultimate control over peace and war rests in the Imperial Parliament.

According to Sir John Willison the Imperial War Cabinet is a means to an end, namely, the creation of an Imperial federated parliament, of which Sir John Willison is a consistent advocate, a Federal Parliament in which Canadians would be in a small minority and which would levy taxation on Canadian citizens.

Sir, Canada is a nation and she will never become a province. At the Imperial Conference of 1917 a resolution had been adopted that all discussion and constitutional changes should be postponed until after the war when a conference for the purpose of considering these matters was to be called. I exceedingly regret that this resolution should not have been adhered to and that our Prime Minister should have agreed to a scheme which he has himself described as an important step in the constitutional development of the Empire. May I also point out, and it will apply to other matters as well as to this—that Confederation is an agreement. It was the result of the agreement of four colonies. It is in effect a treaty, and that treaty cannot be altered nor modified without the consent of all the contracting parties to it. The provinces have agreed to part with many of their rights, and to entrust them to the Federal Parliament, but the Federal authority has no right to delegate any of its powers to another body without the consent of the parties to its original contract.

I now come to our internal affairs, and I have a word to say to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) at the beginning. I have not much to criticise in his speech. Indeed, I congratulate him upon many things he said. His eulogy of his former leader was a masterpiece of eloquence such as I have seldom heard in this Chamber. But what I object to is the somewhat patronizing attitude that the hon. gentleman took a little later on. We, the Liberal parliamentary party, are a contemptible little army according to the Hindenburg of Red Deer. We all thought when he crossed the floor of the House that the heavy artillery was going, and I am sure he agrees with us on this. But, Sir, there is something we can say, with all modesty. We are not so numerous as the gentlemen on the other side, but we have some qualities. The first is that we are a united party. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition can sit there with a sense of security which I am sure the Acting Prime Minister would like to enjoy. It is the sense of security which is produced by the certainty that nobody, either behind him or alongside of him, has a knife or a dagger. My hon. friend has declared himself as concerned about the fate of our party. Our future appears to him very dark. I thank him for his solicitude, but will he permit me to remind him that he may be mistaken. What has taken place in a constituency called Red Deer, very recently, might have taught my hon. friend the wisdom of modesty in prediction. I hope my hon. friend will not take these remarks otherwise than in good part. He knows that he and I have always been friends, he knows that I am a great admirer of his, in spite of the slight imperfections he may have. I will now proceed with my remarks.

I believe that the first war machinery that should be demobilized is the present Government. Self-destruction is a painful operation, but in the interest of the country my hon. friends ought to make the sacrifice and demobilize themselves. Theirs is an unnatural alliance at the present juncture. The doctrine that a political truce should exist during the period of reconstruction, and that the great questions of policy should be left aside and untouched, is sheer nonsense, and my friend from Red Deer demonstrated that himself in part of his remarks. We are not living in Utopia. The very fact that the resources of Canada, as the result of our war effort, have been strained as they have been, compels us to face grave and great problems, and the two traditional opposite sides, which are the interests and democracy, cannot but face each other when the settlement is effected. One or the other must give way; it is impossible for gentlemen of different ideas on those problems to sit with each other, and be consistent with their ideals and principles. Principles are eternal, expedients are temporary. Burke has said that inconstancy is a sort of natural corrective to folly and ignorance. This, under ordinary circumstances, is not flattering, but it is still worse when inconstancy is forced upon unwilling people in order to allow them to perpetuate or prolong an equivocal situation. I agree with the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, that all citizens at this period must be animated by a spirit of pure patriotism, and adopt as their goal the welfare of the country; but in order to reach that desire they must strive to assure the success of the policies which they, in their conscience, deem to be the best to obtain that result. The idea of reconstruction means that a new order has to be created, and that changes have to be made to build up the country upon new and firmer foundations. How can it be done if the reformers and the progressives of the country stand pat and let the opportunity pass by? I fully understand that the reactionaries, the Tories, the protected monopolies—all those whose private interests lie in the perpetuation of the present order of things—should advocate political neutrality. Political neutrality means no change at a time when changes are possible and even necessary, when the democracy of a country asserts its right to shape the policy of government, when every nation is bent upon discarding the privileges of the few and safeguarding the interests of the many. But political neutrality on the part of a reformer is a crime against his country, and a betrayal of his principles.

The people whose voices are most loudly heard about reconstruction are those who do not want reconstruction at all. They claim that during the reconstruction period nothing should be done; things must not be disturbed; methods of business should not be changed; tariff policies should not even be discussed. They instinctively feel that the fewer innovations just now—with these people it is always "just now"—the better. They have mobilized under their banner all the appetites, and they masquerade as reconstructors. But, Sir, it is imperative that new policies should be devised. The Minister of Public Works (Hon. F. B. Carvell) told us the other day that when all the revenues of the country shall have been used to meet the obligations of the present year, we shall still be short $100,000,000. Where shall we get the money to pay this enormous amount? Still, Canada must not be bankrupt and shall not be bankrupt. It is indeed unfortunate that to a large extent our financial situation is the result of extravagance and maladministration. I would need only to quote the speeches of the Minister of Public Works to show that for every dollar of legitimate war expenditure, another dollar has been given to graft and profiteering. Still, all our obligations must be met, and a new system of taxation must be devised.

Sir, a protective tariff that is so high as to prohibit goods from coming into this country is not a fair method of producing a revenue. I have a word to say here to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. J. A. Calder); I regret that he is not in his seat. He stated that there was a cleavage on the tariff as between the East and the West; that the two sections of the country were practically arrayed against each other. This I emphatically deny. Eastern Canada is not an adjunct of Toronto. The minister is very clever, but he cannot bind me with what he used to call the financial rings of Toronto. He cannot do it; he is bound with them, I am not. The voice of Toronto—I would like my friends from the West to put this into their minds—is not the voice of the East. Toronto is making a noise altogether out of proportion to its importance. The rural interests of eastern Canada—and they constitute the great majority of the people,—are prepared and willing to work with the western farmers to obtain a lowering of the tariff. And, unless I am much mistaken, my fellow citizens of the prairies will not sacrifice their right of redress for the mess of pottage which the Minister of Colonization and a few others are enjoying in the Union Cabinet.

The tariff question must be settled now. I take this opportunity of asking certain members of the Government, those who have been called the "separated brethren," to apply to the consideration of this question that sort of mind described by Milton, namely: "A mind not to be changed by time or place."

There was a statement in the remarks of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization with which I entirely agree. He said that Canada will never be a great country unless we put an end to national strifes and a better union of her citizens is secured. Every true, patriotic citizen of Canada realizes that national unity is indeed necessary. But such unity, Sir, cannot exist without liberty, without justice, without respect of the rights of all citizens. Let every Canadian respect his fellow citizen, whatever his race, creed or nationality may be. Let us do away with the spirit of race domination and national exclusiveness. Sir, the war should help the solution of that problem. Prussianism has been crushed in Germany; Prussianism should be crushed in all the countries of the world. Down with this Prussian spirit of domination in Europe; but down with it, too, in Canada. Let us all do our share to accomplish the great work of national union and harmony. We who have had the privilege of learning our political doctrines under the guidance of the great statesman whose loss we mourn, shall endeavour to remain true to his teaching and inspiration. From the grave where he has been laid, Sir Wilfrid Laurier still leads us. We shall never forget his great lessons of tolerance, moderation and equal justice for all. "Live and let live" ought to be the standard principle of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, one of the great reforms to be accomplished is the re-establishment of government of the people by the people and the full restoration of the rights of citizens. The press must be free; censorship must be done away with; freedom of speech must be revived. Certain restrictions were justifiable during the war, but the condition of war no longer exists, and I cannot conceive that any democratic man in Canada would approve of such an act, for instance, as the imprisonment on the eve of Christmas day of a Canadian citizen for the crime of having in his possession an edition of Plato's Republic. Sir, this is an outrage to liberty and decency. The press should be free; the control of the mind of the whole people by way of censorship or otherwise is the very method, in all its purity, pursued by Prussia.

It is that nefarious system that has so moulded the conscience of her people as to produce that moral spirit which has startled the world. No such system should be tolerated in Canada, and the industry of shaping public opinion must be abolished. In that regard, I advocate the disappearance of the new national newspaper under the President of the Privy Council. It is a useless waste of money and its existence creates a dangerous precedent. In this connection, let me say, not only for this newspaper, but for all sources of information, that a lie is always a lie and never constitutes a truth even when it masquerades as propaganda. Moral unity and true progress cannot be brought about by arbitrary methods and compulsion. Liberty alone can achieve that result. In that respect I do not hesitate to say that in Canada as elsewhere, the strongest bulwark against Bolshevism is Liberalism and the principles for which it stands. Canadians who would spare their country the violence of revolutionary changes, that great mass of the people which is between the opposite sides, namely, the interests and Bolshevism, will wish God-speed to the forces of reorganized Liberalism which will ultimately unite for political action.

Having mentioned the word "Bolshevism," I wish to express my regret that speakers on the other side of the House should have seen fit to represent in a most unfair manner the remarks of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) the other day. The methods of cheap political agitators and yellow journalism should not be emulated in this House. It is always their tactics to disqualify in advance the person they purpose attacking by branding their victim as a crook or a coward or a traitor. By abusing their opponents, they endeavour to prejudice the issue and close discussion. Profiteers, monopolists, trust magnates, the protected interests, have always tried to associate reform and progressiveness with revolution and crime.

I regret that some of my friends who still call themselves Liberals should have shown, to such a degree, the influence of their present association. That the Tories should adopt such methods, I do not wonder. It is the old game. The next election cannot, of course, be fought with the slogan "A vote for the Liberals is a vote for the Kaiser." That fellow is out of business now. A new cry must be found, and evidently it will be "A vote for McMaster is a vote for Lenine and Trotsky." Is it not possible to place Canadian politics upon a higher and more honourable level?

There is another matter to which I wish to refer in connection with the Address. A new Franchise Bill is announced, and when it is brought down we shall discuss it. But I regret that the Government does not immediately repeal the War-times Election Act, that iniquitous legislation which will ever be a blot on the fair name of Canada. The late Government, before going to the country, ran away from the judgment of those who had elected them and were their natural judges. They resorted to closure for the purpose of tampering with the electoral laws of the country and manipulating the franchise. In order to frustrate and thwart the will of the people, they proceeded to disfranchise Canadian citizens entitled to all the rights of British subjects in this country. It was merely an act of political gambling. All citizens must be equal before the law. Every citizen of a democratic country has a right to his proportion, an equal share in the Government of the country. As Jefferson said, "Governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed." Those are the principles of liberty and responsible government. And the Allies have proclaimed to the world that they have been fighting for the maintenance of those principles. When President Wilson, on April 2, 1917, made his famous speech before the two chambers of the United States Congress, requesting them to declare war on Germany, he uttered the following words:

> But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own Government, for the rights and liberties of small nations.

And he added:

> To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes.

But here in this country our Government had to be judged by a sort of family jury and citizens who did submit to authority were deprived of their rights and have no longer a voice in the Government of this country. They are not represented in this House, and nobody has a right to speak for them in the Parliament of Canada. This House is not the true expression of the popular will. I am speaking only of the principle of the legislation. In practice, it was a still more damnable machinery, and in point of fact citizens of friendly or neutral countries were, under that law, actually disfranchised and could not record their vote. That law was a crime against popular sovereignty. All Liberals resented and opposed it. The Toronto Globe and the Toronto Star fought a vigorous campaign against it. They said that it was most undemocratic, arbitrary and Prussian in its character. The Toronto Globe has for its motto those words of Junius:

> The subject who is truly loyal to the chief magistrate will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures.

But the Toronto Globe and its friends submitted to the arbitrary measure they have condemned and they were quite willing to profit by that measure. It was most unfair to enact that legislation, but it is not any fairer for gentlemen who have denounced it as a fraud and a crime against liberty, to help carry out the very same legislation. And yet the good old Toronto Globe said after the election that the victory achieved with the help of that Prussian law, as the Globe itself styled it, was a victory for democracy. I urge the Government to repeal that law. Let us see it wiped off the statute-book this session.

There are other subjects I should like to discuss, but I shall have an opportunity later on. In conclusion, I would assure the Government that we on this side of the House are only too willing to co-operate with them and do all in our power to help solve the great problems that confront the country in this trying period. Our only aim is the good and prosperity of our common country, but we shall always follow the course which we conscientiously believe to be the best means to reach that happy end. We may not be successful, we may fail in our endeavour, but we are working not merely for political successes, but for the upholding of the great principles of Liberalism by which we shall always stand.

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to add my humble tribute to the eulogies that have been passed on the late leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I also desire to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address. It seemed fitting that both the mover and the seconder should have worn the khaki. Both had done good service for the country, both had fought the enemy, and were therefore peculiarly qualified to give expression to the desires and ideals of the returned soldier. At one time, when the Hun was pushing forward, liberty, civilization and everything we held dear trembled in the balance, but now the war is happily over. It is not necessary to dwell at any length upon the causes that have brought the war to a successful conclusion. We all realize the genius of Marshal Foch, and Marshal Haig and the ability of the other Allied generals. It was, however, the hammer blows of the Allied armies that did the actual fighting, and in this the Canadian armies had their full share. The brave sons of Canada were in the van in all the big attacks, and wrote the name of Canada in letters of gold on all the battlefields of the great war.

Another factor without which victory could not have been achieved was the British Navy. We have all heard of the freedom of the seas. It was the navy's part to preserve the freedom of the seas both before and during the war, and we all know how well it accomplished that task, enabling the soldiers and the munitions of war to be safely transported from all parts of the world towards the places where they were required.

Important and onerous as were the duties cast upon this Government during the war, equally important and onerous are the problems that will have to be solved in the period of reconstruction, but we need have no fear that the Government which has conducted so well the affairs of the country and Canada's part in the war will not be equally successful in the work of demobilization, repatriation, and reconstruction. The period of reconstruction calls for the exercise of the greatest wisdom, prudence, and foresight, but the resources of Canada are so ample that with wisdom and good judgment all the problems confronting us will be satisfactorily solved.

The war, and the conduct of Canada in the war, and the conditions arising out of the war, inaugurate a new departure. Canada has shown what she is able to accomplish by furnishing the best soldiers that took part in this world war. In consequence of the war, or at least concurrently with the war period, Canada has risen to eminence and distinction so far as finances are concerned, and takes her place side by side with the Mother Country in the matter of furnishing the loans to government to carry on the public business. And now, while the subject of peace and of peace terms are considered, now that the Peace Conference is in session, the Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues of the cabinet sit there with full powers as representatives of this country, side by side with the diplomats of the great nations of the world, negotiating a world peace. That surely is an advance, a marvellous advance for Canada. She has risen to new heights, to a new plane of importance. And these new conditions, this rising to new heights, involves equally new and great responsibilities. All this is a new departure and old ideas and old methods will have to give way. We must look to the future, and not to the past; we must consider the present, and take advantage of and exercise the privileges that are afforded us, while looking forward to even greater things. Not only did our soldiers, many of whom made the supreme sacrifice of life itself that we might enjoy liberty and freedom, not only did these men do nobly, but our civilians as well, men and women, did their share nobly and well in supporting and carrying forward the necessary work for those who were fighting abroad.

The programme set forth in the speech from the Throne is varied and ample. I have no intention to refer at any great length, even in my own humble way, to many of the matters in that programme. But I think we shall all agree that nothing too good can be done for the soldiers who have fought and bled and offered their lives for our liberty. Whatever measures the Government can devise within the bounds of the resources at their command, I am sure, will meet with the full endorsement of all the members on this side of the House.

Then there is the question of alien enemies in Canada. I, for one, sincerely hope that the Government will exercise its utmost powers in carrying out whatever regulations may be enacted to drive these people out of the country. They have no right here, and they have done much harm; I hope the Government will leave nothing undone to suppress them. As to immigration, that is a very important question, and I am sure the Government will exercise the greatest possible care with regard to it. We want no immigrants in this country except the very best, and we want none here who are tinged with any ideas of the alien enemy, the Bolshevists or any of that description.

At a time like this, when there is so much to be done, when such great responsibilities rest upon the Government and Parliament of Canada, one might naturally expect our friends of the Opposition to assist in solving the problems that confront us, that they would be willing to lend their aid to bring about the best conditions, that they would throw out from time to time some hints, some elements of a platform that they would be willing to stand upon, and so assist the Government in carrying on their work. But, so far in this debate, I do not think anything of that kind has been offered. It is true, one hon. gentleman made an apology for the Bolshevists, but I do not think that is a very encouraging or satisfactory means of assisting in the work of reconstruction in Canada. Another hon. gentleman thought well to sneer at the King, at the Prime Minister, and at everything pertaining to the Government of the Dominion. That is the second plank of a platform, so far as we have heard. And there has been another: my esteemed friend the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Joseph Read) last night seemed disposed to extend the friendly hand to the alien enemy. He expressed the wish that a warm place should be found in the hearts of the people of Canada for those who had done so much to injure our cause. These, as far as I have been able to observe, are the three planks of their platform as they have thus far been made known to us in this House.

I wish to say just a word more about my esteemed friend the hon. member for Prince, he was prolific in his advice and he pronounced very strong censure upon those who had at some time sat upon the other side of the House but who had come over here. He thought that their conduct was somewhat inconsistent. You would almost imagine from the way he developed this feature of his speech that he himself had been most consistent in his political allegiance. No one would suspect from what he was saying that he had been boxing the political compass, that from being an ardent Conservative he, without very much notice, became a very extreme Liberal. It is said that it was no question of public policy that brought about this remarkably quick turn in his political affiliation. It was, as far as I can understand, a grievance regarding a damaged cargo of potatoes.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House took recess at six o'clock I was, in my humble way, describing the position that Canada has taken in the world, not only in consequence of the great deeds of her soldier sons, not only because of her achievements in matters of finance, but now, by reason of her being represented at the Peace Congress, with the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, and his associates of the Cabinet, sitting there side by side on an equal footing with the diplomatists of the great nations of the world. We, I think, have reason to thank the Prime Minister for the great part he has taken in bringing Canada to that proud position, and yet, Sir, from the Opposition side we constantly hear the remark made that the leader of the Government should be in Canada, instead of being in the Peace Congress doing the best he can to look after the interests of Canada. We may be sure that Sir Robert Borden is, and always will be, found, where he can accomplish the greatest good for Canada. Is there a man in this House possessing a spark of patriotism who will deny that the place where the Prime Minister can accomplish most good for Canada, where he can best advocate our rights, and where he can best discuss questions of paramount importance to this country arising from the war, is in Paris with the diplomatists of the other Allied nations. That, Sir, is my honest and sincere conviction, and it is most extraordinary that hon. gentlemen opposite should indulge in such reflections rather than contribute to this debate something of a tangible and beneficial character. I am sure the Government will be only too pleased to receive ideas from them—advice, if you will, or suggestions—as how best to carry on the onerous and responsible work that devolves upon it arising out of the war. But, Sir, one hon. gentleman after another rises on the other side of the House with no suggestion whatever of the nature of constructive statesmanship to offer, or anything that might in any way assist the Government in carrying on the great duties that devolve upon it. On the other hand, everything that can be resorted to is done to slight and belittle the Government, everything is said that might bring Canada and its Government into ridicule. For example, the hon. member for Prince, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Read) gets up and discusses by the hour things that have no relation whatever to the matters at issue. The hon. gentleman dwells in the briefest way upon the subjects enumerated in the speech from the Throne, but speaks at length about all other matters in the world, and describes his voyages all over the globe. He is a sea captain, he tells us; he has been meandering round the world, and he recalls his experiences on those travels for our benefit. That, I am sure, is a vast and important contribution to the constructive legislation that is necessary to help Canada along in this important juncture in her affairs.

We have heard too of a light that is in a window, and a certain latch-string that is on the outside of a door. My own opinion, Sir, is that that light shall flicker, waver, grow dim and die out, and that latch-string, exposed so long to the elements, shall bleach and wither and drop into decay before any hon. gentleman on this side—who have come here, as I am convinced every one of them have done, to do their best in an honest way to assist the Government in carrying on the important affairs of the country—will so far forget themselves as to leave the substance for the shadow, and abandon the important business they have undertaken. In view of the exigencies of the situation why should hon. gentlemen on the Opposite side consume the time of the House in talking of matters that have no bearing at all upon the problems calling for solution, or upon the important and onerous business that the Parliament of Canada has been sent here to transact? There are many important questions dealt with in the speech from the Throne that merit long and serious consideration. They will come up in due order when they will receive the attention they deserve. It is not necessary at this stage of the session to say very much more with respect to them, so far at least as I am concerned. There are questions perhaps of a more or less controversial character that will come before us, questions upon which possibly all the members on this side do not exactly agree; but hon. gentlemen supporting the Government have come here for a grave purpose, they have come here to carry on in a serious manner the business of the country. I am sure when they come to sit down and compare notes they will be able to arrive at a reasonable compromise even if upon some matters they cannot absolutely see eye to eye. That is my firm conviction.

In view of all the circumstances, why should not all the members of the House determine to join hands? Why not all determine that they will unite and exert their utmost endeavour to push forward the great work that Canada has to undertake, and do their best in a patriotic and generous way to assist this country to the proud position among the nations that she is destined to occupy.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in the first place that I join with the other gentlemen who have taken part in this debate in extending my congratulations to the mover and seconder of this motion. I must say that it is gratifying to know we have in this House two young men of such independent calibre, who have already rendered such great services to the country, as the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the adoption of the Address. And the plea which they have advanced for unity in this country is certainly commendable. I feel that not only will all members of this Parliament agree with them, but the large majority of the people of Canada will agree that it is high time, after the great services that have been rendered by our men at the Front, that unity should exist in this land, and words of strife among our people should cease forevermore. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to say that I had the pleasure of listening to a gentleman, who went overseas with the Essex Battalion, when he addressed a large gathering in the city of Chatham. That gentleman was of the same opinion as the two hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded this motion. He said on that occasion that it was gratifying to him—he being a former Presbyterian minister in the city of Windsor, in the person of Major Tolmie—on many different instances to see soldiers of all denominations and creeds worshipping in the same church on every Sunday morning, feeling that they were to give a good example to the people they had left at home.

I also wish to say that I join the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) in the splendid reference he has made to the late leader of the great Liberal party in this country. Very little further could I say in that regard beyond what has already been said by members of this House, except to add this: I believe it will be many a day before another man will be selected who will enjoy the same confidence and respect on the part of all classes of people in this country that the late leader did. I am glad to pay this slight tribute to that great statesman on behalf of my constituents and myself.

I am also glad to say, Sir, that representing, as I have the privilege of doing, possibly one of the largest urban and rural constituencies of Canada, I can join with the first portion of the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer, in that the people of my constituency, irrespective of party, of creed or nationality, stood by every vote that I gave in this House in the interests of the prosecution of the war. I am glad to say that not one dissenting word has come from any of my constituents. At my convention they said to me: support any and all measures as far as the prosecution of the war is concerned, irrespective of what side of the House they may emanate from. This I have done since this Parliament was formed. But having done this, I come to the point where I differ from the hon. member for Red Deer, because I feel that he who sat on this side of the House for so many years and who advocated free trade as they have it in Great Britain, now is an advocate of free trade as they have it in the Union Government. It was very noticeable a few nights ago that the member for Red Deer sat with his colleague the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), and these two gentlemen whispered into each other's ears like bride and groom. When the member for Red Deer said this afternoon that he felt like the young lady, then I thought that he must be the bride and that the member for Brantford must be the groom. It was also noticeable that on that same night, before going to his sweet slumbers, the member for Brantford consulted the member for Red Deer as to whether the latter was going to speak that night; for if he was, the member for Brantford would not be able to hear the sweet sound of his voice. The member for Red Deer, however, assured the member for Brantford that he would not speak until to-day, and the member for Brantford went home and rested. It then dawned on me, Sir, that there might be something in the report of the last caucus of the followers of Union Government as given in the Toronto Globe of March 2. The report says:

> Even more remarkable was Mr. Cockshutt's remark at the Unionist caucus when he invited Dr. Michael Clark, one of the best-known Unionist Liberals from the West, to get up on the fence with him. "You get up on the fence from your side, and I'll get on it from mine, and we will straddle it," he is reported to have said.

If the member for Brantford and the member for Red Deer are straddling the fence on the tariff question, let me assure them that the old posts of that fence are rotting, and before long it will topple over, carrying with it those members on the other side of the House who are upon it. The wave of public opinion will carry it away, and these hon. gentlemen will clamber over here for safety, and without looking for the key, will be ready to knock the hinges off the door in an attempt to get away from that wave of public opinion which is so strong against any straddling of the fence at this particular time.

The hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. McIsaac) wants to know where we stand on trade questions and on other questions in this Parliament, I will speak for myself. In the first place, I commend Government for the admission into this country of free farm tractors. The member for Red Deer will not deny that the first request for free tractors emanated from this side of the House and was turned down by the gentlemen with whom he is associating himself at the present time. But public opinion, Mr. Speaker, was so strong from one end of this country to the other that before Parliament could meet in 1918 the Government by Order in Council placed farm tractors on the free list. Will the hon. gentleman deny that? Will the hon. gentleman deny that the first request for free tractor ditchers, in order that the lands of the producers of foodstuffs in this country should be properly drained, emanated from this side of the House? I believe that when he spoke on that occasion he supported the proposal; yet to-day he says that there is no difference between the policies of the two parties. You may call the parties whatever you like, but the voters of Canada, whether Liberals, Unionists, farmers, labourers, or whatever they are, will have something to say as to who will be their representatives and as to what is to be the policy of this Parliament on such matters. I take exception to the assertion of the member for Red Deer that there is no difference between the two parties on the trade question. Away back in 1897, when the Liberal party came into power, that question came up and the people were consulted in open meetings throughout this country as to what the tariff should be. The member for Red Deer will not deny that many articles were put on the free list at that time; I remember two of them particularly, binder twine and cream separators. Cream separators were put on the free list in 1897 or 1898, and I challenge any member of this House to deny that we now have a number of the very best cream separator manufacturers producing the very best article to be had. This article has been on the free list, unprotected, from that time to the present and it has practically not advanced one dollar in price from that day to this, notwithstanding the fact that it has competed with all the cream separators that have been supplied by the greatest manufacturers in the United States. If the manufacturers can produce cream separators in this way when materials put into them are advancing in price, is that not an argument in favour of our having free agricultural implements? I stand for free agricultural implements and am prepared to support that principle at any time. We have great food monopolies in this country, and the only way in which food can be produced more cheaply is by getting farm implements at as low a price as possible. The Minister of Public Works (Hon. F. B. Carvell) speaking in Hamilton a few nights ago said that the only way foodstuffs could be reduced was by pounding down the price of wheat, while right within his hearing, right within gunshot, was the International Harvester Company, which has doubled the price of agricultural implements since the war began. As a matter of fact, they increased the price of them the very moment that the Conservative party came into power. Let me say to the Minister of Public Works that in order to have cheaper foodstuffs the people must be enabled to obtain more cheaply the articles with which they produce them.

I see the hon. member for Brantford here. Let me repeat what I said at the last session of this Parliament. We have in the city of St. Thomas a concern which produces agricultural implements—ploughs, harrows, rollers, and so on—I refer to the Erie Iron Works. This firm has produced these goods at prices 25 per cent less than the figures of the price list issued by the Cockshutt Plough Company, the International Harvester Company or the Massey Harris Company. These are facts which the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. T. W. Crothers), who ought to be familiar with the facts, will not deny. If it is alleged that that is not true, all the Acting Prime Minister has to do is to ask for an investigation before a committee of this Parliament. Does the member for Red Deer know what he is doing when he stands up and connects himself with these high protectionists at this time? He is causing the returned soldiers who are taking up farming as a profession and borrowing $2,500 from the Government, to spend a large portion of this in unnecessary profits which the implement manufacturers are receiving.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) may smile. He can, as he did the other night, fill pages of Hansard with eulogies of what our boys did at the front —for what? To produce the very condition that is going to extract unfair profits for the manufacturers of the machinery with which our boys are going to till the soil in order to produce foodstuffs to prevent the people of this country from paying extravagant prices. I say, without fear of contradiction, that while this state of affairs lasts, the Government is neglecting its duty and is not doing as the Government of the United States has done. The Government of the United States, seeing that a ring was being formed by the International Harvest Machine Company and that there was not sufficient competition, appeals to the courts and has that combine dissolved, and in that country we have to-day competition so far as agricultural implements are concerned.

Will the hon. member say from his seat in this House that the prices which are sent out by the different concerns and which are exactly the same, are prepared in separate offices, when they come out in such form; or is it not true that the three different companies know just what the prices are going to be and that the prices are advanced from time to time to suit their own wishes? I challenge contradiction in this regard, and I challenge contradiction further when I state that, when steel and iron dropped in price last January and the farmers appealed for cheaper agricultural implements in this country, agricultural implements again took an advance of, I think, ten per cent. If we are going to give a square deal to the consumers, to the men whom we are trying to locate on farms, it is for the Government to see whether the statements I am now making are right or wrong and to see that the men are not robbed nor have their money unfairly extracted from them in paying large commissions on the implements which they require to till the soil. If the Government were right at the last session of Parliament in placing at the disposal of the people of Canada 1,000 tractors at wholesale prices, they are right and justified now in giving to the men who are locating on these lands, the returned soldiers in particular, the implements they require at the very first and lowest cost, and in preventing great profits being made out of those men.

So far as the Government policy of good roads and good housing is concerned, I am heartily in accord with the policy of having the best roads and the best housing that can be given to the people of this country; but we should take this matter up very seriously, because, as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) stated the other night, our debt now amounts to $2,000,000,000, and we must be very careful in approaching these matters. I am willing to give my support to these measures which, I believe, will be in the best interest of the country. In passing, however, I want to say that as far as the Daylight Saving Bill, which was prepared and put through this House at the last session, is concerned, it caused great hardship and inconvenience in this country. I was absolutely opposed to it then, and if the Bill is reintroduced at this session, I shall oppose it.

With regard to the different commissions and boards which have been appointed to look after work which the members of this Government and of this Parliament should do, I want to go on record as being absolutely opposed to them, because I do not think we have ever before had a greater demonstration in this country of the uselessness, extravagance and unfairness of such boards as the Canada Food Board. The report of the Canada Food Board was tabled last week, and during the period which it covered, namely, from February 1 to December 31, 1918, a period of eleven months, the cost to the people of Canada by way of licenses and fees amounted to over $500,000. Out of that amount, how much do you suppose, Sir, went into the treasury of this country? $39,000, the balance being for salaries, railroad and other travelling expenses of the Canada Food Board and its officials. Is this the way in which the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) is going to justify his action in remaining on the other side of the House? Is he going to allow the people to have extracted from them $500,000, $39,000 of which goes into the treasury and the balance goes for salaries and travelling expenses. This board has passed regulations which are a source of injury to the people of this country and which the people oppose most bitterly. It has passed regulations that have caused more ill feeling against the present Government than anything else has done. Think of that board costing the country thousands of dollars in salaries and its officials touring the country in Pullman cars—for what purpose? To find out who were paying too much money for their foodstuffs? No. Let us see further what they did. They passed regulations which gave to the people of the country foodstuffs that were not wholesome and which should rather have been fed to the stock throughout Canada. I am not afraid to make the statement that this has caused many diseases to break out in different sections of the country. After those diseases broke out, what happened? This great board, when smallpox and "flu" and other kinds of contagious diseases were raging in different parts of Canada, at considerable expense sent out orders: Take back your flour over 25 pounds to the dealers from whom you got it; let them dump it into the barrel and let some other person who has no disease eat it along with the germs. Take the sugar in the same way. Take back your sugar, you people, whatever you have over a certain amount and let those great patriotic societies, such as the Daughters of the Empire and the Red Cross, that are sending over little parcels of sugar to the boys at the front, who are fighting our cause, send over that sugar, let our boys get some of those germs, and let those diseases break out, and possibly have the entire army laid up, in that way, playing into the hands of the Huns. This board went on with all their extravagance at the expense of the people of this country. Let me state, for the benefit of the high protectionists on the other side of the House that they did one great thing for which we must give them credit. I notice they went into the cookbook business. Of the cook-books which they had prepared, they sold some $7,000 worth, but it cost them some $13,000 to get those cook-books. I suppose the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) will say that we should have had protection on the cook-books so that we might then have been able to break even. That is the way in which this Board carried on its work, and I want to enter my protest against this useless spending of money at a time when we need money so badly and require every dollar to be guarded with the greatest care.

With regard to the Civil Service, I will tell them where I stand. I believe that the Civil Service of this country should be reduced by one-third, and I think the Government will do well to appoint a committee to see that the Civil Service was reduced by at least that amount, thus saving hundreds of thousands of dollars that is at present expended unnecessarily. The men in the Civil Service who are rendering good service to the country could then be paid proper salaries and the committee would see that money was not thrown away unnecessarily. The saving in this regard would be sufficient to pay a large amount of the pensions that we hope will be paid to our returned soldiers; or the money could be expended in giving a better rural mail service throughout this country, and in giving the men who have rendered such service a fair day's pay for an honest day's work. If there is one department of the Government that is underpaid it is the mail service, and particularly the rural mail service, and I say it is a sin and a shame, particularly as in the future many of these positions will be held by returned soldiers. I urge the Government to see that these men receive fair and even good remuneration for the work they perform.

There is another matter. In camps all over this country there are men who have reached the military age within the last year or so, and who, if released, could secure positions that are waiting for them. I believe every member of this House has received requests for the release of these men, but the Government will not let them go. Why hold these men when there are positions waiting for them in civil life? In the city of Chatham, whose chief engineer has been overseas and rendered good service at the front for two or three years, all public works have been held up pending his return. The city did not wish to fill his position, and did not like to entrust the construction of pavements, sewers and other public works to a temporary man. The city council on January 1 requested the Government to release Major Adams so that the public works of the city could be gone on with and employment given to the men seeking work, but nothing was done. The Minister of Militia, I believe, replied that nothing could be done. It seems ridiculous that public works of this kind should be held up by the Government's retaining the services of these men.

In conclusion, I would say that I personally am prepared to support all measures introduced in this House which I think will be in the best interests of the returned soldiers. There is nothing that the Government can do for these men that will not receive the endorsation of the great majority of the people of this country, and it is up to the Government to do something for them. If they do not the blame will lie with them, because there will be very little opposition from this side.

Mr. JOHN WESLEY EDWARDS: (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I desire first of all to add my congratulations to those which have already so fittingly been bestowed on the mover and the seconder of the Address. Seldom, if ever, in this House has that duty been so generally approved; seldom if ever has the approval been more merited. I note, however, that the efforts of the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Redman) did not commend themselves entirely to the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) who had a somewhat serious complaint to make. His complaint was that the hon. member for Calgary East knew more than he had put on the pages of Hansard. As to that, what a striking contrast was presented by the hon. member for South Renfrew, who not only placed on Hansard all he knew but very much that he only thought he knew. In this connection, I might observe that the comic effects of many of the observations of the hon. member for South Renfrew are heightened by the self-sufficiency and conceit of the artist.

I also wish to add my congratulations to those which have been bestowed upon the hon. leader of the Opposition in winning the great Liberal Free-for-All and the $7,000 attached thereto. It is remarkable what speed and endurance an old race horse will develop if he is headed towards home and a good feed of oats. I need not remind you, Sir, that Scotchmen are partial to oats, and the hon. leader of the Opposition is Scotch—plain Scotch sometimes, for he is very blunt and direct in his remarks, and at other times, when his remarks are interspersed with humour, Scotch and soda, sometimes more Scotch than soda, and sometimes more soda than Scotch. The hon. leader of the Opposition, however, is a very worthy type of a very gallant race, and the best wish I have for him is that he may continue to fill the position of leader of the Opposition for the rest of his natural life and that his years may be very, very long. I think in expressing that wish I am also expressing what is in the best interests of Canada.

The hon. leader of the Opposition assisted by a small choir composed of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) held a sort of revival meeting on the other side of the House a few days ago. After a few words of prayer or rather a few quotations from Scripture, which fall very frequently from the lips of the leader of the Opposition, the choir sang that old hymn: Where is my wandering boy to-night? The leader of the Opposition then proceeded to notify hon. gentlemen on this side that there was a candle in the window and that the latch string was outside. He did not state what window the candle was in, but the omission was supplied by the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough, who said that it was in the kitchen window. When extending an invitation to members on this side of the House to return, one would have thought that they would have illuminated the front of the house and put a service flag in the window, or at all events given some manifestations of joy to encourage the wanderers to return home. But no. They told Liberal-Unionists on this side of the House that the only way they could get back home was around by the woodshed and through the back door. They had some veal there leaning against the back fence. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) would know at once that it was only a grade, and a mighty poor one at that. However, a very pathetic appeal was made by the leader of the Opposition, and a very urgent one by the hon. member for Brome. A still more urgent appeal was made by the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough, who told the Liberal-Unionists on this side of the House that if they did not hurry up they would not get any veal. I have as yet seen no indications on the part of Liberal-Unionists to accept the invitation and hurry to the other side.

As the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) very properly and pointedly said: What is there to go back to? If you are looking for a similarity of ideals, whether on trade matters or other matters, I do not see that there is anything to cause hon. members on this side of the House to go back to the other side. Certainly so far as the war and affairs arising out of the war are concerned, I am quite confident that the Liberal-Unionists on this side will find themselves in more congenial company than they would if they were to cross to the other side of the House.

It has been said by some hon. gentlemen opposite that the War-time Elections Act was simply for the winning of the election, and that the Military Service Act was for the same purpose. Of course, hon. gentlemen on that side are actuated by pure motives at all times, and hon. members on this side have not been so actuated. I want to take a peep at history, and not very ancient history either. In August, 1917, there was a meeting of Liberals in the city of Toronto to talk over the political situation and discuss the possibilities of coalition and that sort of thing. They spoke very candidly one to the other, and their proceedings were reported, though they did not intend that the public should be informed of what they said. One gentleman, speaking of the Liberals as a win-the-war party said:

> Win-the-war party? This is not a win-the-war party. Every gentleman here says the whole aim is to win the election. That is the policy of the party.

Another gentleman, formerly a member of this House for Glengarry, said, that as he had in his constituency both Scotch and French, he had taken the course in this House of voting one time with the Government and another time against it, for the purpose of appealing to both these sections in his county. Hon. George P. Graham, in explanation of his position said that he voted and acted as he did in the House with the knowledge and approval of his leader. He stood on the floor of this House and said that he voted for conscription in July, 1917, and advocated it, on principle, and that he would advocate it again on principle. Fancy the position of the Liberal party as represented by that expression of opinion on the part of Hon. Mr. Graham. He was voting and acting in this House with the knowledge and consent of his leader, yet voting and acting in this House in a manner directly opposed to that taken by his leader at that time. We can only come to the conclusion that in Ontario Mr. Graham was acting with the knowledge and consent of his leader in supporting conscription, while a different policy was being supported in Quebec.

Another gentleman present at that meeting now occupies a seat in this House, the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy). He said:

> Like other gentlemen who have spoken I regret the diversity of opinion that exists, and I am confused on account of it. In fact for a month or more past I have been like Eliza in Uncle Tom's Cabin, floating along jumping from one cake of ice to another, and now I want to strike shore somewhere, and I want to land soon.

Well, the hon. gentleman, judging from his remarks the other night, is still floating, and on thin ice, too, and on many questions still quite a way from shore. He found fault with the polling of the soldier vote in England. But there are only two gentlemen in this House who received a larger proportion of soldier votes in England than they received in Canada, and of whom it can be said, because of that larger proportion in England, that they gained an election which they would not otherwise have gained. That is: it is only fair to assume that the Union Government of Canada would have obtained as large a proportion of soldiers' votes overseas as they obtained in Canada. If you give to them only the same proportion of soldiers' votes overseas as they received of the soldiers' votes on this side, and hand the rest of the soldiers' votes over to their opponents, there are only two seats that could have been affected adversely to the hon. members now sitting in this House. So, I think Eliza will have to jump on another cake of ice so far as this point is concerned.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kennedy) also referred to the franchise legislation. He said that franchise legislation should be fair and just. I presume we all agree to that as a statement of principle. The only question is what a man considers fair and just. Is it fair to give the franchise to the slacker, the defaulter, the alien enemy in this country? Is it fair to place these men in the same position as men who have done their duty throughout the four and a half years of war? Is it fair to recognize in the alien enemies of this country citizens on an equal plane with those who have loyally stood by the country in its hour of need? According to the hon. member for North Essex, and several others who have spoken on that side that would be a proper course to pursue. I take issue with them on that; I say that that sort of legislation would be simply putting a premium upon treason and cowardice, it would be unfair legislation—unfair to those in this country who faced their responsibilities as citizens and were prepared to take all the chances that went with doing their duties as citizens.

The hon. member for North Essex and several other hon. members opposite,—the hon. member (Mr. McCoig) who has just taken his seat, I believe, is one—find fault with the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) because he is not in Canada at this time. They say that the Prime Minister should be in Canada now attending to tariff matters, attending to railway matters. The hon. member for North Essex said that Canada is not concerned with the settling of Balkan boundaries nor the policing of Constantinople. That seems a strange stand for a man to take in view of what this country fought for through four and a half years of the most terrible war the world has ever known.

Canada is not concerned in the settlement of the boundaries of the Balkan States. Is it not true that that part of Europe was a seething bed of revolution and a serious trouble for years, and that that trouble arose very largely from the unsettled conditions of the people because the boundaries were not properly arranged and certain races found themselves under the jurisdiction of other people and rebelled against that sort of thing? If Canada has any interest in world peace, it seems to me to require no argument that she is very much concerned in seeing that there shall be a rearrangement of the boundaries of these countries which will make it impossible, as far as we can do so, for such a war to take place again. Is Canada not concerned in policing Constantinople? Is it possible that any hon. gentleman will argue that we Canadians have no concern in the fact that the Turks have murdered in cold blood over a million Armenians whose only fault was that they had accepted the Christian faith? The hon. gentleman may argue that it is more important to us in Canada to settle at once our tariff differences than to endeavour to arrange matters over there and place Turkey in such a position that she cannot in the years to come murder and mutilate, as she has done, not only during this war but for years before this war?

Mr. Speaker, I think we in Canada should be proud of the fact that we have a Prime Minister who is recognized by the statesmen of Britain and France as a man of superior ability, as a man possessing talents which can be of the greatest assistance in bringing about a rearrangement to make impossible the state of things which has filled every honest and decent person with horror during the last four and a half years. The Prime Minister is a man whose soul is sick with horror at what has taken place during the last four and a half years, a man whose vision is broader than the bounds of Canada, or of the British Empire, a man who feels himself to have an interest in the whole human race and what affects the whole human race, and who is playing his part and bringing honour to this country in trying to effect a settlement which will last for all time to come and which will place these countries where they properly belong. I think the expressions which have fallen from the lips of some hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to the absence of the Prime Minister at this time do very little credit to them. The tariff can wait for a few months if need be. The Prime Minister's place at the present time, I submit, is over in Paris, giving them there the benefit of his ability in the effort to effect a settlement of this great war and bring matters to a proper conclusion.

I shall not undertake to add to what has been said already in the way of paying tribute to the achievements of our soldiers overseas. I could not hope to say anything as eloquently and as well as it has been said by many hon. gentlemen who have referred to what our soldiers have done. We are face to face now with the problem of reconstruction and the soldier enters very largely into that problem. I think I am logical in saying that, so far as the soldier is concerned, the problem of reconstruction and repatriation is greater in the constituency which has a thousand soldiers returning to it than in a constituency which has only half a dozen soldiers returning to it. There are certain constituencies in Quebec, for instance, where it will not be any problem at all. If you can judge from the number of soldiers who went from these constituencies by the soldier vote polled, then I submit the problem of repatriation, as far as they are concerned, is no problem whatever. There are several constituencies in Quebec, according to the soldier vote polled in Canada and overseas, that have only three soldiers to repatriate. Things cannot be very much disturbed in a constituency where they only have to repatriate three soldiers supposing that they have all lived through the war and returned. In the constituency of Kamouraska, for instance, there were only 15 soldier votes polled on this side of the water and overseas. Things cannot be so terribly out of tune in that part of Canada in so far as the soldier or repatriation is concerned.

I propose to place on Hansard some figures showing what various parts of Canada have done in regard to sending soldiers in this war. That is something that has not been touched on as yet and I propose to place these figures on record now. The Military Service Act came in for considerable criticism in this House although it passed with the approval of all the provinces of Canada except one. The Government tried honestly under that Military Service Act to keep faith with the men overseas and to keep faith with them by disturbing conditions in this country as little as possible. In order not to disturb conditions more than was absolutely necessary in this country, in order to leave to farming and industrial pursuits those men that could least easily be spared, provision was made in the Military Service Act for certain exemptions and exemption tribunals were appointed. As time went on it became very apparent that the very machinery of the Act which had been provided for the purpose of retaining here those men that could least be spared was being made use of to defeat the purpose of the Act which was to get the necessary number of men to go overseas.

In that connection I may say that out of 403,135 registrations in the Dominion of Canada all but 25,508 asked for exemptions and that was pretty general in all the military districts. But I wish to point out this, and it is exceedingly significant, that those military districts that asked for the lowest number of exemptions in proportion to registrations were those military districts that had already contributed the greatest number of men, and those districts which asked for the greatest number of exemptions were the ones that had already done little or nothing. For instance, in the district of Quebec 39,351 registered, and 39,072 asked for exemptions, and if you look at the figures in connection with the enlistments up to the time of the enforcement of the Military Service Act, the enlistments from that district were the lowest of any district in the Dominion of Canada.

Well, Sir, every person knows that as time went on the Germans made their attempt to break through on the Western Front. The French line was bent back towards Paris, that part of the line held by the British was bent back towards the channel ports, and things looked very dark indeed. The Government of this country, and the Government of Great Britain and the people of France saw that every man that could possibly be spared must go to the Front if we were to save the situation, and steps were taken here to cancel all exemptions; it was absolutely necessary if we were going to keep faith with the men overseas that men should be sent to support them in their efforts to maintain the position on the Western Front. Great Britain had already been drained of almost every available man, and was short of food, yet she went out and took over thirty thousand off the farm, and there was not any kick or row in the Mother Country about it.

On March 31, 1918, the number of recruits obtained from the several provinces were as follows—I will give the number of recruits in March, 1918, and also on August 15, 1918, in order to show what was done here by the Militia Department in trying to obtain the necessary help for the boys overseas. Up to March 31st, 1918, Ontario had contributed 193,689 recruits, and up to August 15th, 1918, 235,925 recruits, an increase of 42,236. Quebec had contributed on March 31st, 1918, 55,206, and on August 15th, 71,891, an increase of 16,685, that is for the whole province. Maritime Provinces on March 31st, 1918, 45,662, and on August 15th, 1918, 56,937, an increase of 11,275. Manitoba on March 31st, 1918, 64,624, and on August 15th, 1918, 72,593, an increase of 7,969. Saskatchewan on March 31st, 1918, 28,540, and on August 15th, 1918, 36,980, an increase of 8,440. Alberta, on March 31st, 1918, 38,188, and on August 15th, 1918, 44,238, an increase of 6,050. British Columbia on March 31st, 1918, 46,895, and on August 15th, 1918, 51,947, an increase of 5,062. That is to say, on the 31st of March 1918, we had 482,806 recruits, and on the 15th of August, 1918, we had 570,521, or we had added in that time 97,717. I submit to you, Sir, that these figures are creditable to the Militia Department and to the efforts of the Government of this country.

I want to carry those figures a little bit further. I want to be perfectly fair to every part of the Dominion in regard to this matter, showing what each did towards helping to win this war. I want to place these figures on record because I think they have a very direct bearing upon the question of reconstruction in this country, and they should be taken into consideration by the Government when it is formulating its plan for the expenditure of money throughout the different parts of this Dominion. If we deduct from the population of each province all Europeans, Asiatics and foreign born, except those from Belgium, France, Italy and Rumania—and I except those because I think it is only right to assume that any residents of those countries in Canada would be willing to do their part with us, and to enlist as our men were enlisting to carry on the war—if we deduct those Germans and Austrians, and so on, from the populations of the various provinces I find that it gives us this result: That out of every one thousand recruits each province should have furnished in proportion to its population as follows: Ontario 368, Quebec 275, Maritime Provinces 138, Manitoba 67, Saskatchewan 59, Alberta 47, and British Columbia 46. That, Sir, is the proportion which each province should have contributed in proportion to its population. Now I will place on Hansard what each province did contribute as against what they should have contributed —	No. of Enlistments.	No. that should have enlisted in proportion to population.	No. above or below quota according to population that should have been furnished by each province.

Ontario	241,258	217,330	23,928 (Excess).
Quebec	80,097	162,407	82,310 (Below)
Maritime Provinces	59,206	81,498	22,292 "
Manitoba	73,434	39,568	33,866 (Excess).
British Columbia	53,765	27,166	26,599 "
Saskatchewan	37,666	34,843	2,823 "
Alberta	45,146	27,756	17,390 "

I might say that these figures take us right up to the 15th of November, 1918, and that in the case of British Columbia that province was pretty nearly one hundred per cent in excess of its fair quota or proportion of population.

I want to impress on the members of the House the fact, which cannot, I think, be controverted, that had each province enlisted men in proportion to its population, Quebec would have contributed 82,310 more men than it did, the Maritime Provinces would have enlisted 22,292 more men than they did, and Ontario and the Western Provinces would have had 104,602 men available for agricultural and industrial purposes. I know full well that in various parts of Ontario there was a great lack of help on the farms; men were scarce. The same was true, I am told, in various parts of the Northwest, in the Prairie Provinces. But what would it have meant to Alberta, for instance, if they had had 17,390 men to help them produce and take off their crops? Had these other parts of the country done their full share, that would have been the result so far as Alberta is concerned. What would it have meant to Ontario to have had 23,928 men scattered throughout the province on the farms and among the industrial concerns? You cannot avoid the lesson which these figures teach when you are considering the problems of reconstruction and repatriation. These problems are necessarily greater in the Western Provinces and in Ontario than they are in the provinces which did not contribute their fair share of men during the war. That is all I have to say in regard to that; I thought it advisable to place these figures on Hansard in order that we might have them there and learn whatever lesson they have for us.

The member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) made some remarks with reference to the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). Among other things he said that when the member for Red Deer came into this House he advocated the principle of free trade as they have it in England. If my memory serves me correctly, at one time that motto was nailed to the Liberal masthead. The difference between the member for Red Deer and the members of the Liberal party is found in the fact that while the Liberal party hung that out as their motto and said that they were for free trade as they have it in England, they used that motto only for election purposes. Whether or not we agree with the trade principles of the member for Red Deer, we must concede that he has at all times been absolutely consistent in advocating free trade principles on this side of the House, on the other side of the House and throughout the country. There has been no straddling by the hon. member for Red Deer. I do not agree with that hon. gentleman on trade matters any more than he agrees with me, but I respect a man who has the courage of his convictions as he has, and who has never lost an opportunity since he came into the House of advocating the principles in which he honestly believes. His position in that regard is vastly different from that of the member for Kent and from that of every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. Who in this House or in the country would dare to say that the trade history of Canada has ever shown the Liberal party to be consistent in the matter of trade or trade policy? Free trade as they have it in England, tariff for revenue, unrestricted reciprocity with the United States—I fancy that at present there are as many trade policies on the other side of the House as there are members. Yet they ask us to come down at once with a tariff policy. The member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) said that the tariff matter must be settled immediately, but he did not offer one single suggestion or give us the slightest idea of what his own views on tariff matters are. The member for Kent found fault with the member for Red Deer. Will the member for Kent say that he is in favour of free trade for Canada? Will the leader of the Opposition say that he favours a policy of free trade for Canada? Will the member for Brome say that he favours a policy of free trade for Canada? Not one of them will speak. Then, for Heaven's sake, let them keep silent; let them not criticise a man who has always been a consistent free trader in this House and out of this House.

Talking about straddling the fence, what was the position of the member for Kent in the last election? Pretty nearly every one knows that he was playing for the soldier vote. He was on the fence, representing himself as being with the Government so far as the soldiers were concerned,—looking for the endorsation of both leaders, if he could get it. He played that up to the limit and he succeeded in getting a fair share of the soldiers' vote. But as a straddler—well, he is an adept at straddling. As a matter of fact, he kept straddling the fence so long that there was a danger of there being two McCoigs instead of one.

The hon. gentleman speaks about the increase in the price of agricultural implements during the war. Yes, the price of agricultural implements did go up during the war. So did the price of beans, of which they raise large quantities in the county of Kent, I believe. So did the price of tobacco. So did the price of potatoes. The price of many articles went up during the war. I should have been very much surprised had the price of manufactured articles not gone up, as everything else went up.

The hon. gentleman would have us believe that members on that side of the House are in favour of free trade. The history of the party does not show that. What was the position taken in regard to agricultural implements in 1907, for instance? The member for Kent was supporting the Liberal party at that time, cheering and hurrahing for the Liberal platform. In 1907 the question of the duty on agricultural implements came up in this House. The member for Kent was not a member of the House at that time. He came into Parliament the next year, but he came in as a strong supporter of a party which had refused in 1907 the appeal of the Conservatives in this House for the reduction of the duty on agricultural implements from 17½ to 10 per cent. When the Fielding tariff was brought in, in 1907, the proposal was to bring the duty down to 17½ per cent, and Dr. Schaffner, now Senator Schaffner, then the member for Souris in this House, moved that the duty on agricultural implements be reduced to 10 per cent. Every Conservative member in the House at that time voted for Dr. Schaffner's resolution, and every Liberal voted against it. Therefore, in so far as the tariff on agricultural implements is concerned, I think I am quite reasonable when I say that past history would encourage the hon. member for Red Deer ((Mr. Michael Clark), or any other free trader, if there is any other out-and-out free trader in this House, to hope for more from the Conservative party or Unionist party than he could expect to get from the old Liberal party.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer for a few minutes. I am sorry to have to refer to it, but I do not think that I should take my seat without making some reference to Civil Service reform. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) a few days ago brought up in this House the matter of the Civil Service and offered some criticism. I was in the House during the whole time that the hon. member made his speech, and not only did I follow him very carefully in the House, but to make certain of what he said I very carefully read his speech as reported on Hansard. I could not, however, find in the hon. member's speech a single sentence, line or word which would justify any person of accusing him of religious bigotry. He presented the matter in a moderate and fair manner. Not once in the whole course of his speech did he mention the word "religion." And yet, because his criticism of the Civil Service affected the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission, Mr. Foran, that gentleman is reported in the press the next day as saying that the remarks of the hon. member for West Toronto against him were actuated by religious bigotry; that the hon. member for West Toronto assailed him, Mr. Foran, because Mr. Foran was a Roman Catholic. I repeat that from beginning to end of his speech, you cannot find one word to justify that accusation by the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission. Have we come, Sir, to a state in this country that an hon. member of this House cannot, from his seat, without being characterized in the press as a bigot, criticise a civil servant who happens to be a member of the Roman Catholic church? Is that the situation with which we are face to face in Canada to-day? It looks very much like it. Not only do I resent that accusation by Mr. Foran, the Secretary of the Commission, but I resent the editorial which appeared yesterday or this morning—I forget which—in the Ottawa Journal.

I am going to refer to a case which will throw some little light on this question. I understand from the press that one of the ministers is going to refer to the Civil Service, and I am very glad to speak before he does, because this is a matter which he can add to his list, and he can give us some explanation on this as well as on the matters on which the hon. member for West Toronto touched. There appeared in the Canada Gazette on December 28 this advertisement:—

> A Publicity Agent to take charge of the publicity work of the Department of Immigration and Colonization at a salary of $4,000 per annum. Candidates should possess the following qualifications:—Ability to prepare and direct newspaper, magazine and farm journal advertising campaigns, both in Canada and elsewhere, in setting forth the settlement opportunities in Canada; knowledge and experience with (a) follow-up systems, (b) the production and circulation of motion pictures, and (c) the natural resources of Canada; ability to direct lecture campaigns; a personal acquaintance with writers, publicists and organizations now dealing with the opportunities and land settlement problems of Canada.
> Application forms, properly filled in, must be filed in the office of the Civil Service Commission not later than the 24th day of January.

In answer to that advertisement, I desire to place on Hansard an application made by a gentleman who seems to me to possess the qualifications called for in the advertisement. He writes as follows:—

> William Foran, Esq., Secretary,
> Civil Service Commission,
> Ottawa.
>
> January 24, 1918.
> Sir,—I have the honour to attach herewith formal application for the position of Publicity Agent of the Department of Immigration and Colonization.

I am at present in charge of the Publicity of the Vocational Branch of this department, which involves considerable research work, and feel that I have qualifications and experience which would fit me eminently for the vacant position.

In my late appointment (prior to the war) as manager of the Copy and Art Department of the Norris-Patterson Advertising Agency, I was brought in touch with many of the leading Canadian advertisers, the preparation of whose copy was in my hands, and the continued success of these advertising campaigns is evidence of the quality of this copy. In many cases it has been my duty to advise on and instal follow-up systems, and especially in the preparation of catalogues and booklets, my experience has been very varied, embodying, as it does, a knowledge of the technicalities of the printing and engraving industries.

As regards the Farm Press, it has been my privilege to handle a number of advertising accounts of manufacturers, appealing particularly to the farmers of Canada, and this has involved a study of farm conditions which was essential before contact with this section of the community could be made.

For the International Varnishing Company, I prepared a lecture with over 200 slides describing the winning of the raw materials in different parts of the world that composed the varnish of commerce and of the processes and manufacture of this commodity—this lecture being part of an educational campaign, directed to the retail merchants of Canada. This is directly along the lines of Cinema Publicity.

I am considered a forceful public speaker, and have had not a little experience along this line, and could adequately plan and direct such campaigns as would be desirable.

In conclusion, I would direct your attention to the fact that I have a most intimate acquaintance with Publicity in all its forms, my work in my late position calling for the origination and design of advertising publicity of every kind. This work brought me in the closest touch with the newspapers and periodicals throughout Canada, and in a large degree with the Farm Press, and my position as Editor of "Economic Advertising" gave me extended acquaintance with leading Canadian, English and American writers and publicists.

I shall be happy to wait on you at your convenience,

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

(Signed) Donald Tuck.

I might add to that the following partial list of campaigns handled wholly or in part by Mr. Tuck:—

The Campaign (1913) for advertising the benefits of Advertising; the Convention Campaign (1914), of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the world, E. W. Gillett Co., Limited, Ames, Holden & McCready, Pedlar People, Limited, International Varnish Company, Cudahy Packing Company, B. Greening Wire Company, American Chiclet Company, H. R. Williams Machinery Company, Canadian Shredded Wheat Company, Gidley Boat Company, Monarch Knitting Company, Steele Briggs & Company, and many others.

Mr. Tuck was notified by the secretary of the commission on February 6 that the position had been given to Mr. R. J. E. Stead of Calgary, as the best qualified candidate. He wrote asking for further particulars and for the names of the board of experts or examiners to whom the secretary of the commission had alluded. That information was given. The personnel of the board of examiners is as follows:

Sir John Willison, formerly editor of the Toronto Globe and Toronto News, now Canadian representative of the London Times; P. D. Ross, editor of the Ottawa Journal; Dr. George H. Locke, Librarian of the Toronto Public Library and Associate Director of Public Information. Dr. Locke, was, unfortunately, ill and was unable to attend the meeting and his place was taken by Dr. A. D. DeCelles, Librarian of Parliament. The Department was represented by the Acting Deputy Minister, Mr W. W. Cory.

I have nothing to say with regard to the ability of the gentlemen who composed the board of examiners who no doubt are very able men but I would direct attention to the fact that they are writers and not men whom you would naturally regard as competent to select a publicity agent. Mr. Foran in one of his letters tells this gentleman that fifteen returned soldiers were among the applicants for the position. The gentleman whose application I have just read is also a returned soldier who had been in the service three and a half years and certainly possesses to my mind the qualifications which would entitle him at least to a personal interview by the Commission. Now, Sir. I make these points: Mr. Stead was appointed on December 19,1918 and drew the salary of the position from that date. Yet the vacancy was not advertised until December 28, 1918. Now get those dates right. I say that Mr. Stead was appointed on December 19, 1918 and the advertisement appeared in the Canada Gazette on December 28, 1918. I say further that no opportunity was given to the candidates to appear in person before the Commissioners. I say also that despite the fact that fifteen returned soldiers had put in their applications, and that one in my judgment had every qualification for the position, the Civil Service Commission disregarded the stated policy of the Government and appointed a man who was not a returned soldier. I submit further that the Board of Examiners in this case did not possess the necessary qualifications to judge of a candidate's fitness for this position. The men composing the board were literary men with little or no publicity experience. I am told that Mr. Stead has not the very wide qualifications for a publicity man called for in the advertisement, that he is a story-writer and a poet. I complain that no opportunity was given to candidates to submit to any written or oral test, and that competition was eliminated by the absence of such a test. Now, Sir, is not a member of this House justified in criticising such a state of affairs? Mr. Stead was selected by whom? By the Civil Service Commission? Not at all. They delegated their powers to the committee I have already named. Once more I call your attention to the fact that one of the members of that committee was Mr. P. D. Ross, editor of the Ottawa Journal, the gentleman, I suppose, who wrote the editorial criticising severely and unjustly the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). It is all right for Mr. P. D. Ross through the columns of his paper to criticise a member of this House for daring to offer any criticism of the Civil Service Commission, because he was one of the subcommittee appointed to select one of his friends for a Government position. You can see the Ethiopian in the wood-pile there, Mr. Speaker, and you don't have to put your glasses on to see him.

I have not one word of adverse criticism or disrespect to offer with regard to the members of the Civil Service Commission. Two of these gentlemen I know, and have known for a number of years, and I have the highest respect for them. The other member of the Commission I do not know, but I have no reason to consider him anything else but well qualified for his position, and a gentleman. It is not the Civil Service Commission that is to blame for the conditions that exist to-day. Who is to blame? The members of this House are to blame because we placed upon the shoulders of the Civil Service Commission an amount of work which no Civil Service Commission under the canopy of heaven could possibly do. For proof of my statement I have only to go to the commissioners themselves, who have furnished the proof over and over again by delegating to subcommittees the work which they are supposed to do. For one position I am told there were 1,300 or 1,400 applications and that a thousand or more of the applications were thrown into the waste-paper basket without ever being looked at. A subcommittee pawed over the other three hundred and made a recommendation to the Civil Service Commission, who notified the appointee that he was the lucky man. There were 62 applications for the position of superintendent of penitentiaries, and another subcommittee was appointed to look over those applications and report to the Commission. A subcommittee was appointed to look over the applications for publicity agent, to which I have already referred. Yet Mr. P. D. Ross, the editor of the Ottawa Journal, says that the members of this House are angry because patronage has been taken away from them, that all that the members of this House exist for is the distribution of patronage, and that now that has been taken away from them they have nothing to do. So far as I am concerned, and I believe the majority of hon. members are in the same position, I have not recommended more than half a dozen men during the whole time I have been in this House. I say that it is as ridiculous a thing as can be imagined to place in the hands of three men at Ottawa the making of all appointments to the Outside Service throughout this country.

What in the name of Heaven does the Civil Service Commission here in Ottawa know of the qualifications of a man for a fifty-dollar post office in the county of Frontenac? There is only one person in the county who must not even express an opinion as to those qualifications, and that is the man who represents the people of the county and is responsible to them. To talk about responsible government and then have a condition of this kind seems to me absolutely silly, absolutely ridiculous.

The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) called attention to the fact that there is a school here in Ottawa run by a gentleman who prepares candidates for the Civil Service. I am informed that he is an intimate friend of the Secretary of the Commission. He was formerly in the public employ under the Laurier Government, and, I believe, was dismissed from his position because he was carrying on this business of preparing candidates. Later he was reinstated, and now holds his position in the Civil Service and makes use of that position to canvass around the departments to get persons to attend his school where they are fitted for the Civil Service, and they never fail. I trust the gentleman will appreciate the ad. I am giving him here to-night. I submit that this is a state of affairs which justifies the hon. member for West Toronto in bringing the matter to the attention of the House. And once more I protest as a member of this House against the attitude of the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission in speaking as he did of the hon. member for West Toronto without any warrant for doing so. I want to express my disapproval of and resentment at the attitude of the Ottawa Journal in its editorial columns, condemning every member of this House in regard to patronage, and particularly the hon. member for West Toronto, especially in view of the fact that the editor of the Journal was one of the men acting as a sub-committee in making these appointments of which we have just right to complain.

We have been told that old conditions have passed and that we enter now upon a new political era in the Dominion of Canada. I believe that to be true, and I believe that it is a good thing for Canada that it is true. Our politics, from Confederation down to the present time, have been largely a matter of man-worship. Canada had in its public life two of the most remarkable characters that ever graced the life of any country, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. These men by their personality added to their superior talents drew men to them; their word was law. I am free to confess that, as a life-long Tory, I used to think that when Sir John Macdonald expressed an opinion on any subject, that settled it—it was no use to debate it further. And I venture to say that there are men in this House to-day whose regard for the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was so great that they paid equal deference to his judgment. This had the effect of suppressing individuality. One of the things that will come out of this war for Canada is that men who sit in this House, from now on, are going to express more their individual opinion than they ever did before. And it is a good thing for the Dominion of Canada that it should be so. I hope to goodness we shall never again have in this Dominion men who are possessed of the wonderful magnetism possessed by the two great leaders who occupied the political stage in this Dominion for so many years. Whether hon. gentlemen opposite believe me or not, I think they will find that men not only in this House but throughout this country are supporting Union Government not only because Union Government has justified its existence, and justified it amply, but because they recognize in this Union Government and this Union party a breaking away from those hard and fast political lines with which, in their soul, they did not agree.

Now, I wish to say a word in regard to the tariff. I doubt very much if this is an opportune time for a thorough revision of the tariff. I stated in this House last session that I did not believe there was in Canada at that time a man who could state what the fiscal policy of this Dominion should be after the war; that after the war we should have to arrange our fiscal policy to meet changed conditions. It seems to me that in the course of the next two or three months, or perhaps in less time than that, there will be such radical changes in transportation rates and in the prices of commodities that we shall be in a better position to form an opinion on tariff questions than we are now, when prices, transportation rates, and other elements in the problem are in a state of flux. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to speak as if the one only thing upon which parties can be based in this House is the fiscal policy. I venture to suggest that there are problems facing this Dominion of far greater importance than the immediate arrangement of our fiscal policy. I have always been a strong protectionist. I have no apologies to make for that; whether I am right or whether I am wrong, I have been sincere and conscientious in my belief. But, speaking as an Ontario man and one who has been a strong protectionist, I am prepared to go a long way in revising my views on tariff matters if by so doing we can keep together the people of this country, who, it seems to me, have got to keep together if we are to solve the problems with which our country's future is bound up. If we can get together by a compromise on tariff matters, there are other matters, such as putting the foreigners of this country where they properly belong, which are more important, in my opinion, than the immediate fixing of the tariff and the settlement of the question whether the duty on a given article shall be fifteen per cent or seventeen and a half per cent.

Before taking my seat I want to say just a word in regard to defaulters and slackers, and the way they have been treated in this country. I have no sympathy to waste on the man who is behind prison bars to-day for being a deserter or defaulter under the Military Service Act. But, Mr. Speaker, I protest very strongly against an Ontario man who is charged with desertion, or being a defaulter under the Military Service Act, being condemned to imprisonment for one, two, three, four or five years, when a defaulter in Quebec gets off with a fine of $5, $25 or $50. In my judgment, the placing of these defaulters in the penitentiaries and jails of the country is a mistake. They should be punished, but it seems to me they should be placed in internment camps, and the form of punishment I would impose on them would be to take from them the franchise. If they have refused, as they have, to do their duty in the nation's crisis, they should not expect to exercise the privilege of the franchise. I will tell you why I object to placing these men behind prison bars. They have been guilty of a breach of the Military Service Act. You take a man and place him in prison or in the penitentiary. Apart from the fact that he has not responded, as he should have responded, to the service of his country, he has shown no criminal instincts whatever. Is it a wise thing to take a man who has given no evidence of criminal instincts and put him in prison along with men steeped in crime? Is that wise from the national standpoint? What chance has that man to come out after two, or five years' incarceration alongside of the worst criminals the country may have produced and play the part of a man? For that reason, and not because I think they should be exempt from punishment, I believe it is a mistake to place these men behind prison bars in our penitentiaries and jails.

In conclusion, let me say that the men on this side of the House, whether Liberal or Conservative, in supporting Union Government, had to decide whether party or national interests should be paramount. There are plenty of big problems in this country to be solved. The motives that actuated the men on this side of the House in the last election should actuate them in the future, and their principal idea should be not the good of the party, whether Liberal, Unionist or whatever it may be, but the good of Canada. There should be sufficient independence and patriotism in every one of us to express his honest convictions on the various matters that come before us and do his utmost to solve them in the best interests of the country. That should be the aim of each and all of us, and I am sure that it is the aim of most of the members, at least, of this House.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, nothing, I believe, can be added to the completeness, the nobleness or the unanimity of the tribute that has been rendered by the state, by the church, and by the people of this country to our revered leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. May I be permitted, nevertheless, to add a few words of loving admiration. It was my good fortune to know this great statesman in my boyhood days at Arthabaska. It was my good fortune to be brought up within the magnetic spell of his great personality. I have experienced the kindness of his heart, I have appreciated the loftiness of his mind, I have enjoyed the benefit of his paternal solicitude.

His life, Mr. Speaker, has been a striking example of disinterested patriotism. His career has been a continuous struggle towards national unity. His death is a great national loss and his memory will be, I am sure, a guidance and a comfort to all Canadians. May the people of this country never forget the ideals and the principles to which our great chieftain devoted the unceasing labour of his lifetime—liberty and freedom; respect for duly constituted authority; religious and racial tolerance among fellowmen; generous co-operation of effort towards the welfare of our common country. May the sons of Canada reap the bountiful crop which the gifted, the great Canadian has sown among difficulties, among troubles and, very often, among bitter fights. There is an inspired legend of the Middle Ages which tells us that when great men pass away God makes their souls stars in the heavens. If that be true, very soon a new constellation will arise in our northern sky shedding forth rays of golden hope on those whom the great Canadian that we loved so much has left behind to continue his noble work.

The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has made a speech which contains many good things and I wish particularly to congratulate him on the moderation of his feelings and sentiments to-night. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the Civil Service Commission. He has attacked the Government, he has attacked the commission, and he has complained of the secretary of the commission. I hold no brief to defend the Government or the commission, or the secretary.

I hope that some member of the Government will do that for me. The hon. member for Frontenac has spoken of defaulters, and according to him defaulters should not be sent to jail. I agree with this statement, and I think that any member in this House who wants to promote the welfare of this country, and to protect our young men, will also agree with the hon. gentleman. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this matter, the member for Frontenac went back to his old habits for a while, and complained that in the province of Quebec the defaulters were not dealt with as severely as they should be. Now, there occurred in the city of Quebec an incident in connection with trials of defaulters, and a long correspondence has appeared in the papers between Mr. Justice Langelier and the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Newcombe. I wish to remind the House that in connection with this incident and this correspondence it has been proven beyond a doubt that Judge Langelier acted according to the instructions he received from this Government. First, Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Minister of Justice attacked Mr. Justice Langelier and said that he had acted contrary to law, and, after an exchange of various telegrams and several letters, the former had to apologize to Judge Langelier. Therefore I wish to say to the hon. member for Frontenac that I do not wish to discuss whether a man should be fined $50, or $100, or $200. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman, who has more influence with the Government than I have: If you want to have justice given, as justice should be given, to the defaulters, do not have your Deputy Minister of Justice send down instructions, which afterwards have to be denied and annulled by Order in Council.

The hon. member for Frontenac made a comparison that he should not have made, if he is really animated by the sentiments that he expressed at the end of his speech, between the province of Quebec and the other provinces as to their contribution in men during the great war which has just ended. I do not know from where the hon. gentleman has taken his figures, I do not know if the figures which he quoted were given by the Bureau of Public Information, but if those figures are as reliable as the other information given by that bureau they certainly do not show exactly what the different provinces of this Dominion have done. But, Mr. Speaker, is it not time for the men of this country, when they consider the problems awaiting to be dealt with, to lay aside their provincial outlook, to lay aside their provincial prejudice and to look at these questions from a national viewpoint. We in our province have never asked if the province of Ontario has done its duty, we have never asked if the province of Prince Edward Island has supplied a hundred or a thousand men, we have never asked if the province of British Columbia has done more than the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, but we do know that Canada has done nobly and we are proud of it. And moreover, Mr. Speaker, there are certain other things we do know in our province. We know that many homes are mourning for the loss of dear sons; we know that many women have become widows, and we know that many girls are mourning for boys to whom they were engaged. We know that many of our boys are maimed and crippled, and we know that our boys of the 22nd Battalion have done, if not better, at least as well as any other battalion in Canada. Mr. Speaker, in concluding these few remarks with reference to the speech of the hon. member for Frontenac, I wish to add this: Last year I expressed my opinion of discussions of that kind. I do not wish to reiterate what I then said, but may I ask that we once for all avoid these discussions that are of a nature calculated to lower the level of parliamentary debate and to shorten the radius of our political insight and perception. Let us be Canadians, let us according to the constitutional spirit of our institutions, represent not merely one county, not merely one province, but represent Canada from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Then on both sides of this House people will have understood their duty toward their common country. Ontario and Quebec will no more be separated, the provinces of Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia will no more be western and eastern provinces, but all the provinces will be component parts of a great whole, and Canada will have reached the stage which Sir Wilfrid Laurier worked to achieve and become a nation of free institutions and a nation proud of its Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the Throne mentions different matters, and I think I can classify them under three heads: First, International; second, Imperial, and third, National. As regards International matters, my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) to-day laid down principles of international policy that ought to be carried out by any government that wishes the improvement of our international relations. I will not repeat what the hon. member said; but may I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is not time to-night for the members of this House to request the Government to state what our delegates and representatives at the Paris Conference are doing? What information have we got, what reliable information have we received, since the Peace Conference was opened? We see by the papers one day that Sir Robert Borden has claimed for Canada the status of full nationhood. We see another day that Sir Robert Borden, from his seat at the Peace Conference has suggested that the Allies should enter into negotiations with the various factions in Russia. We see again that Sir Robert Borden has been meeting the different trade commissions representing neutral and allied countries; but, Mr. Speaker, all the information we get is gathered from the newspapers, and I say that if this Parliament is a representative parliament, as it should be considered to be, we are entitled to be informed officially of what is transpiring, and not have to rely upon hearsay information taken from the press. The Acting Premier has mentioned that Canada should receive an indemnity. Well, that hon. gentleman is in a much better position than I am to deal with a question of such gravity and seriousness. But in view of what we hear and what we read, the Acting Prime Minister can hardly ask the people of this country to believe that an indemnity will be paid to Canada, for it seems to be settled that we are to receive no indemnity. Indemnity for what? Indemnity for the damage caused to our country by the war? That damage is very slight. Fortunately for us, the war has but slightly affected our country so far as material damage is concerned. Shall we be paid back every cent that we spent on this war? We do not know. The Government has not said anything in connection with it; our Prime Minister has made no official declaration; we are in utter darkness in this matter as we are in all other matters connected with these conferences. Is this the way to treat Parliament in regard to problems of that character? I say, Mr. Speaker, that in this respect the Government is not treating the representatives of the people as they should be treated.

I saw the other day in one of the newspapers that it was intended to destroy the German fleet which had surrendered. In this connection I would offer a suggestion. If we are not to have a money indemnity; if we are not to be paid back any of the money which has been disbursed by Canada in connection with the war, why should Canada not receive a number of those ships? It is proposed that those ships shall be sunk in mid-ocean. I do not see why such action should be taken. Are the shipbuilding interests behind this move and behind the articles which have appeared in the press in this connection? I do not know, but I do think that it would be most unreasonable to sink all those ships and thus render them absolutely worthless. Is the Government going to take a stand on this question? If they do not, what will the Liberals say who fought for the Canadian navy advocated by the Liberal party in 1911? What will the present ministers who supported Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his naval policy say when the question comes up before Council? Will the Prime Minister approve the sinking of the ships so that we shall not have a Canadian navy for the defence of our coasts? Because Sir Robert Borden was always opposed to such a navy; he thought it nobler for Canada to pay money than to build ships to defend her own coasts.

The member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) mentioned the proposed League of Nations. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in discussing that matter, but if Canada is to be a party to the League of Nations, Canada should enter that league as a nation. Can we be a party to the League of Nations; can we assume the obligations; can we bind ourselves to such a league, and yet not be absolutely free to decide our own policy in regard to international questions? Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and I have no doubt that this Government has given to it the same consideration that it has given to all the matters connected with the Peace Conference at Paris.

As regards imperial matters, Sir Robert Borden left us last November. Last summer he went over to England, and the year previous he also went over. Since then we have been told that our status in the British Empire has undergone a considerable change. What that change is, what its nature or extent, we do not know. Again I say that this House is entitled to an explanation and to full information, and I hope that the Government will furnish it within a very short time. But I think that both sides of the House will agree on one point in connection with imperial relations, and it is this: the old colonial days are gone. We are no more a colony. We can now say that we are a nation and as such have a right to conduct our affairs on an equal footing with the Mother Country, England. Of course, what I am saying now may be qualified as disloyal. I will remind the members of this House of what happened in 1867 at the meetings of the Canadian representatives in London before the drafting of the British North America Act. At that meeting Sir John A. Macdonald, the leader of the Tory party in Canada at that time, whose memory is rightly dear to every true Conservative in the country, suggested that Canada be described not as the Dominion of Canada, but as the Kingdom of Canada. Mr. Speaker, if such was the opinion in 1867 of the man who was shortly to become Prime Minister of Canada, I think that all members of the House, especially the present Prime Minister, should hold the same opinion and see that we be no longer treated as an ordinary small colony and that we be given all the rights and privileges of a nation. The British Empire, according to a happy expression that has been used of late, should be not only the Mother Country and her colonies, but a League of Nations in itself.

As regards our relation to England, I feel, representing a constituency in the province of Quebec, that it is good for the province of Quebec that Canada remain as it is to-day, a part of the British Empire, because the great protection that we have as a minority in this country is the protection of the British flag. If we cease to be a part of the British Empire, where shall we be? Shall we become independent? Independence is the dream of every young nation; but are we ready for independence? Could we carry the burdens of independence? Would our financial condition enable us to become an altogether free nation? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is not yet ripe for independence.

But another and much greater danger than any other that has been mentioned in the press or in this House, is the danger of annexation to the United States. I am against annexation to the United States, because I believe Canada should maintain her British institutions and also that the Canadian nation should remain a nation of itself. I call the attention of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) to what I am now going to say. His press agents, his censors, have been very busy reporting what the President of the Council has done in Great Britain or elsewhere. The Bureau of Public Information has also been very busy in telling us of different things that have been done by the Government or of different other things that might have been done or will be done by the Government. But instead of having a subsidized press for self-glorification, the Govenrment of this country ought to have a stricter and closer control of the moving pictures shown in this country. If we go into moving picture theatres, we see nothing but American pictures, nothing but the glorification of the American flag. And if there is an American feeling in this country, if there is a sentiment favourable to annexation, the Government of this country is partly responsible for it, because proper control and supervision are not exercised by the Government. I remember, during the war, the censors had cut from the newspapers insignificant bits of news; but if we go into a theatre in Ottawa, or Montreal, or Quebec, we shall see there pictures of such a nature as to make the young men of this country believe that the United States is by far superior to Canada and a far greater country than England herself. The President of the Privy Council should be more loyal and patriotic and should attend to this.

I do not wish to detain the House very long; but, as a Liberal of old standing, I would like to say a few words in regard to the actual situation of affairs in Canada. When I arrived at the House of Commons last year, I was told by members sitting on the other side that we were not to discuss such and such a matter because the war was on. The boys were in the trenches, the country was in danger, and we had to keep silent and united. This year the war is over. This Government was made for the sole purpose of winning the war, and I remember declarations of Liberal-Unionist members of the Cabinet to the effect that the very moment peace was declared, they would walk out of the Cabinet presided over by a leader in whom they said they had no confidence. To-day the war is over; the armistice is signed; hostilities have ceased; but I see with great amazement and surprise, my good friend, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) still sitting in this House as a Cabinet minister. What is the reason? "Win the war" was the slogan last year. This year it is "Reconstruct Canada."

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: By doing nothing.

Mr. CANNON: There is plenty of reconstruction to be done in Canada, because I must admit that this Government has done plenty of destruction. But in my own modest and limited experience, the man who has done the damage is not as a rule the man to repair it. The argument brought forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) would be good if the situation existing in the world to-day was new; but, there have been wars before, there have been reconstruction periods before, and history is there to show us what was done. The hon. ministers will be surprised to know that there was living in England a gentleman who was Prime Minister while England was fighting Napoleon. There was in those days no cry of win-the-war in order to form a Union Government and stifle freedom. Government was carried on according to the old constitution of England, according to the usual lines. The war was won; the reconstruction period ensued; party government was continued, and what happened? Was England ruined? No, England saw an era of development without any precedent. Not only that, but after those exhausting wars carried on by England through a period of twenty-five years, party strife was kept up and political liberty flourished in England as never before. We saw, for instance, carried through the Houses of Parliament that great Bill of liberty and justice, the Bill of Catholic Emancipation. Later on—and this reminds me of what my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said a few minutes ago, namely, that the tariff should be left alone—after those wars, wars that had been fought by England with the energy which always belongs to England, tariff questions were brought to the front. We saw the Manchester school preaching free trade. The Corn Laws were repealed Free trade was established in England. Moreover, the whole basis of representation in Parliament was changed. The Reform Bill was passed. It was in the periods immediately following great wars that England went through that political development to which Englishmen owe to-day their prosperity, their liberty and the stability of their institutions.

But a more recent example may be quoted. I draw the attention of hon. members of this House to the situation which existed in the United States after the Civil war. During the reconstruction period was there a cessation of political strife? No, government was carried on after the war as it had been carried on before and during the war. Party government was considered the best. In those days the man who had guided the neighbouring republic through the terrible war, was stricken down. Abraham Lincoln died when his talents were most needed, but his party remained, his party carried on the Government of the United States, and the trouble that was experienced in the United States at that time was trouble caused by politicians who went into the Southern States and tried to do what this Government did last year, namely, to take away the franchise from citizens who were entitled to it. It was only when that exceptional condition of things was removed and the normal state of affairs was re-established in the Southern States that the real peace existed and has existed in the United States ever since. If England after the great war against France and the United States after the great Civil War were able to carry on party government, and carry it on successfully, history disproves the argument brought forward by my hon. friends opposite to the effect that reconstruction necessarily means a period when political hostilities should cease; their argument is not sound at all.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), and other former Liberals now sitting on the other side of the House have told us they are still Liberals and we cannot put them out of the party. I would say to our friends opposite that I have not the authority or any intention of doing any such thing. Two years ago a great issue arose in this country. Many Liberals in all honesty left their old leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and supported the present Government. Some of them now sitting in the House often said last year: "We cannot vote against this Government. We have to support it because we want to win the war." That object has now been attained, and any Liberal on the other side of the House who wishes to remain a Liberal must now show that he is honestly supporting a Liberal policy and believes the policies he is supporting to be so.

I now come to the question, Is the present Government a Liberal Government? I answer without any hesitation whatsoever that not only is it not a Liberal Government, it is not even a Tory Government; it is worse than that; it is a mixture of both without being anything of either. The ministers call themselves members of a union or coalition Government. Coalition Government can only be had by compromise; it can only live by compromise, and it can only work through compromise. And what is compromise? Compromise is too often but the sickly offspring of ill-mated principles. That is the kind of government we have to-day, and I say to our Liberal friends on the other side: You may honestly and sincerely have supported that Government in order to win the war, but to-day, if you are Liberals, you cannot support it any longer.

This Government by its formation showed that it was a Tory Government, and a Tory of the worst kind. It was born of the union of three elements: first, materialism in its lowest form—Sir Joseph Flavelle, the bacon king; second, perverted spiritualism, professionalized religion, subsidized self-glorification, and, last, but believe me, Sir, not least, Sir Clifford Sifton, that brazen time-server, whose political ancestors can be retraced only to the darkest recesses of the history of England when jobbery was an art and treason a career. The present Union Government is the union of these three elements, and I appeal to any honest Liberal in this country: Can you look upon the product of such a union without disgust and repulsion?

What kind of administration has this Government given? The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), who formerly led the Liberal party in the province of Ontario,—successor to Sir Oliver Mowat and that line of great Liberals in the province of Ontario who thought that in Canada the ideals of Liberalism should be followed and fought for,—this man now sits on the treasury benches, and what administration does he support? How can he claim to be a Liberal when he supports a Government that has taken away the freedom of the Press? I speak to-night in this House, and representatives of the newspapers are in the Press gallery listening to me, but to-morrow I am sure that no part of my speech will appear in the newspapers they represent. Why? Because most of those men are paid not to inform their readers, but to misinform them, and they have been doing that for the last two years. They say that the President of the Privy Council looks after that, but I don't believe it. They have gone further, and taken away the freedom of the Bench. If there is one thing that the Liberal party have always fought for, it is honest justice, but this Government has tried to prostitute justice in this country. Courts have been given orders that if cases of such and such a nature come before them for decision, judgments are to be given in such and such a way, or else the judge was liable to fine or imprisonment. Are we living in Russia or in Prussia? The President of the Privy Council, a former leader of the Liberal party in Ontario, has travelled in Europe, so perhaps he will let me know. This Government have taken away the freedom of the Press, they have taken away the freedom of the Bench, but more than that, they have taken away the freedom of Parliament. The war is over now, and yet while this House is in session the Government is still taking advantage of the War Measures Act to pass Orders in Council against every principle of British justice.

I see the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) listening to my argument. He used to be a Liberal, and I hope he still is one. I am sure he was not present at the Council table when that Order in Council was passed, with retroactive effect, providing for the punishment of those who have already appeared before tribunals and been convicted or acquitted.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, how far back we must go in the history of England to find an example of such behaviour? You have to go away back to the time of Charles I, when the Earl of Strafford was beheaded by virtue of a law having retroactive effect as regards criminal offences. This Government has gone back three hundred years for its precedent. But there are " Liberals " in that Government who have declared that we cannot put them out of the party. It is not very hard to put out of the Liberal party men who have acted as these people have acted for the last year and a half.

I submit to the Liberals on the other side of the House that legislation by Order in Council, freedom taken from the press and the bench, the oppressive acts of labour—these are not acts of Liberalism. When the labouring people of this country are told by the Minister of Public Works that they cannot claim their just rights, but must choose between jail and a military uniform, where are we living? Is it Canada?

If the Liberals on the other side, including those in the Cabinet, claim that this Government should be supported on its administration, what about the programme set forth in the speech from the Throne? All the great men who have been leaders of the Liberal party—Blake, Laurier and all the rest—have always fought for provincial rights. Liberalism has always respected the privileges and liberties of the provinces and insisted that they should be protected. But this Government, which has the support of some Liberals, is taking a position the very opposite to that supported by Liberals in the past. Education is a subject that is left to be managed by the provinces, but this Government announces Bills on the subject of technical education. As the ex-leader of the Liberals in the province of Ontario did not leave the Cabinet, I am not surprised that the speech from the Throne runs to war. Prohibition is another question on which the present Government is aiming at the destruction of provincial autonomy. My stand on this question is very simple. I say that this question should be settled by the provinces. But if the Federal Government wishes to pass legislation in connection with prohibition, let us have no hyprocrisy about it. In this country, in the province of Ontario, people now are not rated according to the money they have in the bank, but they say of a man, " He has so many cases of Scotch in his cellar." I tell the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) that this situation has to cease. If we are to have prohibition let us have a law of such a nature that every man must, within six months of the passing of the law, declare on oath what quantity of liquors he may have in his house, so that we may know.

The speech from the Throne foreshadows another measure. Possibly we may find out once for all whether the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) is a Liberal or not, and whether the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) is a Liberal or not. The Speech announces a Franchise Bill. Two years ago the elections of this country were stolen by means of a Franchise Bill put through this Parliament by the Borden Government. Are we going to have another steal? Will the Liberals who sit on that side of the House protest against such a measure, or will they accept it? The hon. Minister (Mr. A. K. Maclean) who represents the city of Halifax, a few years ago said that the Franchise Bill was a "nameless monster." That "nameless monster" brought him into this House. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) said that it was "iniquitous legislation without precedent in any parliament." He was elected by acclamation. In this House what we want is justice. Let us have justice from the so-called Liberals if they are Liberals. If we are to have an election fight, let it be a real fight, and let not the Government steal the election as the last one was stolen. Speaking even more seriously let me say this: The Minister of Public Works grew very indignant about Bolshevism. As Macaulay put it the only cure for the evils of newly-acquired freedom is freedom. I go further and say that what creates revolution is the love of liberty in the hearts of people who want to live freely and are denied that right. We of the Liberal party on this side of the House represent the men who built up Canada. If in this country we had had only Tories, Canada, politically speaking, would have been in the same state in which it was when the Family Compact ruled. Our forefathers fought and died for our constitutional liberties, and they secured those liberties for the people. Will their children to-day, through want of Liberalism, through want of courage, through want of national pride, cast off our common heritage?

Our boys fought at the front. They have written in the history of Canada the proudest pages that we can read. The name of Canada is known all over Europe, and when a battle had to be fought and the best soldiers were to be brought forward, the British command always thought that the honour of the Empire was in safe hands when entrusted to our soldiers. Will these soldiers who have fought on the other side, soldiers who have shed their blood, soldiers who have sacrificed everything that was dearest to them, come back to this country to find that Canada is deprived of the freedom that they have given to Europe? Let Canadians be true to the great leaders of the past, William Lyon Mackenzie, Papineau, Macdonald, Mowat, Laurier; let their spirit prevail in our council and then the living will be worthy of the illustrious dead.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the work of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment (Invalided Soldiers Commission) to March 31, 1918, with appendix to June 22, 1918.—Mr. Hugh Clark.

Orders in Council with reference to the work of the Department of Agriculture since the last session of Parliament.—Hon. Mr. Crerar.

THE CASE OF J. H. LEWIS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I served notice upon the Acting Minister of Justice (Hon. Arthur Meighen) that I wished to bring a matter to his notice to-day. I shall read the following letter dated at Winnipeg on March 4th, 1919, a copy of which, I understand, has been sent to the Acting Prime Minister:

To Organized Labour, Greetings:

At the regular meeting of the party in session February 26th, the question of forbidden literature and the case of J. H. Lewis, in particular, under sentence at Prince Albert, was taken up and dealt with and the executive instructed to take immediate action and use every effort to bring about the release of all citizens sentenced, and prevent any further prosecutions under this Order in Council.

The following resolution has been wired to acting Premier Sir Thomas White:

Be it resolved that the Winnipeg and District Branch of the Dominion Labour Party unreservedly condemns the savage sentence imposed at Prince Albert on J. H. Lewis for having forbidden literature, and demands immediate abolition of laws and Orders in Council which make possible such outrages on personal freedom; demands release of all citizens sentenced thereunder, and warns the Government that the persistence of such violations of democratic principles in face of repeated protests is provocative of violence. A prompt and specific statement of Government's intention in the matter is requested.

Be it resolved that a copy of this resolution be sent to all branches of the party, also to the Winnipeg Trades and Labour Council with a request for co-operative action. That copies also be sent to the Minister of Justice and the Hon. D. D. McKenzie, leader of the Opposition; to the Saskatoon Trades and Labour Council, and to the three local daily newspapers and the Western Labour News.

That failing a satisfactory reply within seven days from the above date, the executive committee be called at once to take such steps as may appear necessary to carry out the instructions of the party as contained in the resolution passed at the last general meeting of the party.

Trusting this will meet with your immediate attention, on behalf of the party.

From Yours fraternally,

G. Barlow, Secretary.

A telegram to the same effect was also received to-day. This appears to be a serious matter, and I should like to know whether there is to be any immediate relief of the situation.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): About a week ago J. H. Lewis,—of Saskatoon, I think, not Prince Albert,—was found guilty before Magistrates Smith and Elliot, of that city, of having in his possession banned literature, to wit, "War—What For," and "The Melting Pot," both of which publications are, under censorship regulations, prohibited. Lewis was, I am informed,—of this I am not sure, but I am tolerably certain,—at the time an employee of the Post Office Department. He pleaded guilty before those magistrates and, upon his own admission of guilt, was sentenced to a fine of $2,000, I think, and to three years' imprisonment, so the reports that reach us say. Application by telegram was sent on behalf of Lewis for clemency and new trial. Many telegrams have been received, some simply demanding a new trial, and only two, I think, asking for clemency. The powers of the Crown in this regard are, of course, ample so far as clemency is concerned, but as to a new trial, which is the chief demand, our powers are confined to the provisions of section 1022 of the Criminal Code, and may only under that section be exercised—when on a perusal of the case the Minister of Justice believes that the person should not have been convicted. In view of the fact that he pleaded guilty there would seem to be little prospect that that power could be exercised at law in this case. In so far as it is an application for clemency, it is at present under the consideration of the Solicitor General, who has charge of such matters. I believe at the moment that further particulars have been requested from the solicitors acting for Lewis, and also fuller reports from the magistrates.

FURLOUGHS IN FRANCE FOR CANADIAN SOLDIERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. T. LEGER (Kent, N.B.): I desire to direct the attention of the Government to a matter of importance as set forth in a letter written by a Canadian soldier in England and published in L'Acadien, a French paper published in Moncton, N.B. I have translated the letter into English in order that it may be better understood, and I will read the translation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member desires information from the Government on a matter of importance?

Mr. LEGER: I desire to put a question to the Government on a matter of importance. The letter is as follows:

Knotz, Ash., Eng.,
February 15th, 1919.

Mr. the Editor of L'Acadien:—I do not believe I am a grumbler, but when it comes to injustice committed towards the French Canadian soldier, I cannot do otherwise than indicate the facts to L'Acadien which is ever ready to defend our rights. Perhaps I will be able to call the attention of some members of Parliament to the injustices which are done to us in the Canadian Army, and have them claim from the authorities the justice and British fair play for their fellow-countrymen.

I understand, by the English papers, that the Canadian troops in France have crossed to England where they will have a leave of eight days to visit their relatives and friends, before coming to Canada. But the French Canadian soldier who asks for transportation to see the land of his ancestors in France, to spend a few days with some friends he has known in his mother country, or even the Canadian soldier who has chosen a lifetime companion amongst the good girls of France, sees himself refused the privilege of going once more into the country for the defence of which he has sacrificed everything. It is said that the transportation is difficult.

Is that fair play, especially when a great number offer to pay their expenses? There is an order according to the Canadian soldiers who have relatives in England, wives, mothers, daughters, the privilege of bringing to Canada the said relatives at the expense of the Canadian Government, the soldier having only to notify the military authorities of the fact. That is also very well. But why is it that the same privileges are being refused to the French Canadian soldiers who have relatives in France?

I know that my assertions are true, such privilege having been refused to a soldier.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am unable to follow the reading of the letter as carefully as I would wish, but I have followed it sufficiently to be able to say that if any meaning is to be taken from it, it involves an attack on the Government for its policy in respect to the treatment of soldiers. In no case would that be permissible on the Orders of the Day. There is some question as to how far an hon. member should go in laying the ground for a question, but certainly the hon. member is not in order in reading a letter of that character which involves practically an attack upon the policy of the Government. If he wishes to direct a question to the Government, it seems to me he ought to be able to summarize the complaint or to put it in the form of a question.

Mr. LEGER: My question is whether the Canadian soldier, before returning to Canada from England, has the privilege to go back to France on a visit.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia): I think I can answer the question of the hon. gentleman, and I wish to thank him for his courtesy in sending me a copy of the letter he has just read, which I got only a few moments ago. It appears to be a complaint from a young French-Canadian soldier who was in England, and I may say that I have every sympathy with this young man when he says in his letter that he desires to revisit France for the purpose of visiting the girl who is his choice amongst the good girls of France as his life-time companion.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Send him back at once.

Major-General MEWBURN: In that letter he says that he understands the Canadian troops have returned to England. That is not quite correct. The Third Division has returned to England and part of it is on the ocean now homeward bound. In the first instance, it was expected that the Canadian Corps would embark from a French port direct to Canada. That was found impossible for various reasons which I shall be glad to explain to the House later on. Since the armistice, I understand that as regards the troops in England, before embarkation, the men on application have been given a short furlough or leave. I know that the difficulties of transportation across the channel are very acute owing to demobilization and every discouragement is given to men wishing to return to France. This man does not say which unit he is with. If he was with the celebrated 22nd in France, as I presume he was, I understand certain leave was given to that unit in France, and I understand the 22nd Battalion is still in France. I have no personal knowledge of men who have made application being refused permission to return to France on furlough; but if the hon. member so desires, I shall be very glad, if he will give us fuller particulars in regard to this young man and the unit he is with, to pass the information to the Overseas Minister.

[Mr. Speaker.]

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Thursday, March 6.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Speaker, I intervene in this debate primarily for the purpose of making some observations in respect of the statements made a few days ago by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) in reference to the Civil Service Commission and its work. This debate has been a very long and interesting one, interesting because of the many subjects dealt with by the various speakers and also because of the unfettered expression of the individual views of members of Parliament. As was suggested by an hon. member who spoke last night, I have no doubt that the war will affect our parliamentary institutions just as it affects many other things which concern us. As I listened to the concluding remarks of the hon. member from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) last night, as he championed the cause of free speech, a free Parliament and an uncontrolled press, I could not but reflect upon the last ten days proceedings in the House and come to the conclusion that he was endeavouring to champion a cause whose victories were won many years ago and that all these matters are more strongly entrenched and rest upon stronger foundations to-day than ever before in the history of British representative institutions.

Before addressing myself to the subject of the Civil Service Commission and its operations, I wish to refer very briefly to one or two other matters. I would gather from the concluding remarks of the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) which I chanced to hear the other day, and from the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), that some hon. member had entered a protest against the visit of the Prime Minister and his colleagues to the Peace Conference at Paris. Protests of this nature have, from time to time, appeared in the Canadian press. I am unable to understand how any Canadian could object to Canadian representation at the Peace Conference now sitting at Paris. Further, I do not believe such protests reflect in the slightest degree Canadian opinion. Every Allied nation is represented there; every portion of the British Empire is there represented. Upon what basis or reasoning it can be argued that Canada should not be there represented is something absolutely beyond my comprehension. This is the judgment day in the history of nations and institutions. The Peace Conference now sitting at Paris marks, probably, the greatest event in human history, and it would be a strange thing, indeed, if we, as a nation, were not permitted to participate in those proceedings.

Can it be rationally contended that Canada, which fought in this war to the end that some day a peace conference would be convened, shall be written down in history as an absentee from the conference? When we entered the war we had in mind that some day victory would be achieved and that a conference would be held in some part of the world to settle the terms of peace, and to provide, if possible, appropriate means to prevent the recurrence of such another war. That day has come, and it is suggested that Canada should not be represented at the conference. I must express my surprise that such a view should be taken by any hon. member or by anybody in Canada.

If Canada should not be represented, why should the United States? Our effort in man-power, in money, and in everything else, relatively equalled their effort, and I am unable to comprehend the process of reasoning which would lead anybody to the conclusion that the great nation to the south of us can with propriety be represented at that conference, but that Canada should not be represented. We fought as a nation. Our political sovereignty is almost as complete as that of any other nation which fought in this war. We are not a subject power. Our political status is not that of a colony or dependency, and I submit that it would be a great offence to the spirit and pride of the people of this country if for a single moment it were seriously urged that we should not be represented at the Peace Conference as we are to-day. Speaking for myself, I should be ashamed of my country if at this period in her history and that of the British Empire our political status were such that we could not with perfect propriety and as a matter of right sit side by side with every other nation which fought in the allied forces, in settling the terms of peace and the other questions arising out of the war.

It must be a matter of pride to us that we are able to take part in this great world constructive and reconstructive programme. A new map of the world, and particularly of Europe, is being made to-day. New nationalities are being established, on the principles of self-determination or otherwise. New political systems are being framed and the old systems are being destroyed. The terms of peace with the enemy are being settled, and there is being organized a League of Nations which we trust will maintain the peace of the world for many, many years to come.

Furthermore, many material problems of interest to Canada and all parts of the world will be the subject of discussion at the conference. For instance, efforts are being made to solve labour problems upon an international basis. The conference is also considering questions affecting the distribution of shipping, of food supplies, of raw materials, as well as economic and financial questions of vital interest to every nation of the world. I cannot take the time to enumerate the different matters which will very naturally and very properly be the subject of consideration by the conference. In view of the world-wide importance of the questions that will be considered by the conference, I say that it is hardly proper to suggest that Canada should not be represented there. And if we are to be represented, what more appropriate than that the Prime Minister of this country and some of his colleagues should represent Canada? How else could we be represented? If anybody had a right to enter a protest, surely it would be the colleagues of the Prime Minister remaining here, upon whose shoulders further responsibilities have been cast in consequence of the absence of their colleagues.

The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) argued last night that Canada is no longer in a position of political dependency, that it is not a colony in the sense in which it was some years ago. I thought he approached that question cautiously and with some reserve. He took a view which was quite correct and I thought he might have shown a little more confidence in his position. To suggest that the political status of this country to-day, politically or otherwise, is comparable to our position fifty years ago would be to interpret wrongly the organization and constitution of the British Empire and of the several Dominions and to disregard recent political developments. I do not think it is worth my while to pursue the matter further. I merely wish to enter my solemn and emphatic protest against the proposition which has been made by some hon. members to the effect that the Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues should be in Canada to-day, instead of representing Canada at the Peace Conference.

I wish to refer very briefly to a matter which was discussed on Tuesday last by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) in his remarks upon the Address. In discussing financial matters he particularly referred to the flotation cost of three different Canadian loans. The figures which he gave are so palpably in error and do so manifest an injustice to the Department of Finance and the Government that I think a few words should be said upon that point. I shall not, however, refer to any other portion of his remarks. I have not the slightest doubt that the hon. member himself is anxious to have the exact facts.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did the hon. member say that my figures were in error?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: My figures were correct according to the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think I shall be able to show that the hon. gentleman was in error in the statements which he made. He referred to the flotation costs of three public loans. First, in respect of the 5 per cent Public Service Loan in New York, in 1916, for $75,000,000, he stated that the cost of flotation was $4,098,580, or $5.46 per $100.

The fact is that the cost of that loan was $2.70 per $100, and not $5.46 as the hon. gentleman states. In calculating the cost of this loan, he permitted to enter into his calculation the discount of the bonds, amounting to $2,022,927, so that his calculations are obviously wrong by that very substantial amount.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will Canada have to pay that amount of over $2,000.000?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Upon the maturity of the bonds they must be retired at cost. That is quite correct. But the hon. gentleman was discussing the cost actually paid for the flotation, and obviously and beyond dispute, the discount upon the bonds should not be taken into account in calculating the expenses of the flotation itself. If the bonds were sold at a premium, my hon. friend, according to his method of calculating. would be driven to the conclusion that the loan had cost nothing—even less than nothing. That, certainly, would be a strange conclusion to reach.

Sir SAM HUGHES: You must balance one account against another.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, because the hon. gentleman was discussing the cost of flotation. Of course, the discount on the bonds must be taken into consideration in the bookkeeping, and it of course represents the difference, between the par value of the bond and the issue price, but it has no reference whatever, I submit, to the cost or charges of the flotation. Again, the hon. gentlemen referring to the cost of the "Dominion of Canada war loan, 1915," states that the cost was $3,408,358, or almost $3.41 per $100. The fact is the loan was issued in Canada at the price of 97½. The total cash expenditure for remuneration of bankers and brokers, printing, advertising, salaries, contingencies was $425,677, so that the percentage of cost was 42½ cents per $100, considerably less than one-half of one per cent. Now, my hon. friend, I know, will be one of the first to admit that there is a very substantial difference between a flotation cost of 42½ cents per $100 and $3.41 per $100. Again the hon. gentleman referred to the "5 per cent Dominion of Canada War Loan" of October, 1916, a loan of $100,000,000. He stated that the cost was $3,539,410, or $3.54 per $100. The fact is that this loan was issued in Canada at a price of 97½, and the total cash expenditure for remuneration of bankers and brokers, printing and other expenses was $797,468.27, a percentage cost $0.792 slightly over 79 cents per $100—less than four-fifths of one per cent.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to read from the Auditor General's Report which he has before him the figures given for this loan?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend made the mistake, quite unintentionally, of taking the statement as it appears in the Auditor General's Report without discriminating between the actual expenses in connection with the flotation of the loan and the discount upon the bonds. If he had merely subtracted from his figures the discount, he would have reached the cost of floating the loan. His remarks the other evening made it appear that the discount upon the bonds was an actual expenditure of money.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I be pardoned another question? I am very dull witted, no doubt. Do I understand that we are not to pay these discounts?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The 5-year term bonds of the 5 per cent Public Service Loan, 1915, were sold at 99.56, which represents the amount investors were willing to pay. The discount merely expresses the fact that investors wished a higher rate of interest than that offered for the bond at par. If the bonds are issued at five per cent and the investing public desire a higher yield of interest than that, they must offer a price below par. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right in saying that ultimately the bonds must be redeemed at par but that is another matter. At the same time I would impress upon him the fact that in his speech he was clearly discussing the cost of floating the loan and he calculated the discount upon the bonds as an expenditure in connection with the floating of the issue. It went into Hansard and to the press in that form, and I merely wish to make the correction so that there may be no misunderstanding on the part of the public as to the actual cost of floating these loans. When securities are offered the seller must accept the price offered by the market, or not dispose of the securities If less than par is offered and it is accepted, it means that par was not obtained for the bonds, but the difference between that and the issue price is not a charge or disbursements in connection with the flotation of the loan.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Speaker, as I am drawn into this through no action on my own part, I ask permission to submit a question to the hon. gentleman. How can he get round the statement made in the Auditor General's Report, and also in the Public Accounts, where the figures are to be found exactly as I gave them and include all these items as part of the cost? He will surely admit that I am correct—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is going beyond his privilege under the rule.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think I have fully answered the question of my hon. friend. Upon reference to the Auditor General's Report it will be seen that the discount at which the bonds were sold is treated as discount, and not as a flotation charge or expense, whereas my hon. friend was confusing the discount with the costs of flotation. That is the point I wish to make.

My hon. friend referred also to the fact that the 15-year bonds of the "Public Service Loan," which sold at the figure of 94.94, shortly after the issue went above par, and he infers that the bonds were sold at too low a rate. I would point out certain facts with reference to the money market at that time. The Government were unable to make this loan in Canada, at least it was not thought that a market existed here, and the Finance Minister was obliged to go to the only market then available in the world, New York. In that market Canada had no preference over any other country, and other countries were selling securities there at that time. Canada had to accept the best market price offered or not sell at all. The Anglo-French 5 per cent 5-year bonds had been marketed there about six months earlier. That was a five per cent bond and was offered to the public at 98, or to yield 5·45 per cent to the investor. The underwriting price was 96. This loan was not successful and had an adverse effect upon the market. When the Canadian loan was offered to the public it was selling at 95, yielding over 6¼ per cent. This, of course, affected the market for this particular Canadian issue.

My hon. friend thinks that because the 15-year bond of this issue afterwards reached par and over, therefore, somebody made a great deal of money to the loss of the Canadian treasury. It is true that these bonds did reach par and over, but only for a short period. It is also true that very shortly afterwards they fell to 97. It is also true that in 1917 they were selling as low as 87½ and my hon. friend might as well be solicitous about the people who lost when they fell to 87 as of those who profited when the price went above par.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the hon. gentleman wishes I can give him the explanation of that although I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not wish to engage in any very lengthy discussion about this particular matter. It was perhaps peculiar that a 15-year bond should sell at a lesser rate than a five or ten-year bond. The fact is that at this period the short-term securities were more in demand by the investing public than the long-term bonds. Short term securities were at that time more popular with investors. But it appeared later, that the long-term bond was more in favour and had a wider market than the short-term securities. But that was a condition which nobody could foresee at that particular time in the United States.

The Public Service loan of 1915 was sold at what was then regarded as very favourable terms. The results were highly spoken of by the financial journals in the United States, Canada and Great Britain and I do not think there is anything in connection with it that is open to criticism. The only reason I entered upon this subject was to emphasize the fact that my hon. friend the other evening, in stating the expense of floating these loans, was very grievously in error and represented it at a figure very much above, and in excess of the actual amount.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In regard to the statement that I have been grievously in error, I would refer the hon. gentleman to page F-16 of the Auditor General's Report for 1917, Volume 1, where he will find "Charges of Management, Loan Account." The identical figures that I gave are given on that page.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am contending that my hon. friend is wrong in his method of calculation and that he has improperly taken into his calculation the discount of the bonds in reaching the actual cost of floating the issue. He has treated the discount as an expenditure or outlay of money, and in doing so I say he was in error.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know about discount ——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Now, I approach the subject for which I rose, namely, the statements made by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) in respect to the Civil Service Commission and its work. The statements made by the hon. member for West Toronto on Tuesday last involved very serious charges against the Civil Service Commission and the gentlemen constituting that commission. I do not know that any more serious charges were ever levelled against any Government, any branch of the Government, or any individual connected with the public service of the country. His charges involve the perpetration practically of crimes. If they are true it is serious; if they are true they are worthy of further investigation; if they are true the hon. gentleman should repeat his statement formally and ask for an investigation. It is hardly fair to the public service that charges of this nature and character should be made unless the hon. gentleman making them is prepared to substantiate them. I want to say to him that if he believes in the statements he has made, if he thinks that they are well founded and can be proven and if he desires a parliamentary, or any other form of investigation the Government will gladly accede to his request if he formally makes the application.

I regret, however, to say that I have come to the conclusion that his statements are not well founded, and that in not one single instance can they be established or proven. I regret that my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken) should have undertaken to make the statements he did concerning one of the important branches of the public service without first informing himself as to the facts. I do not question my hon. friend's motives. I know he is too honourable a gentleman to make these statements without believing that they could be supported by the facts but still I wish to say that in my judgment, after an investigation of them severally, they cannot be supported by the facts, that they are not well founded, and my hon. friend has done a grave injustice to the public service, to that important body the Civil Service Commission, to the members of that commission and particularly to the secretary of the Commission.

I wish to take these charges practically as they were made in the House the other evening, and I shall comment upon them as I go along. The first matter to which he refers is the appointment of the deputy postmaster in the city of Toronto, and I want to read to the House—and I would ask the House to carefully observe my reading of the statements made—so that my answer to those statements to-day will appear quite clear to hon. gentlemen. They will remember that the hon. member for West Toronto stated that the appointment of the present postmaster of the city of Toronto, in succession to his predecessor who had died early in the last year, was very properly made, and he commended the promotion of the then assistant to the position of chief postmaster of the city. He commended it further upon the ground that the appointee was the senior officer and was entitled to promotion under the principles of the Civil Service Act. He then proceeded to discuss the appointment made to the position of assistant postmaster which was rendered vacant by reason of the promotion of the then assistant to the position of postmaster. He made this statement:

My hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Sheard), in his speech the other day, approved of the appointments to the Toronto post office. I want to associate myself with him so far as the choice of postmaster is concerned; the appointment was made promptly with the best man available. But when it came to the position of deputy postmaster, what happened? The postmaster, who had worked with the present deputy for twenty-five years, sent the recommendation to Ottawa for his appointment. That appointment was held up in this city for months. It was held up until I instituted inquiries to ascertain the reason for the delay, when I was told that it was due to the Civil Service Commission endeavouring to ascertain whether the official recommended was the senior man. It was none of their business, Mr. Speaker, whether he was a senior man or not—he was the one best qualified for the position. As it happened he was the senior official, but the commission refused to accept the recommendation of the postmaster, who knew all the men that were available for the position, and spent some time before consenting to make the appointment. Why? Because the next man in seniority was a friend of a friend of the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission.

That is the statement of the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). Now, what are the facts? They are as follows: That the appointment was not held up by the Civil Service Commission; that the man who eventually was appointed was not the next senior in the Toronto Post Office; that the Civil Service Commission did not refuse to accept the recommendation of anybody; that the Civil Service Commission does not know to-day, collectively or individually—or did not know until Wednesday last—the name of the man who was appointed. These are the facts and I propose to establish them. My. hon. friend says that the Civil Service Commission refused to make the appointment. Well, I will give him the reason why there was a delay in the appointment. He says that the Toronto Postmaster recommended, I think, Mr. Westman. The truth is that the Toronto Postmaster did not recommend Mr. Westman until months after the vacancy occurred. He recommended a man in Winnipeg whom he wanted transferred to Toronto. Now if the Postmaster in Toronto had his way, an official in Winnipeg would be the Assistant Postmaster in the former city instead of the one who was appointed, and my hon. friend might then have protested perhaps with some justice and some vehemence. I want to give the facts which relate to the delay in filling this position, and which are contained in a memorandum which I have received from the Deputy Postmaster General. Possibly I had better read from the memorandum itself as it will present the circumstances to the House clearly and in order:

As regards the delay in the appointment of the Assistant Postmaster, Toronto, the following facts are submitted. The Postmaster of Toronto died on the 17th May, 1918, and the new Postmaster was appointed on the 15th June of the same year. As the Department expected the Postmaster to make a recommendation as to who his successor as Assistant Postmaster should be, no action was taken until the 3rd July, when the Postmaster was written to, asking for a recommendation in this respect. He replied on the 16th July recommending that Mr. Thomas T. Bower, Assistant Postmaster, Winnipeg, be appointed to the position of Assistant Postmaster, Toronto. Nothing further was done until the return of the Chief Post Office Superintendent, Mr. George Ross, who was absent overseas looking after the Postal Corps of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and inquiring into grievances complained of in that Force, as it was considered necessary to have Mr. Ross' advice in regard to whether Mr. Bower should be removed from Winnipeg. Mr. Ross recommended strongly against the removal of Mr. Bower, in the interests of the Winnipeg Post Office, and on the 5th November, the Postmaster, Toronto, was written to, that the Department could not see its way to approve of his recommendation to remove such an important officer from his position at that time, particularly in view of the disturbed condition of the West. The Postmaster was then asked for a further recommendation, and replied on the 18th November, recommending Mr. Eldon Westman. This recommendation was forwarded to the Commission on the 26th November, and on the 30th November the Commission wrote the Department asking to be furnished with a complete statement of the clerks senior to Mr. Westman, also the date of examination, date of entering the service, present salary, and any other information the Department might think justified, ignoring seniority. This information had to be obtained from the Postmaster, Toronto, and the reply was given to the Commission on the 21st December, approved on the 28th December, and the certificate of promotion issued on the 16th January, 1919—the promotion to take effect from the 18th May, 1918, the date the vacancy occurred.

My hon. friend charged the Civil Service Commission with delay in the making of the appointment to the assistant postmastership of Toronto for many months. The fact is that the commission was not responsible for the delay. The hon. gentleman also stated that Mr. Westman was the senior in that post office. As a matter of fact he was not the senior. The Civil Service Commission was justified in inquiring whether Mr. Westman was the senior officer before making his promotion. The Commission was well within the law, and well within good practice in making the inquiry it did. Every single statement which my hon. friend made in reference to this appointment are not founded upon fact, and they are unfair and unjust to the commission in every single particular. Now eventually the appointment was made. The senior officer was not appointed, but I believe the best man was chosen, and in that belief the hon. member and myself are in agreement. That was the view of the Civil Service Commission, but the Commission was not responsible for the delay. The delay was due to the postmaster of Toronto, who wanted to transfer from Winnipeg to Toronto the assistant postmaster of the former city. Why blame the Civil Service Commission then for anything in connection with this particular appointment? The Commission is as innocent of any wrongdoing in connection with this matter as are the mummies in the tombs of the Pharaohs. I repeat, that not in one single particular can my hon. friend justify the statements he has made, and there is not the shadow of a shade of a reason for the complaints which he brought against the Commission in respect of this particular appointment.

Now everybody does not think that the Civil Service Commission did right in appointing Mr. Westman to the office of assistant postmaster, and a protest has been made by the Postal Service Association, I think, against that appointment on the ground that the official in question was not the senior, and that statement is quite correct. There was at least one other official in the Toronto post office who was entitled to that position ahead of Mr. Westman upon the ground of seniority, but upon the grounds of capacity, ability and fitness for the position he was selected.

My hon. friend next referred to an appointment made to the Custom House in Toronto, and this is what he said in relation to that particular matter:

> The same thing happened in regard to filling a position in the Custom House at Toronto. A hardware appraiser was needed there, and the collector of the port forwarded three names from which to make a selection. But, Sir, these three names were taken by an official in this city, and cast into the wastepaper basket, and the Civil Service Commission appointed a man in the city of Victoria, B.C., to come to Toronto to take the position of hardware appraiser.

That is the charge, but the fact is that the Civil Service Commission did not make the appointment at all; they were no more responsible for the transfer of that man from Victoria to Toronto than I was, or than was the member for West Toronto. Yet my hon. friend accuses the Commission of wrong-doing in connection with this particular appointment. I say with confidence that this accusation is not founded upon fact. Indeed, it is not founded upon anything; it is a dream, a vision, on the part of somebody—I am sure not on the part of my hon. friend. The matter never came before the Civil Service Commission; I am sure that not one member of the Commission could give the name of the man who was transferred from Victoria to Toronto. What more can I say about that charge?

Mr. CURRIE: Why, then, was this man appointed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Well, I am going to tell you. The transfer was made by the Customs Department, and its authority for so doing was Section 17 of the Act, which reads, in part, as follows:

> Subject to the provisions aforesaid and to the provisions of section 15, nothing in this section or in this Act shall prevent the deputy head from transferring any officer, clerk or employee from one part of his department to another.

It was under the authority of that section of the Civil Service Act that the Customs Department, not the Civil Service Commission, made the transfer in question.

Mr. CURRIE: Was it the deputy in that case?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know, it does not matter what he was. The official in question occupied the position of appraiser or valuator in the Customs Department at Victoria, and the Customs Department transferred him from Victoria to Toronto. It is a serious thing to charge the Civil Service Commission with the transfer of this man when they had nothing to do with it, never heard of it, and could not even give the name of the man who was so transferred. It is not humanly possible that they could know the name of that man, unless by virtue of the publicity which has been given to these matters during the past few days they had occasion to refer to some documents or were enabled to secure the information from some other source.

Now, if my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken) had attacked the practice of transferring officials he would have been upon safe ground, and he might have been justified in attacking that practice. Speaking for myself, I do think that the Customs Department were hardly justified in making that transfer. I do not think they were justified. They should have known that the doing of that thing would prejudice the Civil Service Act just at this particular stage when it is being tried and when it has many critics and few friends. I think that they are deserving of some castigation on the part of members of Parliament for doing that. True, they were well within their powers, but I think they did not exercise a sound discretion.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who is "they?"

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Customs Department. I do not say that there are not occasions when it is good business and good practice in certain departments to transfer persons from one place to another. I have particularly in my mind at the moment the Customs Inspection Service. I think it would be perfectly justifiable practice to keep the Customs inspectors moving from one province to another. I believe that a Customs inspector should not long remain in one province. But that is a matter worthy of the consideration of hon. gentlemen. The practice I refer to might very well be attacked, but if it is wrong, if it is open to criticism, surely Parliament itself, not the Civil Service Commission, is to be blamed for it. But it is within our power and our jurisdiction to amend the Act so as to prevent transfers by any one department from one point to another, if we think that the practice is wrong. I do protest, however, against such a body as the Civil Service Commission being blamed for something for which they should not be blamed.

My hon. friend next referred to the matter of advertising for applicants for certain positions and the making of temporary appointments in the meanwhile; and he drew the conclusion that invariably the temporary appointee would secure the permanent appointment by virtue of the prestige given to him through his selection by the department. Again I say that this is a fair matter for discussion, but I protest against charging the Civil Service Commission with the building up of this practice. They are in no way responsible for it; it is unfair to accuse them of it. I myself think that the several heads of the departments should resort to temporary appointments as little as they possibly can. Every minister and every deputy minister should anticipate his departmental needs in respect to the appointment of officials, and only under circumstances of urgency and grave necessity should he recommend a temporary appointment to the Civil Service Commission and subsequently ask the Commission to advertise for applications to fill the vacancy. I say this because such a practice lays the whole Civil Service Act and the Civil Service Commission open to suspicion. In that connection I am not disposed to be too censorious or too critical of the remarks of my hon. friend, because I can quite understand that in the multiplicity of temporary appointments followed by advertising, my hon. friend or any other hon. gentleman in the House might well become suspicious of the practice and might well conclude that improper influences were operating somewhere and at some times.

Now, what occurs? Why are temporary appointments made preceding the publication of advertisements calling for applications? It is invariably due to the fact that a department often requires men possessing special qualifications to discharge special departmental duties. Moreover, the Civil Service Commission has been in operation for such a short time that they have not been able as yet to build up an eligible list from which it can select temporary appointees to meet the needs of the several departments of Government. Therefore, when a vacancy occurs or a new office is to be created and the needs of the department are urgent and cannot wait, the practice is for the deputy minister to make a recommendation to the commission for a temporary appointment, and to ask them to approve temporarily of that appointment. The Commission is not to blame; it is unfair to cast that burden upon the Commission. If anybody is open to criticism, it is the minister or the deputy minister or some departmental head, and I repeat that my hon. friend, in his criticism in this connection against the Civil Service Commission and the Secretary of the Commission, was unfair and unjust to them.

Yesterday evening the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) referred to the appointment of a publicity agent required by the Department of Immigration and Colonization. He stated that Mr. Donald Tuck was an applicant for this position. In his application, Mr. Tuck set forth his qualifications and the hon. member thought that he was entitled to the office. Mr. Tuck's letter is used to support the complaint that the Civil Service Commission should not delegate its powers of appointment to a Board of Examiners. Mr. Tuck, however, was himself a beneficiary of this, because not very long ago he was an applicant for the position of head of the Publicity of the Vocational Branch of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and his name went before a board of examiners and he was selected. He was, therefore, a beneficiary of the prevailing system, and if he is to-day complaining of that system, I say that he cannot do so fairly. A publicity agent was required by the Department of Immigration and Colonization and the qualifications necessary were set forth in the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) last night, and I might read them:

A Publicity Agent to take charge of the Publicity work of the Department of Immigration and Colonization at a salary of $4,000 per annum. Candidates should possess the following qualifications:—Ability to prepare and direct newspaper, magazine and farm journal advertising campaigns, both in Canada and elsewhere, in setting forth the settlement opportunities in Canada; knowledge and experience with (a) follow-up systems, (b) the production and circulation of motion pictures, and (c) the natural resources of Canada; ability to direct lecture campaigns; a personal acquaintance with writers, publicists and organizations now dealing with the opportunities and land settlement problems of Canada.

There were, I believe, some seventy-nine applicants for this position. The Civil Service Commission felt that they were hardly capable of deciding, amongst the seventy-nine applicants, who was the man most capable of doing the work. Accordingly they called to their assistance a board of examiners composed of Sir John Willison, of Toronto, Mr. P. D. Ross, of Ottawa and Mr. A. D. DeCelles, Librarian of Parliament. These gentlemen were called together and the applications were put before them. In the end they decided that a Mr. R. J. E. Stead, of Calgary, Alta., was the best qualified amongst the applicants. Will hon. gentlemen be disposed to say that the board of examiners selected were not honourable and capable men? Were they not just as capable of making the best selection as would be the Commissioners themselves if they undertook to make it? Further, the Civil Service Commission is not a board of examiners. Examinations are held on behalf of the Commission throughout Canada from coast to coast. They do not attend those examinations in the capacity of examiners, but examiners especially for that purpose are selected and appointed, and they take charge of the examinations. This was an examination. The statute permitted it. It need not necessarily have been a written or an oral examination; it might be a competitive examination, if in the judgment of the Commission that was desirable. The board of examiners selected Mr. Stead. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) referred to the case of Mr. Tuck, a returned soldier, and he read his qualifications which are very good. I think my hon. friend thought they were so good that he concluded that Mr. Tuck should have received the appointment. I do not say that Mr. Stead deserved the appointment, nor that Mr. Tuck did not deserve it. All I mean to say is this, that when you have seventy or eighty applications for a position, it is humanly impossible to determine with absolute accuracy that one man is much better than another, or that the man who eventually receives the appointment is actually stronger in his qualifications than the man who did not get it. It is difficult to determine matters of this kind to a nicety, and if in the end the Board of Examiners have made a wise and sound selection and have given to the public service a man who will discharge in a competent manner the duties and responsibilities attaching to that office then public interests have been fully met and no one having the public interest at heart can very well complain.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Was Mr. Stead a returned soldier?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think not. Mr. Tuck was.

Mr. McKENZIE: How does this committee proceed in order to reach a conclusion? Did these men appear before the Board of Examiners?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand they usually take the applications made by the several applicants and get from them the qualifications as told by each applicant. They also take all such other means as they consider wise and necessary to afford them information as to the qualifications of the several applicants. They can, if they see fit, bring before them such of the applicants as they think might be best fitted for the position.

Mr. NICKLE: What is the alleged justification for overlooking the returned soldier if he possessed the minimum of requirements for the office?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not say that the returned soldier should not, in this case, have received the appointment. I am not undertaking to say that Mr. Stead should have received the appointment as he did. I am arguing to-day on behalf of the Commission and I am attempting to relieve them of the innuendoes and charges made against them the other day. I am more concerned about that than I am about the defence of the Government, of the departments, or of any system that has grown up or that prevails in the administration of the Civil Service Act. The question, therefore, which my hon. friend raises, is hardly the one I am endeavouring to answer. But when the public service requires a man for a special duty, the Civil Service Commission is bound to secure for the public service the best man available. If that man can be found amongst returned soldiers, then he should have the preference.

Mr. STEVENS: Did we not, in passing the Act last session, adopt the principle that where a returned soldier had reasonably good qualifications, that is, where he could qualify, it was not necessary for him to have the highest qualifications of all the applicants, and where he had those qualifications, he should get the appointment?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Substantially that is quite true. I agree with my hon. friend. That is the principle set forth in the Civil Service Act as enacted at the last session of Parliament, and I am not disputing that proposition at all. However, there must, in practice, be some qualification to that very general proposition. The Department of Immigration and Colonization required a man for the position which I have already mentioned, and, as I have said, Mr. Tuck was an applicant. He appears to have had considerable experience in advertising campaigns. In the second paragraph of his letter he says:

"I am at present in charge of the Publicity of the Vocational Branch of this department which involves considerable research work and feel that I have qualifications and experience which would fit me eminently for the vacant position.

In my late appointment (prior to the war) as manager of the Copy and Art Department of The Norris-Patterson Advertising Agency I was brought in touch with many of the leading Canadian advertisers, the preparation of whose copy was in my hands, and the continued success of these advertising campaigns is evidence of the quality of this copy. In many cases it has been my duty to advise on and instal follow-up systems, and especially in the preparation of catalogues and booklets, my experience has been very varied, embodying, as it does, a knowledge of the technicalities of the printing and engraving industries."

Let hon. gentlemen remember that the Department of Immigration and Colonization wanted a publicity man in connection with immigration and colonization work. Let us now look at the qualifications of Mr. Stead. Remember, I am not arguing in defence of the appointment of Mr. Stead or attempting to detract in the slightest degree from the qualifications of Mr. Tuck. I simply want to place the facts before hon. members, and they can make their own deductions. I want to place the facts before them in such a clear way that they will be able to visualize the difficulties of the commission in selecting a man of the qualifications required by the Department of Immigration and Colonization. I repeat that I am only interested in making what I think is a deserved defence of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. HOCKEN: Was Mr. Stead holding this position when the applications were considered?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think so. In fact, my hon. friend stated so the other evening. Upon the recommendation of the Department of Immigration and Colonization Mr. Stead was appointed temporarily early in January, and for that, of course, the Civil Service Commission is not responsible. I shall now read the qualifications of Mr. Stead:—

"Grew up on a homestead 120 miles from a railway, where he obtained first-hand knowledge and experience of the problems of pioneer life on the prairies, and personal knowledge of the practice of agriculture."

May I remark just here that a publicity man for the Department of Immigration and Colonization would naturally be expected to have a knowledge of the western country, where colonization is alone possible. To continue:—

"Was for 11 years a newspaper editor in Manitoba, developing during that time a wide acquaintance with the problems of the West, and also with newspaper writers and editors. Experience includes the management of the advertising department of a paper, as well as its mechanical production, and the superintendence of a job printing department.

Was business manager of The Alberta Automobile Co., Ltd., from February, 1910, to November, 1912. During this period travelled many thousands of miles over the prairies increasing his knowledge of the Country's agricultural resources and business conditions.

In March, 1913, was appointed Assistant Publicity Agent of the C.P.R. Department of Natural Resources, and early in 1916 was placed in charge of all the advertising and publicity work of the C.P.R. relating to the colonization of its lands. Occupied this position until January 1, 1919, when he was appointed temporarily to position of Publicity Agent for Department of Immigration and Colonization. During employment with C.P.R., his duties included the preparation and direction of newspaper, magazine and farm journal advertising campaigns, both in Canada and elsewhere, setting forth the settlement opportunities in Canada; and the installation and direction of a follow-up system dealing with inquiries from prospective settlers."

The duties of the publicity agent required by the Department of Immigration and Colonization naturally had relation to the colonization of our western lands, and the experience of Mr. Stead with the Canadian Pacific Railway was clearly in line with the duties of this new position. I repeat that the Civil Service Commission was in no way responsible for the temporary appointment of Mr. Stead. There was nothing else for them to do but issue a temporary certificate to him, as a request had been made by the department. Therefore, I say they are not chargeable with any recommendation. There were some seventy odd applicants for this position and the Civil Service Commission chose to establish a board of examiners composed of the persons I have named. The judgment of this Board was that Mr. Stead should be appointed. I have read both the qualifications of Mr. Tuck and the qualifications of Mr. Stead, and I leave it to hon. gentlemen to decide whether or not the Board of Examiners made a mistake. Perhaps they selected the very best man among the applicants; perhaps they did not. At all events, the qualifications of both Mr. Tuck and Mr. Stead were excellent, and I can quite understand how both would appeal to the board of examiners, and I think hon. gentlemen might very well forgive the board if they had selected either. However, they chose to select Mr. Stead, who had been in charge of the immigration and colonization work of the Canadian Pacific Railway—a man who was born and bred in the western country and who knew its needs and might, therefore, naturally be expected to make a very competent official in connection with the matters of immigration and colonization in the Prairie Provinces. That is all I have to say of that particular case.

As I said a moment ago, the establishment of a board of examiners may be open to criticism. But that system is used in Great Britain to-day and was frequently resorted to in the United States some years ago, although I understand they are gradually departing from this practice. I have discussed this matter in the last few days with the Civil Service Commission and they inform me that once they have perfected their organization and have a competent staff they hope, in cases of this kind, requiring technical qualifications, to be able to make the appointments themselves. I appeal to hon. gentlemen to extend to the Civil Service Commission an opportunity to build up an organization, and if this is extended to them I am sure the time is not far distant when they will be able to discharge their duties without deserving criticism on the part of the public. In the meantime, I do not know what else they can do. If the system is wrong, Parliacan easily cure it by amending the Act.

Let me give another case. A few days ago, the Department of Public Works required a solicitor. Seventy-nine applications for this position were received from all over Canada and a committee of lawyers was appointed composed of Judge Audette, of the Exchequer Court, J. F. Orde and W. D. Hogg, of Ottawa, to consider the applications. These three men were all practicing barristers. Will any hon. gentlemen say that if he had been a member of the commission he might not possibly have resorted to the same method as the Commissioners adopted? No member of the Civil Service Commission is a lawyer and, therefore, they could not very well render sound judgment as to the ability of the several applicants for this position.

Mr. COPP: Was the solicitor for the Public Works Department appointed temporarily?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, in that case no temporary appointment was made by the minister, and in that respect the case is different from some of the others we have been discussing. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hocken) how he can reasonably criticise the action of the Commission in creating a board of examiners to select from the applicants one to be appointed as solicitor for the Public Works Department? Were not those examiners better fitted to make a selection than the members of the Commission? What better method of selection could one suggest?

The hon. gentleman then referred to the appointment of a fruit inspector for western Ontario, and he made very serious statements in connection with his appointment. He said:

> The man chosen had been an American citizen before the last election in Canada and could not vote in that election. True, he was Canadian-born but he went across the line and was naturalized there.

This was really irrelevant matter, and many inferences may be based upon what my hon. friend said, none of which, I am sure, he intended.

> He returned to Canada, and was not entitled, as I say, to vote at the last election, but he happened to become naturalized here since. Then he takes precedence of men who have lived here and have been serving the country, men who never ran away and were naturalized in a foreign country. This person is placed over qualified men because he is a friend of the officials.

A friend of somebody in the Civil Service, I suppose he means.

The understanding is that the late Mr. Johnson desired this man to be appointed. That is the way the Civil Service is operated.

The hon. gentleman says further:

His name is Mr. J. R. Hastings. We have over the signature of Mr. William Foran, the chief guide of the Civil Service Commission, the statement that when the limit for receiving applications has expired the applications will be submitted to a competent board of judges who will select a man who is in their opinion best qualified for appointment. Is that the way, Mr. Speaker, we understood that this thing was to be worked out. Are these commissioners Civil Service Commissioners, or are they not?

Now, what are the facts in this case? Mr. Hastings was born in Scotland, fifty-four years ago, and came to Canada in 1882. Later, he went to the United States, as have many other Canadians from every province of the Dominion. He returned to Canada thirteen years ago and purchased an orchard at Winona where he has since been engaged in fruit growing. Nine years ago he became associated with the Winona Fruit Growers, Limited, and during the past seven years has acted as secretary and managing director of that organization. In 1917 he became a member of the Fruit and Vegetable Committee in the Food Controller's office, and later, at the request of the Fruit Inspector of the Department of Agriculture was temporarily appointed by the Civil Service Commission. Again, the Civil Service Commission were not responsible for the temporary appointment, and it is unfair and unjust to attempt to use it against them. If the temporary appointment should not have been made, the Department of Agriculture is to blame, and if accusations are to be made they should be made against that department. I understand that Mr. Hastings is a very capable man and well qualified for the position. There are members of this Parliament who say that he is better qualified for the position than any other man in Canada. Certain persons in Ontario sent petitions addressed to the Civil Service Commission recommending another person, whose name I cannot recall at the moment, for the position; but when they learned that Mr. Hastings was an applicant, they wrote to the Civil Service Commission explaining that they did not know that Mr. Hastings was an applicant and withdrawing their support from the man they had recommended. Mr. Hastings was appointed temporarily for six months, and at the end of that time the appointment was enlarged for another period of six months. Before that time ends applications will be received, and I understand it to be the intention of the Civil Service Commission to appoint a board of examiners made up of three of the leading fruit growers of the province of Ontario, and with them will rest the recommending of an appointee to the Commission.

Mr. CURRIE: Will this board be responsible to Parliament? If not, to whom will it be responsible?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The board of examiners will make the selection from among the applicants and will recommend one person to the Civil Service Commission. The Commission will act upon that recommendation, or not, as they see fit.

Mr. CURRIE: To whom will they be responsible for the appointment?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The board of examiners will be responsible to the Civil Service Commission to whom they act in an advisory capacity. The Civil Service Commission will be responsible to Parliament and to the country for the appointment they make. I may state that when the Department of Agriculture required the services of Mr. Hastings they thought they had the right under section 15 of the Civil Service Act to take him into the service and made the endeavour to do so. But the Civil Service Commission intervened and said: You must not do that; we will appoint Mr. Hastings temporarily, and we will issue a certificate to that effect; but applicants must be publicly called for, and from among the applicants we will make the appointment. That is a small circumstance, but I merely mention it to show my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken) that he is not right in criticising on this ground the Civil Service Commission or its secretary. If anybody is open to criticism it is the Department of Agriculture. I do not say this department is open to criticism, but I do say, and with emphasis, that the Civil Service Commission are not in this regard subject to criticism.

The hon. gentleman next referred to a case which, I understand, has been the subject of a great deal of discussion outside; the appointment to the position of Superintendent of Penitentiaries. There has been a good deal of publicity about this matter, largely because one of the applicants, who was one of the Inspectors of Canadian Penitentiaries, belongs to a very distinguished family in this country; in fact he is a brother of the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), and as gallant a soldier as is that hon. gentleman. My hon. friend from West Toronto, in discussing this particular matter, said:

> And this is the very principle that was adopted when a Superintendent of Penitentiaries was to be appointed. The Civil Service Commission had not the knowledge or the intelligence or the courage to make an appointment, and they selected three men to deal with it, at least one of whom was known to be hostile to the best qualified man in Canada for the position of Superintendent of Penitentiaries. What chance did he have? Among one hundred applicants his qualifications were the best; but this committee says: None of these candidates are quite satisfactory; we throw them all out and we will advertise afresh. You see how they double-cross the soldier; how they whip-sawed a qualified man who is a returned soldier, who fought with the Canadian army at Courcellette, who was promoted on the field of battle to the rank of Brigadier-General and who had had twenty-six years of experience in the very work for which applications were being sought.

I would like to point out that my hon. friend has brought into the argument a great deal of irrelevant matter but which at the same time is calculated to prejudice many members of Parliament and a great number of people outside. If this evidence had been given in a court of law, I am afraid the court would have ruled that my hon. friend's testimony was not relevant and could not be accepted. But, anyway, it has been read into the record and you must deal with it as it is. At the last session of Parliament a statute was passed changing somewhat the administration of the penitentiaries of Canada. This was Chapter 36 of the Acts of the Parliament of Canada for the year 1918. Section 3 of the Act is as follows:

> Sections fourteen to twenty-three both inclusive, are repealed and the following are substituted therefor:—
> "14. (1) The Governor in Council may appoint a Superintendent of Penitentiaries, who shall be an officer of the Department of Justice, who shall, under the Minister, direct and superintend the administration and business of the penitentiaries, and perform such other duties as may from time to time be assigned to him by the Minister."

Then it is provided that:

> "The Governor in Council may appoint not more than three inspectors of penitentiaries, who shall perform such of the duties by this Act required to be performed by an inspector as the Minister may assign to them respectively."

It is also to be observed that:

> "(f) 'Penitentiaries' includes not only the penitentiaries hereinafter mentioned or described, but also such other prisons and public institutions as are from time to time designated for that purpose by the Governor in Council by proclamation in the Canada Gazette."

In due course that Act was assented to by His Excellency the Governor General and became law. Later the Department of Justice were required to fill the position and they thought they should promote somebody in that department. The Civil Service Commission took the ground that there was nobody in the department who should be promoted as there was nobody engaged in that particular line of work, or in work which bore any resemblance to institutional work and they said that this position must be advertised. My hon. friends should not and, I believe, would not object to the course taken by the Commission. I am speaking on behalf of the Commisison this afternoon. The Commission are not open to criticism in reference to anything in connection with this particular matter at all. They deserve commendation for every step they have taken in the matter from beginning to end. In the end, an advertisement appeared in the public press asking for applicants for the position of Superintendent of Penitentiaries; a great many applications were received and later a committee was appointed to consider the applications. The members of the committee were as follows: Dr. C. K. Clarke of Toronto, late superintendent of Rockwood Asylum, Kingston, later superintendent of the Toronto General Hospital and, I am told, one of the best recognized authorities in Canada on institutional work; Mr. C. A. Magrath, of Ottawa; Mr. F. H. Chrysler, K.C., of Ottawa; General Fotheringham, of the Department of Militia and Defence, and Dr. Paget, of the Dominion Immigration service. This committee sat to consider the applications received. They concluded that the advertisement calling for applications stressed too much the business qualifications and did not give sufficient prominence to the technical qualifications. They were of the opinion that anybody responsible for the administration of the penitentiaries in Canada, and for any other institutional work that might later be placed under him, required certain technical qualifications. That was their view. It impressed the Commission and the Commission decided to readvertise, setting forth more clearly the technical requirements for the position.

It is a fact that the man who is in charge of penitentiaries, or who is responsible for the superintendence of penitentiaries in Canada, does require special technical knowledge. The science of criminology in modern times is based upon the theory that all, or most, criminals are insane and that they require special treatment. The modern theory as to the care of these people is entirely different from what it was thirty, forty or fifty years ago. A new conception has arisen regarding the administration of institutions for the care of these unfortunate inmates. I am not going to decide whether the committee or the board of examiners were wrong in recommending that other applicants be advertised for and I am not going to decide whether General Hughes, as the hon. member for West Toronto says, is the best qualified man in all Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There are three of that brand; would you kindly be specific.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I can only refer to the one who is the applicant for this position; I think he is William J. Hughes—

Sir SAM HUGHES: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: William S. Hughes. It is not my intention to decide whether or not he is the best qualified man in Canada, as my hon. friend says. He may be—I do not know—but I do say that, taking the course of action pursued by the Commission from beginning to end, it is hardly open to the very harsh criticism which it has been subjected to by the hon. member for West Toronto. I think the Commission were to be commended because they were perfectly right in saying that the position should be open to public competition and, in insisting upon that, they were perfectly right. There will be always be some doubt really as to who is the best man for this position. But the friends of General Hughes are not the only people in Canada who say that somebody is being railroaded into this position and that some improper influences are operating in this matter. I have a letter which was addressed to me the other day by a man whose name I cannot give, but I propose reading to you just a little portion of the letter.

Sir SAM HUGHES: We will have to get the whole of it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will give it to my hon. friend privately.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not want to see it. I am not interested in the matter particularly. The only reason I asked for it was that I got into trouble by saying "Mr. Gundy" the other day. Every Gundy in Canada but the right fellow has protested.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This letter was addressed to me the other day from Montreal and attached to the letter was a little leaflet issued from the Grand Army Headquarters of Canada. I see on the first page of the leaflet, underscored in blue pencil: "We ask no favours from politicians; they need not expect any from us." That, however is by the way.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does that refer to any particular politician?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know to whom it refers, and I am not going to give the name of the writer. I am reading this letter in order to indicate to the House that when these positions are thrown open to public competition every candidate thinks he is qualified, and his coterie of friends think his qualifications are the best. I do this merely to point out to hon. gentlemen the difficulties confronting the Civil Service Commission in filling appointments which are thrown open to public competition. This letter is addressed to me, but personally I do not know the writer, and it is in part as follows:

> Hon. and Dear Sir,—With reference to the appointment of Superintendent of Penitentiaries, which, originally, was advertised on November 14th, 1918, and for which appointment I am led to believe my application is still under consideration.
> I beg to invite your attention to the following facts:—facts, concerning this appointment which you must admit has been kept open for the appointment of Brig.-General Wm. St. Pierre Hughes, following the resolution adopted by the G.W.V.A. Cornwall Branch.

This applicant is of the view that the Civil Service Commission is improperly manoeuvering in this matter so as to secure ultimately the appointment of Mr. Hughes. On the other hand, my hon. friend the member for West Toronto accuses the Civil Service Commission of attempting to relegate Mr. Hughes into the background. The letter proceeds:

> The publicity given to this resolution is clearly a forerunner of coming events and an announcement to other applicants that the appointment has been now filled.
>
> I do not dispute the right of any man, be he a private or a brigadier-general, to make application for any appointment if he is qualified to hold that appointment, but, as a returned soldier and also a member of the Great War Veterans' Association and the Grand Army of Canada, I do dispute the right of any association or society endeavouring to force the Government to place any of its members when the appointment is open to competition throughout the Dominion, and especially when the appointment is likely to be given to a returned soldier who has every qualification for the position.
> My original application was submitted on November 18th, 1918, and my references were taken up by the Civil Service Commission, and I know for a fact that these references could not be anything other than satisfactory as I am fully qualified to hold such an appointment and am without prejudice.

Mr. CURRIE: Will the hon. minister be good enough to state the name of the writer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not going to disclose who the letter is from.

Mr. CURRIE: It is the custom of the House to give that information when it is asked for.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is not the custom of the House when, as in this case, the document is not a public one, and furthermore it is not of very great interest.

Mr. CURRIE: I want to know to what Orange Lodge the writer belongs?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know that he belongs to any Orange Lodge.

Mr. McMASTER: May I direct the attention of the hon. minister to the fact that it is with difficulty members on this side of the House are able to follow the interesting family quarrel going on on the other side.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no quarrel on this side of the House with reference to this matter and so my hon. friend opposite need not worry.

Mr. McMASTER: At all events we should like to hear what is being said.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I read that letter just to indicate to hon. gentlemen the difficulty which confronts the commission in making appointments of this kind, and in the circumstances I say it may well be justified in calling together a board of competent men and asking that board to recommend to them whom, in their judgment, among the seventy or eighty applicants is best qualified for the position. Whatever may be the merits or demerits of the system now prevailing in making appointments to the Civil Service, whatever may be wrong in the practice of the Civil Service Commission, I want to again say that in so far as this case is concerned the Commission has acted, in my opinion, with perfect propriety, and in an absolutely honourable manner from beginning to end, and in no respect do I think the Commission's conduct is open to adverse criticism.

Again, my hon. friend referred to the appointment of a Chief Clerk of Files. The Soldiers' Settlement Board required a Chief Clerk of Files, and in the advertisement calling for applications it was stated that candidates must have five or six years' experience with files and records in a Government department, and must be thoroughly familiar with such a system. The member for West Toronto in this connection spoke as follows:

> I am informed, and I believe, that a man can begin and complete his studies in medicine in five years; that a man can begin and complete his studies for the Bar in four years; but to be an efficient and capable filing clerk, a man apparently requires five or six years' experience. Is there any intelligent man in this House who will say that that length of experience is requisite for that kind of position?

He proceeds to say there are young officers coming back so broken that it would be impossible for them to take up their former avocations, and that it is the business of the Government to see that they are offered opportunities of this kind. He goes on to say:

> My deduction is, I think, reasonable, namely, that a man who is now in the Government service has been picked out for that position. The job is practically filled before the advertisement is put into the newspaper.

Later he states:

> If we have a Civil Service Commission that is going to cut men out of all opportunity of obtaining such positions, what is the use of putting in the Act the statement that the returned soldiers shall be given a preference?

Such is the hon. gentleman's statement. What are the facts? The Soldiers' Settlement Board, which is administered by the Minister of the Interior, recently required a filing clerk and they were obliged to ask the Civil Service Commission to advertise for one. An experienced man was required, I am informed, for the reason that the Soldiers' Settlement Board is a new branch of the public service. In the meantime, pending the receipt of applications in response to the advertisement, the Soldiers' Settlement Board recommended the appointment of a man temporarily.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did the advertisement call for five years' experience?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, and the advertisement was prepared by the Soldiers' Settlement Board, not by the Commission. Again I say it was unfair to blame the Civil Service Commission for this advertisement. If there is any criticism to be made it should be directed against the proper body. I complain therefore of the generality, the vagueness, and the unfairness of the charges made by my hon. friend from West Toronto. Now, five or six years' experience as Chief Filing Clerk does seem a rather extended period of service to me. I would be rather disposed to agree with the criticism of my hon. friend from West Toronto, but I do not know whether I would be right in so thinking. For the time being I would rather take the judgment of the Minister of the Interior and his officials who must have believed that they required a filing clerk of certain experience and ability, or else they would not have asked for a person possessing such qualifications and experience.

Mr. NICKLE: Does not that blow the whole thing sky-high?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think so. Now, what happened? As a matter of fact the person filling the position temporarily is a returned soldier who served three years overseas as a private, and who has had a son a prisoner in Germany since the beginning of the war.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At one time he was in the public service, and had experience as a filing clerk, for I do not know how many years.

Mr. DEVLIN: He will have to get out then according to the advertisement?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think he will have to get out if he is competent, even though he did not have the five years' experience. I wish to impress upon hon. gentlemen that I am not taking the responsibility of saying it was proper to insist upon five years' experience.

I merely wish to insist that the Civil Service Commission be not held responsible for that portion of the advertisement, and that criticism, if any may justly be made, should be directed against the department responsible for the issuance of the advertisement. However, no injustice has been done to any one. In the meanwhile, the department have a man whom they consider quite capable of discharging the duties attaching to that particular office. Fortunately, it happens that he is a returned man. In due course his application, with many others, will be considered, and in any event the department is assured of having a competent man and one who is a returned soldier. Consequently, so far as this charge is concerned, every criticism which my hon. friend made falls to the ground.

Then, my hon. friend made reference to the appointment of a man named Michael Dryden to one of the employment bureaus at Halifax, stating that on February 3rd Mr. Dryden was advised by a telegram from one W. B. McCoy, of Halifax, who is in the employ of the Industries Department of the Government of Nova Scotia, that he, Dryden, had been appointed to the office, whereas advertisements calling for applications had been inserted in the public press only on February 18th. I have made some inquiry into this matter, and again I find that in not a single particular is the statement of my hon. friend correct. Mr. Dryden was selected by a committee appointed as a Board of Examiners after advertisement. The names of the members of the board of examiners are: Mr. Bryce M. Stewart, editor of the Labour Gazette; Mr. G. C. McNeill, representative of the Great War Veterans' Association, and Mr. R. H. Coats, Dominion Statistician. After considering fully the applications, this Board of Examiners selected Mr. Dryden of Halifax.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who appointed the board?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They were selected by the Civil Service Commission. I find also on inquiry that Mr. McCoy did not, on the 3rd day of February, wire Mr. Dryden that he had been appointed, but that he did, on the 23rd day of February, wire Mr. Dryden that he had been appointed, after he, Mr. McCoy, had been so advised by a representative of the Labour Department. The purpose of Mr. McCoy's telegram was to inquire when Mr. Dryden would report at Halifax to engage upon the duties of his office.

Mr. P. F. MARTIN: What had McCoy to do with those duties at Halifax?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not carry my investigation very far, but I understand that the provincial governments and the Labour Department are co-operating in the matter of the Labour Employment Bureaus which are being established throughout Canada and that Mr. McCoy is in the employ of the Industries Department of the government of Nova Scotia, and, I imagine, was being interviewed by the representatives of the Labour Department who were sent down there from Ottawa. Therefore I say that so far as this particular charge is concerned, the statement of my hon. friend falls absolutely to the ground.

Mr. McCURDY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I am prompted to do so because I have received a letter from Nova Scotia stating that a roster of names was prepared by Mr. McCoy in January; that this list was forwarded by Mr. McCoy for the guidance of the Civil Service Commission, and that Mr. McCoy's recommendations were approved by the commission and his nominees appointed. Has my hon. friend any information on that point?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have absolutely no information on that point. Again I say that the only thing I am interested in this afternoon is that of making a proper defence of the Civil Service Commission in respect of the charges made against it the other day. The Civil Service Commission made a selection from among all the applicants who responded to the advertisement. Evidently representatives of the Labour Department were in the Maritime Provinces prior to the making of the selection by the board of examiners. What they did or what they said I know not and I care not.

My hon. friend made some reference to schools which, he supposed, were specially created for the coaching of candidates for the Civil Service examinations. He said:

> I am credibly informed that in this city of Ottawa there is a certain school. Nobody knows where this school is unless he is directed to it. It does not advertise; the name is not on the door, but candidates who are fortunate enough to be directed to this school are always able to pass with the highest marks. The system has been explained by one of the pupils, a young lady, in this way.

Then he proceeds further, but I shall not quote his remarks at greater length. The innuendo of that statement is that somewhere in this city, in some dark, hidden recess, there is, to the knowledge of the Civil Service Commission or its secretary, a school to which favoured and selected candidates are directed and at which they can be specially coached for approaching examinations. A species of nepotism and favouritism is suggested in this connection on the part of the commission.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is that in my statement?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not in my hon. friend's statement, but one cannot refrain from drawing inferences. I do not want to interpret wrongly my hon. friend's remarks; I do not want to read into them innuendos which he never intended. But, the effect of that statement upon the public is to give them the impression that in this city there are schools for the coaching of candidates for examinations, schools which are specially favoured by the Civil Service Commission, the students at which receive an advantage in one way or the other over other applicants for admission to the Civil Service. Now, I hope that I do not wrongly interpret my hon. friend's remarks. That is a serious accusation to make against the Civil Service Commission or against anybody connected with it. If it is not true, it should not have been made; if it is true, my hon. friend should go further, should give to the House further facts and ask for a searching and thorough inquiry into the matter. Everybody knows that there are in Ottawa, and have been for years, schools specially organized for the instruction of candidates for Civil Service positions. I remember that six or seven years ago somebody in the Customs Department was dismissed from the service because he was conducting at night a Civil Service school, or a school for the preparation of candidates for Civil Service examinations. I should be surprised if there were not half a dozen such schools in Ottawa. Such schools are to be found in Cornwall, Brockville and Toronto; if they are not to be found in every city in Canada, they will inside of twelve months. There are scores of them in the United States. My hon. friend seems to think that in this particular school somebody knows the particular questions that are to be put to the candidates and the particular subjects upon which they are to be examined. Well, everybody in Canada knows the subjects upon which the candidates are to be examined. The curriculum is published and made known to the public; the subjects are set forth on the notices which are sent to the candidates giving the date of examination. The subjects are also mentioned in the regulations of the Commission.

Any one conducting a Civil Service school could go over the examination papers of the last ten years, and I suppose he could approximate any possible question which could be put by the examiners. Again I say, that was an unfair imputation to make against the Civil Service Commission. They are not responsible for Civil Service schools in Ottawa. Such schools may be here by the dozen. I have no doubt there is more than one here. They will grow up in every city and town in Canada from now on, just because there is a wide open opportunity to every boy and girl in Canada to enter as a competitor in the Civil Service examinations and aspire to an appointment in the Civil Service of this country. The Civil Service Commission are not responsible for such schools; they know nothing about them. No information reaches the persons who conduct these schools as to the subjects. Such information is of a public nature. The subjects upon which candidates are to be examined are very few and everybody who wants to know the subjects, may know them. Therefore I say the accusation made in this respect against the Civil Service Commission is unjustified and unfair.

The last case to which I desire to refer is that in the concluding remarks of my honourable friend's speech, when he referred to the unfortunate theft of examination papers by some means or another. My hon. friend almost directly accuses the secretary of the Civil Service Commission for the fact that in some way or another these examination papers reached the hands of two or three candidates at an approaching examination. Why is the secretary of the Civil Service Commission blamed? Will any hon. gentleman answer that question? Why not blame any hon. gentleman in this House? Why not anybody else in the world? Perhaps it is a fair presumption to suspect some person connected with the Civil Service Commission rather than somebody unconnected with the Commission and whose work has no relation whatever to the work of the Commission. The secretary of the Commission never sees the examination papers. They are prepared by certain persons appointed by the Commission, and are educationists of some standing and repute.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the Minister name them?

A. K. MACLEAN: I am sorry I cannot. Their names were given to me but I have not now their names before me. When the questions are set, the papers are put into the hands of the confidential printer of the Commission and they remain in his possession. My hon. friend says: Where are you going to place the responsibility for this? Surely it must be upon the secretary. Under the Statute and under the regulations the secretary is not charged with this responsibility. If he should be charged with the responsibility, then let us make him directly responsible by passing an amendment to the Act or by suggesting an amendment to the regulations; but do not let us make him responsible for this particular offence when he was not responsible. He is the chief executive officer of the Commission and not the custodian of the examination papers. Perhaps he should be. Perhaps the practice of making the confidential printer of the Commission responsible is wrong. I am prepared to hear an argument in support of that contention. Perhaps it is too great a responsibility to leave upon one man, and I am inclined to think so. The member for West Toronto in this connection stated: " If there are clerks under him who are handing out these papers for consideration and they would hardly do it if there were no consideration—he is the man who must be held responsible. If in your business, Sir, you had a man whom you had placed in a chief position of responsibility with regard to a thing of this kind, would you go on down the line and pick out the office boy for dismissal, or would you pick out the man who is primarily responsible?" If my hon. friend's argument is sound he would act as follows: If an employee in the post office committed theft he would say: dismiss the postmaster. If the teller in the bank stole money he would say: Let the bank manager be charged with the crime and dismissed from office. If a deacon of the church committed a sin he would banish the minister from the precincts of the congregation and rob him of his pulpit. Surely there is a great fallacy in the argument which my hon. friend makes in this connection. I am not going to say much about this particular incident. It was unfortunate, but, perhaps, it is fortunate in the sense that it will cause the Commission to take greater precautions in the future in the care of examination papers. These things have occurred in other countries, in connection with examinations of the Civil Service. The same thing occurred in Ottawa years ago, when examination papers were printed at the public Printing Bureau. Personations at Civil Service examinations occurred at Toronto some years ago, and this has also occurred at Montreal and other places in Canada. In connection with Civil Service examinations, it must be remembered that there will always be some persons doing their very best to obtain information about forthcoming examination papers, and personation will be frequently attempted, but, of course, it will be the duty of the Commission to prevent this as far as possible. In this particular case the Commission are doing everything they can to bring the culprits to justice. Already one man has been arrested and his trial is now in progress. The case is in the hands of the secret service and is under the control of the Department of Justice. Everything that should be done is being done, and I do not think any hon. gentleman could suggest that anything be done which is not being done in the case. My personal judgment is that these papers were not stolen from the premises of the Civil Service Commission. The evidence indicates that they were abstracted from a postage parcel en route from the city of Ottawa to another place in Canada. I would like to give my hon. friend my personal view and judgment in this matter, namely, that no person in the Civil Service Commission is responsible for this, and much less is the secretary responsible. I am very sorry that my hon. friend attempted to leave upon the House the impression which he did, particularly in reference to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission.

Just a few words of a general nature and I have done, and I am sorry to have detained the House so long.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Certainly, but I do not want to discuss discounts.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not want to raise a question of privilege. The point is that I do not want to stand before this House and the country as having attempted to mislead the people, and I am not going to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not say you did.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I want to ask a question. If not, I will take the matter up with the question of privilege. It is to be found on page F-16 of the Charges of Management Loan Account, New York Loan, $4,098,580, but I want to know from my hon. friend if the Minister of Finance returned to Canada with the $75,000,000, less the Morgan's commission, or did he return with the $65,000,000, less the discount and the commission? Did we get $70,901,420 out of it, or did we get the $75,000,000?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We received the latter amount.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He came back with $70,901,420.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The difference represents the discount and all charges of selling the issue.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I want to know how much money went into the Treasury of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: $75,000,000, less the cost of charges, less whatever the discount on the bonds was.

Sir SAM HUGHES: $70,901,420. Then I was right.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would have been easy to receive $75,000,000 if the rate of interest had been about 6 per cent.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The point I make is that I was charged with making a misstatement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is not in order in entering into a discussion or argument. He would not be in order in rising to a question of privilege even if he had one, because the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has the floor. The hon. member's speech is on record and it is not competent for him to interrupt.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is competent for me to ask a question if the hon. member is willing.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the hon. member.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How much did the Dominion of Canada get from that loan? Was it $70,000,000 or $75,000,000?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Even if I answer that question it would not follow that my hon. friend's statement was correct.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I got my figures from the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understood my hon. friend to say that the loan cost a certain rate per $100 and I think I have demonstrated that his statement was not correct. My hon. friend does not desire to misrepresent the facts. I know he would like to have the figures correct, just as I would myself, and having that high regard for him I ventured to correct his statement.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How much money did we get?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. NICKLE: Paragraph (2) of section 39 of chapter 12 of the statutes of last year reads as follows:

> Immediately after each examination, a list of the successful competitors in the case of a competitive examination, and of the successful candidates in order of merit in other examinations shall be made out, and the list of successful competitors and candidates shall be published in the Canada Gazette.
>
> (a) Provided, however, that in all examinations persons who have been on active service overseas on the military or naval forces of His Majesty or of any of the Allies of His Majesty during the present war, who have left such service with an honourable record or who have been honourably discharged, and who obtained sufficient marks to pass such examination shall irrespective of the marks they have obtained be placed in the order of merit on the list of successful candidates above all other candidates.

What construction does the minister put upon that section?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the proper construction is the obvious one, namely, that a preference is to be given to returned men, and I think that the Civil Service Commission are following out that policy. I have not followed the work of the Civil Service Commission very closely and am not in a position to discuss individual cases with my hon. friend. But if the Civil Service Commission are not observing this section of the Act they would of course be open to criticism.

Mr. NICKLE: I understood my hon. friend in answering my previous question to say that the returned soldier got no preference.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Oh! No. I did not mean to say that. What I meant to say was that in the case of a position where technical qualifications were absolutely necessary the Civil Service Commission might select a man who was not a returned soldier if he alone possessed the proper qualifications. Reverting to my subject, the hon. member for West Toronto made very, very serious accusations against the Civil Service Commission. I do not believe that ever in the history of this Parliament has any man made more grave accusations against any Government bureau or government service than he made, and I doubt if ever in the history of the Canadian Parliament such serious charges were made against any one man as my hon. friend made against the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission. I have dealt with the cases specifically, and think I have demonstrated beyond controversy that the statements of my hon. friend were absolutely unfounded in every case and cannot be supported by the facts. In concluding his remarks my hon. friend from West Toronto said:

> I have just one suggestion in closing, and that is that the Civil Service Act should be amended at a vital point. I would have every position in the Outside Service filled upon the recommendation of the man who sits for the constituency in which the appointment is to be made.

Mr. Speaker, I quite understand the opposition that exists on the part of some hon. members to the Civil Service Act. It was inevitable that there should be opposition, and I am not surprised in the slightest degree. There have been similar complaints in all countries which have taken the step that this Parliament decided to take at its last session. If the objection to the Act is that the recommending power has been taken away from members of Parliament and the appointive power placed in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, all right. That is a fair matter for debate in this Parliament, and if Parliament wishes to reverse the position it took last session, well and good. Nobody could complain about that because it would be the will of the people, as expressed through its representatives in Parliament, which must ultimately prevail. But if that be the objection I do not think an hon. member should attack the Act through the Civil Service Commission. I think he should attack the Act itself, and on the floor of Parliament, and not make such serious charges as he has made against the commission and its secretary. Last session Parliament unanimously supported the principle of appointment by competition, and promotion by merit. I know the Act is unpopular in many parts of Canada. I have heard many of my political friends on the other side of the House say: This is not a Civil Service Act at all, because no Liberal ever gets a position. The only thing that will satisfy them, I assume, will be the filling of every office by a Liberal. On the other hand I have heard the same complaints from members of the Unionist party, some of whom are not satisfied unless every appointment goes to friends of the Government or of Government supporters. It might be well for us to appreciate that members of both political parties will not all be satisfied with the present system, and if this Act was accepted by Parliament upon the theory that the old conditions would still prevail, it might be well for us to consider at the earliest possible date the propriety of continuing this Act; but so long as it remains on the statute books I say it must be observed. The old conditions will not prevail so long as this Act remains in force. I can quite understand how representatives of Parliament find pressure from their constituents and political friends very embarrassing indeed with the present Civil Service Act in operation. I have sympathy for them. I have been embarrassed on that account myself. But the question is: Are we to have a different system from that which has prevailed in the past in making appointments to public office? Is it desirable in the interest of the public service that appointments to office be made on the recommendation of members of Parliament, or shall they be made by an independent tribunal such as the Civil Service Commission? I am very glad to find so many members on both sides of this House approving, after all, of the principle and expressing their sympathy with the Act and their desire to see it continued. I believe it will only be a short time before every member of this Parliament, or of future Parliaments, will say that the present system is better than that which obtained in the past, and when every member, regardless of the name of the party with which he is affiliated or the constituency which he represents, will be anxious to preserve the principle of the Civil Service Act which leaves appointments in the Civil Service with an independent commission.

My own opinion is that it is by far the better system; fairer, more just, more democratic. It is hardly worth while to boast of democratic institutions unless you follow out the principles of democracy; and it is nothing but tyranny which gives to any party or to any member of Parliament the right to make recommendations to office which are virtually conclusive. I have made many recommendations to office myself during the many years in which I have been in public life, and I have seen the present Civil Service Act in operation; and I have no hesitation in saying that it is in the interest of the public service, it is in the interest of Canada, that the method of appointment which now prevails shall continue.

I trust this Parliament will never again revert to the old method of making appointments. I had intended to refer to the many anomalies and injustices which issue from the past system, but I shall not take up the time necessary to refer to these matters. I trust, however, that Parliament will continue to support, as sympathetically as it did last session, the principle of appointment to the public service by an independent commission.

Now, just a word or two as to the Commission. I have already said more than once that the criticism of the hon. member for West Toronto may have a very disastrous effect upon the work of the Commission and upon the progress and development of our public service under provisions of the Civil Service Act. I know that he did not intend to do injury to so important an institution as our Civil Service Commission, and it became necessary, therefore, for some member of the Government to speak in answer to the accusations he made and in defence of the work of the Commission. He has referred to the fact that the chairman of the Commission, Hon. Dr. Roche, is not a very strong man and has been more or less ill, and consequently has been unable to devote the time to the work that the work deserved. As a matter of fact, Dr. Roche has enjoyed better health during the last year than during many years previous. It is unfortunately true that Mr. Jameson has been seriously ill during the past few months. He became an influenza victim, in the month of November, I think, and has been obliged to spend the winter in the southern states. But, after all, the criticism which is made of the Commission was not directed, in the main, against the capacity, integrity and character of the Commissioners but rather against the work done by them as a body, and the suggestion was, not of incapacity or inability, but of something worse—a desire not to observe the provisions of the law or to carry out the Act honestly. I do not suggest that the Civil Service Commission must be free from criticism; but, I do state frankly that I think the work imposed upon the Commission is excessive, and that Parliament should consider the question of increasing the Commission during this Parliament. I know that the duties of the Commission are so onerous that much of their work must be neglected. They have not devoted sufficient time to the proper organization of the Commission as they should have done. But there was a reason for that. The statute passed last session imposed upon the Commission the duty of reclassifying all the Inside and Outside Service. In conjunction with a body of experts whom they brought to Ottawa they have been engaged in that work of reclassification ever since Parliament rose last year. I say on their behalf—for it should be said of them—that it has been impossible for them to discharge the duties pertaining to their office in the manner and with a despatch, which, I know, they would have desired. I am not pleading for mercy for the Commission, and I would be the last person to say that they should not be criticised. All I ask of Parliament is that fair play and ordinary justice be extended to the Commission and its members. I do not ask more on their behalf; they would not have me do it; they would not do it themselves.

I wish to say a word particularly as to the secretary of the Commission, because I feel that my hon. friend for West Toronto has done that gentleman a great injustice, unintentionally, I believe. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) speaking last evening objected to some statement made by Mr. Foran in commenting on the statement made in Parliament by the hon. member for West Toronto. It is to be remembered that the accusation made against the Secretary of the Commission was a very, very serious one indeed—one who reads the hon. gentleman's speech carefully must be seized of the seriousness of his statements. Accusations made against any man, if the person accused believes them to be unfair, naturally provoke recrimination. In this particular case the recrimination has brought forth a reference to matters of religion and creed, which have nothing to do with the question of Civil Service—and I doubt if they have anything to do with Christianity. Perhaps the statement made by the secretary was unfortunate. I think the statement made by the hon. member for West Toronto will, some day, be regarded by himself as unfortunate. I think the secretary of the commission and the member for West Toronto will, some time, come to understand one another better with respect to these matters, and that each of them will forget some of the remarks that have been made.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. Foran is very limited indeed; in fact, I have never had the opportunity of meeting him in my life until the Civil Service Act was under consideration at the last session of Parliament. But, I do know that he is a strong friend of Civil Service reform and of an efficient public service. I do not believe there is a man in Canada who is so strong a friend of Civil Service reform, and of an efficient, capable public service, as Mr. Foran. He is so regarded by Civil Service reformers in the United States as well as by those in Canada who know him in connection with his work.

I must speak of him as I know him with my very limited experience. I have no hesitancy whatever in expressing to the House my own view, and that is, that he is a capable public official interested in building up a strong and efficient public service. I do not believe for one single moment that the secretary of the commission would be guilty of doing any of the acts which were charged, or suggested, against him in the remarks made a few days ago by the hon. member for West Toronto.

Mr. Foran has been in the public service for thirty years. He has been connected with the Civil Service Commission since 1908 and he was secretary of the Board of Civil Service Examiners from 1895 to 1908. Therefore, he has been intimately connected with, and has intimate knowledge of, everything that relates to the Civil Service of Canada. I think he is trusted by all who know him. I believe his services to the public are appreciated by all who have had an opportunity of knowing him and I think I can safely commend him to Parliament, as a capable and trustworthy secretary of the Civil Service Commission.

I feel called upon in justice to say these few words for the secretary of the commission, and I do trust that the member for West Toronto will be able to revise his opinion of that gentleman and of the work of the commission, and that before this session closes we will have from him an admission that in regard to all, or practically all, of the statements which he made against the commission and its work the other evening, he, unfortunately, was misinformed. Having said these few words on behalf of the commission, the members of the commission, and its secretary, I finish.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ARTHUR TRAHAN (Nicolet): Mr. Speaker, I trust that you and the House will pardon me if, in the course of my remarks, I frequently refer to my notes. Wishing to be understood, and desiring to make a modest but active contribution to national harmony, I address the House in English, which is not my maternal tongue. For this reason I ask your indulgence.

I will make only a very brief answer to the speech which was delivered by the hon. minister representing the city of Halifax. First of all, I wish to assure the hon. gentleman that nobody on this side objects to Canada being represented at the Peace Conference. On the contrary, we say that Canada should be represented at the Paris Conference, but surely my hon. friend from Halifax will not support the idea that nearly one-third of the Cabinet should be overseas while there is so much to be done in Canada, and when ministers remaining here follow, according to the Globe, a policy of " putting off " concerning all important matters.

As to questions relating to the cost of war loans, and the conduct of the Civil Service Commission, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate, and I do not wish for the present to interfere in this family quarrel. I have only one word to say about the Civil Service Commission: I hope that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) will take advantage of the opportunity which has been given to him by the Government, and ask for an investigation in order to prove the charges which he brought to the attention of the House the other day. Speaking for myself, having heard from the gentlemen opposite contradictory statements on the matter, I shall reserve my judgment until this investigation has taken place.

Mr. Speaker, it is stated in the speech from the Throne that " important measures, designed to promote the welfare and prosperity of the people in the new era of reconstruction, social as well as material, upon which the world has entered, will be recommended for our consideration." This paragraph is very general, indeed, and enunciates a very large programme of action. For my part, I would have preferred to the word " reconstruction " the words " readjustment," or " co-operation," which seem to be more applicable to our country. However it may be, the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) the other day exemplified this programme in a very magnificent, descriptive definition. He summed it all up in this telling sentence:—

Reconstruction means a going forward, not a standing still; it means progress, not stagnation.

Let us see, Sir, if the Government has realized such a definition. Is it true that by their actions they have justified the laudatory speech of the hon. minister? In answering this question I wish to be fair, and I will give the opinions of friends of the Government itself. The fact that the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy), who was Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, has resigned that position is very significant. Why did he resign? His motives were explained in a statement issued to the press and which has been already read to this House. It is a clear statement, and coming from such an authoritative source it proves conclusively that in matters of reconstruction the Government, completely and absolutely, lacked initiative, method and courage. Moreover, another good friend of the Government, Senator Nicholls, in a letter published by the Globe of December 4, 1918, said the following:—

The Government has been repeatedly warned to prepare for after-war conditions, but the war is over and little or nothing has been done, although every other civilized nation has been mobilized for trade purposes long since. Better late than never is an old proverb, but "a stitch in time saves nine," is a much better one.

These opinions are confirmed by the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization himself, who said the other day that " there was not very much talk at that time—that is to say, last July—about the preparations for after the war, and we must not be very much surprised in this country if in that respect the full duty of the Government was not completely performed." Then a little further on the hon. minister went on to say:—

We always understood that the war was going to end, that it would not last forever.

Again he said:—

We were not all adrift.

How can the hon. minister reconcile this last statement with the first one? I do not know, but what I do know and say is that the Government has failed in its duty regarding reconstruction.

They were repeatedly warned to prepare for after-the-war conditions, but when the armistice was signed, according to the Minister of Immigration (Hon. J. A. Calder) himself, little had been done. Surely this is not a progressive policy; it is rather stagnation. Read carefully, Sir, the entire speech of the minister and you will see that while set phrases were coming forth fluently and eloquently, actual facts were standing still.

I will deal in the course of my remarks with three subjects: the returned soldiers, the labour question, and the tariff and agriculture.

As to the returned soldiers, many say to them that they are heroes. That is perfectly true. Many tell them also: we owe everything to you. Perhaps the desire is all right, but they speak from the generosity of their hearts, not with due regard to the financial possibilities of the country. Too many transient favours can only make sufferings more acute. Everything which is promised to our returned soldiers and not given to them will be considered by them as a robbery. The Government must take care not to make of each of those whom they help a kind of perpetual pensioner who may become all too easily a rebel or a beggar. On the contrary, it is our imperative duty to afford to these veterans an opportunity at the earliest possible moment and in the most extended manner of resuming their pre-war activities and acquiring, as a consequence, a greater dignity and the right to greater independence. To give to disabled soldiers artificial limbs is good, because you release their bodies of many hardships. But that is not enough. We must secure for them also calmness of heart and soul and inspire in them a high idea of their dignity. Has the Government succeeded in this noble work of raising the morale of our returned soldiers? As you read the newspapers, Sir, you are obliged to confess that the numerous troubles caused by some returned soldiers in Toronto and in other western places seem to suggest a negative answer. This is a great source of regret to every law-abiding citizen, and I earnestly request the Government to adopt proper measures not only to assure material help to our heroes, but also to provide for their intellectual and moral welfare.

I truly believe, Sir, that the principle of granting pensions to returned soldiers according to their rank in the army and proportionately to the pay they were receiving as such is not just and fair. I do not advocate uniformity in the rate of pensions; I only submit that you must not create distinctions and privileged classes among the veterans. Moreover, the Pensions Board should not consider only the gravity of the injury, because the injury may not of necessity bring about a change in the earning power of the man. For instance, an accountant with a leg taken off at the thigh will be able, without suffering any decrease in his salary, to continue to do his book-keeping, while a pianist, deprived of the use of only one finger necessary to the exercise of his profession, may fall into poverty. Consequently, it is the relation between his infirmity and his ability to carry on the work or practise his profession which is the essential factor to be considered in determining the pension of the returned man. Each case, therefore, should be dealt with individually, separately, according to the particular circumstances, on its own merits, and not according to specific rules, rigid regulations, or the rank held by the man in the army.

The Minister of Immigration and Colonization told us the other day that we have, scattered throughout every province of Canada, something like 150 institutions for disabled soldiers. This is very well, but if these institutions are managed according to "the arrogant and insolent system" described by the Globe, "which regards the continued interest and concern of civilians in their sons and brothers after they have become part of the military forces as presumptuous and calling for reprimand and punishment;" if the Administration maintains the conditions that—and here again I quote the Globe—"permitted Ottawa—behind the anonymity of which guilty officialdom now seeks to hide—to utilize a building"—the Base Hospital at Toronto—"which the Medical Officer of Health testified was in a disgraceful and unsafe condition, to house more than double the number of patients it was properly capable of accommodating in a sound and safe condition;" if there is no better accommodation for soldiers in these institutions than in the Toronto, Montreal and other military hospitals; if, as asserts the Globe, of October 30th, 1918, Canada, in its fifth year of war has yet made no attempt "to provide adequate modern hospital accommodation and equipment for the men of Ontario's biggest military district;" and if these conditions prevailed all over the country, well, Sir, to use the expression of the Minister of Colonization (Hon. J. A. Calder), we are nearly all adrift. I am afraid that our returned soldiers will not be cared for as they deserve, and the Government will be held responsible for this bad treatment.

We Liberals are true and sincere democrats, and as such are supporters of responsible government. We desire that the people should govern themselves in accordance with the Constitution, through the intermediary of their representatives. But a reasonable use of political rights demands a political formation, a political organization. How is it that to-day in our country a large number of citizens are sick of politics and apathetic to it? Evidently there is a close connection between this condition and Government by Orders in Council. It is not sufficient to say to the people: You are free according to the law; you are, by the universal franchise, the leading authority; by your vote you are the masters of the country. How can the people be sovereign when we are not permitted, in a meeting of free citizens, to speak freely on matters concerning the interests of the country? Do we sincerely desire to be a nation politically free? Do we sincerely desire that all classes of society, with diligence, energy and thoroughness, should take an active part in active political fights for the defence of their most sacred rights? We must immediately abrogate the Orders in Council repressing the freedom of speech and freedom of the press. These are political liberties for which our forefathers have fought, and I feel it is my imperative duty earnestly to urge the Government to repeal without delay all regulations encroaching upon that liberty, regulations which entail autocratic Prussianism in this Dominion. It is time, Sir, to practise in our political life the democratic ideals which have triumphed on the battlefield.

There is now in our Dominion a general industrial unrest. Its principal sources are: the abuse of Orders in Council, the high cost of living, the scandalous war profits and the social strife between the different classes of the community. During the last four years and a half we have been the sorrowing witnesses of the most bloody war in the history of the world. In our country we have also had our internal difficulties. There has been a general struggle between manufacturers and labourers, between producers and consumers. The result has been the triumph of the powerful over the weak, of the unscrupulous man over the honest man. The rich have become richer and the poor poorer. What has the Government done to help the Canadian people to recover all the rights of which they have been deprived by capitalism under an economic sphere? Has the Government proved to the working people that not only do the labouring men work for a salary, but they perform in our community functions of general interest for the accomplishment of which they have a right to gratitude? Has the Government been progressive in this matter? The strike of the postmen last July, the difficulties of the Government with the Civil Service, the strike of the employees of the Public Printing Bureau which began to-day, are good answers to this question. They prove conclusively that as regards labour the Government has been inconsistent, autocratic and stagnant.

Ministers of the Crown were responsible for this strike and postponed a decision until they were forced by public opinion to make one. Let me quote an article from the Globe under date of July 25, 1918, which explains the situation very well:

> It is impossible to avoid accepting the verdict of the man on the street that responsibility for this dislocation of business rests primarily with the Government at Ottawa. The bonus passed to the letter carriers by Parliament has never been paid. The Government either neglected the repeated petitions of the men or refused to take them seriously. The Premier, the Postmaster General, and several members of the Cabinet were overseas. Those remaining at Ottawa followed a policy of "putting off." The result is the strike, the tying up of much important business, and general public inconvenience and loss.
> The plain truth of the matter is that the Post Office Department has been practically neglected for months, while the Labour Department, which should have properly also interested itself in the situation as it concerned the carriers, is headed with such hopeless inefficiency that nothing effective or business-like can be hoped for under existing conditions.

If the Government acted in the same manner towards the Printing Bureau employees, they must bear their responsibility before public opinion. For this reason, I blame the Government for its prolonged delay in performing one of its principal duties, that is, to guarantee and favour the development of professional organizations. The ministers who occupy the Treasury benches must remember the very object of the State, namely, that its principal mission is to protect all rights without exception.

If common law justly prevents the abuses of the less disputed power, the paternal one, much more should it do so when it is a question of labour contracts. A minimum must be guaranteed to the weakest contracting party. Liberty alone is not sufficient to solve the serious social problems.

As part of its so called progressive policy, the Government intends to confer upon women the privilege of sitting in Parliament. This reform is not asked for by women, and in my opinion is mere camouflage. Women will not avail themselves of this privilege. In Great Britain at the last election there were only a few women candidates and only one was elected. Does the Government really believe that it will be otherwise in Canada? If not, this proposed legislation is useless. Moreover, it is not demanded by the women, who in general have never claimed political rights, but have always firmly demanded laws which would enable them to be victorious in their struggle for life. In our modern society, working women have been exploited by the manufacturers. They receive no protection and work hard till they are exhausted, and it is well known that they are not sufficiently paid. What they demand in the name of justice and humanity is a minimum wage and the Government would serve the interests of women better by passing a law fixing a minimum salary for working women throughout this Dominion, than by giving to women the privilege of sitting in Parliament. Legislation such as I have suggested has already been proposed by the Government of the province of Quebec, and I urge this Government to follow along the same lines.

Inasmuch as the labour programme claims the possession by labourers, including farmers, of their essential rights, the legal, proportional and professional representation of their interests, the protection of their homes, a sufficient salary to insure a decent standard of living for themselves and their families, guarantees by way of state insurance against accidents, illness and unemployment, old age pensions, the privilege of participating in profits and even, by means of co-operation, in the capital of the enterprises to whose success they contribute by their work, to that extent I approve of it. Why? Because the labouring men constitute an essential part of the community and because the Government must solve the problems of our social life. The question is, not merely to provide against poverty, but to guarantee social rights; it is not a question of charity, but a matter of justice. It is important to limit as much as possible that unhappy class of our people earning a precarious wage. Having first admitted that the labourer is entitled to a just salary in proportion to the efficiency of his work we must then grant to him additional remuneration by means of sharing in the profits of the enterprise in which he is engaged. This is the future form of salary and perhaps it will take a long time before the rights of the labourer in this respect is recognized. There will undoubtedly be much objection to it but we know that the principal has been already applied in some measure and with good results in the form of co-operative farming, in the form of distribution of dividends or bonuses and of pensions proportionate to the size of the family. Remedies must be applied if we are to check effectively the industrial unrest which at present makes our national outlook very gloomy. What remedies have the Government proposed? The Minister of Public Works made two suggestions. By the first he declined all responsibility on the part of the Government, and wanted the capitalists to spend their money in industrial enterprises regardless of consequences. To my mind that suggestion is impracticable, because in financial matters there is no sentiment. Secondly, he intimates that the Government will spend enormous sums of money on highways, railways, shipping, etc., but that in consequence we shall face a yearly deficit of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of dollars. This second suggestion is not the proper remedy, and if it constitutes progress at all, it is an uninterrupted progress towards bankruptcy.

What else is the Government doing? We have ministers giving interviews—talking always talking, but doing nothing in the matter of social reform. If this Government progresses at all it progresses in stagnation.

Speaking on the Budget in the session of 1916, the Acting Prime Minister said:

> "The future of Canada rests with the development of its great resources, of which the greatest and most fundamental is agriculture, and this development is in turn bound up with the question of increase in population of the productive sort and the facilities afforded it for the application of its intelligence and industry. It is probable that in the straightened financial conditions which may prevail for some years forward, the question of capital for the development of agriculture may be of paramount importance, and it is our intention to inquire carefully during the coming recess into this most important subject. . . . .

It is always the same song, Sir; it was repeated the other day by the hon. Minister of Immigration, when he said:

> "A good deal of thought and study has been given to many of the problems that would naturally come up when the war would close."

But where are the results? Has the Government created a system of rural credits as requested by the farmers for many years? Not yet, why? Because the Government always studies but never acts. Since 1913 they have had before them a Bill regarding rural credits, and after six years of study and thought, they have not yet adopted it. They are not following on this great question, the bold example of France, of Great Britain, and of the United States, all of which countries have passed, even during war, progressive legislation to efficiently promote rural credits. I hope, Sir, that there will be no more standing still on this question, but that in the interests of the farmer the Government will establish rural credits in Canada, so that the farmer may not be at the mercy of accumulated capital in merged banks, but may be able, by means of co-operation, to finance and develop their own industry, the basic industry of our Dominion. I make this suggestion, not only for the good of farmers, but in the interest of the whole country; because, if agriculture progresses, there will be a decrease in the cost of living, and with such a decrease industrial unrest will soon come to an end.

Is the Government more active and determined as regards free agricultural implements, free food stuffs, reciprocity with the United States, and tariff questions in general? The Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) has admitted that " the Tariff forms a very essential part of the work of reconstruction." This opinion is general among the people; manufacturers await a decision on that important question, and are postponing improvements to their factories pending announcement by the Government of its policy. On this point I have only to read the circular of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, dated at Toronto, February 19, 1919, and numbered 174. It is entitled " New Factories and Additions," and says in part:

> There is no doubt that a considerable amount of factory extension construction is held up owing to the uncertainty prevailing in regard to what the Government may do with the tariff at the approaching session,—as a result of the demands of the Western Grain Growers and other farmers' organizations.

The demand for a decision by the Government on the tariff question comes not alone from the manufacturers of this country, but the Grain Growers, the United Farmers, the local legislatures of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and the rural population all over Canada, are unanimous in favour of an immediate and substantial reduction of the tariff. On the 4th of this month, Premier Norris, of Manitoba, according to a Canadian Press despatch published in the Citizen, expressed a strong opinion that never in the history of Canada was the time so opportune as now for a revision of the tariff on the lines of a substantial reduction. "The Government at Ottawa," said Premier Norris, "is not supposed to be a party Government, and should be in favour of dealing independently with the question."

Facing such a general demand for decision and action on the tariff question, what is the Government doing? Have they, as the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization said, "A true conception of what the people of this country demand in the way of progressive legislation?" No, Sir, they progress only in stagnation. They "wait and see." They should remember that this policy was disastrous in England, and that such standing still is against the public welfare and cannot be rightly supported. Allow me to quote on this subject the conclusion of a letter, dated Langvale, Manitoba, February 10, 1919, and published by the Financial Times, Montreal, of first March inst.

They argue for a "wait and see" policy and for us to let this sacred national policy alone until they have had time to adjust themselves to peace conditions. What about time for us to adjust ourselves? Our point is that if the burden is not removed we farmers, on this drifting policy, will be, if not ruined, brought dangerously near that point. As I said before when wheat was too cheap years ago we were very near to a catastrophe. The life of Canada depends mainly on the basic industry of farming. Let them beware that they do not kill the goose that lays the golden egg. The manufacturers seem to see blue ruin ahead for them if Free Trade is adopted. This I do not credit, but I do know after thirty years' experience farming in Manitoba that if the burden is not eased the farm will be more and more forsaken, and I fail to see how we can possibly build up Canada fit for all classes without a prosperous farming community.

This statement is very accurate and I entirely concur in it. I said, last year, that I was in favour of free agricultural implements and free foodstuffs. May I add, Sir, that, following Liberal principles, I am a staunch supporter of the 1911 Reciprocity Agreement with the United States, of an increased British preference and of the immediate withdrawal of the war supertax. I greatly doubt that such an expression of opinion on my part can induce the Government to reach a conclusion on this question. They are too much inclined to stand still and stagnate in matters of progressive legislation.

We are jubilant, Sir, because the war ended with the triumph of liberty and civilization; but we have another important duty to perform. Our delegates attend the Peace Conference. Let us pray the Almighty that their decisions be always and only guided by the eternal principles of justice and charity which have enlightened the world and which alone can ensure a lasting and profound peace for the universe. Let us learn the moral lessons of the war. Our gallant Canadian soldiers of all races and creeds have united their energies and thoughts, their experience and hearts, for the defence of a sacred cause. Let us imitate them and heartily practice for the progress and welfare of our beloved Canada the beautiful virtue of mutual toleration and the duty of national unity; let us be animated and inspired by the spirit of that illustrious and much regretted statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who during his lifetime always had an undivided affection for Canada and liberty, a profound respect for human beings and who always advocated "welfare in harmony."

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few observations in connection with the debate on the Address as the representative of the most northerly and most westerly territory of this great Dominion. The hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Trahan) has paid some attention to some incidents that have occurred in the present session and, before addressing myself to the subject matters of the speech from the Throne, perhaps you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, to make a few references to some of the things that he has said. He refers to what he is pleased to call the family quarrel and I presume he has reference to what took place in the House this afternoon when the hon. the Minister (Mr. A. K. Maclean) referred to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). One of the hopeful things about this Union party to me is, Mr. Speaker, that when a man who sits on your right has anything to say in regard to the conduct of affairs by the men who sit on the Treasury Benches, he is not afraid to get up and say it in Parliament, or in public, and to have it carried on the wings of the telegraph to the uttermost parts of this Dominion. That is, I consider, good policy. Publicity is one of the great safeguards of democracy and I think it is just as well that members should express themselves here where they can express themselves.

My hon. friend referred to the speech made by the hon. Minister of Colonization and Immigration (Mr. Calder) and particularly to his remark regarding reconstruction that not all had been done that he wished they could do. Is that not all right? I do not suppose there is any minister of the Crown sitting here who is able to do what he would like to do, but it is at least a confession of interest for a minister to get up and say that he has done certain things but there are other things that he has not found himself in a position to do. He shows the right spirit at least when he takes that position rather than attempting to defend what it is impossible to defend. The world is in a very chaotic condition and great changes have taken place all over.

My hon. friend also paid his respects to the method of governing which this Government used to a large extent during the war and when resort was had to Orders in Council. I have heard other hon. gentlemen speaking from the other side of the House and criticising the Orders in Council as well. They have found fault with the Government for using that method of giving effect to the will of the people in carrying on the war. I do not think that criticism is well founded. In my judgment, Orders in Council are an indication of the flexibility of our constitution rather than a symptom of the autocratic methods which governments use in times of stress. Orders in Council have been used by the British Government for more than one century at least. They were in existence at the time of the Napoleonic wars, having been used by the British Government of that day. I do not remember what their origin was, but I know they existed then. They are not used, generally speaking, except in times of stress. Where did the Government get its authority to issue these Orders in Council? Perhaps the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me will be surprised when I point out to him that the authority which is carried by these Orders in Council is derived from the War Measures Act, an Act which was consented to unanimously by the members of this Parliament, and an Act which was supported by the distinguished gentleman whose spirit has passed beyond and who led the party of which my hon. friend is a member. Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself supported that measure. I wondered when I heard of these hon. gentlemen referring to these Orders in Council if they had just thought back far enough to realize where those Orders in Council had their source. In my hand is the Hansard for the special session of Parliament in those fateful days of August, 1914. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is speaking——

9 p.m.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Order.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: What does my hon. friend say?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I do not believe my hon. friend can read from Hansard.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is perfectly in order for an hon. member to read from the debates in Hansard provided they are not the debates of the present session.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: Is my hon. friend satisfied? In that case I may be permitted to read the quotation:

> The gravity of the occasion which has called us together makes it incumbent upon us even to disregard the formalities and conventionalities which in ordinary times the rules of the House, written and unwritten, enjoin as a wise safeguard against precipitate action, but which, on such an occasion as this, might impede us in dealing with the momentous question before us. This session has been called for the purpose of giving the authority of Parliament and the sanction of the law to such measures as have already been taken by the Government, and any further measures that may be needed, to insure the defence of Canada and to give what aid may be in our power to the mother country in the stupendous struggle which now confronts her.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier quoted the War Measures Act from which these Orders in Council spring. The Government is not attempting to get from under any responsibility that they have in this matter. In the final analysis they have to depend on the War Measures Act, and we are told that only those Orders in Council which are necessary to be retained will be submitted to Parliament. They will be brought down and Parliament will be asked to approve or disapprove of them. I do not see why it is necessary to criticise the Government for using an Order in Council as a method of representing the people during the stress of war.

My hon. friend referred to the extension of the franchise to women and criticised that act of the Government. Sir, it is too late to criticise the giving of votes to women. If there was one thing which impressed itself upon my mind during the war, so far as the Canadian people are concerned, it was the degree of organizing ability which the women of this country displayed, to say nothing of their heroism and patriotism during the great struggle. For my part, Sir, I welcome the giving of votes to women, for I feel sure they have well deserved it, and if they are not as thoroughly versed in the arts of government as the male members of our population they will very quickly learn.

I would like, Sir, to offer my felicitations to the distinguished gentleman who now leads the Opposition, and upon whose shoulders the mantle of the late distinguished leader of the Liberal party has fallen. He is an old parliamentarian, and I am glad indeed to find that he was selected as the leader of his party.

I am pleased to find that the speech from the Throne promises constructive legislation which will require constructive statesmanship to carry into effect. Perhaps never in the history of our country do we need more than now such statesmanship and such legislation. Some of the hon. members of this House in their conversations with me rather indicate that they almost fear the return of our men to this country after the cessation of the war. What were we fighting for four years in the great war for? Was it not for a victorious peace, and have we not achieved that triumphant result? Why then should we fear the return of our men from the front, or fear lest a chaotic condition of mind ensue when they do come back? Are these men strangers to this country? Are we bringing back from Europe four or five hundred thousands of aliens? No, Sir, they are our own people who understand the meaning of representative government and what the possibilities of Canada are. They are coming back to their own people, coming back to their own homes, and I have no fear at all as to what their attitude will be. I welcome them back because they have a tremendous flood of energy which, if properly directed, will result in great good to this country of ours. They are coming back to take part in the political life of Canada, and unless my judgment is altogether wrong the men who will govern this country, provincially and federally for the next decade or two are in the Canadian Army. I have no doubt that the Prime Ministers of Canada even will be recruited from that source if history repeats itself in our country, as it did in the United States. In the course of the next ten or fifteen, or perhaps twenty years I have no doubt that the men who fill these positions in front of me in this House, the men who represent the Crown in this country, will be chosen, to a very large extent, from the Canadian Army which has brought such glory to our common country. There is no fear in my mind about the ideas these gallant gentlemen will bring home with them, because they have fought the fight, they have kept the faith, and they are coming back to the country which they love and which they may call their own.

Amongst the constructive legislation promised in the speech from the Throne is a measure to assist in settling the soldiers on the land. I am a great believer, Sir, in having among our population people who have a stake in the soil. Canada is an agricultural country, but we have different resources from which we derive our national life. They are four in number, the farms, the fisheries, the mines, and the forests, but of these four the greatest of all is the farm. It employs the greatest number of our people, it furnishes the largest number of tons of freight to our railroads—in a word, farming is the backbone of Canada. But you cannot convert four or five hundred thousand soldiers immediately into farmers. There are certain things which must be done, and done in unison, before a soldier can be made into a successful farmer. These things are three in number. First, you must have land for the soldiers, and I am glad to find that the Government has undertaken to provide land for our soldiers when they return. But that is not enough. We must also provide the soldier with a certain amount of capital—not very much, but a certain amount—so that he will be able to make a proper start. But there is another thing that is almost equally as essential as land and capital, and that is some experience or some knowledge of agriculture. These are the three things that are necessary, in my judgment, to start a soldier who wants to go on the land and become a producer, as we all want him to do. To give him land and money without knowledge or experience is not of much use, failure is almost sure to result. But if you give him a certain amount of training, which can be done by putting him through a course in our agricultural institutions, then I think the chances of his success are very greatly enhanced.

Another matter referred to is the permitting of desirable immigration. If there is one thing that we have learned in the recent war, it is to be careful about the character of the people we permit to come into this country, and I hope the Government will see to it that the immigrants permitted to enter Canada will be men upon whom we shall be able to rely in any great national crisis in future. If there is one important thing we have learned from the experience of the past it is the necessity of having in this country men who will defend it if necessary with their lives, and that democracy which we all stand for, and which we all believe in, and I hope we all practice. To bring men to this country who have lived their lives under institutions foreign to our own, would be a very doubtful asset in time of peace, and a heavy liability in time of war, as we have already found out. So I hope that the Government will be most careful to see that any men they bring into this country will be such as our free institutions will appeal to, and such as will defend democracy with their lives. The assimilative power of the Anglo-Saxon race has been one of the wonders to men who have studied the question of the assimilative power of races, but even that great and inherent quality of our race has been over-taxed in this country. Therefore, I repeat, let us be careful in the future, and see that we get the right kind of immigration into Canada.

Another matter the Government has taken up, I am glad to say, is the matter of public health. Mr. Speaker, the greatest asset any state can have is the people that compose that state, and the stronger those people are in body and mind the more valuable that asset is. A health department is capable of doing wonders in strengthening our state. In the matter of tuberculosis alone a department of public health, with headquarters in Ottawa, and ramifications throughout the country, can assist in saving—and I speak from knowledge, for I have had some experience in this particular matter—seventy-five per cent of those people in this country who to-day are suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis, called consumption. Such a department can do more than that; it can convert those people into active citizens, who will be a great asset to the country. There is another way in which the Department of Public Health can help our country—I mean in the matter of sanitation, providing a pure water supply for our cities and seeing that our streets are kept clean. In a word a department of public health can do an infinite amount of good.

A Department of Public Health can carry on and develop methods of decreasing the number of typhoid cases. Typhoid, so recently as the South African War, killed more soldiers than did the bullets of the Boers, though in this greatest war of all times typhoid has been practically wiped out. A good, active Department of Public Health at Ottawa can do a great deal towards reducing the mortality from typhoid in this country. The same is true of smallpox. The same is true of venereal diseases, always following in the wake of the armies. A Department of Health at Ottawa can do a great deal towards reducing that danger to a minimum. Take the great influenza epidemic which is sweeping over the world at the present time and which caused the death of thousands of Canadian people within the few months that it scourged and ravaged this country. We do not know yet what the cause of it is. The greatest bacteriologists in the world have devoted their best efforts to the solution of that problem, but the medical profession is not united as to what the cause of this disease is. There is a field for a Department of Health; there is an opportunity for scientists to investigate and inquire into the cause of that fatal scourge and try to secure a remedy. So it is with cholera, that seaborne disease; so it is with bubonic plague. Because of the situation of our country in relation to the ocean highways of the world, these diseases may invade us at any time. They have invaded us in the past. Bubonic plague has been in Canada; cholera has been in Canada; smallpox has been in Canada; typhoid has been in Canada. I think, therefore, we should have a Department of Health, and I should welcome it now.

The speech from the Throne referred to the export trade of Canada. For fifty years we have been devoting our energies to spending money in the development of interprovincial trade, in creating manufacturing industries, in building up our educational and commercial institutions, in constructing our transcontinental railways, in digging our canals, in lighting our coasts, in providing means of transport for this sparsely populated country stretching from ocean to ocean. We have built up in Canada a very considerable manufacturing business, but we have never had our fair share of export trade. During all these years we have been creating, creating, creating. Now is the time, when our statesmen are at the Peace Conference, when commercial treaties are being revised, when the name of Canada stands higher than it ever did in all the Allied countries and Canadian products will be well received—now is the time for us to develop our export trade. I believe that if the energies of the Government are properly directed there may be brought back to Canada an enormous portion of the export trade of the world in the commodities which Canada can export.

We have the greatest possible asset in the Canadian artisan. Did any one believe, Sir, when the war broke out that we could create from the ground up a new industry which would bring into this country $1,200,000,000 from outside of Canada? That is what we did, and we did it with our own people, with our own artisans. We showed that we have in Canada artisans second to none in the world. Having regard to the manufacturing industries that we have here, to our means of transport on the two oceans, to the opening up to us of trade with the Orient, to the fact that South America, Mexico and Central America are at our door and that the European countries which were our Allies are favourable to us, now is the time of all times for us to get after this export trade. Time, tide and fortune await us. Let us assist our Government in any way that we can to get our share of it.

I am glad that the Government is going to expend money for the construction of highways. Canada, like every other pioneer country has gone through the various stages of transportation. First was the method of transport by waterways, then by connecting the waterways with trails, then building roads, then building the great state road, then using the stage coach, then building railroads on a large scale and using the rails which have done so much to develop Canada. Money expended on the construction of highways serves a double purpose; it gives employment to our men and it increases our capital account.

A new system of transportation has been developed in this world since the war began, and it is about that particularly that I wish to speak to-night with reference to its application to the great hinterland of Canada, part of which I have the honour to represent in this Parliament. I refer to the highways of the air. This war has practically created aerial navigation. Three types of airships are used, first, the lighter-than-air machine; second, the land plane, and third, the seaplane. By means of this method of transportation I believe we can give safe and rapid transport to an enormous section of our country which lies undeveloped. We have a tract of virgin soil sixteen hundred miles long and a thousand miles deep reaching from the Hudson bay to the Alaskan boundary, 141st meridian west. In that vast tract I do not believe that there are many more than a thousand souls; certainly there are not more than ten thousand. It is an empire itself, with great possibilities; a vast tract owned and controlled not by any of the provinces, but by the Federal Government. In that tract there may be minerals enough to pay our national debt a dozen times. Some hon. gentleman behind me says that he would like to live there. I will show him how he can go and live there, and live in comfort. I have in my hand an article written for the Geological Survey of Canada by Charles Camsell. He refers to this vast hinterland of Canada in which, he says, there are 900,000 square miles that have never been explored. Most of that is underlain by what the geologists call the pre-Cambrian rocks, in which occur the copper, nickel, iron, silver and gold of northern Ontario. He says:

> Signs are not wanting that deposits of similar minerals of perhaps equal richness occur in various parts of the unexplored north, such, for example, as the copper deposits of the Coppermine River.

I am speaking of land away north of Alberta, away north of Saskatchewan and away north of Manitoba, land which does not belong to any of these provinces. The writer goes on to say:

> It is estimated that the rocks which are the source of this oil, namely, the Devonian strata, are the surface rocks of about 150,000 square miles of the lower Mackenzie Basin, while in the southern part they extend under a larger area of younger rocks, so that their total area covers not less than 300,000 square miles. The future as regards oil, therefore, is full of promise and cannot easily be estimated at its full value. The region is believed to be one of the largest areas of possible oil-bearing country yet unexplored on the face of the earth, and it is to the exploitation of the oil resources that we look for the greatest development in the basin of Mackenzie River. This must come within comparatively few years; for the oil reserves of the United States are estimated by the United States Geological Survey to be sufficient at the present rate of output for only about thirty years.

There, he says, is the largest undeveloped oil field in the world, right in our own country, in a district where there is no population. The climate is salubrious. Men can live and are living out in the valleys of that country the year round. It is a country well watered with plenty of rivers and lakes. How can we reach it? We can reach it by means of the aeroplane. Before I touch on that, let me say that in that vast northern country there are two of the largest rivers in Canada, the Mackenzie river and the Yukon. What I would ask the Government to do is this, namely, to purchase or have the British Government give them an airship. I am not speaking now of the aeroplane, I am speaking of the lighter-than-air machine, known as the dirigible. In this northern country there are the vast valleys, the Yukon and the Mackenzie, sparsely populated, capable of being highly developed, but they lack transportation for about seven months in the year. I would suggest that the Government get an airship, base it on Edmonton, sail it down the Mackenzie river valley to the Arctic ocean, across to Dawson, up the Yukon valley to White Horse, across the northern part of British Columbia and back to Edmonton. Perhaps you, Sir, and the hon. members here think that is a chimerical dream. Well, if you do, you are just about four laps behind the times, and I do not think you are. Has this been done? Are other people using airships and aeroplanes? The Prime Minister of Great Britain regularly goes to and returns from the Peace Conference in Paris in an aeroplane. So does Mr. Bonar Law, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. So do several of the other British statesmen who are attending that conference. I hold in my hands an extract from the New York Times of February 20, referring to an airship which the British people made, known as the R-33. If you will give me your attention, Sir, I will just quote very briefly:

> The R-33 will be fitted with five engines of 1250 horse power in combination, and she will have a carrying capacity of from 27 to 30 tons, which would allow accommodations for a crew of twenty or more men.
>
> Additional safety has been assured to the lighter-than-air ship by the development of a non-inflammable gas (helium) of which the United States possesses almost limitless natural resources.
> Under way the R-33 will have a displacement of 2,750,000 cubic feet, a speed of about seventy knots, and a range of well over 200 hours, or safely across the Atlantic and return in any weather except the worst storms.

Could the R-33 navigate the Yukon and the Mackenzie valley? Let us see. From Edmonton to Herschell island at the mouth of the Mackenzie, is 1,300 miles. The R-33 could do it in fifteen hours. She could make Dawson from there in about six hours, and from Dawson to Edmonton she would come back in about eighteen hours.

In 1897, when the Edmonton route to the Klondike was boomed throughout the length and breadth of this country, scores of people left the old route and went by that route to Klondike. How long, Sir, do you suppose it took to go from Edmonton to Dawson by that route? Just eighteen months. The R-33 will do it in eighteen hours. There are on the Mackenzie river Hudson Bay forts which have been operating for over a hundred years, perhaps a hundred and fifty years, forts that are to-day far removed from civilization except for a very short time in the summer. There are: Fort Chippewyan which this airship could make from Edmonton in six hours; Fort Reliance, five hundred miles down the Mackenzie, which she could make in eight hours; Fort Simpson, where the Liard river joins the Mackenzie, seven hundred miles, which she could make in ten hours; Fort Norman, on the Mackenzie, 900 miles, which she could make in thirteen hours; Fort Goodhope, 1,100 miles, which she could make in sixteen hours, and Fort McPherson, 1,300 miles, which she could make in nineteen hours. What a blessing it would be for these people who are struggling in their cabins along the banks of the Mackenzie river, trying to uphold our methods of civilization, having to transport their supplies for long distances over snow and ice through many months in the year. This ship could operate the year round. There are few storms in that country and it is not very cold. It would be an enormous blessing to that country and to the country which I have the honour to represent, namely, the Yukon. This would not be a costly experiment compared with the building of a railway, and we have more than once mortgaged the future of Canada to give our country transportation. I commend this proposition to the Government and I hope they will favourably consider it.

There is, however, another means by which we can develop the other part of this section of the country that is between Hudson bay and the Mackenzie river valley. In that country, if the geologists are right, it is more than probable that there are other Cobalts and other Porcupines and other Klondikes. What does that mean? It means that if we can find another Cobalt in that country, we can enhance the value of the world's metal by just $200,000,000. If we can find another Klondike in that vast country, it will enhance the world's wealth by $200,000,000 more. These are not dreams at all. I am speaking of absolute facts. The Cobalt district has produced about $200,000,000 in silver. Klondike, I know, has produced about $200,000,000 in gold, and Porcupine is producing a very large amount of money every year. Camsell, in his report, speaks of the difficulty of getting into this vast country, how it is almost impossible to get into it in the summer and get out again and do any work. One can easily understand how that is the case. Can we assist in developing that country by giving transportation? I believe we can. How? By using the aeroplane. I do not need to argue here, I take it that the aeroplane has been demonstrated as being a method of transportation. Aeroplanes travel to-day from London, Great Britain, to Calcutta, in India. They have made the trip more than once. Aeroplanes are used in Europe in very many ways. They are being improved all the time. And when I tell the House that the Prime Minister of Great Britain uses this method of transportation to go to the Peace Conference at Paris, it may be taken as being a fairly safe method of transporting the people from one point to another. What can we do? We have here in Ottawa a number of trained, scientific men whose business it is to make a geological examination of the hinterland of Canada. My suggestion to the Government is this—and when I make this suggestion I am not suggesting something that is impracticable. I do not believe that our men who are coming back will require or expect any coddling. What I believe they have a right to expect is an opportunity to develop the individual initiative which has made this Empire great and which is one of the best assets we have. If we can open up new avenues of employment, new countries to exploit and develop, we can help our men better than by doing anything else. I would suggest that the Government should get some aeroplanes. We are already getting them; we are getting them from the British Government. I saw a report stating that fifteen aeroplanes had been given the other day by the British Government to Sir George Perley. Have we men to operate these aeroplanes? What did our Canadian boys do in this war? They developed the highest type of air men that the world has so far seen. Our own boys who flew those air machines and did such magnificent work with our army in France and Flanders, are coming home and being demobilized. Is there any work in this country for them to do? Is it possible to have some air work for them to do? It is; at least a few of them might be employed in this work. We have the airplanes, the trained airmen and the trained miners, who could go into this land and find out whether these minerals are there or not. It would not require a large expenditure of money. But if these geologists and scientists will go into that country and tell us that it has possibilities of silver, cobalt, copper or gold, then we have the adventurous population who will follow. The scientists could by airplanes be taken from almost any part of the northland into the very heart of this country in a few hours, and they could stay there through the summer and come out in the fall. There need be no fear of a lack of landing places. The country abounds in lakes and rivers and an airplane could land on a river or lake almost anywhere. I have talked with men who have been over this country and I know that it would be possible to go in there in the spring before the ice had melted, and if the airplane was provided with skids a landing place could be made on the lakes. The machines could have both wheels and skids, to be used as occasion required. Canada was a pioneer in the business of airplanes. You will recall, Sir, that long before the air machine was brought to perfection, in the country from which the hon. leader of the Opposition comes, two men were flying their machines over Baddeck county—Graham Bell and Baldwin. It seems to me too bad to allow an opportunity such as this to go by without making the best possible use of it. The geologists could survey this vast tract of land and examine the rocks, the oil experts could find out whether there was any oil there or not, and there should also accompany them naturalists to examine the flora and fauna of the country. Immense herds of caribou roam over that northland. I have seen caribou by the hundreds of thousands up there. Only last year a herd of caribou crossed the Yukon river and took three days to pass a given point. Hon. gentlemen within sound of my voice to-night would hardly credit the size of the vast herds that roam over those regions. It is possible that there is a source of food which could be tapped; the food could be transported and conserved. I am not advocating that as a positive proposal, but I do know that we have men in our employ who could go in and look over these herds of caribou and report to us on the possibility of using them as a food supply. One of our explorers who recently returned from the north reports having seen enormous numbers of musk-oxen. The flesh of the mush-ox is almost equal to that of a cow, and the milk of the musk-cow is almost equal to goat's milk. If that is so, there is a source of food supply which we have not yet tapped.

The science of airplane photography has been enormously developed during the past few years so that now an airplane can fly over a city and mark off every street and avenue so that it could be identified, just as was done during the war in France. It is no trick at all to take aerial photographs of this vast area up north and have maps made, so that there would be no difficulty in knowing just where the lakes and rivers were. There are no mountains there, it being practically a level country.

There is another matter. I have here a dispatch from Winnipeg, under yesterday's date, published in the Montreal Gazette, to the effect that the Legislature of Manitoba has passed a unanimous resolution asking this Parliament to finish the Hudson Bay railway. Premier Norris takes some pride in pointing out that from now on Manitoba will be a maritime province, having in mind Hudson bay, which is in the province of Manitoba. Explorers who have been up north report tremendous ice floes in the Hudson strait. We have spent millions of dollars to build the road to Hudson bay, and for what purpose? So that we can get our wheat out by that route into the North Atlantic and across to Liverpool. Why not have some of our trained airmen patrol the Hudson bay and report on ice and weather conditions in the straits for the benefit of steamers using that route? An air station should be established on the Hudson bay and the airplanes could communicate by wireless with the station. This is not an impracticable proposition; it is just applied common sense. I submit these suggestions to the Government, because they are ways in which we can help our returned soldiers to help themselves, and that is what I believe in. Some may object that the weather conditions would be too severe, that the cold would be too intense. I have not the facts, but I have not the slightest doubt that the airman who could stand the cold at an altitude of from twenty-five to thirty thousand feet, as they did in Europe, would find that temperature colder than anything to be found in the Klondyke, or anything found by Nansen on his trip to the North Pole.

We have the machines, we have the men, and more than that, we have a police force in this country that can help put this scheme into operation—the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, in whose ranks are many flyers. If the Government will not consider my proposal with regard to that north country favourably I urge them to use airplanes in connection with the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I have figures here showing how much it costs for transport from Vancouver through Behring strait into the Arctic ocean for the police force at Herschell island. Another station is shortly to be established at Bathurst inlet. This force polices the whole of that vast territory. There are few stations at present, but the number is gradually increasing. We could carry the men to their posts and back, and their supplies, at a very small cost, and give them regular and continuous means of communication. The men who are up around the Behring sea and strait discovered such a rich store of copper at Coronation gulf that when they reported the find to the Government that district was retired from entry. It is a vast empire in itself and contains tons of copper ore, which I am told is similar to the ore found in the great copper fields of Michigan. I am quoting absolute facts. I have seen the ore and have talked with the men who have been up there. Surely it is not good business or good government to leave that ore undeveloped up there. We could send scientists in there by airplane to explore that vast territory.

I do not doubt that we are now within a few months, perhaps within a few weeks—yes, it may be, even within a few days—of the accomplishment of a trans-Atlantic flight by airship. The Daily Mail of London has put up a prize of £10,000 for the first man who makes a trans-Atlantic flight. There is a Swede in Bayonne, N.J., who is practising now with an airship with which he expects to make the flight by way of Newfoundland and across the Atlantic. The American Government have made an appropriation to provide the materials and build a ship for trans-Atlantic flight. There is not a doubt in my mind that this year, and perhaps within a few weeks, we shall have airships crossing the Atlantic. And they will not stop at that, they will fly across Canada, to Siberia, to China, to Japan. Now, Canada is on this great highway of aerial commerce which is about to be made, because Canada is nearer to Europe than the United States or any other country south to Patagonia, and nearer also to Asia than any other American country. I firmly believe that air routes will be outlined and that airships will fly across the North Atlantic, across the North American continent, across the North Pacific, and that the route they will take to Siberia, China and Japan will be practically the same route—but a little further north—that ships are taking to-day. And why? Because the northern route is the shorter route. Why did the old Spanish merchant ships going to Manilla sight the Aleutian islands? Because that was the shortest route. These airships will cross the very section of country to which I am asking the Government to afford transport facilities. They will seek the line of the mountain range where the winds are not great; they will cross the great section of this country between the Alleghenies and the Rockies, this great central plain, they will sail across to the Rockies, north along that great chain and down the Yukon valley and across over the Aleutian islands and thence by way of Siberia and China to Japan. And on this route from the mainland of America to Yokohama, there is not a section of more than 150 miles, perhaps not more than 100 miles, over which they will have to fly over water.

Why should we do all this that I am asking? Because, Mr. Speaker, we are a progressive people who have led the world in great enterprises. The first ship that crossed the North Atlantic was built by Samuel Cunard, of Halifax, Nova Scotia after whom the great Cunard line was named and through whose genius that great transportation system was developed. In the old House of Commons you will still find the brass plate near the Library which gives the history of the first ship that crossed the Atlantic under her own steam —a Canadian ship. When my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) was Minister of Finance he did a notable thing. Senor Marconi came to America and tried to get the Newfoundland Government to assist him in erecting a wireless station. But the Newfoundland Government could not do as he requested because of a contract which had been made by them with a cable company, the name of which I have for the moment forgotten. Marconi came to Cape Breton. An officer of the Canadian Government, a member of the staff of the Post Office Department, Mr. William Smith, happened to be in St. John's, Newfoundland. He heard of Marconi's invention and of the difficulty that existed because of the contract with the cable company. He was enterprising and far-seeing enough to write to a gentleman here who told the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens about the matter. That hon. gentleman himself wrote and told Mr. Smith that the Government of Canada would be willing to assist Marconi. Marconi came to Ottawa. the Government did assist him with a grant, with conditions attached that the Canadian people should be given low wireless rates for a certain length of time. The result was that Marconi towers were erected at Glace Bay and the wireless system became a fact—and perhaps there are few greater boons to the human race. To-day Canada has perhaps the finest wireless system in the world. And that reminds me that, under the scheme I am advocating, we could take the wireless plants that are being dismantled because of the cessation of war and place them at Hudson's Bay ports and other places in the north for the assistance of the enterprise.

Is there any other great enterprise in which we led the world? We built the first transcontinental road on this continent. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the first railway which connected tide-water on the Atlantic with tide-water on the Pacific, the first which ran from coast to coast, was built by the Canadian people, by the Canadian Government, namely the Canadian Pacific. There was no complete transcontinental road in the United States at that time—I do not know even that there is one to-day, and we have three of them.

We have never yet gone into any of these far-reaching enterprises without our action being justified by the result. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, that the great nickel and copper deposits of the Sudbury region were discovered by the engineers and contractors who built the Canadian Pacific railway. It was the building of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway which made known the great mineral deposits of Cobalt and that whole region. That road was not built with a view to opening up a mineral country, but was built to reach farm land in the northern portion of the Lake Temiskaming country. The same is true of the Porcupine and other great mineral fields opened in Northern Ontario. The sending of a squadron of Northwest Mounted Police to the Klondike, before it was discovered or heard of, helped very largely in the discovery of the Klondike which resulted in giving $200,000,000 of wealth to the world.

Is there anything else in which we led the world? Yes, we were the first people in the British Empire to federate great states, when we created the Dominion of Canada and thus established the model upon which every federation in the Empire has been moulded. Seeing, then, that we have the genius, that we have the country, that we have the people, I trust that this Government, in its wisdom, will see fit to consider some of the suggestions I have made. If they do, I promise you, Mr. Speaker, I promise the Government and the people of Canada, that it will be the sowing of fruitful seed which will yield a hundredfold.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, on rising to address the House for the first time during the present session, my first word must be of deep regret at the loss of our great and beloved leader. And I cannot resist the impulse to extend my thanks, as one of the humble followers of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to the many hon. members on both sides of this House who have spoken in terms of eulogy of the life, character and achievements of that great Canadian. I must mention first, and with special appreciation the remarks of the acting leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) on the second day of the present session.

I also express thanks to two other hon. members on this side of the House. I must more particularly express my sincere thanks and appreciation for the eulogy pronounced yesterday by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) in the speech delivered by him and in which the expressions of admiration and esteem for our revered leader reached a higher plane than has ever been attained in this House before. These remarks came from one who had been educated in the school of that great British statesman, Gladstone, who had dwelt with him in the city of London, who had heard him on many occasions and whose privilege it had been to listen to speeches delivered by him which had not only astounded his auditors but the whole world. I esteem particularly his likening of that great British statesman to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have always believed that it was the ambition of our Canadian statesman to follow in the steps of such a great British statesman as Gladstone. On many occasions when I desired to impress upon my people in New Brunswick the talents and position of our great leader I have deemed it appropriate to compare him to some of the great British statesmen and I have often designated him the Gladstone of Canada.

Being left in bereavement and without a leader at the opening of this House, the first duty of the Opposition was to look for another leader, either permanent or temporary. It having been decided by the Liberal party in this House that the choice of a permanent leader should be left to the consideration of a Liberal Convention to be held as soon as possible, the choice has been made, I believe, for the time being, of a member of this House and of the Liberal party well known to every hon. member on both sides and well known not only in his native province of Nova Scotia but throughout the other provinces of Canada. He is known as a result of the long years which he has given to his people in this Parliament, by his standing as a lawyer, by the ability with which he discharged the duties that devolved upon him while occupying a seat on the Bench and many other admirable qualities which make him most acceptable not only to the Liberal party in this House but, I am sure, to the Liberal party throughout Canada. He also possesses qualities, combined with his experience, which may be of great benefit to the Liberal party, and to Canada at any moment. The hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) comes from a district where miners and steel workers are employed by the thousands in the great industries to be found in Cape Breton. His experience, as well as the place which he occupies in the confidence of those who know him best, give him the necessary qualifications to play an effective and useful part in the settlement of labour problems which this Parliament may have to solve before its prorogation. Therefore, he is well qualified for the position of leader of the Opposition in this House. The will of his people has guided every step of his career. He is an inhabitant of the ancient province of Nova Scotia where the spirit of justice, liberty and harmony still prevails as it did in the days of Haliburton and Joseph Howe. He is imbued with that sense of British fair play and justice which he has displayed on every occasion in this Parliament.

Coming back to the debate on the Address, I cannot help but extend my sincere congratulations to the hon. the mover (Mr. Redman) and the hon. the seconder (Mr. Manion) of the Address. They are not in the House at this moment but I would point out that they have followed a direction new in this Parliament. They have not confined themselves to the old system by which it was considered the duty of the mover and seconder of the Address to speak to the House merely as supporters of the Government of the day. They have in noble language spoken to us of the war and of the heroism, energy and valour of our Canadian soldiers. They have told us of the duty we owe to the returned soldier not only in the matter of increased pensions but in many other respects. I acknowledge the indebtedness of the House to them for the very admirable addresses with which they favoured the House in moving and seconding the motion.

Speaking of the valour of the Canadian soldier, I may say that he has not only done his duty but he has shown a spirit which elicited the admiration of every nation engaged in the war. He has won the respect and esteem not only of Canada but of the British Empire and the Allies by his valour and courage. At the very first of the war, on that great and critical occasion at the battle of Langemarck the Canadian soldiers displayed a superhuman courage and valour but for which the day would have been lost. With the knowledge that there was no possibility of reinforcements reaching them, rather than retreat they fought with splendid courage, the bodies of their dead comrades were used as a rampart against the enemy and whilst the souls of those who had fallen rose to heaven their surviving comrades rallied nobly, stopped the advance of the Hun to Calais and thus saved the Empire. In a great many other hard fought battles they distinguished themselves and brought glory to their native land. At St. Julien, St. Eloi and elsewhere their gallantry and courage brought victory to the Allies and on every occasion the Canadian soldier acquitted himself in such a way as to win the admiration of the civilized world. It remains for the Canadian people to show their gratitude to every one of those returned soldiers who fought for liberty, right and justice, for democracy and against autocracy.

Sir, I wish to be brief in my remarks with respect to the matters referred to in the speech from the Throne. The representatives of the allied nations, including the representatives of the British Dominions, are to-day assembled endeavouring to frame a treaty which we hope will ensure permanent peace to the world. Not only will that congress determine the amount of damages to be paid to the allied countries, but it will be its duty also to endeavour to see that we shall have peace for all time. Not only will that congress fix the indemnities to be paid, but it will endeavour to see that the German people shall divert the trend of the education of its youth from the muddied channel of arrogance, autocracy and Prussianism, to the limpid stream of fraternity and democracy, in the hope that that nation, after sincere repentance and enlightenment, will be able ultimately to join in the League of Nations and help to make the world immune from future wars. So long as Germany educates its youth along the lines which it has followed during so many years, so long will it remain a menace to the world, and the rest of the nations would have to continue the maintenance of armaments, a thing which we would all deplore, and which it is certainly one of the chief aims of the League of Nations to put an end to.

I desire now to discuss more particularly the tariff question, and I am glad to see the Minister of Immigration and Colonization in his seat. That hon. gentleman the other day delivered a very remarkable speech, marked by some brilliant and patriotic features in discussing the intentions of the Government with respect to the returned soldier. But when my hon. friend came to consider the tariff question, he dropped to a lower level. In his opinion at the present time, when demobilization, reconstruction and re-establishment policies call for attention, we ought not to discuss the tariff question, but leave it in abeyance for some future time. Sir, in my humble judgment, the Government should have dealt with the tariff question from the very first; but instead of that it pursued a policy of delay, and now calls upon us to wait a while longer. In my opinion, the very moment the armistice was signed the Government should have called Parliament together with a view to taking some action on this important question, which is the very foundation of our national prosperity, and yet even to-day we are not to see any action taken because of peace time conditions. My hon. friend declared the other day that he was now, and intended to remain, a Liberal. I believe I know my hon. friend as well as any member in this House, and I can bear testimony to his strong Liberal beliefs. I think he is still a Liberal, and I hope he will remain in that frame of mind, not so much from motives of expediency, but with a view to the application of Liberal principles in this great Canada of ours. Let me tell my hon. friend that the question of the tariff is the great overpowering question that a true Liberal of the English school should bear in mind, and therefore we cannot leave unconsidered the matter of tariff legislation, more particularly as we are in the transitionary period between war conditions and peace conditions. In my opinion, no reconstruction policy can bring this country safely from war conditions to peace conditions unless it is based on the economic principles held by the Liberal party. My hon. friend's uncertainty of mind on this subject is perhaps due to his failure up to now to convince his supporters on the Government side, and he, therefore, wishes more time to convince them. I maintain, Sir, that we cannot wait any longer. The people expected the Government to take action three or four years since, and not wait as it has done, and yet in the matter of the tariff it to-day appeals for further delay. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) yesterday gave the Government credit for having given a certain degree of reciprocity in the shape of free wheat and free potatoes. For six years my hon. friend had been lamenting the defeat of reciprocity and the loss of the advantage that would have resulted to the country had that policy been carried out. The same eloquent gentleman spoke of the efforts which he had been making for three years or so to induce the Government to have recourse to an income tax, and yet, after it has been so long urged when it comes to be introduced it is made as light as possible. But why stop there? My hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization always advocated Liberal principles until the day he joined the Union Government. I presume he entered the Cabinet from motives of conscience, and as to that I have nothing to say, but we on this side of the House also have a conscience which would not honestly permit us to cast in our lot with them. Instead of that we have remained true to our principles, to our policy, and to our revered leader. My hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, in giving a reason for postponing the consideration of the tariff question, said, in eloquent terms: "There is a cleavage between the East and the West'.'

I think I can convince my hon. friends that there is no cleavage between the East and the West; that the policy of the West is the policy of the East; that the people of the Maritime Provinces are in harmony with the people of the West in demanding that the principles embodied in the reciprocity pact of 1911 be re-affirmed by this Parliament. The whole population of the Maritime Provinces is in favour of that pact to-day, as it was in 1911. The province of Quebec also is in favour of the reciprocity pact now, as it was at that time. If there is a cleavage it is between the people of Canada and a few financiers of Ontario and Toronto. To prove that the people of the East are in harmony with the people of the West in this matter, I have only to direct attention to a number of resolutions which have been adopted in the Legislature of Saskatchewan, a body which only a few months ago the Minister of Immigration and Colonization adorned with his talent and his ability, as he had done for twelve or fifteen years. There he made fame for himself, and was often justly extolled by the people of his province for his advocacy of the true principles of Liberalism. I will read that portion of these resolutions which relates to the general interests of the country, leaving aside that which is of particular interest only to the province. These resolutions are in the form of a petition to the Dominion Government and were adopted unanimously in the Legislature of Saskatchewan, being supported alike by Liberals and Conservatives. The resolutions read:—

The immediate adoption by the Federal Government of an efficient policy of soldiers' settlement which will ensure the immediate settlement of as great a number as possible of our returned soldiers upon lands in Saskatchewan within reasonable proximity of railway facilities and community centres.

An immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff.

The reduction of the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual uniform reductions be made of the remaining tariffs on British imports that will ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

The acceptance by the Parliament of Canada of the reciprocity agreement of 1911, which still remains on the United States statute books.

The placing upon the free list of all foodstuffs not included in the reciprocity agreement.

The placing upon the free list of all agricultural implements, farm machinery, vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, illuminating fuel and lubricating oils and all raw materials and machinery used in their manufacture.

The immediate extension to Great Britain of all tariff concessions granted to other countries.

This is the view of the Legislature of Saskatchewan; indeed, of the whole of the people of that province. Only last Tuesday the sentiments expressed in these resolutions were adopted in almost the same words by the Legislature of Manitoba, where they were approved by every Conservative as well as every Liberal member of the legislature. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization knows that at many conventions of farmers and grain growers in Alberta the same sentiments have been expressed. The people of the three prairie provinces are one in their demand for the restoration of the reciprocity treaty. Had not the American Congress and Senate given Canada free lumber in 1913 the lumber industry in New Brunswick would have become bankrupt at that time and would have remained so ever since. In expressing these views I am sure that I voice the sentiment of the people of the Maritime Provinces, including members representing those provinces in this House. I know that these views are shared by the leader of the Opposition as well as by every other member from the Maritime Provinces and Quebec. I need not say that they are entertained by my most esteemed friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Hon. Mr. Fielding), who was a minister of the Crown at the time this reciprocity agreement was entered into in 1911. Fortunately, the motto "No truck or trade with the Yankees" was not adopted by the Mother Country. If the Mother Country had taken the same position as that adopted by the Conservatives in 1911 and lacked consideration for the great nation to the south of us, where would we have been in this war?

Of course, these resolutions of the Legislature of Saskatchewan at once attracted the attention of the manufacturers of Ontario, and immediately, through the organ of the President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, they issued a statement of their position with regard to the matters dealt with in the resolutions. In their judgment the time had not come to consider the question of the tariff; it should be left over to the future. Here is what, on January 28, through their president, they say of these resolutions:—

> Therefore, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association believes that the country should concentrate on the one main problem, with its attendant questions, and leave the highly controversial problem of tariff revision to a time when it can be given the undivided attention it demands.

Of course, it demands attention. They give this reason why it demands attention:

> It is a general and familiar law, that in any country, when fundamental tariff changes are anticipated, trade depression follows. During such periods of uncertainty, investment is curtailed, enterprise is limited, commerce lives from hand to mouth, consumers buy sparingly, and building languishes.

If it is a general and familiar law that when tariff changes are anticipated, trade depression follows, we should make haste and have the tariff revision made at once before trade depression takes place in this country. Now is the time to act. If we put the agricultural industry on a good footing, we shall be able to look after the returned soldiers. Agriculture is the basic industry of Canada. We want to send the returned soldiers to the land. One hundred and fifty thousand of them have expressed their willingness and their intention to go onto the land on their return. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) will, perhaps, tell me that the Government are going to be very generous to the returned soldier; that they will advance him a certain amount of money to pay for the land he needs and also money to buy the implements he requires. At the same time, the soldier who wants to go onto the land, wants to see ahead of him a future livelihood. If the Government advance him money, he will have to make good every year the interest on that amount together with the annual instalment he will be called upon to pay. If he is discouraged and cannot meet his interest and instalments, his loan is bound to be forfeited. Unless he sees that he is really encouraged and gets everything he needs at the lowest possible price, he will certainly not go on to the land; or if he does, and is not able to get on, his land will be forfeited and will not be handed over to any returned soldier, but will likely go to some speculator in the West who is waiting for such opportunities. The time is most opportune for immediate revision of the tariff. The manufacturers of this country have, during the four years of this war, accumulated immense wealth through the tremendous profits on their operations. They are to-day in a better position than they have ever been before. They have to-day millions of dollars in the banks awaiting investment. They have millions of dollars worth of Victory Bonds at five and a half per cent interest, free of taxation. They are, therefore, in a position to face the situation to-day. They are in a position, not only to accept the situation, but to help the people of Canada and also to help the farmer to get what he wants so that he may increase the quantity of land under cultivation in this great country of ours. To-day, when I say that the East is in harmony with the West in their claim for reciprocity with the United States, for free agricultural implements, and for having other articles put on the free list, it is because in the Maritime Provinces, as well as in Quebec, a new impetus has been given by the war to the industry of agriculture. Agriculture has doubled its production during the last four and a half years, and everyone of our farmers, with his son coming back from the war, is looking for the moment when he will again be able to increase his production. But to be able to do so he must be given every one of his implements at the lowest possible cost.

We have been informed by the acting leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) that the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) contemplates spending during the coming year $35,000,000 on railway rolling stock and steel rails; $20,000,000 on railway extensions, and $10,000,000 on betterments. We have also been told that $25,000,000 are to be spent on housing. This makes a total of over $80,000,000 which will be spent on railroads and housing in Canada and which will give a new impetus to the industries which our manufacturers are well prepared to take in hand. Now is the time for the Government to act. The problem of the returned soldier must be solved. In my county there are several soldiers waiting to get land somewhere in the county or in the province to which they belong. Owing to the still indefinite state of affairs, we have not been able to locate any of them and they are still waiting. After a few months it will be too late; a year will be again lost for the farmers in the West as well as for the farmers in the East. Therefore, I repeat that now is the time for the Government to take the matter into consideration.

It is true that a compromise is asked for by the manufacturers. They are willing to compromise and they will, perhaps, be satisfied with the elimination of the war surtax imposed by the Government at the beginning of the war on all importations including raw material. It was my lot at the time, amongst other members of the Opposition, to oppose as strongly as possible the imposition of a surtax of 5 per cent against products coming from Great Britian and 7½ per cent on products coming from other countries. The manufacturers will accept the elimination of that war surtax which will give them the raw material. I see in that no great advantage to the producer or the farmer, for I was opposed at the time to the taxation of raw material just because it was hampering external trade, which was of first necessity, more particularly in war time and just now, and because it would also have the effect, with the maintenance of the tariff, of permitting the manufacturer to have the advantage of the elimination of the tax on raw material without giving the Canadian consumer the benefit of it. As long as there is a duty on goods manufactured from imported raw material such as woollen, or linen, or leather goods, the manufacturer will raise his price in accordance with the duty. There would, therefore, be no benefit to the consumer.

There was an offer of compromise with respect to another matter by an hon. member to whose speech I listened with great attention. He suggested that we should have a tariff commission, and I was amazed at his suggestion. Surely, we have had commissions enough during the war. For the last four years we have been governed by Orders in Council and by commissions. The Government would take away from Parliament all of its responsibility. A tariff commission would take a year or two to take evidence from the friends of the manufacturers and the protectionists before it would make a report. During all that time the consumers of the country would have to wait. If there is one thing which should be left to Parliament, according to all British traditions, it is the tariff, which has a bearing on the happiness or otherwise of all the people. I certainly hope the Government will not entertain the suggestion for a Tariff Commission. I would urge my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) to take the tariff question in hand at once, and if he can possibly succeed in bringing his supporters round to the Liberal policy on that question I shall give him great credit for it. I would also ask the Minister of Immigration and Colonization to take up with his colleagues another matter of vital interest to this country—the War-Time Elections Act. To my mind that Act should be wiped off the Statute Books at once and if there is one member of the Government who should initiate a movement in that direction among his colleagues it is the Minister of Immigration. He comes from a province where for long years he has enjoyed the confidence of the people who have come to this country at his own invitation and enjoyed the freedom of Canadian citizenship, who, according to his own testimony, have been loyal citizens of Canada and have voted for him every time he offered himself for election in the province of Saskatchewan. Will he go back to those people and tell them that he is going to keep on the Statute Book the War-Time Elections Act which disfranchises good, honest citizens who came here years ago? Will he tell them they shall no longer have the freedom of the country to which they are entitled? Speaking of this Act on September 11, 1917, just one month before he joined the Union Government, my old esteemed colleague from the province of New Brunswick, now Minister of Public Works, said: "I cannot understand the Government thinking that a Bill of this revolutionary character, which violates every principle of that British fair play which we have bragged about in this country ever since I was a boy, is going to be railroaded through Parliament." That is the way he characterized the Act. I would ask these two hon. members to get their heads together and when they are in Councils to-morrow ask their colleagues to delay no longer but to bring down on Monday afternoon a simple Bill repealing the War-Time Elections Act.

There is another question on which I shall say only a word or two, and that is the question of assistance in the building of highways. We are very pleased that the Government is going to assist the provincial governments in the building of roads, but we on this side of the House wish to put the Government on their guard, as we did a few years before the war when the Government introduced a Bill with similar objects but which encroached on provincial rights. On that occasion we on this side of the House, and particularly my hon. friend the present Minister of Public Works objected to the method under which this money was to be spent. If there was one gentleman who had strong views on that subject it was the present Minister of Immigration and Colonization who, at that time, had a resolution passed in the Saskatchewan Legislature upholding provincial rights and declaring he would not accept any money for the improvement of highways under the terms laid down by the Federal Government. I ask him to see that in the framing of the Bill there will be no encroachment this time on provincial rights. I do not object to there being an understanding between the engineers of the local Governments and the Federal Government, but there should be no pressure brought to bear on the provinces in the expenditure of this money.

While the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) is here, I shall take the liberty of drawing his attention to one or two matters which I have been asked to bring before him. I understand that there is a small number of printers, pressmen, feeders and compositors working in the Militia Department for a pittance which, according to my informant, is not worthy of the department. Sixteen of those men are working at a salary of $66.75 per month, working 42 hours per week, and receiving no extra pay for overtime, although they are often called upon to work overtime on Sundays. I do not know the facts myself but I have every reason to believe that the information given me is correct. I might say that the stenographers in the Separation Allowance and Assigned Pay Branch also make the same complaint of long hours and inadequate pay.

They have to work long hours at rates of pay not adequate to the service rendered. I know that the Minister of Militia will inquire into these matters, and if he finds my statements to be correct, I am sure he will give consideration to these deserving officials.

I close my present remarks with the hope that the result of this war may be to bring lasting peace and harmony among the nations of the world. And may that harmony be reflected in the relation between the various nationalities in this Canada of ours. We all share the same sentiments, a love of democracy, of freedom and justice, and I trust that, having these glorious ideals in common we shall be united in our appreciation of one another's efforts to carry them into practice.

On the motion of Major General Mewburn, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Burrell the House adjourned at 10.48 p.m.

Monday, March 10, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Volume 3 of the Auditor General's Report for the year ended March 31, 1918.—Sir Thomas White.

Order in Council appointing the Minister of Railways and Canals Receiver for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway System.—Sir Thomas White.

Orders in Council respecting pay and allowances to ex-soldiers receiving treatment and training under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.—Mr. Hugh Clark.

Orders in Council respecting pensions.—Mr. Hugh Clark.

Ninth Annual Report of the Commission of Conservation, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING BUREAU.

STRIKE OF PRESSMEN—STATEMENT BY HON. MR. BURRELL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I would like to ask the Secretary of State if he has any information to communicate to the House in regard to the strike in the Printing Bureau and if he would tell us what progress is being made towards a settlement. I would also ask him if he would be good enough to lay upon the table of the House the report that I understand was made to the department by the men.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Secretary of State): The report made by the committee has already been laid on the Table. I have received no report from the men, although I understood that some report was to be made. As this is a matter of some public importance, perhaps I may be allowed briefly to explain the situation as it stands. The Bureau employees consist altogether of about twelve hundred. Of these the pressmen, comprising roughly about one hundred, have struck. The Act of Parliament lays down that current wages paid in commercial establishments shall form the basis of pay for similar work within the Printing Bureau, and it says: " For better guidance, the cities of Toronto and Montreal shall be taken, and those rates shall not be exceeded." The Act does not say that the highest amount payable in either Montreal or Toronto or in both of them may be taken, and the custom has been to take the average rate between Toronto and Montreal in commercial establishments. I might also state that the outside firms embody their rates in agreements which are entered into between the employers and the men. The present agreement, for instance, running until June 1, next. I might also point out that some outside firms, notwithstanding the fact that they lay down a rate to be followed in regard to the wages to be paid to the various services in their establishments, exceed that rate in the case of especially skilled workmen and in respect of various trades in those establishments. It has been contended by the Bureau employees that in fixing the rates for the Bureau, this excess rate for efficient employees in various outside establishments should be taken into consideration in applying a flat rate to all the employees in the Bureau. This, of course notwitstanding the fact, which will not be denied by any one, either employers or men, that the efficiency of the Bureau is away below the efficiency of outside establishments. Indeed, the committee itself says that work in outside establishments is from ten to fifty per cent better than work in the Printing Bureau and the cost of production in the Bureau is unquestionably greater.

As the agreements were to expire next June and fresh agreements were to be made, and as we would then have to adjust the rates, it seemed best to the Government to leave all questions in dispute until those agreements expired and fresh ones were made. The question of a bonus also came up. As hon. members in this House know, the Civil Service were being given certain bonuses. It was thought by the Government—and I do not think it will be disputed by any one—that as a matter of fact or right, the mechanical forces of the Bureau, which were paid according to outside schedules, could manifestly not participate in the advantages of an Inside Service, and that the bonus would not apply to them. But as some outside firms had paid a bonus, and as these differences of opinion did obtain amongst the Bureau employees and the minister, we concluded to pay a bonus, and accordingly a bonus of $2 a week was given to all the men in the mechanical forces and one dollar a week to the women in the bindery establishment. This applied to all of them and left the weekly pay received by the Bureau employees unquestionably somewhat higher than the average weekly pay received in all outside establishments. Moreover, this does not take into consideration, what the committee took into consideration, namely the question of holidays, for which they are paid $112 a year or $2 a week more, when outside establishments are not. This is all set forth in the committee's report. And whatever differences of opinion there might be in the employees' minds or in the mind of any hon. member in this House as to the accuracy of the various details of this report, I do not think that the substantial accuracy of this report will be disputed. and I think no member of this House will dispute that the closing words of the report must be accepted by all. They are:

> We are firmly of the opinion that if our recommendations, arriving at a greatly reduced wage cost through the elimination of unnecessary labour and higher standards of efficiency are not adopted, the only recourse in the public interest is to close the Bureau.

In view of this report and in view of the obvious necessity of some reorganization of a government department which is running in this way, it was thought that as during this fiscal year anyway the Government Bureau employees, were in regard to their total weekly receipts, whether you call that bonus or wages, placed in certainly as good, if not in a better position, than all outside employees, they might very well wait until this report was considered before any increase of wages or new schedules in regard to hours were taken up. That was our position. That position was practically stated to the employees, that the matter should rest, as they were provided for fully, until the dispute was adjusted later on and the report was considered. I think it is the wish of the Government, as I am sure it is the wish of the members of this House that nothing less than justice should be done to the employees, common justice to the ratepayers of this country being kept in view. In the face of that report and my letter to the mechanical department that the matter should be allowed to stand until the Government could consider the report, the pressmen, numbering about 101, have struck, while the rest of the mechanical forces have not struck.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: May I preface a question that I desire to ask the minister, by pointing out to him that there is in the public mind some doubt as to the application of the concluding words of the report which he has just read, and there is general uncertainty as to whether the closing of the Bureau would be as much in the public interest as in the interest of certain outside printing concerns which, like Oliver Twist, have been clamorous for more pap. However, we will not discuss that now. Did I understand my hon. friend to say that when he receives the statement of the men's case he will bring down a copy for the information of hon. members?

Mr. BURRELL: I do not wish to enter into a discussion as to the accuracy of the report, but if I may be allowed to say one word in reply, my hon. friend who had charge of the Bureau for some years, will admit that unless there is a greatly reduced cost in running the Bureau, eliminating all unnecessary expense, and releasing on just terms those who are notoriously inefficient, nobody can justify the continuation of the Bureau.

Mr. MURPHY: These inefficient men should not have been put in the Bureau since 1911.

Mr. J. D. REID: They were put in before 1911.

ALLEGED TRADE DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): The Acting Prime Minister will have read in the newspapers of Saturday last an interview with Mr. F. P. Jones, from which I shall quote one or two extracts, upon which to base an inquiry:

> Mr. F. P. Jones of Montreal, who has just returned from England and France, where he acted in an advisory capacity to Sir Robert Borden, says that the import licenses as they are administered in Great Britain discriminate against Canada and all countries that went to war in 1914.

Then comes the text of the interview, from which I quote these sentences:

> The general election, followed by the Peace Conference, continued to occupy the minds of the heads of the Lloyd George Administration, and evidently purely commercial affairs have been left to the Board of Trade. Now that the Canadian Mission in London have repeatedly and forcibly brought the matter to the attention of the British Government and also to the attention of our Canadian Ministers, in Paris, I feel confident the discrimination which does exist will be done away with.

Then, in the Evening Citizen of March 7th there appeared a further despatch on the same subject, purporting to give a summary of a discussion in the British House of Commons in these terms:

> In the course of a speech in the House of Commons, Lord Wolmer informed the president of the Board of Trade that considerable feeling existed in Canada as a consequence of the policy of licensing prohibited imports. He asked whether licenses had been issued for imports from neutral Allied countries of goods which had been refused from Canada.
> Under-secretary Bridgeman replied that it was true that, owing to their geographical position and to the difficulties of shortage of tonnage, a policy had been adopted respecting import restrictions which had had the undesired effect of discriminating against colonial goods. Now that the tonnage question was easier, he hoped that it would be possible to avoid this discrimination. The question was being considered and an announcement would be made shortly.

I desire to ask my hon. friend if he has any information as to the removal of the discrimination, and if not, whether he has any information in his possession to impart to the House.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I am glad to say that I am able to set at rest any apprehensions my hon. friend may have with regard to discrimination, especially intentional discrimination, against Canadian trade by Great Britain. I have received two cables to-day on this matter. The first is from Mr. Lloyd Harris, of the Canadian Trade Mission overseas, in which he says:

> In reply to question in House, this afternoon's Parliament, Secretary Board of Trade says:
> The Government has decided no import restrictions shall be or continue to be imposed on goods coming from any part of the Empire without the assent of the Cabinet, which shall not be given unless some unforeseen necessity arises. It is not possible at present to remove all restrictions on imports from foreign countries because of the state of the exchange, but all raw materials will be free from import restrictions.

The other cable is from the Canadian Trade Mission in London to the Canadian Trade Mission here, as follows:

> Board of Trade announced yesterday removal of all restrictions on imports from British Empire.

RIOTS AT KINMEL CAMP.

STATEMENT BY MAJOR-GENERAL MEWBURN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Can the Government give the House any information regarding the cable reports of riots among the Canadian troops at Rhyl? Has there been any loss of life?

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): Late on Friday evening I was informed that there had been some trouble in one of the camps in England and I immediately cabled the Overseas Minister of Militia for full information. My cable was crossed by his report on the matter, and which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of March 8th, as follows: (Reads official statement appearing in Ottawa Citizen, March 8th).

"Official statement of the disturbance at Kinmel Camp. In view of the splendid discipline and record uniformly maintained by the Canadian troops since the beginning of the war, in England and France, the incident at Kinmel Camp is very deeply regretted at the headquarters of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada. It is considered that in comparison with others the discipline among Canadian troops has been of high order.

"It is greatly regretted that some of the reports of the incident have been exaggerated.

"Immediately after the armistice had been signed, Kinmel Park was secured as a concentration area, through which Canadian troops passed on their way to Canada, being situated convenient to Liverpool, their embarkation port. There all documentation is completed and troops sorted into drafts according to their destination in Canada.

"Considering the shortage of shipping, the Canadian authorities have congratulated themselves upon the splendid record which has been made, on the whole, as despatching troops to Canada in the month of February. However, the ministry of shipping were unable to furnish sufficient ships to carry out the programme, as promised to the Canadians. Owing to this, in February and early March the shipments of troops having fallen short by fully one-third, there occurred a backing-up from Kinmel Camp through the areas in England and through them to France.

"This has caused very great disappointment to Canadian soldiers who have been overseas for periods ranging up to four years or more without leave to their homes. The withdrawal of some ships and the postponement of sailings of others from time to time, particularly after soldiers had been documented and medically boarded in numbers based on the shipping allocated, has been very trying to the drafts, and this is what it is considered led chiefly to the disturbance.

"Immediately upon the matter being reported to the chief of the general staff, Lieut.-General Sir Richard Turner, V.C., K.C.B., he went to Kinmel Camp and addressed the men in fifteen different places. They seemed to appreciate his explanations and there are not likely to be any further disturbances.

"There are at Kinmel Camp approximately 15,000 troops, all ranks, who have been despatched there as being the last step before boarding ship for Canada. Had the number of men been able to embark in February according to the programme which it was confidently thought could be carried out, the trouble would not have occurred, but the shipping situation, owing to strikes and for other reasons, is admitted to be an extremely difficult matter to control. However, it is hoped by the Canadian authorities that there will not be a recurrence of the delays which have hitherto taken place.

"It is not attempted in the slightest degree to excuse the conduct of the men who took part in the disturbance. Many of the offenders have already been placed under arrest, who, with others involved will be rigorously dealt with.

"During the disturbance there was a certain amount of damage done and it was discovered that civilians were concerned. Up to the present time twelve of these civilians have been arrested and handed over to the civil authorities.

"During the disturbance there were killed three rioters and two men on picket duty. There were twenty-one wounded, of whom two were officers. There is no foundation for the report that a major who is a V.C. has been either killed or injured.

"The troops at Kinmel Park are concentrated in wings representing the military districts in Canada to which they will proceed. They are not in their original units, these wings being composite formations consisting of personnel belonging to many different units. This sorting out is done in deference to the authorities in Canada to avoid delay when the men reach the Dominion. There has been some alleged dissatisfaction because of troops drawn from Canada under the Military Service Act getting priority over those who have seen longer service.

The troops who were in the Canadian corps at the time of the armistice are being returned to Canada by units in the formations that then existed, the first to return being a small number which were embarked on March 1. Soldiers not in the corps such as casualties, railway and forestry troops and others, where available, are demobilized on the principle of the longest service first demobilized, married men having the preference.

A court of inquiry has been convened to make a thorough investigation into all the circumstances in connection with the disturbance, of which Brig.-Gen. J. H. MacBrien C.B., C.M.G., D.S.A., is the president.

That is the official cable. I sent a further cable to the overseas Minister of Militia asking him to furnish us, at the earliest date, with any information he possibly can. He cabled:

All information that can be given out re Kinmel Park disturbance until court inquiry makes report contained in despatch to Government.

The moment that report is received the House will be advised. Later, if I may have permission, I will explain some of the problems of demobilization.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the minister know if all the casualties are Canadians?

Major-General MEWBURN: That is not stated in the cable. I have cabled and asked for a complete list of the casualties.

Lieut.-General Sir SAM HUGHES: I was informed by an officer who has been at Kinmel camp that there was lack of fuel, lack of warmth, for the men there. I would ask the Minister of Militia to inquire into that. If there be any truth in it, why cannot Canadian coal be sent in ballast in our ships to be furnished to the camp to keep the men warm?

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RECEIVERSHIP.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS APPOINTED RECEIVER. STATEMENT BY SIR THOMAS WHITE—CORRESPONDENCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make a statement as to important action just taken by the Government respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system upon which I think it desirable the House should have immediate information. The facts are fully set forth in certain correspondence which I shall read to the House, and an Order in Council which I have laid upon the Table, and which, as it is somewhat lengthy I shall summarize.

Under date of 25th February last, Mr. Frank Scott, Vice-President and Treasurer of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company wrote me as follows:

Montreal, February 25, 1919.

Hon. Sir Thomas White,
Minister of Finance, Ottawa.

Dear Sir Thomas,—Referring to our recent conversations.

I am in receipt of a cable from Mr. Smithers, stating that in the anticipation of receiving the balance of the appropriation of $7,500,000, viz.: $951,911.33, to apply for interest on Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Debenture Stock due March 1st, payment was duly advertised. In consequence, however, of the remittance being coupled with the condition that it is to be used only for operating obligations, the company will be unable to meet the interest due on the first proximo, and serious situation will result.

I respectfully beg to direct your attention to the matter in order that the actual position, and possible consequences may be fully appreciated.

Yours very truly,
Frank Scott,
Vice President and Treasurer.

To this I replied:

Ottawa, February, 28, 1919.

Dear Mr. Scott,—I beg to formally acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 25th instant which you personally handed to me at my office here. I note what Mr. Smithers states in his cable as to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company being unable to meet the interest due upon its securities on March 1st. With reference to the balance of the appropriation of the vote of $7,500,000 by Parliament, the sum of $923,311.26 was paid to your company on your certificate No. 10 dated January 28, 1919, duly approved by the Acting Deputy Minister of the Department of Railways and Canals. This certificate expressly states that this sum is on "account of a cash deficit in the operation of the company from April 1st to November 30th, 1918, inclusive," and "is required to enable the company to meet its operating obligations." The small balance of the vote amounting to about $28,000 will, I understand, be required for the same purpose. There seems no doubt that the deficit in operation should have priority over all other charges.

I have already informed Mr. Kelley, President of the Company, and yourself that it is not the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to provide a further vote for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company while our negotiations with the Grand Trunk Railway Company remain in their present unsatisfactory condition. As I indicated to you, it will be for the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to determine the question of their responsibility in respect of the interest maturing tomorrow upon securities guaranteed by their Company.

Yours very truly,
W. T. White.

Frank Scott, Esq.,
Vice-President and Treasurer,
Grand Trunk Pacific Railway,
Montreal.

Subsequently I received the following:

Montreal, March 4th, 1919.

Hon. Sir Thomas White, K.C.M.G.,
Minister of Finance, Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir Thomas,—I am instructed to inform the Government that in view of the fact that the increased rates applicable to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway have not been sufficient to meet the increased operating expenses, it will not be possible for that Company to continue its operations when the present funds have been exhausted, which will be about the 10th inst.

May I ask you to be so good as to acknowledge receipt of this letter.

Yours very truly,
Frank Scott,
Vice-President.

I acknowledged that letter in these terms:

Ottawa, March 5, 1919.

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 4th instant informing me of the intention of your company to discontinue operations about the 10th instant.

Yours truly,
W. T. White.

Frank Scott, Esq.,
Vice-President and Treasurer,
Grand Trunk Pacific Railway,
Montreal.

Under existing legislation it is not possible, except under proceedings for foreclosure or sale, to have a receiver appointed for a system such as the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Government, therefore, was confronted with what we regarded as imperative necessity in the national interest of providing for the uninterrupted operation of the system. It was found that the War Measures Act gave the Government a complete jurisdiction for the action which it took, viz: by Order in Council to appoint the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals as receiver for the system. I have made a summary of the provisions of the Order in Council as follows:

Re—Grand Trunk Receivership.

Provisions of Order in Council.

(1) Order recites that the continued operation of the G.T.P. System is essential in the present position of Canada resulting from the war, especially in connection with the transport of returning Canadian troops and of supplies, equipment and freight, and that the duty of continuing such operation is thrown upon the Government of Canada inasmuch as there are no effective provisions in the existing laws whereby such continued operation could be otherwise secured and that therefore immediate action is imperative.

(2) Order applies to Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the other companies embraced in its system.

(3) The Minister of Railways is appointed Receiver with all the powers and duties of a Receiver under the Exchequer Court Act.

(4) The Exchequer Court is authorized to make such orders respecting the Receiver and his powers and duties and the carrying out thereof as the Court may deem necessary or expedient in the public interest.

(5) Provides for taking possession by Receiver.

(6) Orders the several Companies embraced in the system and their officers to facilitate the carrying out of the powers and duties of the Receiver and the delivery to him of books and papers and personal property of the various companies.

(7) Provides that nothing in the Order contained shall render the Government or the Receiver liable to the Grand Trunk Railway Company or any Company included in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system or to any creditor or holder of any bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other securities of the said Companies or any of them for any claim by reason of the making of the order or anything done under the authority or under the authority of the Government Receiver or of the Exchequer Court, nor shall afford any defence to, nor prejudice any claim, action or proceeding of the Government of Canada which the Government might lawfully make or take had the Order not been made.

(8) All Officers of the System to continue to discharge their duties under the Receiver so that no interruption in operation may occur.

(9) Nothing in the Order shall prejudice the exercise by the Exchequer Court or by any Court of any Province of Canada of its present jurisdiction to appoint a Receiver or to order a sale of foreclosure of any railway or section thereof or other property affected by the Order, provided that notice of any application for the purposes mentioned shall be given to the Minister of Railways and that he and Counsel for him shall be heard on the application and that the Court in granting, refusing or postponing the application shall take into consideration the public interests involved and shall make such order as shall in the opinion of the Court protect the public interest.

(10) Provision is made whereby the Governor in Council may from time to time and upon the security of Receivers' certificates or otherwise, advance to the Receiver such sums as may be required to enable him to exercise his powers and perform his duties as Receiver.

While, under the War Measures Act, that Order in Council has the full effect of a statute, as Parliament is sitting, it is manifestly desirable that the Government should introduce legislation validating and confirming the Order in Council and sanctioning what the Government has done. Within a day or so, I shall introduce the necessary resolution to that end. There are two further letters which I desire to read. I am making, as I stated, a statement of the facts only. I received on Saturday a letter containing a cable from Mr. Smithers which refers to a statement made in one of the letters which I have read to the House. It is as follows:

Montreal, March 7, 1919.

Hon. Sir Thomas White, K.C.M.G.,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,

I have been instructed by Mr. Smithers to forward the following cable message to you as from him:—

"Mr. Howard G. Kelley has handed me cable message from Mr. Frank Scott containing extract from your letter to him, as follows:— That it is not intention of the Government to ask Parliament to provide further vote for Grand Trunk Pacific Railway while our negotiations with Grand Trunk remain in their present unsatisfactory condition. I beg to recall, when Ministers came over last summer, it was stated in Parliament negotiations would be resumed in London. I accordingly saw Ministers, with members of Board several times and at last was told that Ministers could make no advance in their original offer without consent of full Cabinet in Ottawa. In these circumstances progress in negotiations was impossible, but with a view to facilitating matters, just before the Prime Minister left for Canada, a committee of the Board and myself, saw him, with two of his colleagues, and made a fresh proposal involving very big reduction on our first offer. This offer was not accepted, but on the 5th November High Commissioner of Canada sent for me and said he had message from the Prime Minister asking me if we wished to continue negotiations, and if so, he thought I should go to Canada. I told High Commissioner of Canada, looking to the fact that the Government had given no sign of any intention of departing from their original offer, I thought it was useless going out, unless I had some further explanation, or assurance as to Government's intentions. To this we have had no reply, and I really fail to see how the company can be held responsible for the unsatisfactory condition of our negotiations. Mr. Howard G.

Kelley is returning in a few days and I think it would be advantageous if you could cable any reply you may wish to make to this communication before he leaves. Smithers.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) Frank Scott,

Vice-President and Treasurer."

To which I replied as follows:

"Replying to your cable received through Mr. Scott: Government considers unsatisfactory condition of negotiations due to Board of Directors of Grand Trunk Railway Company entirely failing to appreciate its responsibilities towards the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway undertaking and the bearing of its liabilities in respect thereto upon the question of the net earning power and value of the Grand Trunk Railway System. In November last the Prime Minister cabled to Sir George Perley to suggest to you that if your company desired further negotiations, the Government would be glad to see you in Canada as soon as convenient. He pointed out that it did not seem useful to continue discussion by correspondence. He also suggested that if you came you should be invested with ample powers to conclude an arrangement if one could be reached. Your attitude towards the reasonable suggestion contained in the Prime Minister's communication seemed clearly to indicate indifference towards the continuance of negotiations. Confirmatory of this is the peremptory notification on Thursday last to the Government, without previous intimation, or discussion, that the Grand Trunk Pacific would, on March 10th, discontinue operations, entirely regardless of consequences to Canada through interruption of traffic over a ssytem so extensive and important.

(Sgd.) W. T. White,

Acting Prime Minister."

Mr. CAHILL: I wish to ask the Government if it is their intention to continue governing this country by Orders in Council and then merely bringing in their Orders in Council for the approval of Parliament. If so, why was Parliament called?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If an answer is necessary I would point out that, if the Government had not the powers under the War Measures Act, and the Grand Trunk Pacific had carried out its expressed intention of discontinuing to-day, the entire system of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, embracing all the subsidiary companies, would have been at a standstill with consequences which, I am sure, my hon. friend will appreciate.

Mr. CAHILL: There is no evidence of the Grand Trunk Pacific having made default.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. RICHARDSON: May I ask the hon. the Acting Prime Minister if he is in a position to tell us what the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific are for which the Grand Trunk is responsible?

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would suggest to my hon. friend that, as I am, within a day or so, to introduce a resolution looking to legislation, he defer his question until that matter is under discussion in the House. I shall then be glad to bring down full information respecting what my hon. friend desires to know as well as other information that, I think, will be regarded as necessary to a proper discussion of the question by the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Is the Grand Trunk Pacific actually in default now?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think not actually in default, but the notification we received was that they would discontinue operations.

READING ROOM OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

On the Orders of the day:

Mr. JULES EDOUARD PREVOST (Terrebonne): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, may I inquire why there are no longer to be found in the reading room of the House of Commons any more French publications such as " L'Illustration," " Le Monde Illustré," "Le Journal des Débats," "Le Matin," and a few others. Neither do we find any more " Le Courrier des Etats Unis," and " The Canadian Record," which were previously on file.

I hope the Government will see to it that the subscriptions are renewed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question that is being submitted by the hon. member (Mr. Prevost) is not one of such importance as to warrant taking up the time of the House on the Orders of the Day. He should place his question on the Order Paper in the ordinary course. I might say that I think every reasonable latitude should be allowed hon. members in putting questions on the Orders of the Day if they have reference to important matters of policy but this privilege should not apply to questions of minor importance which can receive consideration in the ordinary course by being placed on the Order Paper.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session resumed from Friday, March 7.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have taken part in the present debate, but during its progress several questions pertaining to matters that are of present importance have been raised, so that I feel it incumbent upon me to make a statement regarding two or three subjects that I think would be in the interest of members.

First, may I be permitted to say one or two words with reference to the sad event which occurred immediately prior to the House convening. It has been my privilege, and the privilege of other hon. members, to listen to the wonderfully eulogistic statements made concerning the late lamented leader of the Opposition, that great Canadian statesman and courteous gentleman. It would be folly for me to attempt to add anything to what has been already so well said, except to briefly state that I sincerely and honestly concur in everything that has been uttered regarding the deceased gentleman.

May I also be permitted, Sir, to extend my congratulations to the two gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne—two gentlemen who have served their country with distinction at the front. What impressed me, Sir, was the high tone and the high note which characterized their speeches; and I have also been impressed by the high tone that has permeated the speeches delivered during the past ten days, together with the apparent sincere desire by members on both sides of the House and their hope and trust that henceforward unity and harmony will prevail in this country. In this hope I entirely concur. I trust, Sir, that the remarks made along this line will not fall on deaf ears. I hope they will sink deep into the hearts of the members of the Government, that they may profit by them, and that the great national work to be undertaken will be carried out in the spirit of several of these speeches to which I have referred.

As I have already stated, there are one or two matters that I would like to touch on, Sir, and relying on the courtesy of the House I may have to refer to a few notes and statistics in doing so. First, I would like to explain to the House the object and reason of the Siberian Expedition. Certain hon. members mentioned the other day that a statement as to this expedition should be made, and this I am now glad to give to the best of my ability.

In order to understand the origin of the Siberian Expedition, one must cast his mind back to the spring of 1918, and in these days of victory it is difficult to do so. In order to properly appreciate the circumstances connected with that expedition one must recall the situation at that time and the gloomy outlook which prevailed. The danger which then prevailed was of a two-fold character. The enemy at that moment appeared to be very strong, and it was necessary to try and reduce his strength and to deprive him of the goal he was after. The second great feature had reference to the Czecho-Slovak race, who had been loyal and faithful to the Allied cause. They were in dire need of help, and the Allies had undertaken to come to their asistance. Had the Allies failed to do so, it would have been at the expense of their honour, to say nothing of the risk of creating additional danger to the Allied cause. During the early period of the war, as is well known, Russia engaged a large number of German and Austrian troops. In 1914, when the war broke out, Germany rather ignored Russia and threw her full weight against France, which accounted for some of the early Allied losses of that period. Now let us follow the course of events down to the fall of 1917, when the Bolsheviks got control of Russia, and made it their business to sue for peace with Germany. This was a deadly blow to the Allies, because it enabled the German military machine to transport from the Eastern to the Western Front over a million men, with a very large mass of artillery and other war material. That great accession of strength enabled the German army to make a tremendous offensive in March, 1918, and to continue the attack during that year. If in 1919 the Allies could in any way reconstitute the Eastern Front, and thereby deprive Germany of the tremendous resources of Russia and compel her to detach troops from the Western Front and despatch them to the Eastern Front, it was worth trying. The Czecho-Slovaks, to whom I have already referred, were friends of the Allies. They had been conscripted into the Austrian army, but deserted in large numbers; some three hundred thousand surrendered to Russia, some thirty-five thousand to Serbia, and twenty-five thousand to Italy. Subsequently, they were recognised and fought with distinction for the Allies on the Russian Front. Then came the revolution in Russia. The Czecho-Slovaks endeavoured, and partially succeeded in crossing Russia and reaching Siberia with the ultimate intention of obtaining transportation across the Pacific and joining the British and French troops in the fight on the Western Front. The Allies had promised to come to their assistance, and the question was, were the Allies going to desert them? While the Czecho-Slovaks were crossing Russia there fell into their hands a very interesting document which was dated 28th April, 1918. The document in question, which was signed by both the German and Austrian Emperors of that time, was directed to all the subjects of Germany and Austria that were prisoners of war in Russia, and instructed them to endeavour to return home. If that was not practicable, they were to join the Bolsheviki army, as being most harmful to Russia and the Allied cause. The document further set out that everybody complying with the order would be considered as serving his country, and would be rewarded on his return home. Finding it impossible to comply with the first direction, and being directed in that event to unite with the party most harmful to Russia and the Allied cause, these prisoners joined the Bolsheviki, and I may say that from the documents received, these men were all trained soldiers and constituted a very formidable accession to the Bolshevik army. At that time in Eastern Siberia the Bolshevik army numbered thirty-six thousand men, twenty thousand of whom were German and Austrian prisoners. The Czecho-Slovaks were now in dire distress.

The Allies agreed to come to their assistance, and here I would like to point out the feeling which prevailed among the Allied War Commission in the spring of 1918. In June and July of that year, the Supreme War Council held that there was not the smallest chance of an Allied victory on the Western Front until 1919, if even then, unless the Eastern Front could be re-constituted. In the middle of June, 1918, the British General Staff viewed the whole situation, and took a decidedly gloomy view of the outlook. The most favourable outcome that they ventured to hope for was that the French and British armies should hold fast until the campaigning weather of 1918, and in 1919 it was then apprehended that the Germans would be able to concentrate at least one hundred and eighty divisions against one hundred and fifty French, British, and American divisions on the Western Front.

They also held that there was a real possibility of the Germans breaking through the Allied lines, forcing the British back upon the sea coast or across the Somme and inflicting a decisive victory on the French army. That was the feeling in the spring of 1918. About the end of June or early in July, 1918, the Prime Minister was in England; I myself had the privilege of being there subsequently, in July. The Imperial War Cabinet discussed the situation with the Canadian ministers who were then there, pointed out the whole of the difficulties and the problems which had to be faced and urged that Canada should assist Great Britain in the organization of a small force to go to Siberia. An arrangement had been made with all the other Allies in the matter of sending a small force to Siberia, not to become engaged in any great military operation, but for the purpose of endeavouring to reorganize the loyal Russian army and to render assistance to the Czecho-Slovaks. It was agreed that Japan should send a force there, and Japan did send some 70,000 men. The United States sent nearly 10,000 men; I think the actual number was 8,500. France and Italy sent from 1,000 to 2,000 men. It was absolutely essential that all the Allies should be represented there. Great Britain was unable to withdraw any of her forces from the western front. All she had available at that time was one British regiment, the 25th Middlesex, stationed at Hong Kong, which was immediately sent to Vladivostok; and it pas expected that another battalion would be available later. The matter was very carefully considered and all the phases of the situation duly weighed, and it was felt that Canada could not very well refuse to go to the assistance of Great Britain at that period. It was agreed, therefore, that a force of Canadian troops not to exceed 5,000, would be raised for the purpose of proceeding to Siberia, this being done on the distinct understanding that such action would in no way interfere with the flow of reinforcements to the western front.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is this force under the Minister of Militia in Canada or the Minister of Militia in England?

Major-General MEWBURN: Under the Minister of Militia in Canada. The reasons why this force was raised may be summarized as follows: First, to help the Russian people throw off the German yoke; second, to prevent Germany from exploiting in her own interests Russia's vast resources, military and economic; third, to prevent Germany from moving troops to the western front from the eastern theatre, and even to compel her, by despatching troops to the eastern theatre, to weaken herself in France and Flanders; fourth, to shorten the war by re-establishing an eastern front; fifth, to deny Germany access to supplies and stores collected in Siberia, of which there was a very large amount; sixth, to help the Czecho-Slovaks, who had made great sacrifices and on whose existence as an independent nation much will hereafter depend.

I should like to state the composition of the force that was sent to Siberia from Canada, in order that the House will have full knowledge and information respecting it. It consisted of small Headquarters, one Cavalry Squadron—Royal Northwest Mounted Police; one Field Battery, one Field Company of Engineers, one Signal Company of Engineers, two Infantry Battalions, one Machine Gun Company, one Field Ambulance, one Stationary Hospital, one Army Service Corps unit—transport and supply; one Sanitary Section, one Ammunition Column for Battery and Small Arm Ammunition; one Mobile Veterinary Section, two Depot Units of Supply, one Bakery Section, one Butchery Squad, half an Ordnance Company, Pay Office, and General Base Depot and Base Guard.

It was arranged and agreed upon that the British force that went to Siberia, plus any others that proceeded there for military operations would be under a Canadian officer. That Canadian officer was Major General J. H. Elmsley, C.M.G., D.S.O., who had proved his worth with great distinction at the front, a man of high standing and high military attainments, a man well thought of in the War Office. General Elmsley proceeded overseas and arrived at Vladivostok with the first detachment about the end of October, 1918.

Then came the armistice, and the question was, should we send the balance of the force? Urgent cables came from the Imperial Government requesting that the balance of this force should proceed, otherwise a very embarrassing situation for the British Government would be created. The matter was given careful consideration, and the greater portion of the balance of the force proceeded. The total number of Canadian troops in Siberia now amounts to 4,434. It was decided not to send the remainder of the troops that were in British Columbia; most of them have been demobilized and those remaining are being demobilized immediately. Canada is responsible only for the pay of these troops in Siberia; all other expenses are borne by the Imperial Government out of Imperial funds. A very large amount of the supplies that have been shipped forward to Siberia have been purchased in Canada and paid out of Imperial funds.

The majority of the troops now in Siberia will be returned at a very convenient date. I am not at liberty to give that date, but it will not be very far distant, and any who remain in Siberia after that date will remain there voluntarily.

Now, one hon. gentleman has remarked that the Siberian force should not have been sent without the consent of Parliament. In this connection I should like to refer to the wonderful special session of Parliament that was called in August, 1914, and at which what was considered to be Canada's duty was laid down. The late leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, during the course of a very impressive address, said:—

> It is our duty, more pressing upon us than all other duties, at once, on this first day of this extraordinary session of the Canadian Parliament, to let Great Britain know, and to let the friends and foes of Great Britain know, that there is in Canada but one mind and one heart, and that all Canadians stand behind the mother country, conscious and proud that she has engaged in this war, not from any selfish motive, for any purpose of aggrandisement, but to maintain untarnished the honour of her name, to fulfil her obligations to her allies, to maintain her treaty obligations, and to save civilization from the unbridled lust of conquest and domination.

He said further:—

> More than once I have declared that if England were ever in danger,—nay, not only in danger, but if she were ever engaged in such a contest as would put her strength to the test—then it would be the duty of Canada to assist the motherland to the utmost of Canada's ability.

The British Government urged that that force should go, and the decision to send it was arrived at in the spirit which is manifested in the remarks which I have just read. I think that no hon. member of this House, or no citizen of Canada, would for one moment say that it was our duty to refuse to carry out the wishes of the British authorities at that time. Our withdrawal when the armistice came would have been an undying discredit to Canada, having regard to her splendid effort in the war.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Were there any "draftees" amongst the soldiers who went to Siberia?

Major General MEWBURN: Some men who were obtained under the Military Service Act went with the Siberian expedition. The Siberian expedition was originally started on a voluntary basis, because we did not want to take any chances on disturbing the flow of reinforcements to the western front. As time went on, there were not enough to fill up this expedition. We had then more than satisfied the demands of the overseas requirements in certain branches. For instance, a large number of men who were really liable under the Military Service Act, but who had come in and reported prior to the proclamation calling them out, were given the option of going into any of the various branches of the service, such as the artillery, and so on. As I understand the Military Service Act, they were enlisted for this war, no matter where it was. These men were given the option of going to France or to Siberia, and the units that went to Siberia volunteered to go there instead of going to France.

Another matter which I would like to touch upon more particularly is the present question of demobilization, and I shall be glad to give hon. members what information I can regarding that. The problem of demobilization is on the minds of everybody to-day. The first question is: Was the Government, on the date of the armistice, prepared for demobilization? I think the Government and the Department of Militia took every precaution and endeavoured to the best of their ability to make all necessary arrangements. As far back as 1916, this matter was given most serious consideration by the Department of Militia and Defence. A considerable quantity of data was prepared and, as time went on, the whole problem of the war, which was ever increasing in difficulty, occupied almost the entire attention of the department. This big problem of demobilization was not, however, overlooked. On the 24th of June, 1916, because this all touches on demobilization, the first thing that was considered on a big programme was hospitalization, because at that period we were getting back to Canada a considerable number of casualties; that is, men who had been wounded or injured were from time to time being returned to Canada for hospital treatment. On that date, one of the celebrated Orders in Council was passed, constituting the Military Hospitals' Commission, which was authorized to take charge of and look after those returned soldiers who were wounded.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Under the Militia Department?

[Major-General Mewburn.]

Major General MEWBURN: No, not under the Militia Department; it was not even an adjunct of the Militia Department. The Military Hospitals' Commission was authorized and organized and operated until February, 1918. It was considered—and I think finally admitted—that as long as a soldier was a soldier he must be treated by the army as a soldier; that a civilian organization could not very well deal with a soldier while he was a soldier. That I think will be admitted by everybody. That attitude has been approved by every country in the world. The functions of the Military Hospitals' Commission were carried out with great vigour and ability until the 21st of February, 1918, when it was decided that it was not feasible that they should look after men prior to discharge. At that time another Order in Council was passed bringing into being the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Militia Department took over the control and hospitalization and medical care of the soldier until the period at which he was fit to discharge. As a necessary corollary the Military Hospitals Commission Command ceased to exist, it being amalgamated with the District Casualty Units in District Depots. Details of all this are very fully set out in what is known as memorandum No. 5, which I have had prepared and which will be laid on the table of the House in a few days. It is a very complete document giving the whole work and machinery of the Militia Department, covering the period from last session to date. I need not bother giving the details of it now. At the time the Militia Department took over the care of the soldier previous to discharge, the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Department was organized—I will deal with it later—to take care of the man after he was discharged, that is, when he became a civilian.

Let me now deal with the military side of demobilization. For some time past and prior to the armistice men were constantly coming back from overseas as individuals. They were not coming back in any distinctive unit, but, coming back as individuals. They were, immediately on their return to Canada, sent to one of the various military districts, the headquarters from which they originally came. They were then boarded, all their documents completed, and if they were for discharge, and not requiring medical treatment, their discharges were carried out and the men were allowed to go to their homes. In the spring of 1918, the Militia Department published what was known as the "Returned Soldiers' Handbook," which was sent overseas and distributed to every man who was returning to Canada. That handbook set forth in detail everything the returned soldier required to know about himself until he became a civilian, and also gave information regarding pensions and so forth so that each individual man had full information.

Demobilization has both a military and a civil side. The first includes transportation to Canada and the steps necessary to carry out discharges from the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The second comprises all measures possible towards returning the man to civil life under the most favourable conditions. I would like to point this out, to show what the Government have been doing prior to that period as to demobilization. In April, 1917, the then acting overseas minister appointed a committee in England to deal with this problem. That committee consisted of Hugh A. Allan, chairman; J. H. Plummer, Brig.-General W. St. P. Hughes, Lieut.-Col. J. H. D. Hulme, Lieut.-Col. J. L. McKinnon, Major George Whitmore and Lieut.-Col. Arthur Sullivan.

Sir SAM HUGHES: You mean Sir Montagu Allan?

Major-General MEWBURN: The information I have is Hugh A. Allan. That committee proceeded to work and spent a long time working in conjunction with the overseas authorities, the corps, and also the war office. Subsequently, a report was sent back to the Militia Department and an Order in Council was passed in 1917 dealing with that problem. Subsequently in 1917 another report was made and further interim reports were published from time to time and sent to the department here, dealing with the whole problem and laying down certain schemes and suggestions that would be carried out when the day of demobilization came. That was followed down until 1918. That committee has been at work from time to time compiling information, working in conjunction with the war office on the general demobilization scheme. In April, 1918, we had an officer overseas who was working in conjunction with the overseas authorities who had been in consultation with General Currie, and all the brigadiers and corps commanders in France. Subsequently, another committee was appointed on which was a representative from Canada, the overseas authorities, and also the representatives of the corps. The report was finally completed in July, 1918, and that report was approved by the Prime Minister when he was in England. It sets forth in detail all the organization, and the suggestions made. While I wish to take all the responsibility that is coming to me in the matter, still I should like to point out to the House that the demobilization overseas is entirely under the control of the overseas authorities, and the responsibility is laid down in the following memorandum

> The responsibility for carrying out the demobilization of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada up to and including the arrival, but not the debarkation of the troops in Canada, shall rest with the Headquarters, Overseas Military Forces of Canada, in London, who will issue all necessary instructions and be responsible to the Overseas Minister.

At that time the whole scheme of demobilization had been worked out, but it was realized that changes would have to be made from time to time.

I should like to point out what else the Government have done for the soldiers. An Order in Council was passed dealing with pensions for soldiers, and the Pension Commission was established. A Select Committee of this House dealt with the question of pensions last year, and I understand that a Bill will be brought down this session,—but I shall not deal with that here as the matter comes under another department and will be fully explained to the House in due course.

Then, provision has been made for settling soldiers on the land, through the Soldiers' Settlement Board. This legislation was approved by Parliament in August, 1917. I have no doubt that the Minister of the Interior will make a full explanation of the work the board is doing. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment deals with the soldier only after his discharge. Our full duty to the soldier is certainly not done when he has been discharged from the army. Even those who have not been disabled in any way should be given all possible assistance to fit themselves for a higher walk in life if they should so desire. This department deals with vocational training for the soldier after his discharge and there are many men who wish to get on in life who are being trained by the department in some particular line.

With regard to demobilization, the question, of course, was to get the men back from overseas and get them discharged. We were ready here in Canada to meet the situation but the question was how rapidly could we get the men back. The original scheme, which I think was sound, provided that the men should be returned according to length of service, married men being given the preference. We were at once confronted by the most urgent solicitation from the corps, who were most desirous that the corps should be returned in complete units. This proposal received our very sympathetic consideration, but the question was how to accomplish it. We must remember how the corps were constituted at the date of the signing of the armistice. Each corps consisted of so many battalions, batteries, and other units, composed of men from all over Canada. The 16th Battalion which originally came from British Columbia, is to-day a Manitoba battalion. Would it be right to take these men out to British Columbia, disperse them there and then bring them back to their respective homes? Another battalion which was raised in Winnipeg is to-day a New Brunswick battalion, and there is hardly a battalion or unit at the front to-day that is composed of men from one particular locality in Canada. It was, therefore, decided that the units would have to be re-constituted in some way, and it was settled, and received the approval of everybody, that the Dominion should be divided into dispersal areas. The number today is twenty-one. A postal guide was issued and sent overseas for distribution to all ranks, so that men who otherwise would not know in which dispersal area their home was could tell by consulting the guide, which showed the location of all the dispersal areas, it also included a map of Canada and enabled them to choose which dispersal area they wanted. A soldier could get this information by merely looking up his post office address. There are a large number of men from Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Quebec, and Ontario, who have enlisted in western battalions, and it was thought to be only fair that they should have the privilege of being dispersed in their home area so that they could go and see their people. The units are, therefore, being re-constituted on that basis

Then came the question of the documentation of the men, and I should like to explain some of the difficulties in connection with this matter. Every man must be dealt with individually. His pay book has to be made up. His discharge certificate prepared and cheques issued both for clothing allowance and the first instalment of his war-service gratuity. Finally, but most important, his medical history sheet has to be prepared. It is absolutely essential in the interest of the men and of the nation that a man's state of health should be determined at the time of his discharge. All these things take time. Under the new system of dispersal areas at least five hundred men can be cleared at an area in one day. Men may come to Ottawa who do not live in Ottawa, but in the area in which Ottawa is the dispersal station. A man can get his cheques for the money to which he is entitled, get his transportation to his home, and his discharge certificate easily within one day.

The chief difficulty we had was to get ships and railway transportation. Immediately after the armistice I had a conference with the Minister of Railways and the presidents of the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian National railways to find out how best to cope with the situation and get the men back as quickly as possible. These railway experts decided that the very best the railways, with their combined rolling stock could do was to handle not more than thirty thousand men per month from the ports of St. John and Halifax. A committee was formed of representatives from the three railroads, whose chairman was selected by the three companies themselves, and ever since the signing of the armistice this committee has been sitting in Montreal looking after the routing, and transportation questions generally. The moment we get information of the sailing of a ship the Department of Militia and Defence notifies the chairman of this committee, who makes all arrangements for the routing of the soldiers. One suggestion that came from overseas was that we should open a camp in Canada, but I think most people will agree that to open a camp in winter at Valcartier or some other such place to handle ten or fifteen thousand men would lead to far more trouble than is being experienced in England to-day.

We decided, and it was agreed to overseas, that the proper way was to bring out the men in such numbers that on the disembarkation of a shipload at any port, it would be possible to move them rapidly to their homes. And we are insisting that these men shall be distributed equitably all over Canada. That is, we will not bring out, say, about ten thousand men to be dumped in Montreal at once, but we bring out a proportionate number to be distributed among the several provinces. That has been done and the machinery is running, I think, fairly smoothly. For instance, in the case of a ship disembarking troops at Halifax to-day we are able to get every one of those troops out of Halifax before nightfall.

The question was, how could we speed that up? We consulted with the railway companies on that point. It was decided that, when navigation opens and we can use the ports of Quebec and Montreal in addition to those we have, then by using day coaches we can accommodate a great many more. It would be no great hardship, for instance, for the Maritime Province troops to use day coaches. The troops for west of the Great Lakes can disembark at Quebec and be carried in colonist sleepers, while those for Ontario and Quebec, except those for the city of Quebec, would disembark at Montreal and go in day coaches to their points of destination. In that way, we can speed up about 45,000 men a month, and with any sort of luck we can have every one of the Canadian troops, except some hospital cases, demobilized and back in Canada by the end of August.

One of the great problems which has confronted us and which touches another department, is the question of soldiers' dependents. That is a problem by itself. It is a well known fact—it has been reported in the public press—that there have been about 25,000 marriages among the Canadian troops in England and on the Continent. There are at the present time about 40,000 dependents to be brought back. In the early stages of the armistice, with the natural desire of these dependents to come to Canada as soon as possible, a lot of them were put on the troopships. This created a most embarrassing situation. We had our troop trains made up to accommodate 500 men, and fitted up with a commissariat car. You can conceive how embarrassing it was when large numbers of the dependents of soldiers desired to go on these troop trains. The situation became almost impossible. A new arrangement has been made under which those soldiers overseas who have dependents desirous of coming to Canada would come on a special boat carrying only soldiers and their dependents, and now, under the Department of Immigration we are dealing with that matter in conjunction with the overseas representative of immigration. We co-operate in every way, supplying the medical staff, nursing sisters and other facilities, and have set apart a hospital in St. John to receive cases that need treatment. Owing to the epidemic of influenza in England we have found the situation a very difficult one, many women returning who are ill, and who are taken seriously ill after disembarkation.

Mr. PECK, V.C.: I would ask the minister if the plan of Sir Arthur Currie for demobilization was ever laid before the cabinet, or was it settled by the overseas minister?

Major-General MEWBURN: Demobilization by units?

Mr. PECK, V.C.: Yes.

Major-General MEWBURN: I stated that the first idea was that the men should be brought back according to length of service, married men first. Subsequently Sir Arthur Currie proposed that they should be brought back by units. Subsequently he proceeded to England and discussed the whole problem. His complete plan was never submitted here, I never saw it; but many communications, letters and cables passed; and the scheme I have spoken of was concurred in by Sir Arthur Currie.

Mr. PECK, V.C.: That was not the original plan?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, because we thought it was not possible to work it out. Several members have asked me how it was that the Third Division came first—how the First Division did not come first. I had a good deal of correspondence with Sir Arthur Currie and other members of the corps at the Front, and a short time ago I had a letter from Sir Arthur Currie giving an explanation of why it was that the First Division did not come first. I think it will interest the House if I read a portion of that letter:

> After the signing of the armistice the first intimation that we received as to our future movements was to the effect that the whole Corps would move to the Rhine and I had made arrangements for the First and Second Divisions to leave, my intention being that as they would be the first to be demobilized by moving men first they would cross the Rhine in that order. After a time there they could be shipped by train to the Base, to get ready for demobilization, their places being taken at the Rhine by the Third and Fourth Divisions.

He gives in some detail the reasons why they could not all get through, and only two divisions went. He goes on:

> Shortly after the first intimation we were told that only two divisions of Canadians were to go, and I allowed the First and Second to proceed, my intention being that after they spent a short period holding the bridgehead I would endeavour to get them to the Base or somewhere near there, and replace them at the bridgehead by the Third and Fourth Divisions, thus giving all divisions an opportunity of seeing something of Germany.

I may say that the first intimation was for our second and fourth army to proceed to Germany, we to be part of the second army. This was later changed and the second army alone went back, and with it 11 divisions, so that for us to furnish two divisions was giving us a very high percentage; the actual bridgehead was held by 4 divisions so that the Canadian Corps holds half.

On top of all this I know there is an intense desire to get back to Canada. I know the pressure that is being brought to bear on you to see that this is carried out. Our people in England have been pressing the War Office who have been brought to release two Canadian Divisions for demobilization, the first of which is to sail for Canada about March. As it was impossible owing to transportation difficulties, namely, supply of cars, etc., to get the First Division back in time to sail for home first, it became necessary for me to nominate either the Third or the Fourth, and because it was raised first I nominated the Third. A few days ago it began its march westward to a point from which it will be shipped by rail as cars become available to the Base.

By the time it is ready to embark we hope to be able to follow it by the First, then by the Second and finally by the Fourth.

As hon. members are aware, the Third Division has reached England and a part of it has come to Canada. As I have already stated, there are other departments of the Government dealing with the problem of demobilization. It touches the Departments of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Pensions, Labour, Agriculture, and Trade and Commerce, all of which are working in conjunction with what is known as the Repatriation Committee, whose work is to bring into co-operation in this service all branches of the Government so as to prevent overlapping and promote efficiency, and which, so far as I have seen, is doing great work.

Regarding the whole problem of bringing the men back, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that no one branch or department of the Government, no one organization can successfully cope with this big problem, but that the nation as a whole, both collectively and individually, must co-operate, must put their shoulders to this enormous problem in order to make our solution of it a success. Through all these serious problems of the war since 1914, when the flow was to the objective on the western front, the greatest enthusiasm existed amongst all the people of the country. I cannot understand why, then, on the signing of the armistice, there should be a kind of backing up on the part of individuals.

It seems to me that if ever in the history of Canada co-operation and friendly assistance were needed, it is to-day, and until that need is met in the proper spirit this great problem before us cannot be successfully solved. If everybody will co-operate and try to assist the individual men as they come back and take their places in individual communities, I think we need have no fear of trouble in the future.

[Major-General Mewburn.]

A great deal has been said about looking after the men. From what I have seen, the men do not want to be pampered. They do not want charity. They want to come back, and, as far as possible, take their places in the community and be absorbed into the national life of the country. The difficulty is that when an individual has been overseas for years, and when he has been trained with one object in view—the object of killing—his mentality is such that it is hard for us to conceive his viewpoint. Whether that man was in an office, a workshop or a bank, his mind has been centred on one object and it is not human nature to expect that that man can come back and immediately take up his old job, or a new job, and get down to normal conditions the same as the man working beside him who has never been at the war. I feel confident that the employers of labour and the citizens of Canada will give the returned soldier every consideration. But, they have to go farther than that. They have to look after the men. I do not mean to pamper them or to follow them around like detectives but they must see that each man gets an opportunity to adjust himself and to do his best. If that spirit is not manifested I am satisfied that from time to time men will become disgusted with their work and will want to chuck it up and leave the job. The superintendents of large manufacturing concerns must show sympathy towards these returned men and I am satisfied that if that spirit prevails we will have no trouble whatever. To give approximate figures, on the 30th November the troops overseas were as follows:

England	123,024
France	152,264
Total	275,288

From that date to the 28th February we have brought back and demobilized 51,765 and in addition we have got rid of and demobilized something like another 50,000 in Canada; so that, since the 30th November and up to the 8th March, including troops in Canada, we have demobilized about 100,000 C.E.F. troops.

The movement of these troops is an enormous problem on the part of the railway companies but I think they are meeting the situation creditably and efficiently. I realize, and can sympathize with, the desire of the men to get back at as early a date as possible.

I would like to refer here, for the information of members of the House, to the question of priority of return. I am satisfied there is not a member of this House who has not been requested, or approached, to try and get back certain individuals from overseas. On the signing of the armistice, I was simply swamped and overwhelmed with letters, telegrams and requests asking me to bring back individuals. I took the matter up with the overseas authorities and corps commanders. I had explained to hon. members to the best of my ability the difficulty caused by the effort to secure priority of return. I have endeavoured to cope with the situation as best I could and I think that hon. members will realize the difficulties and the problems created by a request for the priority of return of certain individuals. This question, I am satisfied, is one of the causes of the trouble at Kinmel to-day. In the early stages in the British Army the principle of demobilization according to trades and occupations was adopted. That was found in the British Army to be an impossible principle to work upon. It created trouble not only in the British Army but in the Navy. I have had many requests from relations and friends to bring back certain officers from the front. It was said that there were jobs waiting for them or that their business interests required that they should return immediately. I cannot conceive why any individual officer who has the honour of having a commission in His Majesty's Forces should dream of having priority and of coming back and leaving the men whom he has had under his control there behind him. I think the officer is the last man who should expect to return. I have never had any applications from officers themselves but they have come from relatives and friends. I have had many applications myself from members of Parliament. I have, to the best of my ability, tried to meet the situation and the policy was finally determined upon that priority of return would only be granted upon compassionate grounds, such as where some financial or business matter was at stake, or where there was serious illness in a family—a man's wife or children dependent on him. In every case coming within this category we have cabled and a request under such circumstances has been acted upon promptly. In other cases that have come before me, I have sent the information over to the overseas ministry pointing out the request and endeavouring to see what could be done about it. But, where you have a thousand men in a unit and one man, say, John Smith, or a particular officer, is brought back in priority you can well see how a feeling of resentment would grow up in those who were left behind.

We have also the demobilization question in Canada. We are to-day confronting what might be called liquidation. Prior to the armistice we had at our various depots, or in the various military districts, battalions waiting to go overseas. When the armistice was announced we immediately started to clean house in Canada. A great deal of work is yet to be done. Each of the depots had to be wound up, discharges of personnel had to be carried out, ordnance stores and equipment had to be turned in and accounts had to be audited. All the hospitals have to be maintained. The various dispersal camps must be maintained and certain depots must be retained in order to carry on the demobilization until it is completed. I wish to assure the House that this liquidation is going on as rapidly as possible. There is also the liquidation of the war stores. Immediately the armistice was signed contracts were cancelled, stock is now being taken and steps are being taken to dispose of all surplus supplies to the best advantage and for the good of the country. I presume that in the final liquidation there will not be a very large dividend declared among the shareholders —the people of Canada. But, we are doing the best we can.

There are just one or two other matters that I would like to explain to the House. Questions have arisen as to service, war service badges, orders and decorations and medals, and I submit the following memo as to that subject:

War Service Badges, Orders, Decorations and Medals:

It is evident from correspondence in the Militia Department that there is much confusion in the public mind regarding War Service Badges or buttons, orders, decorations and medals.

War Service Badges. I have mentioned these first, although they are possibly least in importance, but as they have been issued in large numbers and are generally worn by soldiers discharged, it is well that the House and the country should understand what their significance is. From time immemorial it has been the custom after military campaigns to award orders and decorations for distinguished service and medals signifying the service rendered by a soldier. Of this I will speak a little later but before doing so I wish to explain that War Service badges are a quite recent innovation.

In Great Britain His Majesty during the currency of this great war authorized the issue of what is known as the Imperial Silver Badge. This was to be given to officers, non-commissioned officers and men who had served and had been retired or discharged as no longer fit for military service by reason of old age, wounds or sickness. The idea was that this badge should be worn with civilian clothing to indicate that the man had done his duty, or, in other words, was not a slacker. There was compulsory military service in Great Britain and all men of military age who had served and had been discharged by reason of permanent disability, should have a badge which was at once a recognition of their service and an indication that they had done their duty and were no longer liable for service.

Since the Armistice, amended regulations have been published providing that such men as are unfit by reason of service when demobilized are to be issued with this badge.

In Canada, we have adopted a somewhat different course, in that we have issued three classes of these badges. An amended Order in Council is now in course of preparation making certain changes which are necessary by reason of new conditions. Without troubling the House at great length it will be sufficient to say that there are three classes of badges.

Class "A" designating men who have seen active service at the front in the present war.

Class "B" (Imperial Silver Badge) designating men who have served overseas (either in England or at the front) and who on discharge were unfit by reason of old age, wounds or sickness, but under similar regulations granted by the Imperial Government and issued by us.

Class "C" designating men who have rendered honourable service but who are not eligible for Classes "A" or "B".

[Major-General Mewburn.]

In view of the fact that the Imperial Silver Badge was made available for the Canadian soldier, it is proposed that the Canadian badges "A" and "C" shall be awarded to any member of the British Expeditionary Force as well as members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force (even though he may not have served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force) who complies with the conditions, and who (a) was a resident in Canada on or before August 4, 1914, and (b) has returned to take up his residence in Canada.

So much for badges. We now come to the question of medals. Of these I cannot speak with absolute definiteness. No final announcement has been made but despatches so far received indicate that as regards the army, it is generally agreeed that two medals should be issued, one being an international medal for all troops engaged in theatres of war, and the other a British medal for all troops serving at home and in garrisons. Troops serving in theatres of war would also be entitled to the British medal. Without being able to make a positive statement I assume that with the international medal there will be issued appropriate clasps, indicating either calendar years or different theatres of operations.

Apart from the foregoing two other decorations have been definitely decided upon (A) the "1914 star" commonly called the "Mons Star." Army Order No. 350 dated 24-11-17, stated that "His Majesty the King had been graciously pleased to signify his pleasure to recognize, by the grant of a distinctive decoration, the services rendered by His Majesty's Military Forces under the command of Field Marshal Sir J. D. P. French in France and Belgium during the earlier phases of the war in 1914 up to midnight of the 22nd-23rd November, 1914." The decoration will be a star in bronze; the riband will be red, white and blue, shaded and watered.

The House will be interested to know that a small number of Canadians are entitled to this decoration, principally, I think, members of the Medical Services who proceeded to Belgium or France before the date mentioned.

(B) " 1914-15 Star." This decoration is referred to in Army Order No. 20, dated 23-12-18. It will be awarded to those who served in theatres of war between August 5th, 1914, and December 31st, 1915, both dates inclusive. Those entitled to the 1914 Star already mentioned will not be eligible for the new decoration. The Army Order referred to defines in detail the various theatres of war. This decoration will also be a star in bronze, riband will be red, white and blue shaded and watered. A large number of Canadian troops are eligible for this decoration, including the 1st, 2nd and part of the 3rd Divisions.

In connection with these two decorations it is interesting to note that the issue of the Mons Star led to a proposal on the part of the Governments of Australia and New Zealand to issue a special decoration for the operations in Galipoli. This in turn suggested similar proposals with respect to other theatres of war, and the matter became so complicated it was referred to a committee of which General Seely was chairman, and as a result of its deliberations the 1914-1915 Star was authorized by His Majesty.

In illustration of the difficulties attending the issue of medals in such a war as this, it is estimated that from 12 to 15 million medals will have to be struck by the British Government.

In addition to the foregoing there have been, as the House is aware, a large number of awards for special gallantry to individuals of the Canadian forces. To this must be added a further number of special awards to Canadian soldiers by the Allied Governments.

The latest list of awards to Canadian soldiers which I have includes the following:

Victoria Cross - - - - - - -	61
Distinguished Service Order - -	605
Military Cross - - - - - -	2,312
Distinguished Conduct Medal - -	1,453
Military Medal - - - - - - -	7,785

One hon. member in his remarks during the present debate referred to the desirability of the issue by the Canadian Government of a special medal for Canadian soldiers. Without expressing any adverse opinion on this proposal, I suggest that its consideration might well be left till the Canadian troops have returned home when the matter can be given due consideration perhaps after consultation with members of the Canadian Army Corps. In view of what I have said about the number of medals already decided upon, the difficulties in connection with design, manufacture, and distribution are formidable, and no harm will result from deferring decision on this point until a little later.

I may inform the House in this connection that apart from badges, decorations and medals there are other issues already decided upon which call for a vast amount of work by administrative departments. Among these are the following: (a) King's certificate on discharge. This is a special certificate issued by His Majesty to members of the British forces, including C.E.F., who have been retired or discharged on account of wounds, ill health, or disability caused or aggravated by service. (b) A memorial plaque, to be presented by His Majesty to the next of kin of those members of His Majesty's forces who have fallen in the war. This is to be of circular form, five inches in diameter. It bears an emblematic design with the inscription "He died for freedom and honour," and will have inserted in the field (by an ingenious method of casting) a raised tablet enclosing the name of the person commemorated. The design was a matter of open competition and the selection was made from more than 800 models which were submitted. Each plaque will be accompanied by a scroll with a suitable inscription surmounted by a special device, including the Royal Arms in colour with the initials of His Majesty the King. (c) The Canadian Government proposes to commemorate our soldiers who have fallen in a somewhat similar way by the use of a cross, the cross of sacrifice, to be worn by mothers and wives of those soldiers who have died for the country's cause. Designs have been submitted and it is hoped that it may be possible to arrange for the manufacture and distribution of these crosses at a comparatively early date.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (Oxford South): Have not Distinguished Conduct awards been made to the Royal Flying Corps?

Major-General MEWBURN: There is one other subject I would like to refer to while considering the question of medals. I have suggested it for the consideration of the Government, and I think the suggestion is one the Government might well act upon. It is that the Government should issue to the mothers, or wives of any Canadian soldier who has fallen in action a silver cross, which may be known as "The Cross of Sacrifice." While the idea is sentimental, I think it would be desirable; it would be a silent memento to be cherished by these gallant women who have suffered so much.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Major-General MEWBURN: Now, as regards war records, trophies and memorials. This is a subject which might well be dealt with in a separate speech, and I can only touch on it briefly here.

War records and documents. These may be divided roughly into administrative and historical documents. It is sometimes said that a modern war is fought on paper, and the House may be inclined to share this opinion when I state that, apart from the vast number of current documents in the Militia Department, it is estimated that some 600 tons of files will be returned from overseas. These are of priceless value both for present use and future reference. The housing, indexing and preservation of these, and the consolidation of files made overseas with those in Canada dealing with the same subject, or kindred subjects, is a problem of first magnitude.

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): May I ask the minister a question now which I should have put at an earlier period: Will Canadian who are serving in the Imperial Forces —such as our Flying Corps boys, like the son of the hon. gentleman who interrogated the minister a few minutes ago—be recognized in a similar way to our lads who served in the Canadian Forces?

Major-General MEWBURN: The soldiers to whom the hon. gentleman refers will be treated identically the same as members of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces in connection with gratuity and similar matters. Where a Canadian soldier is drawing a gratuity or emolument from the Imperial Government, if it is less than the Canadian, the difference will be made up. In the matter of decorations, medals and awards, they will be treated the same as the others.

Historical documents, which include war diaries, and all other written records of the operations of the Canadian troops, are of inestimable value. They will be a priceless possession in the archives of Canada for many generations yet unborn. It has been truthfully remarked "that the care which a nation devotes to the preservation of the monuments of its past may serve as a true measure of the degree of civilization to which it has attained. The chief monument of a nation is its documentary records, the preservation of which is recognized in all civilized countries as a natural and proper function in Government."

The value of these documentary records from a business standpoint cannot be overestimated. They are essential for immediate use, and in many cases have constituted the chief, if not the only, protection of the state against ill founded claims. They cannot be adequately protected by insurance, as they can never be replaced. Their destruction would involve loss beyond calculation. For this reason I have recommended to the Government the immediate provision of suitable fireproof structures in which these records can be housed.

By authority of the Privy Council, a commission on war records and war trophies, composed of Sir Edmund Walker, C.V.O., Toronto, and Brigadier-General E. A. Cruikshank, of the Militia Department, was constituted, and has submitted a valuable report which will be the basis of necessary action.

One of the most interesting things that could be imagined is the Canadian war records. I think I am safe in saying that the collection brought together embraces some of the most wonderful war records and photographs the world has ever known. I understand these will comprise some five or six hundred works of art, and it will readily be seen, therefore, how necessary it is that a suitable building should be erected for their proper housing.

There will also be a building erected for the custody of war trophies. In addition a large number of trophies will be distributed to different communities throughout Canada who desire and will require the same. Dr. Doughty, who has been overseas, but I understand is on his way back, is dealing with them. A large number of trophies after demobilization will be returned, and I hope that this commission or committee will be able to distribute them in an equitable way throughout Canada. I am satisfied the Government will desire that these records and trophies should be preserved for all generations.

The last subject on which I shall dwell is that of soldiers' graves, a sad but serious one. I need not remind the House that the graves of those Canadian soldiers who sleep in Great Britain, Belgium and France will be properly cared for. The question has been discussed in the press as to the burial of some of our men in Germany, and in this connection I received a few days ago a cable stating that arrangements have been made whereby the bodies of all Canadian soldiers who were interred in Germany will be removed into the boundaries of France before the Canadian corps leave Europe. In view of the fact that this matter is one of great concern to the Canadian people, I should like to explain that this whole question has been given the most earnest consideration for a long time. At the beginning of the war a department was created to care for and preserve the identity of the graves of British officers and men overseas., The officers of this department were directly responsible to the Director of Graves Registration and Inquiries. Graves registration units were formed to register the position of graves and see that they were marked with durable wooden crosses bearing a metal inscription giving the name, number, rank, regiment and date of death. At a later date a report was received from the High Commissioner in connection with the provision by the Imperial Government, with the co-operation of the French Government, for the registration and care of graves and the creation of a permanent organization in which the Dominion Government is represented. That organization is now in operation and is doing wonderful work. The following despatch was sent by the Colonial Secretary to His Excellency the Governor General in connection with this matter:

His Majesty's Government have decided that all Dominion officers and men dying in this country should be buried at the expense of the Imperial Government in single graves. The land required for that purpose will be acquired in perpetuity at cost of Imperial Army Funds, and all possible care taken of graves. I am confident that it will be the unanimous wish of every one in this country that His Majesty's Government should be privileged to undertake this charge and insure that the last resting place of these Dominion soldiers may not be unworthy of their sacrifice and of the cause for which they gave their lives.

This despatch was duly published, and I have no doubt that the terms in which it was couched were a source of comfort and consolation to those of our Canadian people who had lost loved ones in the course of the war.

The Imperial War Graves Commission, as it is now called, has recently issued a report made to it by Lieut-Col. Sir Frederick Kenyon, K.C.B., Director of the British Museum, in which is outlined the manner in which the cemeteries abroad will be designed. The plans include regimental patterns of headstones, central monuments in each cemetery in commemoration of the fallen, and horticultural features of beauty and interest. Similar steps have been taken with respect to graves in England, varied to meet local conditions.

In the result, perpetual care, and, what is more, perpetual honour, is guaranteed for the resting places overseas of our dead. It is natural that parents of boys who have fallen on the fields of battle should desire to have full information, and when further information is available I shall be only too glad to give it. Some people feel that the bodies of those who fell should not be left there. I appreciate their feeling, but the gratitude for and pride in our victory will centre in those graveyards abroad. They will be the real, the most precious monuments of all; for my part, it seems a great, if sad, privilege to be represented there.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Will the minister tell the House why a Canadian brigade composed of men and officers speaking the French language was not organized last year?

Major-General MEWBURN: I remember that during last session my hon. friend urged the formation of a French Canadian brigade. I pointed out at that time the many difficulties that would be encountered in carrying out that suggestion. However, I took the matter up when I was overseas, and when I was in France I spoke with French Canadian officers in command of the training camps there, as I did also in England. It was not considered practicable that these units should be withdrawn from the corps for the purpose of creating a separate and distinct brigade. The matter was taken up very fully with the overseas authorities, and they gave it very sympathetic consideration. At the time of the armistice I do not think there were sufficient troops to organize a complete, individual French Canadian brigade. It was arranged, however, that all these men who went from the province of Quebec to training camps should be drafted not only into the 22nd Battalion, which was 5 p.m. a French Canadian unit, but also into other units of the same brigade. If the war had gone on long enough—thank God, it did not—eventually these battalions might have become entirely composed of French Canadians and become part of a division and a complete French Canadian brigade. But I laid the request of the hon. member before the overseas authorities, as did the Prime Minister.

Mr. COPP: Why are soldiers now being kept at the different military districts? Some two or three hundred men are being detained at St. John and at Halifax; why is that necessary?

Major-General MEWBURN: I referred in my statement to the fact that in the various military districts a certain number of men were required to carry out the work of demobilization. We are also maintaining in each military district very small forces known as Garrison regiments, not exceeding 200 or possibly 250. It is considered wise and in the interests of the country that there should be a very small military force in each military district in order to carry out whatever work may be necessary in connection with the military organization within that district. The demobilization is being effected as speedly as possible. The men are not kept there for any special purpose, but it was considered advisable, as I have said, to retain these small forces.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I wish to draw the attention of the minister to the report that the United States authorities are bringing back the bodies of the United States soldiers who fell in France. I would ask him to give this matter consideration in regard to the bodies of Canadians who fell. I know that it would be a very heavy job, but the United States authorities are said to be doing it and a great many Canadians are urging that it be done here.

Mr. PECK, V.C.: The German armies have advanced over nearly all the Canadian grave yards. I noticed that a lot of the crosses marking the graves of soldiers had sunk into the sand and that the names were gradually fading away; in other cases the tops of the crosses had been knocked off. May I inquire whether anything is being done with regard to this? It is a very important matter.

Major-General MEWBURN: I have no personal knowledge of that. I have noticed a report that the Imperial Graves Commission has organized a large corps to go over all the battlefields of France and Flanders with a view to looking after this matter. I am personally interested in this because my own boy was left on the Somme battlefield and there is nothing to mark the spot where he fell or where he lies.

Mr. WILLIS KEITH BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address on their efforts. It has been said that soldiers have lost their personality and individuality overseas, but I understand that these gentlemen have both been overseas and have served their country, and such being the case, they have demonstrated that some hon. member on the other side of the House made a mistake in making that assertion.

I fully concur in what has been said in this House in the last few days in regard to the returned soldier and demobilization. I agree that they should not be coddled nor bothered nor the vocation of their life chosen for them. When they return to this country, let them choose the vocation which they wish to follow. I believe that they will come back here with much greater mental and physical powers than they had when they went away, because they have been under stronger discipline and have seen more material handled in a given length than they could see in this country in ten times that length of time. If any of them are maimed or disabled by loss of limb or anything of that sort which incapacitates them for being great captains of industry, they should be helped when help is necessary, and should be assisted in every way, but let them be the ones who shall choose their future vocation.

I have nothing but compliments for the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) for his frank statement as to the condition of affairs in this country. He has not endeavoured to cover it up by any legerdemain of finance, but he has given us a plain statement of facts showing us that Canada's debt is now $2,000,000,000. He also told us that our annual interest will be over $100,000,000. We, as a Canadian people, must face the facts that we have to carry on the affairs of this country and produce enough to pay that debt from our fisheries, our farmlands, our forests and our mines. The other day I received a letter from some one in Port Arthur stating that only 5 per cent of the minerals of this country are being mined. That is a tremendous mistake. If we are going to be buyers from the United States of raw products which we can produce in Canada, how are we going to develop the great resources of this country? It is bad enough to buy from the United States cotton and other tropical products, but it is an outrage on the ability of Canadians that we should be buying outside things that we have within our borders. Instead of appropriating money for housing and other schemes, the successful working out of which is problematical, we should appropriate money for scientific and industrial research. If the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Alfred Thompson) knew whereof he spoke the other night, it was a mistake that the aeroplanes, which the Government would need for this purpose, should be sold for a mere trifle. The hon. member informed us that there were riches untold in the Yukon. He said that we had there vast resources which were known only to those who had travelled the broad expanses of that great territory. If that is a fact, we have made a mistake in selling these aeroplanes which have cost such a vast amount of money.

I notice that in the Maritime Provinces there are many trawlers which the Government are trying to sell for a mere trifle of their cost. Those trawlers should be put into the fishermen's hands and the Government should take action in the matter. Canadian waters are teeming with fish and something should be done to develop this industry. Let us make living in this country cheaper and then the great question of capital and labour will be solved.

In regard to the housing scheme there are many questions to be answered. How are these houses going to be built? Who is going to live in them? Who is going to look after the repairs? I do not see how the Government can go into a housing scheme. The Americans, after the great rebellion in the United States put their shoulders to the wheel and developed their country and made themselves rich in a very short period of time. People went into the middle American States and lived in sod houses or dug-outs. We do not wish to class men who have done that with Mexican cave dwellers, and I have met some of them who are proud of the experience they have had. Until they had raised their first two or three crops and had got on to their feet financially, they lived in those sod houses, and they are no worse for the experience. Later on they were able to erect more suitable dwellings. But at this time when Canada is under the burden of an enormous debt, the Government is undertaking a housing scheme. It is not, in my opinion, possible to work it out without a great loss to this country. When the question arises as to who shall live in these houses, there will be intense jealousy amongst the people.

The Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), says that there are going to be wonderful changes in this country. The first change that I would suggest might be made is that the cabinet should be reduced from twenty-one to fourteen, and then, representation being taken according to population, a cabinet minister would represent only one individual as compared with twenty-five represented by each member of the cabinet of the United States which comprises seven members. This change could be made in the cabinet, and then it should be on a fifty-fifty basis, as I understand it was to be in the days of the Union Government.

We know that Canada must be developed, but how is that development going to be brought about? In regard to the development of its mineral resources, where is Cape Breton to-day? Is it American capital that is holding it back? The Bethlehem Works at Sandwich, Ont., some six years ago, put in foundations for a $20,000,000 plant. I do not see any reports in the press to-day from that great plant. The moment that our capital is utilized to start some work, the Americans come in and undertake some great work there that scares our capital away. Where is the great Clergue of the Sault and the Rainy River district? That was something we had great pride in. Clergue, we thought, was going to be a second Carnegie, but we hear nothing of that now. If capital cannot be induced to develop our great mines, it is necessary for the Government to do something, I do not know in what way, but we cannot build up a greater Canada without developing our own great resources.

In regard to capital and labour, the one is as necessary as the other. Living is so high at the present time that the wages of the labouring classes must be advanced, or we must have greater production to make living cheaper. There is but one way out of the difficulty. We cannot expect capital to come into this country if it is oppressed, and capital, I am sorry to say, is not over-abundant in Canada. If an industry is organized, we go to the United States in order to sell our securities. The United States is, in many ways, drawing the very life-blood out of this nation. For our amusement we get American films which are brought into our theatres, and our people rush into them and spend their money in order to see the foolish, nonsensical things that are going on there without one iota of improvement in intellect, and without receiving one cent back for the money spent. We have to get ourselves together. The brightest and smartest men are going to come from the ranks of the labour party. They can unite and start industries of their own. In this country of ours there are great water-powers, and unless they can be utilized in making goods for export, what is the object in developing them?

Both in the province of Quebec and Ontario there are hundreds of miles of Hydro lines. Under a proper housing scheme the labourers living along the railway lines and around the terminals should form their own co-operative manufacturing industrials, and they are quite capable of doing so, because the Labour party contains some of the brightest men in the Dominion of Canada to-day. Their leaders are amply qualified to organize and run these industries. That, in my opinion, would solve the problem of Labour and Capital. The men could own their own homes and have a few acres of land, and nothing conduces so much to the happiness of a man as to own his own home. In the United States, industries have been started out in the country, and land that was purchased for a few thousand dollars is sub-divided into homes for the people who are operating the industry. One minister has told us that the Government is going on with its housing scheme to keep Bolshevism down. I want to tell the Government that the land on which these houses will be built will cost more than both the land and the house could be purchased for in the rural sections. Land could be bought in the country, accessible to the city by trolley lines, and the homes could have every modern convenience, and no one is so happy as when he is in his own shebang. I think that would be one of the finest things we could do in this reconstruction period. Last night at the Forum in Ottawa, the spokesman of the great Methodist Church said: "We are ready to join with the masses, not the classes." We certainly welcome that church with joy to the great family of democracy. That is only one of the great bodies in Canada to-day that says we must have a united people and that this must be attained by taking a practical interest in the common people. But we can never do this unless the cabinet undoes some of the things it has done by Order in Council. That notorious War-Time Elections Act should have been repealed long ago, as well as other legislation that has been passed by this Government. Unless we have good government in this country we cannot expect people to be attracted to it. I would urge the Government in framing a new Election Act not to disfranchise any nationality. Let them disfranchise the people who make disloyal speeches or commit acts of violence against the State, but do not disfranchise a man simply because he comes from Germany or Austria-Hungary, because many of these people have left those countries simply because they were dissatisfied with conditions there and were told there was a democratic government in this country. There are whole communities of these so-called aliens who have helped to build up Canada, especially in the middle West, and I have great respect for these people. An hon. member opposite said the other day that the population of this country will have doubled in a decade. I would ask him, if we are going to hand-pick the immigrants, where is this population to come from when they know we have an undemocratic and unbusinesslike government here and an enormous national debt? All laws should be enacted by Parliament not by Council.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

I wish to take issue with the statement of the Minister of Militia and Defence who said he did not know of any soldier in Siberia who was not a volunteer. I know that lots of men have been sent to Siberia after the armistice was signed who have protested every inch of the way they have been forced to go. Only six weeks ago some of the men were in Japan; they had not reached Siberia then. What right has this country, with its enormous debt, to protect the interests of the United States, Great Britain or France in Siberia? We have no trouble with the people over there. I noticed by the press that the Bolshevik were dropping bombs from aeroplanes on the Americans near Archangel the other day. Why should this country spend money on an expeditionary force to Siberia? There are a great many other things we could better spend our money on. Only the fringe of our resources has yet been developed and we must dig deep if we are to get something worth while from the bowels of this earth that will help to pay our national debt.

I have one or two charges to make against this Government. The Act for raising revenue by means of stamps on matches, powder puffs, perfume, toilet articles and patent medicines is a good one, and in view of the financial state of this country we could do with more taxes of this nature. But I want to protest against the way some of the officers of the Government enforce this Act. With the exception of toilet articles and patent medicines the manufacturers themselves affix the stamps on the articles I have mentioned. I remember well the hon. member for Bellechase (Mr. Fournier) condemning this Government last year for allowing—I do not know whether he called them "hounds"—but at all events, for allowing these "specials" to travel around the country and drop on some poor woman running a store, who may not have five hundred dollars worth of merchandise in the whole place. While the store owner was at lunch, a little child took charge of the shop and the "special" came in. He bought a certain article and as the child could not reach it, the "special" took it from off the shelf. Very shortly afterwards the woman received a visit from the high sheriff of the district, and she was fined $50 and costs; and as the costs always equal the fine in these cases, the woman had to pay $100. These "specials" have invaded practically every constituency in the Dominion. In the name of common sense, cannot we remedy this state of affairs? The concoctor of vile nostrums who spills enough printer's ink may start out with a basket and become a millionaire in twenty years.

Why not have the manufacturers of patent medicines, perfumes, and toilet articles put on the stamps in their own factories? The Government gets a revenue of $196,000 from this tax, and it is a tax on every soul in Canada, and yet it does not pay the expense of its own collection. Fifteen years ago, when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was Minister of Finance they had a Stamp Act imposing a tax upon patent medicines. Notice was given to every dealer to estimate the stock in hand of patent medicines, and the stamps were sent to be affixed. It was a tax of only 1 per cent, instead of 4, and 4 is not too much. But it made unnecessary the operation of these special agents and obviated the necessity of these trials and fines. It was a measure decidedly in the public interest. One of these agents came into my county and got cases against two dealers who are by no means among the rich men of the county. I was discussing this matter the other day with a member representing a New Brunswick constituency. He told me that in his county a local druggist was running a little ice cream concern as a part of his business. For a time the person in charge of the drug department was absent and one of these specials—probably knowing the circumstances—dropped in. The girl serving the ice cream counter was asked by him for a package of talcum powder. She said she knew nothing about it, did not even know the price. He said, "That is no matter; it is never more than twenty-five cents." He put down the price, took the package and went away. That cost the proprietor of that store $50, and I never knew a case where the expense of the suit was not equal to the fine. That is simply robbing the dealers of this country to enrich the manufacturers who compound these nostrums, and we know that some of these are worth their millions, made out of the people by the lavish use of printers' ink which almost forces the people to buy these medicines. I asked the Finance Minister to reform this condition. Surely it can only be by oversight that it has been allowed to continue.

I have another charge to make. The farmers, who are the very backbone of Canada, whose work is the foundation of our wealth, upon whom we depend most to pay our enormous debt and who work, many of them, a hundred hours a week, are not fairly treated. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) said he asked no favours for the farmers, nor do I, but I do ask for them justice. The farmers were told to raise hogs for bacon. They went at it, and paid as high as $90 per ton for corn. Yet the Government did not guarantee the price of their produce as was guaranteed to the flour miller. But the flour miller makes twelve and fifteen per cent. By the time the farmer had his pork fattened, corn was selling at $70 per ton. Then, again, the Canada Food Board would not allow the farmer to export his cream. All the butter of this country was commandeered, and the farmer could not even eat his own butter, unless it were produced in his own house—he could not take it from the creamery. It was commandeered at 42 cents a pound, and was held by the commission merchants until they got 48 cents a pound, a nice profit for them of six cents. The profit went to the big men who could afford to do something to keep the Government wheels running. In January last butter was 72 cents in New York, and in Montreal 52 cents. A farmer on the border wrote the Food Controller in Ottawa for permission to send his milk into the United States, which would have made an advance in his receipts of about $100 a month. But the answer was, "No." The rich Americans could take out the cream and milk and make a big profit on it. Is not that suggestive again that there is a nigger in the fence? I do not accuse the Government, but we know that the people who enjoy the bénefits of this arrangement are Americans . I do not care to name them, but if anybody wants them he can have them. In this as in other matters the Government is for the big interests, while the welfare of the people is not considered.

It has been proposed that we should have a Department of Health. One department that we could do away with is the Department of Trade and Commerce. Last session, the minister of that department, who is one of the oldest men in this House, spent a week talking about eggs and the quality of eggs, and I presume how many there were in a dozen. He talked also of hay and the quality of hay, and about cement, and the quantity that should be put into a bag. But, as Hansard shows, he could not answer one practical question. Instead of the Department of Trade and Commerce, we need a Department of Industry, with a broad gauge man of energy and big ideas, at its head, a man who knows the practical affairs of Canada and of the world. I am not personally acquainted with all the ministers and possibly they have among them a man of the calibre I have indicated. If so they should form a Department of Industry and put him at its head.

I wish to say a few words on this question of public health. It is a fact that, notwithstanding the almost inconceivable sins that are committed to prevent it, there is a pretty fair crop of babies arrive in this country every year. The lamentable fact is that only two-fifths of these live to the age of three years. Every one loves the soul of a child. I believe that this would be the prerogative of women if they ever turn their attention to Parliament. We all believe in the conservation of humanity to the fullest extent but we want to have fewer departments instead of more. I think that all hon. gentlemen on the other side will agree with me in that. As for adults, I would say: Stand straight, breathe deep, live temperately and you will live longer and more happily than you otherwise would. I said in my campaign that if I was elected to this Parliament I would not speak when opportunity offered, but when duty demanded it. I was a very close listener last session, as I hope to be this session.

Mr. RICHARD CLIVE COOPER (South Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the matters that I wish to take up in connection with the debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I desire to refer at some length to the remarks made by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes). I am glad to state that a better man than I will take this matter up and will deal with the Cambrai and Mons battles from personal knowledge of these great events. I allude to Col. Peck, V.C. The hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton has given us an honour roll of the members of this House. We find that it is very inaccurate and incomplete and that the recapitulation of services given by that hon. member is not actually in accord with events as they occurred. In dealing with one hon. member of this House, the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie), the hon. member for Victoria takes occasion to defend his own action, as well as the action of the hon. member for Simcoe, at the battle of St. Julien in 1915. I have nothing to say in regard to the hon. member for Simcoe, but as the insinuation is made that the only man who could be confused with him is Brigadier-General A. W. Currie of the 2nd Infantry Brigade as he was then, I venture to take up the cudgels on his behalf. We find that the hon. member for Victoria is ubiquitous. There seemed to be some system of telepathy existing between him and the hon. member for Simcoe. We find that every movement of this particular officer during the battle of St. Julien was known to the then Minister of Militia sitting safely at home in Ottawa. I do not intend to enter into any discussion as regards where Col. Currie was at the battle of St. Julien but I will say that for the first time in my life, between six a.m. and seven a.m. on April 24, 1915, I saw Col. J. A. Currie of the 15th Battalion and spoke to him. I did not see him again until I came here last session. In the latter part of 1915 I was in England and I read with extreme disgust the remarks made by the then Minister of Militia and Defence in defence of this particular officer. As I before stated, it is only because of my intention to clear the name of our greatest Canadian soldier from any stigma that I am making these remarks.

On the evening of the 22nd April, 1915, I was, with part of my company, within 200 yards of the village of St. Julien and Gen. Currie was at Brigade Battle headquarters at Fortuin and there I received certain orders from him. It was at this time that the gas came over, the Turcos came streaming back while St. Julien was being laid flat. I moved out to the fields. It was wise. I met Gen. Currie and he said: "Cooper, come along over to Brigade Headquarters until we see what is going to be done." We got orders to move up in support of the 8th Battalion. I did not see General Currie again until the night of the 23rd April, 1915, when he came out to see how we were getting on at the Kerrselaere cross-roads. On the 24th April I spoke to General Currie about five o'clock in the afternoon at Fortuin. Subsequently, during the night he took the remnants of two battalions of his brigade on to the Gravenstafel ridge. The remnants consisted of my own battalion, the 7th, and the 10th, Western Canadians. General Currie placed us in position and told us what he knew of the situation in front of us. Then he went to headquarters of the 8th and 5th Battalions who were on our right flank. The next occasion on which I saw General Currie was on the early morning of the 26th when we rejoined the remnants of our brigade at St. Jean. General Currie then led the brigade composed of the remnants of the 5th, 7th, 8th and 10th Battalions up to a line in advance of Fortuin and the Hannabeke, where we remained until the Tuesday night, he establishing his brigade headquarters alongside of us and personally went around to cheer up the men of the brigade. On leaving the salient on the night of the 28th April, General Currie was the last man out. I would further refer to the hon. member's remark.

> Well, Sir, from the outset of this war I am on record as standing for the saving of the lives of our boys unless it was absolutely necessary that they should be sacrificed.

Having placed this on record in Hansard, I may ask if he gave this matter the consideration he states when he forced the Ross rifle on the 2nd and subsequent divisions of Canadian troops. The hon. member speaks of Cambrai in the following terms:

> I know Cambrai well. General Mewburn has seen Cambrai.

And so on. He says he knows Cambrai. So do I, but only on the map, and I venture to suggest that that is the fullest knowledge the hon. member also has of it. The hon. gentleman quoted from a letter written by him to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) which, in Hansard is undated and which says in part:

> Any ass can sit back and simply order battalion after battalion to go forward to certain death. General Foch does not want that sort of thing, neither do the people of Canada.

His remark is only to true, but also is it true of those who stand back 3,500 milles and, without full information to guide them, undertake to criticise.

For the information of the hon. member I would draw his attention to the result of the Cambrai battle. Official information shows us that the Canadian Artillery fired 7,000 tons of ammunition against visible targets of troops. In close formation our heavy artillery engaged two hundred such targets. We captured more than seven thousand prisoners and two hundred pieces of heavy and field artillery. Our total captures from the 8th of August until the 1st October amounted to twenty-eight thousand prisoners, five hundred guns, over three thousand machine guns, and an immense quantity of stores. The battle of Cambrai was the deciding one of this period of the war. It broke the great Hindenburg line, and left an open country with only natural obstacles for our troops to fight over in front of them. In giving this information, Sir, I am quoting from official sources. The hon. member spoke of Cambrai as though it were a tragedy. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that far from being a tragedy, it presents material for an epic, worthy to rank with those written of the " contemptibles " and our own First Division, at the second battle of Ypres.

Now let me refer to the capture of Mons. Official information shows us that on the 9th November, 1918, the Huns were in full retreat along the whole front of the British armies; that Maubeuge was occupied by the guards and the 62nd Division, with the Canadian Corps approaching Mons. Five British armies, with cavalry and cyclists operating in advance of the infantry, were making a steady forward movement; only in the neighbourhood of Mons was any determined opposition met with. Here we find the Canadians advancing towards the town from the south and west, and working round it on the north. Our Third Division captured Mons in the early morning of the 11th of November, killing, wounding, or taking prisoner all the German garrison. The total casualty list shows seventy-five of all ranks, while they took over a hundred unwounded prisoners. This battle, fought on the holy ground that their glorious predecessors, " the old contemptibles," had to retire from against overwhelming odds in 1914, must surely remain indelibly impressed on the memory of the splendid men who were privileged to take part in this action, and on the people of Canada as a fitting culmination to the great work of our corps.

The hon. member spoke as follows about the Mons battle:—

> I have just this to say about Mons. Were I in authority the officer who, four hours before the armistice was signed, although he had been notified beforehand that the armistice was to begin at eleven o'clock, ordered the attack on Mons, thus needlessly sacrificing the lives of Canadian soldiers, would be tried summarily by court martial and punished so far as the law would allow. There was no glory to be gained, and you cannot find one Canadian soldier returning from France who will not curse the name of the officer who ordered the attack on Mons.

The suggestion made there by the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton, and given broadcast to the fathers, mothers, wives and children of Canadian soldiers, is that General Currie, for his own glorification, deliberately gave the order to capture Mons on the morning of the armistice. A graver indictment of a man I have never heard; in effect, the indictment is wholesale murder. Now, I want to protect General Currie's name to the utmost that an humble member of the army, like myself, can. A little later I will endeavour to explain the chain of authority that exists in the British army, and you will then see that whoever may have been responsible for the order for the attack on Mons, General Currie and the Canadian Corps were just a " cog in the wheel." The hon. member has, I believe, some claim to distinction in regard to winning the South African War. He is an honorary Lieutenant-General in the Service, and for this reason he should at least be as au fait with matters of a military nature as a sergeant. But a sergeant would know all about the chain of authority in the army and would not have made such a foolish statement as the hon. member made here. At the time of the armistice, on November 11, 1918, we find that the Huns were still an unbeaten force. We find that they still occupied entrenchments behind barbed wire, with their guns, ammunition, and units practically intact. They were still an efficient fighting force. Now, I would like to put the situation to the House in this way: Probably all of you, at one time or another, have seen, if not a prize fight, then a boxing match. I would suggest that the position the Allied armies were in on the morning of the 11th November is somewhat the same as a man who is boxing another, and has his opponent almost down and out. The winner knows that the bell is going to ring in about fifteen seconds, but from some notion of chivalry—doubtless a foolish sentiment—he does not knock his opponent out. That is the position of the Allied army before the Huns on the date mentioned. They had no guarantee that the armistice was going to be signed; they had to hammer the brute to be certain that he would sign it.

I would now like to deal with the chain of authority in the army, and I promise not to detain the House unduly in doing so.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. RICHARD CLIVE COOPER (continuing): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was proceeding to detail the chain of authority as it existed in the British Army. As is well known to most people in Canada and the civilized world, Allied operations from last spring were in the hands of Marshal Foch, assisted by an Allied staff. Marshal Foch, assisted by his staff, was responsible for the plan of campaign in all theatres of war in Europe. He, therefore, laid out his plan of campaign, dealing more particularly with the western front. On forming his campaign he called together the leaders of the various Allied armies in France, explained what he wanted done, and gave them their part in the operation. These Allied Commanders in their turn called in the general officers—in our own case—commanding the British armies and allotted them their part in the operations to take place. The General Officer Commanding the army, in his turn, calls on the General Officers Commanding the army corps and allots them their portion of the scheme inside of his army. The Army Corps commanders then call the divisional commanders together, who are allotted their portion of the work inside of the Army Corps. The divisional commanders call the brigade commanders together and allot them their portion of the work inside of the divisional part of the operation. The brigade commanders call the battalion commanders together and allot them their part of the work inside of the brigade. The battalion commanders then collect the company commanders and company officers and explain the work in so far as it is necessary for these officers to know it, and they in their turn go back to the companies and tell the non-commissioned officers and men what is expected of them. In dealing, therefore, with the suggestion that has been advanced that General Currie was responsible for unnecessary loss of life in the Canadian Corps at Cambrai and Mons, it will easily be seen that General Currie was just one small cog in a very large wheel. His was the part that the Allied staff had allotted to him and, just as in the days of the old Light Brigade, " His not to reason why "; he simply carried out orders.

I turn now to another portion of the hon. gentleman's remarks, not made in this House. I regret that the hon. gentleman is not in his chair, as I hate to hit a man behind his back. Here, however, is a point that I feel very strongly upon and about which I should like to speak.

We understand, Sir, that we are entitled to criticise our own people; but we of the Canadian Army resent very strongly a criticism of the British Army by a man who was not there. I turn to a cutting from a newspaper report of a speech delivered by the hon. member at London, Ontario. He says:

> They stood their ground while the Yorks and Durhams threw away their Lee-Enfields and ran because they had "bum" ammunition. On the third day some of the Canadians got some of this ammunition themselves.

Sir, the hon. member rises to a wonderful defamatory height in this connection; his egotism and his dogmatism are absolutely inimitable. But I submit to you, Sir, and to the people of Canada that Canadian brothers in arms will not stand for one moment any reflection being cast upon our Imperial brothers. He referred to two regiments; I shall speak of one of which I know. The Durham Light Infantry came in across the Zonnebeke front and took over part of the trenches of the 8th Battalion, the "Little Black Devils", and they subsequently vacated their trenches during the afternoon of Sunday, the twenty-fifth of April, 1915. The hon. member has quite omitted to mention that these battalions were part of a Northumbrian division which had been less than two days in France, and were hurled into that hell of gas and high explosive and machine gun fire. He says they ran away. As far as the Durhams are concerned, that is not true; the Durhams retired in perfect order—too perfect order, Sir—they retired in platoons, and I saw them cut to pieces, leaving their dead behind in swathes. It is a pity that the license of this House is not better taken care of. Free speech is well in its way, but speech that is too free is very bad.

I turn for a moment to go one further than the Minister of Militia did this afternoon, and when I have gone that one further I think that every Canadian will thrill with pride. I have taken the trouble to work out a little bit of detail as regards our Canadian decorations. I find that 418,052 men went overseas and that 15,750 won decorations and mentions, of which 3,333 were mentions and 443 one bar or more to decorations. The Minister mentioned that this afternoon, but the point I would like to make is that if one decoration had been given to one man instead of one man earning two or more decorations, one man in approximately twenty-seven of the Canadians who went overseas to fight would have been decorated. I think that is a wonderful record. The tale is not yet told, of course, of decorations; we may find three or four hundred more going to our splendid men.

I quote from the Toronto Globe of the sixth of this month, and I feel sure that many thousands of the people of Canada will re-echo the sentiment contained therein:

> The terrors of the war have been great and manifold for our gallant men in France, but Sir Sam Hughes is a greater than any of them. The enemy never dealt a fouler blow than that directed by Sir Sam Hughes against the leaders of the Canadian Army still in the field and unable to defend themselves.

I turn now to a matter that I conceive it to be my duty—rightly or wrongly, I do not know, rightly, I believe,—to touch upon. I have the honour to suggest to the Government that they make General Sir Arthur Currie, K.C.B., some monetary grant of generous proportions as a recognition of his wonderful service in command of the Canadian Corps. It has been the custom in the Empire to reward our great men in a like manner and we here at home should not fail in this regard. We find that our great leader comes back with all the honours in the shape of decorations that a grateful home Government can bestow upon him, and we, in our turn, must do something worthy of the glory which he has brought to us. I am proud to say—this is reflected glory, of course—that I knew General Currie before the war in Victoria, B.C. I enlisted at the same time as he did and I served in the same brigade. Without a tinge of envy, I congratulate him on his work. Victoria congratulates her citizen, and Canada will congratulate her son.

Let me now discuss a few subjects that are of general interest to Canada as a whole, and possibly more especially to my own part of the world. In passing, I would like to refer to the two officers, members of this House, who moved and seconded the Address. They did well—"but then, they are Canadian soldiers."

The sudden transition from war to peace has, I believe, found us, to a certain extent, unprepared. I believe that we are better prepared than any other of our Allies, and I feel confident that if we all work together to help the schemes that the Government is now putting into operation, Canada will not suffer in any great degree, in the near future.

I should like to allude, for a moment, to the visits of our Cabinet Ministers to the West. There is only one way in which our country can be held together. It is vast; it has diverse nationalities; it has many diverse problems, and the only way for the Government to know the feeling of each portion is for the members of this Government to travel. I will welcome, as every man in my own province will welcome, the visit of any member of the Government at any time he can come.

As a comparatively new comer to Canada and as a new member of this House, it may seem presumption that I should refer to the late great leader of the Opposition.

I followed the late, great leader's career long before I came to Canada. I remember him as an outstanding figure in the Diamond Jubilee, although I was not at that time in England. Canada has suffered a great loss. The Empire has suffered a loss. I trust that Canada will rise to greater heights by reason of the example that he has left us.

I turn now to something that may be new to this House, and this may even not be the proper place in which to bring this matter up. In my notes, I have this headed "War Memorials." People's thoughts are now turning to memorials to perpetuate the memory of our fallen, but unfortunately, their thoughts are turning to stone and iron to perpetuate flesh and blood. That is wrong. It is not worthy of the men who gave their lives that we might be free. I suggest that there is a greater, nobler, finer memorial to be erected to our fallen. I suggest that education is the only possible, adequate method of perpetuating the memory of the "immortals." Before I came to Canada, I spent some eleven years of my life in South Africa and some eight years of that in Rhodesia. During that time, on three occasions, I was with the late Rt. Hon. Cecil Rhodes, in three of his trips into the south Gazaland country. On two occasions before the South African war, and the last time was a few months before he died. At that time, he was working out his scheme of scholarships. I was a youngster then and did not take very much interest in it. He often said to me: " Cooper, education is the greatest factor on earth." I said, " Yes." I did not think much about it. He said that he was going to establish a scheme that would reach into every country in the world, and he did so. I suggest that this country can perpetuate the memory of her immortals in no better way than by founding scholarships along the same lines, with such amendments to the Rhodes' Scholarships as may be necessary. These scholarships, I would suggest, would go, in the first instance, to those young men who, when the war began, were in the transition period between school and business life and who, owing to the war have lost one or more years of their lives. They should be the first to be considered. Needless to say, there would have to be some kind of educational test. The scheme would not be practical without it. The second people to be considered would be the children of our soldiers, not only of those who have fallen, but of those who are still living. At the end of a certain term of years, these scholarships could be turned over at large to the children of this country. There would be no question of creed. All would be on an equal basis. The scheme, endorsed by the Federal Government and supported by every provincial and municipal Government interested and given to the people of Canada to subscribe a capital sum, would, I have not the least doubt, bring from the people of Canada alone a sum amounting to twenty or more million dollars. Such a sum would be adequate for between one thousand to fifteen hundred children a year. Work that out in percentage of our population and see what it means in ten, fifteen or twenty years. I do not see any reason for the scheme not succeeding. I feel that the wealthy men in Canada will give freely; that those who have lost their sons or their husbands will give freely for other people's sons or husbands; that the poor people who cannot afford much, will, seeing so much likely to be offered for their children in the future, also make an effort to subscribe. So I think there is very little doubt that the money could be subscribed, and the scheme would be limited only by the amount subscribed.

There is another point. Our desire for the future is to receive such a class of immigrant that we will never think of turning him out. Our eyes naturally turn to the Mother Country, and I submit that if the many hard-working people who are anxious to emigrate, for many reasons, one of which is education, see the advantages that Canada offers to her children, they will come to this country. I notice in a cutting from the London Daily Mail of February 3 that two hundred Canadian fighting men are to be selected from students in the overseas forces for British university training while they are awaiting demobilization. One hundred are to be chosen from the men in France and the other hundred from the men in England, but only those students who have completed their second year in medicine, theology, agriculture, engineering, law, etc., in some Canadian university are eligible. That is good, Sir, but it does not go far enough. This scheme may seem somewhat Utopian, but I really do not see any reason why it cannot be made a reality if the Government will appoint the right men to foster the idea.

There is a matter of importance which I have not yet heard discussed in this House. I refer to national service. We have just concluded a great war which has taught us, if anything, one great lesson, and that is to be ready. I do not purpose to enter into details of any particular scheme. I only say that now, with the ending of a great war, it is our duty to prepare for future wars. The training of our children should be carefully gone into in the schools so that if we are at any time confronted with another war our children will be ready to step into arms without any loss of time. If we had been prepared in 1914 it is more than likely this war would not have been fought. If it had been fought, and we had been prepared, it would have been ended very much sooner, with a huge saving of blood, misery and treasure. It is our duty then to provide properly organized units with proper leaders. I have talked with many officers coming back from France who have compared the men who enlisted under the Military Service Act with the volunteer, and not a single one will give the same credit to a draftee that he will give to a volunteer. There is not a volunteer that can possibly fight on equal terms with a draftee. It is our duty then to do away with such unfortunate things. Let us make every one serve the country. It should be the pride of every man, woman and child to serve the country that gave him or her birth. Further, Sir, it should be the duty of the Government to see that its people are ready.

I turn to another subject—one that has occasioned intense bitterness not alone in Government circles—I am not alluding to Ottawa, though I know it is rife in Ottawa —but in other parts of the country, and particularly in Vancouver. In the Government service there are employed very many women who need not of necessity earn their living. These women have, in most cases, got there, not by competence, but by influence, and I say it is unfair competition against their more needy sisters. I think the Government should take a hand in this matter and clean up the Government services as far as they possibly can. I know that a great many women worked during the war for patriotic reasons, but there were a large number also who worked for patriotic reasons plus salary.

I now come to the question of our natural resources, and one in particular I wish to mention. It seems to me the natural resources of our country have been the plaything of political parties. They have been handed out for services rendered; the nature of the service need not be specified. But now the time has come for that to cease. For the future we must as far as in our power lies conserve the natural resources of Canada for the British. One industry in particular—the fishing industry in British Columbia, with which I am more familiar than any other—is packed full of all kinds of aliens who only became naturalized for the sole purpose of exploiting the fisheries of British Columbia. They gave us no service in the war; in fact, in many cases they were openly hostile to the cause of the Allies. The smaller kinds of licenses, such as the gill-net and the purse-seine were granted largely as political favours and in a great many cases, particularly as regards the canneries, a virtual monoply has been created for a favoured few. I submit that in this particular industry very careful revision should be made of the licenses issued, and those who have not given service should be passed over in favour of those who have. At all events, those who have served should be given the preference. I find that last year there were 5,288 gill-net licenses issued in the province of British Columbia, of which 700 were held by Britishers, which includes natural born Canadians and men from all parts of the British Empire; Indians, the indigenous natives of British Columbia, 1,130; Japanese, 2,629, or 49.70 per cent; Swedes, 105, or 2 per cent, and Swedes in many cases were nearly as bad as the Huns; Finns, who are closely allied to the Swedes, 196, or 3.70 per cent; Norwegians, who are slightly better than the previous two, 220 or 4.20 per cent; Greeks, 59; Austrian, 32; Spanish, 25; German, 21, and other nationalities, 170. Of course, these are all naturalized British subjects. I am not dealing with the other and more valuable types of licenses, because I cannot obtain the figures from the department, but, what I want the House to note carefully is, that outside the Indians, the British born have 13.23 per cent gill-net licenses in British Columbia waters, the balance going to aliens.

I find a resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements), dealing with the subject of enemy aliens. Should I be in order, Mr. Speaker, in discussing that matter now?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the hon. member could discuss the matter generally, but he would not be in order in referring particularly to that resolution.

Mr. COOPER: The province of British Columbia is concerned in having large government works undertaken at once, and wherever it is possible that a return may be had, even if not for years to come. In British Columbia we have not the industries of the older provinces, and we must necessarily have public works to carry us through this transition period. I congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) on the policy of public works which he has launched. I would point out in that connection that in our province we must re-absorb the 51,000 men—less casualties—whom we sent to the war, and many more besides. I am told that the wonderful climate of British Columbia attracts many, and I understand that we are getting some 35,000 more people. We have not work for them at this time, and the only way to absorb them at present is by starting public works.

I trust the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) will go carefully with immigration. Let him bear in mind the large number that are coming back, for whom it will not be easy immediately to find places. I further hope that the policy followed by previous party governments will not be followed by this administration but the future interests of our country will be considered—we do not hold our country for ourselves, we hold it for the future.

Amongst the Orders in Council brought down is No. 179, which deals with the payment of passage to the dependents of soldiers being brought back to Canada or who were never in Canada before. I wish to tell the Minister of Immigration and Colonization that that Order in Council is rank discrimination, that many of the women and children whose passages back to Canada are being paid by the Government, are people who remained in the Old Country and ate the Old Country's much-needed bread against the wishes of that government, with these people it was purely a matter of selfishness. One cannot condemn them, of course, because their nearest and dearest were there. But the majority should have been considered. I think that, if it is the intention of the Government to pay the passages of these people, then it is its duty to pay also the passages of those who came back to Canada prior to November 11, 1918.

The War Service gratuity is a method of covering the transition period between doffing the uniform and putting on the mufti. It is not the best way out, in my opinion; I am afraid it will cost the country much unnecessary money. But it is good. Yet here again we have discrimination; the Order in Council was not properly thought out. I want to bring to the attention of the Government a very just claim in connection with this war service gratuity, the claim of the Imperial reservist who lived in Canada prior to the war and who, when the war started, rushed home to join the colours. He went home and served for 1 s. 1 d. a day—say twenty-seven cents a day. Our Canadian soldiers got $1.10 a day. The Imperial soldier had no reason to complain because the Patriotic Fund came forward generously and augmented his pay to approximately the same as that of the Canadian soldier. But, while they are grateful for that, they are slightly discriminated against by this Order in Council dealing with the war service gratuity. I understand that that is not our business, but I submit to you that these men gave just as efficient service to Canada and to the Empire as did the Canadian soldiers. They have come back to their homes in Canada and have to live under Canadian conditions, and therefore they are entitled to the same war gratuity as are the Canadian soldiers. The Imperial Government has issued a war service gratuity, but no distinction is made between single and married men. Therefore, the private soldier with war service from 1914 up to the present time, if a single man, would receive approximately $200 less than his more fortunate Canadian brother, while the married man would receive approximately $450 less than the married soldier in a Canadian unit. I trust the Government will look into this matter; I sincerely believe that these men have a just claim.

Now, I turn to consider very briefly the case of the man who served in Canada. That man, metaphorically speaking, has been hooted by every Tom, Dick and Harry in the country, he has been called a slacker and other opprobrious names, in many cases without any justification whatever.

There are many splendid men in the service in Canada who have eaten their hearts out to go to the front but who have been discriminated against. We find that the man who had given service in Canada, and was demobilized prior to the 11th November, 1918, does not benefit under the terms of the war service gratuity. It is unintentional discrimination perhaps but it is certainly discrimination.

The Order in Council dealing with clothing allowance gives the first men to come back $8 to $13 and they had to hand in their uniform. This was subsequently increased to $35 but was not made retroactive. I can readily understand that the departments concerned in this matter would have to work possibly until the judgment day in dealing with these retroactive measures, but, in all fairness, I think something should be done to meet the many justifiable complaints that are received from all over the country in connection with this matter.

In the clothing allowance, as in war service gratuity, the draftee benefits at the expense of his volunteer brother. This is hardly fair. I want to take up the case of the officers for one moment because they are not allowed to speak for themselves. I want to deal with the $100 that was given to the officers in England last year. We find that an officer who went to England and never got any farther than England, on August 1, 1918, was entitled to an extra $100 clothing allowance, making in a year or fifteen months $350. We have against that an officer who served overseas and in Canada since September, 1914, and who had to do with the inadequate allowance of $250. I do not believe that there is a single officer in Canada who would make any complaint except for what appears to be discrimination. I submit that men who have given good service in Canada, but who have not gone to England or France, should have been given this extra allowance, not because they desired it but in order to equalize matters.

The Minister of Militia this afternoon mentioned the War Service Button. We have been very generous in our distribution of War Service Buttons but there is a class of men that we have overlooked. There are many thousands of men who, with the best intentions in the world, joined up to go and have a smack at the Huns but who, for some reason or other, were disqualified and never got there. Many of these young men looking physically fit have had the finger of scorn pointed at them as they walked down the street. Is it not possible to give them some badge by which they could show their fellow men that they had tried to go?

The Land Settlement Act is an excellent piece of legislation. I would like to see it put into force just as quickly as ever the Government can, but I should like to see the matter dealt with according to various provincial problems and conditions. What might be adequate provision for a Prairie Province is not adequate for a province like British Columbia, we will say. I would like to see the measure very much increased in its scope. I think it desirable that men who have given good service in Canada should benefit by its provisions. I need hardly point out to the House that every man we can send to the land, who proves to be an efficient farmer, is a national asset, and that every man we can drag away from the city is a saving in labour unrest. A large amount of labour unrest comes in the winter months when we have men from the prairie, farms, bush, and fisheries flocking into town, some with a little money and who, when they have no money left and no work, sit around and make mischief.

Pensions are, in my opinion, inadequate. They are unequal in the way they are determined. I do not think that the method of determining pensions is the right one. I believe that better service could be given if a board were provided in each province, or, where provinces are alike in conditions, in two or more provinces, to deal with peculiar provincial matters. I believe also it would be a wise provision, or until conditions are stabilized, to look at this question of pensions from the rural or city standpoint. It is unquestionably a fact that a person cannot live in a city in the same way that he can out on a farm, and where a person of necessity must live in the city, that fact should be considered. I would suggest that pensions err on the side of generosity consistent with our financial strength.

Prohibition is a very vexed question. I will stand behind the Government, in so far as I am personally concerned, for total prohibition for one year from date. I believe it will be in the best interests of the country that liquor should not find its way freely into the hands of the people until our conditions are stabilized. After that time it should go to the people of the country to decide. I will not say what they should decide for.

In thinking out new taxes to meet the interest on our huge outlay during the war, I sincerely trust my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) will not overlook the very large number of people who to-day do not come within the provisions of the present income tax. I allude to single men earning from $800 to $1,100 a year and who might very well pay a small amount into the Government's coffers.

I will ask the Government to go a little farther in the matter of vocational training. It has been found in many cases that the term allowed for the learning of a certain industry or profession is not adequate. It would be an act of kindness to many young men who are in the transition period if an extra fortnight—in some cases a month, in other cases possibly as high as six months,—were allowed so that they could complete their course and become useful citizens of the country.

Further, I would ask the Government to enlarge the scope of the vocational training, whereby it could embrace the young man who went overseas under age, and whose return was asked by his parents on that score, but who is now debarred from the benefits of the vocational training.

I congratulate the Government on its wisdom in placing the Royal North West Mounted Police in the Western Provinces, because I think it is really the only way whereby Federal legislation will be properly administered.

I have never been a party man, for I have always felt that the cult of party led to a neglect of national ideals, and that the country always suffered from it. I was glad when in December, 1917, so many men from the other side of the House joined up with those that were on this side, and made a strong party with a united front to face the problems of the future. I trust that hon. gentlemen will not be too exacting in their demands from the Government, but will help it in all reasonable ways in their power, in order to get the country back into a real stable condition.

One more remark and I shall close. It amused me intensely to listen to the wild poetic flights that some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House indulged in. There was a delightful parody, for example, by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). I cannot at the moment recall it, but if I remember rightly, it was plagiarized from a hymn book. That hon. gentleman enjoys a Scotch name, and must surely be familiar with Bobbie Burns. I will therefore quote from the words of the immortal Bobbie, in answer to the hon. gentleman's eulogy of the leader of the Opposition:

9 p.m.

Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us
To see ourselves as others see us!
It would from many a blunder free us,

Mr. JOSEPH M. DEMERS (St. Johns and Iberville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at first I wish to refer to the renowned and well beloved leader of the Liberal party whose sudden death has so brutally robbed his fellow citizens of their affection and admiration.

I shall not venture to even attempt to add to the remarkable tributes which have been successively paid to his memory by religious and lay orators in most eloquent sermons and speeches, as well as by journalists in writings that are wonderful in style and inspiration.

I simply wish to lay quietly the tribute of my grief on the grave barely closed of this great man, who personified so well the noblest and best qualities of his race, which is also mine.

I do not intend to prolong this debate, I am usually brief and so shall be to-day. But I thought it was my duty to address this House on this occasion, as I believe there cannot be a more favourable one for a member to express his views and make his observations on the political condition such as he sees it.

From the beginning of this debate we have heard of re-adjustment and reconstruction. Under ordinary circumstances, there would be not any question of re-adjustment or re-construction before we had made our inventory, so as to realize to what extent we were disorganized. However we find ourselves under such exceptional circumstances that we need not take stock, for the disorganization is complete, general, manifest and admitted by all.

We are politically, socially and economically disorganized. Such is the condition, Mr. Speaker, in which we find our country after the war. Before the war, we had a constitutional and democratic government, now we have but a dictatorship; we had a Parliament and this Parliament has been ignored by the Government during and after the war and now perhaps more than ever before. The representatives of the people were left aside, and instead of the guarantee of a parliamentary legislation, we were swamped by Orders in Council, thus doing away with our constitutional guarantees.

If the Government intend to carry on a work of reconstruction, first of all, they must re-establish democracy in this country, namely the government of the people through their representatives.

Before the war, Canada had the reputation of being above all a land of liberty. The Government has changed it all and individual liberty, the freedom of speech and of the press were abolished and replaced by coercion and intimidation.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if we wish to reconstruct, we must re-establish freedom in this country; we must abolish the censorship immediately, for there is no reason now to maintain it and we must let the people absolutely at liberty to express freely their opinion.

Before the war we had an Election Act based upon principles of justice and fair play, but it was replaced by a system of selection.

That Act is a blot on our statute books, which it will be difficult to fully obliterate. That legislation was an Act of cowardice on the part of the Government and a flagrant breach of the right inherent in British citizenship. None could have been more detrimental to our country.

At home, it proved loathsome to a great many people, and should such disgust be too often provoked through cynical and arbitrary legislation like the War-time Elections Act, peace would very likely be imperilled in this country.

Abroad, that law has put the fair name of our political institutions in jeopardy, and should Canada ever want to secure foreign labour in the future for the development of our immense resources, I am very much afraid that the War-time Elections Act will show that it has caused our country an irreparable prejudice, as it seems hard to conceive that foreigners will be very anxious to come to this country, when they know how Canada treated her alien population during the elections of 1917.

The great majority of those who came into Canada did so, because they wanted to avoid persecution at the hands of the autocratic governments of Europe and because they thought they were coming into a free country. They were attracted and almost carried here by lecturers and agents who had exalted the humanity of our laws, who had promised they would be granted and enjoy equal rights. And then, all of a sudden, they must realize that after they had been persuaded to abandon their nationality, they were made practically homeless, that is men without a country. What a splendid advertisement for Canada to have it spread abroad, how the foreign element was treated in this country! We had not long to wait to see the results, as it was reported in the press a short time ago that immigrants whom we had brought here at considerable expense, were withdrawing their deposits from the banks to go back to their native countries, notwithstanding the bad conditions that obtain throughout Europe. Evidently these people are absolutely disappointed; they did not find here that which they were looking for and which they had been promised to secure. They will now go back to Europe and advertise Canada in their own way, according to the treatment they have been submitted to here.

We heard—and I don't know whether it were not repeated in this House—that the Government should frame a policy with regard to aliens. Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if the Government wish to adopt some policy to that effect, they should exercise great care and fully consider what may be the future needs of this country as regards immigration, because the policy thus adopted will surely have a considerable influence and will be an important factor in the foreigner's appreciation of this country's opportunities, in case they intend to come here and seek a fortune.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing which we need not think over very long, that is to repeal the War-Times Elections Act as soon as possible. I believe it is easy to do it. The war is over and there are members of the Government who were shocked by that legislation even in war time. Knowing as we do the earnestness of their convictions, we can easily imagine the efforts they must bring to bear upon their colleagues to induce them to repeal that evil and fatal legislation.

Then, Mr. Speaker, once we have carried out that work of clearing our statutes, let us enact such a law, that the people will be satisfied that the Government had not in view a political machine but a desire to secure the full and free experiment of public opinion. I hope that this new Act will be framed on the underlying principles of the Act which was in force before the war, particularly as concerns the making out of the rolls. I trust that the system of having these rolls made out by municipal councils will be maintained as much as possible, that is almost everywhere in Canada. And I also hope, Mr. Speaker, that we shall never see any more government appointed commissioners entrusted with that work.

The hon. gentlemen recall the Dominion Elections Act of 1896, the enforcement of which resulted in such crying abuses that the Liberal party made the repeal of that famous legislation a special plank of their platform.

The making out of the lists of voters by commissioners appointed by the Government looked to me in my youth and would look to me yet like a board of arbitrators all the members of which would be appointed by one single party.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to refer briefly to another very important issue which was dealt with by hon. members who spoke before me and more particularly by the hon. member for Dorchester, in the beautiful address with which he favoured this House the other evening. I refer to the question of the independence of the judiciary. I regret to charge this Government with having more than once infringed upon the independence and sullied the fair name of the judiciary, through their untimely interference with their duties. There was some serious clashing recently between the Department of Justice and some of the judges, and I regret to say that the Department of Justice did not always emerge with credit.

For a Government to question the integrity, competence or wisdom of our judges and entertain any distrust for them is tantamount to shaking the confidence of the people in an institution which we always considered as being a guarantee of social order and the safeguard of the liberties and rights of the people. A Government who do not respect the independence of magistrates make an exceptionally serious mistake, for which we must call them to account, for it means the sapping of the foundation of our social structure.

I promised I would be brief, Mr. Speaker, and I shall pass on to another subject without any oratorical precautions.

Let me refer to the way of dealing with the defaulters. I believe this is a very important matter for this country at the present moment. I must say right now that I agree with hon. members who advocated a general amnesty, and here are some of the reasons which make me think so.

I was informed that there were 40,000 defaulters in the country, the majority of whom are among the rural population. In all, 100,000 young men answered the call under the Military Service Act, which meant that the Government has hit the mark and if all those who were called had reported, about 40,000 would have been left aside; but I will not use this as an argument.

The principal reason for which I favour a general amnesty is that I am convinced that this Government is responsible to a large extent for the passive resistance which was manifested.

Our people were not prepared for conscription which was repugnant to them, because militarism was unknown in America. Not only were they not prepared, but this Government exerted themselves in letting the people believe that conscription would never be established.

I refer you to the statement made by the Prime Minister himself within and without this House in 1916, and I ask hon. members to remember what occurred in the election of Dorchester in February 1917, when a Cabinet Minister was re-elected as an anti-conscriptionist and supported by another member of the Government who expressed similar views. Was that what you would call preparing public opinion for conscription?

Two months after the Dorchester election in which the young men were told how easy it would be for them to cross over the border if need be, this Government submitted their Compulsory Military Service Act. Then the elections came. What did they say to the people during the campaign? They said that the farmers and their sons would not be called upon to serve in the army, and it is through such false representations that they succeeded in securing the great majority of the votes in the rural constituencies throughout the Dominion, except in the province of Quebec. Furthermore, in order to countenance the statements made by the Unionist speakers during the elections in 1917, this Government passed an Order in Council providing for the exemption of farm labourers from military service. Is that what you would call preparing the people for the enforcement of conscription? And after that you are surprised that there were some refractory ones. It is under such circumstances that we are asked to deal rigorously with people who unfortunately were so candid as to believe in the sincerity of those who solicited their votes and the very men who benefited by such trickery and false representations would now like to enact legislation with a view to apprehending their victims!

Well, Mr. Speaker, I say: That is enough cynicism.

There is another consideration, namely that no good can come out of any harsh measures that may be taken regarding the defaulters. They say there are 40,000. If we decide to deal with them, we must deal with them all. How many millions shall we have to spend in our endeavour to detect them all? We shall be compelled to use an army for that purpose and then to apprehend them; we shall have to build jails to put them in and spend millions to feed them during their detention. When you consider that most of these defaulters are farmers, you will realize what waste of time and disorganization in labour it would represent.

Let those who expect any good out of such harsh treatment be undeceived. We shall only succeed in bringing shame upon 40,000 young men, who, under the present circumstances, represent not only an important, but also a necessary asset, and most of whom belong to respectable families who have assisted one way or another in carrying on the war. We would only discourage and demoralize an army of workers who could prove very useful to the country.

The Government, in spite of the elementary principles of any democratic system, recently passed an ukase imposing a penalty of from $250 to $5,000 or $10,000 upon defaulters, which means that only the poor will go to jail; the others who have means will, for a money consideration, continue to enjoy their freedom. Indeed, this is a nice way to apply the principles of equal rights, but the same thing can be said of the selective Conscription Act which allowed the rich to take advantage of every kind of jurisdiction to avoid enlistment, while the poor were compelled to submit to this condition and enlist.

Therefore we should not be surprised that the workers are avowed enemies of militarism. They are so instinctively, because they know what is good or bad for them and history has taught them long ago that every time a war breaks out they, the poor, have to pay the greatest tribute of blood.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this Government, instead of collecting fines from defaulters, should remember the enormous and absolutely useless expenses to which the conscripts and their families were put. I would like this Government to recall the fickleness which they showed in the enforcing of the Military Service Act, which fickleness caused the conscripts and their families to spend millions, for we have not forgotten that after they had established exemption tribunals, the Government capriciously abolished all exemptions that had been granted, thus putting the conscripts to considerable expense.

I think the Military Service Act has cost everybody enough up to now and that this Government should not further burden the people of this country. Moreover, they would reap no benefit by being too severe. They would only cause a considerable discontent throughout this country which would impede the work of re-construction that we must soon undertake, as we would create much unwillingness among our people.

We fought to secure a world peace. Let us have it first at home. I believe there is enough unrest everywhere without making it any worse. This Government should not only use leniency, but, in all justice, pardon those boys whose education they neglected and perverted, inasmuch as the purpose referred to was concerned.

There are many more matters upon which it is worth while calling public attention at the present time and which must be considered immediately by all those who are interested in the welfare of our country. There is the question of autonomy.

Since I have uttered the word "autonomy," though it was not intended to come within the scope of my remarks, I feel that all I need to say is that this question of the autonomy of Canada is causing much interest throughout this country at the present time. Public opinion feels anxious and uneasy over what is going on to-day in Great Britain regarding the Dominions. As far as I am concerned—I regret to say it, but I do so because I feel it is necessary—I have no confidence in the ability of the Prime Minister in defending and safeguarding Canada's autonomy; I do not believe in his patriotism as a Canadian because I look upon him as an Imperialist first and always.

At the present time, the status of our Dominion is undetermined, unsettled and uncertain; the press reports are contradictory; we do not know whereat we stand. They have talked about the creation of an Imperial Council in which all the Dominions will be represented. Well, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the creation of any Imperial body in which all Dominions should be represented, would mean the complete surrender of the autonomy of these Dominions. But I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we have not fallen so low that the status of Canada can be modified without the representatives of the people being consulted, and I trust that if ever a change is made, it will be made by those who received the proper authority from the hands of the people.

There are many other questions which were discussed in this House and which will come up again before us, such as the cost of living, a most important problem at the present time; the tariff; the civil re-establishment of returned soldiers; the labour question and the special attention which we are called upon to give to what I shall call the great industry of the country, I mean agriculture, every one of these problems is of vital interest to the future of Canada and I intend to deal with them later during the present session, but, on this occasion, I thought I should limit my remarks to what I consider the first step in the work of re-construction.

After we have re-established a constitutional and democratic government and freedom in this country, when we have a Franchise Act based upon principles of justice, when the Government realize the importance of the sacredness of the prestige and dignity of the judiciary, when the sword of Damocles that is held over the head of many of our fellow-citizens is taken down, then, Sir, we shall have established a solid foundation upon which we may confidently build up our national fabric.

Mr. HENRY ARTHUR MACKIE (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House this evening, I feel somewhat subdued. Last summer I read in one of the magazines published in Canada that this House was composed of mediocrities, and that we looked the part. As for your humble servant, he was described as the Italian poet who came to this House without originality, and, withal, described as having ready-made clothes—or ready-made speeches; you can draw whatever inference you like. I do not know whether one mediocrity is capable of passing judgment upon another, but if I am not wrong, the mover (Mr. Redman) and the seconder (Mr. Manion) of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne demonstrated rare ability and a clear conception of the conditions of a new era brought about by the war. If, perchance, my appreciation of these two gentlemen is wrong, I know that I am right in saying that whilst our literary genius was being safeguarded at home, meanwhile writing his own persiflage, these two mediocrities were not such inferior individuals but that they found their place in the front line of battle. As for your Italian poet, he is before you once more, again with ready-made clothes. And let us hope that they will be more pleasing to our friend, J. K. Munro, who has condescended to become the parliamentary fool. Every court has had its clown; why not Parliament?

As I have listened to the speeches on the motion for an Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I have classified them under two headings. On the Government side the position may be summarized quite briefly as this: we have been subjected to a storm, tossed about by the sea, and at times the sun has disappeared almost entirely behind a lowering sky. The sea has grown calmer, the sun has re-appeared and the sailors have fixed their latitude so as to be able to guide their ship safely to destination. In other words, the Government has been subjected to a storm, the ship of State is riding a calmer sea and the ministers have a clear conception of the new conditions brought about by the war and are meeting them in a well defined programme.

Let me digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, before I pass to the attitude which I think the Opposition has taken in this matter, to say a few words about the League of Nations, which has been touched upon by the member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe), the member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), and slightly by the member for St. Johns (Mr. Demers). In this connection the speech from the Throne is somewhat positive in its nature. It says:

> And effectually promote the formation of a League of Nations which will ensure for all time the peace of the world.

A wave of fraternity is passing over the world. Many believe that it will carry away the ativic passions and that regenerated nations will live side by side in a friendly rivalry. It is audacious on my part even to express a doubt. Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, incorporated this idea in his "City of God," a most marvellous work for that time. He speaks of the Christian universe as being under the crook of the one shepherd. The bishop, having become pope, crystallized this idea and formed a league of nations of which he was the head, and the expression of its creation was given in the following sentence:

> Roma locuta est;
> Causa finita est.

The papacy developed the spiritual rather than the material side; otherwise, individualism in the world would have been seriously threatened. The church, being afraid of shedding blood, chose the holy Roman Empire as its secular arm, and that settled the fate of the society of nations. From arbiters the Popes became partisans, and the princes were not docile sons of the Church. The Holy Roman Empire was incapable of enforcing its decisions, and you have the reason therein for the bankruptcy of the League of Nations under the tutelage of the papacy, a most extraordinary power which could reach the bodies and the souls and whose sanctions pursued man beyond the grave. The unbridled Ego of the Renaissance and of the Reformation is as strong to-day as it was then. Peace can reside only in an agreement of interest and can be maintained only by an equitable distribution of the forces at play, and never by the magic virtue of an abstract ideal. The new social order is, as we are informed, to be based, not on fighting, but on fraternity, not on a competitive struggle for mere existence, but on a deliberately planned co-operation in production for the benefit of all who participate by hand and by brain. The labourer demands an equal share of enjoyment, or, at worst, equality in misery.

Let me pass a few centuries in one bound and, following the example of the hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville (Mr. Demers) be brief, and let me quote to you our lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier who, on the 12th day of May, 1911, when speaking on the security of Canada and Imperialism, said:

"We shall not allow ourselves to be detracted from duty to worship Utopias."

At the time of the Coronation of Edward the Seventh, he stated that he "believed in a Parliament of Great Britain but not in a Parliament for humanity."

I should like also to call your attention, Sir, to an article in the Devoir of the 31st day of January, 1919. It is a resumé of an address given by Monseigneur L. A. Paquette, and I desire to say that the Rev. Bishop is one of the leading philosophers in America. He refers to the league of nations, about which I have said a few words and which was intended to bring about a Christian universe. This is what he says in part:

> It was therefore a veritable society of nations organized over the principles of Christianity, placed under the tutelage of the Church and submitted to the law of Christ, the law of equal justice, of charity, of fidelity, the law of peace and of freedom. It is the rock upon which the intellectuals and the politicians have perished. It is the problem upon which the most stubborn and self-willed have spent themselves uselessly.

I leave it to you, Sir, as to whether we should keep our powder dry. Whilst speaking of the League of Nations, may I incidentally pursue my digression by referring to something that was said by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) the other night? He said: We are a nation, and we should be treated equally with England; that is, Canada should be on the same footing as England. I do not agree that Canada is a nation. The position which has been given to Canada overseas to-day is due entirely to its splendid participation, not by reason of its status as a nation. Even if we had a status as a nation, we are in Canada a federation of provinces, and I would still deny that we are essentially a nation. A nation is an agglomeration of people who have the same love and the same hate, who have tasted the same joys and undergone the same reversals, who revere the same great historical figures, who salute the same flag, interpreting its meaning in the same way, because they received in the same school the same mentality. In a word, it is an agglomeration of people whose intellectual, moral and political formation is the same. This is not the case of Canada. Let me prove it to you, Sir, in three instances alone, which I choose amongst others. In 1884, at the time of the Soudan war, the flag meant one thing to the French and another thing to the English. In 1899, the same thing occurred again. In 1914, for the third time, the message of the flag was heard with the result which you know as well as I do.

May I, in passing, touch upon a few remarks made by the hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville (Mr. Demers) in this respect? He does not attempt to excuse entirely the position of Quebec in this matter, but places the blame upon the Administration then in power, if results have not been handsomer than the actual facts show the case to be. Conscription, he says, was not popular. Our people were not accustomed to the word, nor even to the measure, and above all, we had been promised that there should be no conscription. To me that argument can have absolutely no weight, because a people will fight only upon the patriotism that resides within them, and when that patriotism fails then there is no other way than to impose conscription upon them, and it is quite evident that not only in Quebec, but in Ontario as well, the patriotism was not as great as it was in some of the western provinces. Therefore, the reasons given by the hon. member for St. Johns cannot be accepted by me at all events as being sound for excusing the position which his province has taken.

I wish to come back to the appreciation of the speeches made on the opposite side in this debate. I believe I may summarize them as follows and briefly: Come to us, come to liberty, freedom and low tariff. I would say: Liberty, freedom, advocated low tariff, maintained high protection. Come to a state of contradictions, but come anyhow. The question of tariff has been more or less mooted in this House, and we are told that an amendment is coming that is intended to bring about a decision on that question. I am afraid the members of the Opposition will be disappointed in that respect. We shall wait until we have a decision from this side of the House, and the advice given to the Prime Minister the other day by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) was well directed, and I can do no better than to endorse his position in that respect.

Those who hesitate to deal with a question of this sort are neither frank with themselves not true to their country. The question must come up. This Administration may or may not continue to exist; that makes no difference; the present membership must necessarily leave it to the people finally to decide what shall be done in this country. When our friends opposite endeavour to allure us to their side by speaking of a low tariff I would say to them: Come to us with a well-defined programme. Tell us what commodities you intend to subject to low tariff, and how low. Tell us what commodities you intend to subject to protection, and how high. Not only that, but they must argue their case and show conclusively what will be the effect upon the country if the changes they propose are adopted. Furthermore, in view of the changes they would propose they must show how they would raise the revenue. Until then without offence intended; I say that historically; what they have done they have done by stealth and the rest is on record.

I wish to take up the other invitation passed across the floor of the House with reference to liberty and freedom, which I heard mentioned several times to-night by the hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville (Mr. Demers). Liberty is defined as follows:

> Liberty is freedom for crowds to dominate individuals. It is collective thought, collective emotion. It is the reverse of freedom.

Let me give a few examples. A member of a union may not agree in every respect with the policy of the union, but if he wishes to remain a member of that union he must subscribe to the general policy. Otherwise, he will be thrown out. If a man is a member of a certain church he must subscribe to the tenets of that church, or be excommunicated. The member of a political party—I believe there is a party on the other side, but there is none on this, although one may be growing up—must accept the general policy of his party, otherwise, he will be read out of his party, as happened to an hon. gentleman who sits beside me. Liberty, then, is that circumscribed freedom which the collective body is willing to give to the individual. Freedom is defined in this way "Each individual is free to do and live as he pleases, so far as he does not interfere with the corresponding freedom of other individuals." I do not wish it to be understood that these words have any importance in political issues in Canada to-day. My only reason in referring to them is that I wish the Opposition to know they cannot allure us by catch words or catch phrases. They must convince us.

The balance of my appreciation of the speeches is that there has been a little constructive criticism and much destructive criticism. There has been a great deal of talk by hon. gentlemen opposite of ministers on this side of the House abandoned to all sense of virtue and honour, because they happened to be at one time Liberals—and I believe some of them say they still are. I think I am better justified than they when I talk of the anti-ministers and mock patriots whose whole course of opposition is motived so far as I can see by envy and resentment because the ministers have not complied entirely with all their wishes. Am I right in saying that the dart of 1917 still rankles in their side?

Let me give an illustration of the destructive criticism that has been offered without any justification whatsoever by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) and the hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville. According to the hon. member for Dorchester we have lost three freedoms: the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and the freedom or dignity of the Bench, and these freedoms have been lost, he says, through the action of this Government, once democratic, but now autocratic. As to the freedom of the press, if the press of this country has been bought as suggested by the hon. member for Dorchester, or if as might reasonably be inferred from his speech, the press has been muzzled by Order in Council, let me tell him that there has been no censorship on the press of the Dominion of Canada except in matters which might affect the war. And if my hon. friend complains of the lack of publicity which the Canadian press has given him he should remember that he has not been neglected by the German press if I can believe Canadian press reports on that matter. Would my hon. friend have the press used by a certain class of people for the purpose of fomenting insurrection in this country in time of war or now when conditions in Canada have not yet become stabilized? Is that what he desires? As to the freedom of speech, I have been almost from one end of the country to the other and I have heard and read that men can say what they like, and do as a matter of fact. I do not care how many Orders in Council have been passed nor what control of the press there may be by this Government; there never has been any hesitancy on the part of the editor of the Bulletin in the town in which I live to give full vent to his feelings and sentiments. Freedom of speech has not been curtailed so far as I can judge. If the hon. member for Dorchester means that certain radical elements of our population who advocate the use of force to bring about the conditions they desire should be allowed full scope to create trouble in Canada, I take direct issue with him there. What is the other freedom that has gone? The freedom or the dignity of the Bench. Judge Langelier has been referred to. Let me tell my hon. friend that he is no more a judge than I am, but a Justice of the Peace, liable to be discharged like any other civil servant; and he ought to be discharged.

The hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville said in his speech this evening that we ought not to take such severe measures against absentees and defaulters. The weight of the measures which are being enacted to-day, he says, will bear most heavily on the poor people because they are unable to pay the fines imposed. He argues, in effect, that we have no business to impose fines under the Criminal Code, and he would not have us imprison these defaulters.

The general result of his argument is—if a man has committed an offence against his country and the Criminal Code provides that he shall be punished for it by imprisonment or by a fine, if he has the alternative of going to jail, he ought to have the alternative of paying a fine. I cannot understand my hon. friend from St. Johns and Iberville when he says that this Government has acted unreasonably with regard to men charged as defaulters under the Military Service Act. If the law were less strictly enforced, what would the soldiers say, what would the reasonable, thinking people of Canada say after they have made their respective sacrifices—the soldiers by risking their lives, and the civil population by performing the duties incumbent upon them? What would be the result if these gentlemen were given carte blanche in this matter? The only difficulty as a matter of fact, is that the Government has not been more stringent long before. I say the dignity of the bench is curtailed when you find a magistrate—or a justice of the peace not a judge—who takes for his guide a letter addressed to a police officer, and governs himself accordingly in imposing fines or fixing terms of imprisonment. It is time that this Government should at least speak to such a man to let him know that he has a duty to perform, and that he shall perform it even if it is absolutely necessary for this Government to intervene. If the man were a judge I would be the first to impeach him. But he is a magistrate, a justice of the peace, and the province of Quebec should see to it that he is discharged at once. It is not the business of this Government to educate justices of the peace to conduct themselves properly in the administration of the law, but if it becomes necessary to do so this Government will not fail in its duty.

There is another instance of destructive criticism: Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of this country should be here in his place in Parliament. I remember that the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) said that it must be regretted that the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not invited to attend the Peace Conference. Assuming that, if Sir Wilfrid Laurier were alive to-day, and assuming that he had been invited to attend the Peace Conference, would these hon. gentlemen say he should be in attendance at that conference? If so, then it amounts to this: That Sir Wilfrid Laurier's place was at the Peace Conference, but the place of the Prime Minister is in this House. Are these gentlemen sincere when they take that position? I go further. What would be the criticism uttered by these hon. gentlemen if Sir Robert Borden were in his place in this House to-day? Only last session, my first session in Parliament, I heard the Opposition members state that the interests of Canada had been sacrificed at all times by Great Britain more particularly in the matter of boundaries, but to-day they would have the leader of the Government remain in his seat in Parliament to conduct affairs which, I think, are well conducted by the ministers who are here, and neglect this very question of boundary which is certain to be discussed overseas.

It is said that the Government are not making efforts to secure for Canada indemnity for her war expenditure. But Great Britain says that the colonies will receive pro rata, on the amount paid to Great Britain, and all who read the papers must have noticed that announcement. But I go further and say, that even if there is not one cent coming to Canada by way of indemnity, yet the honour of this nation having been maintained, and the security of its people guarded as a result of this war, the price paid is not excessive.

We are told that the Dominion of Canada is encroaching on provincial rights in the matter of education. True, in a general way, education is a function of the province. But it is the duty of the Federal Government to protect person and property, and there is no better way to protect person and property than by education. In the olden days, you had the stocks, the whipping post, the treadmill, the penal colony; and to-day we still have the state provided with expensive machinery to punish men, but not one cent for education. "Educate the people," was the admonition of Penn. "Educate the people," was the advice of Washington. "Educate the people" was the exhortation of Jefferson. But the Government of Canada to-day is nothing else but a hangman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): I am glad these hon. gentlemen realize it, and it is too bad some of them cannot be reached by the tentacles of the law. If they will repeat outside of Parliament what they say here, they will come under the admonition of the law. We lock up, we hang, we strangle to prevent crime, and judges impose long terms of imprisonment on persons to give an example to others. That is a queer way to form character. The Government of the country should see to the education of the common people just as it does to its national defence, and as it sees to the rewarding of the soldier, so it should see to rewarding the teacher who forms the character of the people. We spend millions in bonusing railways, in assisting agriculture, in teaching people how to grow wheat and cattle, but we do not spend a cent in teaching people how to grow up to be men and women. We spend a dollar in education and five dollars in prosecution. We make the calling of the teacher degrading, and pay instead the police magistrate and the judge. We are anxious to bestow extended franchise upon the people and to make them all-powerful, but we withhold from them the instruction without which that power becomes a curse. It is time the Dominion Government took notice of education in this country, and if necessary amendments should be made to our Constitution to meet the case.

I say that the criticism by hon. gentlemen opposite has been destructive in the main. I do not blame my hon. friends opposite. I wish they were more constructive, but there is a reason for their attitude, and that reason is that we are a democracy. The hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville says that we are an autocracy. If we have had criticism it is due to the fact that we are a democracy, and I intend to prove it. We must not lose ourselves in details lest we may imagine that by showing here and there some imperfections or defects inherent to democracy, we aim a mortal blow at the system itself. History, the educator of statesmen, teaches us that by following the same methods we have in the past undergone the same reverses with the same final achievement of success.

In 1754, at the beginning of the Seven Years' War, what was the political system in New France and New England? In the case of the former it was political absolutism, parental government, military discipline. There was a chief to whom all subordinates were ready and willing to render blind obedience. It was governmental and military discipline in all its perfection. If the chief said "Advance" no subordinate would ever have dreamed of saying "Retreat." Montcalm, the military expert, was the one chief whose orders suffered no contradiction.

In New England a contrary system held sway. Everybody had the right to express his opinion. There was no Louis XIV, nor a Pompadour. When the New Englander left the Mother Country, she wished him good luck, never intending to follow him to the shores of the Atlantic or impose upon him an Intendant Talon. In other words, they were masters of themselves, and when New France advanced upon their frontiers they found the New Englanders engaged in private quarrels. There were wranglings with the Mother Country about the supreme command, and the desire to secure ranks of less importance was the cause of much dispute amongst the colonists. On all sides there were wranglings as to the quota of men and money, and there were those, even the Quakers, who, on principle, were unwilling to fight. But pressure on the farmer and his sons actually set the powder on fire. What was the result? There were humiliating defeats, that of Monongahela amongst others, whilst new friends, thanks to its unity of purpose and action, crushed Montgomery at Carillon. Does this prove that autocracy is superior to democracy? By no means. When, after a time, education had taught the New Englander what the object of the war was he realized that the political absolutism of New France intended to drive him and his democratic ideas into the sea, then the Dutch of New York, the English, the Scotch, the Irish Colonists, the Catholics of Maryland, and the Quakers of Pennsylvania, rose as one man ready and willing to shed their blood in the dethronement of political absolutism which meant the triumph of democracy. Has not history repeated itself. The same causes produce the same results. Canada is a democracy where everybody takes advantage of the right of expressing his views on public matters, and it is on that account we find so many Zoilians who find time to criticise the Government in military matters and even in their efforts at reconstruction. All the imperfections they point out are inherent to the democratic system, and with the great Corneille I believe that the most difficult state to govern, especially in war time, is a democratic state.

Clinton was a great patriot and he desired to serve his country well. He proved to be a great organizer, yet he suffered reverses which would have disheartened a man less great than he. But he lived long enough to see the supporters of political absolutism depart for France, and twenty-five years afterwards receive from Madame Guillotine the reward of their stubborn resistance in the acceptance of the new conditions in a new political era. In this war, as in the Seven Years' War, neither England nor France has escaped entirely the more or less serious discords in its political, social and economic sphere. But did they allow these minor quarrels to minimize their effort in the war? Nor will minor quarrels minimize the united effort of these two countries in peace. Nor did they consider these minor quarrels as serious attacks upon their governments. It is only in Canada that you will find so-called statesmen so famished for power that they are ready and willing to sacrifice the good name of democracy to the exigencies of their own ambition, which under present circumstances is misplaced; for it neither corresponds with their ability and talents, nor with the unbounded devotion which they ought to have for democratic institutions. In the twentieth century, as in the eighteenth, democracy at times advanced imperceptibly, yet surely. To-day it goes forth like that army in array mentioned in Scriptures, acies ordinata. This last victory of democracy, let us hope, will silence forever the detractors of these methods in war time.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to tender my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address for the ability displayed in presenting the policy of this Government in showing the spirit in which it is intended to conduct public affairs in the future.

They said that during the last four years the millionaires stood side by side with the workers. I do not intend to deny that, but I believe my hon. friend from Calgary should have told this House the actual and foremost reason for that combination, which was great. No doubt he overlooked this detail, but those who, like myself, on account of their position or profession, are in continuous contact with the working people, are in a position to state that on every occasion the millionaires, specially in the industrial field, never failed to show in a most peculiar manner their interested patriotism.

In many industries the workers were treated as so many tools, even exacting from women and young girls certain kinds of work which require the strength of a man. This was done by day and night, holidays and Sundays without any rest, and on pain of losing their job, while the profiteers, under the protection of the Government, were raising the prices of commodities to prohibitive rates. For that reason, how many healthy bodies, how many fathers or others with dependents were taken to the cemeteries, while our millionaires, by the side of the workers, were getting more and more numerous under the cover of patriotism. The difference that exists between these two classes of citizens is that those who are the majority have met their death and the few others have become happy and prosperous. I will not insist. It was the period of destruction. This Government had made up their minds to destroy everything in order to save the Empire and re-establish civilization overseas. We must admit that unfortunatly they were very successful. Now, that the war is over, there is no reason why this destruction should go on. So they announce a period of re-construction. Let us hope that our millionaires and their kin the Trust magnates will carry their gun on the other shoulder for the greatest good of Society and that they will do their duty.

According to my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Redman)—and I am with him in this—the soldiers should be absorbed into our civilian life. That is meet and just, but where I differ from him is in the manner of that absorption. To my mind, what would be desirable, what the Government should try to do, would be to re-establish the social order as it existed before the war, when the people on this soil of America led a happy and contented life.

As a consequence every soldier back from the front should have the right to resume the position he held before the war and the duty of the Government should be to oblige the employer to reinstate the man. In this way, Mr. Speaker, we should see the bookkeeper going back to his desk, the machinist to his shop, the shoe worker to his factory, the bank clerk to his bank, and all with the most perfect order. But I strongly condemn what is being done in Montreal and probably elsewhere, a state of things which seems to be approved of by the Government, judging by the remarks of my hon. friend from Calgary, namely that the civilian should be thrown out without pity in order to make room for the soldier. That denotes a sad lack of justice and of fairness towards the man who has done his duty; it disorganizes society; it is anti-humanitarian; it will bring wretchedness and misery to the people; it is a school for the Bolshevism which seems to make the Government so anxious. To place signs outside and inside industrial establishments admonishing all comers to "Make way for the Soldier" is to bar out any other person who is in need of earning food for himself and family. Allowing the soldiers to step into any place they choose, without regard to their qualifications or their past experience in civil life paralizes industry and throws out of employment faithful workers who from now on will find it very difficult indeed to earn a livelihood; and in certain cases it helps towards promotion a forger or an embezzler, who enlisted to escape sentence.

That is going a little too far. It indicates approval of what is going on in numbers of our shops where soldiers, about 97 per cent I am told, go from shop to shop, working two or three days here and there, after having caused the dismissal of those who supported them during the war. Why do these things happen? Because there is no effort at regulation. I find this method decidedly unjust. It is a very bad policy, to my mind, and the Government should lose no time in setting up some sort of regulation of these things so that each and every man should be treated according to his deserts.

I wish to point out to the Government that if, at a certain period, ships were more necessary than men, on the other hand, production, to provide for our warriors on the battlefields, is most assuredly the essential factor in warfare; that the soldier be kept in proper fighting trim.

The finest proof we have of this is in the forty years of preparation undertaken by Germany so that when war did come she could call upon her immense reserves of production. In the same way, during four years, our workers have laboured to the very utmost so as to uphold those who, on the other side, were sacrificing their lives, having willingly offered themselves up on the altar of Civilization and Freedom. It would be not just that those who for so long upheld our fighters should to-day have only poverty in return. I believe that, without in the least working any harm to the re-establishment of our soldiers, the Government could give a square deal to our civilian population.

I perceive, moreover, that the immigration problem demands the very special attention of the Government this session. This question is decidedly one of capital importance; but for us, of the old French province, faithful to our traditions and to our faith, and who are following in the footsteps of our ancestors, the problem is not quite so acute. However, we admit that, for other provinces, for which we entertain the highest consideration, when the women will have been completely emancipated, thanks to the ballot and to their introduction into Parliament, I admit, I say, that the problem will then constitute for our province an equation in the second degree rather difficult of solution. Still, since we have a Unionist Administration which on more than one occasion, has shown its liking for force, I have no hesitation in believing that it will see to it that some sort of selection is exercised in the choice of the immigrants who sooner or later will honour its memory. At all events, in the public interest we reserve the privilege of expressing our humble opinion on this subject.

Now I come to a far more serious problem brought up by the mover and the seconder of the Address: I mean, Bolshevism in Canada, the natural consequence of the policy of a Government which is much too inclined to use force. This is certainly one of the most serious political problems that the Union Gevernment was justified in mentioning in the speech from the Throne. There is decidedly something to stir up an Administration if the news we get from Red Russia be true and they will likely be confirmed by our soldiers who were sent to this territory through force, always for the defence of our borders.

While we are speaking of Russia I recall an incident or rather an echo of this afternoon, when the Minister of Militia spoke about the Canadian Expedition to Siberia. I must tell the House that I am far from looking upon the action of the Government in this matter from the same angle as the hon. Minister of Militia. I believe his information to be more or less trustworthy. I do not know where he found the explanations he gave us, but what I can affirm here to-night is that this expedition, from beginning to end, was never done under the volunteer system. And I have in mind just now an instance of the absolutely Prussian brutality with which the military authorities forcefully withdrew 70 recruits from their battalion, the C.O.T.C., Laval, Montreal. Following the custom of the Iroquois the chiefs had notified the officers of this battalion that they required 70 heads and during the night the choice was made, not by vote, but according to the officers' whims, of the young men who were to sacrifice themselves to go and fight in a territory which is decidedly not our boundary line.

And besides I am not of one opinion with the hon. Minister of Militia who claims that the Government accomplished a very worthy deed on this occasion; I would rather share the opinion of Mr. W. L. Smith, a regular contributor to the Toronto "Sun" who calls this expedition to Siberia the "Siberian Crime." Those are the terms he uses to qualify this shipping off to Siberia of Canadian conscripts drafted unwillingly into the expeditionary corps on the way to Vladivostok:

"Canada committed a national crime in sending to Russia, to participate in a domestic quarrel, men who had no business to interfere with this country's striving after freedom, no matter how blind its efforts may be. The crime is doubly heinous when you think that men who refused to go were nevertheless forced to embark for Siberia. It is a flagrant violation of the law of the country which allows men to be sent beyond the borders of Canada "for the defence of Canada" only. No matter what distortion is made of the phraseology of this clause it can never be claimed that men sent to Siberia to interfere in the quarrels of factions at war with one another are fighting "for the defence of Canada." All these men can do is to implant throughout Russia the hatred of everything Canadian, thus endangering Canada's future welfare in ways that we have not space to dwell on. Every Canadian citizen is a party to this crime so long as he does not protest against what is taking place. The crime is more than all on the head of N. W. Rowell. Yes, the President of the Privy Council is the only one among the ministers who was so bold as to not only defend what is being done but further to try and get some kudos out of it. On the Judgment Day I prefer to be in the place of the last Publican, of the greatest sinner rather than in that of the "First Layman" of a great church, a man whose hands will be red with the blood of his fellow-citizens sacrificed in a nameless quarrel."

It goes without saying that the terms are perhaps a little overdone, but I believe that in the matter of this expedition we can find more in the nature of a crime than we can of a worthy deed for which we deserve congratulation.

The Government must keep an observant eye on this pagan, this savage organization which strives to overthrow everything in its passage, and by any means that offer. If Bolshevism has become a burning question we must believe that it exists in certain parts of the Dominion. For my part, representing as I do a riding in the largest city of the Dominion (Sainte-Marie, Montreal), with a population of nearly 65,000 souls, I feel bound to assure my hon. colleagues on the other side of this House that there is no danger of this national calamity getting a foothold in Montreal, that our soil is not favourable to the growth of this disloyal plant. Of course, a short while ago, we had two or three spouters, who looked like Bolsheviki, bob up on the scene, but the folks felt they were related to "Ti Noir" Desjardins and his silent partners of unholy memory. Their arrest had no effect whatever and they are awaiting the return of the hon. Minister of Justice to receive like "Ti Noir" Desjardins a generous cheque to pay them for their trouble and lost time. It is said that in the days of "Ti Noir" the motive behind the affair was to apply martial law to the peaceful city of Montreal. To-day people are wondering if the Government is not working along the same lines so as to establish a Mounted Military Police Force throughout the Dominion, similar to the North West Mounted; and this very plan was put forth some time ago by Sir John Willison in the Star of Lord Atholstan, still all a-tremble from his dynamiting at Cartierville by his friends. There you have what is being said in Montreal, despite all the unfair things and all the silly prattle that is being dished up to us daily by a certain part of the press. I must assure the party now in power that the character of Quebec province does not lend itself to this sort of violence but, if I am to believe my own eyes, things do not look so reassuring in other parts.

Listen to this Bolshevik propaganda, copies of which were distributed by the thousand around the chief industrial centres in Toronto, Niagara Falls and Hamilton—who would ever believe it? Why, to believe certain newspapers, all these places have a monopoly of loyalty to the end of all time:

"After more than four years of massacre, famine and poverty for the workers of the entire world the rival factions of the Capitalists have come to an understanding. Fifteen million workers have given up their lives to decide what gang of exploiters will fleece the workers of the world. Millions of women and children have died of hunger while capitalists were living in luxury. During the war the workers were told repeatedly that they must save the Empire. Working men, you have played the game of your masters. Victory, for you, means only hopeless toil from day to day, mean food, shabby clothing, a hovel for a home, death after a little while. Wake up! Do not let your souls be the souls of slaves. Away with the Capitalist classes. Make the Proletariat supreme. Strive with all your might to establish national institutions in which the workers will possess and control all the means of production and distribution. You have to choose between revolution for the establishment of Socialism, and degradation and poverty.

"You must follow the example of the workers who have founded Red Russia. You have shed your blood for the benefit of your masters. Surely you are ready to take decisive measures for your own good. Set up councils to administer the affairs of the country. Take hold of the industries. Establish military discipline. Crush the Capitalists as they have crushed you since you were born. You must do this if you no longer wish to be cannon-fodder in time of war and beasts of burden in time of peace."

That is what is being distributed in the centres which are fondly believed to be imbedded in loyalty for all eternity. And I really believe that this manifesto was distributed. And what further strengthens my belief in the existence of this state of things is the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Militia on the 13th of December, 1917, before a large gathering in the county which he has the honour to represent, East Hamilton. He was speaking to his constituents:

"In the name of God what possible reason can the people have for supporting the Labour Party. This Party sold us soldiers for an immediate gain just as they did to obtain better wages while the soldiers at the Front were going 'over the top' with fixed bayonets to meet the Teuton hordes. I emphatically warn alderman Halarow (the Labour candidate in East Hamilton) that he is taking a very grave attitude at this time. A day will come when he will be called upon to give an account of his deeds. All the backing he has comes from the yellow dogs who are seeking to evade conscription."

Well, I do not know whether it was really Providence that protected our hon. friend the Minister of Militia, chief representative of our gracious Sovereign George V, or whether the yellow dogs shrank away before his literary broadside, at any rate we have the honour to have him with us in this Parliament. I wonder whether this is not an opportune time to call back Sir Robert Borden from his jaunt to Prince's Island so as to lead the Government in putting down Bolshevism. Anyway, it appears to me that nothing should be dearer to the Prime Minister of a country than to work for the good of his own country before trying to settle matters in other countries.

One thing is certain: the Government was justified in putting this item into the speech from the Throne. Bolshevism certainly has taken deep root in this country and the situation is serious, since this doctrine is growing in a very dangerous part of the country: an ultra-loyalist section. I hope that under the circumstances the Government will show itself worthy of their position.

History tells us that every time a handful of men have arrogated to themselves the right to do as they please, to disregard the rights of the people and the laws of the country, to gag the people's representatives and the Press and muzzle Public Opinion, without advice and without reason, as the present Government has done and is still doing—and I fail to see why this policy is still continued—we must not be surprised if what is happening elsewhere should be seen in Canada, for in Canada, as elsewhere, there is a limit to patience, and the awakening of the people is often horrible to witness.

I do not think that the theories of the views of Sir John Willison would prove an efficient method of holding in check or rather of putting down this class of people or rather this despicable organization: Bolshevism. I must say that this plan of Sir John Willison was the establishing of a Mounted Police Force throughout the Dominion, similar to the Mounted Police in the Northwest Teritories, with a head-office at Ottawa, and holding priority over all the forces already in existence, municipal, provincial or federal; and this, in all the provinces, even in those where there is no call for such a thing.

I believe that the Government could find a much wiser way of coping with this serious problem. I sincerely believe that should the Government stop administering Canada in an autocratic manner, by Orders in Council; should they repeal those nefarious laws which are their offspring; and start to forget, before asking others to do likewise; should they permit to breathe the air of freedom those who crossed the seas for the defence of this same freedom, I believe that Bolshevism would hold no menace for this country, and that the general feeling of unrest which we find throughout the Dominion would disappear.

Another way of solving all these questions, without omitting a single one, would be to hold a just and fair general election and give once more the place of honour to British fair play.

We can say now that we have undergone a period of destruction in a frightful manner, that we are going through the period of reconstruction in a guilty manner and that all that remains for the people to do is to make the Government suffer a period of destruction in a pitiless manner.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Maclean the House adjourned at 10.50.

Tuesday, March 11, 1919.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

OFFICIALS OF THE HOUSE.

THE CLERK OF FRENCH JOURNALS.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That the recommendation of His Honour, the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 3rd instant, respecting the appointment of Mr. Lionel Dansereau to the position of Clerk of French Journals, Votes and Proceedings and Orders of the House of Commons be concurred in.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: I have been requested to ask that this motion might be allowed to stand for a few days as some hon. members who wish to speak on it are now absent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I request that the motion be allowed to stand.

Motion stands.

RAILWAY ACT CONSOLIDATION.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways and Canals) Bill No. 19 to consolidate and amend the Railway Act was introduced and read the first time.

RIOTS AT KINMEL CAMP.

REPORTED RIOTS AT WITLEY CAMP.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): May I direct the attention of the Government to a cable despatch from its special correspondent published in to-day's Montreal Gazette, relating to the Kinmel riots, in which it is stated:

Responsibility for this distressing affair must rest primarily on the Overseas Administration. There was lack of frankness in dealing with the men in Rhyl Camp. The staff in command of the camp knew of the unrest among the men over the delay in getting home—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not in order at this stage in introducing any matter of a controversial nature reflecting upon the administration of the Government or of any of its departments; and the reading of that despatch undoubtedly would have that effect. It is in order for the hon. member to submit any question with respect to the riot, but not to read a despatch of that character.

Mr. MURPHY: If you will permit me, Sir, just to finish the sentence I was reading—

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a very important point involved in the reading of a despatch of that character upon the Orders of the Day being called. There being no subject before the House, strictly speaking, no proceeding whatsoever can be had, but it has been the custom to allow questions touching matters of principle or of grave national import with respect to the administration of the Government. Under no circumstances can matter of a controversial nature be introduced which reflects upon the Government or upon any minister or any department of the Government.

Mr. MURPHY: I bow to your ruling, Sir. I think I have already read sufficient of the despatch to acquaint the Acting Prime Minister with its general purport. Still following your ruling, Sir, I submit that this is a matter of very grave national importance, and I would ask the Government if they can give the House and country any information regarding responsibility for this unfortunate affair, and what steps have been taken to remedy the undoubted evils complained of at Kinmel Park.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): The Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) has already announced to the House, I believe, that a board of inquiry has been constituted to ascertain the facts in connection with this matter. Pending the finding of that board it would seem inadvisable, upon the imperfect information contained in newspaper reports, to make this matter the subject of discussion in this House. As soon as the Government have any further official information I shall be glad to communicate it to the House and the country.

Mr. MURPHY: Orders in Council will be the death of this country. May I ask what information my hon. friend has with regard to the reported riots at Witley camp?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand we have no official information as to reported riots at Witley camp.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JENKINS' REPORT ON THE C.A.M.C.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): I have received a communication to the effect that in July, 1918, Lieutenant-Colonel Jenkins of the Canadian Army Medical Corps was appointed by Sir Edward Kemp to investigate and to make a report upon the financial affairs of that branch of the service overseas, and that a full report was submitted in November, 1918. May I ask if the report in question will be brought down to the House, and if so, when?

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): I have no information with regard to that report. The matter has never come before me, but I will have inquiries made immediately.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session resumed from Monday, March 10.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in resuming the debate on the motion for the adoption of the Address, it is not my intention to discuss or even to refer to the important measures foreshadowed in the speech from the Throne. These will come up for consideration when presented to the House. Nor is it my intention to-day to refer to the important questions of domestic policy within the Dominion of Canada relating to demobilization and reconstruction. These have been discussed and dealt with ably and effectively by my colleagues and members on both sides of the House.

What I desire to address myself to for a short time might be described as Canada's external relations, or to be more specific, the effect of the war upon Canada's status as one of the nations in the British commonwealth, and upon her status among the nations of the world; and if time permits, to give some information on the situation in Russia, so far as the information is in possession of the Government. I am sure all must recognize that the situation in Russia to-day is one of the gravest problems with which the Peace Conference will be called upon to deal, and constitutes one of the greatest perils to the future of our civilization.

The question of the status of Canada within the Empire has already been mentioned in two or three of the addresses, and was discussed particularly by my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) in a very interesting and able address with much of which I found myself in hearty agreement, although to some of his propositions and statements I could not give my assent.

It is not without interest, in speaking of Canada's status to recall the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the German Confederation, which shortly thereafter developed into the German empire, and the Canadian Confederation started on their national existence on the same day, the 1st of July, 1867. Germany, not extensive in territory but having a large population, was founded not on a democratic constitution with the assent of the governed, but with a government established on the basis of an autocracy supported by military power. The German people devoted their thought and attention to the development of a material civilization and to the strengthening of the military power of the State. Probably in no other country in the history of the world was such great progress made during a period of fifty years in material development or in the perfecting of a military machine. When the time arrived that Germany's material civilization or her industrial development had reached a point where she had penetrated all the markets of the world, and her military machine had reached such a degree of perfection that she believed she could safely challenge all the democracies of the world for world supremacy, she started the war which set the world aflame. The result we know to-day. A civilization based absolutely upon material progress and military strength has collapsed in conflict with the moral forces of the world and with the free, democratic peoples who joined in waging war against it. Canada, large in territory but small in population, travelled a different road. With a democratic constitution under which government was carried on by consent of the governed, the people of Canada, loving liberty and cherishing worthy ideals, devoted themselves to the task of subduing nature within their own borders and establishing an ordered democratic civilization upon this north half of the North American continent. Fifty years have passed, and during that period we have developed in Canada such initiative, such courage and such resource on the part of our people, such a love for liberty and for true democratic ideals, that when Germany started this war Canada, without hesitation and without delay, by the spontaneous action of the people, and with the unanimous consent of Parliament, ranged herself side by side with the Mother Country to wage war upon the most powerful military autocracy that the world has ever seen. To-day we know the result. Canada, entering this war strong in her determination to stand by the Mother Country, yet not fully conscious of her own strength or of the extent of her own resources, or of the full possibilities of her own efforts, has emerged from the war one of the really effective powers of the world; whereas Germany, who has always occupied a prominent place in the councils of Europe and at the various peace conferences for more than two hundred years, is not to-day represented at the Peace Conference. Canada is there for the first time, and her voice is heard effectively in re-establishing peace and ordered government throughout the world.

The German people, living under a government which was maintained by military force, could not understand a government based on any other principle; and when the war broke out the people of Germany confidently anticipated that the British Empire would fall to pieces, for they knew that the Mother Country would be engaged in a bitter struggle in Europe. They fondly imagined that the Dominions would take advantage of the opportunity to break away from England and declare their independence. The German mind did not understand the principle of liberty and the loyalty that is born of liberty. During the past fifty years, as the power of self-government, the power to manage our own affairs has been extended, the loyalty of the Canadian people has grown stronger and stronger; and we emerged from this war with the ties that bind Canada to the Motherland and the sister dominions stronger than at any period in our history. We draw this lesson from the history of these two countries, that the larger the liberty consistent with unity, the stronger the loyalty, the greater chance of the permanency of the Empire of which we form a part.

In his address in this debate my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) drew attention to the fact that in the Imperial War Conference of 1917 a resolution had been passed to the effect that the question of any permanent change in the relations of the different parts of the Empire should stand in abeyance until after the war. He then went on to suggest that, by reason of some action taken at the Imperial War Cabinet or the Imperial War Conference last year, that resolution had been departed from, that some action had been taken which impaired the autonomy or freedom of Canada. And he went on to suggest that matters relating to Canada should be settled in Ottawa and not in London.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend says "hear, hear," and we all agree cordially with that sentiment. But my hon. friend from Kamouraska was wrong in his supposition that the affairs of Canada were being settled anywhere else than in Ottawa. Let me recall the situation with reference to the various meetings of the Imperial Conference and the Imperial War Cabinet.

At the Conference held in 1897, the first conference attended by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose loss we all lament, he took the position that Canada was a nation, that the people of Canada should recognize that fact and claim the status of a nation, and the people of the Motherland should recognize this claim and concede to us the status of a nation. I venture to think that in no act in the life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier did he more correctly interpret the situation or more accurately forecast the future which lies before the Dominion of Canada than in the position he then took. It may be that he was somewhat in advance of his time, but certainly he rightly interpreted our position. For I am sure we all agree that there can be no permanent unity among the nations that compose the British Empire except upon a basis of the equality of those nations. That position Sir Wilfrid Laurier maintained throughout the period of his Prime Ministership, and that position has been maintained with equal strength under the Prime Minister who succeeded him and who is at the head of the present Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has there ever been a period in the history of Canada, since 1840, when any other contention was held?

Mr. ROWELL: I can only say that, apparently, there was in the minds of many people—I should think in the minds of most of the people in the early days—the thought that Canada was a colony, a dependency of Great Britain; that we did not occupy the position of a nation.

Let me turn to even a comparatively recent page in our history to show the contrast. At the Imperial Conference of 1911, for the first time in the history of the Empire, the statesmen of the dominions were admitted into the inner councils of the Empire and listened to a review of the foreign affairs of Great Britain. That statement appears so remarkable in the light of present day events may I be pardoned for quoting a paragraph from the address of Mr. Asquith at the close of that Conference:

> Gentlemen, I again advert to a matter which has been referred to by Mr. Fisher and Sir Joseph Ward, that this is the first time—and this conference will be significant in memory in that respect—when, in Mr. Fisher's happy phrase, the representatives of the Dominions have been admitted, as it were, into the interior, into the innermost parts of the Imperial household; what in the old classical phrase were called the "arcana Imperii" have been laid bare to you without any kind of reservation or qualification.
> Those, gentlemen, are matters as to which we cannot take the world into our confidence; we cannot even take our own fellow subjects and our fellow citizens into our confidence in the full sense of the term, but we who have gone into it with the frankness which such confidential discussions admit of, will agree that, even if the Conference had done no more than that, it would have been a land mark in the development of what I may call our Imperial constitutional history.

So recently as 1911, and for the first time in the history of the Empire, the Dominions were permitted to have a full knowledge of the foreign affairs of the Empire. While we were asserting that Canada was a nation and that thought had been taking possession of the minds of the Canadian people, while the British people were gradually coming to recognize that Canada was a nation, yet during all that period we had no voice whatever in questions relating to foreign affairs or to anything that had to do with determining the issues of peace and war. I repeat, in 1911, for the first time, Canada and the other Dominions were admitted to an intimate knowledge of foreign affairs. The Imperial Conference had decided that meetings should be held every four years. The conference would have resumed in 1915 had not war broken out. Personally, I think it was a misfortune that they did not hold the Imperial War Conference in 1915 so that the world might have witnessed the spectacle of the unity of the Empire, of its statesmen coming from all portions of the Empire, meeting in London, and devising means as a united Empire to defeat the German forces in the field.

Mr. Lloyd George, who became the Prime Minister of Great Britain in December, 1915, had the imagination to see that no act on his part could have greater significance for the Empire than that he should invite the statesmen from all the Overseas Dominions to meet the statesmen of the Motherland to confer upon the war, its progress, the terms of peace, and upon after-war problems. Therefore, the Imperial War Conference of the spring of 1917 was convened. The overseas ministers met with the members of the British Cabinet, and from that meeting has issued what has been defined as the Imperial War Cabinet. What is the Imperial War Cabinet? Let me summarize the position. As a full statement already appears in Hansard, and which was made by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) in June, 1917. The Imperial War Cabinet consists of the Prime Minister of Great Britain and of the ministers who are in charge of the departments dealing with Imperial Affairs—the Foreign Secretary, the Secretary for War, the Secretary of State for India, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and probably the Secretary for the Navy, and the Prime Ministers of the Overseas Dominions. They met together and discussed matters affecting the whole Empire, more particularly those relating to the conduct of the war. It is of interest, in considering the constitutional position which was thus brought about, to note, as was pointed out by the Prime Minister in 1917, that the Crown acts throughout the whole Empire. The Crown acts in Great Britain on the advice of the advisers there; the Crown acts in Canada, and in the other Dominions, on the advice of the Dominion ministers; in the provinces on the advice of the ministers of the province; so that, throughout the Dominions and States of the Empire, the Crown acts upon the advice of its constitutional advisers, having regard to the particular subjects that come up for consideration. It was pointed out in reference to the Imperial War Cabinet that there were two cabinets sitting in London. The British War Cabinet which advised the Crown on matters relating to Great Britain, and the Imperial War Cabinet which advised the Crown on matters relating to the Empire as a whole.

Some one said that it was not a Cabinet, that the name was altogether inappropriate, that you cannot have a Cabinet unless it is responsible to a particular parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear". I am not going to quarrel with a name; you may call it a Council if you think it is any better, but what I shall point out to my hon. friend is that the Cabinet has no existence in any written constitution. My hon. friend knows that the Cabinet, like so many other British institutions, was developed to meet the exigencies of the situation, to have the advisers of the Crown responsible to Parliament Here we have another Cabinet which has grown up out of the exigencies of a new situation, to meet new conditions. It is a characteristic development of our British constitution and which, as the Prime Minister said in London last summer, and as he said in this House, is a Cabinet differing from the others in that it is a Cabinet of governments. It is composed of men responsible to different Parliaments and each one responsible to his own Parliament for the advice that he gives, each being under the necessity of justifying that advice before Parliament, just as any other Cabinet or Prime Minister must do.

There are several hon. members who were not here in 1917 and for their benefit particularly may I read a statement which was made by Mr. Lloyd George in the British House of Commons and which was read in this House during the session of 1917 with regard to the creation of the Imperial War Cabinet, so that the members of the House may know just what the constitutional position is as outlined by Mr. Lloyd George:

The Prime Minister (Mr. Lloyd George): I think that I ought to report to the House a very important decision that was arrived at as a sequel to the recent meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet. It is desirable that Parliament should be officially and formally acquainted with an event that will constitute a memorable landmark in the Constitutional History of the British Empire. The House will remember that in December last His Majesty's Government invited the Prime Ministers or leading statesmen of the Overseas Dominions and of India to attend the sittings both of the Cabinet and of an Imperial War Conference to be held in this country. It is to the former body which assembled in March, and held fourteen sittings before separating, that I desire to refer. The British Cabinet became for the time being an Imperial War Cabinet. While it was in session, its overseas members had access to all the information which was at the disposal of His Majesty's Government, and occupied a status of absolute equality with that of the members of the British War Cabinet. It had prolonged discussions on all the most vital aspects of Imperial policy, and came to important decisions in regard to them—decisions which will enable us to prosecute the war with increased unity and vigour, and which will be of the greatest value when it comes to the negotiations of peace. I should like to add on behalf of the Government that the fresh minds and new points of view which our colleagues from over the seas have brought to bear upon the problems with which we have been so long engrossed, has been an immense help to us all. So far as we are concerned we can say with confidence that the experiment has been a complete success.

The conclusions of the Imperial War Cabinet are of necessity secret, but there is one aspect of them which we feel ought to be communicated to the House without delay. The Imperial War Cabinet was unanimous that the new procedure had been of such service, not only to all its members, but to the Empire, that it ought not to be allowed to fall into desuetude. Accordingly, at the last session, I proposed formally on behalf of the British Government that meetings of an Imperial Cabinet should be held annually or at any intermediate time when matters of urgent Imperial concern require to be settled, and that the Imperial Cabinet should consist of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and such of his colleagues as deal specially with Imperial affairs; of the Prime Minister of each of the Dominions or some specially accredited alternate possessed of equal authority; and of a representative of the Indian people to be appointed by the Government of India. This proposal met with the cordial approval of the overseas representatives and we hope that the holding of an annual Imperial Cabinet to discuss foreign affairs and other aspects of Imperial policy, will become an accepted convention of the British Constitution.

My hon. friends who are interested in the constitutional aspects of this matter might very profitably peruse the statements of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, and the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in dealing with the question in this House in 1917.

This is the statement of Sir Robert Borden in reference to the constitutional change:

"Therefore the future of this proposal will be a cabinet of governments rather than of ministers, a cabinet in which the government of the United Kingdom, the governments of the Dominions, and the government of India will be represented. Having regard to the declarations of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and his colleagues, the proposal will carry with it much of advantage to the Overseas Dominions. I say that for this reason: It is not proposed that the Government of the United Kingdom shall in foreign affairs, act first and consult us afterwards: The principle has been definitely and finally laid down that in these matters the Dominions shall be consulted before the Empire is committed to any important policy which might involve the issues of peace or war. The language in which the Prime Minister of Great Britain conveyed his proposal to the ministers from the Dominions made that abundantly clear. So, as I understand the proposal, and I think I understand it correctly, the British Cabinet shall continue to discharge its functions in respect to all matters relating to the United Kingdom, but there shall be also an Imperial Cabinet in which not only the United Kingdom, but all the Overseas Dominions shall be represented by their governments."

Sir SAM HUGHES: King George is the Crown. How then does the hon. member reconcile the Crown in this case, which is the Crown of Great Britain only, with the functions which it is intended to convey by this new cabinet council where His Majesty will represent the Crown in all colonies? May I make myself a little more clear: Canada and the other Dominions will sit in a war council under the Crown which is solely the Crown of Great Britain and Ireland?

Mr. ROWELL: The hon. gentleman is wrong in his statement of the facts. King George is not only the King of Great Britain and Ireland, but of the British Dominions beyond the seas.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I suggest to my hon. friend—I am very much obliged to him for his data, which, of course, I never heard of before—that the Crown is represented in Canada by a Governor, and not by King George. Perhaps that is news to my hon. friend.

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot give any further answer than the one I have already given, which I think is sufficient—that King George is King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the seas, and Emperor of India, so that the Crown is the head, the real constitutional bond of unity between the Motherland and all portions of the Empire, the representatives of which come together in this Imperial Cabinet to advise His Majesty on matters of importance to the whole Empire.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman has not met the question that I raised: Is the King of England appointed by the Empire, or by the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend knows that the descent in Great Britain under the Act under which the present reigning house came to the throne, is by heredity —it descends.

Sir SAM HUGHES: By law?

Mr. ROWELL: When the Crown was settled upon the present reigning house it applied to the whole Empire as it existed at the time that settlement was made.

The Prime Minister stated the situation further in this language.

> They go there as the representatives of autonomous governments, each responsible to an independent parliament. They meet there for the purpose of consultation, co-operation, and united action, but that action can be taken only with the sanction and authority of the representatives of the various nations of the Empire assembled in their own parliaments. Therefore, there is no sacrifice of any existing power of self-government. There is, on the other hand, opportunity for consultation, co-operation and united action, which I venture to think will prove of great advantage to the Empire as a whole.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have quoted these statements for two reasons: First, because these statements were made to the House of Commons in the year 1917, and because the constitutional position was not challenged by any member. Sir Wilrifd Laurier did question the use of the word "cabinet" and suggested that "council" was more suitable, but no member of the House challenged the constitutional position as outlined by the Prime Minister at that time.

Mr. Speaker, neither this Government nor its predecessor has undertaken to change the existing constitutional relations without the consent of the Parliament of Canada, Parliament by failing to dissent, by failing to offer any criticism, did accept that statement at that time as defining our proper constitutional relationship and since then the people at the general election have given their ratification—at least I have never heard that there was any real dissent in the general election to that proposition. So that whatever may be the constitutional relationship arising out of the presence of representatives of Canada in the Imperial War Cabinet that relationship has the assent of the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people. I venture to think this development is a matter of very great importance to the people of this country—it is not the curtailment of our autonomy, it is an enlargement of our powers of self-government. The Imperial War Cabinet does not deal with a single question which in the past has been dealt with by the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS: Does the hon. gentleman seriously say that this question was an issue before the people at the last general election?

Mr. ROWELL: What I said was that the general election had since been held, but I did not hear of any dissent during the election to that proposition.

Mr. ROSS: Did you hear the matter mentioned at all during the election?

Mr. ROWELL: No, I did not hear it mentioned, and for this very good reason: It so commended itself to the judgment of the whole of the people that nobody thought an issue could be made of it. It must also, I think, commend itself to all hon. gentlemen if they take time to consider the situation. What is the situation, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Before the President of the Council leaves the constitutional phase of the subject, I would like to put a question to him. The hon. member says that this Council, or Cabinet, of which he speaks, is constitutional and based on constitutional principles. Will the hon. member explain where he finds any basis for such an arrangement in the constitution of Canada, for instance?

Mr. ROWELL: I said it was a development of the British constitution, like so many others, to meet the exigencies of the situation, and that is the way all the great developments in the British constitution have been made. In that respect the British people have differed from most other nations under free and democratic governments. The majority of nations have prescribed for themselves a written constitution, and they must act within the terms, or the limits of that constitution. The British people, on the other hand, have had confidence in their ability to meet any situation when it arose, and they have adopted their constitutional procedure to meet the exigency of the case. That is the way this Imperial War Cabinet developed.

When my hon. friend asked his question, I was pointing out that the Imperial War Cabinet does not deal with any matter with which the Parliament of Canada previously dealt, or over which it had jurisdiction. There was always an area of sovereignty over which we had no jurisdiction, such as foreign affairs and matters relating to the issues of peace or war. Over these Canada had no control except in so far as she might make representations to the Imperial Government which dealt with these matters. Now, Mr. Speaker, the development is this: Our autonomy has been enlarged, our self-government has been enlarged, Canada has reached the status of a nation, not in name but in fact. Canada now has her voice heard in that area of sovereignty over which she previously had no jurisdiction. The representatives of Canada meet with the representatives of the other Dominions and the Mother Country to determine these questions of foreign policy—the issues of peace or war. There has been no curtailment of our sovereignty. On the other hand, there has been an extension of sovereignty, or self-government, to the people of Canada.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Ordinarily, when a member of a Cabinet disagrees with his colleagues on a question of policy, the course for him to follow is to resign from the Cabinet. Will my hon. friend say whether this course will be followed by a member of the Imperial War Cabinet if he disagrees with other members of the Cabinet on any question of policy brought before it?

Mr. ROWELL: The answer to my hon. friend's question is this: where the Cabinet, as in the past, is responsible to a particular parliament, that has been the constitutional procedure. But this is not a cabinet like any other cabinet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWELL: It is, as the Prime Minister has said, a cabinet of governments in which the heads of governments represent their own peoples. You may call it a council, if you will; I will not quarrel over the term. But it is an assembly, an organ of government, a place where the representatives of the Mother Country and of all the Dominions and of India meet together to discuss matters of common concern and to agree on lines of co-operation affecting the whole Empire.

Mr. ROSS: My hon friend has not answered the question of the member for Kamouraska.

Mr. ROWELL: The question is answered. The difficulty with my hon. friend on the other side is that while he professes to be a Liberal, he cannot readily change. There should be a readiness to change to meet new situations and new developments; there should be new machinery of government to meet new exigencies.

Mr. ROSS: I admit I cannot change just as quickly as my hon. friend.

Mr. ROWELL: I have not changed; I have stood for compulsory military service and the backing up of our boys at the front.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend (Mr. Ross) should not get nervous when he does not have his own way.

Let me come back to the question we were discussing. What is to be the future relation of Canada to Great Britain and to the other Dominions of the Empire? Are we to continue in a position where we have no voice in questions of foreign policy or the issues of peace or war? That is inconceivable on the part of a nation such as ours, which has taken such a part in this great struggle. It is inconceivable that Canada should be content to occupy a subordinate position in the Empire; to have the issues that affect the lives and welfare of her families, and citizens determined by men living elsewhere, and to have no voice whatever in their determination. There are only two ways in which Canada can have a voice in foreign policy. She can have it as an independent nation, or by co-operation with the nations that now form part of the British Empire. Here again I have not changed; I believe that the future of Canada is inseparably associated with that of the Mother Country and the other nations of the Empire. Canada's future is to be found in association with these nations.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am very glad that the hon. gentleman is coming to the right line. Now, would he kindly tell us where the question of responsibility for the colonies—I use the term in a broad sense—comes in?

Mr. ROWELL: Responsibility for the colonies?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Responsibility under the new form. There must be responsibility in all governments, or there should be.

Mr. ROWELL: I will come to that point in a moment.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Well, I have a fad of my own.

Mr. ROWELL: I think I have given my hon. friend a good deal of information and light so far, but I will tell him this: the Imperial War Cabinet, as was announced by Mr. Lloyd George and Sir Robert Borden, was a creation for the purposes of the war. The question of the permanent constitutional relationship is to be settled at a conference to be called after the war, and all these other questions will come up then when the permanent constitutional relationships are being settled.

May I point out the contrast between 1911 and 1917? In 1911 the statesmen of the overseas Dominions were admitted for the first time and on one occasion to a review of foreign policy—in 1917 and 1918 the statesmen of the overseas Dominions and of India meet around a common council table with the statesmen of the Mother Country, there to consider together these very questions for the benefit of the whole Empire.

Mr. NESBITT: If a representative of this Dominion did not agree with the other members of the War Cabinet, would it not be his duty to report back to this Parliament and to get its approval or otherwise of his position?

Mr. ROWELL: Absolutely. Nobody can be bound except by the assent of his own Government, and his own Parliament. That is clearly set forth in the statement of Sir Robert Borden which I read to the House.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Am I to understand—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If you gentlemen will kindly keep yourselves in place, I shall—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does the minister mean to say that at that conference in 1911 there was no consultation with or asking of the opinion of ministers and others concerned? Because I can tell him to the contrary that there was.

Mr. ROWELL: I did not say anything of the kind, Mr. Speaker; I quoted Mr. Asquith and I said that that was the first occasion upon which the statesmen of the Empire had been admitted into the secrets of British foreign policy.

Now, let me come back to the point that I was discussing. Perhaps I could make my statement clearer to the House if my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) would permit me to proceed without interruption. Most of the questions he has in mind may be answered by what I have to say.

While we have been claiming the status of a nation within the Empire since 1897, we did not get the status of a nation until 1917, when the statesmen of Canada and of the other Dominions met with the statesmen of the Mother Country around a common council board to determine questions of common interest relating to the whole Empire. So that during the period of the war there has been a remarkable development in our constitutional position, not by way of a curtailment of our rights or powers, but by way of a great expansion and enlargement of those rights and powers.

Now, my hon. friend from Kamouraska quoted from an address of the Prime Minister in London in June last in reference to the change in our constitutional position and he suggested that we had departed from the resolution passed at the meeting of the Imperial War Conference on April 16, 1917. Let me read that resolution:

The Imperial War Conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial Conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities. They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based on a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial commonwealth and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognize the right of the Dominions and of India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern, and for such necessary concerted action founded on consultation as the several governments may determine.

There has been no departure from the position defined in that resolution. You ask what of the action which was taken last year, and to which my hon. friend referred? Under our constitution, under the constitution of all the Dominions, the Governor General occupies a dual position, which has grown out of the old colonial status. The Governor General, under our constitution, is the representative of His Majesty in Canada. He acts upon the advice of his constitutional advisers, and in that respect occupies exactly the same position as does His Majesty the King to his constitutional advisers in Great Britain. But the Governor General has another function in Canada; so has the Governor General in each of the Dominions, a function that is a survival of the old colonial days. The Governor General was the representative in Canada of the Colonial Office, the high official in Canada of the Colonial Office to receive communications from the Government of Canada. Therefore, if the Prime Minister of Canada wished to communicate with the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the message went to the Governor General of Canada; he communicated it to the Colonial Office, and the Colonial Office communicated it to the Prime Minister of Great Britain. When the Imperial Conference met this year, it was the view of the statesmen, not only of one Dominion but of all the Dominions and of India as well, that the time for that process of circumlocution had passed. It was a relic of the old colonial days. If the Prime Minister of Canada could discuss matters with the Prime Minister of Great Britain around the Council table face to face, when they separated and the Prime Minister of Canada came back home, why should he not communicate directly with the Prime Minister of Great Britain instead of through the Governor General and the Colonial Office as in the old colonial days. That was the view at the Imperial Conference, and a resolution was passed that there should be a change in such channels of communication. Let me read to the House the resolution, moved by Mr. Hughes, Prime Minister of Australia, seconded by the Prime Minister of Canada, and unanimously adopted:

1. That this Conference is of the opinion that the development which has taken place in the relations between the United Kingdom and the Dominions necessitates such a change in administrative arrangements and in the channels of communication between their Governments as will bring them more directly in touch with each other.

2. That the Imperial War Cabinet be invited to give immediate consideration to the creation of suitable machinery for this purpose.

This was not the first Imperial Conference at which this question had come up. It had been raised by the Prime Minister of Australia in 1907. It had been raised by General Botha, Prime Minister of South Africa, at the Conference of 1911. They suggested at both of those conferences that the communications in reference to Dominion affairs should be direct to the Prime Minister of Great Britain himself. The Prime Minister of Great Britain in 1907 and in 1911 took the ground that the burdens and responsibilities of his office were so great that he could not undertake the additional work involved in receiving communications from the Dominions. Therefore the change was not made, but a permanent secretarial was established in connection with the Imperial Conference. The resolution I have read of July last was passed on to the Imperial War Cabinet. The Prime Minister of Great Britain at the present time felt very much as the prime ministers did in 1907 and 1911. He did not wish to be burdened with the additional administrative duties that would be involved in his receiving all these communications but he recognized the justice of the contentions of the dominions and this resolution was agreed upon at the Imperial War Cabinet on the 30th of July last:

1. The Prime Ministers of the Dominions, as members of the Imperial War Cabinet, have the right of direct communication with the Prime Minister of Great Britain and vice versa.

That was the establishment of the principle for which the dominions were contending.

2. Such communication should be confined to questions of Cabinet importance. The Prime Ministers themselves are the judges of such questions.

3. Telegraphic communications between the Prime Minister should, as a rule, be conducted through the Colonial Office machinery, but this will not exclude the adoption of more direct means of communication in exceptional circumstances.

The principle is now firmly established that in all matters of Imperial Cabinet concern the prime ministers of the dominions may communicate direct with the Prime Minister of Great Britain and vice versa. This new procedure was put into effect when the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) returned. Communications passed directly between Mr. Lloyd George, Prime Minister of Great Britain, and Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada in reference to the terms of the Armistice and the terms of peace and also in reference to attending the Peace Conference. This is another evidence of the equal status of Canada with the Mother Country and the other nations of the Empire. This further clause was passed and formed part of the resolution:

4 p.m.

In order to secure continuity in the work of the Imperial War Cabinet, and a permanent means of consultation during the War on the more important questions of common interest, the Prime Minister of each Dominion has the right to nominate a Cabinet Minister, either as a resident or visitor in London, to represent him at meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet to be held regularly between the plenary sessions.

The Prime Minister of Canada did not avail himself of the power of nominating a cabinet minister, as he returned to England shortly after to attend the Peace Conference. I should think it would be a matter of pride and satisfaction to every Canadian that Canada, not only in theory, but in fact, has reached the status of a nation, one of the free nations of the British Commonwealth; that on these vital matters affecting foreign policy and peace and war we have a right to be heard, and the means is provided whereby our voice can be heard in determining these questions so vital to our future. This result has been brought about during the war.

Our constitutional position has puzzled some of the statesmen at the Peace Conference. They could not understand an empire made up of autonomous nations, each having a parliament of its own largely determining its own policy. As a matter of fact, in all history there is no political organization like the British Empire. There is no state with which you can compare it. Never before has there been an empire composed of autonomous nations owing allegiance to a common Sovereign, and each exercising control of its own affairs. It is the greatest experiment in free democratic government which this world has ever seen.

I venture to think that just as the Anglo-Saxon people have been pioneers in the development of constitutional, democratic government in the world and their example has been followed by other nations—and they have been not only pioneers, but successful pioneers—so in this new and greatest experiment in democratic government, involving more than 400,000,000 human beings, more than one-fourth of the whole human race, living on all the continents and many of the islands of the seas, they will be successful; that this League of Nations which we call the British Commonwealth may prove to be the crowning triumph of the Anglo-Saxon genius for government.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In connection with Canada's status as a nation, may I ask whether Sir Robert Borden will be at liberty to affix his signature to any treaty drawn up in Europe at the Conference?

Mr. ROWELL: I have been dealing with Canada's status as one of the nations within the Empire, and I now come to discuss the question of Canada's status among the nations of the world. My hon. friend's question—

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend has said that another conference will be called for the purpose of discussing the changes in the constitutional relations of the Empire. Will the Parliament of Canada be consulted as to the stand our delegates should take at that conference?

Mr. ROWELL: While I have no authority to speak for more than one member of the present Government, I would unhesitatingly say, Yes. That is my own view, because I believe it is a matter of the deepest concern to the whole people of Canada and the Parliament of Canada is entitled to express its views on the matter. Coming now to the question of the Peace Conference my hon. friend referred the other day to the fact that Sir Robert Borden and his colleagues left Canada before the armistice was actually signed, and he offered some criticism, or at all events comment by way of criticism, as I understood him, upon that fact. He thought the Prime Minister and his colleagues had been over there a very long time, probably an unnecessarily long time. Why did Sir Robert Borden leave Canada with his colleagues at the time he did? I will tell my hon. friend. The moment it appeared reasonably clear that a Peace Conference would be held in the not distant future, the Government of Canada through its Prime Minister took the position that in view of the part Canada had taken in this war, of the service and sacrifice of her troops in the common cause, and in view of the status of Canada as one of the nations of the Empire, she was entitled to be represented at the Peace Conference. One can at once recognize that that involved most serious constitutional questions, for while, within the family of nations that make up the Empire, we had reached that stage where all were prepared to agree that the Empire was a league of nations each of equal status, the other nations of the world had not yet been asked to agree to that position and it was entirely a different question to secure their assent to the new and unique position of the British Empire. When this contention was pressed by Sir Robert Borden upon Mr. Lloyd George it had his hearty sympathy, and he was of the opinion that if this new position of the British Empire was to be recognized, it was absolutely necessary for Sir Robert Borden, who had been so influential in bringing about this new and changed relation, to go overseas immediately to take up the question of the representation of the Dominions at the Peace Conference. It was because of this request and for this purpose that the Prime Minister left at the early date he did. The Prime Minister of Canada, I say, took the position that Canada was entitled to be represented at the Conference. The negotiations were protracted. First, the assent of the British Government must be secured. They did assent and the Imperial War Cabinet approved. The matter was then taken up with Allied Governments. I imagine it is quite true that at first the United States offered some objection, because they did not understand or appreciate our changed status, but I am glad to say when they did understand and recognize it they withdrew all objection.

You ask, what is Canada's status at the Conference? The Conference is composed of the five great powers, and other nations which are called secondary powers. Each of the great powers is entitled to five representatives, and the secondary powers are entitled to three, two, or one, according to their varying positions in the war and other considerations which entered into the determination of representation. What is Canada's representation? First of all, there are five representatives of the British Empire, one of the five great powers. Three or four of those representatives, I believe, are permanent members of the Conference. The other representatives are drawn from a panel which includes the statesmen of the overseas Dominions. At all plenary sessions of the Conference, therefore, there are a certain number of representatives of Great Britain and one or two representatives drawn from the panel composed of the statesmen of the whole British Empire, representing Great Britain and the Empire at large as one of the great powers. A representative of Canada, therefore, as part of the British Empire delegation, may be present at the plenary sessions of the Conference. In addition, the Overseas Dominions have the status of secondary powers at the conference and Canada is entitled to be represented, as a secondary power, at all plenary sessions and at all meetings where her interests are specially affected, by two representatives. The other dominions, Australia and South Africa, are also entitled to two representatives each, New Zealand to one, and India to two. The result is that at all plenary sessions of the conference there are five delegates representing the British Empire as a whole, one of whom is chosen from the Dominion's delegates, and nine other delegates representing the British Dominions and India, making a possibility of fourteen in all. At the first plenary session of the conference Canada had three representatives, two representing Canada and one serving on the British Empire panel. Canada has also had three representatives at other important sessions of the conference. The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Mackie) has asked whether Canada will sign any peace treaty. The question has not yet come up for consideration, but my own personal opinion is that in view of Canada's status at the conference she undoubtedly would sign. I should think the British Foreign Secretary or Prime Minister would sign on behalf of Great Britain and the Empire at large, and the Prime Minister of Canada would sign as one of the secondary powers.

I come now to the constitution of the League of Nations, which is probably one of the most momentous documents that has ever been penned. It is too early to discuss its terms; they have not yet been discussed at the Peace Conference itself; the committee has simply presented its report. The covenant, however, makes express provision for the representation of the Dominions, and I venture to believe that when this covenant is signed the name of Canada will appear as one of the charter members of the league, as one of the nations of the British Empire. Hon gentlemen will recall that the direction of the affairs of the League of Nations is entrusted to a council of the league composed of representatives of signatories to the covenant, and Canada as one of the secondary powers will undoubtedly have representatives on the general council of the league. Each nation may have not more than three representatives but only one vote. The executive of the league is composed of nine members, one representing each of the five great powers, the other four to be chosen by the general council of the league as they may hereafter determine. The management of the affairs of the league is vested in this general council and this executive committee.

I shall not enter upon the discussion of the terms of the covenant of the League of Nations, but in order to emphasize its importance, I would point out one or two of the matters covered by it. Not only is the object of the league to preserve the peace of the world—but to guarantee the territorial integrity of the different nations that are signatories of the covenant as against outside aggression. I will not go into the procedure provided to ensure that territorial integrity, but it means that every nation that signs the covenant of the league pledges itself to maintain the territorial integrity of the others, as against outside aggression. When a league is being formed under which not only our territorial integrity but that of the Empire is guaranteed, a league which will affect our whole future and obligate us to adopt the measures called for by the covenant of the league, then surely we have before us one of the most momentous questions to which the statesmen of this country can devote their attention. In view of the character of this document and of the issues involved at the Peace Conference, I am sure the Parliament and people of Canada will recognize that the place of the Prime Minister at this particular time is overseas looking after this country's interest. My hon. friend will remember that the peace treaty is to be based upon the negotiations that took place prior to the signing of the armistice and which formed part of its terms. These negotiations embodied President Wilson's fourteen points, one of these relates to the economic relations between the nations parties to the league and the enemy nations. Is it conceivable that negotiations should be going on in Paris touching questions of economic policy that will affect Canada as one of the signatories to the league and Canada not be represented or her interests safeguarded? I venture to say that no hon. member will say that Canada should not be represented. It is a great honour to Canada that she should be represented at this conference. It is an immeasurably more important conference than that of 1814,—that was a conference only of the nations of Europe. This is a conference not only of the nations of Europe, but of the nations of Asia, Africa, America, and of the islands of the sea; some thirty distinct nations are there represented. It means the redrawing of the maps of Europe, Asia and Africa, and determining the form of government of many of the islands of the sea. It means arriving at decisions that will affect the whole course of human history in the days that lie before us. No conference could gather whose decisions would have more weight, or in which it is more important that Canada should be represented. Canada should be just as influential in the settling of the terms of peace as she was in bringing the war to a victorious conclusion.

I mentioned a moment ago the situation in Russia. A veil of mystery appears to cover that great country, and no one can predict with certainty what the outcome will be. But there are one or two facts of which we here should not be ignorant. Some discussion has taken place in this House in reference to Bolshevism and what it means. I hold in my hand the fundamental law of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic, and I think the members of the House will be glad to know some of the fundamental laws upon which the Bolshevik government is founded. When the Bolsheviki came into power the Constituent Assembly was about to meet, an assembly that had been elected on a democratic basis representing the whole people of Russia. When the Bolsheviki found that the Assembly would not carry out their views and probably would not maintain them in power, they immediately dissolved the Assembly. Some of its members who were not prepared to consent to the dissolution of the Assembly fled for their lives, and some were killed on the spot. The Bolsheviki followed this up by providing for the disarmament of all people in Russia, other than their own followers, under the most severe penalty. On the other hand they armed their own followers. So the position was that the partisans of the Bolsheviki had arms and the others had not. Now, what is the object of this government? Article 9 provides:

"The principal aim of the Constitution of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic in the present transitory period is to establish the dictatorship of the city and rural proletariat and of the poorest elements of the peasantry in the form of a powerful All-Russian Soviet government for the purpose of completely suppressing the capitalist class, of abolishing the exploitation of man by man and of establishing Socialism, under which there will be no division of society, into classes, nor any power of state.

This is a frank declaration that their object is to establish the dictatorship of the proletariat. Under this term they include only those who work with their hands, all other classes are absolutely excluded from participation in the government. The farmer who employs even one man in order to make profit out of his work is looked upon as belonging to the capitalist class and is excluded. It is simply the old autocracy inverted—it was a government by bureaucrats, it is now a government by a different class. It denies the fundamental principle of democracy that every citizen is entitled to a voice in the government of his country. They have confiscated all the land, without compensation, and turned it over to the workingmen and tillers of the soil, each man being limited to the area he could actually work. They confiscated all furniture, agricultural implements and farm stock. They took all factories out of the hands of their owners and turned them over to the workmen and soldiers. They repudiated the national debt, due not only foreign powers but even loans made by their own people. They do not believe in capital, and so do not recognize obligations to any person who has loaned money to their government. If they had a victory loan in Russia even the holders of these bonds would find the debt repudiated.

Mr. Speaker, it will be of interest to the people of Canada to know that one of their first acts was the establishment of compulsory military service throughout the whole of the Russian Empire. They established universal, obligatory, military service and they say that the honourable privilege of defending the revolution is reserved for the toilers while upon the non-working elements other military duties are imposed. They impose compulsory military service and the only men who are permitted to bear arms are the workers while the others must perform other military service. They also established obligatory labour service. You may say there is something to be said in favour of that. They suppressed, and took over, the whole of the press of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friends seem to be very anxious to get the press. Evidently they have not received as much support from the press as they desire But, Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary to go farther to point out the character of the Government which has been established and the principles upon which it is based. They have abolished all private ownership of property. They have abolished the right of a man to own his own home, the home is the basis upon which our Anglo-Saxon civilization rests. What is much more serious is that they have treated woman as a chattel. They have permitted divorce on any terms; a man can turn away his wife for any reason and for no reason, and power has been officially granted to the local Soviets to deal with the relations of the sexes. In many of the Soviets in Russia and some in Siberia they have nationalized woman and she is the common property of any man, or men who wish to take advantage of this provision of the law. It is this uprooting of civilization, this desecration and defilement of womanhood, this confiscation of property that is developing in Russia to-day.

If the Russian people wish that form of government in preference to the old autocracy and if they confine their operations to the limits of their own territory possibly it would not be open to us to object. But they do not confine their operations to their own country. They boldly proclaim that the faith they are preaching must prevail throughout the world. They are seeking to spread this propaganda among all the nations of the world and they boldly tell us that the time will come when Bolshevism will be universally accepted. That is the gravest menace to the world's peace and ordered civilization that we face to-day.

Undoubtedly this is one of the reasons why it is most important to expedite the closing of the Peace Conference, in order that there may be an established government in Germany with which to conclude peace and in order that there may be a government in Germany, after peace is concluded, that may combat Bolshevism. If the dykes between Germany and Russia are broken down, if Bolshevism spreads through Germany it may sweep through Europe as the Tartars overran Europe in the Middle Ages. Who knows whether it will stop there or whether it will not cross the Atlantic? That is one of the gravest problems which the Peace Conference must face. It is to be earnestly hoped that some solution will be found at the Peace Conference which will avert this menace to our humanity.

One word more and I shall conclude. It was my privilege last summer to visit our troops at the front and see something of the courage and the achievements of these brave men. I would not be true to myself this afternoon if I did not as a layman pay my humble tribute to that great Canadian, and gallant soldier, Lieut.-General Sir Arthur Currie, under whose leadership the Canadian corps won such imperishable glory and struck great blows for liberty and peace. I shall not discuss the events of the past summer, but I want to say—and I am sure that my colleagues who were with me will join me in saying it,—that we never met a man who was more deeply concerned about the welfare of his men than was General Sir Arthur Currie. We never met a man who took greater precautions for the protection and safety of his troops. They were always expected to attain the objective that they were asked to attain, but he took all precautions to see that they did it with the least possible loss of life. This can be said for the Canadian corps under General Currie: They took every objective they were asked to take, and they took some of these objectives when others had failed. In August they drove through the German lines in front of Amiens and turned the Germans back toward the Rhine. The German High Command knew that they might be compelled to retire behind the Hindenburg line, but they were confident that once they were behind this system of defence no Allied force could break through and no Allied foot would stand within those impregnable defences. It was General Currie and his men who pierced the Drocourt-Queant switch of the Hindenburg line, and the Canadian soldiers stood upon the soil which Germany had considered inviolate. The piercing of this line gave to our war-weary humanity the hope that the war might really end this year, and that peace might speedily come to this war-cursed world. They fought their way through to Mons in a succession of victories unsurpassed in the history of the war.

The Canadian people will never be able to repay the lasting debt of gratitude that they owe to that brave Canadian soldier, untrained in the arts of war, who stood side by side with the best generals of Europe against the most powerful military machine that the human mind has conceived, or that the human hand has constructed, and under whose leadership the enemy were always driven back. We pay our tribute of respect to that gallant soldier, and we hope he may speedily finish the work committed to his care and return with his brave troops to Canada. The Canadian people eagerly await their coming, and we will give them the whole-hearted welcome their courage, their sacrifice and their achievements so richly deserve.

Mr. WILLIAM D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, although much has been said, and eloquently said, of the life and achievements of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I desire to pay my modest tribute to the great Canadian. The outstanding feature of his remarkable personality was his ardent desire for national unity and his effort to weld the Canadian people together and to inspire in them a national consciousness that will have no regard for race or creed. Coming as I do from a constituency which is populated very largely by those who, like his own people, are not of the predominating majority in this country, I appreciate with peculiar feeling his broad tolerance and his generous conception of what constitutes Canadianism. That, I think, will be the most enduring monument to the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I desire to congratulate the hon. gentleman who has been chosen to succeed him. Sir, I think that his Scottish parents must have had some prevision of the honour which was to come to their son when they named him, and I trust that he may prove another Daniel come to judgment.

I also desire to thank the ex-Minister of Militia for the kind words which he uttered of the German-Canadian boys who fought in the war. When he said that those lads fought just as courageously as did those of any other racial origin, I knew that what he said was true, but I received his words with a depth of gratitude which he perhaps cannot appreciate, and for this reason: A racial prejudice has been allowed to grow up amongst us in this country, which is not what we were accustomed to, and which is not consistent with the spirit of British fair play which always prevailed heretofore. I would further say with regard to the acts of the ex-Minister of Militia that whereas he has his faults, as we all have, and is perhaps not a diplomat, he did after all, at one time in this country, in the early history of the war provide the driving force which I think no other man could have displayed in the same degree as he did. I further say that if he had not been interfered with by the Prime Minister of this country in the matter of recruiting, conscription would never have been thought of.

I listened, Mr. Speaker, with a great deal of interest to the address of the President of the Privy Council. It was a very learned discourse, and parts of it, perhaps, some of us followed with difficulty, but, judging from the questions which were put to him, I think that possibly there is just a little misgiving on the part of members of the House as to whether Canada will properly retain her autonomy in the scheme which he has outlined. He laid considerable stress on one feature which did not appeal very strongly to me, and that was that it was rather epoch-making to find that the Prime Minister of Canada may in future be able to communicate direct with the Prime Minister of England instead of through the Colonial Office. Surely that is is a matter of mere detail. I am reminded of the time when, in my own city of Kitchener, or, as it was at that time, the city of Berlin, we did not have free mail delivery; we had to go to the post office to obtain our mail, which was a roundabout way of getting it. Now it is carried to our doors. It is just a matter of greater convenience but brings about exactly the same result.

Since the Union Government has come into existence, a good many of us have been curious as to what model they have taken for some of the legislation which they have enacted. Since the President of the Privy Council has read from a booklet, the Constitution of the Bolsheviki, which I understand, is forbidden by Order in Council, our eyes have been opened. First of all he read that the Bolsheviki had compulsory military service just like the Union Government. He went on to say that they had obligatory labour laws, and I wonder whether that is the origin of the Order in Council "Work or fight." The press, he likewise stated, was suppressed, and I could not but feel that we could draw a parallel between some of the enactments of the Bolsheviki and the War-time Elections Act. The President of the Privy Council stated that the Bolsheviki gave guns only to their own people, just as the Union Government, or the Borden Administration gave the ballots to its own supporters through the War-time Elections Act.

I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who spoke of the light in the window and the latch on the outside of the door. For my part I think I would use that lamp in the window for the proper purpose for which lamps are intended. Personally I would take that lamp out of the window. Those who may have strayed away from the house, I think, know the way back very well, and may be left to find it for themselves at the proper time. But the hon. member for Red Deer did not like the metaphor of the lamp and the latch-string. He rather fancied himself as a young lady who was receiving the attentions of two ardent swains. He rather enjoyed the experience, and thought he would wait for some time until he should finally make up his mind. There is an old saying in another language, which I cannot repeat in the vernacular, that under conditions of this kind the young lady may say at the outset, "Which one shall I take?" but overnight the question may revert to, "Which one will take me?" Further, Mr. Speaker, in these practical times, even young ladies have an eye to the main chance, and it may be that sometimes they postpone their decision in order that they may seize the opportunity of taking a peep into Duns or Bradstreets, to find out which of the two suitors can give her the best of the things of this world. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not for one moment suggest that the hon. member for Red Deer was not entirely sincere when he stated that his reason for remaining on the other side of the House is entirely that of the national interest. I do not say so, and I believe that he was just as sincere when he made the statement in question as when he pronounced that magnificent and eloquent eulogy upon his old friend our late leader, the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But if it were otherwise we on this side, would admit at once that we cannot compete with the other side at all. We have very little to give, so that perhaps after all the young lady from Red Deer might as well make her decision at once, place her reluctant hand in that of the hon. gentleman from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), and getting off that picket fence—which must be very uncomfortable and which they are said to be straddling together—might say to him in the words of Ruth:

> Whither thou goest I will go, thy people shall be my people, thy God, my God. Where thou diest I will die and there will I be buried.

I heard also the other day the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder). He appeared perfectly sincere in every way, and I for one would say nothing whatever in criticism of a man who feels that his national duty keeps him on the other side of the House. But I would say to him that if he feels, as he apparently does, that he should keep his former Liberal principles in cold storage for another season, that he be very, very careful that they do not perish in the rarified atmosphere in which they are now living.

The hon. minister invites suggestions, criticism and some indications as to the temper of the people throughout this country. If he is absolutely sincere, and I do not doubt that he is, and if the Government desire to get information as to the temper of the people of Canada, I have a suggestion to make: There is in this country, a constituency known as North Ontario. There is another known as Glengarry, there is another known as Assiniboia, and unfortunately another in the city of Quebec. Two of these constituencies have been disfranchised for almost a year. I would suggest to the Government, through you, Mr. Speaker, that they bring on the by-elections in these constituencies, and I think they will get some indication as to what the people think.

Moreover, this House has not met for a period of nine months. That is altogether too long an interval between sessions of Parliament in a country that claims to have democratic institutions. I believe that, especially in war time, the members of this Parliament should be more frequently called together in order that they may give to the members of the Government the benefit of their views and advice. A fabled character of old received renewed strength whenever he touched earth; so might the Government of this country more accurately determine the wishes and the feelings of the people whose servants they are supposed to be by calling together in Parliament the representatives of those people.

I was interested a few evenings ago in reading upon the screen in a theatre in this city these words: "In days long ago, when men wore long hair, narrow trousers and narrower minds, there were placed upon the statute books many laws which have never been repealed." I thought to myself: surely history repeats itself. They must have had a Union Government in those days, because, Sir, we have laws on the statute book, placed there by virtue of Orders in Council, which, at least four months after the termination of the war, ought to be repealed. They are now obsolete; there is no longer any occasion for them. In fact, this Parliament might very well consider the repealing of the law which gave those powers to the Government, the War Measures Act.

What I am now going to speak of has been already dealt with at length, but it is something that should be mentioned again and again, because eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. That is the return of responsible government. We have a shackled press. Even Parliament can be gagged, because there was an Order in Council—I do not know whether or not it has bene repealed—under which the Speaker of the House might strike out of Hansard anything which he did not desire to have inserted in that publication. I am quite sure that our Speaker would do nothing of that kind, but the power is there, and it should not be there.

An innumerable number of publications, indiscriminately selected, were banned by Order in Council. I know whereof I speak, because I made inquiries in the matter and some of those of whom I inquired did not even know the nature of the publications which had been placed upon the proscribed list. Men were forbidden to use that strongest weapon which they have for their own protection, the privilege of striking. Free speech was not permitted at public meetings.

Another thing that I would like to mention, which, perhaps, will not meet with the approval of the House, is this: I am not a socialist, but I do not believe that it was either wise or fair to restrict socialist publications and the right of free speech as they were restricted, so long as the members of the organizations in question confined their discussion and propaganda to constitutional means and deprecated the use of violence in bringing about that which they desired to obtain. I do not think that that is wise. You cannot cure a sore merely by covering it; you simply drive the infection farther in, the whole system is poisoned, and the trouble will re-appear in aggravated form later on. If these men were allowed to meet and conduct their activities in a proper way, surely the Canadian people would see any fallacies if any characterized their views, and the evil would correct itself. If, on the contrary, they are suppressed, the result is what has often happened before; suppression merely aggravates the evil; it does not cure it.

Some of our magistrates—this may not be the direct result of Orders in Council, but I believe it is the direct result of the spirit that has been engendered throughout Canada by the arbitrary action of the Union Government—have convicted innocent men —I have called them "two-by-four magistrates"—absolutely without evidence and without giving them an opportunity of defending themselves or being represented by counsel. May I also express the view—it may not meet with favour on all sides, but I believe it to be the correct one—that there should be no law now, and never should have been, under which the man who obeyed his conscience so far as military service was concerned was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. I do not see what possible good could come from it. They are not criminals, but by associating them with criminals for a year or two or three years we simply destroy what is good in those men, who, after all, were trying to do their duty as they saw it. Any conscientious objectors who are still confined in prison—I know there are some—should be released at once. I agree with the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that a much better method of dealing with military defaulters might be found than by confining them in the jails of this country.

We have to face three particularly great problems, and I shall give them in the reverse order, as I see it, of their difficulty of solution. The first is reconstruction; the second is the enormous debt which we have to carry; the third is the problem of allaying the unrest that prevails throughout Canada. Reconstruction I have placed first; I do not believe that that should be a very difficult matter to deal with. Surely every one will agree that the returned men, the maimed men, should be generously provided for. All others who by reason of their being away have lost opportunities, should have that made up to them. I do not think it should be a very difficult matter to provide for the assimilation of the 250,000 or 300,000 men that are to return to this country. In the years gone by, when immigration was at its height, Canada assimilated from 200,000 to 300,000 men who were not conversant with our conditions and who had to be assimilated into something entirely new to them. That is not the case with the returned soldiers.

The Minister of Public Works (Hon. F. B. Carvell) told us the other evening that the debt of Canada is now $2,000,000,000, which represents a financial burden of something like $250 to be carried by each man, woman and child in the country. We have to deal with that. In passing I would like to draw the attention of the House to what I felt at the time was a tremendous waste not only of money, but of patriotic feeling. The Government expended hundreds of thousands of dollars during the last Victory Loan campaign in newspaper advertising in endeavouring to induce the people to realize that they had a patriotic duty to perform in buying Victory Bonds. When they had accomplished their purpose and the people came with open hands offering of their substance to the country, the Government instead of making use of that opportunity, threw it away and made of it merely a cold financial proposition. They made the bonds tax free. I do not think that that appealed to one man out of twenty of the ordinary working people of Canada. Indeed, they hardly knew what tax free bonds meant. The exemption from taxation feature did not mean very much to them, anyway; nor did these people care particularly. I think those bonds might have been issued at par at 5 per cent interest. In the fervour of their patriotic feelings, I believe the people would have bought bonds issued at 5 per cent. They were not in a calculating mood; they were in a patriotic mood, and if those bonds had been placed at 5 per cent, and this one-half per cent had been saved, this country would have saved for a generation or two at least $10,000,000 a year in interest.

There is waste in the public service. I have made some inquiries, and I am told that this Government has followed the Biblical injunction, and has made two civil servants flourish where one grew before. To bear this out, we have had the report in connection with the Printing Bureau. I should like to say that I think the report with regard to the Printing Bureau ought to be a hint to the members of the Government to make a like investigation into all the other departments, and they will probably find something of a similar nature.

The other evening the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) made a suggestion with which I could not agree. He stated that in order to make up the deficit of $125,000,000 with which we are faced, the Income Tax should operate on higher levels and also on lower levels. I quite agree with him in his first suggestion, that the Income Tax on the higher incomes must be raised, but when he states that the Income Tax should be applied to incomes of $1,000, and perhaps less, I do not agree with him at all. An income of $1,000 is not equivalent to more than $500 a few years ago. If a working man gets a thousand dollars a year, what surplus has he, if he has five or six growing children to support under the present conditions of the high cost of food, clothing, rent and everything else in proportion? When the minister said that he proposed to tax these people in order that they might feel that they were helping to pay the taxes, I had no sympathy whatever with that. The workingman of this country has a very heavy load to bear now, and he is to-day bearing more than his share of the taxes. Last year this Parliament adopted what I thought was a picayune policy of placing a tax on matches and tobacco and some other commodities. That tax on matches and tobacco was the essence of inefficiency because for every dollar that was taken from the purchaser, only fifty cents reached the national treasury. A box of matches that cost five cents a package now sells for fifteen cents, and of the increase of ten cents, the Government obtains only five cents. But that tax is paid largely by the workingman. He is also taxed whenever he patronizes that one little luxury he has, the moving picture theatre. He is taxed when he buys medicine in the drug store, and the Government makes the druggist its collector by compelling him to affix a stamp every time a bottle of medicine is sold. What is the reward that is given to him by the Government? The druggist is rewarded by having spotters placed upon his trail, and whenever perhaps an inexperienced clerk fails to put a stamp upon a bit of camphorated chalk, or something like that, he is haled to the court and fined fifty dollars. If that method of taxation must be continued, I would suggest that the onus be placed upon the manufacturer of affixing the stamp to the article, thus saving a good deal of trouble and inconvenience.

5 p.m.

All of us, no matter what walk of life we may be in, have to lick stamps. A stamp has to be affixed to every cheque, note or draft, or any other kind of commercial paper which is used in this country. While I realize that a very large revenue is probably obtained from that source, I believe it is a primitive method of taxation, something like the window tax in the old days. I am sure, if men could express their views, they would much prefer that some other direct form of taxation be adopted that would not vex and worry them at every turn.

The other day the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) made a peculiar remark. He stated that a certain titled gentleman from Toronto owns the Union Government. I did not believe that, and as that gentleman has since denied the charge—

Mr. McMASTER: His offspring.

Mr. EULER:—denied his offspring, if you like, and as no denial of the charge has come from the other side of the bargain, perhaps we may assume that the statement is only partially true and that only one-half of the Government are owned by the gentleman from Toronto. If that be true, the suggestion that I am about to make will not meet the approval of the Government. Sir Joseph Flavelle, it was stated, had made $100,000,000 during the war. He has since denied that. But no man, no matter how able he may be, can earn $100,000,000, or $50,000,000, or $10,000,000, or $1,000,000. If he happens to accumulate that much money, he is simply appropriating the product of the labour of others. The suggestion I was going to make is that the Government might very well consider the imposition of a very heavy succession tax. That is not a new idea, and I know the province of Ontario is imposing a succession tax, although not a heavy one. I submit there would be no injustice under a law whereby the State would take a substantial part of large fortunes upon the death of the owner, leaving a reasonable amount for the surviving members of the family. Thus the people would receive back their own, that which is really the product of their own labour.

Thus when the time comes for this titled gentleman from Toronto to be gathered to his fathers, I believe the people of Canada, from coast to coast would approve if some seventy-five or eighty million dollars were restored to the people who created it in the first instance. That is a practical suggestion for the consideration of the Government.

The other day the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) made a statement with which I entirely agree and in which there is a world of truth. He stated that wars will never cease until the ethical influences operate in the hearts of men of all races. I believe that to be absolutely true. That can be applied also to what is to-day after all the greatest question that we have to settle in Canada or in any other country. I refer to the matter of the existing unrest throughout this country and the rest of the world. When you analyse conditions and the causes of things, you will find that there is one great cause for wars, and for restlessness of all kinds. It is the quality of human selfishness. That is all. That is the quality that permeates all classes and races of men and brings about wars, disagreements and troubles. Under the conditions under which we live, selfishness is the absolutely logical result. Where men do not know what the future will bring forth, whether they will have enough to subsist on in the years to come, there is only one thing for them to do, and that is to grasp as much as each one can, and "The devil take the hindmost." That is the condition in which we live to-day.

That cannot be overcome except by long years of ethical training. In the meantime the Government can certainly do something to bring about the desired result. One broad principle may be laid down. Labour must receive a greater portion of that which it produces. Consciously or unconsciously, Labour demands, I think, three things: First, personal and individual liberty, and it is going to get that if it has to fight for it. Secondly, a comfortable living, and surely it is entitled to that. Canada is rich enough to keep all in comfort, and I think that an eight-hour day is long enough, if the working man uses those eight hours to good advantage. Third, it desires some sort of security for the future. Is it too much to expect the Government to remove from the minds of everybody, and particularly from the minds of the working people, that great haunting fear of the future? I am certain that in the minds of all there is a fear that they may not be able to produce enough to maintain themselves and their dependents in the coming years. If this means the introduction of old age pensions, pensions for unemployment, and pensions for widows and mothers, I for one am ready to support any legislation in that direction. It is necessary also that men should be educated and the right men fitted to the right jobs.

In conclusion, I am going to refer to a matter which has been touched on by some hon. members, notably by those of the city of Toronto. I refer to the alien question. I am sure that even a number of enemy aliens in this country have received less than justice at times. I shall take the liberty of reading a short extract on this question from a Conservative newspaper that supported the Union Government in the last election. It embodies my view:

> Summed up, the matter of the alien citizens stands: We induced them to come here and wield our picks and shovels; we allowed them to live how and where they pleased; we made no attempt to prepare them for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship and since the war, have accentuated rather than relieved the disabilities under which they are labouring.
>
> We in effect say: "You cannot now become a naturalized citizen and where you have been, we suspend your rights, duties and privileges; we pass laws which declare that if you are under 60 years of age you either must work or go to jail; when you are industrious, we regret exempting you from military service and envy the wages you draw. If you show signs of prosperity and live in Toronto you are likely to have your places of business raided and your property destroyed, and take a long chance of being able to collect any damages, because you were born in an alien land.
>
> There is not one alien among a thousand, unless he live in Toronto, who would return of his own accord to Europe. They came to Canada to work, to make a home and rear a family in a land where liberty, justice and opportunity are said to exist and may be shared in by whomsoever will.
>
> There probably is not one alien in ten thousand, who has lived here long enough to get a hair cut, and who having come from an enemy country several years before the war, would knowingly do anything to aid or comfort the enemy.
>
> This paper holds the opinion that every alien who is industrious and law-abiding should be given a square deal and assisted to become a Canadian citizen. The Allies generally have adopted President Wilson's slogan: "Make the world safe for democracy." In its application is it to be confined to Europe or will Canadians take some of their own medicine?
> Even the Yanks can set us a good example in the treatment of aliens matter. They are naturalizing them on every hand and opening schools for instruction in English and the inculcation of the principles of American citizenship.

I now pass to another phase of this question. There are men in Canada to-day who are called aliens who, to all intents and purposes, are good citizens, but technically have no country at all. In the county of Waterloo, the northern riding of which I have the honour to represent, and also in Perth, Huron, Renfrew and perhaps elsewhere there are living many people who came from Germany from twenty-five to fifty years ago. Many of them have taken the oath of allegiance and have always regarded themselves as citizens. Unfortunately, however, many of them have not taken out naturalization papers, which it is necessary for them to do in order to become full-fledged British subjects and Canadian citizens. This difficulty has been aggravated, in our riding at all events, by the fact that in past elections neither of the two political parties has challenged the voter on the score of nationality; there was a sort of compact in regard to that. When the war came these people who had lived in Canada many years and considered themselves British subjects found themselves denied the right of protection which citizenship ought to give. The matter was brought up in the House of Commons in 1917 and Sir Robert Borden recognized the justice of their claim for naturalization. On that occasion he stated in the House that an Order in Council had been passed under which these people could be naturalized during the war under certain conditions. I quote from the Order in Council:

> The Minister observes further that many persons of alien enemy origin who came to Canada many years ago, during infancy, and have grown up believing themselves to be British subjects, now that questions of nationality are being carefully scrutinized, find it impossible to show that they have become British subjects although they have voted and held municipal positions for many years. Many others believe that they became British subjects through naturalization of their parents, but they are unable to prove it because the records are not available.

The Prime Minister stated that the Order in Council empowered the Secretary of State to issue naturalization certificates to people who complied with its terms. The election came immediately afterwards and nothing then was done in this matter. Immediately after the election, early in 1918, some ninety-three residents of the city of Kitchener made application for naturalization under the terms of this Order in Council. They presented their case through the proper channels, and in all cases recommendation was made by the local judge that they were worthy of receiving naturalization, but this was refused by the Government at Ottawa.

Mr. MURPHY: The election was over then.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but I should make one exception. Although these people who had been in the country from twenty-five to fifty years and had all voted were denied naturalization, one man received naturalization who was an alien enemy. This man, living in the city of Kitchener, came directly to this country from Germany fifteen years ago, and he applied for and received naturalization on January 12th of last year although he did not come under the terms of the Order in Council at all. He knew he was not a Canadian. There was no possibility of a misconception in his case.

He had not lived here very long. He had had opportunities to become naturalized, but had not taken advantage of them. That man who had been here fifteen years and did not come under the terms of the Order in Council was given naturalization by the Union Government, and all the others, many of whom had lived in Canada 50 years, did not receive it.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. EULER: I was just going to mention that. The reason was—that the recommendation made by the one who was responsible stated that he was a good supporter of the Union Government. While this discrimination has been practised against the people of Kitchener, I find in the annual report of the Secretary of State a list of all who were naturalized during the year 1917, and among them there were 471 Austrians, 43 Germans, and 2 Turks. Nobody from the riding I have the honour to represent is included, unless he stated that he had supported the Union Government. Surely these men ought to be given naturalization.

I had not intended to make any personal reference, but a remark made by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) must be my excuse for the statement I am about to make. In giving the names of members of this House who had sons at the front, he gave my own, and in his remarks he said that he did not know whether Mr. Euler had German blood in his veins or not. Mr. Speaker, I have only contempt for the men who will deny his father, or his racial origin. I want to say that the blood that flows in my veins is exactly the same kind of blood that courses in the veins of every other hon. member in this House. It is not English, it is not French, it is not German; it is Canadian. Now, I want to speak so plainly that there can be no misapprehension. The man who is my father came from Germany at the age of two and a half years, long before Confederation, and has lived in this country for nearly seventy-five years, and, what is much more important, he is to-day just as good a Canadian as is his grandson, who is still carrying arms overseas.

An hon. MEMBER: A volunteer.

Mr. EULER: Yes, he was not conscripted. I make this personal reference only for one reason—to give force to my plea for men, who, I think, have not been given justice such as we are accustomed to. We have here people without a country, and in order to express what I mean with regard to them I will read what I wrote to the Secretary of State in connection with this matter, which never received any consideration at the hands of the Union Government:—

> I would like to ask on behalf of these men careful re-consideration. They are in a most unfortunate position through no fault of their own. To-day with the loyal desire to be technically as well as morally, citizens of Canada they have no country and no legal claim to the protection which citizenship ought to provide. Let the Government make all diligent investigation, before granting naturalization, and they will find that the large majority of these men are thoroughly worthy. Recognition of that fact will make for harmony and for the loyalty and true national feeling which a government should make easy rather than difficult.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, when I decided to intervene in this discussion it was at a very much earlier stage of the debate, and there were many things I had in mind to refer to which have since been dealt with by other speakers. There still remain, however, a few things which I would like to deal with briefly. I was struck with the chorus of approval which met the words of the mover and the seconder of the Address, and it occurred to me when I listened to the high tone of their speeches that the people of Canada are much more to be congratulated than are these young men themselves. As one who has observed the trend of parliamentary life for the last thirty years or more, formerly in the Press gallery, I recall the nature of the speeches usually delivered by movers and seconders of the Address in the old days. I am obliged to confess that they were characterized by an obsequiousness and laudation of the Government that was almost nauseating. Now, as a result of the abolition in this country of party politics and the bitter partisanship which means division among the people, we hear a chorus of applause when young men like the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Redman) and the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) speak of service to their country and indulge in sentiments honourable alike to themselves, to this House, and to Canada. I repeat, it is a matter for congratulation to the country that we have come to a time when utterances of such character are recognized and applauded as they deserve to be.

I think it is only fair to say that the new sentiment that has arisen in Canada is due to the fact that we have abolished the old partisan lines which divided this country for forty or fifty years. While this change was brought about primarily by the war, it has been made more complete by the coalition of leaders on both sides, representatives of the old Liberal and Conservative parties joining together to accomplish a great object for the country's good. This cannot fail to have an important effect upon the people, and indeed that effect is already apparent. While much criticism has been indulged in at the expense of this Government as to the results of food control and matters of that kind which are not really fundamental, it is my deliberate conviction that the great body of the people have become possessed of the idea that they will have nothing to do with the old partisan ideals, and shibboleths which have been such a curse to the country in the past. I participated in a function in Winnipeg quite recently which was attended by prominent representatives of the old political parties. As I listened to the Tuppers, the Ashdownes, the Isaac Campbells, the Macdonalds, the Bullmans, and the Fowlers, one after the other, expressing great regret for what had occurred in the past and expatiating upon the evils which had come to this country by virtue of the old partisanship, I was obliged to raise my eyes like the patriarch of old and say: "Lord, now lettest thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation."

That is the spirit of the Canadian people at the present time. Although Union Government cannot go on forever, like Tennyson's brook, one must believe that it is a Government which will live. In my judgment, it will live. I believe that a strong party will be evolved from it which will continue to influence the destinies of the country. The death knell of partisanship as practised by the old parties has been sounded. Partisanship, in my judgment, is as dead as Julius Caesar. We can raise our eyes to heaven and thank God for that.

I have been a student of politics in Canada for the last thirty or forty years, and I have endeavoured to study the two parties. I co-operated with the Liberal party in the old days. I learned my Liberalism at the feet of George Brown, Alexander Mackenzie, Mowat, Blake, and other great Liberal leaders. I also was much impressed by the career of Sir John Thompson, who, although he was not a Liberal, was a great man. As I say, I co-operated with the Liberal party. As the publisher of a newspaper it kept me busy keeping out of the clutches of the law denouncing the old Tory crown and their iniquities in the old days. I was perfectly sincere about it.

I would like to pay tribute to the work of the old Liberals, Baldwin, Lafontaine, Papineau and William Lyon Mackenzie, whose name I always take upon my lips with reverence. We know the fight these men had for responsible government, for the abolition of the clergy reserves, for representation by population, and we know that Lyon Mackenzie was exiled from his country for years and that he spent many weeks with scarcely a bite to eat because he suffered for his principles. We know that when amnesty was proclaimed he crept back to his country a broken old man and was allowed to die in obscurity. When we study the history of our public men and of our politics we must remember the name of William Lyon Mackenzie with reverence. We must understand that we owe a great debt of gratitude to him. The Liberals of the olden days had in their ranks some great men whose patriotism is to be admired.

I had the impression that when their successors in the Liberal party of Canada came into office in 1896 that the ills under which the country was suffering would be cured and that the millennium would be ushered in. I felt that Canada's face would be turned towards paradise and that the long promised reign of righteousness would be brought into existence. I had learned at the feet of those Liberal statesmen to believe that the tariff was bleeding the people until they were white. Indeed, I had listened to the declarations of all the Liberal leaders on this question in the old days. I had seen the blue blood course through the bald head of Sir Richard Cartwright as I was sitting in the Press gallery listening to his denunciation of a total annual expenditure by the Dominion of $37,000,000 as a shame and a disgrace. He said it meant the ruin of the people. The first year of the so called Liberal Administration the expenditure for civil government was increased to the enormous sum of eighty millions. I had heard the appointment of members of Parliament to office denounced as an outrage. I had heard the Senate cursed from Dan to Beersheba, and we were told that if we put the Liberals in office all these things would be corrected. But they were not. I remember going to one of the leaders of the party who had taught me the principles of Liberalism, and I remember protesting to him with great earnestness as a young man that the policy and platform of the Liberal party should be adhered to. I remember saying to him in my childish way—because I was quite young then—that Providence had raised him up to be a great leader in the Liberal party so that he might have it in his power to do a good turn to the people of Canada and set a new ideal before them. I said to him: I have a desire to assist you in carrying out your programme and doing some good to the people of Canada; if you will do this, you will have my devoted assistance, not only in everything that my paper can do in helping you along the line of lifting the people out of the slough of political despond in which they have been wallowing for all these years, but my personal help also. What do you suppose was the answer to me, and I have often wondered if the same answer had been given to my young friends from Calgary and Fort William, what they would have thought. This leader of the Liberal party looked at me and said: "Bob, you are too good for this world." I never had any idea that I had a passport for Paradise or that I had all the virtues that would put me there by Limited Express but I had the old-fashioned notion that a platform that was made to get in on should be a platfrom that was made to stand on.

Let us just look for a moment at what the promise was in regard to the tariff. My respected friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) quoted it the other night. I shall take the opportunity of repeating it:

> I submit to you that the ideal fiscal system is the British system of free trade.
> Let it be well understood that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their ideal is protection; our ideal is free trade.

Under the administration of the Conservative party that sponsored the National Policy, the average tariff was about 35 per cent. Sir Clifford Sifton and other leaders had gone into the West for years and declared to the farmers that if they understood the iniquity of this thing they never would stand it for a moment. They said: Let us have some other policy. Well, Sir, the tariff was revised in 1897 and what do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, was the reduction? I just put it to you. You are a successful and a wise man and I would like to get an expression of opinion from you privately as to what you really thought of it. I am pleased to see the prophet from Brome (Mr. McMaster) in his place and listening to what I am saying. The old Tory tariff was 35 per cent on the average and the total reduction made by the Liberal Government, according to the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) who was the financial critic for the Conservatives at that time, and whose statement I have never heard challenged, was seventy-one one-hundredths of one per cent.

Now it is true—my hon. friend opposite would interrupt me but I will anticipate him—we had also the British preference. I will give the Liberal government all credit for everything they did; we had the British preference, but 71/100 of one per cent was the reduction in the tariff. I think I could have stood it, I think, perhaps, I could have borne with Christian fortitude the situation, only my friends the Liberals expected me to be pleased about it, to giggle, as it were, over the fact that their pledges had been redeemed. I was perfectly willing to bear with equanimity the situation, but I will be hanged if I was able to laugh over it. I did considerable squirming, and when the Opposition introduced their catch-votes, to catch some of us new members, I naturally, was terrifically uneasy, and I was shooting around trying to get my bearings, but old Doctor Landerkin, a fine old chap, would say: "Oh, stand by your party, R. L. stand by your party; this is the usual thing, just vote it down, and never mind what anybody says." But an agricultural implement resolution was brought up, and inasmuch as I had stumped Lisgar on free implements and the coal oil issue, promising free coal oil, and inasmuch as I had pledged myself to the hilt that if my leader did not cut out every whit of protection from the tariff I would resign, I voted for one of these catch resolutions, and I found myself in a very awkward position. I was practically tabooed. The Whips, Sir, went about and asked my friends—you know I am a sort of companionable fellow and love friends and fellowship—they asked my friends not to be seen talking to me. They said: "We will have to teach this kind of man a lesson." I went to Sir Richard Cartwright, and he said: "Never mind, my boy, you just go ahead; there will be no reading you out of the Liberal party, you can read us all out of the Liberal party if you choose." I mention this for the benefit of my friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder), with whom I expect to deal later on when I get time. Sir Richard said to me: "There will be no reading you out of the Liberal party." Well, I was not read out of the Liberal party, but I was dynamited out of the party. That is about what happened to me. Talk about a separated brother. There is a church expression about withdrawing communion from a brother, that is if you stray, some of the churches will withdraw communion from you. Well, Sir, they certainly withdrew communion from me. My friends were warned not to be seen with me at all, and I found myself in an exceedingly uncomfortable position. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. Read) referred to an un-named man who had been such an evil influence in this country. I would not like to be the man that was referred to in this way, but this is the man who sent his emissary to me to warn me that if I didn't follow the party I could expect no quarter—neither nomination, nor patronage. Thank God, I had the independence to tell him to go to a much warmer place than I would like to mention this afternoon. I did not ask for their patronage, and I did not ask for the nomination. However, I got a nomination which carried me into Parliament the next time. I dislike to refer to these matters, and I shall only do so very briefly. Although I was elected by a large majority in old constituency, and although I took the Old Bible in my hand and swore that my entire expenses in that riding—and it was about a hundred and fifty miles long by fifty or sixty wide—were within $500, I was the only man elected in the Dominion of Canada that was unseated for bribery and corruption. Men who co-operated with me were given jobs, and hired to give testimony that teams had been hired in my election. Of course, it was a bit of a conspiracy to drive out of public life a man who had dared to call a spade, a spade. I go over these particulars because I want to draw a parallel between the old days, when I am told that even caucus was a mutual admiration society. When the ministers came into caucus, I am told, they were applauded, applauded, and applauded, and that caucus largely consisted in applause by obsequious members of the ministers of the Crown.

The scene has changed, the young men who rose to move and second this Address, and gave expression to the highest ideals, are the young men who to-day are applauded in this House, and who will be loudly applauded in the country. I only refer to my own experience to illustrate the change that has taken place. You see you could not grow public men in this country under such a system. Blake, MacKenzie, and Mowat, they were only occasionals, they were not the regular annual product at all. The political soil in Canada made it impossible to grow statesmen here. After the lesson that had been taught R. L. Richardson no one, for a long time, undertook to exhibit much independence in this House. I was the awful example. I would like to add, that while the judges were considering the verdict on the election petition against me, the organ of the man to whom the member for Prince (Mr. Read) referred the other night, announced that one was to be transferred to the Supreme Court in Ottawa, and the other to be made the Chief Justice in Manitoba. The verdict was given against me, Mr. Speaker, and one man was transferred to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the other received the Chief Justiceship of Manitoba. I hope that in the sphere in which they find themselves at this present hour, they will enjoy the reward of their infamy. For it was infamy to drive out of public life a man who desired to do his duty by the people.

I never could conceive, it passes my comprehension, that public men would enter public life for the purpose of making money and graft out of office. Surely the highest recognition that any man can receive, is the reward of a good conscience in having rendered decent and faithful service to his country. I offer no apology for that declaration. It is the only conclusion that any man who has considered the philosophy of life and who has thought over the goal to which we are all hastening, can come to.

Now, let me return to the Liberal platform. I remember, in addition to the tariff how the appointment of members of Parliament to office was denounced. It was one of the iniquities of the old Tory party, and I thought when the Liberals got into office, "Now everything is pure, everything is correct." Would you believe it, Mr. Speaker,—and I am going to ask you to tell me your opinion privately, because I have a high estimate of your character—would you believe it that in eight years—I have the figures here but I will speak subject to correction—the so-called Liberal Government appointed more members of Parliament to office than their predecessors, whom they so roundly denounced, appointed during their entire administration.

Now, I have referred to the public expenditure, and I have referred to the appointment of members of Parliament to office, and I now come to the Senate. The Senate had been cursed by the Liberals in opposition as a body of old women, as a graveyard, as a political excrescence on the body politic, until there seemed to be nothing left to be said against them. Indeed, on the hustings Liberal speakers exhausted themselves in denouncing the Senate. They would have a girl or a woman at the meeting with an accordion and when the speaker came to speak of the Senate she would sing "They are going down the valley." Of course, they were going down the valley; the Senate was to be either abolished or reformed. But the Senate was continued identically along the same lines by the Liberal Government. When our old friend Bob Watson, of ancient memory, used to stalk about the constituencies in the West and tell the people what the Government had done after the Liberals came into office, somebody would put the question to him: "Say, Bob, tell us about the Senate; what did you do with that?" "Oh," says Bob, with his thumbs under his suspenders, "we have reformed the Senate all right; I am in it"—and that was regarded as the reformation of the Senate.

I could go on indefinitely in this vein, but I am sure that I have gone sufficiently far to convince this House and the country that there is a great deal of difference between a party in opposition and a party in power.

Lest my friends on the other side, and particularly the prophet from Brome (Mr. McMaster) might think I am unduly hard and critical and unfair to the Liberals, let me say this: I have come to the deliberate conviction, after thirty-five years' study, that the difference between the two political parties which held sway in this country is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. There never was any difference between them, and that is why I want to quarrel publicly with my friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. J. A. Calder), who talked about being read out of the Liberal party. My dear sir, there is not any Liberal party. Yes, there is "the" Liberal party, but there is not "a" Liberal party. Mark the distinction. They have the trademark all right, but I have demonstrated to this House what the practices of that party have been. I think that the member for Brome is perfectly sincere—a great many of them are—and honestly thinks that if his party got into office they would reform the tariff; that they would wipe out every vestige of protection. Not so, my good friend. You have associated with you the Clifford Siftons, the L. M. Joneses and the Billy Patersons and a lot of the people who live, move and have their being in protection—and you just try it some day. When I came down here to Parliament after one election, having stumped the country on a coal oil can, I thought that we would get free coal oil. I used to tell the farmers that the ties of bondage were gone, that they would get their agricultural implements free of duty. And do you know what I found? I found that the question was not whether the duty should be wiped off agricultural implements, but how much it should be increased. L. M. Jones—"old slippery L. M." we used to call him out in Manitoba—was the head of the combine in Canada, and he spent almost an entire Sabbath with me pleading with me to agree to have the duty increased. Now, L. M. is gone; he is not here to offer any defence, and I shall not repeat the conversation; I shall let it go with that statement. Well, I forget what was really done with the duty, but it was left practically as it was, and L. M. Jones was singled out for distinction by the Liberal party; he was made a knight, forsooth, a Knight Commander of the Bath, and died as such.

This is a kind of experience meeting Mr. Speaker and I am putting the cards on the table. I do not want any Liberal to be fooled as I was. I want to be the beacon light—not the one that the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) referred to—to warn any simpletons who may think that they can get all they want in reference to the tariff from the Liberal party; and that is why I am taking the position that I do this afternoon.

After the failure to revise the tariff in 1896 save to the extent of seventy-one-one hundredths of one per cent, one would have thought that there would have been an outcry from the Atlantic to the Pacific over the apostacy of the Liberal party—it was not "a" Liberal party; it was the Liberal party. Let me tell you, Sir, that only a handful from one end of this country to the other offered any protest. In fact, they continued to worship Baal, the same God that my friend the prophet from Brome referred to the other evening. I am going to take my friend up to Mount Carmel to-night, if he will come with me, and we shall have a good time offering burnt sacrifices there. Well, had there been any repudiation of the course followed at that time there might have been some hope for the Liberal party. Repudiation—after the tariff had been revised? What do you suppose our friend the master of the Administration, Clifford Sifton, did? He went up to my old town of Perth, a place near which I was born more years ago than I care to confess, and he made a speech in the course of which he said:

> The tariff issue has been solved by the Liberal Government. It has been taken out of the list of issues as between the parties, because the present tariff is one which our opponents would not change much if they were in a position to do so.

Seventy-one-one hundredths of one per cent—and the tariff issue had been solved, taken out of the list of issues; no further quarrelling as between the parties on the tariff issue! As I say, one would have expected an outcry from the Atlantic to the Pacific. But I do not recall that my friend the prophet from Brome took the platform and denounced it. I do not recall that any of my friends who sat on the other side offered one word of protest. The idea, Sir, was to "stand pat," if you will allow me to use the language of the street, and to carry out the apostacy; to destroy or bludgeon any one whose voice was raised against it in this country. It is a reflection upon the people of Canada that that policy was largely carried out.

The Liberal party—I speak of what is left of it, because really the Liberal party is over here. How proud I was, as an old Liberal, to listen to the magnificent speech of the President of the Privy Council (Hon. N. W. Rowell) this afternnon. How pleased we all were to listen to the able deliverance of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. J. A. Calder) a few evenings ago. Those of us who came over here for a principle, to which I hope to allude later, feel that we, in duty to ourselves and to our country, must stand for that principle until it is finally carried out. We are all proud to know that men of the type that I have just mentioned, old Liberals, are happy in this camp—not because it is a Tory camp, because it is not a Tory camp. There is really no essential difference fundamentally between men.

I have co-operated with members on both sides of the House, and I find the same kindness, the same generosity, the same views pretty generally when you get close to men, whether on one side or on the other. Therefore the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) may set his mind at rest, because he will never be read out of a Liberal party. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) spoke of keeping his Liberal principles in cold storage. I could not understand what he meant, and I will warrant you, Sir, that if he was put to it he could no more tell what Liberal principles are than he could fly to the moon. The trouble is that, so far as I can see, very few have ever stopped to analyse what Liberalism and Liberal principles are. They talk glibly about them, but they never stop to think. If I were asked what Liberalism meant, I would say that it meant freedom in trade, liberty in religion, and equality in civil rights. We all profess that, and inasmuch as the party on the other side, even led by the prophet from Brome (Mr. McMaster) will not be able to carry out the ideas that he has, he may just as well possess his soul in patience, and he will find it far better quietly and conscientiously to support the good things that the party on this side of the House are giving them because if the men on this side are not able, with the combination that I have dsecribed, to manage the affairs of the country at this critical time—and it is a mighty critical time—no other combination in Canada will be able to do so. There is no doubt about that. My hon. friends opposite would not take office if they could get it. They have nobody to go in with them. The light is in the window on this side, and my hon. friends opposite may all have to flock to it after a little.

The war is over. May we hope that for Heaven's sake the racial and religious cry will be dropped for good! I look fondly for the time when the province of Quebec will be represented as it should be in the Government of this country, and we shall not gain anything by calling each other names. Let us, however, be perfectly candid with each other; state the facts exactly as they are, and when we find a combination of men willing to do their best to administer the affairs of this country at the critical stage that we are now at, let us give them every assistance we can. I have passed the stage when I regard all or most men with suspicion. It is only the odd man who is to be suspected. Most men are, in my judgment, endeavouring to do the best they can under Heaven, and the Lord knows it is a man's job being a minister of the Crown. He can hardly call his soul his own, let alone his time. The marvel is that men choose such slavery, but they seem to do it. The responsibility is on the country to give the men who are willing to serve the country a fair chance. Let us not treat them with suspicion. Let us not misinterpret their motives and suspect unjustly that their motives are corrupt and not decent. It is that sort of thing that keeps good men out of public life. Self-respecting men will not pay the price of the sacrifice of their self-respect in order to enter the public life of this country, and I do not blame them.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield) (resuming): Mr. Speaker, the adjournment at six o'clock gave me an opportunity of glancing over some notes I had made. It is usually my practice to make elaborate notes and then condense them on an envelope, and then forget all about them until I have finished speaking, and I see that I omitted one or two points this afternoon. I have spoken about the partisan soil of Canada being unable to produce statesmen. I dwelt at considerable length on that very important fact, and I want to emphasize it once more. It is my deliberate conviction, born of close observation, that owing to the partisan feeling, the absolutely silly partisan feeling that passes all understanding which has prevailed in this country for the last thirty or forty years, it has been almost impossible to raise a statesman in this country. If one "happened" it was merely the result of fortuitous circumstance, and if such a one attempted to preach the gospel of service to his country and to take high ground generally, he was usually regarded as a crank and a dangerous man, and promptly relegated to oblivion. Take the case of the Hon. Edward Blake who, in my judgment, is the greatest son Canada ever had. He knocked at the door of his country offering his splendid services for a quarter of a century, and yet, notwithstanding his magnificent ability, notwithstanding his Liberalism and desire for service, the deliberate verdict of this country time after time was "Give us rather Barrabas," and this country has had to some extent a Barrabas after Barrabas, figuratively speaking. Consider for a moment the colossal mistakes that have been made in this country—the hundreds of millions, for instance, that have been poured into the lap of railway exploiters, until to-day we have on our hands an appalling mess which, unless we sail very carefully, may drag the country down. I shall not take the time to-night to recount the tremendous mistakes that have been made. One unfortunate thing is that the moment a man gets a position in this country, whether he be a great man or not, the people of this country place a halo about his head and our newspapers break into fulsome adulation. And yet, men are very much alike. With the exception of yourself, Sir, and a few others that I might name, there are really no great men in Canada to-day. Men are just mediocre, and fulsome adulation simply destroys them. It simply raises opposition against them, and encourages those disposed to criticise to criticise too harshly.

Now that I am on my feet I should like to say a word or two to the Canadian people. I should like them to get rid of the idea that two or three or a dozen men embody all the wisdom of the country. Why, in my judgment, the very best men of the country are excluded from office. They would not pay the price, would not consent to the sacrifice of self-respect, in order to attain a position in public life. You, Sir, I suppose, have been a candidate in many elections, and must have some idea of the methods that have been employed in the past. If you have not, I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite have. Who could get an Edward Blake to run around shaking hands with his constituents and singing such songs as "For you I am praying," accompanying himself on the melodeon as certain hon. gentlemen have done who have gained seats in this House in past years. The methods that have had to be employed, and which I assume are employed to some extent to-day, to get a seat in this House are such as would entirely turn the stomach of the average man, and that is why good men have been excluded from the service of their country. Mackenzie, for instance. How sweet the name Mackenzie sounds in every Liberal's ear! I do not refer to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. His name may sound very sweet in the ears of the average Liberal, but if he ever gets over to this side of the House—which Heaven forfend!—he will probably discover that his name does not sound so sweet to the average Liberal, and particularly so if he shows any tendency to emulate the example of his noble predecessor, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and carries his principles into operation. When I came to this Parliament, an unsophisticated young Liberal, brought up at the feet of Hon. George Brown and Alexander Mackenzie, about twenty-two or twenty-three years ago, I held Alexander Mackenzie in the utmost reverence, and yet I learned that Alexander Mackenzie was really side-tracked by the Liberals. The name Mackenzie did not sound so sweet in the ears of Liberals of those days. The slogan among the Liberals when the Government was organized in 1896 and when we met here was, " For Heaven's sake let us not make the mistakes that Mackenzie made." I am not making a political speech, but just giving historical facts. I am spilling the beans right on the table beside the Mace so that all within hearing may understand the facts. The " mistakes " that Mackenzie made—I will put quotation marks on the word mistakes—were that he stood strictly to his principles. Mackenzie believed as my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) believes, and as I believe, that a party which goes to the country on a platform is in duty bound—morally bound, bound in every honourable way—to stand by that platform. Mackenzie believed in low tariff, and staked his political existence on low tariff. He was willing to go down to defeat on low tariff. Like that candidate for the Presidency of the United States, he would sooner be right than be Prime Minister. And let me tell my separated brethren on the other side of the House that the chief heritage which the Liberal party—not " a " Liberal party, but " the " Liberal party—enjoys to-day is that which was bequeathed to them by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who stood to his principles. That is their noblest heritage.

Now, a word on the necessity of cultivating the soil that produces statesmen, who are truly servants of the people. For, after all, there is something worth while in being a public man and serving the State. But, if men who attempt to serve the State are ridiculed out of existence, if communion is withdrawn from them, if they are treated as, in the humble instance of myself I described this afternoon, then you will not raise that type of men in the country. Men will not serve the people if they know that they will be politically destroyed for so doing. I remember in my early days reading an essay by a great historian and philosopher. He was describing a hero, a man who had rendered great service to his country, both in the field of war and in the field of politics, for a period of thirty or forty years, and was recognized and acclaimed for what he had accomplished for the country. And the historian, in summing up his life, said: the great achievement—now, mark the words, for this is worth while—the great achievement of that country was to have produced such a hero, and woe to that country that fails to recognize its heroes, for after a time no hero will appear, nay, no hero will even be born. This, in my judgment, indicates the reason why Canada has not produced the type of men it should have produced for the public life of the country. Frequently I have listened to deliverances by able men who have declared that what Canada needs is a leader, a Joshua. [I am looking at my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), though I have not him in mind.] What Canada needs, they tell us, is a Joshua who will take us out of the wilderness and into the promised land. Now, if the philosophers, or so-called philosophers, had stopped to think for a moment they would have known that it is impossible, and has been for thirty years, for Canada to produce a leader, a Joshua. Your public men are no better, and of necessity cannot be better, than the people. That is why it is so desirable to cultivate ideals, and to cultivate especially the ideal of service. That is why I have been glad to say an encouraging word to the two young men, one of whom moved and the other seconded the Address. I said this afternoon, and I repeat, it is a good sign to see member after member on both sides of the House congratulate these young men upon the noble, patriotic sentiments expressed in their speeches. This laudation of ideals augurs well for the future of the country.

In speaking this afternoon, and making a personal reference to the difficulties I encountered as a Liberal who made an attempt, however feeble, to stand by his ideals, I neglected to say what I never had opportunity to say before, but which I am glad to say now. I take advantage of this opportunity to bear testimony to the kindness that was shown to me by the late Dalton McCarthy, and the late Hon. N. Clarke Wallace, who wrote an open letter on my behalf to the people of Canada. I wanted to pay that tribute, and I think it only right that I should do so.

Let me offer a word of advice to my friends of the so-called Liberal party on the other side. If they seriously think of obtaining office, if they have any serious notion that the people of Canada will be willing to place the administration of public affairs in their hands, I would suggest that they join heartily in assisting the powers that be to carry out all measures that make for the good of the country. The responsibility of citizenship is something, I think, the people of Canada are apt to lose sight of. It is all very well to say that we have a Government, that the Government has the responsibility and must do the work and supply the ideas. As I pointed out before, no government embraces all the wisdom, or even a great portion of the wisdom of the people. The members of the Government do what they can, but think of the collossal tasks that lie before the Administration, think of the dreadful responsibilities that rest, not on the Government but on the people. For, after all, the people must bear the responsibility. There is no use in expecting the Government to do all. Take the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) for instance. I suppose no man in Canada is besieged as he has been and is at this time—all clamouring for the expenditure of money in their several localities. The idea must be given to the people of Canada that they have the responsibility on their shoulders. It is useless to blame the Government if everything is not right; let the people get right themselves, and that will help to make the Government right. With the enormous problems of the returned soldiers and reconstruction to be dealt with, the Government will be absolutely powerless unless it has the sympathy and support of the people in so far as it is doing right. And, of course, it is quite absurd to suppose that the average Government does not want to do right. It may not be composed of the wisest or the greatest men, but these men according to their lights are usually trying to do the best they can, and in that they are entitled to the support and sympathy of the people. Carrying out the simile of the wilderness and the promised land, I would say to hon. gentlemen opposite that if they want to inspire the confidence of the country, they must get in line and assist in the measures that make for the country's good, or if they do not, the fate that overtook the children of Israel will overtake them—yes, and even worse, for not even a Joshua or a Caleb among them will enter the promised land. They will remain in the wilderness until they all die out, and only their successors who learn the lesson of service will be able to enter the promised land and partake of the milk and honey.

This afternoon I discussed to some extent the subject of party. I did not go as fully into the idea as I had intended to and I think it is particularly important in this country, and especially at this juncture, that there shall be a very clear conception on the part of the hon. members of this House and on the part of the people at large in regard to "party." I read an address made by an hon. member of this House recently at a function in Toronto, in reference to party. He evidently had it in his mind that Union Government was not a party and he appealed to history to show that they were sure to degenerate into a faction. My hon. friend entirely misreads history in regard to that. Party came into existence in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Before that, in the Roman Empire, they had a sort of municipal government, but, inasmuch as it was impossible to take a vote for the entire Roman Empire, and a vote could only be taken in Rome or at some other place, the system fell by the wayside and degenerated into a military dictatorship led by Cæsar. That is why Cæsar was assassinated. Perhaps some of my good friends do not know that but it was because Cæsar lent himself to the idea of a military despotism that he lost his life. Henceforth Cæsarism prevailed and the world lay prostrate at the feet of a military despot. I rather think that Cæsar deserved to lose his life under these circumstances, but I am not going to go over the history of the world from the time of the dissolution of the Roman Empire down to the organization of the British nation.

Party, as I say, came into existence in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It was the strong, independent spirit of Puritanism standing out in protest against the exercise of the Royal prerogative in matters of Church and State that produced the first party. The development of party government is a very interesting study. Parties were organized for the purpose of accomplishing a reform. The Puritans organized, increased their strength and finally were able to challenge the prerogative of the King. In order to lay my foundation properly I might be permitted to read a sentence or two from Sir Erskine May's Constitutional History of England. Sir Erskine May says:

> Party has guided and controlled and often dominated over the ostensible authorities of the State: It has supported the Crown and aristocracy against the people; it has trampled upon public liberty; it has dethroned and coerced kings, overthrown their ministers in parliament, humbled the nobles, and established popular rights. But it has protected the fabric of the Government from shocks which threatened its very foundations. The annals of party embrace a large portion of the History of England. The parties in which the British people have associated at different times and under various names have represented cardinal principles of Government authority on one side, and popular rights and privileges on the other.
>
> The former principle pressed to extremes would tend to absolutism, the latter to a republic, but controlled within proper limits they are both necessary for the safe working of a balanced constitution.
> When parties have lost sight of these principles in pursuit of objects less worthy, they have degenerated into faction.

That is what my hon. friend to whom I referred had in his mind but he lost sight of principles. That applies to the old Liberal party. I think I demonstrated this afternoon to the satisfaction of every person within hearing of my voice that that party was organized upon certain principles, that it adopted a certain platform and that it failed to carry out that platform. If the administration of the Government of the country becomes a case of the "ins" and the "outs," if that is the only issue as between parties then party degenerates, as Sir Erskine May says, into faction. That is not the case with Union Government, founded as this Government has been on a great principle, for the purpose of carrying out a great object, one of the greatest that human history has ever recorded. This is not a faction; it is a party organized for a great purpose. It is not going too far to say that this party which was organized for a purpose has stood loyally by that purpose. It was surely worth while bringing into existence for that purpose.

But something almost as good has been accomplished. Men, hundreds of them, from the different sides of politics, have mingled for the first time with their fellow Canadians on this side of the House and they have learned that after all there are very trifling differences between them. They have learned that there is not as much dividing them as they thought. Let me give an illustration as to parties. What makes a man a Presbyterian? Is it not belief in and practice of the doctrines of the Westminster Confession? What makes a man an Anglican? Is it not belief in and practice of the doctrines of the Thirty Nine Articles? What makes a man a Roman Catholic? Is it not belief in and practice of the doctrines and tenets of the Roman Catholic church? If a man calls himself a Roman Catholic and yet believes in the Thirty Nine Articles, or the doctrine of the Presbyterian church, is he a Roman Catholic? Certainly not. Therefore I contend that when a man calls himself a Liberal, and if the platform of Liberalism is free trade and if that man practises protection to the hilt, appoints Bob Watson to the Senate, and appoints more members of Parliament to office than his predecessors ever thought of doing, he is not a Liberal at all. He may think he is but thinking that he is does not alter the case. He is what he does and what he practises. Is the point clear, Mr. Speaker? If it is not I have abundance of other evidence.

I have always contended that one of the very worst features in our system of Government is that the followers of the Government are bound by some act of the Government. For instance, the Government introduce say, a Daylight Saving Bill. I hope to the Lord they will not introduce it again this year because we members representing rural constituencies feel that our political lives are at stake if we support daylight saving. And yet, unless we vote for the Government, the Government fails.

Now that is one of the most vicious features of our party Government. I like very much better the French system, and I am going to appeal to the Acting Prime Minister, and to his colleagues, to see if it would not be possible to introduce the French system into this House. As I understand it, all measures introduced into the French Chambre des Communes are thrown open for action on the part of the members regardless of party. How absurd has been the spectacle in Canada for the last forty or fifty years—ever since I can remember, ever since Confederation—of a Parliament of about three hundred supposedly sensible men sitting some to the right and some to the left of the Speaker, and yet in the case of every measure that has been introduced in this House, with rare exceptions, for forty or fifty years, if it was introduced by the Government, the men to the right of the Speaker have voted yea, and the men to the left of the Speaker have voted nay, utterly regardless of the merits of the Bill, and utterly regardless of the effects of the Bill upon their constituencies. It passes comprehension that such a system should be continued. It may be said that we follow precedent, but what do we need to care about precedent? In God's name, let us get on with the business of the country, and do that business as it should be done, regardless of party. Under the French system, when a Bill is introduced the members vote for it according to their best judgment. It may be introduced by the Government, it might be introduced by any particular member, or any particular party in the Chambre des Communes. The measure is discussed on its merits, and even if introduced by the Government, if the majority of the Chamber think it should not become law, the majority vote against it and it falls. The existence of the Government is hinged upon a vote of confidence, or a vote of want of confidence. The Government might introduce what they thought an important measure, and be defeated root and branch, the members exercising their God-given intelligence. Why, if the majority of that House think that that Government, generally speaking, is the best Government for France, somebody submits a vote of confidence in it, and if the motion carries the Government remains in office. There, it is on the Government's general policy, and on the Government's service for the State, that its existence hinges. In our country it is entirely different. Surely, we could break away from precedent and adopt the French system, which I feel sure would be a good thing for the Dominion of Canada.

Now the British system of party government—and it is a fine tribute to the old British race—developed over a thousand years, evolved out of great hardship, great worries and great troubles, but the party system has been deliberately adopted by all free peoples over the earth. So much for the British system. If we follow the British ideals and use parties for the purpose of accomplishing great reforms, then we are following along the right line. Let us glance at the agitation for the abolition of the Corn laws fifty or sixty years ago. John Bright, Richard Cobden, and other able men, whose hearts beat in unison and sympathy for the people, realized that protection was an evil in the land. Hundreds, and thousands, nay, tens of thousands, were almost starving for the want of something to eat, and these great men—men whose hearts beat for the people—saw that in order to work a reform, it was desirable, nay necessary, to get rid of protection. They began their agitation in the House. They secured recruits in the House and out of it, and they worked along for years propagating their theories and pointing out to the people of Great Britain a remedy for the evils that existed, until finally they succeeded in persuading the people and organizing a party in the House of Commons that resulted in the abolition of the Corn laws. That was a great triumph, a great achievement for party! That is what party should be used for, and that should be its only purpose. To merely call ourselves parties, and divide into two factions will never help the country, and, as I pointed out several times, it has resulted in almost destroying our public life. We want to get away from factions, we want to form an idea of what the country's interests are, we want to devote ourselves to the service of the country and carry out what the country needs. In a word, let us serve the country and not serve party.

I want to refer briefly to the speech of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell). I have already alluded to the task which he has in hand at the present time. He has spoken with great frankness, and there has been very little criticism of his statements. Occasionally you hear the speech referred to as a pessimistic statement, but I say all honour to the responsible minister of the Crown who tells Parliament, and through Parliament the people of the country, exactly what the position of affairs is. He tells us that we will probably be faced with a deficit—after providing for pensions, for the carrying on of the affairs of the country, and paying the interest on the war debt—of one hundred millions dollars, —and yet the clamour for public works, and the clamour for expenditures goes on apace. Members of this House, and the people of this country, are faced with a serious situation. It is not fair, Sir, to badger our ministers for lavish expenditures, perhaps unreasonable expenditures, without considering from what source the money is to come. The Dominion has great natural resources, but the prospect of realizing on them is rather limited as we see them at present. Will the Dominion be able to meet that vast expenditure? There is no use blaming the Government. The Government did not bring on the war, and only incidentally incurred the necessary expenditure. The country clamoured for the sending of our soldiers to the front; we all held up our hands for it, and are grateful for the deeds of heroism that our soldiers have achieved and for the glory they have reflected on this Dominion. But the Government are not specially responsible; they are charged with the function of trying to provide the necessary means to provide the necessary money. But this Parliament and the people of this country have the responsibility. The words of the Minister of Public Works should sink deep into the hearts of the Canadian people, and they should not divest themselves, as indeed they cannot divest themselves—of responsibility in connection with the management of our public affairs. I was struck very recently with an expression used by an ex-minister of the Crown. In talking with me he said that thrift has apparently become a vice or a crime in the country. The people seem to have the idea that the golden stream should pour not only from the spigot, but from the bunghole as well. Is thrift a crime?

Let us look at the developments in connection with the Printing Bureau. As chairman of the Debates Committee it has been my duty to visit the Printing Bureau on different occasions, and I came to the conviction that of all the patronage cesspools out of Hades, the Printing Bureau was the worst. It so sickened me that I thought: how can Canada ever succeed if that sort of thing goes on? Perhaps I will be pardoned for saying that last session I went to the Prime Minister and told him about the state of affairs at the Bureau. He was pretty busy at the time, but he gave me a moment or two, and I said to him: "If you, Sir Robert, will place me in charge of the Printing Bureau for one year and give me a free hand, I will promise to cut the expenditure in two and I shall not charge the country one farthing for my services." Sir Robert did not give me a direct answer; he asked me to confer with another member of the Cabinet. Of course, I did not do so, but I thought it was a rare opportunity for a reformer—I call myself a reformer—just to give one object lesson as to what could be done at the Printing Bureau. The mess has been exposed, and a sickening mess it is. I do not blame the present Government, although they have been in office over a year and might have taken some radical action to cure the evil. But it has been the result of the political partisan system practised by both parties for the last twenty-five or thirty years, and both are responsible.

Now, what has happened in the Printing Bureau has, in my judgment, happened before and is happening, though perhaps not to the same disgusting extent, all over the Civil Service of the country. I have not time to tell all the things that have come under my observation; I should not like to tire the House by relating all these particular cases. But it is my deliberate judgment that from the Atlantic to the Pacific things exist in the public service of Canada, and have existed under all Governments for thirty, forty, or fifty years that are a disgrace to the country and that, if not corrected, will sap the life-blood of the country. You cannot allow a cancer or sore like that to exist on the body politic for an indefinite time and expect that body politic to be healthy or to survive. Unless it is cured, it will eat the vitals of the country ultimately, as the cancer will eat the body of the man who contracts it. Would to Heaven that this Government would let me name one commission. I am not very favourable to commissions. We have had a great many of them, but I should like to be able to name one commission that would go from the Atlantic to the Pacific and carve this cancer out. Let us get rid of the barnacles, the thousands who have fastened themselves on the body politic and are eating its vitals out. We had better put our cards on the table in reference to this Civil Service. The Printing Bureau is not the only place; let us clean the whole thing out from stem to gudgeon. It is a big task, a tremendous task; it will require men of firmness, men of courage, men careful of the public interest. Such men are to be found in this country, and if they were given a fair opportunity I believe that this Civil Service could be cleaned up. And the time to do that is when the Union Government is in office; when the Liberals of this country have united with the Conservatives for the purpose of grappling with the vast problems that confront Canada at the present time. That is the only time in which this work can be properly and effectively done, and in God's name, let it be done, Mr. Speaker.

Let me give you a little instance of what I found when I was a member of the Debates Committee twenty odd years ago. We discovered that a number of the translators were drawing large pay and were farming the jobs out to girls at one-fourth or one-fifth the amount they were receiving from the country. I had a notion, in my own foolish little way, that when a thing like that was discovered it could be corrected, and I moved that these men be dismissed. Remember, I was a supporter—at least I thought I was—of the Liberal Government. I moved that these men be dismissed. What do you suppose happened? The Chairman, who came from the province of Quebec—I shall not mention his name—refused to put the motion, and when I insisted, he left the chair and left the room. I said: "Well what are we going to do, boys?" John V. Ellis, a fine old Liberal from Saint John, was a member of that committee, and I moved that he take the chair. But, you know, Mr. Ellis was an older and perhaps wiser man than I in his day and generation; Mr. Ellis did not want to run up against any snag about any patronage business because he might be called down. I did not think of being called down; I did not know enough. I have learned something since then. If I never make another speech in this House I propose to make it to-night and to tell the facts exactly as I know them. It is a fine thing, Mr. Speaker, just once in your life-time to stand up and have your say, anyway.

So Mr. Ellis would not take the chair. Then I looked around and I saw that fine old fellow, Jim Somerville, a Scotchman, who would, I thought, like Wallace, stand to the death. So I moved old Jim into the chair. Do you suppose Jim would take the chair? Not—if you will pardon my adopting the parlance of the street—"not on your tin-type." Jim also was too wise in his day and generation. Jim knew how many beans made five. Jim probably had in contemplation his patronage; all these things were in jeopardy—although poor "R. L." did not understand it at that time; it was a case of fools rushing in where angels like Jim Somerville and John Ellis feared to tread. So when Jim would not take the chair I said to the committee: "Well, if somebody will nominate me, I will take the chair." So my old friend, Nicholas Flood Davin, who loved a scrap and who thought that the boys on the Government side were fighting, moved me to the chair and I took it and had the motion put and carried. But Lord, whatever became of the translators I cannot tell. I do not think they were fired at all. But I was fired. That, Mr. Speaker, is what happened to little Willie. Do you suppose that I ever got the chairmanship of that committee back? No, sir. I have it now, but the committee never meets. I was just reflecting upon how the law of compensation comes in. I was fired, blown, dynamited out of the chair. Billy Gibson, that amiable old whip, went about and said: "You cannot afford to appoint a traitor like that chairman of a committee." So I was not appointed; I was left at home. Although I was too much disgusted to follow it up very closely, I believe that the translators remained in office and drew their stipends just the same, while the girls went on doing their work for one-quarter the money that was paid to the translators.

So much for my little escapade or pilgrimage into patronage. If we try now to work it on that basis, we shall never succeed. We must go at this thing with an axe. The Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), a fine old Liberal, and the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), who was also a Liberal by the way—these men know or ought to know something about the principles of Liberalism. Let them set the pace, and they will, I warrant you, Sir, find a united party behind them to get rid of this parasitic business of patronage. It is a dreadful business in this country and we want to wipe it out. If the Government will but set the pace, I am satisfied they will find the House very ready to second their efforts.

I have some other points yet, although I trust I am not wearying the House. I have to take my hon. friend the prophet from Brome (Mr. McMaster) up to Mount Carmel. Before I do so, I should like to refer to my visit to the old land, and to the battlefields of France and Flanders. I have rarely been able to speak without emotion when I refer to the things that I have witnessed on the battlefields of France and Flanders. When I think of the heroism of our boys on the battlefields and remember the task they accomplished and recall the fact, as it was stated to me, that they did about one-quarter of the actual fighting on the battle front, I have no words in which to express my personal gratitude to those brave sons who have saved liberty for me. I suppose most of those boys had read the history of their mother land. They had no doubt read the history of the preservation of liberty and freedom under the British flag. They no doubt know, as we know, that for centuries the blood of our ancestors flowed in rivers in order that the people of Britain should enjoy freedom in the land. Through the veins of the 60,000 boys, no, of the 500,000 who went to the rescue of liberty and freedom in the old land, flows the same British blood. You cannot make any mistake about it. The Britisher knows how to fight; he knows how to die; but he never yet has learned the idea of yielding. That is something the British subject never can do.

I was struck with the heroism of our women, the daughters of this land who by the thousand went to the front, who nursed the boys through their time of trouble, sorrow and peril. I walked through the hospitals, past miles of white cots. Sometimes I paused to speak to these poor broken fellows—and some of them were woefully broken. I watched these angels of mercy, these Florence Nightingales by the thousand, as they nursed the boys and raised their heads and tenderly tried to distract their attention in order that the silver cord might not be broken. I felt that the days of our heroism and chivalry had not passed away. We have and have had 9 p.m. thousands of Florence Nightingales on these fields. I could not —I have no language in which to pay sufficient and adequate tribute to these noble women, noble beyond compare. A sad business it was passing down these lines. Sometimes my heart was too full to stop and speak a kind word to these broken brothers. But I said: If I live to get back to Canada, I would let Parliament know something of the heroism and devotion of these sons and brothers and sisters of ours at the front.

I should like to take time to tell of the heroism of that great and glorious country, old France. We can well afford to take off our hats to dear old France, France that has stood nobly for a brand of liberty equal to anything cherished by the British race. As we passed through cities like Amiens—driving swiftly in our automobiles lest we should catch the shells that were dropping near,—we could see the pallid, hungry looking faces of the old men and old women of France as they gazed out through the gratings of the cellars with appealing faces to us as much as to say: In God's name, when is this fury to cease? In France there is scarcely a home that has not been desolated, scarcely a home that is not in mourning. I do not recall that we met a single man of military age who was not wearing the historic military uniform of France. All honour to France. We passed over acres and acres of graveyards. Why, on Vimy Ridge alone 100,000 Frenchmen lie buried; what a fight for the liberty of the world?

As we visited Verdun, that wonderful place that was bombarded month after month by the brutal army of the Hun Crown Prince, it is just as if the destroying angel had passed over that once beautiful district and had blasted it beyond recognition. You would see here and there a solitary rampike of some tree lifting its pathetic peak fifteen or twenty feet towards Heaven as if in protest, battered beyond description, the roots torn out all over. The whole country for fifteen miles looks as if it were the face of a smallpox patient magnified a million times. But there the French stood, and month after month said: "They shall not pass." I have sometimes wondered if there was any Canadian that so far forgot his duty to the old land, his duty to the traditions of his home and of his country, who failed to read and study those awful sacrifices: Blood, blood, blood, in all directions. These are the men who have saved the liberty of the world. All honour to them. Surely no representative man in this country,—surely not any man in this country will fail to remember with gratitude and devotion the service that has been rendered by those who have saved the human race from the degradation of the Hun.

I looked over those acres of crosses, and it was a melancholy sight. But never mind, those boys have passed hence and will enjoy a reward that is worth while. For, after all, it is not the money that we gain in this world that counts; it is not the honour or the knighthoods, the lords this and lords that, that matter. The only thing in life that counts is service—service to your country. It will never be asked of us how much money we made in the world or what titles we enjoyed. What will be required of us is an account of the service we have rendered, and if, like those tens and hundreds of thousands who lie lowly in France we have done our duty it will be said of us, as it surely will be said of them, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." I pay this tribute because I felt I could not return to this Parliament without giving my fellow members some idea of the sacrifices that have been made in our behalf in the old land.

Let me pass on to speak for a moment of the work that our Prime Minister has performed overseas. Some hon. members opposite have been disposed to criticise Sir Robert Borden for going overseas. They have asked, why is he not here? Now, I am not going to impute motives or say unkind things. Perhaps these hon. members honestly believe he should be here. I want to tell them—I am not a partisan and have no axe to grind in the public life of this country—that as a member of the Press party that went overseas to witness the effort of Great Britain in the war, I watched our Prime Minister very carefully, and it is my deliberate judgment that he rendered valuable service to the Dominion of Canada while he was overseas.

About one year ago a very critical situation existed at the front. The fifth army had gone to pieces, and if I am betraying no secret and am not deemed to be speaking unwisely, I should like to repeat a statement that I received from high quarters to the effect that France, even heroic France, was ready to quit. It looked at one time as if the channel ports and Paris were gone. The statesmen of Great Britain were considering very seriously what to do. I am not saying that they thought of striking their colours or proposing peace, but the situation was undoubtedly grave and the public men of Great Britain were in a very serious mood. I have this to say: In my judgment no man from the Overseas Dominions exercised such a powerful influence as did the Prime Minister of this country in bucking up, to use a street term, the British Government. I heard Sir Robert Borden speak at the great Mansion House dinner and he was the leading figure there, and there were many great figures present. Sir Robert Borden, in season and out of season, exercised a very important influence in the counsels of the British nation in regard to the war. I hold no brief for him, but I think it is only just that I should pay him this tribute.

I am sure the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) made it abundantly clear in his speech this afternoon that it was the duty of Sir Robert Borden to be present at the Peace Conference. If he were not there we should certainly hear the cry from the other side of the House: Why is the Prime Minister not in France looking after our interests? Sometimes this criticism reminds me of the old couplet:—

> You shall and you shan't, you will and you won't,
> You will be damned if you do, and be damned if you don't.

So, no matter what position Sir Robert Borden took, there would sure to be criticism. After all, the creation of the Imperial Cabinet is simply carrying out the same idea as the League of Nations, to which we look for the solution of so many problems.

And now I am going to invite my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) to come up to Mount Carmel with me. I rather like the hon. member. He has a frank, open face and a generous way with him. He speaks his mind loudly and bluntly. I have had the pleasure of his acquaintance for many years, and I certainly should not like to say anything to offend him, and I am sure I shall not. Some day he may be Finance Minister in some government or other, but it must be a long way off, for I cannot see it yet with a telescope. But when that day comes I shall be delighted to extend congratulations to him. In his speech the other evening he said:

[Mr. Richardson.]

> I say to my separated brethren: Go to the Acting-Prime Minister, who is also the Finance Minister, place the Hansard containing my few humble remarks before him and say to him: Now, Sir, are you willing to go as far as the Grits will go? Then govern yourselves accordingly.

You would think from that statement that the hon. member could do exactly what he liked with the party over there. Perhaps he thinks he could. Perhaps he thinks his party sound on the tariff question. But just let him try the experiment as I did twenty years ago, and he will find how mistaken he is. The "L. M. Jones's," the "Billy Pattersons" and all the manufacturers from Dan to Beersheba who have been identified with their party will have something to say when he starts anything of that kind. If the hon. member was able to organize an efficient government based upon the ideal of free trade which would wipe out the element of protection from the tariff and include in its platform all the reforms which the Liberal party advocated twenty years ago—if he could organize such a government as that I would follow him and be delighted to do so, but I know positively that he cannot make good in any such attempt, because there are just as many, or almost as many, protectionists in the rank and file of the Liberal party as in the rank and file of the other party. I am not even sure that his leader would follow him on a free trade platform; I do not know just what his position is with regard to the tariff, and I am just drawing a bow at a venture. Is the hon. member for Brome satisfied that the great majority of his friends on the other side of the House would follow him on such a platform? If he is not, he must agree to the inutility of any members on this side identifying themselves with him or accepting his challenge. If you review the fiscal history of this country—I reiterate the statement of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark)—the impartial historian will find, and will say, that in actual reductions in the tariff—apart from preference and reciprocity which, no doubt my hon. friend will shoot at me in a minute if I do not anticipate him—the reductions made under Conservative rule have been greater than those made by the other side. They brought down the duty on agricultural implements from 35 per cent to, I think, 17½ per cent, and made other reductions as well. It would not be wise, in my judgment, for us to follow the lure of the light in the shack window on the other side, and leave the friends here, because we believe, most of us, that we can so appeal to this Union Government that we shall get, perhaps, a larger measure of fiscal justice—I speak as one from the West—than we could hope for if the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) were installed as Prime Minister of this country. My hon. friend went on:

> Do you remember that old story in ancient writ of how the prophets of Baal and Elijah worked together on Mount Carmel? You remember how Elijah said, "If Baal be the Lord, serve him, and if Jehovah be the Lord, serve him." If your principles are for liberty and low tariff you know on which side of the House you should sit. If protection and high tariff be your god, then stay where you are.

This is throwing down a challenge with a vengeance. The hon. gentleman quotes that beautiful story that is told in the first book of Kings, of Elijah the Tishbite. Now, Elijah was a hairy man, and if my hon. friend from Brome wishes to imitate him, when he marches to Mount Carmel with me, he had better let his whiskers grow, and also the hair on his head, and he had better gird up his loins. Elijah asked the momentous question which the prophet of Brome asks, "How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him." On Mount Carmel if the hon. gentleman would imitate Elijah he must build an altar. Elijah built his altar of twelve stones, representing the twelve tribes of Israel. I would suggest that my hon. friend take twelve representatives from the old Liberal party—twelve disciples as it were—and of these build his altar. I would suggest these names: George P. Graham, Israel Tarte, Clifford Sifton, Billy Patterson, Billy Gibson, Bob Watson, Jim Sutherland, Senator Edwards, Dr. Landerkin, Jim McMullen, Jim Somerville, and—yes, I think Aleck Smith might be thrown in there.

Mr. McMASTER: A great number of these gentlemen are dead, while others are supporting Union Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON: That cuts no ice with the prophet; as the late John Henry Pope would have said, "There hain't nothin' to it." I think it would be a pity to omit dear old Aleck Smith. He has stood true to the party through good and evil report, and I think he ought to have a place among those stones. After Elijah had built the altar, he dug trenches into which his servants poured four barrels of water. I would suggest to my hon. friend the prophet from Brome that instead of pouring water over these old-timers, he pour kerosine, for without that I cannot conceive of any fire from Heaven or any place else that would burn that crowd. Then, as to the burnt offering, our friend the prophet from Brome, with his loins girded and his whiskers any old length, must be careful about the selection. Elijah selected a bullock, I would suggest that the hon. gentleman drop the last three letters of the word "bullock." Also, as to how the animal should be slaughtered, I think that in view of the machine gun practice of many of these hon. gentlemen in the constituencies for the last twenty-five years, they should shoot the animal. And after these details are attended to it will be interesting to stand by and observe which god he will invoke to get his sacrifice consumed. Will he call upon Jehovah whom he would regard as the god of free-trade, or upon Baal, the reputed god of protection? He will be obliged to gash his flesh much worse than did the prophets of Baal, and cry much louder than they, in order to be heard. And is there not a danger, if he calls on the god of free trade, that he will be reminded of the 1893 platform and the seventy-one-one-hundredths of one per cent? Then, of course, whether or not he is answered by fire he is up against the proposition of imitating the example of Elijah and taking the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal and slaughtering them. In order to secure that number he will have to strike without discrimination. He will have to have recourse to both parties, and probably he will find that when he has slaughtered all the prophets of Baal on his own side he has hardly a sufficient number left for a quorum in caucus. Then after the slaughter, he must in imitation of the prophet retire to the wilderness and sit down under a juniper tree and ask the Lord to take away his life, as he, only he, is left of all Israel who have not bowed the knee to Baal. But against this I think I hear the stentorian voice of the stalwart member for Red Deer declaring that not seven thousand only, but seventy times seven thousand free traders stand fast to free trade in this country, and I think I hear him suggesting also to my hon. friend from Brome to have recourse to the only acceptable sacrifice, a broken and a contrite heart.

I want to say a few words in regard to the tariff. It is bound to loom up at the present session. When the Union Government was organized there seemed to be an understanding that the tariff would not be discussed at least for a short time. At the present session it is not unlikely that the tariff will be discussed. It is a live issue. In order that this country and its industries may succeed, it is desirable that there should be stability in regard to the tariff. I represent a rural constituency in the West. Let me say to this House that the West is in desperate earnest in regard to the tariff. In the old days when the National Policy was formulated there was practically no West and no population in that country. There is now a large population in Western Canada and the people there feel that they have carried the burden as long as they feel they can afford to carry it. They feel that they must have relief and that they must be placed in as good a position as the farmers of the Western States in order that the country may succeed.

Let me say to you, Sir, and to the members of the Government, that there are no politics in the West. The West is not playing politics. I find that my old Tory friends in the West, now that partisanship has been set aside, are heartily in favour of low tariff. In the old days, because of party feeling, they co-operated with their party, but now that there is no longer party Government, but Union Government, they say: We are with you; take the tariff off. The West is united. I was delighted to hear the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe), for whom I have very great respect, tell this House the other evening that the province of Quebec is low tariff, or is willing to join in any effort to reduce the tariff. He spoke of Toronto as being the home of protection. I was wondering if Montreal is not almost as bad in that respect. I do not know what the feeling in Quebec is. I take it for granted that the hon. gentleman would not misinform the House—I am quite sure he would not knowingly do so—and that when he stated, as he did the other night, that there is a large section of the people in Quebec in favour of low tariff he believed it to be the fact.

In the three western provinces there is absolute unanimity in regard to lowering the tariff. Let me say in all seriousness to my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister that I hope he will give earnest consideration to this question. I appeal to him—he is an old Liberal. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) is an old Liberal; they at least have no prejudice against low tariff. They, and the Government, are in a position to solve this very important problem, or to help to solve it, perhaps at the present time or in the near future. Let me tell the Acting Prime Minister, the Government, and this House that the people of the West are not playing politics. They care absolutely nothing about politics. They are heart sick of partisanship but they are resolved on one thing and that is that the tariff must come down. Members who represent the West in this House, mostly behind the Union Government, I think I can fairly say, are reasonable men. They are not going to put a pistol at the head of the Government or at the head of the leader of the Government and say: "Stand and Deliver." If I interpret the feelings of my colleagues from the West accurately, and I think I do, individually and collectively, rather than do that they would prefer to efface themselves and retire from Parliament. We from the West are so obsessed with the problems that face this Union Government, with the colossal task that is before them in connection with reconstruction, that we would go a long way not to embarrass the Government, but on the contrary we would desire to assist the Government. But, the members from the West have not the say. I tell the Acting Prime Minister that I think he can deal on favourable and just grounds with the representatives from the West. But if the Government does not deal with the representatives from the West, who are reasonable, and who realize the gravity of the problem, then the Government must deal with the people of the West and the people of the West are agreed as one man and they are in no very friendly mood at the present time. They think that they have been made a football of between the parties for all these years and, if the resolutions they have passed and their deliberations indicate what their mind is, they purpose having justice.

In the name of Union, in the name of the unity of the country, I appeal to my hon. friend the acting leader of the Government and to the members of the Government, to weigh this matter seriously, to weigh it gravely in order to avert trouble and what may prove a division in the country, and to bring about a reconciliation as between the various elements in the country.

I said this afternoon, and I want to reiterate it here that the time has come when the people of this country, the different races and elements, must forget their differences. The war is over. I do not suppose it will ever be necessary again to resort to conscription. Perhaps happily there may be no great questions which will in the future divide the peoples of the country. I have every respect for the great province of Quebec. I know something of the French Canadian people, something of their kindness of heart, their chivalry, their magnanimity, and I believe now that the clouds are disappearing an effort ought to be made to unite all the people. The great province of Quebec ought to be represented and speedily in the Government of this country. I hope the time is not far distant when our good friends from Quebec will see the reasonableness of the situation and realize the logic of events. Let them yield a point and let the people on this side yield a point in order that harmony and real union may prevail, and so that we may be able in this country to build up a great people.

We have wonderful, magnificent resources. All we have to do is to tickle the soil and tap those resources in order to make this country what it should be, the home of a united and happy people. Let the clouds roll by, let us have union, and if the Government is able to meet the wishes of the West, or reasonably so, on this tariff question, it will go a long way towards cementing East and West.

In conclusion I wish to say that it is my desire, as I believe it is the desire of the people of Canada, to see a great party built up in this country that will serve the public. The people are sick of the partisan cries and the partisan shibboleths. Let us go in for Service from now on. Surely a party like this, which was founded for the purpose of carrying on a great work, founded on a great principle, and sanctified, as one hon. member said the other day, by the blood of sixty thousand of the noblest sons of the Dominion, must and should develop into an agency which will be able to guard and protect the best interests of Canada.

Mr. F. J. PELLETIER (Matane) (translation): Mr. Speaker, when we were apprised of the fact that the most complete and most glorious victory had brought to the Allies the assurance of a peace founded on justice and right, our hearts were filled with deep joy and we said to ourselves that the session which was about to open would rank among the brightest and the most fruitful. Unfortunately, as hon. members have already remarked, in spite of universal jubilation, it was amidst most profound mourning and most sincere grief that this House did open, this year, just after the disappearance of one of the most brilliant men who ever were within these precincts. The voice of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a voice so eloquent, has been silenced forever, and it seems as though the walls of this House were yet resounding with its accents, so closely was the life of that man identified with the life of the country.

However, notwithstanding the fact that our chief is no more and that, as a consequence of his sudden demise, our organization has been perturbed, it is by no means our intention to lose our interest in the affairs of the country; on the contrary, we shall follow the example of that illustrious man, trying to make up, to the full extent of our limited possibilities, for the great worth which he represented and to which the whole country did such a telling hommage on the occasion of his demise; we shall try, in every possible way, to help the work of reconstruction which now lies at our door after the four years of warfare just elapsed, and we shall do so by our most earnest co-operation and our most practical suggestions, so that the Government may fulfil, if they wish so to do, the arduous task incumbent upon them, under the circumstances.

The measures outlined in the Speech from the Throne, this year, are numerous, but if they are to be realized to any advantage, they must be considered in their true light and be rightly interpreted, whatever the preferences of the majority and the settled views of certain elements.

Be the good will of the Governement as it may, Mr. Speaker, all their efforts will be useless if they remain blind to the real conditions under which the country is now labouring and if they fancy that they can mould public opinion as they like, independently of the mighty currents apparent in every country since the evolutions, not to say the revolutions, which have taken place almost everywhere.

Conditions in the old countries of Europe are now being completely upset. A new power has asserted itself, and that power which has overturned everything in certain countries will soon make its influence felt in Canada. It would be an irretrievable mistake to believe that it may be possible to stop this rising tide, to dam this rushing stream. What we want is to guide this new power, to subdue it, to make it instrumental in doing great work for the reconstruction of the country and in view of the transition from war conditions to peace conditions.

This new power is that of the immense army of workmen and of the select battalion of farmers. Those two classes, upon which the prosperity and the future of every country are presumed to rest, realize the importance of the part they are now playing, and they have resolved on asserting their rights and enforcing respect of such rights.

In certain countries, Mr. Speaker, efforts were made to crush this new-born power, with the result that the masses revolted and that all barriers were overthrown. All kinds of unsound doctrines were instilled in the minds of the people by unscrupulous agitators, with the result that the advent of the working class was that of anarchy and disorganization.

It is not to be feared that the new countries of America, should we remain in different, may suffer in the same way? Is it not to be feared, that, through our carelessness, the labouring classes, whether they belong to industry or to agriculture, may become the prey of dangerous agitators? It is with a view to avoiding such misfortune, that I would like the Government of this country to become particularly interested in the condition of the working classes. Owing to certain influences well known to us all and which the Government did not try to do away with, the cost of staple goods in Canada has increased beyond proportion. True it is that the salaries of the workingmen have increased also, but this increase is far from representing a due compensation for the voluntary or arbitrary increase in the cost of living. Previous to the war, $7 was enough to keep a family during a week. In January, 1919, the same family of five was obliged to spend, for the same length of time, the sum of $14.87, which meant an increase of one hundred per cent. Surely, people working on munitions earned very high salaries, but the manufacturing of munitions has stopped and there is, so far, no indication of a decrease in the cost of life in the near future. The situation is yet a serious one, nay, is getting to be more and more disquieting, for a great many people are looking for work, and in some cases, there is a tendency to a decrease in salaries. Therefore, the Government must look into that problem with no delay and not so much with a view to securing higher salaries for the workingmen as to making sure that a decrease in the cost of life will be brought about. The buying power of a dollar, to-day, is reduced to such an extent, that nobody will even think of saving under circumstances where this could be done heretofore. It is absolutely necessary that conditions should change before it is too late.

The hon. gentlemen who moved the Address said: "To-day, the cloud has lifted and we stand on the threshold of an assured and, I believe, a lasting era of peace. Our great epoch of struggle and sacrifice is ended." Those words are true in so far as they concern external peace, but one has not the same certainty of internal peace when one hears the ominous rumblings, here and in other countries of the world.

My hon. friend says further: "The people of Canada may, now that the tremendous burden of effort and sacrifice, imposed on them by the war, has been removed, pause to review with pride the excellent record which they have made under the leadership of the Prime Minister and his cabinet."

Beyond doubt the people of Canada may look with pride to the great things that have been accomplished. I am sure they have already done so, but they will not pause for all that. Those who have amassed millions of dollars during the war, those who have doubled and tripled their already large holdings, can pause and look back on what has been done, but the workingman, the father of a large family who has to wait for the weekly or monthly pay to buy bread and shoes for his children has no time to pause.

If the Prime Minister and his cabinet are really anxious to give the people time to pause and review in their mind the glorious pages that have been added to the history of our country, the economic condition must be changed; there must be an end to those groping and tentative methods and the country should be given constructive legislation.

By all means let the Government do something to bring down the high cost of living. If nothing is done in that direction, the peace that will be signed shortly in Paris will mean nothing for Canada, for war between classes will have started and no one can predict where it will stop.

What is going on in other countries does not justify us in being optimists. What is happening in the great cities; the bolshevic and socialistic disturbances that we hear of, when the censor abstains interfering with the newspapers, does not convey any great hope for the future.

How can the Government lower the cost of living? First by not allowing the unscrupulous middleman to carry on his speculations in regard to all the necessities of life.

Three years ago, the Canadian people should have been protected against those vampires. The only means to that end is to impose a very heavy tax on all profits over a reasonable percentage. Those who are convicted of extravagance and hoarding should be severely dealt with. A maximum price should be put on every necessary article, determined by the cost of production, and not by the fancy of those who have secured a monopoly of the goods.

We are lavishing praises on the soldiers returning from the front and we say that nothing is too good for them. Those praises are certainly well deserved, for our men fought heroically and have made the sacrifice of their lives. But they will not live on praise and eulogy. They cannot be cajoled by such interested flattery.

Let us not forget that these men are returning from a part of the world where a dangerous wind is blowing and that they will not be satisfied with being directed like blind men or coddled like children. Let us remember that in Russia it is the soldiers, the working men and the farmers who have taken the reins. I do not see why the soldiers, the working men and the farmers of Canada could not play the same trick on our Government.

The Government have given notice of special legislation for the settlement of the returned soldiers on lands, to promote agriculture. The Government have also in mind the construction of magnificent public roads and are taking steps to attract a very large immigration into this country.

Every one of these propositions is commendable and has some good points. However, they should be approached and dealt with in a practical way. The surest way to improve the economic conditions in this country is to develop and encourage agriculture by a wise policy of colonization.

However, the idea of reserving the crown lands for the soldiers, and excluding all other settlers by rules and regulations as ridiculous as they are tyrannical is a double mistake.

Experience has taught us that the settling of soldiers on agricultural lands is an unproductive and hurtful experiment. In many cases, the returned soldiers, lacking training and experience, will take up lands as compensation for the sacrifices they have made, but the lands will not be put under cultivation, or at least the production will be far below what it would be under good management.

The duty of the hour is to put under cultivation, by all conceivable means, the largest area possible; it is to call on every one to take a hand in promoting colonization.

Let a keen spirit of rivalry be stimulated throughout the country; let inducements and appeals be multiplied so as to guide as many recruits as possibe towards the new lands. Thus only can it be hoped that the surplus population of country places will be diverted to the new regions, instead of increasing the army of unemployed in the cities, and that the labourers who deserted the farms will be encouraged to resume that eminently beneficent calling.

Let the soldiers be treated with a great deal of kindness, well and good; but be it remembered that the remainder of the nation that toiled and suffered, that laboured and paid during the whole war, also deserved well of the country. Moreover, the national interest requires it and it is needed to ensure peace in the future.

Let large sums be spent in order to lay out roads, well and good; but the construction of highways for the motor cars of those who have reaped millions of dollars during the war must not alone be thought of. Let an attempt be made in order to give an easy access to the lands intended for settlement; finally, let new roads that will induce settlers to take up the new lands be opened.

On the other hand, let us not rely too much upon immigration during the years to follow the signing of the peace treaty. Every country on earth will need its manual labour and shall have an excess population to feed. The only proof of it is that England is pleased to send to Canada thousands of women who are no more of any use to her and whom they cause the Canadian soldiers to marry. Already 50,000 of those women have entered our country and others will come to Canada.

As for men, we cannot depend upon their coming soon. There are too many gaps to fill in Europe to be in a hurry to let go healthy men fit for production. If we need men, let us keep those we have already and put a stop to that stupid agitation whose result would be to turn out of the country people who have been lured by inducements of all kinds and whose only fault is to have been born in one country rather than in another.

Instead of turning them out, let us teach them to love Canada and to look upon it as the finest, the most hospitable, the freest and most generous country on earth. He who loves a country is loyal to it, and people who have been here since many years, even if they were born in countries which have become hostile, would not be long impervious to that beneficent influence.

Let us begin by expunging from our statute books the War-time Elections Act, that legislative blunder whose only use was to foster distrust and dissatisfaction among thousands of people who had been granted British citizenship and never did anything to deserve such a downfall.

After all, Mr. Speaker, if it is our wish that Canada pass succesfully through that transitional period between war and peace, if it is our wish that all the good purposes of the Government, all their good measures be efficiently carried out, let us try to put into practice those noble utterances of the hon. member from Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) delivered in this House the other day: "I am deeply convinced that the establishment of a real entente cordiale in this country should be the desire of all true lovers of Canada. The man, Sir, whether he be a French-speaking Canadian or an English-speaking Canadian, whether he be a Catholic or a Protestant, who wilfully fosters antagonism of race and creed in this country is neither a true friend nor a loyal citizen of the land we love."

Those are words that should ring into the ears of all those who had a hand in a criminal and condemned policy, in a policy that is very aptly described in a pamphlet which the Government had brought in for their electoral campaign, and which is entitled: "Language oppression in the German Empire;" but influential members of the ministry prevented its distribution because it expounded a principle which was a menace to some provincial governments.

Those are words which I take as my own for they express the most intimate conviction of every hon. member of the House, and the Government may rely upon our entire co-operation in all measures they take to establish such an entente cordiale. Besides, that is the foundation of the prosperity and power of our magnificent country, and it should be the first thought of all rulers.

Mr. PELLETIER (Continuing in English): If I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words in English, there are a few points that I wish to take up.

The member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) says that he does not believe in following leaders or parties. I wonder what happened to him at the last session of Parliament when he offered a motion by way of amendment to the resolution proposed with regard to titles, suggesting that no titles of any class or kind should be granted to domiciled Canadians—and then refused to vote for it. The hon. member subsequently stated:

> When I proposed this amendment I had no conception that it was a question which in any way might precipitate a crisis in the country.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

> I had no conception that the Prime Minister of this country would stake the existence of the Government on this issue. I was elected as a supporter of the Union Government, and I would much prefer to resign my seat here to-night than to jeopardize the existence of the Government. In my parliamentary experience in the old days I understood that when a private member introduced a motion, members of the House on both sides were perfectly free to vote for or against it, according to how it appealed to them.

Mr. Speaker, when a member makes a motion or offers an amendment and has not the courage to vote for his own motion, what can we expect?

The hon. gentleman stated that he did not believe in following leaders or parties. He said further that he thought he was too good to be in this world after a conversation he had had with a political leader of his. If he is too good to live in this world, he is very unfortunate. According to his own statement this evening, the Liberal party has withdrawn communion from him. It would appear that the few remarks made by the Prime Minister prior to the taking of the vote on the question of titles resulted in the courage of his convictions being taken away from the member for Springfield.

The member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said on Thursday evening last in the course of his remarks that defaulters under the Military Service Act should not be sent to prison, or words to that effect. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that in many cases the fact that boys did not report for duty was due to their receiving their notices after the day they were summoned to report. In other cases, sons of farmers were under the impression that they were exempt from military service for a certain time and continued their labour on the farm, thus helping the country by producing and helping to feed our soldiers and those at home. And I, Mr. Speaker, like the member for Frontenac, do not believe in imposing heavy fines on such men. In many cases the fine cannot be paid, and the defaulter must take the jail path, which is not a royal one by any means. I believe this policy to be a grave mistake, because these defaulters have shown no criminal instinct, and by sending them to jail you may make criminals of them, even though they be honest men, and blot their careers forever. I demand an amnesty for the young man who was on the farm and was a good soldier in producing and helping to feed the Allies, but who did not understand the law that even lawyers did not understand. If you punish any one, punish the profiteers, whose only ambition was to accumulate wealth and who did not care a continental how long the war lasted or how much blood was shed so long as they filled their coffers at the cost of the poorer classes, who will have to pay a tax for years to come.

The member for Frontenac also said that the personalities of Macdonald and Laurier suppressed individuality, and that from now on the men who sit in this House will express their individual opinions. The hon. gentleman said that that would be a good thing for the Dominion. Mr. Speaker, such may have been the case in the Tory ranks, but with us it is quite different. The proof is that those who left the ranks of Liberalism to join the Unionists were left free by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to act as their conscience dictated, and they have done as they pleased.

Nearly all my hon. friends on the other side of the House spoke about the dim light in the window. The member for Frontenac claims that so far as the Liberal party is concerned, this light is flickering away. Mr. Speaker, if our light is flickering away, may I ask what has become of the Tory light which has disappeared entirely, never to show up again? No doubt it died out or was submerged in the three elements that the member for Dorchester spoke of last Thursday evening. But our light will come up brighter than ever, because true patriotism and the real interest of our country can be found only in Liberalism.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER (East York): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Redman) who moved the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) who seconded the Address. I am sure we appreciate the efforts of those young men, who, responding so nobly to the call of the Empire, went forward to the front and did their part and returned to this country with great honour. The people of this country showed their appreciation of the splendid work of those young men by electing them to this House of Commons, thus giving them an opportunity of showing that they were equal to the occasion as representatives of the people of this Dominion in this House, as young Canadians who would assist in making the laws and in inaugurating great reforms in this country. Therefore, when the people of this country show their appreciation in that way, we must acknowledge that they deserve the showing of that appreciation.

We should feel that a compliment was paid to Canada by the calling of Sir Robert Borden to England for the purpose of assisting in the settlement of the terms of peace at the conclusion of the greatest war in the history of the world. We are proud to have such an eminent statesman assisting in that settlement.

I wish to congratulate the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) on his splendid leadership of this House during the absence of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). We know that the Acting Prime Minister has exceptional ability. He has shown that he possesses it, and we feel that it is the duty of hon. members to render whatever assistance they can to him in order to encourage him in the success which he has made of that leadership.

There are many matters of great importance to be brought before the House during this session. We know that last year the Government had a great deal of responsibility. We know that their physical powers were put to the test by the many duties they had to perform. We know that many Orders in Council were passed and that many commissions were appointed to carry on the great work of this country. We also know that when the members were called to this House at the last session, they felt that there was very little for them to do; that at this period under war conditions it was perhaps necessary that many Orders in Council should be passed and that many commissions should be appointed. Some hon. members, however, thought that as Parliament was in session, some of the responsibility should be placed upon the representatives of the people and some of the work performed by them, and that fewer Orders in Council should be passed and fewer commissions appointed. Now that the war is over, and now that the members——

M. DEMERS: Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the fact that we have not a quorum.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has drawn my attention to the fact that there is not a quorum present.

And a count having been taken, it was found that a quorum was not in the Chamber.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is not a quorum present. This House stands adjourned until to-morrow afternoon at two o'clock.

Accordingly, the House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

Wednesday, March 12, 1919,

The House met at Two o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

SPECIAL ORDER LAPSED—MOTION FOR ITS REINSTATEMENT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, owing to the want of a quorum in the House last evening the debate on the special Order of the Day which was then under discussion has lapsed, and it becomes necessary to restore it to the Order Paper by motion. Therefore, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Carvell:

That the special Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Redman for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, having lapsed by reason of the House having been declared adjourned for want of a quorum on the 11th instant, when the said order was under consideration, be revived and placed on the Order Paper for consideration this day.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): Mr. Speaker, under the ruling of your honour of 3rd of July———

Mr. SPEAKER: I presume the hon. member rises to discuss the point of order.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion itself is not debatable.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know that your honour has ruled that this motion is not debatable, but I presume the acting leader of the Government is moving under Order No. 41,—that is, that a motion without notice can be introduced by the unanimous leave of the House As I understand that, Mr. Speaker, it means that the Acting Prime Minister, or any person moving as he is moving, must move for leave to make a motion by unanimous consent of the House. If Order No. 41 does not mean that, I do not understand that it has any meaning at all. If an hon. member makes a motion that requires unanimity of the House, he must first obtain the consent of the House.

I further wish to say that the Order of the Day fixed by rule 25 of the Rules and Proceedings governing this House has set for to-day a certain procedure; and before the hon. Acting Prime Minister can move his motion he should move the suspension of Rule No. 25, so as to give him the right of way to make this motion. Unless some provision is made for it, we must go through the whole procedure before we reach the Order of the Day with respect to which this motion comes into effect. These are my objections. I am not taking objection to the main motion, but merely to the way in which it is moved. I will not discuss the motion, but I am sorry that as one of the fruits of continuous Orders in Council, hon. gentlemen supporting the Government do not think it necessary to be in the House.

[The Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Whatever weight may be attached to the point raised by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), that point is one which was settled when a decision was given under similar circumstances two years ago. It so happened that the present incumbent of the Chair rendered that decision; nevertheless it is binding until the House sees fit to alter his judgment on the matter. It only remains for me to follow that decision, which was that it was competent for the motion to be submitted and, if agreed to, that a debate which has lapsed by reason of lack of a quorum may be restored in all respects to the position which it occupied prior to its lapse.

Upon the second point raised by the leader of the Opposition, I would refer him to the fact that at the opening of the session on the 20th day of February, there was passed a motion by which it was ordered that the speech of His Excellency the Governor General should be taken into consideration the following Tuesday; this Order to have precedence over all other business except the introduction of Bills. If the motion which is now submitted by the acting leader of the Government carries, my judgment is that it places the debate in precisely the same position as if it had not lapsed. That the motion is quite in order, and if it be adopted by the House we shall proceed with the adjourned debate as the first Order of the Day.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

The Civil Service List.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING BUREAU.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, and in view of the interference with the printing of Parliament caused by the strike at the Printing Bureau, I desire to ask the Government what progress has been made towards a settlement of the strike, and, pending a settlement, what arrangements have been made for the printing of the daily Hansard, the Votes and Proceedings, and the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: The situation is not altered to any extent from what it was when I outlined the position of affairs about three days ago. It was pointed out by me then that at least until the end of the present fiscal year the pressmen who have struck will be in as favourable a position, or in a better position than those occupying similar positions outside, and therefore, in our opinion, there was no reason for them to strike. There are a large number of others who are still employed at the Bureau but who, of necessity, if the presses stop for any length of time, cannot go on working. In view of a condition of that kind arising and also in view of the fact that undoubtedly the cost of the operation of the Bureau and the production of Government printing is abnormally high, the Government would have to consider the question of the advisability of closing the Bureau. However, I am not discussing that at the present moment. Personally, I would like to see the work carried on under such conditions as to justify the continued operation of the Bureau not only on behalf of the people who are employed but on behalf of the whole of the people of this country. Meanwhile we are carrying on, and we hope that a more favourable condition of affairs may be reached.

Mr. MURPHY: The Minister has not answered the second part of the question: What arrangements have been made for printing the daily Hansard, Votes and Proceedings, and Orders of the Day?

Mr. BURRELL: A limited number of the Hansards are being reported, printed, or mimeographed, in this House, and some other necessary papers involving, of course, matters of great importance to the soldiers, as well as some matters concerning the House, are being printed in the Militia Department.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. CAHILL: Have the Government actually taken possession of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. REID: The Government have not taken possession. As receiver I took possession of the Grand Trunk Pacific on Monday morning at one o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. D. L. Redman (Calgary East), for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Tuesday, March 11.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER (East York): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Does the hon. member for East York rise to speak on the debate?

Mr. FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the rules—and I am guided in that respect by a decision given in the British House of Commons under precisely similar circumstances—the debate not having been adjourned but having lapsed, and the hon. member having spoken, he is debarred from speaking further. That is the interpretation of the Rule which I am compelled to take. It works a very great hardship on the hon. member for East York (Mr. Foster) under the circumstances and I am quite prepared to submit to the judgment of the House as to whether the House should nevertheless consent to his continuing the debate. If there is unanimous consent the hon. gentleman may proceed.

And the House having consented:

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for permitting me to continue the debate. When the House adjourned last night I had not quite finished my last sentence, and for the benefit of Hansard I would like to complete it. Now that the war is over, members should take the full responsibility. That completes the sentence. Canada should be more careful about the class of immigration coming into this country in the future. We know that in the past hundreds of immigration agents were sent all over Europe and we spent hundreds of thousands of dollars for the purpose of drumming up and sending forward immigrants to this country. We know that these agents were drawing a substantial remuneration for the work which they were doing and they were anxious to make an elaborate showing. They were not particular as to the class of people they were encouraging to come to Canada. For that reason, instead of securing the better class, these agents paid more attention to quantity than to the quality of the people that they sent to this country. As you know, many thousands presented themselves at the borders of the United States, were rejected, made the short circuit, and landed in Canada. Many of our institutions were filled to overflowing with an undesirable class of people who were physically and mentally only fit to be placed in institutions which have to be maintained at tremendous expense to this country. These people should never have been permitted to come into Canada.
