I fear that all of us are prone to overlook the fact that this is a war year and that our expenditures this year may be greater than last year. We have brought down Estimates involving the expenditures of a vast sum of money, a considerable portion of which will be spent upon national improvements which will afford employment during this very critical period. In that respect I think, Sir, that Canada is in a particularly favoured position to-day. In addition to the Estimates, I have given notice of a resolution involving the provision of a sum of no less than $350,000,000, which must forcibly direct the attention of the House and the country to the fact that this is a war year. We are not spending immense sums of money for ammunition as we did last year, but there are hundreds of thousands of men not yet demobilized. Their pay has to be provided as well as the expense of their transportation back to their native land, and of their re-establishment in civil life. The Government has made provision for a war gratuity, deserved if ever anything was deserved by those heroes of Canada who have done so nobly on the battlefields of Europe. I mention this only to call attention to the fact that our expenditures for this year are inevitably going to be on a war scale. This discussion should, I think, proceed in the light of this and of the other facts I have mentioned.

I was interested, as I think all hon. members were, in the address of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), but I submit to the House, that while my hon. friend is in order, his amendment is out of place; that it is in substance and in fact a want of confidence motion; that if adopted would mean the defeat of the Government on a vital measure, namely, the provision of supply. The amendment should be voted down.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I do not purpose, at this stage, addressing the House at any great length. The amendment which has been moved upon this side of the House has been very fully and clearly discussed by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). Every phase of it has been as well put and as well supported by facts and figures as could have been done by any one. For that reason, it would not be proper for me to endeavour to duplicate the work of my hon. friend. The training which you, Sir, and I have received in our profession is that when a thing is once well done, when an argument is once well put, it should not, in the same case, be put the second time. For that reason, I shall leave well enough alone—a good Tory injunction.

I am very much surprised at the attitude taken by the leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) in regard to this amendment. I would like to ask him and other hon. members who are interested in the tariff, and who have to say to their constituents and the country generally whether or not they are satisfied with the present condition of the tariff. When you go back to your constituents, is it an answer to them to say: "Why, the leader of the Government from his seat in the House told us that if we voted for this amendment it would be a vote of want of confidence in the Government, and consequently, we had to vote it down." The hundreds of thousands, aye, millions of people in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific who are after the Government and after improvement, do not care very much whether that Government is sustained or not. They want relief; they want the right thing done. I appeal to hon. gentlemen in this House who are better acquainted with the history of government in the Old Land than I am, whether governments have not been defeated in the Old Land on a vote of want of confidence and turned out of office on scores of occasions, resulting in the necessary reform being brought about. So long as the supporters of this Government always obey the crack of the party whip we shall never have reforms in this country; for I should like to see the motion from this side of the House, which the hon. gentleman who leads the Government would not pronounce a motion of want of confidence if it was likely to be supported by his followers. That is an old cry; it has no significance. I ask the Acting Prime Minister, or any of the experienced parliamentarians sitting behind him, in what form a resolution should be introduced into this House that would have for its effect, if carried, the putting of the Government out of power, which would not cause the Acting Prime Minister to run into this little hen-house of "Want of Confidence."

What the people of this country are looking for is action, reform, the bettering of conditions in this country, so far as it is in the power of this Parliament to bring that about. We have heard a great deal said in this House condemnatory of the party system. It is not party that is the curse of this country, but the hanging on to power. And when we arrive at the stage when hon. members of this House will put the interests of the people first and the love of power second, we need not be very much concerned which party is in office. It would appear that no matter what aggregation of supporters you get behind this Government, the same nostrum will do. When they are afraid of their toes being trampled on or of being disturbed in their seats, as the ants will fly when a stone is upturned, the same argument is made as was made by the old line Tory government. The people of this country ought to know that the crack of the whip that was good in the days of the old Tory Government of Sir Robert Borden is equally good in the days of this so-called Unionist Government. I have just had placed in my hand Bourinot, an authority on Parliamentary procedure, who lays down the principle (P. 424):

An amendment moved to the motion to go into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means does not necessarily involve a want of confidence in the Administration.

I would suggest to the leader of the Government that he pay less attention to the Pilgrim's Progress and more to Bourinot and parliamentary procedure.

The minister talks about waiting. This game of waiting does not appeal to live, progressive people. If the leader of the Government is so particularly strong on waiting, on teaching pupils what they ought to do, and on bringing his children to task, he should give his attention to some hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House who should have waited. The minister had a gun, so to speak, put at his head the other day, and he was told that unless certain things happened within a certain set time, His Honour the Speaker would have in his hand a certain set of resignations which would bring the hon. gentleman to his milk. And that was with regard to the tariff question.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will pardon me for correcting him, but I have never even heard of such a suggestion, let alone receiving any intimation of that character.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman must have been absent on his Pilgrim's Progress, for that statement was made in the House the other evening by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg). If my hon. friend will look up that speech he will find the intimation word for word just as I have given it, except that the hon. member did not say he was holding a pistol at the head of the Acting Prime Minister; but that was what he was doing. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie), that veteran war-horse and leader of the Ginger Group, that real true-blue Tory, spoke in the House the other night not only of putting a gun to the head of the Government, but of a Government funeral unless certain things were done, and he was not satisfied with an ordinary funeral but predicted a state funeral unless the leader of the Government pronounced himself along certain lines of action. We have also had a spectacle since Parliament met such as I have never seen before in this House. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) was not willing to wait. He was put up, I presume, upon the advice and direction of the leader of the Government. He fully understands his position as a minister of the Crown; he knows the practice that ought to govern ministers who sit together in Council, and I venture to say—at least I hope I am right in saying—that when he stood up in this House he did not give a full explanation, an open-book account, so to speak, of the deplorable condition of the finances of this country. When he was asked why he did not wait for the budget he said he was not giving a budget speech but was disclosing the financial condition of this country, which should be remedied if possible. The question of finance having already been dealt with by cabinet ministers and by supporters of the Government, it cannot therefore be improper for hon. members on this side of the House to put their cards on the table and say to the Government and to this country, as we ought to say: We do not know what the Government proposes to do, as we have no means of knowing, but we appreciate the necessities of this country, and we know what should be done to meet them. We are simply saying to the people of this country: This is what we are prepared to do, and we ask your opinion upon our policy. That is the proper course to take. We have no business to go behind closed doors and conceal our ideas on the tariff. I might say to the leader of the Government that I never knew when he was willing openly to discuss what he was going to do about the tariff. His plan always has been to go behind closed doors and do what he proposes to do with regard to the tariff by Order in Council. He will not trust this House on a matter of that kind, because it might lead to a vote of want of confidence in himself and his colleagues.

So long as they can govern by Order in Council, this fifth wheel of a coach, as they treat this Parliament in matters of this kind, has nothing at all to do with it. "We will do it by Order in Council," they say, "and the thing will be in operation before Parliament knows anything about it." Let me remind our western friends, who are particularly concerned in the tariff, that when this matter was adjusted under Order in Council we on this side of the House said, "If you are in good faith with the West and mean what you have done, confirm it by statute; make it absolute for the people of the West for all time to come." There are some hon. members on the opposite side to-day who sat on this side on that occasion and voted for our resolution, while every Tory on that side of the House voted against it and said that it would be merely an Order in Council, and that when the proclamation was issued repealing it, the Order in Council would be void. That, Sir, is not the way that Liberals on this side of the House intend to deal with the people of Canada. We shall deal with the people openly and above board. If ever there was a time when the masses of the people want to know what Parliament is doing, what the Government is doing, what the true inwardness of things is, and what is in the hearts of Parliamentarians, that day is now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: The great masses of Canadians do not care a button for such technicalities as to how motions are proposed to the House. On the real merits of the case, they will ask my friends from the West and those from the East—every man who has the authority of a vote in the House—"what have you done and what answer have you to make for your action on this resolution?" It is our duty to give the people an opportunity of expressing their views on a matter of this kind. The responsibility for their action is upon them. This is a free Parliament. We have no means of coercing any one, and if we had such means we would not use them, because the principles of Liberalism recognize the fact that every man has a will of his own upon which he should act. And when the day comes for any man to appeal to Cæsar as to whether he has done right or wrong, we hope the people will be free to pass judgment upon our actions in this House, whether we sit on your right or on your left, Sir. The views of Liberals on this side of the House have been put plainly and forcibly by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). I accept every word he has said. I do not differ from him in the least, and I think he expressed very fully, indeed, the views of Liberals as well in the House as out of the House. So far as Canadian Liberalism is concerned, I look with pride to my hon. friend who represents the county of Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) as a man whom I have followed for about fifteen years in this House, a man who has stood true to the policy of Liberalism which he laid down and which brought such magnificent success to this country. We appeal to the people upon the record of Liberalism in the past, the record of Liberalism to-day, and the record of Liberalism which we intend to carry forward when it may be their will to cast upon us the responsibilities and burdens of administrating the affairs of Canada. We have nothing to conceal, and for that reason we have made this motion. It now rests with this House to say what it shall do with it.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the House but for a few minutes on this question. I shall imitate the brevity of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie), who has just resumed his seat, but I sincerely trust I shall avoid the unusual heat which developed with his remarks. There is not the same reason for heat on my part as there is on the part of my hon. friend. I do not resemble the apostle Peter to the extent that he does. We all remember that when that apostle made a famous recantation upon a famous occasion, he accompanied that recantation by unnecessary cursing and swearing. My hon. friend, of course, did not break the rules of this House and of good Presbyterian conduct by indulging in blasphemy, but he went as near it in his remarks as it was possible for him to do.

I must offer hearty congratulations to my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster). I cannot pretend to be greatly disturbed by the fact that I see opposite to me a whole party, such as it is—shall I say, without offense, a whole opposition?—who are at long last united upon a really radical tariff policy so far as declarations in this House can tell us where they are. That is a matter which cannot possibly seriously discompose me, Mr. Speaker, for I was working for that very state of affairs, with the most indifferent success, for a great many years. I congratulate my hon. friend from Brome that in two short sessions, or rather in one session and a very small portion of another, he has been successful where I was a lamentable failure during a period of many, many years.

I shall have no hesitation in following the leader of the Government and the House in voting down this resolution, and I shall do so for very plain reasons which will commend themselves, I am perfectly sure, to the people of Western Canada who are careful students not only of tariff but of tariff records and of tariff situations. I shall vote against this amendment to go into Supply, because, in the first place—I do not want to say anything unparliamentary, and I do not think I shall be doing so when I say—it is not meant to succeed. Hon. gentlemen opposite know very well, and they knew before the motion was introduced, exactly how it would be treated. They knew it would be voted down. Ostensibly it is a motion to change the Government of this country from one set of rulers to another; but in reality it is not such a motion, for its authors know it will not have that effect, and it is not meant to have that effect. I will go a step further than that, Mr. Speaker. We have had the most absolute evidence from my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Jos. Read) that this is the state of mind of the Opposition upon the subject. My hon. friend without contradiction on the other side of the House, said expressly in his remarks upon the Address that they on the other side did not wish to have a change of Government at the present time. They did not wish to have a general election at present, he said, because it would be folly to have an election—which, of course, might result in a change of Government—until the return of the soldiers. In view of that statement, to which no exception was taken by any hon. gentleman opposite, and which, I take it, expressed the opinion of the Opposition, I do not think I am going too far when I say that this resolution is not seriously proposed to the House as one which it is hoped will succeed. That is the first ground upon which, as a man with sincere views upon the tariff question—which views I have never altered and never will—I cannot vote for this resolution.

Now I want to say, in the second place, that I shall not vote for it because there are only certain possibilities in regard to the handling of a tariff. It is a very sweeping resolution, and I thoroughly endorse what has been said by my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) who leads this House about the impropriety of introducing a sweeping resolution, which ought to be an amendment to the Budget, weeks, and possibly months, before the Budget can be introduced. Why, it is a perfectly elementary fact, in connection with parliamentary practice and governmental procedure, that if the attitude of a government upon customs duties were to be avowed before the Budget is presented, it would inevitably lead to commercial transactions in the way of avoiding these very duties after they were imposed by the Budget. That alone, ought to have guarded my hon. friends opposite from bringing in this resolution at this time; and I shall be very pleased indeed to hear how any one who speaks upon this subject will meet that point. If the Government were to accept the amendment of the Opposition, weeks before the changes advocated by the amendment could possibly be given effect to in the Budget, the result would be to defeat the Government in the very objects it had in making changes in the tariff, because commercial transactions would take place beforehand which would save the merchants of this country from the effect of the tariff, whether it was heightened or whether it was lowered.

My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, with a good deal of vehemence of manner which showed he was not very sure himself whether he was on safe ground, appealed to his record on this matter, and the record of those with whom, in former years, he and I were associated. Well, there are records which might have guided my hon. friend and his associates at the present moment in regard to the sweeping nature of the resolution to which I have just referred.

It is interesting to recall how tariffs were handled when they were abolished in the Old Country, and it is important historically to be well acquainted with what is possible in the way of handling tariffs at any given point, having regard to the very principle which my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) laid down himself—that these changes should be undertaken without unduly disturbing existing conditions. Every one who knows the tariff history of the Old Country knows that Sir Robert Peel made comparatively trifling changes in the tariff, in the year 1842, on manufactured goods in Britain, and in the same year he introduced an income tax. Well, when my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is working himself into a state of excitement upon the state of the country, and the need of doing something, he should recall that at least fifty per cent of the policy carried out by Sir Robert Peel in 1842, in moving towards freer trade in England, has been carried out in its entirety by my hon. friend the leader of the Government, for he has followed exactly in the footsteps of Sir Robert Peel in introducing an income tax in this country, something which did not find its place upon the record of my hon. friends opposite, to which he has made such confident appeal. The changes of 1842 were followed by the repeal of the Corn Laws in the year 1846. In three successive Budgets after 1846, going on to the year 1861, Mr. Gladstone swept off in stages almost all the protective duties of the Old Country, ending with the abolition of the paper duty in the year 1861. Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to reflect that from the year 1846 to the year 1861 is included a period of fifteen years. That fifteen years period is the span of the period during which hon. gentlemen opposite held power in this country—power achieved by the profession of Free Trade—and it is not only interesting to make this reflection but to draw a comparison between how real Liberals, led by Mr. Gladstone, dealt with tariffs, and how tariffs were dealt with under the record of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) to which he makes such confident appeal. In the year 1896, coming in with certain professions—which I have no desire to be repeating in this House, but the need of doing so is forced upon us, shall I say by the disorderly parliamentarism which brings in a Budget amendment on a vote to go into Committee of Supply, and I am compelled to make this statement to renew my hon. friends' acquaintance with the history of tariffs in other countries, and with their own tariff history—in the year 1896, the so-called Liberal party came into power in this country, and in 1897 they introduced some trifling reductions of the tariff, and put two or three articles of importance upon the free list. They also introduced the British preference, which was a fairly substantial piece of tariff reduction, and then they went to sleep for ten years. That is not the way Mr. Gladstone tackled the tariff. For ten years, from 1897 to 1907, my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) who is so excited now—who says there is to be no such thing as waiting—waited with absolute patience during that long term, because the tariff was practically passed over for ten years, and then it was, —I was going to say tackled, but that would be an absurd misuse of language,—flirted with again in the year 1907.

Well, what happened to the tariff in 1907? Absolutely trifling alterations were made in it, and in some cases, so far from following the example of Mr. Gladstone, the tariff was raised. It was raised notably on those woollen goods about which my hon. friends are so anxious at the present moment. Any one would have thought that the climate of Canada had improved in the ten years during which these fiscal-preaching Rip Van Winkles had been sleeping. Any one would have thought that the climate of Canada had changed from an Arctic to a tropical one, because hon. gentlemen opposite actually put up the duties on woollens. I suppose they conceived in the intervening time the desire to bring their children up a little more hardily. Well, I am thoroughly at one with my hon. friend from Brome that there could be a good prima facie case made out in a Budget discussion for having woollens reasonably cheap, because there are many months of the year in Canada when we are liable to have a temperature at forty degrees below zero; but when I agree with my hon. friend I must ask him also to disagree with the record of the hon. gentlemen with whom he is now associated, and to which record appeal has been made by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

It is true that the reciprocity agreement was brought in. Now, I do not want to detract by a single word from the credit for that agreement. My hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) seemed to chide myself and others from the West the other night, because we did not always give full recognition to what he, and the Government of which he was a member, had done in this connection.

There is no hon. gentleman in this House, Sir, by whom, on many grounds, I should less care to be chided than by my hon. friend; there is no hon. member of this House for whom I have a higher personal regard. I want to say now that I do not desire to detract from any of the merit that attached to the reciprocity proposals, though a great deal can be said as to whether that is the best method of dealing with the tariffs of a country. But I do want to say this in regard to the reciprocity agreement, and I want to put it on record with these few remarks: that there was a notable quotation made from a notable speech by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)—as he did not divulge the authorship I should not—but he uttered language in which he pointed out that under the reciprocity agreement the manufacturers were not disturbed. I am not sure that my quotation is verbally accurate—it might have been that he said that they were not hurt. In any case, he quoted from a speech which was made in Montreal in the spring of 1911 for the purpose of soothing the manufacturers, and I hope that western voters and members will note that it was a speech made for that purpose. The manufacturers of Canada were told by someone high in the authority of the Liberal party on that day, that they were not hurt in the reciprocity agreement. That is part of the record relied on by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Well, when he comes to attack the tariff in earnest he will not be able to use that language.

If I were dealing with this question on its economic merits, I should try to prove that free trade would not hurt manufacturers who were really self-reliant. I have said in this House that the manufacturers of Great Britain never did anything worth the name until free trade was established in that country. And that is capable of proof by the most exact figures. But that was not the sense in which the statement, reproduced and commended by my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's, was made. The sense in which it was made was that it was meant to commend to the country an arrangement which had regard to natural products only, and which gave practically no relief from protection on manufactured goods, which is the only real protection there is in Canada. That is something that my hon. friend would do well to pay attention to before he asks this country to vote for him and his friends—at any rate, on that record.

In the face of that record I cannot help thinking how much more freely men can talk when they are in the position of great freedom conferred by sitting on the Opposition benches, and when they have not that responsibility which weighs so heavily upon my hon. friend, the head of the Government, in regard to the great subjects that he has touched upon in this House this afternoon. When one thinks of the fifteen years' record of the Liberals in power, which practically amounted to the tariff being untouched, and not proposed to be touched in any way worthy the name in the reciprocity agreement; when one compares that with the record of real reform during an exactly similar period of English history between the years 1846 and 1861, then one cannot help exclaiming about the hon. gentlemen opposite: What patience they had in power compared with their eagerness and impetuosity when they are in opposition! Having regard to the record of the way in which tariffs have been dealt with in this country in the past, compared with the way they were dealt with in Great Britain, I must say that this motion is a very great compliment to the Union Government. The Union Government has only been in existence about a year and a half. They came into existence at the most critical period of the greatest war of history; they have seen that war to a victorious finish in accordance with the wishes of the great majority of the people of this country, and they are now tackling in manful style the difficulties of the early months of reconstruction; and yet my hon. friends opposite have such confidence in their ability that they say, "In your very first Budget, within three months of peace being declared, we want you to make ten times as drastic tariff changes as we were able to do in fifteen years in the times of piping peace." Is that a reasonable proposition to bring before this country on a motion for going into Supply? On that ground I shall have no hesitation in voting against this motion.

[Mr. M. Clark.]

I need not amplify the special points which have already been made by the leader of the House. It is a motion that, while technically correct, is highly irregular and calculated to upset and embarrass the trade of the country, and we need be in no doubt as to why it is introduced.

I heard no argument in the long speech of my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) about the bearing that this question would have upon actual reconstruction in the country. I did hear him give a most emphatic declaration of his belief in party government. His position in that respect was very strongly and emphatically endorsed by my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, and in those declarations we have revealed, unintentionally no doubt on their part, the real meaning of this amendment. It is an amendment by which they do get back to party government; they forget pensions, they forget reconstruction; they snatch at the first thing that seems to have excited a few voters and inclined them to come back from an allegiance which they entered into for the noblest of all purposes. They seize upon the first handle by which they can abuse the Government, the first inducement which they can offer to voters outside. They tell us they emphatically believe in party government on all these grounds.

I hold that on the Budget would have been the time to introduce this resolution, that it is not meant to succeed, and therefore has in it an element of insincerity which does not make an appeal to me; that it is playing a purely party game, and that there is no evidence in the general conduct of the Opposition that they are so vastly in earnest upon a number of other matters which are exercising the people of this country. We had an example of that last night, when one of the policies of the Government of this House was debated for two hours without any gentleman on the opposite side of the House stating his opinion. On all these grounds I shall not have the slightest hesitation in voting with the leader of the Government.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAM HENRY WHITE (Victoria, Alta): Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the resolution moved by the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), I may say that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have frequently brought resolutions of this nature before Parliament. Since the year 1911, when the Liberal party were defeated in trying to reduce, in a measure, the high tariff of this country, we have on many occasions moved resolutions to show that we still stand by the principles that we stood for at that time.

We are told by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) that this is not the time or the place to bring in a resolution of this kind. It certainly is the place, Mr. Speaker; I do not know what the Acting Prime Minister would consider to be a proper time. If we brought it in, as he suggests, in the Budget debate, it would still be a motion of want of confidence. There is no proper time, according to his way of thinking, for hon. gentlemen on this side to bring in a resolution which in any way interferes with the policy of the Government.

The Acting Prime Minister said that many things would have to be settled before this matter could be taken up. It is true that many things have to be settled, but in many parts of the country, particularly the part of it from which I come, where the same problems have to be solved, the people do not consider this an inopportune time to give attention to the tariff. Perhaps more men went overseas from my province than from any other, consequently, there will be more to come home. The fathers of these men and the people generally throughout that country think that this is the proper time to consider matters relating to the tariff. Not only do the farmers, representing seventy-five per cent of the population, hold this view, the three provincial legislatures have unanimously adopted resolutions in favour of action being taken. The Conservatives in the western provinces must be different from those in this part of the country, because these resolutions were supported by the Conservative Oppositions in the three legislatures to which I have referred. Surely the Acting Prime Minister cannot say that this is a political move; that it is made for the purpose of gaining something for party, when he knows that the Conservative Opposition in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba unanimously voted for resolutions in favour of tariff reduction.

A few days ago a platform was laid before this House—that of the United Farmers—that everybody engaged in agricultural pursuits stands for. The Western Legislatures stand for it; the tillers of the soil and the organized farmers of the three Western Provinces stand for it. It is not surprising that Liberals, particularly those who went down to defeat on the same question some years ago, should stand for it; and in doing so they should not be accused of trying to make political capital. An hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who is, perhaps, as fluent and as well-informed as any to be found there, speaking the other day in favour of the large interests which this resolution is directed against, said that Toronto alone paid more income tax than the whole of the four Western Provinces. I believe that is absolutely correct, but it is an unfortunate condition when an area of not more than ten square miles can produce more wealth than the large areas of the Western Provinces. The member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), came, perhaps, nearer the mark than any other when he said that the average income from exports of the farmers in the West was about $700 per capita. I think that is pretty nearly correct, and the farmers who work so hard for what they receive want to reduce a little the income of the large interests and at the same time increase their own.

When the income tax law came into force a year ago many farmers found it difficult to strike a balance and find out what their net receipts were. I have in mind one farmer in the West who, if not the most intelligent man in his district, was as progressive as any other. I cite his case in order to show that the conditions in the West are not what they should be. This man, living in one of the most fertile parts of the country, with land and stock to the value of about $50,000 found that his credit balance last year was $95. True, the year was not one of the best, but he is no small farmer. His gross income was over $7,000, but his expenses were almost the same amount. When you consider that we are paying over twice as much for a plough as we did five years ago, twice as much for wagons, harness, machinery of all kinds, and supplies, it is no wonder that this man's expenses were within $95 of his gross income. You will admit that the farmer whose gross receipts are $7,000 is a great deal more than an average farmer. Besides some hundreds of acres of land, this man had a splendid stock. He had over one hundred head of cattle and possibly forty or fifty horses. I have known him for thirty years, and I know that he has never used anything but registered sires for breeding purposes. He has improved his stock until probably it is the best in the country. Yet he found himself in the position that I have stated, and was obliged to borrow some $2,000 to carry himself over.

The Acting Prime Minister said this afternoon that the farmers would not be misled by this resolution; they would know that some political motive was behind it. When the farmers have not had a prosperous year, members of this House receive telegrams from them. I have received over one hundred, and I shall read a few of them from different districts; the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) and the member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas) will see that I am distributing them pretty well. I will give to the House only a few samples, marking the different corners of the district. The opinions expressed are very similar and they will, perhaps, go to show the unrest that exists amongst the farmers of this country as well as their sincerity in regard to this tariff question. I do not think any hon. member, the Acting Prime Minister included, will say that these men are sending these telegrams in order to make political capital. I do not think the men who sent them ever marked any ballots for me. This is a telegram from Bawlf in the Strathcona Riding:

Bawlf Local of U.F.A. request you as federal member for Victoria constituency to stand resolutely for downward revision tariff along lines proposed in farmers' platform being essential for more production.

Yours respectfully,
(Signed) R. C. Reinhard.

Bawlf is in the northern end of the district. I have here a telegram from a district which, at one time, had the honour to be represented by the eloquent member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). This is from Forestburg, and is signed by Mr. A. Mallett, secretary, Forestburg local:

Forestburg Local U.F.A. sends the following resolution: Be it resolved that the Government of Canada be requested to make substantial reductions in the tariff for imports into Canada.

Forestburg is in the southern end of the district. I have here another telegram from Sedgewick. I might say in passing that out of 200 votes in this section I received seven or eight, so that the gentleman who sent this telegram is not very likely to be a supporter of mine. This telegram reads:

The members of Sedgwick U.F.A. respectfully urge downward tariff revision outlined by farmers' platform proposed by Council of Agriculture and endorsed by provincial farmers' convention this request based on grounds of common fairness to great body of people unjustly burdened by excessive cost of production in basic industry.

I have altogether a little over 100 of these telegrams, all couched in pretty nearly the same language. It seems apparent, therefore, that it is not only the Liberals in this House who are anxious to see some change in the tariff, but the farmers of Canada as well; and when the position is this, that the people of one town in Ontario are producing more, getting more revenue, making more money than all the farmers of the West, it is time for the Government to wake up and look into the matter, in order to see whether some remedy cannot be found for such a condition of affairs. No better land can be found that that in the West; the climate is good and the people are optimistic, and perhaps work harder than any other body of people in Canada, and yet they find they cannot make much money. My opinion is that heavy taxation is the cause of the lack of success in the West. The statement will be made that the people of the West are rich, but I have been a member of this House for ten years and since I have been in this House, I think the Government, on four or five occasions, had to come to the rescue of the Western farmers by giving them seed grain. If they were prosperous they would not require assistance from the Government. It shows how close they are sailing to the wind when one bad crop will compel them to appeal to the Government for aid. I do not think such a thing has happened in any of the older provinces, but when we hear it stated that everybody in the West is making money, why is it that every time there is a crop failure in the West the Government has to render aid? This is a serious question. The Government surely do not understand the real conditions in the West, because if they do, they have a great deal to answer for. There must be something wrong in that country when people who have managed a $50,000 plant for a number of years cannot make an income of over $2,000 and come under the income tax. The people of the West have also the geographical position of the country to contend against. Up to the beginning of the war, the average price of oats was 25 cents a bushel, or 35 cents at the lake front. Let us take these prices, and we cannot expect any higher prices now that the war is over. As transportation costs 12 cents a bushel, that leaves 23 cents. It costs ten cents for threshing, so much to bind the grain and so much to till the land. Therefore, if you make a calculation, you will find that 200 acres of land will bring less than $2,000.

An hon. gentleman from Ontario, a manufacturer, I think, laughs at the idea that the farmers are bearing their share of the taxes. The farmers are willing to bear their share. They have suggested a method by which they can do so; namely, taxation on unimproved lands. As one who has been a farmer all his life, I am in favour of that. Let the Government figure out our share of what revenue is needed, and tax all lands in Alberta, improved and unimproved, and let us pay by direct taxation so that we may know what we are paying. I think every province will be willing to agree to that. But let us not be taxed in this indirect form whereby no one gets the benefit and yet the farmers are paying the taxes just the same.

Mr. MORPHY: I understand the hon. gentleman to favour direct taxation on all lands.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): Yes. If there cannot be found in Alberta enough uncultivated land to pay our just share of taxation in proportion to the population of Canada, I think that is the proper way to get it. The Government might as well take it one way as the other.

When I was reading out some telegrams a little while ago, I overlooked a very important one. This resolution was passed at a farmers' convention:

> Farmers of Vegreville district covering an area of over 1,000 square miles request that agricultural implements and all farm machinery and vehicles be placed on the free list that the reciprocity agreement of 1911 which still remains on the United States Statute Books be accepted by the Parliament of Canada that the customs tariff on all necessaries of life be materially reduced.
> Vegreville Organised Farmers.

The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), I understood, stated that he was in favour of the Government's fixing a price on wheat. I am not in favour of anything of that kind. I do not think there is any necessity for the Government to fix the price of any commodity in the way of foodstuffs. It was decided at the farmers' convention, I understand, although I was not present, and it was stated by the president of that organization who, my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) claims is an annexationist, that they did not want any privileges and they would not go on record as asking the Government to fix a price on anything.

He said they had to go into the open markets of the world and sell, and they wanted an opportunity to buy in those same open markets. In spite of all that has been said, after all the objections made by the Acting Prime Minister in that beautiful "twilight-sleep" speech that is said to have worked such wonders at the caucus the other day, I should like to know what other opportunity we had of stating where we stood with regard to the tariff; I do not know of any other way myself. He was followed by my old friend the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). As long as I have been in political life I have known the hon. member for Red Deer. In the year 1908 he and another gentleman were good enough to give me a good deal of assistance in my first campaign. He was very well received, and may have made some converts. I was very much surprised to-day to find him deprecating the efforts of the late Liberal Government; he said that as regards the tariff they had done nothing but sleep for ten years. I remember his chief argument on that occasion—and I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, whether he cannot put the best side on any cause he undertakes—he carried the people along with him and made them believe that their only danger was in being led away by some misfortune, perhaps like the present Elections Act, from the Liberal Government which had done such wonderful things in respect of the tariff. We were both successful on that occasion, but my hon. friend was not elected on his political or personal record. He was a new man in that country with no political record behind him, so naturally he "went nap" on the political record of the Liberal party. I might say that prior to that occasion, at a provincial election, when my hon. friend did not depend upon the record of the Liberal party, he was not successful, being one of the two Liberal members defeated in the whole province of Alberta. I am not saying that in an unkind way, because we have all had our experiences. We know that, perhaps, the best representative that Alberta has ever sent to this House was defeated in an election; I refer to the Hon. Frank Oliver. But he was not defeated in Alberta, nor by the farmers. He was defeated in France. He won ninety-five per cent of the rural poll; the farmers for whom he had striven so hard stayed with him to the end. He was defeated in the city of Edmonton by people who did not know him. I mention this to show that defeat in an election is not necessarily a reflection upon a man's character or political record. My hon. friend (Mr. Clark) scolded us this afternoon, and he is getting into the habit of scolding hon. members on this side of the House, in whom he used to take such pride when leading them on the straight and narrow path. He pointed out, in very different terms from those used by the Acting Prime Minister, that this amendment was only political jobbery and humbug, and did not mean anything, being only brought in for political effect. Now, to show what trouble a bad memory may cause, I shall read an amendment moved by the Hon. Frank Oliver to the motion for Supply, on May 29, 1917, which I think is as close a parallel to the amendment moved this afternoon as could be found. Hon. Frank Oliver (Edmonton) moved in amendment:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:
>
> In the opinion of this House it would be in the public interest if the Customs Tariff Act were so amended as to provide:
>
> 1. That wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list.
>
> 2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery, and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.
>
> 3. That staple foods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and foods therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of, any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.
>
> 4. That substantial reductions be made in the general tariff on all articles imported into Canada, excepting luxuries.
> 5. That the British Preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff.

I do not think two amendments more similar in language and meaning could be moved, than the one I have just read and that moved this afternoon. The amendment of Hon. Frank Oliver was voted on, and I want to call attention to what happened. We were told this afternoon that it was in bad taste, very unfortunate, and none too patriotic to move such an amendment now that the soldiers were being brought back, but the amendment of Hon. Frank Oliver was moved in 1917 when the war was at a most critical stage, and among the 'Yeas' who voted for the amendment I find the names of Buchanan and Clark (Red Deer).

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Was that after or before the Budget?

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): It was before, but whether it was before or after, the war was on, and my hon. friend voted for the amendment which was so similar to the one moved this afternoon. My hon. friend should not scold us just because we cannot follow him across the floor. Perhaps we learnt our lesson too well when he was our teacher.

He also told us that the Opposition had no responsibilities I might tell him that if we were as erratic as he has proved to be, we might never be in the Opposition; we would be supporting the Government. There is a way of keeping out of the Opposition, and there are other reasons for an hon. member being on the other side. I have heard of a man who represented a district as a party man and received the party endorsation for some years; and when that endorsation was refused him, he changed sides and ran as candidate for the opposite party. That is another way of staying in the Government. After all, we can say that we have the support of all organized farmers in the province from which he and I come. We have the support of both sides, Conservatives and Liberals, in our legislature; and if we are guilty of playing politics all those people in the province of Alberta are guilty of the same offence. I suggest to my hon. friend, who is so well versed in the principles of Liberalism, which he probably learned in a better school than we did, and had perhaps a more sincere teacher than many of us who learned the free-trade doctrine in this country, that he should be more tolerant, if we are not able to see eye to eye with him. My hon. friend admitted the other day that all the preaching and all the beautiful speeches that had been made in this House had been without avail. He said that the most promising pupil of all was the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). But I do not think there is much to show for twelve years of labour. I do not notice any tendency in that direction. If the hon. minister has views of the kind indicated, he has kept them very well concealed. We hope the statement is true, however; and hon. gentlemen on this side will be only too glad to support a resolution of this kind, whether introduced by the Acting Prime Minister or by the hon. member for Red Deer.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House very long in any contribution I have to make this evening to the discussion on the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). The subject matter of the resolution is particularly interesting at this juncture of the session and at this time in the life of the nation. I shall be quite frank with the House, as to where I personally stand in this matter. My record in regard to the fiscal policy of Canada is well known at any rate in that part of the country which I have the honour to represent and in which all my work has been done. The position of the farmers of Western Canada on the question has, I think, been stated to the people of Canada very clearly and in an unmistakable manner. I have been associated, and am still proud to be associated, with the organized farmers. When I entered this Government some eighteen months ago, I did so from a profound sense of duty upon the most outstanding issue before the Canadian people at that time. I followed my conscience then on this question, and I shall do the same on other questions that may call for settlement. I do not disguise the fact that I have always believed in a low tariff policy for this country. I know that there are those in this House, and many in the country, who differ conscientiously from me; but I trust that we can still have differences of opinion on important questions of national policy that are of vital moment to the welfare of Canada, and discuss them purely and simply on their merits. That being my position in this important matter, let me say, Sir, that I think the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has introduced his resolution at a rather inopportune moment; and I cannot help thinking that perhaps it has been introduced by the hon. gentleman as much for the benefit of some of the members on his own side of the House, as for the benefit of some others on this side. As the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) stated this afternoon, hon. gentlemen on the opposite side must know that this resolution cannot be accepted at the present time. What is the situation? If the amendment to the motion were accepted, it would mean the overthrow of the Government and a general election, with all the necessary turmoil that would ensue.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not by reason of the acceptance of it.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, that is what it would mean. It could mean nothing else.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. minister states that if the resolution were accepted it would mean a general election. It would not, Mr. Speaker; it would not mean a division at all, and the Government certainly could not be defeated.

Mr. CRERAR: The Acting Prime Minister, this afternoon, made the position quite clear as to what the real significance of the resolution is, and there is no difference of opinion, on this side of the House at any rate, as to what is involved. I say that it would mean the plunging of this country into a general election, and that is not desirable at this stage. It is wholly undesirable for several reasons, which I do not need to enumerate. I propose to vote against this resolution because it should not have been introduced at the present time. If the hon. gentleman wishes to press the principles contained in it, the proper time to do so is when the Budget has been brought down and when we are considering the future fiscal policy of the country.

Mr. McMASTER: If I withdraw this motion will the Minister of Agriculture pledge himself to vote for a similar resolution later?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. gentleman is very ingenious; at any rate he thinks he is. As far as my position is concerned, I am quite willing to leave it until the Budget is under discussion. The fiscal policy of the Government will be disclosed when that Budget is brought down, and that will be the proper time, in my judgment, to discuss the question which the hon. gentleman has raised this afternoon. Nevertheless, this question is an important one. There is no disguising the fact that in Western Canada there is a very strong feeling that substantial reduction of the tariff should be made, and I think I may say that there are good arguments to support that contention. I do not desire to twit hon. gentlemen opposite with their past record on the fiscal policy. I think I can say, however, that they will have to go a long way before they convince the farmers of Western Canada that they are absolutely sincere in the position they take. If I understand the temper of the Western farmers—and I mention this because free allusion has been made to it this afternoon—he is looking with a very critical eye indeed upon this whole matter. I frankly say that I do not think that a resolution such as the hon. member for Brome has introduced this afternoon—introduced for no other purpose that I can conceive of than to embarrass the Government in carrying on the business of the country at the present time—will find very much favour with the Western farmers at this moment. If the hon. gentleman had introduced the resolution later in the session, and if he had been able to convince the people of Canada as to his bona fides —I do not question that for a moment, because I think the hon. gentleman is entirely sincere—he might have had a better chance of carrying conviction to their minds. Whatever the future may have in store if in the turn of the wheel of political fortune hon. gentlemen now sitting opposite should be entrusted with the reins of office in this country, I only wish to express the hope that they will then be as sincere in their position on this question as they purport to be at the present time. For the reasons I have given, Mr. Speaker, and particularly because this is not the proper time to introduce or discuss this resolution, I intend to vote against it; and I have no doubt whatever in that my action in so doing will be understood by the country.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, my name has been brought into this debate by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) who made the assertion that during my speech on the Address I declared we could not have an election just now, and that I was going to support the present Government by giving them good advice, and helping them in every way I could, as long as I thought they were right. Another hon. gentleman (Mr. McIsaac) in his criticism of my speech stated that I had at one time been a follower of the late Sir John A. Macdonald.

Hon. Mr. REID: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: It was true, and I am proud of it, because at that time Sir John A. Macdonald was the strongest advocate of Reciprocity in Canada. However, it does not make any difference; if I get sufficient new facts at any time to justify me in changing my mind I am going to do so. I believe that "a foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds." The wise man may change his mind several times, but the fool never. My mind has been changed since I made the appeal referred to. What do hon. gentlemen suppose caused me to change my mind? I almost gave my Western friends the assurance—I am sure I gave them the assurance—that the interests of my province down by the seas were identical with theirs. We are a farming population, purely and simply, in Prince Edward Island, and our interests are identical with those of Western Canada; and I told my friends to-day, when they were talking about bringing in this motion: "Bring it in and let those Western people have a chance to save themselves." I hold in my hand a little paper, the only Liberal paper published in the city of Charlottetown. It is called The Patriot, a paper once owned and established by the late Hon. David Laird, the great Liberal that hon. gentlemen from the Northwest at one time had out there taking care of their interests. Here is an advertisement which takes up practically the whole front page of this paper, and it reminds me of the anti-reciprocity dodgers of 1911. Those people went down there and bought up the space in every paper they could get in the Maritime Provinces in order to debauch public opinion. Listen to this extract from the advertisement:

> At the very moment when Canada is struggling with this problem—

That is, the problem of raising the revenue.

> —the Western Grain Growers come forward with insistent demands for:
>
> An immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff.
>
> Free Trade with Great Britain inside of five years.
>
> Reciprocity now, and Free Trade later with the United States.

Then the advertisement goes on to say—

An hon. MEMBER: Who signs it?

Mr. READ: The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the particular and especial friends of the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Government benches.

Mr. DEVLIN: What does the advertisement say further?

Mr. READ: This is what is says:

> These demands are apparently made in the hope and belief that, if they are granted, those making them will be relieved of a large part of what they call the "Burden of Taxation," which the tariff imposes upon them.
> They may argue that under a lower tariff the volume of goods imported will increase, and consequently there will be no decrease in the revenue. But mark this: they want the duty removed entirely from implements, lumber, cement, oil and other articles of which they are large consumers. If the revenue is to be maintained under such a rearrangement of the tariff schedules, other classes of the people must pay what the Grain Growers will escape.

It is pretty nearly time that the Grain Growers begin to do something. My province, as I said before, has identical interests with the great provinces of the west, particularly the three prairie provinces. What has happened in our province through this tariff, the brightest province in the Dominion—that province which nature has done more for to the square mile than any other province in the Dominion of Canada; the jewel of the Dominion? This is what has happened: That province has become absolutely depopulated through forty years of this tariff—forty years of protection. When we were an autonomous province doing our own business, and doing it well, the whole revenue was raised by a ten per cent ad valorem tax on imported goods, and we did not have to pay one per cent of direct taxes. That ten per cent has been raised up to 35 per cent to forty per cent to-day, and they expect the province to live under a burden like that. Why, the agricultural interests of this country are hewers of wood and drawers of water for these Big Interests. Here is another paper —not a Charlottetown paper, but 9 p.m. no less than one of the greatest financial and trade papers in the Dominion of Canada, the Montreal Gazette. This advertisement is headed "Dangerous to Production, to Labour, and to Industry." Then it goes on and gives the whole story, just the same story only in other words, and below are "The proxies of the fifteen thieves,"—Madam Smith the other day in the British Columbia Legislature, drew attention to. She said that the soul of Canada was held in leash by fifteen of the Big Interests of the Dominion of Canada—fifteen men own the whole shooting match. If their names are not signed, well, their representatives are there—Shaughnessy, George, Godfrey, Beatty, Black, Drummond, Ellis, Nanton, Nicholls, Willison, Bulman, Rolland, Russell, Scully, Worthington—just fifteen they total up.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the reason why I have changed my mind, because I see the danger that the Western people are standing in. As I told you the other day, we will send you four members from Prince Edward Island—I am as sure of that as that I am alive—if we get a fair show, but if they come down with that stuff, if they buy the press and debauch the people, as they do whenever they have a chance, where are you going to get off at? I may as well tell you Western farmers that you are not going to get this thing if you work alone, you have to get assistance from the Eastern Provinces, and if you do not look out for yourselves you will be in the soup.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The Acting Prime Minister told you that the appeal we were making to you would be in vain. Very well, if it is in vain, then the burden is on your political souls, and when you go back we will see what the Western people will say about you for losing this cause. There is the danger of delaying for the Budget. If my hon. friend, the Acting Prime Minister, could be entirely depended upon, and we could have the assurance of what he told you people in caucus, it might be all right, but you remember the trick he served us in 1911, when he went in with Sir Edmund Walker and that gang in Toronto. I have not too much confidence in him in that respect.

All the Government has got to do now, if they do not want defeat—as I said before, I do not want to see them defeated at this juncture—is to come out flat-footed and accept this motion. I dare say a few of the Ginger Group would vote against them, but I am pretty well satisfied that if they accept the motion they will get the bulk of the men on this side. That is the proper thing to do, accept this motion and avoid defeat or stultify itself. Let the Government show its hand.

If you defeat this resolution, what is going to happen to the reciprocity agreement? You cannot, you know, according to the rules of this House, bring up this motion again this session; do not make any mistake about that, unless you get the unanimous consent of the House, which you are not likely to get. My hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) said that it should not be moved now. Let me tell him in the words of the good old Methodist preacher: "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation."

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the sentiments contained in the amendment before us have a somewhat familiar ring to me. I had an idea when I heard them first that my hon. friend had been "cabbaging" some of the work of others. I have a very distinct recollection of being on the committee that framed the original resolution from which this present one is drawn, and I may say that I fully agree with the principle contained therein. I remember that while my duty was to assist in the framing of that resolution, the duty of some other members was to canvass support for it, and my recollection is that the men who were sent out to canvass said they had harder work than we, that we had taken the easy part.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Where are those members you were speaking about? They are not on this side; they all crossed to your side.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I think some of the members we canvassed are with you still. However, that is not the point. I thoroughly agree with the principle laid down in the amendment. There is no man in this House who is more thoroughly earnest in support of a low tariff and even free trade.

I have no use whatever for the principle of protection; it is vicious in principle and the sooner we do away with it the better. Perhaps, however, that is beside the question, because the resolution before us does not propose free trade. As the member for Brome has said, our present tariff system is the most expensive way of collecting a revenue. Last year we collected, I believe, about $160,000,000 under the customs tariff. I am satisfied that we paid on account of that tariff at least $500,000,000; that leaves $340,000,000 that does not go into the treasury. I agree that there are many other less expensive ways of raising revenue, and if the question before us were simply whether or not we were in favour of the principle laid down in this amendment, I should be quite willing to vote for it. There is no excuse for our present tariff, and it is up to this Government to see that it is materially reduced. Former Conservative and Liberal Governments had an excuse for not reducing the tariff, which does not exist now. When they were in power the American customs tariff was higher than ours and its existence was the main excuse for protection in Canada. At present, however, we pay practically double the average tariff rate paid by the people of the United States; therefore it is the duty of the present Government to see that there is a material reduction in the customs tariff. I have some hope, notwithstanding what the member for Prince, P.E.I., (Mr. Read) says, that the Acting Prime Minister and the Government will give that some consideration. I do not see how they can avoid giving it consideration. The fact that agricultural implements, cement, boots and shoes, harness and saddlery, and other things mentioned by the member for Brome—I mention only some of the more important ones—are on the free list in the United States is a good reason why a material reduction in the duty on those articles should be made here. The Canadian manufacturers have the American market open to them; they have as good a chance in that market as American manufacturers have, and I see no good reason why Canadian manufacturers should have preference over American manufacturers while American farmers have a preference over Canadian farmers. I am confident that the Government will take this into consideration when they come to deal with the matter of the customs tariff in the Budget.

While saying this, I agree with most of what has been said by the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) and the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. T. A. Crerar). I think they have placed the position of the Western members on this side fairly well before the House. The member for Red Deer says that in bringing forward this resolution the Opposition had no desire to defeat the Government; in other words, that it was not their desire to stand by the natural consequence of their action if this resolution should carry. Is the leader of the Opposition prepared to form a Government to carry on the business of the country if this resolution is adopted?

Mr. McMASTER: Why not?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I do not think he will say that he is; I think it is thoroughly understood that there is no desire of that kind. In what he said the other night, the member for Prince, P.E.I., was voicing his own sentiments and the sentiments generally of the members opposite.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman did me the honour of listening to my remarks this afternoon, he must have heard me say that the Liberal party was prepared to assume any responsibility which this country chose to cast upon it.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: He did not say that he thought this country or the House were prepared at this time to cast that responsibility on the Opposition. What would the consequences of carrying this resolution be? If all the members from the Prairie Provinces, who are deeply interested in the carrying out of some such policy as that suggested by the resolution —very much more deeply interested in it than most of these hon. gentlemen are— should vote for the resolution, the Government would be obliged to resign. A great many of those western members would not be prepared to support a Government formed by the present Opposition. And even if every man of us was prepared to support it, we would not have a working majority in the House, and a general election would have to follow. Who wants a general election? Does the leader of the Opposition want a general election now? I have too much respect for him to suppose that he does. I certainly do not want one.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. THOMSON: The member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) laughs at that. It is implied, I suppose, that I do not want to go back to my constituency for election. I do not care a straw how soon I go back for election; I do not care a straw whether I ever go back for election or not. I am not hankering for it; I do not know whether I shall run again or not. But if the Opposition are not prepared to abide by the consequences of their action—and I do not think they are—their object cannot be altogether to defeat the Government. When I saw this resolution brought up at this stage, it occurred to me that its main object was not to defeat the Government, but to place members from the western provinces on this side of the House in a false position. And if I had not thought that before this debate commenced, I would be quite sure of it now, because member after member on the other side has held out a threat to western members on this side of the House. What hon. gentlemen have said in that regard bears out the idea I had at first. Of course, it is quite open to my hon. friends to do whatever they see fit. I am not worrying about the false position; I am not worrying about my electors. I addressed only one meeting in my constituency before I was elected, and that meeting was attended by intelligent men who had been strong supporters of the different parties—good red-hot Grits and Tories, pretty equally divided. I explained to them as fully as I could what my position was and would be. I foresaw just the position that we are in to-day. I told them that it was quite possible that a resolution of this kind would be brought up in the principle of which I would concur, but that I reserved to myself the right to use my discretion if I felt that the Government in power should be sustained. I said: "If you are not prepared to send me to Parliament on those grounds, send some one else; I positively will not go as your representative otherwise." I say that those who attended this meeting had been strong party men, but not one of them raised the slightest objection; all approved of the position I took.

And I think the position of the western members generally is the same. I want to make it clear that I am thoroughly in sympathy with the principle laid down in the amendment, and were it a question of voting yea or nay on that without its having any other effect, I certainly would vote for it, but I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Victoria, Alberta (Mr. W. H. White), when he says that the position is the same now as it was when we introduced a resolution some two years ago, because my hon. friend must remember that at the time we introduced that resolution the Budget debate was over. I think my hon. friend knows that very well.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Some hon. member near me, when the question was asked, stated that the Budget had not been brought down. I accepted that statement. I am not altogether sure that such was the case. If the Budget had been brought down I apologize to the hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I am not accusing, and I do not wish to accuse my hon. friend of purposely wishing to mislead the House, but I am quite sure that is the position. My hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) has just placed in my hand a note to the effect that the Budget was introduced on April 24 and the resolution was moved by Mr. Oliver on May 29. The position would, therefore, be different. But whether the position is different or not, I do not think that would bind us, under the present circumstances, to vote for this amendment. The circumstances are a little different, but I do not purpose going into them. I do not say that I might not, under certain circumstances, feel justified in voting for this amendment as it stands. It might be the simplest matter for a few of us who represent the most red-hot free trade constituencies in the West merely to sit back quietly, and when the vote was taken to vote for the amendment. That would not defeat the Government. But hon. members must remember this, that there are at least 30 members from the western provinces who are in practically the same position as I am. Would it not, then, be the meanest thing on earth if I did that sort of thing? What would my hon. friends opposite think if I acted in that way? In fair play to each other, under present circumstances, we have to stand together.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Does not my hon. friend know that during the debate on the Address, many speakers on the other side challenged us to show where we stood on the tariff question, and no one asked us to wait until the Budget was brought down?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: That may be. It is not necessary to deny or admit that. People may make challenges to my hon. friend which they have no business to make; but it is not necessary for him to fall into every trap laid for him, is it? I am afraid my hon. friend is rather hard pushed for an excuse—and finds a rather poor one—for the position which he occupies at present. He will have to endeavour to secure some better reason for the action of his party than that. I do not purpose complaining about the action of the Liberal party when in power. At least I do not wish to complain any further than I complained of their action when I was on the opposite side of the House. I do not wish to adopt towards the action of the Liberal party when in power in regard to the tariff question a different tone from that which I adopted when I was a member on the opposite side of the House, or a Liberal candidate. On those occasions I endeavoured to make it perfectly clear where I stood on the question. I also endeavoured to make it perfectly clear that I was not satisfied with the record of my party on that question. And I may say that I am very much dissatisfied with the want of progress shown by the Liberal party when in power on their much-talked-of pilgrimage towards "free trade as it exists in England." They did not make such vast progress as would satisfy me then, and it will not satisfy me now. I do not purpose making any further criticism; but when my hon. friends speak about dealing with the West, satisfying the West, they must remember that the West wants action. The West does not rely very much on opposition promises. The West is more likely to take cognizance of the performance of a party when in power. The West is not playing politics and is not favourable to the playing of politics by any person, and I do not think it will look with favour upon the present action of the Opposition, because the West will regard it as playing politics.

Mr. EMMANUEL B. DEVLIN (Wright): Before entering upon my remarks, I wanted to ask the hon. gentleman a question without wishing to interrupt him in his speech. Could the hon. gentleman suggest any other way than that we have taken by which we might bring this matter before the House in order to get an expression of view from hon. gentlemen on the other side?

Mr. LEVI THOMPSON: If I were going to suggest a way, it might better be done when the Budget is brought down. But I am not objecting so much if my hon. friends merely wish to place themselves on record. I placed myself on record before and I have placed myself on record here this evening as to what I think. If my hon. friends are actuated merely by a desire to place themselves on record, I have no objection to the method they have adopted. If I suffer by it, that is all right.

Mr. DEVLIN: My purpose in asking the question was simply to endeavour to establish in my mind just how sincere the hon. gentleman was, because I think hon. gentlemen in this House know me well enough by this time to understand that I do not want to make myself the judge of the actions of my fellow-men. But to-day I have listened to a debate which has been somewhat marvellous. I gave very keen attention, as I generally do, to the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). I always admire his manner of speaking, and when he sat with us upon this side of the House I admired his earnestness. If I speak along the lines I speak to-night, I will make an open confession—it is said confession is sometimes good for the soul—that it is greatly due to the lessons which the hon. member taught me. He will remember quite well that for years we sat in this House as desk-mates. He said, upon several occasions since this session began, that he was the father of free trade in this House. Perhaps I will not go quite as far as that.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: If the hon. member will pardon me, I never used that expression about myself. I never called myself the father of anybody except four boys.

Mr. DEVLIN: The teacher?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I never describe myself.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does the hon. gentleman say that he was not a teacher? Why, the hon. gentleman pointed out to me on a hundred and one occasions—and this is no breach of confidence—that I must be blind if I could not see that free trade was the only thing to save this country.

Does not the hon. gentleman remember how cleverly he put the matter when he spoke of the rays of the sun coming through the window, and turning to me, said: "Would you put a wall in front of those rays?" Does not the hon. gentleman remember that language? "Why," he said, "it is the same thing exactly when you try to build up a wall against the free entry of goods into this country." Now, I take it that my hon. friend was sincere when he said that; I may be credulous, but I certainly thought he was sincere. And when I heard him say this afternoon that this was not an opportune time for a resolution such as this, I began to think: Has my old deskmate gone back on the principles which actuated him during so many years, simply because he has changed from a seat upon this side of the House to a seat upon that? We all have the privilege of changing our opinions, of course, and I hope that none of us is so glued to any one particular opinion in non-essentials that he will not change it on any account. But the hon. member for Red Deer has pointed out, not on one or two or three or half-a-dozen occasions in this House, but in season and out of season, that free trade as they have it in England is the proper thing for this country. Remembering how he had told us with that eloquence of his how he had learned free trade under William Ewart Gladstone, we thought he was going to instil into the minds not only of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House but of hon. gentlemen opposite, the same undying principles —until this afternoon, when he said: "A punctilio, the merest technicality, prevents me from supporting the opinions I have held on the tariff during my whole political career."

Mr. Speaker, what is good for this country in the matter of trade? Is a low or a high tariff the best? The Acting Prime Minister will tell me that a high tariff is best; my hon. friend from Red Deer, that a low tariff is best. The hon. gentleman from Red Deer says that a low tariff is best, provided there are no technicalities in the way. Away with such talk about technicalities! How often have I heard the hon. member from Red Deer use similar language: Away with your technicalities and your precedents; give us free trade.

I must now leave, with very great regret, my hon. friend from Red Deer and turn to my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson) for a very brief moment. He is another gentleman who sat with us upon this side of the House; another gentleman who said that he had great difficulty in finding converts, as he put it, to the resolution which I have now in my hand, proposed on the 29th of May, 1917, by the Hon. Frank Oliver, when the war was perhaps at its most critical stage. The hon. member says that he is thoroughly in accord with this present amendment, I understand that the hon. member is a lawyer, who occasionally does some farming. He wants the West to know that he is in favour of this resolution, and he is going to support it by voting against it. He hopes the Government will give consideration to the matter. Why, my hon. friend must know that all Governments give consideration to all matters that come before them; oftentimes that consideration is unfavourable, and sometimes it is favourable, and judging by the attitude of those on the Government benches this afternoon and their attitude during the past few days I do not think I am prophesying rashly when I tell the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that the Government is giving very serious consideration to this question, and its final decision will be unfavourable. After saying that he is in favour of the resolution, the hon. member goes on to say that he cannot support it because it might result in the defeat of the Government. Surely the hon. gentleman has not reached the stage where he clings more strongly to Government than to principle. I can hardly believe the hon. gentleman is sincere, because upon other occasions when he sat upon this side of the House looking across at the Government he did not care whether the Government was defeated or sustained. He believed then in principle, but now he has apparently changed, not his principles, let me hope, but his mind. A strong argument which the hon. member brought to the debate this afternoon, and which must have appealed to you, Mr. Speaker, was that whilst he wanted to support the resolution by voting against it, he could not vote for it because it would place his western colleagues in a false position. Mr. Speaker, his vote will not place his western colleagues in a false position if I know anything of the sentiments of the West as we read of them in the Unionist press of today. The West is demanding a lower tariff. Is that not so? The West is not asking hon. members representing western constituencies to wait, but is demanding immediate action. Am I right, or wrong? The hon. member, however, says that he does not want to vote for this resolution, because it will place the western members in a false light. And that can be readily understood. Western Canada has sent representatives here in great numbers to support a lower tariff, and is now demanding action. The West says to its representatives: Now is your time to ask for a lower tariff; we want you to act immediately. One hon. member from the West replies: Will you not wait until the Budget comes down? Another hon. member says: Will you not wait until we see what consideration the Government gives the matter? And yet another hon. gentleman tells us that he will go back to the West and explain his position. He says: It would have been all right for me to do it, but I would have placed my western colleagues in a false light. It seems to me, Sir, that we have come to a time in the political history of Canada when the representatives of the people must not be actuated by political motives, but solely by motives of principle. We, unfortunately—and I shall only allude to the fact in passing—have lost our leader. We have lost one in whom we could confidently place even our own judgment. We were so sure of the greatness of his mind, we were so sure of the position he would take, and that his every action would conduce to the greater advantage of Canada, that we could safely follow him on all political questions which might come before this House. We no longer have him with us, but we have the beautiful fruits of his life work, the principles which he laid down and which should guide not only the Liberals who supported him, but every man who is intent on his country's good and wishes to do his duty by those who sent him here and by the Dominion at large—not as he sees it in his own parochial way but from the broader standpoint of the whole Dominion. Sir, these principles have been instilled into the minds of Liberals in this House and throughout the Dominion, including my Liberal friends on the other side of the House who would follow them if they had the courage of their convictions. I listened with much interest to my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster), who gave a good reason why his motion should be adopted—indeed, he gave many good reasons. He took the question up in its economic phase, and although I shall not weary the House by repeating the virtues of the resolution, I will assure my hon. friends from the West that in supporting the resolution we are not at all guided by what action they may take. We do not care a jot whether they desire to place their colleagues in a false or a fair light in the House. That is a matter of their own concern. But what we wish to place upon the record is the fact that, of all classes in this Dominion, the one class that is not protected is the farming population; and we wish further to record our recognition of the just demands of the farmers and our support of them in those demands. Will technicalities stand in the way? Let that same resolution in a different form be introduced by any hon. gentleman on the opposite side as a Government measure, and I appeal to my leader to tell me whether I am right in saying that hon. members on this side would give the same measure of support to the resolution so introduced as they propose to give to that now before the House.

It is not my intention to endeavour to embarrass the Government. Heaven knows, Sir, they are sufficiently embarrassed as it stands, although they have brought this embarrassment on themselves. They have made innumerable pledges, and if they cannot fulfil those pledges, well, we can only shrug our shoulders and pray for them. But I want to say one word to my friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. T. A. Crerar). We recognize the extremely difficult position he is in, and sympathize with him. We understand that he has been for many years the spokesman for the farming communities in the West. He entered this Government as a matter of conscience, he tells us, and adds that to support this resolution would place him in a false light, it would perhaps mean the defeat of the Government; in any even he did not think the present was an opportune time to propose it. Well, I readily agree with the hon. minister in that last argument; any resolution which may have a tendency to embarrass a Government is likely to be regarded by that Government as inopportune at any time, war or no war. The resolution which was proposed on the 29th of May, 1917, and which was supported by the hon. gentlemen now seated on the other side of the House, was not, according to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, introduced at an opportune time. Its introduction, I take it, would be eminently opportune if the Hon. the Minister of Agriculture happened to be seated on this side of the House; but he is not on this side, hence his opinion. Other members following him spoke along the same lines. Well, Mr. Speaker, any time is an opportune time for the farmers of the East; and if it is not an opportune time for the farmers of the West, my advice to hon. gentlemen representing Western interests will be to wait until such time presents itself. If the farmers of the West are satisfied to wait indefinitely, it is well; but we who represent constitutencies wherein farmers are to be found, and who know something about the farming communities of Eastern Canada, are of opinion that the farmers are not prepared to wait any longer for action on the part of the Government.

Hon. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, considering the importance of the amendment before the House, and the number of times that I have discussed the tariff question in this House during the last fourteen or fifteen years, I do not feel justified in giving a silent vote upon the amendment, and for that reason I shall proceed to place myself on record very briefly as to my position. In doing so I hope it will be distinctly understood that I am speaking for nobody but myself; I am not attempting to represent the Government, and I am speaking, in so far as it is possible to do so, as an ordinary member of the House. Like my friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson) when I heard the amendment read this afternoon it sounded very familiar to me: it was practically the Oliver resolution of 1917, which I seconded, which I supported, which I honestly believed in when I supported it, and with the principles of which I am strongly in accord to-night. There are two matters referred to in the amendment now before us which were not included in the Oliver resolution. The first is a declaration that the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911 should be brought into force by the Parliament of Canada at the present time in order that we might have the advantages of it.

Let me say, Sir, that there was no man in Canada who honestly believed in the virtues of the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911 to a greater extent than I did. There has never been anything in my whole political experience which I viewed so favourably from the economic standpoint—which I believed would be to the advantage of the great majority of the people of Canada—as I did the Reciprocity Agreement. I have not changed my mind one jot or tittle down to the present day, and the greatest regret of my life—not from any personal feelings, but from the standpoint of the public—was that the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911 was not sustained by the people at the polls. I am, however, unable to agree with my friend that any very great good would come by the adoption of the Reciprocity Agreement by this Parliament at the present time, for the simple reason that practically everything which the Reciprocity Agreement grants to the people of Canada has already been obtained, either by the action of the United States Congress, or by the action of the Canadian Government during the last three or four years. Lumber has been made free. That means a tremendous amount to the eastern portions of Canada, and I believe to some extent as well to the western portions of the Dominion. Fresh fish have been made free, which must be a tremendous gain, I know it is in fact, to the people of Eastern Canada. A great proportion of the agricultural products of Canada are free into the United States. Cement has been made free, boots and shoes are free; and practically, as I said before, everything which is produced in large quantities, and which means a great deal to the industries and the producers of Canada, now goes into the United States free of duty. There are, it is true, a great many small items, referred to by my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) this afternoon, which are not free, but they play a very small part in the general trade of the country.

In addition to the articles which have been made free by the United States Congress, wheat and wheat products, or the great majority of them, have been made free by the action of this Government. The same thing can be said of potatoes, due, of course, to taking advantage of the provisions of the recent United States tariff. My reason for saying that the adoption of this policy would not be of very much value to Canada at the present time is, that I always contended that the reciprocity arrangement was not a treaty, but was simply an agreement by which like tariffs should be adopted by the two countries on a certain list of articles. It is well known that a change has taken place in the political complexion of the Congress of the United States during the past three or four months. What course the new Congress may take I do not know; but I am sure that any action which this Government or this Parliament may take to-night would have no influence whatever upon the action which the United States Congress may take when it meets, some time probably in the month of May.

I am not going to-night over all the ancient history in regard to this question, but I do feel that I ought to read one extract from the letter written by the two gentlemen who negotiated the treaty on the part of Canada in 1911, to show that this was not a treaty, but simply an agreement that certain tariff reciprocal arrangements should be provided by the two countries. I am going to take the liberty of doing that because it seems to me it goes to the very pith, the very heart, of the proposal of my hon. friend as embodied in the amendment which he has submitted. I am reading now from the letter, dated 21st January, 1911, signed by W. S. Fielding and William Paterson, in accepting the proposal of the United States Government as contained in a memorandum of the American Secretary of State to them. I will read one paragraph from that letter, to show what was the real intention of the document. It is to be found at page 2457 of Hansard, 1911:

> Nevertheless, it is distinctly understood that we do not attempt to bind for the future the action of the United States Congress or the Parliament of Canada, but that each of these authorities shall be absolutely free to make any change of tariff policy or of any other matter covered by the present arrangement, that may be deemed expedient.

With that understanding, and with the changed conditions that have taken place in the United States, I can see no very great good in the Parliament of Canada, after nearly eight years have gone by, attempting to adopt the provisions of that agreement, and therefore I have no hesitation whatever in voting against that portion of my hon. friend's amendment.

The hon. gentleman next deals with the repeal of the Customs War Tax imposed in 1915. I want to say here that I realize the full gravity of the statement which I am making, or about to make. I was opposed to the imposition of these duties in 1915; I did not believe they were necessary for the purpose for which they were intended. While it is true they may have brought in some revenue, I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that they have added a tremendous burden on the consumers of Canada. I was opposed to them then, and I have failed yet to be convinced that they were necessary.

As to the remainder of the amendment, it is practically the Oliver resolution of 1917, to which I have referred before, and I have but very little quarrel with any of the sentiments expressed in it. I agreed with it in 1917, and I have not seen very much to cause me to change my opinion at the present time.

I do, however, want to point out to my hon. friends opposite that, as was said by the hon. member from Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Read), a man has a right to change his mind if he finds that he is wrong. If a man has any honesty about him, and is convinced that he is wrong in his views, he will not hesitate to change them. I have not arrived at that point yet, but I may tell my hon. friends frankly that I am very much at sea as to what should be the policy of this country during the next three or four years, as to the whole question of the taxation by which we are going to raise a revenue. Earlier in this session I took occasion to point out, in a very brief manner, and in a very general way, the financial situation as I viewed it in Canada. I pointed out that I could not see how, under present conditions, we were going to raise the last $100,000,000 of revenue required in the next twelve months, after the current fiscal year, and I have listened in vain for any person on either side of the House even to discuss the matter, let alone point to the solution.

I think I can go as far as to say that I have seen no very great change in the attitude of the people of Canada and their representatives in their demand for the expenditure of public monies. I am afraid that my teaching has not produced very much result up to date. On account of the changed financial conditions, I tell you very frankly that I am at sea to know exactly what ought to be the proper method of raising taxation in this country. I think practically every method which we have ever heard of before and which we can conceive of in the future is going to be necessary in order to produce the required amount of money; and I want to point out to my friends opposite that the debt of this country will be a billion dollars more before the affairs of the present year are wound up than it was when the Oliver amendment was discussed. While that may seem a very unimportant matter to some hon. gentlemen of this House and some people in this country, it is a very, very serious matter to me.

With many of the general principles laid down by this amendment I am in hearty accord. I do not believe in the doctrine of protection for protection's sake. I do not believe that any industry is entitled to protection to such an extent that it means the prohibition of the importation into this country of the article covered by that industry. I do believe that the raw material of the farmer, his agricultural implements, should be made free, or as nearly free as it is possible to make them under existing conditions. It may be that the manufacture of some of those articles could not exist in Canada if they were made absolutely free. I have not been convinced of that yet, but I am willing to listen to argument, and I would feel like deciding only after a very mature consideration of the subject. But I believe that a great majority of the agricultural implements of this country ought to be free to the farmers.

Now, I realize, Mr. Speaker, that I am making statements which, considering my position, mean a good deal to me. I can only say that when I entered this Government—I am not going over the very, very long and somewhat unpleasant conditions which existed between the month of April and the month of October, 1917; possibly another occasion may arise when they can be discussed—I did so after the most mature deliberation, which many of my good old friends opposite know all about, and nobody knows so well as does my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding). I did so for one specific purpose and for a specified time. The purpose, I am happy to say, has been achieved; the time has not yet expired. During the election in the province of New Brunswick I issued a letter to my constituents and to the people of our province, setting forth the fact that the Government was to be composed of an equal number of former Conservatives and former Liberals, for the purpose of carrying on the war and providing recruits for our army, and that it would continue for the duration of the war and a reasonable time thereafter for demobilization.

Demobilization has not yet been completed, and so far as I am concerned my contract has not expired. Therefore, regardless of what may have been my opinions in 1917, and regardless of what my opinions may be to-day, on economic questions I am not going to take any action which would put this Government out of power while the soldiers are on the ocean coming back and before they are demobilized, and which action would probably, if carried out to its logical conclusion, bring on a general election while this great movement is in process.

I have no fault to find with my hon. friends for bringing up the motion as they have done; that is their business. I have been in this House long enough I think to know the political game pretty well, I have supported governments and I have been in opposition, and I realize the situation. If my friends wish to bring this up at this particular time, it is not according to my views of good political strategy, but, that is their affair, and I realize they are not asking my advice, and I am not tendering it. But the motion having been brought up I am perfectly prepared to face the situation, and I do not think there will be any question that everybody on this side of the House will be prepared to take the same stand exactly, and to vote upon this matter simply for the reason I think very largely that it would be little short of a crime to bring on a general election in Canada under present conditions.

It is all very well for my friends to say, "Well, accept the amendment." Let us get down to earth for a moment. I tell my friends, and they know very well, that this Government could not accept it, and when they say, "Accept it," they are simply asking this Government to do something which is impossible; it could not be done. Therefore it means a vote, and a vote which, if the amendment carried, would mean the resignation of the Government and a general election. I am not prepared to take that responsibility to-night, the members on this side are not taking that responsibility. Further, I do not believe there are more than two or three on the other side who would assume such a responsibility if they knew that was going to be the result.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have stated my views, perhaps somewhat frankly, and I propose to stand by this Government until the soldiers are home. When that time arrives it will be up to me, the same as it will be to every other man in this country, to do exactly what he has a mind to do. I am making no promises of what I will do; I believe that sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof, and when that time arrives I am absolutely free to take any course which I consider in the interests of the country and in honour to myself.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of the resolution. We in this country with abundant resources have struggled against the tide of protection for more than forty years, and we have fought a losing fight. Protection was inaugurated about forty years ago, and since that time we have been losing in population at the rate of two hundred thousand people per annum. Instead of having as we should have had fifteen million people in the Dominion, at the last census we had only about seven million. That was largely due to the protective tariff, which induced the people to go into the cities, the manufacturing centres, at the expense of the rural districts.

When the Liberal Administration came into power in 1896 and advocated their low tariff policy, they at the same time inaugurated a system of immigration, and they were able to get a very much larger number of immigrants from the British Isles and from the United States than had ever been attracted to this country before. We gained in population from 1901 to 1911 1,835,000 people and in the preceding ten years we gained only 530,000 people. During the 1901-11 period we gained that number of people largely from the British Isles and the United States, and they were mainly people coming to settle on the land. But again in 1911 and after that period our immigration fell off and our people quit settling on the land to any extent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of talk in this country by the protectionists for some time past about the production of wealth. Well, the production of wealth in this country comes largely from the land.

The wealth of the nation is created for us in our magnificent land, timber, fishery, and mineral resources, but the only producer of wealth is labour. If you exhaust the timber resources and do not replace them by reforestation; if you deplete the minerals or the fisheries, you are drawing on capital account; but agricultural production is practically self perpetuating if it is properly carried on. The soil, therefore, is the place from which we should largely draw our wealth. For the last forty years the protected manufacturer has been advocating through the press, through active politicians, and on the stump, the principle that we should build up large manufacturing industries, that we should build up an export trade in manufactured goods. Well, previous to the war, England, the chief exporting country of the world, was an importer of foodstuffs. The foreign trade of England previous to the war amounted to $100 per capita; of Germany, the next greatest trading nation, $50 per capita; of the United States, only $30 per capita; and of the smaller nations lesser amounts. No nation ever built up its export business until it became an importer of foodstuffs. Great Britain before the war was importing practically two-thirds of her foodstuffs and Germany one-third; they were doing a world trade in manufactured goods. The export and import trade of the United States was largely in luxuries and in goods they did not produce; it amounted to about ten per cent of their internal trade previous to the war. The export and import business of Germany was done through a free port; the export and import business of Great Britain was done, of course, through a free trade country. It is impossible to build up an export and import business unless you do it in a free trade country or through a free port.

We are asked by the manufacturers to give them protection on their goods, to pay them a bonus on the goods we consume, in order that they may be able to build up an export business. Then, if we allow them this protective tariff or bonus, they say that they are not able to sell their goods in foreign countries; that they cannot find a market unless we, the people of Canada, furnish the funds to foreign countries with which to buy the goods which we produce in Canada. Of course they cannot sell their goods, because they cannot exchange them. The export and import business of a nation is an exchange business. If you are not able to buy from the nation to which you wish to sell, necessarily you cannot sell to that nation. They cannot ship you gold to pay for their purchase. There is not enough gold to go round; they must exchange goods with you.

The Bill that is to be brought down to provide for a loan to foreign countries to enable them to buy our products provides, I understand, that two-thirds shall apply to manufactured goods and one-third to raw and finished farm products. We expect to sell, say, to Roumania and to Serbia not wheat or beef, but finished articles such as bacon, flour and other manufactured foodstuffs. That being the case, the Canadian manufacturer gets the benefit. We are being asked to furnish the money to buy the goods of the manufacturer.

I am not familiar enough with the rules of the House or the rules of the game of the manufacturer to be in a position to say when this subject should be taken up and debated, but I am quite sure that so far as we are concerned, and so far as the men who believe in a lower tariff or free trade are concerned, the time is now. Certainly the manufacturer will never be ready to say that the time is now; and if we do not take action now, when are we to take action? The western people are asking that action be taken now, the farmers of my constituency are asking that action be taken now. The member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson) may be able to explain his attitude to his constituents; but I make this suggestion to the Government: If they have any doubt as to the seriousness of the farmers in this matter, let them hold by-elections in the constituencies of Assiniboia, North Ontario, Glengarry and Stormont, and Quebec East. If they do that, they will find out what the farmers are thinking to-day. If they will not do that, and if the member for Red Deer or the member for Qu'Appelle has any doubt about the attitude of the farmers in their constituencies, I make this proposal: If either of them will resign his seat I will resign mine, and we will test public opinion on this question and find out whether the people think this is a proper time to give it consideration. Hon. gentlemen opposite who believe in low tariffs and in free trade should accept this as an opportune time for action, and vote accordingly.

I must admit that I was rather taken aback this afternoon when I heard the great free trade lion from Red Deer let out a yelp at the Opposition about their attitude, and then come to heel when he heard the party whip crack. If that is the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite who are free traders, we shall never get to the point where we can agree on this question in the House. But a majority of the people favour this resolution; why do not the free traders on the other side vote for it? Members on the other side as well as on this side of the House should show the people where they stand in this matter in order that those who sent us here as their representatives may know what to expect from us.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is my hon. friend in favour of absolute free trade for Canada?

Mr. CAHILL: I am in favour of absolute free trade for Canada at the present moment.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is important in one or two respects, notably in that it has to be taken, if carried, to involve a vote of want of confidence in the Government. It is not my intention to discuss many of the aspects of the matter that have been touched upon this evening, but rather to reply to some remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite who are evidently going to vote for the amendment and who have attempted to justify their vote by all the arguments that they consider necessary to support their position.

It is an amendment to the motion for going into Supply, and it is argued by the leader of the Opposition and by most of the other hon. members who have spoken on that side of the House that it is not thereby a vote of confidence motion. It is true that during the years that I have been in this House, I have heard this point argued a good deal, and especially has it been argued that this is not necessarily to be taken as a vote of want of confidence, if the subject matter of the amendment is not of any very great importance. There may be some force in that, but I do not think any hon. member in this House, either on this side or on the other, could possibly say that this was anything but a want of confidence motion, when it involves an absolute and complete change in the whole of our fiscal policy at the present time. A matter so fundamentally important must certainly, if brought up in this way, if carried or rejected, be regarded as a want of confidence motion, especially when it is brought in at this time before the Budget is brought down. The amendment, as every hon. member knows, relates to the whole of our fiscal system. It is intimately concerned with all our business ramifications throughout the country, and yet the leader of the Opposition said that if it was accepted, it would not be a vote of want of confidence. I can only say that from my point of view, if an amendment of that kind were accepted at this time, when the Budget is at least a few weeks off, and when the closest study is being given to the fiscal and trade conditions of this country, I can conceive of nothing that would so disturb, dislocate and perhaps destroy the industries of this country as to have an amendment of this kind carried at this particular moment. The leader of the Opposition rather taunted the members of the Government and other members on this side of the House and said: Waiting, waiting, what are you waiting for? My hon. friend (Mr. Cahill) said that the time to take this action is now. The leader of the Opposition said that he was extremely impatient and that everybody on that side was satisfied that the matter should not be put off, and he appealed to the record of the Liberal party on this whole matter. May I say to my hon. friend that the record of the Liberal party on this matter is not one of rushing into violent fiscal changes at very short notice? I happened to be in this country in 1896, not taking a very keen interest in politics and certainly not taking an interest in party politics. I listened to the discussions that took place throughout the country at that time. Everybody knows that the party which my hon. friend supported then and which he is supporting now was pledged to free trade as it existed in England. At that time I happened to be engaged in farming, largely fruit growing, in the Niagara peninsula, and I will recall to my hon. friend, if he does not know it, that all the people of that district—it did not matter what their party affiliations were—were greatly disturbed as to the possibility of the promises of the then Opposition being implemented. They did not know what was going to happen, and the whole case was argued very completely before a tariff commission which came around and which comprised amongst others my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), who spoke the other night. My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens, as a member of the Government that had been elected in 1896, did not do what the leader of the Opposition is now getting impatient to do when urging this country to rush into this change suggested to-night, but he toured through the country and listened carefully to all the presentations made by interests affected by tariff changes of any kind. As a result, the particular industry with which I was associated at that time was left practically untouched by a Government which had been pledged to free trade. As the years went on, there came demands for tariff changes, and again the Government which was supported by the leader of the Opposition made another tour of the country and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens was at that time a member of that commission. He came out to British Columbia where I happened to be living. I was still associated with the same kind of farming and the same kind of business, and I had the honour again of putting forward some of the arguments in reference to that particular industry and everything was given a most careful and patient consideration. And, I may say, again to our satisfaction there was practically no change in the tariff as it affected that particular industry. I put these matters before the House as showing the tremendous contrast between a party which was still in power and with which my hon. friend was still associated when it had the responsibility of advocating changes in the tariff, and the attitude assumed by those hon. gentlemen who now have no responsibility at all, except to endeavour to disturb the affiliations of those who are now forming Union Government and a Union party and to try to make ammunition on that side of the House for political purposes throughout the country.

A good deal has been said about reciprocity. The word has a familiar sound to many of us who debated the matter for many weary months in the House and throughout the country I will not discuss it except to refer to the statement made by the mover of the amendment (Mr. McMaster) this afternoon, that the only thing that affected the people of Canada in giving what he called this unfavourable and mistaken verdict upon this point was the appeal to racial passions and so on. I think the hon. member completely misjudges the people of this country if he puts them down as such fools that, after a campaign of education of months and months, the vast majority of them could come to a decision only through appeals to passions. The people of my province came to a decision for various reasons. So far as the industry in which I was engaged is concerned, they came to that decision because they were absolutely convinced that a policy of free trade as regards the fruit growing industry would have meant the absolute extinction of, or at all events, a serious blow to that industry, in which millions of dollars were invested. Over and above that there was a very strong and healthy sentiment amongst the people of Canada at that time that helped to defeat the reciprocity proposal. They believed then—and I believe they do now,—that it was better, whatever mistakes we might make, to be master in our own house, to have complete autonomy and power and control over our own affairs, than to allow our powerful neighbour to have a finger in the pie so that in years to come she could exert over our affairs a control that might be disastrous. I do not wish to argue that point. The leader of the Opposition argued that this was not a want of confidence motion. I will recall to him what the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) said the other night. That hon. member said that he did not wish to see an election precipitated in this country at the present time; that he was prepared to vote against any want of confidence motion, because he did not feel it was in the interest of Canada to have an appeal to the electorate at present. My hon. friend hardly did himself justice in his taunt that our desire not to accept this amendment was because we wanted to hang on to power. I do not think my hon. friend, if he would give a conscientious expression of his opinion, will accuse any minister who has gone through the stress and strain of the last four years of being anxious and keen to hang on to power with all the nerve racking responsibility that is entailed on members of the Government. I can only assure him for myself—and I think I can say the same thing for other members of the Government—that there have been many times when we would have gladly relinquished to others the responsibilities of power and all it entails, and I think it was rather unworthy for my hon. friend to throw out a taunt of that kind. If he thinks the desire of the Government is to hang on to power, then it is still more unworthy of him to show such an anxiety and eagerness to attain to power by the manner he proposed to the House to-night by putting an amendment of this kind. I do not agree with him when he argues that the people will realize that our position is based on a technicality. I do not think my hon. friend need think that the people of this country are so foolish as not to see through the insincerity of such an amendment at this time and not to see that it is simply a political game. We have all played it more or less in the past. There is hardly a member of this House who has not, in some form or another, been guilty of precipitating a vote, or putting the other party on record, knowing that nothing will come of it but thinking: Here is some good ammunition I can fire out to my constituents to show what a lot of blighters these fellows were voting against the best interests of the country, at the same time knowing it was not going to be effectual.

He knows perfectly well this motion will not carry, and I venture to say the leader of the Opposition would be the most disappointed man in this House if the motion did carry and he found himself in the extraordinarily difficult position of having to form a government in this country at this time on a platform along the lines of this amendment. Plunged into the enormous tasks facing this country at the present time, how long would he hang on to power under these conditions? He would not last five minutes; that is my opinion.

My hon. friend from Victoria, Alta. (Mr. W. H. White) dealt at some length with our good friend from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark). I do not think I or any other man in this House need take up the cudgels for the hon. member for Red Deer, because I have never seen a man better able to handle them than he is himself. But I submit that there was absolutely no argument whatever in taunting the hon. member for Red Deer for voting on a motion on May 29, 1917, of a fiscal character, at a time when the Budget was six weeks old. We all know how ardently the hon. member for Red Deer has advocated the cause of free trade, but I venture to say that even if he had been on that side of the House he would not have voted for this amendment, or would have done his best not to have it introduced at such a time if the Budget had been coming down on May 29 and the amendment had been moved on April 24, because he would have known perfectly well what it would have involved. His position was absolutely consistent.

There is sometimes an approach to hypocrisy in this House in regard to political and tariff matters. I think if we told the absolute truth we should express the conviction that the tariff is in a very large measure a local matter. I know that in British Columbia we are mostly protectionists. Speaking for my constituents, they are protectionists because it is a matter of life and death with them in their industries. Coming to the prairies—I am not criticising at all—farming is carried on under different conditions, and the farmers there believe that free trade will in the end be better for them from a financial standpoint. Coming east, the same differences exist, and it is quite natural that even in our own Unionist party on this side of the House there should be difference of opinion amongst our members. We honestly recognize that difference do exist; there must be honest differences honestly held, and the task of statesmanship, at all events, is in the face of extraordinary national difficulties to try to reconcile these differences to some extent. No man on earth can satisfy the extremists of either sides. People talk about compromise. It reminds me of the old story that was told of a man and his wife who had a violent quarrel over what colour they should paint their house. The man stuck to it that it should be painted green. The wife insisted it should be painted white. A friend later asked the husband how the matter ended, and he replied: "We effected a compromise." "What colour did you paint the house eventually?" The husband said: "We compromised on white." That was the wife's idea of a compromise, and I think lots of people would like a compromise along those lines. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition who is so wild in his enthusiasm for the amendment of his friend from Brome, and who possibly, whilst he is in Opposition, would support my hon. friend who has just sat down, who declared for absolute free trade, has never shown any keen enthusiasm for free trade, and he will probably not get up in his place and say he is in favour of free iron or free coal, because he knows perfectly well that these things affect different parts of the country differently. If he wishes to say that he is in favour of free iron or free coal now is the time, as my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) would say, to state so. Now what is the good of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition saying: "We deal openly and above board?" And he talks about hon. members on this side of the House rushing to get into line when the party whip is cracked. I have a high personal regard for my hon. friend, but I must say that, politically, I have never seen in this House a more slavish adherent to the party whip and the party system than the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. Again and again, during the last ten years, I have known my hon. friend get up and vote against amendments of this kind on going into Supply, not on vital questions which would overturn the fiscal system of the country, but on matters of an entirely trivial character, and that had no bearing on the substantial policies of the Government. Again and again I have known him get up and vote against such an amendment on going into Supply, on the ground that it was a vote of want of confidence. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that amendments of this kind, and much of the discussion to which I have listened thus far since the House met, show too feverish an anxiety to try and break the affiliations which at all events hold now various members on this side of the House, who have perhaps thoroughly strong antagonisms or honest differences of opinions on trade matters. There is too feverish an anxiety to try and split up the members on this side of the House who have come here for a high and noble purpose, and who naturally do not want to split up so long as the present conditions face the world. I would say to my Unionist associates—and I am speaking as an old-time member of the Conservative party and of the Conservative Government—I admire the men who came into Union Government because (and I say this advisedly) they showed a far higher sense of proportion than hon. gentlemen opposite. They showed a real knowledge of values; they knew something of the differences between essentials and non-essentials. They left political friends and joined political opponents, than which there is, perhaps, no more distasteful task to any man in public life. They joined political opponents whom they had berated and with whom they had perhaps had very acrimonious discussions in this House. They turned from policies which they had advocated vigorously, simply because they realized they were small in comparison with the infinitely greater matters facing the nation at that time. My hon. friend from Red Deer was one of these men, and I especially admire him for this reason: there was no man on that side of the House who had advocated so vigorously and so consistently the policy of free trade; I venture to say that he was the only member I have seen on that side of the House during the time I have been a member since 1908 who has unceasingly and consistently preached the same gospel in regard to fiscal matters. I admire him for realizing that these things were as nothing in the balance against the pressing and deadly danger that faced this nation at that time. I say it is infinitely to his honour and the honour of other hon. members who did the same thing that the non-essentials counted as nothing against the pressing, grievous and deadly danger facing this country in 1917 and 1918. Talk about taxation and differences of opinion as to taxation methods. What would these have mattered if that danger had become an actuality? If the Hun had won we should have sweated under the most grievous kind of direct and indirect taxation for a lifetime. These men knew that, and not only to my mind did they take the right stand, but they took the sound view according to the opinion of those like the hon. member for Skeena (Lt.-Col. Peck), who pointed out the other day that those who were in the trenches fighting that bloody fight for freedom knew that was the right course if the Empire was to be saved.

Those hon. gentlemen who came over and joined us are now taunted because they happened formerly to have held certain trade theories and convictions, and hon. members on the other side seek to embarrass them and the Government by a resolution which they know they cannot carry, and do not want to carry, but which they propose simply to put those who have joined the Government in an invidious position in the House and before the country. I do not think that the people of this country are so foolish as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition assumes they are. I do not belong to the same political school as my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), although we were born in the same country and lived there for many years. I belong to an opposite school of political thought; but as I look across the seas at this juncture of the world's history, perhaps more grave and portentous than at any period during the war—at all events equally so—with all the terrific turmoil and confusion, military, political, social, ethnological, and fiscal; unrest in every phase of life,—as I look across the seas and consider this state of affairs, I feel that our older theories of life are upset and that there is no man either over there or in Canada who can say at the present moment exactly what political doctrine should be preached and what line of policy should be laid down. My hon. friend from Red Deer was of the same political faith as Mr. Lloyd George—a school of thought that I as a Conservative was brought up to detest, and I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. Lloyd George, an ardent exponent of advanced Liberalism, during the war, sat side by side with many dyed-in-the-wool political opponents, and indeed is still so sitting to-day because he sees that party affiliations are of smaller moment than the great issues that should make for national and international unity.

The country will not mistake the attitude of the House in a vote on a question of this kind at the present time. They know that there are greater things than putting into effect or rejecting this particular piece of political economy. They know that there are greater and vastly more important things that must be done in the face of the dangers threatening the whole world; and that it is absolutely essential, if the world is to be saved from the greatest of all evils—which my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) seemed the other day to hold rather lightly, the peril of Bolshevism,—if we are to hold the sanity of this world and preserve it against the inroads of what all thoughtful men regard as the gravest menace with which we are faced, graver perhaps than even the war; they know that there must be on the part of thoughtful men a recognition of what things are great and what are not great but merely temporary. And it seems to me that the salvation of this country, as of other countries, lies in the frank recognition of differences, and the full determination to reconcile, in the face of bigger things, these differences, and the determination above all things that we shall not be pushed aside from our path by little catch votes but shall recognize that there are larger purposes in view which we intend to achieve.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity a few days ago, in a recent debate, of expressing my views on the general tariff question, and therefore I do not deem it necessary that I should enlarge upon them now. I am reluctant to give a silent vote on this matter, the more so because I am obliged to differ from the hon. gentlemen who sit on your left, and with whom, I assure you, I am more anxious to agree than to disagree. I do not agree with all that was said by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) in his opposition to this resolution. I cannot at all concur in the opinion he expressed that any motion in amendment to Supply is necessarily a vote of want of confidence, though this particular one may be argued to be such. A motion in Supply is one of the occasions on which the representatives of the people have an opportunity to present their grievances, if they have any. It is an opportunity for free discussion, and it is not an unusual thing to have an amendment to Supply moved. My hon. friend drew a distressful picture of what would happen if the amendment to Supply carried. Why do we go into Supply? He says it is to vote money for railways, public works, soldiers, and pensions; and that all this would be stopped if anybody moved an amendment to Supply. That is altogether a mistaken notion. The parliamentary rule was read by the leader of the Opposition, but I know from my own experience that again and again motions in amendment to Supply have been accepted. I have not turned up the records, but I have no doubt it can be found that more than once, when I was Minister of Finance, I accepted motions of that character. Nor do I agree with my friend when he says that we should wait until the Peace Conference deals with our tariff matters. If he will not deem it offensive, I must describe this as some of the "eye-wash" we get concerning Canada and the conference. There is no fiscal question concerning Canada before the Peace Conference. The fiscal questions of Canada must be settled here on the floor of this Parliament. Our right to settle them is beyond dispute, and we will not surrender it to Downing Street or the War Cabinet; neither will we surrender it to the Peace Conference or the League of Nations. We retain that right, and need not wait a single moment to see what the Peace Conference intends to do regarding the matter.

I have not had the opportunity of studying the motion that has been read by way of amendment, but from its general tenor I know it is in accordance, largely, possibly wholly, with my own views upon the tariff questions which are more or less agitating the country. It may be asked, "If the motion is in accordance with your views, why not support it?" Well, I agree with the Minister of Finance that the motion is not opportune at this time. I am obliged to take that position for several reasons. If I were younger and more enthusiastic, less experienced and less responsible, I might feel free to vote for the motion. But I happen to have been Minister of Finance for a period of fifteen years—longer, I am informed, than any other man. Therefore I know something about how tariff questions have been dealt with in Parliament, and I look back on my own experience and put myself for a moment in the position of the Finance Minister. It is well, in considering public questions, sometimes to place yourself in the opposite position. And I ask myself the question, if I were Minister of Finance to-day how would I view this motion. I have to view it as I viewed similar motions when I was Minister of Finance. The records, I am sure, will show that on several occasions, at an early stage of the session, efforts were made to commit the House to particular actions in tariff matters, and I argued that it was appropriate to wait until the Budget was under consideration. If I took that view when I was Minister of Finance, why should I change it to-day merely because another hon. gentleman happens to be occupying that position? I do not think this is the right moment for raising the question. It is a fair case of applying the rule to do unto others as one would have done to him. If I were Minister of Finance to-day I should have to regard this motion as inopportune, and that being the case, I regret very much that I cannot join my hon. friends on your left in supporting it. Later on the question will come up again, but for the present I do not think the motion is a wise one, and it should not prevail.

Mr. FRANCIS N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, before casting my vote on this amendment I wish to explain my position. The amendment contains much that I approve of, but there are some features in it which do not meet with my approval. I deem these to be unjust, and consequently I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment.

Doubtless I am looked upon as a manufacturer, and that designation is correct, but I wish to place the House in possession of the facts with respect to my attitude in the tariff. In the products that my firm turns out we are prepared to meet the competition of the world; we need no protection, and would be only too glad if free trade were to prevail. What we produce we sell in the open market and are prepared to meet the competition of the world—in fact we invite that competition. On the other hand, very much of the materials that enter into the manufacture of our goods and the construction of our plant are subject to a high duty. Speaking for myself personally, and as one engaged in manufacturing operations, free trade would be welcomed in our business. But I recognize there are some industries that do not occupy such a position, and that are not prepared to compete against the world. That is my position as a manufacturer speaking on this question.

This afternoon while the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was explaining his amendment, and the Finance Minister was replying, I was absent from the Chamber. I understand, however, that the latter hon. gentleman said I looked very uncomfortable, and that he did not think I was enjoying the situation. I may have looked uncomfortable, but I was thinking of the unjust features embodied in the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Brome.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCREA: Hon. gentlemen had better hesitate a moment before they applaud. That brought to my mind the unjust treatment which our industry has received. I do not wish to be offensive to the Finance Minister, but it recalled the unfair and unjust treatment that the industry with which I am connected has suffered at the hands of the Government, and that, no doubt, accounted for my doleful look.

The hon. member for Prince, P.E.I., (Mr. J. Read) in his speech to-night declared in very emphatic terms that the public press of Canada had been debauched—had been bribed, bought, and paid for and so on—with the people's money. I am inclined to think the hon. gentleman is not in possession of all the facts upon which he based his statement. I am not, and therefore I cannot say how much public money went to paying, or buying the public press; but I do wish to say that about a million and a half of the newsprint manufacturers' money was devoted towards buying the press of Canada in the last election, and since that time. That is to say, the manufacturers of newsprint in Canada during the last two years have had to contribute the necessary paper for the press of Canada at about a million and a half of dollars less than they would have received if they had been allowed to sell newsprint in the open market of the United States and elsewhere. Consequently I say that is what it has cost the manufacturers of newsprint in Canada to support the Government. We have heard the emphatic statement from hon. gentlemen on both sides that they do not want an election at the present time. Certainly from the paper manufacturers' standpoint we do not want an election just now if we have to pay the newspapers the same price we paid last election.

In part the amendment does meet with my entire approval. That is in so far as it calls for the acceptance of reciprocity as specified and laid down in the agreement of 1911. I was in favour of reciprocity at that time, and for that reason presented myself as a candidate in the county of Sherbrooke where I succeeded in being elected, although that county had never previously returned a Liberal member.

The features of the amendment to which I object, and which I say are unjust and unfair, especially at this particular time, are those which are likely to make inroads into our revenue. Faced, as we are now, with an enormous debt, when the expenditures of the country call for $437,000,000—and I venture to say that when the supplementary Estimates are brought down the total will be swollen to approximately half a billion of dollars—the situation calls for the exercise of caution. If every man is to be exempt from paying his fair share of taxation, if all are not to be required to contribute towards the revenue, where is the money coming from to meet our national necessities? That is the question that puzzles me. If we did not require money on this vast scale I would be a free trader, but on a basis in which all parties would be placed on a position of equality. The amendment calls for the placing of agricultural implements of all kinds, and mill and mining machinery, on the free list, but other industries are to remain untouched. Let me give an illustration of what the effect of this will be. Supposing there is in the city of Ottawa a large manufacturer of farm implements, and on the other side of the street there is a manufacturer who produces another class of goods on an extensive scale. Both men import a great part of the raw material which enters into the manufacture of their products. The man who manufactures farm implements is allowed to import his steel, iron, and brass, the metals of all kinds which he needs, his paint and other materials, free of duty. The man on the other side of the street has to pay a duty on his raw articles, and has to compete in the labour market, has to pay the same wages, and meet other outlays on the same scale. Where is the fairness in that kind of tariff arrangement? If it is possible to reduce the tariff let us do so, but let that reduction be carried out on a uniform basis, and not select certain industries for favoured treatment.

It would appear that the population in the western provinces are largely farmers, and they represent a great many votes. Is it the interest of the country we are supposed to be working for, or are we influenced by the desire to gain the votes of these farmers? For my part, I believe the present to be too serious a time to play politics; it is too serious a time to be bidding for votes. I do not believe in a tariff when it reaches the point that it protects industries in this country; then it is too high. But I do say that the manufacturers of this country with its population of some seven and a half million people are not in a position to compete with the manufacturers of England or the United States, and they must have some protection as tariff for revenue. There is no man more anxious to help the farmers than I am, but there are two sides to the farmers' question. If you give the farmers free implements and everything else, and if they have no population to sell their crops to, what are they going to do with them? I say that it is just as essential that we should build up industries in this country and create centres to consume the products of the farm as it is for the farmers to produce, and the way to do that, in my judgment, is for this Government and for the people of this country to work out some policy which will be fair and reasonable and equitable to all parties—a tariff to produce revenue. I do not think it makes very much difference whether we call upon the farmers of the West to put their hands down into their pockets and pay direct taxes or call upon them to pay in the shape of a duty on implements, provided that that duty does not build up a tariff wall and enable the manufacturers to put the money in their pockets.

The manufacturers of this country, in my judgment, must have some protection, and if I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker, I wish to take up a little of the time of the House to illustrate just what I mean. I have never had anything to do with any branch of business except the one I am engaged in, but I have had a little insight into this one particular line of business. A man with whom I was connected for some ten years and very familiar with was a shoemaker, as were his father and grandfather before him. This man had two factories employing about twenty-five hundred people and manufactured four or five different grades of boots, common men's and boys' boots. The boot from when it started with the side of leather until it reached the finished article probably passed through the hands of twenty-five or thirty men, and every man had to do his share of that work down to the twentieth part of a cent. The man who cut the leather had to furnish so many taps, so many soles and so many heels out of each piece of leather; if he did not he had to give an explanation to the foreman. The outcome of that was that they got this particular business down to a science. The man who owned this shop and showed me through it several times, told me that when they made five cents a pair net profit they were doing good business and able to pay substantial dividends. Why? Because they had a population of 110,000,000 people to sell to and could specialize. Now our boot and shoe manufacturers, with our population of 7,000,000, have to make everything from the finest lady's shoe to the brogan, and cannot specialize on anything, and that applies to every other branch of business. We are not in a position to compete with the old-established concerns which have had this experience, specializing in every branch and favoured with a large home market; and until we reach that point it would be folly to throw down the tariff wall entirely.

I understand that the majority on both sides of the House are not in favour of throwing down the tariff wall. But why throw it down on certain articles and not on others? As I explained at the outset, the reason I am opposed to this is because of the injustice of removing the tariff from certain things and leaving it on others. That is too long a jump to start off with. If it is possible to reduce the tariff generally, let us do it. Tariff for revenue is all we need. and I think that the common sense and wisdom of the people of this country, both in the West and everywhere else, will force them to the conclusion that as members of a portion of this Empire and responsible for the debts of this country, it is their duty to contribute their fair share, and they may as well do it in the form of revenue as by the way of direct taxation.

Mr. LOUIS AUDET LAPOINTE (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this question, but I find the discussion is so interesting that I feel I ought to express my views on the subject before the House.

I am not a manufacturer nor interested in the manufactures of any commodities, but I represent a thriving constituency within the city of Montreal in which there are quite a number of manufacturing industries. I tell you honestly, Sir, that I believe it is my duty as representative of that constituency to vote against the amendment, and I shall do so. First, because I believe that this is not an opportune time to bring forward an amendment of this character. Second, because I am going to put before this House the business reasons why I believe that I should vote against it. I have just received a resolution from the Board of Trade of Montreal, which represents the trade interests of the city and knows something about tariffs and questions of commerce—

Mr. GAUVREAU: They did not vote for you.

Mr. LAPOINTE (St. James): I do not care. I have confidence in their reasons and I believe in them. I quite agree with their views on this matter.

[Mr. McCrea.]

This resolution which I have received from the Montreal Board of Trade is dated March 21, 1919:

I beg to communicate, by direction of the Council of this Board, the following resolution with regard to the adverse balance of trade it unanimously adopted on 18th inst., and to say that same has been sent to the Honourable the Acting Premier and the Honourable the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce:—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE (St. James): My friends sitting beside me apparently will not allow me free speech. If any hon. gentleman does not agree with my sentiments I must just ask him to keep quiet and not interrupt.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has no right to address himself to me directly; his protest must go through you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LAPOINTE (St. James): I hope my protest will go to my hon. friends through you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for St. James has the floor and I hope he will not be interrupted again.

Mr. LAPOINTE (St. James): I will continue my reading of the Montreal Board of Trade resolution:

Whereas, at this time when our fighting forces are returning from overseas in large numbers and they, together with munition workers, are seeking other employment, business must be stimulated to create confidence and stability in commercial enterprises, thereby providing for the maximum employment of labour,—

Whereas, values of all commodities are in process of re-adjustment, and any changes in the present fiscal policy would tend to delay the return to normal conditions, retard initiative and create uncertainty,—

Whereas, because of the heavy adverse balance of trade as between Canada and the United States, as evidenced by the continued high premium of over 2 per cent for the purchase of New York funds, importations from the United States should be kept at a minimum, more especially of such commodities as are made in Canada or as are non-essential,—

Whereas, Great Britain, France and other European countries have seen fit to restrict imports and thereby conserve their own resources and provide employment for their own people,—

Whereas, the burden of taxation must be borne by all classes, and not be sectional, it is therefore necessary that all classes, including farmers, manufacturers, merchants and workers should be fully employed, and thereby make Canada more than ever self contained and less reliant upon imports from other countries,—

Therefore resolved.—That the Council of the Montreal Board of Trade is of the opinion that until a definite tariff policy is adopted for the British Empire, the Dominion Government should exercise, during the period of reconstruction, some degree of special control over all imports, either by a license system or otherwise.

The Chambre de Commerce of Montreal, which includes many able business men and manufacturers, will certainly, at the proper time, pass resolutions similar to this. I have not yet recieved any, but I expect some, because some of my friends who belong to that organization—manufacturers of shoes, leathers and so on—are not specially in favour of too much free trade to-day. There was some difficulty in getting some of the manufacturers in my county to understand they should vote Liberal at the 1911 election; many of them voted for me from a personal standpoint. But some of them were afraid of their trade at that time. I am taking this position, reserving, of course, the right to whatever opinion I consider proper when the Government brings down its tariff proposals.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. McMaster, which was negatived on the following division:

SUPPLY—INTERIM VOTE.

Motion (Sir Thomas White) agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply,—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The present fiscal year ends on the 31st of the present month. I have spoken with the leader of the Opposition (Mr. D. D. McKenzie) with a view of obtaining, as is usual, an interim supply of two months. With his concurrence, I desire to move:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $52,310,026.12 being one-sixth of the amount of each item set forth in the Main Estimates for the year ending 31st March, 1920, laid on the Table of the House on the 19th instant, be granted to His Majesty for the year ending 31st March, 1920.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did I understand the Acting Prime Minister to say "with the consent of the leader of the Opposition," or "with the consent of the House."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I stated "with the concurrence of the leader of the Opposition," and I assumed that the other members would also concur.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I just wished to know whether there were any other members in the House than the two leaders.

Mr. McKENZIE: What the leader of the Government says, namely, that so far as he and myself can concur in this resolution, we have done so, is quite true, but, of course, that was with the expectation that the House would concur. I wish nevertheless to reserve certain rights which the members of the Opposition have in connection with all the items as they come up for consideration later on. Rule 17 (c) of the Rules of the House reads:

On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the Estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

It might be argued later on that all the items were taken up on this resolution, and that consequently this rule did not apply. I want to reserve the right that this rule will be regarded as in force in connection with the Estimates of any department that may come up, notwithstanding that we are consenting by this resolution to one-sixth of the Estimates of all the departments being passed, and also to reserve to ourselves, or to any member who may so desire, the right to criticise any particular item of the Estimates of any department.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend's request is entirely reasonable and I have much pleasure in agreeing to it.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Acting Prime Minister) the House went into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

Resolved that towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1920, the sum of $52,310,026.12 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

SUPPLY BILL—INTERIM VOTE.

Sir THOMAS WHITE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32, granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public services for the financial year ending March 31, 1920.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first and the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

Wednesday, March, 26, 1919.

The Speaker took the Chair at Two o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH.

Hon. N. W. Rowell (President of the Privy Council) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 37, respecting the Department of Health.

Mr. PROULX: Explain.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL: This Bill is to provide for the creation of a Department of Health, to be presided over by a minister of the Crown to be named by the Governor in Council. It also contains the usual provision for the appointment of a deputy minister, to be the deputy head of the department, and for the necessary officers, clerks and employees. The powers of the minister administering the department extend to and include all matters and questions relating to the promotion or preservation of the health and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction; that is the general definition of the powers of the minister. Certain particular powers are mentioned in detail covering co-operation with the provincial, territorial and other health authorities, with a view to the co-ordination of efforts proposed or made for preserving public health. The department is also authorized to deal with questions relating to the conservation of child life and child welfare generally; the inspection and medical care of immigrants; the supervision, as regards the public health, of railways, boats, ships and all methods of transportation; the supervision of federal public buildings and offices with regard to the health of civil servants and other Government employees therein; the enforcement of the regulations of the International Joint Commission promulgated pursuant to the treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the prevention of the pollution of boundary waters; and the administration of certain statutes mentioned in the schedule now being administered by other departments. Provision is also made for the appointment of a Dominion Council of Health, of which the Deputy Minister of Public Health is to be chairman; the council to be composed of the chief executive officers of the Provincial Health Departments and three other persons to be named by the Governor in Council.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

*Mr. PREVOST:

1. For what reason does the Reading Room of the House of Commons no longer contain certain publications which heretofore were therein found, namely: L'Illustration, of Paris; the Monde Illustré, of Paris; the Journal des Débats, of Paris; the Matin of Paris; the Courrier des Etats-Unis, and the Canadian Record?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to secure said newspapers and reviews for the use of the Members of the House of Commons?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed by the Clerk of the House, who has made inquiry, that the Paris Matin and the Canadian Record have never been on the list of publications in the reading room of the House of Commons. The other papers mentioned in the question were on the list for years, but during the war they ceased to come, for some reason, it is supposed, connected with the war. With respect to the second part of the question I shall be very happy to confer with any hon. member who may desire additional papers to be added to the reading room list.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

*Mr. PREVOST:

1. Has the Royal Commission, appointed to inquire into and report upon the commercial possibilities of the Georgian Bay Canal, on the 18th of March, 1914, completed its work.

2. If so, when will the report be submitted to the House?

3. If not, is said Commission, which was appointed five years ago, expediting its work diligently so that a final report may be presented at a very early date?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL: In reply to 1, 2, and 3, instructions were given under Order in Council of 6th October, 1914, that as much data as possible be gathered with respect to the industrial and commercial aspects of the project, and the collection of such information was entrusted to the Chairman W Sanford Evans until sufficient progress be made to enable the holding of public sittings by the Commission. Such data was compiled and three reports were submitted, printed and laid before Parliament, but on account of the war, there were no public hearings.

INTERNED ENEMY ALIENS.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka):

1. Is it true that enemy aliens interned in Canada are permitted to sue and trade the same as Canadian citizens?
2. What is the amount of property held in Canada by alien enemies and is it being investigated?
3. If so, by whom and on what authority?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. No.

2. Estimated value of property reported to Custodian and Department of Secretary of State, $38,000,000.

3. Under the Consolidated Orders respecting Trading with the Enemy, persons managing or holding property of alien enemies were required to notify the Custodian thereof, and persons owing money to alien enemies which would be payable if a state of war did not exist were required to pay the same to the Custodian. Action was taken to publish as widely as possible the effect of these orders. Under the said orders the Secretary of State is authorized to make investigations where trading with the enemy was suspected, and under the provisions of the orders investigations have been made in every case where a suspicion was raised of any contravention of the orders. By Order in Council dated the 11th of November, 1918, published in the Canada Gazette of the 14th of December, 1918, the Enemy Debts Committee was constituted, consisting of: the Secretary of State of Canada, an officer of the Department of Finance named by the Minister of Finance, and an officer of the Department of Justice, named by the Minister of Justice, and that the following act upon that committee: the Under Secretary of State, Mr. J. R. Forsyth for the Custodian, and Mr. C. C. Robinson for the Department of Justice. The committee is proceeding with the investigation required by the said Order in Council, and has advertised its terms widely, asking for reports of all alien enemy property held in Canada.

4. What was the total expenditure in connection with the previous National Registration Act?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING EXPENSES.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What do the printing expenses of the Government amount to?
2. Why is not all the printing of the Government done by the King's Printer?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1918, $2,569,559.73.

2. For various reasons:

(a) The flow of Government printing work not being regular at all times, gluts of work occur in some or all of the departments, and when it is felt delivery cannot be made in time, the work is sent outside.

(b) Some of the departments are under capacity in equipment, for instance, the press room; some of the work has to be sent to outside firms for execution.

(c) The Printing Bureau is not equipped to manufacture electrotypes, half-tones, line cuts, zinc cuts and engravings of all descriptions; it is not equipped to do lithographic work (maps, cheques, certificates and other commercial work, etc., etc.), or to do all of the specialty printing work. These classes of jobs have also to be sent outside.

4. If so, what has been their findings, and has any action been taken?

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes, a Court of Inquiry was held on November 8, 1918, by order of the General Officer Commanding Military District No. 5, inquiring into and reporting upon the administration and conduct of the various temporary hospitals.

4. The findings are as follows:

"The court having heard the evidence and after visiting the temporary military hospitals at the Drill Hall, Quebec, and at Levis Armouries, is of the opinion that:

"The buildings selected for these temporary hospitals were the most suitable available under the circumstances.

"The equipment, including drugs and medical supplies, were adequate.

" The food supplied was in sufficient quantity and of good quality and suitable.

"The organization of these two temporary hospitals was completely developed under unexpected circumstances, and there was no undue delay in completing this organization.

The sanitary condition of these two hospitals was at all times satisfactory.

"The A.D.M.S. M.D. No. 5, who was responsible for the organization of these hospitals, and Lt.-Colonel E. A. Lebel, C.A M.C., Officer Commanding Quebec Military Hospital, have shown much attention to the organization and administration of these hospitals, and the work of the personnel and V.A.D.'s have shown remarkable devotion in their duties and given their best endeavours to carry out their tasks towards all patients.

From evidence adduced there seems no question but that all the patients received skilful treatment, good care and nursing while under care in these hospitals, and the court finds no cause for complaint in any manner whatever."

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE VACANCIES.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Did the Civil Service Commission advertise for applications for the positions of executive head and four assistants in connection with the war loans in the Department of Finance? If so, when and how many applications were received?

2. Did the Finance Department subsequently request the Civil Service Commission to make no appointments to these positions? If so, when was such request made and why?

3. Have appointments to any or all of the above positions been made? If so, when, by whom, and what are the names of the persons appointed?

4. Were any of the applicants for the above positions or any of the appointees returned soldiers?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes; August 8th, 1918; for executive head, 81; for four assistants, 232.

2 and 3. On 30th July, 1918, the department, in order to build up an organization to carry on the Victory Loan campaign, 1918, without having to lean too heavily on the department proper, wrote the Civil Service Commission to secure the services of a first class executive head and four or five accountants. The department emphasized the necessity of the immediate employment of these officials, because they must obtain a working knowledge of the arrangements to be made for the flotation of the loan.

The 1918 Victory Loan was to be issued on a very different basis from previous issues. The bonds were to be printed and furnished to all branches of the various banks before the campaign opened so that immediately on full payment of subscriptions the coupon bonds could be handed out at once to the subscribers and the fully registered bonds as soon as the required registration could be made in the books of the Finance Department.

The Civil Service Commission advertised for applications for above mentioned positions in the Canada Gazette of August 8, 1918, calling for the filing of applications not later than September 12 next but extending the time for one week for candidates from British Columbia, thus fixing the date for closing the lists as September 19, 1918.

It became necessary for the department to take very prompt action in the direction of making all preparations for the issue of a very extensive loan, the plans of the Dominion Executive Committee being so far advanced as to require a conference arranged for the 20th August between the subcommittee and officers of the department to effect final arrangements of all details. As the commission was not in a position, until after the 19th of September, to furnish officials required for this work the services of the officers of the department who directed the work of previous loans were utilized. It was eventually deemed more advisable to delegate one of these officials to take complete charge of the carrying out of such arrangements rather than rely at such a late date on the services of a new and untried appointee. To assist him in this work, the department availed themselves of the services of four expert men loaned by the Victory Loan organizations in Toronto and Montreal to, as it were, represent them in the work. These officers, whose names are as follows, were loaned to us from the organizations from the dates mentioned: Arthur Paterson, October 16, 1918; Thomas Holloway, October 16, 1918; James R. Adams, October 16, 1918; George E. Elliott, October 24, 1918.

Their services will be required until the final adjustment of the loan. They receive remuneration from the department at the rate of $2,500 per annum each, being the amount of remuneration offered for assistants in the advertisement of the Civil Service Commission.

On the 5th December, 1918, the Deputy Minister of Finance wrote the Civil Service Commission in connection with the employment of the above and asked for certificates for such employment which were issued by the commission and forwarded to the department.

MAIL CARRIERS' BONUSES.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Were the bonuses, recently given to the mail carriers of the Dominion, all of the same amount, or were said bonuses of a higher amount for the mail carriers of the western provinces than those paid to the mail carriers of the Province of Quebec?

2. If so, what were the amounts of the bonuses paid to the mail carriers of the western provinces, and of the Province of Quebec, respectively?

3. Why were the amounts less in the case of the Province of Quebec mail carriers than those of the western provinces?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. No.

2. Letter Carriers in the Western Provinces were given an allowance of $100 from April 1, 1917, and an additional allowance of $200 from April 1, 1918, making a total of $300, in addition to the allowance of $180 which they have been receiving for a great number of years, and those east of the Great Lakes were given an allowance of $100 from April 1, 1917, and $250 from April 1, 1918, making a total of $350.

3. For a number of years postal employees west of Sault Ste. Marie have been given $180 living allowance in addition to their regular salaries by reason of the presumed increased cost of living in the West, but no corresponding allowance was made to those living east of Sault Ste. Marie. When therefore, the additional allowance or bonus of $200 from April 1, 1918, was given to the letter carriers in Western Canada, a bonus of $250 was given to those east of Sault Ste. Marie, being $50 in excess of those in the West.

PAYMENTS TO SIR CHARLES FITZPATRICK.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the amount of $5,000 received by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick for the fiscal years 1915-16 and 1916-17 to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, should be returned by the said Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to the Treasury of Canada forthwith.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to recall the circumstances to the minds of hon. gentlemen who were present last session when a discussion took place on this subject? The circumstances in connection with this motion, the payment of $2,500 to cover the expenses of the Chief Justice of Canada in connection with attending meetings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, dates back to 1897, I think, when, at the suggestion of the then Minister of Justice (the late Sir Oliver Mowat) that amount of money was placed in the Estimates for the specific purpose of meeting the travelling expenses of the Chief Justice when performing the journeys referred to. From 1897 until a few years ago the item always appeared in the Estimates in exactly the language which I have stated. No variation was made in that language until the fiscal year 1915-16, when the wording was somewhat changed. Previously the vote had invariably read "Travelling expenses attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council." In the fiscal year 1915-16 the wording of the vote was made "Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council." I am aware that apologists for the respectable raid which has been made on the treasury to the extent of $5,000 will find in the wording of the vote—in its technical or legal phraseology—a loophole for an excuse for the payment of this money. I submit, however, that there can be no doubt that the express object for which this money was granted was to cover the travelling expenses of the Chief Justice when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If the Chief Justice did not attend these sittings he would incur no travelling expenses, and there would be no justification for his taking advantage of this vote. The Chief Justice rather seems to have held that view himself at one time. When I first brought this matter up in the House on 13th May, 1918, the Ottawa papers the next morning contained an interview in which Sir Charles Fitzpatrick characterized my statement that he had received this money when he did not go overseas as absolutely untrue. In the interview in question that gentleman used these words, as reported in the press:

When I do not go to London of course I do not receive the money.

I proceeded then to show from the Auditor General's Report that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had received money for travelling expenses, although he had not gone overseas in the two years referred to. On the 15th May, 1918, the Prime Minister without comment read to the House a statement which he announced had been placed in his hands by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. The statement drew attention to the fact that the wording of the vote in the fiscal years 1915-16 and 1916-17 had been changed to "Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council," instead of reading as formerly "Travelling expenses for attending sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council." I hold myself responsible, as a member of this House, for allowing this vote for this purpose to pass for the two years in question. In common with very many other members of the House I was present at that time, but I excuse myself for not raising objection to the vote on the ground that ever since 1897 this money had been voted without dispute, and the purpose of the vote was taken for granted. But, Sir, after I found out that the gentleman concerned had not gone overseas and had not performed the service for which the money was undoubtedly voted, after I found out that we had made a mistake in passing this vote in those terms, I do not feel like adding to my mistake an offence; because if I were to allow Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to retain, without question on my part, money for which he had given no service whatever to the country, I should be condoning what I regard as absolutely wrong. I do not propose to do that, consequently, I am making the present motion.

But, Sir, I did not think it would be necessary to bring this matter up in this House at all after what transpired last session. When we were in Committee of Supply, as will be found by reference to page 2507 of last year's Hansard, I asked if the Chief Justice had repaid, or would do so, this $5,000. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George E. Foster) who was overseeing the Estimates, said that an answer would be given later in the evening, and for the time being the item was allowed to stand. Later on the same evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce brought the item forward again, but at my request allowed it to stand until the statement which he had promised was produced. I said in explanation of my request:

> But the fact that, in my judgment, five thousand dollars of the money of Canada has been taken out of the treasury by a man who happens to be Chief Justice of the Dominion of Canada, warrants me in saying that I will not consent to the passage of another item of $2,500 to that gentleman until I know that the money—

—that is, the $5,000 in question—

> —will be refunded.

Again the item stood, and when we came back to it a little later the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave a summary of the statement which he had promised earlier in the evening to give, and which I take it from reading Hansard he was authorized by the Chief Justice to give. I commend to your consideration a portion of that statement, the full text of which will be found on page 2536 of Hansard. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> Sir Charles Fitzpatrick contends that he was entirely justified under the circumstances in accepting the allowance for the two years during which he visited London.

That is entirely true.

> But with reference to the last two years—

That is, the fiscal years 1916 and 1917.

> —as it appears to be the wish of the House that these amounts should be returned, he says—

That is, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick says, > —that he is quite willing to return them.

I thought, Sir, when I had that statement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce expressing the words of the then Chief Justice of Canada, that I had an assurance which would make it unnecessary for me to refer to this matter again.

As soon as I received that assurance from the Minister of Trade and Commerce I withdrew any objection to the voting of the $2,500 for the next fiscal year. That is to say, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, having given the assurance of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick that this $5,000 would be returned, obtained $2,500 from this House for the purpose of paying the travelling expenses of the Chief Justice when he went overseas. Now, Sir, I am informed that that $5,000 has not been returned.

I am not a lawyer, Sir, and therefore am at a great disadvantage in arguing a case of this kind where a lawyer is concerned; but I think I have heard of such a thing as getting money under false pretences, and I do not know but what I will have the right to have the Minister of Trade and Commerce arrested for obtaining money under false pretences, because the committee did not consent to the $2,500 being voted until he had given the assurance from the mouth of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick himself that the $5,000 would be returned.

Now, Sir, the late right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in discussing this matter in the House on that occasion used these words:

> This item goes back to 1897. It was for travelling expenses. It appeared in the Estimates in that form until 1915 or 1916, when the item was changed from "travelling expenses" to "special allowances." Under this the Chief Justice received his travelling expenses to attend the court, when, in fact, he had not attended the court.

Of course, we are all aware of the fact that about the time that wording was changed it was not quite so healthy to travel across the seas as it had formerly been; the submarine menace was growing all the time. I do not know whether the former Chief Justice of Canada was a good swimmer or not, but at all events he apparently found it safer to stay on this side of the water—and he did stay on this side of the water. My contention is that, having stayed on this side of the water, he should not have drawn the $5,000 which he did draw, and which I say this House voted with the intention that it was to cover his expenses when he went overseas.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to use any strong language in referring to this matter; perhaps if I did Bourinot would step in and guarantee immunity to the gentleman to whom I refer. Bourinot does step in as a guarantor of immunity to certain men when they happen to occupy exalted positions in this country. There is more in this matter, Mr. Speaker, than the sum of $5,000. If there was one person more than another in the Dominion of Canada whose every action should have been beyond the slightest question, that person was the one holding the highest judicial position in the gift of the Dominion of Canada. I regret very much that the former Chief Justice of Canada has not lived up to his intention of last session as announced to this House by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do not know why he has not done so, but I can only come to this conclusion, that he must be in some doubt as to whether the members of this House think he should hand this money back, and the only way that I know of to remove that doubt is to get an expression of opinion from the members of the House on this motion, and that is what I propose to do this afternoon.

How can we as representatives of the people go back to our constituents and say that we have acted here in their interests in endeavouring to put down corruption or graft of whatever form or from whatever source, if we allow a man who occupies an exalted position in the country to pocket $5,000 for which he has never given one dollar's worth of service.

A short time ago we were told in this House that the prison doors were yawning to receive the profiteers and grafters of Canada. Yawning precedes sleep, and I suppose that this yawning is the physical manifestation preceding a somnolent condition. We must be asleep when our money is taken improperly by some one holding a high position. We have to answer for this to our constituents. Whether a man be the Chief Justice of Canada or a peasant, he has no right to receive money for which he has given no service. What service has Sir Charles Fitzpatrick rendered to Canada for the $5,000 which he received in those two years? Some members of the Government may deem it their duty to attempt to justify the receiving of this money by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick on the ground that it was voted by Parliament. I do not think that that would be good ground for the Government to take. Why not be fair with the general public? One does not add to his status as a man by refusing to acknowledge a mistake after he has made it; he certainly does not improve his position if he converts that mistake into an offence, and that is what I would feel I was doing if I permitted this gentleman to retain $5,000 for which he has given no service to the country.

This money was voted year after year for the purpose of paying the travelling expenses of the Chief Justice of Canada when he attended the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. No objection is made to his receiving that money during the years that he did go across the seas, but during the years that he did not go, he should not have received the money. I believe that the great majority of the people will support my view that, having received the money, it is his duty to return it to the treasury of Canada.

Mr. JOHN BEST (Dufferin): Mr. Speaker, I intend to support the resolution, because if men holding high positions in Canada who get money that they did not earn or obtain money under false pretences are allowed to hold the money and go scot-free, how shall we prosecute the poor man, woman, boy or girl who steals because he or she is cold or hungry? I hope the Government will not condone any such action simply because the man in question holds a high position. Much of the unrest in Canada to-day is caused by just such actions as this. The poor man and the poor woman have the idea that because a man holds a high position he can get away with any amount of money. I hope the Government will see that this money is returned, as it should be if it was not earned.

Mr. PROULX: The member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said that the wording of the resolution appropriating these sums of money was changed in 1915. Was that change made by the Government on its own initiative, or at the request of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick?

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: (Acting Minister of Justice): The resolution which the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has brought to the attention of the House is of a character not only unusual, but involving upon this House a very deep responsibility. The adoption of the resolution unquestionably would very seriously challenge the personal honour of a citizen of Canada, and I am sure that no hon. member will feel like supporting it unless he is convinced that the necessity for the passing of the resolution is based upon the demands of reason and of justice.

The citizen involved is a man distinguished in our public life, I do not argue that on that account his honour should be any more jealously guarded against unjust aspersion by the House than should the honour of the most humble citizen of our country. But he is a citizen of Canada, and only upon the gravest cause should we take any step which would impugn his honour as a public man and as a citizen.

In order that the House may decide whether or not there is behind the resolution that principle which compels its adoption, that is whether or not the resolution is fair, just and right, it is necessary that I should review very hurriedly and briefly the circumstances connected with this matter. As I do so, what I say will be an answer to the question just addressed to the House by the member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx).

For some years the Appropriation Act of this Parliament contained a provision under which this House appropriated out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, $2,500. I ask the House to note the exact wording of the resolution making this appropriation:

Travelling expenses of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick attending sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.

In 1913-14 and 1914-15 the vote was put through in that form, and my information is that in those years the moneys were drawn by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick only when he actually attended the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and not otherwise.

In the Appropriation Act of 1915-16, the words employed were as follows:

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.

Precisely the same words were employed in the succeeding year, 1916-17, but for the following year, 1917-18, they were changed to read as follows.

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses when attending the sittings of the judicial committee of the Privy Council.

The House will observe that all three wordings are different. In the first, the word "allowance" is not used at all. The words employed are:

Travelling expenses . . . . attending sittings of the judicial committee.

In the second:

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with—

And in the third:

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses when attending—.

It is of the utmost importance that the House should have clearly in mind the three distinct wordings which the Parliament of Canada employed in voting the money in question. Under the first wording, while that was the language of Parliament, the money was drawn by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick only during the years that he attended the sittings of the judicial committee. Under the second wording, during those two years when it read simply: "to cover expenses in connection with—" Sir Charles Fitzpatrick drew the money although, as I am informed, he did not actually attend the sittings of the Judicial Committee. I am not sure what actually occurred in the succeeding year, but in that year he would clearly not have been entitled to draw the money unless he attended the sittings, because the wording is:

When attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Parliament is now requested to pass a resolution calling upon Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to return the money which he drew for the years 1915-16 and 1916-17. I am using only the language of moderation when I say that the House could not justify such a resolution upon any ground of its own mistake, upon any ground of wrongdoing whatsoever, unless that wrongdoing is attributable to the party who is to suffer. I am neither admitting nor denying mistakes on the part of this House. Parliament may have been mistaken, but the country must pay for the mistakes of Parliament—not a single individual. It is to the country we are responsible.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the minister think the Chief Justice should profit by the mistakes of Parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend will permit me to finish with the subject I am discussing, I will deal with that in a moment. Parliament has, in the history of this country, made many mistakes, as has every Parliament in the history of every country. Parliament has often voted money for which the country has not received the full equivalent in value. Sometimes Parliament has undoubtedly voted money for which the country has received no equivalent in value, and many instances could be cited of votes and actions on the part of this House where the country has not received full consideration for the money voted. We might, for example, go back to contracts made by this country in days gone by, contracts which to-day would, I think, by any dispassionate observer, be freely declared to have been improvident contracts on the part of this country, contracts by which this country suffered and in respect of which this country did not receive anything like the equivalent in value, and there have been instances in which no value whatever was received for the money voted. But in those cases I do not think Parliament would, for a moment, consider visiting the injury upon those who were parties to the contract. Suppose, for example, we were to go back to a contract made in 1903 and refuse to-day on behalf of the citizens of this country to recognize the legal rights that arose by virtue of that contract, such a course would be indefensible. I think, therefore, I am on safe and impregnable ground in asserting that whether Parliament made an error or not is not the question now. The question now is whether or not Parliament is justified in asking a man who, as a result of this appropriation, received money from this country, to return that money to the treasury of Canada. Parliament could pass such a resolution and could take that position only if the party receiving the money should not in honour have taken it, was not entitled to it, or used any dishonourable means to get it; if, in a word, circumstances of dishonour attached to the receiving itself. Is that the case here? What was the intent of Parliament in voting the money? What must Parliament now say frankly was its intent in voting the money in these words? It is to be noted that a change was made in the wording. The old language which made the resolution apply only if Sir Charles attended, and only for travelling expenses, was abandoned, and Parliament, rightly or wrongly, employed other language instead, voting that money as a special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee. Parliament has, in other cases, employed similar language. Parliament employed similar language even in the case of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick himself, in connection with his duties as administrator in the absence of the Governor General. The language in that case is:

Special allowance to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General.

My information with regard to the paying out and receiving of the latter money voted is that such was done in exactly the same way as in the case of the money paid out and received in connection with the appropriation now under discussion. My information is further that that language was employed in connection with the appropriation in question prior to the use of it in the present case. The question arises: Must Parliament now take the position of saying that, in changing its language and in using the language there employed, it did not intend that money to be drawn in the same way as in the previous case when the same precise words were used, but only when actual attendance on the Judicial Committee took place?

Mr MORPHY: Had Sir Charles Fitzpatrick any other duties than going overseas in connection with the Privy Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not hear the question of my hon. friend.

Mr. MORPHY: Had Sir Charles Fitzpatrick any duties that he could perform otherwise than by going overseas for the purpose?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not aware that he had. I see the point my hon. friend is making. The information given to me by the Department of Justice is that this allowance in connection with acting as deputy to the Governor General, has always been paid without inquiry at all as to whether any expenses were in fact incurred. This appropriation was in the same language, and evidently
3 p.m. was intended by Parliament in the same way. As to whether in the present instance consideration for the appropriation was actually given or not, it is quite true the same consideration could not be said to have been given as if Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had attended. But similarly, under the other vote, it is quite clear there might be cases,—I do not know whether there were or not,—in which it was not actually necessary for the Chief Justice of Canada to act as administrator of this country. It must, however, be kept in mind that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had to hold himself in readiness to go overseas, and it can quite forcibly be argued that the intention of Parliament was that an allowance should be made to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick either for attending, or in years when he did not attend, for holding himself in readiness. Before Parliament could be justified in passing a resolution which challenges the honour of a respected citizen of this country, Parliament should be fully convinced that there was moral wrongdoing on the part of the receiver of that money in taking the money so voted by Parliament under that wording, and it must remember that the same wording had been employed in other cases; and that no such course has ever previously been pursued.

Mr. BEST: Was the wording under which this money was paid out changed previously to the first year that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick did not attend the sittings, or at the end of the first year that he did not attend?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My information is that the first year that he did not go, but accepted the money, was subsequent to the change in wording. I am concerned with the legal aspect alone. My duty merely is to state the circumstances, and to ask Parliament to consider the principle which should inspire us in determining this question, and to point out that we should not be swerved from that principle by any but vital considerations, because, if there is one thing more vital than another it is that the Parliament of this country shall not lightly and for insufficient cause challenge the integrity of a citizen of this country.

Mr. DENIS: The minister has pointed out the three different wordings in the Estimates. I should like to know whether the money was voted, no matter what the wording may have been, with the specific object and intent of paying the travelling expenses of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The intent of the vote must be gathered from the wording of the vote itself. The intent in other cases of similar wording has been as actually shown by the result—the paying of the money, although the attendance did not necessarily take place.

Mr. PROULX: I think it is merely playing upon words to say that the Chief Justice should have drawn the money when he was not put to the expense of attendiing the sittings of the Privy Council. It seems evident from the three wordings that this money was voted for the specific purpose of defraying the expenses of the trip overseas and the stay in London of the Chief Justice, in order that he might attend the sittings of the Privy Council. I think it would have been preferable if the Chief Justice had been obliged to file a monthly account of his expenses, just as the judges have to do under the Judges' Act. However, Parliament decided to vote a lump sum, but it was certainly the intention of Parliament that this sum was for defraying the expenses of the Chief Justice while attending the sittings of the Privy Council, and the Chief Justice should have known that that was the intention of Parliament. I should like to know whether the wording of the resolution was changed by the Government with or without a request from the Chief Justice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know of no request.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What explanation has the minister to make with regard to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that this money would be returned by the Chief Justice?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps I should read his exact words. On Page 2479 of last year's Hansard, in answer to a question, the Minister of Trade and Commerce read a letter from Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, the last paragraph of which reads as follows:—

> If, however, it is now considered that the intentions of Parliament have been misunderstood I can only say that I shall be prepared to return the amount of the allowance received during the two years in question. My first object is to avoid all personal embarrassment to you.

In effect, that means that if Parliament —or the Government, I presume, to whom he was addressing the letter—considered that he had drawn that money against the intention of Parliament he was prepared to return it.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is not the paragraph to which my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) refers.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind hon. members that the House is in committee, and that the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) has the floor.

Mr. PROULX: The resolution in the Estimates of 1915-16 uses the word "expenses." It says: "Special allowance to cover expenses in connection with the sittings of the Privy Council." The wording of the resolution of the following year is a little different, because the words "when attending" are added. But both resolutions contain the word "expenses." I say that if the Chief Justice did not attend the sittings the money should not have been paid; I think the Department of Justice was negligent in not requiring a certificate showing the expenses incurred before paying the money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Department of Justice does not pay the money.

Mr. PROULX: Under the Judges' Act, the cheques are paid by the Justice Department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. PROULX: The certificates, at all events, go to that department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. PROULX: Do they go to the Auditor General?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the cheques.

Mr. PROULX: Then the Auditor General should have required a certificate that the Chief Justice had attended the sittings of the Privy Council. We have been paying money for which we have received no consideration. According to law, there must be consideration in every contract. If you give a promissory note, and no consideration passes, and you are sued for non-payment, you cannot be made to pay because there was no consideration. In this particular case, there might be difficulty in getting back the money. The minister says that Parliament made a mistake. I do not admit that Parliament made a mistake. I think the intention of Parliament was clearly expressed by the word "expenses," and I say that the Government was negligent in paying this money. I understand that last spring Sir Charles Fitzpatrick offered to return the money, and I certainly think it is the duty of the Government to request a refund of the amounts paid for which there was no consideration given. The Government are the trustees of the people, and they should take care of the people's money which is entrusted to them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I quite agree with the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen), that the House should give most earnest consideration to this matter and have all the facts before it so far as possible, before supporting this resolution. I have given the question some attention by way of making careful inquiry in my own department and in the Department of the Privy Council with a view to ascertaining precisely what happened in connection with the changed wording in the Estimates of 1915-16. The Acting Minister of Justice has referred to the payment of the special allowance by the Finance Department upon the requisition of the Department of the Privy Council, of which the Prime Minister of Canada is the head.

As a result of my inquiry I have come to the conclusion that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick accepted this money in entire good faith, and I feel bound to say so to this House. I asked the Deputy Minister of Finance (Mr. T. C. Boville) for a statement of the matter which he has presented to me in a memorandum that reads as follows:

Department of Finance,
Ottawa, Canada, March 26, 1919.

Memorandum respecting Sir Charles Fitzpatrick.

In 1912-13 the sum of $2,000 was voted under the heading "Miscellaneous" for "Travelling expenses to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council."

The sum of $2,500 was voted in each of the years 1913-14 and 1914-15 in the same wording for the service in those years.

The amount for 1912-13 was paid in two sums.

In 1913-14 the vote was not expended.

The amount in 1914-15 was paid in one sum on June 15, 1914.

In these three years it will be noticed that the allowance was to cover the travelling expenses of Sir Charles when attending the sittings of the committee.

When the estimates for 1916 were being prepared the wording of the item was changed so as to read,

"Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council."

This change in the wording of the vote was conveyed to the undersigned in January, 1915, by the Secretary to the Prime Minister who asked that the vote be amended to read in the same way as the vote for expenses in connection with the services of the Deputy of the Governor General, which, being in the nature of a special allowance, was paid monthly.

The effect of this change in the wording of the vote was to convert what had hitherto been a vote for travelling expenses for Sir Charles when attending the Committee into a grant which might be paid to him apart altogether from his attendance on the committee.

The expenditure of the vote naturally fell under the administration of the Privy Council Office, and was applied for month by month by that office in the ordinary process through the office of the Auditor General, who interpreted the vote as above, and authorized the payment month by month. The allowance was so paid during the years 1915-16 and 1916-17. Thereafter it was changed to read,

"Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses when attending the sittings of Judicial Committee of the Privy Council."

(Sgd.) T. C. Boville.

Now, a question has been raised as to what was the intention of Parliament and of the Government in this matter. I do not recollect distinctly concerning the change that was made; it is not in my memory that the matter was specially called to my attention at that time. I cannot say what the intentions of Parliament were, but of course those intentions would be gathered from the language in which Parliament expressed itself; and that language was contained in the Estimate, which my deputy points out was handed to him by the private secretary of the Prime Minister. I think it must be admitted that the deliberate change in the wording must have been intended to have some significance, else why would it have been made? I would ask the House to note that the item deliberately omitted the words "attending sittings," which had appeared in previous years as a limitation on the use of the amount, and also the qualifying word "travelling," which had formerly appeared in connection with the word "expenses."

Mr. PROULX: I would like the minister to observe that in the year 1916 the word—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member may rise to ask a question with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor, but for no other purpose.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The memorandum which I have for the year 1916 is this: "Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses—"

Mr. PROULX: Is it for the next year?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The question is raised whether, if the word "expenses" occurred in the item, the money could be paid unless the expenses had been actually incurred and vouched for. On a certain assumption it undoubtedly could. It might have been the intention of those responsible for the change in the item that the vote should be an average vote of $2,500 per year for expenses. If the expenses exceeded the amount the Government would vote no more, and if they fell below the amount it would still be paid. Now, I would draw the attention of the House to what the late Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said respecting this matter during last session. He was dealing with the question of a vote which purported to cover expenses and yet which was paid to the party to whom the money was voted, irrespective of whether or not the actual expenditure had been incurred. At page 2599 of last year's Hansard (unrevised) the late leader of the Opposition is reported as follows:

> This special allowance to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to pay his travelling and other expenses while attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council goes back to the days when Sir Oliver Mowat was Minister of Justice. At that time the then Chief Justice, Sir Henry Strong, went to England, to sit as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council under an Act which had been passed by the Imperial Parliament inviting judges of colonial courts to sit with the members of the Judicial Committee. Their services were required especially for colonial cases. The Government of that day, at the instance of Sir Oliver Mowat, placed an item in the Estimates of $2,500 to cover the travelling expenses of the Chief Justice. I do not remember the exact wording of the item, but it was to pay the travelling expenses of the Chief Justice while attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or some such wording as that. This item goes back to 1897. It was for travelling expenses. It appeared in the Estimates in that form until 1915 or 1916, when the item was changed from "travelling expenses" to "special allowance." Why this change was made from "Travelling expenses" to "Special allowance" I do not know.

Then further on the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:—

> It so happened that in one or two years the Chief Justice was not called upon to attend a sitting of the Judicial Committee, and in those years he had received the money. If the item had been left as it was before with the wording "travelling expenses" the money could only have been paid when there were travelling expenses, but it was changed to "special allowance," and there the matter stands to-day.

The position therefore is that the Government, which is responsible for the bringing down of the Estimates, changed the wording which had prevailed up to 1915-16, and which covered the travelling expenses of the Chief Justice when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to special allowance to cover expenses. I am advised, and believe, that the payment which was made by the Finance Department was legally and regularly made. That was the view of the Auditor General, who authorized the payment, and it was the view of the Privy Council officials who obtained the money from the Finance Department. My own view is—although I do not recollect the matter distinctly, I have had a good deal on my mind since 1915—that it was the intention that that language should be changed so as to authorize the payment to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick month by month. I do not pretend to say what was in the minds of other members of the Government, but reviewing the situation in the light of what I am informed by the responsible officials was done—the change in language which was made at the instance of the private secretary to the Prime Minister—I am of the opinion that the intention was to assimilate, or practically assimilate, this to the language of the vote to the Deputy Governor, and that the money was paid out by the Government and received by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick on that basis. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick received those payments monthly. He might have gone overseas in September, having received monthly payments from the end of March, or the first of April rather, the beginning of the fiscal year, up to that time, and continued to receive the monthly payments after that. His expenses might have been more than $2,500. If they had been, he would not have been entitled to receive any money in excess of the $2,500 which was specially voted. If, on the other hand, he did not go Overseas, then he was not to account for the money. Now, I do not say that that was the intention of the Government, or of any members of the Government, because my recollection of the circumstances is imperfect, but it is a possible explanation; and I cannot understand why the language of the item was changed from what it was in 1914-15 to what it was in 1915-16 unless there had been the intention to make a change. Why would the change have been made in the language if there was no intention of change? I am driven to the conclusion—

An hon. MEMBER: To get the appropriation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not speaking about the actual expenses incurred in attending the meetings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; what I am talking about is the change which undoubtedly took place in the language of this item.

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): I can explain that to the Acting Prime Minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will have an opportunity of explaining it later. The hon. gentleman will pardon me, I have no desire to prevent him from asking me a question.

Mr. GAUVREAU: When the hon. gentleman has concluded I will give my explanation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Now I have received this telegram from Sir Charles Fitzpatrick:

Quebec, March 25, 1919.

Sir Thos. White,
Actg. Prime Minister,
Ottawa, Ont.

You are at liberty to state when Mr. Edwards moves his resolution that I adhere to the explanation given in my letter to Sir Robert Borden and which was read in the House last session in answer to Mr. Nickle's questions. I then offered to return the money and I now repeat that if the Government or any of the officials through whom the money was paid will say that there is any doubt as to the regularity or legality of such payments I am prepared to return the money.

C. Fitzpatrick.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): That is not what he said last year

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have simply read the telegram which I received this morning.

Sir SAM HUGHES: To what officials does Sir Charles Fitzpatrick refer in his telegram?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I presume he would mean the officials who had to do with the paying out of the money, including the Auditor General. Now, permit me to make my position clear. I have stated that I believe that this money was paid out legally and regularly. I have also stated that I believe the money was received in good faith by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. I cannot speak as to what the intentions of Parliament were, except in so far as can be gathered from the language of the item which was passed by Parliament. It is for Parliament to say what its intentions were, if it so desires, with respect to this matter. I have endeavoured to make a clear statement of the facts, as I understand them, because I think the facts should be before Parliament, and if any of my statements are in error, or if there are other facts which I have not been able to ascertain by inquiry, and which are in the possession of any hon. member, I shall be only too glad if he will bring them forward for the information of the House in coming to a decision, because it is for Parliament to decide, on this important subject.

Mr. JOHN BEST (Dufferin): I understood from the memorandum which the Acting Prime Minister read that the wording of this vote was changed in 1911?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In 1915-16.

Mr. BEST: If Sir Charles Fitzpatrick drew money from the first of April, 1915, to the first of April, 1916, he did so for at least one year under the old wording?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think not, because the Estimates are voted in advance.

Mr. C A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouta): When the Chief Justice of Canada was empowered to sit on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the wording of the estimate to cover his expenses was "travelling expenses." It was discussed between the Minister of Justice and Sir Charles Fitzpatrick that perhaps some day he would not be obliged to go, but that he would like to draw the money all the same. Then it was understood that the Minister of Justice would change the phraseology of the item under which, instead of "travelling expenses" the word "allowance" was used. The Minister of Justice adopted that word because he was a little scared that some of his best friends, like the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) would kick against the vote. Thus under the term "allowance" even if the Chief Justice did not attend the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council he could draw the money voted. This is the explanation I have to give to the House.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with what the Acting Minister of Justice says, that the matter under discussion this afternoon should be approached with all the seriousness that this House can muster, because if the House should decide—and certainly no matter whether the House decides or not—that this money should be repaid, there is a certain reflection on the former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court in the fact of this discussion taking place this afternoon. The Acting Minister of Justice says that we should be particularly careful because the reputation of a man who occupies, and has occupied, a particularly high place in Canadian national life is under review. But I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that it was thought that Cæsar's wife should be beyond suspicion because she was Cæsar's wife, and those who occupy high positions should be particularly careful to see that not even the shadow of a suspicion is cast over their lives, and certainly the fountain of justice should be careful to see that the waters of justice are in no way discoloured.

I do not agree with the Acting Minister of Justice when he says that the passing of this resolution will necessarily mean that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick committed a moral wrong when he took the money. I am sure the Acting Minister of Justice feels, as does every member of this House, that it would be a ridiculous contention, a contention that no court would uphold, that no lawyer would endeavour to sustain, that the misreading of an Act of Parliament—not intentionally misread, but misread in an honest belief—would be considered as fraudulent intent as distinct from misapprehension I am quite prepared to admit that if the former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court knew that the estimate, which is in effect a statute, did not and could not have carried the meaning that he put into it, then it was a fraudulent thing for him to have taken the money, and morally wrong. But if the Chief Justice believed that he had a right to take the money, then this House in asking him to return it is not saying that he did that which was in itself morally wrong, but is taking him at his own word when he told us in the letter to the Prime Minister, read by the Minister of Trade and Commerce last session, that if his view of the intention of Parliament was mistaken he was prepared to return the money to this House and to the country. And it is on that argument in part that I purpose this afternoon to direct my remarks.

What was the intention of Parliament? The Acting Minister of Justice says that that is the test which must be applied in discussing and deciding this matter. The Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) takes practically the same point of view. Now, what was the intention of Parliament, and how are we to reach a conclusion as to what it was? I would like to direct the attention of the House to this matter in some detail, because, as I said, Sir, in rising, this is an important matter—it is a matter that probably will have a wider bearing than those of us who are taking part in this discussion this afternoon have any idea. For I am satisfied that from one end of the country to the other the public have their eye on this discussion and on this vote. That is the conclusion I have reached from what I have heard in my own constituency and the questions that have been asked me in reference to the matter.

The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier told the House that in 1897—if my memory of dates does not fail me—the original vote was passed for the purpose of allowing the late Chief Justice Strong of the Supreme Court to go to England and attend the Privy Council. Regardless of what the original intention of the vote was, the vote from 1907 until 1914 was couched in this language:

Travelling expenses of Sir H. E. Taschereau—

Or Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, as the case might be.

—attending sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

That contemplated a journey being taken by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and it contemplated his expenses being paid in reference to that journey. In 1911 that was the form of the vote, in 1912 it was the same, the same again in 1913, and the same language was used in 1914. In 1915 the vote was made to read as follows, and it will be found as item 320 of that year's Estimates:

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

There was a change in the language, certain words were omitted from this vote, as the Acting Minister of Justice has said, and there was a change in the phraseology in that the words "attending sittings of the Judicial Committee" were left out.

How are you going to judge what was the intention of Parliament when that vote came before it? Now, Sir, the position I am taking this afternoon I am taking as having been a member of the House when that vote went through. If it went through and I misunderstood what the House meant, then I am prepared to take the responsibility that must be mine, because even if I were desirous of doing so I cannot evade it. But as the Acting Minister of Justice says, the question is: What was the intention of Parliament?

You can tell the way the wind blows very often by the direction of the smoke from the chimney tops, and you can tell the direction of the current by the straws that float upon the surface of the water, and I would draw the attention of this House to the fact that in the Sessional Papers of 1915 at page 92 this language is found:

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Then there follow two perpendicular parallel columns, the first column headed 1914-1915 and below that the sum of $2,500; and the next column headed 1915-1916 and below it another sum of $2,500. That means to you, Sir, and to me and to every member of this House that when these Estimates were brought in the apparent intention was not that there was to be a new vote for a totally different thing, but that the old vote was being revoted and the purpose of the vote for 1914-1915 was being carried forward in 1915-1916.

But, Sir, I am not going to stop at that. The hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) often asks questions. In 1915 on the 19th day of March when he asked a question in this House, I very much doubt, Sir, if he understood how much light it might throw on the discussion that is taking place this afternoon. In column 1250 of Hansard for 1915 the following appears:

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.

Mr. PROULX: How many trips to London does the Chief Justice make each year?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He usually goes twice, so far as my memory serves me.

Notice the language, Sir. In answer to that question the right hon. the leader of the Government did not say that Sir Charles Fizpatrick went twice; the member for Prescott did not ask how many times Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had been in the habit of going to London, he asked the Prime Minister: "How many trips to London 'does' the Chief Justice make each year." "Does" is the present tense; it means something that is or is to be done. Sir Robert Borden answered: "He usually goes twice, so far as my memory serves me," That implied that the practice had been that the Chief Justice went twice to England, but the question of the member for Prescott and the answer of the Prime Minister, taken in conjunction with the fact to which I have just referred, certainly meant that this House had reason to suppose—and I as a member of this House did suppose—that that $2,500 was being voted for identically the same purpose as the votes which had been passed from 1911 until that year—and these are the years that I have been in this House.

Let us go further. I realized that it was a question that should be considered seriously, and after the member for Frontenac first introduced the subject into the House I was not satisfied with the answers given by the members of the Government who replied to the question or with the answers given to the public by the Chief Justice through the press. I placed on Hansard a series of questions, which I propose to read to the House, together with the answers given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). If you turn to Hansard of 1918, pages 2478 and 2479, you will find the following:

Mr. NICKLE:

1. Is it the intention of the Government, in the event of voluntary repayment not being made by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick of the $5,000 paid to him to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for the fiscal years 1915-1916 and 1916-1917, and not incurred nor disbursed, to take steps to recover this amount?

To which the answer was:

1. No. In view of criticism made in the House of Commons, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has offered to return the amount mentioned although he strongly urges that he is legally entitled thereto under the Act of Parliament which authorized the payment. In this opinion the Department of Finance and the Auditor General concur.

The second question was: "If not, why not?" To which the answer was: "Answered by No. 1." The third question was:

3. Does the explanation given by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick in the memorandum read to the House by the Prime Minister on May 15, for the acceptance of the said sum, express the practice and policy of the Government?

To which the following answer was given:

3. The explanation referred to as given by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick does not purport to express any practice or policy on the part of the Government but merely the views of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick as to the effect of the legislation governing the payment of the allowance and his rights thereunder. In this connection the following additional letter has been received by the Prime Minister from Sir Charles Fitzpatrick:

"My Dear Prime Minister,—May I trouble you again with reference to the payments made to me as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, to which objection has been taken by two or three members of the House of Commons as having been accepted by me contrary to the terms of the Parliamentary appropriation which authorized them.

"Dealing first with the 'special allowance to the Chief Justice to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General'; as you are aware, during the early years of Confederation, the rule assigned to the Administrator one-half of the Governor General's salary. Subsequently this provision was considered neither just nor advantageous when applied to a Governor General when absent from his Government for a brief period either on leave or on the public service. As a result the emolument was reduced, about 1875, from one-half to one-fourth. In 1906 the question was again reconsidered and it was then decided that it did not comport with the dignity of the high office of Representative of the Sovereign in this country to make abatements of his salary and the regulations which authorized them were revised so as to provide that in case the Governor General of Canada was absent for a period of thirty days consecutively there should be no reduction of his salary for reason of such absence. In 1907, another change was made which provides that in any case of absence although exceeding thirty days no deduction should be made for the period of twenty-nine days.

"Subsequently it was thought proper that the Administrator should receive a fixed sum of $2,500 in lieu of those allowances. At a later date the Government thought proper to increase this allowance from $2,500 to $5,000. That this latter amount was voted with the sanction and approval of Parliament cannot be doubted. For two years, the amount was put in the estimates and voted in the regular way and paid without protest. In the estimates for 1917-18 as originally brought down that special allowance was reduced to $2,500, but on the 19th September, 1917, as will be seen on reference to Hansard, p. 6049, an item was introduced in the supplementary estimates 'to complete the special allowance for the Chief Justice so as to make it equal to that allowed the previous years, $5,000.' This did not pass unnoticed. Mr. Edwards, M.P., drew attention to this increase and asked for an explanation, which explanation was given by Mr. Reid, the minister in charge of the estimates, who said it had always been the custom to pay this amount to the Chief Justice, 'and the Government feel that as he has been receiving $5,000 for the position it is hardly fair to reduce it at the present time.' It was also intimated that the payment was made partly for the purpose of implementing the salary of the Chief Justice. Although the allowance is made to me personally I have always paid over the proportion due to the senior puisne judge of this court who has acted as administrator during my absence.

"Dealing now with the two payments of $2,500 each, made to me as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, one during the fiscal year 1915-16 and the other during the fiscal year 1917-18.

"The amounts in question were voted by Parliament as 'special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council'—the provision in regard to 'travelling expenses' attending sittings of the Judicial Committee, which was a condition of payment in previous years, having been intentionally omitted—and were paid in monthly instalments on application from the Privy Council office to the Auditor General who evidently certified in the usual course that the cheques asked for might be properly issued by the Finance Department.

"I perhaps never gave the matter as much consideration as I ought to have done but my view was that an allowance to cover expenses differed from the payment of actual expenses and was at any rate not dependent on their being incurred in any particular period."

Just a comment in passing. If the late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court admits that there was a condition precedent that the expenses should be incurred in some particular period, then, to use a slang expression, it was up to the Chief Justice to show that he incurred expenses at some particular time that exhausted the money for which this vote was made. The letter continues:

"The expenses of attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee must always vary with the length of the sittings and of course attendance is not necessarily confined to one sitting in the year. If there were more than one attendance in any one year the expenses would certainly exceed the allowance.

"The war has brought about an exceptional state of things. Though I have offered each year to go over to assist at the sittings of the committee I have been advised that it was not considered necessary to ask me to do so under the conditions actually obtaining.

"The fact that this exceptional position had continued for two years no doubt properly called for an alteration in the vote and this was made for the fiscal year 1917-1918.

"I do not think that any representation of mine can be responsible for the view which I suppose both the Auditor General and the Finance Department must have held that the payments could be properly made.

"If, however, it is now considered that the intentions of Parliament have been misunderstood—

I commend this remark to the careful consideration of the Acting Minister of Justice and of the Acting Prime Minister. I shall read it again from the beginning, so that it may not escape their attention:

"If however, it is now considered—

"Now" must mean the present time. (Reading):

—"that the intentions of Parliament—

That is, the intention of this institution, which is made up of its components parts called "members."

—"have been misunderstood—

That is, if the intention of members of Parliament have been misunderstood.

—"I can only say that I shall be prepared to return the amount of the allowance received during the two years in question. My first object is to avoid all personal embarrassment to you.

"Yours very truly,
"C. Fitzpatrick."

The next question I asked was:

4. Are payments of the nature of those referred to in the statement of Sir Charles made without the concurrence or consent of the Auditor General?

To which the answer was:

No. The allowances in question were drawn with the concurrence of the Auditor General of the Department of Finance.

The last question was:

If so, why?

The answer was:

Answered by No. 4.

As I have said, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has, in that letter, offered to return the money if the intention of Parliament has been misunderstood, and, I think, I have shown on general principles that the intention of Parliament was misunderstood in this respect, that the answer of the Prime Minister to the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) indicated the members believed the vote was for expenses to be incurred. I think it is also abundantly clear, from the manner in which the vote was put in the Estimates, that the intention was not to direct the attention of Parliament that this was in any way a different appropriation. I want, however, to go just a little further than that. I want to endeavour to deal with this question as a matter of law. There is a fairly celebrated case from British Columbia called Rex versus Clement, where a judge, Mr. Justice Clement, got into considerable difficulty because he took a travelling allowance to which he was found not to be entitled, and as far as my inquiry has enabled me to find a precedent as to the meaning of the word "allowance," that case is the best guide I have been able to secure. I want to be quite frank with the House. As I said in rising, I approached this question from the point of view of a member of Parliament sincerely desirous of doing his duty. My first angle of approach was this—and I do not want to make myself out as being any better than any other man, because the chances are I am not,—I wanted to catch the spirit of the House, and I said to myself: What would I have done if that money had been offered to me? And I am not going to answer that question. Then I said: What would other members have done if that money had been offered to them? And I have asked, not one, but half a dozen members of this House, some professional men, some business men, some men on the farm, and they have all said: We do not think we should have taken it; the intention was that the Chief Justice should have attended the sittings, or else not have drawn the money. Satisfying myself, therefore, as to what I might call the common-place point of view of the ordinary man on the street, I turned to this question: What is the law on the matter? What are those special allowances? Are they increases in emoluments or are they indemnities? Are they intended to add something indirectly to a man's salary, or was it the intention to defray

4 p.m. expenses honestly incurred? I set out to find a precedent, because, as you know, Sir, when lawyers are in doubt on a point, they endeavour to find a case to elucidate their arguments. I found the case which I have mentioned, Rex versus Clements, heard in the Exchequer Court of Canada, as reported in the Canada Law Journal, volume 50, at page 67, and on appeal, taken to the Supreme Court by Mr. Justice Clement, the Supreme Court sustaining the findings of the court below, as to the meaning of allowance.

Mr. STEVENS: Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was a member of the Supreme Court.

Mr. NICKLE: While it is quite true that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was a member of the Supreme Court at the time that judgment was given, my recollection is—and I want to be quite fair to His Lordship—that he did not give a judgment. The case was apparently argued before the other members of the court. As regards the interpretation of the law; the provision in the Judges' Act is not on all fours with the provision in the Estimates. The provision in the Judges' Act to which I have referred reads:

> There shall be paid for travelling allowances—

In the Estimates of 1915 the wording is "special allowances"— > —to each judge, whether of a superior or county court, and to each local judge in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court, except as in this section otherwise provided, in addition to his moving or transportation expenses, the sum of six dollars for each day, including necessary days of travel going and returning, during which he is attending as such judge in court or chambers at any place other than that at which he is by law obliged to reside: Provided that:—

> (a) No judge shall receive any travelling allowance for attending in court or chambers at the place where he resides.

The facts are briefly these. Mr. Justice Clement had been living at Grand Forks and he moved to Vancouver. When the question arose as to where his residence was, he alleged that he had a technical residence at Grand Forks, but the court held that, in the terms of the statute, his residence was at Vancouver, and that he was, therefore, not entitled to the $6 a day mentioned in the statutes. But I want to emphasize this, that there was the "tail," if I may so express it to the section of the statute, stating definitely:

> No judge shall receive any travelling allowance for attending in court or chambers at the place where he resides.

This made it abundantly clear that if a judge resided in the place where he attended court, he could not draw the $6 a day. But I quote from the case—and I do not want to obscure my argument—for the purpose of giving a judicial interpretation to the word " allowances." The case came first before Mr. Justice Cassels of the Exchequer Court, and He said:

> Now it seems to me too clear for any reasonable doubt that this statute only contemplates an indemnity to the judge for expenses he is put to in travelling from and to his place of residence. It never could have been intended as a statute to augment the salary prescribed by statute. The sole legal question is where was the place of residence of the defendant as contemplated by the statute during the time the charges in question were made?

Mr. Justice Cassels found that the place of residence was Vancouver, and he, therefore, disallowed the charge of $6 a day. The case went to the Supreme Court (see Western Weekly Report, Vol. VI, page 414), and Mr Justice Duff, Mr. Justice Anglin and Mr. Justice Idington gave a decision. Mr. Justice Anglin —see Western Weekly Report, Vol. VI, page 428—said:

> I agree with Mr. Justice Cassels that the purpose of this section was not to augment a judge's salary, but to indemnify him for outlay occasioned by travelling and absence from the place where he resides in the discharge of his duties.

The Supreme Court gave judgment confirming the point that the allowance was an indemnity for travelling expenses incurred, and that His Lordship, Mr. Justice Clement, was not entitled to draw his $6 a day during the time that he was in Vancouver. I, therefore, think that authority proves quite conclusively that the word "allowance" as used in a statute means compensation for something done or to be done on indemnity against expenses. I am forced to the conclusion that the expression "special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council," as used in the Estimates of 1915, and taken in conjunction with the method of the vote, as well as the remarks of Sir Robert Borden as elicited by the questions of Mr. Proulx, means that the allowance was given in condition that the expenses were incurred, and that His Lordship attended the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will my hon. friend tell me how proceedings in the Clement case were instituted?

Mr. NICKLE: Speaking from memory, a motion was passed in the Legislature of British Columbia, of which the Dominion Government apparently took notice, and an action was launched to recover from Mr. Justice Clement the money which it was alleged had been improperly paid to him.

Mr. McKENIE: Does my hon. friend not think that precedents are good procedure, as well as law?

Mr. NICKLE: If the hon. member will give me the opportunity I hope to prove to him before I get through why the procedure he suggests is not wise. The hon. leader of the Opposition is an ex-judge, with a reputation of knowing the law. He ought to know, and does know, that we lawyers make a very sharp distinction between mistakes in law and mistakes in fact. I do not believe he will dispute my law this afternoon when I state that if a mistake at law is made, you cannot recover money from a man to whom it has been paid through that mistake. My hon. friend nods his head; I therefore assume that he assents to the proposition that I have enunciated. But if a mistake in fact has been the cause of money being paid out in error, then the money may be recovered. Now the question is, was there a mistake in fact in this case? Was this money paid to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick under a mistake as to the facts underlying the payment? Were those who paid over the money under the impression that the Chief Justice had been to England? The Acting Prime Minister has told us this afternoon that those who paid over the money were under no mistake as to the facts; they knew Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had not been to England. There was no misrepresentation on the part of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick; he did not pretend he had been to England; it was known that he was in Canada. And the leader of the Opposition has the temerity to rise and ask me: Is not legal procedure just as good in this case as it was in the Clement case? He knows perfectly well that if an action were launched in the courts it would be ineffectual, because this Parliament, represented by the Department of Justice, would be compelled to admit that they knew that the Chief Justice had not been overseas; they could not show that any representation to the contrary had been made, and on the very principle of law which I have just enunciated and to which my hon. friend has assented, the money could not be collected as a matter of law. We are not discussing these votes in any narrow, legal way, but on the broad ground of national honesty and righteousness, if I may say so.

I wish to direct a few remarks to another phase of this question. I want to say that whoever drafted Sir Charles Fitzpatrick's letter is a marvellous draughtsman. It is as subtly drawn a document—I did not say corruptly—as the pen of a man could draw. I want to read my questions and the answers again, because the leader of the Opposition has directed my attention to a certain point:

1. Is it the intention of the Government, in the event of voluntary repayment not being made . . . . . to take steps to recover this amount?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. No. In view of criticism made in the House of Commons, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has offered to return the amount mentioned although he strongly urges—

Strongly urges what? Not that he was entitled to receive the money, but:

—that he is legally entitled thereto.

What does legally entitled thereto mean? It has a double-barrelled meaning. It may mean, entitled to receive or entitled to retain. I am quite prepared to admit that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick is legally entitled to retain the money, because possession is nine-tenths of the law, and self-possession the other one-tenth. But the Chief Justice does not say that he is entitled to the money. He qualifies his answer by saying "he is 'legally' entitled thereto." What does "legally entitled" mean, to the man who knows his law? It means that if you enter the courts of law, with their rules and precedents, you could not recover the money as there had been no mistake of fact influencing payment. He qualifies the word "entitled" by the word "legally," and the hon. member knows that the Chief Justice is legally entitled to retain that money because he has got it, and we cannot show there was any mistake in fact.

Let us look a bit further. I was not as subtle in drawing those questions as I should have been, but I have learned since. One question I asked was this:

Are payments of the nature of those referred to in the statement of Sir Charles made without the concurrence or consent of the Auditor General?

I made a slip when I used the word "concurrence." I should have used the word "certificate," but I did not. In answer to my question Sir George Foster replied:

These moneys were paid in monthly instalments on application from the Privy Council office to the Auditor General, who evidently certified—

He does not say "who certified in the usual way," but he uses the word "evidently." Evidently from what? Evidently because the money was paid over. I understood the Acting Prime Minister to say this afternoon that the items were never certified but went through the ordinary course, and the Acting Minister of Justice says: This House is estopped this afternoon because the payments went through in the ordinary course. I ask him, what do we private members know as to how items are paid?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend will please quote me correctly. I never made any such statement.

Mr. NICKLE: I have no desire to misquote him. If my hon. friend did not say that, I must have taken down incorrectly what he said. If we were estopped, it would mean that we were absolutely prevented from going further at law. But I say this House is not estopped—and I am using the word not in its narrow, legal sense, but in a different sense altogether—I say we are not reasonably prevented in common sense and decency from inquiring into this matter—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say the same too.

Mr. NICKLE: —and taking a vote on it, simply because payments were made in the ordinary course of which we knew nothing.

There is one other point to which I wish to draw attention. I am going to vote for this resolution for three reasons: First, because as a member of Parliament I certainly never intended, and I do not think Parliament intended—I do not know what the Government intended—to increase Sir Charles Fitzpatrick's salary by $2,500 in the years 1915, 1916 and 1917, when we were preaching economy and thrift from the housetops. If the House did intend that, the members who were present in 1915, 1916 and 1917 must testify their intention by their votes.

Mr. RICHARDSON: What is his salary?

Mr. NICKLE: I am not discussing his salary. I do not care whether his salary is $100,000 or $100. It is purely a question of principle, and I approach it from that standpoint.

The Acting Prime Minister read a telegram this afternoon which purported to be a repetition of the offer made by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to this House through the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in 1918, and I shall show how vastly different are the two messages of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, and what a wide divergence there is between the principles enunciated in 1918 and those enunciated by telegraph this afternoon. If those hon. members who are not lawyers will listen carefully and bear in mind what I said a few moments ago as to the difference between a matter of law and a matter of fact, they will perceive the subtlety that lurks in the message which we have heard this afternoon. In the year 1918 Sir Charles Fitzpatrick said this: "If, however it is now considered"—Let us give the benefit of the doubt, Mr. Speaker, he may mean, considered by the Government, or by the House, but he admits that the intention of Parliament should be accepted—"if it is now considered that the intentions of Parliament have been misunderstood, I can only say that I shall be prepared to return the amount of the allowance received during the two years in question." That, I take it, is tantamount to saying: "If Parliament says the money should be returned I bow to the judgment of those who voted the money and return it to the country, as Parliament thinks it should be returned; I took the money believing I had a legal right to it, but if Parliament thinks otherwise, I am prepared to accept its decision."

The Acting Prime Minister read a telegram this afternoon in which Sir Charles Fitzpatrick says: "You are at liberty to state, when Mr. Edwards moves his resolution, that I adhere to the explanation given in my letter to Sir Robert Borden and which was read in the House last session in answer to Mr. Nickle's questions." What does he adhere to? He adheres to his explanation; but he makes a radical departure from his offer of 1918 to return the money if Parliament asked for its return. On March 26, 1919, there is no such offer. The offer now, I repeat, is in effect this: That if the Government, or any of the officials through whom the money was paid will say that there is any doubt as to the regularity or legality of such payment, he is prepared to return the money. In one case he gives the positive assurance that he will return the money if Parliament expressess a desire that it shall be returned owing to a misunderstanding of its intentions. In the other case he falls back on the narrow legalism, "I will return it if you can show by law that I should not have received it or retained it." The two positions, Sir, are as far apart as the poles.

Now, I have spoken longer than was my intention, and I should not have gone as fully into the matter as I have done had it not been for the objection of the leader of the Opposition. I think that this is a question on which we should have a vote this afternoon entirely on principle. The hon. member will either vote this afternoon that this money shall be returned because Parliament never intended that it should have been received by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick unless the expenses for which it was intended to be voted had been incurred, or he will endeavour to side-step the issue. I, Mr. Speaker, am going to vote for the resolution because I believe the intention of the members of Parliament was that the money should not have been paid unless the expenses were incurred. I am of opinion that that was the intention of this House in the broad way in which Parliamentary intentions should be construed. If I took the narrow legalistic view and argued from the standpoint of precedent I should conclude that the money ought to be returned; and I say frankly, as a lawyer and on my reputation as such, that I do not believe this money could be recovered in a court of law, for the reason that I have given, the money having been paid over without a mistake in fact. But I am going to vote for the motion for another reason,—and I am sorry that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick did not pay the money back in 1918.—I am going to vote for it because I believe this will be an object lesson to those who occupy high positions, that they must stand out fearlessly before the people and show by conduct that they are above and beyond the temptations that they condemn in others.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I must say at once that I am not rising to speak on this question as the leader of the Opposition, nor a partisan Although I may have a poor reputation in many respects, I think that in this House at least I am reputed to be a good partisan. But it is not as a partisan that I shall speak. I shall address myself to the observations of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). He did not understand my question or he would not have taken any exception whatever to what I said. The hon. member was quoting a precedent in law—the case of Rex vs Clement. That case was one in which Government money was obtained by a judge who, it was contended, should not have received it, and it was considered by the authorities that that money should have been refunded. From that case the hon. member quoted authoritatively the judicial definition of "allowance." I ask him the question: If he is quoting good law from that case as to what allowance is, is not the manner in which the Government went about getting that money back a question of precedence that we should follow in this case as well? If that case is light and guidance as law, is it not also light and guidance as to procedure? I do not think there is anything offensive about that question. My hon. friend said the leader of the Opposition had the temerity to state that fact in this free Parliament. If that is a matter that requires extraordinary temerity, or temerity of the most ordinary kind, I do not understand my position in this House; and I think my usually perfect and complete friend should rather apologize for the way in which he construed my remarks. I did not intend to interrupt the hon. member, but simply to suggest that this House, although the highest tribunal, and nominally the highest court in the land, is in the broadest sense of the word, not a court at all. Consequently, if a case which has run the gauntlet of the Exchequer Court of Canada and the Supreme Court of Canada, is quoted to this Parliament as an authority on any question, the whole case, I contend, must be applied to the subject under discussion. And if in the case of Judge Clement it was proper that he should be haled into the court before his peers—according to the procedure provided by our constitution and the British constitution, which recognizes the fact that no man can be affected in his person or property except by fair trial before his peers—will the hon. member for Kingston say that this Parliament, because of its high prerogatives, should adopt a different course and try a person in his absence?

Mr. NICKLE: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly.

Mr. NICKLE: Does my hon. friend suggest that if a man elects to be tried in a certain forum, that forum has no right to take him at his word?

Mr. McKENZIE: I certainly say that a man's choice of tribunal does not confer jurisdiction upon that tribunal. I may be charged with murder and, knowing a friendly magistrate somewhere in Hull or in Ottawa or elsewhere, I might admit to the sheriff my guilt in the matter but request to be tried at the place I might designate.

Mr. NICKLE: May I ask another question? Does not the hon. member's parallel fail, in that trial of murderer is regulated by statute, whereas the recovery of any amount paid by Parliament is not so regulated?

Mr. McKENZIE: We have a precedent—

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. NICKLE: Not precedent; what is the law?

Mr. McKENZIE: We have a precedent.

Mr. NICKLE: Not a precedent.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, we have a precedent, which is the law. That is the famous case of Rex versus Clement. If my hon. friend from Kingston will please listen to me, these moneys which are paid as allowances are voted every year by Parliament. Allowances are paid out by the authorities to the judges, and if they are paid in a place where they have no right to be paid they are in exactly in the same position as the moneys which were paid to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick from a vote of this House—it is a vote of the House in both cases, and in both cases the money paid out by the officers of the Government.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): Will the hon. gentleman give us his views about the failure of a "consideration"?

Mr. McKENZIE: I might well have expected that the rapid, running mind of my friend from Peterborough would get so far ahead that I could not hope to answer him. By this time next week I may catch up to the hon. gentleman.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, when my old-time interrogator came to his feet, that these cases could not be more alike. I want it understood at once that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick does not require, or claim, any defence from me, nor am I here to act in any capacity of the kind, but I want to make this perfectly clear: That the moneys paid out to Judge Clement, and the moneys paid out to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick are identically in the same position—they are public moneys paid out to a judge in the one case, and public moneys paid out to a judge in the other. Now, the Clement case in an older one—that is to say, the initiation of the procedure to get the money back is of an older date. What was done in that case? I presume that a fiat was obtained by somebody from the Crown, proceedings were commenced in the Exchequer Court in behalf of the Crown, and the case was tried out properly in court. Let me say to my hon. friend from Frontenac, or to anybody who is interested in this matter, that those proceedings having been established by the authorities, the course taken in the Clement case was the proper one to follow. Why depart from it and ignore the Exchequer Court, ignore the Supreme Court of Canada, ignore the Supreme Court of Ontario—this proceeding having happened in the province of Ontario, and come under the jurisdiction of the Ontario courts? I say that it is entirely irregular, at all events it is entirely a departure from the precedent that was established in the case of the Crown against Judge Clement. In that case, Judge Clement, I am sure, had the opportunity of coming before the court and making the best explanation he could, and the issue was tried out; the pros and cons having been heard. But a forum is selected here at which Sir Charles Fitzpatrick is not present, and at which he is not given a chance to tell his own story or to put up his defence. That being the case we are not within the safeguards and bulwarks which are given to every British subject, and which provide for a man being heard by his peers before any judgment is given against him which affects either his person or his property. That is the position which I take as to the matter of procedure.

Now, my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) is not happy in his reference to the facts. The hon. gentleman says that this is a case in which the money was paid by a mistake of law, and that being so we cannot go into a court of law to recover it. That is perfectly good law as far as our courts are concerned. But if the money has been paid in consequence of a mistake of fact, of course we can get it back. But the hon. gentleman, however, says that there was no mistake of fact, that we knew all about it; consequently we cannot plead ignorance of the facts. Well, the Prime Minister of this country is supposed to speak for the Government, and when we get a statement of the facts relative to a Government transaction from the Prime Minister, I am not aware that there could be any higher authority, and I submit that we have a right to accept the facts as stated by him. The hon. member for Kingston read an answer from Hansard, in which the Prime Minister gave it as his opinion that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick went twice a year to attend the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Now, that is the knowledge of the Government on this matter. Well, if it turns out that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick did not go, and that he got the money under a mistake of fact,—the Prime Minister having stated that the Chief Justice was going to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council twice a year, whereas he did not go at all, and the officers of the Government, under the belief that he was going, paid him the money,—then there is clearly a mistake of fact, and the law which my hon. friend from Kingston quoted does not stand in the way of going to the Exchequer Court, having the facts determined, and the case properly tried. There is another thing that I wish to submit: This is the High Court of the Parliament of Canada. We are here sitting—those of us who are not burdened with the responsibility of judicial office—like the jurors in court, and those hon. gentlemen who are familiar with court practice know that the jurors must take their law from the judge. He may be absolutely wrong, but the jurors sitting there, having heard the facts of the case, must take their law from the judge; he tells them what the law is. I regard myself as a layman and a juror sitting in this House to-day. I hear such facts as are presented, and I am bound to receive the law from the Minister of Justice. I must apply a logical, clear-cut analogy to my position here to-day as to my position if I were sitting in court, under a judge, as a juror. The Minister of Justice in this case gives us the law, and he tells us that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was entitled to receive this money, that he got it absolutely honestly under the prevailing rules.

Mr. NICKLE: Did not the Minister of Justice use the expression "legally entitled?"

Mr. McKENZIE: He said Sir Charles Fitzpatrick got the money properly.

Mr. NICKLE: Did he not use the expression "legally entitled?"

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not aware that he said any such thing. I do not know how a man gets a thing properly unless he gets it legally.

Mr. NICKLE: Don't you?

Mr. McKENZIE: No, I do not. I must admit that I am not up to trisecting things like the hon. member for Kingston, but I thought that legally, honestly, and properly were concomitant and conjunctive terms and went together.

Mr. NICKLE: Not overlapping.

Mr. McKENZIE: But now it appears we can get a thing legally and justly which is not properly got. If that were so we would not have the same high opinion of our laws that we have to-day. But whatever the interpretation the Minister of Justice puts upon the case, he tells us this money was legally obtained, and, as far as I am concerned, taking the law from him, and I have nothing to do but with the facts, I think we have to stop there. Let us transfer ourselves for a moment to the House of Commons in England, and consider a question of this kind coming up there. In England, perhaps, the officers of the law fill a higher position in the estimation of Parliament than they do with us. Whether they do or not the functions of the law officers are the same. If a question of this kind comes before the British House of Commons, where questions of law and fact are involved, the Parliamentary officers of the law hand down a certain decision upon the point and that is the end of it: Their decision is accepted and there the matter stands. Now, we have the decision of the officers of the law of this Parliament to the effect that this payment is all right, and that we have nothing to do with it—that it is the payment of a mere indemnity to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, just the same as the indemnity that he received as Deputy Governor.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the Acting Minister of Justice said this afternoon that this was not a legal question at all?

Mr. McKENZIE: I was not aware of that, otherwise I would not have said what I did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never made such a statement. I said I thought a question of law was involved, and I also said that the honour of a citizen of this country was involved.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is worth while to find that the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) is wrong for once. It is worth while to discuss the whole thing to obtain that knowledge.

I was just saying that this was according to the interpretation that was put upon it by the officers of the law, that it was by way of indemnity to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick just the same as the allowance that was made to him as Acting Governor General. If that is the interpretation, I do not think we have anything further to say about it.

One more word, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from West Peterborough asked me whether there was any consideration for this money. I think that the duties thrown upon Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, or upon any other Chief Justice of this country attending the sittings of the Privy Council, are very onerous indeed, and that it would be absurd that merely his travelling expenses should be paid. Every professional man in this House who has special responsibilities will understand that he must have certain qualifications and make special preparations for those duties which he has to perform. If a judge of one of the Ontario courts is going on circuit he has to prepare himself for that duty, and for that duty only, and for that duty he is paid; but if he is asked to go and sit in the Privy Council, what has he got to do there? He has got to know something about the laws of Australia from which appeals come, something about the laws of New Zealand from which appeals come, something about the laws of South Africa, India, and every other colony,—he must acquaint himself with the laws of all these different countries, otherwise he is rather an impediment and a nuisance and a danger to that court than a help.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does the Canadian representative on the Privy Council have anything to do with colonial cases other than those from Canada?

Mr. McKENZIE: As far as I understand it, he sits upon that court and he hears every case that comes before it, and cases come before it from every country that I have mentioned. For that reason he must have a knowledge of the laws of those different countries, and certainly the duties which he has to perform are very onerous. Therefore I think there was good consideration for any further compensation that might have been given him.

Apart from that, let me say at once that if the words of this vote are to be interpreted, let them receive judicial interpretation as in the Clement case. There is no question of difficulty in getting this before the Exchequer Court, from the Exchequer Court to the Supreme Court, and from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council. That is the place where this matter should be dealt with, and not in this House. Then we shall have a full and proper interpretation of what is meant by the language of this vote. If there is anything wrong, it is not traceable to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, rather it is traceable to the Prime Minister of this country—at all events, it is traceable to his office. We have heard from the memorandum handed to the Acting Prime Minister by his deputy minister. that word came to him from the office of the Prime Minister that a change was to be made in the language of the Estimates for years past so as to convert this from a matter of actual expense to an indemnity. There the fault is traceable, if fault there be, and from the time that the Prime Minister of this country, through his secretary, passed that word down to the Department of Finance, where those Estimates were prepared, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had a perfect right to take advantage of the change of mind of the Prime Minister and of all the officials of the Government by which he was receiving this money. There is not a scintilla of evidence that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick ever asked for that change. Is it fair, without giving him a chance to be heard in one of our courts, that we should pass a condemnatory resolution in this House? I suggest to my good friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), he having heard the case now, and having had all the satisfaction that he can possibly get out of it, and knowing, as he does from this Clement case, that there is another and a proper way of getting this money back, that he withdraw this resolution.

Mr. WILLIAM S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the whole matter resolves itself down to a question of interpretation. It is a fundamental rule of law that the meaning of an Act of Parliament must be gathered entirely from the words in which it is expressed, and there are many cases where the intention of Parliament has not been carried out by the expressions used in the statute. I think a very good illustration of that is what occurred in this House a couple of years ago, when in passing the Act to take over the Quebec and Saguenay railway it was enacted that the Government should pay the cost of that railway as determined by the Exchequer Court, and an hon. member of this House asked a question of the Minister of Railways and Canals who then had the Bill in charge, if the word "costs" included interest paid for money borrowed during the time of construction. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said: Yes, cost would cover interest paid by the contractors for money borrowed during the time of construction. When the case came before the Exchequer Court, that court decided that interest paid during the course of construction did not enter into the question of cost at all as a matter of law. So that I say the interpretation of what we meant when it goes to the courts is left to the courts, and I am willing to argue this case upon that ground.

I contend that the three clauses mean practically the same. The first clause says:

Travelling expenses of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick attending sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The next clause says:

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

If the words "to cover expenses" had not been in there would be no doubt whatever in my mind that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick would, as a matter of law, be perfectly entitled to receive the $2,500, which would simply be an addition to his salary as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But it is not given to him in that way; it is given to him to cover expenses. We do not require a statement as to whether his expenses are more than that amount or less than that amount, but the money is given to him for that special purpose.

The last clause says:

Special allowance—

The same words again.

—to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Now, I am assuming that there are no expenses in connection with his services as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council unless he does go to England, and if there are not, then he is not entitled to those expenses, because I find in this memorandum prepared by the Justice Department that the word "allowance," as defined in "Wharton's Law Lexicon" which, as members of the legal profession are aware, is the standard legal dictionary, as "something conceded as compensation." If a man has incurred no expense, he cannot claim any compensation for expenses. According to the terms of the resolution appropriating these amounts, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, as a matter of law, is not entitled to the $5,000 which he received during those two years. In saying that I am not saying anything disrespectful of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. To a certain extent he was justified in taking these amounts because of the change which was made in the wording of the resolution. I do not know whether the change was made inadvertently or purposely, but whether inadvertently or purposely, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick would naturally believe that it had been made for the purpose of enabling him to get that compensation. Personally, I never intended, and I doubt whether any other member on this side of the House intended, that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick should receive $2,500 to cover his expenses in going to England when he did not go to England and did not incur any expense. For these reasons I must vote for the resolution of the member for Frontenac.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion this afternoon. The legal aspect of this matter has been put before the House in all its phases by the member for Kingston(Mr. Nickle), the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) and others; I desire to approach the matter entirely from the point of view of the remark of the Acting Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Meighen) that the honour of a citizen is involved. I do not know that my thoughts will lead to the same conclusion as his, but I do feel that the honour of a citizen is deeply concerned —more deeply because the citizen in question sat at the fountain-head of justice as the Chief Justice of the highest judicial tribunal of Canada, the summit of all law That court, above all courts in the land, and the Chief Justice of that court, of all officials, should keep clean.

Any one listening to the discussion to-day could not help but feel that there has been a lot of specious argument around the question of legality. Whether the action of the Chief Justice was legal or not, was it honourable in him to take the money? I think that is the whole question. He himself did not think that it was—at least, he had doubts, because in the letter read by the member for Kingston the Chief Justice said that if Parliament considered that he should not keep the money, he would return it. The matter is, therefore, "out of court;" he has sent it back here for the opinion of this House.

Let us see what the member for Frontenac asks us to do. His resolution reads:—

That, in the opinion of this House, the amount of $5,000 received by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick for the fiscal years 1915-16 and 1916-17 to cover expenses in connection with the udicial Committee of the Privy Council, should be returned by the said Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to the Treasury of Canada forthwith.

Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has said two things about returning this money. First, he said that if the House was of tthe opinion that he should return it he would do so. After thinking the matter over for a year, he sends in a telegram which reads:—

You are at liberty to state when Mr. Edwards moves his resolution that I adhere to the explanation given in my letter to Sir Robert Borden and which was read in the House last session in answer to Mr. Nickle's questions. I then offered to return the money—

He then offered to return the money if Parliament was of the opinion that he should. Note what he says now in this telegram, from which I quote further:—

I then offered to return the money and I now repeat that if the Government or any of the officials through whom the money was paid will say that there is any doubt as to the regularity or legality of such payments I am prepared to return the money.

I thank the Acting Minister of Justice for the phrase "the honour of a citizen is at stake." This citizen has apparently forgotten his own honour and has descended to depending on regularity and legality. There is no doubt in the mind of any one in this House that that $2,500 a year was voted to enable the Chief Justice to go overseas and perform certain duties, and if we look at the matter in a fair way we will realize that no honourable man would take that money unless he did go overseas to perform those duties. That is the whole issue; there is no legal quibble about it. The member for Frontenac wants to get the opinion of this House on the question whether it is honest and decent and right that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick should keep that money, and the opinion of the House should be given in no uncertain way. It is then up to him to say: "The House of Commons, having been asked by me to give their opinion, has declared, by a majority vote, that I, sitting as the Chief Justice of Canada, while well cared for by the Government, being in receipt of $17,500 a year in all, should return the money voted to me during two years for expenses that were not incurred, for the performance of services that were not rendered." The Acting Minister of Justice said to-day, in answer to my question, that there was no duty to be performed in this connection except that of going overseas to attend the meetings of the Judicial Committee. So that the late Chief Justice has taken $5,000 out of the treasury without having turned a hand for it. Probably he did it legally; probably he did it regularly. I am inclined to agree with the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) that there may have been some conversation between the Chief Justice and some one else—I would not say with the Minister of Justice. But Sir Charles Fitzpatrick is astute enough to frame up anything for his own benefit to work through somebody—in a way that people understand. The point I make is that we are not seeking to sue him for this amount. If this resolution carries, the opinion of this House will be conveyed in the public press or through Hansard to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. His question will be answered, and the honour of the citizen will be up to the man whose honour is at stake. If Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, after that opinion has been expressed, feels that it is worth his while to keep the money of Canada, I, as a citizen of Canada, will say:

You are very welcome to it, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick; you will answer to yourself and your conscience in attempting to hold on to that which you did not properly obtain.

Mr. ROBERT J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Sometimes there come up for decision by members of Parliament, questions in which the easier course would be for a member to refrain from voting. I must confess I am in some doubt on this question, and I would find it a good deal easier to leave the chamber, as I felt tempted to do, so as to miss the vote if a vote takes place, but I generally do not like to run away from risks, if I may so term it. I have listened to the arguments put forward this afternoon by members on both sides of the House as intelligently as an ordinary layman can listen to the arguments of lawyers. I do not pretend to be able to follow the subtleties—that was the word used, I think, by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle)—of lawyers' minds. I have listened to the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) and the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) explaining the position, not of the Government, but of their legal advisers in this matter, and my interpretation of their remarks is to the effect that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had, at least, a legal, if not a moral, right to this money. If we take it into account that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had a legal right to this money—and even my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy), who thinks this money should be returned, admits that he has a legal right to it—and if we are demanding it back from Sir Charles Fitzpatrick simply on the moral ground, then it should be the duty of this Government, if Parliament insists, on moral grounds, on getting this money back, to investigate thoroughly the administration of the Government at the present time and to make other people who have taken money to which they have no moral right pay it back; and to go back over the record of the late Governments and make the crooked contractors pay back moneys which they had no moral right to take.

If I felt convinced that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had no right to retain this money, I would have absolutely no hesitation in voting in favour of this motion; but because I had a doubt in my mind in regard to the matter, I made it my business to chat with a few of the ministers who knew the situation and they are all of the same opinion as the Acting Prime Minister and the Acting Minister of Justice, namely, that this $5,000 should be left as it stands at the present time. One of the reasons put forward which impressed me very much was that, if this Parliament voted in favour of demanding the return of this money, that would practically be saying that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was a thief and stole that money. I am not prepared to go as far as that. I am not, however, convinced that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had a moral right to this money, and I will tell the House, in a moment, what I would do if I were Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. I think the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) stated that if Sir Charles Fitzpatrick wanted to play the right game, he would have paid the money back last Fall. I do not know Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, I have not had the pleasure of meeting him, but in my opinion the reason why he could not pay the money back while under this cloud, was that if he did so, he would be admitting to the people of Canada that he stole it.

5 p.m.

Mr. RICHARDSON: That he took it improperly.

Mr. MANION: Possibly he took it improperly, but I do not suppose Sir Charles Fitzpatrick would care to admit that he took it improperly even if, in his inner conscience, he thought he did. I do not blame him for that. I think his proper stand would be to stand by his guns; otherwise, he would be admitting that he took it improperly, a thing which no man would care to admit. To take a thing improperly is a drawing-room phrase for stealing it. One of the ministers with whom I spoke expressed the opinion that if Parliament passed this resolution it would wipe out any reputation for honour that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has. There is a great deal of truth in that, and I am not prepared to vote away the reputation of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick for $5,000. Not only is his honour at stake, but the honour of this Government is also at stake. That is the conclusion I have reached, and I have endeavoured to give in a few words my reasons for supporting the view held by the Acting Prime Minister and the Acting Minister of Justice. If the vote taken by the House on this matter does not support Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, I suppose he will have to pay the money back; but supposing the vote supports him in keeping it, in that case, if I were Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, I would pay back the money after I was exonerated, as a doubt has been cast upon him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I hear laughter from different parts of the House. I do not think that view differs from my first conclusions in this matter. I repeat what I said at the outset, namely, that every hon. member who has spoken has admitted that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has a legal right to this money. Therefore, he has not stolen it, and I do not see why he should admit he has stolen it. But as a doubt has been cast upon him, the proper course for Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to pursue, if this vote exonerates him, is to hand back this $5,000 to the people of Canada.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: If we vote for this resolution, will that defeat the Government?

Mr. MANION: I understand this has nothing to do with either a defeat or a support of the Government, and I am not, as is implied by the hon. member, tied by any chain to supporting this Government, if I feel like voting against it.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Centre Vancouver): I wish, in just two or three sentences to make my position clear on this question. I may say at the outset that I intend to vote for the resolution for reasons which are perfectly clear to my mind. I remember very well, when the items referred to were before the House, it was clear to me that we were voting from year to year this sum of money for a particular purpose, namely, to pay the expenses of the Chief Justice of Canada, whoever he might be, to attend the sittings of the Privy Council. Last year—and I use the argument I am now going to use, for the particular benefit of my hon. friend (Mr. Manion)—when the Estimates were being considered, this question was raised by several members, and a large number of members who intended to speak did not speak for the reason that they were given an assurance by the Government, on the strength of a letter from Sir Charles Fitzpatrick read by a responsible minister of the Crown, that this money would be returned. On that assurance being given to the House, opposition was at once removed and the item was allowed to pass.

Another feature of the case to which I wish to draw the attention of the House is this. The question of law has been discussed very carefully and earnestly by hon. members. One principle is accepted in all courts, namely, that where in law a phrase or a clause of a contract is in doubt, the lawyers and the judge usually look for some precedent or some action which went before which might interpret the meaning of the clause.

We have a dozen precedents for this. From the year 1897 to 1915-16 this item was in the Estimates year after year, and it was there for a particular purpose, and the money was used for that purpose. In the year 1915-16 the wording was slightly changed, but the item as it had appeared the previous year was placed alongside; in other words, the vote was interpreted in the terms of the vote of the previous year. I submit to the Government this point: If we, as private members, were to be forced to analyze in detail every item that comes before this House we should never get through the Estimates in a hundred years. Every item in the Estimates is condensed in as few words as possible, and we trust to the officers of the Crown to carry out the intention which Parliament undoubtedly has in passing these items in this abbreviated form. It was clear to Parliament what this particular vote was intended for; it was clear to Parliament last year that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick intended this House to understand that he would return the money. But a year afterwards we find that the money has not been returned. I shall certainly take the opportunity of expressing my opinion in a vote on this matter.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): If I agreed with my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) in what he said, I should vote as he is going to vote, but the only thing he said with which I agree was that we are dealing with a very disagreeable question. I am no apologist for Government by Order in Council, but if this matter could have been settled by an Order in Council it would have saved Parliament a very ugly situation. I think, for once, I would be in agreement with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) who seems to want it settled somewhere else than here anyhow, and we are at one in not fearing to derogate from the rights and privileges of Parliament on the present occasion. I must say I rather resent the duty of having to discuss and decide on this question; it should not have been thrown on the shoulders of Parliament. It appears to me, as my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Morphy) suggested, that there has been some intercourse between the Government and Sir Charles on this question, and the Government should have saved Parliament from having to discuss and vote on this matter. I do not attach much importance to the legal cobwebs that we have had spun here this afternoon. Of course, it is a long time since we ascribed first place in that particular art to my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen), but I thought this afternoon he would have to look to his laurels because the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) really made a splendid exhibition along the same lines. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) was willing to enter into the competition, but I am bound to pronounce him a bad third. When I listened to these gentlemen I wondered if I could lay claim to being an intelligent layman, and ever since I have been trying to persuade myself that I am a reasonably intelligent layman.

I am sorry for Sir Charles Fitzpatrick in this connection. I do not share the habit of my hon. friend from Fort William of wishing to use strong language where I can possibly avoid it, and I differ very profoundly from the attitude that he has just taken up in asserting that those who vote in a certain way in this matter will proclaim that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick is a thief. I should like to warn my hon. and young friend against the use of such language; even if he thinks it, he should modify his language. It is sometimes well, it may be generally well, to call a spade a spade, but there is excuse in some circumstances for calling it a horticultural implement. In this case I neither think Sir Charles Fitzpatrick a thief, nor will I have my vote represented as indicating that I think so. I do not blame, primarily, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick for the situation. I think it should have been settled when there was a chance to settle it, without the House having to vote on this question. I have a slight acquaintance with Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, and I think he is a man who by his intellectual gifts and by his high character has been an adornment to many public positions in this country. That is all one needs to say upon such an interpretation of the vote here as was given by my hon. friend from Fort William.

While I am sorry for Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, I am sorry for myself, as a member of Parliament, in having to deal with this matter. From the view expressed by the Minister of Justice that this House is the guardian of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick's honour I sharply dissent. Every man is the guardian of his own honour; it must be so; and I refuse to assume the guardianship of the honour of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. Neither am I the guardian of the business capacity of the Government. This question has been allowed to drift into the House of Commons for settlement, and what I have to remember is what I am guardian of. I am the guardian, in the humble capacity of a single member of this House, of the public purse; that is a duty which I cannot avoid; it is put upon me by those who elected me here, and by the constitution of our country. We all know, in spite of legal contentions to the contrary, that this five thousand dollars was paid to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. I do not think any one contradicts that. That is a fact known to everybody, including the hon. leader of the Opposition. He may not know it in his legal capacity, but as I do not know what that is, I am content if he knows it in his capacity as a member of Parliament. I believe, and I want to state my belief, that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick in taking that money took it under error. I will not permit myself to say of any other man what he should have done when he had committed that error—and I am using the language of straightforward sincerity. I do not know that I would even answer on my own account a question which I suppose the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) addressed to me with the other members of this House. He seemed to turn in my direction when he asked, would I have taken this money? I thought at the time, my mother was Scotch, and it is a large sum, and I am not bound to answer the question. I should be in the same difficulty if he had gone on to ask, would I have given it back, and for the reason that if I had got the sum I should not have retained it till this time, as I have not been able to exercise the Scotch quality of taking care of money too well So I have not to answer this question as to what Sir Charles Fitzpatrick should have done or what I would have done myself under those circumstances.

The money was paid by the Government to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to enable him to travel. He did not travel. It was said during the war by somebody—the Minister of Public Works, I think—that we must "work or fight," and I think that in this case the question was, "travel or return the money." That, at any rate, is the view I shall take of the matter. The money was paid for travelling expenses; travelling was not done, therefore it is due back to the country, and I say that without any reflection upon Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, but merely as indicating the way in which I shall vote. For once I was pleased to take my law—if it was law; the commonsense of it anyway—from my old friend the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx), who was, to my mind, by far the clearest-brained lawyer who spoke on this subject in the House to-day. I have tried to put this question from the point of view of the layman, and to put before the House the reasons which shall guide me if the question comes to a vote.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (Oxford North): When I voted, as I did, for the resolution at the time the vote was taken, I believed that the money was to be paid to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick as a sort of salary, somewhat in the form of a retainer which is sometimes paid a lawyer by a corporation for the purpose of securing his services at any time if required. I might have been wrong in my view of the question at that time, and I am not saying that I was not. I have listened to most of the discussion this afternoon, and have heard a great deal of legal opinion. The Acting Prime Minister has told us that the changing of the wording was made at the request of the Prime Minister's secretary. Now, the money was paid by the Finance Department at the instance of the Department of Justice and the Privy Council, without any question, and with the sanction of the late Auditor General, who, we all know, was very capable. In these circumstances it is my opinion that the money was legally paid, and, as far as I can gather, it was honestly accepted by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. I therefore have no other recourse than to endorse the payment that was legally made by those who were in authority to make payments such as this, and to oppose this resolution.

Mr. H. E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec County): There is no doubt in my mind that previous to 1915 and 1916 Sir Charles Fitzpatrick would not, according to the way the money was voted then, have been entitled to it; but under the vote of 1915 and 1916 I think the money was legally paid to him and that it was accepted in good faith. There must have been some reason for the change that was made in the wording of the Estimate, and I feel I must vote against the resolution and at the same time express regret at some of the remarks that have been made concerning Sir Charles Fitzpatrick.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): It is extremely difficult to understand the attitude of any hon. member in this House who defends Sir Charles Fitzpatrick in his retention of this money. Sir Charles himself, in his letter last year, offered to return the money if this Parliament thought he should do so, and that was an absolute admission on his part that there was certainly a doubt in his mind as to the propriety of his retaining the money. One hears many legal arguments on a question of this kind, but it seems to me that the bald facts are so self-explanatory that a wayfarer, though a fool, could not fail to decide what is Sir Charles Fitzpatrick's duty in this matter. When the late Dalton McCarthy some years ago was addressing a meeting in the town of Selkirk, Manitoba, in the course of a criticism of the Government of the day in which he made some deductions that were perfectly logical, an obtrusive person in the back who was opposed to him politically asked him: "How do you know, Mr. McCarthy, that what you say is right?" Mr. McCarthy, with that dignity and strength of character that distinguished him, paused for a moment and replied, "Because I am not a damned fool." Now the people of this country are not fools—I omit the adjective—and they know that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick received $5,000 for services that he did not render. The matter has been referred to this House for decision. The people are exceedingly critical, and the average Canadian citizen regards $5,000 as a large amount of money—which indeed it is, Mr. Speaker. The people are waiting to see what attitude their representatives in Parliament will take in this matter. The money was improperly accepted. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick did not spend one farthing of it, and yet his salary is $17,500.

If you give him this additional money as an honorarium, he will have $20,000, nearly three times, perhaps more than three times, the salary of the average minister of the Crown. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was the Chief Justice of Canada, the fountain of justice in this country. In addition to that he was the administrator representing the Governor General of Canada, and the people have a right to look to him as the fountain of honour, as he was the official fountain of honour. And yet he takes this $5,000. He practically admits he did not earn it, he did not spend it, and he had it improperly; and to ask this House to say that he should be allowed to retain the money is, in my judgment to insult the intelligence of members of the House, the intelligence of the people of this country. I did not hear the remarks of the Acting Prime Minister, or of the Acting Minister of Justice, but taking the interpretation of their remarks as I heard it secondhand from members of this House, I must confess that I am surprised that either, or both, of those gentlemen—while they may not have defended the payment—should have left the impression that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick is legally entitled to this money. A man may be legally entitled to $100,000, and yet not have one scintilla of moral claim. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has no moral claim on this money; and let him understand, as the reperesentative of the Crown in this country, that the Parliament and the people of Canada do not propose to allow him to go Scot free in this matter. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, by reason of his position, should be placed in the pillory, and it should be given out to the people of Canada that this Parliament does not intend to allow a man of his position, and of his supposed honour, to escape responsibility. Let the declaration of Parliament this afternoon be quite clear, so that the country will have no doubt as to the mind of the people's representatives that we propose to insist upon having this money returned. If under the circumstances, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick should wish to retain it, then on his head be the responsibility. I agree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that Parliament cannot be the keeper of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick's honour, or of any man's honour—every man must be the keeper of his own honour—and if we make an emphatic pronouncement on questions of this kind, we will have struck a strong and hearty blow for honesty and for honest public service in this country.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General): I do not take the same view of the question as is taken by my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and quite a number of other hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. If blame attaches to any one as a result of this unfortunate matter, I think the blame should be put upon the House of Commons itself, or upon the Government administering affairs in 1915-16, rather than upon the shoulders of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. In my judgment no stigma whatever, no degree of moral turpitude whatever attaches to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, in respect of the two payments of $2,500 each which form the subject of this resolution. Parliament must be presumed to know what it is doing when it passes its Estimates. Deliberately it changed the language which had prevailed in this House with respect to this item for years. When this vote was made in 1915, an item which stated in express terms that the money was given for travelling expenses was changed. We assume that it was done deliberately, because that action was taken with the knowledge of hon. members who were then in this House. We are supposed to know what it meant, and we approved of it· we must have known what it meant when we took that course. The blame for anything that has gone wrong since must be attributed to us; if a mistake was made, we made it. Why did we make the change referred to? To my mind the matter is clear, and I agree with the view taken by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. E. W. Nesbitt) with respect to it. The language of the vote was changed expressly to permit Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to accept an allowance practically as an addition to his salary. What was the wording of the vote of 1915? "Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council." My hon. friend from Springfield and my hon. friend from Red Deer said that money was paid to enable Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to travel. There is nothing in the vote which limits the payment to travelling expenses. We are assuming that there was no expense in connection with the office but expenses of travel. We do not know whether or not Sir Charles Fitzpatrick employed clerical assistance or stenographers, or disbursed money for telegrams, postage, or the like. So long as any expense was incurred at all the payment of the money cannot be withheld. Let me give a little instance by way of illustration. Every hon. member of this House who were here fifteen or twenty years ago accepted mileage every year and travelled on a railway pass. Members of the Ontario Legislature do that yet. In the Militia Department the higher officers receive an allowance per diem; they do not give details of their expenditure for travelling expenses, they do not vouch their accounts. The allowance, I believe, is some $12 or $15; at any rate whatever the amount may be, I am told they do not give an itemized account of their expenditures; they accept the allowance no matter how small their expenditure has been. Our judges do the same thing. We give them a per diem allowance of $6 or $8 for expenses, and if the expenses happen to be $2 or $3 below the amount, the allowance is drawn just the same. The money is not given for actual expenses, it is an allowance, and it was so in connection with the money that was voted to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick.

Mr. R. H. COOPER (Vancouver South): Will the Solicitor General definitely state that this money was voted for work done by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not quite catch the question.

Mr. COOPER: This money was voted in connection with attendance at sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Solicitor General says that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick may have used it for certain other expenses, but he does not say that it was expended for work in connection with the Judicial Committee.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have just as good a right to say that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick might have used it for other purposes as hon. members have to insinuate that he did not use this money for expenses. I have just as high and firm ground for doing that as hon. members have who are criticising this payment. The fact still remains, however, that when we voted this money we voted it in plain, distinct language as an allowance, and having done so we should assume the responsibility. I quite agree that no good end is going to be served by a discussion of this unfortunate question in this forum. In my opinion this discussion is purely academic, and I do not think anything will come of it, whether we adopt or reject this motion. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick may say: "I do not propose to return this money," even if we adopt this motion. How are you going to compel him, if he takes that attitude?

An hon. MEMBER: What about his telegram?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He may not act on it, he may even change his mind with respect to it. How are you going to exercise compulsion? Where is this going to end? When is any finality going to be achieved? There is a forum where this question could be disposed of, and I think the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition is the correct one in view of the statute which says that a claim of the Crown may be adjudicated by the Exchequer Court of Canada. I believe that is the proper form to which this whole question should be referred and there be dealt with. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick can be heard there. We have not had the other side of the matter, except in the somewhat discursive communication which has been read from Sir Charles Fitzpatrick himself, but if we have a claim, or believe we have a claim, the Exchequer Court is the forum where this question should be decided. In that court we should get finality, a definite finding. Here the discussion may have the result of casting a slur upon Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, which, in my humble judgment, is entirely undeserved on account of anything that has occurred in this transaction.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) does not place Sir Charles Fitzpatrick in a very favourable light when he tells us that even if we vote that this money ought to be returned to Parliament Sir Charles Fitzpatrick will not return it, although he has offered to do so. I shall not attempt to follow the legal side of the argument. I think it was well that that side should be stated, and it was stated very completely by the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). I do not look at this matter from the legal standpoint, neither do I think the people of Canada so regard it. I think the member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) gave the right view of it. The people of Canada see an item in the Estimates of $2,500 for expenses, and as far as they can learn no expenses have been incurred. Now, I submit, Sir, that if any expenses had been incurred sufficient to warrant the taking of that money some member of this House would be able to say so to-day. No person has ventured such a statement, no person has even insinuated that any expenses had been incurred. We are told that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick might have spent something on postage, clerical help, or something of that sort, but no effort is made to show how much that is or how little, and if it was anything like sufficient to justify this payment I am sure that fact would have been stated here to-day.

If a postman, Mr. Speaker, takes fifty cents improperly we send him to the penitentiary for five years. I do not mean to say that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has stolen the money, but I go this far, that the one man in Canada who should be careful of his position in matters of this kind is the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Every man should be careful of what he does in financial transactions if he is an honest man, but the one man above all others in this Dominion who should be careful that nobody can say he has taken five cents improperly is the man who presides over the Supreme Court of this country, and it is most regrettable that he should have allowed this matter to go so far when he knows the feeling of Parliament from former discussions.

Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that working men, farmers and others who have to work for five years to earn $5,000 should get restless when they see that amount taken by a man already drawing $15,000, and taken improperly. How are we going to prevent unrest, how are we going to satisfy the people that we are doing the square thing by them when men who have the highest paid positions in this country resort to these means to add to their incomes? Whether Sir Charles Fitzpatrick is able legally to retain this or not, he has no moral right to it, and that is the view I take and I propose to give effect to it by my vote.

Mr. GEORGE BOYCE (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to have to say anything in regard to this matter. I heard it all at the last session, and I then made up my mind that surely the Chief Justice, the model of the law courts of this Dominion, would hand back that money, but I find he has not done so. I regret very much that he intends to retain $5,000 for which he has given no return. If he had gone to the old country to sit on the judicial bench, then he would have had a right to that money; but not having gone I do not see that he has the slightest grounds for retaining it. If some poor man or woman took improperly $50, or even a loaf of bread, he or she would go to jail for it, and yet here is a man who, while occupying the highest judicial office in this country, took $5,000. I think it is something this country expects to have dealt with, and I for one am going to vote accordingly.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman purposes to speak he can only do so in closing the debate, and if he exercises his right to reply now, other hon. members will be precluded from speaking.

Mr. EDWARDS: I only wish to say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) has the floor.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words upon this question, but if my hon. friend the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) wishes to make a statement that he withdraws his resolution, then I will give way to him.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of withdrawing my resolution. I am aware of the fact, as I presume my hon. friend is, that it is a quarter to six. I believe the sentiment of this House is that we take a vote on this matter.

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Speaker, I have done my best to follow the reasoning of the hon. gentlemen who have already spoken. I am indifferent in this matter as to whether the charge is made against a man who calls himself Fitzpatrick, or whether it be made against a man who might call himself by any other name. I desire not to give a silent vote, but, I hope, an intelligent one, and in order that I may give that vote, as I mean to give it, I want to say a few words in explanation. We have been dealing this afternoon with a case that I might call the case of Edwards vs. Fitzpatrick. The complainant in this case asks us to constitute ourselves into a transferring court to transfer the charge in the case of Edwards vs. Fitzpatrick to one of the King vs. Fitzpatrick. I understand that the Government take the position that they will not recommend, nor will the officers of the Crown recommend, that the case be styled one of the King vs. Fitzpatrick, but that it must continue to be the case of Edwards vs. Fitzpatrick.

I was brought up, Mr. Speaker, under the British system of justice, and you all know it is a rule of British justice that every man in this country must have a fair and a free trial, that the evidence for and against him shall be heard, and that both parties shall have access to the court to give their version of the case.

I put it to hon. members of the House: Is this a fair trial to give to the defendant in the case of Edwards vs Fitzpatrick? The hon. gentleman asks us to sit here not as judges but as jurors and to render a verdict upon the facts as he has stated them, without giving the accused, or the defendant, an opportunity of stating his version of the case. Is that fair? Is that British justice?

I want to emphasize the further point that there are jurors in this case who do not stand indifferent as between Edwards and Fitzpatrick. It is a rule of British justice that when a juror is not indifferent as between the King and the accused, he shall stand aside and not be allowed to decide upon the facts of the case. The member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) told us that he was not concerned with the law in this case; that he did not want any instruction to the members of this House—the jurors in this case—on questions of law. Is that British justice? What would he say, for instance, if in some famous trial, after the judge had charged the jury upon the points of law, one of the jurors called upon to decide on the questions of fact stood up and said: "Your Lordship, away with your questions of law. We do not want to know any law in this case; we want to decide it according to the facts as we wish to see them, not according to the facts as they have been placed before the court."

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the hon. gentleman who said: "hear, hear" be good enough to stand up?

Mr. BURNHAM: What does the hon. member wish to know?

Mr. DEVLIN: I was not referring to the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham).

Mr. McLEOD: Is the hon. gentleman asserting that it is not the right of the jury to decide the facts in any case heard before them? I say to him that it is absolutely the right of the jury to decide the facts.

Mr. DEVLIN: My hon. friend is a lawyer and he must know well that I am not propounding any such doctrine. It is perfectly within the province of the jury to decide upon questions of fact. But let me ask the hon. gentleman: is it not within the province of the judge to instruct the jury upon questions of law? Will he be fair and answer that question?

Mr. McLEOD: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: The judges in this case are the law officers of the Crown, who tell us that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick had a legal right to keep the money. Are we to take that into consideration, or are we not? Will the hon. gentleman again be fair and tell me what his view is on that point?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should confine his remarks to his discussion of the subject before the House, and not address another hon. gentleman.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then I ask you, Mr. Speaker, at the present moment the judge of this court, whether you would simply take the facts of a case brought before you and set aside all the law, where the case had to do with facts and law? I take your silence, Mr. Speaker, as indicating that you thoroughly agree with me.

With the statements that we have before us—the statement of the mover of the resolution and some of his friends and the statement of the Government advised by the law officers of the Crown—what can we poor mortals, layman jurors, decide in this case? Have we not the right to ask that the defendant at least be heard in some way before we decide this case against him? Unless that right is granted, Sir—that right which is a principle of British justice—I propose to vote against the resolution.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the legal luminaries on both sides of the House and have come to the conclusion that every hon. member must have come to: That this is really not a legal, but a moral question. With regard to the moral question—the fact that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has agreed to leave it to the judgment of this House, notwithstanding the fact that he knows the packed jury and the mentality of them—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that remark.

Mr. READ: Well, I withdraw that remark. —notwithstanding the nature of the jury, I am perfectly satisfied that in his own mind Sir Charles Fitzpatrick stands acquitted, as stainless as a star. Now, to give you my own attitude I shall paraphrase a few words from that grand old moral philosopher, Robbie Burns:

> Who made the heart, 'tis He alone
> Decidedly can try us;
> He knows each chord, its various tone,
> Each spring its various bias.
> Then at the balance let's be mute,
> We never can adjust it;
> What's done we partly can compute
> But know not what's resisted.
> Then, gently scan your brother man,
> Still gentler Charles Fitzpatrick;
> Tho' he has gang a kennin'wrang
> His company's full of bad tricks.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion negatived.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): A question of principle has been raised today in the discussion of this whole question. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) stated that in his opinion the money had been unduly taken. Whether it was legally or illegally taken, so long as it was unduly taken, it should have been returned to the treasury. I will not lay very much stress on the question whether the money has been taken legally or illegally, but I will call to my assistance another principle which has been applied ever since Confederation. I refer to the separation of the three distinct powers which are at the foundation of our constitution—the executive power, the judicial power and the legislative power. It has been the constant practice of all statesmen not to allow any one power to trespass on the province of another. The executive power, the province of which is well defined by our constitution, should not trespass on the legislative power. That is one of the reasons why we so much object to the method of procedure by Order in Council. We consider that by the method of procedure by Order in Council, the executive power is trespassing upon the province of the legislative power. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has, in this resolution, asked us to substitute the legislative power for the judicial power. It is the duty of this House to enact laws, but it is not the duty of this House or of this Parliament to pass judgment on the laws that this Parliament has enacted.

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Thursday, March 27, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

BRITISH AMBASSADOR AT WASHINGTON.

CABLE FROM RT. HON. SIR ROBERT BORDEN DENYING NEWSPAPER RUMOURS.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, from time to time press despatches from abroad have erroneously associated the name of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister with the position of British Ambassador at Washington. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister, and I have received from him to-day this cable:—

Paris, March 26, 1919.

Acting Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

You are authorized to state publicly that I am not considering the post of British Ambassador at Washington, and that it is my intention to return to Canada and resume my duties as Prime Minister as soon as the work of the Peace Conference will permit.

Borden.

DEATH OF SENATOR TAYLOR.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): There occurred in the Capital yesterday an event which I feel the members of this House would not desire should pass without fitting and appropriate reference. I allude to the sudden death of the Hon. George Taylor. As is known to the members of this House, the hon. gentleman was a member of the Senate, having been appointed to that body in 1911, but it was through his long association with this chamber that he was best known to parliamentarians and to the public throughout Canada. In the general election of 1882 he was returned with a majority of less than 300, and at each ensuing general election he was re-elected by a gradually increasing majority, which in the year 1911 had reached nearly 1,000. He was a member of the House of Commons for almost thirty years, serving under the premierships of Macdonald, Abbott, Thompson, Tupper, Bowell, Laurier.

The late Senator Taylor belonged to a generation of public men that is fast passing away. In his earlier days party spirit ran high and men were strong partisans. Senator Taylor was a staunch party men, and there was never any doubt as to where he stood upon a public question. He had the most implicit and abiding faith in the tenets of the Conservative party, and his devotion and loyalty to its leaders were unbounded. As has been the case with almost all men of his type, his strong partisanship in no wise prevented his being held in high esteem and respect by his political opponents. I am sure that the House will support me in saying that he was a man who was always well liked by both sides in this chamber.

For a period of twenty-five years he was Chief Whip of the Conservative party, and he enjoyed in very marked degree the personal friendship and confidence of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. I know that he also enjoyed the esteem and respect of the late leader of the Opposition, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and there was no man in the councils of the Conservative party whose advice was held in higher regard by Sir Robert Borden, the present Prime Minister, than was that of the late Senator Taylor. In addition to the confidence which was reposed in him by his leaders, and which he continuously enjoyed, he was popular with the rank and file of the Conservative party, and indeed, as I have stated, of all members of the House. In his own constituency, which I have the honour to represent in Parliament to-day, he was regarded as the foremost citizen of the town of Gananoque, in which he had lived since early manhood. The late Senator was a man of fine public spirit and good works; a man of high benevolence, whose benefactions were many and most generous. I think the outstanding feature of his personality was his exceeding kindness of heart, which endeared him to all who knew him. He was never so happy as when doing a kindness to a neighbour or extending a helping hand to any of his constituents, or to any with whom he might be acquainted, or even chance to meet casually. In his constituency and here at Ottawa, where he was best known, he was regarded, and rightly so, as a man of most sterling integrity and probity of character. He will be greatly missed by his associates in both Houses of Parliament. I am sure that this House will join with me in an expression of deep regret at his passing away, and of sympathy with his widow and other members of his family circle in the bereavement they have sustained.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we are all pleased to join in the handsome tribute paid to the memory of the late Senator Taylor by the leader of the Government. By his death we are, Mr. Speaker, once more reminded of the uncertainties of life, that we are merely pilgrims in this land, and that our sojourn here is but a transient one. The departed senator was for many years a conspicuous figure in the public life of this country, he having occupied a great many municipal, provincial and federal positions, to all of which he brought a full sense of responsibility and of public service, and, as has been well said by the leader of the Government, he also brought to them an extraordinary amount of energy and devotion. We all remember him with respect and kindly feelings, for he was a sincere and faithful friend and a man upon whom at all times the country and his friends could depend, for he held decided views, and there was no misunderstanding his attitude where the interests of this country were concerned. I wish to connect myself, as, I am sure, my hon. friends on this side of the House do, with what has been so appropriately said in regard to the memory of our departed friend, Senator Taylor.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER DAMS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) if there is anything new in connection with the project of damming the St. Lawrence? During the concluding stages of the war a request was made to the Canadian Government, and referred to the International Waterways Commission, to the effect that a company, in order to produce war material, should be allowed to increase its power capacity, and permission was granted to that company by the commission to dam the St. Lawrence at a certain point in the river, but for the period of the war only. I would like to know if that permission has been withdrawn now that the war is over.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is very little to be said in answer to the question of the hon. member for Maisonneuve. The matter has been under review departmentally, and a departmental report on the subject is being prepared, upon the receipt of which it will be submitted to a board recently constituted, known as the Dominion Power Board. I may add that that board, which is composed of the leading engineers in the Government service, has now surveys and investigations under way in respect to various portions of the St. Lawrence, and is also utilizing the investigations made by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and by other bodies; all that information will be utilized and brought to bear upon the determination of the question as soon as the departmental report is submitted.

RETURNS NOT BROUGHT DOWN.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I have a list of thirty-seven orders for returns voted last session. It seems to me that it is only reasonable the Government should have these brought down without further delay, and I would ask the Acting Prime Minister if he will see that those orders are brought down.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would ask my hon. friend to give me a list of them. I shall interest myself to see that they are brought down as quickly as possible.

ADJOURNMENT OVER EASTER.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Mr. Speaker, a rumour that recently went around the corridors of this building has, I observe, blossomed out in the public press by way of information that the Easter recess this year will be one of three weeks' duration. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister if, in view of the great amount of public business requiring attention in Parliament, the Government have it in mind to give countenance to any such unjustifiable waste of time?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The statement is without foundation and has not been drawn to my attention by any one except my hon. friend, although I think I saw something of it in the press. An announcement by the Government as to the Easter recess will be made in due course. My own view would be that the recess should not be of undue length, because it is highly desirable that Parliament should proceed as rapidly as possible with the public business.

OVERSEAS MAIL—RIMOUSKI.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With your leave, Mr. Speaker, might I ask the member of the Government who represents the Postmaster General if it is true that Halifax has been substituted for Rimouski for the reception of the trans-Atlantic mails?

Mr. ROWELL: I will make inquiries and give my hon. friend the information tomorrow.

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a matter of keen and widespread public interest at the present time is that of daylight saving. The Government has received numerous—I had almost said innumerable—communications from various sections of the community both in favour of the continuation of the legislation of last year and against such legislation. The question is not a party one and it involves no question of political principle of which I am aware, and I think it is desirable in the public interest that there should be a free discussion by the members of this House, representing, as they do, all sections and all interests of the Dominion, upon the subject. With that in view I intimated to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr McKenzie) this morning, and the information was also conveyed to the Whips on both sides of the House, that when the Orders of the Day were reached I would move that the House to proceed to a notice of motion by the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Cooper), appearing as No. 46 on the Notices of Motion on the Order Paper. The resolution is as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to re-enact at once Chapter 2, Statutes of 1918, "The Daylight-Saving Act, 1918."

It has appeared to the Government that such a discussion as I think we shall have will bring out the opposite points of view held on this subject and the arguments by which they are sustained. I therefore move:

That the House do now proceed to Notices of Motion, No. 46.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Does the leader of the House say that the Government has no policy on this matter?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This motion is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH: I rise to a point of order. This motion should have the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The unanimous consent of the House is not necessary. It is competent for the Government to move that a certain Order of the Day be proceeded with.

Motion agreed to.

The House thereupon proceeded to the Order: "Notices of Motions."

Mr. RICHARD CLIVE COOPER (Vancouver South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to re-enact at once Chapter 2, Statutes of 1918, "The Daylight Saving Act, 1918."

He said: In deference to requests received from large centres of population all over the country I bring this matter before the House in order that hon. gentlemen may express their opinion with regard to it.

In the matter of daylight saving there is a clear, dividing line between two conflicting interests. On the one side we have the dwellers in the cities and towns, and on the other the farming interests. The question is: whose claims are the stronger? I am not going into the subject in detail, but I wish to point out that while the dwellers in the cities and towns are practically unanimous in their approval of daylight saving, the farmers are not. Many farmers all over Canada, particularly in the West, would gladly support daylight saving legislation.

I do not intend to deal with this question in the light of any precedent; that Germany, England and France have found daylight saving of value does not matter. To my mind the question is whether the re-enactment of the Daylight Saving Act would benefit the majority of the people of Canada. I believe the largest number of people in Canada reside in the cities and large towns and work within the confines of four walls —in offices, stores, laundries, factories,— where the ventilation leaves much to be desired. As they are in the majority, the demands of these people for an extra few hours of daylight throughout the summer months must be given consideration. Moreover, the desire of the mothers and the children to get out in the sunlight after the father has come home from work must be regarded by all reasonable men who desire to conserve and improve the greatest asset in our national life; the children.

Reading the speeches dealing with this matter last year, I was impressed by the fact that mention of a very large labouring class was carefully omitted. I refer to the miners of Canada, who, with their wives and children, embrace some three hundred and fifty thousand persons. Only the dwellers in cities and the farmers were mentioned in the discussion of the matter last year; an odd fisherman or two was brought into it, I think, but not to make any matter. So that if we consider the wishes of the miners we shall find—as I know from a conversation I had to-day—that they sincerely desire to have the extra hour of daylight during the summer months. They work for the most part in the darkness under ground, and they will appreciate the extra time which the daylight saving enactment will enable their wives and children to spend in the sunlight with them.

A daylight saving enactment comes into effect in the United States on the 30th day of this month, and if we do not follow the example set by our big neighbour to the south, a great deal of confusion is bound to result. I should like to point to a lesson to be learned from the great war. Up to the spring of 1918 the Allied armies were struggling along under a divided command, and the results were not such as we desired. But from the time that we came under one undivided command, that of Marshal Foch, our success was speedy and was continued until it culminated in victory and the Armistice on November 11, 1918. I submit that application of the principle that brought us success in that case can be made to the action of Canada and the United States with regard to daylight saving.

It has been very truly said that the farmers are the backbone of the country. But if that backbone is too rigid, it becomes a detriment to many of the country's interests. The farmers are divided on this question. Those who live close to towns and railways are opposed to daylight saving, while those who live at a distance from the towns and railways are more or less indifferent. In the West there are large farming communities of foreign settlers, the Doukhobors and the Mennonites, for instance, who own huge tracts of land and care nothing for the movement of the hands of the clock. If a vote were taken on this question among the farmers of the West and the votes of the farmers living close to towns and railways balanced against the votes of foreign settlers and farmers living distant from towns and railways, the majority would be in favour of daylight saving. I believe—it will not be denied that for many years, even before I came to Canada and probably before I was born, the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific have been living under artificial time. That time has always been dictated by the railway companies. Would it hurt the farmer in any way to add another little bit of artificial time? I submit it would not. I sincerely believe that in this Daylight Saving there is no obstacle to the best interest of the farming communities, and in every centre of population throughout Canada there is a strong and insistent demand for it. I have had, from all parts of Canada, a large number of communications, only one of which, which arrived at 2.20 p.m. to-day, but which covers Canada from coast to coast, I purpose reading:

> The Canadian Credit Mens' Trust Association, Limited, representing the wholesale trade from coast to coast strongly endorse re-enactment Daylight Saving law commercial classes largely preponderating over agriculture minority and living in large centres would receive great benefit without injuring agricultural classes can we do anything to strengthen your hands?

The endorsement therein contained is, I believe, the sentiment of the majority of the people of Canada.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve and Gaspé): I should like to state very briefly the reasons why I support the motion moved by the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Cooper). I have the honour to represent, for the time being, two constituencies, one a farming constituency, the other a manufacturing constituency. I remember when the Daylight Saving Bill was introduced into the House last year by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), there was very strong opposition to it, and if I was pleased at anything, it was that the Government, through Sir George Foster, had the courage to stand by its guns and see the Bill through. I trust the Government will, at the earliest opportunity, take the bull by the horns and bring in a similar Bill to the one introduced by Sir George Foster last year. That is, however, only an aside.

I represent a farming constituency in which this daylight saving was in force last year as it was in all other parts of Canada, and from the county of Gaspé I received no protests whatever against the measure. On the contrary, I do not think it affects the farmers or the fishermen of that county. They are, and have to be, early birds in any case in order to earn their living. At three o'clock in the morning the Gaspé fisherman is in his barge sailing for the banks in the Baie des Chaleurs, and he does not even look at the hands of the clock. But I also represent the manufacturers and the labour element of Maisonneuve, in which constituency the Daylight Saving measure was in force all last year, and from that important section I received very many letters requesting me to support a renewal of the measure. That is the reason why I stand to-day as a seconder of the motion moved by the hon. member for Vancouver. I believe, moreover, that, in the interest of the health of the people of Canada the measure should be put in force again. It worked very well last year, and I was impressed by the figures from Washington quoted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whereby it was proved beyond peradventure that millions upon millions of tons of coal had been and would be saved as a result of the enactment of the Daylight Saving measure. I would be interested to know what Mr. Magrath, the able Fuel Controller, thinks of this question. It is true the war is over, but our people must learn to save coal, because we may have labour troubles amongst the miners of Pennsylvania and also of eastern and western Canada, and our people may see the advantage of saving coal and thereby saving light.

Another point which impresses me is this. Whatever any one may say, we are living side by side with the great American Republic to the south, and although we must not be merged with that great republic in all the doings of its legislators, still, there are measures passed by the United States Congress which affect the whole of our national life in Canada. Congress has recently passed a Bill which will bring Daylight Saving into force in the United States on the 31st of this month or on the 1st of April. This will affect, amongst other things, chiefly the transportation business of both countries, and I am in a quandary to understand how the railway systems of Canada are going to conform with the time-tables of the railway systems of the United States. If the time in Canada is an hour behind the time in the United States, how are connections to be made at the boundary line? Will all the trains stop one hour at the boundary line, or what will they do? This is one reason why I think a Daylight Saving Bill should be reintroduced this year, and if it is I will give it my hearty support.

Mr. JOHN BEST (Dufferin): Last year, when the Daylight Saving Bill was before the House, I opposed it because I believed that we were here to legislate for the greatest good of the greatest number, and my opinion is still that the great majority of the people of Canada are to-day opposed to daylight saving. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) said the other day that the farmers get up early in the morning. I am a farmer and I get up early in the morning, but there have been times when I have had to get up in the late hours of the night, and I can say, as a farmer, knowing this to be a fact, that last summer thousands of farmers throughout the Dominion got up in the late hours of the night in order to take their milk and other perishable goods to the station in time for the train. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cooper) said that the intention of this legislation was to increase the amount of daylight by one hour. If any man in Canada can tell me how this Government, or any other government, can increase the time of daylight by one hour, then I shall sit down and say no more. The few men in the towns and cities who are asking for daylight saving are not the men who get up at daylight; they are the men who remain asleep in bed until eight, nine, or ten o'clock in the day, and they want other people, who have to get up in the morning, to do their work at that time, while they drive around in automobiles. Last year, when the Daylight Saving Bill was before the House, I asked if any farmers' organizations had requested that it be passed, and the minister said, no. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cooper) is absolutely mistaken when he says the farmers of this country are divided over this question, because I believe they are against the re-enactment of a daylight saving almost to a man. Nor can I understand why he says that the people in the cities and towns and villages are in favour of daylight saving; I believe that at least half of these people are against it. Many of this latter class have told me they are opposed to it because they have to get up an hour earlier in the morning. A working man who goes to work at seven has to get up at six for his breakfast. If the time is changed, he will have to get up at five. Would any sane man in this House say that the labouring class in this country want to get up at five o'clock in the morning? The hon. member also says that daylight saving would save fuel and light. I am a farmer myself and I know what I am talking about, and I say that during the last six weeks which daylight saving was in force last year, more fuel and light was consumed in the morning than under the old system. Imagine a man having to get up at four or five o'clock in the morning during the latter part of September and October, and having to put on a fire and burn light. Under the old system he would have gone to bed about the same time, I admit, but he would have saved fuel and light in the morning.

The hon. member also says that the farmers near the cities and towns and villages are not opposed to daylight saving. I want to tell my hon. friend that there is not a class of farmer so much opposed to daylight saving as those living near the towns and cities and villages, and for this reason: The labouring man who comes out from the town or village to work for the farmer during haying and harvest sees his fellow-workers in the nearby town quitting work at five in the evening, and naturally gets dissatisfied. There are cabinet ministers sitting here to-day who will tell you that their experience has been that it is this class of farmers which is the most opposed to daylight saving, for the reason I have given; and I cannot understand how my hon. friend should make such a contention. Any man who knows anything at all about farming knows that from haying until winter comes, an hour in the evening is worth two in the morning, because a farmer cannot start haying or harvesting before eight; and if the time is changed again this year it will mean he will lose an hour at night.

Why does the farmer living farther away from the towns and villages not want daylight saving? Let me give a concrete case, which is illustrative of conditions all over the Dominion. In the county I have the honour to represent a mail courier starts his trip twelve miles from one of the towns.

Now he has to be in that town at 8.15, and every man, woman and child in the villages along the route are opposed to the time being changed, because it means they will have to get up at three instead of four o'clock in the morning to catch that stage. This carrier has to get up now at four in the morning to feed his horses, and if the time is changed he will have to get up at three. I think almost as many men from the cities and towns have spoken to me against daylight saving as the farmers themselves. It is true that telegrams in favour of daylight saving have been sent to me by a few men; but who are they? Manufacturers who have nothing to do but ride around the country in their automobiles. Last year, just because a few men asked the Government to put a daylight saving measure through, this Government said they were obliged to do it—had pledged themselves to do it at the election. The men who made those representations to the Government did not represent three per cent of the population of this country.

Why is it conditions are so unsettled all the world over to-day, and unrest and anarchy prevail in many parts of the civilized world? It is because one class of people is being set against another, and I would ask whether it makes for harmony for the hon. member for Vancouver to stand up in this House and almost ask the Government to defy the farmers and say: We will enact this law.

Mr. COOPER: Will the hon. member quote any word of mine that was at all along the line the hon. member suggests?

Mr. BEST: I will. I think a sufficient justification for my remark was the hon. member's statement that we should not look to the farmers of this country, but should inquire what the people in the cities and towns want, and then enact a daylight saving measure. I say not only in connection with this Bill, but with every Bill that comes before the House we should try and compose our little differences and live in harmony together as one nation. We have simply got to do it; there never was a time in the history of Canada when there was so much disunion among the people as at present. One of the Ottawa papers said the other day that the only excuse the farmers gave for wanting the time to remain as at present, was because it was God's time. I say that is an insult to the farmers of this country, who have very good reasons for wanting the time to remain as it is. In the rural districts many children have to go one or two or three miles to school. At present they can help their parents by doing some of the chores before they go, but if the clock is set ahead they will not be able to help their parents in any shape or form.

The cheese and dairy men of this country do not want daylight saving. Imagine asking these men who now get up at four o'clock in the morning, to get up at three and milk fifty or seventy-five cows and take the milk to the station, while ninety per cent of the people in the towns and cities are asleep in bed. I made a trip in my automobile a short time ago—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Does the hon. member get up at seven in the morning and ride in an automobile?

Mr. BEST: I get up at five. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the farmers of this country have not the right to own an automobile? The farmers are the people who feed these men lying asleep in their beds, and if they are not entitled to an automobile I should like to know who is. Well, what did I find as I drove through those towns? I passed many men driving along with their milk and cream.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it in Dufferin county that these people were asleep?

Mr. BEST: I say that ninety per cent of the people in these towns were asleep while the farmers were already at work and had milked their cows. How can a farmer get hired help from a village or city during haying and harvest, if daylight saving is re-enacted? The farmers of this country have to crowd practically their whole year's work into five or six months during the summer, and when they hire men from the villages and towns during haying and harvest the men are not willing to work until six or seven in the evening when they see their fellow-workers in the towns quitting work at five. If the Bill is introduced and is made law, I am of the opinion, Sir, that there will ensue a greater agitation than is likely to be caused by any other Bill on the Order Paper. I do not suggest that it will cause any considerable harm, but the people of this country are looking askance at Parliament and there seems to be a general feeling that if their wishes are to be ignored to meet the whims of the few it is time that they were organized in an endeavour to obtain justice and fair play. I would, therefore, earnestly request the Government to consider this matter with extreme care and not to be influenced by a few telegrams that have been received here. Telegrams, Sir! Why, I can get from one township in my county more telegrams deprecating the daylight saving scheme than all the cables that are to-day in this House. I read about two dozen telegrams the other day obviously signed by one who was trying to convince people that every man, woman and child in his neighbourhood favoured daylight saving. We have too many petitions and resolutions, and altogether too many telegrams sent to hon. members, purporting to be representative of popular opinion on this subject, when, in nearly every case, the man who has sent the telegram probably does not represent even all the members of his own family.

The farmers have a strong argument against this scheme. During the past four years they have risen early in the morning and retired late at night in order that they might, as far as possible, comply with the urgent request of the Government to increase production in view of the crisis that faced the nations in the matter of food supplies. They worked admirably to save the situation, and in return are their wishes now to be ignored? Why should not the farmers be allowed to observe the standard of time to which they have been accustomed? The hon. member is apprehensive of trouble at the boundary. I admit there may be trouble at the boundary; I am not disposed to dispute that probability; but would that trouble be at all comparable to the difficulties that would arise through every school section in the Dominion having a different time? In our county, people were unable to get their children off to school in the morning. Many of the trustees interviewed the inspector and desired him to revert to the old time. He saw the situation and agreed. In the confusion that resulted from the change of time there arose serious difficulties that cost the farmers considerable money. A farmer breaks his machine and has to stop work at three o'clock in the afternoon. He starts for the town or village believing he will get there before six o'clock to have the necessary repairs attended to. When he reaches the shop he finds that it was closed at five o'clock, and in consequence he loses a day, which means a good deal to him in the busy season. Now, this Dominion has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in an attempt to keep men on the farms, but how can they expect to retain the rural population if they are to be ignored in such important matters as this. I would ask my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cooper) to produce, if he can, a letter or a telegram from any organized farmers' institution in Canada expressing approval of the daylight saving scheme. I do not believe he can, and I hope the Government will see that the wishes of the people are respected in this matter, and that whatever laws may be enacted we shall not have any antagonism between the cities and the towns, and the country.

Mr. H. E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec County): Mr. Speaker, I represent one of the largest constituencies in the province of Quebec, and I think that the daylight saving law passed last year had the approbation of all the people in my section. Speaking for the city of Quebec, whose views I think I voice, I desire to state that if the Government introduces this measure I shall support it.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): I must congratulate the Government and its leader on the course they are taking in this matter. In no possible sense is it a political question, nor can it be regarded as such; and while the tone of the remarks of my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr Best) will probably be excused because he is a farmer and talks about something from which he has suffered, still I think the best judgment of the House will be that no attempt is being made to set race against race or class against class in this matter, and it is one that each hon. gentleman will deal with according to his best judgment. I might say, as a resident of the great city of Winnipeg, that we adopted Daylight Saving two years ago, regardless of any action of the Federal Parliament, and the people of that city were very much gratified with the result. The residents of Winnipeg were pleased with Daylight Saving, and I believe will continue it, although there were some difficulties which resulted from its operation. For example, there was a difference between our railway time and the city time, but there was not very much complaint with regard to that, and if I represented Winnipeg city in Parliament I would vote to have Daylight Saving continuously. However, I represent a rural, not an urban constituency.

I received a few minutes ago a telegram which I shall read to the House:

Winnipeg, Man., March 27, 1919.

R. L. Richardson,
House of Commons.

This organization, after fullest consideration of subject with business men, farmers, labourers, is practically unanimous in favour of continuation of Daylight Saving plan in Canada this year, and urges Government to take immediate action to this end.

Winnipeg Board of Trade,
W. H. Carter, President.

I am surprised at the statement in the telegram as to the attitude of the farmers, because my constituents are generally opposed to daylight saving. In the West the sun rises very early and sets very late, and it makes a very long day. As against that telegram I have received a letter from the Minister of Education of Manitoba, the Hon. Dr. Thornton, which I shall read to the House, because it is a very important declaration, and should have a considerable influence on the members from Manitoba with regard to the vote which they may give on this resolution.

Winnipeg, Manitoba, March 6, 1919.

R. L. Richardson, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Re Daylight Saving Law.

Dear Sir:—I wish to call your attention to a resolution passed unanimously by the annual convention of the Manitoba School Trustees' Association protesting against the re-enactment of the above law; also to a similar resolution passed unanimously by the Legislature of the Province of Manitoba. I wish further to add my own protest because of the difficulties which arose in connection with practically all the rural schools of the province. The nature of the difficulty will be more clearly appreciated by reading the enclosed copy of a letter received from one School Board. This is only one of a great many dealing with the same situation. I hope the Parliament of Canada will not re-enact this measure.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) R. S. Thornton,
Minister of Education.

Dr. Thornton has not sent me the first resolution to which he refers, at least it was not enclosed in the letter, but I take his statement as authoritative that such a resolution was passed by the Manitoba School Trustees' Association. In the resolution passed by the legislature you have the consensus of the opinion of that province as represented by the provincial members

Now here is a copy of a resolution passed by a School District:

At a meeting of the School Board of the Elgin Consolidated School District, held on February 27th, a resolution was passed that this School Board appeal to you to use your influence against the re-enactment of the so-called Daylight Saving law. Last year we found it to be entirely unworkable in our Consolidated School, and had to set our school hours at 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. This led us out of one difficulty, viz.: the starting time for the vans, but immediately we found our noon hour conflicting with the meal hour of the parents living in town. This was a cause of constant friction.

[Mr. Richardson.]

I may explain for the benefit of hon. gentlemen who may not understand the reference to "vans" in the resolution, that in the province of Manitoba many of the school districts have large wagons, or vans, which they send about the road allowances to collect the children. That is particularly desirable in cold weather when blizzards might overtake the children, as sometimes happens, with fatal or disastrous results. Under the circumstances I take it that the opinion of rural Manitoba is strongly against daylight saving. My hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best) has already advanced arguments showing the difficulty of farm help carrying on operations early in the morning because of the dew on the grass, and I may say that difficulty has been a very serious one in the West. Furthermore, farm labourers raise objection to daylight saving as under it they have to work longer hours than those men who work in manufacturing towns. Therefore they want the hours set at the same time, but not under daylight saving, because it operates rather seriously and entails hardship upon the farmers. Accordingly, as the representative of a rural constituency I shall feel obliged to cast my vote against the resolution.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (Kent): Having the privilege of representing possibly one of the largest rural constituencies, which also contains a large city and a large town, I am in much the same position as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. From the cities of this country there comes some request for the enactment of a Daylight Saving Law, and I have received a request of that kind from one of the largest towns of my constituency. In every other section of my constituency, however, resolutions have been passed by the county and township councils asking me to oppose Daylight Saving and to vote against the re-enactment of such legislation.

I agree with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) as to the inconvenience which will result in getting children to school if the daylight saving law is re-enacted. In the rural parts of my constituency there are children who have to go a distance of a mile and a half to three miles in order to attend school, and under daylight saving the mothers of those children are obliged to rise an hour earlier in order to get them off each morning. This legislation has been opposed not only by women in the rural districts, but also by women in the towns and cities. This is a fact which hon. members must not overlook, because we expect that at the next general election the women of this country will have a voice in the election of representatives to Parliament.

As far as the labouring men are concerned, we expect that sooner or later in this country—legislation has already been introduced in some of the legislatures—an eight-hour or nine-hour day law will be called for. If such a law were in operation the men in our industries would quit work at four o'clock in the afternoon, instead of five o'clock, which would leave an extremely long afternoon between the time of stopping work and retiring to rest.

As regards the saving of coal likely to result from daylight saving, I do not see much argument in it. Daylight saving only operates from the 30th of March until the 30th of October, which period comprises the warmest months of the year, so that not very much coal would be saved in that time.

The question of the towns passing by-laws has been referred to. In some cases by-laws have already been passed compelling business houses to close at nine o'clock, even on Saturday nights with the result of greatly inconveniencing many workingmen, and business men who sell goods after the stipulated hour for closing are subject to a fine, which is another great hardship. The question of the effect on farming operations of daylight saving has been referred to. In the southwestern parts of Ontario crops are raised which are known as hoe crops, and it is utterly impossible to hoe some of these crops while the dew is on them. That is the case with the bean crop and the sugar beet crop. There are a number of other crops of which the same might be said.

I believe that the House is now thoroughly conversant with both sides of the question, and to save a prolonged debate I will move, seconded by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Ross) to replace the words "it is expedient to re-enact at once," by the words "it is not expedient to re-enact until this day six months," which would postpone the matter for the present

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The motion as amended will read as follows: ,

That in the opinion of this House it is not expedient to re-enact, until this day six months, Chapter 2, Statutes of 1918, "The Daylight Saving Act, 1918."

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH (Ontario, South): When this question was introduced last year I took strong ground against it, and I am more than ever convinced that I was right in my action at that time, by the support which I have since received in the country. It is true that I am not, like my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best), perhaps a farmer according to his strict interpretation because I live upon the farm where I was born, whereas that hon. gentleman, a number of years ago, left the farm upon which he had lived.

I am not going to discuss the question as to whether this legislation is right, I shall leave that in the hands of the House. I will say, however, that I was more than delighted that this amendment has been moved by the hon. member for Kent. Any one who has ever lived upon a farm or been in close personal connection with farmers absolutely agrees with the amendment which has been moved to-day. Had the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) not moved his amendment, I would have gone one step further and tested the opinion of this House upon the resolution. As a farmer and as one in close touch with farm life, I may be allowed to say that if the Government of this country would think for a moment of the result in Manitoulin, in South Huron, and in the northern part of the county which I have the honour to represent, I do not imagine they would have allowed this to go so far. The farmers —and I am one of them—have a right to their own opinions, and they have the right to give expression to their opinions in this House, and while I do not say they are always right—neither do I say my hon. friends from the Great West are always right—I am bound to say that on this question of daylight saving the farmers of the province of Ontario are absolutely in touch with the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Kent, and which I propose to support.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, when this question came up last year it had the support of the Government, and I am sorry to note to-day that the Government has not the courage of its convictions of last year in this matter. The measure was introduced last year by the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), but unfortunately for those who are in favour of the measure the hon. minister is not here to-day to back it with the authority which he gave to it on the last occasion. I would like to ask the hon. members of this House who are opposed to this measure why it is that practically the whole civilized world has passed legislation in favour of daylight saving. I would like the hon. members of this House to tell me what country in Europe has not adopted a measure of this kind. The United States has adopted this measure. After all there are some farmers in the United States who are doing quite as well as the farmers in this country, and yet there was no protest from them. How is it that in the whole of Europe—in France, in England, in Germany, in Austria, a measure of this kind is in operation? I do not think that the farmers of this country are one whit less able to carry on their business than those of other countries, and it seems to me that it is a reflection on them to say that they cannot.

When this question was before the House last year we had a learned disquisition upon it by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he cited some facts which I think it might be useful for us to bear in mind. Some gentlemen of this House seem to have very short memories, or they may be like the famous Bourbon family, they never learn and they never forget. The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who must be considered to be one of the high priests of the Unionist party, gave some information to this House which I think it is well we should hear to-day. He stated that a parliamentary committee was appointed by the British House of Commons some few years ago to study this whole question of daylight saving. This committee did not restrict its energies to Great Britain alone, but it went on a roving commission throughout the whole of Europe, and it learned that the measure was in every respect beneficial, not only economically, but in regard to the morals and health of the people. That committee, in one of the paragraphs of its report, said:—

> We have devoted particular attention to the question of the effect of "summer time" on the health of children, and we have been glad to find that, in spite of certain statements which had been made to the contrary, the bulk of the evidence favours the conclusion that in the case of children also "summer time" has proved a success.

Then the report deals with the position of the employers:—

> The general view of employers as expressed in the replies to the questionnaires, was that their employees had taken full advantage of the extra hour's daylight; and that while the majority were not in a position, with so short a period of observation, to state positively whether or not an improvement in health had resulted, a number had noticed increased vitality in their workers, and in some cases an improvement in the standard of the work. Only one or two employers recorded the appearance of any ill effects in the shape of tiredness and irregular time keeping. We have had evidence from all sources of the value of the extra daylight to the very large number of workers who cultivate gardens and allotments.

There is a further paragraph with regard to agriculture, which may be of interest to our friends from the farming districts:—

> In spite of such difficulties as have been recorded, a very large majority of farmers and war agriculture committees are in favour of the renewal of the Act, and the majority even of those who are of opinion that it was not advantageous to agriculture consider that it should be renewed, as they recognize its great benefits to the community at large.
> Taking the whole of the evidence, we are satisfied that the great bulk of the working classes are favourable to summertime, and we are convinced that they stand to profit by it as much as, and in many cases more than, any other section of the community. Such real inconveniences as have been experienced will, we believe, be remedied with a little more experience of summertime conditions.

That is the report of the British parliamentary committee who, as I have already stated, made an exhaustive study of the subject throughout Europe. Now we find ourselves in this position, that every white civilized country in Europe and North America will be in favour of this measure, and the only country that will not be in favour of it, if this resolution is not put through, will be Canada. I ask hon. gentlemen of this House whether they wish this country to be put in that position or not.

Mr. J. E. SEXSMITH (East Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I was a little surprised at the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jacobs) who has just taken his seat, telling us that Austria-Hungary and Germany had this daylight saving record, and I wondered if he considered that that was a good recommendation for us. I would like to remind him that they have Bolshevism there and many other things that we do not want in Canada.

When this so-called daylight saving measure was up last year I opposed it, and I feel to-day that I was perfectly justified in my action, and I am convinced now that seventy-five per cent of the people of Canada are opposed to this legislation. It may have some advantages, but its disadvantages far outweigh them. The men that work from nine to ten hours a day, I do not care whether in the city or in the country, Mr. Speaker, oppose this measure. I know, for I have talked to city men who were working last year when this measure was brought down, and when it went into force on the first of April, they said: "We had just commenced to go to our work in the morning daylight, but when the clock was put back one hour we had to go by lamplight." There is no getting away from the fact that the people in Canada that are asking for this legislation to-day to be put on the statute-book are the class who go to work at ten o'clock in the morning, and some of them perhaps do not do any work at all; but the people who are opposing the measure are the people who work long hours. I know that sportsmen, lacrosse and baseball players, and golfers, are the people who are agitating, and I am sorry to say some of the newspaper editors have taken up the cudgels in their favour. We have all been discussing serious matters here during the last month. Canada is burdened with debt, and where are we going to get the products to pay that debt? Shall we get it by putting the hands of the clock ahead an hour? No, we must get it out of the earth, the mine, the field, the forest, the sea. The farmers to-day, and justly so, are opposing this measure as an unit from the Atlantic to the Pacific, simply because it was detrimental to them during its operation last year.

Many farmers in my district supply milk on contract to firms in Toronto, where the hon. member who edits the World (Mr. W. F. Maclean) comes from. I got off the early train at four o'clock one morning last year on my way home, and when I saw the farmers around the station at that hour I dodged off to the other side in order to meet as few of them as possible. In order to carry out their contracts these farmers were obliged to begin milking operations last year between three and four o'clock in the morning. Ordinarily the local train carrying the milk to the city leaves at six-forty in the morning, but when the hands of the clock were turned ahead, that practically meant that the train for Toronto left at five-forty. One man told me that at the end of the season he was absolutely played out because of the hours he had to keep. Is it reasonable, is it sensible, is it in the interests of this great country, that farmers shall be obliged to milk by lantern light not only in the winter, but in June and July as well? A farmer who has three or four children said to me: My older boy is twelve or thirteen years of age. His mother is not very strong, and before this daylight saving came in he used to do a little work in the morning before he went to school. But now we cannot get the children to go to bed an hour before sundown, and the result is that when the men get up and work an hour or two they must have their breakfast; then when the children get up their mother has to prepare a second breakfast. Not only does she lose the little services which the children formerly rendered before they went to school; she has imposed upon her the additional burden of getting a second breakfast.

I think that some of the schools asked the inspector to allow them to run under the old time, but he refused, and the schools were run on the new time, to the great disadvantage of all concerned.

I saw something in the Ottawa Journal a couple of mornings ago to the effect that the cities and towns and railroads should adopt the daylight saving and then let the isolated farmer "go hang," so to speak. Now, in harvest time the farmer always loses an hour or two in the morning, because he cannot draw in or run the binder before nine o'clock or half-past nine. Before the hands of the clock were changed he made no complaint about losing that time, but last year he lost not only an hour in the morning, but also an hour in the afternoon, because the men would not work after five o'clock. Only one municipality in my constituency continued to use the old time.

It is true that in the cities production in garden plots may have been increased under daylight saving. Out of patriotism, men and women, boys and girls, were working day and night, early and late, to produce as much as possible. But if the daylight saving measure is put into operation this year, many farmers who have to depend on hired help will be very careful about their operations. The newspapers are preaching to the people the doctrine of "get back on the land." Will this measure help to get the people back on the land? I contend that it will help to get them off the land. Many farmers throughout Ontario who have had to hire help are selling out and getting off the farm simply because of labour difficulties.

The arguments of the hon. gentlemen who have advocated the re-enactment of the daylight saving measure are very feeble. It is said that United States has adopted a measure of this kind for this year. I think I am right in saying that the measure adopted by the United States this year is simply a continuation of the measure passed the year before. A very strong feeling prevailed throughout the United States this year in favour of the repeal of the daylight saving measure, but the resolution was placed at the bottom of the list and the interested parties filibustered it. It was talked out and a decision never reached, as has sometimes been the case in this House; so that the daylight saving measure remained law in the United States this year. I am glad that our daylight saving legislation lasted only a year and that we have now the privilege of expressing our views with regard to it, and if necessary, of casting our vote for or against it. I sincerely trust that the Government will take into consideration the inadvisability of re-enacting this legislation, and that we shall have heard the last of it for this year.

Mr. GEORGE WILLIAM ANDREWS (Winnipeg Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the daylight saving legislation was brought down by the Government last year, I was strongly in support of it. Personally, I see nothing very much wrong with it to-day, but when I returned to my constituents last year—who, by the way, are not farmers, but real working men nevertheless—I found that the measure was not at all popular amongst those who started work at six or seven in the morning. It did not meet with the approval either of the men or of their wives, and I have no hesitation in saying that if a referendum could be taken in my constituency of Winnipeg Centre, where there are some eighty thousand people, the measure would be heavily defeated.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (Oxford South): It was generally understood throughout the country that the daylight saving legislation would not likely come before the House this session, and until I came into the chamber this afternoon I had not expected that this, the last resolution on the Order Paper, would come before us for consideration. It is generally recognized that after the House has been in session about four weeks, resolutions of private members placed on the Order Paper after that date, would have little or no chance of getting before the House.

I have no intention of going into this matter in detail, but I earnestly request every hon. member to consider carefully the signs of the times. A feeling of great unrest prevails in practically every country in the world to-day.

Many labour organizations throughout the country are not content with even an eight-hour day, but are now advocating for a six-hour day and that the old rate of wages should be maintained. Since the beginning of the war the cost of living has undoubtedly increased considerably throughout the world, and while many industrial workers in the towns and cities are receiving large wages, I believe many of them are unable to save more than they did when wages were much lower than at present. The result is that they naturally look at this question with an earnest desire that the cost of living should be considerably reduced. What will the trend be if all these agitations are complied with? Does any one think it possible that the cost of living in this country can be reduced under such conditions as reducing the hours of labour and moving the clock onward, by which many people can get their day's work done during the forenoon so that they will have the whole afternoon for play? Does any one think that by putting a full day's work in during the morning at the old rate of pay, the result which is so much desired at the present time can be achieved? The people who are producing the food for the world to-day are tired; while the war was on they laboured hard under difficulties and made great sacrifices. Perhaps some people will say that they did it largely through a desire to reap the advantages of high prices accruing as the result of their labour. That may be true in a number of instances, but, on the whole, I believe they did it through an honest desire to help win the war. What are the conditions throughout Canada to-day? The value of the field crops of Canada during the past year amounted to about $1,000,000,000. We have facing us at the present time an appalling debt, and when one takes a general survey of the physical features of our country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, where is the hope for the future based most strongly? Is it not from our soil, our fields, our forests, and our mines, that we hope to create the wealth necessary to overcome the serious condition with which we are confronted at this time? But it is rather significant that even under conditions as they were formerly without the short labouring day, without moving the clock on, the trend has been from the broad lands of Canada to the towns and cities, so that about one-half of our small population of around seven million people are to-day living in our towns and cities. That is not, from an economic standpoint, at all desirable, and that is why I protest when I hear people argue in favour of this so-called daylight saving. This is a most foolish name to apply to the measure, because it does not save daylight in any sense whatever and the name is a misnomer. In the county and province from which I come, the people who are engaged in the food production are almost, if not a unit in favour of leaving the time as it has always been previous to 1918, and I think their views are representative of the views of the majority of the people of Canada. I have received from almost every imaginable representative body in my constituency resolutions protesting against the re-enactment of this legislation. While I have received such resolutions from school trustees, insurance companies, farmers' organizations, municipal bodies, indeed, practically every organization in the county, I have received only one petition or resolution in favour of this measure from the members of a horticultural society in one of the towns. I have had from the people of the towns numerous individual requests urging that this measure be not re-enacted; that they are not at all in favour of it; and I think if there was any strong feeling in favour of it, petitions that it be re-enacted would have been received. But in view of the feeling throughout the country that this measure was not going to be reintroduced, one can understand why those who are agitating for it, who desire to have nearly the whole afternoon for themselves to play, got busy during the past few days and made the wires hot bombarding the Government in order to make it appear that there was an overwhelming sentiment throughout the country in favour of it, and I presume that is why we are discussing this question this afternoon. I would suggest that the Government consider impartially what is really in the best interests of the country. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) will have to do a great deal of hard thinking and figuring before he is in a position to secure the requisite revenue to meet the expenditures with which we are confronted, and I, therefore, suggest that nothing be done which will, in any way, discourage those who are creating the wealth that is needed to help us out of our present difficulty.

I have the honour to represent a county that is well-known as one of the greatest dairying districts in Canada. Last year a survey was made of 437 dairy farms in that county as regards the revenues and profits that the farmers on those farms were making. The term "scientific agriculture" is very often used nowadays and, if I do say it, scientific agriculture is applied in that county as well, if not better than in any other section of Canada. What was the result of this census—and let us remember that this was taken during a year when the returns for dairy products were higher than ever before in the history of the world? It was found that after allowing the farmer $500 for wages, he received, on his capital invested, 7 per cent.

We hear people saying that the farmers were profiteers during the war; that they have reaped enormous advantages as a result of the high prices; that many of them have become wealthy; that they have their automobiles; well, if there is in Canada any class of people who require automobiles to carry on their business, it is the farmers. The automobile is a business proposition with them; it is not a question of pleasure altogether; and if it were not for the fact that a farmer has something of that nature, he would not be able to carry on his business to-day. Notwithstanding what may be said about the farmer, it is a fact that the movement from the country to the city that has been going on to such a tremendous and alarming extent for so many years, has continued during the war to even a greater extent than before. From 1915 to 1917, in Ontario, there has been an actual decrease in the farming population of 37,867. Some one may say that is the result of so many men having enlisted.

That is largely true, for at the same time the cities have decreased to the extent of 10,736, and towns and villages increased to the extent of 744. The war is ended, so far as we can judge at present, but the last few months have witnessed in the older sections of Ontario the greatest number of exchanges of farms in the history of Canada; and the significant thing is that it is not the impulsive shortsighted farmers who jump from one conclusion to another who are selling their farms, but the hard-headed business men among them. And the people who are taking their place are very largely people of inexperience who imagine that conditions on the farms of Ontario are much more advantageous than they really are. I would suggest to the hon. members of this House, and particularly to those who are so anxious to have the afternoons to themselves for play, that they consider the effect on the cost of living which this so called daylight saving measure would have in this country, and I would urge them not to aggravate the present situation. There is no denying that a bad and bitter feeling is growing up between the urban and rural citizens of Canada: we cannot close our eyes to that fact, and the sooner we recognize that something will have to be done to remove this feeling, rather than aggravate it by mischievous legislation of this kind, the better it will be for all concerned. In the rural sections many of the children have to go a long distance to school, sometimes two or three miles, and if this measure is again adopted they will have to be dragged out of their beds in the morning to get them to school in time. Is that a condition we should have in this country, simply because it suits the convenience of those in the towns and cities who wish to have the whole afternoon or nearly so to themselves? This resolution if adopted will result in many more people selling their farms and moving into the towns and cities where their children can receive an education, which would be more difficult for them to receive in the country districts. Furthermore, there is nothing to prevent those who desire daylight saving from having it. There is no town or city in Canada that cannot pass a by-law bringing socalled daylight saving into effect, without interfering with people in other parts of the country.

It may be said that the United States have in effect a similar measure. The United States law of a year ago was to remain in force until repealed, differing in that respect from ours, which would have to be re-enacted. This year Congress rose with much business still not dealt with, and daylight saving as a result was automatically continued. I think it is generally conceded, however, that if the matter had come before Congress the law would have been repealed; so I do not think there is much force in the example of the United States. And as for making our law conform with theirs, why, that is hardly in keeping with the principle of autonomy of which we are so proud; and it is not exercising that initiative in our own affairs which we should exercise. Sometimes we lead even the United States.

I have spoken at greater length than I intended, but I have still not touched many important features, which, however, other speakers discussed fully, but I am satisfied that the arguments I have advanced ought to convince every-

5 p.m. one in this House that it is not in the interests of Canada under present conditions to have legislation of this kind put upon the statute book. Do not forget that self-denial will have to be practised by all the people of Canada, and do not imagine that it is the other fellow who will have to practise all of it, and that you can go scot-free. That idea is altogether too prevalent in this country. We must all make sacrifices in view of the conditions with which we are confronted, and I believe that if we face our difficulties with courage in a sound business-like way they will soon be overcome. I do not think anything will be gained by having this discussion this afternoon, and I regret exceedingly that the Government have seen fit to allow it to come up to-day. I think it would have been much better if the matter had been left in abeyance and nothing done to aggravate the feeling which undoubtedly exists to-day between urban and rural citizens.

Mr. WALTER DAVY COWAN (Regina): The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) sought to chide the Government for not having the courage of their convictions and bringing down their policy on this question, and the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sutherland) practically took the same attitude. I think that criticism is quite undeserved, for I remember quite well when the Minister of Trade and Commerce brought in this Bill last session he brought it in as a war measure, in order to save coal which was absolutely necessary to meet war necessities, and he said at that time, in answer to a question, that the law would remain in force for only one year, and then Parliament could decide whether it should be re-enacted or not. And that is exactly what is being done to-day; I commend the Government for keeping the promise which was made last year.

For my part, I am quite satisfied that the Act which was passed last year has done exactly what it was intended to do; that is, it has saved to Canada many hundreds of thousands of dollars. In our city, in the power house and in every private house, a great deal of coal has been saved; but because I supported the measure last year, as I did, as a war necessity, it does not follow that I am going to support a similar measure when the necessities of war no longer exist. Conditions to-day are entirely different, and with me the question is simply this: Do the people of Canada want this Bill or do they not? I for one do not believe in forcing legislation down the throats of the people in advance of the time when they want it, and it is quite evident to me, from the numerous letters and resolutions which I have received from private individuals and public bodies and trade associations in my constituency, that a very large element in our part of the country does not want this legislation. Mark you this: In the city in which I live, on the 6th day of April, we are going to have fast time, because we have had it there by by-law for many years. It makes it very difficult to transact business, because we have slow time in the country all around, and the farmers often come in an hour late to transact business, but we have it, and it cannot be repealed except by by-law, and you cannot get enough people to repeal that by-law. I tried it myself, because I did not like the trouble caused by having the two different times; but the people want it, and so let them have it. In time, I fancy the farming community will be educated to the advantages of daylight saving, but until that time comes, and they express a desire for it, I do not think we should force it down their throats. Therefore, I am going to suggest to the Government that they do not introduce a Bill for re-enacting daylight saving this year. I do so because it seems to me it would act simply and solely as an irritant to our agricultural community, and when you get a farmer irritated he gets hot, as the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) very clearly evidenced this afternoon. It is not desirable that such a condition should exist. What is happening to-day is this: The workingmen to-day are making considerable demands, and the farmers are about the last people in the community who have any inclination to accede to them; they want to get a dollar's worth of work for every dollar paid from any man whom they employ. I think that we should remove the irritation that undoubtedly exists by not enacting this legislation. The agriculturists are unquestionably annoyed, and these things are merely pin pricks that accomplish very little. I would, therefore, suggest to the Government that they do not bring in this Bill. I believe that a great many of those who express opinions on the subject are not by any means vitally interested one way or the other. By way of illustration I may mention one fact. One of the numerous letters I have received recently came from a Methodist minister who lives in the province of Saskatchewan—not in my constituency. He said that farm labourers were not available, and that as soon as they heard the factory whistles they wanted to go to the house and rest. This is, to say the least, rather strange, in view of the fact that there is not a factory whistle within one hundred miles of this gentleman, parson though he is! It is obvious, therefore, that a great deal of what we hear on the subject is purely imaginary, and we must remove these misconceptions. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be advisable at the present time to put this measure through.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (Oxford North): Somebody has suggested in the discussion this afternoon that the miners should be considered. As a matter of fact the miners nearly all over Canada work in three shifts a day, so that it cannot make much difference to them which system of time is adopted. I am not acquainted with the mining sections of the West, but I know the Cobalt section intimately, and know that that is the practice there.

Now, I do not think that there is any doubt that the people in the cities and large towns are largely in favour of daylight saving. The merchants and manufacturers and some of the workingmen regard it favourably—not all of the workingmen by any means, because I have been informed by some that they are indifferent in the matter. It can safely be said, however, that the bulk of the city people would be in favour of the Bill. As has been remarked many times this afternoon, we are a country of different classes, or rather, we follow different occupations; but it is best that we all should agree if we can, on some common platform. I believe that the farmers are opposed to this project, and the remarks of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) concerning their opposition I endorse, because I have had resolutions from cheese factories, farmers' clubs, municipal councils, county councils, and, practically speaking, any organization that could pass a resolution of any kind, in opposition to the renewal of daylight saving. My hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Jacobs) said that there was no opposition to this daylight saving in the United States. On the contrary, as far as I have been able to gather from the United States press, there seemed to be considerable opposition from the farming communities in that country to it. Congress convened and rose suddenly, and as the law was not repealed it remained in force.

I hope I may be pardoned if I state a personal experience in illustration of my contention that the farmers are earnest in their opposition to the renewal of this law, and that they have reasons for such opposition. My hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan) said, if I did not misunderstand him, that it was largely a matter of sentiment, and that the farmers, appreciating the advantages of daylight saving, would come to favour it. This contention, however, will not hold, as I shall show. In Ontario, as a great many hon. members no doubt know, there are threshing machines that go around from place to place and do the threshing by the bushel. This is necessary because we house all our own grain in the barn. It is also necessary, where we grow fall wheat and barley, to have a first threshing in order to clean out the barn sufficiently to allow other grain to go in. This first threshing, as we call it, is commonly practised. Now last year it so happened that our crops in Ontario were very heavy, and I had to thresh early my fall wheat and other grain so as to get room in the barn for the oats. I had about 40 or 50 acres of oats standing out all cut and in shook. I had not sufficient men on the farm, and could not obtain a sufficient number in the immediate neighbourhood, to take in the crop as rapidly as I could desire, so one of the factories allowed me to enlist volunteers from among its men to help me. I took those men out, leaving the factory shortly after seven o'clock and arriving at half past seven. It was half past nine before any work could be done in the field, owing to the dew on the grain. The following morning the men went out again, but the dew was heavier than ever, and they could not commence work before ten o'clock. Our section of the country is largely a dairy section, and it is necessary for our men to stop work at five o'clock in order to get the milking done. The men that came from town would not work longer than ten hours and you could not ask them to do so. At any rate they stopped at five o'clock, and as a consequence they worked, practically speaking, only two hours or two and one-half hours in the forenoon and from one o'clock until five in the afternoon. Under these circumstances, therefore, the day is very short. One might suggest that the men could go and do something else in the morning while waiting; well your own men might be able to find other things to occupy their time, but where you have certain work ahead of you and men are waiting to do that work, they will not do anything else in the meantime. They will wait for the main work, and anything they may do in the way of chores will not under such conditions amount to anything. This is a matter, Mr. Speaker, in which the farmer is intensely interested. There is a feeling of irritation at the present time on the part of the farmers. They are of opinion that we are legislating in the interests of the city people and not of the farming community. This feeling is unnecessary and not correct. However, I would ask my city friends, who until last year, have done without this legislation all their lives, without any serious effect on their health or business, to give way to the farmers, in this matter at least, because the farmers' interests are at stake. Let them meet the farmers to that extent. It will do no harm and it will, in my judgment, prove of great benefit to the country. It will also prove to the farmers that we are not trying to legislate in opposition to their interests.

Mr. SAMUEL FRANCIS GLASS (Middlesex East): I do not rise with the idea that I can add anything to the arguments advanced in opposition to this legislation, or submit more strongly anything that was urged a year ago when the law was enacted. I do not, like the hon. member for Oxford South (Mr. Sutherland) take exception to the attitude which the Government has assumed on this question, which question has possibly agitated the country considerably more than from its very nature it should. Personally, I think the Government has taken a very wise step in permitting the question to be discussed dispassionately in the House, and having it decided on its merits. As has already been pointed out, the Government has kept faith with Parliament and lived up to its declaration of last session that this law should be enacted for the period of one year, and if not found satisfactory it could then be determined whether it should be continued or die a natural death. As I said last year, I cannot urge any personal objection to the Bill, but if I am to reflect the opinion of my constituents in this House, and respect their wishes, I can do nothing less than oppose the re-enactment of this measure. Every important organization in my constituency—the county council, township councils, farmers' clubs, fair boards, dairymen's associations, and all the different organizations engaged in the activities of agriculture—have passed strong resolutions opposing the re-enactment of daylight saving. In deference to their wishes, and respecting the opinion of farmers as expressed in agricultural journals and in the press throughout the country, I am bound to believe that the re-enactment of the law will cause a disturbance in the agricultural community that would not be justified by any benefit which the Bill could confer upon city communities.

The hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution has drawn attention to the fact that fifty per cent of the people of Canada are living within cities, and he reaches the conclusion, that because certain city organizations have placed themselves on record as strongly supporting this legislation, that therefore it represents the unanimous opinion of the cities. I am in a position to say, so far as the district from which I come is concerned, that feeling in the city of London is by no means unanimous in reference to this measure. I have heard labour organizations and labour men repeatedly urge that this law should not be re-enacted, and they expressed the opinion that it was a nuisance and an annoyance to them. If the city population represent one-half of our total population then they are not unanimous as to the desirability of re-enacting daylight saving.

It is sometimes asserted by those who claim to reflect city sentiment, that the farmers could very easily adjust their clocks to meet the situation which would be created by the enactment of this law. I pointed out, however, last year, and the statement has been repeated this afternoon, that possibly never before in Canada's history had the farmers been compelled to draw from the industrial workers in the city for labour for farm requirements to a greater extent than in recent years. And when recourse was had to such labour by the farmers residing in the districts surrounding cities, villages and towns where industries are established, they have found that their labour regulated its hours of employment so as to conform with the regulations of the labour unions of the district. Therefore this law necessarily imposes a difficulty upon the farmer in retaining the interest of the man drawn from that class of labour after the time for quitting work has expired in the surrounding towns. That is a very great difficulty which the farmers in those districts have experienced. Why cannot the farmer just as well say to our friends in the city, "If you find daylight saving a convenience, pass a by-law and go in accordance with whatever time suits you." I remember in the city of London a couple of years ago a by-law was passed in that way, and it was found that what was called local time was out of harmony with railroad time. Accordingly after the by-law had been in operation for a few weeks, the very organizations that had started the agitation for its passage objected to it on the ground of the inconvenience caused, and the by-law was repealed before the summer had half passed. If the railways are going to make their time conform to the time that is in operation in the United States I cannot see any difficulty in the cities adopting the necessary by-laws and fixing their hours of labour so as to harmonize with it.

There is another strong reason to be urged against this legislation and it is this: At the present time, when necessary onerous restrictions are being imposed on the people of Canada, or rather not so much of an onerous as of a vexatious character, farmers do not relish the idea of being compelled to submit to further unnecessary impositions. The proposed law will be unpopular in the country, and I believe it will not be acceptable to this House. Had a vote been taken on the question a year ago, I do not believe it would have carried. The sentiment of the House was just as strongly opposed to daylight saving last year as it is now, but the House deferred to the express wish of the Government at that time, and the arguments advanced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that as other countries were making the experiment we might as well try it for a year, and if the law did not measure up to expectations, it could die a natural death. Now, Sir, that death has taken place, and we are now going to decide whether it is wise to have a resurrection. In my opinion the law will be buried. If we want peace and harmony in the rural districts we must not further impose a law of this nature on the people: we should refrain from arousing such irritation and dissatisfaction as will undoubtedly be created if this law is again placed on the statute books.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince, P.E.I.): I am not going to detain the House very long, and I would not speak at all were it not that I have changed my mind since last session. I pointed out the other night that in my opinion consistency was the hobgoblin of little minds. I believe in expressing my views to-day, even though it may contradict everything I said yesterday, providing I have good grounds for changing my opinion. I want to say that the only vote I gave in this House last session to which fault was found in my constituency was the vote which I gave on this daylight saving measure. One of the reasons that I have for changing my mind is that my constituents found fault with me last year for supporting the Daylight Saving Bill.

I want to answer some of the arguments put forward, Mr. Speaker, in favour of daylight saving. One was in regard to train time. Some years ago the United States railway time was an hour different from ours, but we found no very great difficulty about it, and as a matter of fact there are three or four different sections between the Atlantic and Pacific where there is an hour's difference in the train time; for instance, we change our time one hour at Vanceboro on our way to Ottawa. That argument is not well taken.

Another thing that has come up in this debate would cause me to change my mind, that is, that I find that the large cities which wish to adopt the daylight saving scheme within their own boundaries can do so by way of by-law. Therefore, why should we extend daylight saving to the country people who do not want it? If the cities want daylight saving, let them adopt it within their civic boundaries; then there is no harm done.

An argument advanced in favour of the Bill by the hon. member from Montreal (Mr. Jacobs) was that all the rest of the world had adopted daylight saving. That is no good reason at all in its favour. If it was, why every law enacted by other nations would need to be adopted by us.

Another very strong argument in favour of the amendment is that the country young men get very much dissatisfied with the fact that the city boys can knock off work an hour earlier, because it is impossible for the farming people to complete their work by five o'clock.

There is just one more thing I want to say in regard to this question, and that is to thank the Government for the change in its attitude towards this House, and inviting this expression of opinion, instead of its former course of introducing a measure and then telling the House: You must swallow this or defeat the Government.

Mr. R. C. HENDERS (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the introduction of this daylight saving measure, and at the same time to express my appreciation of the fact that the Government has acted in good faith with this House in giving the opportunity that has been afforded this afternoon for an expression of its opinion. I distinctly remember that it was with the understanding that this measure was to be on trial that it was allowed to go into effect last year. It has been on trial for the year, we have been studying the facts in connection with it, and I believe that this House has come to the conclusion that the measure has not proven satisfactory.

I rise to protest against it, Mr. Speaker, and in doing so I believe I voice the opinion of organized agriculture in Canada. I have in my possession at the present time more than 300 resolutions passed by organized farmers in Western Canada and a number from Ontario, all of them distinctly opposed to this Bill, and in which they set forth in strong terms, good, sound argument why they are opposed to it. I have failed to discover one organization among them that is in favour of this Bill. Surely if it was an advantage to the farmers there would be some of them expressing themselves in favour of it. I think organized agriculture represents about forty-eight per cent of the population of the Dominion of Canada at the present time, and I take it that that forty-eight per cent have expressed themselves on this measure. Furthermore I find myself supported by men from the towns and cities in the contention I am now making—I have had expressions of opinion from organizations in some of the cities and towns putting themselves on record as opposed to this measure, and for this reason: They say that the children of this country should be taken care of and should have every opportunity of developing to the utmost advantage, in order to bring them up to the best manhood and womanhood that this country can develop, and they say that this measure is robbing our children of at least one hour's rest which is essential to child growth and child development. I find further that the public schools are opposing this measure. We have the Minister of Education from one province and the superintendents of education all over the provinces offering their opposition, for the simple reason that they say one hour of the education day is practically lost to the rural population by daylight saving. By this I mean that we had it on trial in our public schools and we found that the children coming there at the earlier hour in the morning were not up to normal for the first school hour because they were deprived of the rest they should have had. And after giving it a trial, a number of our schools simply went back to the old order of things and opened at nine o'clock.

I do not think any valid argument has been advanced in favour of this measure. Several assertions have been made with regard to the saving of light and coal, but I fail to find that a single hon. member presented a valid argument in support of such assertions. I therefore ask the Government that this measure be not passed.

Mr. H. H. HALLIDAY (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the pros and cons of this question have been pretty well gone over—at least the cons against this so-called daylight saving have been; I have not heard very much from the pros. Last session I supported this Bill, and I did so with a clear conscience. In opposing it this year I believe I am not speaking for myself alone but for 40,000 other people whom I represent here. After leaving the House last session I made careful inquiries throughout my constituency, which is a very large one, and I did not find one man who was in favour of this measure being enacted again this year. That is the reason why I oppose this resolution to-day. An old lady came to my door on the twenty-second of June last, while I was reading a newspaper at 10.15 p.m. She jumped on me about this daylight saving. I said: "My dear lady, you did not object to this daylight saving legislation before it came up in the House last session." "Well," she said, "I am willing to try anything once."

Mr. DUNCAN CAMPBELL ROSS (Middlesex, West): I agree with what has been said by various members who have opposed this resolution. More than ninety per cent of the agricultural people of Canada are absolutely opposed to daylight saving, and the great masses of the labouring people as well are opposed to it. These two organizations constitute a great majority of the people, and we should respect their wishes by defeating this resolution. If the House adopts daylight saving it will be giving more consideration to the pleasure of the leisured classes in the big cities than to the business and the production of the toiling masses on the farms and in the cities. On that account I am opposed to this resolution.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General): I rise to a point of order. I direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the language of the motion now before the House. It is as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to re-enact at once Chapter 2, Statutes of 1918. "The Daylight Saving Act, 1918."

The amendment of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) asks that the words "it is expedient to re-enact at once" be replaced by the words "it is not expedient to re-enact until this day six months." If the amendment means anything, it is what is known as the "six months' hoist," which is merely a motion to adjourn and is not debatable. On the other hand, the meaning might be that it is not expedient to re-enact the Daylight Saving Act now, but that it should be enacted six months from now, which would bring it in force next autumn. I fancy that the amendment has not been very carefully worded, and if one voted for it he would render himself rather ridiculous. The main motion can be met with "Yes" or "No." If the amendment is merely a six months' hoist, it should not be debated; if it is merely a negative, it should be ruled out of order. I submit that we should have a ruling on this point before the debate proceeds further.

Mr. SPEAKER: While this amendment purports upon its face to be a motion for the six months' hoist, in actual fact it has not that effect. The sense of the amendment is that daylight saving be enacted six months hence, not that the subject should be considered six months hence, which would be the six months' hoist. The second point raised by the Solicitor General is whether a motion to effect a six months' hoist is debatable. If that motion is made in the form of an amendment to a substantive motion which is before the House, it can be debated, because there remains sufficient of the original motion, which is debatable to permit debate. On the other hand, a motion made not by way of amendment, but "that the subject be considered this day six months," would be a straight motion for the six months' hoist, and, under Rule 17A, would not be debatable. As the motion of the member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) is in the form of an amendment, it is debatable. Although it is not very happily worded and does not, in my judgment, convey the meaning which the mover had in his mind, it is technically in order.

Mr. McCOIG: The amendment was worded as it is for the purpose of permitting a discussion of the matter. Had I worded it differently, it would not have been debatable, as I think you, Mr. Speaker, will rule. I was going to ask the consent of the House, at the conclusion of the debate, to change the wording to make the amendment read: "considered this day six months."

Mr. DAVID MARSHALL (Elgin, East): I have received letter after letter from my constituents expressing their opposition to daylight saving. I was the first man to start a canning factory in Canada, and I have been in the business ever since; that brings me in close touch with the farmers, and enables me to speak with some authority on this subject. Last year we contracted for 30,000 acres of corn, peas and tomatoes, all produced by the farmer. If there was ever a time when we should try to make things pleasant for the farmer, it is now. The daylight saving measure interfered very much with our getting contracts from the farmers this year. They say "we have to stop our work at five o'clock instead of six, and that interferes with the harvesting of our crops."

I am quite in sympathy with what has been said by the member for Kent (Mr. McCoig). When the ground is damp you cannot work many of the crops produced for canning; consequently daylight saving would be very detrimental to the farmers, and in expressing my opposition to it I am expressing the views of the people whom I represent.

Mr. WILLIAM GARLAND McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Last session I supported the Daylight Saving Bill and when I went back to my constituency I found that apparently I had done the right thing, because so far as I know all my constituents are in favour of daylight saving. I think I am safe in saying that the people generally of British Columbia are in favour of daylight saving. About two-thirds of my constituents are farmers. I represent about 50,000 people, two-thirds of whom live outside the city. I have recently received from many organizations in the city requests that I should support daylight saving, and at the same time, I have received no objections whatever from the farmers. I presume, if my farmers objected to daylight saving, they would advise me of their objections just as farmers in other places have advised their representatives of their objections. I, therefore, take it for granted that my farmers are in favour of daylight saving. Possibly, the farmers of British Columbia are a little in advance of the farmers of the East in their ideas in regard to daylight saving. It is, perhaps, not surprising to see the farmers of the East opposing an innovation of this kind, because farmers have opposed many innovations. It may be remembered that when the first locomotive appeared in this country, the farmers were opposed to it; they said that locomotives were a nuisance; that they frightened their cattle and so forth. When automobiles were invented, the farmers opposed them, saying that they should not be allowed, and, if I remember correctly, it is only within the last year or so that in Prince Edward Island automobiles have been allowed to use the roads and now they can use them for only two or three days a week. My opinion is that in a few years the farmers will appreciate the fact that in this respect it is the right thing for Canada to fall in line with the rest of the civilized world. I trust the Government will see fit to re-enact the daylight saving measure this year.

Mr. AUGUSTE THEOPHILE LEGER (Kent, N.B.): When the Daylight Saving Bill was brought down last year, from what I could understand of it, I was opposed to it. After the session was over when I went home I made inquiries amongst the farmers and the labouring classes of my constituents. I found the farmers were absolutely opposed to daylight saving and the labouring classes said: We do not like it at all; it means more expense to us, especially in the fall of the year; it is an hour lost to us. Therefore, I am going to vote against the re-enactment of this measure just as I did last year. Some hon. members contend that daylight saving is a great thing for the cities and towns. While it is true I come from a small town, I find that when the merchants open their stores at seven o'clock in the morning, or six o'clock under the old time, there is practically no one around, so that they lose an hour in the morning, and in the evening they lose another hour.

So far as the farmer is concerned, Parliament, instead of giving him an hour in the morning, should give him an hour in the evening so that he can harvest his grain. As has been stated, farmers cannot start harvesting until ten o'clock in the morning, and the afternoon from two o'clock to six or seven o'clock is the best time for the farmer to harvest his grain. The morning I left to attend this session of Parliament, I met one of the most important farmers in my constituency and he told me to do all I could to prevent this measure being re-enacted, because it is against the interest of the farmers. I have been asked to tell the Government to keep its hands off the farmers, to give the farmers all the latitude possible, because they are the backbone of the country, and should, therefore, be given every advantage, and the same may be said of the working classes. For these reasons, therefore, I intend to oppose the re-enactment of daylight saving.

Mr. GEORGE BOYCE (Carleton): I was very much amused at the hon. member from British Columbia, who wants to make us believe he represents a farming constituency. They are truck farmers, and in the East we do not take much stock in truck farmers. I do not think any hardship will be caused by the people of the cities working an hour or two hours in the morning, as they choose. We do not want to dictate to them, but we do not want them to dictate to us. I come from a constituency comprising mostly farmers and dairymen and my opinion is that if this measure be re-enacted, a great hardship will be suffered by them. I believe also the people in the cities who are supporting daylight saving are standing in their own light, because if this measure be re-enacted, it is bound to enhance the cost of the production. We cannot go out into the fields to cut grain until eight o'clock in the morning, and the greatest part of our day will be lost. If the farmers do not know their own business when to begin and when to quit work, without being dictated to by the people of the cities, they are not endowed with as much common sense as I thought they were. I think the great majority of the people of the cities do not want daylight saving, only a few who do not get up until nine o'clock in the morning and who want to play baseball, cricket and so on in the evening are in favour of it, and if they are the ones who are going to rule the farmers of this country the farmers want to know it. Do not aggravate the farmers too much. So far as I can make out, there is in existence a little organization, just about as big as a man's hand, called the Organized Farmers. If you aggravate the farmers too much you will get that organization down here, and while I am a strong supporter of the Government, I ask the Government to be very careful, or those people will drive it out and my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best) will, perhaps, become Minister of Agriculture. I trust that the result of this discussion will be that the farmer will start work whenever it suits him and the city people the same.

Mr. HORATIO CLARENCE HOCKEN (West Toronto): I want to say a few words on this question on behalf of the farmers of Toronto. There are, in my constituency, a great many farmers, and although, of course, they are truck farmers, as the hon. member (Mr. Boyce) has stated, yet they produced a great deal last year and they did so after they had performed their day's work, so that I think in that respect they are entitled to some consideration, as in doing that they show that they are willing to work overtime in order to bring about that production which the country needs. The statement has been made by the Fuel administration at Washington that 1,250,000 tons of coal were saved by daylight saving in the United States during the past year. I have not figured out what proportion of that would be Canada's saving, but the proportion must be very large.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the hon. member explain how one pound of coal can be saved? I have never heard that explained yet.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is saved by not starting lighting plants so early in the day as under the old system; that accounts for a very substantial saving in coal. Large quantities of coal oil are also saved by people not having to light their lamps so early. The saving in light and fuel has been enormous in the United States, and proportionately large in Canada.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Does the hon. member think, now the war is over, that it is desirable to save coal? Would it not be better to keep people digging it and keep all our industries going?

Mr. HOCKEN: We have a Commission of Conservation in this country, the purpose of which is to conserve our natural resources, and I submit that if we can save two or three hundred thousand tons of coal, that is a saving worth while. I appreciate that I am in a decided minority in this House, judging by the speeches that have already been made, but I want to say that there never was a more popular measure than daylight saving so far as the big cities are concerned. The workers in my own plant and in my constituency—and I represent 90,000 industrial workers—are unanimously in favour of daylight saving; they think it is the greatest boon ever given to this country. On the other hand, if we do not enact this measure, there will be a state of great confusion in this country Tne hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith) has said that daylight saving will mean that the farmer will have to get up an hour earlier to catch the milk train. But he will have to do that anyway, because the railways of this country are going to conform with the American time.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): What authority is there for that statement? I am very interested in this matter and would like to know from the Government whether it is a fact.

Mr. HOCKEN: I saw the report in the newspapers, and I think we may take it for granted that our Canadian railways are going to conform with the American railway time. In the county of Haldimand the people did not adopt daylight saving last year, but held all their meetings in churches, schools and other places on the old time. I want to warn the House that if daylight saving is not adopted by Parliament this year there will be a state of great confusion in our industries all over the country, because transportation is our principal industry, upon which all the others depend. I realize that the sentiment of the House as expressed is absolutely against me, but I am here to represent my constituents and my personal opinion also is that daylight saving is one of the best measures that this Parliament has ever enacted.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Government should be fully informed as to the sentiments of the people on the daylight saving question. It is immaterial to me whether the proposed legislation is put into effect or not, and I may say that the people in the greater portion of the constituency from which I come are not interested in the matter either. They feel that there is adequate daylight for all their purposes, and in fact more than enough. I am, therefore, able to look at the question from an absolutely unbiased standpoint. Some of the constituencies, however, think differently. I have travelled a good deal and am satisfied that the farmers in Manitoba and northern Saskatchewan are almost unanimously opposed to any change. I do not propose for a moment to go into arguments from the farmers' viewpoint; they have already been advanced by others more qualified perhaps to speak on the subject than I who have had no actual experience on the farm. It has been suggested that there might be some difficulty or confusion in the railway service between the United States and Canada if there were a change of time, but I see no reason why there should be any more confusion in the service between the two countries than at different points along the lines in Canada, such as Port Arthur, Broadview and Field, where the time changes in any event. The prevailing sentiment in Manitoba has been fairly well expressed in the letter which has been read from Hon. Dr. Thornton, and I believe that the farmers generally throughout Canada are strenuously opposed to this proposed legislation. This is not a vital question to the future welfare of Canada, it is one that might well be left to the majority to decide; and if the minority should happen to be those who are in favour of daylight saving, then they have the privilege of legislating to suit themselves in their own cities and towns.

Mr. THOMAS HENRY THOMPSON (Hastings East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to put myself on record as being opposed to the Daylight Saving Bill, although I supported it last year as a war measure. The arguments that have been advanced by the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith) are practically identical with my own, and express the views of the people of the riding I have the honour to represent. My district is a dairy section. Some of the milk is shipped to Toronto but 95 per cent of it is sent to the cheese factories. I believe that under the by-laws of the cheese factories that the milk drawer must be at the end of the route at five o'clock. If the change in time were effected that would mean four o'clock, and the farmer would have to rise too early.

The Government has spent considerable money in an endeavour to educate the farmers in the proper methods of dairying. and one of the things which they have advocated is the regular milking of cows. It has become the practice to milk at five o'clock in the morning and at five in the afternoon. Five o'clock in the afternoon their hired help leave and the farmers are obliged to do the milking without assistance. Besides, the sun is still high at that time and it is more difficult and expensive to save the milk. The cheese companies have passed resolutions opposing daylight saving, and several have requested me personally to oppose it. The school sections are also strongly opposed to it; it is not necessary that I should give their reasons. The hon. member for East Peterborough has taken up this point and I agree with all he has said. The farmers' co-operative associations have passed resolutions against it. The county council of Hastings composed of thirty-one members—twenty-six farmers, and five members representing four villages and one town—have also unanimously expressed their disapproval of the proposal. Another disadvantage that attends the daylight saving is that the hired man is idle in the morning, while he loses an hour in the afternoon. Looking at the question from these standpoints therefore I do not think the Government should put this legislation into force. I must commend them, however, for having given the members an opportunity of expressing their views on this question. As far as I can see there is no need for the amendment, and I am prepared to vote against the resolution.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (York South): I have listened with a great deal of attention and interest to the discussion, and the views of the farmers as expressed by various hon. members have my entire sympathy. There is no doubt a grave feeling of unrest among the farmers, and I agree with the statement which has been made that the farmer's occupation is a very precarious one. Now if there is an unrest among the farmers, such as we have evidence of on all sides, it is the duty of the Government to address itself to this state of affairs and remedy such grievances as may exist for the day will come when the farmers will be industrially organized and will obtain their rights. I also agree with the statement made by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. T. H. Thompson) that the farmers should be at liberty to express themselves in this House.

But there is more than that goes with it: If the farmer is entitled to express his opinion in the House and it prevails, then the farmer has a right to rule this country as well as express his opinion here. The way in which this question has come up to-day brings to my mind, and will bring to the minds of the people of the country the responsibility that rests upon the Government of the day in dealing with this question, which cannot be made an open question and cannot be relegated to private members to settle. My contention is, although I may be wrong in my doctrine, that the Government must take the responsibility of dealing with this question. I have heard conversations of late in regard to the responsibility of the Government, and I thoroughly agree with what I have heard in those conversations, viz:—That while members may speak and express their opinion, the responsibility rests on the Government of the day of dealing with questions at issue, and especially of dealing with a question of this kind. The statement appears in to-night's evening papers that the Canadian Railway War Board, has assumed to deal with this question, and says that the daylight saving arrangement of the United States is to obtain in regard to the railroads of Canada. I would like to know at this point, if I can, whether the Government intend to assume responsibility for the policy of this Board. If it does, then we shall have daylight saving in spite of the expressions of opinion here, and especially in spite of the expression of opinion by the farmers. It would be a disappointment to the farmers, however, if they are merely to have the opportunity of expressing their views, and that in some way an irresponsible body, like the Railway War Board, shall assume to give us daylight saving in this country.

Then there is another view of the matter. This country forms part of the continent of America, and we have, more or less perhaps, to continentalize our policy, daylight saving to-day is the rule and is the law in the United States. Heretofore the administration of our railways in this country has largely been based on the system that prevails in the United States, and has worked in harmonious arrangement with the administration of the railways of that country; the two systems have always run together. I want to know whether, if this House votes, as I expect it will vote to-night, against daylight saving, the order that has gone forth of the Railway Board is to obtain, or whether the grievances that have been expressed here this afternoon as far as the farmers are concerned are to end in nothing? Will the Government tell us to-night that it intends to assume the responsibility on this question, and to be responsible for the acts of the Railway Board, or if it intends to recall, after the vote takes place to-night, the order that has gone out from the Railway Board? If the Government assumes that responsibility and recalls the order referred to, it will be a party to something that will result in great dislocation of the business interests of the country. An hon. gentleman sitting near me suggests that I should ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) now. If the minister cares to offer an opinion well and good, but I do not think I can fairly press him to do so. However, I want to point out first, the dislocation, as far as the business organization of America is concerned, which is involved in the present situation, and second that the Railway War Board, an irresponsible organization, proposed to retain daylight saving in Canada. I want the farmers to understand fairly what they are going to get. Are they to get daylight saving or not? Are they to be satisfied with a mere opportunity of expressing their dissent? There is a great deal of reason in that dissent. I say that although I voted for daylight saving and intend to vote for it again to-night, for I know what is the condition of the farmer in Canada. I am not going to say that I have tried to do a little farming myself, because it seems to be an offence for some of us who were born in the country, and who would like to have, and do have, a home in the country, to make such a confession. I have been unbraided in this House on account of that, and yet it is my right, and I intend to exercise it, to express my opinion. On behalf of the farmers I say that if the House to-night votes to defeat daylight saving then the farmers are entitled to get the advantage of it. If not, the Government must assume responsibility for the action of the Railway War Board, and compel the farmers to submit to daylight saving, and I do not know what is going to be the outcome in that case.

But I revert to the question that I have raised, that we must harmonize ourselves with the rest of the continent to which we belong. We have heard a good deal on that subject in this House. I disagreed to a certain extent with some hon. gentlemen in this House when the question was up before. But the more I study the question of the recent great war, and the more I see of it, the more I am convincel that it is the duty of this country to associate itself with the continent of America in the matters arising out of it, and to keep clear of, and keep away from, as much as possible, the present issues that are embroiling Europe. We have over there to-day, representing Canada, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, the Overseas War Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Customs. We have those ministers who, from my point of view, are butting somewhat into the affairs of Europe, and are open to the charge,—and I am not saying it in any spirit of disrespect,—that they are actually porch-climbing to get into the conferences of Europe.

An hon. MEMBER: Question.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am talking to the question, I am talking to the question of responsibility. The Speaker may call me to order, but I wish to point out that in view of the responsibility that goes with this question, and what has taken place in Europe, our duty is to keep our country in harmony with the rest of the Continent, and not to dislocate our railway arrangements. I do not know whether other hon. gentlemen appreciate the situation; I have tried to appreciate it, I have studied the railway question. It may be that the dislocation that I fear will not occur, that the problem will be satisfactorily worked out. Nevertheless, I fail to understand how the great city of Toronto will maintain its business connection with the United States, or with the ports of Europe, unless we have harmonious arrangements, or how the city of Montreal, or the other great manufacturing centres of Canada will maintain their present situation.

An hon. MEMBER: Let them change their time table.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Changing their time table will not do it. Perhaps the Minister of Railways has a plan to meet the situation, and if he has I shall be only too glad to learn of it, and to understand it. As I size the situation up, however, our business is going to be dislocated, and it will be a very serious matter if we dislocate our transport service by such a change in the law as is proposed here to-night. Let me repeat that we have always arranged our railway policy so as to harmonize with that of the United States. There was a time when we had railways of broad gauge. That was the case with the old Great Western. But the gauge was brought to standard and into harmony with the American railroads.

There was a great business built up between the two countries and a great amount of traffic came to Canada because we had standardized our gauge, which enabled us to take the traffic of the American roads and carry it over our lines to our own Atlantic ports or to the American ports. To-day we are allowing the great New York Central line to handle from the Niagara frontier all its traffic which originates in Chicago and to carry it over its lines in Ontario to Buffalo and New York. Now, is all that to be dislocated? So, my contention is that the responsibility must be assumed by the Government, and the farmers who are voting for this change are entitled to get what they expect, and their expectation is that there is to be this dislocation of the railway transportation of Canada—that daylight saving is to be at an end in this country. I feel that it would be better to leave things alone and to try out daylight saving a little longer. Of course, the cities have the opportunity of passing by-laws that will give them daylight saving, and I know all our cities and manufacturing towns will have it.

I know that the farmers who have been expressing themselves here this afternoon have a grievance. They have to get up too early in the morning in order to ship their milk to the cities. But if the Railway War Board at Montreal orders the railways to run on the daylight saving schedule, what is to become of the farmer?

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask the hon. member a question? What has the running of the railways to do with the farmers? What difference will it make to them even if you make the change to-morrow?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: This is what the farmers say: If the trains run an hour later in the morning they will get the benefit of rising that much later. If the Railway War Board orders the railway companies to operate their train service on the daylight saving schedule the farmers are going to draw a blank. They think they are considering something else here this afternoon, and that an expression of their appreciation for the opportunity of stating their views on this question is all they want. I venture to say that they want something more: They want results. And again I say, after all this war experience we should be careful before abandoning daylight saving. During the war we had to change many things, we had to abandon, more or less, responsible Government and take refuge in commissions, and we are to-day dealing with the transportation question by means of a war measure; we have appointed a receiver for the Grand Trunk Pacific as a war measure; we are governing the country still by means of war measures, and probably we are going to have daylight saving as a war measure by this Government. But if that is the case is it not time that we had responsible Government in this country?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Let us have peace.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Let us have responsible Government first now the war is over. Let the farmers come here and express themselves, and if they express themselves in a certain direction, then if that expression of opinion by them is respected, they are entitled to carry on the Government of this country. That is the way it impresses me. I may be mistaken, but after studying this question very closely—and I am again speaking now from the business standpoint—I want to see the farmer have his grievance remedied in some way if possible, and a compromise may be effected, continuing to the cities and towns daylight saving in regard to railways and other things, and allowing the farmer to make his own time to suit himself. I know that is rather hard and I confess it may not be feasible.

I want the House to be seized of what the issue really is. We have been talking all the afternoon and I have waited for some one to tell us how our railways were to be run, and just at six o'clock I was made acquainted with a statement in the evening papers—I suppose it is correct—that the Railway War Board had settled that we were to have daylight saving. I will take the liberty of asking the Minister of Railways and Canals whether we are to have daylight saving in regard to our railways according to that statement?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not any word from the Canadian Railway War Board. Of course, the Canadian Railway War Board may make arrangements to run their railways on whatever time they like, but in so far as the operation of the railways is concerned they must be operated in the public interest. If they are not being operated in the public interest Parliament can correct that condition; and as we shall practically own half of the railway systems of Canada in a short time, I think Parliament can make the railways do whatever they like.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: But I do not know yet from the statement of the hon. the Minister of Railways whether we are to have daylight saving. I hope he will give me credit for not speaking from a political point of view. I am trying to speak for many of the farmers of this country, I am also trying to speak for the business and the manufacturing and the railroad interests. I do not know what is going to happen to the railways who have this large transportation problem ahead of them retaining the very large international traffic which comes to them from their American connections. The funny thing is we are discussing this great question without a responsible proposition before the House. I do not remember a similar situation. Somebody must take the responsibility, and if the Government are convinced of the truth of the position of the farmers let them say: "All right; the farmers have made out their case and we assume responsibility of giving them the relief they ask." But we are told now by the Minister of Railways that the business interests of Canada are to be guarded. I am not going to abdicate my function as a member of this House by handing over this question to any irresponsible Railway War Board to deal with, and I do not think the Government ought to abdicate their functions or contract themselves out of their liability, as to the legal phrase is, but they must deal with this question, and I submit that before this discussion is over we ought to have a statement of the Government's policy.

Just one word more in regard to the advantages of daylight saving. These are many and have been demonstrated in the countries of Europe, and we are the first country to go back on what was called progressive legislation. The European countries may have been wrong, but I have seen no one yet who has brought forward a scientific explanation for the difference between our country and the countries of Europe on this question. A large portion of my reading has been in the direction of the increased benefit that has come to the working classes of this country by reason of daylight saving in connection with giving their children a little better chance, and my idea of the object of government is to improve human welfare. Now, if the farmer has a grievance it should be remedied. I do not feel justified in saying that the statements made by hon. gentlemen this afternoon with regard to the position of the farmer in this matter are not correct. If, then, they voice the views of the farmers, we must do more with regard to these grievances than merely allow them to be expressed in this House.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Wouldn't the simplest way be to let the farmers alone and let them mind their own business?

Mr. MACLEAN: I am not interfering with the farmers. The Canadian Railway War Board has interfered with the daylight saving proposition; it has said that on Monday the clock is to be set back in every railway station.

Hon. Mr. CARVELL: Set forward. That is what the whole trouble is about.

Mr. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman intimates that there is trouble because somebody wants to set the clock forward. Will he, then, assume the responsibility of setting it forward. Somebody must assume responsibility in this matter. If the farmers are to get what they are after, a declaration should be made by the Government that daylight saving is at an end and that the farmer will not have to get up earlier in the morning. But as a result of the order issued by this Railway Board, on Monday morning the farmer, willy nilly, will have to get up early to milk his cows and get his milk to the train in time for shipment. If he is to get what he wants, he ought to know it to-night. The business community and the railways should know to-night what the policy of the Government is to be; otherwise each city will do as it likes in the matter, and instead of a well-ordered community we shall have something more or less in the nature of chaos. The members of this House should not go away to-night without knowing what is to be the law; without knowing whether the clock is to be put forward an hour next Monday, or whether it is to be left as it is.

Mr. P. R. DuTREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the cities and towns of Canada, representing a majority of the people, are in favour of the daylight saving system, and more than half the rural population is in favour of it. This Parliament, therefore, should re-enact the daylight saving measure. I do not see what great inconvenience would thereby result to the afrmers. The daylight saving measure was given a good trial last year and it gave satisfaction; I did not meet a single person who believed that the measure was not a good one. I agree with the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. W. F. Maclean) that the Government should take some stand in this matter. Last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with all his eloquence, brought the Daylight Saving Bill before Parliament; he was very insistent upon having it passed, and for my part I was pleased to support it. Now that daylight saving has had such a good trial and the people have become accustomed to it, why does not the Government bring down a Bill to re-enact daylight saving for this year? Are they afraid to take the responsibility? It is not proper that the Government, which is supposed to lead the people, should not take responsibility in this matter. In the views which I express I voice the opinion of practically all the people of the great city of Montreal. On Sunday the hour will be changed in the United States, and failure to adopt the same system here will result in great inconvenience to our large centres, our railroads and our economic system generally. The suggestions of hon. gentlemen as to the complaints of the farmers are not based on facts. I hope, therefore, that a daylight saving Bill will be introduced and adopted by the House.

Mr. HENRY ARTHUR MACKIE (Edmonton East): In order to have a clear expression of the views of the House on this matter, I wish to move, in amendment to the amendment:

That the words "until this day six months" be struck out of the amendment and the following substituted therefor: "during the year 1919."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Mr. Mackie moves in amendment, seconded by Mr. Douglas (Strathcona) that the words "until this day six months" be struck out of the amendment, and that the following be substituted therefor: "during the year 1919," so that the resolution will now read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to re-enact during the year 1919, chapter 2, Statutes of 1918, "The Daylight-Saving Act, 1918."

Mr. MACKIE: That is not the amendment that I suggest. I ask that instead of giving the six months' hoist to the daylight saving proposal, the Bill be not introduced during the year 1919.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Will the hon. gentleman tell us what the effect of this amendment is? I want to vote intelligently.

Mr. MACKIE: The hon. gentleman ought to be able to see what the effect of it is.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: To make this matter quite clear to the House, I shall again read the sub-amendment. The resolution is as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to re-enact at once Chapter 2, Statutes of 1918, "The Daylight-Saving Act, 1918."

It was moved by Mr. McCoig, seconded by Mr. Ross:

That the said resolution be amended by replacing the words: "it is expedient to re-enact at once" by the words "it is not expedient to re-enact until this day six months."

It was moved as a sub-amendment by Mr. Mackie (East Edmonton), seconded by Mr. Douglas (Strathcona):

That the words "until this day six months" be struck out of the amendment and the following substituted therefor "during the year 1919."

The resolution as amended will read:

That in the opinion of this House, it is not expedient to re-enact during the year 1919 Chapter 2, Statutes of 1918, "The Daylight Saving Act. 1918."

Mr. HENRY HERBERT STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Addressing a few remarks to the motion, the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, I think the House is quite clear on the main issue and both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment are of very little importance in this discussion.

As I listened to the various addresses, this is what I gathered, namely, that the principal objection to the so-called Daylight Saving measure is made on behalf of the farmers. Several reasons are given: First that the dairy interests are seriously affected in connection with the shipment of milk and other dairy products to the cities in the morning; second, that the farmers who have large areas of hoe-crops thereby lose an extra hour in the morning on account of the dew and so forth; third, that it interferes seriously with harvesting operations for the same reason; and fourth, that farm labour near the towns is also seriously interfered with. These arguments deserve careful consideration on the part of every hon. member.

On the other hand, I desire to present to the House a few arguments in favour of daylight saving, and the House should consider both sides of the question and decide accordingly. I am speaking to-day on behalf of that great army of workers in Canada, particularly of those in the city which I represent, who spend long hours of confinement within the walls of the factory, shop and office, and also on behalf of the wives and families of those workers in the hot and ill-ventilated flats in the congested areas of the cities. To all these the extra hour of daylight in the evening is unquestionably a great boon. It is of value to them from the standpoint of health as well as from the standpoint of adding, in a certain degree at least, to the small amount of pleasure they get in life.

It has been stated as a strong argument in favour of daylight saving that the United States of America has passed a similar measure, and that, therefore, we should follow suit. I have no sympathy with that argument, my opinion being that we should decide the matter as Canadians in our own country's interest.

I wish to refer to the argument advanced by some opponents of daylight saving that the only persons who are asking for it are the idle rich in the cities, a few gentlemen who wish to play golf and so forth. That is not the case. I can assure my hon. friends who represent country districts that we do not represent that class of people, who can look after themselves pretty well. Where there is one individual of that class, there are a thousand or more of the other class to which I have referred—the workers confined in the shops, factories or offices. It is on their behalf that I support the re-enactment of the daylight saving measure.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth): I feel to-night I am in agreement with the majority in this House, and that is a comfortable feeling to have. I am always inclined to say a good word for a departed friend, and I feel to-night, as we are attending what I consider to be the wake of the Daylight Saving Act, I should like, before it passes out of existence, to say a good word for it. A year ago I felt that it was a matter of very little concern whether the Daylight Saving Act came into force or not. I did not see much advantage in it, and I did not, at that time, see that there was going to be very much disadvantage.

After a year's experience, however, I have learned that daylight saving has advantages, and I should like to enumerate one or two which I have observed. We have today heard a good deal about the school children in the country, and I want to say a word or two on behalf of them. It is a great benefit to the school children in the country to be relieved, under daylight saving, from their school duties at three o'clock in the afternoon instead of being kept in school until four. That is a decided advantage which is perhaps not appreciated as it should be. It is far better for the welfare of the child to be in the schoolhouse from eight to nine o'clock in the morning and to be relieved at three o'clock rather than to go into the schoolhouse at nine and to remain there until four. The same argument may be used in behalf of the factory employee. The day is at hand when Parliament, employers of labour, educationists and others will have to give very much more attention to the physical welfare of the people, and anything which adds to the comfort and good environment of the factory employee is of advantage not only to the employee, but to the employer and to the country at large. If we can, under any measure, have the employees of a factory engaged from six to seven o'clock in the morning by sun-time, and relieved from their duties at five o'clock in the afternoon rather than have them entering on their duties at seven in the morning and being relieved at six in the afternoon, we are doing them a great favour, inasmuch as from five to six in the afternoon—and I am speaking of the factories in the small towns—is the worst hour of the day for the factory employee to spend in the factory employed at his work, because in the summer time it is the hottest hour of the day in the factory.

I would like to say a word for the people in the offices of our towns. I do not at all agree with some of the remarks made this afternoon which would lead us to believe that the farmer is the only person who works. While I know that no person works harder than the farmer, there are, in our offices, stores and factories, many people who are working just as hard as they possibly can.

They are not idle by any means, and because their work differs in kind from that of the farmer it does not mean that they are not being worked to the limit. I have found, during the past year, that daylight saving was an advantage to these people, allowing them to get away from their offices an hour earlier in the day and have that much more time for outdoor recreation. I believe that if we could total up the results of daylight saving during the past year we would find that the health of the people of this country has been considerably improved.

Mr. BEST: What about the flu?

Mr. STEELE: Having said that much, I think I have stated the chief advantages of daylight saving. But notwithstanding all these advantages, I think the disadvantages have been very much greater, and I therefore propose to vote against the re-enactment of daylight saving. I speak especially for the dairy farmers, inasmuch as I believe they are the ones who have been inconvenienced the most by the passage of the daylight saving measure. I want to say this to the people of our large cities: we hear a great deal of criticism these days of the producer of milk and the enormous profits he is getting, but it is my opinion that in the near future people will have to pay a good deal more for their milk than they are paying now. They can afford to pay a good deal more, and still be getting the cheapest food supplied to the people of this country. At fourteen cents a quart there is no cheaper food than milk, and when the people of the cities expect farmers to get up at three in the morning, milk their cows, haul the milk three, four, five, or six miles, and ship it to the city people so that they can get it early in the day, they are expecting something unreasonable from the agriculturists. I think the time is not far distant when the city dairies will have to have refrigerator cars left at points in many of our large cities, where the farmer can leave his milk at a convenient hour during the day. I must vote against the amendment to the motion. I cannot imagine how two representatives of agricultural constituencies could move and second such an amendment as was moved by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) and seconded by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). Their amendment read: "That it is not expedient to re-enact this measure until this day six months." How any person can argue against daylight saving in the summer time and favour its coming into effect on the 26th day of September I cannot understand. Surely the farmers of Kent county will not sympathize at all with the attempt of their representative to bring daylight saving into force on the 26th of September, and I am equally confident that the farmers of West Middlesex will not approve such a move. I shall vote against the motion also, for the reasons which I have given. I believe it is in the best interests of this country that it should not carry, and I am quite satisfied that the majority of my electors are opposed to it.

Mr. W. A. CHARLTON (Norfolk): I have not any pronounced views upon this question, except that uniformity throughout the whole country is very desirable. Still, in view of the large number of petitions and resolutions I have received, I feel that I must say a word. One resolution I received was from the county council of Norfolk, which county I have the honour to represent, declaring unanimously against daylight saving. I have also received petitions from farmers' clubs and many other organizations and associations, all opposed to the measure, also several letters from residents of towns stating that we should favour the views of the farmers. Then, Sir, in keeping with the new order of things which has come into this world and which will remain so long as the world lasts—this beautiful world clothed everywhere with garments of Deity but now desecrated by the violence of man—in keeping, I say, with this new order in which women are not merely followers but great leaders in every movement which is for the welfare of the people; I have received an angelic petition from a group of mothers asking me to oppose this measure. Under the circumstances I feel perfectly justified in voting for the amendment to the amendment and against the resolution.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by the member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) this evening, as I always do, particularly when he is speaking on matters pertaining to agriculture. My interest was aroused by the hon. member some years ago, when he suggested that the problem of farm labour be solved by the farmers hiring two shifts of men, working eight hours each. His close and intimate knowledge of farming conditions made a deep impression upon me at that time, and I have since listened with very great interest indeed to the words of wisdom which always fall from his lips. But I thought he came very near to violating the second paragraph of rule 18 this evening; if he was not violating that rule in the matter of irrelevance, he was dangerously close to violating it in the matter of tedious repetition. I am also in the habit of listening with interest to the remarks of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), who is also the distinguished member from the rural constituency of Gaspé. I represent only one constituency in this House, but it is perhaps the most strictly rural constituency in the Dominion of Canada, because there is not within its bounds a city or town or even an incoroporated village. It is very convenient indeed to be in the position of the hon. member for Maisonneuve, representing as he does, two constituencies, one a city constituency and the other a rural constituency; and it is particularly convenient when a matter of this kind comes up on which there is a certain amount of conflict between the people who reside in the cities and those who reside in the country; because if the hon. member wants to keep in line with the rural population he represents Gaspé, and if he wishes to line up with the city dwellers, he is the distinguished member for Maisonneuve, which is an urban constituency.

I rise on this occasion for two reasons: First, because, representing a rural constituency, I think I should express my opposition to the re-enactment of the daylight saving measure; second, because I want to propose a solution of this vexed question So far, it has been considered from only one standpoint. Daylight saving proposes that every person should get up one hour earlier than in normal times and quit work one hour earlier in the afternoon, thus having an hour for play at the end of the day's work. Why not turn the clock the other way, and instead of getting up one hour earlier in the morning and quitting one hour earlier in the afternoon, get up one hour later in the morning and quit work one hour later in the afternoon? Then those who are interested in daylight saving—the dry goods clerks and the golf enthusiasts—could get up in the morning and play golf.

Then they will appreciate what it means to play golf when the dew is on the ground, and at the same time will realize the position of the farmer who has to go to work in the morning when the dew is heavy. Of course, if they played golf in the morning on moist ground they might probably soil their canvas shoes, and their fingers when they handled the ball, but they would find the atmosphere just as exhiliarating in the early morning as at any other time; and I venture to say that if they took their recreation at that time they would find that the farmer had been at work an hour before them at that. I am told also that those who indulge in the game of golf and similar semi-manly recreations are people who have rather a tendency to stoutness; and, as I am credibly informed that the early morning dew is almost a specific for gout, there is an added reason why it would be advisable to change the time around and take this hour for recreation and pleasure in the forenoon and not rob the farmer of his best hour in the day.

Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I object to re-enactment of the daylight saving law because I believe that the vast majority of the people in the country are opposed to it. I am sure that the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution was perfectly sincere when he gave his opinion as to the percentage of those in favour of daylight saving. I do not question his sincerity, but I certainly question the correctness of his figures. I believe that if a census of opinion were taken on this question it would be found that fully sixty per cent of the people very determinedly and positively oppose it, and of the other forty per cent, half would be as strongly in favour of daylight saving while the other half would be indifferent. That is a fair representation of the sentiment of the country, I think, whether it represents the sentiment of the House or not. I am opposed to the re-enactment of the measure because it not only puts the farmers to unnecessary inconvenience but subjects them to considerable financial loss as well. Some will probably disagree with me in the statement, but I am convinced that I am right when I say that last year considerable financial loss to the farmers attended daylight saving. Not only does it inconvenience the farmer, but it imposes extra work on the housewives in the rural part of the country and the wives of the labouring classes in our large centres of population. Who is benefited by it, and from what source comes the request for daylight saving? The newspapers? Why, certainly. It is all very well for the newspaperman who gets down to his office at eight o'clock in the morning and whose staff may want to go off in the afternoon; and there are no doubt a number of clerks who would like the change. But the farmers and the great bulk of the people who are working in factories and industrial plants, people who have to be at their work at seven o'clock in the morning, do not, I think, really want this law. Should we follow the example of the United States? I think not. Let us legislate for ourselves.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Conditions in Canada are not the same as those in the United States. One hon. member referred to the fact that England, France and Germany had adopted daylight saving. Well, what of that? Has that anything to do with Canada? The conditions in those countries are absolutely different. The hon. gentleman forgot that we have only a few people to the square mile in Canada while in the countries to which he referred there are one hundred, two hundred or three hundred people to the square mile. The population in each of those countries is very largely urban, dwelling almost entirely in the cities and towns, while the rural population is only a small percentage. Canada on the contrary is a rural country.

A few years ago the Government thought it wise to adopt on government works an eight-hour day. I expressed myself against the measure on former occasions, because I considered the adoption by the Government of an eight-hour day made it just that much harder for the farmers and the people in farming communities to obtain the help that was necessary to work their farms. That was one concession that the Government made to the labouring class when they agreed to the eight-hour day on government works, and I ask them now to make a concession to the farming class in regard to this matter of daylight saving. I do not think there can be the shadow of a doubt in the mind of any member of the House, after having heard the speeches delivered this afternoon, that the farmers are opposed to the Daylight Saving Bill. And if hon. gentlemen in this House believe that to be a fact, I ask them to respect the wishes of the farmers in this matter and vote accordingly.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Secretary of State): My hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) was very much surprised that a resolution of this kind was put on the Order Paper or permitted to be taken up at this time, and he seemed to think that not only was there no need for it, but that the people did not want it in any shape or form. I must differ from him in that view, because I think that however we may vote—and I may frankly say that I will support the resolution—it is not at all a bad thing to have had this free and open discussion in Parliament on a question in which there is considerable interest, and which, after all, is not a political question in the ordinary sense of that word. I do not think my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best), quite did justice to the mover of the resolution when he placed him in the position of having interjected a question, and said that he was engendering very bitter strife between large sections of the community. I did not so understand the mover of the resolution. I understood him to say that there would be a natural conflict of opinion between the rural and urban sections. I think my hon. friend from Dufferin need not have been so warm in some of his remarks, because after all, Sir, we can afford to hold different views and express them temperately.

I cannot agree with the statement made by some opposing the resolution that as low as three per cent of the population is in favour of such a resolution. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), I observe, put it very much higher. Of course we can only guess on a subject of this kind, but I think it is interesting to have the various opinions held in the different constituencies reflected by hon. members in the House.

I do not think that the method of approaching this subject is particularly to be deprecated, as my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) seemed to think. Some hon. members who have spoken have accused the Government of shirking responsibility on a question for which they ought to shoulder responsibility. Again and again in this House, I have heard hon. gentlemen complain that in democratic governments the tendency is for the Government to run the whole country and make their followers fall into line by the threat that otherwise the Administration would be smashed. I am rather inclined to agree with my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) that it is not a bad thing on a question like this to have a free discussion in the House, and to feel that even if members of the Government hold divergent views in regard to it they would still be justified in continuing to hold office. I am glad of that because on this question I may find myself differing from my distinguished friend from Leeds (Sir Thomas White).

However, there were one or two remarks made during the debate that I want to answer. Some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken very strongly against daylight saving have stated that they believed it to be a good thing as a war measure, and they supported it last year on that account. I may be dense, or I may not perhaps have given the argument sufficient attention, but if daylight saving is good as a war measure because it instilled more energy into our people and caused more production in this country, it surely must be an equally good measure for Canada in days of peace.

I thought that my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Steele), who finds himself in the position of having to vote against the resolution, supplied one of the strongest arguments that I had yet heard in favour of the measure, when he gave it as his deliberate conviction, as a medical man, that on the whole the health of the people of Canada had been greatly improved through the operation of this legislation. If that is so I think it is a priceless blessing to achieve. The hon. gentleman also spoke of the very beneficial effects upon people who were working in factories, school children, and so on, that had resulted from the change in time. I am not disposed to dispute for one moment that in many respects daylight saving may have been somewhat detrimental to certain classes, and especially to the farming interests. I remember when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) first mooted the idea of this legislation I was then Minister of Agriculture. Sir George Foster seemed to think that the whole country was in favour of it, but I told him at that time that I was inclined to believe that a large section of the farming community would be against it. He said he had given a great deal of attention to the subject, and I think he had ascertained the feelings of a very large portion of the community. It is true that the view held in the country with respect to this matter may have changed somewhat. I am prepared to admit that a great many of the farming section, possibly most of them, are against it, and it therefore became a matter of balancing conditions.

One of the things that I do think has a material effect upon this question as it presents itself to-day is the operation of the railways, and the fact that in the United States daylight saving is in operation. My hon. friend from South York tried to throw some responsibility on the Government. He demanded that it should control the railways and compel them not to observe daylight saving, if this House, by its vote, decided that it should not be adopted. Well, my hon. friend must know that this is a question of railway operation and of railway time tables. Surely he would not lay down the principle that because the railways are adopting daylight saving and alter their time tables they should not continue to have the power they have always had of running their trains at certain particular times? I must say that I am not convinced yet that if the railways are altering their time tables by an hour, and that consequently the large business interests of the country, the financial institutions, and so on, with their ramifications, are also going to observe the difference of an hour, in the main it will not lead to a very great deal of confusion and loss if the whole country does not carry out the same policy.

Looking at this matter from the British Columbia point of view, I may say that I represent a constituency very largely rural. Perhaps I do not know the exact feeling which prevails throughout the province, but I do not know that in my visits to British Columbia last fall I never heard a single word against the operation of the daylight saving law. I believe it was the opinion and the expectation of those people out there that it would naturally follow that daylight saving would continue this year, and the only communications I have had on the subject at all have been communications expressing gratification that daylight saving had been accomplished.

My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards)—not very seriously I am bound to admit—suggested that some of this campaign was instigated by gentlemen who do a lot of golfing. I am almost afraid to admit that although I was a farmer for twenty-five years I am still a golfer, and I am not, as he pictured, an exceedingly stout person or suffering from any physical disability of that kind. Nor do golfers always wear canvas shoes, which are exposed to the dampening influence of the dew. Daylight saving is popular with the people in cities and towns, and I recognize the truth of the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Cooper) that the workers in the stores and factories strongly support it. Personally, I am going to vote for the resolution and against the amendment. Whatever effect this particular resolution may have—according to my hon. friend from South Perth, it is almost dead now and we have come to assist at the burial—I am convinced that it is an excellent thing to have a question of this kind form the subject of a general discussion, and to afford to every hon. member an opportunity of voting on it without the question of party allegiance being raised. I think that it will be the means of fixing the attention of the whole country in a way that it has never been fixed before, and will ultimately lead to its being settled in a manner that will be for the good of Canada as a whole.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Lt.-General Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): I remember many years ago hearing an American stating that his doctrine in religious matters was to go to Hades his own way, and let everybody else go theirs. That is largely my doctrine on this question. I have not the slightest objection in the world to the people of the cities and towns advancing the clock an hour in the morning. If they think they can make a little better time in getting to or leaving their offices, they are welcome to it, but I am certainly opposed to upsetting the whole industrial conditions of the Dominion of Canada by enacting a statute of this kind. There is not a municipality in Canada to-day but can bring about the desired result by passing a by-law. As a matter of fact, in many towns to-day throughout Canada the whistles are started blowing at five o'clock, half-past five, six o'clock, six-thirty or seven o'clock, as the case may be. That procedure goes on and there is no great worry or turmoil over it; people adapt themselves to their environment. Those in the towns and cities who want their time advanced can easily find the machinery to do it. But I protest, on behalf of the farming community, and those who do not want to have legislation of this kind forced upon them, against this kind of thing. This talk of it being a war measure is the merest piffle which has been resorted to in the case of any one with a fad to advocate until it has become nauseating.

The farming community want to be let alone. They say the old standard time is good enough for them. I am not very old yet, but I can remember, Sir, when Toronto had one time, then at Donlands we had to set our watches ahead a few minutes, we had to do the same thing when we got to Dumbarton, and I remember in the town of Bowmanville where I grew up we were four minutes ahead of Toronto in our time. Our watches had to be adjusted when we moved up and down the country one or two miles, and yet the people survived, they raised their grain and sold it, and got along very well without any standard time. Then standard time came in, and I remember on one occasion being in St. John where I found they had three different times; the old meridian time, the standard time, and some eastern or Atlantic seaboard time, so that you never knew what time any one was going to travel by. Yet St. John thrived and things went on quite satisfactorily. Therefore I take the liberty of suggesting to the Government that there should be no further interference with our standard time. The farmers are content with the old standard or meridian time, but they have no objection to the cities and towns passing by-laws to put the clock ahead or back an hour to suit their own convenience. Daylight saving is all very well for those people who are fond of the pleasant pastime at which my hon. friend the Secretary of State is such an expert—golfing is a very pleasant exercise for delicate women—and I have no objection in the world to cities and towns regulating their own time, but in the name of Heaven let us alone. Down in the city of Windsor they have one time, across the river another time. At Port Arthur our time is the same as it is at Sarnia; at Fort William, which is the dividing line, it is an hour ahead. So we have all that strip of Canadian territory from the Detroit line to Port Arthur with an hour's difference in time. I think there is a great deal of meddling in connection with this whole business, and I, Sir, shall vote to let the matter remain as it is without any interference with the standard time, leaving each municipality to regulate its affairs as it wishes.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to discuss the merits of daylight saving legislation. I am going to express my opinion upon it when I cast my vote, and I think after the discussion we have already had it is the best way to express it; but I want to vote on a motion which is according to the Rules of the House, and I rise therefore for the purpose of raising a point of order against the amendment to the amendment as moved by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Mackie). The main resolution reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to re-enact at once Chapter 2, Statutes of 1918, "The Daylight-Saving Act, 1918."

That statute, chapter 2 of the statutes of 1918, reads as follows:

> 2. During the prescribed period in each year in which this Act is in force, the time, for general purposes in Canada, in each province, shall be one hour in advance of the time which under the law of the province is the time prescribed for such province, and, if there is no time so prescribed, of the accepted standard time.
> 3. This Act shall be in force during the present year for such time as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council.

If the main resolution is adopted it will mean that this Act shall be in force during the present year, that is the year 1919. So the amendment to the amendment, which merely says that it is not expedient during the year to enact this legislation, is merely a negation of the main motion and is not in order.

Mr SPEAKER: In respect to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) I must point out that he refers to a statute, while the resolution before the House is merely an academic one, or one calling for an expression of opinion on the part of the House, and it would have no effect upon the legislation of the country whatsoever. Therefore it resolves itself into a question purely of phraseology, as to whether the amendment to the amendment is actually an amendment to the amendment. In my judgment it is, because the motion calls for the enactment of a statute at once; the amendment says that it shall be enacted in six months; the amendment to the amendment says it shall not be enacted for at least one year. So it is an amendment in question of time, and in my judgment therefore it is in order.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): Mr. Speaker, I quite concur in the views of the hon. gentlemen who have expressed their satisfaction at the manner in which we have been permitted to discuss this question. I know there are times when it is necessary that the Government shall accept the responsibility of a measure, but I think it would make for every good end if we had more frequent opportunities to discuss matters in the free and open way in which this House has had this matter before it to-day. I have only received one communication on this subject from my constituents; it is against the Daylight Saving Act. Strange to say it does not come from a rural community, it comes from one of the incorporated towns within my constituency. In the town of Shelburne, the shire town of one of my counties, the Board of Trade has passed a strong resolution against daylight saving, and the secretary in transmitting it to me informs me that the views of that community are in harmony with the action of the board. Any hon. member will realise at once that the decision of an important body like a Board of Trade in one of our towns calls for profound consideration and respect from the representative of the county, and I certainly receive it in that way. That is one side of the question. The other side is this: Last year I briefly spoke and voted for the Daylight Saving Bill. After that I had an opportunity of visiting my constituents and spending some time amongst them, and I am bound to say that no one offered any objection to the course I pursued so far as I heard. Wherever the question interested them at all they were perfectly satisfied and content. So I have on the one hand the apparent satisfaction of the whole community, and on the other hand I have this resolution of the Board of Trade of one of my towns, to which I should like to pay great respect. Taking it all in all, I am inclined to think I have not found sufficient reason to change the ground which I took last year.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question now before the House, I should like to endorse the sentiments of the hon. gentleman from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding). I am thoroughly in accord with the course that the Government has adopted to-day, and I am not in accord with the course that the member for South York (Mr. Maclean) has taken. It would appear to me to be much better for this House and for this country that the members of this House should express their true opinions, rather than that they should express them wholly and solely under party patronage, so to speak. The Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) has very frankly risen in his place and said that the Government desired an expression of opinion from this House.

He desired that the members of the House should voice their own opinions or the opinions of their constituents without regard to party. The member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) seemed to ask that somebody should take the responsibility, but suggested that he should not; in other words, he wanted to be allowed to get in under the wing of the Government and say later to his constituents that he followed the Government, or did not, whichever suited his purpose. The course, therefore, followed by the Government in this matter is a fit and proper one.

We know from the experience of last session that a very decided cleavage of opinion prevails in this matter as between the urban and the rural population, between the country districts and the cities, towns and villages. The petitions and expressions of opinion that have been received by the great majority of members of the House from rural districts indicate that daylight saving is decidedly unpopular in the country and that the farmers do not desire it. It appears to me, representing, as I do, a constituency made up of both urban and rural districts, that, taking all things into consideration, the requests of the rural population in this case ought to be acceded to. It is true that there are two extremely arguable sides to the question, but the urban districts have unquestionably not expressed their view in as concrete and forcible a way as have the rural districts. Having regard to what the farmers have done for this country, considering the extent to which the prosperity of Canada depends on the rural interests and the definite manner in which those interests have expressed their opinion that the re-enactment of daylight saving would be absolutely detrimental to them, it is the duty of this House to listen to those representations and to carry out the suggestion contained in them.

Mr. GEORGE B. NICHOLSON (Algoma East): Like some other members, I represent a constituency the population of which is about equally divided between those whose business is agriculture and those who work in factories, saw-mills and mines. So far as I have been able to judge, just as much difference of opinion exists on one side as on the other. I took the opportunity of going all over the agricultural part of my constituency during the harvest season and finding out what the farmers thought of daylight saving. Many of them were decidedly opposed to it; many of them expressed absolute indifference. I found the same attitude among the men working in factories, in mines and in railway services. So that, so far as my constituents are concerned I am possibly not compelled to take any particular stand in this matter.

In this whole discussion there has been too great a tendency to regard this daylight saving proposal as something in the nature of a class measure. Many references have been made to the millionaires and the golf-players, and not enough consideration has been given to the large number of people in the urban centres who are neither millionaires nor golf-players and who work in shops and factories ten hours a day. These men say to me: It is a decided advantage for us to have our leisure moments all at one end of the day, and that in the evening. But it has been pointed out to us that the daylight saving system works a great disadvantage to a large number of people who work on and are interested in farms, and we are willing to forego the advantage accruing to us by the enactment of daylight saving in order to do away with the disadvantage resulting to our agricultural population. If the subject was discussed from that point of view, without any effort to create prejudice in the minds of any class of the people, we would arrive at a more satisfactory conclusion. My judgement is that in the interests of harmony those of us who benefit by daylight saving should be willing to forego the advantage accruing to us from it in order that the agricultural interests may have their way, so to speak. Unquestionably 95 per cent of the people interested in agriculture throughout Canada are opposed to daylight saving, notwithstanding what I said regarding my own constituency. I am going to vote against the resolution, without regard to the amendments, because I believe that the re-enactment of the daylight saving measure would not be in the interests of harmony among all the classes of people in this country. I suggest that hon. members should discuss subjects of this kind on their merits. Many of the class differences prevailing in Canada are largely due to the activities of loose-lipped agitators who do not hesitate to take advantage of every opportunity to encourage these differences, having very little regard to the merits of the subjects they discuss.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): I wish to say just a word or two on this resolution because of the fact that the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) laid particular stress on the railway situation. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to re-enact at once Chapter 2, Statutes of 1918, "The Daylight Saving Act, 1918."

I cannot see any necessity at all for an amendment to the original resolution on which I should like to have seen a straight vote. Be that as it may, however, two amendments have been moved which, if carried, really mean that the resolution should not be adopted. When the Government introduced the Daylight Saving Bill last year, one thing that had a great deal of influence on the passing of that legislation was the fact that from one end of the Dominion to the other the people were undoubtedly led to believe and, I think, hon. estly—that we were short of fuel and that everything possible should be done, in the interest of the public and in the interest of the war, to conserve fuel. Therefore, when the Bill was introduced, the farmers of Canada, being willing, as they were during the whole war, to make any sacrifices necessary to bring the war to a successful issue, decided to give up what they believed was of great value to them and perhaps make a sacrifice in order to conserve fuel and thereby furnish more ammunition and give better service to the men at the front.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask the minister a question? I have asked it of several members and I have not yet received an answer. I should like to know how one pound of coal has been saved through the Daylight Saving Act.

Mr. REID: Whether any fuel was saved or not, there was at all events a feeling throughout the country that a shortage of fuel existed and that fuel might be saved as a result of daylight saving. For centuries, we have had a standard time in this country; we have got along very well under it; there has never been any trouble, and I want to say frankly that since since my birth I have been satisfied with the standard time, and have not wanted it changed and would like to see it continued as in the past. There is, however, a difference of opinion on this question throughout Canada. As the hon. member for South York has stated, the most serious matter at present is the way in which it will affect the railways of Canada. He asked me for an answer as to what the railways would do. The railways are being operated under their own managements, and unless some trouble should arise and complaint is made to the Government, the Government will, of course, not interfere. When trouble arises and complaint is made the Government, of course, are supreme in this country in so far as rectifying anything that may not be in the public interest is concerned. I do not know what the railways will do, but frankly I cannot see that the situation that may arise will be as serious as has been represented. Travelling from here to Vancouver, one retires to bed at night and when one gets up the next morning the time is changed one hour. One moves one's watch ahead, and the change does not seem to make much difference; one gets along just the same. My view, therefore, is this, that when a train arrives at the Canadian side of the boundary line the time will be changed the one hour's difference, just the same as occurs on the time-tables of trains going from here to Vancouver. There is only this difference—and what effect it will have I cannot say—that on transcontinental trains the time is changed at divisional points. The question has been asked: What effect will this have where trains are crossing the boundary not at a divisional point? No one can answer that question until the thing has been tried.

There is no doubt, however, the railways of Canada will, in their own interest, make their time-tables to suit the interest of the people they are serving. But after all, we have, as hon. members know, the Board of Railway Commissioners, which has full power and jurisdiction over all the railways in Canada in rates and time-tables, and the interests of the people are guarded by that board, from which there is an appeal to the Governor in Council and from that to the Parliament, which is supreme. Personally, I should like to have the old standard time retained in Canada. I believe the cities can change the time to suit themselves, as has been done in other places.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend, as Minister of Railways, not think that, on the first of April next, when the time tables of the American railway systems are changed, the Canadian railways will have to adapt their time tables to those of the American railways?

Mr. REID: I am not doing any thinking until the thing is done and I see what the arrangement is. I will then do some thinking as to whether it is in the interest of this country or not. When one is crossing at Detroit and other places, the time table shows one hour's difference. The standard time is changed at American points, for instance at Rouse's Point. At present you leave New York at a certain hour and arrive at a certain hour at Montreal. I cannot see why the trains cannot simply change the time at Rouse's Point and run on Canadian time into Montreal. Perhaps, I am not an expert railwayman and so cannot see the effect of the situation on the railways of Canada, but this is a case where we should vote as our constituents want us to. I am quite satisfied from the petitions I have from my constituents that they are absolutely opposed to the daylight saving scheme, and until I feel that it is in the public interest to make a change, I consider it my duty to vote as my constituents would have me vote.

Mr. S. J. CROWE (Burrard): I was not very much in favour of the daylight saving Act last year, but after watching its operation last summer I am certainly in favour of its re-enactment this year. I believe that I am voicing the sentiments of my constituents when I say that ninety per cent of them are in favour of daylight saving. I have heard very little criticism of the measure. I have received quite a number of telegrams and communications from the city of Vancouver, of which I am one of the representatives, and all these communications strongly endorse daylight saving. This afternoon my colleague from South Vancouver (Mr. Cooper) received a telegram from the Reeve of the Municipality of Point Grey, which, as it arrived after he had finished speaking, he has asked me to read to the House. It is as follows:

> Point Grey Council, on behalf of the citizens, favours daylight saving and requests your urgent efforts towards that end.
>
> George Fletcher,
> Point Grey.

I received telegrams yesterday from the different athletic associations in the city of Vancouver, also a wire from the Retailers' Association of Vancouver, as well as a letter from the Kiwanis Club of that city, all in favour of daylight saving. I think myself that daylight saving is in the best interests of the great majority of the people of this country, and that is why I am going to support the resolution.

Mr. A. E. FRIPP (Ottawa): It seems to me there is a very important preliminary question to be determined before we vote to-night. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) has not in my judgment cleared up the situation. Now, as I understand it, those hon. members who desire to vote against daylight saving will find themselves in this position, if the resolution is agreed to: The railways of Canada will follow the time tables of their American connections, and the result will be that instead of the farmers of Canada avoiding the disadvantage which some hon. members see in daylight saving, the trains will run an hour earlier just as they did last year. I therefore think that before we vote on this question we should have some assurance from the Government that if this House refuses to accept this resolution, the railways of Canada will not change their time tables but will run on standard time.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What have we to do with the railway time tables?

Mr. FRIPP: Everything. I am satisfied that the Canadian railways will change their time on Sunday next, and that means they will run their trains an hour earlier than at present. Then those who voted against daylight saving will have daylight saving in effect so far as train connections are concerned.

Mr. MANION: What effect will the change of time have on any railways except those that cross the border?

Mr. FRIPP: It will affect every railway in Canada.

Mr. MANION: But why should it, except those that cross the border?

Mr. FRIPP: My hon. friend must realize that a train leaving Ottawa this afternoon for New York must cross the border and—

Mr. MANION: I am speaking of the trains that do not cross the border.

Mr. FRIPP: If our Canadian railways change their time on Sunday to conform with American time, it means that all our trains will be run an hour earlier than at present. So far as my constituency is concerned, and myself personally, we are absolutely in favour of daylight saving. Last year it worked out marvellously well in the city of Ottawa. It gave to our labouring men, who have passed a resolution in favour of the measure, an extra hour a day which has been greatly to their benefit, and I venture to say that if you took a vote in the city of Ottawa to-day ninety-nine per cent of the people would vote in favour of a re-enactment of the measure. So personally I am prepared to vote for the resolution, but at the same time I imagine that if it is defeated those who think they have gained an advantage will find they have gained a lemon. I say that if the resolution is defeated, and there is to be no Daylight Saving Act in operation for the ensuing months, the railway companies of Canada should run on their present time; otherwise there will be great confusion in freight and passenger traffic, and all business connected with the railways will be in a state of chaos more or less, which will be detrimental to the best interests of the country. I repeat what I rose to draw to the attention of the House, that it should be well understood that if this resolution is defeated, the railway time tables of the country shall not be changed, but remain as they are.

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): It seems to me the question has been discussed thoroughly, and I shall say only a few words. There appears to be a difference of opinion between the rural and urban population of Canada. As a farmer, and as a representative of an agricultural constituency, I am decidedly opposed to daylight saving. There is no question that it does a financial injury to the farmer by reason of the fact that he loses an hour each day at the season of the year when time is most precious. Under daylight saving he rises by the clock as usual, does his chores, and is ready to proceed to the fields to cut his hay or grain probably at eight o'clock, but if the dew is heavy he will be unable to do anything until half-past nine or ten. That hour and a half is practically lost. Then, in the afternoon he has to stop at four or five o'clock—five o'clock at any rate but usually at four—if he has chores to do; so that it is a direct financial loss to him. On the other hand, I can quite appreciate the fact that the urban population is strongly in favour of daylight saving. I am willing to grant that the opinion is fairly evenly divided pro and con on this question. But that is not the point. The urban population have only this to claim for daylight saving, namely, that it gives them an hour more in the evening in which to enjoy themselves, or to rest, although it does not benefit them financially, whereas, against that, the farmer argues that he does suffer a direct financial loss, and it does not seem to me under these circumstances that there can be any question as to what the decision of this House ought to be.

As to what has been said to-night with reference to the railways, I can conceive, if the report which we see in the press to-night is correct, that the Railway War Board has ordered all railways in Canada to adopt the American time on the 31st of March, all farmers who ship milk, cream and other produce in the morning will be compelled to adopt daylight saving. I do not doubt that this is attributable to the action of the United States, and am not disposed to blame the Railway Board, because I do not see how we can help adopting the time of the United States roads. We have either to do that or hold our trains up on the border for an hour.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): I occupy the somewhat unique position, Mr. Speaker, of having voted on both sides of this question during the last two years. When this matter came up in 1917 I criticised it very severely. In fact I gave what some newspaper called a very learned dissertation on the whole theory of standard time and other allied subjects, and as a result of the severe criticism which was levelled at the Bill it was withdrawn by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). Last year, in order to bring ourselves in harmony with practically all the rest of the world, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was very anxious to put the Bill through, did me the honour of naming me as his seconder. Therefore, like many other hon. members I voted for the Bill. Now it comes up again, and as a member of the Government I take some credit for putting this matter up to the representatives of the people as we have done. I do not believe in the party whip system, as it has operated, I think, to the disadvantage of Canada in public life in the past. There has been too much, on the part of both Government and Opposition, of a practice of a dozen men or fewer getting together and outlining a policy and expecting the others to accept it. I realize that under the system of responsible government the great majority of matters that are really questions of policy must be decided by a government, and the government must stand or fall by the vote of the majority of the representatives. But this is not, in my judgment, a question of government policy. It is a question merely of what is best for the country. I was very much in favour of submitting this question to the House, and I am glad to see that the House accepted it in the spirit in which the Government put it forward, notwithstanding the objection of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean). I shall not enter into the merits of the question from the standpoint of either the farmer or the resident of the city. I am a farmer myself to some extent—my hon. friend smiles.

An hon. MEMBER: To what extent?

Mr. CARVELL: Well to the extent that I make some money, I am happy to say. I am a farmer, and I can agree with every word said by the farmers. In the part of Canada from which I come we lose not only an hour, but an hour and a half, because we are on the extreme western edge of the Atlantic standard, and our standard time is half an hour faster than sun time. When you add another hour to that, instead of leaving work at six o'clock during hay and harvest we leave at half past four. The same condition of affairs exists in Western Manitoba and near the Rocky Mountains, and wherever you get beyond the meridian when the standard time is in advance of sun time, until you reach a point where you are an hour and a half ahead of sun time, which makes it almost impossible for the farmers to get along. This, however, has been so thoroughly discussed by hon. members that I do not intend to pursue this phase of the subject. I shall now deal with the question in its relation to the railways. I am aware that there is a very strong prejudice by the railway companies in favour of the adoption of daylight saving, not so much, perhaps, because of any intrinsic advantage in the scheme, as that the United States, having adopted it, great inconvenience and difficulty will arise in the operation of the Canadian trains if we do not follow suit. It has been pointed out that there are many places in Canada where railways will be compelled to run an hour earlier than they do at present simply because the United States has adopted daylight saving. There must be twenty-five or more places in Canada where trains run across the border. There is no doubt that a train that starts from New York bound for Montreal or Toronto will leave an hour earlier than ordinarily and arrive at its destination an hour earlier, and the man who desires to travel by that train has to rise an hour earlier than usual. But there are a great many other places where it will mean an advantage rather than a disadvantage. At four different points between the Atlantic and the Pacific the time now changes one hour, and on every train that goes from the Atlantic to the Pacific the clocks must be changed so many times. There are two places in my own constituency where Canadian trains running into the United States are now compelled to change time by one hour. To-day they are compelled to change the time an hour in crossing from Windsor to Detroit or from Sarnia to Port Huron, whereas under this arrangement there would be no change. It is therefore apparent that while there are disadvantages there are also corresponding advantages. I have consulted some of the railway men, and will state their argument in favour of the adoption of daylight saving. I was not able to attend during all the debate, and possibly what I am about to say may be a repetition of what has been said before. If it is, the House will pardon me. The railway men admit that there is no difficulty in operating the trains where the time changes at divisional points because that is done all over the country. But there are certain places where trains cross the international boundary line which places are not divisional points and where there are no telegraph offices. An engineer running a freight train in the night may be handed an order that he is to stop at a certain hour. Either the train despatcher may make a mistake in not properly calculating the time, or the engineer may make a mistake, and there is liable to be an accident. I am not sufficient of a railway man to answer yes or no to that, or to say whether there is a great deal to it, but I will state this: I have found that most of the things that are held up as reasons for opposing a measure can be overcome if men want to overcome them. I have a great deal more faith in the ability of the Canadian railway companies and their very intelligent employees than to believe that it is impossible that they can work out a little matter like this. If they can work out a change of time at all these different points, moving from east to west across the continent, it seems to me they will not have much difficulty in arranging for changes of time when moving from north to south.

I also realize that it is a great convenience to people living in cities and towns to have the time advanced an hour. I think any person will admit that. But I do not agree that I am compelled, because of something that is a convenience to the dwellers in the cities and towns, to vote for a measure which, to my own personal knowledge, will result in great loss to the farming community. It is not a question of convenience or inconvenience to the farmers, it is one of absolute money loss; there is not a farmer in this House —I think there is scarcely one in the country—who would not tell you that the change of standard time was a real money loss to him. It is true that the inconvenience is worse in some places than in others; it is very much worse on the western edges of the standards than on the eastern edges. In the town of Riviere du Loup, for example, the adoption of this legislation would only mean the gain of half an hour, and therefore the disadvantage involved would not be very great.

The only great objection, from a business standpoint lies with the railways, and I do not think that is sufficient to justify me in voting to put the farmers of the country to a loss which I am sure they would incur if this legislation goes through. Therefore I will have to vote for the amendment to the amendment and against the resolution.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): I rise for the purpose of asking a question, not with any desire to speak again. I understand that the resolution declares it to be expedient to re-enact at once chapter 2 of the statutes of 1918. I presume that is the Act passed last year?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON: That Act expires shortly?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON: When does it expire?

Mr. CARVELL: At the end of the current fiscal year.

Mr. RICHARDSON: In that case what is the object of the amendments? If we vote down the resolution does not that settle the whole question? I think hon. gentlemen should have it established to their satisfaction exactly what they are going to vote on. If the motion is to re-enact the Daylight Saving Act, and we vote it down, then the whole thing falls and there is no necessity either for the amendment, or the amendment to the amendment, because the law will expire in three days. Let both amendments be withdrawn, and then members can vote intelligently on the question.

Mr. CHARLES GAVAN POWER (Quebec South): After having listened for a considerable time to the various opinions expressed, I have come to the conclusion, somewhat reluctantly, I admit, that the inconvenience occasioned to the farmer by the passage of this law will not be greater than the disadvantages which will result to the city worker and dweller should the law not be re-enacted. In common with a great many members of this House I have the greatest possible sympathy with the farming community, so much so that the day before yesterday I voted to remove what I thought was a very substantial grievance under which they were suffering. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, a large number of the members of the House who belong to the farming class did not seem to want that grievance removed. Now, Sir, taking those circumstances for granted, I must look to my own constituency, and I find, from letters, telegrams, and communications of all sorts which I have received in the past few days, that the financial, the business, and the working classes of the city of Quebec are almost unanimous in favour of a measure of daylight saving. That being my own conviction as well as the conviction of my constituency, I will take great pleasure in supporting the resolution introduced by the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Cooper).

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): The object which the Government had in view in facilitating the debate upon the motion of the hon. member for South Vancouver has been amply accomplished.

In view of the acute divergence of opinion in the country, and among members of the House, it was felt advisable and eminently proper that an opportunity should be given for a frank, free, expression of opinion, precisely such as we have had to-day. If ever there was a question with which a Government, or a Parliament, had to deal, which might properly be submitted for the opinion of the members of the House of Commons this is one. It is not a party question, nor, as I stated this afternoon, does it involve any political principle. No one will pretend to say that those in the country who are opposed to daylight saving represent substantially any one political party. No one will pretend to say that those in cities and towns who are in favour of daylight saving represent completely or in large measure any political party. It seems to me, therefore, that it was an entirely proper proceeding, and I am very glad to have had the views which have been expressed, particularly those of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) who has had a wide experience as a parliamentarian, and who was for so long a member of the Government of Canada, in support of the view which we have taken. Now it seems to me that Parliament was discharging a function to-day, which it might more frequently be called upon to discharge, and that is to inform the public generally of Canada as to the opinions which are held in the various sections of the country which are represented in this House upon public questions. I am the first to say that in any matter that involves the policy of the Government, the Government cannot transfer its responsibility to the House.

The executive has its responsibilities, and the House has its duties, but they are separate and distinct. The Government cannot escape its responsibility in the matter of policy, and of course its measures must be such as commend themselves at all times to a majority of this House. I do not at all agree therefore with the views put forward by the hon. member for South York that the course which the Government has adopted in this matter is in any way a violation of the principle of governmental responsibility.

Mr. JACOBS: May I interject a remark? It was made a Government measure last year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am aware of that. It would have been perfectly open for the Government last year to have taken the opinion of Parliament on the matter had it so desired.

I do not intend to-night to discuss this question on the merits, because it has been discussed from every angle, and I am exceedingly grateful to all the members of this House who have taken part in this debate and given the Government and the country the benefit of their views. I was aware, generally speaking, of the views which prevailed in the country and in the House, but although I have had information showered upon me from various parts of the country, this debate to-day has been most informing and illuminating and has as I stated before, abundantly justified the policy which has been adopted.

But as to the merits, I have just this to say. It seems to me to be a matter of inconvenience on the one hand and of hardship on the other. I do not mean to say that that will apply to every section of Canada, dividing such section into urban and rural districts; but, generally speaking, it appears to me that whereas in the case of towns and cities there may be inconvenience by reason of the House not adopting daylight saving legislation, at the same time this discussion has abundantly shown that in the farming communities there is more than inconvenience—there is hardship. Let me state further, that I make that assertion having regard to the conditions which prevail to-day. What those conditions will be a year or two years hence I do not pretend to say. But it has been shown in this House that under prevailing conditions with regard to shortage of labour and otherwise, there will possibly be hardship in many of the rural districts if daylight saving legislation is enacted, and that view has been strongly supported in the arguments which we have heard to-day from the representatives of the rural districts.

Now, this is not a Government measure which is under consideration to-night. It is a resolution of a private member which, if it had been reached yesterday, could have been discussed by this House precisely as the House has discussed it to-day; therefore it is open to every hon. member on this side of the House, and of course to every hon. member on the other side of the House, and to every hon. member of this Government, to vote upon this question precisely as he pleases without reference to party lines or to the fact that members of the Government vote one way or vote the other. As for myself, I intend to vote for the amendment to the amendment. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr.

Richardson) has pointed out truly that it would be very much better if we could have a straight vote upon the original resolution, but that is not the position before the House. The position is that one hon. member has moved an amendment which does not, I believe, represent what he intended to move. There is before the House also an amendment to that amendment, and by voting for the amendment to the amendment, as I propose to do, I shall vote against the resolution of the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Cooper).

Mr. F. N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, as I propose to vote on this question differently from what I did last year, I wish to express my opinion on the matter. When this same resolution was presented last year it appeared to me to be not a very sound proposition; I thought it was meddling with something that was outside the jurisdiction of the House, and consequently I voted against it. But after having tried it out for a year I am rather pleased with it, and I think it has been, in our section, a benefit rather than otherwise. I think it is one of the wise measures of the Government,—I am sorry I cannot congratulate them on all the measures that they have brought up and passed.

I can see no special harm in this resolution. I have a telegram to-day from my constituents, and I had a copy of a resolution, which I think has been forwarded to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, asking him to favour this measure; my constituents are very much in favour of it. Personally, whether daylight saving legislation is enacted or not does not affect me very much, because I have always had the habit of getting up before the law requires me to. But, as I say, in my constituency I think this daylight saving measure has had the effect of getting our people up earlier, and when you accomplish that you are moving in the right direction. It does not need any law to keep them out of bed at night, because most of them stay up too late; but if you can induce the population either in the cities or the country to get up earlier, I think it is a step in the right direction. I argued last year the farmer's standpoint, that he required his help in the afternoon, and that a man in the afternoon in haying or harvesting time or other busy seasons was of very much more value to him than a man in the morning That was especially true last year, and the year before probably, when the labourers practically dominated the whole situation. I do not think that the labour conditions are the same just now as they were last year, and it is not likely they ever will be. Then if your foreman or the man in charge was not feeling very good it was better for him to keep away, because if he appeared before his men looking cross they did not want to stay with him. But this coming season, and probably the seasons to follow, when the farmer goes to town to get help in his haying or harvesting season, while he may have to pay pretty reasonable wages, which is not objectionable, I think he will be able to say to his help anyway, "I will dictate to you to some extent the hours of labour. If I do not ask you to work earlier in the morning, I will expect you to work later in the evening."

The United States have adopted a law putting daylight saving into force from the first day of next month, and that has a peculiar effect upon our railway services crossing the border. For instance, on one particular section of the Canadian Pacific railway whicr passes through the state of Maine, the Maine Central and the Canadian Pacific operate over quite a distance on the same tracks. It would certainly be very inconvenient to have two systems of railways operating on the same tracks but under different schedules. Possibly the same condition prevails in other localities throughout the Dominion. It is quite probable that whether this House adopts the daylight saving system for this year or not, the railways will have to adopt it in order to carry on their work satisfactorily.

I do not think the farmer will suffer by the adoption of this legislation. If he does not want his hired man to start work at seven o'clock, he can tell him to come on at eight o'clock, as under the old system, and work an hour or two later in the evening. It has been said that the labouring class is not in favour of daylight saving. I am informed by the general manager of our business that they expect to put the daylight saving system in force from the first of April whether the Government adopts it or not. I appreciate the position of the farmer, but I believe that the labour conditions are such that he will not have the trouble that he has had in the past. I voted against daylight saving last year because it looked to me like a silly and uncalled-for move, but having tried it out, I am pleased with it. To my mind, anything that has the effect of encouraging people to get up early in the morning is a step in the right direction.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Agriculture): This debate has proceeded for five hours during this afternoon and evening, and all the arguments that can be advanced pro and con have been pretty well exhausted. I should like to observe, however, that we have the experience of last year to go upon, and there is no doubt whatever that upon a very considerable part of the population the daylight saving measure did work a hardship last year. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) referred to the fact that the legislation was to be continued in force in the United States for the present year. I think I am correct in stating that had Congress not talked it out, as one hon. gentleman observed this afternoon, the chances are that the measure would have been repealed. The agitation against it was very strong indeed, and the consideration of its repeal was before Congress at that time.

I am not particularly impressed by the arguments that have been adduced as to the need of re-enacting this legislation in Canada in order to facilitate our railway train service. It is quite true that we may be obliged to alter our railway time tables in Canada so far as international train services, and possibly also so far as trains connecting with international lines, are concerned. But a large number of trains running daily in Canada are not connected with international train services, and there is no reason why they should be affected by the change of time in the United States.

The agricultural population of Canada are a unit in opposing this measure. It affects them peculiarly; it works a hardship upon them. If city dwellers desire to get up earlier in the morning, it is surely not necessary for Parliament to legislate in order to enable them to do so. The member for Sherbrooke on a little reflection will surely realize that that is a fact. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote against the resolution.

Mr. THOMAS M. M. TWEEDIE (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in a position similar to that occupied by a great many members of the House with regard to this matter. I supported the Daylight Saving Bill last year, but after a year's experience I find that in the city of Calgary about as many are against the principle of daylight saving as are in favour of it, while in the outlying rural parts almost every one is opposed to it. It seems to me that the consideration of this matter resolves itself into a question of deciding between convenience and necessity. The necessity is all on the side of the agricultural interests in that district. No necessity is involved, so far as I have been able to ascertain, in the matter of daylight saving as affecting the people residing in the city; with them it is simply a matter of convenience. I propose to support the policy which has regard to necessity rather than to convenience.

The Railway War Board was absolutely justified in issuing an order making effective on Canadian railways the same time as they have in the United States. Many Canadian trains go to Boston,, Bangor Portland, Chicago, Detroit and other important centres in the United States, and if the systems running these trains did not adopt the time effective in the United States, the railway systems of the United States would have to alter their time tables to suit the train schedules in Canada in order to prevent traffic from being held up twelve or fourteen hours at points where connections are made. As the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has suggested, local trains not connected with international lines can give the agricultural interests the same service as they are receiving at the present time.

Mr. JOHN ELAWS REID (Mackenzie): I cannot see that there is any law which prevents the dwellers in the cities from getting up an hour earlier, if they see fit, and I am sure this House cannot pass any legislation which will compel them to get out of bed an hour earlier. I am opposed to the daylight saving scheme, because it is detrimental to the agricultural interests, and for that reason it is not good for Canada as a whole. I will just read a telegram which I have received from Mr. Morrison, of Toronto, secretary of the Organized Farmers of Ontario:—

> Consensus of members' opinions on so-called Daylight Saving almost completely unanimous opposition to it. We do not believe rank and file of towns and cities are in favour of it, if so they can make local arrangements without changing the clocks.

That is all I wish to say in regard to the matter, and it will be my duty to oppose the daylight saving scheme.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER (East York): I did not intend to speak to-night, but so much has been heard from the farmers this afternoon that I want to speak on behalf of the people in the cities. It has been stated that the farmers work fifteen hours a day and have no recreation at all, and that they should have some consideration. I represent a city of some 550,000 people; Montreal has a population of 750,000 people; Quebec, 150,000 people; Hamilton, 100,000 people; London, 75,000 people; Winnipeg, 150,000 to 200,000 people; Vancouver, 150,000 people, and there are other smaller cities. Surely the people of those cities should have some consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What about Ottawa?

Mr. FOSTER: If I have omitted any cities with large populations, hon. members are perhaps more familiar with them than I am. The point is that the daylight saving scheme was tried out last year and not one city has complained; the cities are all perfectly satisfied. Resolutions have been passed by the large cities endorsing daylight saving and I have enumerated hundreds of thousands of people who desire daylight saving. As has been said a dozen times, if the farmer wants to continue to work under the same conditions such as have existed for the last hundred years, let him do so, but let the city people work under such conditions as they find is most agreeable and beneficial to them. Surely the hundreds of thousands of people in the banks, factories, and all the other industrial institutions of the cities deserve some consideration. They must have recreation, physical exercise, and if they want to get that by putting the clock an hour forward so as to give them an extra hour in the evening, they should have some say and some rights in this Dominion. They do not want to have all the say, but surely these hundreds of thousands of people should have somebody to voice their sentiments. I have found such a change in the last twelve months that hon. members are falling over themselves in order to get from under, to get to the other side, to please the farmer. They imagine from the development of the last twelve months that the farmers are becoming a serious consideration in the political situation of this Dominion, and they want to stand on the right side of that influence. I am not going to be influenced by the farmers of the Dominion so far as to forego the rights of the people in the great cities. Where would Canada be, where would the farmers be if it were not for the consumers in the great cities? Could the farmer earn a livelihood, notwithstanding his great production, if he did not have the people in the great cities to consume his products? If it were not for the people in the great cities of this Dominion, neither daylight saving nor anything else would be of advantage to the farmer. The people of the cities are the backbone of this Dominion, financially, mentally and numerically, and it is not right for this House to be lop-sided on this question as it is to-day.

Mr. JAMES BOWMAN (North Huron): It seems to me absurd to add anything to what has already been said in opposition to the re-enactment of daylight saving, as numerous strong arguments have been brought forward in opposition to it, while the few arguments in favour of it have been very feeble. In the first place, I commend the Government for giving hon. members who represent the people of this Dominion an opportunity to say where they stand on this question. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Foster) claimed, I understand, that the urban population of Canada was in favour of daylight saving. The riding which I represent is composed of 26,000 people, about one-half of the population being urban and the other half rural. I have not received a petition in support of the re-enactment of the Daylight Saving Act, and I have received from councils and co-operative societies in the riding, as well as from many private individuals, petitions against the re-enactment of that measure. But we should go further than simply to depend on such evidence as that as evidence that the people are opposed to daylight saving. At the present time we are trying to place agriculture in this country on a good sound basis. We are also, through the Soldiers' Settlement Board, undertaking a very important work in placing our returned soldiers on the land. It is, therefore, very necessary that we should do what we can to make agriculture as profitable as possible, so that when those boys are placed on the land they will be encouraged to remain there. I am very much afraid that if something is not done along that line to aid agriculture, we shall find that the work undertaken by the Soldiers' Settlement Board will be wasted energy.

A number of hon. members, speaking in support of this resolution, have advocated that we should copy the legislation passed by the United States, putting daylight saving into force and effect for the ensuing year. I am not one of those who are prone to copy the legislation of the United States.

The people of Canada are the ones who should be consulted, and whatever legislation we place on the statute book should be in accord with the sentiments of the people of Canada. It has been said that daylight saving was in force and has been re-enacted in many of the countries of Europe and in the United States, but that is no argument that it will be in the best interests of Canada. Conditions differ. Canada has largely a rural population, and its people are largely dependent on agriculture, whereas those countries that have enacted daylight saving and are still in favour of it are composed mostly of the urban class. We in Canada should do as we think right, and vote in the interest of the great majority of our people. I have nothing further to say except this: I should feel I was remiss in my duty did I not oppose the resolution which has been brought forward to-day for the purpose of re-enacting the daylight saving measure.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Mackie (Edmonton) which was agreed to on the following division:

Main motion as amended agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House seems to be in more or less in doubt as to the question. It is largely technical. By adopting the amendment to the amendment a certain expression has been adopted, and that stands as a portion of the question. Technically speaking a portion of the original question still remains, and in order to have it intelligible, to say the least, it ought to be passed, hence the necessity for putting the motion as amended.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Friday, March 28, 1919.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Auditor General for the year ended March 31st, 1918, volume 1—Sir Thomas White.

Summary Report of the Geological Survey (Department of Mines) for the calendar year 1917—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

CABLE FROM SIR ROBERT BORDEN THAT GERMANY MUST PAY CANADA FULLEST INDEMNITY POSSIBLE.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, recently there appeared in the Canadian press a despatch from London attributing to the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, the view that no indemnities should be sought from Germany. I took the liberty of bringing the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister, and I have received from him to-day the following cable:

Paris, March 27, 1919.

Acting Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

Report alluded to is absolutely unfounded and indeed absurd. You are authorized to give absolute and explicit denial to any such statement. We are making every effort to procure from Germany the fullest indemnity that she is able to pay. Borden.

LANDING OF TRANSATLANTIC MAILS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) yesterday asked if Halifax had been substituted for Rimouski as the port for the landing of the Transatlantic mails, and I promised to make inquiry and reply to the question to-day. I have to say that Halifax has not been substituted for Rimouski, nor is any such change in contemplation.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: The situation is this: Owing to the interruption of Transatlantic traffic, due to the war, there is no regular line of ships now carrying the Canadian mails. Hence the Post Office Department must make arrangements with whatever vessels are available, and as the majority of these vessels are carrying troops and come under orders with respect to the landing of those troops, the mails are necessarily landed at the port where the disembarkation of troops takes place. There is no intention of changing the permanent policy which has been followed.

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): In years past it has been the custom of the Government, after the first five or six weeks of the session, to introduce a motion changing the hours of meeting on Wednesdays and making them correspond to the hours of meeting on the other days of the week. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce such a motion applicable to next Wednesday, or the Wednesday following?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government will introduce such a motion later on in the session, but I think not before Wednesday, the 16th April. That is to say, I think next Wednesday night will be free and the Wednesday night following. I hope that arrangement will meet with the approval of the House.

OIL-BEARING LANDS—THE SHELL COMPANY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I have seen the statement lately in the press that a company known as The Shell Transport and Trading Company has an application before the Government to acquire a monopoly of oil-bearing lands in Western Canada. I would like to know if that statement is true, and if so whether the Government will furnish some details with respect to it.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): The company in question has had an application before the Department of the Interior for some time, but it has received no favourable consideration.

DAYLIGHT SAVING—RAILWAY TIME.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): In view of the statements appearing in the press concerning an order supposed to be issued by the Railway War Board, or some railway organization, that the railway clocks are to be set forward on next Monday morning, might I ask the Government if the difficulty will not be met by the railways changing their time-tables instead of making a change of the kind proposed?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): The Railway War Board is composed of the heads of the several railways, and they arrange the manner in which the operation of the railways will take place.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Cannot the railways arrange their time-tables without interfering with the clocks?

Hon. Mr. REID: They arrange the time-tables, and if there should be any dissatisfaction with any arrangements which the board may make in connection with the operation of any of the railways, the Board of Railway Commissioners, of course, will deal with the matter in the regular way.

DOMINION LANDS SURVEYS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN, Bill No. 10, to amend the Dominion Lands Surveys Act, was read a second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Examination for admission as articled pupil.

Mr. ROSS: What change does this section make in the present law?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: The subject of solid geometry is transferred from the final examination, where it was under the Act of 1908, and made applicable to the preliminary examination. Physics is a new subject.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Examination for commission as a surveyor.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): The subjects that are added by this section to the old curriculum are:

Analytical geometry and calculus; levelling, location and construction of roads, principles of irrigation, investigation and calculation of water powers; elementary geology and mineralogy, prairie and forest flora of Western Canada.

This is to bring the standard up to that of other countries for the final examination.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The whole tenor of the Bill seems to do away with the possibility of having any one become a Dominion land surveyor who has not passed this technical examination.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it not a fact that a great many of the best engineers in the service are men who started in as chain men and worked up year by year, Why run to examinations? The tendency of all modern civilization is to get away from examinations. Examinations breed narrow men, not practical men. We have had a good many illustrations of that in every department of the public service. Not that I object to a man being master of these subjects—he might be a very good man in spite of them, but we have a lot of extraordinary good men without any of these examinations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is no doubt true that competent surveyors may be produced, and have been produced, without a knowledge of the mathematical subjects that are defined here; but when one is establishing a standard, examinations are necessary; and when examinations are necessary subjects for those examinations are necessary; and it is only a question of what should be included. It is quite impossible to technically qualify men and not have examinations. If it were not so there would be no qualifications required for any profession. A man might become a very good doctor or a very good lawyer and not pass any examinations; but that would not be a very safe system to adopt for qualifying men for entrance to those professions. The same argument applies here. Consequently the purpose is to include not only the practical training and experience which the Act also provides for, but in addition technical qualification in the subjects which every Dominion land surveyor should understand. This simply brings the list of these subjects up to the standard adopted by every other country, and a survey of the included subjects would indicate to me that they would be very appropriate matters indeed upon which candidates for the profession of Dominion land surveyor should be examined.

Mr. SHEARD: I would like to ask the hon. minister, what is the value of astronomy in surveying? It is a very wide and extensive subject—almost inexhaustible if it is fully gone into, and it seems to me to be quite unnecessary. Then, we have prairie and forest flora of Western Canada. That practically embraces a study of botany, which, in order to be any way thorough to meet a proper examination as a separate subject, would take at least a year's time to acquire. To my mind, these subjects are more or less impracticable for one who is to undertake the duties of an ordinary land surveyor. I would like to get from the minister good and specific reasons why these two subjects are included.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is an actual fact that the outlines in surveying work are now laid by astronomical calculation. In subdivision work that applies as well. Indeed, in much of our surveying the geodetic points are fixed by astronomical calculation. Astronomy is undoubtedly a most pertinent subject in the necessary curriculum of surveyors. As to the flora of Western Canada, a man might certainly become a perfect surveyor as far as it would appear to me at least, without a knowledge of that subject; but in the work of surveying in the Dominion Land Surveys Branch we require a report on the character of the land and of the plant life over which the survey extends. This is the cheapest and most convenient way in which we can get it, and while I do not suppose it is intended to ask a candidate in surveying anything in the nature of a scientific botanical knowledge of the flora of Western Canada, still he ought to know generally how to describe in his report for the records of the department the plant life which he encounters in his surveying work.

An hon. MEMBER: How does this affect the old surveyors who have been in the employ of the Government for a number of years?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not affect them at all.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Surveying by contract or tender.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The purpose of this amendment is to enable the day system to be used, instead of making it compulsory to use the contract system. The contract system was abandoned in the United States in 1910 with good results.

Mr. McKENZIE: What does the minister mean by the contract system as compared with the day system?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If a certain area is to be surveyed and subdivided, under the contract system that work would be given out by contract, instead of men being employed under the department to do it by day labour.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not find in this Bill anything covering those who are Dominion land surveyors under the present Act. Are their rights protected?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Their rights remain intact.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There is nothing in this Bill in regard to them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A section would have to be inserted in this Bill, in order to affect them. As long as they are not mentioned, their rights are left as they were.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

BANKRUPTCY ACT.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, respecting bankruptcy.

He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, perhaps it would be well if I were to give to the House a brief explanation of some of the main provisions of the proposed measure. The subject of bankruptcy and insolvency has not been dealt with by the Parliament of Canada since 1880. As the House is aware, under section 91 of the British North America Act, the question of bankruptcy and insolvency is one of the questions which was left to the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada. In 1875, this Parliament passed a Bankruptcy Act, and after two amendments in subsequent years, that Act was finally repealed in 1880, so that for the last thirty-nine years we have had no bankruptcy law in the Dominion of Canada. It seems rather surprising that we should not have had one, because, with the exception of China and Canada, almost every country in the world has bankruptcy laws. Great Britain has a bankruptcy law, and every British Dominion save Canada has one. The operation of the Bankruptcy Act in this country between the years 1875 and 1880 was not regarded as a marked success, and it was urged that the machinery provided was much too cumbersome; that delays in the administration of the Act were very great and tedious; that the whole administration of the Act was expensive, and that too great liberty was permitted to fraudulent debtors to obtain special privileges. The result was that the Act gradually fell into disfavour and was finally repealed in 1880.

It has been thought proper that another effort should be made to pass an Act having general application throughout the Dominion of Canada. During the interval between the year 1880 and the present time, many of our provincial legislatures attempted something in the nature of bankruptcy or insolvency legislation. It was at one time doubted whether they had power to pass any legislation in regard to bankruptcy and insolvency, but that question was set at rest by a judgment of the judicial committee of the Privy Council in 1894. The province of Ontario, it may be remembered, undertook to pass an Act in respect of assignments and preferences by insolvent persons; the jurisdiction of that province to pass such an Act was questioned by the Federal authorities and a case followed which went to the judicial committee of the Privy Council. That judicial body held that Ontario was within its jurisdiction in passing that enactment. The ground of that decision was briefly this:

That the provisions of section 9 of Ontario "Act respecting assignments and preferences by insolvent persons" which relate to assignments purely voluntary, and postpone thereto judgments and executions not completely executed by payment, are merely ancillary to bankruptcy law, and as such are within the competence of the provincial legislature so long as they do not conflict with any existing bankruptcy legislation of the Dominion Parliament.

That decision simply meant that so long as there was no Dominion bankruptcy or insolvency Act in force the provincial legislatures might, by reason of the ancillary jurisdiction which they possessed, pass laws which, while strictly speaking, not bankruptcy or insolvency Acts, related generally to that subject. For instance, while provincial legislatures might provide for the abolition of preferences among creditors, they could not compel a debtor to go into bankruptcy or provide for a discharge to the honest debtor. The provincial powers were exceedingly limited. Only this Parliament can pass a bankruptcy law which will have uniform force and effect throughout the Dominion. One difficulty in the way is the fact that there are so many legislative jurisdictions in this country. In Great Britain, the Bankruptcy Act is a comparatively simple thing, there being but one central legislative authority for the United Kingdom. But in Canada there is the Dominion Parliament, as well as nine provincial legislatures, and during the last forty years all the provincial legislatures have made some attempt to pass laws approximating very nearly to bankruptcy and insolvency laws. The effect of the passage of this measure by this Parliament will be to abrogate and annul the existing provincial laws upon bankruptcy and insolvency.

There is another difficulty in our way. In eight of the provinces of the Dominion the basic principle which has been adopted is the English common law, while in the province of Quebec the basic principle is the civil law, and a considerable distinction exists between the two. In the drafting of the present Bill an effort has been made to unify, as far as possible, the laws of the various provinces. The object of the Bill is to give uniformity in all commercial matters pertaining to bankruptcy, to the extent of abolishing all preferences or priorities as between creditors, and allowing all creditors to share equally in the estate of an insolvent debtor.

In the next place, the object is to provide an expeditious means of administering an insolvent estate, and at the same time to render that administration as inexpensive as possible. In the third place, and this is one of the main objects of the Bill, provision is made for the honest insolvent receiving, under certain conditions, an absolute discharge from further obligations; that is, the man who has fairly and fully disclosed his business dealings and handed over his assets to the trustee.

This Bill was before the House last session, but not exactly in its present form. Last year, it was referred to a special committee, which held twenty-five prolonged meetings and examined very carefully the provisions of the Bill. The Bill was reported to the House, but the session was then so far advanced that it was impossible to give it any further attention before prorogation. During the interval certain changes and amendments have been proposed to the Bill as it was reported from the committee last year. While there are a great many changes in the present Bill, with the exception of one or two the amendments are not in any sense radical. The object has been to follow as closely as possible the phraseology of the English Act, although that has not been possible in many of the sections. Most of the changes that have been made are changes in phraseology.

One radical change, however, has been made. The Bill presented last year applied to all persons, firms and corporations doing business in Canada, with the exception of farmers and wage-earners earning not more than $1,500 a year; but the compulsory clauses of the Bill did not apply to corporations. The present Bill has been changed in that respect, making all corporations subject to its provisions. The various clauses of the Winding-up Acts in our Canadian statutes have been incorporated in the present measure, so that this Bill, if it become law, will apply to all persons, firms and corporations except banks, railway companies, trust companies, and insurance companies, which are governed by special Acts, and to all persons except farmers and wage-earners earning less than $1,500 a year. Farmers may take advantage of the Act, but they cannot be forced into bankruptcy against their own wishes. If they desire the benefits of the Act they can receive them by making an assignment. The Bill, of course, is somewhat complicated, and contains a vast number of provisions which are more or less technical.

The machinery for administering the Act is to be the Superior Courts of the provinces. The Bill does not seek to establish any new court for the administration of the bankruptcy laws. It has been suggested that a bankruptcy court might give greater uniformity, but this would involve a very large increase in the judiciary of Canada.

Mr. PROULX: Have the county courts jurisdiction in bankruptcy?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not under this Bill. I assume that the principle of the Bill will receive the approval of the House, and I think that when the Bill itself comes under discussion in detail, many useful suggestions will be made. The Government do not for a moment consider that the measure is a perfect one, but it is as nearly perfect as they have been able, after a great deal of effort, to make it, and they will gladly accept any useful suggestions that may be made by way of amendment, as we carefully consider the Bill section by section. If the Bill is permitted to have its second reading, when it reaches the Committee stage every facility will be given the House for the fullest possible discussion in order to remedy any imperfections that may exist in the various complicated sections. The Bill also applies to the Yukon Territory, and the District Court of the Yukon is the tribunal specified there.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): At this stage I have very little to say regarding the Bill, as it is only within the last two or three minutes that it has been distributed and hon. members have not had an opportunity of studying its provisions. I have carefully followed the explanation made by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie), and I agree with him that a bankruptcy law for Canada should be very useful. It is no doubt a necessary piece of legislation. Not having had opportunity to examine the Bill, I have nothing further to say at present; but I might suggest to the hon. Solicitor General that perhaps it might be well not to press it in Committee to-day, as hon. members, not being familiar with its terms, are not in a position to offer proper criticism.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a second time.

FISHERIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT—BRITISH COLUMBIA LICENSES.

On motion of Hon. Mr. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries), the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

That it is expedient to amend the Fisheries Act, 1914, by providing that the annual fee for a license to operate a salmon cannery or salmon curing establishment in British Columbia for commercial purposes shall be five hundred dollars, and in addition, four cents for each case of forty-eight one-pound cans, or the equivalent thereto, of sockeye salmon, and three cents for each case of forty-eight one-pound cans, or the equivalent thereto, of any other species of salmon, including Steel Head (salmo rivularis) packed in such cannery during the continuance in force of the license; and the said five hundred dollars shall be paid before the license is issued, and the remainder of the license fee shall be paid as the minister may from time to time by regulation prescribe.

He said: The resolution is self-explanatory, namely that it is the intention to increase the annual license fee for canneries to $500.

Mr. McKENZIE: Increased from what amount?

Mr. MACLEAN: Some two or three years ago this matter, together with many others incident to the salmon fisheries of British Columbia, was the subject of an inquiry by a commission, one of the recommendations of which was that the salmon cannery license fee should be $1,000. The present license fee is $100. It was not deemed advisable to make the license fee $1,000, but rather to increase it to $500. The proposal seems to be approved by all interested parties in British Columbia, so far as I have been able to ascertain. There was some opposition to it, of course, but inasmuch as the salmon fisheries of British Columbia are regarded as a monopoly it is generally considered but fair that the amount of the license should be $500. When I say that the salmon fisheries of British Columbia are in the nature of a monopoly, I mean that those who are interested in the business carry it on by virtue of a license. A license is issued for the various contrivances that are used to catch fish, and the canneries must also have a license. It is conceded that it would not be in the interests of the industry to allow every one to catch or can fish, and inasmuch as those who are permitted to engage in the industry do so by virtue of a license, their business is to that extent a monopoly. It is therefore deemed proper by the department that those who enjoy the privilege should pay more for it than they do at present.

Mr. ROSS: Can any one pay a license?

Mr. MACLEAN: Oh no, they are limited in number according to locality. It is always desirable to license but a limited number of fishermen or canneries in any district. Some districts will stand more fishermen and canneries than others, according to the quantity of fish that periodically visit those waters. It is a matter of much dispute in British Columbia as to the number of canneries and fishermen that should be licensed, but the consensus of opinion is that there should be some limitation. Every one who desires a license, or applies for one, cannot get it and in that respect the officers of the department responsible for the administration of the law must do the best they can and give licenses to those whom they believe, to deserve them most. It is also believed that this increase in the license to $500 will meet the expenditure made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries in connection with the administration of the salmon fisheries of British Columbia. To-day it costs more than $200,000 to administer the fisheries in that province. It is thought that this increased license will yield a revenue considerably above that amount and it is hoped that the department will be able to do more to encourage the fisheries of British Columbia and also to expend more money in the administration of the law. It is my intention at the proper stage to send this Bill to the Fisheries Committee.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I do not profess to know very much about the fisheries of British Columbia but it would appear to me that it will only be strengthening the monopoly to make the license fee as large as $500. The same question arose in Eastern Canada in regard to the lobster fisheries. It was contended by the packers that it would be a good thing to have a limited number of canneries because there were not enough fish to supply a large number of canneries. It is the same argument that is used in British Columbia. That was always resisted by the people in Eastern Canada who wished the industry to be thrown open to any man who could erect a factory and equip it. It was felt that he should be allowed to do so; otherwise the business is bound to fall into 4 p.m. the hands of a few people who will put up the prices on the consumer. If we charge $500 for a license to catch salmon I assume that the man who packs salmon will get that money out of the consumer. We are also charging four cents a case on the fish packed and that will represent a very large sum of money payable by the packers of British Columbia. These packers will turn this account over to the people who consume the fish and we are assisting them in making the price of the salmon higher than it otherwise would be. What do we get for it? It strikes me that we do not get anything while we are making it possible for the few people who are engaged in packing salmon to create a monopoly. What do the public get out of this? The minister has not told us any benefit that is coming to the public from this change. I can easily see that it will be an advantage to the packer. I am not interested in the packer. I am interested in the people who consume the salmon. I would like the minister to explain, if there is any explanation, how this change that we are now asked to make in the law will in any sense benefit the consumer.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It might perhaps be difficult to answer directly the question which my hon. friend from Guysborough has put to me. As I stated before, it is impossible to administer the salmon fisheries of British Columbia without the granting to a limited number of people only the right to fish and to can salmon. That is conceded; nobody, as far as I am advised, will question that statement. It is not questioned by the citizens of British Columbia or by the fishermen of that province. It is conceded universally, I think, that the fisheries must be administered by a system of licenses. It is disputable, of course, whether in any given water any given number of licenses should be issued. Every day there are applications from fishing sections in British Columbia for licenses to fish and can salmon, but they can not be granted. That is conceded, even by those who apply for them, and who are very frequently refused licenses.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): What is the reason that they cannot be granted?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Because of the nature of the salmon fisheries. They would be very rapidly destroyed if the fish were caught in too great quantities in any one season. I do not intend to go into the history of this particular species of fish this afternoon. I think that had better be reserved for the special committee or in Committee of the Whole House, but there are several reasons why this particular fishery must be protected. The salmon of British Columbia breed in the headwaters of the lakes and streams of the province. They then proceed when young to the sea. They return after two or three years to the place from whence they came and in proceeding back they are caught or proceed to their spawning grounds where they die. As a matter of fact but few return to the sea because they die on the return to the breeding ground if they are not caught by the fisherman. It is necessary that not all the fish proceeding to the place whence they originally came be caught; otherwise they would be extinguished. My hon. friend opposite seems to think that an increase in the license fee will be a disadvantage to the consumer. I do not think that is correct, inasmuch as if the persons licensed to catch or can salmon have a monopoly it is only proper that they return a part of the profit to the Government. That is the principle of the resolution.

Mr. CAHILL: Will they not be allowed to increase the price to the consumer to the extent of the extra charge for the license?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not know. My hon. friend might as well put that question to me concerning any other commodity that is offered for sale.

Mr. CAHILL: We are not making a monopoly in any other commodity.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The salmon catch of British Columbia is marketed the world over. The greater proportion of the catch is marketed not in Canada but in Great Britain. I do not think that the additional fee proposed under this resolution will increase the price at all. But it is felt, and very properly so, in British Columbia, that they who have this privilege conferred upon them by a license from a department of the Government should pay a tax to the country, and that is one of the reasons for this proposed increase in the fee.

Some hon. gentlemen may object to the fee of $500 as being too small and they might do so with very good reason. However, the judgment of the officers of the department is that, for the time being at least, $500 is sufficient. It is to be understood that that is not the only tax the canners must pay. Hon. gentlemen will see by the terms of the resolution that they will also be obliged to pay four cents for each case of forty-eight one-pound cans, or the equivalent thereto, of Sockeye salmon, and three cents for each case of forty-eight one-pound cans, or the equivalent thereto, of any other species of salmon, including Steel Heads, packed in such cannery during the continuance in force of the license. That provision has always been in the statutes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the weight mentioned there the lobster pound or the salmon pound?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Exactly the same condition prevails in British Columbia in respect to the content of the salmon can as obtains in the Maritime Provinces in regard to the content of the lobster can.

Mr. DUFF: I would like the minister to give us a little information as to how these licenses are granted. It seems to me that the argument which he advanced as to the likelihood of the extermination of salmon if more licenses are granted is altogether different from what can be urged with respect to other species of fish. I do not presume to know very much about salmon fishing in British Columbia, but I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman when he says that the salmon which go up the river one year to spawn will all be exterminated. The minister does not seem to realize that the salmon spawn before or after, going up the river, and while perhaps the old fish may be caught that year, millions of spawn have been deposited on the banks of the river which in the following year will grow into salmon, and consequently are ready to be caught the following year, or in years afterwards. I would also like the minister to state why these license fees have been increased from $100 to $500? If the fishermen have asked for that increase I think it is good legislation, but if it has been made at the demand of the canners, who wish to prevent other people from going into the business, I do not think it can be so designated. I have had a little experience in connection with our fisheries, and I think that every fisherman who wants to catch salmon should be allowed to do so. Then I would draw attention to the matter of the weight of the cans. The resolution states that there shall be an additional fee of four cents—speaking of Sockeye salmon—for each case of forty-eight one-pound cans. Now if the minister wants to make this resolution harmonize with that which he previously introduced in regard to lobsters, he must provide that the can shall contain sixteen ounces, or else change the resolution to read that the fee shall be four cents for each case of forty-eight twelve-ounce cans, each case of forty-eight thirteen-ounce cans, and so on, specifying the weight of the can from one ounce up.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): In regard to the last point raised by the hon. gentleman, I would say that it is proposed to introduce legislation this session compelling all manufacturers of food supplies to expose upon the containers the exact contents of each can, which legislation will apply in this case. As a matter of fact, the British Columbia salmon can to-day, while called a pound can, does not contain sixteen ounces of salmon meat.

Mr. DUFF: It seems to me the hon. gentleman should change the resolution, because it specifically refers to one-pound cans, and one pound certainly means sixteen ounces.

Mr. MACLEAN: That will be provided for in another Bill.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

Mr. MACLEAN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 39, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1914, founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways) Bill No. 19 (Letter A of the Senate) to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. REID: As this Bill is a very lengthy one, and there are a number of persons that desire to be heard with reference to some of its clauses, I would move, with the consent of the House, that it be referred to a special committee composed of: Messrs. Armstrong (Lambton), Carvell, Reid (Grenville), Green, McCurdy, Nesbitt, Mowat, Tweedie, Wallace, Morphy, Reid (MacKenzie), Davidson, Mackie (Renfrew), Allan, Boys, Crothers, Stevens, Lemieux, Murphy, Sinclair (Antigonish and Guysborough), Kennedy, Cahill, Ross, Casgrain, Copp, Demers and Molloy, with power to report from time to time, and that Rule No. 11 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: As no notice has been given of this motion it can only be accepted with the unanimous consent of the House.

Motion agreed to.

AID TOWARDS ELIMINATING LEVEL CROSSINGS.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, Bill No. 29, to amend the Railway Act (Aid for Railway Crossings) was read a second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 1—Grant continued for ten years.

Mr. REID: This extends the time so as to allow the Board of Railway Commissioners to pay a portion of the cost of removal of dangerous crossings for another ten years.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysboro): Does it apply to the Government railways?

Mr. REID: No, I intend bringing in a Bill later on to cover all the Government owned railways.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What does it apply to?

Mr. REID: All railways under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does it apply to the Canadian Northern?

Mr. REID: Oh, yes, to every Dominion incorporated railway. The sums expended from this fund from 1909 to 1919, do not appear to be very large. They are:

1909-1910, $70,00; 1910-1911, $69,109.18; 1911-1912, $7,643.14; 1912-1913, $20,807.38; 1913-1914, $39,968.11; 1914-1915, $92,099.48; 1915-1916, $47,079.99; 1916-1917, $46,630.53; 1917-1918, $13,740.85; 1918-1919 (to March 12th), $2,336.85.

We have not used a very large amount out of the fund voted each year, but we thought it was as well to continue the provision pending the enactment of the new Railway Bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It would appear from the minister's statement that this Act is of no service to those parts of Canada served by the Government railways. On the Intercolonial Railway there are a great number of dangerous crossings, but so far as I know nothing has been done towards eliminating them. The hon. minister says that the Government railways may be brought under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and in that case I suppose the same law will apply as to other railways, but at the present time it is unsatisfactory. If that condition of affairs is going to continue, I would like the hon. minister to consider whether some arrangement could not be made by which the Government itself would take steps to eliminate these dangerous crossings, or unite with the municipalities in doing so.

Mr. REID: There is no doubt that the Government railways in the lower provinces will be under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners within a very short time, and of course this provision will apply there as well as to any other part of Canada. I have been over the Intercolonial, and I know there are some very dangerous crossings, but I suppose the same condition applies to other railways. The difference is that in most of those cases on the Intercolonial they were urging the Government probably to do a greater proportion of the work than this section would cover. Under this section the railway, the municipality, and the Government each contribute a certain proportion of the cost of protection.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): How many people were killed last year at these dangerous crossings?

Mr. REID: I have not that information.

Mr. NESBITT: I think the new Railway Bill as it left the Commons last session had a clause in it, with the consent of the then and the present Minister of Railways, placing the Government railways under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission.

Mr. REID: That is so.

Mr. DUFF: Do the Board of Railway Commissioners order the replacement of dangerous level crossings by overhead crossings, or simply the protection of level crossings?

Mr. REID: It is for the Board of Railway Commissioners to decide whether the removal shall be by subway or overhead.

Mr. McKENZIE: A certain amount of money is paid out of the public exchequer to the agency that is constructing this work, because it is not Government work, and the aggregate amounts to a considerable sum of money. It would be well for the House and the Committee to know under what system the parties to these crossings are entitled to get a contribution from the Treasury.

Mr. REID: The procedure and control, as I understand it, is that if there is on any railway a dangerous crossing to which this legislation will apply, an application is made to the Board of Railway Commissioners to investigate and report, and their decision as to whether that crossing should be removed and the expense incurred, is final. After that decision, the parties appear before the board and an agreement is arrived at as to what proportion will be borne by the railway, the municipality and the Government. The board may decide that fifty per cent of the cost will be borne by the railway, thirty per cent by the municipality and twenty per cent by the board. When the accounts are submitted by the railway company, whose duty it is to remove the crossing, the board will investigate the accounts and if they approve the accounts they will authorize the payment.

Mr. McKENZIE: The department pays out the money on the order of the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: Why do we not make the extension for two years instead of ten, so that in two years, when our railway policy is more clearly determined, we may decide what should be done?

Mr. REID: If the new Consolidated Railway Bill is passed, it will probably supersede this Bill. The former Act was for ten years, and I prefer renewing the former Act as it stood.

Mr. VIEN: I object to giving this authorization for ten years, and I am going to move that the word "two" be substituted for the word "ten." If the Consolidated Railway Bill supersedes this, the change will not cause any great inconvenience to the Government. On the other hand, if the Consolidated Railway Bill does not supersede this, when that Bill is being discussed in committee, the same objection will probably be raised. I move, seconded by Mr. Duff:

That the word "ten" be replaced by the word "two" in the sixth line of section 1 of this Bill.

Mr. NESBITT: If the new Consolidated Railway Bill supersedes this one there will be in it a clause cancelling this measure. If the new Consolidated Railway Bill does not supersede this one, and nothing else interferes, no better legislation could pass through the House than this to assist in doing away with level crossings. I see no reason why we should not continue this legislation for ten, or even twenty years.

Mr. VIEN: We are now taking control of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and if we can judge from the announcements of the Government to the House we are also going to take control of the Grand Trunk. When this is done there will be in Canada only two railway systems, the Canadian Government Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, neither of which require this aid to carry out the changes in dangerous railway crossings. Surely the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are able to do this work without the help of the Government, and so far as the Canadian Government Railways are concerned, this means simply transferring the money from one department to another. It may be advisable for the next two years to retain this item in the Estimates and to vote it, because we have not as yet taken over the control of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk, but I do not see why we should give this authorization for ten years. I do not believe it will be required for ten years, and I think we should economize and at the end of two years refrain from expending this sum of $200,000 a year.

Mr. REID: There would not be any difficulty for the hon. member, if he so desires, to ask, at the end of two years, that this legislation be repealed. I think this is a good measure, and even if we take over those two roads, I will press that this law be continued, because I think we should remove these level crossings. If the hon. member's suggestion should prevail, there will be no authority to order that dangerous railway crossings be removed. I would rather that even the full amount of $200,000 a year be paid for ten years if the result will be the saving of lives at these crossings. As a rule, the crossings ordered to be removed are those where life has been lost. This legislation refers only to crossings built prior to 1909, and surely we should give assistance to have them removed wherever it is found necessary that they should be removed. If the new Consolidated Railway Bill supersedes this measure, this difficulty will cease to exist, but we have now been trying for three years to get that Bill passed.

Mr. VIEN: The minister has not answered my arguments at all. He says that in two years, if he thinks it advisable, he will have this law repealed.

Mr. REID: I did not say that. I said that if the hon. member finds after two years that, in his opinion, the Act should be repealed, it will be for him to make a motion to that effect. I do not want this legislation repealed until the end of ten years.

Mr. VIEN: It would be much simpler to make it two years, than make it ten, and repeal the Act after the end of the two years. The minister has not answered my other arguments at all. I am strongly in favour of dangerous crossings being done away with, but I contend that the expense in connection therewith should be borne by the railway companies and by the municipalities concerned, not by the public. It would be very easy when the Railway Act comes up for consideration so to amend it as to give authority to the Board of Railway Commissioners to order any changes that are required to make dangerous crossings safe, the expense to be borne by the municipalities and the railway companies, whether it be the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific. It is not a question of not removing the danger; the question is, who shall bear the expense of removing it? I think the railway companies can well afford to pay the expense of making these crossings safe, and they are the ones who should be made to pay, together with the municipality concerned.

Amendment negatived.

COMPENSATION TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES WHO ARE KILLED OR INJURED.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways and Canals) Bill No. 30, to amend an Act to provide compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duties, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

On section 1—Compensation payable out of Consolidated Revenue Fund as may be authorized:

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): When the resolution was under discussion, I suggested that the Provident Fund be devoted exclusively to pensions for retired employees of the road. I should like to hear from the minister with regard to that. Another point I made was that a certain class of employees on the Government railways does not appear to be provided for under this Act. If that is so, it is an important omission. The Act provides for all those who are employees according to the terms of the Provident Fund. Is it true that a certain class of employees on the Government railways are not provided for in this Act?

Mr. REID: All permanent employees of the Government railways are supposed to be members of the Provident Fund, and all employees, whether permanent or temporary, come under either the Compensation Act or the Provident Fund.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Even temporary employees?

Mr. REID: Yes, they come under one or the other.

In order to change the present Provident Fund Act the employees would have to approve of such change for the reason that they are subscribers to that fund. The largest part of it is subscribed by the members of that organization, and the Government could not undertake any change without their consent. The present proposed changes are the result of a careful investigation of the whole matter by the solicitor of the Government railways, who has discussed the situation with the principals of the different organizations that subscribe to the Provident Fund. The employees of the Government railways have several organizations. They are union men, and the conductors, the engine drivers, the brakesmen, and others all have separate societies. In order that I might satisfy the House that this Bill, in the form in which it is, had received the approval of the employees, I brought into the House some days ago a memorandum signed by the heads of these different organizations in which there was a request that this legislation should be enacted. A number of employees who are superannuated and who availed themselves of this fund several years ago consider that the pension they are now receiving is far too small under present conditions. This matter has been brought to the attention of the organization, but so far no change has been agreed on. When I brought this matter up in the House a few days ago I expressed the opinion that there was a necessity for some arrangement whereby these different funds or benefits to the employees should be consolidated in one law in order to provide that employees in any part of the country might receive the same benefits as those elsewhere. I have made inquiries concerning the nature of the organization of the Canadian Northern Railway as regards the insurance fund—for this is really an insurance fund—and I find that it is entirely different from the Provident Fund of the Intercolonial Railway. The Grand Trunk Railway employees also have a different system, and if we could bring them all under one organization or under Government ownership a considerable advantage to all would acrue. When the Compensation Bill was discussed last year I stated that I had consulted the members of the Provident Fund who had expressed themselves at that time as being perfectly satisfied with the Bill, and I added that if the Act were found in practice to be unsatisfactory in any respect it could be amended at this session. Now the two main objects of this Bill are these: First, to provide for the payment to each province of its proportion of the cost of operation of the Compensation Act; and, second, in respect of cases in which employees were killed who had not elected, prior to the accident, what fund they would take advantage of. There was no way by which the dependents of such men could obtain the benefits of the Compensation Act or the Provident Fund. Two such cases were called to my attention by the hon. member for Kamouraska, and for that reason I have inserted the clause making it retroactive.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I do not want to be over critical of the Bill because I am heartily in favour of it, but I am still inclined to believe that there is a class of employees in the Government railways who are not provided for at all under this Bill. To say that they are provided for under the existing law is not strictly correct. Under the Provident Fund the only accident for which there is provision is permanent disablement. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. REID: I do not think so.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): There is no provision in the Provident Fund Act for a man temporarily disabled. If a man loses a finger or has his leg broken, there is no provision for him under the Provident Fund which, as I understand it, provides for old age pensions and men permanently disabled. Men who are permanently incapacitated are put on the same basis as pensioners. That exhausts the Provident Fund. Now we come to this Compensation Bill. The minister tells us that the men who are provided for under this compensation are permanent employees of the railway. I do not think that is very satisfactory. To give an illustration. A man who was working in connection with a steam shovel gets injured while engaged in such work. If he is not a permanent employee of the railway he does not come under the Provident Fund, neither does he come under this fund. If I understood the minister correctly he said that permanent employees—

Mr. REID: What I said was this: Any employee of the Intercolonial or the Government railways, even though he is a labourer and has been at work only a day, if he is employed on the Intercolonial railway at the time of the accident then he comes under the Compensation Act of last session. So that every employee of the Intercolonial railway or the Government railways will come under one Act or the other. I think I have made myself clear. The Provident Fund applies only to permanent employees.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It is stated in this section what class of people this Act applies to. It will apply to any one who is employed within the meaning of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees Provident Fund Act. The Minister says that that includes every person working for the Government railways, even a labourer.

Mr. REID: I did not say that.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Well then, this Act does not apply because it specifies those who are employed within the meaning of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees Provident Fund Act.

Mr. REID: That is right.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the labourer I referred to in my illustration is not an employee in the sense of this Act, then this does not apply to him.

Mr. REID: The Provident Fund Act does not apply.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is no provision under this Act for any man unless he is a permanent employee.

Mr. REID: The hon. member is quite right. A temporary employee would not receive any benefits from the Provident Fund. He would receive it under the Compensation Act.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If so that is quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. JACOBS: When the Act of 1918 was passed I raised an objection to the restriction which was inserted in the Bill limiting the responsibility of the Government railway to only one of these funds. The question now comes up again. It is declared in this Bill that the injured party must make election as to which fund he intends to draw from and if he is to draw anything under the Compensation Act he is not entitled to come under the Provident Fund. As the minister has just stated, a very large proportion of this Provident Fund is contributed by the employees themselves. It is nothing more or less than insurance. The employees pay for this. Although there have been clauses inserted in the Provident Fund Acts relating to railway companies, (not under the control of the Dominion) limiting the responsibility of the railways and declaring where a party becomes a member of the provident society he renounces any claim to other damages, the Privy Council has decided that it is absolutely illegal and that the Provident Fund is an insurance fund. The employees pay for participation in that fund and they are entitled to its benefits irrespective of the responsibility of the company under the Compensation Act. Why should the Government attempt to restrict its responsibility to the Compensation Act or to the Provident Fund where the ordinary railways are responsible under both? That is something that the Government has attempted to enact by legislation which is denied to it under the common law. The Grand Trunk Railway Company to-day have a provident fund. It is declared that it is an insurance fund and the question of election or not does not cut any figure. Why will the Government insist upon putting itself in a better position than the ordinary railways of the country? It is quite wrong and the portion of the Bill which declares that the employee must elect which of the funds he is to draw from should be struck out. I would therefore move in amendment that the words:

"Unless he elects to accept prior or subsequent to the injuries such compensation in lieu of the allowance payable under the provisions of the Provident Fund Act, section twelve, Class D, and gives notice in writing of such election."

That the words "unless he elects to accept prior" be struck out.

In that way the employee will be entitled to participate in both funds. One is the Act under which he pays for insurance and the other is the Compensation Act, and which provides for the compensation to which he is entitled.

Mr. McMASTER: Is this Provident Fund composed altogether of contributions from the men, or does the Government also contribute?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The Government pay $100,000 a year towards this fund, and, therefore, if this amendment is carried, the Government will be paying twice. They will be paying the money that they are paying into this Provident Fund and they will also be paying under the Compensation Act.

Mr. McMASTER: I think that a middle ground should be taken in regard to this matter. I think it is quite unjust and unfair to ask a man, in order to avail himself of a right which the law gives him, to waive his right to a fund to which he himself has contributed. It would seem that the proper attitude for the Government would be this: A man, if he is hurt should be entitled to have the proportion of the fund that his subscription would bear to the whole fund. The Government should not be obliged to pay twice, but I think a certain portion of the fund should be given a man as the insurance to which he has contributed and then he ought besides to have the right of compensation that any other employee has from his employer.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): That would put the railway employee in a different position from every other class of employees in the country?

Mr. JACOBS: Because he pays for it?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): He does not pay for it entirely because the Government contributes a certain amount annually. That was done because at that time there was no compensation law applicable to the railway employee.

Mr. McMASTER: I quite accede to the proposition that the Government should not be obliged to pay twice, but it seems to me that a man should not be obliged to give up rights in a fund to which he has contributed in order to get his rights in another fund. There should be some allowance made for the man. He should receive something from the Provident Fund as well as getting the ordinary compensation under the law. You might express it in this way: A man who works for an ordinary employer is hurt. He has been carrying an accident insurance policy. He is entitled to certain payments under that accident insurance policy and he is also entitled to ask his employer to indemnify him for the loss he has suffered under the ordinary law of the land. In this case if the employee has contributed to a provident fund he should be entitled to withdraw a certain amount from that fund, and he should also be able to get compensation under the law of the land. Inasmuch as the insurer has also subscribed to the fund, in the case of the Government, the Government should not be obliged to pay twice, and it would be quite fair when a man is to take his compensation qua employee that he should not be paid full compensation from the Provident Fund. But he should not be obliged to waive all his rights to the Provident Fund in order to avail himself of his rights to compensation as against the Government who happens to be his employer.

Mr. REID: With regard to the Provident Fund and Compensation Act, I have had these matters up with the employees and there has not been any question raised. The employees are satisfied. We have been trying to make the Provident Fund Act and the Compensation Act satisfactory to them. This Bill is all that they have asked for or suggested. I would think

5 p.m. that it would be better to carry out the wishes of the employees. I take the same position to-day that I did last year. Let this Bill go through, see how it works out and if it is found that the employees are not receiving the benefits that they should receive under either of these Acts, I have no hesitation in saying that I will come back again and ask that the Act be amended so that there will be no injustice to any employees and that they may receive all the benefits under these Acts. Then again, I think we will probably have to have a new Act to apply to the whole of the railways. I would not like to interfere with the Provident Fund Act at this particular time without again taking it up with the employees. As I have been trying for some time to make it satisfactory to them and to cover every point they raised, I would not like to amend the Bill now.

Mr. JACOBS: I pointed out to the minister last year that the law is directly against his contention. As to whether the employees are satisfied or not, that is not the question before us to-day. Sometimes the employees of a railway company are perforce obliged to be satisfied, or they may find themselves looking for a job. As I indicated to the minister last year, the decision of the Privy Council was to the effect that money paid out of a Provident Fund is no compensation at all to the employee; it is purely and simply an insurance. Why should this employee be obliged to pay into the Provident Fund, this insurance fund, and afterwards elect as to whether he is going to take the ordinary compensation which is provided for by the common law, or take this insurance for which he pays? Why should he pay a penny for this insurance if he is not going to get anything out of it? He could put his money into his pocket, he could buy two per cent, if he wishes, and fall back on the ordinary compensation law. But here he pays into the Provident Fund and gets nothing. He puts his penny into the slot and takes nothing from it. I say that if you take this money from this man as an insurance you are obliged to pay him the whole, or part of it, irrespective of the compensation to which he is entitled under the common law. As to being satisfied with it, is not a question for this House. This is a question of right and justice.

Mr. REID: I take issue with the hon. gentleman. The House has voted $100,000, and we are putting up that amount each year as insurance under the Compensation Act.

Mr. JACOBS: The men have a right under the law of the land to get it. How much are the men paying into the fund?

Mr. REID: I admit it, but they are not paying one dollar into the compensation fund. They will receive greater benefits under the fund we are subscribing to as an insurance. I have not got the figures here, but I do not think they are paying any more.

Mr. JACOBS: The minister told us a few minutes ago, that a very large percentage of the Provident Fund is paid for by the employees.

Mr. REID: They do pay a large percentage, there is no doubt about it at all. At all events, we are paying $100,000, and if the employees wish to take advantage of the Compensation Act there is no reason why they should not do so. However, I took this matter up with some of the employees and discussed it with them, and they think it is fair; I have never heard one of them complain yet. Now, until the matter is brought up and discussed with the employees and they say they are not satisfied, or until we get an opportunity of enacting a statute that will give the same treatment to an employee in Halifax as to an employee in Vancouver, I am in favour of continuing as we are. I want to do everything I can for the employees.

Mr. JACOBS: Then agree to my amendment.

Mr. REID: Agree to your amendment?

Mr. JACOBS: Yes.

Mr. REID: I will agree to any amendment that the employees and the management of the Government railways will say is fair and just, but so long as the employees themselves have not raised the question and say that the present plan is fair and just, I am going to accept their views and not those of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MURPHY: When the minister says he has taken the matter up with the employees and discussed it with them, I assume that he is speaking generally. The hon. gentleman, does not, I assume, intend to convey to the committee that he has taken up and discussed with the employees the special clause covered by the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Jacobs).

Mr. REID: What I have done is what any man would do. I have taken the matter up with representatives of the Provident Fund and with the employees.

Mr. MURPHY: Generally.

Mr. REID: There was a representative here last year, and instead of taking it up with him I asked the solicitor of the department to go into the whole matter of the Provident Fund and deal with it, and then come back with a memorandum saying what the employees wanted, in order that I could assure the House that the employees were satisfied. He came back with this memorandum signed by eight or ten of the heads of the Provident Fund. Until I receive a complaint of some kind or another, some evidence of dissatisfaction, or some complaint such as was brought to my attention by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) last year to show that an injustice might be done to employees, I prefer to carry out their wish as they have submitted it to me. If this is so important a matter, why has there not been a complaint made to me by the employees? I have never heard of it from the time the hon. member (Mr. Jacobs) raised the question last year, and the hon. gentleman knows that every word he said then, and every word I said—indeed every word that has been said here to-day—is taken cognizance of by the committees of the Provident Fund. If the employees have any complaints, I am willing to come back to Parliament and apply for legislation to remedy their grievances, and make that legislation retroactive, until such time as the Compensation Act can be introduced. That is what I am trying to carry out, I do not think there could be anything fairer.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the minister wish the House to believe that he took up this question with the employees of the railway, and pointed out to them that this Provident Fund was an insurance, and that they would be entitled to that in any event, under the judgment of the Privy Council, irrespective of the Compensation Act, and did the employees who were interviewed say they were satisfied with one fund and not with the two funds?

Mr. MACLEAN: The Provident Fund is not altogether an insurance scheme, because Section 12 of the Employees' Provident Fund Act provides as follows with respect to Class D:

> Those who are permanently disabled from following their usual occupation in the service as a result of injuries received while on duty and actually at work in the service.

I assume that was to provide a scheme for workmen's compensation for injuries.

Mr. JACOBS: They pay for it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): At the time that Act was adopted I do not think there was in force in any province in Canada a workmen's compensation act providing compensation for injuries. Now there is such legislation in force in every province, but, unfortunately, it is not applicable to the employees of the Government railways. Therefore the Government, in order to put their employees in as favourable a position as the employees in other industries, was obliged to pass the legislation of last year, which is virtually a Federal workmen's compensation act, to take care of those railway employees who are injured in the railway service of the Government. It strikes me, without having given the subject a great deal of consideration, as hardly a fair proposition to say that an employee is entitled to the provisions of practically two workmen's compensation acts.

Mr. JACOBS: That is what the Privy Council decided.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I am not quite satisfied that the point was ever before the Privy Council.

Mr. JACOBS: Look at the case of Miller and the Grand Trunk Railway decided about ten years ago by the Privy Council.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I daresay some matters which involved the Provident Fund Act were before the Privy Council, but I am very doubtful whether the particular point we are discussing was ever before that tribunal.

Mr. JACOBS: I think so.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think it is a matter for Parliament to say whether an employee of the Government railways is entitled to compensation from two separate funds,—that is, to be a beneficiary under the Act of last session and under the Provident Fund Act. I quite agree that he should not lose his rights under the other provisions of the Provident Fund Act. There is something in that contention.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): The case of Miller and the Grand Trunk was an action for damages on behalf of an employee of the Grand Trunk who had been killed, and the Grand Trunk sought to evade its responsibility by pleading that the man was a member of such a fund as the Provident Fund (which has been created for the Government railways); that it was contributing to that fund every year, and that the employee agreed not to sue the company for any damages because of that contribution. The Grand Trunk succeeded before the courts of this country, but the Privy Council decided that the Provident Fund was to be considered as insurance, and that the agreement signed by this employee did not relieve the company from its liability.

Mr. REID: In that case was the man killed?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Yes.

Mr. REID: The Provident Fund does not apply in such a case, and the Compensation Act was brought in for that reason.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): But the Privy Council decided that it was to be considered merely as insurance; that the employee was paying an amount every month to that insurance, and that the company was obliged to pay damages in addition to the amount of the insurance. This is the law in respect to the other railway companies. An employee of the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific is a member of a railway provident fund, and if he is killed in a railway accident, and the company is responsible in damages, he receives the amount provided for by the Provident Fund as well as the compensation.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Might I ask if the Grand Trunk scheme provided for a system of compensation for injuries?

Mr. JACOBS: No; that is the common law.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Was it in anyway analogous to the amounts the Provident Fund provides?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): No, the Grand Trunk was liable under the law of the land.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I assume the Privy Council was perfectly right. All Compensation Acts strictly provide that no employee may contract himself out of his rights under the Act.

Mr. JACOBS: The Government is contracting itself out of its obligations.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think the Railway Employees Provident Fund Act was a step in the right direction, but since that Act was passed all the provinces have enacted Workmen's Compensation Acts. Later the Government of Canada was obliged, as it did last year, to pass legislation of a similar nature to cover its employees. Upon what principle does my hon. friend contend that these employees —in this case railway employees— are entitled to compensation from two separate funds?

Mr. JACOBS: One is compensation and the other is insurance.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think it would be unfair to those who contribute to the Provident Fund to enable those who suffer injuries to receive compensation from both sources. I can quite understand why those who contribute to the Provident Fund would object to that suggestion which my hon. friend makes, and, furthermore, inasmuch as we contribute to that, I think it is perfectly right that we should take care not to treat one class of employees who suffer injuries differently from other classes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Does it not seem reasonable that the employees of the Government railways should be placed in exactly the same position as the employees of privately owned railways?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Yes.

Mr. REID: They are.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): That is all my friend asks.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Allow me to draw the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) to the fact that every employee of the Intercolonial Railway is required by law to pay 1½ per cent of his wages into the Provident Fund. There is no necessity of his doing so when we adopt this Workman's Compensation Act, because provision is made for insurance under it on a more liberal scale than under the Provident Fund. So the man would be better off if we allowed him to keep his money in his pocket for he would be paying into the Provident Fund without prospect of any return.

We are exacting from the employees of the Intercolonial Railway money which we do not exact from the employees in machine shops, in saw-mills, or in any of those industries carried on in the same territory. They get their compensation under the Compensation Act without paying anything into the fund of the company.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But they contribute their money for other purposes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Why should we collect this money at all from the Intercolonial Railway employees?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It was an insurance scheme worked out between the railway management and the employees.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): That is true, but it does not exist now.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The reason for the Provident Fund still continues.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): For old age purposes?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): For old age purposes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): That is all.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But so far as compensation for injuries is concerned it is not very applicable.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): That is why I raised the point.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): That is quite true, but I assume that the employees would still want to continue the Provident Fund for those other purposes, and I do not imagine they would want to cut down their contribution. It really helps the Provident Fund to have the Government of Canada assume all financial responsibility for injury to employees, because there will be more available for compensation for general insurance purposes.

Mr. FRIPP: Does the Government of Canada contribute to the fund in the province of Nova Scotia under the Workmen's Compensation Act there.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No, nor to that of any province. The Bill was introduced last year to take care of Federal employees.

Mr. FRIPP: The case of Miller and the Grand Trunk was determined before any Compensation Board was organized in the provinces.

Mr. JACOBS: That is so.

Mr. MICHAUD: In the case of an employee in any industry, he insures his life in an accident company, and if an accident occurs he goes to the company and gets compensation, and he also receives compensation under the Compensation Act.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): How does he get compensation from his employer?

Mr. MICHAUD: Under the Compensation Act.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): He does not get it from his employer.

Mr. MICHAUD: He would in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I know; but he does not get it from his employer. All employers of a certain class contribute to the Compensation Fund, and the man is paid by the province out of that fund.

Mr. MICHAUD: Under the common law, he would get it from the employer.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No, under the common law he would probably get nothing, at least without a law suit.

Mr. MICHAUD: And also under the Compensation Act.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It was very rarely that a man ever got any compensation for injuries under the common law. The Employers' Liability Act first gave him relief from the common law limitations, and then later came the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Mr. MICHAUD: In this case a railway employee should be in the same position as any other employee.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It should be remembered that under the workmen's compensation schemes, as in force in all the provinces, certain classes of employers contribute to a fund, and all the contributors of a given class are insured against accidents to their employees. The Government, on the other hand, contributes nothing to a general fund with other railways insuring against accidents to railway employees. Other railway companies may make contributions to the various funds in the different provinces, but we do not. I suppose there would, in any case, not be much purpose in our contributing to a fund, because we are responsible, we are in a little different position from the ordinary contributor to the Workmen's Compensation Fund.

Mr. HARRISON: Are the Workmen's Compensation Fund and the Provident Fund separate and distinct?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Yes.

Mr. HARRISON: The minister told us this afternoon that the Government paid $100,000 into this Provident Fund last year.

Mr. REID: Every year.

Mr. HARRISON: The employees paid $167,000 last year. Is it fair that a man who has been contributing to that fund for twenty, twenty-five or thirty years, should get no benefit from it?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): He will.

Mr. HARRISON: In what way? He has to choose between the Compensation Act and the Provident Fund Act.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Let me read this section of the Provident Fund Act with which the hon. member may not be familiar:

> The following classes of persons shall, upon the recommendation of the Board and the approval of the minister, but subject to this Act and to the rules and regulations of the Board, upon being retired by the minister from service, be entitled for the remainder of their lives to monthly allowances as provided for in this Act:—
>
> Class A. Those who have attained the age of seventy years after being fifteen years in the service;
>
> Class B. Those who, after being fifteen years in the service, become physically or mentally incapacitated from following their usual occupation in the service;
>
> Class C. Those who have attained the age of sixty years after being fifteen years in the service, and request to be retired from the service;
>
> Class D. Those who are permanently disabled from following their usual occupation in the service as a result of injuries received while on duty and actually at work in the service.
> Class E. Those who, previous to the coming into force of this Act, entered the service at such an advanced age as to cause them to reach the age of seventy years before being fifteen years in the service; provided that on attaining the age of seventy years they have been at least ten years in the service.

The proposed Bill does not destroy the rights of members of the Provident Fund. All contributors to the Provident Fund are entitled to receive relief under classes A, B, C and E, in any event. An employee may avail himself of his rights under class D, and he would do that only when it would be more favourable than would be the provisions of the proposed Bill.

Mr. HARRISON: He has the privilege of choosing whether he will come under the Provident Fund Act or the Compensation Act.

Mr. REID: This Bill really applies only when an employee has been permanently disabled and goes out of the service or when an employee has been killed. Otherwise, he has the other benefits of the Provident Fund.

Mr. HARRISON: On some parts of the Grand Trunk system they are paying exactly along this line.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I do not know that.

Mr. HARRISON: I think that is the case. Of course, I have not gone into this question very thoroughly, but it seems there is an opportunity here for an employee to be a loser.

Mr. REID: I disagree with the hon. member. I have not had any such complaint from the employees, and I think the hon. member will agree with me that if there were anything defective in the measure, or if the employees were not receiving their just rights, the matter would be brought to my attention and would, of course, receive consideration. I want to emphasize that fact. I do not want it to go abroad that I am trying to interfere with the rights of the employees. Under the Provident Fund they have and will continue to have benefits, but this Bill improves the condition of the employees very much and they are satisfied.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think it is a complete answer for the minister to say: "I have no complaints," when we point out to him an injustice which stares one in the face. It is the most elementary principle of justice that it is wrong to say: I offer you a benefit, but in order to receive this benefit, you must renounce another. This Provident Fund is something into which the men have paid in larger proportion than the Government, and I presume old employees have been paying into this fund for years. Let us take a concrete case to make the matter clear. Smith and Jones have been hurt in an accident. Smith has been working for twenty years with the company, and has had 1½ per cent deducted from his wages for twenty years, while Jones has been working for three months. They are both offered compensation under the Compensation Act, the understanding being that they are to waive whatever rights they have to the Provident Fund. Jones says: All right; it does not make any difference to me; I have been paying into the fund or having 1½ per cent deducted from my wages for only three months. But the case of Smith, who has been paying into this fund for twenty years is very different. To him, the Government says: You have rights, if you wish to exercise them; but, if you exercise your rights in connection with the Provident Fund, you will not get anything under the Compensation Act. That is grievously unfair. I grant this, that as the Government has been accustomed to contribute to the Provident Fund, it would not be fair to ask the Government to pay again, but it could easily be found by an actuary what the Government's share was as compared with the men's share, and the man could get the compensation to which he is entitled under the Compensation Act, and he should also get his share out of the Provident Fund, as the share contributed by the men represents the share contributed by the Government.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): How could the hon. member work out his suggestion? I understand him to say that the injured employee should receive some portion of the money he has paid into the Provident Fund, which money would be applicable to those who are entitled to compensation under class D. This does not take away the rights of the employees to compensation under the other classes, A, B, C and E, and it would be very difficult to determine what a man would be entitled to for injuries under the Provident Fund, even if he were permitted to draw compensation from both sources. I do not see what the Minister of Railways can very well do in the matter to meet the suggestion of my hon. friend. There are only two contributors to this fund. the Government and the employee, and the Minister of Railways has had before him the employees in the person of the officials who administer the fund. They say to him that they are perfectly satisfied that any person permanently injured should not draw compensation from both sources. If any Act should be amended it should be the Provident Fund Act and not the one we are considering.

Mr. McMASTER: That may be. I am not saying which should be amended, but I am drawing to the attention of the committee the flagrant injustice of what is proposed to be done. The minister has asked me how I would suggest the thing should be done. I say that an actuary could easily calculate what proportion the Government had contributed toward the building up of the fund, and what proportion the men.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But not how much was applicable to permanent injuries.

Mr. McMASTER: I presume that could be established too, but I am not prepared to discuss that this afternoon. What I want to lay before the Committee is this: It is flagrantly unjust to make compensation under the provisions of the Compensation Act dependent upon a man's renunciation of his rights in a fund which his money has helped to build up.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): He does not renounce his claims upon the fund; he is only renouncing his rights in respect of a certain class of claim.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I should like to see the employees get benefits from both the Provident Fund and the Compensation Act. We must not forget that this legislation is brought down to better the condition of employees on the Intercolonial Railway. The minister says that the employees have been consulted in the drafting of this Bill, and further, that if it does not work out satisfactorily in practice, he is prepared to amend the Bill next year. I should like to see the Bill pass, even if it was only for the clause providing that, "for the future," dependents will be paid.

Mr. J. D. REID: If my hon. friend's amendment was accepted, employees might be compelled to pay more into the Provident Fund, and I should not like to undertake that responsibility. After all, the employees are contributing towards these benefits, and I think the question raised by my hon. friend is of such importance that I do not care to accept his amendment before consulting the employees. But the very fact that it might compel the employees to contribute more seems to me sufficient justification for not accepting the amendment at this time. Surely, there cannot be anything fairer than that. All the employees will read this discussion and if they desire to pay more into the fund, the Act can be amended accordingly. This Act applies only to those who are permanently injured and out of the service, and to those who are killed. Under the circumstances, I would ask the hon. member not to press his amendment.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I would suggest that as there is no great rush for this Bill to be passed, it should stand over for a week or possibly until after Easter to give the minister an opportunity of consulting with the employees. There is another point I wish to draw to his attention, and that is the definition of the word "employee." I notice there are a number of employees of the railway working at Port Borden who have not been paid according to the McAdoo award. Are these men considered employees of the railway under this Bill?

Mr. J. D. REID: I could not say as to these men. Those who contribute to the fund come under this Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: They are freight handlers.

Mr. J. D. REID: Any permanent employee, receiving a monthly wage, can contribute to the fund and come under this Act. The men who would not contribute are those employed only for a temporary period.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): I think the minister should accept the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Read) and let the Bill stand until he has had an opportunity of consulting with the employees. I admit that this Bill is a great improvement on the legislation of last year, and if the pressing of the amendment would prevent the adoption of this legislation, I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw his amendment. The minister said last year what he has said to-day, namely, that the employees were well satisfied with the measure he proposed, but he admits now that that legislation was susceptible of improvement.

Mr. J. D. REID: I stated last year that I had consulted with the employees, and they were satisfied with the legislation. Since the Act has been in operation, they have discovered the defects that were pointed out by my hon. friend from Kamouraska.

Mr. JACOBS: They are not trained lawyers.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): The minister says that he consulted with the employees last year and they were satisfied with the legislation as proposed, but now they have found the defects which the minister says I pointed out to him. He is now amending the Act to avoid the injustice it was doing to the dependents of employees. Under the old Act the widow of a man who had been killed and who had not elected to come under the provisions of the fund could not receive anything, because she had not waived her rights, so to speak, to something she was not entitled to.

My hon. friend realized the manifest absurdity of this and in the present Bill he is remedying that condition. We submit that the employees of the Intercolonial Railway or the Canadian Government Railways ought to be placed in exactly the same position as the employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. My hon. friend says they are in the same position, but we know that they are not. It should be a very simple matter to find out conditions as they really are before this Bill comes again before the committee, and the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) ought to be accepted; that we wait for eight or ten days and ascertain in the meanwhile how the Canadian Pacific employees are dealt with.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): How are they dealt with?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): They are receiving compensation for damages according to the law of the land, and they are also entitled to benefit under the Provident Fund, which exists in the other companies as well as in the Canadian Government Railways, and which has been considered by the Privy Council to be merely an insurance.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have made inquiries, and notwithstanding what the hon. member says, I believe that the employees of the Intercolonial Railway are in equally as favourable a position as those on the other railways, and my opinion, I think, is just as good as the hon. member's, on that question. I have taken this matter up and have had my assistants take it up during the Recess, and after consultation with the railway employees I am informed that this is what they desire. If the committee does not want to pass the Bill I would rather withdraw it this session than have any further amendments.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I prefer this Bill, but—

Mr. J. D. REID: I would much rather withdraw the Bill than that there should be any possibility of injustice to the employees.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope that is not a threat on the part of the hon. minister.

Mr. MORPHY: I have listened to this debate with considerable interest and I would not like to see the Bill withdrawn, because it is admittedly a substantial improvement on the existing law and I think that the minister is entitled to some credit for progressive legislation in the interests of the men. What struck me particularly was the frank way in which the minister, following his usual custom, consulted the employees of the roads through their representatives. They have approved the Bill, and as far as I have heard from hon. members there has been no protest from the men. Hon. members on the opposite side of the House deserve credit for seeking to better the conditions of the employees, but if we were to encourage a practice of suspending every Bill for a week until somebody had an opportunity of stirring up trouble, I do not see how the minister could possibly make any progress. The Bill is admitted to be in the interests of the men, and I might as well, if I desired to be factious, raise an objection to the Government giving the $100,000. All the employees are evidently satisfied, and in view of the assurance of the minister that should anything be found unsatisfactory between now and next session the Bill could be still further improved, I think we should proceed. If the question raised by some hon. members should prove to be in accordance with the wishes of the employees, they would no doubt be given the credit to which they would in that event be entitled.

Mr. ROBB: The day before yesterday we spent debating whether or not $5,000 which it is claimed was legally paid out should be refunded, and I suppose the discussion cost the country $25,000. We spent yesterday discussing the advisability of rising an hour earlier in the morning, and that I suppose cost us another $25,000. Now we are discussing a Bill in regard to which there does not seem to me to be any real complaint from those interested, and to expedite matters I think it would be better for my good friend to withdraw his amendment and let us get through this resolution, bearing in mind that when the flowers bloom and the weather is hot we may at a late hour at night rush through millions of dollars with but little discussion, I think we should get along with the business before the House.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: When I requested the minister to suspend the matter for the time being I had no idea that he would threaten to withdraw the Bill altogether. I would be sorry to see it withdrawn, for half a loaf is better than no bread. The suggestion that we have no complaint from the railway men is not according to the facts. I represent a great number of railway men, and know that they are not receiving what they should under the McAdoo award. However, I am glad to hear the minister's statement that he intends to stand by the employees, and I trust he will remedy that matter. I refer to the freight handlers and others at Port Borden.

Mr. JACOBS: In view of the threat made by the hon. minister to withdraw the Bill altogether, I am prepared to withdraw my amendment. As my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island aptly puts it half a loaf is better than none.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Last year the point was raised—I think by my friend (Mr. Jacobs) that this Bill did not provide for any service upon the Crown or upon the Board of Railway Commissioners, or the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. REID: I know the point the hon. member refers to. Later there will be introduced a Bill in connection with railways covering the point.

FISH INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries) the House went into committee on the following proposed resolution.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Fish Inspection Act, chapter forty-five of the statutes of 1914, and to provide that the said Act shall apply to pickled herring, alewives, mackerel, and salmon other than mild cured salmon, and the containers in which such fish are packed and marketed; that the Governor in Council may order that the provisions of the said Act shall extend and apply to any other kinds of fish, whether pickled or not, and the containers in which such fish are packed and marketed; excepting, however, fish packed in cans or other hermetically sealed containers, and fish packed by fishermen or others for their own use and not for sale or intended to be used for any other commercial purpose; that regulations may be made prescribing the size and make of such containers, and the manner in which and places where they shall be inspected and marked, and also prescribing how fish shall be graded, packed and inspected, and the place and manner and by whom fish are to be inspected, and other provisions relating thereto; that no container shall be used unless inspected and marked in accordance with the regulations, and all fish shall be graded; that all fish imported into Canada from other countries shall be packed in containers of a similar character and equal quality to those required under the proposed legislation; and shall be clearly marked with the kind, grade and weight of fish they contain, and with the name of the country of origin, provided that when such fish are imported into Canada for exportation it shall only be necessary that the container in which such fish are packed be marked with the name of the country of origin; that with certain limitations an appeal to the minister may be made in case of disputes between an inspecting officer and the packer, owner or other person: that inspectors shall have the right to enter upon any premises, vessel or boat for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of the Act as amended; that penalties may be imposed, and containers and fish forfeited and seized for violation of the Act or regulations; and that the proposed legislation shall come into force with respect to fish caught on the Pacific coast on the first day of November, 1919, and with respect to fish caught on the Atlantic coast on the first day of April, 1920.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Substantially the proposal under this resolution is the compulsory inspection of fish. The subject of course will be controversial but I wish to promote the measure a stage so that it can be referred to the Fisheries Committee to be thoroughly inquired into. I assume that the committee will ascertain what public opinion is on the matter. I do not know if it has ever been discussed in the House before in the form of a resolution or a Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a law now in connection with fish inspection, but it is not compulsory. This is compulsory inspection?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The proposal contained in the resolution is that the inspection shall be compulsory. The legislation now in existence was passed in 1914 and it provides for a system of inspection upon the request of any applicant. It is not compulsory. The results under this system of permissive inspection are as follows:

	Barrels inspected.	No. of packers requesting inspection.
1916	7,213	73
1917	8,977	80
1918	16,667	103

Mr. DUFF: Has the minister the localities in which this inspection took place?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No, I have not that information.

Mr. DUFF: Are you referring to the Atlantic coast?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It would all, apparently, be on the Atlantic coast, because I do not think there was any inspector on the Pacific coast. There an inspector was appointed in 1918. There are seven inspectors on the Atlantic coast. I give these figures to show the number of packers who availed themselves of the privilege of inspection year by year. I am informed by the officers of the department that there is quite a substantial demand throughout the country for compulsory inspection.

Mr. DUFF: Have you that report?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Yes, we would have it.

Mr. DUFF: May we have it?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Certainly, I shall see that it is made available to hon. members. I do not know that I can say anything further on the resolution. I would like to get it passed so that the Bill may be introduced and printed. I admit that it is a highly controversial matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From whom did the request for this legislation come—boards of trade and merchants?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The Canadian Fisheries' Association is one body that made a request for it. The department sent out 122 inquiries to fishermen, coopers, packers and dealers, of whom 117 replied in favour of compulsory inspection. However, that would not indicate a great volume of public opinion behind the proposal.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Were they all favourable to it?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Out of 122 inquired of, 117 were favourable.

Mr. McKENZIE: To what class of that people was that inquiry sent?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Fishermen, coopers, packers and fish dealers.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Does the inspection refer to the barrels?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It refers to the container.

Mr. SHEARD: Would the minister tell us what an alewife is?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It is a fish.

Mr. DUFF: I am not quite sure what the procedure is in a resolution of this kind, and therefore I would like to have an assurance from the minister that opportunity will be given for a full discussion of this matter either in the Marine and Fisheries Committee, or in the House after the Bill has been introduced.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Certainly, ample opportunity for discussion will be afforded. I only wish that it was not necessary to ask for the passing of a resolution of this kind. It seems to be a great waste of time, and it is hardly fair to the House because hon. gentlemen have not the opportunity of knowing in advance what the Bill contains. However, there will be opportunity for discussion when the Bill goes to committee.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: I represent a fishing constituency, and I do not object at all to this measure, although I have heard no expression of public opinion with respect to it. I learned last fall, however, that some fish were inspected at the Magdalen Islands by an inspector from Prince Edward Island, to which inspection my constituents objected very strenuously, contending that the inspection should be done by a man from their own district. On the whole I think this is a fair measure and that it will satisfy public opinion, but the minister will be expected to give full information with regard to it. For example, if the measure passes will there be a large number of inspectors appointed to carry out its provisions, or will the department utilize the good services of some of its present officials? In the present financial state of the country I would not favour any wild expenditure for inspection purposes. The department should avail itself of the services of the present staff of inspectors or officers and thus avoid any additional expenditure.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The system of inspection to be adopted is the really important and serious feature of the Bill. If fish were to be inspected immediately they were put in the containers, it would mean employing a tremendous army of inspectors, which would be undesirable and make the administration of the Act very expensive. I shall read a memorandum given me with respect to that by an officer of the department:

> That with respect to the fish a system of inspection similar to that applied to fruit should be adopted, by which means the packers would be required to cure, grade and pack their fish in accordance with the standards set; that they, not the inspectors, would be required to mark the packages with the kind, grade and weight of the fish contained, but that the inspectors would be empowered to thereafter examine the fish at any convenient time or place, in order to ascertain whether they are correctly designated by the marks on the package.

That appears to be about the only system of inspection that could be worked out, and it would not be necessary under it to have a large number of inspectors.

Mr. CHISHOLM: There are certain inspectors now.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Seven.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The trouble is that every fisherman on the coast is also a packer. The blue-book tells us there are some eight thousand fishermen whose operations cover about five thousand miles of coast, and the difficulties in connection with administering regulations of this kind would be very great on account of the scattered way in which the work is done. If the packers of fish operated like the packers of fruit, and there were places where fish was handled in large quantities, as is done in the case of fruit in the Annapolis valley and other points, the task would be a much easier one. I understand that in many places fruit is sold on the trees, and the packer comes along with his crew of men, and the necessary boxes and barrels, and the fruit is picked and packed under inspection.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think it is inspected at the warehouse largely.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): That may be so, but the conditions under which fish is packed differ greatly from those under which the packing of fruit is carried on. A man may be living in a little harbour in an isolated place. He catches the mackerel and packs it himself in barrels, which are sometimes made by himself, and the difficulty of getting an officer to go to that man's place and inspect the fish after it is packed will be very great indeed. If the inspection work is done in that way it will require an army of officials and will prove very expensive.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I quite agree with my hon. friend. But ultimately these fish are forwarded to some centre; for instance, in my hon. friend's own constituency a great quantity of pickled fish would reach Canso at one time or another, and would be inspected there.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Then the inspection would be in the interest of the dealer and not in the interest of the individual fisherman.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The Bill provides for regulations which will set up standards. The packer will assign the standard or grade of fish himself, and he will place that mark on the barrel. Later when the fish reach a certain place they will be inspected by the regular inspector.

Mr. CROWE: Why should the proposed legislation come into force on the Pacific coast in November, 1919, and in the Maritime Provinces not until April, 1920?

Mr. DUFF: On the Atlantic coast the fishing is over in September and October, and consequently there are no more fish to inspect until the following spring. Therefore, the ensuing April would suit Atlantic coast conditions.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would suggest to the minister that this measure is capable of causing a great deal of hardship to fishermen. Take my own county. There is a large fishing establishment in the northern part of Victoria county which puts up five hundred barrels of what they call No. 1 Herring, and which they sell as such to Smith Brothers, or some other big fishing firm, in Halifax, at say $8 a barrel. The firm believe that they are selling No. 1 Herring, and they have so put it up. However we have not yet reached the millennium in commercial matters, nor the acme of perfection in square dealing. It is quite possible, therefore, that some person who desires to get cheap herring may have those herring examined in Halifax by an inspector who will say that they are not No. 1 Herring, and then the whole fat is in the fire. The people who sold those herring as No. 1 herring cannot get the price for that grade, although they acted quite honestly in the matter. I would say that the inspection must take place before the fish is shipped, if it is to take place at all, and before delivery is taken, otherwise there will be no end of trouble, lawsuits and dissatisfaction, and much heartburning among the poor fishermen.

As the hon. minister is aware, deep-sea fishing is a very arduous occupation, entailing long hours and, sometimes in our part of the country, facing the full sweep of the Atlantic in all its terrors, and the fisherman has enough to contend with at present without inflicting this inspection upon him, for it will make things worse than they are now. Therefore, in the interest of everybody concerned, I would enjoin upon the hon. minister the greatest possible caution in dealing with this matter to avoid creating unnecessary difficulties.

To-day a very excellent quality of fish is being sold in Nova Scotia, and it is in our own interest to sell good fish, for we have to compete with Newfoundland, Sweden, Norway and other countries. I hear very little complaint about the quality of fish sold in Canada brought either from the Pacific coast or from the Atlantic coast.

I would suggest to the hon. minister to do what he proposes to do about that small can and big Act of Parliament. He proposes to cut down the big Act of Parliament to suit the can. In this case, if there are too many officials and they have nothing to do I think it would be well to find something else for them to do or send them about their business. Do not try to legislate difficulties in order to give them work; have greater care for the fishermen than furnishing unnecessary labour for too big an army of officials.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I quite agree with the point my hon. friend makes, and I apprehend there will be a great deal of criticism in reference to this Bill just upon the point to which he refers. However, if the Bill is eventually adopted, I hope it will not work an injury to the fishermen. If it results in placing upon the market a better fish it will also result, I think, in higher prices being secured by the fishermen.

Resolution reported, read and concurred in.

Mr. A. K. Maclean thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 41 to amend the Fish Inspection Act:

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) the House went into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Weights and Measures Act, chapter fifty-two of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to define more clearly what officers are included under the term "inspector," and the ratio and proportion of the foot, French measure or Paris foot, to the Dominion standard measures; and also to provide for the appointment of a Superintendent of Weights and Measures, with prescribed duties, for the examination of inspectors and certificate of qualification required; and for the fixing of inspection divisions; and further to prescribe by regulation when and how often weights and measures and weighing and measuring machines are to be inspected, verified and stamped; and that the Governor in Council may prescribe a fee to be charged for a specified period, not to exceed one year, instead of a fee for each inspection and verification; and further, to prescribe penalties for selling or delivering anything by weight, measure or number short of the quantity ordered or purchased; or for knowingly using any counterfeit weight, measure, weighing or measuring machine, or having, selling, or dealing in the same, except such as can, after adjustment, be admitted to verification.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The changes proposed in the Bill are not very numerous. The Weights and Measures Act heretofore was administered in the Department of Inland Revenue, but last year it was transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce. One of the amendments is to substitute the name of the Minister of Inland Revenue in the Act for that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There is a slight amendment in reference to the French measure or Paris foot. In the province of Quebec the French foot is used in land surveying, but only in such cases, I understand. The French foot is defined under the amending Bill as equal to 12.789 inches instead of 12.79, a correction of .001. This amendment is made at the request of the Incorporated Society of Surveyors in the province of Quebec. Another amendment proposes annual instead of bi-annual inspection, but—

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the hon. minister leaves the former amendment, does it change the length of the surveying standard of measurement in the province of Quebec? It seems to me that in the description and measurement of lands that are already sold or may be under sale it may create a difficulty and possibly involve very serious losses.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not think you could get much of a lawsuit out of .001.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know of a very serious lawsuit which arose out of the fact that the drip from the edge of the shingles on the roof of a man's house fell on to the other man's land. It was a case of trespass, so it does not require very much to cause a lawsuit.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): If there was any danger of the amendment provoking a lawsuit, it perhaps should not be in the Bill. If my hon. friend will think over the matter in the meantime, I shall be glad to have his views. The Bill will also provide for an annual instead of biennial inspection, but there will be power in the Bill to make regulations to the effect that scales which are not used frequently need not be inspected so often. One of the reasons for making an annual inspection is that in the case of public scales, mine scales, grain elevator scales, etc., which are in constant use, it is felt that the inspection should be more frequent. The law as it now stands requires the payment of the inspection fee immediately after the inspection is made, the Bill purposes giving power to the officers of the department to make arrangements by which these inspection fees may be paid annually. For instance, in the case of elevator companies which may own twenty to fifty elevators, it may not always be convenient to have the inspection fee paid at the place where the elevator is located.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): In many cases there may be no responsible representative of the company there present to whom the money can be entrusted. It might not be convenient to make immediate payment, and such companies would like the privilege of paying the fees annually from their head office.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From the head office?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): This resolution provides for the appointment of a superintendent. Has the minister any person in view, and what will the salary be?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): This provision was made necessary because the Act was administered by the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue. That position has been abandoned, and as there is now no such officer as Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue, it is necessary to put somebody in his place to administer the Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the French foot going to disappear, or is the Bill to be founded on this resolution simply defining it so as to make it tally with the Government standard measure in the Act?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Paragraph 2 of the Bill will repeal the old section and substitute the following:

The foot, French measure or Paris foot, shall be held to contain twelve inches and seven hundred and eighty-nine thousandths of an inch standard measure.

That is the standard for land surveying purposes in Quebec only.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it intended to make the standard in the rest of the Dominion conform to the present standard in Quebec?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No, Quebec is the only province in which the French foot is the standard measure in land surveying.

Mr. MURPHY: You would not apply it in Ontario?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is it the intention to insert in the Bill this provision which is contained in the resolution:

—and further to prescribe by regulation when and how often weights and measures and weighing and measuring machines are to be inspected, verified and stamped; and that the Governor in Council may prescribe a fee to be charged for a specified period, not to exceed one year.

Does that apply to measures of all kinds? For instance, in the drygoods business yard measures made of brass are used. These are and must be stamped by the Government at the time they are purchased and before they are put into use. Must they, under this Bill, be examined periodically in future? A yard stick made of metal cannot be stretched or varied, and as it has the Government stamp on it, why should it be necessary to have a periodical inspection of measures of that kind? There are no doubt other measures that are in the same class. Once a measuring article of that kind has been approved by the Government, it cannot vary unless a man deliberately cuts a piece off, and that would be absurd.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not think this would include a measure of that kind.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think it would be wise to except measures of that kind in the Bill, because otherwise there would be no end of trouble to men using them. Inspectors would be coming along at irregular intervals and charging merchants fees for inspections that would not be necessary.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not think the Act applies to that at all.

Mr. PEDLOW: The resolution says "measures."

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The hon. member might bring that matter up on the second reading when the Bill is printed.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not know whether the measures of electric currents and the inspection of meters come under this department or not. They used to come under the Department of Inland Revenue and they likely come under this department now.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): This is under the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I think a different set of officials inspect electrical measures.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When did that come under the Department of Trade and Commerce? It used to be under the Department of Inland Revenue.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It was under the Department of Inland Revenue and was transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce at the same time the Weights and Measures Branch was transferred.

Mr. McKENZIE: If this is not in the minister's department. I hope whatever department has charge of the work will take note of what I have to say. In our part of the country there is the greatest possible dissatisfaction in regard to these meters and the calculating and reading of meters. It is believed there is a great deal of filching from the public by reason of defective meters, and there is no proper inspection at all. If I want to get a meter in my house tested, I do not know where to go. We have no inspections and we have no official who takes any cognizance of this sort of thing.

When you take into consideration that there are hundreds of thousands of these meters all over the country, on whose readings men are paying out large sums of money, it can be readily understood how important it is that they should be tested and kept in proper order. So far as I know, there is no system of inspection at the present time, and I take this opportunity of bringing the matter to the attention of the minister.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I shall be very glad to bring to the attention of the proper officer the remarks of the leader of the Opposition, and I shall ask him to write my hon. friend a letter. There is an inspection of electrical plants by Dominion officers, but whether that includes an inspection of household meters I cannot say. I would think, however, that meters are inspected at some stage or other by a federal officer, but whether that is done at the installation or from time to time thereafter I do not know. I would think that there ought to be in every city some official who would be available to any householder for the purpose of testing the meter. I shall be glad to look further into the matter.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Are not electrical meters under provincial jurisdiction, just the same as the wiring of houses and buildings and all that sort of thing?

Mr. FAFARD: The resolution proposes to define more clearly the ratio and proportion of the foot, French measure, or Paris foot. I understand that the Paris foot is the standard measure now. Why are we making a change?

Mr. MACLEAN: I think the hon. gentleman was not in the House when we were discussing this matter a moment ago. The change is being made at the suggestion of the Incorporated Society of Surveyors of the Province of Quebec. At the present time the Paris foot is defined as the equivalent of 12·79 inches. It is proposed to make it 12·789 inches.

Mr. FAFARD: It is 12·789 now. I do not think it ever was 12·79.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Resolution reported, read and concurred in.

Mr. Maclean (Halifax) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42, to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Customs and Inland Revenue Service—salaries, including Commissioner and Chairman, Board of Customs at $6,000, Assistant Commissioner of Customs at $4,500, Assistant Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue at $4,500 — Contingencies, $43,000, $463,387.50.

Mr. REID (Grenville): The salaries are the same as last year, except for the statutory increases, and an increase of $1,000 to the commissioner, and $500 to the assistant commissioner.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the bonus included in that?

Mr. REID (Grenville): No.

Mr. PROULX: What is the reason for the increase of $1,000?

Mr. REID: Mr. McDougald is a deputy minister, and all the deputy ministers got an increase of $1,000 this year.

Mr. PROULX: Does not the minister think that is a large increase?

Mr. REID: I do not think so.

Mr. PROULX: It seems a large increase to me, especially in view of the finances of the country at the present time, faced as we are with a deficit. The deputy ministers are already getting a large salary, while officers in other departments who have families to maintain are getting only $1,500 or $2,000. These men certainly need an increase more than the deputy ministers, who are receiving $5,000. If a man cannot live on $5,000, he will not be able to live on $6,000. I think the Government should give more consideration to the under-paid, rather than to those already enjoying high salaries, but the Government seems to think more of the higher salaried officers. I for one am opposed to such an increase.

Mr. McKENZIE: Have any changes been made in the staff? Have there been any deaths or additions to the staff?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The staff is exactly the same, with the exception of the addition of the minister's private secretary.

Customs.—Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary Customs buildings and rentals, $4,000,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): There is an increase of $110,000.

Mr. REID (Grenville): That is to provide for increases in salaries during the coming year. In the Inside Service there is an annual increase provided for under the statute, whereas increases to the Outside Service are given by the department, and there has always been each year a certain amount put in the Estimates to allow for these increases. Instead of $110,000 it has generally been $200,000 or $300,000, but this year it has been reduced to $110,000 in order to allow of increases to those who, it is considered, are entitled to them having been in the service for a number of years. When the re-organization of the Civil Service is effected and the Outside Service is put on the same basis as the Inside Service, the statute will give them an annual increase of $50 or $100, and there will of course be no necessity for a vote such as this.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): How many officers are now in the Outside Service and how many were there a year ago?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The information will be available in a moment or two.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much of this $4,000,000 is applied to rentals and temporary buildings?

Mr. REID (Grenville): I am unable to say offhand how much the rentals amounted, but they are practically all made through the Public Works Department. We have not a record of them in the Customs Department. If we want an examining warehouse in the city of Montreal, the Public Works Department secures the premises on our information as to the number of surface feet that we require, and other specifications, and the rental is paid through that department. Only occasionally, and in the case of a very small building is this work done through the Customs Department.

Mr. SHEARD: What proportion of this $110,000 represents salaries? Does it embrace any increase in salaries for the coming year? The reason I ask is because on inquiry I was informed that the entire salaries of the Civil Servants must be adjusted to a general ratio of increase. I think we ought to be informed as to what percentage is salaries, and what percentage rentals, and if the amount includes increases.

Mr. REID (Grenville): The increase of $110,000 is intended for increases to the officers of the Customs Department on the outside staff and not for any special salaries. The hon. member probably knows that during the present fiscal year ending March 31 salaries in the Outside Service were increased by way of bonuses out of the war vote put through last year. This $110,000 is not for that bonus, but for increases that are given every year. The departmental staff presents to the minister a report showing what in their opinion each member of the staff should receive by way of increase. In the past we voted about $300,000 or $400,000 for increases, but as I have stated we have reduced it this year. In my opinion, however, it should be as much as it was last year, but the bonus is to be considered. If we were to give every member of the outside staff about $100 increase it would take at least $300,000 The hon. member asked for the number of employees last year and this year. On March 31, 1918, there were 3,351 in the Outside Service, and at the present time there are 3,283, or 70 fewer than there were a year ago.

Mr. SHEARD: Does the minister say that the war bonus is included in this amount?

Mr. REID (Grenville): No. Last year the Government gave the Outside Service a bonus which was taken out of the vote of $2,000,000.

Mr. COWAN: The war bonus would have to be considered apart from this?

Mr. REID (Grenville): Yes.

Mr. COWAN: I understand that a number of Civil Servants from various parts of Canada gathered recently and decided to ask for increases. Will these increases satisfy those men?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The matter will have to come up later on in the session. The Civil Service Commission are now classifying the Outside Service and will probably put it on the same basis as the Inside Service. Parliament will have to consider whether we are to continue bonuses or increase salaries under this classification that is being made. We are not in a position to decide this matter just at this moment and are making this vote the same as last year.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Did all the outside officers share in the bonus?

Mr. REID (Grenville): All up to $1,880, but not over.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Only the officers who are permanent and not those who have been employed for six or seven months?

Mr. REID (Grenville): All that were employed, both permanent and temporary, previous to April, 1918.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Do I understand the minister to say that those, such as messengers, who are employed in the House during the session received the bonus?

Mr. REID (Grenville): I am only talking about the Customs Department.

Mr. ROBB: I understand that for some time there has been a staff of accountants from the United States employed making a survey of the different departments so as to advise the Government on the increases that are demanded, and this at considerable expense, notwithstanding that the Government had a report three or four years ago from accountants from Great Britain. What I particularly desire to draw to the attention of the minister, and more especially to the attention of the hon. Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), is the fact that we are starting to-night to vote Supply to this Government. It seems to me that before the Government ask for Supply they should first give to the people of Canada a correct and complete statement of our financial position. We should have a statement of the debt of the country, the assets that would be deducted therefrom, temporary loans, treasury bills and all the outstanding and unsettled obligations and engagements in connection with pledging the credit of Canada, including railways, docks and steamships; in short Mr. Chairman, whatever engagements the people of Canada are pledged to. I think it is due, not to the Opposition, but to the country as a whole that we should have a complete, fair and honest statement before any considerable amount is voted.

Mr. REID (Grenville): The hon. member is perfectly right in saying that Parliament should have that information at the earliest possible date. I am glad the hon. gentleman mentioned it this evening and I shall draw the attention of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) to his remarks to-morrow morning. The Minister of Finance will take advantage of the opportunity, no doubt, when the House is in Committee of the Whole on the resolution by which he is asking for a vote of $350,000,000, to give a full statement of the financial position of Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Will the minister give us any information in regard to the accountants who are employed?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The Civil Service Commission had in hand the reorganization of the Civil Service, and they employed a staff of accountants. I could not say where they are from, I never made any inquiries, but I would suggest that the matter might be brought up when the vote in connection with the Civil Service Commission is under consideration. If the information is wanted at an early date I will have it brought up in Supply again.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I wish to draw the attention of the minister to a request from my constituency for an additional custom house at Port Felix on the Atlantic coast. This is a fishing village with something like 1,500 inhabitants who are engaged in the inshore and deep-sea fisheries. A number of small vessels are going in and out of that port but there is no custom house nearer than five miles at White Head. It is not convenient for the inhabitants to go that distance to do their business with the custom house. They are also shipping fish to the United States, and some statements have to be filed and entries made in regard to these shipments. It is quite a cost and a burden to have to drive five miles to make these entries. These small customs offices on the coast are very inexpensive. The salary of the officer is a mere trifle, something like $200, and it would be very little compared with the convenience it would be to the people of that locality to have a customs office there. I would be obliged if the Minister would ask the inspector in that district to go into that matter and see if anything can be done to promote the convenience of the merchants, shipowners and others in that district.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I shall have our inspector make an investigation to see whether we should be justified in establishing an office there. Of course, every office we open means more expense to us.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The salary would be very small.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would the minister be able to tell me about the number of the customs warehouses in the province of Nova Scotia, or what might be regarded as private warehouses? There is a great deal of complaint about the improper use of customs warehouses in that province. It is said that liquors are stored in these warehouses and that in some manner they find their way out of them. The complaint is made that warehouse licenses are given to men who are engaged in the liquor business. There is absolute prohibition in Nova Scotia, and to find that large quantities of liquors are stored in Government warehouses, or in warehouses recognized by the Government, creates a great deal of adverse criticism. Last year I brought this matter to the notice of the Minister of Customs himself (Mr. Sifton) who is not present now, and he told me that no further recognition would be given to such warehouses. That you can find in Hansard. But they are still in existence and they are still a terrible nuisance particularly in that part of the country from which I come. I trust that the Government will not encourage the illicit sale of liquor by recognizing these warehouses. I would like to know how many such licenses there are, for what period they have been granted, and whether it is the intention of the Minister to cease granting them in territories where absolute prohibition prevails so far as it can be carried out by provincial enactment?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The policy adopted when I was Minister of Customs—and I think it is still carried out—was to grant no bonded warehouse licenses in any province without the consent of the provincial authorities. I remember cases where a private individual would apply for a bonded warehouse license—

Mr. McKENZIE: That is what I am complaining about.

Mr. REID (Grenville):—and our answer would be that it would only be granted after getting permission from the local Government. In Nova Scotia there are no bonded warehouse licenses granted, I venture to say, without such permission, and in that way we feel we are only giving effect to the provincial prohibition law. There may have been bonded warehouses where a person had a quantity of liquor stored when the Prohibition Act came into force, and possibly it may be a case of that kind to which the hon. gentleman refers. In that event we would allow the person to have a license until he sold the liquor on hand; but under no conditions would he be allowed to replenish the supply unless the necessary permission was forthcoming from the local Government. I can assure the hon. gentleman that no licenses have been granted in the province of Nova Scotia since last session, unless through the instrumentality of the provincial license board, or whoever is entrusted with the enforcement of the provincial liquor law.

Mr. McKENZIE: I asked the minister to state positively whether there are any bonded warehouses licenses outstanding today. I think there must be, and in that event I want the names of those who hold them. If there are no such licenses then the parties interested are imposing upon a credulous public, because they say they have the necessary authority. They certainly have such places and there are liquors in them. I can assure the minister that there is no such thing in Nova Scotia as a board, or a body of men, with authority to license anybody to sell liquor. Absolute prohibition exists there, except that medical men may sell liquor for sacramental purposes in accordance with the law. The municipal councils can also appoint a few vendors, as they are called, who are licensed to sell on a doctor's certificate. I believe that in the city of Halifax there is a board who have the power of appointing vendors within the city, but that is the extent of their jurisdiction. Apart from this, no body of men is authorized to grant licenses or deal in the liquor traffic in any way. The complaint of the good temperance people of Nova Scotia, particularly those of the county of Cape Breton, is that bonded warehouses or other places are loaded up at night with liquor brought in surreptiously in cars, under the pretext of being carloads of pressed hay. Upon complaining last session, the Minister of Customs assured me that these licenses would be cancelled altogether, but I find that that has not been done. I may tell the minister that in the county of Cape Breton there is a great deal of serious complaint about this matter.

Mr. REID (Grenville): There must be some mistake, because no licenses have been granted by the Customs Department except what we call Class 2 Bonded Warehouse Licenses, which are endorsed "Storage of Liquors not Allowed." Now, as to the charge which the hon. gentleman makes, he knows that the bonded warehouse is in the custody of an officer of the department, who alone keeps the key, and if access to that bonded warehouse is desired it must be obtained in the presence of the officer. Under Dominion statute liquors cannot be shipped into the province of Nova Scotia, neither can any one in the province import them. It is suggested that someone in the city of Montreal, or the province of Quebec, where the right exists to load and ship liquor, has consigned a carload of liquor, under the guise of being a carload of pressed hay, to someone in Sydney or North Sydney, and that the officer in charge of the bonded warehouse, the only man who has the key, is in league with the owner of the liquor, and permits it to be taken into the bonded warehouse, and afterwards smuggled out and sold to people in the locality. I cannot come to any other conclusion from the statements which the hon. gentleman has made.

I can hardly think that the officers of the Customs Department would allow anything of that kind to go on. The whole responsibility for the observance of the law is in the hands of the officer, the man who has the key of the bonded warehouse. My officers sitting beside me tell me that at the present time they do not know of any licenses that have been issued for bonded warehouses in Nova Scotia for the storage of liquor. It is possible that some person may have had a license prior to the Temperance Act coming into force, and was allowed to keep his liquor in bond until it could be disposed of, but if the law is that liquor cannot be sold in Nova Scotia, it is still there, otherwise the officers of the department are not carrying out their duty. As a result of the statements made by the hon. member tonight, I shall at once instruct the officers of the department to see what bonded warehouses are still in existence where liquor can be stored, and if there are no such bonded warehouses, then they must ascertain whether there is any possibility of liquors being stored in bond. Because I quite believe the hon. member has been informed—probably it may be from stories not founded on fact—that liquor is going in in that way, and of course if any officers are implicated they would not be entitled to remain in the service. But I can hardly believe they would do that. It is quite possible that liquor is being shipped into Nova Scotia in violation of our prohibition law, just the same as it is being shipped into every other province. There is no doubt that liquor is being shipped from the province of Quebec, where there is no prohibition, into all the other provinces in violation of the law, but I feel that when we investigate we will find that liquor is not going into any building under the control of the Customs Department.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am informed that in the town of New Waterford, for instance, there is a private bonded warehouse; that in the town of Glace Bay there is more than one bonded warehouse; and I think that in the town of North Sydney, from which I come, there is at least one bonded warehouse, if not more. When the owners got their licenses I do not know, but they have had them for a long time. The Temperance Act, with its prohibitive clauses, was passed in 1916, and, except for a certain period in the city of Halifax, there was no part of the province where licenses could be issued or where liquor could be legally handled. I do not think there is any good ground in a prohibited area to allow the continuance of these licenses for nearly nine years, and unless the minister can find that there is very good reason for it they should be cancelled altogether. Because I tell him on my responsibility as a member that these bonded warehouses are refuges for the illicit handling of liquor. I am not making any charge against any officers, because I have not any information, but this thing is going on under the eye of the officers Whether they have any complicity in it I am not saying for one moment; all I say is it is going on and it should be stopped.

Mr. REID (Grenville): My officials tell me that there can not be a bonded warehouse at New Waterford because it is not a customs port. They hand me this official report of March 31, 1918, and inform me that no licenses for bonded warehouses have been granted since. This report gives the receipts for the attendance of officers at bonded warehouses for the twelve months ending March 31st, 1918, and the number of bonded warehouses. Of class 2, where liquors are not allowed to be stored, I find that in Halifax there are 29, in Sheet Harbour 1, in Lunenburg 5, in La Have 2, in Sydney 1, in Yarmouth 1. These are licenses granted for the storage of goods other than liquors. At Halifax they have warehouses of class 3, that is, general warehouses where half a dozen merchants can store any goods in bond except liquor; at North Sydney there is 1.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who has it?

Mr. REID (Grenville): I cannot give you that information; but whoever has that bonded warehouse has no right to have liquor in it, and if the officer in charge allows liquor to go into that bonded warehouse he should not only be dismissed, but he should be prosecuted for violating his office. In Sydney there are two bonded warehouses of class 3. Now, it may be possible that in North Sydney or Sydney some official may be in league with the licensee of the warehouse. I have seen in the press, no doubt the hon. member has seen it too, that in some of the provinces—I do not mean Nova Scotia, but provinces west of Ontario, and probably in Ontario itself—charges have been made against Government officials that they were guilty of conniving with men engaged in the illicit handling of liquor. Possibly such a thing might happen with some of our officers in Nova Scotia, and in that way the information coming to the hon. member might be correct. As he has brought the matter before the House and shown that there may possibly be collusion on the part of our officers I shall make it a point to at once have a thorough inspection of all these warehouses in every province, and if there has been any such collusion in the past the officers should receive the treatment they deserve; but if we cannot find any dereliction of duty on their part, the very fact of the hon. member bringing the matter to the attention of the House, and our inspectors being instructed to investigate every bonded warehouse throughout the Dominion of Canada, will have the effect of stopping anything of that kind in the future.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I understand the minister to say then, that there are no bonded warehouses in the province of Nova Scotia where liquor can be stored. I am quite sure that there have been a good many such warehouses, but whether they exist to-day I do not know. I know a case in a certain town in Nova Scotia where the bonded warehouse was in the cellar of the hotel.

In some mysterious way the liquor seems to find its way from the cellar up to the bar where it is distributed to the customer. I do not think that is going on in that particular hotel at the present time, but it was certainly an abuse of the bonded warehouse system. The minister, I understand, read us a list of bonded warehouses, and he said that in not one of them can liquor legally be stored. The inference I take from that is that there is in Nova Scotia no place under the control of the Dominion Government where liquor can legally be stored. Am I right?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The information given to me by my officials is that in Nova Scotia there are no bonded warehouses in which liquor may be stored by any private individual. The hon. member might catch me just a little if I said that there is no liquor stored in any of those bonded warehouses, because if a customs officer in Nova Scotia gets word of a carload of liquor that is there against the law, it would be his duty to seize it and put it into a bonded warehouse. There might, therefore accidentally be some liquor there that was seized and not yet disposed of, but unless it is there under a seizure or at the request of the local government or on their authority. I do not think there is any liquor stored in any bonded warehouse in Nova Scotia. At all events we are not granting and will not grant licenses for bonded warehouses in Nova Scotia without the consent of the local government. I remember cases where licenses have been requested from Western Canada for the purpose of storing liquor. I think one request came from Manitoba, the party stating in his letter: There is no license board here and no one has any authority. I replied that authority would have to be secured from the deputy minister or the minister of the department, and I think in one case the party was successful in getting that authority. Licenses may have been granted on the suggestion of the local government of Nova Scotia, but if the Government of Nova Scotia has not consented, then I do not think there is a license in that province.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not think the Government of Nova Scotia has, since 1910, consented to the granting of any license to any person in that province to keep a bonded warehouse for the purpose of storing liquor. I should like the minister, through his officials, to inquire into the matter. If there are any such licenses, or if the Government of Nova Scotia has consented to the granting of a license to any one for a bonded warehouse for storing liquor, I have a right to know it. I do not believe that such is the case.

Mr. REID (Grenville): Yes, the hon. member has that right.

Mr. McKENZIE: I shall be very much surprised, because the Government of Nova Scotia has been strongly in favour of temperance and been passing strong temperance laws, particularly since 1910, if that Government or any member of it has given permission to, or helped directly or indirectly any person to get a license for the purpose of evading their own law. If there is such a case, we want to know it, and I want, if possible, to know if the Government of Nova Scotia or any official of the Govervent is participating in any such transaction.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I agree with the hon. member that there should not be any such licenses, and I will write him a letter to-morrow, stating just what the situation is in Nova Scotia. When the prohibition Order in Council came into force, the only licenses that I remember were granted were licenses in St. John and Halifax for ships' stores or for export, but as soon as we passed that Order in Council, those licenses were cancelled. I remember the matter coming up about St. John. There were in St. John some firms whose whole business had been the storage of liquor for selling to vessels entering the port and going out again, and they felt sore in regard to the matter. Their licenses were allowed to continue in force only until they got rid of their stock, and then their licenses were cancelled and they went out of business. I shall be very much surprised if there is a license for storing liquor in Nova Scotia. The official sitting beside me, who has charge of those licenses, says there is none.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister will see that a vigorous campaign is instituted against the existence of such warehouses he will be doing a great service to the cause of temperance in Nova Scotia and will win the gratitude of the good people who are putting forth great efforts to suppress the evil of intemperance in that province.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I will certainly do that, and I will say further that I cannot understand how any one is going to get liquor into that province, because the Government railways cannot carry that liquor except in violation of the law. I gave orders that they were not to carry it, and that the officials were to have a vigorous compaign to see that no one was allowed to ship it in under the guise of some other article. No matter whether the liquor is being shipped to the province or in the province, it is in direct violation of the law, and I will again ask the officials to watch the matter very closely and to see that every possible precaution is taken to prevent violation of the law, either by transportation or importation.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): As the minister has mentioned the carriage of liquor by the railways, I want to point out to him that it is generally consumed by some person on the railway before it reaches its destination. I have not the slightest doubt that nearly every train leaving Montreal for the Maritime Provinces contains illegal packages. In 1916, the Government passed a law prohibiting the exportation of liquor from a province like Quebec, in which liquor can legally be sold, into a province like Nova Scotia which is a dry area. The law was made very positive that no liquor could legally be carried by the railway from one province to another in violation of the law of the province to which it was sent. At that time the question arose as to who was to prosecute, and a long discussion took place in the House as to how that should be dealt with. The attention of the Minister of Justice was drawn to the fact that the violations occur, let us say, in the city of Montreal, and the prosecutions in the Maritime Provinces are under the control of the municipalities, and it would be very difficult for a local municipality to prosecute a wholesale merchant in Montreal who had illegally shipped liquor into Nova Scotia. We, therefore, put into the Act a clause making it the duty of the Justice Department to carry on these prosecutions and to see to it that no violation of the law of 1916 took place.

That step was hailed with great delight by the temperance people throughout the Maritime Provinces, and the clergymen thanked the Lord that we had a Government that not only passed a law prohibiting the carriage of liquor, but also gave us the Minister of Justice of Canada to enforce that law. It looked very good on the face of it. Ever since that Act was passed it was known by everybody down there that liquor was going into the Maritime Provinces every day; there were two trains every day, and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has told the committee that the liquor was packed in the centre of carloads of hay, and that great quantities were shipped in that way. This has been going on for the last three years, and the other day I ventured to ask the Acting Minister of Justice how many prosecutions had been brought by the Minister of Justice since 1916, the year in which the Act was passed. And what do you think was the reply? The answer was, none. The Minister of Justice has done nothing, although the railway has carried the liquor and the railway employees have been drinking it as it went along. The Minister of Justice has gone to sleep, and the good people who prayed for him and thanked the Lord we had such a minister have been deceived.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): The accusation just made by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) is a very sweeping one, and if it is correct some recognition must be taken of it. I gather from what he says that information has been laid before the Justice Department by some responsible person, that violations of the law have taken place, and that the Justice Department has refused or failed to act. If that is the case, the House and the country should know it. If it is merely a case of hearsay, the House and the country should also know it. I do not think the hon. member would suggest that the Minister of Justice should go down to the province of Quebec or the province of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia and act as detective while the cars are being unloaded, but if any responsible citizen has laid an information, as the law provides for, and the Justice Department has failed to act, we should certainly know it.

Mr. REID (Grenville): Perhaps the hon. member for Guysborough will bring this matter up when the Estimates of the Justice Department are under consideration.

Mr. DUFF: This talk of bonded warehouses and kindred matters is apt to make us rather dry. With regard to the item under discussion, I should like to know what percentage of the item is accounted for by the statutory increases in the Outside Service of the Customs Department.

Mr. REID (Grenville): There are no statutory increases in the Outside Service. In the Inside Service, there is a statutory increase of about fifty dollars a year until the maximum of the class is reached. In the Outside Service, the matter of salary increases has been left to the minister in the past, but now the Civil Service Commission are classifying the whole Service, Inside and Outside, and it is expected the Outside servants will get a regular statutory increase. The officer at a small port might start at a salary of $1,000 a year, and rise by annual increases of $50 up to $1,500, or whatever was the maximum for that port.

Mr. DUFF: I understood the minister to say earlier in the evening that the increase of $110,000 was practically accounted for by salaries. That would be about twenty-nine per cent of $3,000,000. I do not think the increases should be as high as that.

Mr. REID (Grenville): There are 3,283 officers, and the increase would average about $35.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a vacancy in the staff at North Sydney caused by the death of an officer by the name of McLeod. I should like to know if anything is being done to fill that office, and whether preference will be given to returned soldiers in making the appointment.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I understand that it is not necessary to fill that office, but if it is to be filled, the appointment will be made by the Civil Service Commission. I understand that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) is carrying out the policy I insisted on when in charge of the Customs Department. During the last two years I was in charge, every vacancy was filled by a returned soldier who had served at the front, and I made about 380 appointments during that time; I understand that about 200 appointments have since been made. I understand that the Civil Service Commission are giving preference to returned soldiers in every case, and they are certainly doing it in regard to my department, because I insist on it being done. I think every member of this House will agree that the men who have served at the front must get the positions if they can fill them, and they will get them.

Mr. DUFF: I am very glad to hear that the minister has carried out that policy but certainly the Minister of Customs is not carrying it out, as I can prove by a case in my county last year.

Mr. REID (Grenville): All appointments are made by the Civil Service Commission, and they are carrying out the policy of giving returned soldiers the preference.

Mr. DUFF: I called the attention of the Minister of Customs to this vacancy before the appointment was made.

Mr. REID (Grenville): Where was it?

Mr. DUFF: At Riverport.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Last year a vacancy occurred in the Customs service at Port Hastings, in the county of Inverness. I called the attention of the Minister of Customs at the time to the fact that he had appointed an aged gentleman to the position without examination. The minister had assured me that whoever was chosen for the position would have to take the examination, but I do not think this old gentleman did take it; I do not think he could. What I want to ask the minister is this: In that case would it not be proper for him to have this position filled by a returned soldier? There are many of them who are well qualified for the position, and in making such appointment the minister would only be doing what was right.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I have just made inquiry and am informed by one of my officials that in March, 1918, a man named W. H. Skinner was appointed at a salary of about $300. He must surely have some other occupation, because he could not possibly live on $300. I do not know how the appointment was made, but I suppose it was by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Was the appointment permanent?

Mr. REID (Grenville): I shall have to ascertain why the appointment was made and just what the situation is. In some small places it has been found difficult up to the present time to get returned soldiers. Some of these places pay small amounts ranging from $50 to $300, and they could not get returned soldiers to take the positions owing to the smallness of the salary, while in many cases no returned soldiers were available. It is necessary to get a man living near who has some other occupation, and an appointment of that kind may have been made temporarily until a returned soldier could be found. You can hardly expect a returned soldier to go into a port and live on $300. You would have to secure a man who had some other means such as a pension, but there are positions of the kind which undoubtedly would offer great assistance to a returned soldier who had been seriously wounded and whose pension, being insufficient to support him, would be augmented by some $200 or $300. I think that is being done; in fact, I know of one case in which a returned soldier superseded a man who was willing to give way to and help the returned man, although the salary was not large.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I think this is nothing more nor less than a political appointment, because I understand that the regulations of the department call for an examination. I had the assurance of the minister last year that there would be an examination, but it was never held, and this old gentleman was appointed. The man who filled the position previously—I think his name was Forbes—had held it for a number of years, and his son, the only support of a widowed mother, acted for three or four years before his father's death. One would expect that it would be only natural for the department to allow this young man to continue in the service, as he requested to be allowed to do, until he could have an opportunity of taking an examination. The department did not see their way clear to grant this request but appointed this particular friend who was a very active politician in the district. I am not scrupulous enough to say that this was very reprehensible if the Government were pretending to be appointing men to office on account of their political persuasion. But when we have a Government who claim to have abolished patronage and who appoint men to positions of this kind although they have not fulfilled the regulations, I certainly must take exception to their action. They are not living up to the standard which they have set. Apart from this however, there are several soldiers there who have been home for some time and, if I mistake not, there was a returned man in the vicinity at the time the department made the appointment. I suppose the soldier did not care to make application for the position, but there are soldiers there now who would be glad to get it. It is not necessary that the soldier should be a cripple in order to get an appointment. If he is back from the service and is working on a farm I think it would be only a reasonable recognition of the part he has played in the war to give him an opportunity of filling any of these positions if he cares to take it. Under these circumstances, therefore, I say that this position was filled for political purposes, and for no other reason. I corresponded with this young man and told him the examination would be held, and although I wrote the department requesting them to notify him when the examination would take place—I think it was to be held in Sydney—he never received a notice. However I understand my friend is permanently appointed.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I hardly believe the Minister of Customs would countenance political patronage. At all events the appointment was before the Civil Service Act came into force, and at that time it was necessary to fill the position by the minister. He had to take recommendations from the best source that was available to him, and no matter what means he took to obtain the best man he could, he would be open to criticism.

Mr. READ (Prince): I desire to say a few words on this question. I think the whole country has gone crazy on this matter. If I had an enemy, or if I wanted to do the soldiers a dis-service, I would endeavour to get them into the Civil Service. If there is any calling in the country more degrading than another, it is the Civil Service. Put a man into the Civil Service, and, as a general rule, you spoil him for anything else. But apart from that, he is bereft of all ambition and his career is destroyed. You might as well commit economic suicide as enter the Civil Service. There are soldiers coming across the seas who are persuaded by this propaganda —whether it is political or otherwise, I do not know,—that the Civil Service is a desirable thing to get into. But I would not put a dog into it.

Mr. FIELDING: There being no statutory increases for the outside service, by what method is it proposed to discover who are entitled to increases and who are not? What is the modus operandi by which increases are granted?

Mr. REID (Grenville): During the time I was Minister of Customs,—and I suppose the practice is the same at present and will continue unless we can get the classification through the present session,—the position was this: The officials of the department, that is, the commissioner, the assistant commissioner and the inspectors, knew those who were entitled to increases and made a list which they submitted to the minister, and I think in almost every case the recommendations were acted upon. Some one may ask: Why some and not others? In posts where men have reached their maximum their salaries remain stationary. Under the old Civil Service Act there were several classes. There was a maximum for inspectors, one for assistant inspectors, messengers, etc. That is why I say it would not probably apply to every officer in the outside service.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The minister has told us that all these appointments are to be made by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. REID (Grenville): Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I can understand how the Civil Service Commission can make an appointment after examination. If they want to fill a position they can examine the applicants and find out the one best qualified. But there is another class of cases where that cannot be done. In my own constituency the position of harbour master of Canso became vacant a few months ago.

Mr. REID (Grenville): That is in the Department of Marine.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I do not care where it is; I want to get at the principle upon which the commission act. To my knowledge there are three or four applicants for the position, all good men, but not one is known to the commission. How are the commission to decide between these three or four applicants, a thousand miles away, men they never saw and know nothing about? Is it by some rule of thumb in the office here? It would not be proper to correspond with anybody down there; it would not be proper, under the system which my hon. friend says is such a splendid one, to ask me who is the best man, and I would not venture to say anything about it. But how do they arrive at a decision in a case of that kind?

Mr. REID (Grenville): Again I must ask my hon. friend to bring that up on the Civil Service item. But there have been a good many appointments in the department I am administering.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Without examination?

Mr. REID (Grenville): I never ask them that at all. The only inquiry I make when a man is sent to me to fill a position is whether he is a returned soldier. If I get the answer "yes," I ask no questions as to what steps the commission have taken in examining him for the position. I know he is qualified in one way and I am willing to give him a six months' trial. If he does not prove himself to be qualified he must then make way. As long as they are carrying out that part of the law I feel satisfied that we have a proper system of examination.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My hon. friend has not dealt with my point. I think he will admit that there are a number of appointees in his department that are not subject to examination; for instance, those at small ports where there are salaries of $200 or $300. He must be satisfied that such appointments are made by the commission without knowing anything about how they are made. Let us put aside altogether the question of the returned soldier, because if a returned soldier is available for a position everybody will say, let him have it. The case that I mention is one with which a returned soldier is not concerned at all. None of these men is a returned soldier. Every one is well qualified for the position. Then, take a case in the department of my hon. friend where there is no clerical work to do and no examination. How do the commission arrive at a decision where there are two or three parties applying for the same position?

Mr. REID (Grenville): There is no trouble about that. Take a small port in Nova Scotia. There are several applicants for a $300 position. The commission suggests that the inspector go to the place, examine the applicants, take their papers and send them back to the commission. Then, the commission may decide which man they believe is the best. In addition to that the inspector himself can examine the applicants after the Civil Service examination has taken place. It is no trouble for the Civil Service Commission to hold an examination in several places in Nova Scotia. In a small place where the salary is only a few hundred dollars they can depend on the inspector examining the applicants and making a report as to their qualifications.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): In the case to which my hon. friend from Guysborough refers, the position of harbour master of Canso, of which I have no knowledge, the Civil Service Commission would ask for applicants. An application form would give the age, previous occupation, and qualifications of each applicant and he would also be required to give three references. If they did not seek advice from any other source they would arbitrarily decide which of the applicants would seem to be the best qualified for the position. It may be a very arbitrary method of reaching a decision but that is what they do. In the case of appointments to the post office, particularly rural post office, the commission always seek the assistance of the inspector for the province. I imagine that in most cases the inspector would make some personal inquiry himself before advising the commission. In the case of a harbour master I do not think there would be any provincial official with whom the commission could communicate.

Mr. FIELDING: Returning for a moment to the question of salary increases in the outside service, my hon. friend says they are made on the recommendation of the commissioner, the assistant commissioner and the inspector. In regard to the minor offices throughout the country the commissioner could not really know anything about them except by correspondence and the assistant commissioner would be no better off. The only official who would have any knowledge of the efficiency and the services rendered by these various officers would be the inspector. Can we assume that such increases are always made on the recommendation of the inspector?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The commissioner would have some knowledge of the amount of work in connection with these offices from the reports sent to the department.

Mr. FIELDING: Of the volume of business.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I mean the volume of business. Returns are sent to the department of the clearances of vessels and the work performed in the different ports. You might have a case where an officer might probably have received $150 at the time he took the position and when there would be only a dozen clearances during the year. But the work would have increased very much at that particular port. We would have that information in addition to the report of the inspector himself.

Then, of course, the inspector would be better able to judge because there are places where, although the record did not show much business done, the person appointed as preventive officer might have to travel over a long piece of coast in order to prevent smuggling. In the gulf of St. Lawrence there are cases of that kind, and the inspector would know what work the man was performing and be able to make a report concerning it. The commissioner would have to depend a great deal on the information which he gets in this way, and upon his own knowledge of conditions when he placed an official at certain work. I do not know any other way in which an estimate could be arrived at. This is what has been depended upon in adjusting the salaries under the rule for the last twenty-five or thirty years. Now the Civil Service Commission are endeavouring to see whether they cannot introduce an improvement, under which the officials in the outside service throughout the Dominion would be placed on a more satisfactory basis.

Mr. FIELDING: I quite agree with my hon. friend when he says that the revenue is not to be the only measure of usefulness. There are many places throughout our coast line where the collection of revenue would be small, but the service is important because of its preventive character, and if you did not have these officers there the revenue would lose a great deal. But the point I was coming to is, how the minister and his officials, whose good purpose I am perfectly satisfied with, can obtain any knowledge of the operations on the coast except through the inspector, and I am leading up in my own mind to the question whether these things are done through the inspector or otherwise. If my hon. friend says it is done through the inspector, I think that is a fair answer.

Mr. REID (Grenville): We have a report from the collector of the port as well as from the inspector. In the province of Nova Scotia, as in the other Maritime Provinces, all these officials in the out ports are under one particular collector who makes a report to the commissioner of the work performed by each. It is the only way that I can see whereby we can come to a conclusion as to what is fair and right in the matter of remuneration. There may possibly be cases where there has not been absolutely fair treatment, but I think while I was administering the department the officials as a rule were satisfied that the staff was being fairly treated, and I believe that policy will be continued.

Mr. McKENZIE: With respect to the vacancy in the port where I live, did I understand the minister to say it is not intended to fill it?

Mr. MACLEAN: I remember having a communication from some person in North Sydney many months ago in respect to this position, and I was informed upon inquiry, I think by the Customs Department, that it was considered unnecessary to fill it.

Mr. McKENZIE: This man McLeod was the customs officer at the railway station, and another officer may have been transferred to take his place. If that is so, I have nothing to say, but there should be an officer there.

Customs: — Miscellaneous — Printing and stationery, subscriptions to commercial papers, etc., $200,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a large increase here. To what is it due?

Mr. REID (Grenville): It represents the regular increase based on the higher cost of materials and labour.

Customs:—To provide for expenses and maintenance of revenue cruisers and preventive service, $105,000.

Mr. DUFF: What is the reason for the increase here?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The Customs Department had a large steamer, the Margaret. It was a new boat and had only arrived on this side of the Atlantic a few months before the war broke out. The Naval Department requisitioned the steamer and took it to Halifax where it was placed on service in adjacent waters. This vessel has now been brought back and re-commissioned for her regular route.

Mr. DUFF: How many steamers are there engaged in this service, and what work do they perform?

Mr. REID (Grenville): This vote covers other vessels besides the Margaret. If I remember aright, we bought a steamer for cruising operations around Sydney. I can recall a discussion which took place with reference to that vessel when I was Minister of Customs.

Mr. McKENZIE: That was the Alert.

Mr. REID (Grenville): That was the Alert. There is no danger now of illicit operations because importations of liquor are prohibited.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the Alert still sailing the seas?

Mr. REID (Grenville): Yes.

Mr. DENIS: How many of these revenue cruisers are there?

Mr. REID (Grenville): There are the Margaret, Alert, Winamac and Zaidee.

Mr. DENIS: This item is also for preventive service. Are we to understand that the preventive service is carried on exclusively by the revenue cruisers, or is it done by other means?

Mr. REID (Grenville): This vote also provides for the salaries of the chief preventive officer, Mr. Wilson, and his staff, and their expenses.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Will the minister say if the vacancy created at Boylston by the dismissal of an officer some time ago has been filled?

Mr. REID (Grenville): I cannot find the names of any Government officer at Boylston.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I am told there was an officer there, but he was dismissed.

Mr. REID (Grenville): There is no officer there now.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is there any intention of appointing one?

Mr. REID (Grenville): No.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. minister inform me as to the duty of the preventive service in a case like the following: According to press reports a large cargo of whisky, or alcohol and white whisky, was wrecked on the coast of Nova Scotia and considerable quantities of it were taken inland and cached; some of it has since been discovered. Does the preventive service operate at sea to prevent smuggling; does the Customs Department get any revenue out of this liquor when it is found; and are they taking any steps to find it, or are they going to leave it to Nova Scotia?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The vessels that I have just mentioned are employed in that service and it is the duty of officers in command to seize any such liquors. I noticed that item in the newspapers. The people who cached that whisky did so before the preventive officers arrived on the scene, otherwise they would not have had a chance to seize it.

Mr. MORPHY: Is it too late now to get the revenue from that cargo?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The whisky is gone; that is the trouble.

Mr. MORPHY: I suppose the preventive authorities will take care of that?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sure it is the intention of the hon. minister to have an efficient service from those boats.

Mr. REID (Grenville): Oh, yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I take it for granted that wherever he is paying out public money for the preventive service it is his intention to get value for it? I would like to find out something about the Alert—not the old stories they used to tell about her, for I believe she has quite reformed and is leading a much better life, and far it be from me to remind her of her old sins. But suppose a steamer is attempting to smuggle liquor from St. Pierre, which is a little island only sixty miles from our coast where they have the right, under the law of France, to handle liquor, I presume the Alert is maintained for the purpose of preventing that smuggling, and is presumed to have sufficient speed to overhaul any steamer trying to get away from her. I would like to know the horse-power of the Alert, her age, tonnage, and particularly her speed, and also some information about her seaworthiness, because I am told that the Alert is not of much use beyond lying in harbour and cruising on fine days when the sea is very, very calm, and that when it comes to chasing she cannot chase herself very far. I think men who have very fast boats and know they can outsail the Alert go over to St. Pierre, load up with liquor and smuggle it into the locality. I would like the minister to make inquiry and see whether he is getting value for the money he is paying for the maintenance of this boat.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I will be very glad to do that. Of course, it was difficult to get any steamer during the last two or three years. The officials say the Alert has been doing good work in preventing smuggling in that locality.

Mr. McKENZIE: If they are ready to give me information I will be delighted to hear of one thing the Alert has done.

Mr. REID (Grenville): The hon. member will remember, when she did good work according to his statement. The hon. member will remember the trip which he discussed in this House.

Mr. McKENZIE: Oh, yes. This is a new Parliament; perhaps they did not hear about that. The hon. member knows that she was in this service at that time and he was paying the salaries of the crew. Under his supervision she was permitted to load with rum at North Sydney, and it was used for corrupting the electorate in the northern part of Victoria county. That is the service she rendered.

Mr. REID (Grenville): The hon. member said she did well. A few minutes ago the leader of the Opposition brought up a question as to whether there were any licensed bonded warehouses in Nova Scotia, and the statements I made in answer were what I had from the Customs Department, which were correct. However, I communicated with the Inland Revenue Department in order to see whether there might be any possibility of bonded warehouses under that department. I now have an official of the Inland Revenue Department beside me. Of course, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) will understand that I know nothing of the Inland Revenue Department so far as its administration is concerned. The Assistant Commissioner of Inland Revenue tells me that in Nova Scotia there are the following bonded warehouse licenses issued by the Inland Revenue Department: John A. McKay, New Waterford; Pius Gannon, North Sydney; A. S. Taylor, Glace Bay; The P. Doherty Co., Ltd., Sydney; H. Conter, New Waterford; G. Martinello Co., Ltd., Sydney; Mayflower Bottling Co., Ltd., Sydney; King Bottling Co., Glace Bay; John A. McRae, Glace Bay; Michael Nolan, Glace Bay; Mendel Maganet, Glace Bay; Felix Dipenta, Sydney; G. Martinello Co., Ltd., Sydney. The Assistant Commissioner tells me that these parties had licenses issued to them prior to the passing of the Order in Council prohibiting the importation or sale of liquor throughout the Dominion of Canada.

They had a quantity of liquor in store, and the licenses were extended simply in order that they might hold the liquor in store. Instructions were sent to the officials of the Inland Revenue Department that those people were not to be allowed to take in any more liquor than what was in store at the time the licenses were granted, and they were to hold it until they could export the liquor or dispose of it in accordance with the laws of Nova Scotia. The liquor had to be exported or sold or destroyed; it was not allowed to be disposed of in any other way. I think the hon. member will agree with me that the information I had from the Customs Department is correct, and if the information the hon. member has given to the House is correct, namely, that some of these bonded warehouses are allowing liquor to be put into them in violation of the law—because they cannot accept it in accordance with the law—then some official or officials in the Inland Revenue Department or some officers who have charge of the keys of the bonded warehouses must be in collusion with those who own the bonded warehouses. The statement of the hon. member in regard to the bonded warehouses is very serious, and it is the duty of the Inland Revenue Department to investigate every bonded warehouse in Nova Scotia and other places where there are bonded warehouses in order to find out whether there is any truth in his statement. If those bonded warehouses are in existence, some means should be taken to see that the liquor is exported or destroyed or disposed of in the province legally, and those bonded warehouses should be got rid of at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The bonded warehouses mentioned by the minister are all in the island of Cape Breton. Can he give us the names of owners of bonded warehouses on the mainland of Nova Scotia?

Mr. REID (Grenville): McCullough and Creelman, Truro; the National Drug and Chemical Company, Halifax. The latter have a bonded warehouse for medicine. No others appear on the list in Nova Scotia. Something may not be altogether right in the list I have given, but we shall have a thorough investigation into all those bonded warehouses. I promise the hon. member I will send one of our best officials to investigate the whole situation in the bonded warehouses in Nova Scotia, as well as in bonded warehouses in other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I understand a reference was made to an extension of the licenses. Have they been extended, and if so, for what period of time? How much intoxicating liquor was there in those warehouses at the time the prohibition Order in Council was passed and that extension was given, and how much is there now?

Mr. REID (Grenville): I cannot this evening give the hon. member that information. Those licenses were granted a year ago, and the assistant commissioner of Inland Revenue tells me that the minister in charge of the department informed him that those licenses will not be renewed; that the parties who have those licenses must, prior to the expiry of them, dispose of the liquor, either by exporting it or by disposing of it in the province legally. Otherwise the liquor will be destroyed .

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): When were those licenses issued?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The first of April a year ago.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Was not the Prohibition Order in Council passed a year ago?

Mr. REID (Grenville): I do not remember the date now. Even if it were passed about that time, if a large quantity of liquor was stored in those warehouses, the licenses would have to be renewed.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I understood the minister to say, at some period in this discussion, that the licenses were renewed. Are we to understand that they were new licenses that were given to those people within the year, or were they licenses that were renewed?

Mr. REID (Grenville): They were old licenses that had been in existence prior to April 1, 1918, and that were renewed. None of those was a new license issued either by the Minister of Customs or by myself within the last year.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): When will those licenses expire?

Mr. REID (Grenville): On the 31st of March, and they cannot and will not be renewed without the consent of the Government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I suppose the minister has, in his department, information as to the quantity of liquor that was stored in those bonded warehouses a year ago and also the quantity there now.

Mr. REID (Grenville): An officer of the department has a full record of what was there at the time and what has been disposed of since, and he should be able to put his hand on it in five minutes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Will the minister give that information to the House when his Estimates are taken up again?

Mr. REID (Grenville): Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is, in my part of the country, a general impression that liquor was put into those bonded warehouses for a purpose. Notice was given by the Government that on a certain date a certain Order in Council would be passed, and there was a most desperate rush to get hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of liquor into those bonded warehouses in Nova Scotia, although the people who shipped it in had a full knowledge that the Order in Council would be in force on a certain date. The impression is that, by some influence or another brought to bear upon the department, those licenses were either renewed or permitted to exist under those circumstances after those places were filled to the rafters improperly and illegally, and with the full knowledge that the Order in Council was to be passed. There is a feeling abroad amongst the temperance people in that part of the country that is not at all amicable to the department, because the officials of the department are blamed, justly or not, with being in league with those parties and helping them to move their liquor into those places from which it is being doled out. It cannot get out except when an officer is there. All those people who have those licenses are old-time rum sellers, and it is the most extraordinary thing that only such people have those licenses, when for the last ten years, indeed, for the last twenty years there has been no permission to sell liquor in that province. We had the Scott Act in 1910, and the minister knows how old the Scott Act is. For the last thirty years, I might say, there have been no means of selling liquor in the county of Cape Breton except illegally.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I am glad of the discussion this evening. I am satisfied, from what the assistant commissioner tells me, that everything has been done to prevent illegalities in all the provinces. The prohibition order came into force about the middle of March last year, and I have no doubt that large quantities were shipped in immediately prior to that. People would import it in the hope of selling it to the local governments for medicinal purposes, for instance. Of course, attempts are made in different parts of Canada to violate the law. The result of this discussion to-night will be vigorous efforts on the part of officers of the department to ascertain just what is going on and to take greater precautions, if that be possible. When the stocks in these bonded warehouses are disposed of, the licenses will be cancelled, and no more will be issued.

Mr. READ (Prince, P.E.I.): How many of these bonded warehouses are there in Prince Edward Island, and what are the names of the parties controlling them?

Mr. REID (Grenville): There are none in Prince Edward Island for liquor; only for tobacco.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I suppose these licenses and the renewals are in writing? When the minister brings down the information that has been asked for, I should also like to know what was the quantity of liquor stored in these warehouses at the time the licenses were issued, also the quantity on hand at the present time; and the form of license, so that we can see the conditions under which the sales are to be made.

Mr. REID (Grenville): I will bring down that information, and will also give it personally to my hon. friend and to the leader of the Opposition, because it is in that part of the country where a large number of these warehouses are. If we ascertain the quantity on hand when prohibition came into effect, and the quantity now on hand, we shall be able to find out whether there has been any collusion or not, so far as those figures will show; but it must be remembered that if there has been collusion the parties would probably try to cover it up. At all events, I shall bring down the information.

Excise—Travelling expenses, rent, fuel, stationery, etc., $100,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What accounts for this increase?

Mr. REID (Grenville): It is on account of the extra expense in travelling, hotel bills and so forth.

Excise—Stamps for imported and Canadian tobacco, $125,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): What does this item for stamps mean?

Mr. REID (Grenville): It is for printing.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is not all the printing done under contract with the Finance Department?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The Finance Department have a contract with the American Bank Note Company, but this department pays for its share of the stamps.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Has a settlement ever been made with the merchants in connection with the stamps on matches? There was a good deal of confusion in connection with the new law. It was not clearly understood when it was coming into effect, and the dealers were instructed to stamp all the matches they had in stock at a certain date. Some of them did so, at a considerable expense. Then they discovered that the Act was not to come into force until some weeks later, and that they had spent their money needlessly. I understood that a refund was to be made. Has the department ever settled with these people?

Mr. REID (Grenville): The Assistant Commissioner tells me that all these cases have been settled satisfactorily.

Excise—Preventive service—Salaries, $110,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How does the minister account for this decrease?

Mr. REID (Grenville): Distilleries have been closed up, and not so many officers are employed.

Mr. DUFF: Have many seizures of illicit stills been made by the department?

Mr. REID (Grenville): Since prohibition has come into force the seizures have increased by 1,100 per cent.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Has the department appointed any officers whose duty it is to look after these illicit stills?

Mr. REID (Grenville): Now that the illicit stills have increased by 1,110 per cent, the hon. gentleman can readily understand that it takes more officers to hunt them down than were required before prohibition came into effect. The department is doing everything it can to put an end to these illicit stills. If it were not for these illicit stills, we could get along with considerably fewer officers.

Mr. DUFF: Where are these illicit stills located? How many seizures have been made?

Mr. REID (Grenville): In Ontario there are 37; in Quebec, 25; in New Brunswick, 1; in Nova Scotia, 3; in Manitoba, 6; in Alberta, 13; in Moosejaw, 7; in Vancouver, 11; in Victoria, 2.

Mr. READ (Prince): Are there any in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. REID (Grenville): No. The seizures were ten last year, and this year 110.

Excise—To enable the department to supply methylated spirits to manufacturers, the cost of which will be recouped by the manufacturers to whom it is supplied and to pay rent, power, freight, salaries, etc., $400,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is the desire to have this item of $400,000 stand.

Mr. REID (Grenville): Then the whole item will have to stand.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any great urgency about these votes for excise? We need not go over it all again. The Chairman will remember that we have discussed it all except this item of $400,000. I am willing that the next, $500, shall be dealt with and carried.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What became of Mr. Vincent, Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue?

Mr. REID (Grenville): There is now only one deputy minister. Mr. Vincent was given his salary of $5,000 for this year and is receiving the salary of deputy minister as in the Estimates.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 11.03 p.m.

Monday, March 31, 1919.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY RECEIVERSHIP.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I beg to lay upon the table of the House, Mr. Speaker, certain information asked for in connection with the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, consisting of the following documents and correspondence:

(a) Copies of the important correspondence passing between Grand Trunk officials and members of the Government in connection with the negotiations that were carried on;

(b) Copies of communications between the Receiver and officials of the Grand Trunk Pacific;

(c) Copies of certain communications that have passed between Grand Trunk officials and the Government since the passing of the Order in Council;

(d) Copies of the Order and an amending Order dated March 13, 1919;

(e) Balance sheets of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and of its subsidiary companies, and statements of revenue and expenditure of the system.

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1919-20.

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further Supplementary Estimates for the year ending Mach 31, 1920, was presented by Sir Thomas White (Acting Prime Minister), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT 1908.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 40, (letter G of the Senate), intituled: "An Act to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1908." He said: This is a Bill from the Senate. Its purpose is to remedy a defect in the Code whereby officers in charge of the enforcement of these provisions were not subject to the ordinary restraints against bribery.

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): With your leave, Mr. Speaker, in view of the adoption of daylight saving by several of our municipalities, and in view of the change in the time table of the railway systems of this country, might I ask the Acting Prime Minister what the Government intends to do in the matter having regard to the vote of this House last week?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): The Inside and Outside Civil Service has always conformed to local municipal regulations with regard to time. Therefore the Civil Service will, so far as practicable, conform to local time as established by municipal regulation.

With regard to the sessions of Parliament, which now begin every afternoon at three o'clock, except upon Wednesdays, when the session begins at two o'clock standard time, it has not yet been intimated to the Government what official action will be taken by the city of Ottawa;—that we shall know by to-morrow.

We also desire to await the decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners on the question of railway time tables, which will be before it for consideration to-morrow. The House will therefore meet to-morrow by standard time, as it has met to-day. After we have received official information as to the action taken by the City of Ottawa and the decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners, I shall announce to the House the course which will be suggested by the Government with respect to the hour of the meeting of Parliament, having regard to the convenience of members.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I should like to ask a question concerning another aspect of this matter. Railway corporations undoubtedly have the right to change their time tables, but has the Government considered what authority these corporations have for changing the time?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That question is at present before the Board of Railway Commissioners for determination.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They may change their time tables, but not the time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand that it is the question of change of time tables that is before the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it the question of time tables, or the question of a change of time on the part of the railway companies? Any railway system may change its time table, but they may not change the time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The railways have changed the time and that question will come before the Board of Railway Commissioners to-morrow for determination as they may deem proper.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. GAUVREAU.

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): I rise to a question of privilege. In Friday's Hansard I am reported as follows, in connection with the Bill brought down by the Minister of Railways (Hon. J. D. Reid) to provide compensation to Government employees who are killed or injured:

> I should like to see this Bill pass, and the only provision to which I take exception is that providing that "for the future" dependents will be paid.

If Hansard had reported me as saying just the reverse, Mr. Speaker, it would have reported me correctly, because the Minister of Railways is my witness that I helped him to pass the Bill. What I said was that if only for the sake of that very provision to which Hansard reports me as taking objection, I should be glad to support the Bill. I am sorry to have been reported as I was, because many railway employees in my riding will get the impression that I objected to the clause providing for future dependents.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will see that the necessary correction is made.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT DEFAULTERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GAUVREAU: Is the Acting Minister of Justice aware of the feeling of unrest which prevails throughout the country because of the imprisonment of young men who are unable to pay the $500 fine imposed by the last Order in Council with reference to defaulters under the Military Service Act? Is it the intention of the Government to take less drastic steps in this matter or to grant a general amnesty to all concerned?

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): The Government is not aware, so far as I know, of any very general unrest in this connection. The question of amendment of the regulations and of the law is, of course, one thing, while the question of amnesty or clemency is another. Certain well-defined rules have been adapted on the latter subject, which, I think, do not err on the side of being too drastic. The matter of amendment to the law is not under immediate consideration.

PAYMENTS TO SIR CHARLES FITZPATRICK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I desire to read to the House a letter which I have received from Right Honourable Sir Charles Fitzpatrick:

March 29, 1919.

Sir:

Mr. Edward's resolution

In view of the statement which you made to the House, Wednesday last, and which is clearly correct in fact and in law, namely, that the money provided by the two votes in 1915-16 and 1916-17 was paid to me by way of special allowance, was received by me in good faith, and was legally and regularly so paid in monthly payments by the officers of the Finance Department upon the authorization of the Auditor General, and in view of the fact that some members of the House state that they understood the two votes in question in a sense different from that which their language clearly bears and from the sense in which I understood and was justified in understanding it, I enclose herewith my cheque for five thousand dollars in your favour as Acting Prime Minister to be paid over to the Dominion Treasury.

Yours truly,

C. Fitzpatrick.

The Hon. Sir Thomas White, K.C.M.G.,
Acting Prime Minister,
Ottawa, Ont.

I have received the cheque in question and have endorsed it over to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada.

PROGRESS OF DEMOBILIZATION.

SIBERIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE RETURNING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia): As a matter of public interest I wish to advise the House as to the progress of demobilization up to date.

So far during the month of March we have moved from overseas and demobilized 42,232 soldiers and 4,850 dependents. In addition to that, 8,078 soldiers are now on the ocean.

Since the date of the armistice, up to and including to-day, including five ships now on the ocean, we have brought back 109,248 soldiers. Including those in Canada we have demobilized since November 11, the date of the armistice, 164,621 men.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): The minister told the House the other day that our soldiers in Siberia would probably be returned at an early date. Have any steps been taken in that direction?

Major-General MEWBURN: I did announce that. Arrangements have been completed for the return of the Canadian Siberian Expeditionary Force. I shall be very glad to give the hon. member private information on the subject; we have been requested by the War Office not to specify the exact date of their return.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DEMERS:

How many men in pursuance of the Military Service Act of 1917, have been conscripted and sent to the front?

Major-General MEWBURN: The number of those who went to the front is not available at present, but the number sent overseas, 47,509.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many police officers were employed by the Government in the county of Richmond in

2. E. McIver, $3 per day, Richmond; G. H. Moore, $3 per day, Richmond; W. J. Ewing, $3 per day, Richmond; G. M. Hall, $3 per day, Bishop's Crossing; F. Barlow, $3 per day, Danville; J. J. Barlow, $3 per day, Danville; H. S. Brown, $3 per day, Danville.

4. The Provost Marshal.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many police officers were employed by the Government in the County of Wolfe in connection with the administration of the Military Service Act, 1917?

2. What were their names, and how much salary did each one receive?

3. Are they still employed?

4. Upon whose recommendation were they appointed?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. The number on duty in this area on date of disbandment was —4 men employed, 3 at Danville and 1 at Bishop's Crossing, both places being shown as Richmond and Wolfe. Previous to this, the numbers varied according to requirements, and the personnel at times changed.

CIVIL SERVICE POSITIONS.

MOTION BY MR. McCURDY THAT WOUNDED SOLDIERS BE GIVEN PREFERENCE.

Mr. F. B. McCURDY (Colchester) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Civil Service Act should be amended so that, while having full regard to efficiency, a preference in appointments to the public service shall be afforded to members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who have become casualties in a theatre of war.

He said: All hon. members know that from 1914 to 1917, while appeals were being pressed on the manhood of Canada to voluntarily enlist in the military forces, undertakings both direct and implied were given from every recruiting platform to those who were being urged to join. Intending recruits were assured that, come good, come ill, Canada would see that after the war every reasonable consideration would at all times be afforded to those who responded to the call. I confidently state that these commitments were made with the practically unanimous consent of all Canada. And furthermore, were a similar world condition to confront Canada to-morrow, and should it become necessary to raise a large army by voluntary enlistment, I have no doubt that similar undertakings would again unhesitatingly be given.

The Government has not been at all idle in preparing to honour the country's obligations. It has created a good deal of machinery designed to facilitate the return of the soldier to civil life. It has provided medical and instructional services, established an elaborate pensioning system, and is now engaged in the establishment of a Soldiers' Land Settlement organization. But much remains to be done, and it must be particularly remembered that the best results can be assured only when all agencies dealing with the problem are fully or-ordinated and harmonized. For the purpose at which this resolution is aimed, the practice of the Civil Service Commission must undoubtedly be in concord with the policy of the Government.

Quite recently I was requested to make inquiry of the Civil Service Commission regarding the appointment of an officer in the public service in Nova Scotia. In response to notices sent out by the Commission two applications had been lodged. Both were from discharged soldiers, one having got as far as England and from there returned to Canada for discharge, while the other, who had been wounded in France, had incurred a permanent partial disability of his left hand. Somewhat to my surprise I learned that, in practice, both these classes of returned soldiers were regarded by the Commissioners as possessing equal claims to appointment so far as their service records were concerned. That, the Commissioners advised, was the interpretation placed on the Civil Service Act. While we all appreciate the admirable spirit that impelled those who did not get further than England—as it did others—to enlist, it is undoubtedly in the public mind that those active service men who have sacrificed and suffered most best deserve preferment at the Government's hands. I am advised that in view of the decision of the Civil Service Commissioners, any alteration or rectification in cases such as I have referred to can be effected only by amendment to the Civil Service Act.

I will not give any opinion as to whether or not the Civil Service Commission are correctly interpreting the Civil Service Act, or whether or not they are following the policy of the Government in this matter. If they are facilitating a Government policy, then I am bound to say that in my opinion the Government has not correctly interpreted the opinion of hon. members of this House. Indeed, if the Civil Service Act really bore the interpretation that the Commission has placed upon it I feel that the Government would have been supported by this House in altering by Order in Council under the War Measures Act this detail in order that the most deserving class should be fully protected. However, what is past is gone, and I am advised that it will largely meet the present situation if hon. members will support the resolution proposed. To them I confidently appeal.

In urging the particular claims of those who have become casualties, I do not for a moment wish to prejudice the rights,—already acknowledged by statute,—of any other one who has been on active service. I am satisfied that the purpose can be accomplished without creating any injustice anywhere.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would ask: Is it not eminently fitting that, efficiency granted, the public service of Canada should, to as great an extent as possible be carried on by those who have already served their country in a vastly more difficult and sterner field of activity? And, as a matter of course, those who in the discharge of their military duties had incurred physical disabilities would, I take it, be as gladly supported for preference by the public generally, as they are by their equally gallant but more fortunate unwounded comrades.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Would there be any objection to extending the resolution to include Canadians who have served in the British Expeditionary Force and in the Air Service?

Mr. McCURDY: I see no objection.

Mr. DANIEL LEE REDMAN (Calgary East): As I said some time ago, the main problem underlying the demobolization of our returned soldiers is that of employment. This is a duty which the people of Canada must seriously consider, if we are to avoid any difficulties with our returned men. The Government must also regard it as a duty which they owe these men, because they were instrumental in sending them overseas. When the State undertakes the disposition of certain classes of its citizens in various fields of activity, and, as in this case, send men to war, they must assume responsibility for the care of those who return with disabilities that handicap or prejudice them in the occupations which they formerly followed.

I think, further, that it is perfectly reasonable to say that returned soldiers should go into the Civil Service. Ordinarily, we do not recommend our friends to go into the Civil Service, but men who have been overseas for the last three or four years, who have suffered somewhat in their mental capacity because of their experiences and the shocks which they have received, or who have suffered physical disabilities, require that sense of security and steadiness which can be obtained in the Civil Service, perhaps, to a greater extent than any other line of activity in Canada. The Government, as the hon. member who has just spoken has stated, has given promises in that regard and I feel that the Government will take exactly the same view of this matter that they took when they made those promises.

I have no fault to find with the administration of the Civil Service Commission, but I do say that the Civil Service Act is not as well suited as it might be to the purpose of giving to returned men employment in the Civil Service. That Act was passed last year. I think I am correct in saying that every hon. member of this House is anxious that all returned soldiers who desire to enter the Civil Service, having regard to the efficiency of the service, should be given that opportunity. I think the House will be willing to consider how the Act passed last year has fulfilled the desire of the House and the country in regard to the employment in the Civil Service of returned soldiers. Previous to the passing of this Act, and under the old patronage system, every member gave the positions coming under his control to returned men. Under the old system the member was amenable to the pressure of public opinion and he was directly responsible to the returned soldiers and to the people in his own community. Did that system still obtain, returned soldiers would to-day have practically all the positions in the Civil Service which become vacant. But, under the Civil Service Act, that element of responsibility on the member of Parliament has been eliminated.

We might look for a moment to see what the results have been under the Civil Service Act since that Act has been in force. We find by the figures which have been issued by the Civil Service Commission itself, that the following appointments have been made since the Act came into force:—

Permanent	1,672
Temporary	14,570
Total	16,242

Of that 16,242 appointments made in one year 1,834 were returned soldiers. I must say in fairness to the commissioners that a large number of these appointments were stenographers which is a class of employment in which the soldier does not as a rule compete. However, I think that these figures in themselves are a fair indication of the truth of what I say. I do not believe that the returned soldiers are getting a sufficient number of positions in the Government service under the Civil Service Act which Parliament passed last year. The first point in the Act which I think might well be amended is this. It is provided by paragraph (a) of section 39 of the Civil Service Act that soldiers who have obtained sufficient marks in examination to pass shall be placed on the list at the head of all other candidates.

While it is true that many civilians are being appointed to positions in the Civil Service, the Commission have been doing what they could to provide soldiers with the necessary qualifications with positions. But, especially in the West advertisements come out only a day or so ahead of the time that a man must send in his return in order that it may be received within the prescribed limit of time. We have coming back to Canada some 500,000 men and I do not think I will be going too far when I ask this House to put it up to the Civil Service Commission to confine the appointment of male employees to returned soldiers. If that were put up to them they would know exactly where they stood, and they could send out the notices as to vacancies earlier. They might use the machinery of the Soldiers Civil Re-Establishment department, act through their labour representative in each district and get in touch with the returned soldier who might be available so that when a position is open a soldier will be ready for it. We might amend this Act for one year; or, we might amend it from year to year so that the condition would not extend for a longer time than was necessary, but for one year at least we might provide that none but returned soldiers should be allowed to compete in an examination where male employees are required. That is the first proposition I would make. Perhaps some honourable members may think that in proposing that I am going too far, but even if they take that viewpoint I would say to them that such a position would be much easier to maintain than the present position, which is certainly not going far enough.

Under section 15 of the Civil Service Act it is provided that the Civil Service Commission may appoint to positions requiring technical or professional knowledge without examination. That refers to positions requiring the knowledge of some profession or some other kind of technical knowledge. The Commission themselves, I must say, have gone as far as they could under that provision. They are not appointing without competitive examination all the people requiring technical or professional knowledge but they are as far as possible holding competitive examinations under that section. But there are under that clause, positions which are being filled without any examination and when no examination is held no preference is given returned soldiers. The Stead case, which was discussed in the House a few days ago, came under section 15 of the Act. While a competitive examination is required for all the lower positions in the service, and while it is in this class that preference is given to soldiers, in dealing with technical or professional positions no preference whatever is given to soldiers and we have the Stead case as an illustration of this. In addition to that, in the city of Calgary, we had some time ago, a civilian young man appointed to the position of assistant receiver general. There is no question in the world that a soldier could have been obtained properly qualified and trained to fill that position. Nothing to my mind creates such a feeling of distrust or sense of unfairness among soldiers as to see a young civilian appointed to a position which a soldier could have filled. Usually that feeling is not manifested on the part of the particular soldier who wanted the position but on the part of other soldiers who have returned and who feel that it is the duty of the Government to provide for those who are not quite so well able to fight their own battles as those who have not suffered the shock of war. If there is any one thing that causes a feeling of distrust on the part of the soldiers, it is the appointment—in violation of the promises which this Government and this Parliament have made—of a civilian to a position which a soldier could have filled.

There is no preference whatever given to the dependents of soldiers. We should not throw the preference open to all relatives of soldiers but there is one class of soldiers' dependents who are well defined, a class who are in effect wards of the State, and that is the class who are obtaining pensions. By paying them pensions we admit that their male relatives, on whom they are dependent for support, have either been killed or have received such injuries in the war that these dependents have been deprived of their means of support. I think that this Act should contain a clause that those soldiers' dependents who are receiving a pension should be put in the same class as soldiers in competitive examinations and have the same preference as they have. In the case of soldiers there really is no age limit because any one who has been admitted into the army has to undergo a medical examination and is pronounced quite fit and able to carry on, but as to dependents there would have to be an age limit.

Another point that has created a great deal of difficulty is that of promotion. Section 45 of the Act provides that :

> Vacancies shall be filled, as far as consistent with the best interests of the Civil Service, by promotion.

Now we must all admit that promotions within the Civil Service should be a very tower of strength to it—that is to say, the hope of promotion should inspire the civil servant with ambition, and with the desire to do better work. But the soldiers' viewpoint is this: Under the present Civil Service Act practically every higher position in the Civil Service is being filled by promotion, and when we explain that to the soldiers they say. "When we went away, these positions used to be filled on the recommendation of the local member; you tell us that you are going to give all vacant positions to soldiers; and yet you ask us to consider a scheme whereby you argue us out of these appointments, and the only positions we can get to-day in the Civil Service are the very lowest ones, and not all of those." In Calgary a famous case came up—famous as far as I was concerned because even yet, although it happened a year and a quarter ago, protests against that appointment have not ceased. That was an appointment made to the Banff Park superintendency, which was made clearly in accordance with the Civil Service Act. Previously that position had been filled on the recommendation of the member for the constituency, as I think practically all other appointments in the Outside Service were made. To-day, however, those appointments are made by promotion, and my view is that it would only be fair to the soldiers to say that hereafter these appointments should be given to them, and not only that but they should be eligible for those positions which are now regarded as promotions under the Act. Of course that could only go on for a year or two until the soldiers are absorbed into civil life, and my idea in urging this is that in the meantime the soldiers shall not suffer.

At the present time there are two classes of casualties in the country going to make up the total of two hundred thousand in our Army. The first class consists of those men who were wounded but that recovered to such an extent that their ability to carry on their ordinary work is by no means impaired. The second class consists of those whose wounds have been such as to unfit them in varying degrees to carry on their previous occupation. I feel, as the hon. member who proceeded me felt, that even over other soldiers the preference should be given to these casualties. That class can be very easily defined: they are the class to whom we pay pensions and an exact limit can be placed upon them. Not only should we give them a preference over other soldiers, but I think we should go even further. We should, if necessary, provide positions for these disabled men, not by making new positions, but by granting power to the Civil Service Commission to dismiss, if necessary, young men who had been appointed to the Civil Service since 1914, when war broke out. Let me make my position clear: I think that the Civil Service Commission should have the right to use their best discretion and select for dismissal, as likely to do the least harm, the young unmarried man, who was appointed while the war was in progress, and replace him by a soldier who has been so disabled that he is unable to carry on his previous avocation. That is, perhaps, a drastic proposition to make, but I believe it to be the duty of this Government towards these men who have been disabled in the country's service. I believe the Government can do that without any great amount of unfairness to any individual who was so appointed, and without violating any principle.

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): Will the hon. member kindly define what he means by a "casualty"?

Mr. REDMAN: Technically it means any one who has appeared in the Army Orders as a casualty.

Sir SAM HUGHES: You do not include shell-shocked men in that category.

Mr. REDMAN: No. Such a man is not an offcial casualty. One would have to be a mind reader to determine all such cases.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the point I want to see explained.

Mr. REDMAN: There may be cases that are not casualties that are suffering from these disabilities, and if any way could be devised to include them in the classes of men meriting better treatment, I should be only too pleased.

I have enumerated the different points I had in my mind with respect to this matter. I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not indulging in any criticism of the Government, or of the Civil Service; I am simply pointing out to the House the defects which I think exist in the Act passed last year, defects which should be remedied since we all have the intention of doing full justice to the returned soldier.

I do not think anything which I have suggested will weaken in any way the efficiency of the service. It is rather a question of seeing that those who are more entitled than others to positions in the Civil Service are given that preference to which they deserve. I do not think there is anything to-day which is causing more distrust amongst returned soldiers than the appointment of young civilians to positions in the Civil Service.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I heartily endorse the views expressed by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Redman) and the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy). I would go a little further and broaden the word casualty so as to include those who saw active service in the trenches—that is men who fought in the trenches—because the fact that a man may have got a slight wound in the arm does not give him any better claim to a position over the soldier who fought alongside him for three years and happened to miss being hit. But that is merely a detail, which is covered by the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary.

I want to point out—while I am sorry to see the returned soldiers all looking for Civil Service positions, I would rather see them take their place in the broad fields of life and become more useful citizens to the country than civil servants can possibly become—that the remarks of the gentleman (Mr. Redman) are worthy of most serious consideration. I have been making inquiries throughout the country, as to whether the soldiers who have returned from the trenches have been reinstated in their old positions by the employers, or have taken other work, and with one or two exceptions, where men had been more or less disturbed by shell-shock, I have received most gratifying reports. I was speaking to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) the other night and he mentioned that every man who had returned to his service, and he has many of them, is an infinitely better man than he was before he went overseas. As an old educator I have always been opposed to technical examinations for promotion, and I think that every educator in the country, who has studied the matter, will agree that technical examinations constitute no test of efficiency whatever, or very little. I would like to have the Government consider the matter from that viewpoint, that is, instead of having an applicant examined for a position by gentlemen who know nothing about the qualities of a soldier and mighty little about the duties of the office to which the applicant is aspiring, that these examinations should be limited practically to returned soldiers, and that the commission should give the benefit on every occasion to the returned soldier who is applying. Because, mark my words, the man coming back from the front is a much stronger and better man, nine times out of ten, except by reason of his physical incapacity, than if he had never gone to the war. The best men are those who had gone through the furnace of war

I would also like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that it would be well to have regard to the honourable casualty. There are casualties that are not very creditable but, thank fortune, they are very very few. A friend was telling me about a man who had made a great to-do about getting a position. My friend asked him for his medical sheet and his service record—his crime report; he never got them, and the man ceased applying. He had not been to the front at all. I think it would be well to make sure that we are getting the very best of these splendid fellows appointed to these positions. I thought all these positions were being filled by returned soldiers, and I was very much surprised to hear that that is not being done. I think the returned soldier is entitled to everything that can be given to him. I suggest that the motion should be enlarged so as to take in the men who have served at the front.

Mr. ROBERT JAMES MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): I wish to support the motion of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) and the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Redman). My recollection of the passing of this Civil Service Bill was that if say ten men passed the examination for a Civil Service appointment, and one of those men was a returned soldier, that he, would be given the preference, no matter where he stood on the examination list. If I understood wrongly, then I think such a rule should be put in force.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) made a point during the debate to the effect that the Canadians who had enlisted in the Imperial forces should be considered in filling these positions. I think any resolution to be passed by this House should embrace those men. I believe in filling all these positions with returned men. For instance, supposing in my constituency there is a vacancy in the Civil Service, but there is not in the neighbouring constituency an eligible man, I think some effort should be made to get a returned soldier from some other part of Canada for that position.

There is one little point more or less in connection with this that I would like to mention here. It is in regard to returned soldiers already working in some branch of the Civil Service. In my city at the present time a number of men on the grain inspection staff are laid off after the rush of the season is over. Last year and the year before among the men laid off were a number of returned soldiers. The Great War Veterans' Association opposed this very vigorously, and perhaps they demanded more than the department could see its way to give, because I think the department wanted to be quite fair to these men. On each occasion I brought the case to the notice of the department in charge, and I explained that I thought they should keep on an efficient staff, and that in addition they should keep on, even at a loss, any returned soldiers who were working on that staff. In the past year out of 80 men between Fort William, Port Arthur and Winnipeg, it only meant keeping on some ten or fifteen returned soldiers. That may seem unreasonable, but we as members of this Parliament have been asking the private corporations of this country to do that very thing, and, to be consistent, the least we can do is to ask our Government to do the same. It is too late to remedy this matter this year. No doubt the department acted in good faith on the advice of its officials, but I believe that advice was wrongly given. I told the men who gave this advice in Fort William that I thought they gave it wrongly. They did not mean to be unfair, but they were unfair to the returned soldiers. I hope next year those returned soldiers will be retained in their positions as far as possible. I do not like to go so far as to suggest that other men should be laid off to give positions to returned soldiers, but I do not think returned soldiers should be laid off when we are asking private corporations to retain them.

One word in regard to shell shock, although there has been no extended discussion on that subject. Many men who have suffered from shell shock at the front are just as much casualties as the men who have been wounded. I have seen men come into my dugout in the front line who had seen some man wounded beside them; they were not wounded, but their nervous system was so completely shot to pieces, that they were in a much worse condition perhaps than the wounded man. Many of these cases are marked "shell shock wound" and are given a stripe to denote it, and a very large percentage deserve that stripe. I support very strongly the hon. members for Colchester and Calgary and hope that this resolution will carry.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) has laid a resolution before the House which in fact advances the principle of a preference within a preference. It demands the sympathy of the House with respect to the matters it deals with, and that sympathy will not be any the less by reason of the fact that the resolution has been spoken to by two members of this House, both of whom have done gallant service at the front, and not only have they distinguished themselves there, but they have created a most favourable impression in this House.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that a resolution bearing on this matter was brought down by the hon. member for North Grey in 1916, though it did not go as far as the resolution now under discussion. That resolution read:

> That, in the opinion of this House, in all future appointments to the Civil Service of Canada, preference should be given to those properly qualified candidates who have served with the Canadian Expeditionary Force in the present war.

Although that resolution only spoke of a preference for Canadian soldiers generally, the hon. member who brought the resolution before the House at that time made this statement:

> As all those who return will not be able to secure appointments in the Civil Service, we shall have to create a preferential class among them, and in doing so, no doubt we shall take into consideration the fact that those who have been wounded, but who after a certain time will be able to perform the duties appertaining to civil servants, should be given preferential treatment among those who have served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

The Prime Minister also spoke in that debate and referred to the Order in Council which was passed on November 27, 1917: It is as follows:

> The Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, advise that in making appointments to the Government Civil Service, preference be given to the returned members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, especially those who through disability occasioned by active military service are unable to fill their previous occupations; such appointments to be subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act and to be made with due regard to the capacity of any applicant to discharge the duties of the position to which it is proposed to appoint him.

Subsequently, as hon. members know, a provision was put in the Civil Service Act which, while not going as far, perhaps, as the resolution proposed by my hon. friend, did give general preference to returned soldiers. I sympathize with the view of my hon. friend, supported by the member for Calgary (Mr. Redman) that the policy of the Civil Service Commission should be in accord with the principles enunciated in that provision and laid down by the members who have just spoken. Of course, the mover of the resolution and the member for Calgary must recognize as we all do, the difficulties which surround this question. I am sure that the Civil Service Commission are doing the best they can. Of course, there will be mistakes. Some time ago objection was raised because returned soldiers who were applicants for certain positions were required to show that they had had a number of years' office experience. Lately the regulations have been amended so as to dispense with that requirement where it can be shown that it is not necessary, and that the soldiers are sufficiently experienced in a broad way without requiring that specific number of years' office experience.

There may be a good deal in what the member for Calgary has said with regard to the commission giving proper notice and providing a proper length of time to enable soldiers to take advantage of the opportunity presented to them of getting a position.

As to the question of dependents, I would not like to say very much about that except to remark, in passing, that the dependent as ordinarily construed is one who is really a dependent; if he is able to earn a livelihood, in a sense he would no longer be a dependent. I assume what my hon. friend means that extra sympathy should be shown and attention given to those who are near relatives to soldiers who have seen service.

Mr. REDMAN: When a man receives a pension it means that he has lost certain means of support.

Mr. BURRELL: At all events, that will have full attention and sympathy.

The member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) spoke of examinations and rather deprecated the holding of examinations for technical positions. I can understand the difficulties that might be encountered in that respect. If, for instance, a returned soldier wanted a position in mining, geological or entomological work, it is quite obvious that technical knowledge might be necessary in order to determine his usefulness in that line of work.

I should deprecate as much as the member for Calgary—the practice—I can understand it would arouse resentment if it were generally followed— of appointing young civilians to positions when it was possible to get returned soldiers who could anything like fill the positions. I doubt whether there are any cases where such civilians have been given the preference; where it has been done, the circumstances must have been very exceptional. Having regard to the enormous number of appointments under consideration, I have no doubt that occasional mistakes are made, but I am sure that the Civil Service Commission are in sympathy with the principles laid down in this respect. For myself, I feel, as the House generally does, that no consideration is too great for those men who crossed the seas in order to fight in those days of peril for the perpetuation of our institutions. There have been cases—I am sure my hon. friend would be the last to deny it—where soldiers have been given positions who have made it very difficult for the authorities to retain them because of their having shown little aptitude or desire to do the work; and it has been naturally a painful business to dismiss them by virtue of the fact that they are returned soldiers. Yet in some cases it has been practically impossible to retain such a man because of the manner in which he did the work. On the other hand, employers generally and the public should have the strongest and most abundant sympathy for men who have been wounded, especially, perhaps, for those who have been shell-shocked, and who having been given positions do the very best in them, but who cannot do as well as they might if they were restored to a normal state of health. The vast majority of men who have returned from the front whether wounded or unwounded—and one thinks more sympathetically of those who have been wounded —after facing the stark realities of life and death over there during three or more grim years of war, will not only be bigger men all round, but will, in the long run, do better than ever before in whatever particular class of work they were formerly engaged.

I do not suppose that the mover of the resolution intends to press it to a vote, because the Civil Service Act is going to be amended. Amendments will be brought down within the next few weeks, when these and other points may very well be taken up. In the meantime the attention of the Civil Service Commissioners will be directed to the motion of my hon. friend and to the discussion that has taken place on it. When the amendments are brought down opportunities will be afforded to the mover of the resolution, and to those who have spoken, to press the points on which they have touched.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Before the member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) takes advantage of his right to close this debate or decides whether or not he will withdraw his resolution, I should like to make a few remarks on the matter under discussion.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion this afternoon, more particularly to the remarks of the minister (Hon. Mr. Burrell). When he said that the matter would be taken into sympathetic consideration, he reminded me of a story I read some years ago of a colonel, who, passing down the Strand in London, saw a private of his regiment selling mutton pies by the street side. He stopped and spoke to him, and discovering the condition in which the man was, said: "You have my deepest sympathy"; to which the man replied: "Darn your sympathy; buy a pie." It is not sympathy that the returned soldier wants or that those of us who are speaking this afternoon on his behalf, desire. What he wants is recognition by way of appointment, recognition in the Civil Service, recognition throughout the country.

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: I hope my hon. friend is not arguing that I offered plain sympathy without asserting any intention of doing anything in a practical way, for such is not the case.

Mr. NICKLE: Not at all. I simply want to point out that the matter has really got beyond the point of sympathetic consideration. I regard the problem that confronts the country to-day,—and I trust to make it clear before I sit down,—as one of the most serious that we in Canada, particularly in Ontario, have to face.

The minister is quite correct in saying that an Order in Council was passed on the 27th of November, 1915. But it is to be remembered what the conditions were in this country when that Order in Council was passed. At that time patronage was within the gift, so to speak, of the private member on his recommendation to the Government, which, as a rule, was followed. The Order in Council of 27th November, 1915, stated that preference was to be given to the returned soldiers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, especially those who through disability occasioned by active military service were unable to engage in their previous occupations, such appointments to be subject to the Civil Service Act and to be made with due regard to the capacity of any applicant to discharge the duties of the position to which it was proposed to appoint him. That Order in Council was confirmed by an Order in Council passed on the 12th of October, 1916, which read as follows:

> In making all appointments to the Civil Service, whether in the Inside or in the Outside Service—

The reason why that was put in was this. Some discussion had arisen as to whether the order of the 27th November, 1915, applied to the Outside Service as well as to the Inside. The new order was therefore made to read:

> In making all appointments to the Civil Service, whether in the Inside or in the Outside Service, preference shall be given to those candidates who have served overseas in His Majesty's forces during the present war, and who have been honourably discharged therefrom, especially to those who through disability occasioned by active military service are unable to follow their previous occupations. Heads of departments, deputy-heads of departments and the Civil Service Commission shall within their respective jurisdictions over appointments be responsible for establishing systematic methods for ensuring that such preference is given.

And the Order in Council of the 27th November was repealed. The net effect was this: That the members, who had the right of recommendation to the Government, were told by the Government—because if my memory services me correctly, a copy of these orders was sent to the members—that if a member's recommendation was to be filled it must respect the principle laid down, and I must say that in the great majority of cases the Order in Council last passed really expressed the feeling of hon. members from one end of the country to the other, that the returned man must get the preference, and the one whose capacity had been impaired should be given priority.

But when the Civil Service Act was passed—and most of us were in the House when that Act was passed—I doubt if we fully understood all that was comprised within the four corners of the measure. Section 38, Part III, declared:

> Except as herein otherwise provided..... appointments to positions in the civil service shall be by competitive examination..... in accordance with regulations to be made by the Commission.

Section 39, sub-section 2 says:

> Immediately after each examination, a list of the successful competitors in the case of a competitive examination, and of the successful candidates in order of merit in other examinations shall be made out, and the list of successful competitors and candidates shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

Put briefly, that meant that there were to be two classes of examinations: Those to fill positions where competition was to prevail, in which the honours went to the competitor making the largest number of marks; and secondly, where examinations were held for the filling of more than one position, the candidates with the required minimum number of marks should be entitled to secure recognition. A further proviso was made by paragraph (a) to this effect:

Providing, however, that in all examinations persons who have been on active service overseas on the military or naval forces of His Majesty or of any of the allies of His Majesty during the present war; who have left such service with an honourable record or who have been honourably discharged; and who obtain sufficient marks to pass such examinations, shall, irrespective of the marks they have obtained, be placed in the order of merit on the list of successful candidates above all other candidates.

That meant that in all examinations where a minimum standard was required the returned soldier, provided he received the required minimum number of marks, should be entitled to be placed at the head of the list, and in that order should be entitled to recognition.

Mr. MORPHY: Is not that exactly what the Civil Service Commission are doing?

Mr. NICKLE: If my hon. friend will allow me to proceed I will explain my position in a few moments. The net result of paragraph (a) was this: That where the minimum number of marks was obtained, the soldier should go to the top. But, in part, the difficulties arising at the present time are in connection with professional or technical positions, which, as the hon. member for Calgary states are filled without an examination being held. In that class of cases the Commission have no such regard for what I might call the preferential treatment set out in paragraph (a) of section 39, or by section 45 which established a principle that was not recognized when patronage was in the control of private members. Then, promotion was not an essential of recognization: it was a question of selection, and not necessarily of promotion. But section 45 provided that:

Vacancies shall be filled, as far as is consistent with the best interests of the Civil Service, by promotion.

To put the matter briefly it comes down to this. Where there is an examination, either competitive or otherwise, marks being the determining factor, the returned successful soldier goes to the top of the list, but where it is a question of technical or professional qualification, the Civil Service Act makes no provision for such recognition of the returned or disabled soldier; and where it is a question of promotion, no recognition is given to the returned soldier as such.

Recently I have received from three organizations in my riding three resolutions. The first is a resolution passed on the 11th day of March by the Great War Veterans' Association, and reads as follows:

That this association is of the opinion that the present practice of the Civil Service Commission in not carrying out its avowed policy in dealing with returned men deserves strong condemnation.

Another resolution was passed by the Soldiers' Aid Commission for the city of Kingston, and as you know, Mr. Speaker, the Soldiers' Aid Commission is organized for the express purpose of aiding and obtaining employment for the returned soldier. This resolution reads:

That this branch of the Soldiers' Aid Commission of the province of Ontario should go on record as favouring a change in the existing regulations of the Civil Service Commission, making it possible for returned men to secure government positions and appointments with the least possible amount of difficulty, having due regard for the efficiency of the service; that every opportunity should be given at all times for the returned soldier to qualify for Civil Service positions, and that in the filling of positions rendered vacant by any cause, a returned soldier, all other things being equal, shall have the preference, and shall be given every chance to qualify.

The Army and Navy Veterans' Association also passed a resolution unanimously supporting the resolution as moved in this House this afternoon by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy).

The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) asked me a question a few moments ago, and it was a very, very pertinent question and merits, I think, a careful answer, and I want for the edification of the House as well as of the hon. member to read two sets of letters which I think will make clear that the Civil Service Commission, while they may be endeavouring—to give them every credit—to carry out the principles of the Civil Service Act—are through the details of the regulations and the restriction of sections 15 and 45, not able to implement as fully as the House would desire the rights of the returned soldiers. In reading these letters, I do not intend to give the names of the soldiers mentioned therein. One letter dated December 23, 1918, was written by myself to the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Ottawa:—

Kingston, Ontario,
December 23rd, 1918.

Chairman,
Civil Service Commission,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Roche:

Mr. X. of this city went overseas as a member of the C.E.F. and had the misfortune to lose his right arm close to the shoulder. Prior to going overseas, he had had excellent experience in his father's factory and is thoroughly conversant with the management of men, general manufacturing, and ordinary commercial bookkeeping work and methods. He now desires to devote his energies to something that offers a prospect of advancement. I suggested some position akin to that of assistant postmaster, assistant collector of customs, or other work requiring honesty, energy and application. I wish you would send me the necessary form of application and also advise me if you know of any vacancy. I can speak in the highest terms of the young man who expects shortly to return to England to be married, and is therefore anxious to know something definite in regard to his future.

To which I received the following reply, dated December 27th:—

December 27, 1918.

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge yours of the 23rd on behalf of Mr. X.

I am enclosing you a form of application for temporary employment which Mr. X. might fill in and return to the Commission, so that we may have his name on file in the event of temporary help being requisitioned for by any of the departments in the line for which Mr. X.'s qualifications would fit him.

As you are aware, under the Civil Service Act 1918, all clerical positions of a permanent character must be filled after passing the regular Civil Service examination. We will have a large list of eligibles as a result of our examinations held on the 13th instant. There are other positions, however, of a special or technical character that you no doubt see advertized in the Canada Gazette from time to time and which advertisements are copied into the press of the country and are also sent to public institutions and to all the branches of the Great War Veterans' Associations, etc., which positions do not require the passing of the regular academic examination but are thrown open to public competition and selections are made on merit, returned soldiers of course being given the preference, all other things being equal.

The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) will now realize why I did not answer his question at the moment he asked it. That letter of the Civil Service Commission stipulates a provision that is very detrimental to the returned soldier, namely, that if he has not passed the examination held at the regular period he is prevented from recognition until another examination is held. And as these examinations are held only every two or three months, or, perhaps, every five or six months, the man who came back on the 27th of December, 1918, according to the terms of that letter in so far as I have read it—and I purpose to read it to the end, was denied recognition at least until the next examination was held. Now I shall proceed with the letter:

There is at the present time no request before the Commission to fill such positions as you have mentioned, namely assistant postmaster, assistant collector of customs, etc., but such positions are filled by promotion if there is any person on the staff qualified to fill same. If new appointments of this nature are required to be made, open competition is invited.

The letter is concluded in the formal manner.

As regards recognition by promotion, the gentleman on whose behalf I wrote had no chance whatever unless he began at the bottom, no matter what his capabilities were. Because he had given up a position of ease and affluence and gone to the war, in which he lost an arm, he was in an infinitely more disadvantageous position than the man who remained at home and held his position in the Civil Service. The latter receives promotion, whereas the man who went overseas, was injured and could not resume his former employment, would be obliged to start at the bottom with $500 or $600 a year. The man who stayed at home is promoted to a position that is worth $2,000 or $2,500 a year.

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: Suppose he were an elderly man who could not go overseas, and who could not be expected to do so, should he not be given promotion?

Mr. NICKLE: I will say frankly that I think each case must be considered on its merits in relatinn to the situation that exists at the time. If the man who holds a position in the Civil Service is an aged man with a family, and has given honest and faithful service, while the man desiring recognition is a young man, I think in all fairness the elderly man should get the preference, and if possible the younger man be given the position next vacant. But if a young man holds an important position won by ability and application, and the man returned from overseas is married and has two or three children, the recognition should be given to the man who has been to the front. Underlying this, the broad principle should be that the returned man, particularly if he is capable, should be regarded with singular care and sympathy by this House, by the Government and by the commission. I shall now read another letter writen by me on March 17, 1919, to the Civil Service Commission.

Kingston, Ontario,
March 17, 1919.

The Civil Service Commission,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sirs:—Mr. Y. now lives at X. street, having returned from the front where he went in 1916. For eight months he was laid up with a broken leg and an injured neck as the result of concussion but is now quite himself again.

He desires to be appointed as letter carrier and appears to have all the qualifications that that position would require. As he is married,—his wife and children living here with him—he would prefer an appointment to the Kingston staff, if an opportunity offers but would, if such were not available, go elsewhere. He tells me he sent in an application through the Postmaster over a month ago but has heard nothing in reference to the matter.

Please be good enough to see this letter is filed for reference.

Yours sincerely,

W. F. Nickle.

On March 20, I received this reply:

Ottawa, March 20, 1919.

Dear Sir:

I have your letter of the 17th instant, respecting the case of Mr. Y., a returned soldier, who desires a position as Letter Carrier, if possible in Kingston Post Office. I am sending Mr. Y. an application form asking him to fill out and return it at his convenience. I may add, however, that vacancies are filled as far as possible from the lists of successful candidates at the regular examinations. When these lists are exhausted, however, other applications are considered and I can assure you that Mr. Y's case will be given every attention.

Yours truly,

(Sgd) W. Foran,
Secretary.

Mr. W. F. Nickle, Esq. M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

The net result is that, attaching so much importance to academic qualifications as demonstrated by examinations the returned soldier, if he is here, and successful may go to the top of the list. We are demobilizing men at the rate of 30,000 or 40,000 a month, and these men are not in a position to get recognition in examinations until the regular examination is held. The provision is also made by the Civil Service Act subsection 5 of section 39:

If there remain from a previous examination successful competitors who have not received appointments, their number shall be deducted in making the computation, and their names, in the order of merit, shall be placed at the top of the list to be prepared in accordance with subsection 2 of this section.

In other words if all the positions have been filled and there are ten or twelve civilians unappointed after the first examination, should the Civil Service Commission decide to have a second examination those civilians who were successful at the first examination take priority, although soldiers may have passed in the second examination. I do not believe this was the purport of the legislation passed last session, and the Act should be amended to carry out what was undoubtedly the principle that moved this House, namely that the returned man, particularly when disabled, should be given the preference. Now in regard to the point taken in one of these letters; "all other things being equal," I remember once having heard a shepherd remark that no two sheep were alike, and that he could distinguish each by its face. I think the same thing holds true with men; no two men are exactly alike, neither have they exactly the same qualifications. The difference between some men are remarkable, and between others, trifling. But there is always a difference. If the principle is going to be laid down that the returned soldier shall get the preference only when all other things are equal, it practically means that he will be given no preference at all; because it is only when two men are equally qualified and equally entitled to a position that the returned soldier gets the preference. That nicety of selection simply means that the recognition of priority for the soldier is destroyed. I think there is a tendency to attach too much importance to academic qualifications as demonstrated by marks obtained in examinations. The academic qualification is valuable in that it indicates training and intellectual status.

Academic qualifications are all right as far as they indicate training and intellectual status but they are not all right when you attach so much importance to them that you forget what one might call aptitude, ability and resourcefulness. In the soldier's case the experience that he has had overseas will, in my judgment, in many cases, make him a better man than before he went. I believe that a man who went overseas three or four years ago and who, actively guided by a strong sense of patriotism and a consciousness that he was doing his duty, stood to his post and did his bit as a true soldier has qualifications that you cannot measure by an academic test, and which you cannot judge by his capacity to stand high in an examination in long division or in extracting the cubic root. I would not say that examinations must not be held. I admit that you must test a man's worth in some way and an academic examination is one sort of a test but I would like to see the working out of the Act so changed that when an appointment came up the list that was secured four or five weeks or perhaps seven or eight or perhaps months ago, would not be taken as the list from which the appointment would be made. I believe that some steps should be taken to find out if there were any returned men available who could do this work, even though those men had not made application, and if it was found on inquiry that such a man existed, an opportunity should be given him to demonstrate his worth and, if he satisfied the commission, not necessarily by an academic examination, of his capacity to undertake the job, he should be given the position regardless of the fact that he did not have an opportunity of writing on an examination which was held in the regular course of events.

I think this demand is going to grow in so far as the Civil Service is concerned —I was going to say worse and worse— but I will change that and say steadily. Men are coming back from the front and their disability claims are rapidly being adjusted by the Pension Commissioners. I suppose we will have, when we have got through, 60,000 disabled men. These are men whose earning capacity is impaired through service and the question is: Where are these men going to get employment and what is going to be the policy of the country, both from the point of view of the Government and from the point of view of the captains of industry, as to what use we are going to make of the residuum of ability that these men have?

The House will remember that pensions are not voted by way of compensation. They are not voted with respect to a man's pre-war earnings; nor are they voted with respect to his impairment in relation to his pre-war occupation. A pension is voted to a man with reference to the amount of work which it may be determined he may be able to do in the ordinary unskilled labour market of the world. The result is that many men of high technical qualifications, education and broad experience are finding themselves impaired in relation to their pre-war occupations and are unable to live adequately on the pensions that have been or will be, granted to them.

As these men, driven from their pre-war occupations, go about this country seeking new occupations, they are confronted, and are apt to be confronted more and more, with this problem that the employer has to solve: Am I justified, in relation to the Workmen's Compensation Act, under which I am now called upon to make compensation, to those of my employees who are hurt, in taking these men back again into my employ? What risk do I incur if I take back into my employment a man who is disabled as a result of service?

The reason I allude to that point is this: The pressure under the Civil Service Act and the pressure from the country for recognition by the employment of returned men is going to depend largely on how far these returned men may or can be absorbed into the industrial, commercial and agricultural life of the community. The principles that underlie the Compensation Act fall into two classes. Some of the compensation acts are worked out on the principle of assessment and others on the principle of individual responsibility. Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta, to an extent Manitoba, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have worked out their compensation acts on the principle of assessment. The industries of the different districts are divided into thirty-five or forty classes. The hazard of each is determined and a rate struck. That rate is levied on the average wage paid during the year. In some cases it runs as low as ten cents on the $100 and in others it goes as high as $4 or $5 to each $100 of wages paid during the year. The average is about one per cent of the wages paid. In Quebec and in other provinces the assessment system does not prevail. The employer is responsible for the compensation to be paid to the employee. Each factory bears its own losses, and the manufacturer is deprived of the right of setting up the old common law defence of contributory negligence and voluntary incurment of risk. These principles are set to one side and if an accident happens the employer must pay the man who is regarded, so to speak, as a part of the machinery of the factory, and if a part of the machinery is injured the responsibility for compensation is thrown on the owner of the industry. There is no escaping the obligation. That obligation, in those provinces in which individual responsibility prevails, is largely met by the manufacturers carrying insurance in some of the line companies that carry on that class of insurance. You can readily see from this that the problem which confronts the employer coming under either of the two systems is if he takes back the returned man and the compensation for disability is increased. If this happens to be an employment in which many men are engaged, consideration is not so important as in the smaller employments where a few men are engaged. If only two or three are engaged the responsibility will make a tremendous increase in the risk. I am quite willing to admit that the great majority of the employers of this country are patriotic. I am quite willing to admit that the great majority of employers are anxious to take back into their employment men who left them to go overseas. They are anxious in so far as they can, to give employment to the men who have returned and are looking for work although, when they went overseas they may not have been employed in the particular factory of the employer, who is asked to take them on. But, we must follow that out and find where we are being led. There is no question—it cannot be disputed—that where a man has suffered any disability he will be more awkward and less alert than the man who has not suffered such a disability. Working about rapidly moving machinery which is the very backbone of industry to-day, that man may not find his senses as keen and cannot respond as rapidly to the premonitions of danger as the man who has his full faculties about him. The restrictions under which he works tend to increase accidents. If these accidents do increase, as accidents are bound to increase I think that the dollar and cents argument will be likely to prevail. The economic argument will be felt that each man must endeavour to conduct his factory on a basis to enable him to compete with those who are not as patriotic as himself. As that argument begins to be felt, or as that pressure begins to be felt, there will arise a tendency not to keep the returned man in the employ of this industry or that. Now I had a very striking instance of that a few months ago. There is in my riding a shipbuilding company who are anxious, and have always been glad, to give the returned man recognition. A returned man came into my office and told me he could not get work. I asked the shipbuilding company would they take him on, and they said, "Send him down," and they gave him work. He had not worked there more than a few weeks, when one day, whilst walking across a narrow bridge, he had a fit of dizziness, fell off the bridge and was drowned, with the result that I believe some four or five thousand dollars has been, or will have to be, paid to his dependents. That claim is going to be thrown on the shipbuilding industry. Naturally that industry would likely say, "We do not want to take on any more men like that if we have got to meet the cost incidental to such an accident."

Then there is another class of cases, a very serious class, where a man has had a disability that leaves him a fair residuum of ability to carry on his ordinary work in life. We will take a man who has lost one eye, but whose other eye is perfectly good. One eye is fairly capable of doing the work that the man has to do, working about machinery, or working out of doors; but if he loses the second eye that man becomes stone blind and cannot carry on his work. A man has lost two fingers off his right hand. He is quite capable of doing his work, and doing his work well, but if in addition to the two fingers he loses two more, and loses his thumb, his whole hand is gone. Now what is to be the principle that is to underlie the recognition that is to be given under the Workmen's Compensation Act, where a man suffers an impairment, subsequent to his war disability, on going into industrial employment? Is the workman's compensation to be on the basis of the injury the man suffered through his industrial activity without relation to his war disability, or is the compensation to be determined by the disability the man suffers in relation to his condition on the assumption that he was a whole man when he went into that employment?

Then there is another class of cases. A man comes back from the front. He has been away from the industry two or three years. He is not as skilled a man as he was when he went away. He has lost the skill that comes from long unbroken practice. He has suffered some injury at the front, say a wound that is fully healed, and he comes back into industry. While he is working along, being a bit clumsy, he gets struck right on the old wound, and the old war disability returns, and instead of taking two or three weeks it takes him five or six months to get better. Is his compensation going to be paid in respect of two or three weeks, or in respect of five or six months?

You ask me what are my suggestions for these difficulties and why do I bring them up this afternoon? As I told you I bring them up because I believe they have to be met. Primarily, I bring them up because I believe if they are not met we are going to have so many men looking for Government recognition in this country by virtue of Civil Service appointments that Governments are going to be decidedly uncomfortable. You have a right to say to me "You are criticizing, do some constructing. A man of very moderate ability can be a very bitter critic; it takes a good man to be a passable performer." You have a right to ask me to become a passable performer; and I want to submit to the House a few suggestions which I think it should take into its consideration. The United States, Italy, France and Great Britain have had this matter under review. They have realized that the returned man has a right to his place in the community. He has a right to his citizenship, and I mean by the expression he has a right to his citizenship, that he has a right if he desires it when he comes back to this country to be given some employment in which he will have a reasonable opportunity of earning his daily bread, and that he should not be made to feel in this country after having given, perhaps I might say, the best of his life, that there is no place in Canada for him, and that all he has ahead of him is to loaf the streets, living on a pittance of a pension; that there is no place in Canada where he can turn the ability he may have left to account and do something to advance the interests of his family. Nothing is worse than that. I do not sympathize with those that believe that work is a burden. I believe that work, honest work, in reason, is the salvation of mankind; and I believe that honest work for the returned soldier is going to be the very best thing that this country can offer him. Of course a pension, with respect to his disability, as well with honest work for the returned soldier is going to be the best thing that this country can offer to him if we are in the years to come to have a contented, thrifty and satisfied class in Canada, among those whom we call the returned men.

Now, the suggestion I make is this, and I divide it into three classes, because I have not had sufficient opportunity to reach a conclusion—I have not been able to get sufficient information to warrant me in finally saying what I think should be done: As I have endeavoured to explain to the House, Sir, the Workmen's Compensation Acts, all proceed on the assumption that the disabled man in industry shall get something in respect of his industrial disability. To give that compensation means that industry, as a class, or individual employers, must meet the cost. Shifting the burden of taxation does not pay the taxes. Shifting the burden incidental to the risk of employment from one industry to a

5 p.m. group of industries does not pay the compensation incidental to the occupation, it simply shifts it, so to speak, in that it equalizes the burden over the entire industry and takes it off a particular shop. I would like to suggest to the Government, therefore, that they should carefully consider this point—that they should insure all returned men as against industrial disability. This would create of the returned men a preferred class, because the manufacturers of this country would be brought to realize that the returned men put no burden on them in respect of workmen's compensation. If they took a man into a particular industry and an accident happened to him, the state would bear the loss, the industry would be spared that loss, and the amount, in my judgment, would not be so excessive. I believe you could do it at a cost of a million dollars a year, and I do not believe it should be done—at least at the beginning it should not be held out that it would be done—for more than five years, and I think the principle should not apply to men who had not been in the army, let us say, six months or a year. Now the reason I say that the man should be in the army at least six months or a year is this: Some men were drafted into the army and were only in it a few weeks. Other men volunteered and were only in a few weeks. Some men are coming back and are going back into civil life exactly as well as when they left it, because they were not in the army long enough to be physically impaired. Others have been as I have endeavoured to show, long enough in the army to be seriously impaired, and these are the men that I think should be protected. I want to be frank with the House: In making this suggestion I am making a suggestion that will, to a certain extent, be beneficial to the employer, and will be beneficial for this reason: In all classes of industry certain men are injured, not through any negligence of the men, not through any negligence—as the law would determine negligence,—of the employer, but by what I would call unavoidable accident. A boiler may explode, a wall may fall, something of that sort may happen, by which returned men would be injured, and yet their injury would in no way be attributable to any disability they might have incurred during the war. Some people may say, "That is too broad a scheme, it is too big a scheme, the Government should not commit itself to it." If they cannot do that, insure all pensionable disabled men—as against industrial disability, who have been recognized by their being pensioned, are suffering from disability due to the fact that they have been impaired, and permanently impaired through service, or during service.

As far as I can estimate it, there will probably be 60,000 of those men, of whom about two-fifths will go into industrial or commercial pursuits. As I said some little time ago Sir, the average protection rate is about one per cent, and it has been computed that it costs on the average about $7 a year to insure a man against industrial disability. Two-fifths of 60,000 will give us 24,000, and at $7 a man that would involve an annual expenditure of $168,000. That is all it would cost this country to insure the pensionable disabled man, and in that way I think we would guarantee them employment in the industries of this country.

But if you are not prepared to do that, then let us at least think of this, which although not nearly enough, is something that the returned man is entitled to be given insurance against, the increased liability to industrial accidents due to his disability. If the loss of one eye is valued at 30 per cent by the Pension Board, and by the Workmen's Compensation Board, then when a man loses one eye during service he will be given a pension of 30 per cent, and if he loses the other eye, becoming totally blind, the industrial compensation being only another 30 per cent, then the man who has become stone blind in industrial service will only get 60 per cent, unless the aggravated disability of 70 per cent is charged against industry by the Compensation Board. Surely that man is entitled to a hundred per cent disability. If the Government is not prepared to adopt either of the first two schemes, surely the suggestion I make in regard to insurance against increased liability for aggravation from industrial accidents is something that this country should and likely will be willing to undertake.

It is a responsibility which should not be shifted on to the employers. I recognize their patriotism, their anxiety to do everything they can to give employment to returned men, but I know how inexorable the laws of supply and demand are, how inexorably the law of costs bears down on industry, and if a manufacturer finds that by reason of keen competition he is making a loss, as sure as the sun rises in the morning, he is going to cut down his costs, and the only way he can do so is by increasing his efficiency, by stripping his factory of every overhead charge that can be eliminated, and I am afraid that in the years to come one of the first to suffer will be the disabled man.

You may say that much of what I have advanced has nothing to do with the Civil Service Commission. I think it has a great deal to do with the Civil Service Commission, because I appreciate the problems with which they have to deal. I appreciate that there is much discontent among our returned men at the present time, and I agree with what the hon. member for Calgary said, that there is one thing that the returned man resents, and that is a young man getting recognition, and I know as I speak on the floor of this House that, unless a change has taken place in the last few weeks, there is one young man in Kingston holding a Government position that should be given to a returned man, and he is holding that position because somebody more powerful than the member wants to keep him there. It is now only a temporary position, but it is a temporary position that has been held for a period of from eighteen months to two years, and just as sure as I stand on this floor to-night I am confident that the reason that young man is being kept in that temporary position is that it is desired that some day his appointment be made permanent. I ask the minister and this House: Is there any reason why an able bodied young man who has not been at the front should not give way, even although he is a temporary employee of this Government, to the returned man who has lost an eye or an arm or a leg in the service of his country, but has all the other qualifications essential to fill that position? I do not think that this country wants the retention of these positions by men who are physically fit, and I want to urge that on the Civil Service Commission. As I said before, I am in favour of the Civil Service Commission, I do not want the worry and anxiety of political patronage, but if the Civil Service Commission is going to continue, both the commission and this Government have got to be alive to the fact that public sentiment from one end of this country to the other demands that full and generous recognition be given to the returned men; and the people of this country are determined that the returned men shall not be deprived of the recognition they are entitled to merely for technical and trivial reasons.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. gentleman inform the House whether he drew the attention of the Government to the fact that that young man could be replaced with advantage by a returned soldier?

Mr. NICKLE: I think I drew the attention of the Civil Service Commission to the fact. If I may enlarge on the hon. member's question, what I think should be done is to appoint a returned man as one member on the Civil Service Commission. He might make it his especial duty to watch over the interests of returned men and give careful consideration to all the facts underlying their cases.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (Oxford South): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House touches a real live question, a question that is uppermost in the minds of the people. I had no intention of saying anything on it this afternoon, but I doubt if there is a representative in this House who cannot recall an instance or more in his own constituency which would justify him in supporting the resolution moved by the hon. member for Colchester. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the addresses of the hon. members for Calgary and Kingston (Mr. Redman and Mr. Nickle). I think the hon. member for Kingston has made it abundantly clear that the returned soldiers are not only not receiving a preference at the hands of the Civil Service Commission, but they are not even receiving what they are entitled to in open competition. Some time ago I placed a question on the Order Paper in regard to this matter, and the information I received was that among the appointments, permanent and temporary, which had been made since the passing of this Act, in 1918, about 12½ per cent of them had gone to returned soldiers, and a great many of them appointments carrying very small salaries, and for that reason so trivial in their character that there was no credit due to anyone for the fact that they had been made.

Now, in view of the fact that I spoke very plainly on this question when the Civil Service Act was before the House last year, if you will pardon me I would like to make some reference to what I said on that occasion, for the reason that I was rather severely criticized for having spoken as plainly as I did at that time. I was then strongly in favour, and I am still strongly in favour, if we are to have the Outside service under the Civil Service Commission, that at least one member of that Commission should be a returned soldier. I think that this should be done in fairness to the men who are coming back to this country after rendering a great public service. I said:

> I do think that the soldiers would have felt that their interests were being safeguarded and looked after much better had a returned soldier been appointed as one of the members of this commission. I submit that among returned soldiers men could have been found possessing the qualifications which I have mentioned; yet for some reason no returned soldier has been selected to fill one of these positions.

Previously, on May 13, I said, when the matter was before the House:

> The fact that the returned soldiers are not represented in the commission justifies the criticism that is offered of this measure and the endeavour to provide all the safeguards that are necessary to ensure that they shall receive the treatment that they are entitled to.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

There is no representation of returned soldiers on the Civil Service Commission. Previous to that I had protested the bringing of the Outside Service under the Civil Service Commission, and I should like to quote a few words I said in reference to that matter:

> I am speaking in this way because I feel this is an inopportune time to introduce a measure of this kind when we have coming back from overseas every day men who are maimed for life, and who will find it difficult to follow their old vocation. These men should surely be given the preference, but I cannot see within the four corners of the Bill anything to safeguard their rights in any degree. It is true that an Order in Council has been passed, but so far as the Bill itself is concerned—I have looked it over very carefully—no safeguards have been provided. On the contrary, the examinations that may be prescribed by the Civil Service Commission will probably debar a great many of these men from entering the civil service, who under present conditions might be appointed. Why is it that to-day practically the only positions you can get for a returned soldier are caretakers of public buildings or some other menial employment of that kind? It may be that in other parts of the country returned soldiers are being given positions.

I said further:

> I say this is not the time to introduce a measure of this sort. It is not right that our returned soldiers should be prevented from occupying positions they are competent to fill simply, it may be, because they cannot spell "Bolsheviki" correctly. I say we could well afford to let this measure stand over until a more opportune time, and the same remark applies to a good deal of the legislation we have had before us this session.

That legislation was put through, and to-day we are in a position to judge what the result has been.

The Civil Service Commission was subjected to very severe criticism on a former occasion in this House during the present session, and the matter will undoubtedly come before the House later. But the fact that in my own constituency as well as in the constituencies of other hon. gentlemen there have been glaring instances where men who have not been casualties at the front, men who have not served at the front at all, are given the preference over men who are returning from overseas in large numbers, is I conceive, nothing short of an outrage. When the matter was before the House last year I pointed out that there was a difference between the Civil Service and the Public Service. These soldiers have been rendering a great public service for many months, some of them for many years. As you go along the streets of our cities and meet numbers of men stumping along minus a leg or an arm or crippled in some other way, you can conceive of no more desirable place to employ these men than in the Civil Service of Canada. There they can render efficient service, because undoubtedly many of them who have been trained in vocational schools are well qualified to fill Civil Service positions. But to my amazement the letter read by the member for Kingston shows conclusively that returned men do not receive consideration until all those who have written at previous examinations have been placed. This is a very serious matter and one that demands the attention of this House and of the Government. Were I not firmly convinced that a great injustice is being done to these men, I would not speak so strongly on this question as I do; but I know from careful investigation that there is no excuse whatever for this condition and the blame for it must be brought home to the Civil Service Commission.

Before the outside service was brought under the Civil Service Commission, members of Parliament, having some knowledge of the conditions in their own constituencies, had some responsibility in the matter of appointments. Under the present arrangement they are not even consulted; a committee is appointed by the Civil Service Commission to find out who is the most suitable man for a given appointment. When the House was discussing the Bill to bring the outside service under the Civil Service Commission, I said:

> By placing the Outside Service in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, we are departing from an established rule that has been in existence in the British Empire for many years; that is, responsible and representative government. I believe a government ought to be responsible to the people for the administration of the affairs of the country. I do not believe you can delegate those responsibilities to any commission and say: The commission have done so and so; the Government cannot interfere in the matter, and we are not responsible for the action of the commission.

We are being held responsible, as we ought to be, for the actions of this Commission. You cannot get away from it; the representatives of the people are rightly being held responsible for what this Commission is doing in their various constituencies, without our knowledge or consent. Under the present arrangement the member of Parliament is in a most humiliating position. One of my constituents comes to me and says: "Why is such and such a man appointed to a position, while men who are returning every day from the front, men who have bled for their country, men who are maimed and crippled, do not receive any consideration from the Civil Service Commission?" All that I can do in that case is shrug my shoulders and say that the matter is entirely in the hands of the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa; that they do not consult me in the matter. Such a condition of affairs should not exist at this particular time; at least until our soldiers are reinstated in civil life, members of Parliament ought to be consulted and ought to have some say in the matter of appointments; as they will be held responsible by their constituents the present humiliating condition should be done away with. I quite agree with the principles expressed in the resolution, the moving of which was much needed in order to awaken the people of the country to the humiliating conditions which exist in this respect.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (Perth, North): Mr. Speaker, The subject under discussion I conceive to be one of the most important that will be touched upon this session, and the member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) is entitled to credit for bringing the resolution before the House.

While I agree with the resolution and the spirit of it, I cannot believe that it is broad enough to suit the exigencies of the situation in Canada to-day. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Civil Service Act should be amended so that, while having full regard to efficiency, a preference in appointments to the public service shall be afforded to members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who have become casualties in a theatre of war.

What I object to is that the resolution is narrowed down and restricted in its phraseology to apply only to casualties. The word 'casualty' is a very broad term, and as the resolution is now worded a man whose only injury was a sprained ankle or some minor flesh wound, who was in the trenches perhaps only one day before the fighting stopped, might get a preference over the man who had fought for his country for three or four years. I do not believe the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) intended so to restrict the meaning of his resolution. In fact, I have spoken to him about it, and he said he had no such intention; that his purpose was to get the matter before the House so that the House could settle on some one resolution.

I was rather surprised to learn to-day from the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) that the Civil Service Commission are not now giving a preference to returned soldiers. In correspondence which I have not here I have had word from the Civil Service Commission directly to the contrary effect; they say that soldiers who have qualified at the examinations are being put at the top of the list. Now the Civil Service Commission is a creature of the Government, and I think it is about time that this Parliament should put forth an opinion that would have some effect upon the commission. Taking as true what the hon. member for Kingston has told the House to-day, I do not think there is a member of this House who would not condemn such a procedure being followed by the Civil Service Commission. According to the correspondence read, the commission are filling all the positions they can by examination, and now the hopper of applicants is absolutely congested, and the soldier who writes hereafter on an examination may not get a position for many years to come. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is the spirit that actuates the Canadian people to-day; I do not think it is a practice that they will stand for. It is no use our crying out that we are going to do something for the soldier, and then by some pretence or specious practice have a Civil Service Commission doing everything to prevent the country doing something for the returned soldier. That is the only meaning I can see in the letters written to the hon. member for Kingston. I do not like the word "big stick;" I do not like using a club on anybody, but I think a resolution that would influence the Civil Service Commission and would show the temper of the people of this country as reflected by the Canadian Parliament would be quite in order. And then, if the Government have any influence upon the Civil Service Commission—and I direct the attention of the Acting Prime Minister particularly to this—I would whisper into the ear of the chairman that he had better look alive to the welfare of the returned soldier and not play favourites in any other direction. To put the matter in what I conceive to be its proper position, and in order to make the resolution a little broader, while still preserving the spirit of the resolution of my hon. friend from Colchester, with his approval I am going to move in amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the original resolution be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the opinion of this House the Civil Service Act should be amended so that priority in appointments to the public service shall after this date for one year be given to members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, Canadians in the Royal Air Force, and Canadians in the Imperial and allied armies who have served at the front; disability, length of service and efficiency to be considered.

[Mr. Morphy.]

Mr. R. W. WIGMORE (St. John City): In seconding this amendment I must say that I consider the resolution deals with one of the most important matters that have been discussed in this House since the opening of the session. I realize, as does every hon. member of this House and every citizen of Canada, that the returned soldiers feel that the Government is not keeping its pledges to the boys, that the promises which they made to the boys when they left for overseas were not sincere. I should just like to give a few concrete cases that have come under my observation in the constituency I represent, and I want first of all to say that the Great War Veterans' Association of the city of St. John are very much displeased indeed with the attitude of the Government. There have been a number of appointments made to positions in the city of St. John which returned soldiers could have filled just as efficiently as those who have been appointed. Not very long ago a letter-carrier was required in the post office department. Several returned soldiers applied, but unfortunately not one of them passed the necessary examination. That was how the Civil Service Commission got around it in that case. The result was that a boy of sixteen who, of course, had never served at the front was appointed to the position, and several returned soldiers were turned down. In another case a vacancy occurred in the Customs House. Several returned soldiers applied for the position, one of whom at least had passed the necessary preliminary examination. Another soldier, who had never been overseas but had been taken ill and placed in hospital at Ste. Agathe, was appointed because he had passed the qualifying examination whereas the other soldier had only passed the preliminary; and this appointment was made in the face of the recommendation of the Great War Veterans' Association and a number of prominent citizens of St. John. Similar cases are occurring every day, and the returned soldier is not at all satisfied with the treatment he is receiving.

In the Marine and Fisheries Department in the city of St. John a number of temporary vacancies occur that do not require examination. A very singular thing happened there not long ago. Dependents of soldiers overseas were dismissed while in some cases at least, men of military age and physically fit were retained.

One man had two sons overseas and another three, one of whom had been killed, and I think that in such cases preference should be given to the dependents of soldiers who have been overseas. Construction work is now in progress at Courtney Bay by the St. John Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Construction Company under sub-contract by the Bedford Construction Company. Scores of returned soldiers have applied for positions in connection with this work, but the preference has been nearly always given to civilians. This is a matter that the Government should endeavour to remedy. I am entirely in favour of the amendment because I think the resolution does not go far enough. Preference should be given to the returned soldier in every case, and it should not be necessary in connection with appointments to positions such as that of watchman on a dock or of letter carrier to pass the rigid examinations which are required. I will support the amendment.

Mr. MORPHY: As a matter of privilege I would ask that the words "and allied armies" be added after the words "Imperial army."

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): I shall be brief in the expression of my opinion on this matter. In my judgment the resolution does not go far enough, and I shall support the amendment because it recognizes the military record and time service of our returned soldiers. Many applications have been made by returned soldiers for positions which I think they were qualified to fill, but their applications, for some reason or another, the Commission did not favourabley consider. Young men who were among the first to respond to the call, enlisting in the first week of the war, and who spent some winters in the trenches very much to the detriment of their health, have come back physically unfit, and when they apply for positions the Civil Service Commission inform them that they must have their discharge before their applications can be considered. Among the returned soldiers, many who have not lost limbs are suffering other disabilities which render them incapable of strenuous work, and it has often happened that men who were longest on active service and were discharged long ago have been put off, some who have not yet been discharged are urged to hurry up and get their discharge papers so that they may be appointed. Many a returned man who has won distinction on the field of battle is overlooked, and as I think that something should be done to remedy this condition of things, I shall support the amendment. I concur in the opinion that all appointments to the outside service for a year at least should be reserved for discharged soldiers, and if in any county or parish there may not happen to be a soldier available to fill any vacant position, one from the adjoining county or parish might be selected..

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to delay the House for any length of time, but coming from a constituency that sent a large number of its sons overseas, I feel it incumbent on me to say a few words on this question. We are indebted to the member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) for bringing so important a matter as this before us, and I wish to say, with all the emphasis I can, that the Goverement for some reason or other, are not doing what we expected they would do when the Civil Service Act was passed last year. I think I voice the opinion of members of the House as well as of returned soldiers and citizens generally when I say that too many of the returned men are being turned down in connection with appointments to the public service. This is a very serious matter and one that should be looked into by the proper authorities. There is a very deep-seated opinion current that things are not right and that the returned soldier is not being treated as he ought to be. He needs employment as soon as he is fit after his return, and if the policy that is outlined in the letter which was read this afternoon is one that is being pursued by the Civil Service Commission, I can easily understand why dissatisfaction exists. The policy as laid down in the letter read by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) is exactly contrary to what it should be. It is evidently the intention to exhaust the list of those civilians who have passed examinations before attention is given to the soldier. I would suggest that the proper course would be to consider the case of the returned soldier first, and let the civilians, no matter how high their marks may be, stand until the returned men have received their due.

Mr. NICKLE: I have not the letter before me, but the practice is this: When an examination takes place those who are successful obtain recognition before the returned man who has not had an opportunity of passing the examination.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That is quite as I understand it, and, as I say, is exactly contrary to what it should be. I think that these technical and academic examinations are entirely unnecessary in the case of soldiers. If a soldier has sound common sense and can fulfil the duties of the office to which he seeks appointment—and I would always qualify it in that way—he ought to have the first claim regardless of whether he can pass at the top of the list or not. He should be the first man to be considered, because the country owes him a duty which it can ill repay even if it gave him a very good position. In my opinion, therefore, the Civil Service Commission should seriously interest themselves in behalf of the returned soldiers and endeavour to place them in good positions as speedily as possible. It is quite true that members endeavoured to do that when they were dispensing the patronage. I received many circulars on that head and I always endeavoured to see that the returned soldier was the first man considered. In many cases no one else was considered. That is the way it should be before the Civil Service Commission.

I think the amendment of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Morphy) is a very excellent one. I do not know how the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) may feel towards it. I think that Canadians who have enlisted in the air force, or in the marine, or in any of the Allied armies for that matter and have been wounded in battle or in the service of the country, are entitled to consideration. But whether it is the amendment that is put or whether it is the resolution, I want to go on record as being entirely in accord with the principle that is enunciated in both of them. I want to let it be distinctly understood that from now on the returned soldier gets the best of the deal all along the line and you cannot put that too strongly. He has not had it up to date to the extent that he should have had it. I would hold up both hands for giving all the positions to returned soldiers that they can fill. I would consider them first. Our duty is first to the soldier and after that the civilian list, which is a matter of very small importance, comparatively, may be considered. Before the soldiers are provided for, do not let any of these civilians in at all.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the remarks which have been made in reference to this question. I wish to place before the House the facts of a case that occurred in my own town. A young man came back home in March, 1918, having lost a leg in the war. He made application for a position that became vacant, but to our great sorrow that position was merged in another. The Collector of Customs took the position at a lower salary than that which had been previously paid and prevented the young man from getting it. Now the Collector of Customs at that port occupies the dual position of Collector of Customs and Immigration Agent. This young man made application for the position of Immigration Agent which had become vacant.

Mr. MACLEAN: How much was paid for the office of Immigration Agent?

Mr. MICHAUD: The salary was $800 or $900. The position was given to the collector at a lower rate in order to prevent this young man from getting it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): In what county is that?

Mr. MICHAUD: In Restigouche and Madawaska. The application was made to the Civil Service Commission. We also made application to the chief commissioner of immigration when we were here but we did not succeed in our enterprise. This case illustrates the fact that a great injustice is being done our young soldiers who return maimed and unable to earn their living. This young man speaks and writes both languages, is well educated and is fully competent to discharge the duties of the position. His name is Dugal and he is a son of the Honourable L. A. Dugal of Edmunston.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): There is one phase of this question that I would like to say a few words about and that has reference to the sending out of the advertisements to applicants seeking positions in the public service. In my own experience this advertisement comes along in western Canada too late for the applicant to get his application back to Ottawa in time to receive consideration at the hands of the Civil Service Commission. I do not know whether this is done intentionally or whether it is just carelessness on the part of the Commission. Through that practice alone there has been a tremendous injustice inflicted on all returned soldiers as well as on civilians who are looking for positions in the Civil Service. I am quite in accord with the sentiments expressed both by the mover of the resolution and the amendment. I think the amendment moved by the honourable member for Perth (Mr. Morphy) is preferable to the resolution because it goes farther and I would therefore support it. Too little regard has been paid to the promises which have been made by the Government in regard to what shall be done for the returned soldiers and I hope that in the future more consideration will be given to the promises and the pledges which were made to the men before they went overseas.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): I am in entire sympathy with the resolution and also with the amendment except that neither goes far enough. In neither is mention made of the Canadian navy or seamen of the mercantile marine. I would like to suggest to the honourable the mover of the amendment (Mr. Morphy) that the members of the Canadian navy and the seamen of the mercantile marine be also included. Whilst perhaps the Canadian navy did not get a chance to do very much during the war, the seamen of the merchant marine, during four years, were in every sea and faced the submarine danger. They are entitled to the sympathy of the Government just as much as the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the members of the Air Force of the Canadians who enlisted in the Imperial army.

Mr. T. M. M. TWEEDIE (Calgary): I would like to ask my hon. friend the mover of the amendment (Mr. Morphy) a question. The amendment says that disability, length of service and efficiency are to be considered. Is the proposal to make the Civil Service of Canada exclusive to returned men for one year, and is this consideration as to length of service, disability and efficiency to apply only among the returned men themselves and without regard to the efficiency of the Civil Service?

Mr. MORPHY: I should say that they should be efficient to perform the duties.

Mr. TWEEDIE: The resolution would not go to the extent of making the service exclusive for returned men without regard to the efficiency of the Civil Service of Canada?

Mr. MORPHY: No, my intention is to put the returned soldier, if he is efficient, ahead of everybody else.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I have no hesitation whatever in supporting the resolution and the amendment as suggested. Campaigns have been carried on throughout the length and breadth of Canada asking employers to reinstate those men who left them when they enlisted for overseas service. Many men have been reinstated, but it has been found that they are unable to perform their duties to the same extent that they did when they went overseas, perhaps by reason of some nervous disability. The result has been that employers have discharged these men. But I think that the Dominion of Canada can take these men into the Civil Service, and that even if they have not one hundred per cent efficiency in the performance of their duty there is no justification for their being discharged from the Civil Service on the same ground that they would be discharged from private employment.

When we take a large manufacturing industry, or some mercantile business, we know that throughout the length and breadth of the country the competition is very keen. An employer may be very good hearted and may desire to retain all these men, but he finds that he is up against the competition of those engaged in the same business, and that he cannot successfully carry on his activities, or successfully compete with his rivals if he yields to good nature.

I think the resolution which has been brought in by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) covers that class of cases. I also think that provision should be made in the Civil Service of the country for those men who are casualties, or who are suffering from physical or nervous defects which prevent them from carrying on their duties as they did before they went to the front. We owe a duty to these men to see that they are provided for, and that they have the same source of income and maintenance as they did when they were engaged in industrial pursuits. I have very much pleasure in supporting the resolution as introduced by the hon. member for Colchester, and also the amendment, due regard being paid to the necessity of the maintenance of efficiency in the Civil Service. I also wish to support the stand taken by some hon. gentlemen with regard to that service. I think it would be very unfortunate for Canada if, for any reason, we should abandon the reform which we adopted last year and returned to the old system of party patronage which previously prevailed in this country.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Both the resolution and the amendment have evidently met with a very substantial and favourable response in the House. I would like, however, to suggest that when it is proposed to make amendments to the Civil Service Act of the nature proposed it would be well if the opportunity were afforded of giving very careful consideration to the details of such amendments. In the course of two or three weeks very important and substantial amendments to the Civil Service Act will be submitted to Parliament, and I would suggest for the consideration of the mover of the resolution, and of the mover of the amendment as well, the desirability of postponing until then consideration of the proposals set forth to-day. Every opportunity will be afforded the members of the House to submit amendments of this character when the Bill is introduced, and in the meantime I can assure both hon. gentleman that the Government will give every consideration to the proposals which have been presented to-day. I trust that both hon. gentlemen will refrain from asking for a formal adoption of their proposals upon my assuring them that the Government will take careful cognizance of the matters which have been referred to, and that in the course of two or three weeks, or a month at the least, there will be ample opportunity of considering amendments of this nature to the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MORPHY: As mover of the amendment, with the consent of the seconder, I have no objection to the course outlined by the minister. I might request the privilege of adding that he will hasten down to the Civil Service Commission in the morning and put a flea in the ear of the authorities there so that they may keep moving in accordance with the spirit of the House as evidenced by what has taken place here to-day.

Mr. McCURDY: The expressions of opinion by members of the House show unanimity in support of the principle of my motion, not a single voice having been raised in dissent. The whole difficulty in the premises has arisen because the original policy of the Government, with regard to this important matter was not adhered to, or implemented in the Civil Service Act, adopted last year. The language of the first Order in Council, which, by the way, was adopted on the recommendation of the Prime Minister quite soon after casualties began to return to Canada, or, to be exact, on November 26, 1915—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is proceeding to reply. I understood he rose for the purpose of stating whether he would, or would not, withdraw his resolution.

Mr. McCURDY: I am going to state my reasons for withdrawing the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: In that case will the hon. gentleman make them as concise as possible?

Mr. McCURDY: The Order in Council of 1915 to which I have referred, Mr. Speaker, distinctly states that:

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

In making appointments to the Civil Service preference shall be given to the returned members of the C.E.F., especially those who through disability, occasioned by active military service, are unable to fill their previous occupations.

That language is followed in successive Orders in Council, but unfortunately reference to those who had suffered disabilities while on active service was omitted from the Civil Service Act of last year.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements made by the Secretary of State and the Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that very extensive amendments to the Civil Service Act will be presented to the House before the end of April, and the hope they hold out that these amendments will include the sense of the resolution of this afternoon, I have much pleasure in acceding to their request to withdraw the motion.

Motion of Mr. McCurdy and amendment of Mr. Morphy withdrawn.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

MINISTERS OF THE CROWN.

PROPOSAL THAT ALL SHALL BE MEMBERS OF THE COMMONS.

Mr. WILLIAM D. EULER (Waterloo North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, all Ministers of the Crown should be members of the House of Commons, or become such within a period of three months after their appointment to the Cabinet.

He said: Mr. Speaker, after the strenuous debates of last week, and which developed acute differences of opinion among honourable members, I propose a resolution this evening that I believe should be, in principle, acceptable to a very large majority of the members of the House—that is, providing that the Government do not make it a party question. And I think, Sir, that it is not a party question because the practice of appointing senators to the Cabinet of Canada, as is well known, is one which has been followed by both Liberal and Conservative Governments in the past.

Last week in connection with the debate on daylight saving, I was pleased to note the action of the Government, in that they appeared to give a certain freedom of speech and of action to hon. members on their side of the House. I rather suspect that the reason for that action was because the Government did not care to assume the responsibility of re-enacting that measure; but be that as it may, I am willing to give the Government the benefit of the doubt, because I believe that it is in the interest of Parliament that there should be permitted to the hon. members on the opposite side of the House a reasonable independence of action, rather than that the majority in this House should resolve itself merely into a rubber stamp to record the wishes of the Cabinet.

I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that the significance of the resolution which I propose is quite evident to every hon. member. If I were speaking in a general way, I should say that it is intended as a step towards a more advanced and complete democracy. And when I use the word "democracy," Mr. Speaker, I realize that in the last few years it has become somewhat hackneyed and that perhaps to most of us it is more a matter of sound than of meaning. The hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean), in the debate on daylight saving last week, made a statement that during the course of the war, and especially in the last year or so, the Government had found it necessary to suspend in some degree the principle of responsible government. I do not agree with him when he says that it was necessary even then; but I do agree with him that the time has arrived when responsible government in full measure ought to be restored. If it is indeed true that the war which has just ended was a war "to make the world safe for democracy," then, Sir, I contend we ought to use every opportunity to carry into effect in a concrete way the principles that we were fighting for. We should not be afraid to take our own medicine, but should let democracy, like charity, begin at home.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I have offered has for its object the debarring from the Cabinet of members of the Senate, for what I consider to be the sufficient reason, that members of the Senate, not being elected, are not representative of, and not responsible to, the people. I am quite prepared to have some hon. gentlemen say that the easiest way to accomplish that which is desired in the resolution would be to abolish the Senate entirely, and if any hon. members choose to offer a Bill in that regard, I for one would support it. I have not risen this evening with any intention of dealing with the Senate as a body, but it does appear to me that in these so-called democratic times a non-elective Senate is something of an anomaly in this country.

We have been told, Sir, that the Senate is established more to protect minorities than perhaps anything else. I do not think that the history of Canada shows that they have had any very great success in that direction. In fact, it seems to me that at the present day the Senate is more in the public eye, because by force of circumstances it has become established as something of a clearing house for the obligations of those who desire to free themselves from the bonds of matrimony —it has become something of a divorce court. But in order to abolish the Senate constitutional action would be necessary; to follow out that which I propose would require no change whatever in the Constitution, the British North America Act, and if this House saw fit to pass this resolution, it could easily be carried into concrete effect simply by the Government adopting the principle upon which the House placed itself on record.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as is well known, senators are not elected. They are merely the partisan appointees of the Prime Minister or of the political party which happens to be in power. That, I submit, Sir, is not by any means an indication that the men so appointed possess the confidence of the country. Indeed it is only too true that exactly the reverse is the case in very many instances, and that men who have been rejected when they have offered themselves for election to the House of Commons are frequently appointed to the Senate merely as a reward for party service.

The responsibility and power of the ministry are very great. During the past two years the power of the Cabinet has been greater even than the power of Parliament itself. That was during the war. As a matter of fact, the War Measures Act is still in force and the Government still retains that power. But even after the War Measures Act becomes null and void the power and influence of the Cabinet will still remain very great. Members of the Cabinet who are of sufficient calibre to deserve a position as responsible as that, wield a tremendous power not only in the formulating of policies, but also in the administration of the departments over which they have control.

The appointment of senators to the Dominion Cabinet is entirely subversive of the principle of responsible government.

I bring this matter before the House at this time because I feel that the abuse—I think it is an abuse—to which I refer appears to be growing. We have in the Cabinet at the present time no fewer than three members of the Senate; more, I think, than we have ever had since we first enjoyed responsible government. First of all, we have the leader of the Senate (Sir James Lougheed), who is Minister of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment. This afternoon we had a very interesting and lengthy debate on the matter of the appointment of soldiers to positions in the Civil Service, and we shall have a great deal of that this year and in the years to come. It seems to me that a minister holding the important portfolio of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment should be present on the floor of this House to give his advice to members and to answer questions that may be put from time to time.

The same is true of the Minister of Labour, Hon. G. D. Robertson, who also is a member of the Senate and has not a seat in this House. One of the most difficult and important questions with which this country will have to deal in the future is the question of labour, therefore this Parliament will necessarily have to concern itself with legislation affecting labour. Old age pensions, pensions to widows, and legislation on matters of labour will have to be considered by this House in the very near future. I do not think that the Government is doing its duty to the people, particularly to the working men, in not having in this House, as head of the Department of Labour, a man who manifestly, by election, enjoys the confidence of the people whom he is supposed to represent.

Then I come to what everybody must consider the most glaring instance of the violation of the principles of responsible government that one could possibly conceive. And, by the way, I make these criticisms not at all in a personal sense, but only in so far as they affect the public service and the public good. We have as Postmaster General Hon. P. E. Blondin, a member of the Senate, a gentleman who in the elections of 1917 offered himself for election in two constituencies and was overwhelmingly defeated in both; in one by a majority of about 1,200 votes and in the other by a majority of no less than 6,500 votes, receiving himself only 500 votes in the constituency of Champlain. This gentleman is in charge of a department which employs about 10,000 persons, which has in its control the expenditure of something like $18,000,000 a year. Yet, in the face of the fact that this gentleman was rejected by his constituents; in face of the very evident fact that he does not possess the confidence of the electors of Canada, the Prime Minister has retained him in an office which, it will not be denied, should not be occupied by any one who is not responsible to the people and who does not occupy a seat in the House of Commons. The Postmaster General is not answerable to Parliament; the same may be said of all members of the Senate who hold portfolios in the Cabinet. They are not on the floor of the House to answer questions or to pass their own estimates through Parliament.

We were told this afternoon in a return that the Postmaster General is represented in this House by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell). I do not know whether that gentleman has informed himself very particularly as to the details of the Post Office Department; I doubt it very much. At the same time, most of us are willing to admit that the duties of the President of the Privy Council are so light that possibly he feels that the large honorarium that he receives may very well justify his giving some attention to the work of the Postmaster General. But I do contend that the appointment of three members of the Senate to positions in the ministry is the very negation of responsible government. In the case of the office of the Postmaster General it is nothing less than an arrogant defiance of the will of the people which this Parliament, if it dares to call its soul its own, should not tolerate any longer.

If any reply is made to the arguments that I offer, the first may be that Liberal Governments in the past have appointed Senators to the Cabinet. That is true, although I do not think that it is true in such a glaring degree as it is in the case of the office of Postmaster General. But even if it be true, I do not for one moment admit that that affects the argument in the slightest degree. That a Liberal Government did what has been done by a Unionist or Conservative Government makes it neither right nor wrong; the question should be decided entirely upon its merits.

It may also be stated that a similar practice is followed in the British Government; that members of the House of Lords occupy portfolios in the British Cabinet. That also is true, and while I admit that we have taken from the British practice and the British Constitution many desirable things and incorporated them into our own system of government, it does not follow that we must in every respect follow the example of England. Our conditions and political development have been in many respects entirely different from those of Great Britain. The British have travelled a very long way through all the stages of feudalism, autocracy and rule by the aristocracy, and while they have made great progress on the way to democracy I do not think that the most ardent Britisher would claim that they have yet attained to the very highest ideals of democracy and that no further progress is possible for them. But even if that were contended, again I would say that the mere fact that a thing is good in England does not necessarily make it good in Canada. Moreover, in England when a member of the House of Lords holds a portfolio in the Cabinet, in almost all cases the department over which he presides is represented in the House of Commons by an under-secretary.

The constitution of Canada never contemplated that a member of the Senate should be appointed to the responsible position of Minister of the Crown. That is quite apparent when we consider that when a member of the House of Commons is elevated to the position of Minister of the Crown, notwithstanding the fact that he already possesses the confidence of the people, as shown by his election to the Commons, he is obliged to go back to his constituents for re-election.

That, to me, proves that it was the intention to provide an absolute safeguard; it was intended to ensure that when a man was promoted to the responsible position of Minister of the Crown he should possess the confidence of the electors.

It is no compliment to the hon. members on the other side of the House that three members of the present Cabinet are drawn from the Senate and that the Prime Minister of Canada should, in effect, say to hon. gentlemen opposite that he does not find any of them worthy of occupying the position of Postmaster General, for instance, or that of Minister of Labour, or whatever it may be. For my part, I believe there are a great many members on the other side of the House who could discharge the duties pertaining to those portfolios fully as well as those duties are now discharged, and it would be more in keeping with the principle of responsible government, because the fact that they occupied seats in this House would be an assurance that they possessed the confidence of the people.

In the resolution which I have submitted I provide for a slight qualification, and it is this: that members of the Cabinet shall become members of the House of Commons within a period of three months after their appointment to the Cabinet. I am willing to admit that occasions might arise when it would be desirable, possibly in an emergency or because of some man's special fitness, to appoint to a Cabinet position a man who was not a member of the House of Commons. In such a case the new minister should submit himself, in accordance with the principle of responsible government, to the electors and be returned to the House of Commons within a period of not longer than three months. Failing to be returned, he should make way for some one else who would fill the requirements in that regard.

I shall not elaborate the matter further. It seems to me the argument requires no proof, that the principles are so sound as to be apparent to all; the truth of what I have said, while it has been poorly expressed, must be evident to almost any member of this House. I base my argument on the simple principle that membership in the Cabinet of Canada should be held only by those who are members of the House of Commons and thus responsible to the people. In these supposedly advanced days of the sovereignty of the people let us show our sincerity by putting our own house in order. Let the Government of Canada conform in every respect with the principle of responsible institutions, for which such heavy sacrifices have been made.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I have listened with close attention to the observations of my hon. friend (Mr. Euler) with respect to the motion now before the House, and if I have any general criticism to make of his remarks, as I understood them, it is his failure to appreciate the constitution as it is to-day, and the status of the Senate as a body of co-ordinate jurisdiction with this House. My hon. friend's argument proceeded along this line: The Senate is not an elective body, but an appointive body. Therefore, no member of the Government should be a member of the Senate. Now it is debatable—the hon. member and other hon. gentlemen have their views—whether the Senate of this Parliament should be an elective or an appointive body; but that is not the question before the House. The question before the House is the motion of the hon. member, and that motion must, I submit, be debated having regard to the constitutional position as it exists to-day. It appears to me that to give effect to the resolution of the hon. member would be to derogate from the status of the Senate as established under the British North America Act. I think it might properly be pointed out that the British North America Act is an act of Union; it is a compact; it represents the agreement which was made by the different sections of this country at the time of Confederation. It is perfectly clear from the debates which preceded Confederation, and from the Act of Union itself, that great importance was attached to the creation of the Senate as a part of Parliament. My hon. friend has put his resolution in this form:

> That in the opinion of this House all Ministers of the Crown should be members of the House of Commons or become such within a period of three months after their appointment to the Cabinet.

He puts his resolution affirmatively; but, negatively, it might be put in this way—and my hon. friend did put it this way in his remarks:—No member of the Government of Canada shall be a member of the Senate for a longer period than three months. Now in view of the constitutional situation as it exists to-day, namely, that the Senate has under the British North America Act co-ordinate legislative authority with this House, save as to money votes and bills levying taxation upon the people, which must originate with the Commons, it would appear to me that the resolution goes much further than this House or the country would be prepared to go; because it involves a vital change in our constitutional practice of administration and of legislation, and, as I have said, derogates from the status conferred upon the Senate by the British North America Act.

I think I would agree with my hon. friend that the representation of the Government in the Senate should always be limited as compared with that which it should and, I submit, must have in the House of Commons. Ever since Confederation however it has been recognized by all administrations that the Government must be represented in the Senate for the reason that the Senate is a legislative body, that Bills originate with the Senate as well as with the Commons and that the Senate must be a party to all legislation before it can become law. I do not know that any hard-and-fast principle has been adopted, but it has been generally recognized that there are certain portfolios which must belong to the Commons. For example, I cannot conceive of the Minister of Finance being a member of the Senate and not of the House of Commons, because of course, he is dealing almost wholly with financial and fiscal measures which must originate in the House of Commons. With regard to the British Constitutional system, it is to be observed that a member of government need not necessarily, according to the strict law of the constitution, have a seat in the House of Commons or in the Senate. Frequently, and especially upon the formation of new governments, a minister is called into the counsels of the Government by the Prime Minister although he has not a seat in either House. In practice, of course, that situation could not be long maintained, and therefore I may dismiss that feature because, generally speaking, it is necessary that Ministers of the Government should have seats either in the House of Commons or in the Senate for the purpose of dealing with the legislation which is there being discussed, of expounding Government measures, and of informing the two Chambers as to government policy. There are certain departments which I think should be represented in the Commons, although I should not like to lay down a hard-and-fast rule. The Department of Finance is clearly one of them. It has been the practice ever since Confederation, as I have stated, for governments to have representatives in the Senate, and so far as I am aware the leader of the Senate has always been a member of the Government, in order, as is obvious, that he may inform the Senate as to Government policy is regard to legislation before it.

I took the trouble, in connection with this resolution, to look up the practice of the various ministries with regard to Senate representation, and my hon. friend is entirely in error in supposing that this Government is in any singular or anomalous position, much less one open to criticism, by reason of having three members in the Senate. In the Administration of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Alexander Campbell was Minister of Justice and leader of the Senate; and when Sir John A. Macdonald died, there were, I think, two members of his Administration without portfolio in the Senate. My hon. friend will find that under the succeeding Prime Ministers, Sir John Abbott, Sir John Thompson, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and Sir Charles Tupper, there was in the case of each Administration a representation of two or three members of the Government in the Senate; and always, I believe, the leader of the Senate, under the Administrations of which I have spoken, was a member of the Government of the day. Further than that, Sir Mackenzie Bowell when Prime Minister was leader of the Senate. Coming down to the Liberal Administration of the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier—of whom I have always understood my hon. friend was a devoted follower and admirer—we find that instead of the number of members of the Government having been diminished in his regime it was if anything enlarged. My hon. friend declares that he is taking advanced Liberal ground. Well, he is criticising rather severely in his remarks some men whom the people thought were fairly advanced Liberals.

Mr. EULER: I did not say Liberal; I said democratic.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, if my hon. friend desires to dissociate Liberalism from democracy—

Mr. EULER: No, no.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: —I am quite prepared to allow him to do so; but I do not know what the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have said to him if he had suggested that he, Sir Wilfrid, was not a democrat, and was not in favour of democratic government. I do not know what the late Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat would have said to my hon. friend if he had made the suggestion that he also, although a Liberal, was not in favour of democratic government. And I would point out, with reference to the last-named statesman, who so long carried the banner of Liberalism in the province of Ontario, and indeed in Dominion affairs as well, that when he joined the Liberal Administration in 1896 he became Minister of Justice and at the same time took a seat in the Senate and became its leader. Then there was another noted statesman of whom I used to hear in the old days, and who I thought was a fairly advanced Liberal. I think he would turn in his grave to-night if any hon. gentleman, especially on the other side, suggested that he was not a Liberal and a believer in democratic government. I refer to that old fighting Liberal, the late Sir Richard Cartwright, who became a member of the Senate and its leader, and who, while he occupied that position in the Senate, held one of the most important portfolios in the Government—the portfolio of Trade and Commerce. Would my hon. friend suggest for one moment that any of the departments mentioned here to-night is of more importance to the business and commercial life of the country than the Department of Trade and Commerce? I do not believe the hon. member would put forward that view for an instant. There was another man whose name was known in every Liberal household throughout Canada,—the Hon. Sir Richard Scott. He was a strong Liberal, and I believe that he would have said, and all of his associates would have said, that he was in favour of democratic government and of the principles of democracy. He was Secretary of State in the Laurier administration and was also a member of the Senate. In addition to those I have mentioned,—Sir Oliver Mowat, Sir Richard Cartwright and Sir Richard Scott—there were, I believe, two other members of the Laurier Administration who had seats in the Senate; one was Hon. Mr. Templeman and the other Mr. Hyman. So that we have an unbroken practice—

Mr. McKENZIE: Who was the last-named gentleman?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Hyman.

Mr. McKENZIE: He was not in the Senate.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, I am mistaken in regard to him. However, since Confederation we have had an unbroken practice of all administrations, Conservative and Liberal, as well as the Unionist Government of to-day, having representatives of the Government in the Senate.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend say that Mr. Templeman was a member of the Senate?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have a note to that effect.

Mr. ROBB: Not when he was a minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend would like to have the Hon. Mr. Hyman and the Hon. Mr. Templeman eliminated, I shall be content with Sir Oliver Mowat, Sir Richard Cartwright and Sir Richard Scott. I was pointing out that all governments since Confederation have had representation in the Senate. So far from defending that system, I put forward the view that with the constitution as it is to-day no other course is practicable. I put that view forward for the reason that the Senate is a body of co-ordinate legislative jurisdiction with this House with the exception that money votes have to originate here as well as bills providing for taxation. Another name that I had overlooked has been called to my attention by an hon. member—that of the Hon. David Mills. No hon. gentleman on the other side of the House would challenge for one moment the Liberalism or fidelity to democratic principles of the Hon. David Mills. Why, he was one of the Apostles of Liberalism. When my hon. friend finds fault with the Union Government for having representation, as we have it to-day, in the Senate, he is by implication visiting very severe censure upon the liberalism of those who were highest in the counsels of the Liberal party, its leaders and, as I have said, its apostles. I have no doubt that my hon. friend had his early teaching in Liberal principles from those whom he is impliedly censuring to-night by reason of the fact that they concurred in the principle of representation of the Government in the Senate.

I do not know what view my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) will take in regard to this but we shall hear in due course. I am not censuring those leaders of Liberalism. I repeat that under our system as it exists to-day, no other course is open to a government but to have representation in the Senate. Bills originate in this House involving matters of Government policy. Bills also originate in the Senate involving matters of Government policy. For the despatch of business it is very desirable that the Government should be able to initiate Bills in the Senate as well as in the House of Commons if for no other reason than to save time. But even as to Bills originating in the House of Commons and which go to the Senate, they must be adopted there. The policy of the Government must be explained with respect to those Bills because the Senate must concur in them before they can finally receive the assent of the Governor General and become law.

Fancy the situation that would exist with no member of the Government in the Senate to indicate the policy of the Government in regard to particular measures and to guide its deliberations in respect to Bills of any character, financial, fiscal or otherwise, which had been introduced by the Government and carried through this House. It seems perfectly clear to me that there must be representation of the Government in the Senate. I think the leader of the Senate should be a member of the Government. Although I am rather in favour of limiting the number of members of the Government in the Senate, because this is the popular chamber, I see no objection, as the governments of which I have spoken saw no objection, but on the other hand I see an advantage in having representation of the Government of the day in the Senate. Otherwise, I am satisfied that the business of legislation would not proceed with the despatch that is desirable; nor with the co-ordination of work that should exist as between the two Houses.

My hon. friend has spoken about the fact that the Postmaster General and the Minister of Labour occupy seats in the Senate. In past Administrations the Minister of Justice frequently occupied a seat in the Senate. The Secretary of State in some Administrations occupied a seat in the Senate. The important Department of Trade and Commerce was represented by Sir Richard Cartwright under the Laurier Administration and the important Department of Agriculture has been on more than one occasion represented in the Senate. Where is the difficulty from the standpoint of conveying information to this House as to Estimates or as to the administration of some department which happens to be represented in the Senate. Take the Postmaster General's department, one of his colleagues is here to answer questions which may be asked of the Prime Minister and to deal with his Estimates when they are before the House. Another colleague, the acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, is here to represent the Minister of Labour in this Chamber, to answer questions and to declare the position of the Government in regard to any matter which may come within the jurisdiction of that important department. My hon. friend used a very strong term in regard to the Union Government. He does not seem to like the Union Government—it is hard for me to understand that.

Mr. GAUVREAU: There are lots of reasons.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I know that my hon. friend (Mr. Gauvreau) has a very much more kindly feeling towards the Government and he would not express himself in such strong terms. My hon. friend's resolution has stated that the policy of this Government in having the Postmaster General a member of the Senate and the Minister of Labour a member of the Senate is an arrogant defiance of the will of the people. If that is so, it seems to me that he must apply it to the preceding Administration.

Mr. EULER: That statement was made entirely with regard to the retaining of the Postmaster General after the people had expressly declared that he had not their confidence.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Was it in arrogant defiance of the will of the people for Sir Richard Cartwright to represent the Liberal government in the Senate? Should he have gone to the country to be elected after having been appointed to the Senate?

Mr. EULER: He was not defeated.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend confines it to one case, but it seems to me that, if it was arrogant defiance of the will of the people to appoint, under the constitution, a citizen to the Senate, and afterwards appoint him to a membership in the Government, or if he chanced to be a member of the Government to retain him, then I say precisely the same remark must apply in the case of any other citizen, or former minister, who was appointed to the Senate and retained a seat in the Senate and his position in the Government without having been endorsed by the people.

I pointed out that we must take the constitution as it is, and as it is the Senate is an appointed body. This Government is only following the practice of all governments since Confederation in having a portion of its membership represented in the Senate of Canada. I have shown, I think, that for convenience of legislation in the two Houses it is absolutely necessary that the Government should be represented there, and in view of all the considerations put forward, it would appear to me that this House would be very slow indeed to adopt a resolution of such far-reaching effect, so far-reaching as to seriously affect the legislative machinery of this country, set up at the time of Confederation, and consisting as it does, not only of the House of Commons, but of the Senate. So long as the Senate is a part of our constitution, until the constitution is changed it appears to me that this Government, or succeeding Governments, will be found to have a representation in the Senate if they are to have proper regard to the efficient despatch of the legislation which comes before Parliament.

It is not necessary that I should refer to the situation which exists in Great Britain. My honourable friend would hardly contend that Great Britain is not a democracy. Great Britain has been fighting the battle of democracy in this war, and has been pretty successful in fighting it. It has been the democratic spirit which has animated Britain which has enabled her to win the war, but what is the practice there? We find that in democratic Britain Lord Kitchener was Minister of War, and occupied a seat in the Lords. Will my honourable friend contend that Lord Kitchener was debarred from occupying the position of Minister of War at the outbreak of hostilities because he occupied a seat in the House of Lords? And what shall we say with regard to Lord Milner and Lord Curzon?

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Is the Acting Prime Minister giving those as examples of British democracy?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no hesitation in giving the Right Honourable Lloyd George as a shining example of British democracy. My honourable friend would not dissent from that surely? And my honourable friend knows how the Right Honourable Lloyd George has constituted his government to-day. So that I think we can put on one side the talk about the violation of democratic principle in this Government having three representatives in the Senate.

Now my honourable friend has put forward his resolution and delivered a very interesting speech in support of it. I have given the reasons which, in my view, should influence the House in rejecting it. I think that while the constitution remains as it is we should not lay down the principle in this House that no Government should have one or more of its members in the Senate, which is a component part of Parliament, and, in my view therefore the resolution should be negatived.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton South and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I do not find it necessary in answering the argument of the honourable leader of the Government, to make any pronouncement as to any views that I may entertain myself in regard to whether or not members of the Senate should be members of this, or any Government. The honourable member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has put his case very clearly and very strongly, and I think that in a democratic country like Canada, and in a democratic House such as this, it is well that questions of this kind should be brought forward and discussed in the open so that people in the country may know what our views are. In my humble judgment, Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Government did not answer the argument of the mover of the resolution at all. The honourable member for North Waterloo admitted that it has been the practice since Confederation for members of the Senate to be members of the various governments. Notwithstanding this admission the leader of the Government, having no other course, built up this man of straw, and when he had that effigy well built and of very good proportions, started in to demolish it. He made a fairly good job of demolishing his straw man. because there was nobody to interfere—the effigy was unprotected from his very vigorous attack. There is no question about any man's ability to put up that kind of man and knock him down. But that is not the question at all. The question is whether or not in this democratic country, in this great Canada of ours, at this particular juncture when we say that old things have passed away, when this democratic Union Government which we now have tells us that everything has become new—there are no Grits, there are not even any Tories according to its dictum. The old landmarks, they tell us, are forever swept away, or put to one side. Such being the doctrine, and gospel of the Union Government, if everything else of old habits must disappear, and forever, this undemocratic idea of members of an irresponsible body being members of a responsible government, should also disappear? That is the spirit, object, and principle of the resolution of the hon. member for North Waterloo. But the leader of the Government says there must be Government representation in the Senate. I agree that it is and has been the custom to have a member of the Government in the Senate as a sort of intermediary between that House and the Government.

It does not follow that the man who is that intermediary should have any particular responsibility to the people of this country or should be an administrator at all. Up to a short time ago Sir James Lougheed, although the recognized leader of the Government in the Senate, had no portfolio, and with that condition of affairs no person had any fault to find. But the moment that a man who is a senator and not responsible to the people, a man who cannot be called upon to go before the electorate and give an account of his stewardship, becomes the spender of the people's money as the Senate may tell him to expend it, he should be responsible to the people. It is absolutely impossible, Mr. Speaker, to think of responsible Government if that is not done, because the true essence and meaning of responsible Government is that the Government collectively and individually is responsible to the people and must submit its actions to their final judgment. If that Administration is to a large extent governed by a body that is not obliged to go to the electorate for a verdict in favour of or against its Administration, it is no longer responsible. It is along those lines that my hon. friend moving this resolution is asking the opinion of this House.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Now, let me say to the hon. leader of the Government that only a few days ago—last Friday, was it not?—he took a spasmodic fit in favour of wide-open democracy in the shape of the Daylight Saving Bill; but I think, as was hinted on this side of the House, that was something that he was quite willing to get clear of, he was willing to be generous in disposing of that he hated to have anything to do with, and he let us have our full fling.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A final fling.

Mr. McKENZIE: He said in effect, "They think they are having something they are really not getting, and I am delighted to be clear of it and to let them get into all the hot water they please over it." But now when it comes down to a question that is more democratic, that goes to the very heart of democracy—and we have some very good democrats in this House—he cracks the whip at his followers and says, "This must not be accepted," and whether our friends, the supporters of the Government, think this is a democratic idea or not, the ground is cut from under their feet and they must not think at all for themselves, but simply as the Government thinks.

The leader of the Government put forward a few arguments as to why we should have representation in the Senate. If we turn to the Government of the United States, Mr. Speaker, we find that it is governing a hundred million people and has not a representative in either the Senate or the House of Representatives. Still it gets along splendidly, and if the United States Government gets along with the governing of a hundred million people without a representative in Congress, surely this Canada of ours with only eight million people, having full representation of the Government through elected members of this House, can get along without a representative in the Senate.

My hon. friend is a good lawyer, and I presume above everything else he is a good constitutional lawyer. I am sure he is not trying to tell us that the Senate is in all respects the same as this House as far as the representation of the people is concerned. He tells us that it is important that the Senate should know what the Government policy is. They have nothing to do, Sir, with Government policy; they are supposed to be paid by the people as an independent body, as a check upon the legislation of this House, absolutely free from party bias one way or the other. That is their function, and that is their position.

It is not necessary therefore, if they are properly discharging that function, to tell them how the wind blows as far as Government policy is concerned; although I do not object to somebody being in the Government without portfolio who can tell the Senate what the policy of the Government is, but they are not so very busy but they might read Hansard and see what is going on in this House. Perhaps it is necessary to chew the food for them and put it in their mouths, but I do not think that is the type of men they are. I think they are willing to read the Bills we send down for their consideration without somebody going over them and telling them what is in them. I do not think it is at all necessary that on the grounds set forth by the hon. gentleman we should have members of the Senate in the Government.

Now about the question of Labour. The hon. minister knows that that is a department of comparatively recent origin. It has been created for the purpose of giving labour a special voice in this House through a minister, and if there is any department of our Government that requires to be in immediate touch with the legislative body, that department is the Department of Labour, because every hour something arises in this House, some questions to be asked by the men who are here fresh from the people and who are in touch with labour feelings and labour wants. There should be a man sitting in this House, and I submit to the Acting Prime Minister that it was always the intention from the inception of this Department of Labour that the minister presiding over it would be in this House. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Government that they have no business to take the Minister of Labour, I care not how excellent a man he may be, and place him in the seclusion of the Senate where we who represent labour have never an opportunity of presenting our views to him. He should be sitting in this House and hearing what we say.

I have no advice to give my hon. friend who moved this resolution. I do not wish to establish a precedent that my hon. friend who leads the Government might think would be detrimental to the established principles that we have been following in this country, but I think the purpose of the resolution would be served just as well if it were not pressed to a vote.

Mr. EULER: The leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) has so well answered the arguments of the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) that very little is left for me to say. The Acting Prime Minister, being a lawyer, apparently has more respect for precedent than I have. I admitted that the practice we have discussed to-night has been followed in the past, but I am not prepared to admit that because of that it was a correct practice to follow. After all, the Acting Prime Minister was quoting persons in the way of precedents, whereas I was trying to impress principles. He has not answered the argument that ministers in charge of important portfolios involving the expenditure of large sums of money should be responsible to the people through the Parliament of Canada. And the vital principle involved in this case of the Postmaster General he has avoided with great skill.

The Acting Prime Minister paid considerable attention to what may be called the constitutional phase of the question. He said that it was in accordance with the constitution that we should have members of the Cabinet in the Senate. I do not think it is mandatory or obligatory that members of the Senate should be in the Cabinet; the matter is entirely subject to the discretion of the Prime Minister or of the Cabinet itself. I am inclined to think, from the tenor of his remarks, that the Acting Prime Minister is, after all, pretty much in sympathy with what I have stated. In fact, he gave expression to the opinion that he would not like to see—he did not use the word "abuse," but I will do so—the abuse carried much further. In view of that assertion, and having regard to the probability that as a result of this we may expect an abatement of an unsound practice, and because of the fact that the Acting Prime Minister has cracked the party whip, I shall not press the motion to a division.

Motion negatived.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

PROPOSAL TO INCLUDE BOYS ENLISTED UNDER AGE.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, boys who enlisted under age and who under the regulations are not at present included in the present vocational system, shall be given vocational training in such lines as may be considered to their best interest and so as to enable them to complete their educational course interfered with by enlistment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in bringing this resolution before the House I feel that the principle which it embodies will receive a very large measure of sympathy and support from the members of the House, and,

I am quite sure, from the Government. I have purposely limited the resolution so that it applies only to boys enlisted under age. My reason for doing so was this. Many difficulties are involved in the question of vocational training in its wide, broad sense, and I recognize the perplexities with which the Government was faced in deciding just how far to go. I did feel that there could be no opposition to dealing with the class referred to in this resolution, and I made this limitation specifically to enable the Government to get the views of the House with regard to the matter. I feel sure that they will remedy this very serious defect in the system of vocational training. The great dominion of Australia has adopted this system. I state that simply as a suggestion, not particularly as an argument.

The lads who enlisted at the age of fifteen, sixteen, seventeen and eighteen, will be citizens of Canada for a long time. They are young men, starting at the very threshold of life, and for the full term of their manhood will be citizens of the country. Parliament, therefore, would assume a very serious responsibility if it interfered in any way with the prospects in life of a young man just at the beginning of his career. That is a very strong point that I wish to emphasize at the outset.

The State owes the boyhood of Canada a fair chance. The citizen owes allegiance, support and loyalty to the State; but the State has its duty to the citizen. These lads demonstrated their loyalty to the State by volunteering their services,—many of them gave up their lives at the front,—and to young fellows of that type the State owes everything they can do for them. If an error was made in allowing these young men to enlist and go overseas, the error was on the part of the State, not on the part of the boy. The boy simply showed a splendid spirit, the spirit which actuated the manhood of Canada generally; they went overseas typifying the sacrifice, and the grit, and the pluck, of the people of Canada. I wish to give one or two illustrations to bear out my arguments. A young lad enlisted at sixteen years of age and went overseas with the 65th Battalion. He received his certificate for entering High School before he enlisted. He was wounded at Regina Trench. Certain great battles or events of the war stand out from others; one of these is Regina Trench. Any boy who went through that fight and who suffered wounds there is certainly entitled to consideration. This lad has since recovered and returned to Canada after several years' service. He finds himself faced with a regulation which provides that as he is not incapacitated to carry on his previous work he is not entitled to vocational training. What was his previous work? He was a schoolboy. Mark you, this boy goes overseas, performs all the work of a man, heroically faces the enemy, suffers wounds, comes back a full-grown man—because no person could question his manhood after that—and he is asked to go back to school again where he left off, two, three, or four years before, as the case may be. The perpetuation of such a regulation is too absurd to be seriously considered by the House.

Another is the case of two brothers who went overseas. The younger enlisted at the age of fifteen. He was a big, husky boy, but the authorities knew he was under age and they kept him in Canada for six or seven months. The boy however was keen to get across and he got an opportunity to go over with one of the battalions. He was engaged in a number of battles and was wounded twice. His elder brother was also wounded, returned, and got vocational training, but this younger boy comes back to Canada and gets no vocational training at all, because when asked his vocation on enlisting he said he was a photographer. As a matter of fact he was a messenger to a photographer in Montreal. They gave him a physical examination when he returned, felt him all over and finding him physically sound, told him: "You can carry on as a photographer which was what you were engaged at before enlisting." That is another illustration, and I could give very many more.

I have here a document drawn up by students of Queen's University giving another viewpoint. Briefly, it is this: Some 110, or something like sixty per cent, of the second-year medical students at Queen's —I think the figures are limited to Queen's —went overseas and gave their trained services as orderlies in hospitals; they were not qualified to go as medical men, but gave their two years' training in the university for the benefit of the hospitals, as orderlies. They come back after a couple of years' service without any funds, for they could save very little out of an orderly's pay, and now they need assistance to complete their third year. Most of them are young fellows; some of them, though perhaps not all, under age. That is but another illustration of the imperative necessity of this House and Government recognizing the need of helping the boys to carry on their educational courses and fitting them for their vocation in life, whatever that may be.

I wish to proceed to another argument, and what I shall say is not in the way of criticism, because all this work is new to the Government and to the country, but simply in the way of suggestion to the Government. My opinion is that our present method of vocational training is too diversified; it is not under one head. It may be answered that, technically speaking, there is a head in Ottawa, but I am speaking not of the ministerial, but of the technical or professional head. As a matter of fact the training is not under one head so far as administration is concerned. In that respect each unit—and there are something like a dozen different units in Canada—carries on almost independently. Let me give an illustration of one unit with which I have some acquaintance—"J" unit, which is the unit of the province of British Columbia. On the staff of "J" unit are 57 returned men, 9 civilians, and 25 female assistants, mostly stenographers. That makes a staff of 91, which is divided as follows: 38 instructors, 8 ward aids,—that is women who assist in the wards with the cases confined to bed—and 45 administrators. There we have only 46 instructors out of a staff of 91, and I do submit that the proportion may fairly be considered as almost top heavy. The reason I draw attention to this matter is that I believe the work could be done far better if it were under a head with some special qualifications—a man, for instance, who had been a sub-head of one of our leading educational institutions or universities. A man trained in technical educational work should have supreme control of vocational training in Canada, and each unit should carry on under this central head.

Another point I wish to make in that connection is this: Instead of giving training in electrical engineering, we will say, in each of these different units, it might be very much more to the advantage of the student, and would certainly be to the advantage of the country from a financial standpoint, if the training in these various vocations could be centralized to a greater degree than at present. I will illustrate what I mean by again referring to "J" unit. In "J" unit there are certain centres where vocational training is given. At Fairmont hospital in Vancouver, I find, there are six teachers and five pupils. It is difficult to understand just what the six teachers are doing with only five pupils,—perhaps one of the pupils is particularly unruly. At another place, I find two teachers and twenty-four pupils; at another, three teachers and seventy-four pupils; at another, fourteen teachers and one hundred and fifty-nine pupils. The latter three cases are quite reasonable. At Esquimalt there are four teachers and fifteen pupils. The reason I draw the attention of the Government to this is because I believe the cost of administration, which is always advanced as an argument against expenditure on vocational training, could be very materially reduced and the efficiency of the training very much increased; and if a reorganization were effected, not one iota would be added to the cost of extending this education to the young men with whom particularly my resolution deals. Some time ago I asked some questions which have not yet been answered, and which were asked to stand as an order for a return, which has not yet been received, so I am not in a position to give exact data upon this point, but I am informed that there have been between six and seven hundred applications for vocational training from young boys who enlisted under age which have been turned down; I do not know how many more there are. Let us compare this number who would be affected by my resolution with the number of applications received,—and I do this to show that it is not such a very important matter from the standpoint of finances as we might be led to believe. I am told that the total applications for vocational training are somewhere around 12,000—from 11,900 to 12,000. That is quite a large number and will give the House an idea of the magnitude of the task which the Government have in hand. Now the point I make is this: That the administration cost for additional pupils would be comparatively slight compared with the administration cost of the training now given, and particularly so if a better organization of the system of training were effected.

I wish at this point to ask a question which I think is of vital importance. If we refuse these boys this technical or vocational training, what is to become of them? They left the country as boys out of High school or college, or from the shop; they were merely lads playing around their homes. They leave, and in a couple of years are transformed into men—a transformation that, had they remained in civil life, it would have taken probably ten or fifteen years to effect. It is unreasonable to expect that these lads in any large number will go quietly back to school to resume their education at the point at which they left off. If they will not do that—as I am sure they will not—what is their future to be? There is only one thing open to them, that is, the common labour market; I say emphatically that it would be wrong to take keen-spirited lads like these—because they were the keenest-spirited of all who enlisted—and, after they have been to the front and have rendered such admirable service, many of them returning seriously wounded, simply turn them loose and say, "Now you can go to the pick and shovel." This Parliament and this country owe to every one of them at the very least a technical education. We owe them the chance of making good in this life, and it is our bounden duty to see that they get that chance. I accordingly urge this resolution, and would bespeak for it the most serious and careful attention of the Government.

At this point I would offer another suggestion, and that is in reference to the establishment of technical schools in Canada. I believe, Sir, that this is an excellent opportunity for the Government to take advantage of the suggestions put forward in a very long report on technical education made some years ago under the authority, I think of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government. I remember having seen the report, although I had not the time to give it any careful perusal. It strongly advocated the establishment of technical schools in Canada, and if ever there was a necessity for such institutions it surely exists to-day, not only for these lads but also for other men who have been wholly or partially incapacitated. Technical schools are urgently needed, and this would be an eminently opportune time to establish them and make them a permanent institution. I do not think that there is an hon. member in the House, or an intelligent citizen in the country who will question the advisability of establishing such schools. Taking that for granted, when could a better opportunity present itself for the undertaking than at this moment? For these reasons I would impress upon the Government, and particularly upon the minister in charge of this department, the importance of technical schools for the instruction of the youths who enlisted under age as well as other men seeking technical education or vocational training. I do not desire to labour the question, but the problem facing us is one which not only merits our attention, but imposes a serious duty upon us, and I trust the Government will not pass it off with the comment that the matter is a complicated one which may open the door to serious and expensive demands from all quarters, but will realize, in its fullest significance, the fact that there are some six or seven hundred lads who enlisted under age and did their bit and who have now come back with the simple request that they be given a decent technical education to fit them for their future life work. The very least that a grateful government and people can do is to give these lads the opportunity they deserve and badly need, and for these reasons I move the resolution.

Mr. HUGH CLARK (North Bruce): Mr. Speaker, when this question first came up Canada did what I think every other country at war did. It regarded disability as the line of division between men who should be re-trained and men who should not. This was the only line that could be taken by which we could avoid what might be considered as class legislation. It may probably be argued that we have strayed from that in connection with our Soldiers' Settlement Act when we re-train men to enter into agriculture. But as against this argument it must be remembered that our object was to encourage the returned soldiers to take up agriculture, and the object of the re-training was to ascertain whether or not the applicants were fit and proper persons to whom certain loans should be given to enable them to go into farming. Outside of that I think we can say that we have so far avoided anything that might be called class legislation. I admire my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in the sympathetic attitude he takes towards the men who enlisted under age, because I am firmly convinced they were impelled by a splendid spirit of patriotism, a spirit perhaps not shown by others of maturer years; I believe, as he does, that the Government should have some regard for these young men who have devoted two, three or four of the most precious years of their lives to the service of their country—years in which their characters were forming, and in which they and their parents hoped they would be able to qualify in some profession or occupation by which to earn their livelihood.

My hon. friend suggests that he does not want to hear any reasons why this project should not be undertaken, but I must tell him that when it was first proposed it opened the door to other propositions as well. The proposal was made to us by the universities, to which it was represented by the returned men that those who wished to have an education should be given it. We had the further demand that other people who were not students should be compensated for losses in business, or should be given loans to set them up in business, and the subject assumed such large proportions that the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment decided to go no further with it. This, however, was owing to no lack of sympathy with the proposal my hon. friend has just advanced. The entire subject of university training has engaged the attention of the Repatriation Committee of the Government, a member of which committee will no doubt speak after I have concluded. The university students whose courses were interrupted, and who, perhaps, are in as bad a position as young men who enlisted under age, must also be considered, and that is a matter that will have to come before the Government. I can well understand the arguments of my hon. friend with respect to all these classes of men. He has anticipated the contention that might be made as regards increased cost, by giving us the cost of organization and of maintenance, and he has suggested that there should be more centralization. Had I expected these arguments I might be in a better position to meet them. However, I wish to say that the young men in whom my hon. friend has shown such sympathetic interest have the same interest and sympathy from myself.

Mr. F. L. DAVIS (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I regret that so small a House is present to consider the question which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has brought to the fore. I also regret that I have made no preparation to address the House on this subject, but it is one that I have been interested in and I would like therefore to have a word upon it. If the wealth of the country is its manhood, as we all believe, this question is one that very greatly concerns the future of our Canadian soldiers, and more especially is it necessary that we should deal with the very young men of the class which the hon. member for Vancouver has dealt with. The very young man has not fixed his course in life; he has not as yet set before him what his life aim shall be, as the university student or the man who has chosen a professional course has. There will be a very serious void in this young man's life unless an unusual effort is made to engage his interest in its future development. I believe that Parliament is interested in getting this young man started upon a course of vocational training, the machinery for which has been largely provided. It is not a matter of extending it to the young men who can be brought into the schools and technical colleges which the Government will operate apart in any event from the question of training injured soldiers. I therefore would give my support to the proposition and earnestly commend it to the House.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to take part in this debate, but I think something should be said in support of the proposition brought forward by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. In my humble opinion, the State owes a very special debt to those boys of fifteen or sixteen who went to the front, because they never should have been allowed to go. If the State allowed them to go to the front, then the State is under an obligation to see that they are equipped to lead useful lives when they come back. I was somewhat astonished to hear the remarks made by the hon. Acting Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment (Mr. Hugh Clark). What I gathered from his remarks was that a claim was made to this Government on behalf of those boys that they should be entitled to vocational training, and that apparently this was a just claim; that again a demand was made for special training by people who had lost money, and that that was not such a just claim as the other; that these matters constituted a proposition of such tremendous importance and difficulty to the Government that the only thing they could offer to the boys at the present time was warm and sincere sympathy. I think that the young men who are in a position that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has brought before the House are entitled to something more.

Mr. HUGH CLARK (North Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I made mention of those cases because each grew out of the other and what I did say was that all these questions were matters that were engaging the attention of the Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment Department.

Mr. McMASTER: No doubt they are engaging the attention of the Government, but that the war was going to come to an end was an idea that we had been cherishing for years. Incidents of this class ought to have been considered months ago rather than, as the Government tell us, after the boys come home and are discharged from the army. It is during the first few months after they are discharged that they must be interested in some line or they will drift into those blind alleys of employment that the member for Vancouver Centre indicated. I endorse most heartily what has been said by hon. members on the other side of the House, and urge that this matter is of paramount and immediate importance. It seems to me that the Government has only to amend its regulations so as to say that all the school boys who left Canada and who served in the army should, on their return, have the right to vocational training even if they do not come within the four corners of the present regulations. These regulations could very easily be amended. It is far better that the Government should offer training to a few who perhaps do not deserve it than that they should not give any of this class of boys the training to which they are entitled.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Council): Mr. Speaker, the question brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is one of very great importance and I am sure all the members of the House are deeply interested in it. I believe the number under the age of eighteen years who enlisted, is substantially larger than my hon. friend mentions. I have not the final figures but the estimate which I have received, and which is based on the information the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment has secured is between 5,000 and 7,000. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) suggested that the enlistment of these boys should not have been permitted. I imagine that very few were knowingly permitted. I imagine that the boys gave their ages as 18 years or more in order to get overseas. I believe there were many instances of that kind. I remember on one occasion being at a camp in France where I saw a boy who was obviously under 18 years of age. I also saw a man who was obviously over military age. I said to the man who was over military age: How did this boy get over here? He turned to the boy and said: How do you come to be here? The boy replied: I got here in the same way as you did—by lying about my age. Many of the boys in their anxiety to get over, gave an age above what it actually was. I am only saying that in answer to what my hon. friend said that the Government should not have permitted them to enlist. But that they constituted an exceedingly fine body of young men no one will question. I remember many of them were brought back from France when it was found that they were under age. Last summer we saw at Bramshott a full battalion of young boys under the command of Colonel McKay of Winnipeg.

Some of those boys had one or two wound stripes on their arm, and I must say I never saw a finer battalion than that battalion composed of boys all under eighteen years of age. The majority of them had served at the front. Others had gone as far as England and were weeded out of other battalions and incorporated in this boys' battalion under the command of an able and sympathetic commanding officer, who was giving them training in England.

Now, as my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Clark) has pointed out, the basis upon which the work of the vocational branch of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is carried on is to provide an education for disabled soldiers, a disability of the soldier which prevents him from resuming his former occupation, and the training courses are established and carried on to fit him for a new pursuit. May I turn to the section of the Order in Council which defines the conditions upon which a man becomes entitled to vocational training under the regulations as they now exist:

> Any former member of the forces suffering from a disability which in the opinion of a naval or military medical board, or of a medical officer of the department, is due to or was aggravated by service, and which in the opinion of the Directors of Vocational Training of the Department prevents such former member of the forces from returning to his previous trade or principal occupation, shall be entitled to re-training for a new occupation in accordance with the regulations of the department, and to such allowances as are provided herein for former members of the forces undergoing re-training.

A great many men come within that class, and vocational training is now being carried on throughout the country at the various centres as established by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment. That training may be described under three heads.

There is the training which is being given in certain universities and schools to those who desire to enter upon a course, or a vocation, which justifies the sending of them to these schools. In other cases, where special training is required, it has beeen found necessary to establish classes conducted entirely by the department. The third method is the utilization in industries of the apprentice system, where these men are given training in shops or factories in the particular occupation which they desire to pursue, and their income is supplemented as provided in the Order in Council.

From all who have come within the classes I have referred to, special provision is made by way of pay and allowances. The allowance payable by the department to a former member of the forces who is without dependents will be $60 per month. He receives $60 a month during the whole period he is undergoing this training, as well as free instruction in the school. The allowances payable while undergoing training by the department, for a former member of the forces, who has a wife, or a wife and child, or a wife and children, is as follows:

For such former member of the Forces	$85.00 a month
For one child	10.00 a month
For two children	18.00 a month
For three children	25.00 a month
For more than three children	25.00 a month

Plus $6 a month for each child in excess of three.

The House will thus see and realize the amount that is being contributed by the Government in the case of each of these disabled men, or for a disabled man who has a wife and children. Then, corresponding allowances are made where he is a widower with dependent children. Corresponding allowances are also made where the man, though not married, has others dependent upon him, as in the case with the soldier serving at the front. In other words his position is kept as nearly as possible as it was while he was serving in the army, and he draws pay and allowances during the period he is undergoing training.

It is quite true, as has been pointed out, that this provision does not apply to those who are not disabled, and this raises a very important question. It applies with particular force to those under eighteen years of age. But, as my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark) has mentioned, it has been pressed upon the Government that the relief should not be limited to those under eighteen years, but that provision should be made for all whose education has been interrupted. It is only necessary to point out that the average cost per man of vocational training is about $1,000, to indicate the amount of the charge which would be placed upon the country if many thousands more were brought within the provisions of the existing regulations.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the $1,000 include the cost of administration and plant? Does it represent the whole cost?

Mr. ROWELL: Approximately the whole cost.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister will realize that the larger the number the smaller the individual cost.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so, that would reduce the administration charge undoubtedly. The number undoubtedly will steadily and rapidly increase as the troops come back, and as the disabled men return from the hospitals in England. Therefore it is anticipated that there will be a large increase in the number that even under the existing regulations will require treatment in the vocational institutions provided. While that is all true, everything that has been said about these boys is also perfectly true. Undoubtedly it is a matter of serious moment to Canada, and to all the nations at war, that so large a percentage of young men, just at the age when character is being formed, and when they must get their education, if they are to get it under the most advantageous conditions, were called upon to serve their country at the front and have been deprived of these educational opportunities. Unless these young men do receive an education now we will undoubtedly suffer in the future in the educational leadership of our country. I am sure all will recognize that at no period of our history was it more important that we should have our citizens, and particularly those who will be the leaders of our people, thoroughly trained and given the best education that is available in order that they may render to the State the service which that education should qualify them to render. As my hon. friend (Mr. Hugh Clark) has said, this whole problem is receiving the earnest consideration of the Government. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment is looking into the number who will be affected by a provision for those under eighteen years. We are also looking into the question of the boys whose university course has been interrupted, to see what financial obligation would be involved if anything is attempted in that direction. This question has been considered by the Repatriation Committee of the Cabinet, and a report has been prepared upon the matter, which will come before the Government for consideration probably within a few days. In view of that fact I must ask my hon. friend, who has very properly brought this matter to the attention of the House, if, having done so, he could see his way clear to withdraw the motion. It is a matter involving governmental policy which is receiving the earnest attention of the Government at the present time, and upon which an announcement may be expected in the near future.

One other matter I might mention. My honourable friend referred to technical education and the opportunity this would offer the Government for dealing with the suggestions contained in the report on technical education which was made some few years ago by the Commission appointed by the Government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Might I draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that in the Speech from the Throne there is an announcement that a Bill will be brought down this session providing for vocational training. A Bill will be introduced into the House this session dealing with the question and providing substantial assistance for the work of technical education in the different provinces of the Dominion. There can be no doubt of the importance of technical education, of the great practical benefits which would result to the industrial life of the country if we had a larger trained body, such as we might secure by the enlargement of existing institutions or the establishment of others where technical education might be given.

Mr. WILLIAM F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, before this resolution is withdrawn by its mover I would like to say a word or two on behalf of the principle enunciated during the debate. As the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) has said, to avoid legislation being thought to be class legislation, those responsible for the promulgation of the regulations affecting vocational training established the principle that vocational training should only be given to those who through disability had been impaired in their trade or occupation as practised before the war. That admits that the soldier prior to enlistment—not the schoolboy, but the soldier who had a trade or occupation—was in a position then to earn his living, and that if his disability was of such a character that on his return he could not earn his living, then the State recognized its responsibility to give him such a training as would enable him to earn a living in another sphere of activity. But when you come to apply that principle to the position of the schoolboy, you find yourself confronted with this difficulty. The schoolboy at the time of his enlistment—and I am speaking now particularly of the boy in our high schools and our secondary schools—was not in a position to earn a living; he was building the foundation on which he hoped later on to earn a living. He went over as a boy of sixteen or seventeen, the companion of girls at school with short skirts and flowing curls and of boys in knickerbockers—children so to speak living at home, kept in the parental establishment at the minimum of cost. He spent two, three or four years at the front. He returned, not a boy of seventeen, but a man of twenty-one, and not only a man of twenty-one in years, but a man of probably twenty-five in experience, in aspirations and in instincts. He cannot return to the secondary school which he left three or four years ago, he must go into the university, where his class fees are greater, and his maintenance higher, and where the general average of living costs are much more than when he was a schoolboy.

What is going to become of the young man? He cannot go back to school, because there is no place there for him. If means are not provided for him and—I speak of him who has not been born with a silver spoon in his mouth—if he has not the means to contiue his education he must give it up. If he had not a trade or occupation prior to going to the war, what is he to do? Because he was willing to sacrifice his future when seventeeen years of age is he to go back to the very roughest of trades, to become a manual labourer? I do not believe that that is the desire or the intention of the Government, and I am impressed to-night by what the President of the Privy Council said, that this Government appreciates the necessities of the situation and is endeavouring to find a solution for them. And the President of the Privy Council is quite correct when he says that the problem does not stop with the boy who went to the front when he was seventeeen years of age. I am confronted in my own riding, more particularly in the university with which I happen to have the honour to be connected, with the troubles of the medical students and students of the School of Science. The universities did magnificently in the war. I have not the figures as fully as I would have had them had I any expectation of this debate, but I know the Royal Military College lost in the neighbourhood of 150 of its graduates and undergraduates; that Toronto University lost somewhere in the neighbourhood of 550; that McGill—I regret I have not the figures—

An hon. MEMBER: A very large contribution.

Mr. NICKLE: —but I know McGill gave a magnificent contribution to the war, and Queen's University sacrificed 150 of its graduates and under-graduates. But not only did we sacrifice many men through death, many of our best—and they were the leaders in university life—were impelled by the call of duty when war broke out to go to the front in the most, I was going to say menial, capacity. Medical students of three and four years' standing went as hospital orderlies earning only enough to keep them at the front. Then when they return to Canada after giving two or three years from the creative period of their life they find that the six months' course has been extended to eight months, and when they look about to seek employment to put them through they find in these disturbed times that there is no employment to be had, and they are obliged either to seek financial assistance or abandon their course. Last Saturday when in Kingston I was waited upon by a delegation of medical students who explained to me, speaking for their class, that unless they were granted assistance by way of donation, or unless some other financial arrangements were made, it was impossible for many of them to see how their academic course could be completed.

The universities are impressed with the necessity of making up to these young men the years they have lost in the war, and some of them this year are running summer sessions so that a man who is anxious because of the lack of the wherewithal for the more extended course may in two years take the four years' course, that is, in one-half the ordinary academic course he can fit himself for his chosen profession.

I sincerely trust that the Government will give this matter most careful and immediate consideration, because I am impressed with this fact, that if there is one class more than another that has paid a terriffic penalty in this war it is that class which is composed of the leading spirits in our university and educational life, and in the years to come it is absolutely essential that as promptly as possible these men who went down to death be replaced by other men of the same high spirit, vigour of thought and intellectual quality, if Canada is not to feel more severely than she should the sacrifices she has been called upon to make in this war.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have not anything particular to add to what has been so well said by the mover of the resolution and by the other hon. gentlemen who have spoken, but silence on my part, on account of the position which I hold, might be construed as indicating that I have no special interest in this resolution, when the contrary is the fact. I agree entirely with what has been said by the mover of the resolution as to the very great importance of allowing those young men to get within the scope of the vocational training which is now being given, Nothing should be allowed to stand in the way. I suggest to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), who seems to speak with authority for the Government on this question, that no time be lost in enabling these young men to get the advantages which others are receiving from this branch of education. The country generally has reason to find fault with the Government for being slow in connection with these matters.

The member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) mentioned technical education. That is a matter that has been receiving the attention of this House for many years. Ever since 1910, when a commission was appointed by the Government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier to inquire into the matter, it has received the attention of the country in concrete form. The Government of Sir Robert Borden, early in its lifetime, found in its archives the report of this Commission. I have distinct recollection of this matter coming up in the House every year and of promises repeatedly made that some action would be taken. But eight years have gone by and nothing has been done either by this Government or by the Government preceding it—which was, to my mind, just the same Government under a somewhat different name. And to-night when a supporter of the Government asks what is to be done about technical education, he is told that somewhere, sometime, something may come forth into actuality. Technical education is at all times important; to-day it is more important than ever. If the Government wish to give the industries of this country a good start and a good standing, let them stop high protection and devote their attention to technical education. The industries will then be put upon a good footing, efficiency will be brought about in our producing centres, and our manufacturing industries will have such a superior standing in the world that protection will no longer be required. I make this argument not in a broad sense of talking politics or tariffs, but simply to illustrate the great necessity of putting the young men and young women who are to be the producers of our country on an equal footing with those of any other part of the world by giving them technical training.

In the province from which I come we have an excellent technical college; I am proud to say that Nova Scotia was the first province, with its small means, to build up a first class institution of that kind. That technical college is affiliated with the universities in our own province; students holding two-years' certificates from any recognized college in Canada may finish the other two years in our technical college and get their degree. I do not know how many of the other provinces have similar institutions, but I am sure that institutions of that kind can be made sufficiently strong and sufficiently important to be self-sustaining and to be of great benefit not only to the provinces in which they are established, but to the whole country as well. After we get well on our feet in establishing these institutions throughout the provinces, we could have a great central institution for the whole of Canada. But, to begin with, we should have institutions in the various provinces, supported by such sums of money out of the Treasury of the country as will enable them to be put upon a first class and efficient footing and carry on such technical education as is recommended by the Robertson Commission Report now in the hands of the Government.

I fully agree with the arguments put forth by the mover of this resolution, and I hope that what he has in mind will be carried out at once by those who have charge of vocational training; and, further, that the matter of technical education and the carrying out of the terms of the report to which I have referred will be taken up by the Government as soon as possible. I hope that the Government will move; I hope they will start up and do some work. We on this side of the House are ready to meet them and help them along. From day to day, when items of Government work on the Order Paper are reached, the response is given: "Stand"—"Stand"—"Stand"—nobody ready to do anything. When we come to have a long dreary session in the hot summer, we shall be blamed on this side for blocking the business of the House, whereas we are doing nothing of the kind. We invite the Government to get along with their work, and we will help them; we will help them particularly with this technical education and in the carrying out of the ideas suggested by the resolution of the member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. STEVENS: The Acting Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment (Mr. Hugh Clark), said that the basis upon which vocational training was granted to returned soldiers was that of disability. I appreciate, as I stated a moment ago, the perplexities with which those administering this department have been faced; but I think they have had sufficient experience now to have the matter well in hand. I should like to emphasize the fact that I have limited the application of the resolution to boys who enlisted under age. This, I think, is a fair answer to the suggestion that it opens the door to many other claims. The President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) stated that my figures were very much out when I gave 700 as the number of applicants of boys under age for vocational training. He gives the alarming figure of 5,000.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will pardon me; I gave 5,000 not as the number of applicants, but as the number under age who enlisted.

Mr. STEVENS: I say that this figure is an alarming one; it emphasizes the gravity of the problem with which we are faced. The further argument is made that the boys who enlisted under age are personally to blame because they described themselves as being older than they were. Surely the medical examiners would not pass 5,000 boys who were under age—that is a very large number. If true, it certainly does not reflect much credit on the medical examiners. I can easily understand that a great many would get through. I know boys personally who enlisted when under age and who were quite well known to be under age by the military authorities who accepted them. The cost of training 5,000 boys at $1,000 each would be $5,000,000, and what the House and the Government must consider is this: Is it worth $5,000,000 to take 5,000 boys out of the cesspool of ignorance and put them on the highway to decency and capability? In justification I may say it is not my fault I did not get the right figures. I think if the minister had given me about two hours in his office I could have got the figures exactly. I am sure they must be easily available on short notice, and I cannot understand why the figures have not been given in answer to the question I asked over two weeks ago. At all events, the Bill is in preparation and

I am willing at the request of the Government to withdraw this resolution at present. But in all courtesy and in a perfectly kind spirit, I am going to advise the Government that if the principle of this resolution is not included in the Bill when brought down I shall exercise my freedom as a citizen of Canada and as a member of this House to fight the Bill to a finish, because I feel this is too important a matter to be lightly dealt with. I do not say that with any desire to harass the Government, but I think the expression of opinion here to-night should be quite sufficient for the Government to include such a provision in the Bill as is sought by this resolution. I wish to thank the Government for saying they are going to bring down the Bill.

Motion withdrawn.

ST. CHARLES RIVER IMPROVEMENTS —THE KING V. BELANGER.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX moved:

For a copy of all papers, records, and other documents, in the case of His Majesty the King, Appellant, and Pierre Edouard Emile Belanger, Respondent, now pending in the Supreme Court of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last year on two occasions I brought this matter before the House, and I wish now just to point out very briefly the facts of this case. As you are aware, some years ago the Government decided to build a dam on the River St. Charles at Quebec. A gentleman by the name of Belanger was the proprietor of two beach lots on the River St. Charles, and when the time came to build the dam in question expropriation proceedings were taken, and a petition was entered before the Exchequer Court, where the respondent Belanger, who was the plaintiff in the court below, claimed from the Government the sum of $800,000 in round figures; this seemingly representing 50 cents per square foot for one of the two lots and 35 cents per square foot for the other. His Majesty the King was represented in this case by a very eminent counsel from Levis, Mr. Bernier, who has been the batonnier of the bar in that district and, if I mistake not, for the whole province of Quebec. Mr. Bernier denied that Belanger had any valid title to these two lots, denied also that the portion of these lots situate between high and low water marks were always water lots situate in the estuary of the River St. Charles and covered with the waters thereof, and affirmed that said lots always formed part of the Crown lands and were never legally granted to anybody. That was one of the pleas filed by the Crown as represented by its counsel. Then it was averred that even if the respondent proved his title, a reasonable sum ascertained under the provisions of the Expropriation Act should be paid him for the value of such lands and the damages resulting therefrom. The enquete took place. Mr. Justice Audette of the Exchequer Court, went to Quebec and quite an array of witnesses was summoned before him. Finally, on the 28th of June, 1917, judgment was rendered. The Court held that the respondent had proven his title and was entitled to recover the value of the lands. The amount awarded by Mr. Justice Audette for the two lots totalled $215,925.10, with interest. To that amount the judge added the 10 per cent which is allowed in some cases owing to peculiar circumstances. This 10 per cents, at the rate of 10 cents a square foot, represented the sum of $21,592.51. The case was appealed by His Majesty the King and came up before the Supreme Court last year when this Parliament was in session. In his factum the counsel for the Crown stated that the Crown accepted the judgment of the Exchequer Court as regards the larger amount, but appealed as regards the smaller sum of $21,592.51. When the case came up before the Supreme Court one of the judges appeared to be surprised at the way in which it had been conducted, and inquired of counsel if the Crown were really appealing only as regards the smaller award, or as regards the larger sum as well. On counsel insisting that the appeal was in respect of the smaller sum only, the court of its own initiative stopped the case and decided to ask that new instructions be given to counsel. This attracted my attention as it appeared in the press, and I was curious enough to look at the record of the case. To my amazement I found some startling developments in it. I discovered that Mr. Justice Audette had reluctantly made the award after witnesses had been heard in the city of Quebec. He said:

The lands in question were acquired by the suppliant for the sum of $18,165.32, and were practically yielding no revenue save the renting of one house on lot 513, and pasture on lot 560. These lots lie in the estuary of the river St. Charles, and are nothing but a stretch of muddy soil upon which in the case of 560 some marine grass grows upon which cattle may feed; but the land is entirely covered by water at high tide, and the lot has been practically idle and no use has been made of it for years and years. Wharves may be built upon the same, as wharves may be built in fields, but it has no access to deep water, except to the height of the water brought in by the tide. Lot No. 513 is impracticable for building purposes. It is a beach lot. Some of the witnesses were candid enough to say, they thought the property had very little value, but it might have value for public purposes and assessed it on that basis. In other words, that the property was of very little value to the owner, but might be of some good value to a party expropriating for public purposes, or for a scheme like the present works. However, it is now settled law that in assessing compensation for property taken under compulsory powers, it is not proper to consider as part of the market value to the owner such value as the land taken may have to the party expropriating when viewed as an integral part of the proposed work or undertaking.

The Court must guard against fostering speculating in expropriation matters, and must not encourage the making of extravagant claims, and more especially must guard against being carried away by the subtle arguments of real estate speculators or expert witnesses and thus render the execution of public works impossible or prohibitive. While the owner must be amply compensated in that he shall be no poorer after the expropriation, it is no reason to charge the public exchequer with exorbitant compensation built upon an imaginary or speculative basis. These remarks I must confess are provoked by the extravagant amount of the claim of the suppliant, namely the sum of $800,085.65 for a property which cost him, a few years before, the sum of $18,165.37 as above set forth, and more especially when the property has been idle for years and years and the public work in question herein is the only thing which will give it any value. I feel I am perhaps allowing too high an amount for a property composed of waste flats and beach entirely covered with water at high tides, which a few years ago cost in round figures $18,000 and which had been for years practically unproductive and has been a charge upon the owner, the taxes being larger than the revenues, and but for the public work in question would have very likely remained idle for years to come.

However, the judge rendered his judgment, and to the sum of $215,925.10 he added 10 per cent for compulsory taking—because the land had been taken against the owner's will—the total sum being $237,517.61. Now I confess that when I read this judgment, and the appeal therefrom, I was startled to find that for a property consisting of two beach lots on the St. Charles river which had cost the owner originally $18,000, and which did not produce enough revenue for years and years to pay the taxes, His Majesty the King should pay over $237,000. This was acquired for a public work which, I am informed, has been abandoned.

Mr. MORPHY: Has the hon. gentleman discovered in the record the evidence upon which the judge based his finding allowing $215,000?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have not the evidence before me, but I had it last year. The evidence, with the plans, is filed in the Supreme Court. The evidence is very lengthy. I found that last year no expert appraiser had been called as a witness. Several neighbours and friends had been called. When the man from whom this property was purchased died his estate had been obliged to pay the inheritance tax to the provincial government and a declaration was filed which, had it been filed in this case, would have proven that the estate attached no value whatsoever to these lots. Yet, that evidence was not adduced before the judge. The judge reluctantly granted that enormous amount of $237,000 for a property which was bought for $18,000 and which for years had not produced enough to pay the taxes.

The judges of the Supreme Court were startled, stopped the case and told the counsel for the Government that he should receive new instructions from the Department of Justice. What I want to know from the Minister of Justice, or his representative, is whether or not new instructions have been issued, whether new evidence has been adduced and just what the Government intends to do in this matter.

With the present financial condition of the country it would be nothing short of scandalous that this enormous amount of money should be paid to land speculators especially when the object for which the construction was made—a dam—is being abandoned by the Government. I think the House is entitled to get some explanation from the Government because, as will be shown by the record, this land was bought evidently with the view of carrying on a speculation at the expense of the taxpayers. The Government has been warned. On two occasions last year I called the attention of the House to this case and I am informed that the case was lately given a re-hearing by the Supreme Court. No new instructions were issued. Possibly the judgment may be that the award of the Exchequer Court be confirmed. No doubt it will be confirmed because the Counsel for the Department of Justice accepts the award and contests it only for the smaller amount. It is something remarkable. Here is an award of $237,000 given reluctantly by the judge, as the judge so admitted. Counsel goes before the court, files his factum, introduces his case and says: Oh, well, as regards the large amount of $225,000, the Crown accepts that award, but as regards the $25,000, we intend to fight. It is a very strange circumstance indeed. The damming of the river St. Charles has been stopped, so I am informed, and yet this case goes one. Some time next fall somebody will startle the country by stating that the amount has been paid. I do not care one whit where it is that the expropriation has taken place. It would be far better for me probably not to say a word. I would be very popular in the neighbourhood if I would remain silent on this question. But I am a taxpayer, I am one of the legislators of Canada, and it is my duty as a legislator and a member of Parliament to protest against such a scandalous transaction. The Government, I repeat, has been warned, but instead of heeding the warning the Government is proceeding with the case and no action has been taken. Well, I give a last warning to the Government and I say: Retrace your steps, and stop this proceeding because it is nothing short of a scandal.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman had spent five minutes telephoning to the Department of Public Works and making inquiry there he would have understood the situation in regard to this matter and he never would have made the speech that he has made this evening. The only reason that I am saying anything in answer to what the hon. gentleman has said is that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) and my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) are absent. I am not seized of all the facts but let me say that I was in Quebec and looked over this property when I was Acting Minister of Public Works. It is true the property was expropriated, but I do not think any Minister of Public Works would have ever considered the purchase of that property even at $18,000. Certainly, I would not myself have taken it at that sum. However, the property was expropriated and the case was sent to the Exchequer Court, which is the customary procedure in expropriation proceedings. The decision of the Exchequer Court is supposed to be satisfactory to all, but what astonishes me, as well as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, was that the Exchequer Court gave judgment for $215,000. That fact not only surprised me, but it surprised the Government as a whole. I am free to admit that the case was badly handled in the Exchequer Court. I believe that if the Government had been represented by better counsel that judgment would never have been given. An appeal to the Supreme Court followed, and argument was heard in that court. However, the Department of Justice was following the case, and when it heard in court the position taken by counsel, as stated by the hon. member, a stay of proceedings was applied for and granted. The Department of Justice engaged other counsel and took the case in hand itself. If the hon. gentleman has made inquiries he must know that the department asked for a new trial, and that a new trial was granted. He must also know if he is acquainted with the facts, that the Department of Public Works has filed a plan abandoning three-quarters of the property for the reason that it does not require it. What will now happen is this: one-fourth of the property has been built on and therefore must be retained, but there will be a valuation of it. Unless we get a fair valuation there will be a further hearing in the Exchequer Court, and the Government will be represented by the best counsel it can get. When the case is tried, and judgment rendered, it will be fair and just. With the full information in his possession, which the hon. gentleman could have got by merely telephoning for it as I did, it would not have been necessary to have taken up the time of the House for one hour to-night trying to make it appear that there has been an awful scandal, whereas the facts are that three-quarters of the property that was sought to be foisted on the Government have been abandoned, that only twenty-five per cent of the property is being retained, for which a fair value will be paid, and that instead of $215,000 having been paid out not one dollar has been expended.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere): I know something of the circumstances of this case, and I know the counsel who was employed by the Government. That counsel has been the Batonnier of the Bar of Quebec, Batonnier Général of the province of Quebec, mayor of the city of Levis, member in the Quebec Legislature for the County of Levis, and is one of the most respected lawyers at the Bar of Quebec. Last year when this question came up, the Minister of Justice made this reply to an interpelation by the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux):

> There is not any doubt that the Crown was represented by counsel. The facts in regard to the direct action of the Crown are that the instructions were of the clearest possible kind, that an appeal should be made from the entire award, and the appeal which was lodged under the immediate direction of the Deputy Minister of Justice, as the departmental records will certainly show, was an appeal from the entire award.

The documents which will be filed will show that the appeal was not for the entire award, but for the ten per cent specially provided in the award by the judge of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. J. D. REID: It may be true that the appeal to the Supreme Court was made in the way that the hon. gentleman states, but it was the lawyer from Levis who made it, not the Justice Department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Under whose instructions?

Mr. VIEN: I will come to that point, because I have something more in store for the hon. minister. The Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) now acknowledges that the appeal was only for the ten per cent, and yet the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), when giving information to this House last year, said that the appeal had been made under the direction of the Deputy Minister of Justice and for the full award. We now have the evidence that the appeal was not made for the full award, but only for the ten per cent. There is something further. The hon. gentleman says the appeal was made only for the ten per cent, but it was made thorugh counsel who did not obey his instructions. Well, Sir, a few days after the session 11 p.m. closed—and the statement to which I have referred was given to the House by the Minister of Justice on the 23rd of May, 1918, the very day of prorogation—I returned to Quebec and had an interview with Mr. Bernier himself. He then told me definitely that he had written instructions to appeal only for the ten per cent. There is something very mysterious about this case. I have not the slightest doubt that the counsel engaged by the Crown to act in these proceedings tells the truth when he says he had written instructions, and it simply envelops the whole affair in greater mystery. This is particularly true when we remember that the Minister of Justice made the statement last year that the appeal was for the full award, whereas to-day we have the evidence that it was not for the full award but only for the ten per cent.

I say, Sir, that this case is really tantamount to a big scandal. It is a scandal to see the Minister of Justice give wrong information to the House on a matter of such importance. Before giving the information he should have taken steps to verify it. I am not going so far as to say that he deliberately gave wrong information, but surely when a minister of the Crown is giving an answer to a question put to him in this House his answer should be based on first-hand knowledge. It is also mysterious and almost tantamount to a scandal for a minister of the Crown to say that he gave instructions and that the appeal was for the full award, when the counsel who was retained by the Government to deal with this matter—and who is a reliable member of the Quebec Bar, one who has occupied the highest position in its gift—definitely states that he acted on the written instructions of the department. I submit that it is time we saw the bottom, and the under bottom, of the whole affair, and it seems to me that the Government should lay on the Table all the documents bearing on this case, so that we can investigate the matter fully and call to account during this session the people responsible, and not wait, as they did last year, until the last day of the session before producing the evidence.

Mr. D. D. MCKENZIE: I do not think that the Government should get off lightly on this transaction. I have facing me on the front benches of the Government four distinguished members of the Bar, and this is a legal question. I am surprised that when proceedings in the Exchequer Court and in the Supreme Court of Canada are under fire my good friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) is put forth as the chief bluffer. I do not always agree with the judgment of the leader of the Government, but on this occasion, in putting forth the Minister of Railways in a case of this character his judgment was of the very first order. The Minister of Railways started out bold and aggressive as usual, which is the first essential of a bluffer, but it fell through, Mr. Speaker, it was not half as effective as I thought it was going to be. We are now down to the rock bottom of this business, and the Government must give an account to this House and to the country as to how it is that some $250,000 of public money was almost paid, the judgment of one court delivered and almost the judgment of another, until the court itself stopped making it obligatory on the people to pay out this sum of money.

What should the Government have done about this case? I was never a minister, and possibly I never shall be, but I know what the procedure is in matters of this kind. When the Government wants land it is supposed to send a competent Government surveyor to inspect the site, make a plan of the land required and report on its value. In this case we find that after the matter has gone through the courts and we have almost paid $250,000, it is discovered that it is only a quarter of the land that they want. Is that good business, is that the kind of procedure that this Government will countenance? They never even procured an estimate of the value of the land. Having obtained a report and valuation the department should have tendered the money to the owner of the land. Was that done in this case? The Minister of Railways said to-night that he went on the ground as a casual observer, that he was merely acting on behalf of some other minister, that he considered it was ridiculous to pay the sum of money that had been suggested. The department should have obtained a valuation of the land, tendered the owner the amount of the valuation, and if he refused to take the amount he could go to the Exchequer Court at his own risk, for if the Exchequer Court found the property was not worth any more than the amount tendered, he would have to pay the cost of the proceedings. That is the way this business should have been carried through.

I submit, that there was the greatest possible bungling and negligence in this transaction, from start to finish that ever came before this House, and that this attempt to bluff it off is something not worthy of consideration. I think it is hardly fair to the lawyer who acted in the case, who was not instructed fully as to the facts, and who was evidently made a scapegoat to allow this business to go through to answer some sinister motive that evidently some speculator in touch with partisan authority had in mind in the whole transaction. There is not a word of evidence here from the Government that the lawyer concerned ever had the proper data put in his hands, and I submit that it is hardly fair to him to hold him responsible for the whole business, when the Government itself and those responsible were derelict.

It seems to me, Sir, that we are very much indebted to the honourable member who has brought this matter to the notice of the House, and I do hope that even at this late day the Government knows how much of this land it wants, and that it will have a proper appraisement made of its worth, and will tender the money to the owner and let him take the responsibility of disputing the value in the Exchequer Court. The whole transaction is something that the responsible department should apologize for.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Acting Minister of Justice is not in his seat to-night. He was not aware that this Order would be called this evening and he went home some little time ago. I asked the Minister of Railways,—who, as he stated, was at times Acting Minister of Public Works,—to make inquiry of the Deputy Minister of that department with a view to having some information laid before the House to answer the question of my honourable friend.

Personally I know nothing of the transaction. So far as the Government is concerned we are willing that the correspondence called for shall be brought down. Until the documents are brought down it is rather futile to discuss the matter in the House, because we should have assertion on one hand and counter-assertion on the other, and we should make no progress toward elucidation of the facts. From the discussion to-night, however, two or three matters seem to me to stand out.

It is stated by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Lemieux), and by the hon. member (Mr. Vien) who has spoken in support of it, that the counsel engaged by the Department of Justice to represent the Crown in the expropriation proceedings before the Exchequer Court is a man of eminent legal ability. That in itself would appear to be conclusive proof that the Government was not, as stated by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) negligent with respect to the proceeding. In a proceeding of importance involving the expropriation of property of considerable value the most important matter is the selection of counsel, and by the admission of those who are making these charges—for they are charges in effect—against the Government here to-night, the counsel selected was a man of high standing at the bar. Before the court of first instance, the trial court, the presentation of matters of fact is of supreme importance because it is upon the evidence adduced there that the court reaches its conclusion, after hearing the witnesses and observing their demeanour, as to the value of the property expropriated. The principal thing in litigation affecting property by expropriation is the decision of the first court, because a court of appeal will not lightly set aside the decision of the court which has heard the evidence, seen the witnesses and reached a conclusion on the facts adduced before it. Nothing is put forward here to suggest that the counsel selected was not a man of standing before the courts of Quebec; on the contrary, he has been vouched for by the two hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken.

The Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) has said that he saw the property in question before or about the time that the expropriation proceedings were had. He was of the view that it was not worth more than $18,000. He could not well know what the court would determine it was worth; therefore his view of the transaction at that time would be in accordance with his judgment as to what the value of the property was. The St. Charles works were projected in 1912 upon a larger scale than that upon which they have been or will be carried on. One can conceive of a piece of property, not regarded as of great value, being expropriated in connection with a larger project and the conclusion being reached, upon that project being reduced, that a part of the property might be abandoned, as the Minister of Railways said to-night. It has been suggested by the member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) that the Minister of Justice misled the House. I am sure he would not say that the Minister of Justice intentionally misled the House. The Minister of Justice made a statement which I am certain he made in all good faith, and if it is in fact an error—I do not pronounce upon that, as I do not know the facts—I am sure that it was made by inadvertence. He was speaking of an appeal from the Exchequer Court judgment to the Supreme Court. Now it has been stated that a new trial has been granted at the instance of the Department of Justice. That new trial was sought, no doubt, on the ground of the judgment that was rendered by the Exchequer Court and which was on appeal before the Supreme Court. If a new trial has been granted, as stated, and if three quarters of the property has been abandoned, it seems to me, looking at the entire transaction in the light of what I have said, that there is nothing to call for any particular censure of the Government. Eminent counsel selected; judgment given; appeal had to the Supreme Court; new trial asked and granted; the project as originally conceived reduced; three-quarters of the property taken abandoned, one-quarter only retained; issue now as to the value of that one-quarter. That seems to be the position of the transaction at present. As I stated at the outset, the Government will be very glad to bring down the papers, and until they are brought down I do not think the House can reach any just conclusion with regard to the transaction or as to allegations made by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to it.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the facts were as argued by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), the case would not be very good, though it would still have a leg to stand upon. But I am afraid that the case is not exactly as he would like it to be. As it stands, the case is as follows: The Government of Canada decides to build a dam on the river St. Charles, and has to expropriate some land in order to do so. I am credibly informed that the two lots in question are below the dam, not above the dam; therefore they are not at all affected by the dam. That is the first information I get. Moreover, many speculators are involved in this case; there is an Ethiopian in the pile. I am informed that this man Belanger is only a prête-nom —a name borrowed by others. First of all, there is a petition of right, and action is taken before the Exchequer Court, and expropriation proceedings are had. Does it not strike you that there is something radically wrong with this business? For a property for which the owner is supposed to have paid $18,000, the judge, according to his own words, reluctantly grants $237,000. No expert appraisers are called; the judge is helpless; he looks around; who is going to enlighten him? The Department of Justice should have seen to that. Think of the enormity of the case! Here is a man claiming $800,000 for a property that cost him $18,000, and which had not produced enough revenue to pay the taxes during a period of twenty years. There is something strikingly strange about that. The judge after having heard the witnesses, with the acquiescence of the counsel representing the Government, renders judgment. An appeal is taken by the Department of Justice. The interests of the Crown are again confided to this same counsel. Now I hope that when the papers are filed, the letter of protest written by Mr. Bernier, K.C., will be filed with them because he declares most emphatically that he received his instructions from the Department of Justice to appeal only from the smaller amount, the 10 per cent, and not from the larger amount, $225,000. At all events no case is filed in the Supreme Court in which His Majesty the King is involved without the Minister or Deputy Minister of Justice surveying the whole case. How does it happen that this factum was filed with this declaration on behalf of the Crown?

By the judgment of the Exchequer Court rendered on the 28th day of June, 1917, the Court held that the respondent had proven his title and was entitled to recover the value of the land expropriated from him by the appellant.

From this part of the judgment of the Exchequer Court the appellant does not appeal.

The appellant is His Majesty the King, represented by the Minister of Justice or by the Deputy Minister of Justice. I had the honour of being Solicitor General of Canada for two years and I know, and everybody knows, that no document issues from the Department of Justice for any of the courts, whether it be the Exchequer Court, the Supreme Court, or any other, without first being surveyed and passed on by the Minister of Justice or at least by the very able Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Newcombe.

My hon. friend says that the honour of the counsel is not questioned. It is not. It has never been questioned by me or by anybody else; but I say to the Government that there is something very mysterious in the whole proceeding; there is something very mysterious which must be clarified by the Government. The Minister of Railways and Canals says that a new trial has been ordered. How does he know?

Mr. J. D. REID: I inquired over the telephone from the Deputy Minister of Public Works—the Minister of Public Works was away—and the information I have given to the House is what I got from him over the telephone just a few moments ago.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am sorry, but I think my hon. friend has been misinformed, not intentionally so, by the Deputy Minister of Public Works. My hon. friend should have inquired from the Deputy Minister of Justice, because the case is conducted by the Department of Justice, and not by the Department of Public Works. I am informed by some one who was present at the Supreme Court a few weeks ago when this same case was argued—argued, if I mistake not, by Mr. Chrysler, K.C., the very eminent counsel from Ottawa—that Mr. Chrysler took no different stand from that taken by Mr. Bernier; he argued from the same evidence, from the same factum, and there was no change in the procedure. The case is now en délibéré by the Supreme Court and I am very much surprised at the information the minister has just given.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Deputy Minister of Public Works tells me the Supreme Court has granted a new trial.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have followed the proceedings of the Supreme Court for the last few days and have read some of the judgments, but I am not aware that the Supreme Court has granted judgment in this case. But if it has, well and good. If a new trial has been granted, well and good. A new trial will be highly gratifying to me, and I am pleased to learn that the Government has at last awakened to the enormity of this claim. I am glad the Government has reduced by 75 per cent the acreage required for the damming of the river St. Charles, and I can assure my hon. friend that when this case comes up, if a new trial has been granted, the Government's counsel may obtain from the provincial revenue officers in Quebec the clearest possible evidence that this property is worth just a few hundred dollars. My hon. friend seemed a little excited when he spoke a few moments ago, but he should not have been excited. He should have thanked me for bringing this matter before the House. I brought it up last year on two occasions without any result. I could get no information then; but to-night I learn that a new trial has been asked for by the Department of Public Works and has been granted by the Court, and that the department will not require more than 25 per cent of the two lots. Well, I think that is a success, and under the circumstances my motion should pass unanimously and with cheers.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m..
