Then may I say a word with regard to a matter of policy of this government. The dairy industry, the poultry industry and other industries in eastern Canada are dependent upon the importation of feeds and they need to know whether this government is going to maintain freight assistance on the transportation of these grains. We have to have that if we are to maintain our industries. Some think of my constituency as specializing in the growing of apples. It did at one time and I hope it continues at least to maintain an interest in that industry during these trying times, but we also are producing today millions of dollars' worth of dairy products, beef and poultry. In Kings county alone over $1 million worth of hogs were produced last year. If time permitted I could go on to give figures indicating the development of the agricultural program in that valley.

The centre and core of that is dependent to a substantial degree upon the bringing down of feed grains from western Canada under the present freight rate assistance policy. We should know whether that is going to be continued. If it is discontinued nothing less than tragedy will occur. Last year I raised the matter when the estimates were before the house. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) happened to be away but his parliamentary assistant stated that he thought this would become a permanent policy. It was raised in the house a little while ago and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), with his bland smile and genial personality, said that it would be continued to June 30 and that after that consideration would have to be given to what was going to be done.

You cannot produce eggs or raise hogs and chickens if you have to wait until June 30 to know whether to cut off their heads. Surely this government should be able to make up its mind with respect to that policy. I urge that some direct action be taken so that we can have this situation corrected before too long and then be able to plan knowing that the policy will be there and that he will have at least that amount of assistance on which to depend.

I mentioned a moment ago the necessity of shifting the unbalanced trade pattern which confronts us today. Our exports to the United States are increasing while our exports to the rest of the world are going down, particularly those to the sterling area countries and the British market upon which we in the east are so dependent. I know that there are times when there has been some criticism because Great Britain does not buy more from us.

There has been some feeling engendered in that direction and I think it is only right that we should know the facts. I have here a copy of the Economic Record published by the United Kingdom information office and it contains some facts which I think should be on the record. Before the war Great Britain had an overseas investment of £80 per head of its population. By the end of the war that had changed to a deficit of £55 per head. The loss of the income from dividends from that tremendous investment is largely responsible for the position in which they find themselves today.

We hear much about United States investment in this country, and we are glad to have it. As the hon. member who preceded me a little while ago pointed out, were it not for the United States investment in this country our dollar position would be as bad as it was four or five years ago. We hear very little about British investment in this country. On looking at this publication I find that whereas the United States investment was over $6,665 million, the British investment in this country is over $1,720 million. On the basis of population of the two countries Great Britain has invested a greater proportion of her national wealth in Canada than any other country in the world.

We are now facing a position where it is very difficult for us to export our products to that country because they have no money with which to pay for them. Our exports have been falling off, and Canadian purchases in Great Britain have been dropping steadily according to this report. In 1951 Canadian buying averaged $31·9 million per month, but this year it is running at $22·5 million per month, for the first two months. In 1951 Great Britain purchased from Canada an average of $60 million per month. I think some thought should be given to this matter.

It has been brought out in evidence within the last few days that a Centurion tank can be purchased in Great Britain at a saving of over $60,000 as compared with the cost of its counterpart in the United States. I think all the authorities agree that the Centurion tank is more efficient as a fighting weapon than the nearest counterpart coming off the United States production line. A saving of $60,000 per unit is quite substantial and we would also create purchasing power in Great Britain for our primary products.

I urge that this government purchase more goods from Great Britain through the Department of Defence Production and other departments so that purchasing power can be created in that country. It is not merely a matter of sentiment and tradition, important though they may be; it is a matter of dollars and cents. We need markets so that we can shift this trade unbalance which at present exists. The only way we can do it is by making purchases there. In that way a tremendous amount of purchasing power can be created. I think this government with its powers to negotiate could make certain that when supplies were purchased a certain proportion of the money paid would be earmarked for the purchase of Canadian fish, Canadian apples, Canadian cheese and other primary products.

As far as I can see it is only in that way that we are going to make progress along this line. We in this party have suggested a commonwealth conference to deal with trade matters. I think that is essential, but here is a step which can be taken at once and if taken would be of great assistance.

I am not going to attempt to follow the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), who has just left the chamber. He referred to the actions of the Ontario government and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) when premier of Ontario in connection with the cheese producers of that province. I could not quite follow the hon. member and I am not sure whether he was making a speech for the cheese producers of Ontario or for some Ontario member who did not want to make it. I do hope he will be more successful speaking on behalf of the cheese producers than he was when he spoke on behalf of the fishermen of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and made his appeal some little while ago. I as a Nova Scotian am somewhat disturbed and rather ashamed of the fact that we have a government at Halifax and a government at Ottawa that apparently, because of some little internecine feud or jurisdictional dispute, cannot even determine who is going to assess the damage done by these storms concerning which such moving appeals were made by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) and others in the house when the address in reply to the speech from the throne was before us. We noticed in the press the other day that there has been a conference, that the federal government is waiting for the provincial government to ask it for aid, and that if asked they are prepared to assess the damage. I hope some action will be taken along that line in the very near future to repair the damage done by the storms.

Our fishermen along the Atlantic coast also feel, as our other primary producers do, that when they are confronted with a problem there are delays. A disaster takes place in the Red river valley, an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease occurs, and assistance is made available, and quite properly so. Assistance can be obtained for the western wheat grower. Their plight only has to be raised on the floor of the house and our friends from the western provinces close ranks. Then inside of a week or two weeks the necessary moneys are voted and it is all over.

We hear these terrible sobs and cries from western members about the plight of the western farmer. We appreciate their plight and sympathize with it, but I think those of us from the east on all sides of the house sometimes feel that our own primary producers have suffered disasters and have not received the treatment which would have been accorded them if they had happened to live in another part of Canada. Last year the fishermen off the Atlantic coast did not suffer a disaster because of a storm but they just did not catch any fish. There were none, and they did not come appealing to the house for help. Now, however, there is a situation which requires attention.

When the minister was in Nova Scotia the other day he made a suggestion which I think is a constructive one and may have some merit. He suggested the working out of some form of insurance with respect to these things. But let us get some action on these matters, and I suggest that we want to avoid internecine feuds and wrangles and get a clear-cut policy between the federal and provincial governments so that in the matter of storm relief as well as other matters there may be more direct action in the future. These jurisdictional wrangles are of interest with respect to another matter which I have mentioned before. I will not say I feel deeply about it because it is a matter of viewpoint or perhaps a matter of the imagination. However, I want to refer to it because the solution of the problems of those of us from the east—and we have our problems—is centred to a certain extent upon the development of power.

With the Canso bridge going in and the satisfactory development of the steel industry, I believe we can have primary industries and that secondary industries will follow. This will go a long way toward solving the economic problems of the maritimes. However, we need power, and I have enough vision, perhaps enough Irish in me and enough speculative imagination to think that the development of atomic energy may be the solution of our power problems in the maritimes. Obviously that form of power will not be desired by the central provinces within the next few years because they are going to invest so much money in the development of hydroelectric energy. Therefore they will have to safeguard their investment and will not want to see the development of power from atomic energy take place too rapidly in central Canada. Therefore we will have the opportunity of developing the use of atomic power in the east along the Atlantic coast. I was speaking the other day to a gentleman who is very close to this matter. He is one whose name you all know and he did not only say this to me but to many others. He said publicly that the development of atomic energy in Canada was such that one could visualize it in the same way as if the Kitty Hawk plane of Orville Wright's days were transformed within three years into a big United States bomber of the last war. He said if you could envisage such a transformation you could get a picture of the development of atomic energy in the industrial field that they can foresee today. All that has been done within these past few years. If we have no internecine feuds between the provinces and the federal government, if we can get the use of atomic power developed in the maritimes, then I suggest these provinces will again take the position in the economy of the country which they had before confederation when they really carried the country. Possibly our friends from the central Canadian provinces, who today are enjoying such tremendous wealth, may find that they will be only cousins although perhaps not poor cousins. They will find that our standard of prosperity will be equivalent to that maintained in the rest of Canada.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I do so with considerable knowledge of how many residents of my constituency feel about the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I can assure you that I am not going to try to describe it in the house. In the first place I would not want to, and in the second place, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would not allow me to do so.

Mr. Fleming: Give it a trial.

Mr. Wylie: However, they were very disappointed. They say it is a very disappointing budget. The people who pay personal income taxes were sadly disappointed. After listening to the minister say that we were going to get a 6 per cent reduction in income tax it certainly upset them to find there was an increase. I believe the figures that have appeared in most of our daily papers are correct. There is no need for me to go over them again. The minister and his parliamentary assistant know them quite well.

I listened to a speech tonight with which I must take issue, that of the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis). He spoke about western farmers getting so much from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. He did not mention the $65 million but he hinted at it and we knew very well what he meant. May I suggest to the hon. member that he look at the record and find out the losses that the grain growers of the west, wheat growers in particular, have suffered during the last few years. He may have often wondered why you can buy bread so cheaply. I would not be a bit surprised at that. The reason for that is that the farmers, who comprise one-third of the population of this country, subsidized the rest of the country by supplying cheap wheat. I think that is a statement that cannot very well be contradicted. The wheat farmers of the west are in a very precarious position today. As a matter of fact they do not know just what to do. The year 1951 was a good growing but a bad harvesting year. In the province of Alberta today approximately 56 million bushels of wheat and 71 million bushels of coarse grains still remain unthreshed. When a province suffers in that way it is a national disaster. It is true that in parts of Alberta they are doing some threshing and some of the wheat is turning out not too badly, but it must be remembered also that in the southern part of the province, from a line drawn south from Red Deer, we have had more rain than for many years. All the lakes are full; the sloughs are full, and the fields are under water. Much of that crop is ruined.

I am not blaming the federal government for that, of course, but I am suggesting there is something wrong when a member from one of the eastern provinces gets up in this house and says we are giving the western farmers so much money. I would ask the house, if it had not been for western Canada where would the Cockshutt Plow Company be, where would the Massey-Harris Company be, where would the International Harvester Company be, and many others? In my travels around Ottawa I still have to see as much machinery as is used out west. In the smaller villages in this vicinity I have not seen machinery piled in the yards as it is out in Saskatchewan and Alberta. It must be remembered that all this machinery is produced in Ontario and Quebec, yet the best market for it is in the western provinces. What about cars? When we buy a car at home we pay $226 freight from Oshawa to Medicine Hat on a Chevrolet, the cheapest car you can buy. Ontario people can go to Oshawa and pick up a car without paying any freight. The trouble is that we are hooked both ways. We pay the freight on our grain to the head of the lakes and we pay the freight on our cars and machinery from the point of distribution to the point of delivery.

Mr. Blackmore: And all the freight goes to Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Wylie: That is something the eastern members must realize. It is something many of them do not appreciate. When the dominion government, or should I say the wheat board, was prepared to pay the western farmers $65 million of their own money, why should the west be criticized for accepting it? Don't try to tell me that money came out of taxes. If that was the case I would like the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance to tell me so. I believe that came out of the wheat board.

Mr. Blackmore: It came directly out of the farmers.

Mr. Wylie: Certainly it came out of the farmers; it was their own money. Every time we hear that sort of thing in the house I really boil over, because it is not fair; it is not playing the game, and it is not helping bring about the unity we should have in this country. We know very well we cannot get along without the east. Surely the east must know they cannot get along without us.

Then just a word about coarse grains. What about the freight on coarse grains that has been paid by the government? We do not hear very much about that, though I remember that one night the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spoke to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) about it and put him in his place. When the minister speaks he usually knows what he is talking about. He certainly did that night, because he showed exactly what the farmers in Ontario and Quebec had received by way of freight assistance on feed grains.

An hon. Member: $110 million.

Mr. Wylie: It was twice that. We do not object to that. If the government wants to do it that is its affair, but that money comes out of the taxes we pay. When the farmers out west received $65 million from the wheat board that was their own money, and they were entitled to a lot more than that. They should have received many more times that amount.

Today the wheat farmers are paying too much for what they buy and getting too little for what they sell. We hear about the cost of living coming down. Sure it has come down, but on what? On what the farmer produces. It is true that if you buy a new car today the price has dropped somewhat. All the government did was to take off 10 per cent in excise tax. But today many people cannot afford to buy new cars. Many farmers cannot afford them this year; they did not get their grain threshed last year and may not get it threshed this year. I would suggest to the government that it is about time the wheat board gave the farmers a little more for their wheat; and it is just about time one-third of the population, making up our basic industry of agriculture, stopped subsidizing the rest of the people so they can have cheap bread.

We have heard a lot about family allowances, old age security and almost everything else in this debate. Sometimes it does not hurt to repeat what has been said; but in view of the fact that it is going to take me considerable time and I cannot possibly finish by eleven o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: On Monday the Prime Minister will move the notice of motion which appears in the Votes and Proceedings of this date, taking Mondays away from private members. However, it was understood that on that day we would proceed with the business of private members for three hours and thirty-five minutes from the moment we got to the orders of the day, since that was exactly the time that was taken up on the motion to set up the committee on redistribution. As soon as we are through with private members' matters we will continue the debate on the budget.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 28, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SESSIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton) presented the first report of the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON MONDAYS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the oral notice given by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) last Thursday at the close of the sitting, and as published in Votes and Proceedings for Friday, I move:

That on Monday, April 28, 1952, and every Monday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

I would hope, however, that it might be understood that there would be allotted today as much time to private members' business as was taken last Monday to deal with the motion to set up the committee on the readjustment of representation.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if there were any reason before us why the motion should be adopted at this time, I would be prepared to support it, as I think many other members would. On other occasions in the past similar motions have received assent from members at a time when it was clearly demonstrated that urgent matters required consideration. But no urgency—and I submit this to hon. members—has been demonstrated, and no such case has been presented to us. On the contrary there are many reasons why the rights of private members should be preserved, in this as in other sessions.

This session has followed a pattern which surely calls for the attention of all members. Tomorrow we will be into the third calendar month of the session. Outside of the strictly formal bills which were called for following the approval of the supplementary estimates, the only measure placed before the house for consideration by way of legislation is a bill that was introduced at the very outset to deal with an emergent situation which had arisen because of the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease.

It is not necessary to say that there was an extended debate on the speech from the throne, or that there has been already a debate for some days on the budget. Those debates of necessity were more extended, and doubtless the discussion was more discursive, because no direction has been given to the business of this house since the session began on February 28. There has been no pattern, there has been no lead, there has been no indication to hon. members of the things they would really be called upon to discuss except for those private measures, either by way of bill or by way of motion, brought forward by private members.

It is true that we had a discussion on external affairs and national defence. It is true that after repeated requests the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated the concurrence of the government in the suggestion that had been made that there should be separate debates on external affairs and national defence. But the effectiveness of those debates was to a great extent stultified by the fact that, for whatever reasons may have been put forward, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) saw fit to address a club in New York just a few days before that debate when every subject that could be brought forward was brought forward there. Then a few days later he went on the radio over a national network and devoted his attention largely to one party in this house in a manner which introduced a spirited debate on what the motives of that party really were.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: It is interesting to notice the measure of impatience that is displayed by members of this house the moment any suggestion is made that they should follow the rules which have been established for some time.

Mr. Cleaver: Speak to the motion.

Mr. Mutch: Right now you are out of order.

Mr. Howe: What motion are we speaking to?

Business of the House

Mr. Drew: I propose to follow the course of my remarks until such time as Your Honour indicates that in your opinion they are not in accordance with the motion before us. There is only one Speaker in this house, and I do not intend to accept direction from cabinet ministers or other members as to the subjects I shall debate in this house.

An hon. Member: Usually out of order anyway.

An hon. Member: Blue Monday.

An hon. Member: Blue for you fellows, all right.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Drew: Fortunately I am in no hurry, and I intend to wait until Your Honour at any rate has the opportunity to hear what I am saying.

This house then heard a discussion of external affairs and later it heard a discussion of national defence. The minister for external affairs showed scant regard for the members of the house in the course he followed; moreover, when defence was being discussed the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) showed even less courtesy toward the house when he absented himself during a substantial part of that debate.

An hon. Member: So were you.

Mr. Drew: The chairman of the committee on defence expenditures is obviously under the impression that he is sitting as chairman of this house. We shall await with considerable interest his decisions tomorrow as chairman of that committee.

Mr. Chevrier: We are waiting for your bright arguments.

Mr. Drew: We in this house have now before us for debate the budget, which provides the whole financial authority of parliament and the government for the coming year. The attitude of the government toward the budget debate is displayed by the fact that having brought in the budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) sat here for one day on Tuesday, then dropped the whole thing and left to engage in other activities not in any way related to his responsibilities in this house. The budget debate should not proceed until it is convenient for the Minister of Finance to return to this house.

An hon. Member: Is that a ruling?

Mr. Drew: I heard an interjection, "Is that a ruling?". No, Mr. Speaker, it is not a ruling. If the hon. member had been listening he would have heard that I said that the time has come, that the time is long overdue, when some hon. members of this house on the other side and to my right should listen to suggestions as to what they should do instead of just being rubber stamps for the government.

Mr. Sinnott: Dictatorship.

Mr. Drew: I find some interjections most interesting because they are illuminating. I heard from one brilliant member opposite the word "dictatorship".

Mr. Sinnott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Recognizing the brilliance of the hon. member who made the interjection, I feel that I should not let the remark pass unchallenged, because it is obvious that, in the mind of the hon. member it is dictatorship if any member of this house should even question the propriety of everything done by the government and supported by those who support it so regularly, including the hon. member who has just interjected the remark.

Mr. Harkness: He used the word in the Russian sense.

Mr. Drew: It is in the mind of at least one brilliant member of this house that it is dictatorship if anyone raises any question about the course followed by the government. If there is any danger of dictatorship—and of course obviously there is none while hon. members and others are free to express their opinions—it is the danger that we let the majority of this house deprive the members of their ordinary rights without just argument and excuse.

Mr. Sinnott: Let us get down to business.

An hon. Member: You are no ordinary member.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that the hon. member who has just interjected is no ordinary member of this house. We are dealing with members of this house generally and their rights. I have referred to the fact that without explanation or justification of any kind we are proceeding at this time with the budget debate in the absence of the Minister of Finance. That very fact is an affront not only to members of this house but to all Canadians at a time when we are considering a budget that will be the basis of the enormous taxation to be imposed in Canada this year. It is directly relevant to the motion before us.

There can be only one suggested argument in support of such a debate proceeding in the absence of the Minister of Finance. That would be that no matter what argument is put forward, the ears of the government will be deaf in any event. If we have reached that point, then it would be wise for the government to go one step farther and end the farce by introducing a motion that all debate should come to an end, and let any member who has anything to put forward simply file a written argument and have it appear in the record, because the government does not intend to listen to it in any event.

The reason for the arguments that are put forward is that the government may hear these arguments. We are now dealing with a pattern which has been established, namely, that ministers primarily concerned first make their arguments outside of the house. Then when these matters come up in the house they give scant attention to the members, and, having presented their case do not even bother to listen to the arguments that are put forward. Do not let any hon. member say that the arguments that have been put forward have not been arguments worth listening to. Speeches have been made in the house that should have been listened to by every member of the house and many more members of the government than have ever been here at any time since the budget debate started. Speeches of vital importance have been presented.

There have been speeches made with respect to the deplorable situation in the farming industry, including dairying, and the textile and other industries across the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Yet on many occasions not more than two ministers of the crown have even thought it worth while to listen to these arguments, even though the responsible minister, the Minister of Finance, is not here and apparently has no immediate intention of returning, so far as one can see at the moment.

Mr. Sinnott: A good by-election speech.

Mr. Drew: The motion now before us would end the normal rights of private members who have bills and motions on the order paper. Where is there before the house at the moment a suggestion of any measure presented by the government calling for such urgent attention that the rights of private members should be done away with in this manner?

Mr. George: What about last Friday night?

Mr. Drew: I am sorry; I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. George: What about last Friday night?

Mr. Drew: May I ask what the hon. member said?

Mr. George: Last Friday night we ran out of private members' bills and motions. There were not enough sponsors in the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Even public bills.

Mr. Drew: It is perfectly true that last Friday night certain measures were not dealt with. The hon. member and I both know that, but the fact remains that there is a great deal of business before the house, and most certainly the hon. member has no right to complain if a further opportunity is provided to certain hon. members associated with him to discuss subjects which they regard as so important.

But there are private members' motions and other measures before the house that are of very great importance. I suggest that up to the present time during this session the debates that have taken place on private bills and private members' motions have had a far greater sense of reality than the debates that have taken place on government motions or government bills that have been brought forward.

So far as the house is concerned, legislation could have been brought forward. It could have been sent to committees and dealt with in committees. In spite of that, the committees are really only getting under way at this stage of the session. I must say I have been much interested in the suggestion made that members of the Conservative party—

An hon. Member: Progressive.

Mr. Drew: —were not displaying very great interest in the affairs of the committee on defence expenditures because at one meeting only one of their members was present.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: You know the rules.

An hon. Member: He makes them as he goes along.

Mr. Drew: Recognizing the supreme brilliance of the source of the last remark, I will not even make a comment. Doubtless, the hon. member will give us the benefit of his great wisdom.

Mr. Sinclair: It is a very simple rule known to most parliamentarians.

Mr. Drew: Doubtless we will hear more from the hon. member on a number of occasions. The question that I raise concerns defence expenditures and related subjects. I might point out that at the meeting of the committee of last Tuesday, to which reference has been made—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —the committee had no opportunity whatever to deal with—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —the Petawawa situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the leader of the opposition not to discuss at this time what took place at the meeting of the committee.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the rule I was talking about.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am so glad you have such excellent advice. According to the hon. member, apparently you follow that advice whenever you hear it. I know—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: —it has been indicated on many occasions, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the house have confidence in your judgment, and I might say they have no confidence at all in the judgment or otherwise of the hon. member who has been interrupting.

An hon. Member: Oh yes, we have.

Mr. Sinclair: Temper, temper, temper.

Mr. Drew: As Hansard does not record all this constant interruption, I wish to make it quite clear that when an argument is being presented with respect to the rights of private members there is nothing but a continuous uproar from members who apparently do not believe that private members should have any further rights in the house.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. McIlraith: That is not the cause of the uproar.

Mr. Drew: I should also like to indicate for the record that the noise has come exclusively from members who are supporters of the government.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Dispense.

Mr. Drew: The house will proceed with the debates under way and will proceed with the business—

Mr. Sinnott: Is that an order?

Mr. Drew: —if there is some direction and guidance given by the government as to what business is going to come before the house. I wish to ask at this time for an assurance from the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: You will get it.

Mr. Drew: I hope I shall get it. May I say in response to the most recent interruption that I hope there will be an undertaking from the Prime Minister that no second session this year will be contemplated—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: —and that the delay—

Mr. McCann: We do not want it.

Mr. Drew: —and carefully planned frustration that has rendered so much of the debate ineffective—

Mr. Mutch: Sounds like a confession.

Mr. Drew: The time of confession for the hon. member will come later in this discussion, provided he feels himself free to take advantage of that opportunity. The subject now before the house does relate to the point I have raised. There can be no excuse for a second session this year—

Mr. McIlraith: No one suggested it.

Some hon. Members: Who suggested it?

Mr. Drew: —and I repeat that I hope the Prime Minister will give the unqualified assurance that there will be no second session this year, always subject to those emergencies which have no relation to the ordinary business of this house. I am raising this question now because last year we did have a wholly unnecessary second session—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. At the present time there is nothing before the house in regard to a second session. I think the hon. member might reserve his remarks on that subject until it is before the house.

Mr. Drew: I am pointing out why the business of the house should be expedited—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: —and why it would be wholly unnecessary to adopt this motion if the government really wanted to get ahead with the business. If the government does want to get ahead with its business, then let it introduce the bills it has under consideration. It is not reasonable to believe that at this stage of the session the government has not ready all the legislation it intends to introduce. Let it bring forward that legislation and move it into committee so it can be given consideration, instead of holding it back until the end of the session when there will not be adequate opportunity to examine it, as has happened so often in the past.

I am raising these points because we have urged over and over again that the rules of the house do make it possible to deal with the bills and resolutions of private members as well as the regular business of the house, as long as the members have some idea when that business is going to be dealt with. Let no one make the suggestion by way of reply that the government has sought to expedite proceedings and that long debates have taken place on every motion it has introduced. There have been debates, but those debates have taken place because hon. members have no way of knowing whether or not they are going to have an opportunity of raising the questions they want to raise. They do not know whether this session the government is going to change its habits and let debate follow an orderly pattern, or whether it is going to follow the practice of the last several sessions and leave the important things until the last, when the heat of the summer and the desire to get home will make it very difficult to discuss adequately the measures brought before the house.

This motion will have the effect of further limiting the rights of private members, which already have been limited greatly. During the years of war and immediately after, the habit grew of setting aside the rules; but surely now we have reached a time when we can abide by the rules. If those rules need amendment, let the amendments be introduced in the ordinary way. Instead of motions to suspend rules, let us have motions to change the rules if in fact such changes should be made. But at a time when we have so little before us, at a time when the Minister of Finance does not think the budget debate is sufficiently important to be here for it, let us not adopt a motion of this kind which deprives private members of the opportunity to have real debates on subjects that are of real concern to the people of Canada.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): On various occasions when motions of this kind have been presented to the house I have protested on behalf of the private members who are associated with me. To a very large extent I agree with what has been said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in regard to the necessity of members of this house safeguarding in every particular the rights of private members. I am not suggesting for one moment that the government with its large majority wishes to exercise some kind of dictatorship over all of us to override the House of Commons, but I do support what was said by the leader of the opposition in his concluding remarks. Bit by bit the rights of private members have been restricted, largely because of the necessities of war. Prior to the war private members' days were looked upon as being embedded in the rules of the house and were not interfered with without very good reason; and always, may I say, after there had been some discussion and consultation with the whips or leaders of the opposition parties.

Having watched the loss of the rights of private members in this house over a period of years—and rights have been lost—it is good that once in a while private members should assert themselves and demand that their rights be retained in every particular. Under wartime conditions private members were willing at all times to forgo many of their rights. I remember one or two regular sessions when there were no private members' days at all. That was because of the emergencies then existing, and was by agreement.

I believe those of us who from time to time criticize the conduct of the business of the house should take some responsibility for endeavouring to provide the better organization of that business. There is no question but that the manner in which we conduct the business of this parliament does not reflect much credit upon the House of Commons. The rules which have been provided very largely for the protection of those of us who are private members from time to time need to be reconsidered and revised.

I agree with the criticism of the leader of the opposition in regard to statements made outside this house and the absence of ministers when such important matters as the budget are under consideration. I think that does show a lack of regard for this parliament.

Coming now to the private members' resolutions, a number of those resolutions on the order paper are of very great importance, not so much to the private members themselves as to their constituents and to members of all parties from one end of this country to the other. These resolutions can only be moved in the form in which they are brought before the house, namely "that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given." I have felt that from time to time the government has paid no attention to the expressed will of this parliament.

I am not going to discuss the income tax exemption for medical expenses, the milk subsidy, and so on, but resolutions concerning these matters were approved by this house, in one case unanimously, for the consideration of the government. I do say this: The only opportunity, other than by moving an amendment to the budget or the motion for an address in reply to the speech of His Excellency at the opening of the session—the only opportunity a private member has to bring before this house matters of importance not only to their constituents but to the whole of Canada, is by the filing of private members' resolutions. They do perform a useful function in this parliament. Consequently I do not like to see any attempt made to restrict the rights of private members. If this privilege is to be circumscribed in any way, or dispensed with for the moment, it should be done by agreement rather than by the adoption of a motion.

I am quite sure the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would find that most hon. members would be willing to accede to the request of the government, if the government were in a position of some difficulty regarding the business of the house. As has been said this afternoon, we do not know as yet what legislation is coming before us, and we are therefore in an extremely difficult position in attempting to make a judgment. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think the organization of the business of this house must be reconsidered. I suggest that private members' days be continued until at least we have complete knowledge of the legislation that is coming before us, and until we are sure that the committees of the house are going to be at work. I am extremely anxious that the committee on agriculture should go into the matter of the foot-and-mouth disease. I cannot see any reason why the government has delayed consideration of that matter. I am sure that all members are willing to cooperate to facilitate the business of the house, provided that we know what the business of the house is, and can form a mature judgment as to the need for forgoing some rights of private members.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to take a moment to say that we are anxious to do what we can to help the government get its program before the house and have the business completed. But at the same time we do feel we should not take any action, except after careful consideration and by agreement, that would further abridge the rights of private members. For this reason I find myself very largely in agreement with the other two party leaders on this side of the floor.

I would suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) give careful consideration to frequent conferences between the party whips to see if it would not be possible to organize the business of the house in such a manner as to speed things along. If we were given some idea of what is coming up, we could be prepared when that item of business came before the house and would thus facilitate the dispatch of business. On this matter I must stand with the other party leaders.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a few words with reference to a matter which has a bearing on the motion that is now before us. On Tuesday, April 1, when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) moved a motion to take away Wednesdays as private members' days, a request was made by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to which the Prime Minister made a conditional reply. I feel that the substance of that reply should even yet be implemented. It is for that reason I rise to ask the Prime Minister to give further consideration to what was asked for on that occasion.

As the Prime Minister and the house will remember, Monday, March 31, was to have been a private members' day. By unanimous consent we gave it up as a private members' day so that the government might have it for the consideration of supplementary estimates. Accordingly the next day, when the Prime Minister moved that Wednesdays be taken away, the member for Rosetown-Biggar requested that the loss of the day before might be made up in some way. In his reply the Prime Minister indicated that there were certain difficulties, but he did say this, as recorded at page 999 of Hansard for April 1, 1952:

> Perhaps we might consider suspending this order a week from Wednesday, or try to make it up in some other way that would satisfy hon. members.

I would point out that the Wednesday referred to was Wednesday, April 9, but the order was not suspended on that day. Instead, we considered the Japanese peace treaty, which was government business. Thus, so far as the private members are concerned there has been no compensation as yet for the loss of that full Monday, March 31. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that whatever may be the disposition of the motion now before us, which is designed to take away Mondays as private members' days, the Prime Minister should still consider the point which he said he would consider on April 1, and arrange with the various groups in the house for the provision of at least one more Wednesday for private members' motions.

Mr. Speaker: If the Prime Minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I must confess I was very much surprised, though I do not suppose I should be, at the performance of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) this afternoon. I should not have been surprised. It was merely reminiscent of many such performances and outbursts before the election of 1949. In thinking it over I recalled a number of occasions when it was the privilege of the hon. gentleman to lecture the members of this house on the way in which the proceedings of this house should, in his opinion, be carried on, instead of being carried on as they have been in the long and somewhat fruitful years of the life of this house when the hon. gentleman was not a member of it.

It has been suggested that there should be frequent conferences between the whips of the groups. I think that is a very good suggestion, but it would be necessary for the whips of the groups to report to the leaders of the groups they represent that there had been such conferences so that those leaders of the groups might not be taking attitudes differing from the understandings that seemed to have been reached between the whips.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that there has been no understanding by the whips in regard to this matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: I was unaware that the hon. gentleman was one of the whips.

Mr. Drew: Cheap; very cheap.

Mr. Casselman: I happen to be one of the whips, and there was no understanding with respect to this.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am informed, and I believe it, that on Wednesday last—and that was not the first time it was discussed—before the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) announced in the house that there was going to be a motion, he discussed it with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat.

Mr. Casselman: The leader of the house is not—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister has said that he believed that one whip discussed this matter with another whip.

Mr. Drew: That is not what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. St. Laurent: I said that my information is—and I believe it to be accurate—that the Minister of Public Works mentioned to the hon. gentleman who sits behind the leader of the opposition his intention of giving that notice, and was told by the hon. gentleman that he thought it was quite all right.

Mr. Drew: I repeat that there was no undertaking.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: There may have been no undertaking, but there has been an attempt here this afternoon—

An hon. Member: Don't lose your temper.

Mr. St. Laurent: —to put before the public as facts something which does not represent the facts, and I am attempting to re-establish the facts. Even before Easter there had been discussion as to the making of this motion to take away the Monday, and it was suggested—I believe by the hon. gentleman who represents Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—that there should be at least one Monday for private members after we came back after Easter. I thought that was a reasonable suggestion to make, and instead of giving the notice immediately,—because last Monday it was the unanimous wish of the house to take part of the time to deal with the motion to set up a committee on the readjustment of the representation of the house, inasmuch as that committee is apt to have quite a long job before it—the giving of the notice was postponed until after the Minister of Public Works had mentioned it orally in the house on Wednesday night.

I was under the impression—and I think there were some reasons for my being under such impression—that the private members had had the time they wished to have to deal with the various matters they had put on the order paper. Some minutes after nine o'clock last Monday we reverted to private members' business—and I was here—and every one of the resolutions was called. That of the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote) was, I think, the last on the list, and that was the only one that anyone was ready to proceed with. All the others were allowed to stand. Again on Friday night private bills and public bills and orders were called and disposed of in twenty-two minutes of the hour that was available for the discussion of those subjects, and the matters which hon. members had expressed a desire to have votes upon had received votes, and had been disposed of by divisions of the house.

From the very beginning of the session I have endeavoured to meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen opposite and to arrange the debates in the manner in which they have suggested they would like to have them arranged. I was under the impression that this motion was not going to raise any storm today, even though there might be six by-elections in the offing. The leader of the opposition suggests that a great deal of time has been taken, to the point of creating a feeling of frustration because of the fact that the government was not bringing forward any of its business. Will the hon. gentleman give himself the trouble to look at the Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day, pages 15, 16 and 17? Will he note the dates on which the notices were put on the order paper to be dealt with just as soon as they could be reached without taking away from the private members of the house the opportunity to debate the matters they were debating?

On March 7 there was put on the order paper notice of a resolution to introduce a measure to extend the application of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. On March 11 there was another for the introduction of a measure to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947. Then, on March 14, a resolution that it was expedient to introduce a bill conferring authority upon the governor in council to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct a certain railway line; on March 28, that it was expedient to introduce a measure to amend the war veterans' allowance legislation, for increasing allowances and permissible income, etc. On the same day there was another, that it was expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951; on the same day, that it was expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Insurance Act; on April 1, that it was expedient to introduce a bill to amend the National Defence Act; and there follows a long series of amendments to which the notice refers. On the same day there was a resolution that it was expedient to introduce a measure respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners; on April 8, that it was expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Aeronautics Act; on April 23, that it was expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the governor in council may do such things as were required in order to implement the Japanese peace treaty which came into effect this morning. On April 24 there was another, that it was expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Pension Act.

These matters, especially those which concern the veterans, have come to the point where it is urgent that they be dealt with as soon as possible, because it is my understanding that the representatives of the Canadian Legion are to be here on May 6 and that they expect to have the bills which concern the veterans in such shape that they can make representations to the committee to be set up—of which notice is now on the order paper—to consider this veterans legislation. Any suggestion that there has been delay in bringing forward the measures that the government wishes to have dealt with is quite contrary to the facts. These measures cannot be introduced without the adoption of the resolutions of which the notices are on the order paper. The committee set up at the last session to consider the rules of the house has not been able to get agreement on the proposal that there shall not be both a debate with the Speaker in the chair and a debate in the committee of the whole on each of these resolutions which must be adopted before the legislation can be introduced.

Mr. Drew: And they could have been called at any time.

Mr. St. Laurent: Had they been called at any time, we would have had the assertion by the hon. gentleman and by others that we were curtailing the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne,—

Mr. Drew: Nonsense.

Mr. St. Laurent: —the debate on external affairs, the debate on defence, the debate on the budget.

An hon. Member: Don't get angry.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have been trying to act in such a manner as to have the agreement or at least the acquiescence of the hon. gentleman opposite. It may be that we shall have to take another attitude, that we shall have to say that the business of the house has to be considered and will simply give notice in the house of the time when it will be considered and take whatever consequences may result from assertions of the hon. gentleman opposite that our huge majority is being used to muzzle parliament, to establish government dictatorship or government by orders in council, and that there is a disregard of the democratic rights of the people represented, as the hon. gentleman would seek to imply, only by those who sit on the opposition benches.

Here the understanding has been that there would be allotted to the business of private members as much time as had been taken last Monday to deal with business of a public character on a day when the private members' motions should have had priority. This motion was put on for today merely for the purpose of having today used in that manner and not carry over the undertaking to have another private members' day, in addition to today, used to replace last Monday.

There is no desire to prevent any debate on any matter that is on the order paper. If hon. gentlemen will bring to our attention any specific matter that—though it has been called, and has been stood over—should still in their opinion have priority over the public business of the country, their representations will get consideration.

So far as the present session is concerned, which, as has been pointed out by the leader of the opposition, is now in its third month, I think it is time to do what in my experience has always been done at about this stage in the session. I can assure hon. members that there is no desire to cut off or to prevent debate or divisions. The house has had proof during this session that there has been no desire to dispose of these matters by talking them out. They have been brought to a conclusion, and they have been disposed of by dividing the house upon them. I think that is what hon. gentlemen wish to have done, and there is no desire to have the business of the house carried on in any other way. On the other hand there is no desire just to take without comment the lectures that it pleases the leader of the opposition to give us from time to time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Prime Minister in his remarks has referred to me and part of what he said is correct, but—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member should have raised his question of privilege during the Prime Minister's remarks.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of courtesy I let the Prime Minister finish. I think I should be permitted to state my question of privilege. My point is this—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the house wants a revival of the question of what took place between the whips, I will allow it to be done. However, I think it was discussed fully.

Mr. Knowles: All I wish to say is that when this proposal was presented to me by way of my being informed of what was to be done, I complained every time about our not getting that day that we lost and which the Prime Minister had promised to give us as I indicated in my remarks this afternoon.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a question of privilege, the hon. member admits, I think, that I did mention this matter to him before it was brought up in the house on Wednesday evening. I told him we intended to put that notice of motion on Votes and Proceedings the next day. I did not ask his agreement, but he was informed about the matter. The same thing applies to my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Casselman: No agreement at all.

Mr. Knowles: We were merely informed; we were not consulted.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion of the Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Drew: Lost.

Mr. Speaker: Carried.

Mr. Drew: Lost.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour will please say aye.

Some hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed, nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. St. Laurent) which was agreed to on the following division:

GRAIN

REFERENCE TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE OF ANNUAL REPORTS OF WHEAT BOARD AND GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the annual report of the board of grain commissioners for the year 1951, and I now move:

That the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1950-51, tabled on March 18, together with the report of the board of grain commissioners just tabled, be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF SUPREME COMMANDER FOR EUROPE

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the house may be interested to learn at this time that General Matthew Ridgway, United States army, was today appointed by the North Atlantic council to succeed General Dwight D. Eisenhower as supreme allied commander for Europe. This announcement was made this afternoon in Paris by Lord Ismay who had presided over the first meeting of the reorganized council as vice-chairman. At that first meeting this morning the President of the United States was requested to put forward the name of an American to succeed General Eisenhower. He put forward General Ridgway's name, and General Ridgway was appointed by the council this afternoon.

The general feeling which has been held towards General Eisenhower for his services to NATO was, I think, very well expressed by Lord Ismay this morning when he said:

Our hearts are filled with pride and gratitude for what General Eisenhower has done since he was appointed supreme commander in Europe. It may well be that when history comes to be written the contributions which he has made towards saving peace will be acclaimed as no less worthy of renown than his contributions towards winning the second world war.

[Mr. Speaker.]

General Ridgway's distinguished military career and, in particular, his recent post of commander of United Nations forces in Korea, show him to be well qualified for the important duties of supreme commander of the forces of North Atlantic countries in Europe. It is also gratifying to learn that President Truman has expressed his agreement that General Gruenther should remain as chief of staff to the new supreme commander, a post where he has been so successful and effective under General Eisenhower.

QUESTIONS

BANKRUPTCIES SINCE 1945

Mr. Boisvert:

1. How many bankruptcies occurred in each province of Canada during (a) each of the years 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950 and 1951; (b) the first three months of 1952?

He said: Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to withdraw this question for the purpose of redrafting it.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Johnston:

1. How much money has been paid to the province of Ontario by the federal government for the construction of Ontario's share of the trans-Canada highway?
2. What are the contractual requirements before the federal government pays any money to a province for the construction of the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Winters:

1. Payments made to the Ontario provincial government by the federal government as Canada's share of the cost of construction of the trans-Canada highway in Ontario as at April 26, 1952, amount to $7,772,835.41.

2. Before money can be paid by the federal government to a provincial government for the construction of the trans-Canada highway, there must be a signed agreement between the two governments under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act, chapter 40, of the Statutes of Canada, 1949, and the terms of the agreement must have been carried out, with respect to the work for which payment is claimed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS— SNOW REMOVAL

Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. What type of railway snow removal equipment is on hand between Levis, Quebec, and Campbellton, New Brunswick?
2. How many of each type of equipment were available for use (a) during the period of January 1 to February 28, 1952; (b) for the dates February 13, 18 and 22, 1952?

Questions

3. What type of railway snow removal equipment is on hand between Moncton, New Brunswick, and Campbellton, New Brunswick?

4. How many of each type of equipment were available for use (a) during the period January 1, to February 28, 1952; (b) for the dates February 13, 18 and 22, 1952?

5. What was the cost to the Canadian National Railways for removal of snow following storms in (a) the Levis, Quebec and Campbellton, New Brunswick area on (i) January 23, 1952; (ii) February 13, 1952; (iii) February 18, 1952; (b) the Moncton, New Brunswick and Campbellton, New Brunswick area on (i) January 23, 1952; (ii) February 13, 1952; (iii) February 18, 1952?

6. What was the delay, in hours, of each of the trains running into Halifax on the dates (i) January 23; (ii) February 13; (iii) February 18, 1952?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Wing plows, rotary plows, spreaders and flangers.

2. (a) 20 wing plows, 3 rotary plows, 6 spreaders and 9 flangers (maximum number available during the period in question).

(b) February 13:16 wing plows, 3 rotary plows, 4 spreaders and 9 flangers; February 18:19 wing plows, 3 rotary plows, 6 spreaders and 9 flangers; February 22:20 wing plows, 3 rotary plows, 6 spreaders and 9 flangers.

3. Wing plows, rotary plow, spreaders and flangers.

4. (a) 11 wing plows and 7 flangers; (b) same as (a) on each of dates.

5. (a) (i) January 23, $88,925. (ii) February 13, $91,592. (iii) February 18, $210,511.

PENSIONS FOR PERSONS PHYSICALLY INCAPACITATED

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a supplementary answer to a question of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) which was first answered on March 12, 1952, as found at page 352 of Hansard. The question is as follows:

1. Did the various provincial governments undertake a survey to find out, among other things, the number of physically incapacitated persons in Canada?

2. If so, has the survey been completed?

3. What are the particulars disclosed regarding the number, age, and financial standing of those disabled persons?

4. Will a pension scheme be introduced at the present session to relieve the distress of those persons?

The answer is as follows:

1, 2 and 3. See reply tabled on March 12, 1952, Hansard, page 352.

4. The experience of foreign countries suggests that disability pensions should be closely associated with rehabilitation services which are designed to restore the disabled person to productive employment. Without remedial health, vocational guidance and training services, the cost of disability pensions may run unnecessarily high, without achieving this goal. On February 20, 21, and 22 the national advisory committee on rehabilitation of disabled persons set up as a result of last year's conference in Toronto, held its first meeting. It will review all aspects of the needs of disabled persons, and make recommendations from time to time.

Our new old age assistance and old age security programs will between them provide pensions for an estimated 45,000 totally and permanently handicapped persons. Allowances for blind persons will provide financial aid for approximately 8,500 more this year. Approximately 160,000 disabled veterans are receiving pensions and an additional number are being looked after under war veterans allowances.

Through the national health grants program substantial assistance is available to the disabled as follows:

(a) The government has provided for a sum of more than $4 million for a tuberculosis control grant part of which is available for "the provision of free treatment including rehabilitation".

(b) There is provision for a crippled children's grant of over $500,000 "to assist the provinces in an intensive program for the prevention and correction of crippling conditions in children, rehabilitation and training".

(c) Under the general public health grant very substantial sums are available to extend diagnostic and treatment services for those afflicted by arthritis and rheumatism or polio.

(d) The government has provided for a sum of more than $5 million, part of which is available for the rehabilitation of backward children and of mentally ill patients, under the mental health grant.

The provinces, under well-established workmen's compensation plans, provide pensions for the victims of industrial accidents. Approximately one-third of the cases in receipt of mothers' allowances are the result of disabilities which impair earnings. Some provinces offer special allowances for persons suffering from tuberculosis, and Newfoundland and Ontario have in recent years provided incapacitation allowances.

The province of Ontario has at its 1952 session just passed legislation providing for disability pensions. There is no indication at the present time that other provinces intend to follow this example.

It is the intention of the federal government to work in close co-operation with the provinces and interested organizations in a constructive approach to the complex problems involved in the various types of disabilities which impair the ability of individuals to work.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

IMMIGRANTS FROM BRITISH WEST INDIES

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. How many persons of British West Indies origin are at present living in Canada?

2. How many persons have entered Canada from the British West Indies during each of the five years 1947-1951, inclusive?

3. How many applicants for entry to Canada from the British West Indies have been refused entry during each of the five years 1947-1951, inclusive?

4. For what reasons were these applicants rejected and how many were rejected for each of these reasons?

5. How many students were admitted to Canada from the British West Indies for the purpose of studying in Canada during each of the years 1947-1951, inclusive?

6. How many of those students applied for permanent residence in Canada?

7. How many of these student applicants were granted permanent residence in Canada?

8. Are any statistics available to show how immigrants to Canada from the British West Indies, compare with immigrants from other warm climate countries in the following respects (a) health records; (b) wages or salaries earned; (c) unemployment records; (d) profession and occupation followed; (e) public liabilities?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE

Mr. Argue:

1. How many herds of cattle have been destroyed in Saskatchewan as a result of foot-and-mouth disease?

2. How many animals were in each herd?

3. When was disease first reported in each herd, and how many animals were suffering from disease?

4. What are the names of all veterinarians who inspected these herds, and on what dates did each veterinarian make his inspection?

5. What animal inoculation tests were made on each herd and on what dates?

6. What was the result of each test?

PURCHASE OF BUILDING SITE IN SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. Gillis:

1. Did any federal government department purchase a building site in Sydney, Nova Scotia, in the years 1951 or 1952?

2. If so, for whom was it purchased?

3. How much was paid for it and for what purpose does the government intend to use it?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of a report made by "F" division, C.I.B., Regina town station, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, dated March 20, 1952, with respect to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the report to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar refers as having been made by "F" division, C.I.B., Regina town station, R.C.M.P., dated March 20, 1952, with respect to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, is a report made to his superior officers by a constable of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police acting as an investigator in this matter. The Department of Justice and the government have consistently taken the position that reports made to their superior officers by members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police concerning investigations which they have been instructed to conduct have always been withheld from production in the House of Commons upon the ground that it is not in the public interest to produce them.

The reasons for the taking of this position will be obvious to anyone who gives the matter thought. Not only are the police investigators instructed to ascertain all the relevant facts, but they are encouraged to submit to their superior officers their own theories and their own hypotheses as to what interpretations might be drawn from these facts in further investigation into the matter. They are encouraged to suggest further lines of inquiry. They are encouraged, and indeed instructed, in the case of an investigation into a crime, to suggest in strictest confidence all those whom they regard as possible suspects, however slight may be their own reasons for suspecting these other persons, in order that their superior officers to whom these confidential reports are made may, by considering these confidential reports along with other confidential reports received from other investigating officers, draw conclusions as to what further investigations may be necessary, or even ultimate conclusions as to guilt and the identity of the guilty party or parties.

If the investigating officer does not know at the time he makes his report that it will be privileged from publication he, I suggest, will be hesitant about suggesting hypotheses, particularly in scientific and other fields in which, if he is not qualified as an expert witness, his oral evidence would not even be received. He will be most hesitant about naming suspects if he knows that the names of such suspects are to be published and their reputations prejudiced or ruined when in fact they may be completely guiltless. Therefore the production of these confidential reports would destroy much of their value. For these reasons the Department of Justice and the government feel that in the present instance we must follow our uniform and invariable practice of refusing to table the confidential report referred to in the hon. member's motion. Without arguing the matter unless it becomes necessary, I would submit the following citations: 1943, Hansard, volume 1, page 202; 1943, Hansard, volume 4, page 4193; 1945, Hansard, volume 2, page 1929.

Mr. Coldwell: In view of the minister's statement, may I say that I understand there is nothing in the report which would indicate that anyone had been guilty of criminal action of any sort, and that the material therein with respect to the matter of foot-and-mouth disease is of vital interest to the house and the standing committee on agriculture. I do not propose to press the motion to a vote because I do not want to prejudice the members of the committee when they demand production of the report before the committee. From my knowledge of what the report may contain, I think it is a most important document. I am not going to press the motion but I want to protest against the statement made by the minister because I do not believe that the guilt of persons is involved in this particular report, but merely an outline of the investigations that have been conducted by the mounted police concerning the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. Garson: May I clear up a point? I was not suggesting any guilt was necessarily involved in this particular report. My point was that when in the preparation of police reports they have to make suggestions, express their own ideas and name suspects, the whole system of obtaining such reports would be invalidated if at the time they were prepared it was known they were going to be published.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES—PROCEDURE IN TABLING OF RETURNS ORDERED

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, at this time I rise on a question of privilege which relates to the subject just dealt with. On March 12, at page 354 of Hansard, a motion was passed by this house under motions for papers, which reads:

> For a copy of all communications that passed between veterinary officials either provincial or federal and the federal Department of Agriculture, together with all records since the 17th day of November, 1951, relative to the cattle epidemic of vesicular stomatitis or foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan, also all certificates or statements of analysis showing the results of the chemical examination of suspected specimens of either of said cattle diseases.

At that time the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said:

> With the same reservation as stated by the Prime Minister.

Then the motion was agreed to. The statement by the Prime Minister was in reference to the first motion for papers before the house that day, and was in these words:

> Mr. St. Laurent: Subject to the usual reservation that the consent of the other governments concerned be obtained.

Now I rise to ask why there has been such delay in complying with a motion for papers passed by this house, the papers being and always having been available. The matter was brought up on April 7 at page 1163 of Hansard by the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton), who inquired as to the production of these papers. At that time the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. McCubbin) said:

> I will look into the matter and see what can be done.

I rise merely for the purpose of asking the minister the reason for the rather unnecessary delay in the production of papers which are neither involved nor difficult to procure.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I have been over the records that would be covered by the motion. I must say the wording of the motion itself is not such as to get some of the information my hon. friend has discussed with me, apart altogether from what is taking place at the moment. The motion was passed by the house, and I presume if the house insisted all the information that might be available would eventually have to be brought down during this session. On the other hand it has been agreed already that all the facts having to do with the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease will be submitted to the agriculture committee and subject to discussion there. Any matters which of necessity must be privileged in connection with a matter of this kind can be settled when that committee meets, and we can pretty well determine what should be brought down in the house this session. If there is anything that must be brought down while the committee is sitting in order to clear up the situation, there is no difficulty about getting that information. But I think it would be improper to bring down in this house under this or any other order discussions that took place between officials of a department. Such discussions with regard to certain matters have always been considered privileged. If it is the desire of the committee and later of the house that even those privileged matters should be brought before the committee in a case of this kind, I do not think there would be any question about it; but I do not think it is necessary to bring down this information at this stage.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The answer by the minister is exactly the kind of thing that was objected to here this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Knowles: Contempt of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says he can stand before this house and determine whether a document or a series of documents ordered to be produced shall or shall not be produced.

Mr. Gardiner: If I might say a word—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not interrupt my hon. friend. The order was passed, and that order is final. I point out that under citation 329—

> When a motion is adopted, it becomes the resolution, vote or order of the house.

That resolution has become an order of the house. No minister of the crown has any right to say we will wait until a committee of parliament meets and if that committee considers that the order is improper it can so determine. If the minister had any objection, on confidential or any other grounds, he should have raised it on March 12; but he did not do so. He said the order might be passed by the house subject to the same veto or reservation that had been properly imposed by the Prime Minister in reference to the first motion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of parliament I am asking you to rule that the minister shall not have the right to determine whether on his ipse dixit documents shall not be produced which may be inconvenient to his department. Such an attitude deserves your attention, as custodian of the prerogatives of parliament, to see that these orders are not circumvented at the wish of any department. On the basis of the order that was passed by the house I ask Your Honour to direct that the documents be produced. The minister has been fair enough to admit that the reason they have not been produced is not that they are not available, but that in his opinion it would be improper to do so. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to uphold the rights and prerogatives of parliament and order that these documents be produced not at the convenience of the minister or at the whim of a committee about to be set up, but because parliament has been directed and ordered that they be produced.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry that, since this matter came up just before I came into the house, I have not had an opportunity to search the rules and determine on what rule I might base my contention—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did the minister not make that reservation when the motion was passed?

Mr. Gardiner: Nevertheless, it has been the practice during the time I have been in parliament that discussions between individuals in departments in arriving at conclusions have been privileged. Now, the conclusions themselves that happen to be reached in that matter may not be privileged, but the discussions that have taken place back and forth in the reaching of those conclusions have been privileged. Order after order has been brought down here in which that kind of thing has not been presented. My understanding is that it is some of that which is required at this particular time. I may say that I can bring down a return which does not contain that kind of thing, but I do not think that would satisfy the hon. member. I want him to know beforehand that if it is brought down, and if any of this other information is required and if it can be obtained properly in the committee, all well and good. If it cannot be obtained then because it is privileged, that is another matter. I am quite prepared to bring down to the house what I think is not privileged and might be brought down, but I am afraid it would not get the results the hon. member wants. I do not want him to feel that there is any misrepresentation in connection with it. Later on if he says he has not got what he wants, he will have to get it in the committee rather than through this method.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that illustrates an attitude that borders closely on contempt of parliament, when a minister says "I shall produce whatever documents I choose to excise from the record, regardless of the order of the house." When the order was passed there were no reservations such as the minister now makes. After discovery, I assume, that there are some documents he does not desire to produce, the minister has no authority to determine what documents shall be produced. An order has been made, and at this point I am going to leave it to Your Honour to make a direction to the minister, after having looked into the authorities, that parliament shall not be treated with contempt, regardless of how inconvenient some of the documents may turn out to be. I am not going to allow an order of the house to be pigeon-holed, and have the rights of the house determined by some committee set up by the house. At this time I simply ask for a determination of this matter, and that the minister be directed to produce the records that I want, particularly the records as set out in the order and not the minister's interpretation of confidentiality which would deny the production of documents that parliament has ordered.

If the minister can get by with this, then any minister can simply say, "We shall give you whatever documents we think will not do any harm but the rest of the record will remain hidden because we determine confidentiality." I simply let the matter rest there, so that after consideration Your Honour may determine whether or not we on this side of the house are to be placed in the position where ministers of the crown determine how orders of parliament are to be interpreted, and what documents they will deliver in accordance with the orders made.

Mr. Gardiner: One more word on this, Mr. Speaker; I happen to know what the hon. gentleman wants. He came over to my desk and asked for it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I mentioned one document.

Mr. Gardiner: One document, that is the one you want. At the time I stated to him, "Well, you know that is privileged." He agreed that is was privileged.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that statement made—today?

Mr. Gardiner: No, about two weeks ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was no such agreement.

Mr. Gardiner: There are some documents—as a matter of fact, I did not know this one was in existence and I do not know how the hon. member found out about it. The only document that was mentioned is the one which I think the government official who sent the message should be in a position to deal with. This government official can be brought before the committee and asked to deal with it. I do not think I should be asked to put it on the table, and I do not think I should be asked to determine that it should not be put on the table. As a matter of fact, I am not suggesting that I should not bring down all these documents before the end of this session; that is what this order calls for. But the official of the department who is concerned with this document ought to be in a position to explain this message, why it was sent, and so on. He will be before the committee, and he can be there next week if the hon. member wants it.

Mr. Argue: After the Saskatchewan election.

Mr. Gardiner: There is nothing in connection with it that we have to hide. This committee can be got under way next Monday if hon. members so desire. This official could be before the committee as soon as it meets. I do not think it is fair to this official, and that is why this privilege is there, to simply parade this message before the public and say this is what he meant by it. The official should have the right to go before this committee and indicate why he sent such a message. I am not suggesting that you could not have it next Monday if you wanted it. You can have this man here that day or the next day if you want him here, but I do not think this house should order that discussions which took place between two officials of the department be produced and spread over the country as political propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I just rise to say one thing. However inconvenient politically it may be, an order has been made. No minister dares stand up in this house and say, "I shall give you what is politically convenient but I shall deny the documents that are a detriment to me politically."

Mr. Gardiner: I have not said that. I have said that I will give you all the documents which you are entitled to.

Mr. Knowles: In support of the point of order that has been pressed by the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) I believe Your Honour should consider, in addition to the other citation, citation 389 of Beauchesne's third edition. Before I read that citation I should point out that there are citations which permit opposition to a motion for the production of papers at the time the motion is before the house. That time has long since passed. I submit that a good deal of what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has said today was entirely out of order. If he wanted to oppose the motion of the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) he had the right to do so but he did not oppose it. He indicated one condition, namely, the consent of the provinces concerned, but otherwise the motion passed and became an order of this house. If the Minister of Agriculture even implied that to any extent at all he may not carry out the order of the house, it would bring him under the citation to which I called your attention, citation 389.

Foot-and-mouth disease—Documents

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow a debate on this matter. The hon. member for Lake Centre has brought this matter to the attention of the house. He has asked the Minister of Agriculture that the documents be tabled. Whether they should be tabled today or tomorrow, it is not for me to say. It is not for the Speaker to say when they should be tabled. The house is the master of its own proceedings. I preside over the proceedings of the house to see that the proceedings are carried on according to the rules and standing orders of the house.

I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for bringing to my attention the citation he mentioned and I also thank the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) for bringing to my attention the citation he mentioned. As for endeavouring to enforce any order that is passed by this house for the production of papers especially during the session in which the order is passed, I must say that it is not within my power to do so, and I rule accordingly.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wish to read citation 389—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I have given my ruling, and I rule accordingly.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully appeal against your ruling.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

A question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that, an order of the house having been passed this session requiring the production of certain papers and the papers having not yet been produced, Mr. Speaker should order that production should be made. Mr. Speaker ruled that it was not within his power to do so. The hon. member for Lake Centre and others have appealed the Speaker's ruling. Those in favour of the Speaker's ruling will please rise.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege: the procedure is not clear, but I now give notice that I intend to ask that the house shall direct the production of these documents, and that orders of parliament shall not be flouted at the ministerial whim of any minister of the government. I do so under citation 389—

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear; I hope you get the chance to read it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —which reads:

If parties neglect to make returns in reasonable time, they are ordered to make them forthwith; or so much of returns as has not been made. If they continue to withhold them, they are ordered to attend at the bar of the house; and unless they satisfactorily explain the causes of their neglect, and comply with the order of the house, they will be censured or punished according to the circumstances of the case.

I give that notice, Mr. Speaker, that I intend to ask that the rights of parliament be upheld and, without prejudice to those rights, give that notice now; for unless the rights of parliament, and the orders, are to be upheld, then parliament has ceased to exist.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that it is within the rules to give oral notice, nor am I sure when the notice will be debated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is just to preserve my rights.

Mr. Speaker: Well, may I have the privilege myself of saying that I think what has been said just now proves to the house that my ruling was correct.

Mr. Knowles: It proves the very opposite.

An hon. Member: Shut up over there.

Mr. Speaker: The ground for my ruling was that it was not within my power. It may be within the power of the house.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Lest there be any misunderstanding, anything I have said in no way derogates from your authority.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not intimidated by those interruptions. I am not in any way challenging your order that the ruling is final, but I assert once again as a member of parliament my right in the House of Commons to have full information.

Mr. Speaker: Next order of business is notices of motions.

UNITED NATIONS

CO-OPERATION AMONG SPONSOR NATIONS OF NATO

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, if an invitation is received by the parliament of Canada to appoint delegates to meet with delegates from the legislatures of the sponsor nations of NATO, with a view to discussing their closer co-operation within the framework of the United Nations Organization, the government should give consideration to the acceptance of the invitation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, obviously the motion in my name which you have just read will not be as controversial as some of the other matters which have come up for discussion today, and that perhaps is fortunate. I hope that there will be support for this motion from members of the various parties throughout the house. As a motion it is not entirely satisfactory to myself because it is a compromise designed to get as much support as possible and, also, of course, a motion to ensure a debate in the house on NATO and the necessity for making it into an adequate and effective instrument for our purposes.

I am asking that, if an invitation is extended to the parliament of Canada to send delegates to meet with members from the legislatures of the sponsor nations of NATO, we accept it. The question arises: Who is going to bell the cat, who is going to issue this invitation? Speaking for myself, I should like to see Canada issue the invitation. I can see no reason indeed why we should not take such a lead for we have nothing to lose but our own fears. On the other hand we have everything to gain.

The more I consider the international situation and the way in which in certain aspects it is deteriorating the more convinced I become that members of parliament throughout the western democracies and all citizens will be terribly negligent in their responsibilities if they do not explore every avenue which can lead to a greater security for our people. It is possible that such a conference as I have in mind might be a failure, although I do not think it would be. I am prepared to take that chance. Some may argue that if it is a failure it will set back the cause which we have supported for an indeterminate number of years. I doubt it. What I am concerned about is finding out whether or not those ideas which many of us hold, ideas designed to make NATO stronger, have validity. The only way we can do that is by holding such a conference.

I am a believer in Atlantic union as the best way of strengthening the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I wish to make it abundantly clear that as a supporter of Atlantic union I am in no way in the slightest opposed or hostile to the United Nations or to what the United Nations is trying to do. What I am trying to do is to make the United Nations stronger by trying to make NATO stronger.

I have no intention of going over the basic arguments for union which I adduced last year in the house. The sponsor nations which I have in mind, apart from ourselves, are the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg. What I would like to see, and here I speak personally, is a union among those countries, so that we might have a common foreign policy, a common defence policy, a common currency, a common citizenship and of course a common policy along lines of trade.

Some will say today that that is visionary. It may well be. Others will say that it is revolutionary, but that it certainly is not for what we are doing is proceeding along the lines of the precedents which we have established in the past. What strikes me most forcibly is that if war comes and we are to wage it successfully and efficiently that sort of union must come about for our own preservation. Therefore it would be so much better were we to try to achieve it, to lay the foundation for it now when we are at peace even if it is a somewhat uncertain and unsettled peace.

Those who believe in union of the North Atlantic democracies have in mind a triple goal, a threefold objective. We wish to achieve freedom, security and prosperity for our peoples. It is lamentable to think that within seven years of the conclusion of a war which shook the world we are spending more than 50 per cent of our national budget on defence. We are not spending it willingly, we are doing it because we are compelled to by extraneous forces but we have to do it. We are going to spend this year on defence five times the amount of the entire budget of Canada twenty years ago and yet we are no nearer peace today than we were in 1945. Perhaps we are a little nearer than we were in 1948, but that is the best that can be said.

That being so, it is time to re-examine and re-assess the security system which we have had in the past and to some extent to which we still cling. I maintain that the needs of today demand that that security system be rebuilt. This does not mean that we scrap the instruments which we have at hand, but rather that we use them in a way which will give us the security which we crave. The only chance of safety for the nations of this world, perhaps the only possibility for many people to live in this world, is to make war impossible. The question is: How do we go about it?

One of the best ways of going about it is to make the Atlantic community a reality. The Atlantic community has come far within the last few years but still we are talking rather than doing. I have inveighed frequently in the past against the policy of the western powers as being almost entirely a negative policy, a policy designed to stop communism rather than a positive policy designed to promote the concept of democracy and freedom throughout the world. We are not going to inflame the minds of men by kindling enthusiasm for something which is entirely negative, but on the other hand if we make our policies positive, if we make policies for something instead of against something, then we shall get the support of peoples who are still unhappily somewhat hesitant.

I believe that under Atlantic union the freedom of all the individuals who were members of it would be enhanced. After all, the stress in a union such as I envisage is on the individual citizen and not upon the national governments. It is the individual citizen who is all-important. My suggestion is that we ask the citizen to transfer some of his personal sovereignty to a still greater international organization. Those of us who have only a smattering of history remember what happened in the United States before union was formed and in Canada before the dominion was formed. At that time the citizens were asked to transfer their sovereignty beyond the state and the province, to the union as it was in the United States and to the Dominion of Canada as it was here. I am suggesting that we have to extend and transfer that sovereignty even further today if we are going to be safe in the years to come. By so widening our individual sovereignty we shall automatically increase our individual security.

I have enumerated the seven nations with which I should like to enter into such an agreement. I mention them because we have a common heritage of culture, we are steeped in the same concepts of democracy. We cherish the liberties which we have in common and we have the same devotion to freedom. Above all, in such a union I am convinced that the rights of the minorities throughout these countries would be protected even more adequately than is the case just now. Today the rights of minorities are protected sometimes by a written constitution, sometimes by an unwritten constitution. Under union not only would the national constitution be operative to protect minorities, there would be legislation based upon the union which would give still greater protection.

I submit that this policy of co-operation among these nations will give still greater security in the world. If we have greater security it follows that we shall thereby enlarge our freedom. That security which we desire is growing, slowly it is true, and we welcome that growth.

The situation which exists in NATO today is indeed a far cry from that which existed a year ago when I spoke in a similar debate. I said then that the machinery whereby the supreme commander could get directives was slow and cumbersome and, indeed, dangerous in the sense that it might lull us into a false sense of security. Now the machinery is being streamlined, and we welcome it. General Ridgway will have the opportunity, denied to his predecessor for obvious reasons, of getting decisions much more quickly by the council.

Yet the fact remains that in NATO we are still putting the cart before the horse. We are still insistent on building up a military machine without as yet creating the civilian control which is so desirable. I cannot think offhand of another example in history where that has been done. Usually nations have collaborated and co-operated on a political basis first, and from that co-operation the military machine has come. Such, for understandable reasons, has not been the situation with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It was essential that we build up our defences as rapidly as possible. We are doing that; we are achieving the defences which we need.

The next step to be taken, and the most important one, is that we create some form of democratic control of the armed forces that are being built up in Europe. It causes one to think seriously when we realize that within two or three years General Ridgway may have under him in Europe as many as a million men and under my concept of what is an appropriate state of combat readiness, ready to defend immediately against any attack. A force of a million men is an extraordinary force to control, and in my opinion the only way it could be done adequately would be through some form of Atlantic union. But if we cannot achieve that just now—and I am afraid that we cannot—there is an alternative by which we can create some form of accountability. That is by forming a North Atlantic assembly. I shall mention that later at greater length.

What is important, and what I am sure the ministers who have attended North Atlantic Treaty Organization meetings realize as fully as anybody else, is that we cannot have security by military means alone but that we have to have economic co-operation and support in a far greater way than has been the case in the past. In other words, we have to make article 2 of NATO work. It is in our interests in Canada to make Europe prosperous. The more prosperous Europeans are the greater is the market for those things which we produce and sell. But unhappily, with certain exceptions, on this continent our history has been for the last six years that, while we were willing to help Europe with arms, we were equally willing to hinder Europe with tariffs. We are prepared to give with the one hand and to take away with the other.

I of course believe that with the creation of a free trade area among these nations we should achieve a prosperity unparalleled in history and even yet undreamed of. It may be that in so far as the general reduction of tariffs is concerned the United States is the principal culprit, but at the moment it is not my intention to allot blame. Rather I wish to further my thesis. Whether the United States became industrially the most powerful nation in the world through tariffs is questionable. I do not think so. Nor do I think the United States became such a powerful nation entirely owing to the ability and drive of its people. The real reason for the United States being so strong today is that the industrialists of that country had a tremendous area in which to sell their wares. They had a great population for whom they could manufacture and sell on a mass production basis. So the people of the United States, because of the great area in which they live and their great population, are able to get cheap production and mass production as a result of the size of the market, and accordingly their standard of living is high.

But what would happen if a market of that size were doubled within a short time? If I were an American my instinctive reaction would be that one effect of a free trade area in this group would be that there would be no more economic aid required for Europe, and that as a United States citizen I would not have to tax myself to provide this assistance to my allies. The credit needs of Europe could then be satisfied by public as well as by private investment. In Europe we should find that capital would no longer be frozen by controls necessitated of course by the chronic shortage of dollars, while the Americans and we in Canada might conceivably be willing to risk our capital in Europe because of the lack of controls. I am certain that were this free trade area to emerge there would be millions, and indeed tens of millions, of dollars available for investment on both sides of the Atlantic. There would be great prosperity.

Coming as I do from western Canada, I can see the great advantages which would accrue to that part of the country if the European nations who are our allies today had the dollars they require to buy the raw products we produce. I can see the great advantage which would accrue to farmers, fishermen, fruit growers, lumber producers, and indeed to all our raw material producers. It would be in our economic interest to do that, but the majority have not yet realized just where our economic interest lies. This aspiration will undoubtedly be classified as visionary, no matter how essential it is to our common welfare.

The all-important fact is that the situation in Europe today is probably as precarious as it has been since the war ended. The nations of Europe who are our allies are steadily losing their markets in Asia. The market in China is lost. The market in Indonesia has been partially lost. War has disrupted Indo-China. The pattern of trade in India and Pakistan is not yet clear. Australia has decided to cut its imports by some 50 per cent, and the nations that are going to be most severely hurt and most badly affected are the nations in Europe. Where then are they going to find markets for their exports? The only area I can think of that is readily available is on the North American continent, and there is no sign yet that we are willing to take European goods. There is no sign yet that we are agreeable to implementing to the fullest article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Therefore we are left with the very simple fact that we shall be compelled, if we want to keep our allies strong, to pour out economic aid to Europe. If we continue to do so we are justified in asking—to what sort of allies? They will be allies, they will be governments, they will be nations which will be very much under the gun. They will be governments under pressure of events at home, and the most serious pressure of all will be that of a falling and constantly reduced standard of living with its inevitable concomitant that the lower standard of living will give encouragement to the communist parties within those countries. By our default the men of Moscow may win.

After all, with the standards of living of their people falling, and with no market in which they can sell their goods, the governments of these countries will be compelled to cut their expenditures on defence, and that is the simple fact of the situation. Therefore by default we in North America will have weakened our allies, and of course disastrously weakened ourselves. The picture I draw is pessimistic, and yet I believe it is an accurate blueprint of the future. What we have not yet realized is that the Achilles heel of the west is the tariff structure of the western nations. Some may say: Why do the Europeans not enter into a union of their own? The answer is that a European union would solve none of the problems of Europe.

European union would not solve the perpetual dollar imbalance which perplexes Europe today. European union would not give our European allies more dollars. European union would not give Europe the security it wants, because Europe cannot be secure without the assistance of North America, and we in North America must realize that we can have no security without the assistance of Europe. The other day I had the opportunity of chatting with the foreign minister of one of the NATO countries, who happened to be in Ottawa. He was quite outspoken and told me that in his opinion the only salvation of Europe lay not in European union but in Atlantic union, and that his country had gone so far as to amend its constitution to make entry into such a federation a possibility.

Here I repeat words which I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will remember: if the North Atlantic community is to endure it must rest on something broader and deeper than military co-operation alone. In other words we come back to article 2 of the treaty. There are some in the various countries belonging to NATO who regard article 2 somewhat in the form of holy water to be sprinkled upon an instrument of power politics. That is a cynical outlook; it is a defeatist attitude, which may yet cost us dear. If any holding these views should be appointed to any national delegation to Paris we might find them not at all prepared to carry out to the uttermost the policies of their home governments, and this is something which must be guarded against. Those officials who go to Paris to attend NATO must be men who are convinced that arising from defence needs will come collaboration in other fields. We have gone a long way in military co-operation. We will need to go just as far and even further in economic co-operation, and it is essential that all the officials sent to Paris should be, so far as is humanly possible, men who are convinced that article 2 can be the reality for which we hope.

In my own mind I am convinced that the surest way to make article 2 a reality is through Atlantic union; but in the absence of such a union I am content to advocate the creation of a North American assembly. Great benefit may be derived from parliamentarians in various countries meeting each other, discussing their problems and becoming more and more conscious of mutual needs. Unquestionably there will be clashes of opinion and conflicts of ideas, which we should welcome; but I am convinced that if such an assembly were attended by men of good will and integrity, great good could come out of it.

Let us admit also that we are making progress in NATO in ways other than defence.

Once we get rid of the froth and spume of what happened at Lisbon we can see that certain real achievements have been made. For instance, two or three years ago it would have been fantastic to suppose that three individual men, not representatives of governments, would be asked and even encouraged to examine national budgets and advise sovereign nations as to how they should order their finances for the common good. That is really extraordinary; yet what is extraordinary today will be commonplace tomorrow.

Equally interesting is the fact that the decisions of the NATO council are being accepted by the member governments, by and large. I say "by and large" because owing to its constitutional structure the United States does not find itself in the same position as, let us say, the United Kingdom or Canada. In our case the Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the approval of the government, can embark upon or support a certain policy in the NATO council knowing he will be supported when he comes back to parliament. The Secretary of State of the United States can also support a policy in the NATO council, but he has no guarantee that he will have the approval of congress or the senate when he returns to Washington. Nevertheless, even admitting that, governments today are accepting the decisions of the council. As time goes on and NATO develops, more and more its decisions will be accepted by national governments.

That being so, what is NATO today, apart from being an alliance of some fourteen nations? NATO is a loosely knit assembly of diplomats, senior civil servants, admirals, generals, air marshals and all the necessary and requisite camp followers. Only occasionally do ministers who are elected representatives sit in on the councils of NATO, though undoubtedly they will have the last word. But as long as that is the case; as long as the elected representatives of the people are divorced from what NATO is actually doing, so long will there be no real sense of community developed. I am convinced that one of the urgent requirements of the day is that elected representatives of the people should help more directly in framing the policy of NATO.

That brings me back to the concept of the North Atlantic assembly. In a couple of days we are going to have the privilege of a visit from a distinguished United States delegation, which is coming to Ottawa to discuss with Canadian parliamentarians the possibility of setting up a North Atlantic assembly. Its members will include Senator Gillette of Iowa, Senator Sparkman of Alabama, Congressman Leroy Johnson of California and the Hon. Owen Roberts, formerly a justice of the United States supreme court. I have no idea what conclusions will be arrived at as a result of these meetings, but we can be certain they will be stimulating and I hope the first of many of a like nature. We shall be discussing the possibility of creating a North Atlantic assembly. Again I have no idea what shape such an assembly would take. Possibly it might be along the lines of the assembly of Europe, with the council of NATO acting as a sort of interim cabinet until we can get something much closer to the European idea.

Mr. Blackmore: If the hon. member will permit a question, has he any information as to who is appointing these men from the United States? How are they being appointed to come here to Canada?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): These men are not being appointed by anybody. They are coming up here at the invitation of Canadian members of parliament, coming on their initiative and paying their own expenses, though I hope we personally may be courteous enough to pay whatever expenses they incur while in this city. It is purely an unofficial delegation, and I think something very much worth while.

To revert to this North Atlantic assembly for a moment, the objection has been made that you could not have discussions in such an assembly without contravening security, without discussing matters which are classified. I do not hold that view. I think that in such an assembly there would be quite sufficient to discuss without getting into classified matters. The most important thing to be discussed, of course, would be the broad outlines and objectives of policy of the North Atlantic organization. If I were to put my aims and hopes into four short, succinct sentences I could do no better than quote these four points coming from a group of people in the United Kingdom who believe much as I do. They are:

1. To secure peace we need a global defence policy for the western and Atlantic community acting in partnership.
2. To carry out a common defence policy we need a common foreign policy.
3. To maintain and improve the standard and quality of living we need a partnership in economic policy.
4. To achieve this partnership in defence, foreign and economic affairs, we need regular meetings of a council of ministers, served by a common secretariat and guided by a common assembly.

When we arrive at that partnership, Mr. Speaker, when we arrive at that assembly, then the bones of NATO will become clothed in flesh and blood; then, indeed, the North Atlantic community of which we have heard so much will have become a reality.

United Nations

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I feel, Mr. Speaker, that possibly I ought to say a word or two on this resolution, although its terms are not, as I understand them, such as to require any statement of policy on behalf of the government. The resolution reads:

That, in the opinion of this house, if an invitation is received by the parliament of Canada to appoint delegates to meet with delegates from the legislatures of the sponsor nations of NATO, with a view to discussing their closer co-operation within the framework of the United Nations organization, the government should give consideration to the acceptance of the invitation.

It will be noted, Mr. Speaker, that the invitation referred to in the resolution would be one that would be addressed to the parliament of Canada. It would not, I suppose, be appropriate for the government, as such, to reply to an invitation of that kind which would be addressed to parliament. In fact, if we did so we might very well be accused of some of these undesirable attitudes in relation to parliament which were thrown at us today by the official opposition, the leader of which is not at present in the house. Nor I believe is the external affairs spokesman of the opposition who would normally be interested in a resolution of this kind. They are no doubt engaged elsewhere on business of vital public importance. I would not for a moment accuse them of being "rude" to the house because they are not here at this time.

I believe it is quite proper, however, that someone in the government should say a few words about a resolution of this kind which deals with such a vitally important matter, even though the invitation referred to in the resolution would be one addressed to parliament. As a matter of fact, an invitation similar to that which has been suggested in the resolution was, I believe, addressed to parliament not so long ago in respect of a meeting of the Council of Europe at Strasbourg. The parliament, not the government, through the Speaker decided to send representatives to that meeting. I believe that was done, and quite properly. As a member of the government who would normally be particularly interested in a matter of this kind, I would think it would be impossible however to state in advance that the members of the government, as such, in discussion with members of their own party, would pledge themselves to the acceptance of any such invitation. I am sure the hon. member who proposed the resolution would agree that we would want to know the source of the invitation, and we would want to know something about the form in which it was couched.

This resolution does not give—I am not complaining about it because it would probably be impossible to produce a resolution which would do so—any details about the kind of invitation, whether it would be from a government or from an unofficial organization. Nor does it indicate the nature of the invitation. If, however, an invitation came from a responsible governmental source, and the hon. member who moved the resolution has suggested that possibly that responsible source might be the government of Canada, and was couched in proper terms which did not commit those who accepted it to a course of action that might be undesirable, I would think very serious consideration should be given to it, not only by the members of the government but by all the members of the house to whom it would be properly addressed as the parliament of Canada. I do not think I could or should go further than that at this time. I know that any serious proposal which would increase the co-operation of the members of NATO within the framework of the United Nations, as this resolution suggests, and which would thereby strengthen NATO, is one which should commend itself to all the members of this house as I am sure it would commend itself to the members of the government.

From that point of view, it is very easy for me to support the idea behind this resolution. I would not, however, wish that support to be interpreted later on as meaning that an invitation of any kind to the parliament of Canada to participate in a meeting of this kind would, normally and naturally, be approved by the government as such. I have had something to do with the development of NATO, and anyone who has had anything to do with that development cannot help but support any move which would strengthen co-operation between the members of NATO, and by "co-operation" within the meaning of this resolution I am not thinking so much of military co-operation as of co-operation in other fields. There is no member of NATO who is more interested in that kind of co-operation than Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the minister mean by that?

Mr. Pearson: Co-operation in the field of foreign policy; I mean co-operation in the field of economic policy; I mean, as this resolution would seem to indicate, co-operation which would bring NATO and its policies into closer contact with the legislatures of the other countries. That is one of the things most on the mind of the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution, and that is a question which has already been discussed by NATO, ways and means by which the organization could be brought closer to parliament.

Hon. members will recall a committee which has been referred to in this house before, the committee of five on non-military co-operation. This committee made a report to the council at Rome and the council at Lisbon. This report was the result of a good deal of examination by a working group presided over by a Canadian official who will shortly be a member of our permanent delegation to NATO. In that report to the council of NATO at Rome, these words were included in the section on possible relations between parliamentary representatives and NATO:

> The suggestion that some form of association of parliamentary representatives with certain phases of NATO activity would be desirable was put forward in the committee chiefly with a view to developing an adequate understanding in parliaments and among the general public of NATO and its objectives, and of the role which parliamentary representatives might play in strengthening and developing the North Atlantic community.
> No definite proposals were put forward as to how such an association might be developed. It was noted that the Council of Europe includes parliamentary representatives of most North Atlantic countries, but that it also includes certain other countries. It was suggested that some form of closer association of parliamentarians from North Atlantic countries might be developed within the framework of the North Atlantic community, and that possibly parliamentary advisers might be attached to the North Atlantic council delegations.
> On the other hand, it was generally recognized by the committee that the problems which have arisen in the relationships between the ministerial and parliamentary organs, for example, in the Council of Europe, would apply equally to any similar arrangements in the NATO context . . . Difficulties might also arise in certain countries whose constitutional arrangements were based upon the principle of the separation of powers, and in countries in whose parliaments there were communist elements of substantial importance. The opinion was also expressed that the establishment of a council of governments in itself provides for the participation of cabinet ministers in various fields who take the responsibility of presenting NATO programs and objectives to their respective parliaments, although it was noted that in the case of at least one North Atlantic country, cabinet ministers were not directly in contact with the legislature and could not assume this responsibility.

Then the report goes on:

> It is the opinion of the committee that this is a subject—

That is, closer parliamentary association with NATO.

> —which can best be dealt with on the basis of experience and that no general recommendations can be made at this time. It should be examined further at a later date, in the light of the constitutional and political problems involved for each of the North Atlantic governments and the experience of other international bodies.

At our Lisbon meeting, in our report we included a recommendation that that subject should be one of the matters to be gone into by the permanent council, the council which is now sitting in permanent session.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the minister permit a question before he gets further away from the idea of economic co-operation?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: Does the minister intend to enlarge upon or to elaborate on the meaning of economic co-operation before he finishes? If not, does he care to do so now?

Mr. Pearson: I do not want to get into a long and detailed discussion of the various forms of non-military co-operation in connection with a resolution of this kind which is primarily concerned with ways and means of bringing NATO into closer association with parliaments and the elected representatives of the people. The whole question of economic co-operation within NATO was touched on in previous statements I have made and is now the subject of examination by the NATO agencies concerned. I pointed out previously, and I do not think it would be inappropriate to mention it again now, that in dealing with economic co-operation within NATO we, as members of that organization, have to be careful not to introduce arrangements which would cut across arrangements already made between the members of larger organizations. After all, there are some of the members of NATO who belong to other associations, and all of them belong to the United Nations. We have to be quite certain that, in attempting to reduce the barriers to trade within the NATO group, we shall not be confusing and making more complex arrangements in the larger groups. However, that is all I should like to say about that particular subject at this moment.

On the question of closer parliamentary association, I myself think this is a most desirable objective to be achieved, but it is not always easy to see how it can be done. I am not sure that the procedure of parliamentary advisers which has worked well, I think, with regard to the United Nations, would be equally satisfactory with regard to the NATO council. Certainly in the NATO council meetings I have attended, a good many of the discussions have been in military committee, and a great deal of the information given there was highly secret. Although that fact would not necessarily make the attendance of any member of parliament inadvisable or undesirable—in fact it might make it more desirable—nevertheless there are represented in NATO some governments who would be highly embarrassed indeed if parliamentary representatives of larger groups were invited to be parliamentary advisers at NATO council meetings.

I am not going to say much more about the resolution now. I do not wish at this time to get into a discussion of how far we should go, not in giving up our sovereignty but in pooling our sovereignty and making it work for us. I have stated in this house and outside of it that, in this day of complicated international relationships, it is obviously desirable, as I see it, to pool our sovereignty with other friendly states in the interests not only of our security but possibly of our survival. Every time we make a mutual aid treaty with any other country we are, in a technical sense, giving up some of our sovereignty, some control over our own affairs, but we are doing that of our own free will in the interests of our own security and of our own prosperity.

Mr. Low: And we can contract out if we wish to do so.

Mr. Pearson: We can always contract out of any arrangement that we can contract into, and which has in its terms an arrangement for withdrawal. There are such terms in nearly all international agreements. We make these decisions of our own free will. We make them first as governmental decisions. We bring them to parliament for parliamentary approval; and only after parliamentary approval are they ratified by the government. I suggest that that procedure constitutes a safeguard to make sure that the government does not make any unnecessary surrender of national rights for international security.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question? It is a matter of interest, having regard to his experience. Is Canada bound by any decision made by the government without ratification by parliament? I am asking that question for information. I am greatly interested in what the minister is saying.

Mr. Pearson: I do not believe that Canada is politically bound by any decision made by the government, or legally bound by any decision made by the government—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I mean—legally bound.

Mr. Pearson: —when it is a decision in respect of an international agreement which requires ratification. The government is not bound by the signature of any such agreement before ratification. It is now well-established constitutional practice that, before such ratification should be given, parliamentary approval should be sought and obtained.

In that respect I do not think we need to fear very much about the effect on our national sovereignty of international agreements into which we enter of our free will, because they represent the will of parliament and parliament represents the will of the people.

In conclusion I would merely express, as a member of the government, my own agreement with the underlying purpose of this resolution, namely that we should encourage every method of co-operation within NATO which would strengthen that body. If a meeting of the kind that has been suggested could be held, if the invitation came from a responsible government source, and if the invitation were couched in terms which promised some desirable results, I should think that to such an invitation addressed to this parliament, the members of parliament would wish to give extremely serious consideration indeed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to apologize to the house because I am afraid I am forced to take part in a debate tonight for which I am not quite ready. I just returned to the city late this afternoon, after some days' absence, and found this resolution was to be debated. So I am afraid my remarks may, to some extent, be disjointed and not well arranged. However, I shall try to place before the house the position I take, personally, with respect to the resolution now before us. I hope I shall be able to make my position lucid and clear, because I would not want any of the hon. members to be under any misapprehension as to where I stand.

The resolution we are debating was introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), and reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, if an invitation is received by the parliament of Canada to appoint delegates to meet with delegates from the legislatures of the sponsor nations of NATO, with a view to discussing their closer co-operation within the framework of the United Nations Organization, the government should give consideration to the acceptance of the invitation.

Before proceeding further may I congratulate the hon. member upon his introductory speech. I thought it was lucid and eloquent, and that it set before the house this afternoon in clear terms exactly what is in the hon. member's mind with respect to future developments on a world scale. In anything I have to say tonight I wish to assure hon. members, and particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North, that I do not intend to descend into the use of any personalities, or to place my presentation on anything but the highest possible level, because I think the hon. member's resolution is worthy of consideration by all thinking men.

However, the hon. member did admit that his resolution, as it appears at page 9 of today's order paper, is a compromise resolution. Hon. members will recall that on February 26, 1951, the same hon. member moved a resolution in these terms:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of supporting the calling of a convention of delegates from the democracies which sponsored the North Atlantic treaty and representing the principal political parties of such democracies, for the purpose of exploring how far their peoples, and the peoples of such other democracies as the convention may invite to send delegates, can apply among them, within the framework of the United Nations, the principles of federal union.

Hon. members will notice that in the resolution now before the house no mention whatever is made of federal union; but in the mover's address this afternoon I thought he made it clear that, actually, what he seeks is at least a first step toward, if not merely an Atlantic federal union, then perhaps a world federal union.

Hon. members will also be aware of the fact that it was not just on February 26, 1951, that this idea was presented in this parliament. We go back to June 28, 1950, and if we will look at the report of the debates of the Senate, at pages 600 and 601, we will see that the Hon. W. D. Euler moved a resolution similar in terms to that moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North on February 26, 1951.

I was not so much concerned about the wording of the resolution in the other place, because the hon. senator suggested three alternative wordings. But it was what he said in support of his resolution that intrigued me. I shall quote from page 601 of the debates of the Senate for June 28, 1950, second column, where he says—

Mr. Speaker: Order; I understand the hon. member is quoting from a quite recent debate in the Senate?

Mr. Low: No; it was on June 28, 1950.

Mr. Speaker: It is not customary to quote from debates so recent. I think perhaps it would be better if the hon. member did not do so. It is difficult for me to determine what is recent.

Mr. Low: Very well, I shall not quote it, but shall be content to paraphrase it, if that is in order.

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances, yes.

Mr. Low: Thank you, sir; I certainly would want always to be in order. But, to paraphrase what was said on that occasion, the chief reason for raising the resolution in the other place on the day it was raised, and for not adjourning the debate to some future date, was given as this: That on that date Mr. Clarence K. Streit called the hon. senator from New York and suggested that the other place discuss and adopt the resolution on that date because, he went on to say, it might be of sufficient importance that the Canadian Senate had passed it to introduce it into the Senate of the United States and perhaps some leverage could be gained for its passage through the Senate down in Washington. Some other remarks were made in connection with it which I would not be permitted to read into the record, but the important thing, which I again stress, is that the resolution considered and passed in the other place on that date was promulgated and introduced by the outstanding advocate in America of federal union.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member thinks that he cannot quote the resolution which was passed in the other place. He would be perfectly in order to do so as it is the debates in the other place which must not be referred to. The record of what has been done can be referred to.

Mr. Low: I think I have accomplished the purpose I had in mind. What I wanted to do was to relate the resolution which we are now dealing with to a world movement which is headed by one Clarence K. Streit who is the editor of a magazine called Freedom and Union. I have a definite and straightforward purpose in doing that, to show that today what we are actually debating is not whether we shall just call a meeting to discuss how far it is possible for the member nations of NATO to co-operate more fully under article 2 of the treaty but to see how far it would be possible for us to arrange to take the first step toward a fully integrated federal union of the NATO nations and, secondly, to use that as the ramp to catapult us into a wider federal world union. To substantiate that I turn to page 2 of the issue of December 1951 of Freedom and Union. The policy advocated by Mr. Streit and his organization is as follows:

> To educate the public, in the U.S. and abroad, in the principles of individual freedom and federal union, and their importance to peace, production, higher living standards and greater spiritual development and happiness.

To this end, to support the convocation now of a federal constitutional convention representing all the experienced civil liberty democracies, with a view to their forming a federal union of the free, or Atlantic union, which would guarantee their bill of rights, govern them in those fields where they agree that a common government, federally proportionate to the people, and directly elected by and responsible to them, would best advance their individual freedom, and uphold the right of each nation in the union to continue to govern all its other national affairs in complete independence.

This is the part which is quite enlightening to most of us:

To make sure that such a union shall be formed as the nucleus—the first step toward a universal free federal world government—and shall meanwhile be a loyal member of the United Nations and seek to extend the union's free federal institutions to other nations peacefully and as rapidly as practicable.

To provide a magazine forum for the presentation of all views on the whole problem of freedom and federalism.

It is quite clear that what we are dealing with is not a minor proposition put before us in this resolution. I believe that all of us could quite easily agree that it would be desirable for the free nations of the world and more particularly, now that reference has been made to them, for the NATO nations to convocate at some date representatives of their people to discuss how far it might be possible for them to more fully co-operate for the general good of those nations, for the general good of the world, for the keeping of the peace and that sort of thing. Those are noble ideals and I subscribe to them. I have no objection to going as far as the minister of external affairs suggested this afternoon namely, pooling our sovereignties, using that pool for the common good, especially in times of difficulty such as we are facing today, or in times of crisis.

But I want it understood, as I tried to make it understood by a little interjection this afternoon, that in any pooling of sovereignties that we might arrange, even to meet crises such as we now face, I think it is desirable and in the interests of the liberties of the people to make sure that when they contract in they can also contract out. That is the principle by which I stand, the right to contract out of any international obligation if conditions become intolerable for us in that international arrangement. Otherwise there is no guarantee that we shall ever be able to maintain and preserve our liberties.

So I am quite in accord with the minister and I think with the wording of the resolution, but I believe that everyone who followed the hon. member's introductory speech this afternoon saw that it really was not that that he was debating. As he went along he made such statements as that he hoped that a debate would take place on the question of how to make NATO an effective instrument for our purposes. I then asked myself, "whose purposes"?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Canada's.

Mr. Low: That is fine. If it is Canada's, that is good and I would subscribe to it; but if "our purposes" means the purposes of a group of internationalists who are determined to use NATO as a means of catapulting us into a world state, then I think we need to be mighty careful about that part of it.

The hon. member also referred to some fears that had been expressed that the discussion of a resolution of the sort he had introduced might "set back the cause which many of us have". I wonder what that cause is? Is that the real purpose behind the resolution? Then the hon. member went on to say, I think without any equivocation, that what he sought was a political union of the Atlantic states in which there would be a surrender by each component part of its sovereignty in the field of finance, in the field of foreign affairs, in the field of defence, and if I remember correctly in one other field.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Trade and currency.

Mr. Low: Trade and currency. I think I have sufficient to envisage that what was behind the hon. member's good intentions was an impelling desire to go further and see that eventually we take another step, which of course would be the establishment of what he was pleased to call a world free state. He said as a matter of fact that he deplored the huge sums that were being spent in preparation for war, and cited the fact that today 50 per cent of the budgets of the nations who are subscribers to the Atlantic treaty are being spent for war purposes. Well, Mr. Speaker, I deplore that too, and I suppose every member of the house deplores it. I should like to see it possible to reduce our defence expenditures to $1 if it were practicable. But the question I have to ask myself is this: Is it possible that the formation of an Atlantic federation, in which we as individual nations surrender our sovereignty, could bring peace? That is a question we have to ask ourselves. What evidence have we that it would bring peace?

Let us go one step further and look at the end which the world federal unionists have in their minds, the achievement of a world federated state. Let us take that proposition first and look at it. Is it possible that the achievement of a world federated state, with world citizenship and all these glorious things that its advocates envision attached to such a state, will ensure peace to the world? The first thing I have to ask myself is whether it would be possible in the first place to achieve a world state. Let us debate that proposition for a minute. What does history tell us? I think history shows that the nearest thing we have ever had to a world state was the holy Roman empire which in my judgment was neither holy, Roman nor an empire, though that is what they called it. There were three things that struck me about the holy Roman empire and that I have always remembered. The first thing is that it was created as a consequence of a long drawn out series of military conquests, and in no other way. That tells me something. Second, the holy Roman empire maintained itself only by further continuous military expeditions that had to be undertaken to put down revolutions and enforce peace. It was never at peace. The third thing that I learned from history was that in the end the holy Roman empire, so-called, broke up with a crash that plunged the whole world into darkness, and not only that, but into a perpetual succession of bandit wars that lasted for many, many years.

What kind of price was paid for that form of world government? I think that the objective that the federal unionists say they want to achieve, world peace, is a worthy objective. I should like to see that world peace established, but I believe we must all be fully aware of the price we shall have to pay for it if we seek it through federal union.

I am wondering if it will be worth the price we shall have to pay for it. There is no guarantee in the world that, even if we pay the terrible price we may have to pay to set up a world federated state, it would bring peace. My judgment tells me it would not.

Mr. Blackmore: Or happiness.

Mr. Low: Or happiness. What the world government advocates refuse to see, as far as I have been able to make out in my study of their proposals, is that no federal union or world state is ever likely to be created, or maintained after it is created, except by force, the force of one very powerful state imposing its will upon the others or the force of a group of states attempting to impose their will upon the others. Is that what my hon. friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, would call peace? That is not my definition of peace. Let us never forget that the international communist party and the bolshevik leaders of Soviet Russia are determined to create a world state on the model of the Soviet union. No one who knows anything about history can deny that. Lenin held, and he handed down to his successors in the politburo, the conviction that the Marxist state never could live side by side and in peace with the capitalist state. They believe that and they conduct themselves as if they believe it.

At the same time the Russian communist imperialists are logical enough to know that the world state which they promote can never be achieved, can never come into existence, through universal voluntary agreement. That is why they keep huge standing armies and are hastening to build navies and air forces. They know it will have to be imposed by subversion first, undermining the existing order by subversive action in all countries, and then through the use of external armed forces after the subversive activity has done its deadly work. They know that, and that is why they are making preparations as they have been for the time when they will have to resort to all-out armed conflict in order to impose their form of social, legal and economic organization upon the world. I am convinced that no world state could possibly be created before the United States of America and the Soviet union have slugged it out and one of them emerged as the victor and the other as the vanquished; until the victor of that mammoth struggle has imposed his particular social order on the other.

These two are acknowledged to be the powerful world forces, and everybody recognizes that they stand irreconcilable with respect to what kind of social, legal and economic order the world state should have when it is finally achieved. Is it possible, therefore, I ask, to achieve a world government or a federated world state without armed conflict? If not, why is there all this foolish talk about the aim of federal union being the maintenance of peace? If a conflict should occur with these mastodons I have mentioned as the main contenders, would it be possible to get along and have any peace without having the resulting world state policed constantly and perpetually by millions of armed men? That is a question we have got to answer.

What would happen to individual freedom in such a contingency? Can anyone imagine that he would be more free than now? Yet we hear the advocates of federal union say: Surrender some of your freedom now and get bigger freedom later. Before I consent to surrender any sovereignty and freedom I am going to know to whom it is going and what they are going to use it for. Human freedom in a world state today would be suppressed just as surely as darkness follows day. Not only that, I have asked myself what would happen to world culture. It is a good thing to have different cultures and traditions. Those are the things that make for variety and spice in life. Under a world state brought about as it would have to be today, or perhaps for that matter at any time, I am satisfied the result would be a levelling down of human cultures, because a culture is a mark of differentiation. In the conflict that inevitably would result from the drive to establish a world union or world state today, I cannot imagine that state tolerating too many differences among the people. The idea would be to level down those cultures and make them one. That is not my idea of abundant living and freedom. Any really serious effort to establish a world state today would undoubtedly destroy a good many of the cultures of the world, and any marked differentiation would not be tolerated in such a state. I recall something written by a great writer whose name escapes me for the moment, and I quote it because I agree so much with what he had to say:

> The plain reality is that the world, in terms of culture, civilization and consciousness is not and cannot be one world. And to try to make it one, against all the realities of life and nature, is far more likely to awake a spirit of rebellion than the spirit of harmony.

In my opinion the surest way to bring open world conflict is to launch a serious, determined all-out drive for a federated world state. When I say that I also want to ask this question. I do so seriously, without any attempt to throw a cloud over anybody and certainly no one in this house. If it is a fact that a serious attempt to establish a world state today would plunge us into world conflict, is it not possible that evil forces who know this may try to use a drive for world union to plunge us into a world war? That is one of the things I have to ask myself and which every responsible member of this house will have to ask. No one can deny that there are evil forces who are determined to bring open conflict because they benefit from it. Certainly they will make use of any possible spark to ignite the conflagration.

I think that is all I wish to say about the major proposition. In my judgment it will only be possible for peace to exist in this world under the rule of the divine Son of God, certainly not under the rule of an international junta of power maniacs; and I am not prepared to surrender my sovereignty to such a junta. I am concerned in the main, Mr. Speaker, about preserving the freedoms and liberties that have been won over the centuries at such cost in blood and life. The further you remove from the sovereign individual his controlling government, the more difficult it will be for him to preserve his freedoms. I am jealous of those freedoms, as I think every red-blooded Canadian must be. Under a world federation what would happen to the liberty to take part in our own government; what would happen to our liberty to worship Almighty God in our own way in our own churches, unmolested? Who is going to say my right will be preserved inviolate? The hon. member for Winnipeg North says the Atlantic union parliament will make laws. Certainly they will; but the mere making of laws is not going to secure to me in perpetuity the right to those freedoms I now hold dear.

When I speak of the freedom to worship Almighty God without molestation in my own way and in my own church, my mind goes to some other people in the world who were convinced that if they surrendered a little of their sovereignty their freedom would be enlarged. I am thinking, for example, of the people of Hungary, who at one time valued very highly their religious liberty. I wonder if their freedom was enlarged when they became a member of the ring of iron states? Ask them today. Think about Cardinal Mindszenty and some of the others. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that when we think in terms of world government we have to think of those things we hold most dear. In any government, no matter what it is, we have to see that checks and balances are established which will preserve our freedoms inviolate.

Well, if world government cannot guarantee us peace, how in the world can anyone by any stretch of the imagination say that the complete integration of the economies and politics of the governments of the NATO nations can guarantee us peace? I should say one of the surest ways to guarantee war today would be to go all-out in the formation of an Atlantic federation with the idea of building up terrific strength to match that of the people in the other half of the world. It means that we are getting ready for the conflict, that we really believe it is coming. I have never seen any evidence that you cannot achieve by a treaty of co-operation as much as you could possibly achieve towards establishing peace in the world by a complete political and economic integration of the NATO countries.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North mentioned what I have heard so many people mention when trying to defend their views with respect to federal union. He mentioned that the United States had achieved a very workable form of government by federal union. He further said the Atlantic federal union would be exactly similar. I do not think he went quite as far as some others have gone, but I just want to point out something that a lot of people conveniently do not remember. I have in my hand a clipping from the New York American of February 28, 1951. The writer unfortunately did not append his name to the article, but it hits the nail so much on the head that I want to put small parts of it on the record. This contains a comparison of the so-called NATO federal union or Atlantic union with what happened in the United States of America. The heading of this article is, "A dishonest parallel." The article reads:

George Washington, who held as one of his deepest convictions that the United States could survive only by avoiding foreign entanglements, is now quoted by advocates of world government in support of their strange proposal.

In the course of the constitutional convention, in 1787, General Washington wrote to a friend complaining that the reluctance of the individual states to surrender their sovereignty to a federal government was keeping the nation "weak, inefficient and disgraceful."

The letter has been cited by Lawrence Dawson, executive director of the United World Federalists of Illinois, as an argument in favour of his organization's proposal that this nation yield its sovereignty to a world government.

"Although General Washington was referring to the states which became the United States of America," said Mr. Dawson, "the principle of delegating sovereignty to which he referred is precisely the same principle which the United World Federalists hope to see applied through the United Nations to the entire world.

"In that limited field necessary to abolish war, we federalists believe that the world should be governed by the same system of carefully delineated and delegated central authority which has worked so magnificently . . . in our country."

Now, the writer says this, and it is very much to the point.

This is a monstrous argument. It rests on the pretense that the United States would have no more to lose in yielding its sovereignty to a world government than had each of the states in yielding to a central government created by themselves.

But the utter dishonesty of that pretense is evident at a glance.

The inhabitants of the thirteen states were all Americans.

They had local differences but they shared, all of them, the basic idea that individual liberty was the most important thing on earth, and that the only way it could be preserved was through self-government by the people.

Only if that same ideal were passionately shared by all the peoples of the world would the parallel which one-world advocates try to draw between the thirteen American states of 1787 and the nations of the earth today be accurate or honest.

I agree.

The greater part of the earth is inhabited by backward masses who have no understanding of liberty, or so much as even a dream of liberty.

And among many of the more advanced peoples the ideal of freedom, where if it survives at all, is greatly diluted.

Some have permitted themselves to be enslaved to dictatorships; others have traded off their liberties for socialism's false promises of security.

When the Messiahs of the one-world daydream suggest that America could submit to the control of nations that do not know freedom without sacrificing its own freedom, they are saying, therefore, something that simply is not true.

There is no parallel, Mr. Speaker, between what happened in the United States or what happened in Canada and what would happen in the attempt to set up Atlantic federal union or world federal union.

I think one valid argument that was used by the hon. member was that some form of Atlantic union is necessary to ensure control of the military by civil government. I believe that. I agree that his argument there was valid. Certainly, we must never allow ourselves to become in any way subject to the rule of a military junta. For that reason I am sympathetic to the idea of some kind of very close co-operation, but on a basis that would allow every nation to contract out if the conditions under which they have to work become intolerable, to see to it that a civil administration that could control the military is set up.

I agree further with my hon. friend when he says that we must do everything we can to make article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty work. Surely, his argument is sound on that. I must say, and I say this in conclusion because I know my time is running out, that the general assumption that communism spreads only throughout countries or amongst peoples who are hungry and have a lower standard of living, cannot be substantiated.

Mr. Noseworthy: What about China and Russia?

Mr. Low: Yes, I shall take China and Russia. Communism did not spread through China and Russia, but in each case it was imposed upon those countries by a very small group of communists. So it was with every other country where communism got its hold. I agree that there were intolerable conditions in the countries and there were protests against those conditions. The protests gave a small group of iron-fisted imperialists the opportunity to exploit the situation, and they used it to full advantage. Just the same every effort ought to be made to bring about co-operation amongst the Atlantic countries so that article 2 of NATO could really be made to work in the interests of peace and for the welfare of humanity.

I could subscribe to the resolution as it stands. I am prepared to go and listen to the proposition that is put forward, and to study this matter very fully. I want it clearly understood, however, that my organization is not prepared to agree to any surrender of sovereignty of the Canadian people without first letting the people know exactly what it is that is going to be surrendered, what the price is going to be; and without obtaining from the people direction in a mandate for that surrender. Consequently, when the people indicate in no uncertain terms that they want to surrender their sovereignty, then I shall be quite ready to listen.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I have listened with a great deal of interest, Mr. Speaker, to the remarks just made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) on this resolution. It is an interesting resolution and reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, if an invitation is received by the parliament of Canada to appoint delegates to meet with delegates from the legislatures of the sponsor nations of NATO, with a view to discussing their closer co-operation within the framework of the United Nations Organization, the government should give consideration to the acceptance of the invitation.

In my humble view, sir, this resolution is uncalled for, untimely, frivolous and dangerous. I shall explain that. It is based on the one-world theory of Wendell Willkie. We had some delegates who came to Canada, and when questions were put to them they could not answer them.

One bright question that was put to the delegates was this: If you have one world government, will you have any more tariff barriers? And, sir, not a word. At the same time they were asked if they would be interested in having some citizens from Alabama running in Huron, Winnipeg or in Ottawa, and if Canadians could run for election in the United States—no answer. And they were asked what they would do with the sovereignty of Canada and of the provinces; what they would do with the constitution of Canada; what they would do with the Bill of Rights and the constitution of the United States—no answer.

What surprises me very much is that they continue to speak and to elaborate their view that nobody understands. If somebody has money to waste they have only to pay $2 for a ticket for the dinner tomorrow night and to waste some time at the meeting that is going to take place in one of the rooms of the building. For me, I will not insist upon it; for I find this idea of a world government absurd in itself; it cannot work; we cannot destroy the sovereignty of all countries.

I knew it was coming to that a long time ago when patriotism was declared out of fashion, and those who are thinking of Canada as Canadians were called isolationists. We were isolationists because we were thinking of Canada before thinking of any other country. I have no objection to alliances with other countries.

Mr. Low: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. Pouliot: Union makes strength; I am for it, provided that we keep our sovereignty and that we keep the right to decide everything right here in Ottawa, and that the provinces have the right to decide what pertains to them in their capital cities.

Mr. Low: Unions for righteous purposes.

Mr. Pouliot: Exactly. And what is coming with that suggestion of world government? It is world irresponsibility.

Mr. Low: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pouliot: We will have Brock Chisholm in every field of activity, men who are responsible to no one. I remember that one day when $500,000 was voted by this parliament to send to the world health organization. A few weeks afterwards Brock Chisholm was elected the big boss of that organization. I will not say that he used that money for political purposes but we never knew what was done with it. It is not only that, sir. What particular benefit would Canada get from world government? At the present time we have treaties that bind us to the nations that have signed the NATO agreement. That is all right. It is a good thing to have allies, although I believe bilateral pacts would be much better than unilateral pacts; but on account of the difficulty in dealing in diplomatic matters with the United States and having our views accepted by the United States government, perhaps it was the only way to have an organization like the North Atlantic pact. But if you remember, sir—probably you have forgotten it—some years ago I suggested that the United States should enter into the British commonwealth as a dominion. A few days later I met some prominent Americans who were greatly scandalized, and who could not agree that the United States could be a dominion similar to Canada in such a commonwealth of nations. But now, if we have that theory of world government put in practice, the United States will not exist any longer; Canada will not exist; Great Britain will not exist; France will not exist. We will have one world; citizens of all countries and of none. How can we subscribe to that?

I give credit to the hon. gentleman who sponsors the resolution that he may be an idealist. It would be his only excuse to bring that kind of resolution here. But not only that; what I want him and the others who subscribe to his motion to understand fairly well is the consequence of creating an irresponsible organization of that kind. It is abuse; it is disaster; it is anarchy; it is complete loss of all our traditions. The world will be a big melting pot.

Mr. Low: It is.

Mr. Pouliot: Not as it is in the United States, to make good patriots of the American citizens. Patriotism will be banned; patriotism will be forbidden; patriotism will be equivalent to what treason is now according to the Criminal Code.

Well, sir, I am not to speak any longer about it. I do not think we shall take seriously the ambassadors of good will who are coming here to preach nonsense. If some people have some money to waste they can spend $2 each to go to the dinner tomorrow night, and if they have time to waste they can go to their meeting. Probably I shall go there at some time to realize once more that they cannot answer any questions that are put to them.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, last year, as has been mentioned, a somewhat similar resolution was presented here in the House of Commons. At that time I was not present. I was a member of a group in Winnipeg that was watching for that debate with considerable interest, as were several other groups in all the major cities across Canada. To our disappointment the debate collapsed with only the mover of the resolution, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) taking part.

The subject matter of this particular resolution is of very considerable interest and importance to many people in Canada, and it is desirable that several members participate in the debate, as has happened on this occasion, because there are various points of view to be set forward. I do not propose advocating world government; for my thinking has not carried me that far. I propose, however, supporting the resolution for reasons that follow.

We face two great problems which overshadow all our internal troubles and disputes: The problem of defence preparedness so that we may not lose our freedom, and the problem of finding a way towards enduring peace.

The energy that we devote to strengthening our defences must be matched by the energy we display in exploring every road, every path or even faintly marked trail, that leads toward peace. General Eisenhower has expressed the thoughts of millions in some of his remarks which John Gunther quoted in the Ottawa Citizen of April 25. These are General Eisenhower's words:

> Total war would be the suicide of our generation.
> We must train the youth of America to avert world war III, and not to refight world war II.
> There is no glory in battle worth the blood it costs.
> I hate war as only a soldier who has lived it can.
> Weakness cannot co-operate with anything. We have got to be strong.
> I hold that a resolute, intelligent, and frankly displayed determination to live up to our present position in the world is vital to our current and future welfare.

It is with those thoughts in mind that I approach the present subject. The importance of this motion before us is that it concentrates attention upon the problem that should be uppermost in the minds of all people, namely, can democracy survive in this era of world revolution? For we are living in a period of revolution just as important as any revolutionary period in history.

The threat of the present crisis is towards the liberty and freedom of the citizens of the democracies. I think that it is wise sometimes to look back into history, and my excursion shall be very brief. I was reading just the other day some debates of the House of Commons at Westminster dealing with army estimates. One of the hon. members there was stressing the development of weapons from the earliest times, and had reached the middle ages when he was interrupted by an hon. member on the opposite side who said: "On a point of order; are we discussing the war estimates of William the Conqueror, or what?" The Speaker intervened and said, in a kindly fashion, "I think the honourable and learned member was advancing cautiously but steadily towards the present age." I will advance a little more speedily in my review of some earlier history.

I think we should remember that democracy, as a form of government, has a very short history, when compared with other forms of government. The history of the world has shown that political power has been longer in the hands of autocrats and oligarchs than in the hands of the people. In the ancient world democratic government arose in the states of Greece, and persisted for about four hundred years. It flourished in the fifth century B.C., declined in the fourth under the Macedonian conquest, revived in feebler form after the death of Alexander the Great, and perished under the weight of the Roman empire.

Centuries elapsed before democracy was re-established. The last three hundred years have witnessed the modern flowering of democratic government. But the threat of Russian imperialism is as grave now for the democracies of today as were the threats of Sparta and of the autocrat Philip of Macedon to the democracies of Ancient Greece. They perished for the same reasons that threaten us now—lack of cohesion and of political unity. Their military alliances proved unstable. Their preparations for war were delayed. Their policies were as well known to the enemy as to themselves, for they were debated in public. Their ranks were infiltrated by enemy sympathizers. They lacked unity of purpose. They fell, one by one, to the aggressor, although their combined strength effectively asserted would have saved them.

War may not be inevitable, but the history of the world discloses very few periods when it has not been afflicting mankind. The only long period of peace enjoyed by western Europe occurred in the first and second centuries A.D. when the Roman empire was supreme and the legions kept the barbarians in check beyond the frontiers. Several generations of men in Europe lived in freedom from the fear of war.

Their successors have not been so fortunate. No similar peaceful period was seen again until the nineteenth century, when the British fleet and the Monroe doctrine effectively discouraged any maritime adventures. The twentieth century has experienced the most devastating wars in the long and troubled history of mankind with destruction and atrocities reminiscent of Genghis Khan or of the thirty years' war.

The one compelling desire of twentieth century man is for relief from this recurring disaster. With the rapid development of the means of destruction the need for a solution to the problem of world war preoccupies our thoughts and calls for the most earnest and active measures, if civilization is not to receive a mortal blow.

Arnold Toynbee in his book "Civilization on Trial" shows clearly that we have no grounds for belief that our civilization will endure forever. During the last five or six thousand years many civilizations, he points out, have risen, have declined and have fallen. In that period of six thousand years, democracy, which gives the greatest freedom to the individual, is a form of government that has had much the briefest history. We consider it man's highest achievement in government. Can it be maintained unimpaired, safe from the foes without and the perils within?

Toynbee suggests that we are not doomed to make history repeat itself; that it is open to us through our own efforts to give history a new and unprecedented turn. He considers that we have three tasks—in politics, to establish a constitutional co-operative system of world government; in economics, to find working compromises between free enterprise and socialism; and in the life of the spirit, to put the secular superstructure back on to religious foundations. Of these three tasks the political task is the most urgent. The world is on the eve of being unified politically by one means or another. Can we stave off unification by force?

Efforts towards peace have been very great. During the nineteenth century over 400 peace organizations were formed, distributed among 15 countries, and more than a hundred international peace congresses were held. In the twentieth century we have seen many alliances formed, many peace treaties signed. We had a league of nations for twenty years, attempting to obtain security for the nations of the world by means of conference. A similar attempt has been made through the United Nations. A successful solution still seems far distant. Precarious peace is being maintained in some areas of the world now by the age-old methods of treaties, alliances and collective security measures. None of these methods in the past has prevented the outbreak of war.

Before attempting to make plans for the prevention of world war it would seem necessary to determine the causes of war. That is no easy task, for there are as many opinions as there are men who have discussed the matter. I attempted a few years ago to summarize the causes that have been advanced by leading individuals to account for the outbreak of the wars which the common people do not want. They are as follows: The natural pugnacity of mankind; economic conditions, the revolt of the have-nots against the haves; the special wickedness of a people; the imperialistic ambitions of nations; revenge for earlier defeats or for unredressed grievances; fear of encirclement; the conscious wickedness of governments, rulers, diplomats, capitalists and imperialists; the selfishness of men; the struggle of oppressed subject peoples; the activities of armament manufacturers; the breakdown of international trade; the battle for oil, raw materials and markets, and the international financiers.

Another cause was given by the late Lord Lothian, who was British ambassador to the United States in 1939, who said:

> The fundamental cause of war is neither unjust treaties, nor racial or religious or cultural differences, nor maltreatment of minorities, nor need for raw materials and markets, nor imperialist ambitions, nor strategic considerations, nor capitalism or nationalism. The cause of war is the anarchy of sovereign states. The end of war can come only through world federation.

There are others who consider that despite all our efforts the only hope for the future lies in a change in the minds and hearts of men such as Christianity can bring about through its emphasis on love and brotherhood. Lord Lothian suggested that although that is true in so far as the final abolition of war is concerned, nevertheless it is the function of politics and government to create the practical conditions in which resort to violence will be forbidden and prevented between nations, as it is now between individuals and groups within national states.

These views give some idea of the diversity of opinion concerning the cause of war and the complexity of the problem. Unless agreement can be reached as to the cause of war it will be difficult to formulate measures to prevent war. If Lord Lothian's view be accepted that the root cause of war is anarchy, what steps are necessary to replace the present anarchy with the rule of international law? There are sixty sovereign states within the world, each a law unto itself. Because each nation is a law unto itself the secondary causes of war frequently prevail to disturb the peace of the world—the ambition of rulers, fear of encirclement and so forth.

It is obvious that sovereignty might be maintained unimpaired if the nations would of their own accord accept arbitration for the settlement of their disputes. That method is well known to Canada, the United States and Great Britain for it was thus that our boundary disputes were settled. Among the great nations of the world arbitration has been resorted to on more than two hundred occasions in the period from 1794 to 1914. It has never been accepted as a compulsory method of settling differences.

The league of nations offered a method for solving international disputes but it soon became clear that some states were not disposed to abide by the decisions of the league and preferred to withdraw from that organization. The present United Nations has disappointed in part the hopes of its founders.

Within the last thirty-seven years we have had two world wars, a league of nations and a United Nations and are now back to the old and oft-tried plan of alliance and coalition. Now it is the United States and her allies against Russia and her allies and satellites. Earlier it was Athens against Sparta, Rome against Carthage, Marlborough, Eugene and Holland against Louis XIV, the Grand Alliance against Napoleon, the Triple Entente against the Triple Alliance. Thus does history repeat itself and the prevention of world war seems as distant as ever.

As Sebastian Haffner puts it in the London Observer and as repeated in the Globe and Mail of November 26, 1951:

> In our historical experience, coalitions are short-lived and ephemeral structures. They are knocked together for the purpose of war against a common enemy, and they regularly fall apart as soon as the war and the common danger are over; or, if the expected war does not materialize, they disintegrate quietly.
> The great coalition, which is embodied in the North Atlantic treaty, has from its inception been meant to defy this historical law. Whatever Russian propaganda may say, it never was an alliance for war; its purpose was and is to prevent war and to enforce and maintain peace. This is a long-term aim and it means that the coalition must hold together as a working organization over a long term of years and maintain joint policies in spite of the many disruptive factors which are bound to arise between sovereign allies in the course of time.

Maintaining a coalition during the course of a war is difficult enough. A military disaster, a change of government, internal troubles—any one of these or other causes may result in the loss of an ally. Recall the difficulties that faced the allies in 1917—a military reverse in Italy, disaffection and mutiny in the French army, revolution in Russia. Only the aid and steadfastness of Britain and the United States saved the situation on the western front. In a protracted cold war period which is the endless vista before us there is the gravest danger that some of the partners might become weary of the struggle and withdraw into isolation or be weakened economically and become an easy prey to a fifth column.

Even the strongest member of the present coalition presents a problem. Bruce Hutchison writing in Maclean's, April 1 of this year, has this to say:

> The United States is trying to erect and lead, in a fashion never known on earth before, a world-wide coalition of free peoples whom it does not understand and frequently antagonizes through its lack of understanding.
> The biggest question of all—

He quotes a leading United States government figure as saying:

> —is whether a democracy under our system, and with our anti-military tradition, can build up enough power for the job, and, if it does so, whether it can maintain that power for years, maybe decades, without either using it recklessly or getting tired of the load and dissolving it, just as the Russians hope. It'll be the toughest thing we ever tackled and remember, if you foreigners need our understanding, we'll need yours.

Is the answer to this and to other problems that face the North Atlantic Treaty Organization a form of political union among the various members? The objective before us seems to have two features, one the maintenance of peace if possible by such preparations that any aggressor will be restrained from running the risk of war and, secondly, if war does occur, that the western democracies will be so strong and so united that victory in the struggle will be assured.

Some form of political union between the members of the great coalition seems essential. The differences of race do not constitute an insuperable barrier. North American man is merely western European man transplanted across the Atlantic. There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of North Americans whose birthplace was in western Europe and millions who are descendants of western Europeans. An Atlantic community of democratic peoples numbering over 300 millions needs only the closer bonds of political union to form a unity that would be proof against the ambition of any foreign power. In that Atlantic community is contained the industrial might and power of western civilization. In that Atlantic community, united and strong and free, would be preserved the great spiritual heritage of western civilization and of Christianity.

The motion for consideration before us does not commit either the government or Canada in any way. It merely suggests that the way be kept open for consultation and investigation. Our goal is peace with honour. Our hope is for freedom and for security from the scourge of war. Closer co-operation between the sponsor nations of NATO may be the road to enduring peace. We should explore that road or any other so that we may satisfy ourselves that no effort has been spared. Vision and faith are needed in this hour if our civilization is to survive.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the house that if the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): There are a few words I should like to say in closing the debate. First of all, I am glad that at least three other members partook in it this year. Perhaps we shall have even more next year when some similar motion again comes before the house. What I should now like to do, however, is to clarify some of the matters which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) raised this afternoon. As he pointed out, and as is of course the case, one cannot include every possible aspect of the situation within a resolution such as this without making it most cumbersome. The points he raised were valid and I find myself in complete agreement with them. Indeed, were I to rewrite the resolution with all points in it I would be perfectly willing to state that we should not accept an invitation to such a conference unless it came from one of the governments of the seven sponsor nations of NATO.

Second, I would assume that such an invitation would imply that there was a responsible purpose behind the invitation. Third, the whole purpose of my concept of union would be destroyed were members of parliament to go to such a conference with power to pledge the Canadian government to a certain course of action. Those whom I should like to see go to such a conference are parliamentarians on their own as parliamentarians and therefore in no way able to commit the government.

Perhaps with these matters cleared up the Secretary of State for External Affairs might feel able to accept the resolution, weak in some ways though I think it is. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has just told me that he hopes to be able to say a few words on his resolution. Therefore I shall be very brief in what I have to say. I should like to comment much more fully upon the interesting and informative speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) but time precludes. As for the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I listened to him with interest but he always seems to me to have an infinite capacity for reducing his own views to absurdity.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) gave us a very interesting contribution but I thought he was chasing intellectual hares. He quoted the New York American with some relish but I assume he has not seen recent copies of the Chicago Tribune which really outdo the American considerably. In fact the resident Ottawa correspondent of the Chicago Tribune recently wrote to his paper implying that certain United States senators were coming to Ottawa to sell out their country. I assure the hon. member for Peace River that if he follows the Tribune closely he will find a great deal of ammunition against us Atlantic unionists but of course most of it would be completely erroneous. I think the hon. member for Peace River was arguing against something for which I was not arguing. I was discussing the proposition of federal union throughout the world. I do not think world government is a practical proposition today but I do think by some form of union we could appreciably strengthen NATO. The hon. member for Peace River asks for an alliance into which we can contract and out of which we can contract. Per contra, our allies could contract out of that alliance just as rapidly as we could, and there would simply be no security of any sort whatsoever with such a loose conglomeration of nations ready to get out when the going got tough.

I am an Atlantic unionist. I should like to see these seven nations brought together very closely, and I should like to see it done without benefit of war. As I said this afternoon, if war comes, survival will demand that we enter into that form of union. But I was only arguing for Atlantic union. Obviously we are not going to get it within the predictable future. Therefore I am prepared to compromise to a substantial extent on my views in the hope of creating something stronger than we have now. I believe Atlantic union amongst these seven nations would give us power so great that any potential aggressor would think several times before he attacked us. After all, wars today are not only won on the field of battle. They are won principally in the factories. They are won by industrial potential, and these seven countries together would control almost 70 per cent of the world's industrial potential. With that behind us we should be in an extraordinarily strong position, strong enough, I suggest, to offer the best hope for escape from the scourge of war.

Motion agreed to.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

PROPOSAL TO INCREASE AMOUNTS PAID TO COMPENSATE FOR INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation increasing the amounts paid under the Family Allowances Act to the extent necessary to compensate for the increase in the cost of living since the said act was first enacted.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure this evening to move the foregoing resolution.

As hon. members will recall, the Family Allowances Act was enacted on August 5, 1944. It came into operation when the first payments were made in July, 1945. The prime minister of that day, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, in introducing the family allowances motion and bill, stated that it was one of the important measures the government was going to take towards post-war reconstruction and the introduction of a new era. I believe the Family Allowances Act has been of great value especially to families in the low income groups. Because of the improvements that have resulted from family allowances by way of better clothing, food and medical care, and improved educational opportunity, all citizens of Canada stand to gain. Benefit has resulted mainly to the children of low income families, but I welcome the fact that family allowances are paid without a means test.

The government can and does recover from those in the higher income brackets a large part of what they receive in family allowances, if not perhaps even more. Family allowances have made an important contribution in improving health standards among our children. I believe they have resulted in children being able to obtain a better education. If young Canadians grow up in better health and receive a better education they will be in a better position to help produce the wealth of this country. If they have been reared in good health and given a more adequate education, in their adult life they will be more productive and consequently the net result to Canada will be a betterment in our standards for generations to come. I believe the family allowance is a good investment in the future, and will pay the nation enormous dividends.

When introducing the legislation the late prime minister, Mr. King, pointed out that in the first six months of 1944 some 39·3 per cent of all those presenting themselves for enlistment for active service were rejected. It was Mr. King's opinion that if the Family Allowances Act had been in operation in the days of the great depression that rejection rate would have been much lower. Family allowance is a good investment if peace is maintained in the years to come. It is an equally good investment if our nation should once more face an emergency such as prevailed in 1944.

I think hon. members will agree that if the Family Allowances Act was good in August, 1944, and if the payments of those days were the payments that should be made under such legislation, those payments do not represent the same purchasing power today. In other words, as the years have gone by the value of the family allowance has been reduced. So I present this motion in the hope that the house may support not a real increase in the value of the family allowance cheque but a restoration of the family allowance to the same purchasing power it possessed in August, 1944. It may be said, as is true, that if this resolution were adopted it would add a substantial sum to our expenditure, and it may be argued we are not in a position to meet such additional payments. I think hon. members should remember that the payment of family allowances is not at all in the same position as, for example, an increased vote for national defence or rearmament. When we spend money on arms we spend it on something that does not go into consumption in Canada and does not improve our standard of living. On the other hand an increase in the family allowance is merely a redistribution of purchasing power among Canadians, and I believe it is time low income families were given family allowance cheques which would purchase a great deal more than is the case today.

Then I believe an increase in the family allowance would mean a definite improvement in our home market. Canada is facing a real emergency, not because we cannot produce enough food but because agriculture surpluses are piling up. I do not suppose the Canadian market could absorb all those surpluses, but I am sure that if the government increased family allowances there would be a greater consumption of such food as meat, milk, butter and eggs. People enjoying a high standard of living consume a high protein diet, and it is those very protein foods that are in surplus in Canada today. I believe that by increasing the family allowance we would provide an increased Canadian market for agricultural products.

The government has tried various fiscal measures to control inflation. Apparently inflation has been brought under control, at least temporarily, but inflation in the last few years has been terrific. The price level is up; the cost of living is up. Because of that increase in the cost of living, because inflation has resulted from the failure of the government to take adequate measures, I say there is a responsibility on the government to do what it can to alleviate the inflation that exists today and therefore should restore the value of the family allowance. There has been a small decrease in the cost of living in recent months. There has been a somewhat larger decrease in the wholesale index. Agricultural products are in surplus supply. There is substantial unemployment. Everyone knows that inflation is usually followed by deflation and often by depression. I believe the payment of the family allowance together with the other social security measures we now have in effect, such as the old age pension, in themselves provide a cushion against possible depression. In other words, whether inflation or deflation should come, it is in our best interests to increase the value of the family allowance.

There has been a terrific increase in the cost of living since August, 1944, when this legislation was enacted. At that time the cost of living index stood at 118·9. In March, 1952, it stood at 189·1. There had been an increase in the cost-of-living index within that period of 59 per cent. I am suggesting that the government should increase family allowances to the extent of approximately 60 per cent. I should like to see the minimum monthly payment per child increased from $5 to $8. I should like to see the maximum monthly payment per child increased from $8 to $13, with the other payments varying accordingly. I say I propose that family allowances should be increased by 60 per cent in order to compensate for the general increase in the cost-of-living index.

I believe that family allowances are spent by the mothers of Canada mainly on clothing and food for the children. The clothing index has increased more than the general cost-of-living index. In August, 1944, the clothing index was 121·5; in March of this year that index was 211·2, an increase of 74 per cent. I say, therefore, that a suggested increase in the family allowance of 60 per cent is a moderate one and is 14 per cent less than the increase in the clothing index since August, 1944. The increase in the food index has been even more substantial. In August, 1944, the food index was 131·5; in March of this year that index was 241·7, an increase in that period of 84 per cent. Surely, a suggested increase of 60 per cent in the family allowance is most moderate, as it is actually 24 per cent less than the increase in the food index.

As I have already stated I suggest a 60 per cent increase in the family allowance because, since 1944, the general cost of living has increased by approximately that amount. I believe if the family allowance were increased that increase would be used by the mothers of Canada, almost without exception, to improve the health and nutritional standards of their families. One of the most important commodities for the growing child to receive is milk. Canada can produce lots of milk. We have a surplus of cheese in Ontario now, which is just another form of milk. Our dairy surpluses are threatening the dairy industry, yet statistics show that from 1946 to 1951 there has been a decrease in the consumption of milk in Canada. In 1946 Canadians consumed almost 6,000,000,000 pounds of milk; in 1951 it was 5,865,000,000 or a decrease within that five-year period of 2 per cent. But that does not tell the whole story. From 1941 to 1951 there was an increase in the population of Canada of 18·6 per cent, apart from the population of Newfoundland. A 2 per cent decrease in the actual consumption of milk between 1946 and 1951, therefore, because of the increase in population becomes a greater per capita percentage decrease. I estimate in those five years from 1946 to 1951, because of inflation, because of the high cost of living and the fact that low income groups could not afford to buy all the milk their families needed, milk consumption per capita in Canada dropped by approximately 10 per cent.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the consumption of milk in Canada would increase substantially with an increase in the family allowance. We have milk in surplus supply. The only thing standing in the way of many thousands of Canadian children receiving more milk is the fact that their parents have not got the money to buy it at present high prices. I believe that an increase in the family allowance would not only allow mothers to buy necessary increased quantities of milk, but would result in the general nutritional standards being raised. It would result in these children being better clothed, receiving better medical care and being given an opportunity for better education.

At the present time we are engaged in a large rearmament program. Democracy throughout the world is being challenged. But if we are to protect democracy in Canada, I do not think we should allow large defence expenditures to stand in the way of maintaining the value of our social security legislation. Real production in Canada is going up year after year. In his speech the other night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) pointed out that within the last year real production in Canada had increased by more than 5 per cent. I do not believe that this resolution of mine really goes far enough. I should, perhaps, be advocating that the real value of the family allowance should be steadily increased. But in the hope that the government will give my proposition more favourable consideration, I have kept my proposal within what I consider moderate bounds.

All I am saying to the government in this resolution is, do not allow defence expenditures or any other claim on budget revenues to stand in the way of protecting the purchasing power of the family allowance, the old age pension or other social security measures. Can Canada afford such an increase today? The increase would amount to approximately $192 million based on the estimated cost of family allowances during this year of $320·5 million. For this year our gross national product is estimated at $22·5 billion. Surely we can afford something less than one per cent for the welfare of Canadian children. Surely, we can afford something less than one per cent of the gross national product in order to restore the purchasing power of the family allowance.

The sum of $5 a month for a child under 6 years of age, $8 a month for a child of 13, 14 or 15 years of age, is not very much. No one expects the government, or the parliament of Canada, to make provision of family allowances to the point necessary to maintain a child in a home. In other words, the parents must have a continuing responsibility. Is $5 a month now, for an infant child, of sufficient help in relation to the cost of keeping that newborn child in health, in comfort and growing satisfactorily?

Perhaps some hon. members, like myself, have purchased the last issue of Life magazine. In that magazine is set out the cost in New York of a layette. As I understand it, a layette consists of all the provisions and equipment that a mother needs for a newborn child, the first child. She needs these provisions to take care of the child when she brings it home from the hospital. In New York it is estimated that the cost of the average layette is $400. This article goes on to point out that the mother, if she budgets very carefully, may provide all of the things necessary to care for her newborn child for the amount of $275. It takes a lot of family allowance cheques to reach the sum of $275. It takes 55 family allowance cheques; it takes almost five years for the present family allowance cheques to total the smallest sum, according to Life magazine, that it is necessary to spend on provisions to take care of a newborn child.

I use that example, Mr. Speaker, to point out that the present family allowance cheque is wholly inadequate. My resolution, I repeat, asks the house to consider not an increase in the real value of family allowances but merely that this house is of the opinion that the purchasing power of the family allowance cheque should be restored.

When family allowances were mentioned in Canada, before the act was passed, it was stated by a lot of people that the provision of family allowance cheques to a percentage of mothers in Canada would result in the cheques being spent on riotous living, and for things other than the benefit of the children in the home. But the statistics that have come from the experience in the Department of National Health and Welfare show that Canadian mothers, almost without exception, spend the family allowance cheques wisely and to the advantage of their children. Children to the number of 2,956,844 were in receipt of family allowances in 1945-46. There were 1,910,192 families in receipt of family allowances in 1950-51. Of almost 2 million families in receipt of family allowances, only 56 prosecutions were under consideration. In other words, Mr. Speaker, only one mother out of every 33,000 mothers in Canada was even suspected of having spent the family allowance cheque unwisely. Therefore I say that the experience of the family allowance branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare is a real tribute to Canadian mothers. Canadian mothers take the family allowance cheques and almost without exception spend them for the welfare of their own children.

By improving the health standards of our children, and by improving educational standards, on becoming adult citizens they will be, because of family allowance legislation, healthier citizens, better educated citizens and will consequently make a better contribution to the welfare of Canada and of the world.

Once again I say that democracy cannot afford to stand still. Our way of life is on trial. It is not good enough for us to mark time on social security measures. It is not even good enough for us to protect the value of social security measures that have been legislated in the past; rather, because of ever increasing production in Canada, our social security legislation should be improved and expanded. Therefore I say to the government the very least we can do in parliament at this time, if we are to keep faith with Canadian motherhood, is to restore the purchasing power of the family allowances.

Mr. Martin: Before we end this debate may I suggest that momentarily we refer to motions and give the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the opportunity to make a brief statement, and after that we shall return to this motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LIVESTOCK

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—FURTHER OUTBREAK IN SASKATCHEWAN

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this morning we had notice that there was another suspected foot-and-mouth disease case reported near Weyburn. We have checked the case today and have confirmed that it is foot-and-mouth disease. The location is section 2, township 9, range 14, west of the 2nd meridian. This location is five miles northeast of Weyburn near a flag station called Mansur. There are 41 cattle involved so far. Source of infection has not been uncovered, but it is believed there are some contacts as well.

PROPOSAL TO INCREASE AMOUNTS PAID TO COMPENSATE FOR INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Argue:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation increasing the amounts paid under the Family Allowances Act to the extent necessary to compensate for the increase in the cost of living since the said act was first enacted.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few words only in support of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). On two occasions I suggested to the house that the government could and should increase the amount of family allowances. I have not changed my mind on the matter especially in view of the substantial increase in the cost of living these past few years. It would seem,—and this is fortunate,—that the cost of living is becoming more stable. Nevertheless it is still considerably higher than it was when the government passed this fair family allowances legislation.

The member who preceded me and who moved this resolution stressed the way mothers, in particular, are using the money received in the form of family allowances. I have the privilege of living in the country, while my humble calling puts me, moreover, in daily touch with families of all classes and circumstances.

If I trust my humble experience, I think I may state again, in this house, that our families are putting to excellent use the money these cheques bring them. You can hardly imagine, Mr. Speaker, how happy our mothers are, and how proud even, to use their family allowance cheques in order to furnish their small children with, amongst other things, the medicine and the medical attention they need.

Now, it is possible, and even very probable, that in some cases, though very rarely, there may have been some abuse which only confirms the general rule.

But I repeat that the great majority of our families make proper use of that extra money they receive every month. From the social point of view, I believe nobody can contend that this government investment is not well-advised. Everyone agrees that the family is an essential institution which we must strive to preserve and develop, since the family is still the great reservoir that supplies the nation with its manpower and population increases.

We are counting on immigration to increase the population of Canada. We are not discussing that matter now. May I say though that we should first look to the family to obtain the surplus population needed to develop in our country true Canadian citizens. It is the family that above all will give us true Canadian citizens.

Well, to my mind, family allowances are an excellent means of helping and encouraging our Canadian families. Therefore, it is an excellent piece of legislation both from a social and an economic standpoint.

Once again I say that the increase in the amount of family allowances should not necessarily be of a permanent nature; and so, I would be quite willing to suggest that should the cost of living go down, this increase in the family allowance cheques could be reduced proportionately.

The mover of the resolution has suggested an increase of 60 per cent. That may not be enough. Perhaps we might simply consider doubling the amount of the allowance for the time being, only to reduce it gradually as the cost of living decreases.

In any event, I do not wish to take up too much time. I only wanted to add a few words to those of the mover of the resolution and to say that, in my humble opinion, a splendid opportunity awaits the government of improving an already excellent piece of social legislation which could nevertheless be made even better.

(Text):

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house reads:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation increasing the amounts paid under the Family Allowances Act to the extent necessary to compensate for the increase in the cost of living since the said act was first enacted.

The hon. member who proposed the resolution, along with the hon. member who has just taken his seat, referred to the soundness of the principle of the family allowances measure first envisaged in the throne speech some eight years ago. Many members will recall the debate that ensued following the introduction of the measure in 1944. That measure was passed, in spite of vigorous opposition in the house from certain quarters, and vigorous opposition outside the house from certain quarters.

The government of that day—

Mr. Knowles: Passed unanimously.

Mr. Martin: —headed by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, whose government, and whose succeeding governments, have been responsible for all acts of social legislation on our statute books, indicated at that time that one of the reasons the government was introducing the measure at a time when we were still engaged in spending much of the resources of the nation in the prosecution of a war, was the fact that 84 per cent of the children of Canada depended for their maintenance upon some 19 per cent of the working population. That was a consideration which moved the government of that day to make the proposal which ultimately ensued in the Family Allowances Act as we know it, subject to the amendments introduced in this house two years ago.

The Family Allowances Act on our statute books is not certainly the first family allowances act passed by any country. There were some 30 countries of the world that had family allowances legislation before it was introduced in Canada. But it is safe to say that, with the exception of two countries, no country had a scheme of family allowances based on the same direction as is the statute we are discussing tonight.

In many of the European nations family allowances were opposed by labour, largely because those measures were used as a means to depress the wage levels prevailing in those particular countries. In Canada the labour movement, represented by the three congresses of labour and other corresponding bodies in Canada, gave immediate support to this measure, because it was clearly indicated in the introduction of the measure, and by the very provisions of the act itself, that the introduction of family allowances in Canada was not intended as a means of denying any legitimate wage demand that might be made by any group of employees.

And so our measure was introduced, as the prime minister of that day said, as one further evidence of the capacity of a democratic nation to provide within the responsibility of governmental obligation a measure of social reform for the people subject to its authority.

It is significant that while there was opposition in the house to the family allowances measure, one does not find any political party in Canada today taking issue with it. Indeed some of those who were its opponents, and whose names are recorded in Hansard as expressing at that time, I am sure, their honest views, are now to be found in the ranks of those who give strong support to the measure. And perhaps that is one of the best evidences of the soundness of the measure as introduced by the government of the day.

The hon. member who has spoken undoubtedly cannot be accused of having offered his resolution at this time in answer to the speech made in this house last week by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). I say that because his resolution has been on the order paper for some time. But it is not without significance that the only strong suggestion made in this house from any quarter for a retrogressive change in the Family Allowances Act has come from the member for Moose Jaw, one of my hon. friend's own colleagues.

An hon. Member: We disown him.

Mr. Martin: I am sure the hon. member for Moose Jaw meant well when he made the suggestion he did, but it is a matter of interest to note that thus far in this house the only real expression of opposition to the family allowances measure as presently drafted came from an hon. member who sits but two places from the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution.

Mr. Noseworthy: You cannot get any political capital out of that.

Mr. Martin: I am not trying to make any political capital. The reason I mention that is that in taking the position that I will take tonight I am sure the hon. member who has just interrupted me will be among the first to say that this government has lost interest in social reform because it could not and did not accept this particular motion. That is the reason why I referred to the incident of disagreement between distinguished members of the same political party sitting almost at the end of the gangplank.

Mr. Knowles: You will walk it yourself one of these days.

Mr. Martin: This is not the only proposal that has been made for a change in the Family Allowances Act. The correspondence and contact that I have had with those interested in amendments to the Family Allowances Act indicate a stronger attempt to lengthen the eligible age for family allowances than to increase the amount. I think my correspondence has been five to one asking that the age be increased from sixteen to eighteen years. As a matter of fact the suggestion has been made in this house that family allowances should be paid up to twenty-one years and not concluded at age sixteen. One might easily say to the hon. gentleman who has made this proposal tonight that if there was any change to be made in the family allowances measure consideration would have to be given as to the priority of these two suggestions.

My hon. friend might be the first to say: "Let us do both. He is in the happy position of being on the suggesting end. I, along with my colleagues in the government, have to bear in mind the cost that is involved in these measures and their relationship to existing social measures and to the over-all obligations of the government and the people of Canada at this time. My hon. friend in his peroration—I thought it very good although I am not commenting now on its soundness—suggested that I should not regard the question of cost at all, that I should realize that we are a democracy and that the way a democracy could survive was by the government giving constant and repeated evidence of its interest in the health and social welfare of the people. With that sentiment I of course agree and I think the government has given real evidence of its interest in that regard.

Where I disagree is that we must consider the question of the cost of these measures. We have seen evidence in the past year in some countries where they have had to engage in a policy of retrenchment of social measures. Why? Because they had to consider, as any government or parliament must, the cost of these things.

Mr. Wright: Or because it was a Conservative government.

Mr. Martin: I did not catch that interesting interpolation, but I would like to get it.

Mr. Wright: Or because it was a Conservative government.

Mr. Martin: I do not quite appreciate the significance of my hon. friend's interjection, but it likely has a significance I do not yet see. We are now spending in Canada about $1,500 million on health and social security measures on the account of federal and provincial governments. The old age security measure which was introduced in parliament at the last session raised our expenditures in the field of social security by over $300 million.

The hon. gentleman may think that all that one has to do is to make a proposal and, because it is meritorious, it should be adopted regardless of the cost. I have never lost an opportunity when speaking about these things —I think my record and indeed that of the government in these matters is no less sincere than that of the hon. gentleman who proposed this resolution—to indicate, as I think we should when discussing such measures, the extent to which we can guarantee their continuance. The money for these measures does not come out of our pockets as a government or out of the pockets of any individual member or group of members of parliament. True, we make our contributions to the general tax fund, but the moneys for all of these measures must come from but one source, the hard work of the Canadian people. There is no other source. Consequently when one comes to consider the desirability of any particular proposal one must relate it to the capacity of the people, in the light of all the obligations of the government, to meet the cost of the proposal if accepted. That is certainly true of this measure.

We are spending, as I say, $1,500 million this year—the federal government, the provincial governments and voluntary organizations—on health and welfare. The federal government is charged with the responsibility of administering substantially 80 per cent of that figure. I submit that that is a significant sum of money which has to be raised by taxation imposed on the people of this country, on those who represent the class of people who are directly represented in the 84 per cent of the population that have to be maintained by roughly 19 per cent of the working population of the country.

One is often charged in the administration of these measures with being profligate and insensible to the relation between the capacity to pay and the benefits obtained. I deny and the government denies that in the administration of these measures or in the adoption of any of these measures we have been profligate. We have sought at all times, from the Old Age Pensions Act of 1926 up to the present time, to relate our expenditures to the national income, to the national product and generally to the capacity of the nation to meet these obligations.

When one thinks that today we are paying slightly less, in terms of the budget of the nation, on health and welfare than we were in 1938 one cannot be accused of engaging in irresponsible administration. Of course it will be argued, as indeed the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) argued the other night, that if that is the case the country can give consideration to increasing its expenditures, particularly in the field of social security. But in making that suggestion I think the hon. member overlooked the fact that $2,000 million is being budgeted this year for national defence.

That does not represent, we hope, a normal expenditure of government but an expenditure of government which we believe to be desirable at this time in the interests of maintaining decency, and civilization, and making our contribution toward peace by supporting the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We have paid out in family allowances $1,882 million from the inauguration of family allowance payments up to March 31, 1952. As the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution has said, there can be no doubt about the social benefits of this provision. Family allowances undoubtedly, based not upon emotional anticipation but upon actual continuing checks and surveys, have helped Canadian parents to provide better food, better shelter, better clothing, improved health care and education for their children. Generally speaking there can be no doubt about these benefits. Therefore I am in full accord with what the hon. gentleman has had to say in that particular, as indeed I am sure is every hon. member of the house.

On the other hand, it is interesting to note that by the time a child reaches the age of 16 we estimate that on the average that child will have received throughout his or her period of life up to the age of 16 something in the neighbourhood of $1,188. That represents a considerable sum of money, particularly for the low income groups. It does give parents an opportunity of doing something for their children which, but for the existence of this measure, they would not be able to do. I think one of the most salutary results of the family allowances measure is that in every one of our provinces since 1945 when the act became effective school attendance has gone up to its highest point and has not receded except for two cases in one year. That is of course a result of the highest value. It is a result that other countries cannot claim largely because there is not the same strictness of administration in some countries as in our own. The moment a child under 16 years ceases attending school in Canada payment is suspended unless an adequate reason for non-attendance of the child at school is given by the parent responsible or by the person acting in the status of a parent.

The immensity of our program, which now costs us over $300 million a year, may be seen in the following figure. If the United States, for instance, were to adopt a program such as ours it would cost that country $3,500 million a year. It is not for us of course to comment on the existence of legislation in that country, but I think the immensity of our own program is seen in the fact that it would cost almost $3½ billion a year if a family allowance measure were adopted in the United States. Therefore, in suggesting as the hon. member did that there should be an increase in the amount paid under the Family Allowances Act, I am sure he would not want to have us interpret his suggestion as meaning that the present plan does not represent a very substantial social measure involving a very substantial sum of money.

The fact is that it does represent the second most costly social venture that this country has undertaken, a venture which in our case is more expensive and more extensive in its financial benefits than the benefits paid under family allowances measures of any other country in the world but one. It is interesting to compare some of our benefits with those in countries where the family allowances measure is somewhat comparable. It would have been interesting to have the hon. gentleman indicate how our measure compares with other countries such as New Zealand, Australia or Great Britain. Because they are relative comparisons I should like to give comparative figures at this time. First of all with respect to the total amount spent on family allowances in any one year on a per capita basis, as well of course as the total amount spent since the inauguration of family allowances, Canada leads all countries on the basis of payments as they are at present altogether apart from the proposal of my hon. friend which he says would amount to another $192 million a year.

The percentage of net national income spent on family allowances in New Zealand is 2·65 compared with 2·15 in Canada, but the Canadian figure of 2·15, compared with 1·41 for Australia and ·57 for Great Britain, indicates that the Family Allowances Act as it stands with relation to existing benefits represents an amount of money which demonstrates the determination of the people of Canada to provide the most satisfactory family allowances program possible. Likewise it would have been interesting if he had compared the relation of family allowance payments to other social security expenditures. In Canada, for instance, for the year 1951 family allowance expenditures represented 27·7 per cent of all social security expenditures, taking into account the veterans charter, the Old Age Pensions Act of that day, the national health program, the unemployment insurance measure and various other miscellaneous measures that come within this category. Let us compare that with the proportionate expenditure made in Australia and other countries, that is to say, the relation of family allowance expenditures made in Australia and other countries to other social security expenditures—in those countries. In Australia the percentage is 24·6 per cent, in Great Britain 4·7 per cent and in New Zealand 23 per cent.

Therefore Canada's 27·7 per cent represents the fact that our family allowance program is larger in percentage of relation to social security expenditures than that of any other of the countries with which I think comparison is justified. That is significant. What my hon. friend has done tonight is to urge that, although Canada leads in that it is able to say that its family allowance payments represent a greater portion of social security expenditures than in these other countries, we should still increase that expenditure and bring it, as he conceivably would if he carried his proposal to a logical conclusion, away out of proportion with existing social expenditures or other expenditures that he and others propose from time to time in the house. He said that at the present time we were paying family allowances to some 2 million children. Well, he has underestimated the extent of this program. I am sure he meant to give the higher figure, which for the sake of accuracy is 4,513,000 children. In other words 4,513,000 children receive every month from the regional offices of the family allowance division moneys contributed by the taxpayers of Canada for the purposes envisaged in the Family Allowances Act. That is a tremendous figure. It represents 1,960,000 families, which is also a significant figure. The total monthly cost of this program to Canada is some $27 million a month. Hon. members have seen the departmental estimates for this year, and they will see that we are budgeting for a total of $332,150,000 for family allowances for this year.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to other members of this house, particularly the hon. gentleman in whose name this resolution stands, that this figure of $332,150,000 must be kept in mind in discussing a resolution such as that now offered to the house. In 1946 our total expenditure on family allowances was $240 million. When you realize that we are now spending $332 million on family allowances, altogether apart from the old age security payments which amount to well over $300 million, and which will increase because of our ageing population, while I would not say the hon. gentleman is not responsible, one has to clearly relate these figures to the capacity of this nation to meet these costs, particularly when we are committed to the extent of $2 billion by way of building up our defences. I think nothing would be more regrettable than to give our people the impression that there is no limit to what we can do in these matters. Nothing would be more unfortunate than to convey the impression that nothing is beyond the capacity of this nation which is now so heavily taxed; and I believe that on occasion no hon. gentleman is more vociferous in regard to the level of taxation this government has had to impose than the hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution. I can only say to him that the proposal he makes would only give increasing justification to those who sometimes deplore the extent of taxation.

My hon. friend says we should relate the cost of family allowances to the cost of living. I have had to do with the administration of these measures for six years now, which has given me an opportunity to see what other countries have done and what people who have spent a good bit of time studying these measures think about their relation to the cost of living. If you want to damn a social security program, just relate it to that aspect of the problem. A social security program must be constant. It must be so arranged as to never encourage retrenchment. It must be so arranged as to be capable of improvement, not diminution. If you relate the cost of living at any one period to the social security benefit you will get the same result they got in France and Switzerland, where the total cost of many of these measures has gone far below the level when they were first introduced. The pretext given in every case I know of was that after the measures were introduced they were related to increases in the cost of living. When the cost of living went down the benefits were reduced, not only proportionately but often well below the original level. So on that ground alone I do not think the proposal of the hon. member is sound.

There is another consideration. My friend argues as though these family allowance payments or any of these social benefits were intended as complete grants to cover the total maintenance of a child or, in the case of the old age pension, an aged person.

Mr. Argue: I said the very opposite.

Mr. Martin: Then that will confirm what I am about to say, and will be an argument in favour of the position I am now taking. These grants, family allowance payments or any others, are only grants toward maintenance. No one suggests that a child can be maintained for sixteen years on some $1,100. What we do argue is that but for the money contributed under this program millions of children in this country since 1945 would have been denied many of the necessities and opportunities which this measure has afforded them. As I have said, without any increase whatever in the payments the family allowance program this year is going to cost $332 million. Compare that with the total figure for the first year the act was in force; look at the figures year after year, and it will be seen that the annual cost of family allowances has increased step by step. In addition we have the increasing cost of old age security and so on, which incidentally in a ten year period is going to increase very materially. While I take second place to no one in my desire to promote these measures, I certainly would not want to recommend to this house a proposal which in all honesty I would feel could not possibly be met at a later date within the financial capacity of this nation as presently known or as far as one can see into the future.

Naturally the government has great sympathy with this resolution. The government was the author of this legislation. This was not a proposal that came from the other side of the house. It was not suggested by the C.C.F. party, though they claim credit for spurring the government on with regard to it. This proposal was first made in this house by the then hon. member for Compton; that is to say, for the first time after the parliament which lasted from 1930 to 1935. About twelve years before that the suggestion had been made by another hon. member, also a supporter of the Liberal party. It is not that I want to say hon. gentlemen have not contributed to this measure—

Mr. Gillis: We pushed you all the way.

Mr. Martin: —it is because of that very kind of observation. I am sure the words I have used tonight will not be referred to in the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite, but the fact is that the C.C.F. party had no contributing initiative whatever in connection with the Family Allowances Act, nor did the party sitting immediately opposite. Indeed the leader of that party in the house at that time, Mr. Bracken, referred to it as a bribe, as an iniquitous measure. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is now coming into the chamber. I am glad, because it gives me the opportunity to say that when he was premier of Ontario he took strong exception to the passage of the Family Allowances Act.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Yes, hon. members may laugh, but the fact remains that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has been repeating the same inaccurate statements over and over again. The minister knows quite well that in the Ontario legislature I stated with the utmost clarity that our government supported—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Go ahead; I have no doubt whatever that no matter what the leader of the house at the moment says, you can count on the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) getting into this so you do not need to encourage him. The fact remains that in so far as family allowances are concerned, the matter was put forward by the Ontario government and the minister knows quite well that we were anxious to discuss it. The criticism was of the method that was followed in dealing with a thing of this kind without consulting the provinces, in the way that they did.

Mr. Sinclair: Since my name has been mentioned, perhaps I should enter this debate, although I did not want to until the member mentioned my name. On at least five occasions I have put on the records the actual words used by the then premier of Ontario in a CBC broadcast. The words were to this effect: I shall fight this iniquitous legislation in every court in the land. As usual, he did not. He talked big, but he did nothing.

Mr. Drew: That is just exactly the sort of statement I would expect from the member.

Mr. Sinclair: Accurate.

Mr. Drew: It is highly inaccurate, and he has on several occasions given a false impression of what was said at that time by simply taking a truncated section of that speech. The minister knows because the minister sat in the conference we had held just before that. So far as the province of Ontario was concerned we were very anxious to deal with this subject, and that criticism was criticism of the procedure that had been followed. I have just raised this question now because, if the motion is to be discussed, then by all means it should be discussed; but if we are to get further afield I shall have to go further afield and deal with any remarks that are made.

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. My word in this house has been impugned and I want to ask the leader of the opposition just one question, if the words I used from his CBC broadcast are untrue, because I remember those words. I have studied them. Did he or did he not say, talking about family allowances and as premier of Ontario: "I shall fight this iniquitous legislation in every court in the land."

Mr. Drew: The hon. member is so inaccurate I am not going to bother answering.

Mr. Martin: The hon. leader of the opposition was not in the house when I was about to make an observation concerning opposition to family allowances. I was going to refer to his participation in the family allowance measure when he was, I know, unavoidably engaged upstairs. But he has come into the house, and I thought in fairness to the comment I made about the C.C.F. party taking credit for all these measures, certainly without evidence to support their taking credit for one iota of this measure—

Mr. Gillis: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Martin: Just a minute. I thought that in fairness to the leader of the opposition I should wait until he came into the house before referring to him.

Mr. Gillis: Does the minister not recollect that in the C.C.F. program of 1942 there were family allowances. The members in this group argued with the members on that side of the house for two years striving to prove to them that this was a desirable piece of legislation. After it was popularized and sold to the Canadian people, the government realized that they ought to enact it in 1944 in order to get elected.

Mr. Martin: I certainly do enjoy the hon. member's questions, which always turn into very effective speeches. I simply want to say to him that I have not the same familiarity with the platform of the C.C.F. that he has. If he is referring to something in the C.C.F. platform of 1942 advocated family allowances, I want to tell him that the hon. member for Compton made his speech urging family allowances in 1935. I suspect the framers of the C.C.F. program—

Mr. Knowles: Health insurance was in the Liberal party platform in 1919.

Mr. Martin: What I like about the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is that he never loses an opportunity to tell this house and the country of his interest in social reform, and I do not deny his interest. But the moment anyone else takes any measure of credit, he is up on his feet interrupting the speaker.

Mr. Knowles: I just wanted to give the Liberal party credit for the fact they had health insurance in their program in 1919.

Mr. Martin: I want to leave the member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I want to say that I do not see him too much but there are occasions, if he will not misunderstand me, when I hear him too often. I do not want to be unfair to the leader of the opposition, but I do say to him with all sincerity—if I had known this debate was going to take this constructive turn I would have had the material available—that my recollection, and it is pretty vivid is that the hon. gentleman—I have not any doubt for motives that were sincere—did take the position substantially taken by the leader of the Conservative party in this house at that time. A resolution was introduced—here are the words that I had in my mind. This is an excerpt from a radio address by Mr. Drew appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail of August 10, 1944.

Mr. Sinclair: He was Premier Drew then.

Mr. Martin: This excerpt reads:

> Warning that Ontario faces "the most alarming constitutional crisis since confederation," and condemnation of the King government for enacting legislation of vast import to the provinces without consulting those provinces, were voiced last night by Ontario Premier George A. Drew in a radio address broadcast over a province-wide network.

Premier Drew also declared that in passing the baby bonus bill Prime Minister King knew "the bill was not worth the paper it is written on."

I must say that I am glad now the leader of the opposition knows that the bill is worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. Drew: Certainly, because, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it is an entirely different proposition to deal with the minister than to deal with his self-constituted assistant, but I do remind him of this. What he has already read supports exactly what I said that the subject was discussed on the basis of a constitutional issue, and he knows perfectly well—

Mr. Sinclair: Wait until the next paragraph.

Mr. Drew: —that the province of Ontario, at a time when I was still premier of that province, entered into the proper arrangements to provide facilities needed for the officials of that department to carry this into effect; that is what made it possible to implement the act. If that had not been done, what I said would have been correct.

Mr. Martin: I should like to read the balance of it:

He said the government of Ontario would do everything in its power to see that "this iniquitous legislation" does not go into effect.

Mr. Sinclair: You heard that before tonight?

Mr. Martin: I continue the quotation:

He charged that passing the baby bonus bill and similar measures was an "arrogant usurpation" of powers.

"If the Ontario government submitted to this," he said, "then we would be handing over the rights of this province to a government which has shown only too clearly that it submits to the will of Quebec."

"This," he said, "is the simple issue," and demanded: "Are we going to permit one isolationist province to dominate the destiny of a divided Canada? I hope that each one of you will answer that with a resounding no, which will be heard in every part of the province of Quebec."

"I hope," he said, "that the people of every other province will give the same answer to this question which must be answered one way or the other very soon. And I go so far as to hope that the same answer will be given by many people in Quebec who must have felt heartsick and ashamed that their province has been made to appear before the world in such a shameful role."

The past is the past. What I want to emphasize now is that this measure is supported by every hon. member in this house except I take it the C.C.F. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher).

Mr. Sinclair: And George Drew.

Mr. Martin: Every hon. member now supports this measure. That confirms the wisdom of the measure; that confirms the arguments that were made in this house—and they were strong, stormy arguments, as all of us who were in this house at that time will remember; so much so that one hon. member left this house—

Mr. Sinclair: One honest Tory.

Mr. Martin: —and came back to it only after several days of absence because of an altercation he had with one of your predecessors, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Coldwell: As I remember it, his was the only voice against it.

Mr. Sinclair: He was a Tory, and then he resigned.

Mr. Martin: But now, every one supports the measure, a measure that is part of our social security program.

There is another argument that I should like to address to the hon. member who introduced this resolution.

Mr. Argue: Don't talk it out.

Mr. Martin: If hon. members sometimes would not take so long in proposing things, the government would not have so much difficulty in bringing forward its reply. The hon. member, in proposing this measure, belongs to the party that says we should not have social security legislation by the piecemeal technique. We must bring in the whole social security program in one piece of legislation to cover every conceivable avenue of social reform. What has he done tonight? He has brought in, in an isolated way, a proposal with regard to one measure which he himself said will cost $192 million.

Mr. Sinclair: Page the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Martin: We had a parliamentary committee examining a program for old age security that was going to cost over $300 million, and even the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was one of those who thought that several months of study should be given before we finally decided on the old age security measure that we now have. And so my hon. friend offers this proposal. I say he does not offer it because he wants to demonstrate that he is against the new political philosophy of the hon. member for Moose Jaw since his resolution, as I said a moment ago, has been on the order paper for some time. But I am sure there was no happier man than the hon. member when he realized in the last hour, yes, the last two or three hours, when private members' resolutions were to be discussed, that he would be able to send out to Saskatchewan and to other parts of the country, his view that there should be no means test applied to family allowances as distinguished from the proposal made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

I do not attack in any way the sincerity of the hon. member for Moose Jaw or the sincerity of the hon. member who proposed this resolution; but what I do say is that the speech of the hon. member who proposed this resolution is one that gives evidence of the soundness of the government's approach to this whole business of social reform, introduced by the same administration that gave us old age pensions, with opposition in another place; by the same party that introduced the veterans charter; by the same party that introduced unemployment insurance; by the same party that introduced the national health program and by the same party that accepted the recommendation of an all-party committee to bring in old age security.

Mr. Sinclair: The Liberal party.

Mr. Martin: All of these measures are costing us, as I say, $1,500 million. That represents a sizeable proportion of the resources of this nation, which can be paid for only, as I say, out of one source, namely, the hard work of the people of this country. And if I judge their temper aright, they do want these measures, but they want us to make sure that we give adequate study to each project before we finally adopt it, and put it on the statute books for all time to come.

Dealing finally with my hon. friend's conclusion, when he said that we should demonstrate to the world that a wealthy and powerful nation like Canada should not hesitate to do all that it could to improve the social conditions of our people, I say that our country is doing that. I do not know of any country in the last three years that has adopted as important and as significant a social security program as Canada, at a time when it is calling upon its people to spend so much of its resources to arrest potential aggression in the world. On reflection, I know that my friend will leave this chamber tonight, go down the dignified pavement of parliament and will say: Well, you know, perhaps it was my—inexperience—my youthful impulsiveness—that led me to suggest that Canada was not leading the way at this time—

Mr. Knowles: That is not what he will say, and you know it.

Mr. Martin: —both as to her contribution to national defence and in her contribution to the building up of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and her support to the United Nations. Also at a time when she is not forgetting to do what she can to improve the standard of life of her people through the veterans charter, through the old age security program, through the national health program, and now through the Family Allowances Act, which we have been discussing, and the amendment which the hon. member has put before us in an interesting way tonight.

Mr. Argue: There is one minute left.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says that there is one minute left. That gives me the opportunity of saying this. I agree with my hon. friend that this measure has given the mothers and fathers of this country an opportunity to be really tested. There have been abuses in the Family Allowances Act; there has been fraud. But the number of occasions on which we have had to authorize prosecutions is relatively insignificant in respect of a program that is costing us well over $300 million, but which for the purposes of administration is costing us less than $4 million. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, at eleven o'clock this night that my hon. friend's resolution has served to remind us of the great value of the great social security act which bears the name in this country of family allowances.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister mentioned today that it has become urgent that we deal with legislation concerning the veterans because the delegation of the Legion will be in Ottawa next week and wish to see the legislation before they make their representations before the veterans affairs committee. Therefore tomorrow we will proceed witth the motion setting up the special committee on veterans affairs. Then we shall take up the resolution preceding the bills relating to veterans: first, the motion on legislation respecting the war veterans allowances; second, the motion on the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951; third, the motion on the Veterans Insurance Act; fourth, the motion on the Pension Act, and then we will revert to the debate on the budget.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 29, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. B. McCulloch (Pictou) presented the third report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

SASKATCHEWAN—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE —REFERENCE TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before motions are proceeded with, and in view of the discussion we had yesterday, I should like to make a suggestion to the house. I have before me a motion moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was passed on March 12 and referred to yesterday. This reads as follows:

> For a copy of all communications that passed between veterinary officials either provincial or federal and the federal Department of Agriculture, together with all records since the 17th day of November, 1951, relative to the cattle epidemic of vesicular stomatitis or foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan, also all certificates or statements of analysis showing the results of the chemical examination of suspected specimens of either of said cattle diseases.

I should like to say to the house, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the first part of the motion, "for a copy of all communications that passed between veterinary officials either provincial or federal and the federal Department of Agriculture", cannot be acceded to because I have not been able to find any such documents on the record. Then the motion goes on:

> . . . together with all records since the 17th day of November, 1951, relative to the cattle epidemic of vesicular stomatitis or foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan . . .

There is some doubt in my mind as to whether there is very much in the way of records in connection with this matter. There are on the files of the department, either here or at Regina, but mostly here, communications between the officials of the department. That is to say, one official would say to another, "we are doing so and so," and suggest to him what he should do. I submit that that kind of record has always been considered to be privileged, provided that the minister desires it should be privileged. This has been the general practice, and I think one can easily understand why it should be so. I am not going to refer to Beauchesne or Bourinot in connection with the matter, further than to say it is indicated in many places that unless that were the general rule it would be difficult to carry on government as a government should be carried on. I quite agree with that.

That has been the general practice. As a matter of fact, shortly after I came into this house no less a parliamentarian than the late Lord Bennett gave me a lecture on it which I have never forgotten. I think it has been generally admitted that kind of thing is privileged.

I realize that this is a rather unusual situation in that everybody has been more or less stirred up over the fighting of foot-and-mouth disease and is naturally interested in it. If the house agrees, I am quite prepared to table what is looked upon as privileged—that is, to table all the communications which are on the file. There is nothing in any of them that the government need be concerned about making available. They are the usual communications that pass back and forth between officials when they are administering anything in any department. I am quite prepared to table them all, but I should like to suggest to the house that it might approve a motion which I should like to move without notice. I know that the rules of the house require that I give two days' notice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To alter the order, I presume.

Mr. Gardiner: Not to alter the order at all. I am prepared to accept the order in spite of the fact that it is poorly drawn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was drawn well enough to cause the minister trouble.

Mr. Gardiner: I now move:

> That the subject of the prevalence of foot-and mouth disease in the province of Saskatchewan and its attendant ramifications be referred immediately to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Mr. Ross (Souris): A nice cover-up.

Mr. Gardiner: Again I say that I know I require the unanimous consent of the house. If I have not unanimous consent, then I should like the house to take it as a notice of motion and we can discuss the matter at a later time.

I think it should be recognized by the house that the officials of the department have some interest in this kind of thing. It is all very well to say that we in the house have an interest in it. We have, but men who have made their lifework the work of a department have some interest in it too. Because of the discussions that have taken place here, I assume that the meetings of the standing committee on agriculture are going to be more or less of a trial of the individuals responsible for the administration of the health of animals branch of the Department of Agriculture. In fairness to these men I think I should not place on the table of the house documents which will be a part of the evidence—practically all the evidence that will be produced—before the country and put the officials in a position where they will have to wait three or four days or a week and listen to the discussion of these documents throughout the country and see it in the press without their having any opportunity to be heard.

I think it would be helpful if we could permit this matter to be dealt with immediately by the committee. The committee is meeting tomorrow morning. It was being called to consider the wheat board report and to organize for that purpose. Instead of doing that it can occupy its time by going immediately into this question. My suggestion is that by unanimous consent the house should agree to the committee going immediately into a discussion of the question tomorrow, with the knowledge that I am quite prepared to put all the documents on the table of the house, whether privileged or otherwise, and leave them in the hands of hon. members.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a question? Perhaps I should address the Minister of Justice. Do these documents include the report I asked for yesterday, namely, the report made by "F" division, C.I.B., Regina town station, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, dated March 20, 1952, with respect to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act?

Mr. Garson: Replying to my hon. friend's question, I may say that in the administration of the mounted police we cannot permit the production of confidential police reports of this kind. If we do, we destroy the whole value of securing them, for reasons which I explained yesterday.

Mr. Coldwell: I understand there is no security involved in this case.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Garson: The position is that when police reports are prepared upon any matter at all they are prepared upon the assumption that they are confidential and are not going to be produced anywhere. A lot of information is put in them on that basis that would under no circumstances be put into a document which was not prepared with that in view. Therefore for many years the department has resisted the production of such documents, and we must continue to do so. For that matter I do not think they would shed a great deal of light upon the question in any event, because what should be concerned here is largely a matter of people speaking about animal diseases who are qualified experts in that field.

Mr. Coldwell: I understand the report discusses the quarantine and the manner in which it was carried out. It seems to me that is of as much importance to the committee as any other document.

Mr. Garson: With respect to the last point raised by my hon. friend, if he is concerned about establishing the facts as to the quarantine there is no reason why he cannot establish them by having the policemen called who were in charge of establishing the quarantine and having them give their evidence orally to the committee. That would be much more satisfactory than reading a report with speculation and the like in it.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): To begin with, I want to say that the minister's explanation today is merely an exculpatory method of refusing to carry out the will of the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: An order was passed by the house on March 12 with the minister's consent and approval. Time has gone by. On April 7 an inquiry was made about the matter, and the same course of procrastination and postponement was followed then. The minister now says: I will comply in my own way with the order of parliament. That is an added affront to parliament. No one can atone for his failure to give the full record to parliament by simply saying: I am not going to do it in the way parliament orders; I have my own alternative which I now offer.

Mr. St. Laurent: There is no alternative.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This matter is a serious one. Unless members of parliament can rely on records being brought down when parliament so orders; unless parliament can rely on the fact that the records possessed by the departments will not be selectively reviewed, with the ones that can cause no difficulty being produced and the rest concealed, then an order of parliament means nothing.

Yesterday the minister made this unusual statement, as found at page 1649 of Hansard. He said:

> There are some documents—as a matter of fact, I did not know this one was in existence and I do not know how the hon. member found out about it. The only document that was mentioned is the one which I think the government official who sent the message should be in a position to deal with.

I ask that the minister table these records in parliament.

Mr. St. Laurent: He said he would.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask that he do not make them subject to what a committee may decide or consider proper.

Mr. St. Laurent: He has offered to table them right away.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask that they be tabled in the house. That is the only way for the house to be satisfied that the order has been carried out. I hope that what took place yesterday will not be repeated. As to consenting to proceeding with the motion the minister has introduced, my personal submission is that I can see no reason for the house to give such consent. There is only one way in which to comply with an order of the house, and that is to table the record. What I requested yesterday was that the record and documents the minister has should be tabled. That was voted down when I tried to secure action on the part of the government. It was then that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) might very well have risen and said to his minister: Produce the documents.

I ask that these documents be tabled now, and that no subterfuge be adopted whereby parliament must submit to a committee the right to say what parliament shall have.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): In view of the hon. member's intimation as to what I should have done yesterday, may I remind him that the request he made yesterday was that Mr. Speaker make an order in the exercise of his powers. Mr. Speaker decided that he had no power to make such an order, that it could be made only by the house itself. It was against that decision that an appeal was taken and a vote registered, not at all upon the question whether any special document should have been laid on the table.

The hon. member does not appear to have been any more attentive to what was being said today than he was to what took place yesterday, because today the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said that in spite of the fact that in his view it was not usual to table certain of these documents, he was quite prepared to lay the whole file on the table. He merely added that because of the understanding from the very first day this house met that this matter would be referred to the select committee on agriculture, he proposed doing today what in my experience has always been done and what was done no later than yesterday, when by leave of the house there was a motion by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to refer to a committee the reports he had tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: These are not reports.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is something which in my experience is current practice; but if there is objection to its being done without notice, the hon. gentleman or any other hon. gentleman has only to say he objects and it cannot be done without notice. Then notice will be placed in Votes and Proceedings and the motion will be called when the forty-eight hours have expired.

There have been complaints within the last few days because this matter has not yet got to the committee on agriculture, but apparently when a move is made to have it brought before the committee a technical objection is raised. It is the right of any hon. member to raise such an objection if he thinks the public interest or any other interest will be served thereby, and I am sure His Honour would not put this motion until he had satisfied himself there was no such objection.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask one question to get this clear in my mind? I understand that the minister now proposes to do what he refused to do yesterday, namely, table the documents in question, but that he is making that conditional upon the house accepting the motion to refer the matter to the committee.

Mr. St. Laurent: No.

Mr. Coldwell: The Prime Minister says that is not so. What does the minister say?

Mr. Gardiner: I thought I made it very plain that if it is the wish of the house, as I understand it is, I am quite prepared to table all the documents, but I want to go on record as saying that I am tabling documents which are usually privileged in this house. In other words I do not want to be presumed to be committing anyone in future to what I am doing on this occasion. I am quite prepared to lay on the table of the house all the documents that by any stretch of the imagination can be brought under this motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: I am prepared to lay on the table all those I think ought to be there and all those anybody else might think should be there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: Just wait until I get through. I am prepared to lay on the table all those anybody might think should be there, and there are no others in the record. They will all be laid on the table.

Mr. Coldwell: May I suggest to the minister that he table the documents and then move his motion referring the matter to the committee, because apparently there is confusion in the house.

Mr. Gardiner: There is one thing I would like to impress upon everyone here; whether or not it has any effect upon the hon. member for Lake Centre I must say it anyway. Yesterday the worst case of foot-and-mouth disease we have yet had broke out. We should not have officials who should be out fighting this disease down here before a committee any longer than is necessary, and I think it is most important that these proceedings be started tomorrow. I am not making that as a condition in connection with the tabling of the documents; I am prepared to table all the documents unless the house should say I must not do so in order to protect something or other. I am quite prepared to table them.

An hon. Member: Table them.

Mr. Gardiner: All right. My hon. friend says I refused to table them yesterday. I did not refuse to table them yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: Let us get this thing straight. A little laughing is not going to help it any; this is not a laughing matter. I said yesterday that these documents would be available at what I thought was the proper time. Perhaps it was not the proper thing to say but I said they would be available. The only thing I have in mind is that civil servants ought to have some rights in connection with a matter of this kind. I am not going to try to be the defender of the civil servants in connection with this matter. I am going to listen to their evidence, and I presume every member of that committee will do the same thing. Then when they have heard all the evidence they will make up their minds. But I am sure the hon. member for Lake Centre will agree that there never has been a case brought before any court in which it has been a good thing to prepare the public for a decision in a certain direction before the evidence has been heard.

I think we should start in tomorrow morning hearing the evidence. I am not making that a condition, but I believe it should be done. If the house will not agree to that, then I ask—I said this before, but I want to repeat it—that what I have said today be considered as notice so the question may be brought up forty-eight hours hence. I repeat that I do not think forty-eight hours should be taken up in that way. Already, I have had to order one of the officials who should be out in Saskatchewan to remain here so he would be available any time this matter came up, in order that hon. members might question him. I think we should expedite that hearing as much as possible, and that is the only idea I have in mind. We have nothing to be concerned about in connection with this, any more than any other members of the house. For that reason I am quite prepared to lay these documents on the table; and I now do so. You can deal with them as you see fit, but I still think we should have the committee meet tomorrow.

I now move:

That the subject of the prevalence of foot-and-mouth disease in the province of Saskatchewan and its attendant ramifications be referred immediately to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister having properly and graciously complied with the order of the house, certainly that is all we want. Let me say to the Prime Minister, however, in reply to his gratuitous remark as to whether the public interest or any other interest is served, that the interest of parliament must be served; and that was the purpose of bringing up this matter on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion (Mr. Gardiner) agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That a select committee be appointed to consider a bill respecting allowances for war veterans and their dependents, and to consider such other matters relating to veterans affairs that may be referred to the committee; with power to send for persons, papers and records; to print its proceedings, and report from time to time to the house; that the provisions of section 1, standing order 65, be waived in respect to this committee; and that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Balcer, Balcom, Bennett, Blair, Brooks, Carter, Corry, Croll, Cruickshank, Dickey, George, Gillis, Green, Harkness, Herridge, Hosking, Jutras, Langlois (Gaspe), Larson, Lennard, MacDougall, McWilliam, Mott, Mutch, Quelch, Roberge, Ross (Souris), Thomas, Tremblay, Weaver, White (Hastings-Peterborough).

Mr. Brooks: Is the minister going to give us an explanation?

Mr. Lapointe: I hardly think this resolution calls for any lengthy explanation. It is the usual resolution setting up a committee to study the legislation which will be introduced following the other resolutions now on the order paper.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am extremely pleased that the minister is setting up this committee. The only regret is that it was not set up sooner. I understand that there is a rush now to get through these resolutions before the house so that we may set up the committee and hear the views of the veterans within the next few days. This rush is just a further argument for a standing committee of this house on veterans affairs. This is a matter which has been brought before the house on a number of occasions, not only by me but by other members as well.

I do not think there is any more important subject with which this house has to deal than that of veterans affairs. There are quite a number of standing committees, and many of them never sit at all. Year after year they are set up and simply exist on paper, but the veterans affairs committee is one that could and should sit every year. Since 1935 when I came to this house we have had almost yearly veterans affairs committees. We had a committee last year, one in 1948, one in 1945, and one in 1946. This is an indication that the veterans affairs committee should be set up as a permanent institution of this house.

As I said a moment ago, veterans affairs are most important and are becoming increasingly important. After the first war we had only the first war veterans with which to deal. Today we have the veterans of the second world war, and we shall have the veterans from the Korean war. It is difficult to estimate how many veterans we may have in the future. A standing committee on veterans affairs has also been urged by all the veterans organizations across this country. They have made their recommendations to the cabinet. Therefore I ask that this matter be given favourable consideration by the government.

We may think that we have veterans affairs fairly well settled, but the changing conditions in the cost of living and in the manner of living in this country make changes necessary in this type of legislation. Just a few days ago I noticed that in the maritime provinces the officials of the Veterans Land Act were meeting. They were very much concerned over the fact that many of the young men who had been placed on the farms were now leaving them. They found it impossible to carry on under the regulations which had been issued. I do not see any mention of that matter in any of the resolutions which are on the order paper today.

I might refer also to the number of members on this committee. Today it is thirty-one, the same as last year when we criticized the small number on the committee. In 1945, for instance, there were sixty members of that committee; in 1948 the smallest committee we had was thirty-five. There are a large number of veterans in this house, and I think we could easily increase the number on that committee. I am not going to press the point, Mr. Speaker, because it is not as important as the setting up of a permanent committee on veterans affairs, nor is it as important as another matter to which I should like to refer for a few minutes.

The terms of reference of a committee are, of course, the most important part of the resolution setting up the committee. We may ask ourselves whether our present terms of reference are broad enough. In my opinion they are not. The terms of reference in 1945 and 1946 were entirely different from those which we had in 1951, and different from the terms of reference which we have before us today. In 1945 we were permitted to consider all the legislation passed since the commencement of the war with Germany with regard to pensions, treatment, re-establishment, hospitalization, and so on. The committee was given very broad scope. In 1946 the terms were broad enough to consider nearly all veterans questions. Last year and this year, in my opinion, the terms of reference have been very narrow. For instance, in 1951 we considered them so narrow we tried to have them amended in the house to include the War Veterans Allowance Act. This motion was voted down, but repeatedly in the sessions of the committee we asked that this matter be referred back to the house so that the terms of reference might be broadened to include what we considered the most important matters concerning veterans.

I consider that last year the committee's hands were tied, and the results indicated that our terms were not broad enough to consider the matters which we all agreed should have been considered. I really think it is not unfair to say that last year the committee was an abortive committee, and that it did very little that was of benefit to the veteran. Some good matters came before the committee. For instance, the widows receive the full orphan rate for children. There is an allowance for children, continued up to the age of 21, where they are making educational progress. But these were not the broad matters which the veterans across the country wished to have considered. The two important matters which should have been before that committee last year were an increase in the basic rate of pension and an increase in the war veterans allowance. Most of the time of the committee last year was taken up not in considering matters which were referred to the committee but rather in considering matters which were not, but which we considered should have been, before the committee at that time.

Time and time again veterans organizations appearing before the committee emphasized the fact that they considered that the reference was too narrow and that these two important matters, namely, the basic rate of pension and the war veterans allowance, should have been before the committee for discussion.

I might say that one good result of the committee's work was that the opposition members and the veterans organizations across Canada put up such a strong argument for an increase in the basic rate of pension that at the fall session last year this matter was considered—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brooks: —and it had to be considered by the government. At that time an increase was made in the basic rate of pension. But the other matter which also should have been considered at that time, the war veterans allowance, was not considered. The veterans had to wait many months for an increase in the basic rate of pension—

An hon. Member: By-election.

Mr. Brooks: —and now they have had to wait almost a year for an increase in the war veterans allowance. My hon. friend can have the opportunity to speak, if he wishes to do so; and if there is anything I say which the facts will not bear out, I should like the hon. member to get up and point it out. He cannot do it.

As I say, the war veterans allowance should have been considered. For nearly a year, hardship has been forced upon the old veterans of this country. They were made to wait another year. They were made to wait during a time when the cost of living was continually increasing. There has been considerable suffering. I will venture to say that there is not a member of this house who has not received many letters from war veterans across Canada pointing out the suffering and the injustice to which they have been subjected over this last year, because, as I say, we were not allowed to consider this most important matter in the veterans affairs committee a year ago.

These letters speak about the reduction in the war veterans allowance, for instance, and count on an increase in the pension. When we put through in this house legislation giving old age security allowances to men and women to whom it was not financially necessary to give assistance, these war veterans—a segment of our population which needed assistance perhaps more than did any other people in this country—were denied this right.

As I have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, there are two matters which should have received more consideration from this house in connection with veterans affairs. One is the question of setting up a permanent standing committee on veterans affairs which could take up yearly these matters which, of necessity, must come before it. The second is the broadening of our terms of reference so that when veterans matters arise we as a veterans affairs committee will be in a position to deal with them.

I do not intend, sir, to labour this matter any further. In view of the fact that the terms of reference are again, in my opinion, too narrow to include, for instance, this matter of the Veterans Land Act and other matters I could mention, I should like to move the following amendment:

That the resolution be amended by striking out the word "such" in the third line and substituting the word "any," and in the fourth line striking out the words "that may be referred to the committee."

The resolution would then read as follows:

That a select committee be appointed to consider a bill respecting allowances for war veterans and their dependents, and to consider any other matters relating to veterans affairs, with power to send for persons, papers and records;—

And so on. The rest of the resolution is the same as it appears on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: There is a rule to the effect that the powers of a committee cannot be enlarged by an amendment. I ruled on this point before. The pertinent section of Beauchesne's third edition is citation 546, the second paragraph of which reads in part as follows:

When the house is considering a motion, of which notice has been given, for the appointment of a select committee, a member cannot move in amendment that the committee be given wider powers than those which were set down in the notice.

I would think this amendment gives the committee considerably wider powers than those which are set down in the notice. Accordingly, I cannot allow the amendment to stand.

Mr. Brooks: Possibly the minister would accept the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I think what has just taken place in the house points up the necessity for a standing committee on veterans affairs. We in the opposition try to get references to these committees widened in order to deal with matters which are constantly being brought up in our constituencies and in the country generally, but the government, by the terms of reference to the committee, limit our ability to represent the people who really want to have their cases put before the house.

We in this house passed a veterans charter. It was fairly broad in its terms, and was a reasonably good act, but to say it was a reasonably good act does not mean that it cannot be improved upon. It does not mean that difficulties in administration do not necessarily arise from time to time. With regard to the regulations under the veterans charter, the Veterans Land Act and various other acts, I am sure that hon. members on the government side have had brought to them problems which indicate that there is need for constant supervision, revision and scrutiny of those acts and of the regulations made thereunder.

After all, when we enact a law it is fairly general in its provisions; it is the administration of the act, and the regulations which are passed under it, which make it either effective or ineffective. We have had reasonably good administration; nevertheless hon. members who are going out to their constituents between sessions, meeting them and discussing their problems with them, have a better idea than any other group of how these regulations are affecting veterans in the different parts of the country. Therefore there should be a permanent veterans affairs committee of the house.

I have a resolution on the order paper to that effect. It is No. 11 on today's order paper, and reads:

> The following proposed resolution: That standing order 63 be amended by inserting therein immediately after subsection (l) the following new subsection:

Unfortunately, private members' days are being curtailed from now on, and we shall not reach this resolution on the order paper. The motion which is now before the house to set up this committee points out the necessity of a permanent committee, because at least in every second session of parliament we have to set up a veterans affairs committee to deal with these things. Why not have a permanent committee to which could be sent references wide enough to deal with all the veterans problems that are constantly being brought before us?

I do not want to go into the details of this matter at this time, because there are various resolutions on the order paper having to do with the amendments which the government is proposing at this session. The amendments which are to be brought in under these resolutions may be good, or they may not. We have not a copy of the legislation yet. Unfortunately the legislation will be confined to certain specific amendments of specific acts. We shall not be able to deal with the other acts in the veterans affairs committee. I would urge the minister and the government to give serious consideration to setting up a permanent committee of the house to deal with veterans matters so that year by year, as we meet here in parliament, the committee can be called together, and we, as veterans of the house, can get together to discuss these problems and improve the veterans charter which the government, rightly, I think, was quite proud of when it was adopted. Surely the government should be prepared to do that; surely it should be prepared to give an opportunity to hon. members to place the problems of their constituents and the veterans in their constituencies before the committee regularly, and to suggest amendments that should be made to keep our veterans charter up to date.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group are glad to support the resolution to set up a special committee to consider amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. But we also regret that the terms of reference have not been widened sufficiently to make it possible for that committee to deal with any matter that it may consider it should be allowed to deal with. In spite of the way in which the resolution is worded, I hope that the government will see fit to allow discussion on any matter that the committee may consider should be discussed.

For instance, we all know now that last year, as a result of the curtailing of the terms of reference to exclude any discussion of the War Veterans Allowance Act, a lot of hard feeling was caused in that committee; not only hard feeling in that committee but hard feeling in the various veterans organizations throughout the dominion. As a result, last year we did not have the same degree of harmony in the committee as was usually prevalent in former committees.

I do not want this to be interpreted as a criticism of the way in which the chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), conducted the hearings. I have always had a very high appreciation of the way in which that hon. member has acted in his capacity as chairman of the committee. I have always felt that that hon. member has a very keen desire to do everything in his power to advance the interests of this country.

I do think that the government should give consideration to making the veterans committee a permanent standing committee of this house, and that it should adopt the practice of referring to that committee the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs in exactly the same way that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) refers the estimates of his department to the external affairs committee. Such action would make it possible for us to keep up to date on the operations of the various functions of his department, and it would also help to expedite the passing of his estimates.

This is a large department; it handles a great deal of money, and it is very hard for hon. members to keep up to date on the various activities of the department. In view of the fact that this is only a special committee, and not an annual committee, I hope that the minister will, this year at any rate, when the briefs of the Legion and of other organizations are presented before it, allow a full discussion on any matter that is brought up that the committee feels should be discussed in full; otherwise a lot of bitterness will be engendered in the committee, in exactly the same way as happened last year.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to add my voice to that of those advocating that there be a permanent veterans affairs committee, and that the committee meet annually to consider the affairs of veterans of this country. May I remind hon. members that if it had not been for the veterans of 1812, 1898, 1914 and 1939 there would be no houses of parliament sitting at Ottawa today. The veterans of the recent war and of previous wars have defended this country and this parliament against aggressors with mighty armies who were determined to stop this parliament from functioning.

When certain Liberal members of this house interrupt a veteran of the 1914-18 war who is pleading on behalf of the veterans of Canada, I think it is a disgrace. I think it is a disgrace for any man to interrupt a plea on behalf of a veteran or of any group of veterans.

The veterans affairs committee should be a permanent standing committee; it should be available at any time to meet the demands, requests and considerations that are made necessary by the changes that occur from time to time. Today we have advertisements prominently displayed in newspapers and various weeklies across this country asking the young men to join the air force, join the infantry, join the navy. What we are really saying to these men is this: Offer your lives, offer your arms, offer your health; offer yourself to become permanently disabled in the defence of your people and of this country. That is what we are asking these men to do, and it certainly does not behoove any member of this House of Commons to speak flippantly or to interrupt a veteran who is pleading on behalf of veterans.

There is a war on today, and it is not the last war. Hon. members know that in their hearts. The number of veterans is increasing, and their demands are increasing. It will be an honour for any man to sit on that committee, a great honour to serve to the best of his ability, to be fair and just to the men who have given their all in defence of this parliament and in defence of the people of Canada.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I wish to concur in the remarks made by the previous speakers. I regret that the minister indicated so readily that he would not agree to or approve of any extension of the terms of reference. If that is an indication that we are going to have the same type and kind of veterans affairs committee that we had in the first session of 1951, then I regret it very much, because I would point out to the minister that the effect of that committee is still felt throughout the country. When you go home you find that the veterans cannot understand why certain matters in which they were keenly interested were not discussed. The veteran cannot understand why his member was not allowed to bring those matters up before the veterans committee. It is no good trying to explain to a meeting of the Legion the details of parliamentary procedure, terms of reference and things of that nature.

I suggest to the minister that he adopt the method followed when the late Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie was minister of veterans affairs. I can remember him dealing with a similar resolution and telling us that the committee would be wide open and that any matter pertaining to the welfare of the veteran would be open for discussion. I notice that there is a bill on the order paper referring to pensions, and the order paper indicates the three things the bill will cover. I assume that when that bill comes before the committee our hands will be tied as far as the Pension Act is concerned except as it relates to those three items.

I would like to hear the minister say right now that the committee will be permitted to discuss any matter referring to the Pension Act. Another matter that I know hon. members will want to discuss is the Veterans Land Act. A case came to my attention only a short time ago where a veteran who had not taken up his re-establishment credit wished to purchase a farm, but he found that that was impossible with the amount of his credit. I think the minister will be the first to admit that farm values have increased greatly, and that veteran found that the $1,200 he was entitled to was totally insufficient. There are many other matters that members of the committee and of this house would desire to have brought before this special committee on veterans affairs.

We probably will not have a committee set up during the session of 1953. I appeal to the minister to say now that any matter pertaining to the welfare of the Canadian veteran can be brought before this committee for discussion.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, my remarks are going to be short, sharp and to the point, because I should be upstairs right now at a committee meeting. This matter of setting up a permanent committee on veterans affairs is not new; it has been discussed on several occasions and I am in agreement with the suggestion. In fact I advocated it four years ago.

One of the things I am concerned with is the terms of reference of this committee. Rather than being a committee on veterans affairs, it is being set up as a legislative examining committee. The only prerogative the committee is to have is the right to examine any legislation the government may send to it. There are four bills on the order paper and the committee is to have the right to examine that legislation.

I do not know what the Legion has in mind. The only representations I have seen so far in their publication is with regard to the amendments to the Veterans Land Act. That may be all that they have in mind at the present time. There is one aspect of the Pension Act which I should like to see opened up for discussion. I refer to decisions that disabilities are of pre-enlistment origin. I think there is considerable room for the examination of that type of decision. I know it is based on medical evidence and the attestation papers, but I have seen cases where the decision was not what it should have been even based on that evidence.

I do not intend to carry on a prolonged discussion. I have always felt that the time to raise arguments of this sort was on the second reading of the bill. I believe the committee should examine the legislation and when it comes back for ratification if we consider there is anything wrong we can argue accordingly.

If the terms of reference of this committee are to be held down, as is indicated, friction and trouble and difficulty will be created. I think the minister would be well advised to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), but should insist that the first order of business of the committee should be to deal with the bills now on the order paper. Then if there are other matters which the committee want to discuss, it would be free to do so.

I am a member of this committee, but I believe that a permanent committee should be set up to examine legislation from year to year. I believe also that the terms of reference of this committee should be broadened so that we may discuss other matters once we have completed the business sent to the committee by the government. That would prevent a lot of friction and difficulty and wrangling in the committee and in the final analysis would save considerable time.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have advocated the setting up of a standing committee on veterans affairs to deal with problems affecting the veteran. Some years ago when the veterans charter was evolved we thought that that was fine legislation for the veteran, but changes have occurred since that time and there is a great variety of problems that now face our veterans. I am quite satisfied that the terms of reference of this committee as set forth in the resolution are not broad enough. I think that is most unfortunate. When a committee was set up a year ago the Legion presentation of May 17, 1951, had this to say:

> Therefore, the Canadian Legion cannot be satisfied with the legislation before this committee. There are no recommendations for improvement in the basic rate of pensions nor is there any mention at all of war veterans allowance, the two principal problems affecting veterans today.

They go on in that vein. I am happy to think that as a result of the efforts of the council of the Canadian Legion and the public as a whole the government were forced to amend the basic pension for veterans during the last session. They did that despite the fact that the terms of reference of the committee of that time did not provide for a discussion of that particular item.

I think the terms of reference should be made broad enough so that we might be able to discuss all veterans problems. I know that many of the veterans of the present war are finding some difficulty in getting rehabilitated. The Veterans Land Act has been referred to. This act is absolutely inadequate. It was niggardly enough at the time it was brought into being, but with the present increased cost of farm machinery, livestock, land, production and other items it is absolutely impossible for a young man to be set up under that act.

During the past few months a survey was conducted in Ontario to find out what was necessary to set up a young man, not a veteran, on a farm. It was found that it required approximately $15,000. The necessary legislation was introduced into the legislature whereby any young man with the necessary qualifications who has been a resident in the province for three years can be established on a farm with a maximum outlay of $15,000, of which he must supply $3,000.

That is evidence of the total inadequacy of the Veterans Land Act. There is no provision to discuss that act at this particular time and therefore we will not be able to discuss many of the problems facing the veterans of past wars and of the present war. I am sorry the minister has not accepted the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) that any provision of the Veterans Land Act may be discussed by the committee.

Again may I repeat that I should like to see a standing committee on veterans affairs constituted which could consider veterans affairs at each session of the house. I hope the minister will see that the chairman has some latitude, and that we will have broader terms of reference than are provided in the resolution before us so that we can adequately discuss the various problems pertaining to the veterans of this country.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), I am going to make my remarks short and relatively sweet. I must say that personally I am very pleased to see that the government and the minister have decided to introduce this motion providing for the re-establishment of the veterans affairs committee. However, I most wholeheartedly support the pleas of previous speakers as to the necessity for a permanent committee on veterans affairs. Veterans affairs are of such growing magnitude and importance that they require a standing committee to review veterans legislation constantly and to take note of changing situations and circumstances. A very good illustration was given by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) when he mentioned the completely inadequate terms of the Veterans Land Act in some respects so far as settling men on farms under present prices and conditions is concerned. In the second place, the new conditions are creating great difficulties in connection with administration and the giving of satisfactory effect to the terms of the small holdings section of the Veterans Land Act. A great deal of other veterans legislation is constantly affected by changing conditions and circumstances.

I also support the pleas that have been made for wider terms of reference. I think there is no question that the resolution gives the committee wider terms of reference than the motion placed on the order paper at the last session. However, I think the suggestion of members that we should have an opportunity to examine any matter of concern to veterans of this country is sound. I notice the minister is listening most carefully. I hope he has listened most sympathetically to the representations of members on this side of the house with respect to the particular things they have been concerned about this afternoon, the necessity for a standing committee of the house on veterans affairs, and the widening of the terms of reference contained in the motion.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I have been requested by the local command of the Canadian Legion in Essex county, zone 1A, to present their recommendations to this committee. Since I am not a member of the committee I wish to take this opportunity to present their views. Their recommendations are:

1. That the basic principles upon which war veterans allowance is allowed and paid be unchanged.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the house feel that these representations should be presented to the house? Is not the committee being set up so that representations may be made to it?

Mr. Green: Surely the debate on this resolution is wide open. I should think the hon. member is in order in bringing forward these suggestions.

Mr. Speaker: The debate on this resolution should not be wide open. Strictly speaking there is no reference in the motion to setting up a standing committee. It has nothing to do with a standing committee. The motion before the house is to set up a select committee. What has been debated has been the question of whether we should set up a standing committee. No objection was taken, so I did not object. However, if the house feels that the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) should be allowed to present these representations now I will not object.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I want to bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I am not a member of the committee and probably will not have an opportunity of making a presentation to the committee. Similar representations may be made by other commands of the Canadian Legion. Of that I am not certain, but I have been requested by my local command of the Canadian Legion in Essex county, zone 1A, to present these recommendations. They are as follows:

1. That the basic principles upon which war veterans allowance is allowed and paid be unchanged.

2. That war veterans allowance be increased from $40 single and $70 married to $60 single and $120 married.

3. That the total ceiling be raised to $1,200 single and $2,000 married.

4. That Canadians who served in England only in the first war be entitled to war veterans allowance.

5. That widows of imperial or allied services with twenty years' residence in Canada be entitled to war veterans allowance regardless of the date of death of their husband.

6. That home exemption be raised to $9,000.

I am not making any recommendation personally on behalf of the Legion as to these matters but merely placing them on the record so they will be before the committee.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I merely rise to say that as a member of different veterans affairs committees in the past I have always advocated the establishment of a standing committee on veterans affairs. I am disappointed with the limited terms of reference of the resolution. As we all know, there are certain weaknesses in various acts dealing with veterans affairs. Some of these weaknesses have been drawn to my attention during the past few months, but under these limited terms of reference I will not be allowed to bring up one of these matters before the veterans affairs committee. For that reason I most strongly urge the minister to enlarge the terms of reference.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the resolution under debate merely mentions one bill, namely, a bill respecting allowances for war veterans and their dependents. I think we all realize by now that there is great need for changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act. As a matter of fact an attempt was made in the spring session of 1951 to have the question of the War Veterans Allowance Act dealt with, but we were refused an extension of the powers of the committee when the debate took place in the house. Then when the special committee was set up and a motion was moved for a reference back to the house requesting extension of powers so that war veterans allowances could be dealt with by the committee that request was voted down by the government members on the committee.

It was perfectly obvious at that time that there was a need for an increase in the war veterans allowance just as it was obvious that there was a need for an increase in the pension. I hope the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and his parliamentary assistant have benefited from the trouble into which they hurled themselves last year.

An hon. Member: What trouble?

Mr. Mutch: Trouble? What do you mean?

Mr. Green: They should have brought in terms of reference containing wider powers for the committee. There is no reason at all why the committee should not be allowed to deal with any matter affecting the war veterans of Canada. It is quite apparent from the minister's reply to the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) that the government will not agree at this time to an extension of the terms of reference, but I should like to have a statement from the minister with respect to whether or not it is the intention of the government to refer to the special committee the other three bills, resolutions for which are on the order paper. For example, order No. 9 on today's order paper is a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951.

Mr. Lapointe: All three will be referred to the committee.

Mr. Green: Order No. 10 is a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Veterans Insurance Act, and order No. 17 is a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Pension Act. I am glad to hear from the minister that it is his intention to have all these bills referred to the committee.

Mr. Lapointe: In my opening remarks I stated that all the bills would be sent to the committee.

Mr. Green: The minister's opening remarks were so short and sweet—

Mr. Lapointe: The more reason you should have understood and remembered them.

Mr. Green: In fact I do not think he said anything. If he did he was merely mumbling, and I did not hear what he said.

Mr. Lapointe: I do not usually mumble.

Mr. Green: I would also ask for a statement from the minister as to whether or not it will be permissible to discuss the problems which have arisen under the Veterans Land Act. If he says those problems can be discussed I have no doubt the committee could put through a request to the house for an extension of its terms of reference in order to deal with them. Someone said here this afternoon it was a great pity that the Department of Veterans Affairs is not now taking the attitude that was taken when Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie was minister, namely, that each special committee on veterans affairs should have power wide enough to enable it to consider any question affecting the veterans at that time; and that this was the proper course for the government to follow. I should hope we would get back to that procedure, rather than limiting the powers of the committee each year.

That brings me to the other point which has been stressed by every member who has spoken from the opposition side of the house; namely, that there should be a standing committee on veterans affairs. Incidentally if there were such a committee it would be able to consider any problem arising in connection with the veterans of Canada, and that is as it should be. We have several standing committees of the house, and I would leave it to the good judgment of hon. members whether any of the committees for which provision is now made have any more importance than a committee on veterans affairs would have. First of all there is a committee on privileges and elections; then a committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines; third, a committee on miscellaneous private bills; fourth, a committee on banking and commerce; fifth, a committee on public accounts; sixth, a committee on agriculture and colonization; seventh, a committee on standing orders; eighth, a committee on marine and fisheries; ninth, a committee on mines, forests and waters. Incidentally, I do not believe that committee has met in the sixteen years I have been a member of this house.

Mr. Knowles: It meets once a year to appoint a chairman.

Mr. Mutch: That is no recommendation for setting up another committee like it.

Mr. Green: A committee on veterans affairs would be different. Then there is the committee on industrial relations, the committee on debates and the committee on external affairs. In addition, of course, there are the joint committees made up of the members of the Senate and the House of Commons. I believe veterans affairs questions can be compared very reasonably with those having to do with external affairs. There we have a committee which considers the estimates of that department and reports to the house, but there is still opportunity in committee of the whole house for a discussion of each item.

There may have been some excuse for not having a standing committee on veterans affairs when we had only the veterans of the first world war to consider. The problems facing them were largely of a pattern and had been considered for many years in the house, and not many changes could be contemplated. Now, however, we have hundreds of thousands of men and women who served in the second world war, and the problems which have faced and will face them are different from the problems which faced the men and women of the first world war. In addition we have the men who served or are now serving in Korea. Their service will bring up problems different again from those arising out of the second world war.

Mr. Lapointe: That can be considered by the committee under that resolution.

Mr. Green: I think it would be far wiser and more businesslike to have a standing committee which could follow these problems from year to year. Then we have the men serving in Europe, whose conditions of service are different again, and finally we have thousands of young men and women serving right here in Canada. Our whole defence system has been changed. We have many more people serving in our defence forces than ever before in peacetime and questions are coming up such as whether they should qualify for pensions in the same way as those who have seen active service. Incidentally, I believe the law is too strict now in regard to pensions for those Canadians who have been able to serve only in the defence forces at home. I do not think they are getting adequate consideration.

However, there are all these different conditions which did not exist a few years ago, and the probability is that they will be changing from year to year as time goes by. These problems will certainly be before parliament for many years. It is going to be a long, long time before the last Canadian veteran is off the scene, far longer than anyone in this house will survive. So I do suggest we should give very serious consideration to putting our method of dealing with veterans affairs on a better basis by setting up a standing committee. When the minister closes this debate I hope he will assure the house that this special committee will be permitted to consider whether or not there should be a standing committee on veterans affairs. That question is one of the most important to be dealt with at this time, and I hope that this special committee will be given the privilege of recommending whether or not a standing committee should be set up.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): I would like to join briefly with the others who have spoken, to express the hope that the terms of reference of this committee will not be limited to the comparatively narrow compass which the resolution would seem to indicate. If that is done I think there is no question but that the committee cannot do a proper job. In addition, I am very much afraid that a good deal of the time of the committee will be taken up discussing whether matters which may be brought up come properly within the terms of reference. We have had a great deal of experience with that in some committees in the past. If we are going to be so circumscribed that some of the questions now considered pressing by various veterans organizations across the country cannot be discussed in this committee, then to a large extent the work of the committee will be stultified. I should like to say also that I think the real answer to this problem is a permanent committee such as a number of us have been requesting for a number of years, and I would hope such a committee might be set up.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall be very brief in closing this debate, Mr. Speaker. Great stress has been laid on the fact that no standing committee on veterans affairs exists. The suggestion has been made that if such a standing committee were set up, it would provide the solution to all problems concerning veterans welfare. To hear some of the hon. members in the house one would think that the mere fact no such standing committee exists prevented hon. members from airing their views or making suggestions concerning veterans affairs. I believe that the debate which has just taken place on this resolution is good evidence to the contrary.

During the course of this debate we have heard hon. members referring to certain problems and expressing their views. All members have the same opportunity on the debate on the address and during the course of the last session I believe they took considerable time, as it was their right to do, to discuss and put forward their views on veterans affairs. The same privilege is accorded in the debate on the budget which is taking place at the present time, during the course of which members may present their views. Further opportunity is presented when the detailed estimates of the department are discussed, because then every aspect of veterans affairs legislation is open to consideration. When my predecessor was in office the policy was established of setting up the veterans affairs committee whenever the government contemplated important changes in the legislation.

It has been stated that the terms of reference are too narrow, and the committee should be given the same terms of reference as it was given in 1945. The situation in 1945 was completely different from the situation today. During the course of the second world war the government had legislated by order in council concerning the welfare and rehabilitation of veterans of that war. I believe there were some 52 or 53 orders in council which had been passed, and the minister of that day asked the committee to consider all those orders in council and consolidate them into legislation. From that consideration the veterans charter emerged. I submit that the situation today is quite different, and that it is my responsibility—which I am willing to assume and have assumed before—upon the advice of the officers of my department, to introduce the necessary changes to the various parts of the veterans charter. Last year I introduced amendments to the Pension Act, and at that time I undertook to set up this committee. I undertook to introduce during the course of this session amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act, and the resolution setting up this committee is in compliance with my undertaking to this house and to the veterans organizations throughout Canada. Those organizations will come I am sure—they have been invited to come—and state their views to the committee, just as they have in the past.

Furthermore, I want to point out that it is not only when a parliamentary committee is sitting that an opportunity is afforded to organized veterans bodies of this country to present their views to the minister or the Department of Veterans Affairs. Once a year at least, and last year twice, they met with the members of the cabinet, and the door of the office of the Minister of Veterans Affairs is always open to them. I can assure my hon. friends, although it may surprise them, that the members of the executive do exchange views with the minister, and many of the solutions which are found for veterans problems are the result of those exchanges of views. I believe we can proceed with the setting up of this committee to which will be sent not only the legislation concerning war veterans allowances but various other amendments to legislation mentioned in the resolutions on the order paper. Possibly there will be other legislation; in fact I know of one other bill which is being prepared at the present time.

Mr. Green: What about the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. Lapointe: The matter has not been considered, but at this time the whole matter of the Veterans Land Act is being looked into by the officers of the department at my request.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister in a position to tell us what is the subject of the other bill which is being prepared?

Mr. Lapointe: The hon. member will find that out when it is brought before this house.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

COMPLAINT AS TO EMPLOYMENT OF UNITED STATES WORKERS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will the minister take steps to investigate the complaint of the Vancouver Building Trades Council (A. F. of L.) that United States workers are being allowed into Canada to fill jobs which Canadian workers could do, more particularly on the very large projects in British Columbia such as the Alcan project, the smelter expansion at Trail, the Capilano dam construction and the oil pipe line project from Edmonton to Vancouver?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am grateful to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, for drawing this matter to my attention. We have not had any complaints up to the moment, but as he has said there are some we shall investigate immediately and I shall advise the house.

Mr. Green: I shall send the minister the clipping if he wishes.

TRANSPORT

RADIO STATION "VOUS"—CONGESTION AT HALIFAX OF FREIGHT FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I have two questions to direct to the Minister of Transport. He is not in his seat, and I have been informed by his parliamentary assistant that he has had to attend a meeting. I should like, however, to put the questions so that he might answer them tomorrow.

The first question is: Was radio station VOUS, operated by the United States air force at Pepperrell air force base, St. John's, Newfoundland, compelled or requested to cease broadcasting?

The second question is: What is being done to take care of the freight congestion at Halifax of freight destined for St. John's, Newfoundland?

FISHERIES

DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM FOR NEWFOUNDLAND—RADIO ADDRESS BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. A recent radio address by the minister on a fisheries development program for Newfoundland was described as "Bradley's boat-building bunkum" by the minister of fisheries in the Newfoundland legislature. Is the minister prepared to comment on the statement?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I have read the report of Mr. Keough's remarks in one of the St. John's papers. If he is reported correctly, it is quite apparent that he is singularly lacking in knowledge of the facts.

LIVESTOCK

ASSURANCE TO PRODUCERS OF FLOOR PRICE ON CATTLE AND HOGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I had a question I wished to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). He can take it as notice and answer it later. It is as a result of a press report in the Winnipeg Tribune of April 23, to the effect that packing house executives state that they cannot take the financial risk of paying floor prices for cattle when Ottawa gives them no guarantee against loss. As a result of the unsatisfactory market conditions with regard to cattle and hogs prevailing in the Winnipeg stockyards, will the minister state what steps the federal Department of Agriculture proposes to take in order to assure the producer these floor prices as announced?

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION—INCREASE OF ALLOWANCES, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend and consolidate the legislation respecting war veterans' allowances; for increasing allowances and permissible income; for assisting veterans who may be employable to some degree; and also to provide for the salaries of members of the war veterans allowance board.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister not going to make a statement?

Mr. Lapointe: I can make a statement when we get into committee.

Mr. Knowles: I think it would be preferable if it were made now.

Mr. Mutch: We have three other resolutions that we want to proceed with; you have four chances to speak.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lapointe: I will make the statement first, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harkness: Are you playing hard to get?

Mr. Lapointe: I have never known the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to be so anxious to hear me speak.

Mr. Mutch: Conscience.

Mr. Lapointe: As I mentioned in my previous remarks today, this resolution comes forward as a result of an announcement I made last year, during the course of the last session, at the time when I announced that the Pension Act would be amended. At that time I stated that the government was considering amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act; and that this question was much more complex than that with respect to the Pension Act, where the amendment simply consisted of a percentage increase of the basic rate. It was felt this question would be more conveniently and adequately dealt with by the select committee on veterans affairs and that such a committee would be set up during the course of this session. I also stated that action taken as a result of this procedure would be made retroactive to January 1. That is, any benefits accruing to recipients of war veterans allowance would be made retroactive to January 1.

As hon. members will see, after this resolution has been adopted and the bill is distributed, they will be presented with a completely revised statute, a bill entitled the "War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952" which will replace the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946. In other words, the bill which is to be presented is not merely one containing amendments to certain sections of the act as it now stands, but is a complete revision and consolidation of the War Veterans Allowance Act. It was thought advisable to do this, because, as hon. members know, since it was first enacted in 1930, the War Veterans Allowance Act has been amended on many occasions; in fact, I believe it was amended five times, namely in 1936, 1938, 1946, 1948 and 1950. It was felt necessary to make some rearrangement of the act so as to present its provisions in a more logical order for the greater convenience of those who have to refer to it.

I wish to point out immediately, Mr. Speaker, that the basic principles of the act have not been changed and that any changes of substance in the bill which will be presented have been made only to render it a more flexible instrument for providing assistance to those veterans and their widows who, in their old age, are unable to maintain themselves or who have no other resources, or whose resources are extremely limited.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Green: What does he mean by the basic principles of the act?

Mr. Lapointe: I mean that there is no change as to the conditions under which veterans can qualify under the act.

Mr. Green: You mean that the means test is to be retained?

Mr. Lapointe: I mean that the present provisions concerning the conditions under which benefits may be obtained are to be retained. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the most important matter which will be dealt with in the bill is the basic rate of allowances. It is proposed to make a substantial upward revision in these rates. At the same time it is proposed that ceilings for allowable income be also raised in order to bring them more in conformity with the ceilings now existing under the Old Age Assistance Act and the Blind Persons Act. As hon. members are aware, this would allow increases to some pensioners with low disability pensions and others having income other than the war veterans allowance.

A third element is being introduced by this bill. Over the years experience has shown us that a considerable number of war veterans allowance recipients, especially those who are granted entitlement because of having reached the age of 60 without being completely physically disabled, are from time to time able to find some employment of a temporary or a seasonal character, for instance. I think everyone will agree that those who can find such employment should be encouraged to do so. The provisions of the War Veterans Allowance Act, as it now stands, sometimes make it impossible to avoid penalizing the veteran who takes employment in that manner. It is proposed now to deal with such veterans whom we may class—and I think those are the words used in the resolution—as marginally employable, and who meet the other conditions of entitlement under the War Veterans Allowance Act by paying them the allowances on a monthly basis when they are actually unemployed and unable to find suitable employment. Without going into the details of this proposal, which hon. members will be able to study when the bill is before them, I might say that the general effect of this proposal would be to exempt their earnings from the operation of the annual income ceiling. There will also be other improvements in the bill, such as the benefits which will be payable to a veteran or his spouse during the twelve months succeeding the death of either of them, and it is also proposed to increase the rates paid to orphans under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Brooks: Will any consideration be given to Canadians who served only in England during the first war?

Mr. Lapointe: I do not think I am expected to give the details of the bill at this stage of the resolution.

Mr. Brooks: You have been giving them, and that is why I asked the question.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this is a measure which all of us in the house welcome; in fact it is one that we have been awaiting for a considerable period of time. The extent to which we will welcome it will of course depend upon the precise terms of the bill, or in other words, upon the extent of the improvements forecast by the resolution and by the remarks which the minister has just made.

In the first place, we are glad to learn that there is to be an increase in the amount of the war veterans allowance. I take it there will be an increase both in the rate paid to single veterans and in the rate paid to married veterans. I regret that the minister did not see fit to indicate in the resolution that is now before us what the new amounts will be. I had hoped that—

Mr. Lapointe: It is improper to do so, I believe, in the resolution.

Mr. Knowles: The minister interjected to say that he believed it is improper to do so.

Mr. Lapointe: In the resolution.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest the very opposite. Now that this point has come up, Mr. Speaker, I feel I must express my regret that over the past number of years a practice which was followed for decades in this parliament has been allowed to disappear. It disappeared not without my protest on a good many occasions; but the government seems to have been able to get rid of the practice of including in the resolution preceding a bill statements as to the maximum amount of money involved in that bill.

I could take the time, but I will not, to go over bills like the original old age pensions bill, the original family allowances bill, and many others down across the years of the parliament of Canada. In all cases, with very few exceptions, down until 1947, the amount to be provided in the bill was spelled out in the resolution. It was not until 1947 when the old age pension amending bill of that year was before the house that the amount was not included in the resolution preceding any important legislation. Some hon. members will recall the interesting time we had on that occasion. Since then the government has repeatedly brought in resolutions of this kind. I do not think it is fair. However, when resolutions are worded in this way we should be accorded by the rules of the house the right, under citations 439, 445 and 486 of Beauchesne's third edition, to move to increase these amounts when we get into committee on the bill. Whether or not we shall attempt to exercise that right will of course depend upon the provisions of the bill.

This is like a good many other things that happen in parliament, Mr. Speaker. Practices long established are altered on some particular occasion. That change is confirmed by a majority of the house, and in succeeding years we find that we cannot get back to the practice that we thought had been clearly established. At any rate, in addition to the procedural and technical objections that I have now voiced, I express my regret that we have not yet been informed what the amounts are to be.

When I was speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne on March 10 of this year, I urged that the amount of the war veterans allowances should be not less than $60 a month for a single veteran and not less than $120 a month for a married veteran. Those figures compare with the present inadequate rates of $40.41 for a single veteran and $70.83 for a married veteran. So far as I know, the Canadian Legion has not yet officially changed its request of a year ago for amounts of $50 a month single, and $100 a month married; but I believe that, in view of the increase in the cost of living and the difficulties facing our veterans, the Legion is considering changing that request and asking for higher figures. As a matter of fact, I have before me a letter which I received from Mr. A. Cairns, provincial secretary of the Manitoba and northwestern Ontario command of the Legion, which was dated March 15, 1952. This letter was written to me by Mr. Cairns after I had made the speech in the house which I referred to, the speech of March 10, in which I suggested that the amounts should be not less than $60 a month single, and $120 a month married. Mr. Cairns comments on that in this paragraph:

> We feel that the single allowance should be increased to $60 a month and the married allowance to not less than $110 a month which, in our opinion, is the least amount on which the veteran can possibly live in any decency. There is no reason on earth why recipients of the war veterans allowance should be compelled to live in slums. Surely they are entitled to better than that.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the figures which I suggested—and which I suggested on my own—are very close to the figures suggested in that letter by an official of the Canadian Legion in my own city. I earnestly hope that when we get the bill it will have in it figures not less than the figures suggested in Mr. Cairns' letter; I personally still think they should not be less than $60 single and $120 married.

Some hon. members may say: Let us get through this debate and get the bill and find out what is in it. The answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is that the purpose of this debate on the resolution prior to the introduction of a bill is to give hon. members a chance to express their views, and to give the government the benefit of those views, in the hope that the government might look at the bill and see whether it is all that it should be. My hope is that if figures such as I have suggested are not now in the bill, the minister, after listening to the debate that takes place at this stage and in committee on the resolution, will reconsider those figures and raise them, as I say, to not less than the figures suggested in the letter from which I have just quoted from the provincial secretary of the Manitoba and northwestern Ontario command of the Canadian Legion.

As I have said on other occasions, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter in which there is tremendous interest on the part of the Canadian people. That interest is to be found not only among veterans themselves, but among Canadians in all walks of life. People who themselves may have no direct connection with veterans nevertheless feel that Canada should do a lot better for our burnt-out veterans than we are doing at the present time.

I was interested in an exchange that took place a few moments ago while the minister was speaking, when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) interrupted him. We had hoped, many of us in this house at any rate, that when the War Veterans Allowance Act amending bill came before us at this session it would include, if not the complete elimination of the means test, at least very drastic modifications of it. I take it from what the minister has said that although this is a brand new bill which will take the place of the old one, it will be the same in substance in that the war veterans allowance will still be based upon the same principles already in effect.

There are a great many veterans in this country, seventy years of age and over, who are finding it very hard to believe that the means test has really been removed from old age pensions. I have the capacity to explain it in technical terms, but that explanation just does not answer the question in the minds of a great many veterans and a great many widows of veterans. I refer in particular to those who are 70 years of age and over. Since January 1, 1952, they have been drawing old age security pensions. They get the full $40 old age pension because there is no means test on that pension, but they have had their war veterans allowance or their widows' allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act cut by virtue of the means test that still exists in the War Veterans Allowance Act.

The standard case is the one that has been drawn to my attention by so many persons that I am sure others have had the same experience. It is that of a war veteran who was formerly drawing $40.41 per month but when he started drawing his old age pension of $40 his war veterans allowance was reduced to $10.83 per month, so that his total income would be $50.83 per month, which is within the statutory ceiling of $610 a year.

I should like to hear from any hon. member who has found it possible to explain to a veteran treated that way that he is not under the means test. It cannot be done. You can explain to him for hours on end that the means test does not exist under the Old Age Security Act, but he will come back at you and say that it is there under the War Veterans Allowance Act. He insists that he is under a means test, whereas many other Canadians seventy years of age and over are receiving old age security without having their other income reduced. I contend that this is unfair to our burnt-out veterans.

If the bill does not deal with that problem pretty drastically, if there has not been an examination of the whole relationship between war veterans allowance and the Old Age Security Act, I hope the minister will have that done before he presents the bill to the house. I would remind the minister that the Department of Veterans Affairs has had considerable time to study this matter. As a matter of fact the minister's predecessor and his parliamentary assistant appeared before the special committee on old age security, the sessions of which were held nearly two years ago. It was either in May or in June of 1950 that they attended before that committee so that it was nearly two years ago.

Although nothing definitive came out of the discussions on that point while they were before the committee I think it was made clear to those who appeared on behalf of the Department of Veterans Affairs that the relationship of war veterans allowance to old age security was one that called for exhaustive study and perhaps some brand new basis of treatment. As I say, that was nearly two years ago.

Nearly a year ago—in June, 1951—I urged the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) to have this matter studied during the summer of 1951 so that it could be dealt with in the fall session of that year and so that a new relationship between the war veterans allowance and old age security could be devised and brought into effect prior to the date that the means test would be removed from old age pensions payable to those seventy years of age and over. I was bitterly disappointed last fall when we came here for the fall session to discover, whether or not any study had been given to the problem, that no proposals were forthcoming.

As a matter of fact, hon. members will recall that when we came here last October there was no indication that anything was to be done at the fall session with regard to veterans legislation. In due course, after considerable debate on the floor of this house, we did have the introduction of amendments to the Pension Act with regard to disability pensions, but we were told that war veterans allowance matters would have to wait until the 1952 session. I dared to hope that even with that further delay—as I suggested it adds up now to nearly two years—we would have an overhaul of the relationship between war veterans allowance and old age security, but from what the minister said today apparently there is to be no change in principle. We are still to have the means test, we are still to have a ceiling on what is called permissible income. Although we have not been given the figures, the minister said that they would be brought more into line with means test provisions of the Old Age Assistance Act and the Blind Persons Act.

We shall have to wait until we get the bill to see what those figures are, but I might point out that the ceiling under the Old Age Assistance Act for a single person is $60 per month or $720 per year, and for a married couple, $100 a month or $1,200 a year. I submit that if the new bill provides for ceilings at those levels on the war veterans allowance there is going to be a great deal of disappointment both on the part of veterans who are receiving the allowance and their comrades who are not. There will also be disappointment on the part of Canadians in general that the means test has been continued with the harshness that is apparent with ceilings of that description.

I was glad to hear the statement that veterans over the age of sixty years who can obtain some employment will be treated on a slightly different basis. I take it that their financial position is to be considered on a monthly rather than on an annual basis and that they will get some advantage out of that position. But it is still a means test. The veteran is to be told that in the month he is earning money he will not get his war veterans allowance but that in the month he earns no money and is without other resources he will receive the war veterans allowance.

It has taken a long time in this country to get across to the government at any rate the fact that the people of Canada do not like the means test idea. We have won that point with respect to old age pensions for those seventy years of age and over; we have won it with respect to family allowances. It does seem most unfair that the place where it still remains is with respect to our burnt-out veterans.

I know the kind of problems that arise when you ask for the straight elimination across the board of the means test under the War Veterans Allowance Act along with its elimination under the old age security legislation. I need not go into those problems at this point, but my submission to the government is that it has not tried to find some other relationship that would respect to the extent which they deserve it the dignity of those whom we refer to as our burnt-out veterans. Surely if there has to be a test of some kind, if there has to be some qualification, if some kind of a line has to be drawn, let us do something that is more dignified, more humane and more Canadian than apply the means test which apparently the government is retaining in the War Veterans Allowance Act.

As I said a moment ago, we welcome the fact that the act is being completely redrawn. I think that is good from the standpoint of administration and of those who have occasion to refer to the act. It has been amended so often that it is difficult to know just what its provisions are without a considerable amount of research. But is not this a golden opportunity to make some of those changes that are so basic?

During the discussions we had, particularly last fall, with respect to the War Veterans Allowance Act the minister did give the assurance that veterans who had been on the allowance, but who lost it on receiving old age security by virtue of the means test in the War Veterans Allowance Act, would not lose any hospitalization or treatment rights which they previously enjoyed. I hope that point will be covered in the bill. I hope that not only will such persons not lose any hospitalization or treatment rights they previously enjoyed but that it will also be made clear that veterans in similar circumstances, who might not be able to qualify for any actual allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act because of their other income, will nevertheless be entitled to hospitalization and treatment benefits.

Once again, along with others who have made the point by interjections if not in other ways, I want to urge reconsideration of the section of the act which denies the burnt-out pension to veterans of world war I who did not get beyond England. That applies still to a great many veterans, although their number is dwindling, and it applies to quite a number of widows of veterans. These veterans and veterans' widows find it difficult to understand the discrimination against them, particularly when it was no fault of the veteran that he did not get to France in the course of world war I. In world war II England is accepted as a theatre of war but not so in world war I. I feel that change should be made at this session when the act is being rewritten in this way.

It is a good many years now since a former parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs indicated to a group of widows who were here making representations—and I was present when he did so—that he believed that change would be made at the next session. We are still waiting for that change. It would not affect a great many people. Certainly it would not involve many dollars so far as the treasury of the country is concerned, but it would mean a great deal to those affected.

I hope too that consideration will be given, if it has not already been covered in the bill that is to be presented, to the change made a few years ago with respect to imperial veterans who come to this country, and more particularly with respect to their widows. We know that the provision now is that an imperial veteran who has had twenty years residence in Canada qualifies under the War Veterans Allowance Act if he meets the other conditions. His widow, however, does not qualify, no matter how many years she may have lived in Canada—even though she may have been born in this country—if her husband did not himself have the full twenty years residence in Canada before he died. Again the number affected is not great, but it does seem basically unfair that that line should be drawn. I earnestly hope that consideration will be given to this matter.

Members opposite may suggest that one is raising too many details at this time, but I suggest this is the time to do so because of the minister's announcement—it was not clear from the resolution—that we are now getting a brand new War Veterans Allowance Act. That means that each and every one of these points will be before us, and I hope that such debate as may take place now will persuade the minister that if there are weaknesses in the bill in the form in which it is now drafted he should improve upon those weaknesses before it is presented to the house.

A few days ago I directed a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs regarding recoveries where there have been alleged overpayments since January 1, 1952. I had in mind a particular case the details of which I have since sent to the minister. It is the case of a veteran's widow, a lady past 80 years of age, who prior to January 1, 1952, was receiving the widows' allowance under this act, namely, $40.41 a month. That was her total income. She applied, as was her right and duty, for old age security and commenced receiving it in January, 1952. For some reason, which has not been made known to me, the Department of Veterans Affairs did not catch up with this particular case until the month of March. In other words, this lady's war veterans allowance cheque was sent to her in full for the months of January and February. During these two months she got what most of us would like to see all these old people get, both her cheques, the one that she had been getting for years under the War Veterans Allowance Act and the old age security which is now payable to everyone.

In other words, she got a total of $80.41 a month in January and again in February. But when the war veterans allowance board caught up with the case they of course had to point out to her that under the legislation as it now stands she was not entitled to the full $40 old age pension and with it the full amount of the war veterans allowance. It was pointed out to her that her war veterans allowance would have to be reduced to $10.83 a month. In other words, as I said a moment ago with respect to these cases generally, this woman is not under a means test so far as her old age pension is concerned. She gets that $40 in full. But because of the means test in the War Veterans Allowance Act she can have only $10.83 of the so-called burnt-out pension.

In this particular case the war veterans allowance board not only reduced her cheque forthwith, starting with the month of March, to $10.83 so that her total income would be under the statutory ceiling, but they also said to her: Because you have been overpaid in January and February we will have to recover that overpayment. Therefore we are going to take $5 a month off your $10.83 cheque until the amount that you were overpaid in January and February is recovered. So she is now getting only $5.83 where she was formerly getting $40.41. I think it was vicious to do it at all but particularly vicious and unfair in view of the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs had announced in the house last fall that any changes made in the War Veterans Allowance Act would be made retroactive to January 1, 1952. If that is done the result in this particular case will be that a little later on this woman's case will have to be reviewed and something will have to be given back to her for January and February of the amount that they are now taking away from her.

I submit that, bad as it was to reduce the amount of the cheque at all, it was adding insult to injury to make a further reduction in lieu of that so-called overpayment. I hope in that particular case—as I say, I sent the details of it to the minister—that the making of that recovery will be discontinued and that the practice will be suspended in all these cases that are brought about in this way until the legislation respecting the War Veterans Allowance Act has been enacted. I think I need say no more at this time. I want to impress upon the minister and the government how strongly Canadians generally feel about this matter. The burnt-out pensioner is a person whom people in all walks of life feel should get the best possible deal. I hope we will get out of the government a better bill in terms of principles, in terms of the amount of allowance, in terms of the arrangements for other income, than I suspect is coming in view of what the minister has said.

Some time today, perhaps, when we get into committee I hope the minister might also deal with the last clause of the resolution now before us, which reads:

—and also to provide for the salaries of members of the war veterans allowance board.

These members are on salary now, of course. I would like to know if the phrase simply means that in the new act provision is to be made for their salaries to be continued, or whether it means there is to be an increase in their salaries. The minister raised a procedural point a few moments ago, and I think he may run into some difficulty if he is suggesting an increase, in view of the fact that the wording of the resolution does not provide for any increase at all. I think at some stage of the game today the minister should tell us what the salaries of the members of the board are now and what changes, if any, are proposed.

In closing, however, I say that the important aspect of the legislation now before us is that we fix the amounts of the war veterans allowance at reasonable levels, that we establish a more dignified relationship between war veterans allowance and old age security than is provided by the means test that is still being applied to the recipients of war veterans allowance, and that we accord the fullest measure of respect and dignity to these deserving fellow citizens to whom we refer so often as our burnt-out veterans, to whom we are so heavily indebted.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): My remarks will be brief, Mr. Speaker, because I think we will be in a far better position to discuss this matter after the bill has been brought down. However, I should like to say that we in this group are very glad that a measure to increase the amount of allowance and raise the ceiling has been brought in even at this late stage. I think it would have avoided a great deal of confusion and discontent if this legislation had been brought down in the first session of 1951, before the unemployability supplement had been introduced and before the increase in pensions had been initiated, because, as the minister knows, there is a great deal of confusion and discontent in connection with this matter, and I believe this legislation will help remove most of it.

This legislation proposes to increase the amount of the allowance and to raise the ceiling; then it provides for assistance to veterans who may be employable in some degree. I was rather puzzled by that, though I suppose it will be easier to understand just what it means when the bill is brought down. Even with the minister's explanation, however, I do not quite understand. I should have thought it would be the other way around, that additional assistance would be provided those veterans who are unemployable. That is what the Legion asked for, because those unemployable veterans cannot take advantage of the casual earnings and make any additional income. This legislation apparently provides for additional assistance to those who can work. It seems to me that is the wrong way around, but as I say it will be better to wait until the bill is brought in.

I also regret that no mention has been made of the declaration of England as a theatre of war in world war I, and apparently no provision is going to be made for the payment of the war veterans allowance to the widows of imperial veterans who have resided in this country for twenty years but whose husbands died before that period of residence had been completed. However, since this is going to be referred to the veterans affairs committee. where I am satisfied it will get a thorough going over, and since I am a member of that committee, I will wait and take up these matters later.

Mr. Graydon: I am going to make the shortest speech in this debate, and ask the minister to remove the means test from the war veterans allowance.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Green: I would like the minister to explain to the committee what is to be done concerning what is called the war veterans allowance assistance fund. For a few years now a vote has been brought in each year—

Mr. Lapointe: It is going to be continued.

Mr. Green: —under which a maximum of $10 a month could be paid to a single recipient of war veterans allowance if he had no other income, and a maximum of $15 per month to a married recipient with no other income. In effect payments out of that fund were subject to a second means test, because the veteran had to establish that he had no other income. I wonder whether that plan is to be continued or whether it has been consolidated with the regular war veterans allowance payments. I notice a vote in this year's estimates for the fund, but I would ask the minister whether it has been consolidated with the regular act.

Mr. Lapointe: That fund is being continued, and the same principle will be followed.

Mr. Green: The same principle is to be applied?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, in general.

Mr. Green: Then I think the committee is entitled to know the conclusion reached by the government as to the relationship of old age security payments to war veterans allowance payments. That question, of course, was brought up on different occasions last year, and now I think we are entitled to know what decision has been reached and what action is to be taken in that regard.

Mr. Lapointe: I regret that I do not understand too well what information my hon. friend wants. When the matter came up last session I did explain that we were considering the whole question of the war veterans allowance and its relationship to old age security payments, and that the government would introduce legislation this session as a result of that study. This is the legislation which I am attempting to introduce, and when my hon. friend looks at the bill he will be able to see whether or not it meets with his approval. I do not know just what else the hon. gentleman wants, unless he wishes a long discourse on social security, which I do not think would be proper at this time.

Mr. Green: Is the amount of the war veterans allowance to be reduced by any old age security payments a veteran may receive?

Mr. Lapointe: This bill changes nothing in any way in regard to old age security payments. It was made very clear last year, by myself when I discussed the matter and when the Old Age Security Act was discussed in the house, that for all purposes old age security payments are considered income. By this legislation nothing is done to change what is in the Old Age Security Act.

Mr. Brooks: Would that not depend on what ceiling is put on?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, within limits.

Mr. Brooks: That will be set out in the bill, of course?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, the amount of the ceiling is mentioned in the bill.

Mr. Green: The resolution reads:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend and consolidate the legislation respecting war veterans allowances;

What other legislation, in addition to the present War Veterans Allowance Act, is to be consolidated in the new act?

Mr. Lapointe: It is only to include all the amendments which were introduced into the act within the last few years. As I explained in my opening remarks when introducing the resolution, we have rearranged the act and put it in more precise and orderly form for reference purposes. It is more easily understood.

Mr. Green: It is really just a revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act itself, and there are no other acts being consolidated?

Mr. Lapointe: Including the amendments which are being brought forward.

Mr. Brooks: A few moments ago I asked the minister whether those serving in England would be included in this act. The minister suggested that I might ask that question when we were in committee.

Mr. Lapointe: I suggested to the hon. member that he would see the details of the bill when it was distributed.

Mr. Brooks: That is an answer that the minister can give to any question.

Mr. Lapointe: It certainly is an answer that the minister can make to any question seeking detailed information. Unless my understanding of the procedure that takes place during the debate on the resolution is wrong, the detailed information is given in the bill. I understand that is the practice which is being followed, and I am sure the hon. member would not like to depart from any established parliamentary practice.

Mr. Brooks: The minister himself has departed from it, and that is why I am asking for the same treatment. The minister might have given the same answer to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra or any other member. I should like him to accord me the same courtesy he has shown to them.

Mr. Green: I submit the minister is not following out the proper practice. If what he now contends is correct, there is no use at all in having any questions on the resolution preceding a bill. All the minister needs to do is to say "Wait and see the bill." The question asked by the member for Royal is in order, and I submit the minister should answer it. Last year we had the Minister of Justice declining at first to give us the amount of salary that was to be paid, I forget whether it was to judges or some other public servants, but finally it was decided he would have to give the figure. Certainly, we are entitled to have an answer to the question asked by the member for Royal. We are entitled also to know the ceiling which is proposed, and the amounts by which these allowances are to be increased. All that information is relevant. When the minister answers by saying that we have to wait and see the bill, he makes a farce of this stage in dealing with legislation.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member rising to a point of order?

Mr. Green: Yes.

The Chairman: The hon. member did not say that, but merely expressed his views that the minister was not right in his interpretation of the practice in committee. It was for that reason I did not rise immediately to comment on the remarks made by the member for Vancouver-Quadra. It appears to me that members on all sides of the house ask questions of the minister, and the minister who is in charge of the resolution gives replies. It is not for the chairman to direct the type of reply that is to be made. The only rule which I must enforce is that the questions must be relevant to the resolution which is before the committee. I would say that so far the questions which have been asked by the hon. member for Royal and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra appear to have been related to the resolution.

When the minister says certain precise information is contained in the bill, what I believe he has in mind is that he would prefer that the information be given when the bill is being discussed clause by clause; that is his own position. It is not up to me to instruct him as to how he should reply to questions directed to him by any hon. member in the house. I think the hon. member will agree with me.

Mr. Green: Your Honour has held that the questions which we asked were relevant to the resolution, and I submit we are entitled to have answers to them.

Mr. Lapointe: I believe you stated, Mr. Chairman, that it was not up to you to give instructions as to the type of answer that the minister has to give.

The Chairman: That is quite correct.

Mr. Lapointe: I have no objection, but I wish to point out that we are now discussing a resolution which reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend and consolidate the legislation respecting war veterans allowances; for increasing allowances and permissible income; for assisting veterans who may be employable to some degree . . .

What is discussed at this stage is whether it is expedient to introduce such legislation, and not the specific details of that legislation. It seems to me it is absolutely improper to go into the details of the bill at the present time.

The question which the hon. member brings up concerns something which would be contained in a clause in the bill. If we are to go through that procedure at this stage, then we would be having repetition when the bill was introduced and was again before the committee.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, might I—

The Chairman: Just a moment. I have listened very carefully to the remarks made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs in which he further clarified his understanding of the practice. I am at the moment considering citation 439 which appears in Beauchesne's third edition, which I think perhaps I might read to the committee:

> The object of the resolution recommended by the crown is to give the house a first opportunity to discuss the advisability of making certain expenditure. The details of the projected measure are not then disclosed and debate is confined to the resolution which should not be lengthy . . .

I think that both hon. members are quite right in their contentions. According to this citation, the minister is quite right when he says he is not going to divulge the details of the bill at this stage. There is no objection to that. There is no objection, either, to members asking questions about details, so long as those questions are relevant to the resolution.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If he gives the details, we shall not need the bill.

Mr. Graydon: If the Minister of Public Works is answering me before I ask a question, that is an innovation.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not answering you; I am answering the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Graydon: I believe that on reflection the minister will realize he is establishing something new in the way of procedure, and something which is not in accordance with long established practice so far as this house is concerned. In a case of this kind I have never known such a thing to occur. Well, yes, I have known it because ministers are never anxious, in most cases, to be giving information gratis to members of the opposition.

Mr. Lapointe: That is extremely unfair. I have always given all the information you wanted, but at the proper time.

Mr. Graydon: I want to say to the minister that in my opinion and, I think, in the opinion of the house generally, this is the proper time for the giving of information of the character of that asked for by the hon. member for Royal. All these things are a matter of common sense as well as of rules. It seems to me that the minister would facilitate and expedite the debate considerably if he would answer the question asked by the hon. member for Royal. It is not, I should think, a particularly difficult question to answer. If it is answered, it will give him some idea as to the prospective legislation that is before the house.

According to the rules, as I understand them, this resolution is for the purpose of discussing, before the bill is brought in, these various matters which the government has in mind so that if, after the debate has taken place, the government then feels that there should be an amendment to the bill, that amendment can be proceeded with. I do not think that you can just close the door entirely on questions in committee by saying: Oh, no; you have to wait until the bill comes. It has not been the regular practice here to do that.

Mr. Lapointe: It has been the practice.

Mr. Mutch: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, if it is a point of order, may I say that I have been here as long as the hon. member who has just concluded his remarks, and I remember at least two occasions last year when, in introducing a bill, the minister began discussing some of the clause-by-clause items in the bill and was called to order by the Chair. I have forgotten what bill it was—

Mr. Green: That was on second reading.

Mr. Mutch: It was not on second reading; it was on the resolution. More than that, when these bills are prepared and are first printed, what is the practice of the house? They are marked "personal and confidential", and those bills are handled by those people only who are sworn to maintain secrecy with respect to them. There is no distribution of them, except to responsible officials, until after they have first reading in the house.

Mr. Green: Does that include parliamentary assistants?

Mr. Mutch: Yes; I have one. I think I have responsibility to maintain secrecy. If the hon. member has any information with respect to it, he has not obtained it from me. To say that it is not the practice to do as we are doing is just asinine. The staff of the house, as well as our own officials, are sworn to secrecy with respect to these bills. Personally, I cannot see that it makes any difference one way or the other. We always get three debates on these things anyway: one or two at the right time and then one or two semi-official ones. As to saving time, I do not think it makes any difference. But it is the practice and it has been the practice at least for the twenty sessions that I have been here.

Mr. Graydon: This is not a secret session.

The Chairman: Order. Let us not enter into a prolonged debate on procedure. A question has been asked. The minister has replied in accordance with his own interpretation of the rules. Upon reflection, if one looks at the citation which I quoted a moment ago, namely citation 439, it would appear as though the minister is right. I cannot say that the hon. member who has asked the question has not asked a relevant one. But let us not enter into a prolonged discussion on procedure. Certainly this resolution is before hon. members for the purpose of discussing the advisability of making a certain expenditure, and I would imagine that the incident could be considered as closed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before we close the whole thing, Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that we bring this question before the special committee on rules and standing orders. It will have a meeting this week.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. member is losing sight of the fact that it is the government that is introducing this legislation.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member must not speak on the point of order. I have already given my ruling, and my ruling is not debatable.

Mr. Sinnott: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 181, respecting allowances for veterans and their dependents.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

PROVISION WITH RESPECT TO TIME OF EXPIRY

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951, to provide that the act shall expire on the last day of the first session of parliament in nineteen hundred and fifty-three in lieu of the last day of the first session of parliament in nineteen hundred and fifty-two.

Mr. Brooks: Will the minister give us a short explanation?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes. I do not think it is necessary, Mr. Speaker, for me to say much at this stage with regard to this resolution. This is an annual bill which is being introduced to provide for the veterans benefits to be given to members of the Korean fighting forces. The Veterans Benefit Act, 1951, enabled the Department of Veterans Affairs to provide for the members of the Korean forces benefits similar to those which were granted to veterans of world war II. As hon. members know, the majority of the veterans benefits, as we know them, are made available to Korean veterans by order in council under that act. It has been the practice, since the forces in Korea were constituted, that such orders in council are drafted following a close study of the veterans legislation that can be made applicable to Korean veterans by an interdepartmental committee which submits its recommendations to me and, through me, to council. Section 9 of the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951, provides that this act shall expire on the last day of the first session of parliament in 1952. Through this bill it is proposed simply to amend the 1951 act in order that the act shall expire on the last day of the first session of parliament of 1953 and to continue the authority to grant, by order in council, the various veterans benefits to members of the Korean forces.

Mr. Brooks: It is the same bill as you had before the house last year except that the date is changed?

Mr. Lapointe: That is right; it is exactly the same bill except for the date.

Mr. Brooks: Does it include the forces in Europe or does it apply only to the Korean forces?

Mr. Lapointe: It only includes those forces, I believe—and I am subject to correction—which are in a theatre of war or in what is defined as a theatre of war. I do not believe that Europe is a theatre of war or that the 27th brigade, to which my hon. friend refers, is in a territory which is considered to be a theatre of war. In other words, the bill applies only to Korean forces at the present time.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Green: As I understand it, this bill is of a temporary nature, designed to meet a situation until it is possible to bring in permanent legislation to deal with these benefits.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Green: When does the minister expect that it will be possible to provide for these benefits by legislation rather than by orders in council?

Mr. Lapointe: The procedure which is followed, as my hon. friend knows, is the same as was followed during world war II. I believe that last year some of the orders in council, which were passed under the act, were put into statutory form. The Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act was so amended; so were the Pension Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act to replace what used to be out-of-work benefits under the old veterans charter during world war II. As the situation becomes clearer it is intended to put it into statutory form and get the approval of parliament of some of these various orders in council.

Mr. Green: Are there any benefits at the present time for the men who have served in the 27th brigade in Europe, or who served in Canada?

Mr. Lapointe: There are some benefits, yes. They enjoy the benefits of the Pension Act; they enjoy the benefit of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act; and they enjoy the benefit of the Unemployment Insurance Act that I mentioned before. All of the benefits of world war II have not been extended to them.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 182, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT

PAYMENT TO ESTATES OF FULL AMOUNT OF POLICY

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Insurance Act so as to provide that in certain cases the estate of the insured may receive the full amount payable under the policy contract.

Mr. Brooks: May we have some information from the minister?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, this is simply to permit the introduction of a bill to correct an oversight which took place last year when we amended the Veterans Insurance Act. There was in the bill sent to the committee at that time a clause to amend section 11 of the Veterans Insurance Act. The section provided that:

Where, under this act, the insurance money falls into and becomes part of the estate of the insured, such estate shall be entitled to receive only the reserve under the contract at the time of the death of the insured.

We wanted to take away that restriction and make the full amount of the policy payable to the estate. But in the same clause, as hon. members with recall, it was prepared to introduce a war clause into new contracts. It was all in the same clause of the bill. When the bill was referred to the select committee on veterans affairs, the introduction of the war clause was not approved. And the whole of the clause was deleted, so that the old section 11 now stands as it was. In order to correct that situation we are proposing to introduce an amendment to the insurance act this year and make it conform to the returned soldiers' insurance act.

Mr. Green: Will it be retroactive?

Mr. Lapointe: It does not matter, that I can see.

Mr. Green: Will it be retroactive? In other words, will it cover any cases of veterans dying in the meantime?

Mr. Lapointe: No, it will take effect as from the date the legislation is passed.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Lapointe: I am afraid I did not make myself clear. There was no war clause. We wanted to introduce a war clause; as we were repealing old section 11, we decided to use that number for the section to introduce a war clause. This was objected to in committee, and as a result there was no war clause. But the old section stood, and we want to correct that now, and make the full amount of the policy payable to the estate.

Mr. Brooks: I remember the Legion objected, and I objected to section 11 being amended as proposed in Bill No. 352 last year.

Mr. Lapointe: That is it.

Mr. Mutch: We cut off too much.

Mr. Lapointe: We cut away more than we intended to.

Mr. Green: Will the position not be that in the case of an insured who died in the intervening twelve months, his estate will suffer unless this amendment is made retroactive?

Mr. Mutch: Just in the same way that every person suffered prior to the proposed amendment last year. It has the effect of delaying the amendment one year. The position will be just the same as that of any insured who died previous to the introduction of that clause a year ago, which was deleted.

Mr. Green: If this was a mistake in the committee, surely there should be no suffering because a veteran has died in the intervening twelve months. Surely provision could be made to cover the last twelve months.

Mr. Mutch: I suggest you make that argument in the committee. From past experience, I think it would be a good thing to do.

Mr. Wright: Will you call it six o'clock?

Mr. Mutch: No; we are almost through.

Mr. Wright: I want to ask questions with respect to this. It is now six o'clock. If this were the last bill I certainly would say let us finish it. There is another bill. We cannot finish the other bill.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, may I say that at eight o'clock we will have private and public bills and orders. Then we shall revert back to these veterans motions. I do not know, if we do not take the whole of the evening on that, whether the house would agree to proceed with the motion setting up a committee in the name of the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters). It has to do with setting up a committee to go into national film board activities.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think we should proceed with what the minister announced last night, in view of the fact that certain hon. members have proceeded on the assumption that we were going to follow that order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then it will be the discussion on the budget after these bills.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR PAYMENT FOR FARM STORAGE

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935 (payment for farm storage).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased at this time to move the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, payment for farm storage. The provision permitting the wheat board to pay farm storage was placed in the Canadian Wheat Board Act some years ago. The section of the act now provides that the Canadian wheat board shall pay storage if directed by regulation. This bill merely deletes the words "if directed by regulation". If the bill is approved by the house it will make it compulsory on the wheat board to pay for farm storage.

However, I would point out that even with the amendment as proposed by this bill the wheat board would still have the power to set the period during which farm storage would be paid. Even the way this bill is now drafted it would not be mandatory upon the wheat board to pay farm storage for a full twelve months period, but it would establish the principle that the Canadian wheat board shall in each year make provision for the payment of storage for grain held on farms.

In case hon. members representing constituencies outside of western Canada may think that this bill is asking parliament to pay from the national treasury the western wheat farmer farm storage, I would point out that that is not the case. The bill merely provides that part of the farmer's own money which has been obtained by the Canadian wheat board shall be used for the payment of farm storage. This is not an entirely new principle as farm storage was paid during the early years of the war. The mechanics of paying for farm storage are quite simple as the wheat board need merely to increase the initial price paid for wheat by the present storage rate paid to the elevator companies, namely, one-thirtieth of a cent per bushel, per day.

The first point I wish to make therefore is that this bill is not asking the federal treasury to pay the farmer anything; it is merely asking that a certain proportion of the farmer's own money already held by the wheat board shall be paid out in a given way. Over the last few years the difficulties experienced by farmers in marketing their grain in the fall, the fact that there is a growing inventory of wheat being held by the wheat board, indicate that something should be done to ease the situation.

Some farmers find that they do not have the same opportunity as other farmers to deliver wheat to market in the fall. While the country elevator system is spread throughout western Canada, that system along with the annexes and storage space is not distributed in such a way as to give the same market facilities to all farmers no matter at what delivery point they may wish to deliver their grain. The payment of farm storage would assist, in a material way, farmers who are unable to market their grain in the fall.

Certain policies followed in the last few years by the Canadian wheat board have meant that farmers at various points have had little opportunity to market their grain. I do not wish anything I say to be interpreted as criticizing the wheat board, but last fall in particular it adopted the policy of taking short-haul grain to the head of the lakes and to Vancouver terminals first. That meant that in the fall grain was moved first out of Manitoba and Alberta and farmers in certain other areas in Saskatchewan were forced to store grain for longer periods.

The secretary of the Alberta wheat pool points out that it has been the practice in the past for grain to be moved first to the head of the lakes from short-haul points, which meant that Alberta farmers had the greatest difficulty marketing their grain. The payment of farm storage at the rate of one cent per bushel per month would compensate those farmers who have to build additional storage for grain because of the policy adopted by the wheat board or because of non-availability of elevator and storage space.

Another policy followed by the wheat board, and again I am not criticizing it, has resulted in certain farmers having the opportunity to market much of their grain, if not all, much more quickly than others. This was due to the policy adopted by the wheat board of removing quotas for a certain period of time on the higher grades of wheat. Consequently the farmer who had threshed his grain and was fortunate enough to have milling grades of wheat was able to market it in the fall and receive payment for it while other less fortunate farmers had to bear the additional cost of storing grain on their farms.

From my observations with respect to farmers harvesting and delivering grain in the fall I would say that certain farmers, usually the well-to-do ones with modern hauling equipment such as a two or three ton truck, can market larger quantities of their grain, particularly when the quotas are lifted for a period of time, than can the small farmer who must depend on someone else to haul his grain or must use a team of horses or a small farm truck. Farmers who have modern combines and up-to-date machines are also able to harvest their grain earlier than some of their neighbours who are smaller farmers and must depend upon the custom combine or on equipment of their own which is in many cases obsolete.

The payment of farm storage would mean that a farmer who must store his own grain would get a payment of one cent per bushel per month. He would not make a fortune but he would receive a sum of money which would in part compensate him for the additional trouble of handling that grain three times, once out of the combine, once into the granary and once out of the granary, before it gets to town. I believe it would provide the farmer with additional money to go toward the cost of providing storage on his own farm. It is not a case now of whether or not the wheat board shall pay storage on grain. It is a case of whether we should ask the wheat board to make farmers along with elevator companies eligible to receive the regular storage rate.

I believe the payment of farm storage would also make it possible for a great many farmers to haul grain to the elevator of their own choice. I know that if I belong to the wheat pool organization, as I do, and if I care to, as I have in the past, I can store my grain on the farm even though there is room in a line company elevator and wait until finally there is room in my own wheat pool elevator. In the fall a great many farmers need money right away, and when they find the wheat pool elevator plugged to which they would like to haul their grain they are forced to haul to the line elevator company. If the farmer were paid farm storage he would at least have some small compensation for the trouble of handling his grain two additional times and he would then be in a position to patronize his own co-operative elevator company at a later date.

I believe it might be a good thing—and I ask the minister to give this point consideration—for the government to formulate a policy directed toward keeping on every farm a minimum quantity of grain at least until the middle of the summer. I believe the history of western Canada shows that in one year out of three there is a large area of crop failure. If the farmer in any crop failure area had on his own farm from 500 to 1,000 bushels of wheat he would have in that form some crop insurance and protection against crop failure. I want to point out again that the bill would allow the Canadian wheat board to vary the time over which farm storage could be paid. If there was a crop failure and the wheat board needed all the wheat that farmers could deliver, then of course the farm storage period could be greatly reduced. I doubt very much whether the wheat board is going to have any serious difficulty in the next year or two in obtaining grain to sell. The difficulty that the wheat board may well face is difficulty in being able to dispose of the grain offered for sale.

I believe that if farm storage were paid to farmers it would mean less clamour for available elevator storage space. The little fellow, who is now pushed to the wall in the fall and cannot get his grain out in competition with neighbours who have modern equipment, would get some compensation, and perhaps at a future date within the crop year elevator storage space would be more readily available. I brought up this subject on December 14, 1951. I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) at that time if he and the government would give consideration to the payment of farm storage. The minister levelled quite a blast at me at that time. I am going to omit quoting that part of the proceedings now, but the minister had this to say—

Mr. Knowles: It was the Christmas spirit.

> My hon. friend is practically suggesting that when delivery of grain is made, say in March, instead of getting $1.20, which probably would be due on No. 1 Northern wheat, the farmer would get $1.24. All right, that is 4 cents he is ahead there. But when he gets his final payment he is going to find that 4 cents is deducted. All he gets is 4 cents a little bit earlier. If we changed the interim payment and made it 24 cents instead of 20 cents the result would be practically the same.

I have been attempting to make the point that farmers who must bear the additional cost of storing grain on their own farms should receive compensation. The minister says that all farmers are paid and should continue to be paid the same price for grain irrespective of whether or not they must store it on their own farms. But the minister does not follow that policy with respect to paying storage to elevator companies. He does not say: We will pay all the elevator companies the same storage fee irrespective of the length of time they store the wheat or the quantity they store. On the contrary, storage to elevator companies is paid as it should be in greater amounts to those elevator companies that store larger quantities of wheat for longer periods of time. Just as it would not be fair to pay each elevator company the same storage fee irrespective of the quantity of wheat that the company stores, it is not fair to pay each farmer the same price for a bushel of wheat irrespective of whether or not the farmer must store his wheat for a long period of time. The minister has said that it would not help the farmers at all. I admit that the main result of the bill would be a reallocation or redistribution of farmers' money amongst the farmers. But it does mean that those farmers who must bear the additional cost of storage for a considerable length of time because there is a lack of elevator space or because there is a shortage of box cars or because the wheat board is taking the short hauls first and has removed the delivery quota, would receive some compensation. Farmers are now paying storage on grain to elevator companies whether they like it or not. The carry-over last July 31 was greater than in the previous year, and there is no doubt the carry-over this year will show a further increase. That being the case, the elevator companies are likely to go on building more and larger annexes. In other words provision is going to be made for the storage of larger and larger quantities of wheat; the farmer is going to pay for that storage, and somebody else is going to get the benefit.

I do not suggest that we should stop paying storage to elevator companies, but I do say storage should be paid to farmers. If that were done I do not imagine the elevator companies would go on increasing the number of annexes so they could store larger quantities of wheat. Last year western farmers, through the wheat board, paid the elevator companies over $17 million. In my opinion the amount paid for elevator storage is likely to increase this year. But I believe it could be held at the present figure of $17 million if farm storage were paid, and any additional storage that might subsequently be needed for grain in western Canada built on the farms so the farmers would receive the benefit.

Mr. Sinnott: How much was that per bushel?

Mr. Argue: One cent per bushel per month. The attitude of any western member to this bill should, I believe, depend to a large extent on whether the farmers of western Canada want farm storage. Before I deal with that point I think in fairness I should say that in the correspondence I have had with various farm organizations I have not had strong support for this bill from the farmers' elevator organizations such as the Manitoba wheat pool, the Saskatchewan wheat pool or the Alberta wheat pool; but in the correspondence I have had with these organizations I can say they have not raised objection to this legislation. I think I can fairly interpret their correspondence by saying that for the most part their position was neutral.

On the other hand I have had correspondence with the Manitoba farmers' union who informed me, over the signature of their secretary-treasurer, that they have requested farm storage and are supporting the payment of farm storage; and they point out that they have a membership of over 22,000. Then I come to the Saskatchewan farmers' union, a grass roots farm organization that is strong and active at the present time. Year after year that union has consistently passed resolutions favouring the payment of farm storage. As a matter of fact just a few weeks ago the Saskatchewan farmers' union presented a brief to the Canadian wheat board, and under the heading of farm storage it had this to say in part:

> Another plan to relieve elevator congestion both at local and terminal points and ease pressure on quotas, etc., is a plan of compensation to farmers for grain stored on the farm, especially for grades or kinds of grain not required for immediate marketable positions . . . We would again urge the board to seriously consider implementing a farm storage plan for grain for the new crop year. Such a plan could and no doubt should provide for cancellation of farm storage at any stated date on any given grade or kind of grain required for immediate sale.

Resolution No. 14 at the last annual convention of the Alberta farmers' union reads as follows:

> Resolved that this convention go on record as being in favour of the wheat board paying farm storage on undeliverable grain, at the same rate as elevator companies receive.

These statements and resolutions are couched in somewhat different phraseology but I believe those three farm organizations would support wholeheartedly the bill I am presenting to parliament tonight. I might add that at an executive meeting held in Regina on August 29 the Saskatchewan federation of agriculture adopted the following resolution:

> That this meeting of the Saskatchewan federation of agriculture request the wheat board to institute a system similar to that in effect in 1941 and 1943 of storage payments on grain stored on the farm.

There we have the farmers' unions of the three prairie provinces, together with the Saskatchewan federation of agriculture, advocating and supporting the payment of farm storage.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this bill would provide for the reallocation of a small proportion of the farmers' own money. It would provide some compensation to farmers who must store grain on their farms for a longer period of time and consequently must pay an additional cost with respect to storage. The farm organizations I have mentioned support this proposal. In travelling through my constituency and discussing this matter I can say the farmers themselves are almost unanimously in support of it. I believe it only fair that farm storage be paid directly to the farmers themselves, and if that were done we might need even less elevator storage than we now have. So I say the bill I am presenting tonight is in the interests of the farmers and in my opinion is supported by the rank and file western wheat producer.

Mr. Sinnott: As a farmer I would like to ask the hon. member a question, for the sake of information. How much would the administrative costs be in this connection?

Mr. Argue: I think that question might be better directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), but it would seem to me that the administration cost would be low. It would merely mean that the wheat board would increase by one-thirtieth of a cent a day during the storage period the payment for any particular grade of grain which the wheat board purchased. The minister told us at one time that there were over 300 grades of wheat. I do not think that the addition of one further factor by which the price of wheat will be varied would cost the Canadian wheat board very much in the way of administration charges.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has given, Mr. Speaker, a well reasoned argument in favour of farm storage. He said that I blasted him on another occasion. I certainly never intended to blast the hon. member. I consider him a hard working and capable member who is well posted on the wheat situation in western Canada. The section of the wheat board act that the hon. member proposes to amend was enacted in the spring of 1940 and applied to the 1940-41 crop as well as to the 1941-42 crop. The circumstances that caused the amendment of the act were that war had broken out in 1939; transportation to the old country was badly disrupted, markets were disorganized and Canada was receiving very few offers for her crop. At that time it was important to induce farmers to hold grain on their farms to the fullest extent they were able to do so. The clause is, in my opinion, still a valuable clause to be applied in any year that promises to be a year in which wheat does not sell readily. Nevertheless, I cannot agree with the hon. member that it is a clause which should be invoked every year; even when there may be an active market for wheat and when, as this year, wheat can be sold if it can be delivered at seaboard.

I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that no impediment should be put in the way of getting saleable wheat delivered to the wheat board and delivered by the board to ocean ships as rapidly as the market will absorb it. We all know that the successful marketing of wheat and other grains is primarily the marketing of a crop in the year in which it is grown. I have been around western Canada for some forty years, and I am well aware that the calamities in the past, involving a sharp fall in the price of wheat, have been caused by accumulated unsold surpluses from previous crops. It is that situation which I believe should be avoided above all others.

The hon. member has said that no taxpayers' money is involved in his amendments. His proposal is that all the producers of western Canada who market wheat, oats or barley, shall pay to certain producers, who carry their wheat, oats and barley on their farm for a period, storage rates as set out in the bill. I think such payment can only be justified on one of two grounds. The first ground would be: is it to the benefit of all the producers that this should be done? In other words, will all the producers benefit from the money that will be paid to those who collect storage on farm stored grain? The second ground would be that the present system is inequitable, and would there be greater equity as between producers if farm storage were paid?

Now, we will examine the first point: will it benefit all the western farmers if certain wheat or oats or barley is held back on the farms? I see nothing to indicate that that would be the result. As I have said we have today, and have had for several years, a very active demand for Canadian grain. Last year, and again this year, the sales of wheat, oats and barley were limited only by the quantities of those grains that could be delivered in a marketing position at the proper time. Surely, no inducement should be held out to any producer which would induce him to avoid delivering his grain when that grain is needed by the wheat board. The board has to sell wheat well in advance of loading at seaboard, and it can only sell wheat, oats or barley when it is assured that the grain being sold is in a position to permit the carrying out of the contract entered into by the wheat board. With the international wheat agreement, the situation in regard to wheat is not as difficult as it was when wheat was being sold on the open market or to individual customers. The board can have reasonable assurance that the wheat which it sells will be delivered, and it can proceed in its selling with a good deal of confidence, for it knows the selling price of wheat before the season opens, and it also has some reasonable assurance of the quantity of wheat that will be delivered.

Let us take a case that is easier to examine. Let us examine the sale of oats. Now, the active period for selling oats is in the winter months. I have here the prices and sales of oats for the crop year 1950-51, the last full crop year of which we have record. We find that in September, 1950, when deliveries of oats commenced, 7·3 per cent of the crop was delivered and the average price was 88½ cents. The next month, October, 15·8 per cent of the crop was delivered and the price was about the same, 86⅛ cents. In November, 14·8 per cent of the crop was delivered and the price was 92⅜ cents. In December, 9·7 per cent of the crop was delivered and the price was 95⅝ cents. In January, 8·3 per cent of the crop was delivered and the price was $1.01. In February, 3 per cent of the crop was delivered and the price was $1.05⅝. In March, 2·3 per cent of the crop was delivered and the price was $1.01⅜. In April, 3·8 per cent of the crop was marketed—we are now getting into the spring months—and the price was 99¼ cents. In May, that is when the cattle were out to pasture, 7·7 per cent of the crop was delivered and the price was 89¼ cents. In the month of June, 11·9 per cent of the crop was marketed and the price was 80⅞ cents. In the month of July, we find the biggest marketing of all, 15·4 per cent of the crop was marketed and the price was 77⅞ cents.

Let us look at it from the point of view of all the producers of western Canada, the people who are paying these bills and who would be paying the man who stored his oats on the farm and sold them in the months of May, June and July. Who should pay the shot? Should it be all the producers who should pay those people who hold their oats back and dump them on the summer market, thus cutting the price 20 to 25 cents a bushel, or should it be the farmer who delivers his oats to the pool in July, knowing he was going to bring down the average price to all producers? Should he not instead pay for the privilege of coming into that pool at that late date? I think he should. I think that is a fairly typical illustration of the folly of the argument that grain storage should be paid on the farm to defer delivery of grain that could be marketed.

The position of barley was much the same for last year. I will not give all the figures. About 50 per cent of the barley was delivered in September, October and November. That barley brought from $1.52 to $1.57, the lowest being $1.52. Twenty-four per cent of the barley was marketed in May, June and July, and that barley brought $1.36½, $1.26⅛ and $1.19. Oats and barley were sold, following the practice of the board, as they were delivered. The barley that is delivered in November is sold in November; the barley that is delivered in December is sold in December. If more barley had come forward, more barley would have obtained the prices that were prevailing in those months. The people that held back for their own purposes—and it must have been for their own purposes because it was not necessary—and preferred to market their grain in June and July were the people that cost all the producers of barley in western Canada a substantial reduction in the final payment for that barley.

I think that the first test that I would apply is this. Is it a good thing for all the farmers of western Canada that certain people should hold back their grain when it is possible to deliver it to the elevators? I say that farm storage does not produce a beneficial result.

Let us examine the position with regard to gross inequities. The hon. member for Assiniboia will say that some farmers can deliver their wheat promptly and get paid their initial payment while other farmers are not able to do so. I would remind hon. members that in western Canada we have a quota system. The quota system is not perfect but generally speaking it provides that every producer in western Canada can market a certain proportion of the production of his acreage. Quotas usually start at eight bushels an acre. Therefore every farmer in western Canada can deliver and get paid for eight bushels per acre of wheat.

Where then does the inequity come in? We will say that one man has 20 bushels of wheat per acre, that he can market only eight bushels per acre and that he has to hold back the other 12 bushels. Then there is another man who has only eight bushels of wheat per acre and he is in an area which produces only eight bushels of wheat to the acre. He can market all his wheat under the quota system. It is therefore contended that the man with the big crop is discriminated against. Well, who should be discriminated against? Is it the man with the big crop or the man with the small crop? It seems to me that if there is any equity in the marketing of wheat, that equity is preserved by the quota system and that the fortunate areas—the areas with the big crops—have their good fortune through having big crops and are not entitled to ask all the producers of western Canada, small and large, to pay them additional sums because they have quantities of wheat that cannot immediately be marketed and because certain quantities have to be retained on the farm.

Those are the two tests. I do not know of any others. On the basis of benefit to all the farmers, the farmers who have to pay the bills for farm storage, I say that they tend to lose if farm storage is made compulsory as is proposed in this bill. As to equal opportunity to market grain, I say that opportunity is protected by the quota system. The quota system applies equally everywhere. If it favours farmers in poor-crop areas, I do not call that inequity. I think the man who gets a poor crop and who is located in a poor crop area is entitled to any advantage he may get by being able to deliver all his wheat as it is harvested. In areas where the yield is great and where the producer has a big crop, if he can market his eight bushels an acre along with the rest of western Canada, I say that he is not being penalized by the fact that, out of his surplus, some part has to be carried over until space can be made available in the elevator system.

A point has been made of the fact that the farmer pays storage to the elevators. He pays only that storage which is incidental to getting his wheat, oats or barley to market in the shortest possible time. The grain is not purposely held in country elevators. The country elevator is a marketing point for wheat, where wheat is weighed, graded and loaded into box cars. Good operation provides that storage at country points should be held to a minimum. Of course in the winter months there may be some delay in transportation and storage may be paid in country elevators.

The terminal elevators are in exactly the same position. In order to keep transportation moving in the winter months, it is desirable to have storage where grain can be accumulated for the opening of the navigation season. But there again the purpose of the wheat board is not to put wheat in those elevators in order to collect storage. The purpose is to use those elevators as an instrument for getting the grain to the seaboard as rapidly and as economically as possible. I do not think it is at all comparable to say that because elevators collect storage from the producers who use the elevators, for that reason the producer should be paid for storing wheat, oats or barley on his farm when otherwise that wheat, oats or barley could be delivered and sold by the wheat board at the time when the market is favourable.

For those reasons it seems to me that this bill should not receive support. I have never been able to see a case for payment of storage on the farms except in those years when the market is sluggish and when additional deliveries of grain would only clog the marketing machinery, instead of facilitating the sale of the grain. In periods of that kind the present act permits the government to apply the provisions of farm storage payment by regulation. Those provisions have been applied in the past and they may very well be applied in the future. But I cannot think of anything more harmful to the marketing of grain in western Canada, or more detrimental to the best interests of the producer, than to make mandatory the payment of storage on the farm during every year, regardless of marketing conditions.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in days gone by I have had a great deal of fun in supporting farm legislation; and when good legislation is introduced at the present time I will be just as energetic as anybody else in the house in advocating it, because I believe the farmers need all the help they can get; and no one is in a better position to give them some help in straightening out some of their injustices than is the minister who has just taken his seat. If he will only ask the Canadian bread eaters to pay the proper price for the farmers' wheat, I for one will be much better satisfied than I am at the present time with our contracts.

With regard to this bill, the main thing it asks for is the striking out—from subsection 2 of section 21, I believe—of the words "if directed by regulation". If the wheat board find it advisable or beneficial to the wheat growers, they have all the power under the present act that is asked for in this bill. Personally, I can see arguments for and against this change. I do not see sufficient advantage in passing this legislation to make the change asked for. I can see that a farmer who is financially able can hold back thousands of bushels of his grain and draw storage on the farm for that grain. On the other hand, I can see a number of the little fellows who have perhaps 500 bushels or 1,000 bushels of grain of their own contributing to pay that storage to the man who is in business in a big way. Therefore while this legislation provides benefits in some ways, it will create injustice in other directions.

Since the act as it stands at the present time contains everything that is asked for in this bill, it is not my intention to support the bill. It has been stated by the mover of this bill that the farm organizations, or the western wheat pools, are neutral. In this instance I believe they are right. I could also be neutral and not vote for or against. I realize that when farm organizations, or any other organizations, meet in convention and have a resolution presented to them—it may be presented by somebody who has not thought the matter all the way through, and he may very easily get that convention to vote for something about which they know very little, or to which they have given very little thought—they may pass it without knowing what they are doing. Perhaps that is what happened with regard to some of the organizations that voted for this out west.

I do not feel that anybody will be injured by our not passing this legislation tonight, because, as I have stated already, everything asked for in this legislation is already contained in the wheat board act as it stands at the present time.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this bill also with regard to farm storage. It seems to me that the wrong attitude has been taken with regard to this farm storage. In the first place, the elevator companies take in the grain and get it out to market as fast as they possibly can, in the fall of the year. The farmer does exactly the same thing. He wants to get it to market as fast as he can get it there. The man who is forced to do that is the man who has to sell his grain, the small man, the small farmer who has to sell 500, 600 or 1,000 bushels to pay his debts. He has to sell it at that time.

Let us take the big man, and calculate this on an interest basis. Threshing starts in August. We have August, September, October, November, December, and then January, February and March. Up to February he has six months at 6 cents a bushel for storage. Tell me of any good common-sense farmer who has an amount of grain who would not keep that grain in the granary for 6 cents a bushel for storage? Any rich farmer will keep his right in the granary for 6 cents a bushel for storage. Why should we pass this legislation and allow the rich farmer to receive that gain?

I will agree that the man with 1,000 acres or 2,000 acres down in the southern part of the province of Saskatchewan can afford to do it, but the farmers that I represent certainly cannot afford to do that. They try to get their grain out, and they get it out as fast as they can. Here is another thing that would happen. March and April come along. What would happen is what happens in the fall. Manitoba floods out everything. If we were to have the farm storage proposition we would have that happen in April because all these men down there would naturally keep their grain if they could get that large amount for storage.

Take the situation as it stands today. The minister has told us that he can sell this grain as fast as he can get it. The man in the country who is going to get 6 cents a bushel for storage on his grain is naturally, beyond any shadow of a doubt, going to keep that grain. Why would he keep it? He would keep it because there are two things that he will get out of it. In the first place he is going to be sure that he has a crop. If he does not, he keeps that grain. In the second place, he is going to be well paid for it, and we, the smaller farmers, are going to have to sell our grain in the fall of the year, or during the winter months, and then we are going to have to pay the rich farmer, too. It is all going to have to come out of that amount.

If you are going to sell an article you have to put it in the place where you can sell it. We have not got enough transportation in western Canada to draw even 40 per cent of the crop in the last two months of the year. I am sure that if we had the transportation to do the work, which we have not, in the final analysis, we would bog down because of the large surpluses that would be built up, owing to the amount that was being paid for that storage. The farmers would not think about storage; they would think of the dollars that they were going to get out of it. I am sure that the majority of farmers in the eastern part of the province of Saskatchewan certainly do not want farm storage.

Mr. Sinnott: What about the man who feeds livestock?

Mr. Larson: I have two or three things that I should like to say on this subject, but I should like you to call it nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I shall adjourn the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I call it nine o'clock?

On motion of Mr. Larson the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT

PAYMENT TO ESTATES OF FULL AMOUNT OF POLICY

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Insurance Act so as to provide that in certain cases the estate of the insured may receive the full amount payable under the policy contract.

Mr. Wright: When the house rose at six o'clock I was about to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question with regard to this resolution. I am just wondering whether this resolution means at least what I interpret it to mean. It says:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Insurance Act so as to provide that in certain cases the estate of the insured may receive the full amount payable under the policy contract.

I have had communications from certain veterans who carry this insurance who wish to have it placed to their estate on their death but under the contract as it stands at the present time it must go to the next of kin. In some cases the veterans are desirous that it should go to their estate rather than to the next of kin. I am wondering about this amendment which is being suggested here, which states that under certain circumstances the insurance may be left to the estate.

Cases were placed before the board which indicated how unfair it was when a veteran had to leave his insurance to his next of kin. In one particular case the next of kin were living in Great Britain and had had no interest whatsoever in the veteran or his welfare. In that case the veteran would have preferred to have left his insurance to his estate and then to have disposed of his estate by a will to people who had been friendly to him during his lifetime. I am just wondering whether the minister has explained whether that would be possible under the proposed amendments.

Mr. Lapointe: Before we rose at six o'clock I endeavoured to explain the purpose of this legislation. I believe the cases to which my hon. friend has referred will be taken care of by this amendment. The Veterans Insurance Act provides for certain classes of beneficiaries. When taking out a contract the veteran specifies the beneficiary to whom the policy will be payable in the event of his death. There was a restriction in the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act which was eliminated last year and but for the error which I was explaining at six o'clock a similar section would have been eliminated from this act.

Under this amendment we will now be able to pay the full amount of the policy instead of only the reserve as is the case at the present time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 183, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSION ACT

ADJUSTMENT OF CLOTHING ALLOWANCE IN CERTAIN AMPUTATION CASES, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Pension Act (a) to adjust the allowance for excessive wear and tear of a pensioner's clothing, when he wears a prosthesis, to correspond to the increase in the basic scale of pensions; (b) to make more adequate provision when there are two dependent parents of a deceased member of the forces; and (c) to provide for some administrative changes.

Mr. Brooks: Will the minister explain?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lapointe: I had no intention of saying anything until the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) asked me to explain. The amendments which are contemplated in the bill to follow this resolution will provide for an increase in the allowances paid to veterans for wear and tear on clothing as a result of an amputation or the wearing of prosthetic appliances.

It is also intended to increase the amount payable on behalf of a second dependent parent when there are two dependent parents involved. This award of dependent's pension where there is a second parent is, at present, $15 monthly and will be increased.

The other amendment was suggested last year during the course of a discussion on the bill to amend the Petition of Right Act. I believe it was the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) who questioned the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) on the application of that act as a result of a decision rendered by the exchequer court a short time previously. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that an applicant whose claim is based on accidental injury or death due to negligence of a servant of the crown shall not be placed in a better position than an applicant whose claim is based on disability or death due to enemy action.

To illustrate what I am trying to say: It would not permit anyone drawing a pension under the Pension Act as a result of injury or death of a soldier while on service to also claim against the crown before the courts of this country for damages over and above the pension being received. A similar section was placed in the Government Employees Compensation Act following a judgment that had been rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada, and I believe a similar section is to be found in all provincial workmen's compensation acts.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this resolution. First of all may I thank the minister for the explanation he has made. I am particularly interested in the resolution because it proposes certain amendments to the Pension Act which have not been the result of, shall I say, strong representations or pressure by any organization or group. That indicates to me that these amendments possibly result from the close observation of the officials charged with the administration of the act with respect to omissions in the legislation as a result of the amendments last year and the effects of changing conditions and circumstances. If I am correct, I think that is very much to the credit of those who are administering the Pension Act. I tried to listen carefully to what the minister was saying but the debate on the farm storage of wheat was progressing to my rear. Therefore I could not hear very well and I did not hear all the minister had to say. Fortunately that debate has now been adjourned to the lobby.

The resolution before us is divided into three sections. The first reads as follows:

(a) to adjust the allowance for excessive wear and tear of a pensioner's clothing, when he wears a prosthesis, to correspond to the increase in the basic scale of pensions.

I am sure every member of the house realizes that is good and to the advantage of the pensioners concerned. I am very pleased to see this amendment proposed because I presume that the number of people affected is relatively small, and it is most agreeable to this group to see that even the needs of this relatively small number are being given consideration by this amendment. The second part of the resolution reads as follows:

(b) to make more adequate provision when there are two dependent parents of a deceased member of the forces.

I am not quite clear on what is meant because I did not hear the minister's explanation very well. However, from what I heard I would say that this provision is good as far as it goes. When we are in committee I should like the minister to explain whether this also means that consideration is being given to removing the means test from the compassionate pension under section 35. I understand that is the section concerned in this proposal. I should like the minister to explain that further because when we were amending the act last session I, in association with several other members, brought this matter to the attention of the house. It has been brought to my attention on quite a number of occasions by those who are directly concerned with the administration and effects of section 35 as it now stands. I hope that when consideration is being given to this amendment the minister will be persuaded to amend the act further so as to remove that means test. The third part of the resolution reads as follows:

(c) to provide for some administrative changes.

There again I did not hear clearly what the minister had to say. That was not his fault, but did he inform the house of all the administrative changes proposed when he was speaking?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: I must say that, although this resolution covers a rather limited scope, it is of great importance to at least a small number of people, and I am very pleased to see the government proposing these amendments to the Canadian Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Brooks: I want to ask the minister one question. Clause (a) of the resolution refers to adjusting the allowance for excessive wear and tear of a pensioner's clothing so as to correspond to the increase in the basic scale of pensions. The purpose of clause (b) is to make more adequate provision when there are two dependent parents of a deceased member of the forces. I should like to ask the minister why there is not an increase when there is only one dependent parent of a deceased member of the forces. Why should it only apply when there are two? Subsection (a) speaks about an increase in the basic scale. Why should there not be an increase for one dependent as well as for two to correspond with the increase in the basic scale?

Mr. Lapointe: As my hon. friend knows, in the case of pensions paid to dependent parents there is what I might call a means test. My hon. friend is aware of that. They are not pensions that are paid as of right like the pension paid to the disability pensioner or a widow. I believe there is a ceiling in the act, and consideration must be given to the circumstances of the dependent parent within that ceiling. There also was a ceiling in the case of two dependent parents. The amount was limited, and we are intending to amend the act to increase the amount in respect of the second parent.

Mr. Brooks: I do not understand yet why it is not intended to increase it for the first.

Mr. Mutch: There is power under the legislation as amended a year ago to deal with one dependent parent but there was a fixed ceiling in the legislation which placed a limit on the total amount payable to the two of them when there was a second parent, and the proposal is to increase that joint sum.

Mr. Knowles: The ceiling?

Mr. Mutch: The sum of the two. Under this proposal it can be higher than it was possible for it to be before.

Mr. Knowles: Is the ceiling being raised when two are involved?

Mr. Lapointe: That is right.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 184, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 25, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, when this debate was adjourned last Friday evening I was about to deal with family allowances and old age security. Since that time we have had a debate on the Family Allowances Act, during which much useful information was disclosed. However, the fact remains that the payments made under that act today are not what they were when it was enacted in 1944. They do not have the same purchasing power; instead of being the payments they were, they are considerably reduced. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) discussed this subject very thoroughly, and I admired his courage and the way he put forth his views. He praised the Liberal party for bringing in family allowances, and said it was the first party in this country to think of them. I suggest that the Social Credit party in Alberta was the first party to suggest that dividends be paid to the people of this country, and without a means test.

Mr. Byrne: But you never paid them.

Mr. Wylie: It is true that the Liberal government has come a long way toward meeting our requirements. It is also true that we do not agree with the way they collect the money with which to pay these allowances. The fact is that the Social Credit party of Alberta was the first party in Canada to suggest a dividend.

Mr. Byrne: They suggested it, but they never paid it.

Mr. Wylie: I will handle you in a minute. I agree that any time we add to the purchasing power of the common people we are doing something good. If in 1930 or even 1937 or 1938 we had suggested that $322,150,000 be distributed, you know what would have happened. They would have said that was inflation; that we would be giving the people something for nothing, and we would ruin everyone. If that money had been distributed in those bad years—

Mr. Byrne: Where were you going to get it in those years?

Mr. Wylie: The same place we would get it today. If that had been done we would not have had the suffering we saw in many parts of this country. Perhaps the hon. member who is interrupting me did not go through that. I doubt if he did. He looks very well fed, and I imagine he was well fed in the thirties, from the way he talks. When we did suggest the distribution of a dividend in 1933 and 1934 and up to 1937, they said it could not be done, that we would have inflation. Well, I would sooner have inflation any time than deflation. When we have inflation, within limits, people have money; but in those tough years when we had deflation no one had any money. The trouble was that we produced so much everyone had to starve. I remember that I was employed by the Alberta government as an agricultural field man on relief work. The dominion government shipped in carloads of cheese, beans, creosoted fish and everything else to be distributed by the mounted police among the recipients of relief. At the same time people running stores in those towns and villages were going broke because they had too much of those goods on hand and could not sell them. Is that the way you want to live? I don't. I saw what happened, and we do not want that to happen again.

Mr. Byrne: It won't, under a Liberal government.

Mr. Wylie: Under a Liberal government? Surely you do not want me to start in on the Liberal government. If you do I can do it, and I can tell you plenty. Talk about the poor prices being paid for cattle today. Think what the Liberal government did back in 1937 and 1938, when they bought our cattle for a cent a pound. Don't ask me about the record of the Liberal government in the purchase of cattle. I had no intention of getting into this, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member asked for it and I gave it to him.

In connection with old age security, together with the other members of this group I was very happy to see the means test removed at the age of 70. One thing we did disagree with was the amount paid. Today Liberal members get up and praise the Liberal government for removing the means test. That was done by unanimous consent of the house. Having had eight years of experience in handling old age pensions over a very large area, I knew what conditions were, and I was glad to see the means test abolished. It enabled some people to receive the benefits who otherwise would have been disqualified. But the dominion government has done one thing by paying only $40 per month. It has forced every provincial government to use a means test in connection with any supplementary pensions. I know that is the case in Alberta, where we pay one of the highest pensions in Canada to our aged citizens. We pay $10 a month plus all medical and health benefits, but that comes under the means test. We render the same assistance to the people from 65 to 69. Not only that, but in Alberta we pay a pension of $40 per month to widows who are between 60 and 65. What other province pays a pension to widows? Certainly the federal government does not but the government of Alberta does.

Mr. Byrne: How many widows?

Mr. Wylie: I am sure that if you lived in Alberta there would be another widow.

Mr. Speaker, those are the facts, and that is what Alberta is doing; but we are forced to do it under a means test. I am sure that Saskatchewan and British Columbia use the means test on their supplementary payments. Perhaps Ontario does, too.

Mr. Hellyer: Ontario does not have a supplementary payment.

Mr. Wylie: The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Hellyer) says that they do not have a supplementary payment in Ontario. In other words, the old age pensioner must get along on the $40 per month. I am sure there are plenty of Conservatives from Ontario here who could correct that statement if it were wrong. In Alberta, we do have a supplementary payment, because that province is one of the top provinces so far as provision for old age security is concerned.

The other evening I listened to a very interesting speech delivered by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver). It was a very enlightening speech. He showed us what could be done in that northern part of Manitoba, and what can be done in northern Manitoba can be done in Saskatchewan and Alberta. Those areas hold untold wealth. We know there are many thousands of acres of agricultural land and thousands of acres of minerals that have not yet been explored. While I listened to the hon. member I could not help but think about the southern and central part of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and the development that we could have in those areas. I am going to speak about Alberta, because I know more about that province than any other.

In Alberta we have three large irrigation schemes that are being developed. There is the St. Mary's-Milk river, the Bow river project and the Red Deer river diversion. If those three projects were fully developed, and we hope they will be in the very near future, they would bring into the irrigation area close to 900,000 acres with a potential for the establishment of perhaps 10,000 or 11,000 farms. This area is well served by railroads, highways and other services which must be taken into consideration in developing communities. In the southeastern part of Alberta we consider every year a dry year. Last year was an exception, and we had an abundance of rain. As a matter of fact, we had so much rain we could not get our crops harvested, which is very unusual for that area. However, over the years the people of the drought area expect every year to be a dry year. This year the area is starting with an abundance of subsoil moisture. As a matter of fact, there is from four to five feet of subsoil moisture which is more than we have had for thirty years. It does not mean that we are going to have a crop. The southern portion of the province is subject to these Chinook winds which will dry up a crop in about five days. As a matter of fact I have seen a crop standing four feet high, and within one week it has been wilted to such an extent that you could see the rows in which it was seeded right across the field. It is for that reason we need these three irrigation projects, and that is why we must continue to work in spite of the floods we had this year.

I might say that Medicine Hat experienced this year one of the worst floods it has had since 1918. A thousand people had to leave their homes. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not here, but it does seem to me that the P.F.R.A. should use its power to establish dams in that area so that the water could be stored. One of the main causes of the flood at Medicine Hat was the dam on Seven Persons creek. While the dam did not go out the spillway did, and the results are the same.

What happened with regard to the Ross creek project? P.F.R.A. administration had all the supplies in there in order to put in head gates on the canal and to divert the creek into the canal, but they were moved away before the diversion was completed two years ago. The result was that a year ago this spring the main highway leading south to an important farming district was flooded to a depth of several feet of water. The farmer's yard where the diversion is located was washed out to a width of about 20 feet, with water to a depth of 14 feet. This year the P.F.R.A. administration had to repair that damage. It has cost them thousands and thousands of dollars to do what they should have done in the first place, namely, to put in proper head gates in the canal. At the present time the head gates are not in the canal. This means that our reservoir is not full because we could not turn the water in.

In this house we talk about saving money in the estimates. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) mentioned many ways in which this could be done. I mention this one tonight. When we have the goods on the job, let us use them and finish it. But they were moved away. I would not venture to say that they were playing politics by moving them away but I believe that is exactly what happened.

Mr. Byrne: Did you ask them?

Mr. Wylie: I did. That is what happened. The job was not completed. The storage of water in southeastern Alberta is extremely important to that area.

Another matter that must be looked into is another storage dam on the Bow river. That is of great importance. The farmers of the eastern irrigation district are worried lest they will not have enough water when a dry year comes along. They have a right to be worried, because when we put another 400,000 acres under water on the Bow river development project it is certainly going to require all the water that we can store. There is only one solution, namely, to build another dam on the Bow river. The more we do in that line, the more we are going to save for the people of Canada.

We want more people out west. Certainly we do. There is only one way in which we are going to get them and that is by developing our natural resources. Alberta is today doing a good job in developing her natural resources. I do not have to tell hon. members that, because they all know it. But we must have more development in the way of irrigation and we must have more people to settle on the land. In that way they will be producing something that will be of benefit to Canada.

We as members of parliament must have not only a provincial but a national outlook. Too many Canadians today do not believe that anything which benefits one part of Canada benefits the remainder, but it does. Let us work together so that we can develop this country from one end to the other.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should first of all like to refer to a statement made by my colleague the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). As reported of page 1474 of Hansard he stated:

. . . there is not much satisfaction to many of our taxpayers to hear these millions and billions bandied about—they do not live in a world of millions and billions; they live in a world of fives and tens, and less than that. It is the ordinary taxpayer that I am interested in, and it is the ordinary taxpayer that this house exists to protect.

I think there is a great deal of food for thought in that statement made by the hon. member for Greenwood. I believe that important fact is all too often overlooked in this chamber.

This has been a huge budget, one of approximately $4·5 billion, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) left with us to discuss and to debate in this chamber while he departed to the south for some days. We have been rather accustomed to the phraseology of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to the effect that we might save a million dollars, but what is a million nowadays? I am afraid that has become rather the mental attitude of the government of the day in taxing the people and in the expenditure of our money.

A great deal of this budget is for national defence. Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to an editorial in the Globe and Mail of April 26. It is headed "$18,000 Per Man" and reads as follows:

If money is the sinews of war, Canada's armed forces should be the most formidable the world has ever seen. They are certainly the most expensive the world has even seen. Never before in history has a nation's armed forces cost it more than $18,000 per man. Even today, no nation comes close to that figure—including the United States, which is supposed to be the most extravagant in its military spending.

It is a matter of simple mathematics. Canada's defence budget, exclusive of foreign aid, is $1·7 billion. Our armed forces number 94,000. This is just over $18,000 per man. The U.S. defence budget, exclusive of foreign aid, is $51 billion. Its armed forces number 3·5 million. This is just under $15,000 per man.

How about Britain? During the present fiscal year, that country will spend $3·9 billion on defence. She has 850,000 men under arms. Thus, her cost per man is just over $4,500. Australia's defence budget this year is $300 million. With forces of 50,000, her cost per man comes to $6,000. Belgium's forces total 140,000, with a defence budget of $460 million; slightly over $3,000 per man.

It is true, of course, that the emphasis in Canada's defence program is on the air force—most expensive of all services. Our cost there runs around $25,000 per man. But Britain seems to manage it on slightly under $5,000 per man. As for the army, Britain gets 440,000 men for her $1·4 billion—slightly less than $3,500 per man. Canada gets 48,000 men for her $532 million—slightly more than $11,000 per man.

It is also true that Canada labours under the handicap of her relatively small population; and hence her relatively small armed services. A nation numbering its troops in the thousands will naturally have a higher per-man cost than one which numbers them in the millions; which has the advantage, so to speak, of mass production.

But the fact remains that our per-man cost is markedly higher than the American; three times as high as the Australian; four times as high as the British; nearly six times as high as the Belgian.

This newspaper does not argue that a per-man cost of $18,000 is unjustified. It can be justified—but only in one way. We are only justified in having the most expensive troops in the world if they are best-trained, the best-equipped in the world. We are only justified in paying the top price if we get the top return from it. Are we, in fact, getting the top return? Are we getting our $18,000 worth?

The fact is that we are not. We have none of the tanks which make the British divisions the hardest hitting force in western Europe today. The best we could put into western Europe, or into Korea, was infantry—well-trained, and efficient, but not expensive. The story of our air force does not need repeating. Whatever may be the deficiencies of the British, the Americans, even the Belgians, they are ahead of us. These being the facts, what has been done with our money?

That is very indicative of the thoughts of many of the taxpayers of Canada today.

It has been pointed out also by the hon. member for Greenwood in his discussion of the defence department that there was an item of some $4,890,000 for telephones, telegrams and communication services in a year. That seems out of all proportion. There are huge sums spent on government travelling and removal expenses, and many millions are spent on the publication of departmental reports and general publicity in that way.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) spoke to the house, and is reported at page 1530 of Hansard as having said:

Where, in the world today, is there any country whatsoever with a sounder economic position, a better fiscal policy, better development, or a higher level of employment than this country of Canada under the present Liberal administration?

He implied that everybody should be very happy in this country. Well, Mr. Speaker, I, like many other people, for many months past, have been very worried and concerned about the general plight of agriculture from coast to coast in this country of ours. I can tell you that many of these farm people are greatly worried, and in my opinion have reason to be so worried. In many cases the beef producers are without a market, and with the announced floor of from 7 cents to 10 cents a pound below the market of some few months previous many people are now out the value of feed and labour during the winter months, along with a further loss of cattle values.

This has been a very serious business in respect to them. They have been greatly aggravated by the disastrous outbreak of foot-and-month disease. I am sorry to hear of the recently announced outbreak in various other areas. It is certainly playing havoc with the beef industry of this country and with our general economic situation.

The Winnipeg Tribune of April 23 carried the following:

> City packing house executives state that they cannot take the financial risk of paying floor prices for cattle, when Ottawa gives them no guarantee against loss.

This was written some days following the announcement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that these floor prices were now in operation throughout this country. I can tell you that there were several very unsatisfactory days in the St. Boniface stockyards adjoining Winnipeg.

There was a floor price of $22.80 per hundredweight announced for good steers, and a floor price of $24.50 for grade A hogs. But the price being paid in Winnipeg yards for heavy hogs and sows has been approximately 14 cents. That is a very great difference, and it is creating great hardship for those producers in the matter of marketing their hogs.

The cattle market has been at a stalemate for several days, with no sale whatever for certain grades of cattle. We had the plight of the poultry producer, and an unsatisfactory price for eggs. The plight of the dairy producer, and especially that of the cheese producer, with no market for their products, has been referred to. If there is a floor provided for hogs, for poultry and for other products, the cheese producers of this country are every bit as much entitled to a floor price during these very difficult times.

It has been pointed out in this debate that Canada's farm population of some 450,000 are dependent on receipts from the dairy industry as a source of income. It contributes more than $600 million to our national commerce. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), a large area of Canada is peculiarly suited to this form of farming, and it requires years of labour to build up a good dairy herd. The present situation in the dairy industry constitutes a national emergency. The outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease that I have referred to has resulted in the loss of the United States of America market for dairy cattle, as well as for beef. The traditional United Kingdom market for cheese is lost, and there is a quota imposed by the United States of America against Canadian cheese.

The government have announced the policy of support prices for certain agricultural products which, as I stated, is also applied to the cheese producers. The apple producers of this country are facing loss of markets. Then we have the western wheat producer who has subsidized the consumers of Canada and of the United Kingdom by several hundreds of millions of dollars during past years, and they are still continuing to do so.

There is the matter of the international wheat agreement and the policies of this government which have been responsible for this. While we have been urging the government for some years that the domestic price of wheat should be different from that prevailing under the international wheat agreement, nothing has been done. Again I want to appeal to the responsible minister and to the government that there should be a different price for the domestic wheat of this country.

On April 16 at North Portal, North Dakota, the American farmer was receiving $2.09 a bushel for his wheat, while across the street at North Portal, Saskatchewan, the Canadian farmer received $1.43½ per bushel for a like grade of wheat. In the United States of America the federal treasury subsidizes the farmer for the prevailing difference in the market price and the price under the international wheat agreement. According to the Searle Grain Company research department, this will cost the United States of America taxpayers around $600 million during the term of this international wheat agreement. While we have lost many of our best agricultural products, the price of our products is rapidly decreasing, the cost of production is still increasing. The cost of farm machinery increased during the year 1951 by over 14 per cent, and further increases are expected. Farm wages are at an all-time high, and still rising.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Catherwood) pointed out the fact that we at one time enjoyed a splendid market for many of our agricultural products in Britain. In 1938 we supplied 27·5 per cent of the total British imports of barley. This market is now entirely lost to Russia. In 1938 we supplied 93·9 per cent of the total British imports of oats, and this market is lost. In 1945 we supplied 43 per cent of the total British imports of beef. This market is lost to the Argentine. In 1945 we supplied 83 per cent of the total British imports of bacon. This market is lost to a very great degree. In 1945 we supplied 31 per cent of the total British imports of cheese. There has been a great loss of this market. In 1947 we supplied 18 per cent of the total British imports of poultry. We have lost this market chiefly to iron curtain countries such as Poland and Hungary. In 1948 we supplied 79 per cent of the total British imports of eggs. That market is completely lost.

These figures indicate, Mr. Speaker, that we are facing the most serious financial and trade crises in our history, and it is a dark picture for Canadian agriculturists during these times. With Canada being the only dollar member of the commonwealth our markets have been practically erased. This party has asked the government to initiate a trade and economic conference of members of the commonwealth, but up to the present that request has been refused. It is most important that to some degree Canada should regain its traditional markets for primary products. Our loss of markets has brought about a situation that strikes at the very roots of the agricultural economy of Canada.

As already set forth by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), Canada is short of tanks and planes. The British Centurion tank is considered one of the best of its type in the world and it sells for much less than other types. The British Canberra bomber is so good that the United States are making it for themselves. Our armed forces are very ill-equipped and if Canada for the time being were to buy Centurions and Canberras in some quantity the British would have dollars with which to buy Canadian agricultural products.

I urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who is also the Minister of Defence Production, to do something about this. I think the minister should be able to work out some scheme which would be beneficial both to the armed forces of this nation and the agricultural producers of Canada. I trust the government will endeavour to take some action such as this.

Before closing I should like to make some reference to this dreaded foot-and-mouth disease. I was surprised at what took place in this chamber yesterday with respect to a motion that had been passed previously by the house. I know the matter is to be discussed by the standing committee on agriculture, but that committee has not yet been convened. While I am anxious to get to the bottom of the cause of the great delay in taking action once the disease was first discovered I want to make it clear that I do not want to be responsible for keeping these veterinary officials away from that area in Saskatchewan while the matter has not yet been cleared up. The committee is to be convened tomorrow to investigate this serious matter. I think this is one of the most serious things that have struck this nation in its entire history. We cannot begin to predict its effect upon our economy. While it has been decided to place the matter before the agriculture committee I think we should be most careful to see that the services of these officials are used to the best advantage in trying to stamp out this disease.

When the minister made his announcement that the disease was under control I sincerely hoped that he was right, but I along with others said that we must keep our fingers crossed until the first few weeks of spring had passed. The new outbreak has occurred during the last few days and I sincerely hope that this will be checked as soon as possible.

I should like to have the minister point out in more detail how the floor price on beef is to operate. I have before me the last copy of the Manitoba Co-Operator which contains an article headed "Who Benefits?" and which reads:

> In the March 27 issue of the Manitoba Co-operator an editorial appeared, entitled "Ten Provinces—Eleven Problems." A suggestion was made that it was imperative in the interests of the livestock industry of Canada to remove all provincial embargoes and turn the problem of dealing with the foot-and-mouth disease entirely over to the federal government, whose sole responsibility it was in the first place.
> Livestock markets in western Canada are still chaotic and will no doubt remain so until all interprovincial embargoes are removed. With the United States market closed and with our present level of livestock production in Canada, it is unlikely that the domestic market will absorb all that is offered for sale in the next few months, unless the retail price drops to a corresponding level of that for live cattle.
> It is interesting to note that one large retail outlet in the city of Winnipeg quoted blade rib roast of beef at 63 cents per pound on February 25, the day that the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease was announced. On April 17, the same cut of beef was advertised at 62 cents per pound. In spite of this, cattle have dropped nearly five cents per pound in that time. The question farmers would like answered is, why have not retail prices been reduced more than one cent per pound?
> The recent announcement from Ottawa that a support price for cattle has been established at 25 cents per pound basis Toronto for good steers (dressing 53 per cent defatted or 55½ per cent fat in), has been met with criticism from farmers. In order to determine the dressing percentage cattle must go to packing plants for slaughter prior to establishing the price. This means that carcass grading for cattle has been foisted on the unsuspecting farmers much as carcass grading for hogs caught them unawares a number of years ago.
> The support price applies to four classes of cattle —choice, good and medium steers and heifers, and choice cows. At the time of going to press, no announcement has been made as to the price differentials at the St. Boniface market.
> As far as can be determined, the support price does not necessarily mean that cattle will be bought at that price. In our opinion, it actually means that the federal government guarantees to buy any surplus stocks of beef from packing plants at the equivalent of that price. At present prices for cattle at St. Boniface are three cents below the support price.
> In view of the fact that the producer is being blamed for the high cost of living, what the farmer would like to know is who is getting the difference? The consumer is paying nearly the same price for beef, while the farmer is getting five cents per pound less than he was two months ago, and has little or no guarantee that the price may not go lower.

Can it be that the meat trade has outwitted the government officials, by absorbing the differentials?

This is a most serious situation and I hope the Minister of Agriculture will give more details to the house and to the producers of this country of the operation of the floor price on beef. There has been great dissatisfaction with respect to this as well as with respect to the floor price on hogs. In many instances the prices are not going through to the producers of cattle and hogs. I trust that steps will be taken to clear up the situation as soon as possible.

I make a final appeal to the government to try to work out a scheme to try to hold stable markets for our agricultural products. I have suggested a scheme whereby most useful equipment for our armed forces could be exchanged for primary products.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I am taking advantage of the latitude permitted on the budget debate to make a few remarks concerning housing. I have spoken on housing before in the house, but the present situation warrants immediate attention. This is a very broad subject and tonight I propose to deal with only one aspect of it.

It has been said by this government that housing is considered second only in importance to our defence program and proof of this is contained in the several amendments made from time to time to the National Housing Act.

These amendments were designed to keep our house-building program geared to the maximum that was in keeping with the materials available. There has been criticism of course, but most realize that our defence production program did make heavy demands on men and materials during 1951. However, I think most will agree that the house-building section of the construction industry was not working at maximum capacity toward the end of 1951 or during this past winter. Yet despite this availability of tradesmen and material, there has been a substantial falling off in the construction of new homes.

Why then, with an improving material and manpower situation, are we not getting more houses built? It is not because people do not want them or need them. Nor is it because people cannot afford them. A house can be built today under N.H.A. with a 20 per cent down payment. At this point I might say it has been suggested that the down payment be reduced to 10 per cent. With this I am in accord. However, before this can be done we must rectify the situation which is bogging down our house-building program under the present 20 per cent down payment plan. How can we hope to build more homes with a 10 per cent down payment at this time when we are not building them now with a 20 per cent down payment? Why then, with material and labour available, and with thousands of people anxious to build, is house building under N.H.A. slowly grinding to a halt?

It is because of the reluctance of the insurance companies or, if you prefer, "the approved lending institutions", to make loans under the National Housing Act, and this despite the fact that they can earn 5½ per cent and despite the fact that the government through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in effect underwrites their losses. I say it is because they are able to place their funds in shorter term mortgages at higher rates of interest. There are those who believe it is quite in order that the lending institutions should place their money, or perhaps I should say their policyholders' money, with the highest bidder or, in other words, extract all that the traffic will bear. To this I take exception. I believe these companies, which after all are only custodians of their policyholders' money, have a responsibility in this matter which so directly affects the welfare of our people. I do not believe these companies should take advantage of our present buoyant economy and discontinue lending under the National Housing Act simply because they are able at the moment to make loans to private home builders up to only 50 per cent of the value and on shorter terms.

It has been suggested that the interest rate be further increased. With this I do not agree. It would only have the effect of increasing the over-all cost of the home. I believe these companies should at least set aside a portion of their available funds for lending under the National Housing Act, and thereby make their contribution toward building a better nation just as every other decent citizen is contributing something at the present time. Such a program would, I am sure, have the support of their policyholders.

I raise this matter because I believe it is tremendously important and urgent now to the country as a whole, and I raise it especially because it affects my own area. I believe these insurance companies or lending institutions are giving northern Ontario a raw deal. Since the last amendments permitting a lower down payment were passed by parliament in October, 1951, only four loans have been made in northern Ontario. There were none in November, 1951, one in December, none in January, one in February and two in March. Of these four loans, one was in Sudbury, one in North Bay, one in Kapuskasing and one in Sault Ste. Marie. Imagine only four loans in all northern Ontario in the past five months! This is despite the fact that they wrote millions of dollars' worth of insurance in every city, town and hamlet throughout northern Ontario.

This brings me to another aspect of the situation, namely, that all these millions are being drained out of northern Ontario and invested in certain selected areas of southern Ontario. Our own money is being used to build up better housing in southern areas to compete further with our northern Ontario centres. I am also informed that these companies are pursuing a policy of lending only to select risks in certain areas of these southern centres. In other words, they are just skimming off the cream.

It has been further suggested to me that these companies are permitted to use their own discretion as to where housing is needed and as a result are lending only in certain areas. I should like the minister to clear up this point. Surely such a policy cannot be condoned by the government when we need a program that will build homes in every community across the nation. I would urge the government to call a conference immediately with these lending institutions through the appropriate channels, get this phase of building under the National Housing Act under way again, and insist that the companies earmark a reasonable portion of their available funds for this purpose.

I would further urge that if this co-operation is not forthcoming the government should then change its policy and should expand the facilities under section 31A which permits direct loans. I admit that I do not favour the federal government becoming a large-scale landlord, but I feel the present situation demands immediate attention. I believe, if the government points out to the lending institutions their responsibility at this time, together with the suggestion that the government is prepared, if necessary, to enter this field itself, that then and only then will our housing program be resumed, and then and only then can the minister say, as he has said on previous occasions, that the lending institutions are playing their traditional role in this field. By such action as I have suggested we can make sure that all our people have the opportunity, if they so desire, to build under this plan.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland), and I have no hesitation in saying that what he said was certainly factual and, unfortunately, only too true. I agree entirely with the earlier part of his speech. I think the only part I disagreed with was when he said so much of the money these insurance companies were draining out of northern Ontario was coming into southern Ontario. I can tell him that we have the same complaint in western Ontario as the hon. member so ably described in the few short minutes he took up tonight discussing this very important subject.

I have for a number of years concerned myself with the question of federal taxation and its relationship to crown corporations and municipalities in this country. I am glad that the government has gone part way, at least, in recognizing the seriousness of this situation growing up within our economy, and that today we have the Abbott or government formula as laid down for crown companies, which is quite satisfactory. I am also glad that the government has taken the step it has in the way of grants in aid to municipalities, where federal property constitutes 4 per cent or more of total assessments. Beneficial and all, however, as this change may be, no one, I am sure, agrees that the problem has been satisfactorily met.

Twelve years ago in this country the federal government took 49 cents of every tax dollar, leaving 51 cents to the provinces and the municipalities. Today, the federal government absorbs 73 cents out of every tax dollar, and the remaining 27 cents leaves the municipalities and the provinces to get along as best they can. While this whole question of federal, provincial and municipal taxation warrants considerably greater study than has yet been afforded this problem in view of its gravity, the immediate question is what can and should be done to assist financially pressed municipalities, and we find those from coast to coast.

The present tempo of development and industrial expansion in this country has created for many municipalities problems with which they are unable to cope. Increased demands for educational costs, services for housing and numerous other requirements are today bringing the burden of municipal taxation to the point where that long-cherished hope of owning your own home is being questioned.

The present policy of the government of grants in aid to municipalities is reserved to those areas where federal property exceeds 4 per cent of the total assessment. In my opinion, all federal property should be subject to regular municipal taxation, and I urge the government to give consideration to this problem at the earliest opportunity.

I listened with interest to the Minister of Finance when he presented his budget in this house on April 8 last, and I was impressed with the marked similarity between this budget and the one presented in the pre-election year 1948. I have since re-read the minister's budget presentation of 1948 and also his presentation in the pre-election budget of 1949. In the pre-election budget of 1949, when the minister announced sweeping tax reductions right across the board, he had this to say at page 1795 of Hansard:

. . . I feel the time has now arrived when this parliament should enact some further substantial reductions in taxes. The increasing flow of goods available for sale to consumers without higher prices makes tax reductions economically feasible. The prospective surplus of revenue over expenditures, in the absence of tax changes, and even of a substantial cash surplus over our requirements for income and investments make tax reductions financially feasible. The reduction of more than $1,600 million in our net debt made in the last three years has put us in a position now where we may prudently give consideration to further tax reductions. Finally, sir, I should say, that I have been led to believe in recent months, as no doubt other hon. members have, that most of the Canadian people would support and even welcome an enlarged measure of tax reductions this year.

Those were the minister's words. Compare the situation then with the situation now. Economically feasible then, because of the increasing flow of goods available to consumers, but not economically feasible today when goods are not only available but in many industries are piled up in inventories, causing widespread unemployment. Financially feasible then, because revenues exceed expenditures. That situation is just as true today when we have before this house estimated expenditures which the minister himself admits exceed what the government expects to spend.

In this regard, I do not think the Minister of Finance, any more than the Minister of National Defence, can do more than say "We think this vote adequate for what we may require." The record of the past few years has conclusively proven that defence expenditures have been overestimated. This, combined with continuing high revenues exceeding estimates, has resulted in surpluses far exceeding estimates given to this house. Reductions prudent then, because since the war we had reduced the public debt by $1,600 million. Surely this reason is just as valid today, when we have reduced the public debt by $2,344 million, as it was in 1949.

The fourth reason given by the minister at that time was that the Canadian people would support and even welcome an enlarged measure of tax reduction. On April 8, when the budget was presented to this house at page 1260 of Hansard, Minister of Finance told us that—

Unless conditions at home exceed my generous expectations, and unless the clouds that overhang the international scene lift more rapidly than we now have a right to expect, my hope for next year is the same as that expressed a year ago, an expectation of no increase in tax rates, but not much likelihood of substantially lower rates.

A week later however, speaking to the voters of this country in a "Nation's Business" broadcast over the C.B.C. national network, the minister had an entirely different story, when he said—

I hope that before too long the international situation will make it possible to make some bigger tax reductions than we have been able to make this year.

Just what happened in the international scene during that week that warranted this change of assurance to the Canadian voter has never yet been explained by the Minister of Finance. This similarity of factors and apparent predication of reasoning to suit the circumstances leads me to believe that if there ever was a time when estimates should be gone over with a fine toothed comb, it is this year. I hope the government will see fit to afford parliament the opportunity to do this, instead of the usual practice of voting millions a minute in the dying days of parliament.

I want to discuss another matter, Mr. Speaker, the gravity of which is increasing year by year, and which constitutes a problem which I think warrants top-level consideration by the federal governments of this country and the United States. I refer specifically to the increasing damage as a result of high water levels in the great lakes system, and the inadequate action taken by responsible governments to meet this situation. Personally I am in favour of the St. Lawrence waterway development, but I am not carried away with the idea that this will be accomplished at an early date, or even undertaken within the next year or so. In the meantime, and as part of any St. Lawrence waterway development consideration must be given to the disastrous effect of rising water levels in the great lakes system.

I do not intend on this occasion to reiterate the extensive damage that already has been caused, other than to point out that in my own constituency valuable lake shore property has been damaged severely and it has been necessary to move and rebuild a lake shore road on three different occasions within the last twenty odd years, always in the expectation that this action would be adequate, only to find that the problem was becoming worse. Press reports would indicate damage in the millions in various other parts of the province of Ontario, and I think this government is well aware of the serious damage already done.

The suggestions I propose to make to this house today have been considered in line with the possibility of the eventual St. Lawrence waterway development and would, in my opinion, fit into such a scheme.

The great lakes, having a surface area of over 95,000 square miles and a drainage basin of approximately 298,000 square miles, are the headwaters of the St. Lawrence river system. In comparison with other large river systems, the vast storage capacity of these lakes causes an unusual stability in the system, reducing fluctuations in level and eliminating floods in the main river, and makes possible some sound measure of control over lake levels. But I agree that any plan to accomplish this purpose must be long range, and any overall plan would require some years to be fully effective.

An examination of the United States lake survey record of monthly mean stages of the great lakes, which extends back over a continuous period of 91 years, reveals that the extreme range in stage experienced by any of the lakes during this period is 6·33 feet, and that occurred in lakes Michigan-Huron. The range experienced by the other lakes during the same period is 4·07 feet in lake Superior, 5·08 feet in lake Erie and 6·29 feet in lake Ontario.

With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I would like to place on record a graph of water levels on the great lakes, prepared by the corps of U.S. army engineers, and recording the fluctuations in water levels over a period of 91 years, up to and including 1951. I believe this graph material would be of immeasurable value to members of this House of Commons who, like myself, are concerned with this problem.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to have this graph appear in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed*.

Mr. Murphy: There are a number of factors, both natural and man-made, that cause the levels of these lakes to fluctuate, and I propose to deal with some measures which I am reliably informed would be very effective in reducing lake levels and controlling lake levels. A little later I intend to deal with—

1. The water coming into lake Superior.
2. Control of lake Superior water coming into the lower lakes.
3. The Chicago diversion.
4. The Welland canal.
5. The Trent canal.
6. The deepening of the Welland canal, if feasible, or an additional by-pass.
7. Blasting of the rocks at Galop, with a control system at Iroquois.

If the supply to the system and all the factors which affect it were uniform and forever constant, the lake levels would not change. However, this ideal condition is not the case. The weather, which produces the supply, is very changeable. Precipitation irregularities in the various lake basins are the primary cause of the variations in the lake levels, and I realize that the relation between precipitation and lake levels is a complex one which has not been fully determined. The lakes reach minimum stages in the winter. During the spring, when the precipitation which has been accumulated on land areas during the winter is released, the levels rise and reach maximum stages usually in the summer. This spring we have unusually high water, and I understand that lake Huron will be approximately a foot higher by July.

The record shows that these levels fluctuate from year to year, as is apparent from this 91-year graph. These fluctuations are due to periodic changes in the precipitation quantity and distribution, but the relationship is not a direct one but is modified by several factors. Precipitation during the summer has but little effect upon lake stages, a large percentage being lost by transpiration from growing vegetation, and I must say here that in conjunction with any proposed plan, reforestation should be a major project. It would not only help in conserving moisture, but on its own, would become a valuable asset to the country. The spring and fall rains have the greatest effect upon the levels, and I am informed a succession of years of excess precipitation is necessary to cause high lake levels, and for that reason engineering projects to lower lake levels are sound. I agree that it is impossible to predict lake levels more than one month in advance.

There are several factors which affect the levels of the great lakes. I mentioned changes that could be due to the projects of man, such as diversions of water into and from the great lakes basin, and changes in the outflow, which could be obtained by navigation channel improvements. I have in mind the blasting of a channel at Galop, with a control system at Iroquois, and I am told that the level of lake Ontario could be lowered some three or four feet and maintained at or near that level.

We in Ontario are also concerned about the levels in lakes Huron, St. Clair and Erie, and we appreciate that much of this water must come into lake Ontario, but as I said a moment ago, the level of lake Ontario could be lowered as part and parcel of the St. Lawrence seaway scheme.

In Canada there are two separate diversions of water into lake Superior from the Hudson bay drainage basin. We have the Long Lac project, which began in 1937. In 1941, the development of power began in this project, and according to the records, through 1950 the average diversion was approximately 1400 cubic feet per second. The other diversion is the Ogoki project, which began in 1943, and the record for 1950 indicates an average of 3600 cubic feet per second.

These two diversions add 5000 cubic feet per second to the supply of lake Superior. I now submit that the locks from lake Superior could be used to control the flow into lake Huron, permitting increased flow at periods of low water level.

The effect of these two diversions has been to increase the stages of lake Erie and lake Ontario by about 3 inches, and the stages of lake Michigan and Huron by about 4½ inches. I now go to the Chicago drainage scheme. At Chicago water is diverted from lake Michigan into the Illinois water shed, which is part of the Mississippi river drainage basin. In 1900, the sanitary district of Chicago started diverting water from lake Michigan at the rate of 3000 cubic feet per second and increased it to a little less than 9000 cubic feet per second, and when this maximum increase was used, the Supreme Court of the United States, on April 21, 1930, ordered that the diversion be reduced to 3100 cubic feet per second.

It would appear from this data that if the Chicago scheme would take a full 9000 cubic feet per second, it would mean a lowering of lake Huron-Michigan level by 12 inches or more.

Since 1829, Canadians have diverted water from lake Erie through the Welland canal into lake Ontario for navigation and power purposes. Since 1939 this diversion is at the rate of approximately 5900 cubic feet per second. It seems to me that this canal should remain open during the winter season, and if this is not sufficient diversion, I am suggesting that the Welland canal be deepened to increase the diversion, or in its alternative, another canal with locks be constructed to take off this surplus water, and at the same time provide hydro power.

I noticed the other day a speech made by one of the greatest authorities in Canada, Mr. Grant Lindsay, which indicated consideration was being given to the deepening of the Welland canal.

Although I am one who is of the firm belief that it is only a matter of a few years before we have hydro developed by atomic power, I am informed that we should have another 6000 cubic feet per second going over or around Niagara, and thus control and maintain a lower level than we now experience in lake Huron, lake Erie and lake St. Clair. I do not know the amount of water going from the lake Huron basin through the Trent canal into lake Ontario. It would be necessary to know this to assess the over-all picture, but I am wondering if, in the study of these problems by those capable of doing so, the Trent canal could not be made a greater factor than it is today to divert water from lake Huron into lake Ontario.

I understand that the fact of a diversion of 5900 cubic feet per second from lake Erie through the Welland canal decreases the stages of lake Erie by about 3½ inches, and this in itself is no small consideration.

Many people affected by the high levels of lake Ontario might be concerned about the additional water coming into lake Ontario, but I think that a blasting of a channel through the rapids, as I indicated before, with a control system at Iroquois, could lower the level of lake Ontario to any desired level.

I think it is generally recognized now that the damage is so great, and likely to be still greater, that governments on the highest level must recognize their responsibility. I am sure that our friends to the south must also realize the seriousness of the situation, and I think the lowering of lake levels and international waters is a matter of prime importance to the governments and the peoples of both countries.

I emphasize again that much of this work could be undertaken as part and parcel of the St. Lawrence waterway scheme, and thus not be a duplication of expense.

I understand that an international control board has recommended that the quantity of water allowed to flow from lake Superior into the lower lakes shall be reduced by 7,000 cubic feet of water per second, and that this recommendation will be sent to the joint international board for final adoption.

I think, in reviewing the whole aspect of this serious situation, each idea must be examined, if implemented, in order to ascertain how much it will reduce lake levels and how long it would take for such reductions. This would then permit all those concerned with lake levels to govern themselves accordingly.

It seems to me we must realize that the works of man have aggravated the present situation, and that it is the power of man, through the higher levels of government, to do something constructive now. I think it is most important that the Canadian and American authorities exercise their intelligence and resources to lessen the flood danger.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest in conclusion that it is entirely possible by undertaking most of the projects I have outlined that the level of lake Ontario could be kept at or near 245 feet above mean tide at New York, and that the level of lake Huron could be held at or near 579 feet above mean tide at New York. This would be several feet lower than the present high level, and still be not as low as the graph shows the levels to have been in some years. I think it is agreed that we cannot take any action that is going to lower lake levels lower than they have been according to this graph. In the main, action that must be taken must be with the idea of maintaining as nearly as possible a constant level. By doing this we would no longer face the terrific losses we now experience or the danger of even greater losses in the future.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard all the speeches on this particular motion, but the ones I have heard have been excellent and very much to the point. Possibly some of my remarks may not be altogether in point. Before I get to the ones I wish to make, I have a few comments to make dealing almost exclusively with my own province, in a way.

I had the privilege of making the first flight on the new North Star service instituted on Sunday last. I want to congratulate the minister responsible and to thank him for the institution of that service. As far as I was concerned, it meant cutting the time taken in coming to Ottawa at least in half. As an example of what I mean, may I say that I left Torbay airport at 3.30 and arrived in Montreal 6½ hours later, having had two stops of 20 minutes each. There is only another hour between Montreal and Ottawa. When you look at the train time, Mr. Speaker, as we have had to look at it since coming here, and realize that it is anything from 4½ days to 5 days—

Mr. Stick: Seven.

Mr. Higgins: As my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick), says, the last time we travelled together it was 7 days. This new service has made a wonderful difference. So if it is the magic carpet of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in the case of the North Star, as far as that is concerned, I feel it is well justified that it exists. I want to thank him, and I feel quite certain that the service is going to be patronized to the extent that he would want it to be patronized. I am not going into the merits or the demerits of the particular aircraft. I understand that subject has been discussed here on former occasions and I do not think I should rehash it tonight. However, I want to make one comment in connection with the meal services, and I think it is one that should be made.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): And the liquor?

Mr. Higgins: As to the liquor, I think you had better carry your own, as far as I can see; and I am still able to carry it.

The point I wanted to make is this. The DC-3's, the other aircraft flying out from Montreal, provide a meal service and there is a considerable contrast between the meal service provided in the North Stars and that provided in the DC-3's. Quite a number of people will continue to use the DC-3's because of the number of flights per day from Montreal. I am referring not only to people who are travelling to Newfoundland but to those who are travelling all over the maritime provinces. From these meals they get a bad impression of the service provided by T.C.A. I am not casting any reflection—nor do I intend to do so—on the personnel of T.C.A. in any way. I do not think you can better the personnel, but I think you can better the meals considerably on the DC-3's, trans-Canada. I have had that complaint made to me by outsiders; and when I speak of outsiders I mean Americans and tourists. I think we should make every effort to try to have meals that compare with the meals provided by American air lines and by our own North Star. I say that not in any carping spirit but with the idea of attempting to make constructive criticism. I also understand that there is going to be a new form of silencer applied to the North Star, or a new muffler system. I think that would be a great help indeed. At the present time the noise is practically deafening and except for the fact that the service is so fast that one puts up with it, really you would not take it from choice. I pass that suggestion along in the spirit merely of constructive criticism.

One other point that I think might be borne in mind is from the point of view of people who may be nervous when travelling in aircraft. If it could be provided in some way or another that these flaming exhausts would not be stuck up in the passengers' faces, I think that might be a good idea as well.

Going from aircraft to landing fields, may I say that when Queen Juliana arrived at Gander, a desolate picture was painted of her landing and of her quarters at Gander itself.

An hon. Member: Colonel McCormick.

Mr. Higgins: Don't get me started on that man McCormick. I believe Your Honour has already called me to order on that subject. If I start on it again, I might go too far.

I was speaking of the time that Queen Juliana arrived at Gander airport and of the description which was broadcast of her arrival and which was publicized in the various newspapers. It gave an extremely bleak impression of the quarters provided for travellers at Gander airport. It is all very well to say that no reflections are cast on the place that gives hospitality in such a case, but there really is a grave reflection. When one has the queen of any foreign country described as being quartered in a room that has no floor covering, that has no toilet arrangements of any kind, and that is small, it is bound to cast a reflection. I therefore say in all sincerity—and remember, I am not putting any blame on the Department of Transport or whatever department is concerned, because that is apparently the way that most airports are run—that there should be set up some quarters that might not be used always, that is, they might not be used by any Tom, Dick or Harry.

It is not every day that you have these special people coming here, and I think there should be some quarters set aside that could be used on such occasions as that. It is not a costly business, but it would make all the difference between getting bad publicity and getting the kind of publicity that Canada deserves. I do not think that the queen said anything about it, but I am quite certain that a great number of other people did. We do not want that to happen again. That is just another angle.

I am sure the minister will now follow me in most things that I say as well as he has in the past. The most important thing that I wish to speak about tonight is this; and again it is something that is almost local, but it is practically international, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately I did not have the answer given me this afternoon because of the enforced absence of the minister who had to attend a meeting in another part of this building. I refer to the operation of a radio station by the United States air force in Newfoundland. To those of us who live within the radius of that station it is most important to have this particular station continued in operation. The terms of its operation are, I understand, that it may be operated by the United States air force until six months from the time that formal peace has been signed with Germany. It has been in operation from the beginning, from the time when the United States forces first came into Newfoundland, and it has given wonderful service and entertainment to the people within its radius. I suppose the chief kick that I have heard is this and I am sure that it has been heard not only by me but by all the members from Newfoundland. It has appeared in all our daily papers; it has been broadcast. I know that I for one was buttonholed very often before coming to Ottawa this time. The real worry that the baseball fans have is that this station broadcasts ball games, and it is the only station that does, and that the people down there, the Newfoundlanders and the Americans, who live off the base are not able to hear those programs.

I do not know where the blame rests. It has been passed to various places. I have heard the department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs blamed, but this morning in the committee he disavowed any such blame. As I understand it, it is not the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I have not had an answer from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), but I expect the answer will be that it is not his doing. Where the blame rests I do not know. If the facts are as we have had them outlined in many letters in the Newfoundland press and by many private individuals, the blame would appear to attach to the proprietors of a recently incorporated company that operates a broadcasting station. Unfortunately that broadcasting station—and I do say this, I suppose, in a spirit of criticism—is not unfavourably inclined to my hon. friends opposite. Protests were made before the licence was granted to this particular station. At the time it made its request to be given the right to operate, it stated very definitely that there was lots of room for another station in Newfoundland. As a result of that appeal they were given the right to operate.

Now, I understand—and I understand on authority that I am satisfied is reliable—that one of the proprietors of that particular station, the chief proprietor, went to the American general commanding and told him that his station was not able to stand the competition of the American station, and by other and divers means, whether there were threats or not, Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to ascertain—one does not approach an American general and say, "Tell me the whole story"—but for whatever reason, the station has been put off the air. I do hope very sincerely and honestly, and I am sure my colleagues from Newfoundland will express the same wish—

Mr. Stick: Hear, hear.

Mr. Higgins: I hear, "hear, hear" in agreement. I am sure that the hon. members opposite will also voice the same wish. This station has given us so much pleasure, and has given all our people so much pleasure, that whatever steps have to be taken to see to it that the American authorities are reassured that we wish them to continue their broadcasting should be taken. I hope those steps will be taken.

My idea is that they do not wish to offend Canada in any way. It has been suggested to them that by continuing operations as they are they may offend Canada, and for that reason they have stopped. We have to remember—and I am speaking now in the broad sense—that in so far as the United States forces in Newfoundland are concerned, they are possibly the largest industry in the matter of getting money to our people. We must recognize it as the very first great industry we have.

Speakers from Newfoundland on the other side of the house, not only the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick), have enlarged on this particular matter recently. I would not like anything at all to take away the good feelings that exist at the present time between our American friends and the people of Newfoundland. This may very well do so, because, as I say, there are a considerable number of American personnel and their families living off the United States base, and they cannot get these programs. Moreover, the base at Argentia is also dependent on the programs coming from Pepperrell air force base as well. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I do hope that whatever minister is concerned, whether it is the Minister of Transport, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson)—I would even ask the Prime Minister himself (Mr. St. Laurent)—will take a hand in this particular matter because it goes a little further than that. It means good relationship between the newest part of this dominion and our great sister country on the other side of the border. It means very much more than just merely asking that Newfoundlanders will hear the ball games; I can assure you of that.

On motion of Mr. Higgins the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, we will proceed with the debate on the budget on Wednesday and Thursday, but tomorrow we will first take up the resolution of the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) to set up a special committee to consider the operations of the national film board. I think that is about all.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 30, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

REFERENCE IN SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO PERSONAL ASSISTANT TO LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with respect to a matter that has come to my attention since the house met yesterday. I find that the chairman of the committee on defence expenditures made reference at a meeting of the committee to the announcement that had appeared that Mr. Vernon Kemp had been appointed my personal assistant. He drew from that certain inferences which I think were wholly unjustified and very improper.

I might say that Mr. Kemp, as I think the hon. member for Spadina should well realize, had been discussing this matter with me for some considerable time before the incidents occurred at Petawawa. What I am objecting to particularly are the words used by the chairman of the committee—

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of order, is it in order for the hon. member to refer to the proceedings of the committee at the present time?

Mr. Drew: —in referring to this subject.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A point of order has been raised. I did not raise it myself as there appeared to be no disapproval of the leader of the opposition discussing in the house what took place in the committee.

Mr. Fulton: He is discussing a report in the press.

Mr. Drew: I am not discussing procedure in the committee; I am discussing the newspaper report. I am discussing the fact that in reference to this appointment the chairman of the committee used these words, that it was a part of Drew's gestapo.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid I cannot allow—

An hon. Member: Steamroller.

Mr. Speaker: —a discussion at this time of what took place in the committee, whether a newspaper report is involved or whatever it may be. If the hon. member objects to the newspaper report he can raise his question of privilege in the committee but not in the house.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the committee, and I am referring to something that is definitely a matter of privilege. I have stated what I wish to state—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —and I am making these remarks with the expectation that the hon. member for Spadina, who I believe will wish to do so, will indicate that these words were not intended in the manner in which—

Mr. Sinclair: What words?

Mr. Drew: —in which they were spoken, because the hon. member for Spadina on many other occasions—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —has indicated that he would not wish a matter of that kind to stand in that way. I am referring particularly to the term, "Drew's gestapo".

Mr. Croll: If I am in order, and I presume I am—

Mr. Speaker: The proceedings have not been in order. The matter should not be raised in the house. It should have been raised in the committee. However, it has been raised in the house, and if the hon. member wishes to speak at this time I will not object.

Mr. Croll: To clear up the matter, I want to assure the hon. member and the house that no reflection was intended upon the hon. member.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think we should endeavour to keep our proceedings regular. I am sure the leader of the opposition could go to the committee and state his objection there. I cannot permit it to be done here because the house does not know what the hon. member is discussing. I do not know what he is discussing, and there is nothing before the house. I think the hon. gentleman will agree that the objection to what took place in the committee should be made before the committee.

Mr. Drew: Since you have said you thought I would agree, Mr. Speaker, I may say I do not agree. I think this is the proper place to raise it.

An hon. Member: Study the rules.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The leader of the opposition has said he thought this was the proper place to present his objection and for that reason he presented it. My ruling is that it is not the proper place, that it should be presented to the committee.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

7. What other revenue did it receive from the C.B.C. in 1950 and 1951?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

INVERNESS COUNTY, N.S.—COAL DEVELOPMENT AND ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. Gillis:

For a copy of the report made to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys on possible coal development and economic conditions in Inverness county, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia.

Mr. Prudham: For the information of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I know of no report that would have been made to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys in reference to the possible coal development and economic conditions in Inverness county. However, I believe such a report has been made to the department of mines of Nova Scotia by Dr. Lewis Young, a geologist who was working for that department.

Mr. Gillis: The report may not have been made to mines and technical surveys; it may have been made to mines and resources before the department was changed around, but my information is that a Dr. Haites did make a report of that nature to the federal department. I do not know who would inherit it.

Mr. Prudham: My officials have no knowledge of the report. However, I shall ask them to have another look, and perhaps this motion could be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved:

That a special committee consisting of the following members, namely, Messrs: Beyerstein, Boisvert, Browne (St. John's West), Cannon, Carroll, Carter, Coldwell, Courtemanche, Decore, Dinsdale, Ferguson, Fraser, Gauthier (Sudbury), Gauthier (Portneuf), Henry, Jutras, Knight, MacLean

(Queens), Macnaughton, McWilliam, Murray (Cariboo), Richard (Ottawa East), Robinson, Smith (Moose Mountain), Whitman, Winters, be appointed to consider the operations of the national film board as set forth in its annual report with authority to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time, and that the presence of at least ten members shall constitute a quorum; that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minister going to make a statement on this matter?

Mr. Winters: I do not think the house would expect me to say much at this time, Mr. Speaker. From time to time hon. members have requested that the annual report of the national film board be referred to a committee of the house for detailed study. The government has considered these requests and is of the opinion that it would be in the public interest to set up such a committee to provide its members with an opportunity to study the annual report of the board, and at the same time to give the government film commissioner and his officials a like opportunity of explaining the board's operations. I so informed the house on March 17.

Since its inception, the national film board has become more and more integrated with Canada's national growth and has played an increasingly important part in the development of our national status, largely through its assigned role of interpreting Canada to Canadians.

I am sure most Canadians feel that the national film board is doing good work, and they will welcome this opportunity of having a detailed study made of the board's activities as reflected in its annual report. The commissioner and members of the board are similarly pleased to be able to have discussions with members of a committee and, through them, to provide Canadians generally with an opportunity to learn more about how this important government agency serves the public.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, as I know other members of the house are, that the minister has at last consented to the establishment of this special committee on the national film board. It is about five or six years late, but it is better late than never. The question as to why the committee was not set up before is not a $64 one, because I feel quite sure that if it had been, the findings of the committee would have certainly embarrassed the then minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no, no.

Mr. Fraser: Oh, yes, would absolutely have embarrassed the minister who was then in charge of the national film board. For some years this board has been what one might call a hot potato, and the different ministers have tossed that potato from one to the other, saying, "I don't want it, you can have it; it doesn't belong to me." If there had been an inquiry by a committee in those early days, I am quite sure the findings of the committee would have embarrassed the government as well. There is no doubt about that.

I feel quite sure that before the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), who is now in charge of the national film board activities, came into the house he wondered why that board had been called a white elephant—in fact, a herd of white elephants. I feel quite sure also that after the minister was installed in his office, and took charge of the film board, he had reason to know why the board had been criticized. For a number of years it was just a place into which the taxpayers' money was dumped. There is no doubt that the taxpayer did not get dollar for dollar value.

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Mr. Fraser: I hear a Liberal member saying "dispense", and I quite realize why he said that. The Liberals never like to be criticized in any way at all. They always feel they are one hundred per cent right—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fraser: —and in most cases they are one thousand per cent wrong. However, if that hon. member had just waited a moment he would perhaps have heard something that he would have applauded. I am going to say that I feel, and I know many others do as well, that under the present minister, with the use of a little common sense, this national film board will develop into something that is useful to the people of Canada. This film board has greatly improved since the minister took over.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fraser: I am glad the Liberal members are applauding, because I know that they did not applaud five, or even three, years ago, despite the fact that they knew the national film board was not doing its job.

Mr. Riley: That means we are making progress.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, you are making progress slowly in the national film board, but there is still room for improvement.

Mr. Riley: But in the right direction.

Mr. Fraser: But in the right direction, and that is only because you have had constructive criticism from the Conservative party.

The minister who is now in charge of the film board installed a business management firm to check into the affairs of that organization, and it was about time. I feel that since that check was made and a report issued, the film board affairs have been in much better shape; they are on a sounder basis. The affairs of that board were certainly on shifting sands before that time. The minister saw that the former director of the film board was kicked upstairs, and a new director put in his place. I say "kicked upstairs" because I believe he went to the United Nations. I have heard very good reports of the new director, both from his own employees and other sources. We shall wait, however, until we are in the committee to find out exactly what this new director has been doing. He has accomplished quite a bit, and he has had a big job.

I should like to read an article which appeared in a magazine entitled Canadian Photography, a monthly booklet issued for professional photographers throughout Canada. A few years ago this magazine was not very favourable to the national film board, because, in many ways, the board was stepping on the toes of professional photographers. The article which appears in this magazine was published in Toronto Saturday Night. The date on which the article appeared in Toronto Saturday Night is not given, but it appears in the February issue of Canadian Photography, and reads as follows:

> When Mr. Arthur Irwin left Maclean's magazine just over two years ago to take over the national film board, this appointment aroused great public interest. When it was announced recently that his two-year appointment had been extended indefinitely, no one paid any attention.
> The change is a tribute to Mr. Irwin's accomplishments. It reflects the fact that two years ago the film board was "news" not because of its films but because of rather general doubts about its efficiency. Now the film board only gets into the news, it seems, through flattering reviews of its productions.
> The public flurry of two years ago was largely based on allegations that the film board was harbouring communists and was too bad a security risk to make secret films. But the more serious and significant complaint was that it was a badly organized unit, suffering from all the waste and inefficiency which goes with bad organization. The communist scare was Mr. Irwin's first worry, and it was one of the quickest and most easily solved. The real effort of these last two years has been the unspectacular and unexciting grind of trying to establish a more efficient organization.
> With a new and vigorous board behind him, Mr. Irwin has won the confidence of his staff and has brought much better order into the film board's operations.

That proves the statement I made a few minutes ago.

It is to be hoped that no restrictions will be placed on this special committee that is being set up to study the national film board activities. The committee should have full sway, and should be allowed to call in representatives of the Canadian motion picture industry, the Canadian commercial photographers, the Canadian press photographers' association and any other organization that is interested in motion pictures or photography.

This year the national film board is going to cost the taxpayers of Canada over $3 million. The minister might say: Oh, no; it will not cost that. What is the estimate for 1952-53? I will not say it is only $2 million; it is the large amount of $2,919,951. In 1951-52 it was $2,600,000 approximately. There has been an increase this year of over $317,000. On top of this we have the expense that the Minister of Finance has in having his officials in the national film board to check on the accounts, pay the accounts, and so on. We also have the accounts of the Minister of Public Works for the twelve different buildings which the national film board occupy in Ottawa and the other buildings that they rent throughout Canada and in other places. The national film board must show the committee where this money goes and just what use is being made of it. The committee must find out whether the pictures produced are what the Canadian public wants, and also if they are just what are needed for our children and also for our adult education.

I am a great lover of good motion pictures, and I know that a good many other hon. members are also. In fact, I know that the Minister of Agriculture is.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is so much talking in the house that it is difficult for me to hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Fraser: I just said, Mr. Speaker, that I know the Minister of Agriculture is a great lover of motion pictures, because he goes to good shows on Wednesday nights, when we have the night off. I generally meet him there. I also like good motion pictures.

Mr. Gardiner: We pick the same kind.

Mr. Fraser: A few years ago, however, the documentary films put out by the national film board were not worth much to the public at large owing to the fact that the details in them were not correct. On numerous occasions in this house I pointed out some of those details.

This committee should also find out just what advantage the national film board is to the various departments of the government, and whether it would be better for those various departments to get their motion pictures made by commercial film corporations.

The national film board was set up in 1939, just before the war. I have here the resolution that was read in the House of Commons on Tuesday, March 7, by Mr. Euler, who introduced it.

Mr. Fraser: 1939. It is to be found at page 1661 of Hansard of that year. The resolution was as follows:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to create a national film board empowered and directed to review and report on government film activities and to discharge such other duties as the governor in council may request; and to authorize the governor in council to appoint, and determine the salary of, a commissioner, to be the chief executive officer of the board. Also to provide for the appointment of an interdepartmental committee to centralize government film distribution.

At that time the Department of Trade and Commerce was the one in which all the films were made, and this national film board was set up in order to combine the operations. When asked for an explanation by the hon. member who now represents the constituency of Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), Mr. Euler went on to say further:

The purpose of the bill which is to be founded on this resolution is fairly, if briefly, described in the resolution itself, but I might add something to acquaint the committee with the purposes of the bill. Perhaps primarily the reason for the framing of the bill is the fact that the film has become a very important and powerful factor in the dissemination of information, the production of entertainment, and for publicity purposes generally and it is growing constantly. Various departments of the government—I need not mention them particularly, but at least five or six departments of the government —have had in the past their own film activities entirely independent of one another.

Mr. Euler went on to say further:

There is also provision for an executive officer of the board, who is designated in the bill as a commissioner. He will be the only paid official. It will be his duty to act under the instruction or supervision of the board in its practical work of co-ordination and that sort of thing.

He further went on to say:

It might not be necessary to include that in the bill, but it is thought well to give that committee an official standing. The members of that committee will be drawn from the departments which have film activities, the chairman to be the commissioner himself.

He also said:

I may add, in conclusion, that this board is not being established with the intention of providing jobs for anybody. There is really to be only one paid man in the organization.

He said further:

That has not been considered. But the only other paid official might be a clerk or a stenographer.

In Hansard of March 13, 1939, Mr. Euler set out just what the films were costing Canada at that time. The total for the fiscal year 1937-38 amounted to $51,998.75. In 1947-48 the national film board cost the taxpayers of Canada $3,514,940.

On more than one occasion in this house I have said that the various departments of government should be allowed to select their own firm for making their films and developing them. I know that some departments of the government have done this; but under the present set-up I believe that each department has to pay to the national film board a fee of some 10 per cent over and above what the commercial firm charges. When the late Hon. Ian Mackenzie, a former minister of veterans affairs, was in office, I know that on more than one occasion he had private commercial firms make films for his department.

In their policy declarations and resolutions, 1951-52, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce had this to say:

The Canadian chamber of commerce generally endorses the minority report on the national film board of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, in which it is recommended that two or three members should be appointed to the board of the national film board as moderators, with the duty of examining objectively all plans of the board. The national film board should not extend its operations. The film act should be amended so that it is no longer necessary for departments of the federal government to secure their films through the national film board.

I mentioned what the total cost of the national film board was to the public in 1947 and in 1948. About that time I put a question on the order paper. In 1947 the expenses for employees, salaries, wages and expense allowances totalled $1,844,000 and some odd out of a total of $3,514,000. That shows that most of the money went into salaries and expenses instead of into pictures. This is how that $1,844,000 odd is made up: Total expenses for Canadian employees amounted to $242,814.04; total salaries for employees in Canada were $1,384,831.89. The cost of foreign offices maintained outside of Canada amounted to $138,959.05; the salaries of employees outside of Canada amounted to $57,825.06; expenses, including allowances of employees in offices maintained outside Canada, totalled $20,464.10. That amounts to $1,844,894.14, and was for salaries and expenses alone.

In conclusion I wish to say a word in regard to the distribution of films in Canada. It is the general belief in Canada that these different film councils that are set up are maintained by money supplied by the national film board. That is not so. These councils are set up locally, and the different organizations in the different municipalities or districts all chip in. I think in my district they pay $2 each. There are dozens, in fact hundreds, of different organizations that chip in. Then these different organizations are permitted to have films free, and the loan of a projector. The different councils have to buy their own projectors, I understand, and that is one thing that I should like to mention to the minister. Proper instructions should be given to someone in these councils, despite the fact that they are locally maintained, in the care of motion picture projectors. I know of many instances, not only in my own district, but in other districts, where projectors are sent out with an operator to a school or to some other organization, and after they start to run the machine they find that it is out of kilter and will not work properly. It not only gives the local film council a bad name, but also reflects on the national film board.

I know our film council in Peterborough is well managed and directed, because my own dentist is the president of the council, and I know that he has as much pull as anybody in Peterborough. He is also a good manager. I am also pleased to say that I have a daughter on that council who represents the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire, which in turn represents some twelve or more other branches and chapters of the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire in the Peterborough district. These film councils do not distribute just national film board pictures. In most instances they have to buy their own films. If they had to depend on the national film board reels altogether for their distribution I am sure they would have to fold up. In many instances they buy films produced by other motion picture companies in Canada, and I suppose some of them are imported. I know of one firm that operates in Ottawa, Crawley Films, that makes excellent pictures. There is nothing better in the United States than the films the Crawley firm makes. We have other firms in Canada making good pictures.

As I said at the beginning, I am pleased that this committee is being set up, and I hope that the minister will see that no restrictions are put on its proceedings.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, during the years from 1945 to 1949, or the early 1950's, I had the honour of being the minister in charge of or responsible to the government for the national film board. The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) has been the self-appointed, or probably appointed by his party—

Mr. Fraser: No.

Mr. McCann: —critic of the national film board. The occasions on which he has voiced that criticism—and I have no objection to the criticism—were when the appropriation or estimate to sustain the national film board was before parliament. My appraisal of his ability and of his right to make the criticisms which he did are based upon the fact that he visits the picture shows once or twice a week. I could never find anything in his criticism more substantial than the evidence which he put forth that might come as a result of that attendance. The national film board—

Mr. Fraser: You did not listen to me very attentively.

Mr. McCann: Just a minute; you have had your opportunity. He claims that the national film board has been a hot potato, that it has been a place in which the government found they could dump public money. The record will show that these are his accusations.

Mr. Fraser: That is right.

Mr. McCann: It has never been a hot potato. For a number of years the board was under my jurisdiction, until in the view of the Prime Minister my duties as Minister of National Revenue were such that I had enough work without continuing the national film board. When the department of mines and technical surveys was established, that duty was transferred to the present minister, my colleague, the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters).

Let us go back for a minute or two over the history of the national film board. It was established in 1939. The idea of establishing it was to co-ordinate the services in the several departments of government that had to do with the matter of publicizing their activities by using a new medium of communication and a new medium of education. These various departments of government used films, and it was thought that it would be advantageous and economical if these several activities were co-ordinated into one department or one agency. That agency became the national film board.

I admit immediately that during the years 1939 to 1945, under the direction of Mr. John Grierson, who was then the head of the board, these activities were spread perhaps beyond what they would have been in peacetime, and our expenditure ran up to several millions of dollars—I forget the exact figure—and the number of employees was up in the neighbourhood of a thousand.

After the war, in 1945, when I took the department over, I began a policy of retrenchment. Anyone who will look at the estimates for the national film board in the years 1941 up to 1950 will see that there was that retrenchment, both in dollars and in personnel. Therefore although I am not jealous of the few words of commendation which my hon. friend has directed toward the Minister of Resources and Development, I wish to state that the policy of the national film board as it is at the moment was initiated before the present minister came into office—and I am sure the minister will bear me out in my statement, because he sat on the board when I was the responsible minister.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Settle that with him.

Mr. McCann: I wish to tell the house that the national film board was not intended to be, nor will it ever become, a money-making agency of government. It was set up for several purposes, one of which was to have documentary films.

Let me explain what that means. Up until a few years ago, what was the record of great national events throughout the world? Unless they were written in a book we had no record of them. The film offered a new medium through which we could have great events in our history placed on the record and kept there for ever, in order that generations yet unborn would be able to see what the world was like one or two hundred years before they came along.

Then, the national film board was established for educational purposes. It was there for entertainment purposes, for purposes of instruction, and for all the other purposes of a new industry such as the film industry in the present-day world.

Those are the reasons the film board was set up, and they are the reasons today. If the board is going to spend more money this year than it has in previous years, or if it spent more last year than it did the year before, the reason for the increased cost is the increased cost of wages and of the materials they use in their work.

Last October in the visit of Her Majesty the Queen to this country we witnessed one of the great events in our history. The national film board did a splendid job in preparing an excellent film known as "Royal Journey". That film has been shown in our own country, and it has been sold in the United States so that it may be shown there. On balance the crown will have some considerable profit from it.

I do not intend to speak at length; but I hope the hon. member for Peterborough West will be a daily attendant at the national film board inquiry. I welcome the inquiry, and have suggested it on previous occasions. The government and the national film board have nothing to fear from the most minute inquiry that could be made into the activities of the board; and if the hon. member for Peterborough West wants to put forth his criticism or ask questions he will receive suitable and satisfactory answers.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the minister a question?

An hon. Member: You made your speech.

Mr. Fraser: You do not want to answer the question? All right.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed that the committee is about to be set up. In common with other hon. members I have asked over the years that such a committee be established, not because I felt that the national film board had been guilty of anything that required investigation, not because of anything it had not done, but so that the board might have an opportunity of explaining to hon. members, and through them to the country, the work it is trying to do.

I was glad indeed the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) spoke as he did about the board and its activities. He mentioned the film "Royal Journey," which has been acclaimed, everywhere it has been shown, as to colour, technique and conception, as one of the outstanding films of modern times. The national film board is to be congratulated upon the magnificence of that production.

When I hear criticisms of our national film organization I like to review the prizes and awards that have been made for documentary and other films to public and semi-public organizations both here and elsewhere. Those of us who have noted the awards made will have been quite pleased with the number obtained by the national film board.

A few years ago there was considerable criticism of some of the board's employees. I am very glad indeed that that criticism has not been continued. Mr. John Grierson has often been mentioned in this connection, but I note that at page 51 the Massey report refers to Mr. Grierson as "a distinguished British producer of documentary films", and points out that he was asked to make an investigation and to report his findings. Whatever Mr. Grierson's private views may be—and I do not know what they are—I think this country does owe the first commissioner some gratitude for having laid the foundations for documentary film projects which have brought acclaim to this country.

From time to time I have met people from the United Kingdom and from South America, as well as from the United States, who have told me that they have seen some of the documentary films issued by the film board. Those people have spoken in the most enthusiastic terms when referring to the films. I know of nothing that has given Canada better and more competent advertising than the films produced by this national organization, and I think we should recognize the work that has been done.

The sittings of the committee will give hon. members an opportunity of looking into the organization of the national film board and the extent to which it is associated with any minister of the crown, or with the government or, indeed, with the house. My own view has been for a long time that the national film board might well be placed in the same position as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—in other words, divorced from political control in any respect, and set up, as is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as an independent organization responsible to parliament and reporting through a minister to the house.

I believe the present plan has within it some dangers. I do not think that at the moment those dangers are of great consequence, because I do not believe the present commissioner would allow the national film board to be used in any sense as an organ of propaganda for the government of today, or any succeeding government. I do not think the present commissioner would do that. I have the utmost confidence in his integrity and ability, and I am not afraid that that would happen under the present circumstances. But I still think that in the interest of the national film board and of parliament it would be well for the committee to go into the organization of the board and to inquire into its association with the government. Then if the committee sees fit it might recommend that the board be set up as a corporation similar to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which in my opinion, and also in the opinion of those who make the awards for broadcasting, has done a remarkably fine job in the field of radio.

I believe that the national film board at the moment is doing and can do an equally fine job with respect to the cinema. After all, as the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) pointed out, there are many people in Canada who derive a great deal of pleasure and recreational as well as educational benefit from attendance at the cinema. I do not often go because I do not have the time, but I agree with the hon. member that it is a modern form of entertainment which can be both educational and enjoyable.

Without the national film board we would have to rely to an even greater extent than at the present time on the medium of Hollywood films or films coming to us from across the sea for any interpretation of Canada. Most of the films shown in Canada are of United States origin, to a lesser extent they are of United Kingdom origin, and to a very small extent of European origin. I think it is in the interests of national unity and the building up of national understanding, as well as in the interests of national culture, to have an organization that is doing something fundamentally Canadian in this most important field. Those who have seen Hollywood films dealing with Canadian life—I can think of several I have seen—will understand what a caricature these films are in many respects of the actual life of people in Canada. I remember one film which was supposed to concern the mounted police, the name of which I do not recollect. It was a caricature of life in northern Alberta, where some of the picture was filmed, and in southern Alberta, where, as I remember, it, the Hollywood portrayal of a policeman was married. The film was of such a nature that it was almost an insult to Canadians.

Without the national film organization we would have no other way of bringing to the people, not only of Canada but also of other parts of the world, a true picture of our conditions of life and of Canada in so many of its aspects. Unfortunately we have been misrepresented in the films to which I have referred, and not only misinterpreted but caricatured.

There is another aspect of the matter which I think should concern the house, namely, the development of television. We are going to have television in Canada sooner or later, and in some parts quite soon. Undoubtedly television broadcasting will have to depend to a very large extent on films. Indeed, I thought one of the interesting points in Mr. Allard's presentation to the committee on radio broadcasting a year ago was that he wanted the private interests to control television but he wanted the national film board to provide the necessary films to a great extent. He was content to rely on this organization to do a job which everyone admits they are well qualified to do.

I have always been interested in the distribution of educational films. More and more our schools and educational institutions are relying on films as a supplementary medium to formal education. Listening to a broadcast originating in Newfoundland during Easter week, when I was at home one morning, I was amazed to learn of the number of projectors that have been placed in Newfoundland schools in the last year or two, thus bringing to the remote outposts of that province a picture of life in the rest of Canada, bringing to them films informing them of life in other parts of Canada and dealing with topics having other educational value. Such films of course are mainly 16 and 35 millimetre films.

I think the recommendation of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, contained in what we refer to as the Massey report, should also be noted by the national film board. Among its recommendations I find the following on page 308:

> c. That the national film board consider appropriate measures designed to increase the distribution of 35 mm. documentary films through commercial outlets in urban areas and to create new outlets in distant and sparsely settled parts of the country which do not have them.

I think that the more the national film board can encourage the use of such films in motion picture theatres and other commercial outlets, the stronger the national film organization will become and the more useful it will be. Indeed it might bring further revenue to the country which could be used for the further development of the national film facilities.

In saying this I am not in any way minimizing the part that some of the private film organizations have played in Canada, but after all, the field is limited so far as they are concerned. The distribution of many documentary films must of necessity be on a non-profit basis, and in that field the national film board plays a most important part. If we are to supply our educational institutions with documentary films, and, as the Minister of National Revenue said a moment ago, films which may be of very limited value at the moment but may be of great historic interest, then only a film organization of this description can afford to undertake such projects.

I feel very strongly that in the field of documentaries the national film board has done a job of which not only the board but parliament, which provides the funds, should be very proud indeed. Mistakes have been made, but the mistakes are completely overshadowed by the successes that have been achieved since the organization was set up in 1939. When we think of what was done during the war to record not in still pictures of the kind we have hanging in the Senate chamber or stored away in the archives but in living pictures, what the young men and women did in the army, navy and air force, and indeed in industry, we realize that as the minister has said this record will be of paramount interest to generations yet unborn.

May I just pay this tribute? I spoke of the present commissioner but there is no question that the national film board has gathered together an exceedingly able staff of devoted young men and women who are doing this work not only to get a living but because they are interested in it because they enjoy doing it and feel they are making a contribution to the country in which they live.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

I am not going to add to what I have already said but I am pleased indeed that this committee is being set up. It will give those of us who are members of it an opportunity to go into the operations of the film board; but also—and this is the principal reason I have asked for such a committee—it will give the officers of the national film board including the commissioner an opportunity to tell this house and through this house and the press to tell the country, something of the job that organization is doing. I am convinced that most people in Canada are not aware of the kind of useful work the film board is doing. The establishment of this committee will give many thousands of people, I hope, the opportunity to understand the work of the board.

I was happy to note in the Massey report that a number of people and organizations have been interested in what the national film board has been doing. At page 53 of the report I find this:

> About 120 organizations in briefs and evidence discussed the work of the national film board, some at considerable length. Most of them approved of its work, and asked that this work be extended. They went further. Many Canadians expressed pride in the work of the film board considering that, like our national radio service, it is a valuable and distinctive Canadian achievement.

Many of us do not realize the extent to which Canada is advertised abroad today by the national film board. I was told the other day that on Broadway in New York city, outside one of the big theatres, was the advertising of the film "Royal Journey". I am not sure that the national film board was advertised as being the originator of the film, but I imagine that on the screen at least the people were told this was a production of the national film board of Canada. Consequently I welcome this paragraph which states that organizations expressed their approval of what was being done and urged that the work of the film board be encouraged and extended.

As a member of this house I feel that we should give the national film board all the credit it deserves for what it has done in the past, and hope it will be allowed and encouraged to continue and indeed extend that work in the future.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the committee that is being set up, but I should like to say a word to put before the house the position we take with respect to this motion. I have a special interest, I think, in the national film board and its productions. I represent a constituency that is very largely rural and lacking places where people may have easy access to picture houses. For that reason the people of the Peace river country have deeply appreciated the documentary, educational and entertaining films they were able to obtain from the film board. As a matter of fact several local committees have been set up in my constituency who have sent competent people around with projectors and screens to show these films. We appreciate that service, which I think has done much to keep my constituents informed on the historical developments of our country and the documentary and educational processes as they have been developed and used by the film board.

Some years ago, when I first became acquainted with the work of the board, I did hear considerable criticism of some of the personnel; but I am glad to say that in recent years such criticism has already died away. Today I hear very little if any criticism of the personnel. I think Mr. Irwin must be doing an excellent job. I want also to compliment the ministers who were responsible for laying down the policy, because no commission can be any better than the policy it has to administer. So I think you must have done a good job in recent years in developing your policy. Otherwise there would have been continuing criticism of the kind we heard some years ago, which in those days was sometimes rather bitter.

I have heard some criticism of this sort, that in some cases the film board may be encroaching upon the legitimate fields of private business. Well, I do not know about that. It is one of the many reasons we welcome the inquiry. I believe the more information that can be adduced and made available to the public, the less criticism of that kind will be heard. Like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I am sure that if we get these things on the record and make them available to the Canadian people they will be able to decide for themselves whether there is any unnecessary encroachment by the board upon the field of legitimate private business. I must hasten to add that the major part of this criticism I have heard has been with respect to still-picture work, not so much with regard to motion pictures. I am looking forward to the information that will be brought out as a result of this inquiry.

I am convinced that there is a very useful purpose the film board can fill and indeed is filling. I saw the technicolour film of the royal tour, and enjoyed it very much. I thought it was a splendid production, and one thing that appealed to me strongly was the excellent commentary that went with it. I do not think I have ever seen a documentary film with a finer running commentary, and I think most people who saw it felt as I did. It was a tribute to our country that we should have recorded that tour so well, to be preserved here for future generations; and I want to compliment the board on that splendid production. As I say, in the remote parts of our country the people are going to be the gainers perhaps more than in areas where they have a more easy access to picture houses.

For a great many years I have felt that, in the field of education, there is a need for more visual material. It seems to me that the recommendation made in the Massey commission report that the board undertake to make and distribute more 35 mm. educational films is a very good one. I should like to see that done. The superiority of the 35 over the 16 is something that cannot be understood unless one has had some experience in using the two. The sound track on a 16 mm. film is very difficult to apply with any real success, so I should like to see that Massey commission recommendation carried out if it is at all possible. I am not going to weary the house with any further discussion at this time. Let me conclude by saying that we welcome the inquiry and our representative will be in attendance. I am going to be very much interested in the information that is brought out as a result of the inquiry.

Mr. Charles Henry (Rosedale): I have just a few remarks to make in this debate, Mr. Speaker. I hope to have the honour of being a member of the committee, and that is one reason for the brevity of my remarks. Before I came to this chamber as a member of parliament I had the honour of being a public servant in the service of the government of Canada, with the then prime minister the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, from whom I have drawn much inspiration in my public life. I well remember his remarks in 1946 that the things which unite us are greater than those which divide us. It is my opinion that most Canadians are united in the thought that the home is the backbone of the nation. I look forward to the day when television will attract people to the home for entertainment which otherwise they might look for elsewhere.

In the first half of the twentieth century there has been a greater movement outside the home for all purposes, particularly for the purpose of entertainment. This being so, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but think of the fine thing it would be for Canada if we had special television facilities for the showing in the home of a picture such as "Royal Journey". In the United States and elsewhere there are special facilities for the showing of motion pictures through television sets. A coin box arrangement is attached to the television set and the owner of the set has pictures in the home whenever he desires. I regard this as the most remarkable entertainment achievement in the first half of this century.

I welcome the committee, and I thank the minister for nominating me as a member. I cannot help but think that we in Canada should go ahead with facilities for showing motion pictures in the home through television stations or otherwise as means are found by those who control television. It seems to me that the government should consider the further co-ordination of the national film board and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for purposes of this advance in the field of television in relation to motion pictures.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall detain the house for only a moment, and not to comment on the excellence of the film board. I take that as expressed by those who have already spoken. My only purpose in rising is to draw attention to a thing which happened in this debate which I have never seen before, and which may never happen again; that is my excuse for detaining the house for a moment.

This afternoon we had the spectacle of two ministers dividing the spoils, so to speak. In his generosity the member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) gave praise to the film board and the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters). The minister received the praise graciously and swallowed it. Then, later on, we had the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) explaining that it did not belong to the minister of resources at all.

Mr. McCann: I did no such thing. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fraser: He would not allow me to ask a question.

Mr. McCann: You were not answering questions, you were asking them. On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) is entirely misinterpreting what I said. In a debate of this kind I believe the record should be kept straight, and it was with a view to doing that that I spoke as I did. I will gamble one hundred to one that the present minister will substantiate every statement I made.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have been extremely unfortunate. I had no idea that what I was going to say would irritate anybody.

[Mr. Henry.]

Mr. Knowles: Is that gamble subject to income tax?

Mr. McCann: No one is irritated.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me put it this way. The praise which had been taken by the minister of resources is going to be shared, and that is all right. I think we can leave it entirely to the ministers to divide it up amongst themselves. The only thing I was going to say was that I do not think we shall have many other occasions when ministers will share praise, but I would say it would be still more unusual if ministers would rise and share the blame which comes from this side of the house. It would be very useful if we could have the departments of agriculture, finance and national revenue dividing up the blame; that would be most interesting.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I only rise to speak for a few minutes. I do so for two reasons. First, I have been asked by a number of constituents to say a good word for the national film board whenever I have the opportunity. I rise first on that count. Secondly, I rise because whenever the member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) speaks on the national film board I listen to his negative approach to this great national organization and become nettled so that I feel like talking. I will say that the member for Peterborough West did modify his criticism somewhat today compared to other occasions his negative approach was less negative.

I want to say that I know very little about the technical aspects of film production or the administration of the national film board in detail. However from my experience in my own constituency, I do know that there are a large number of people who greatly appreciate the work that has been done by the board throughout the years. This is true particularly of those people living in country districts. Like the member for Peace River (Mr. Low) I represent a riding which has within it a number of isolated communities. The people of these communities appreciate the films they have seen as a result of the national film board being in operation. In the cities of Trail, Nelson and Rossland we have very active film councils. I may say that the work of the board is so appreciated that these film councils represent a complete cross section of the community, and have the support of a large number of people.

The member for Peterborough West more or less implied that the amount of $2 million or so was far too much to spend on the work of the national film board. I cannot agree with that suggestion, when we place that small sum for this very valuable cultural work in this country as against our total budget, it is indeed a small amount. I quite agree, Mr. Speaker, that possibly there have been some administrative weaknesses in the film board that have been corrected. I think we must expect some difficulties because it is a new type of government organization in which there has been little previous experience in any country. I believe I had a very good illustration of the value of this $2 million odd to Canada when I had an opportunity of visiting New York recently. First of all, I think the expenditure is worth while for the good publicity it creates for Canada outside of this country. I happened to be walking down Broadway in New York at 7 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Sinclair: Just getting home?

Mr. Herridge: I got up early, Mr. Speaker. I am an early riser. I was walking down Broadway—

An hon. Member: No excuses!

Mr. Herridge: —and it surprised me to find that at a theatre where they were showing "Royal Journey" there was at 7 o'clock in the morning, a line-up three blocks long for a show commencing at 9 o'clock. I made a point of asking the reason. The show contained several features. As I walked along I asked various people this question: "What are you interested in?" And in each instance the reply was the same, "Royal Journey". Is that not worth $2 million to Canada when we realize that millions of people in the United States will have an opportunity to see that film and other documentary films produced by the national film board?

I might also say that I completely agree with the remarks made by my leader in this debate, when he was speaking of the value of these films for educational purposes across this country. I think that all progressive-thinking or forward-thinking people are realizing more and more their value for that purpose.

Before I conclude I might also say that I was greatly pleased to hear the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) make the statement he made—and with the vigour he displayed and the language that he used—in explanation to the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). I agree with all he had to say. As a result of this committee's being established and as a result of the excellent opportunity being given to the hon. member for Peterborough West and other members to quiz, inquire and seek information, I am sure that at the conclusion of the hearings of that committee, when the report is made to the house, the prestige of the national film board will be further enhanced in Canada.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Winters: —in closing this debate I simply want to express my thanks to the various members who have spoken expressing appreciation of the work which the film board is doing at the present time. I gather that the film board enjoys a high level of esteem in the minds of all members of the house for the work it is doing, and I shall be glad indeed to convey those sentiments to the members of the board and the commissioner.

I especially wish to thank my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), for the justifiable remarks he made in this debate. They were prompted chiefly because of the fact that the criticism directed against the board by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) largely covered a period when the board was under the direction of my esteemed colleague. That criticism, to my mind, is not justified. I know the hon. member's opinions. He has expressed them in the house on many occasions. The period in question was a difficult one for the board, following the war, when retrenchment was required. Periods of retrenchment and deflation are never popular, but sometimes these things must be done; and it is at such times that the real administrative ability and efficiency of the administrator are required to be brought to the fore. As I have done before, I wish to pay tribute to the work my colleague did during that period in defining the operations of the board and establishing those operations on a satisfactory basis in order to face the peacetime period.

During the past two years we have had a number of opportunities to consider the policies of the board, and I think all members have given expression to their views about what the policies should be. The so-called Massey report indicated the direction in which it could be expected that the people of Canada wished the board to progress. On many occasions hon. members have referred to the recommendations of the Massey report. We had opportunities to discuss the policies of the board at the time the legislation was put through this house in 1950, and on the numbers of occasions on which we have discussed the estimates of the board. I think the time has now come to consider the operations of the board in the light of the policies that have been laid down for it.

There is always the question as to how much a government should do in any field and how much private enterprise should do. Just as my colleague who preceded me, I for one have always held the view that the government's agency in this field should do everything possible and practical to stimulate private operators to produce pictures which will reflect Canada to Canadians under the same terms of reference as are laid down as guiding principles for the board itself. I think a good indication that this is being done is contained in Hansard at page 1460, in a reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton). The question was whether or not the national film board distributes films produced by private agencies, provincial governments, governments of other countries and agencies of international co-operation such as the United Nations and the European co-operation administration. The answer is that the board does distribute such films and that the number of subjects in distribution as of the date on which that question was answered was 279, with a total of 3,460 prints. I think it must be clear to hon. members that the government is trying, by every reasonable means at its disposal, to encourage private enterprise in the field.

The hon. member for Peterborough West made a statement—and I think he referred to operations some time ago—in which he said he understood that the national film board charged 10 per cent with respect to films made up by private operators for government departments.

Mr. Fraser: That was back in 1948.

Mr. Winters: My answer to that statement is that the film board charges no such fee, but that they absorb all such costs of administration themselves.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to express the hope that all members of this committee will avail themselves of the fullest opportunity to examine the operations of the board as reflected in its annual report. During the course of the committee's proceedings I hope that hon. members will visit the board's premises in Ottawa and see the conditions under which the employees of the board work. I hope too that all hon. members, including especially the hon. member for Peterborough West, will avail themselves of as many opportunities as possible to see the product which the board turns out.

Motion agreed to.

BRIDGES

BURLINGTON CANAL—REPLACEMENT OF DAMAGED STRUCTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask the Minister of Public Works. Owing to the extreme damage that was done yesterday to the Burlington canal bridge at the entrance to the Hamilton harbour, will the minister consider immediately the plans of his department for a new overhead structure to replace what is left of the present bridge, especially as it is a vital spot in our highway system, leading from the international boundary into northern Canada and the trans-Canada highway?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the appropriate time to make a statement on the incident mentioned by the hon. member.

On April 29, about noon, the steamer W. Fitzgerald, loaded, approached the Burlington channel and whistled for entrance to the harbour through the ingoing channel. At the Burlington canal the channel is divided into two parts, namely the ingoing and the outgoing; and they are separated by a 30-foot pier in the centre of the channel which forms an abutment of the two bridges, one of which spans each of the channels. The railway bridge located 500 feet further towards the lake is a swing bridge where the one bridge spans both channels and is ordinarily in an open position except when passage of trains demands its being used as a crossing. As the Fitzgerald approached, the bridgemaster prepared to raise the bridge and to make the channel clear for the passage. In doing this he closed the gates at both ends and stopped vehicular traffic. When he returned to the operating cabin he found that either the power, which is supplied by the Hydro Electric Power Commission, was not available or there was some mechanical defect that prevented the bridge from lifting. He then signalled the ship to use the outgoing channel but by this time the ship was too far advanced to alter its course. The ship, realizing the difficulty, dropped both anchors and reversed its engines. However, the bridgemaster was still unable to lift the bridge and the ship, though travelling very slow, collided with the bridge in a down position, thus causing the truss to collapse and to turn the operating mechanism out of position. These are the facts as given over the telephone. However, they are being confirmed today by our engineer, Mr. Wilson, who is over getting the details.

As soon as we heard of the accident we dispatched Mr. Thompson, bridge engineer, who is very familiar with the bridge at Hamilton, to look over the situation from the standpoint of what should be done to make a quick replacement. As yet we have no report from either Mr. Wilson or Mr. Thompson. In the meantime we have instructed the department of customs to issue no clearance to the steamer until such time as we have carried on sufficient investigation to determine, even roughly, just what was the exact cause or roughly what liability there was on the steamboat.

The most likely method of replacement would be the installation of two single track Bailey bridges which are suitable for all classes of traffic on a 100-foot span of this type. If these are installed it will mean that the channel will be blocked to navigation and the ingoing and outgoing traffic will have to use the one channel. This will be a great hardship as Hamilton harbour is perhaps one of the busiest harbours in Canada.

It will likely take a period of from two to three weeks to instal the Bailey bridge but for the time being we have arranged with the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, who have several of them, to hold what is required for this particular position. We will in all likelihood have to make arrangements with them or with Hamilton Bridge Company, Limited, which I consider will be perfectly satisfactory as they have made them many times and are perhaps the people in Canada most familiar with the installation of them.

The question of whether or not the bridge should be rebuilt or viewed through wider eyes and abandoned to the use of other crossings of the canal and the substitution of a high level fixed bridge to carry vehicular traffic over the canal and at the same time provide a wider channel for navigation can then be gone into.

At the recent meeting of the Dominion Marine Association held about a month ago, their navigation committee came to this office and made special representations asking that the centre pier be removed and that the channel be widened. Their reasons for this were that the vessels, particularly the new larger type, were such that navigation through such a narrow channel was extremely difficult and hazardous. They recommended the construction of a high level bridge located on the line of the present railway.

We have in the department a plan prepared by Colonel Thompson, in his capacity of chief engineer of the Hamilton Bridge Commission, which has already been discussed with the department of highways in Toronto, and this might form a basis of negotiations with the Ontario department of highways whose interests are material by reason of the importance of the Queen Elizabeth highway.

USE OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY BRIDGE BY PEDESTRIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I have another question in this connection that I wish to ask the Minister of Transport. If the answer is not available today, perhaps he will take this as notice. Owing to the tie-up of traffic caused by the damage to the Burlington canal bridge yesterday, will the minister consider allowing the use of the Canadian National railway bridge for pedestrian traffic?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I spoke to one of the officers of the Canadian National Railways, who is in the city today, and he was unable to give me a definite answer because he wanted to get in touch with the superintendent of the Toronto area. Until he does, I am unable to reply categorically to my hon. friend's question.

HIGHWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF ROAD BETWEEN STEWART RIVER CROSSING AND DAWSON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Simmons (Yukon-Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Is the minister prepared to say what progress is being made in regard to the construction of a road this year, following the survey made last year, between Stewart River crossing and Dawson?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the financial agreement between the federal government and the government of the Yukon Territory, there are two main classifications of such roads. One is resource roads which are the responsibility of the federal government, and the other is trunk roads, which are the responsibility of the Yukon government. This road in question has both trunk and resource characteristics. In the circumstances, both governments are interested. At the present time discussions are going on with the commissioner of the Yukon Territory to see if an equitable basis of participation can be arrived at, if this project is to proceed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Simmons: I have a supplementary question. Will a start be made on construction this year?

Mr. Winters: That depends in part, Mr. Speaker, on what agreement can be arrived at with the commissioner of the Yukon Territory.

STRAIT OF CANSO CAUSEWAY

PROVISION IN CONTRACT FOR MINIMUM WAGE RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Transport? If and when the master contract for the Canso causeway is let, will the Department of Transport, in co-operation with the Department of Labour, attach to that contract a wage schedule that is fair to the many areas in Nova Scotia from which labour and technical personnel will be drawn?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his question several days ago, but because of circumstances over which neither of us had any control it was impossible to deal with it until now. The answer is that schedules of labour have been arranged by the Department of Labour, showing minimum rates of wages for all classes of labour, which will be attached to the contract or contracts entered into by the Department of Transport for the construction of the Canso causeway.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENT

REPORT OF OPERATIONS FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1952

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house to revert to motions. I beg leave to table the report of the operations of the Bretton Woods agreement for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I also wish the house to be kind enough to revert to motions. By leave of the house I move the following motion:

That, in relation to the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means and any amendment or amendments thereto, on the budget brought down Tuesday, April 8, 1952, the provisions of standing order 28 be suspended until the said debate be concluded.

Under standing order 28 the house resolves itself into committee of ways and means, or committee of supply, without question put, on Thursdays and Fridays. Therefore, if we wish to continue the debate on the budget tomorrow and Friday I have to move this motion, with the consent of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT

RADIO STATION "VOUS"—CONGESTION AT HALIFAX OF FREIGHT FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Transport has a couple of answers to questions I asked him yesterday.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have yet to get the questions before I answer them.

Mr. Higgins: The questions are on Hansard. I will read them.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry; I did not see them.

Mr. Higgins: My first question, Mr. Speaker, is this:

Was radio station VOUS, operated by the United States air force at Pepperrell air force base, St. John's, Newfoundland, compelled or requested to cease broadcasting?

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry; I was not aware of the question on Hansard, because I had to be in a committee yesterday. The answer to the question in so far as the department is concerned is that radio station VOUS was neither compelled nor requested to cease operations.

Mr. Higgins: Then it is fair to say, so far as your department is concerned, VOUS can continue broadcasting?

Mr. Chevrier: I gave my hon. friend the answer to his question; I can neither add to nor subtract from it.

Mr. Higgins: My second question is to be found on the same page and reads as follows:

What is being done to take care of the freight congestion at Halifax of freight destined for St. John's, Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: I understand there was some congestion in that area ten days ago, but that situation has bettered itself considerably. In any event, the Canadian National Railways have chartered another vessel from Furness Withy, which should be in operation this week.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I wish to mention, because I will not be here at six o'clock, that we will continue the debate on the budget tomorrow and Friday. If that debate is concluded we will take up legislation in the name of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier).

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 29, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, when I broke off last evening I was dealing with a subject concerning which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has just spoken, namely, the operation of radio station VOUS. As I said yesterday, while the matter does not have great importance to all of Canada, nevertheless it is of importance to a great section of Newfoundland. It has the further element that it is most useful to and greatly wanted by United States forces in Newfoundland.

Apart altogether from the very selfish aspect of the matter, that the station means so much to us in Newfoundland in the development of friendship between United States forces and the people of that province, and apart altogether from the good programs which have emanated from the station, particularly for those people who enjoy listening to a ball game, there is also the selfish angle that our continued good relations with United States personnel mean a great deal to us by way of coin of the realm. I am sure no member from Newfoundland would want anything to interfere with that happy relationship. I was assured yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that his department had taken no action. It would appear therefore that the present situation in connection with the operation of the station would be the same as it has been since 1941 when the United States forces first came to Newfoundland and established American bases there.

I am assured today by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that his department has taken no action. It would seem to be clear that there is no other control of broadcasting, except that maintained by this government. I would presume that the provincial government certainly could not control the operation of the station. So I get back to the premise I stated last night, which I now feel is the correct one, that the station has ceased broadcasting as a result of the manœuvring of station CJON, the other commercial station in St. John's. In making that suggestion I am confident it is the correct one.

While this matter may not be one of great importance to all parts of the dominion, because of the importance of international relations and of friendship with our American friends, I believe the suitable minister, if necessary the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself, should give assurance to the United States forces in Newfoundland that there is no objection to the operation of that station. This would give great pleasure to American personnel and to the people of Newfoundland. I have sent to the Minister of Transport a great number of newspaper clippings, even more of which have come to my desk today. They consist of editorials in local newspapers, and numerous letters. This is not a subject brought forward only as a talking point. On the contrary, it is a matter of some importance, and I take this opportunity to make my complaint. I am certain that ministers of the government will agree with me that whatever steps should be taken should be taken by them, so that radio station VOUS may continue its broadcasting, and render a service to the people of Newfoundland.

I mentioned last night that the presence of United States troops constitutes one of our great industries in Newfoundland. Perhaps my description may have been a misnomer, but the fact remains that a considerable amount of money is being left in Newfoundland through the operations there of American bases. I think it is possibly the high-liner of money-returning industries in Newfoundland today, if it can be called an industry.

And, in connection with the establishment of new industries, I am happy to note that a company known as the Newfoundland-Labrador Company—I believe that is the correct name of it—has as its chairman Sir William Stephenson, and that it has gone into that province and taken over the operation of the new industrial program established by the provincial government. Press reports would seem to indicate that Sir William has gone in with the blessing and possibly with the active co-operation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). At all events the minister has allowed himself to be quoted as saying that he is pleased that Sir William Stephenson has done that, and Sir William Stephenson has said that it was at the request of the minister that he agreed to take over the job.

We are happy about it because, quite frankly, we were more than anxious about the way matters had been going under governmental control of these new industries. The surplus left by the commission of government, and which we had hoped would continue for some years, has practically vanished. The schemes for which some of that money has been used by the provincial government are, to say the least, very much on a par with some of the South Sea bubbles of the old days.

In having Sir William Stephenson come to Newfoundland the minister has done us a real service, because he has taken the government out of business. That is Sir William's statement; and I understand it was as a result of Sir William's insistence that the premier said the government was turning over the operation of all its industries to this corporation. We do trust that this will be a good measure. Certainly it will reassure our people that the moneys there will be spent wisely.

Because of the expenditure of moneys there will have to be a demand on the federal government for a revision of the terms. One of the terms of union was that a royal commission would be set up within eight years to review the finances of the province. That will be looked upon with a benevolent eye. I can assure the minister who will be taking care of this matter that it is very necessary, because the financial picture of the government of Newfoundland today is not a happy one.

I shall not say more in that connection at the present time. I am glad to learn from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) today that congestion of freight at Halifax has been taken care of through supplying a boat of the Furness Withy Company to take care of the excess freight. The situation has been a deplorable one. I know of one instance where cars ordered by an importer had left Windsor on April 1, but had not reached him on April 17 the day I left to come to Ottawa. They had been left in Halifax and had not been forwarded to St. John's in that length of time. One can very well see the effect on business of such terrific congestion. I am glad to know that it has been taken care of.

I wish to refer to another matter and one which directly concerns the budget. Before coming here I had a meeting with the tobacco workers international union No. 307 whose members are employed in the Imperial Tobacco Company branch at St. John's. It is a factory that has been in operation for very many years, and the employees are becoming worried as to future operations because of the excessive taxes on tobacco. The plant has been running on short time and consequently the workers do not have as much take-home pay. The president of the union, Mr. John Madden, wrote me a letter which I wish to put on the record. It reads as follows:

> We wish to draw to your attention our views concerning the outrageous budget brought down by Mr. Abbott. Sir, the budget is about as fine a piece of sabotage of any industry as I have ever heard of. He takes three cents off a pack of cigarettes, then, to add injury to the insult, he takes the same amount off the American cigarettes. This man must have a mania for taxes. He states the government lost money, not because sales dropped off but on account of a strike and a price increase by the manufacturer. This Mr. Abbott knows to be totally untrue. He also states there is very little smuggling of American cigarettes. The man must be blind as well as stubborn.
> The manufacturer advanced prices last year by one cent. This did not mean anything. Cigarettes retail out of ship stores for 10 cents a pack of 20. This gives the manufacturer a good profit. Where did the rest of the 40 cents go? I can tell Mr. Abbott where part of it goes, to schemes like the Ming Sung Company which cost a few million, but what is that, or to armies so far on paper. Mr. Abbott takes nothing off the plug or cut tobaccos. The only thing about cut and plug is that they are no worse off than before he brought down his insulting reduction on cigarettes. Plug and cut tobaccos are smoked by frugal people with very few creature comforts, but this means nothing to Mr. Abbott. Mr. Abbott takes your job and the shirt off your back, and then he will look around for a way to spend the money. On behalf of the hundreds who have lost their positions, and of those who will yet have to give up theirs, we wish to thank Mr. Abbott for nothing. To end this letter, I must say I think Mr. Abbott is named wrong. So I now christen him Barabbas.

In company possibly with many other hon. members, and certainly many citizens of the dominion, this being the 30th day of April I also felt very much like using that name when making up my income tax because quite truthfully it was rather a shock to realize that you had to put your hand in your pocket for so much money. We have heard of the tremendous surplus and we have heard no explanation of how it is being used, at least, no explanation that bears water with me. Therefore it seems to me very much like a story that I heard some time ago. There was a gentleman who was always encouraging people to enter politics but he himself was never prepared to do so. He was a fine, outstanding man and in fact is a great friend and close associate of mine. He would be a very admirable person to be a member of parliament. A clergyman said to him: "Mr. Blank, I take it you are going to agree to be a candidate". "Oh no", my friend said, "I really cannot. I should like to but I am too busy". The clergyman said to him, "Well,

I know you are a good person. You read your bible a lot. You should read verse 46 of the 11th chapter of St. Luke". When my friend, who of course does follow his bible very well, got home he took his bible and read this particular verse. I think it is quite appropriate to the present budget and that is why I am going to read it, bearing in mind that the minister in private life is of the same profession as myself. It reads as follows:

> And he said, Woe unto you also, ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers.

That is the position. I expect that next year, when there will very likely be an election in the fall, not only will fingers be put to the budget but the whole hand, and we will have a very much different budget to face at that time. I am sorry that the minister is not here but his very able parliamentary assistant is, and I know he will bear in mind the request of the tobacco workers union of St. John's, and I hope he will endeavour to take away in the next budget the name that the minister has been christened.

Mr. R. J. Wood (Norquay): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to speak in the budget debate because it gives me an opportunity to deal with a matter with which I have been more or less concerned all through my life. I was born in a rural area in the province of Manitoba where we have no manufacturers. I am going to touch briefly today on the question of tariffs. I am sorry to say that in the budget there is very little reduction in tariffs. There is a small reduction with respect to the importation of glass but apart from that there is practically no reduction in tariffs whatever. Throughout Canadian history it is the Liberal party alone from which relief has been received so far as tariff walls are concerned.

In Manitoba and the other prairie provinces we are primary producers. We produce grain, livestock and poultry, and we catch fish. Farther west there is oil and gas, and in the north there are minerals. Canadian manufacturers are located in what is known as central Canada, an area bordered by the cities of Montreal, Oshawa, Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor, Sarnia, Sudbury and Ottawa. Central Canada is the territory inside that triangle, and it is known as industrial Canada. When I talk about central or industrial Canada that is the locality to which I have reference.

Tariffs were originally set up in the form of a fairly strong wall in 1879 during the days of the Sir John A. Macdonald government. In 1896 under the Tupper government the wall was made larger and more dominant. Following the election of 1911, tariffs were made still higher under the late Sir Robert Borden government. Then after the election in 1930 we got the Bennett government, under which we had tariff walls higher than ever before or since in Canadian history. All through the history of Canada our tariff walls were increased during the times the Conservatives were in power. The only time we got any relief was when we had a Liberal government. We were given relief under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and previous to the election of 1911 he promised that if the Liberals won that election we would have considerable relief through reciprocity. Unfortunately, particularly for western Canada, we lost that election. Under the government of William Lyon Mackenzie King tariffs were lowered on many occasions; and as I said in the beginning, I am rather disappointed that in this budget we were not given more relief from tariffs.

Today we hear from hon. members to the left the same kind of talk we had back in the days of Arthur Meighen and R. B. Bennett. We hear talk of Canada first, and we hear demands for a meeting of the British commonwealth of nations. This Canada first talk is not new in this country. Arthur Meighen and his followers were talking about Canada first in this house for five years, from 1921 to 1925. Only one group of people in this country would benefit from Canada first; that is the owners of industry. And as far as I can see, no good would come from a meeting of the British commonwealth of nations. We had two or three meetings of the commonwealth nations shortly after R. B. Bennett's government was elected in 1930, and each meeting resulted in more restrictions upon trade with our neighbours and best customers, the United States.

I remember the conditions that existed under the Bennett government when the highest tariffs in our history were put up. During the campaign we had men come into our halls and schools and ask if we were satisfied with 28 cents a pound for our butter and 22 cents a dozen for our eggs. Not long after that we were getting only 14 cents a pound for butter and 7 cents a dozen for eggs. They asked if we were satisfied with the prices we were getting for grain. After they got into power we could not sell our grain at all. I have in mind a farmer living a little west of Virden in western Manitoba who wanted to get some money to send his children to high school, so he loaded a carload of 1,800 bushels of barley, shipped it to Fort William and waited for the return. His only return was a bill from the railway company for $7.32 still owing for freight on the car. He did not have the $7.32; a farmer could not sell anything for cash under the Bennett government because we had no markets, so he wrote back to the railway company and said he was sorry he did not have any cash, but he had more barley.

I was running a transport from 1933 to 1935 and I know how the market was for cattle and hogs in those days. During 1934 I saw carloads of pretty fair grades of cattle coming to the stockyards at St. Boniface from Saskatchewan and Alberta, and being unloaded and sold for one-half cent per pound. Naturally you will wonder how the farmer could pay the freight. Arrangements were made in those days whereby the railway absorbed one-third of the cost of freight, the farmer absorbed one-third, and the government absorbed the remaining third. In that way they were able to take these surplus cattle off the prairies and sell them for a half cent per pound. That was $5 for a thousand pound animal; that is what pretty fair animals were selling for at the stockyards in those days. Our hogs were selling at $4 a head. When I hear hon. members to the left worrying and accusing our government of doing nothing about markets for our cattle, I think they should clean their own doorstep first.

Mr. Ferguson: We have foot-and-mouth disease under the Liberal government.

Mr. Wood: The tough times on the prairies under R. B. Bennett are not going to be forgotten for quite a while. During those days the farmers could not get cash for their eggs, their butter, their grain, their cattle or their hogs. As a result they could hardly get enough cash to buy the necessities of life for their families.

Mr. Brooks: It was the same all over the world.

Mr. Wood: I can remember that in those days, because a farmer could not get gas to run his car, he would take out the engine, put a tongue and doubletree in front of his car, and pull it around with horses. We see those old cars sitting in barnyard corners today, and they are known as Bennett wagons. In western Canada the Bennett government will go down in history for having at least introduced the Bennett wagon. That resulted partly from the policy of Canada first, and that is what might happen again if we had another meeting of commonwealth nations which would introduce measures that would interfere with trade with the United States.

Mr. Ferguson: May I ask the hon. member one question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

[Mr. Wood.]

Mr. Wood: If the hon. member wishes to ask a question he might wait until I am finished. I will be glad to answer his question then. Since 1879, when the first tariff wall was set up in Canada under Sir John A. Macdonald, industry has expanded and become very strong. I have reference particularly to the textile industry which has expanded enormously, particularly in central Canada. Why shouldn't it? The textile industry in Canada enjoys now, as it has all through Canadian history, the highest protection of any industry in Canada. I have here a table of textile industries in Ontario and Quebec divided into two groups, the first being those producing textile goods with fur content and the second those producing textiles without fur content. I find that in Quebec there are 2,109 establishments producing textiles with fur content and 1,801 producing textiles without fur content. In the first group in Ontario there are 1,386 establishments, and in the second group 1,143. This makes a total of 3,495 textile establishments in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec producing textiles with fur content, and 2,944 producing textiles without fur content.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a fair indication of just how prosperous the textile industry in Canada has become. While I am on this topic I should like to mention that recently I was told of a man in western Ontario who, thirty-two years ago, wished to build a textile establishment. He had a small amount of money of his own, but in order to build his first plant he borrowed $25,000. He built his first establishment and, in the meantime, has expanded until today he has three textile establishments and he is rated at $2½ million. When people come into this house and say that the textile industry is not doing well you just cannot believe them. I feel sorry for hon. members to the left of me who come in here and plead for support for the textile industry. I feel sorry also that they would use unemployment as an excuse when requesting support for the industry. I wonder if they really believe that getting more support will result in less unemployment? I am of the opinion that it would work in reverse. I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that if there were more tariffs to support textiles the unemployment would become worse.

Our people today do a lot of travelling and they know the price they are paying for textiles in this country. They know the prices that are being charged in the United States for similar goods. Two or three days ago I was in the United States when I was coming back from my Easter holidays. I was driving back through the city of Duluth, Minnesota. I entered a store to obtain a couple of shirts of a brand that is sold in Ottawa, that is the Arrow shirt. In Duluth I bought these two shirts for $3.95 per shirt. They are of a good texture, equal to any you can get in this city of the same brand. I went into one of the better stores in Ottawa, E. R. Fisher on Sparks street, and was told that their Arrow shirts were $4.95. I said, "Is that the only Arrow shirt you have?", the man said, "We have them at higher prices, but that is the cheapest shirt that Arrow makes in Canada." This shirt sold on Sparks street for $4.95, and in comparing the quality I believe the one purchased in Duluth is the better shirt of the two. This is what we in the western provinces are up against, and have been up against ever since Sir John Macdonald instituted the first tariff wall of any consequence.

From the dominion bureau—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Wood: I am sorry to see the hon. gentleman to the left of me so worried about these conditions I am mentioning. These conditions are known to many people across Canada who travel in the United States.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): These statements are so inaccurate. About three-quarters of what you said is inaccurate, and I should like to point out the inaccuracies right here.

Mr. Wood: I have a report from the dominion bureau of statistics dated January 2, 1952, which gives me the various tariffs charged against the importation of goods coming into Canada. At the top of the list we have passenger cars, tariff No. 438, and the British preference and most-favoured-nation rates are shown. Now, the United States is included in the most-favoured-nation rate. She is our closest neighbour and our best customer. The most-favoured-nation rate on automobiles coming into Canada is 15 per cent. On a $2,000 car that is $300. The general tariff rate is 27½ per cent.

Refrigerators—these are the boys—Westinghouse, General Electric and these other large manufacturers have grown rich at the expense of the consumers of this country. I am not surprised at United States concerns coming to Canada to erect factories, because this is certainly a lush market; we certainly get it in the neck from these industries. We have the British preference tariff against refrigerators of 17½ per cent. The most-favoured-nation rate, including the United States, is 20 per cent, and the general tariff is 40 per cent. Radios: from Great Britain they are free. From most-favoured nations there is a duty of 20 per cent and the general tariff rate is 30 per cent.

Then, we have electrical appliances including electric stoves, washing machines, toasters, irons, mixmasters, vacuum cleaners, and so on. The British preference on those goods is 15 per cent, with the exception of irons, 12½ per cent; mixmasters, 10 per cent and vacuum cleaners, 5 per cent. The most-favoured-nation rate on all those items is 22½ per cent. This will serve as a small indication of why we are paying the ridiculous prices for stoves, washing machines, refrigerators and other electrical appliances that we are paying today.

Mr. Ferguson: I hope the Toronto Star prints your speech.

Mr. Wood: I hope so too. I am sure the Toronto Star and the Globe and Mail as well would learn a lesson. The general tariff on these goods, Mr. Speaker, is as follows: On stoves, it is 30 per cent; washing machines, 35 per cent; and on toasters, 30 per cent; irons, 27½ per cent; mixmasters, 35 per cent, and so on down the line.

Then, we come to shirts. The British preference on shirts made from woven fabrics, wholly of cotton, is 25 per cent. The most-favoured-nation rate is 25 per cent, and the general tariff rate is 35 per cent plus 4 cents per pound. You will notice that 25 per cent just works out to the difference between the United States price and the Canadian price on those shirts. That is what industry in Canada is doing. They are just calculating the retail value of these goods from the United States, not only for refrigerators, washing machines, automobiles but also shirts that are made in Canada, and then adding on the amount of the tariff; that is what the customers are paying.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Subsidizing industry.

Mr. Wood: That is what I am coming to. Within the last five years the western provinces have produced, in agriculture alone, over $5 billion worth of goods. We cannot come down into Ontario and sell any of those goods.

Mr. Ferguson: Why not?

Mr. Wood: We cannot.

Mr. Ferguson: You sell millions of dollars' worth of goods in Ontario.

Mr. Wood: We cannot sell any here, and that is what I want to come to now. We produced over a billion and a half dollars' worth of goods, and when western producers come to sell their goods they cannot sell them in Ontario. We have to sell our goods throughout the world over the top of tariff barriers. We have been able to sell our cattle in the United States, thanks to the Mackenzie King government. In 1936, through the good offices of the late W. L. Mackenzie King, we were allowed to sell to the United States a total of 250,000 cattle a year, and from that time right up until today our cattle market has been increasing in price. The outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease has put an end to that, however. If we are to go back and depend on the British market, as we did prior to 1948, our prices are not going to be very good in this country, and I am afraid our production of cattle in this country will go down a great deal also.

An hon. Member: Too poor to buy.

Mr. Wood: That is right; too poor to buy. I want to say that in my constituency and our province of Manitoba we caught in the last year over 30 million pounds of fish. In my constituency alone we caught over 10 million pounds. When we go down to the cities of Windsor, Hamilton or Toronto, however, and ask those cities if they will buy our fish, they say, "No, we have lots of fish of our own."

Mr. Brown (Essex West): We will buy your goldeye any time.

Mr. Wood: Ninety-eight per cent of the fish caught in my constituency is shipped to Minneapolis and Chicago. When we get cash back—and that is what we get; and we are considered a sheltered market—we are compelled by this tariff barrier to send the money down to central Canada for the goods we require for our livelihood.

I consider that that is discrimination against the consumers in western Canada. I consider—and I am sorry to have to say this, but I must do so—that it has cost Manitoba too much to belong to confederation. Tariffs are just a handout to industry.

Mr. Sinclair: They are subsidies.

Mr. Wood: They keep in business a man who should be out of business. They allow him to charge a larger profit than would be charged if conditions were equal. That is the result of tariffs. As I said before, I am sorry that this budget does not show more reduction in the tariffs than it shows. I feel that if we are going to get any relief at all from tariffs, we have to get it through a Liberal administration because Canadian history shows that we will not get it from the Conservatives. Certainly the Conservatives in their talk do not show any disposition to favour any relief whatever in the future with regard to tariffs.

I have here a statement, and I want to quote it, which was made by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) who, I believe I might say with apology to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins), is perhaps the leader of the Conservatives in the new province of Newfoundland. This is what he says, as reported at page 790 of Hansard of November 7, 1951:

> I think that is the experience of anyone who has recently visited the United States.

He is talking about prices.

> They will agree that, in almost 99 per cent of the goods that they saw there, their observation of prices showed that the prices are lower in the United States than they are in Canada. This article sets out a list comparing the prices, and only in two or three cases are they higher in the United States.

That is just an observation that everybody in this country knows.

I have here a quotation that I want to give you from another leading Conservative, namely the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). I understand that the hon. member for Three Rivers is the president of the Young Liberal Association of Canada.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Conservative.

Mr. Wood: Yes, of the Young Progressive Conservative Association. As he is one who is in such an important position, I would presume that he is here voicing Conservative policy. He says here—and you will find this at page 491 of Hansard of October 29, 1951:

> Again I urge the government to prohibit immediately all meat exports to the United States, so that the price of beef, for instance,—which is a basic food—may return to a level that would be commensurate with the income of the average Canadian, while still enabling western cattle breeders to make a reasonable profit. As long as we export our meat to the United States where salaries are much higher than in Canada,—

You will notice what he says about salaries, namely that they are much higher in the United States than they are in Canada.

> —our fellow citizens will have to go without meat . . .

And so on. That is a statement of which I hope our cattle producers throughout the country will take note. As he is the president of the young Conservatives of Canada, I presume that the Conservative party will agree with that statement.

I have here a statement by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) and I was rather surprised at this statement in view of the fact that he represents a new province. Of course, if the country is full of industries I can understand the statement. But if it is not full of industries—and I doubt that it is—then I cannot understand this statement coming from a man who is considered to hold a fairly high position in that party. I might say that this statement may be found at page 735 of Hansard of November 5, 1951. As he is there reported, the hon. member said:

> I just want to draw to the attention of the house the fact that we import about $1,500 million worth of goods a year from the United States,—

That is all right.

> —upon which a large amount of customs duty is paid. I suppose the customs duties collected by the Canadian government must run into an amount of about $250 million.

I would judge that they run into more than that. I would judge that they run to at least $300 million. He continues:

> I do not know how much is collected from the United States, but there must be a substantial proportion of that amount. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance is present in the chamber listening to what is being said. Would he approve such a policy? What would the other countries of the commonwealth say? They would say: What? You are going to make a special friend of the United States and let their goods in free? What about the rest of the world? The United States is the greatest country in the world at the present time. You are going to help her to become greater; you are going to throw your doors open to the United States, and are not going to give us any chance. What about the people in Canada who are working in factories that were built up by this protection? Are we going to throw the doors open to allow foreign goods to come into this country? Such a suggestion is fantastic . . .

Mr. Speaker, I will say that such a suggestion is not fantastic. I would also say, speaking about inflation and the high cost of living, that I believe if the tariffs were lowered by 25 per cent tomorrow we would have a reduction of at least 15 points in our cost of living index inside of ten days.

The automobile industry has become extremely strong in this country. The Ford motor company and the Chrysler corporation have built up a great city in Windsor. Certainly General Motors have built a great city in Oshawa. They all complain of the corporation taxes being too high. Nevertheless, I note that General Motors in Oshawa are extending their plant at a cost of $8 million this year.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): They are losing money.

Mr. Wood: They may be losing money, but they are spending $8 million on a new truck plant this year. Studebaker down in Hamilton is not doing too badly either. As I said before, we produce over $1,500 million worth of goods in the western provinces each year. We sell these goods not in Ontario or in Quebec because we have no market there for those goods. We must sell them throughout the world wherever we can find a market. But when we need to spend our money, Mr. Speaker, and when we need to buy goods that we require, whether it be automobiles, clothing, boots and shoes, furniture or anything else, because of our tariff system we are compelled to funnel all that wealth right down here into the centre of Canada.

I have a reply to a question of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) which appeared on the order paper, and in which he asked for the value of the agricultural products of the three prairie provinces. The reply says that in 1950 the three prairie provinces produced $1 billion worth of goods. I also have a statement from the automobile industry showing the number of cars, trucks and buses produced in Canada. A total of 390,102 cars, trucks and buses were produced in 1950 at a valuation of $610 million. This reply to the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond says that, in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and in Alberta 93,763 cars, trucks and buses were purchased, which amounts to 24 per cent of the entire production of 1950 at a valuation of $190 million. That is 30 per cent of $610 million, the entire cost of these cars, trucks and buses produced in 1950. Therefore when you talk about the wealth that is produced in the west, and what becomes of it, just keep in mind that we have to find markets throughout the world but when it comes to spending our money it comes down into the central part of Canada into the cities of Windsor, Oshawa, Toronto and Hamilton, and other cities in this area that I described when I rose to my feet, and we get nothing in return. We are paying and continually bonusing, the industries down here because of the tariff, and we are getting nothing in return. I say that it has cost Manitoba producers and my constituents too much money to belong to confederation.

I have another little quotation that I wish to bring to the attention of the house. It is a remark of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), which he made on March 18, concerning corporation taxes. I am going to read this remark of his because, in my opinion, he probably expresses an opinion here that does not conform with my interpretation of what he said. He said, at page 571 of Hansard:

> There are different methods of dealing with those inflationary pressures. There is one way this government has not attempted, by which it can deal with inflationary pressures better than by any other method at this moment. That is to stop this overtaxation. Some $721 million of overtaxation in the first nine months is $721 million taken from the pockets of our people which has added by that much to their expenditures. Let it not be said that a substantial part of this is represented by corporation taxes. No one knows better than the Minister of Finance that if firms are to stay in business corporation taxes are going to be passed on to the consumer and they always will. Every hon. member in the house knows that no other method can be employed under a system which seeks to retain some measure of profit as an alternative to bankruptcy. All this is paid by the people, and has been taken out of their pockets.

It is true that that is being paid by the people. I have no complaint to make about that statement. It is absolutely true. I also see that he is quoted in the Hamilton Spectator as making the same statement in Beamsville. The following appears in that paper:

> This year's budget, he said, meant an average of $315 for every man, woman and child in Canada to pay the Canadian government alone, not including provincial or municipal taxes.
> The invisible taxes were much greater than the income tax, and corporation tax was "a second hidden sales tax with every cent being paid by the people."

That is true. All these taxes are being paid by the people. I am not taking any objection to that statement. It is true that all taxes come from the pockets of the people, whether they are hidden taxes or otherwise. But if corporation taxes are reduced, it does not follow that we shall be able to buy goods any cheaper. That is the point. It means only that corporation profits will be greater, and the shareholders of the corporations will get bigger dividends. Therefore the people that the leader of the opposition is interested in are the class of people who own the corporations. I am not surprised at this, because the leader of the opposition leads a party that has always been interested in the people who own corporations. It is nothing new.

You often hear, Mr. Speaker, of after-dinner speeches being made in some of these cities along the central line of Canada and the United States, where they rise to emphasize the imaginary line. I want to say that there is nothing imaginary about this line between Canada and the United States. I would say that as far as trade is concerned, the line between Canada and the United States is an iron curtain. It is an iron curtain that was first established under the Sir John A. Macdonald government, and made stronger under the Tupper government, and then still higher under the Arthur Meighen government and by devious ways and means under the R. B. Bennett government it was made still higher. They had such things as British preferential tariff, and then the most-favoured-nation clause, the general tariff, quotas, administrative orders and everything else. The result is that there is great trouble to get anything out of the United States and into this country. You have to get a permit; then there are quotas, administrative orders, and all the various sections of the tariff. That is what we are up against in this country. I now come to item 491 in the budget, which provides for the expenditure of $1,500,000 for the tourist trade. Personally, I think it is a good thing to encourage tourists to come to Canada and see our lovely country, and try to get them to spend their money here. But I have a statement from the Free Press which says that in 1950 Canadian tourists spent $140 per capita in the United States; whereas the United States tourists spent $10 per capita in Canada. There is nothing whatever surprising about that when you consider the different levels of prices. You know, the people of the United States are not any more foolish than we are. I think they are probably a lot smarter than we are. The people of the United States have their own money; they earn that money. They come to Canada, and they look around for something to buy. When they walk into the stores and shops and find that the level of prices is from 15 per cent to 20 per cent higher than they are in the United States they say: What is the use of buying this stuff here? They go home and they buy what they want at home. Many Americans come to Canada, and they would spend the money they have, but they find nothing to spend it on. The only things they buy in this country are gasoline, food and probably a little English chinaware, and a few trinkets that they take home with them just to show that they were in Canada. They walk into the stores, and they see an ordinary shirt. That shirt would cost them $4.95 in Ottawa, but they can get it for $3.95 in their own city, and they say: What is the use of spending money in this country? They look at a refrigerator which costs $400 in this country, but they can buy it for $265 in any city in the United States. The spread in automobile prices is around $500. Many people say that this spread is taken up in the sales and excise taxes. Do not believe that story. The tax on a Chevrolet car today is approximately $353. There is a federal tax on the same car of $129 in the United States, so that the spread in taxes in the two countries is of the order of about $230. The spread between the Canadian and the United States tax is not of the greatest importance; it is the spread the automobile industry collects in this country that makes the difference.

I should not like to close without mentioning one further matter. The farmers of Ontario and Quebec are in a preferred position. Situated here in the central provinces, they are close to the industrial centres where, if there is any little market at all, it is available to them. I say "any little market at all", because it is not very big. Those of us from the west are not able to sell our goods down here in industrial Canada—and I wish to emphasize that fact. We have had unfortunate experiences with our fish, because we found we could not sell a box of fish in this part of the country.

I say the farmers of Ontario and Quebec are in a preferred position, because they live close to these large industries. We must keep in mind that for the past number of years the federal treasury has been bonusing the Ontario and Quebec farmers to the extent of $6 per ton on feed for their cattle and hogs. I say that, in the light of that fact, it shows a lack of grace on the part of any citizen of either Ontario or Quebec when he criticizes the payment of $65 million received by the farmers of the west for their grain. That is only pin money when compared with the hundreds of millions of dollars we pour into central Canada in the payment of prices that are too high for the goods we buy. I say that hundreds of millions of dollars have been poured in for that purpose, and that it shows ill grace on the part of any citizen of Ontario and Quebec to mention the payment of $65 million. So far as that is concerned, it is a matter of only two or three cents a bushel; so that if a farmer does sell a thousand bushels it is only a matter of $25. That same farmer will buy a Chevrolet automobile and will have to pay $300 more for it than if he could buy it across the boundary line. So I suggest the citizens of Ontario and Quebec should not make reference to that $65 million any more.

Mr. Ferguson: If it is the ideal place, why do you not move down here?

Mr. Wood: Before closing, I wish to comment upon the budget. I believe the budget is a good one. I wish to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) for budgeting on a pay-as-you-go basis. If we are going to cut down on our taxation it would mean that we would have to sell bonds and borrow in order to carry on. I think that would be a wrong policy for Canada at this time, with the country as prosperous as it is.

Again may I say that I commend the budget, and I am well pleased with it. I am not satisfied to see that tariffs have not been reduced but, apart from that fact, I am pleased with the budget and offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance.

At this point I should like to voice my gratitude to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for having secured markets in past years. I must say that it is not the price one gets for his product that means everything. Price is a secondary consideration. The fact that he has a market for his goods is the important thing.

One has only to refer to what the condition was in the days of the late R. B. Bennett. He was going to get us markets, and give us big prices. But he did not get the markets. He did not make an effort during that time to get markets for our cattle, and when the United States government passed a measure of reciprocity in 1934 he neglected to do anything on our behalf. It was not until 1936, when the Mackenzie King government took office, that we were able to make any kind of satisfactory deal. So there is no use of members in the opposition talking about markets.

I am not kicking about prices. Although they might not be as high as might be desired, let us have the markets. I offer my word of gratitude, as I have said, to those two ministers, because they have done more for the people in western Canada than have all other men put together.

I could speak much longer, but I believe I shall not do so at this time. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your indulgence.

On motion of Mr. Courtemanche the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Graydon: What will be the business tomorrow?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We will continue this debate.

Mr. Knowles: That is what the Minister of Public Works said.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 1, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

SASKATCHEWAN—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE AND OTHER DOCUMENTS

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege again in connection with the return that was passed on March 12, and which reads:

For a copy of all communications that passed between veterinary officials either provincial or federal and the federal Department of Agriculture, together with all records since the 17th day of November, 1951, relative to the cattle epidemic of vesicular stomatitis or foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan, also all certificates or statements of analysis showing the results of the chemical examination of suspected specimens of either of said cattle diseases.

I would ask the minister to produce further documents that today were brought before the committee on agriculture, and that should have been included in this return; also the certificates or statements of analysis, none of which appear in the documents that were tabled here.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I understand that the matter referred to by the hon. member was discussed in the committee this morning, and my hon. friend wishes to have the documents which were tabled in the committee tabled here as well. That will be done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are still some, other than those tabled in the committee. There are still the certificates of analyses that were ordered to be tabled here, and they have not been tabled in the committee as yet, nor have they been tabled here. The place where those documents were to be tabled was the House of Commons, and I am asking now particularly for these certificates of analyses, none of which was included in the return tabled.

Mr. Gardiner: So far as I know there is one table of analyses which should be in the documents. I indicated that this morning, and it was to have been produced this afternoon in the committee. I am not sure that it is ready for production. If it is, it will be there, but in any case it will be brought in.

LIGHT ENGINE PLEASURE AIRCRAFT

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What light engine pleasure aircraft suitable for flying club use are manufactured in Canada?
2. What is the price of these aircraft respectively?
3. What light single engine aircraft of types similar to the above are imported from the United States?
4. What is the price of these aircraft respectively, in the United States and Canada?
5. What is the tariff imposed on these aircraft imported from the United States?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. There are no light engine pleasure aircraft suitable for flying club use manufactured in Canada at the present time.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 1.

WARTIME HOUSING—SALE OF PROPERTIES IN BRANDON

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Does Wartime Housing Limited expect to put up for sale its houses with basements located in the 600 block on 22nd street in Brandon?
2. If so, when will these houses be put up for sale?
3. What would the approximate price be?

Mr. Winters:

1. No decision has been taken regarding the sale of these houses which are administered by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It is not expected they will be offered for sale in the immediate future.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. See answer to No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS—PURCHASING FACILITIES AND MEDICAL STORES

Mr. Balcom:

Have the purchasing facilities and the medical stores of all departments of the government been consolidated into one procurement and one distribution centre under one branch of the government or one branch of the armed services?

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—WINNIPEG REGIONAL OFFICE

Mr. Viau:

1. Is there a family allowances regional office in the city of Winnipeg?
2. If so, on what date was it organized?

3. What were the names and grades of the personnel who organized it?
4. Of the present personnel of this office, what are (a) the names; (b) date of appointment; (c) grade on appointment; (d) present grade; (e) permanent and date made permanent; (f) temporary?
5. How many vacancies exist, and in what grades?

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE—WINNIPEG REGIONAL OFFICE

Mr. Viau:

1. Is there an old age assistance regional office in the city of Winnipeg?
2. If so, on what date was it organized?
3. What were the names and grades of the personnel who organized it?
4. Of the present personnel of this office, what are (a) the names; (b) date of appointment; (c) grade on appointment; (d) present grade; (e) permanent and date made permanent; (f) temporary?
5. How many vacancies exist, and in what grades?

NOLAN V. HALLET AND CAREY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What was the total expenditure, paid or incurred, for (a) legal fees and disbursements; (b) travelling expenses; (c) other costs and expenses not included as legal fees and disbursements, in connection with the Nolan v. Hallet and Carey case?
2. Are there any outstanding accounts for solicitors' or counsel fees that have not been submitted?
3. Who were the counsel for the prosecution, and how much did each receive?

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES—FIVE-DAY WEEK

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Is the five-day week in effect in any department of government, or in a crown corporation or government agency?
2. If so, in what departments, corporations or agencies?

BRIDGES

BURLINGTON—USE OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY BRIDGE BY PEDESTRIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he has anything further to disclose on the building of a catwalk on the railway bridge at Burlington for the use of pedestrians?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I should like to deal first with the question which the hon. member asked me yesterday, which I think is somewhat different from the one he asks now. The question reads in part:

. . . will the minister consider allowing the use of the Canadian National railway bridge for pedestrian traffic?

The management of the Canadian National Railways advise that the railway bridge is a swing bridge and that it is normally left open to allow the passage of vessels and closed only when trains have to cross. There is no walk of any kind for pedestrians, and persons crossing would therefore be required to walk on the track ties. This is obviously hazardous, and the Canadian National feel that before the bridge is used by pedestrians the company should be indemnified against any claims for damages or injuries which might arise as a result of such use. If the municipal authorities concerned are prepared to give a bond satisfactory to the railway relieving the company of any responsibility for possible accidents occurring from the use of the bridge by pedestrians, and will then communicate with the vice-president of the Canadian National Railways, Toronto, consideration will be given to allowing pedestrians to cross the bridge under the conditions mentioned.

Mr. Lennard: I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe on one occasion, and that was during the construction of the present highway bridge, the railway bridge was used for that purpose.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION—NON-COASTAL ESKIMO TRIBES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): A question on the order paper in my name was passed by the house as an order for return on March 20. The question related to certain statistical items concerning federal aid to education. I have had no answer as yet to that particular question.

While I am on my feet, I might mention that on Monday, April 7, the house passed an order for the production of certain papers for which I had asked, and as yet I have received no information. I trust that the Secretary of State will expedite these answers.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to look into the matter.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—SITTINGS OF COMMISSION IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Is the Prime Minister in a position to advise regarding the commencement of the sittings of the commission on the South Saskatchewan river project, and also whether sittings will be held in Saskatchewan as it has been determined will take place in Manitoba and Alberta? Will the government ask the commission to endeavour to arrive at an early conclusion?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The only answer I can give is that the government has asked the commission to expedite its proceedings, and has indicated to the commission it was very anxious to get its report at the earliest possible date. With respect to the other matters about which the hon. member is inquiring, I shall have to get the information from the commission and I shall endeavour to do so as soon as possible.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

IRREGULARITIES AT PETAWAWA—APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE S. CURRIE AS INVESTIGATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Could he inform the house under what statutory authority Mr. George S. Currie was appointed to carry out certain investigations which the minister described in this house a few days ago?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I would have to look it up. I believe there is authority under the National Defence Act.

Mr. Drew: Will the minister take that question as notice and give the information, in view of the other discussions which are taking place which might refer to that subject?

Mr. Claxton: Right.

LIVESTOCK

ASSURANCE TO PRODUCERS OF FLOOR PRICE ON CATTLE AND HOGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): On Tuesday, April 29, when the orders of the day were called, I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture, who was not in the house at that time. The question had to do with the steps the department proposes to take to assure that producers of cattle and hogs, especially cattle, will receive the floor price for their cattle which the government announced. There is great dissatisfaction in the Winnipeg yards this week.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the position in Manitoba is a little difficult, in view of the fact that we have not yet reached an understanding with the government of Manitoba as to when the embargo which has been placed on the slaughtering of cattle at Winnipeg will be removed. It is a little difficult to operate on that market from our point of view until that situation is cleared up. I must say that the last time that I looked at the market, which was either yesterday or the day before yesterday, the Manitoba market was above the floor price.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Does the minister's statement apply to other provinces as well?—because I understand there has been difficulty outside the province of Manitoba. Some days the floor price has not been paid in Winnipeg, and I understand the same condition has prevailed in certain other provinces as well.

Mr. Gardiner: There are some difficulties in dealing with the establishment of floor prices until such time as we get cattle moving. It is quite true that there are difficulties in Saskatchewan, since there is no place to slaughter cattle from eastern Saskatchewan until Manitoba does permit them to be slaughtered in Winnipeg.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Would the minister say what action is proposed to assure that the producer does receive these prices when the other technicalities have been removed?

Mr. Gardiner: Action in that connection has been taken and a system to put it in effect is established right across the country now. The whole question has been discussed with the board and everyone concerned and a set-up is there in order to deal with it. But there are some features of the actions of some provinces up to the moment which make it impossible to deal with it effectively in certain areas. We must reach understandings there before we can give any further guarantees. The provinces may be within their legal right, but we think there must be more co-operation before we can carry out some things for which we have no legal responsibility and therefore no mode of enforcement. We must reach our conclusions by arrangement and by agreement if we are going to do things which a province has a right to enforce and which they do not want us to enforce.

Mr. Harkness: I wish to address to the Minister of Agriculture a question supplementary to those put by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). The question is this. Have the floor price difficulties at Calgary, which the parliamentary assistant was out there two days ago to discuss, now been resolved? If so, what settlement was made of them?

Mr. Gardiner: The parliamentary assistant returned from Calgary only this morning. I have not yet had an opportunity to discuss the question with him, since I was in the committee all morning, and so was he. Just as soon as we have discussed the question, I will report further on it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Harkness: Can the parliamentary assistant not tell us?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I am certainly not going to make any report to the house until I first report to my minister.

Mr. Rowe: The minister certainly has him well trained.

INQUIRY AS TO OPERATION OF BEEF SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will he indicate to the house in what provinces the announced beef support price is now actually in operation?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Well, Mr. Speaker, where they follow our directions, they are in operation everywhere.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Are they in operation in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: They have been functioning fairly well in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Rowe: Within about three cents.

EGGS

ASSURANCE TO PRODUCERS OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware of the fact that producers in Saskatchewan are getting as low as 10 cents a dozen for eggs? What steps is the minister taking to see that the floor price for eggs is enforced?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The arrangement with regard to eggs is that at any storage across Canada where there are eggs in surplus around about December 1—it is toward the end of the year, the date not being established exactly—those eggs will be taken by the federal government or by the department.

As is known, for the last two years there have not been any such eggs and none have been taken. We have notified some of those who are dealing in eggs that if they continue to pay or if they are paying a price which is below the floor, we are not obligated to meet the condition set out. That is, if buyers of eggs who are putting eggs in storage are, over a period of time, buying eggs at, say 10 cents a dozen, when the price at which we agree to take them over is 38 cents, they have been notified that it will make it extremely difficult, if not impossible, for them to collect from the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What check have you on that sort of thing?

Mr. Gardiner: We have pretty fair checks on it.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—PROGRESS OF LONDON DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister make any statement to the house with regard to the progress, in London, of the discussions on the international wheat agreement? I believe they opened there on April 17.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I cannot make any statement. The discussions are being held in camera. No official statement is being issued by the negotiating group, and probably no statement will be made until the conference ends.

GRAIN

HANDLING OF 1951 PRAIRIE CROP

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I intended today to make a statement on the crop situation in western Canada. I think it is of interest since this is May 1.

I would like at this time to report to the house regarding developments in connection with the handling of the 1951 prairie grain crop. Members of the house are familiar with the gigantic problem which was created as a result of such a large quantity of grain being harvested in the prairie provinces last fall in a tough and damp condition. As the work of the Canadian wheat board and the board of grain commissioners for Canada comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce, I have followed in detail steps which were taken to deal with the problem within my department and by the Department of Transport.

Since the unfortunate harvest period last fall, the Canadian wheat board had before it at all times a very accurate measurement of the unprecedented quantities of tough and damp grain which were threshed last fall and which had to be dealt with, as far as producers were concerned, in a period of five to six months. As I advised the house some time ago, the tough and damp problem has involved the acceptance at country elevators of some 250 million bushels of out-of-condition grain.

There are those who felt that this problem was too large to be handled through available facilities, and I must say that many anxieties were experienced by those who shared the responsibility for dealing with this problem.

I feel I am justified in advising the house that the tough and damp grain problem has been looked after, although drying operations will go on for some time within terminal elevators both in Canada and the United States. Western Canada has now experienced about three weeks of dry weather with abnormally high temperatures for this time of the year, and, as a result, good progress has been made in threshing the balance of the 1951 grain crop. Generally speaking, the grain which stood in the fields or in the swath is turning out well and is being threshed in a dry condition. It is apparent now that the problem of threshing is not going to add to the tough and damp problem as it developed from threshing last fall.

In dealing with the tough and damp grain problem during the present crop year, the Canadian wheat board realized that if the problem were to be adequately dealt with large quantities of grain would have to be sold as tough grades. This policy was vigorously pursued and large quantities of out-of-condition grain were merchandized in Canada and in export markets. The United Kingdom in particular has taken a large part of her requirement from Canada in the form of tough grain and for the past five months has been most helpful in aiding us in the solution of our problem. Other importing countries have also taken tough grades. In Canada, the milling industry has steadily utilized tough wheat in its mill mix. The merchandizing of tough grain on the part of the Canadian wheat board has been one of the principal factors in dealing with out-of-condition grain this year. Sales of tough quantities now exceed the quantity dried in Canadian facilities.

Since last December, every effort has been made to keep terminal drying capacity throughout Canada operating as closely as possible to a maximum. Up to the present time some 75 million bushels of tough and damp grain have been dried in Canadian facilities. These drying operations were carried on at the terminal elevators at the Pacific coast, at interior terminal elevators in the prairie provinces, at the lakehead and, in some instances, in eastern Canada. In addition the Canadian wheat board with the co-operation of the board of grain commissioners for Canada, in March and April, moved about six million bushels of damp wheat from country points in Saskatchewan and Alberta to Duluth, Minnesota, and Superior, Wisconsin, for drying. I might add that elevator companies found difficulty in completing their orders to Duluth and Superior, which was an indication that the damp grain problem was easing.

During the winter months, large stocks of tough and damp grain were accumulated at the lakehead and, with the opening of navigation on the great lakes, progress was made in relieving lakehead terminals of excessive quantities of damp grain through the shipment of a further two million bushels of damp wheat to Duluth and the shipment of a further substantial quantity of damp grain to Buffalo. The exact quantity which will go to Buffalo has not yet been determined but it will be sufficient to reduce lakehead stocks of damp grain to manageable proportions. The wheat board has now ordered a further shipment of about 500,000 bushels of wheat to Churchill, and to the extent that damp wheat can be shipped in carload quantities by elevator companies to Churchill, the drier at that port will be used. I might add that the shipment of damp grain from country points is still being given preference.

In summary, I would say that a tremendous job has been done in the last five months by the Canadian wheat board, the board of grain commissioners for Canada and the Department of Transport. To these agencies of the government must go the credit for planning the widespread attack on the problem of out-of-condition grain. Equal credit must go to the railways for the movement of out-of-condition grain into selling positions or to elevators with drying facilities, and to all the elevator companies and local elevator agents throughout the prairie provinces who co-operated wholeheartedly in meeting a problem of unprecedented magnitude. With an early spring in the west this year, there is every prospect for an early harvest, and it is not likely that this country will again experience an out-of-condition grain problem as large and as widespread as the one which has been dealt with during the present crop year.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 30, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. Henri Courtemanche (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, April the 8th of this year, thousands of Canadians were hoping that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would at last bring them good news, would at last inform them of substantial tax reductions. We all know, however, what has happened. In this budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, one would search in vain for anything that would encourage the unemployed in Canada, give hope to the victims of the housing shortage, give the heads of families cause to expect any substantial decrease in the cost of living. Our great treasurer has, in brief, decided to maintain taxation at a very high level, the effect of which is to promote unemployment, aggravate the housing shortage and contribute substantially to the increase in the cost of living.

The Minister of Finance should therefore not be surprised if no one has offered him congratulations nor thanks except, of course, those who are duty bound to kowtow to him and especially to approve by their vote the budget he has brought down, however dissatisfied their electors may be with these apparent and hidden taxes the government of this country is constantly levying.

In keeping with the mandate given me by the taxpayers of Labelle county, I shall certainly not approve the budget which the Minister of Finance has brought down. However, I shall take the liberty of paying him a compliment. I can tell him that on the evening of Tuesday, April 8, he made a speech which was marvellously and tragically consistent with the best and the worst traditions of the Liberal party. Having heard that speech and read the newspaper comments on the next day, I was reminded of the speeches of the present Prime Minister's predecessor, which all at once confounded, mystified, intrigued and embarrassed the whole of this country's press.

Moreover, nobody has forgotten that memorable banquet, at the end of which all those present were wondering whether the then head of the Liberal party had resigned or not.

Today, I admit that the Liberals are past masters in the art of saying "yes", while suggesting that they mean "no". A despicable art, if there is one, but an art which remains, I believe, the main cause of the often lengthy period of office enjoyed by Liberal governments.

The Minister of Finance, following in that respect the example set by some members of the Liberal party who now belong to history, has announced that taxes would be reduced while demonstrating at the same time that they were going to increase. He succeeded so well in this task that, the next day, the learned members of the press, all over Canada, were at a loss to express an opinion, and to give an interpretation of this verbal avalanche which served to camouflage a real and truly existing increase of the income tax. It did not take long, though, to see through this most involved situation and L'Action Catholique of Quebec, in its Wednesday, April 9, 1952 issue, headlined in the following manner its report on the changes in income tax:

Income tax is lowered but everybody pays more than in 1951.

This Quebec city newspaper had succeeded in condensing hours and hours of speeches into a mere dozen words. I told myself that the Minister of Finance would have done well to follow a course in journalism or to become a newspaperman in order to learn how to think in a more compact manner, how to clarify his thoughts, how to give them preciseness so that after hours and hours of words, sentences and figures nobody would have to say: "What is really happening to us?"

It is obvious that the minister is likely to lose his post the day he will be able to act in such a way because the Liberal party, as has been made clear by experience, does not like its members to make themselves too well understood. That is a luxury that the Liberals can afford only when they have reached the Senate. Indeed, some hon. senators, members of the Liberal party, do not hesitate when opportunity affords to state fully what is on their minds, what they used to think but could not reveal heretofore.

Shortly after his speech in the house, the hon. the Minister of Finance addressed the nation over the radio in an effort to explain the confusion. If my interpretation is correct —but I would not be too sure about it—he stated that in announcing a tax reduction, he had meant that taxation was going to be reduced on the basis of what we were supposed to pay for this year, but that it would obviously be higher than in 1951.

That statement was a little clearer but we may ask the minister what prevented him from being equally explicit before the house.

I know that the hon. minister has in his department a lot of experts who exercise their wits in order to complicate everything. But the public is fed up with such complications. Our people want things to be clear and clearness can always be easily attained when there is nothing one wants to hide, when there is nothing one wants to cover up, when one does not want to make the taxpayers believe that the moon is made of green cheese.

Therefore the budget speech conforms to the best traditions of Liberal policy as far as ambiguity and apparent contradictions are concerned.

However those gentlemen to the right will answer that the income tax has been decreased although there will be no decrease in fact because of the addition of a social security surtax but they will say we have lowered many taxes, for instance, on washing machines, stoves, appliances, soft drinks, furs, cars, travelling bags, etc. Obviously there has been some relief, but now, if ever, is the time to say too little and too late.

Let us take for example the tax on cigarettes. The minister has lowered that excise tax by three big cents.

But up to now there has been no indication of an increase in the sales of Canadian cigarettes. There is no indication, on the other hand, that smuggling of American cigarettes has slowed down. This means that because of excessive taxation our people are getting used gradually to breaking the law the same as in the United States the corruption there in certain taxation departments of Washington is blamed on excessive taxes.

Because of the fact that taxes on cigarettes are still too high, unemployment will continue in the tobacco industry, producers will remain in a difficult financial situation, and the revenue from taxes on cigarettes will decline.

Why does the Minister of Finance persist in imposing excessive taxes on any commodity at all? Has he not been forced to recognize the fact that he made a serious mistake when he last increased the excise tax on cigarettes and that his estimates of revenue from this source were as wrong as his other estimates?

Mr. Lesage: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Courtemanche: I have no objection.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I read on page 13 of yesterday's—that is Wednesday, April 30—edition of Le Droit, the following news item:

> The hon. member for the historic county of Labelle, Mr. Henri Courtemanche, created some sensation yesterday at the House of Commons by condemning the budget presented on April 8, by the Hon. Douglas C. Abbott.

And if I go on reading that article, I find, word for word, the remarks which the hon. member has just made. Did the hon. member make the very same speech in this house yesterday?

Mr. Courtemanche: I am grateful to the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) for having pointed this out to me. I had not read the paper. I shall explain to him that I had been asked for my text. I am not responsible for its having been published before I actually made my speech.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Who wrote it first?

Mr. Courtemanche: I do not need the hon. member's help to write my speeches.

Taxes are indispensable to public administration and, when they are levied fairly and logically, they can become a great factor of progress. On the other hand, when they are not levied discerningly they can be a source of destruction, of surprisingly rapid destruction. What is true of the cigarette tobacco industry is also true of other industries, as well as of individuals and the community.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That's right!

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is in the paper.

Mr. Courtemanche: Le Droit knew that I was going to make a speech. It said so in advance to warn my opponents.

The surplus of revenues over expenditures announced by the Minister of Finance could have been used to bring about a reduction in income tax so as to help the taxpayer. I mean a true and real decrease, not a lower tax on what we could have paid but a large reduction on what we have been compelled to pay up to now.

Income tax discourages and depresses. Every Friday or Saturday, when his pay envelope is handed to him, the first thing the worker does is to look for all the deductions. And he discovers that the sum which actually remains in his envelope is very much smaller than the salary that his employer actually hands out to him. If he happens to obtain an increase he feels frustrated again, for he soon realizes that he benefits very little, very little indeed, by that increase, since the income tax has claimed its share, that is, generally speaking, the lion's share. I feel that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) will be bound to admit that these deductions from the source do not help to improve the relationship between capital and labour. What workers really want—and one cannot blame them for it—is a net salary which would be big enough to enable them to look after the needs of their families. Often, one is flabbergasted by the nominal salary. But once the compulsory deductions have been subtracted it is quite another story. Our southern neighbours have long spoken of the "take-home pay" when discussing the labour problem.

How can we expect householders to save for the future when they cannot even balance their budget because the Minister of Finance is not the least interested in balancing his?

Of course, government members try to find excuses to justify overtaxation. There is national defence! There is social security!

Let us deal first with national defence. I am all for it and I recognize everything possible should be done when the country is in danger. However, the term national defence is apt to become the perfect pass-key with which the people on the right will elude their responsibilities and duties. Are we to forget that countries have been ruined through ensuring their national defence? Today, one wonders what would have happened, had it not been for assistance from America. And later, when we also shall be bankrupt, who will help us?

If truly national defence were involved, no one would object. We should call it "international defence", defence of South Korea, defence of Germany. It would be surprising to know what percentage of the appropriations for so-called national defence will be spent in Canada for Canada. Is it not true that some people have expressed dissatisfaction because there were insufficient funds for civil defence? Yet, if there be an important feature of national defence it surely is the budget that could be voted for civil defence.

I know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) does not like anyone to criticize the way in which that national defence is organized. I believe, however, that enough things have happened these last few years to allow us to state that, if care is not taken, national defence will really become national wasting of money.

The Minister of National Defence does not like criticisms. But he should hardly expect any congratulations from us for the manner in which those military camps which are not in use at present are being watched and protected.

Social security is also beginning to be a pass-key. Should anyone venture to criticize certain items of the budget he is accused of being opposed to social security. No, I am not opposed to social security. On the contrary, I would like to see it granted in the greatest spirit of charity, generosity and kindness. Should social security, however, be used as a pretext to ruin the taxpayer? Have the experts of the Department of Finance considered what kind of social security we will have, in spite of all possible allowances and pensions, the day this country goes bankrupt?

National defence, social security, these are, in our mind, two arguments but too frequently used by members on the government side to hide their poor administration, their excesses of all kinds, their errors. The real champions of national defence and of social security are not those who think that both these fields call for unrestricted expense but those who demand a closer control for one and the other with regard to the employment of sums levied from taxpayers, i.e. those who oppose attempts to justify all these abuses by putting forward both these arguments as a shield, or as an armour.

If individuals have scarcely benefited from any friendliness on the part of the Minister of Finance, corporations have not been much more fortunate. I believe that the fate of heads of families, in town or country, ought to worry us more than that of large or small corporations. I am sorry to say that it but too often slips the mind that excessive taxation with regard to these companies only falls back on the small man, who in most cases suffers from it to a greater extent. Let me explain. An overtaxed corporation cannot be developed nor expand as it would want to do.

It is thus prevented from establishing a great number of new jobs which our 370,000 or so unemployed would certainly not fail to welcome. Besides, and that is the most important point, a corporation or company is made up of hundreds and thousands of small shareholders, such shareholders being, very often, widows, orphans, workers saving for the future, far-sighted farmers and numerous small wage earners.

Any attack launched against the big companies is also directed against those very people. Banks and insurance companies are called upon, in many cases, to provide the funds needed by a good many concerns. Whenever corporations are overtaxed, banks and insurance companies are hard hit as also are, indirectly, those with small savings or insurance policies.

Whenever a tax is imposed, whatever that tax may be, it is like a stone cast into the water. Upon hitting the water, the stone starts a constantly widening circle. The consequential effects of a tax are a bit similar to those ever widening circles. They never reach but a small group; yet as a consequence the whole nation is made to suffer. No matter how we tax, tax again and overtax the big interest, the small wage earner will always be the one to suffer most, and a day will come when only those of extremely moderate means will be left to bear the whole burden of taxation.

I would like to say a few words about the taxes levied on crown companies in the new budget. In my opinion, crown companies should not be exempt from any municipal or provincial taxes. But I am wondering what difference it can make to the federal treasury whether these companies pay federal taxes or not. Is it not true that whatever deficit they have will be made up by Ottawa and is it not true that if they register a profit, it will go into Ottawa's coffers?—at least we hope so. This will undoubtedly require more red tape, more bureaucrats and more civil servants; it will increase the cost of administration. In a word, it will increase the taxpayers' burden and nothing more.

In fact, would it not be a means of sheltering those companies from criticism on the part of members of parliament, of sheltering them from the indiscreet and inquisitive investigation of the people's representatives, at least of those in the opposition? Could these taxes paid into the federal coffers not be used as an excuse to strengthen the immutability of the bureaucrats who administer those government enterprises? I must say that it looks pretty fishy to me.

The Minister of Finance abolished the 15 per cent tax on washing machines, stoves and refrigerators. In so doing he merely put an end to an injustice but he cannot make up for all the wrong done through a tax that was both so unfair and so ridiculous. Who could ever conceive that a washing machine, a stove or a refrigerator could be considered as luxuries and taxed accordingly? We do not know a single housewife who considers her stove as a luxury any more than she believes she is using an article of luxury on Monday mornings when she starts to do her weekly washing. As far as the refrigerator is concerned, under modern living conditions, due to our small accommodation and to the necessity of making use of all that is bought, because everything is so dear, it has become indispensable in most cases. We heartily approve the abolishing of the 15 per cent tax on those articles but abolishing that tax does in no way make up for the wrong that has been done these last few years.

(Text):

In conclusion may I say that the people of Canada are too heavily taxed. Our taxation has reached a point where it is nothing less than a tragedy, because it has brought about a crisis in unemployment and a shortage of living accommodation. About a year ago, on April 14, 1951, the day after the budget speech of that year, which was not any better or more promising than this budget, a Liberal newspaper of Montreal, Le Canada, tried to cheer up its readers by stating that there were other people much more heavily taxed than we were, the people of Great Britain. That was a poor consolation, if you ask me, but it perhaps was a very good illustration.

If today the people of England are more heavily taxed than we are, if they are facing a national economic crisis, it must be attributed to the heavy taxation which has been imposed for the purpose of national defence and social security. There was a time when the people of Great Britain had to undergo all kinds of sacrifices in order to ensure the national defence of their country, but afterwards the expenditures on social security were certainly exaggerated.

Some time ago the main object in Great Britain, as it is in Canada today, was national defence and social security. Now they find their national defence is in danger and social security cannot be ensured any more. To avoid bankruptcy they have had to go backward. It may be found in the near future that we in Canada will have to do the same because our system of taxation may become an instrument of ruin instead of progress.

Two thousand years ago Isocrates, the Athenian, said that those who were making money should be considered as criminals and punished more severely than criminals themselves. If that man came back to earth today and saw the new budget of the Minister of Finance, he would have to say, as I say myself, that today it is not only those who make money who are punished as criminals; it is also those who earn a simple and modest living.

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, during the first two months of this year I came to the conclusion that Canada was Utopia, and it was not until my return from South America to Canada and to this chamber that I realized, from the speeches of hon. members across the way, that perhaps all was not well here. My wife and I travelled to South America by sea. It took us nineteen days to go from New York to Buenos Aires. During those nineteen days I had many conversations with citizens of the United States prominent in business, governmental and military circles in their country. Without exception these men spoke of the envy they felt of this country. One of the chief points they emphasized was the fact that Canada had a large surplus, and that since the war we had written off over $2 billion of our national debt. These are matters which seem to be the source of great complaint in Canada, according to hon. gentlemen opposite and a certain section of the press of the country. But I can imagine the howl that would go up in that same section of the press if Canada should have deficit budgeting year after year and pile up our national debt to unheard of heights.

High taxes are not pleasant for anyone. I am sure everyone in this chamber will agree that I should have no love for high taxes. Like many others, I think of yesterday, April 30, as probably the blackest day of the year. But the fact remains that the rest of the world knows of our financial set-up, of our great industrial development and of the progress this country is making. It is not easy for the government to maintain high taxes. It would be much easier to lower them and get in right with everyone and it is not easy to introduce credit restrictions. But one has to leave our own shores to appreciate just what the policies of this government have done for this country and how much better off we are than any other nation on earth.

Speakers on the opposition side have made much of the fact that the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar today is roughly 50 per cent of what it was before the second world war. I wonder how these critics would feel if they lived in a country whose currency had depreciated by one-sixth or one-tenth or even one-fiftieth, and where the cost of living had risen sixfold while wages had only doubled. These are manifestations one sees outside Canada, which drive home how beneficial have been the policies adopted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in particular and the government as a whole. I wonder how they would feel if our credit had shrunk to such a low level that we were unable to make purchases from foreign countries. Yet that is exactly the predicament in which many other countries find themselves today; and that is not restricted to South America by any means.

I happened to be in Brazil the day the Canadian dollar reached parity in relation to the United States dollar, and I was astounded to see that the newspapers in Rio de Janeiro headlined that fact. To Brazilians it was a great achievement, an almost unbelievable fait accompli. In Brazil much is known about Canada because of the development of hydroelectric power in that country by the Brazilian Traction Company, and the extraordinary personality of our former ambassador there, Mr. Jean Desy. Wherever you go, when it is discovered that you are a Canadian you are immediately told, "What a wonderful job your ambassador, Jean Desy, did for you in our country." I might add that the visit of Lord Alexander did much to cement the friendship between the Republic of Brazil and the Dominion of Canada. The film board has also done a great deal, not only in Brazil but throughout South America, to help our neighbours of the Americas become Canada conscious. Wherever I visited our trade commissions and embassies I was told there was a constant demand for more and more pictures produced by the Canadian film board.

I was very interested in a line-up I saw in front of one of our embassies in South America. It was made up of newly arrived Italian immigrants who were trying to obtain entry visas to Canada. In some way a false rumour had started that the Canadian embassy was granting Italian immigrants visas to go to Canada. In spite of repeated denials by our chargé d'affaires a new line-up formed each morning in front of the embassy doors, waiting to see the proper officer, hoping to obtain visas. To me that showed in no uncertain manner how anxious the people of other countries are to come to our shores, which hold out so much promise to them.

In Chile I discovered a large potential market for Canadian products. Unfortunately we do not buy enough from Chile to give that country the credits to enable it to make purchases here. In many respects our economies are parallel, and there is very little that we can exchange. I would suggest, however, that if Canada needs more nitrates during this period of national defence construction, or more copper, those products be obtained from the Republic of Chile. I believe that Canada could buy certain fresh fruits and wine from Chile. Our seasons are exactly opposite. When it is midwinter in Canada, it is midsummer in Chile. The fruits of that country are of a superior quality, and by importing those fruits it would be possible to furnish Chile with some Canadian foreign exchange.

Last week while in Montreal I was surprised and gratified, on going into a fruit store, to be able to buy Chilean grapes. I only hope that this is the beginning of a large trade in that particular line. I am quite certain that were we to purchase more from Chile, she would come to Canada and buy large quantities of wheat, dairy products and manufactured goods.

In passing, I should like to note that I flew from Santiago, Chile to Buenos Aires on an airplane operated by British Overseas Air Corporation. I am particularly happy to say that this plane, although termed an Argonaut by the British, is in fact a Canadian-made North Star. At 19,000 feet we flew safely and comfortably, and I might add proudly, through the various passes in the Andes mountains, with the mighty peaks towering above us in some instances 3,000 to 4,000 feet. In speaking to a member of the crew of that airplane I was told that B.O.A.C. consider their Argonauts or North Stars one of the safest and most rugged of any aircraft flown by that company. I may tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that while in South America I travelled on no less than four air lines, and on each one of those air lines both wines and cocktails were served. You know, the drinking habits in South America are considerably different from those in Canada. In order to meet competition the air lines are forced to serve wine and cocktails, just as they are to serve meals. No one is required to take the wine or cocktails and I know that my hon. friend would be like me and refuse them. The fact remains that throughout all these southern latitudes it is the accepted thing that air lines serve wine and cocktails.

The one great tragedy I noted when visiting the great South American ports like Rio de Janeiro, Santos—the greatest coffee exporting ports in the world—Montevideo and Buenos Aires, was the almost total lack of ships flying the British flag. In fact, in the four ports I only spotted one British flag, and that was on a royal mail steamer in regular service between South America and England. I mention this, and I repeat that I consider it a great tragedy, because it shows how much British trade has been diverted from world markets to the dominions and colonies within the sterling zone.

While in Port of Spain, Trinidad, I made it a point to enter quite a few of the smaller shops, chiefly grocery stores. I found that virtually all the goods displayed were of British origin or perhaps I should say British commonwealth origin. Unfortunately, the display of Canadian goods was conspicuous by its absence. For instance, one could find quantities of cheese and butter from New Zealand and Australia. In exchange Trinidad sends tinned citrus fruit to New Zealand. I discovered also that virtually all of the dried and smoked fish on display came from the Scandinavian countries. Formerly, this type of goods was supplied by the great maritime provinces of Canada. It does not seem right or economically sound that all this trade has to be diverted away from Canada. Certainly, it is an economy that is built on false premises. We could use all the tinned citrus fruit that Trinidad could produce. We could use much of their fresh fruit and yet, under the present system, this fruit is being sent halfway around the world.

I was asked, while in Port of Spain, why it was that Canada was no longer buying all its cane sugar requirements from the British West Indies. My answer was that we were buying some of our sugar from Cuba for the simple reason that Cuba would trade with us. In order to sell, one must buy and the man to whom I was speaking agreed. The next question he asked me was, "Would you consider bringing the British West Indies into confederation as the eleventh province"? I said that frankly I had not given the matter any consideration and I did not think anyone else up here had considered it sincerely. He said, "Take this message home with you: a lot of consideration has been given to that in the British West Indies." Actually in developing new or old markets for our dairy products, agricultural products and our fisheries, it would go a long way in solving a very knotty problem. I have particular reference to the cheese problem that is so evident in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, at this time to go into all the ramifications of the cheese problem, because I have had many talks with both the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his parliamentary assistant. They well know my stand on this important matter.

Just a week ago today I had the opportunity of accompanying delegations of cheese producers and milk producers from the counties of Leeds, Prescott and Glengarry to an interview granted us by our Minister of Agriculture. It was one of the longest and one of the most understanding interviews, I believe, that I have ever had with a cabinet minister. I believe that the minister explained his position clearly. However, I should like to say that if the cheese producers are unable to make satisfactory arrangements through their own association in conjunction with the marketing board of Ontario, the marketing board of Ontario and the federal Department of Agriculture should get together in a spirit of co-operation to devise a method of keeping the cheese market at a reasonable level.

Cheese is a vital agricultural industry throughout the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and especially in eastern Ontario. It would indeed be a tragedy for our dairy agriculture as a whole if the price of cheese should break or if the bottom should drop out of the market. I should therefore like to suggest that when a floor price is set for cheese, it should be high enough to reimburse the producers for the capital they have invested and for the wages that are paid. There is, of course, such a thing—and we saw it work last year—as overpricing an article, when it becomes profitable for other countries to export their products to this country in competition. But there must be some point in between where the milk producers and the cheese producers of this country will be adequately reimbursed for their labour and for their capital invested and at the same time there will be produced a market where competition from outside sources will not be too heavy.

I am firmly convinced that there is a market for our cheese right in our own country, and that every effort should be made by all concerned—by the Ontario marketing board, by the Ontario cheese producers' association and by the federal Department of Agriculture—to get our cheese right across Canada, and to get the people of Canada cheese-conscious so that our people eat at least as much cheese as the people of Britain ate before the war. If we did that, we would absorb all the cheese that is made in this country and there would still be room for imports. In the meantime let us do all that we can to fill our needs from our own market, along with an attempt to get rid of any surplus stocks that are on hand in the markets of the world.

To return to the budget for a moment, I cannot agree with my hon. friends opposite when they say that the general public is displeased or even agitated. In fact, most people were prepared for the type of budget that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) presented. We know that taxes are high; but to avoid a third world war we must do our share as a member of the United Nations and of NATO. At this point I should like to compliment the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell)—and I wish he were in his seat—for his patience and perseverance in finding in a United States publication adverse criticism of the Canadian financial structure.

I have always had a high regard for the Atlantic Monthly; but after all, it is not the type of magazine that has a wide circulation. However, we see in the great national weeklies such as Time, Newsweek, U.S. News and World Report, in magazines such as the Reader's Digest, and in the great dailies such as the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune references to Canada's fiscal policy, all of which are in the most glowing terms; and in the great financial papers such as the Wall Street Journal we see great recommendations for investment in Canadian stocks. I would ask this question, Mr. Speaker. Could it be that the Atlantic Monthly is like the person referred to in the old song: "They were all out of step but Jim."

The budget is really straightforward enough when one considers what the taxpayers would have paid under the terms of the old budget. By the wildest stretch of the imagination no one could accuse the Minister of Finance of trying to deceive the public. The Minister of Finance gave what would have been collected in taxes, and what we would have had to pay had the terms of the 1951 budget continued throughout 1952, and he compared the difference in taxes we would be paying under the new tax scheme.

For a moment, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal briefly with a subject that has been discussed both in the Ontario press and in the Ontario legislature. It is a subject about which, strangely enough, little has been said until recently, although it was six years ago when the then minister of finance allowed the provinces not coming under the dominion-provincial tax agreement to collect 5 per cent of the dominion income tax levy, which amount was deductible from the gross income tax payable by the individual taxpayer to the federal treasury. It would appear that the provincial government found income tax so distasteful that it was unwilling to set up the necessary machinery to collect this income tax. As we know, Ontario along with Quebec did not choose to enter the dominion-provincial tax agreement. There may have been good grounds for not accepting the formula proposed at the last dominion-provincial conference. Certainly Ontario has not fared badly during the last five years. This has resulted, no doubt, from the gross national product being much higher than could have been contemplated. The 1947 agreement provided for payments based on the gross national product and population data for three years preceding the year of payment. Ontario's collection from corporation income taxes and succession duties reflected this rise more quickly than the payments provided for under the three-year formula tax agreements.

In his most recent budget speech on February 21, 1952, the treasurer and premier of the province of Ontario produced a table to show the total collection from corporations, succession duties, statutory subsidies and excess mining and logging royalties. Over the five-year period the taxes I have just mentioned amounted to $456,300,000, which is about $7 million more than the total rental payments of $449,500,000 which the province would have received under the tax agreements. The total of $456,300,000 shown in the table also includes $10 million for uncollected corporation taxes, succession duties and mining and logging taxes. The province will have to wait a number of years to collect all these arrears. On the other hand, the total of $449,500,000 which Ontario would have received during the five years of the tax agreement would have been fully paid up as of June 30, 1952.

The Department of Finance has informed me that under the new tax agreements, to start in 1952, payments will be adjusted on the basis of the G.N.P. for one year immediately preceding the year of payment instead of three years. This results in the rentals payment reflecting more quickly any change in the economic position. It is interesting to note that the estimated payment to Ontario in 1952-53 under this proposed new agreement is considerably in excess of the amount Ontario estimates it will receive from using the tax fields in question. I would like to place this short table on the record:

Estimated payment to Ontario under new agreements in 1952-53—$137·5 million.

Amounts Ontario expects to collect in 1952-53: (as shown in forecast of revenues for 1952-53 in Ontario budget speech February 21, 1952).

Succession duty	$16
Corporations tax	89	million
Statutory subsidy	3·6	$108·6
Excess under a tax agreement		28·9

It is estimated that the payment to Ontario under the new 1952-53 agreements will be $137,500,000. These are the amounts reported by the premier and treasurer on February 21, 1952, which Ontario will collect should it again decide not to come into a dominion-provincial tax agreement. This amount shows succession duty, $16 million; corporation taxes, $89 million; statutory subsidy, $3,600,000; or a total of $108,600,000. Subtracting $108,600,000 from $137,500,000 you get $28,900,000 to the good should Ontario enter the new dominion-provincial tax agreement.

I would not presume to advise the premier and treasurer of Ontario whether the province should or should not come under the new agreement. But if it should decide not to, I would respectfully suggest that if the province is unwilling to collect the 5 per cent allowable income tax, the provincial government permit the municipalities within the province to do so. This would not set a precedent, because municipal income taxes were permitted in the province of Ontario prior to 1936. Probably this would require authorization from the federal Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), but I can see no reason why this should not be allowed under the offer already made to the two provinces of Canada not signing formal tax agreements. It would not cost the income tax payers of Ontario any more than they are already paying, and it would help the hard-pressed municipalities where real estate taxes have more than doubled since the war. I might say that the tax rate in the two larger municipalities in my county, the towns of Brockville and Gananoque, are, by a strange coincidence, both set at 86 mills, making it unbearable for the property owners.

By allowing the municipalities to collect income tax it would assure them of a steady income, and it would more than supplement the uncertain subsidies now granted the municipalities in the province.

In conclusion, I should like to say that to appreciate this country one must investigate conditions in other parts of the world. It is true that we are not satisfied with all that is going on here. If we were satisfied, we would cease to make the progress that is so vital to our future. We have advanced more than any country in the world since the war, and, I might add, we are the envy of all, but the fact remains we must seek to move forever forward and forever upward.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak for a while today about two things. I want to refer somewhat briefly to the budget, and then I wish to spend some time on national housing. Before I do either of these things I should like to make a few comments about the remarks made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

At the opening, and again at the closing, of his remarks, he laid particular emphasis on the fact that Canada had had such a wonderful period of prosperity. Of course, that is true; it is very true indeed. But he took great satisfaction in saying that the federal government was largely responsible for that. Of course, that is not true. The first remark was true; the second one was not.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, yes, it was.

Mr. Johnston: Oh, no, it was not.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, it was. Good fiscal policies are great factors in the economic position of the country.

Mr. Johnston: The only federal influence on prosperity is the preparation for war. If that preparation for war were taken away today, we would find ourselves right in a depression again.

Let us look at the prosperity that we have had across this country. Let us take one good example. Let us take Alberta. What has the federal government done for Alberta?

Mr. McIlraith: Marketed the wheat crop.

Mr. Johnston: And they beat us out of $504 million coming to us.

Mr. McIlraith: Do you remember the time—

Mr. Johnston: They tried to satisfy that $504 million claim with a measly gift of $65 million. That is what they did for us. I will tell you something more that the federal government did for Alberta. In Alberta there has been a great industrial expansion in the field of oil. But let us look at the position of the Canadian prospectors in the province of Alberta when it comes to comparing the tax relationship between Canadian investors and United States investors. In the field of drilling in the province of Alberta the United States investor gets a much better deal from the United States government than the Canadian investor gets from our federal government. That is an operation suffering a great handicap for Canadian capital investment in oil production in Alberta. But, despite that fact, and owing largely to American capital investment, that business is progressing very rapidly in western Canada.

We remember that during the war the federal government spent around $5 million by way of investments in the tar sands of Alberta. The work done by the federal government was absolutely of no use. Then for some reason or another, mysterious or otherwise, at the close of operations the plant at Fort McMurray burned up.

On the other hand the provincial government had gone ahead and carried on development of the tar sands to the point where, when the last report was put out, it is now feasible, both economically and commercially, to extract the oil products from the tar sands, and to compete in the commercial field with the wells being drilled.

Mr. Prudham: But they had all the advantage of all the experimental work and research work of the federal government.

Mr. Johnston: The federal government never did a thing, even though there was a war on. They never came to the point where they could successfully separate the oil from the sand.

Mr. Prudham: They went a long way toward it.

Mr. Johnston: They started back before 1914, and what developments did they make? The development carried out by the federal government in connection with the tar sands, from away back in 1914 up to the present time, is very little, compared with what has been done by the province, and when compared with the progress the province has made since the federal government burned up that plant at Fort McMurray.

Mr. Prudham: That's a lie. They did not burn up their plant.

Mr. Johnston: I should not say deliberately, but it burned up.

Mr. Prudham: They have not solved the problem yet.

Mr. Johnston: According to the last Blair report, they have solved it. But perhaps you are a better authority than Mr. Blair, who is an engineer and took pains to prepare a report upon it.

Let us see what the federal government has done for western Canada in the field of freight rates. I am going to give them a good deal of credit because, after about a hundred years, there had been some equalization of the transcontinental rate. But the action now being taken by the railway companies will greatly nullify any benefits those of us in western Canada received from the transcontinental rate.

I suggest that throughout the history of this country the rate structure has been such as to impede, to a great degree, the industrial development of western Canada. Yet the western provinces are advancing, despite the federal government.

When the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) say that our national product has reached an all-time record of $22·5 billion, they do not need to be so cock-eyed sure of themselves. They do not need to throw their chests out and say, "See what we have done."

Mr. Knowles: Just cock-eyed.

Mr. Johnston: It is the private industries and the provincial government that have been responsible for the industrial development of Canada—and that, despite the handicap put on through taxation and otherwise by the federal government.

Mr. McIlraith: You are talking as though there was a provincial election out there.

Mr. Johnston: We do not have to worry about that. We can look after that quite well.

Mr. Prudham: They are worried this time.

Mr. Johnston: And, incidentally, they are going farther afield, so that some of the others had better watch their step, too.

For a moment let me refer to the national debt. But before I come to that may I say a word about the budget, because a discussion of the budget will lead to a discussion of the national debt. According to the Minister of Finance, the estimated expenditures for this year will be $4,270 million, but he has budgeted for $4,279 million, leaving a surplus of $9 million. The hon. member has just referred to a provincial election, and he may have had in mind the fact that it looks much better to estimate a surplus of $9 million than to estimate a surplus of $722 million, which was the surplus in the first nine months of last year.

Of course everyone knows that that is not going to be the surplus. So why make it the estimated surplus? Even the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant know quite well that the surplus will be much greater than that. Why, last year—

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has tried to put words in my mouth, in company with the Minister of Finance I do believe that the surplus will be as he has indicated. If however Canada continues to expand under a Liberal government, as it has done in the past, we might have more revenue —and we hope we will have.

Mr. Hees: Despite the Liberal government.

Mr. Johnston: I will accept the statement of the parliamentary assistant, that in his judgment, and the best judgment he can get from departmental officials, the surplus in the next year will be $9 million, if conditions stay the same. If conditions stay the same as they are we are positive that the surplus will be somewhat close to what it was last year—and that is a long way from $9 million. So the only thing I can say to the parliamentary assistant is that his judgment is going to be exceedingly poor. It may be the best he has, I will grant that; but I do not think one has to be a prophet to estimate that, if things go along as they have been, the budget surplus will be around $300 million or $400 million—and that is a long way from $9 million. It may be that my estimate is a long way out; probably it will be. But I do not have around me an array of experts to make estimates. But I will bet the parliamentary assistant anything he likes it will be closer to the sums I have mentioned than to $9 million.

The Minister of Finance has told us that in the year 1951-52 the national debt was $11,473,300,000, and he pointed with pride and satisfaction to the fact that they were able to reduce the national debt by $355,-700,000. Of course he did not say that the people had been overtaxed, that there had been an unnecessary increase in taxation.

He says that this is a proper procedure and, when he was speaking, I think the parliamentary assistant said the same thing.

Mr. Sinclair: Quite right.

Mr. Johnston: They agreed that during a time of prosperity it was good practice to put on a little more taxation, and to reduce the national debt. Well, we have had a Liberal government since 1935. The war started in 1939, at which time the national debt was $3,152 million. A Liberal government has been in power since 1935, and during its term of office the national debt has risen from approximately $3 billion to over $11 billion, including deductions.

An hon. Member: Why?

An hon. Member: What was responsible for it?

Mr. Johnston: The federal government was responsible for it, and nothing else.

An hon. Member: Ever hear about the war?

Mr. Johnston: There was a war on, but—

Mr. Sinclair: He took good care not to hear about the war.

Mr. Johnston: What is that?

Mr. Sinclair: When the hon. member made that statement I said that there had been a war, and then I said that since he ignored the fact there was a war between 1939 and 1945, and took good care to ignore it—

Mr. Johnston: I did not ignore the fact that there was a war. You should wait until I finish my sentence. When I said they did make an increase you said there was a war on. But who was responsible for raising the debt up to $3·5 billion, if it was not the federal government? There was no war on then. But even though there was a war from 1939 until 1945, the financial policy followed by this government was to borrow unnecessarily from financial institutions and chartered banks, thus creating a tremendous amount of debt.

Mr. Sinclair: And borrowing from the people of Canada. We paid for over half of war financing out of current taxation.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) wants to know what happened between 1935 and 1939 when there was no war and yet our national debt kept climbing and climbing.

Mr. Sinclair: How much?

Mr. Johnston: From about $2,000 million to over $3,000 million. Of course you do not call that much. I am speaking only from memory. The parliamentary assistant probably has some financial assistants behind him and he will be able to put the figures on the record. I turn now to page 1249 of Hansard where the minister is reported as having said this:

> This is the sixth successive year in which we have had a surplus—

He should have called it overtaxation, incidentally.

> —and it brings to the very large and gratifying total of $2,344 million the amount by which we have been able to reduce the net debt of Canada since April 1, 1947. Applying the current average interest rate of 2·65 per cent on our outstanding debt, this represents interest savings of more than $62 million a year.

It is said a total of $62 million has been saved the taxpayer by that reduction of $2,344 million, but how much has this government unnecessarily taxed the people because they have increased the national debt from around $3,000 million to over $11,000 million? That is the question. No wonder interest payments on our national debt are now over $441 million. Subtract the saving of $62 million from that and you find that because of the improper and inadequate financial policy of this government the Canadian people are being forced to pay that amount.

I want to turn to page 1252 of Hansard where there is another gem that I want to read. Before I do that I should like to refer to something the minister has said on a number of occasions. In order to avoid being accused of improperly quoting the minister I will quote his words as reported on page 1254 of Hansard:

> In other words, the average taxpayer will pay six per cent less than he would otherwise have done under the income tax law as it now stands.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) referred to that a moment ago and that is why I am putting it on the record. I contend that any person reading that statement would come to the conclusion that he was going to have his taxes reduced this year by six per cent. I say that because nearly all the newspapers, the worth-while ones anyway, interpreted that statement as indicating that there was going to be a reduction. They pointed out that the people of Canada naturally expected a reduction, but of course such was not the case. Without repeating all the figures that have been placed on Hansard regarding this, let me mention just a few. A taxable income of $1,000 will face an increased tax of 12·1 per cent. A taxpayer with a taxable income of $3,000 will pay as much as 11·6 per cent more. The fortunate person with an income of $398,000 will pay only 5·1 per cent more. I do not intend to quote many more figures in that regard although many more could be put on the record.

It will be seen from that that the ones who are being penalized, the ones who must pay the greatest increase, are those with low incomes. That is exactly the place where increases should not have been applied. I was somewhat amused in reading the speech of the Minister of Finance to read the following as reported on page 1252 of Hansard:

> There will be no net increases in the taxes paid by corporations—

And then further down:

> In considering the over-all tax position of corporations under this new structure it should be remembered that there is an additional two per cent tax on all corporate income imposed under the old age security act. To sum up, then, the top corporate tax rate in Canada will be 52 per cent in eight provinces and 54 per cent in Ontario and Quebec.

This is the pathetic part:

> Quite frankly, I am concerned that conditions make it necessary to maintain in our tax structure rates as high as this on business profits. My main concern is not with the current year or even possibly with next year. The ill effects of too high taxes can perhaps be endured for a year or two. But as I said last year, excessive rates of tax on corporate incomes if long maintained can do grave damage to the economy as a whole, and I say quite candidly that if I had more leeway for tax abatement it is to income taxes, both corporate and personal, that I would give first consideration.

You can see from the figures I have just placed on Hansard that the consideration increased taxation was not with the poor of the Minister of Finance with regard to man, was not with the man with the low income. I agree that corporate taxation is high when it comes to 52 or 54 per cent; but, if consideration must be given, in my judgment it should be given to those in the low income brackets. When you look at the balance sheets of the large corporations you find that they all indicate increased profits. While taxes were reduced on certain commodities, I venture to say that in no case could you find that reduction reflected to the full extent of the tax reduction. Nearly all of them showed increased profits because of the reduced taxes.

Mr. Martin: Was the tax reduced on automobiles?

Mr. Johnston: Yes, the tax was reduced on automobiles but the prices of automobiles were not reduced by the full amount of the tax.

Mr. Martin: Were they not?

Mr. Johnston: No, they were not.

Mr. Martin: Yes, they were, I am sorry.

Mr. Johnston: They were not in western Canada because I have the prices right here.

Mr. Martin: I would be glad to have them.

Mr. Johnston: I said that I wanted to divide my time up between two subjects, the first being the public debt and the other national housing.

Mr. Martin: Will the hon. member send me those figures privately or put them on the record?

Mr. Johnston: I will.

Mr. Lennard: The hon. member is right because that is what happened in eastern Canada.

Mr. Martin: They say not.

Mr. Knowles: Whose speech is this?

Mr. Johnston: I may say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that I have a clipping in my desk. I will get it and send it to him.

Mr. Martin: I thank my hon. friend very much. He is always most kind.

Mr. Johnston: I hope I shall always be. I always give credit where credit is due. I want to speak now about our housing problem. I do not think there is an investment in Canada or anywhere that can bring a greater return in happiness and contentment than the owning of homes. The National Housing Act was put into force because the government hoped that it would bring about increased and better housing. When the Canadian Congress of Labour appeared before the government on March 27, 1952, they made the following submission, and I quote from the Canadian Unionist of April:

> The Curtis committee estimated the accumulated housing backlog at the end of 1945 at 648,000 units. For the four years 1946-1950, and the first three-quarters of 1951, net family formation is officially estimated at 484,500. Housing wastage by fire, demolition, etc., was probably around 48,500. Total current housing needs for the period were therefore about 533,000 units, while total housing completions in the period were about 472,000. We built more housing than ever before in our history, but we did not even keep pace with the current need, let alone cut into the backlog. On the contrary we fell further behind. The total backlog is now probably over 710,000 units.

Taking an average family of three people, a backlog of 710,000 units would mean that over two million people are without proper housing. That is not a very good thing for Canada. Housing conditions in this country should be improved, and in my judgment two things should be done. Building regulations under the National Housing Act should be so revised that more houses would be built, and more important, so that better houses would be built. I have here a booklet recently issued by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation setting out the building standards under the housing act. On the title page it says:

> Minimum requirements for planning, construction and materials for buildings upon which loans are made under the National Housing Act, 1944.

Then in a little box on the front page it says:

> It is imperative that every borrower examine these standards.

I wonder why that should be so. I am going to say that the reason every person should examine these standards very carefully is to give the borrower the assurance that his house will be built according to the plans and specifications set out in this government pamphlet. You may say that the plans and specifications as such are not set out here. That is true, but the standards upon which those plans and specifications are based are carefully and minutely outlined in this booklet. Let us turn to the first page, where the heading is, "The National Housing Act, 1944. Central Mortage and Housing Corporation building standards for urban, suburban and farm housing." The first paragraph reads:

> The standards for housing in respect of which joint loans may be made are prescribed under section 5, 2(a) and (b), section 10, 2(a) and (b) of part I and part II and under section 14, 2(b) of part III.
> These standards shall apply to detached, semi-detached, duplex, semi-detached duplex and row housing. They are not intended to apply to apartment houses.

It says these standards have the force of law, and it gives the chapters and sections of the statute. There should be no question but that when a borrower takes the advice of the government and carefully examines these standards he is justified in coming to the conclusion that they should have the backing of law. Down a little on page 5 under the heading "general conditions" I find these paragraphs:

> (e) Changes from the approved plans and specifications of the project on which a loan commitment has been made will not be permitted without first obtaining written approval.
> (f) The prospective borrower is advised that construction shall not be started until plans and specifications have been approved by C.M.H.C.
> (g) The applicant or his contractor shall inform the office where the application was made of the proposed date of construction in order that inspections may be made at the proper times. These inspections are for the purpose of ensuring that proceeds of the loan are being used to construct the house in accordance with plans and specifications submitted, and upon which the cost of constructing the house is estimated.

Notice that it says "in order that inspections may be made at proper times" and that these inspections are "for the purpose of ensuring that proceeds of the loan are being used to construct the house" in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted. I do not know what greater assurance could be given those who want to build houses, and more particularly those who have built houses under this act, than this booklet which clearly outlines the standard of approved government construction. But I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that not one house in a hundred is constructed according to the standards outlined in this booklet.

Mr. Prudham: You are wrong.

Mr. Johnston: I am not wrong; I have had a good deal of experience along this line. This thing is one of the most criminal pieces of propaganda ever put out. A great many people are losing money, buying poorly built houses, because of the false information given here. There is nothing in the law that will cause Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the lending institutions to see that these standards are lived up to. I have raised this question many times in this House of Commons. Just the other day I received a letter from Ville St. Michel, Quebec, dated March 10 and addressed to the government and members of parliament. I have not time to read it all, but I want to read part of it:

We wish to bring to your attention as a member of the house and a representative of the people that in building our homes the contractors failed to comply with certain of the minimum building standards as provided for in the booklet put out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

And further:

Surely one would conclude, as we did, that in laying down the conditions under which loans would be made, that the machinery would also be provided by which these conditions would be enforced, but on making inquiries of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation the reply is as follows:

"The Prudential Insurance Company of America carry out inspections on your property to ascertain whether this unit was built in accordance with N.H.A. standards, and they would be in a better position to ascertain or take action against the builder towards rectification of items as listed by you."

You will notice they did not say the Prudential Insurance Company would take action, but merely that the insurance company carry out inspections. The manager of the insurance company in Calgary which was financing these veterans houses there told me they did not put inspectors on the job to see that these standards were lived up to. The only reason they put inspectors there, if they ever did, was to see that their loan was guaranteed, that it was used for that purpose. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not have inspectors to see that these building standards are lived up to; that is what they told me in Calgary, and now we have the very same thing in Quebec. This letter goes on to point out that they have taken up this question with their member, who has made certain efforts to have their position alleviated but apparently with no results. I have taken up the matter on many occasions, but I have never heard that hon. member discuss the question in this house. I hope he does; he will certainly get my support.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my time is fast going. I am not the only one who is complaining about this. One of the considerations controlling the policy of the department with respect to housing is the lending institutions; make no mistake about that. The other day a fellow living in Calgary wrote me saying he wanted to get a loan under the National Housing Act and visited the lending companies in Calgary, but they refused. It is within the city limits and there are other houses in the vicinity, but because the mortgage company did not like putting money out in the suburbs this man could not build the house. I wrote to the minister and asked him for some explanation of this condition. His reply is dated March 27, 1952, and reads as follows:

As you know, early in 1951 the lending institutions began to tighten their operations under the National Housing Act, and restricted their activities in the larger urban areas. In an attempt to offset this trend, the government raised the interest rates under the National Housing Act in June, 1951, and again in October gave the lending institutions higher guarantees against the higher lending values which were introduced at that time.

These steps have been taken in an attempt to encourage lending institutions to widen their present restrictive policy. However, you will appreciate they are free agents in the matter of lending under the National Housing Act, and the government cannot force them to lend at levels or in areas where they do not wish to.

It seems to me that is very good evidence that it is the lending institutions who are making the policies of this country and not the government.

Then in the Ottawa Journal of April 8, 1952, there is an article bearing the heading "Says life insurance companies trying to control housing." The article reads as follows:

F. A. Mager of Winnipeg, president of the National Housebuilders' Association, said the life insurance companies are attempting to regulate the amount of housing to be built in any one area of Canada.

"They even tell us what materials we can use, despite what is laid down in the national building code," he said. Their attitude amounted to contempt for the government and the building industry generally, he added.

Then he goes on with further remarks about it. Surely that is evidence enough to indicate that the people of Canada are not getting what they are paying for. In almost every instance these building standards are being flouted right under the people's noses. This building standards book calls for three sets of plans and specifications. For whom are they prepared? The book does not say anything about that. The three sets of plans are for the lending companies, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the contractor. There is no provision for the builder or owner having a set of plans in his possession.

Is there any provision whereby the owner can get access to these plans? We went to the local offices of Central Mortgage and to the contractor to try to see these plans and specifications. They brushed us off just the same as the others. The poor devils in the province of Quebec are getting the same brush-off. It seems to me that this government should introduce some legislation that would afford some protection of the money which the home builder has invested, and which would ensure that the money was properly spent. Then, the buyer would be sure he was getting the house the government tells him he will get if he builds according to these standards. At the moment, all the crimes are not committed in the comic books, and this booklet could be classed as the No. 1 crime comic.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): It was rather amusing to hear the oft repeated remark by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) "under the Liberal government." I believe he was referring, at the time he made that remark, to the prosperity we find in Canada due to the efforts of labour, private enterprise, the farmers, United States investments and the great fertility of the Canadian soil. I feel confident that the people of Canada are beginning to realize that from now on, whenever they hear such remarks, they really mean "Canada under the thumb of the Liberal government." It is in that position Canada finds herself today, under the thumb of the Liberal government. The Liberals are willing to take credit for all the prosperity that Canada and Canadians are enjoying, and for the discovery of oil, primarily by the Imperial Oil Company and the other big oil companies which are controlled from the United States just as Imperial is controlled and operated primarily by Standard of New Jersey. To hear the Liberals in this house talk about prosperity during the last six or seven years you would think that none of it was due to the preparations for defence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferguson: I hear some hon. members saying "hear, hear". They are still shouting "hear, hear", but the public does not need any reminding that Canada is definitely under the thumb of the Liberal government. If we were not under the thumb of that government and feeling the suffering and pangs of the government, Canada, with all its natural resources, the energy of its people and the working capital flowing into it which has never flowed before, would be progressive to a far greater extent than it has been under the thumb of the Liberal government. In spite of the natural resources, in spite of the efforts of private enterprise, labour and farmers, we find we are facing an increasing shortage of houses. Canada has a chance that it has never had before. The eyes of the world are on this great and prosperous country. What planning has this Liberal government done in the length of time it has been in office, both prior to and since the war.

Let us actually analyse the efforts of this government. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, at a time when he was an ordinary member, severely criticized this government for its lack of accommodation for the members of parliament who were sent here to put forth their best efforts on behalf of their constituents. I do not suppose he would care to repeat that address today, but it was quite true. It certainly was a correct and severe criticism of his colleagues for the unbusinesslike manner in which the accommodation for members of parliament is handled. No industrial concern in the world would pay an executive $4,000 a year with $2,000 expenses, then cloister him in a room about ten feet by ten feet with another executive earning a like salary. This is true not only of this government but past governments, but I believe it applies more particularly to this government. It is utterly impossible for the members who are overcrowded with two in a room to carry out their work and properly represent their constituents.

People are inclined to look upon members of parliament and members of the Senate as statesmen or would-be statesmen. Let us remind the people of Canada that in my opinion every man and woman who votes should be a statesman in selecting representatives capable of carrying on the business of Canada. When these representatives are sent here by the people of Canada, they deserve far better treatment than they are receiving from this government. What can the people of Canada expect when their representatives, who are supposed to hold one of the highest offices in Canada, are shown the lack of consideration which they are receiving from this government. Forgetting the duties of the rubber stamp, I am sure that most Liberals in this parliament today, if permitted to vote without threat of the loss of a judgeship or of the position of parliamentary assistant, would get to their feet and vote that immediate steps be taken to improve the position of members of the House of Commons with regard to their facilities.

Mr. Croll: We would all vote for that. We are all for it.

Mr. Ferguson: You say you are all for it. So are the people of Canada. But you members of this House of Commons cannot get any better action with regard to your complaints than can the rest of the people of Canada. That is the result of being under the thumb of the Liberal party, as I have already mentioned. The members of parliament are under the thumbs of the Liberal party—not only the Liberals but the C.C.F., the Social Credit and the Conservatives—with regard to proper accommodation in which to carry out their duties to their people.

I have here a clipping from an outstanding and reputable paper. I refer to the Toronto Telegram. I believe this clipping has a great deal of truth in it. It reads in part as follows:

> Prime Minister St. Laurent has laid down the law to Liberal members that there is to be only one session of parliament this year. He is said to have told a party caucus a few days ago that the business of the House of Commons must be cleaned up by July 15.

Mr. Croll: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferguson: Someone says "hear, hear". Rubber stamps! The clipping continues:

> If it isn't, he will adjourn parliament and continue the same session in the fall. That meant M.P.'s and senators would be paid only one $4,000 sessional indemnity in 1952, even though they may have to sit again later in the year.
> Mr. St. Laurent plans shortly to serve similar notice to the other parties.

He plans to do that. Imagine that. I just cannot credit the idea that the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada actually has those plans in mind.

An hon. Member: That is the Telegram.

Mr. Ferguson: I am sure the Telegram's source of information was reliable.

An hon. Member: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) laid down that condition the other day.

[Mr. Ferguson.]

Mr. Ferguson: The hon. member will have an opportunity, in a few minutes, to answer intelligently. There will be plenty of opportunity for him to defend his government, if he wishes to do so. I do not think he will wish to do so very wholeheartedly.

If there is legislation to be attended to at this parliament by the representatives of the people, just imagine such a threat being made that hon. members will have to sit here until the hot days of July or else they will have to go into the fall, following an adjournment of parliament, and that they will have to do it for $4,000 a year. Let me say this to the members of the House of Commons. If the people of Canada want in parliament the men they need, $4,000 a year or a session is far too little to attract such men. It is far too little to bring into parliament the type of men the people of Canada need.

If we cannot finish the business of the people which we are sent here to transact in a businesslike manner, parliament should go into a second session and the people of Canada should be glad to pay an additional $4,000 for the services of men who are handling the job properly. If those men are not handling the job properly, the democratic form of government gives the public the privilege to say so. The labour unions of this country would consider it an insult to offer their leaders the stipend which is offered to the makers of the laws of this country, the men who appoint the judiciary of this country, namely $4,000 a year with $2,000 expenses.

I do not know of a member of parliament who does not know, when he comes here at that remuneration, that he is compelled to live in a room on the third floor of a rooming house in Ottawa. He cannot afford to live in proper quarters such as the Chateau Laurier unless he takes the money from his own pocket. A member of parliament is called on by his constituents to answer his door and to attend to their affairs long after the butcher and the baker have turned the keys in their stores at 6 o'clock at night. He is at the beck and call—and rightly so—of his constituents who are worried about one matter or another. If he is the right kind of man he knows of these responsibilities when he offers himself for election. But the members of this government, which has the people of Canada under its thumb, in the length of time they have sat in office have not been men enough to come forward and raise the salaries of the representatives of the people to an amount which is somewhere near what it ought to be.

It is a disgraceful situation. How can we conscientiously feel that we, as a body, are responsible for appointing judges at $8,000 a year, how can we feel responsible for the making of the laws to be administered by those judges, at this disgraceful and insulting remuneration of $4,000 a year? Surely you are not afraid to stand on your feet and tell your constituents that you believe you are worth greater compensation for your efforts. If the people do not think so, at election time they will tell you so, me included. Most of the members feel as I do, but they sit back and say, "I don't think it is good politics to mention that." I am not built that way. I am sent here to mention matters which I believe are of vital importance to the people of Canada, whether it means my defeat or my re-election. At the end of my term the voters will decide. I hope I shall always remain that way.

There is confronting the people of Canada at the present time a problem of the most serious nature; I refer to the foot-and-mouth disease. Some people are blaming the civil servants, the departmental officials, for lack of knowledge, lack of attention and carelessness. It is almost time that all cabinet ministers, without any hesitation, assumed all responsibility for the people working under them in their various departments. The cabinet ministers of any government should say to the civil servants under their jurisdiction something to this effect: Irrespective of how you received your appointment or under what government you received it, and irrespective of the length of time you have served this country, I will take into serious consideration your contribution towards the administration of this department but I am also going to mete out a punishment that is just and fair for any lack of proper attention to your duties, because I am responsible. The cabinet minister is responsible. We find this shifting of responsibility to department heads, shifting it to civil servants, through lack of guidance by the cabinet ministers at the head of these departments, through lack of taking into serious consideration the importance of their position as cabinet ministers.

The previous speaker asked: If the war in Korea ceased, what kind of depression would we have? Hard-headed, sane, worried financial experts, industrialists, and representatives of labour are saying: What is going to happen next? Where are we headed, in spite of the natural resources that God gave to Canadians, in the year 1952? You all know that that is true. People are all following the middle of the road course. They are afraid to invest capital in industry. They are afraid to pick the plums we have. We know that. The harvest is ripe in Canada. We are afraid to bring in more immigrants. We are afraid to develop this great country. We are afraid of unemployment. This is not the Sahara desert. This is the Dominion of Canada, one of the richest and greatest countries in the world. It is prosperous in spite of the Liberal government and in spite of the failures of past Conservative governments.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferguson: We have all made mistakes; all governments do, except the Liberal government. They are never willing to admit their mistakes. They are afraid. They take all the credit for the prosperity of Canada—prosperity in spite of the Liberal government. It is time that some of the cabinet ministers, particularly the lawyers, got out of there and they put a few more industrialists in there. If that were done the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) would not stand out so much like a sore finger with his great business training. Things would be better if there were a few more industrialists in the cabinet. With all due respect to the members of the legal fraternity, of which the cabinet of the Liberal government is principally composed, when they need a lot of valuable advice I am sure they will agree with me when I say that they must have to turn to the Minister of Defence Production and say: "What do you say, C.D.? We are lawyers, we do not know."

Mr. Robertson: And they get a real answer.

Mr. Ferguson: They get a real answer as far as they are concerned, because they would not know whether it was right or wrong.

The training of a lawyer is long, and I am sure that all members of the cabinet who are lawyers are good lawyers, but they say: "you may go so far and no farther; that is the law." There is very little vision for the future about that. The Minister of Defence Production is the sore finger in this cabinet, and when he makes a suggestion the multitude of lawyers in the cabinet say: "I guess you are right; you take over that portfolio." What a great fellow he is.

Mr. Riley: That is pretty tough on lawyers.

Mr. Ferguson: That is pretty tough on lawyers, but it is quite true. There are 180 odd Liberals in this house. Probably they will be glad when I have finished speaking. I am quite sure they will, because I am going to say this to them. When they vote in this house on national issues and on conditions which they know confront them, such as office accommodation and lack of housing in Canada, and the great industrial falling down in the middle of the road, they vote as a body. Can you imagine 180 odd members voting 100 per cent on an issue in this house? What a pang it must be to the conscience of some representatives whom I know when the whip speaks to them and they vote as one. We should have a few more Churchills in the Liberal party. There was a man who changed from the Conservatives to the Liberals and back to the Conservatives again. It is time we had more men like him.

I hope the day will never come when I sit in parliament and demonstrate, as I have seen it demonstrated here, the unanimous vote of this party on practically every issue.

Mr. Riley: When you say "this party" do you mean your own?

Mr. Ferguson: No, the Liberal party.

Mr. Riley: What about your own?

Mr. Ferguson: Ferguson has not always voted with his party, and I intend to continue in that way. The people of Simcoe North are the people who sent me here. Let me say this: I will always remember that fact, because my duty is to those people as well as to the people across Canada.

Mr. Riley: All unanimous on combines.

Mr. Ferguson: I voted on the combines because I believe the way I voted was the correct way to vote, and for no other reason.

Mr. Cavers: What about the St. Lawrence waterway?

Mr. Ferguson: Some hon. members would have liked to vote with me, but that parliamentary assistant fish was dangling under their noses, and a judgeship in the future was dangling under their noses; certainly senatorships were. There are quite a few vacancies that have not yet been filled. They are lovely things to hold up to the boys and say: Now, you have to keep in line or you will not get a senatorship; there are two or three coming for your province. You are getting a little older.

Mr. Croll: Envy will get you no place.

Mr. Ferguson: They certainly hold the vacancies open long enough for you to get a chance, because they will always be there.

In closing I should like to impress upon the few cabinet ministers sitting here today the necessity of doing everything in their power to try to eliminate the scandalous office conditions that the people's representatives are asked to put up with in the House of Commons today. Immediate steps should be taken to remedy the situation in the most economical and businesslike way. I impress upon the cabinet of this country and the members supporting that cabinet the necessity of putting forth every effort. Let us have less red tape and less procrastination in order to build houses that are needed by thousands of people across Canada. Let them stop patting themselves on the back and get down to earth. Bring more immigrants to this country who will work along with the people already here and continue to spread and enlarge the prosperity brought about by the ingenuity of the Canadian people who are here now, and the great neighbour we have to the south, coupled with the natural resources of Canada that should be developed in order to support a population five times the size of that which we have today and still be prosperous.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) for relinquishing part of the time allotted to him so that I may have a few words to say before six o'clock. With what he has had to say I am to a large extent in agreement. Knowing that he comes from a family of distinguished and eminent lawyers, I think that we can probably take his remarks with respect to the legal profession with a little bit of salt. However, I agree with him as to members' salaries, and what member in this house does not agree with him? With respect to other things, of course, we should like to have co-operation.

We should like to limit speeches in this house to thirty minutes so that we may be permitted to leave this chamber by ten o'clock in the evening and not have to stay until eleven o'clock every night. If he will use the same forensic ability with his party on that matter we shall achieve that goal. I know the government is not desirous of throwing any weight behind this, because they are not anxious to put any pressure of their majority on the opposition. They want to give them every opportunity, but I am sure that if he will use his ability, which I envy, we shall accomplish that.

I should like to say a word on behalf of my constituency, which has probably the unique distinction of being the only constituency in Canada which is wholly south of the United States. A constituency is only about as good as the people that live in it. The people in our constituencies—and when I say "our constituencies" I mean the constituencies of Essex East, Essex South and Essex West—are showing their ability, their kindness, their large-heartedness at this present time. Because of our geographical situation we, like other constituencies bordering on the great lakes, are having considerable difficulty at the present time. As soon as the floods became manifest in our area an engineer was sent immediately to the area, by air, to make a survey. He has reported back. Subsequently the Minister of National Health and Welfare

(Mr. Martin), the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) and I have interested ourselves daily in that subject, and have attended meetings of the citizens group formed in the constituency of Essex East, and which is doing such a remarkable job.

I would say, in fact, that they are doing a heroic job, working day and night under great hardships to keep the flood waters back. They are not always successful, because there have been occasions when the flood waters have poured in over the dikes and over the waterfront of lake St. Clair, covering the main highway to a depth of about two feet. However the provincial government has seen its responsibility, and it, too, is doing a good job. There is an engineer in attendance to give advice, and he has been working closely with the local committee.

In my own constituency of Essex West, along the Detroit river I was instrumental in getting the towns of La Salle and Sandwich West to start an organization. The organization has been continuing and has done a good job in laying plans which would become effective in the event of an emergency. I am sure that if the provincial government finds that the problem becomes so great it cannot cope with it, it need only make application and it will be given every consideration by the House of Commons, as was done in connection with the Fraser valley and Winnipeg floods, and the fire at Rimouski.

Because of our geographical location we have things of great value. I am not particularly interested in discovering what is wrong with the area; my chief wish is to point out any error there may be and then to take every step possible to see that the error is corrected. I wish, further, to emphasize that which is good in the area—and there are many things. I thought this was best expressed by an hon. member of this House of Commons who visited the area, in company with fifty other members. On a bright Sunday morning they went down along the Detroit river to Amherstburg, and up through Harrow and Leamington. Passing through a sunny and rich farming area they saw mile upon mile of fruit trees in blossom, acres upon acres of hothouses in which cucumbers and tomatoes as well as other vegetables were being propagated under glass.

Upon his return to this city I asked him what he thought of what he had seen. With vigorous gesticulations he said, "No, no, no; what I saw I don't believe!" That, I think, best expresses the feelings of those who have seen the rich agricultural district in that area, as well as the great industrial plants.

Most of all however we pride ourselves on the friendliness of our people, a condition being commented upon each day. Only yesterday it was expressed to me in this building by a person of high rank who only recently in his official capacity had visited Windsor. He told me that of all the places in Canada he had visited, he found the people of that area the most hospitable and the most friendly that he had encountered anywhere. I do not say that in a boastful fashion, but state it merely as a fact, because I believe to a large extent we have acquired some American traits of character, of which that is one.

I pointed out some time ago that in the area we have large industries, and I should like to refer to that fact for a moment. We have large automobile industries, large pharmaceutical plants and large chemical plants. Then, in association with the automobile industry there are sixty or seventy large and small feeder plants producing parts and equipment being fed to the automobile industry. Those industries have been operating in the area for many years. I believe it is safe to say that in that part of Canada there are more mechanical and chemical engineers per capita than in most other parts. They have acquired the know-how of the industry. They are familiar with the technique. They are easily accessible to the United States which, either through our tunnel or across our suspension bridge, is only about five minutes away. In that length of time one can go from the heart of the city of Windsor to the heart of the city of Detroit, and he is at once accessible to the large technical ability of not only Detroit but the whole of the United States, because the automobile industry is concentrated in that American city.

Labour in the Windsor area is the same as in any other part of Canada. For the most part the workmen are hard-working, sincere and home-loving. They want nothing more than comfortable accommodation, enough to eat, and the hospitality and warmth of their homes. They have been trained not only in the universities of the area, but in those of the rest of Canada. They have had the advantage of one of the best technical schools in Canada, the W. D. Lowe school, formerly known as the Windsor-Walkerville technical school. This is a large educational establishment with competent instructors who are capable of training students for the automobile and other industries, including those connected with building trades in the area.

Then, we have available to us the University of Michigan located at Ann Arbor Wayne University and L'Assomption College So that labour is well trained; there is n reason why they cannot obtain the training they want to have. For the type of production on which Canadian prosperity and security is founded, there must be the utmost co-operation between labour and management. If we are going to meet our production goals and maintain our present standard of living we must utilize all our productive resources. These cannot be used to the utmost in an atmosphere of suspicion and prejudice. We have had our difficulties in the past and we will probably have them in the future. It may be that because of our proximity to the United States our difficulties in my area are greater, but I think the rest of Canada can be most grateful that we have shown the ingenuity and stability to weather these storms. I know that we will eventually come out on top.

If we are to overcome our difficulties there must be absolute co-operation. There must be a complete absence of fear, of suspicion and of prejudice. The Department of Labour has done a great deal in the way of providing machinery by which these things may be overcome, and I should like to speak on this for a few moments.

In February, 1943, the then minister of labour and the minister of munitions and supply set up an interdepartmental committee on labour-management committees. It is interesting to note that that good friend of labour, Mr. M. M. Maclean, a valued employee of the Department of Labour, was a member of that committee. The people of Canada owe a great deal to his efforts.

An advisory committee composed of representatives of trade union and employer groups was constituted to assist the interdepartmental committee. In March, 1943, the government officially decided to encourage and sponsor the formation of labour-management production committees. Of course, that was for war purposes. It might be interesting to put on the record the principles underlying these committees, and I quote from the report of the Department of Labour for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1944, page 44, as follows:

1. The purpose of labour-management production committees should be to examine and consider means to improve and increase production;

2. The committee should be composed of representatives from labour and management directly engaged in production in the particular units or plants in which each committee functions. The number of representatives of labour should be at least equal to the number of representatives of management. The representatives of labour should be chosen in a democratic manner, preferably from the various departments or natural divisions of a unit or plant, rather than from the entire working force;

3. The committee should be advisory and consultative. Management should examine carefully all recommendations of labour representatives and, in cases where recommendations are not acceptable, should provide adequate explanations. Similarly, the representatives of labour should examine carefully all recommendations of management and co-operate in making effective all recommendations endorsed by the committee and adopted by management;

4. The committees should concern themselves exclusively with problems of production, and should leave problems relating to wages, working conditions and similar matters, including grievances, to the appropriate collective bargaining procedure.

A labour-management co-operation service was established in May, 1947, as a section of the industrial relations branch of the Department of Labour to continue the work of the labour-management production committees. This committee was precisely what its name implies, a committee composed of representatives of labour and management to increase production and improve efficiency through greater co-operation between both groups. It is a joint enterprise. It is a two-way communication channel for the exchange of ideas and information on production problems. It is an agency making possible effective plant action on production, conservation, recreation, welfare, morale, absenteeism, safety, and a large number of other important problems. It in no way affects the right of a union to enter into bargaining agreements.

It is not a management plan for the promotion of company unions. It is not a labour plan for taking over the job of management. It is not a bargaining agency or a grievance committee. Wages, hours, working conditions and related matters are subjects for determination by collective bargaining procedures. If time permitted I could go on at some length to deal with the functions of this service.

I would certainly recommend this to industry which must take the lead in the city of Windsor in setting up as many labour-management production committees as is possible. The report issued this year indicates that 789 labour-management committees are operating in Canada affecting 306,427 workers. There is a total of 441 committees in the manufacturing section affecting a total of 164,154 workers. I am glad to be able to say that many labour-management committees are in operation in the automobile feeder plants in Windsor, but I am sorry to say that there does not seem to be the same co-operation in the plants of the big three which is necessary if we are to produce successfully for the betterment of Canada and create the utmost labour harmony.

I urge that industry take the lead in co-operation with the Department of Labour and see that such committees are set up at an early date. I should like to indicate what has been said by a worker in a plant, not in the city of Windsor, about the work of these labour-management production committees, and I quote:

> Things are done with a real team spirit around the place because we all know what's going on and why. Management tells us what's the trouble and we try to show them what's wrong. None of us are perfect. Any of us can be off the beam—but we can tell each other what's on our minds and there's no hard feelings. Sometimes we tell each other plenty. We make a better team when we all know the score.

Some companies throughout Canada in the operation of these labour-management production committees give certain incentives to the workers. I have in mind one company which in order to stimulate production started a competition between four teams of workers operating certain machines in the mills. The winners of this production competition were given a trip to interview the customers of that mill. They visited with the customers and saw what they wanted, and came back full of enthusiasm for the business in which they were engaged and in which they were partners. I think, too, these labour-management committees create confidence as between labour and management as nothing else can. When they get together they can do as we do in caucus, and explain matters frankly and honestly. I think if we are honest and sincere with each other—and this applies to management and labour—we will have greater industrial harmony.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

(Translation):

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, while addressing my humble remarks to the house today, I do not so much propose to comment on the budget as such, as to submit certain statements on our immigration policy.

Nevertheless, after listening the the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) on April 24 last, I thought it might perhaps be appropriate to put a few suggestions to him.

In a speech which will go down in the history of his party, he indicated to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) how to economize something like $315 million. On page 1569 of Hansard, the member for Moose Jaw suggests that the members of the house should begin by setting an example and reducing the length of the sessions so as to have one session a year, without regard to existing conditions.

Since the hon. member has raised this matter without indicating the steps that should be taken to shorten the long sessions of parliament, I wonder why, in his campaign to curtail expenditures, the hon. member did not suggest that the redistribution committee, set up to inquire into the distribution of seats in the house allotted to each province, stick to the letter of the Canadian constitution. Since according to the constitution, the matter of distribution must again be examined in the light of the last census and since according to that same constitution my hon. friend's province is liable to lose five seats as a result of the same census, I would have thought that my hon. friend from Moose Jaw would have asked the house to stick to the constitutional formula and thus save approximately $300,000 in the next two parliaments.

As the hon. member for Moose Jaw stated, it is fitting that members of the house should themselves set the example in curtailing expenditures. I hope that he will be the first to practise what he preaches when the opportunity arises.

In the same speech, he urged the Minister of Finance to delete from the estimates item No. 42, where an amount of $500,000 was voted in order to help the maple syrup producers in the province of Quebec. This aid is granted by the government to help our producers replace the equipment used in the manufacturing of maple products and allow them to export their wares. This industry brings every year into Canada several million dollars, and I do hope that the government will continue to advise parliament to adopt a measure which is so beneficial to our farmers.

While studying the estimates of the same department, the hon. member might have come across the fact that not one among the Ontario or Quebec members tried to suggest that items 46 and 47 of these estimates should be reduced or suppressed altogether because they applied to the western provinces. As far as I am concerned, I have only the most superficial knowledge of the difficulties encountered by our fellow Canadians living in the prairies; I would be loath to see them deprived of the improvements which might be brought to them, thanks to the aid of the federal government. In return, I am sure the hon. member would not wish to adopt, towards my province, an attitude I would be reluctant to take towards any other province.

So much for that. I will not deal any further with the other suggestions made in that same speech since I feel no other member in this house would want a reduction in the rates of family allowances, old age pensions or in any other social legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I consider the financial administration of the government to be highly important and I am one of those who have confidence and who believe that no country in the world has a better reputation than Canada, from a financial point of view.

The present government has, for a very large part, presided over the destinies of the nation since the dark days of the years 1931-1935 to the present period. During these 17 years that separate us from the "great darkness," Canada has taken an active part in a world war. We were victorious in that war and, if peace is not yet ours, at least we did not have to undergo the tragic crises which were the lot of the other nations with which we shared that victory.

This government, which longed then, like every other free nation, for an era of peace, was soon faced with the threat of new communist aggression and compelled to look, with the co-operation of friendly countries, for a new way of once again preserving world peace, which was threatened by an enemy more terrible than the one we had just defeated.

In seeking this new protection in alliances with other nations, it was imperative that we should assume certain obligations and new responsibilities which, during these last few years, have obliged the government to ask parliament for those appropriations as the price of our security.

Of course such expenses bear heavily upon the Canadian people. But we all hope that our collective effort will show any potential enemy that aggression would be a bad risk and that it would be preferable to settle our differences at a round table.

Many of us are asking ourselves just how far our defence preparations should go in view of the huge sums contained in the estimates. Such a question, Mr. Speaker, deserves an answer because the taxpayers want to know at times where their money goes. We would be on the wrong course if an arms race was our only aim. It is therefore important that the different countries co-ordinate their efforts so that each dollar spent for common defence be used where it is required and so that no country be called upon to contribute more than is necessary to pay this insurance premium for our common protection.

Canada today is doing its heavy share and the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance inevitably reflects that fact. And in spite of this international situation which continually requires that ransoms be paid as protection against the forces of war, our government has passed social legislation which, in certain respects, goes further than any legislation existing elsewhere.

There again, tremendous amounts must be provided in order to maintain these social services, such as family allowances, unemployment insurance, pensions for the blind, old age pensions and our national health program. These are dangerous and fascinating times. Our prosperity, fashioned with hope and anxiety, has reached a peak we had never dreamed to attain during the present generation.

The various provincial governments each claim the glory of governing the most prosperous province. The future looks so bright that some of them become dazzled like the Duplessis government in Quebec, for instance, who are led to believe they have discovered the province of Quebec.

In all this atmosphere where prospects of a golden age join with uncertainty, where the forces of peace are locked in a constant struggle with the forces of war, the present government is able to bring down a balanced budget, to pay the cost of our defence and our national welfare and at the same time, which is quite surprising, to reduce our public debt. This wise government which has succeeded in stabilizing the cost of living, in spite of what our Progressive Conservative friends may say, has surprised them to such an extent that the surplus of the Minister of Finance is a riddle to them they are unable to explain.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the wise administration of our present government in this dangerous prosperity.

Let us consider the immigration problem. The speech made in this house on March 10 last by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) prompts me to do so. Needless to say, I do not share all the views he expressed on this occasion, nor am I able to find any reasons which might justify the request submitted by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce on page 13 of its last brief to the effect that many more immigrants be admitted into this country than we are now receiving.

I certainly do not hesitate to state with Philippe Roy of L'Action Catholique that, in our day, immigration is spoken of in the name of justice and human kindness, or of a more rational distribution of the world's population, and that as Christians we must support the principle of immigration.

I am therefore speaking of the manner in which that principle should be applied in our country, rather than of the principle of immigration itself.

> Today a nation more than twice as large in population as it was in 1913, and many times as strong, is taking in only half the number of immigrants we took in at that time. I merely point out to the house that it is time we burst these bonds of caution. We have to take a firm stand in this country on immigration because we can produce more homes, more suits of clothing, more pairs of shoes and more loaves of bread.

And a little further down:

> I am convinced that the country wants more of the right kind of immigration, the kind that we have been getting particularly this year.

Mr. Speaker, I respect the hon. member's opinion, but I believe that our immigration policy not only should be carefully selective, but it should also adapt itself to economic, social and political conditions in Canada.

Confronted with the huge geographical spaces of our country, people have often expressed various opinions concerning the best possible solution to the problem of Canadian population. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), speaking in British Columbia, expressed the hope that our population will one day reach 125 million. I feel that this is a rather high figure and I am inclined to believe that this represents more people than Canada could support.

For, in spite of the vastness of our country, one should not fail to take into account the following facts: vast regions are unable to support a large population. All the northern districts, from Hudson bay to Georgian bay, the north side of lake Superior, Great Slave lake, and including the whole Arctic region, which represents two-thirds of the whole surface of Canada, can hardly, except here and there, support a population. According to the dominion bureau of statistics, after the 1931 census, the arable land in this country comprises no more than 352 million acres—i.e. scarcely 27·5 per cent of its total area.

Of this total, 163 million acres are already settled. The rest of the area as yet not settled represents land where the farmer who will settle there will undergo a great many difficulties, because of the climate, the nature of the soil or the very limited production he will be able to obtain.

Naturally, the greater part of this farm land is located in the western provinces but even there agriculture seems confined to wheat growing and part of these lands are already marginal. The serious drop in Saskatchewan's population, during the last decade, seems to indicate that special crops in the prairies are unable to support a heavy population.

That is to say that Canada's population cannot be determined on the basis of land area alone. Other factors must be considered, such as the development of our natural resources, our productive capacity, our industrialization and our economic conditions. Therefore, in the preparation of a long-term immigration plan, it would be important to inquire into all these conditions.

If we look up statistics, we find that we have had waves of immigration which went up and down according to the times. The years before the war of 1914 were characterized by a heavy flow of immigrants. From 1916 to 1923 there was a large drop in the number of immigrants, but immigration was again on the increase from 1924 to 1931, when it was practically shut off up to 1945.

It is interesting to note that from 1901 to 1931 Canada received more than 5 million immigrants, but that, during the same period of time, nearly 3,500,000 people left the country. There is no doubt that a great number of these immigrants went back to their own country or that they simply passed through Canada before going to the United States. However these figures show that our immigration policy did not have the results that we hoped it would have. It is therefore important that our immigration policy be adapted to economic conditions in this country.

The present industrial expansion should not be overestimated. Although the development of our natural resources allows us to foresee a bright future we must always keep in mind that our Canadian economy is strongly influenced by international market conditions and conditions in other countries. Furthermore that development of our resources might be misleading if our role consists merely in extracting the raw materials and selling them to other countries without establishing manufacturing industries.

Even today, despite the activity resulting from our defence effort and our economic expansion, each year we go through a critical period of unemployment about which we certainly cannot feel unconcerned. And our great labour unions have requested that there be no immigration whatever during those periods of unemployment.

On the other hand, the housing problem is very serious in Canada and I take advantage of this opportunity to ask the government to amend the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the National Housing Act, 1944, in order to allow more people in the middle classes and from rural areas to avail themselves of the benefits of these acts. Conditions and restrictions imposed, in certain rural areas, under this act make it very difficult to operate, at least in the constituency of Charlevoix, which I have the honour to represent. A great many Canadian families are looking for houses. The manpower necessary for the construction of these houses is available since at the end of February of this year there were more than 13,000 unemployed in the building trades alone. In a report published recently by the Department of Trade and Commerce, no serious shortages of building materials were anticipated for this year.

I believe the time has come to extend the compass of the present National Housing Act in order to deal with the present housing shortage.

And this housing situation is closely related to our immigration policy since we have a right to ask where these immigrants are expected to find a house.

Briefly, Mr. Speaker, while I congratulate the government on their careful and judicious selection of immigrants, I am unable to share the views of the member for Spadina and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce who are calling for a greater number of immigrants.

I repeat once again, our immigration policy should not only aim at a proper selection of immigrants but it should be consistent with economic conditions in this country having regard to our absorptive capacity, to the yearly recurrent periods of unemployment and to the housing problems we face at the moment.

As immigration is also under provincial jurisdiction, I think it would be important to establish an advisory committee, consisting of the various provincial governments, of the representatives of labour unions, of employers and of the different universities, with a view to helping the department to work out an immigration policy consistent with this country's political, social and economic conditions.

In this way in order to increase the population of Canada we should be able to lead immigrants into this country towards adopting the ideals we all share, that is, a great, happy Canada respectful of the rights of all its sections, such as the two main races of this country have undertaken to build up when history placed them side by side to form the Canadian people.

(Text):

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Northumberland, Ont.): The nature of the 1952 budget, as presented by our very able Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), is significant of our expanding economy and of our important place in national affairs. It underlines what must be apparent to all of us, namely, that Canada is one of the great nations of the free world, and that the entire world is looking to us for more and more of that stability which is necessary if free institutions and our way of life are to survive.

The opposition members have attacked the budget as imposing excessive taxation. I think we must be realistic, and if we remember our national prosperity and our domestic and international commitments, then I think we must conclude that the rate of taxation as imposed by this budget is quite in keeping with Canada's ability to pay. If we wish to continue our social security program, furnish sufficient money for the orderly administration of government, have sufficient funds to develop our natural resources, and still maintain our defence expenditures, then it seems to me we must be prepared to make some sacrifices during this important period of world affairs.

The Minister of Finance has indicated that there will be this year an estimated expenditure of $4,270 million. I should like briefly to review what these expenditures are as they were outlined by the Minister of Finance. We are spending on national defence slightly over $2 billion; on our social security program and other pensions, nearly $1 billion. Interest on the national debt and payment to provinces amount to $650 million, and the general administration and other activities of government amount to approximately $650 million. I should like briefly to review these expenditures. We are spending on national defence slightly over $2 billion. I believe that all hon. members agree that Canada must play her full part in the defence of freedom in the world today.

The Minister of Finance has very wisely pointed out that the scale of the defence budget is determined by policies approved by this parliament. It is true that the administration of the defence department is most important; but after all, what we members of parliament decide is in the best interests of Canada must underlie the expenditures of national defence. I am sure that all hon. members support the part Canada is playing in the United Nations. The vast majority of the members in this house approve of what Canada is doing in support of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I was very disappointed in the attitude of the C.C.F. party some time ago when they criticized the government for the support we are giving to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I for one am prepared to accept the advice of the statesmen and military experts of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as to what is necessary in order to preserve our freedom. I cannot believe that in the C.C.F. party there are many international experts whose advice we can trust implicitly. Let us not make the mistake of too little too late. One thing we must be sure of is that we have the strength to deter Stalin and the Russians from taking any chances or provoking another great war.

The financial critic of the official opposition made a statement in this house which is to be found on page 1481 of Hansard. He said:

> We should not expect men in the services to be interested in expenses, Mr. Speaker. I think we would be naive to expect that. It is not their job, but the job of parliament.

I cannot agree with that statement. I think there is great responsibility on men in the services to see that our dollars are wisely spent. We can vote money in this house, but after we have given careful consideration to it, and are sure that it is in the national interest, then I think we have the right to expect the men in the services to do their part. There is a responsibility on the part of the deputy minister of national defence, the assistant deputy ministers and on all other officers of the armed forces. I remember that the financial critic told us of the time when he was in the army, and how careful he was to see that no public money was wasted. I would say that it is rather presumptuous on his part to suggest that he was the only man of that type to be found in the armed services. I am sure that there are many other men of that type who are anxious to see that money which we vote for national defence is wisely spent. I sincerely believe that is the case in the Department of National Defence in Canada.

We have had long discussions in this house on national defence; we have had a defence expenditures committee; we have made a close study of the estimates of the Department of National Defence. I suggest to you that every opportunity is given to members of the opposition party to show what money is not being wisely spent.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and his department on their good judgment in picking Cobourg, Ontario, my home town, as the site of the new central ordnance depot. There can be no doubt that the department showed excellent judgment in this decision, because Cobourg has many advantages which make it the logical place for the establishment of such a project. We have ample room for expansion of this depot, should it be necessary; we have excellent rail, water and road facilities; we have an adequate supply of labour; we have excellent recreational facilities. In fact, I think that we have everything which will make this central ordnance depot a real success.

I should like briefly to review our expenditures on social security which amount to nearly $1 billion. I am sure that these expenditures are approved by the vast majority of Canadians. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) wisely said the other night that we must consider very carefully the amount of money we spend on social security. We must be very sure that we shall never have to regress in the payment of social security. It is true that the C.C.F. party demand even greater and greater expenditures on social security.

The leader of the C.C.F. party, speaking in the house not long ago, assailed the government because we are not spending as large a percentage of our national income on social security as we did some four or five years ago. It seems ridiculous to me, when we are in the midst of a vast rearmament program costing over two billions of dollars, that the leader of the C.C.F. would expect us to spend as large a percentage on social security as we did before. I believe the social security program is the greatest single contribution the Liberal party has made to good government in this country. I am sure that as soon as the country can afford greater social security benefits the Liberal party will see that these are brought into being.

There can be little discussion of the third item in the budget, that of the payment of the interest on the national debt, and payments to the provinces. We would be failing to fulfil our obligations if we failed to make these payments.

Coming to the fourth division of the expenditures as outlined in the budget, we find that $650 million is being spent on the general administration of government. I submit that real economies have been instituted by this government. I have in my hand the estimates for this fiscal year, and when we look at the different columns, we see that there has been a decrease in the various departments of government amounting to $62,787,593. There have been increases in other departments, so that we find there has been an over-all increase in all departments of government of $605,208,972. But when we look closely into these estimates we find that the increase in the Department of National Defence is $392,410,629, and that the increase in the Department of National Health and Welfare is $252,464,877. These two departments show a total increase of $645 million.

So, reviewing the whole situation as it is set out in the estimates, we find there has been an actual decrease of $45 million in all other estimates. This has been accomplished, in spite of a 10 per cent increase in salaries, and other costs. In spite of these economy measures on the part of the government we know that many services have been greatly expanded in the past year. I need only remind the house of the increased postal services, our stepped up immigration program, our improved service for Indians, and the expansion of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Our country is an ever-growing country, and it requires an increasing amount of money in order to run the government of the country in an efficient way. The government can be congratulated upon the real economies it has put into effect in the last year. While members of the opposition are always asking for decreased taxation, they ask continuously for greater and greater expenditures. They have asked for extensive federal aid to education; for certain gifts to Great Britain; for more economic aid to other countries; for the payment of subsidies and the like. All these things are very desirable, and many of us would like to support them; but we must remember that they cost money, and represent an increased burden on the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Rowe: And advertising over the C.B.C.

Mr. Robertson: I am pleased to see that the Minister of Finance has either eliminated or reduced many of the excise taxes on household goods. When I spoke in the budget debate a year ago I expressed the hope that these excise taxes could be reduced, once the danger of inflation was over. We all know there has been some easing of the inflationary pressure, and I am pleased indeed to see that the minister has seen fit to reduce these taxes.

He has also indicated that credit restrictions are under constant review; and I know that when conditions are suitable a gradual removal of these credit restrictions will be undertaken. We have a budgetary surplus of $356 million. I know how disappointed are members of the opposition that the budgetary surplus is not greater. They have been telling us for many months about the great surplus that would exist at the end of this y ar, despite the constant warnings of the Minister of Finance that there would be huge expenditures at the end of the year which would reduce this surplus by a great amount. I say there is no need to apologize for the present surplus which the budget produces.

Mr. Fraser: They robbed the people to get it.

Mr. Robertson: As I have already pointed out, the opposition has suggested many times expenditures which would mean even higher taxation.

Mr. Fraser: Who did?

Mr. Robertson: This surplus has produced many beneficial results. It has helped to bring inflation under control; it has strengthened Canada's economy; it has reduced the burden of our national debt; it has attracted capital from abroad.

Opposition members cannot agree as to what the budgetary surplus will be for the coming year. Some say that it will be as large as last year's. We have only to check the speeches of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) to see that those gentlemen think our surplus will be very great. Then, today in the house the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) expressed the opinion that the surplus would be between $300 million and $400 million. He was very honest about it, however, and admitted he did not know how much it might be. Yet he hazarded this wild guess.

Other members have expressed a quite different view, and I should like to read some of their opinions as they are set forth in Hansard.

Mr. Fraser: He cannot read from this debate.

Mr. Sinclair: The present debate? Why not?

Mr. Robertson: We see that the financial critic of the official opposition has this to say:

> I would state without hesitation that we do have in this country, despite our glowing figures, those grandiose figures, uneasiness, and the feeling that we have been on the crest of a boom year after year, and there is the fear that one day the boom will end and the reckoning come.

How often have we heard that prophecy over the last few years? Here is what the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) had to say, as it is set out at page 1503 of Hansard:

> Now that we have lost the markets for our agricultural products and prices are decreasing, I am wondering where the government is going to get all the money it needs.

And quoting the leader of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), we find that he said this, as it is set out at page 1494 of Hansard:

> Fear of overproduction is beginning to manifest itself not only in the farming industry but also in many fields, in spite of the world's need for food, and other necessities of life, and in spite of hunger and suffering in many lands.

He goes on to say, as reported on page 1495:

> Today farm prices, it is true, are relatively more fair in relation to taxes and interest rates; but the general price level is so high that there is widespread fear that the present abundant situation will come to a sudden collapse.

Just what advice should the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) take from the members of the opposition? Some are predicting a huge surplus while others are saying that our national production is falling away. If these latter people are right, then under our present taxation we will be budgeting for a deficit and even the financial critic of the official opposition says that that is not a good thing.

Our Minister of Finance has a wonderful and proud record to present to this house in the matter of debt reduction. Since 1947 he has reduced the national debt by $2,344 million, with an interest saving to the taxpayers of Canada of $62 million. I ask hon. members of the opposition what good businessman, under similar circumstances, would not do exactly as the Minister of Finance has done. Is it not true that the generally accepted business principle is to pay your debts during periods of prosperity? I have never heard anyone speak to the contrary.

The position taken by others is that we should have a planned debt reduction. What does that mean? It means that if the advice of those members of the opposition who are crying hard times is taken we will have to tax the people of Canada even more. Why is it not reasonable to adopt a pay-as-you-go budget and plan for a balanced budget? If our prosperity exceeds our expectations then I submit that that is the time to make payments on our national debt. Why should we saddle posterity with the debts of our generation?

I have noticed that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) is becoming the official spokesman for the Conservative party at political meetings throughout the country. I congratulate the hon. member upon his rapid promotion within the party, but after reading some of his speeches I feel that I cannot congratulate the Conservative party upon their selection.

Mr. Lennard: You might do better than your man Thomson at that.

Mr. Robertson: Did I hear the hon. member say the leader of the opposition?

Mr. Rowe: You did not understand that at all.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. member for Broadview has been speaking at many political meetings. A report in the Telegram, the accuracy of which I am sure my hon. friends will not challenge, quotes him as saying in London, Ontario, that the present budget was a fraud on the Canadian people. The real fraud is the double talk of the Conservative party.

Let me give a few examples. I think the most glaring is the position taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on family allowances. We know that when he was premier of Ontario he said that he would do everything to prevent this iniquitous act becoming legislation. I listened to that speech on the radio and I have no doubt that he made that statement. He comes into the house now and tells us that he was opposing it on constitutional grounds. What sins are committed in the name of the constitution!

Mr. Knowles: The Liberal party ought to know.

Mr. Robertson: I should like to give another example of the double talk of the Conservative party. I have in my hand a report of a press conference which took place on Monday, March 12, 1951, at which time the president of the National Progressive Conservative Association was questioned by members of the parliamentary press gallery. He was asked this question by Mr. Baldwin:

> I believe the Progressive Conservative party voted with the C.C.F. for price control. Can you tell me why?

The answer of the hon. member was as follows:

> We did—

And then he continues:

> We supported the C.C.F. amendment because we wanted to register protest against the "do-nothing" policy of this government, and this was the only vehicle open to us. We might say that we were not subscribing to any particular form of control, and certainly not the old control.

Their advice—flexible controls selectively applied. That is the way the Conservative party would have handled the inflationary pressure which we had some time ago. Could you imagine any greater disruption of our national economy had the government accepted their advice?

Mr. Rowe: It might have been better for business.

Mr. Robertson: It might have been better for the pulp and paper business at the present time.

Mr. Rowe: That is not helping either you or your party.

Mr. Robertson: We have heard many members of the Conservative party speaking in the house and attacking the government for removing the name "dominion" from certain statutes of Canada. They almost suggested that they were the only people who were proud of their British ancestry and of British traditions. Let me tell them that there are many members of all parties who are proud of that heritage. When we review the situation we find that not long ago their great party was known as the dominion Conservative party, but today we find that they are glad to call themselves the national Conservative party. Could we have a better example of double talk than that?

Mr. Rowe: When was it called dominion?

Mr. Robertson: You must have known because you had something to do with changing the name of your party. The members of the Conservative party are always preaching economy, and then they ask for larger and larger expenditures. I have already outlined some of the demands on the government which they have made. The Minister of Finance pointed out in his review that had the people of Canada accepted them in the last election our taxes would have been $1 billion more than they are under a Liberal government.

Finally they suggest to the people of Canada that we could have our national security program, that we could have ample money for national defence, that we could have all the money necessary for the orderly discharge of the business of this country and still offer the people of Canada a substantial reduction in the rate of taxation. Can you imagine a greater fraud being perpetrated on the Canadian people than the present policy of the Conservative party? I should like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, what other people think of the government of Canada and its accomplishments. I quote the Monetary Times of March, 1952, commenting on the return to parity of the Canadian dollar:

> Nearly everybody's happy that the Canadian dollar is back to parity with its American cousin. It's more than a matter of national pride. A par dollar will help reduce the cost of what we Canadians import from the United States. In this way parity is a contribution to a reduction in the cost of living in this country.

And the London Times under date of April 15, speaking of Canada's position, says:

> Clearly Canada is exceptionally favoured by fortune; but prosperity as well as adversity is a test of statesmanship, and much credit is due to Mr. St. Laurent's government for the happy condition of the nation's affairs. Canada may be congratulated the more wholeheartedly by her friends because her financial strength helps to buttress the entire free world.

Those of us who were privileged last evening to hear our distinguished visitors from the United States, Senator Gillette and Mr. Justice Roberts, will remember the tribute they paid to the economy of our country. I for one prefer to accept their opinion and that of such newspapers as I have quoted rather than the opinion of the official opposition or any other party in this house.

The financial critic of the official opposition accused the government of debauching our currency. He reminds me of the juryman who was unable to agree with the other eleven jurors. In exasperation he said, "I have never seen eleven such stubborn men." I submit that the financial critic of the opposition is in exactly the same category and that everyone is not out of step but the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I do not wish to suggest for one moment that we have no problems in this country. We have had many problems; we are facing grave problems today and we will have great problems in the future. But I do suggest that the government has met those problems of the past effectively and, may I add, courageously.

We have certain problems in my own county of Northumberland which are causing some concern today, and I should like to mention them briefly. One is the fact that in Cobourg and the next largest town in the county, Campbellford, we have some unemployment. We know the development of the ordnance project at Cobourg will do much to relieve the unemployment situation in that town. In Campbellford the main difficulty is unemployment in the textile industry, which is general throughout the world. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) very ably pointed out that the depression in the textile industry was world-wide, but I was happy to note that he predicted some improvement in the near future. I am sure the government will give every consideration to the needs of the textile industry and will do what can be done to help it.

We have noted some decline in agricultural prices. That is causing some concern in my riding, which is partly rural. The reasons for this decline are many and varied. Some are seasonal; some arise from overproduction and some from the loss of the British market. Some result from the foot-and-mouth disease, and some are a combination of all these. No one could expect the top prices we have been receiving for agricultural products to continue indefinitely, but I would like to impress upon this house my belief that it is most important that we see the returns from farm products do not fall below a reasonable level. I am convinced that we cannot enjoy real prosperity in this country unless our agriculturists are enjoying a decent scale of living. I endorse the farm price support policy of the government, which I believe is doing much to stabilize conditions in the country today.

The chief worry in connection with agriculture at the present time has to do with the dairy industry, and I want to speak particularly of the cheese situation. I listened with great interest a few evenings ago to the very interesting speech on cheese by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). We have long recognized him as one of the leading authorities in this house on the fishing industry and I am pleased to see that he is so versatile. I could not agree with everything the hon. member said regarding cheese, but I do believe it is not the sole responsibility of the federal government to look after the cheese situation in Canada today. The difficulty developing in connection with cheese is a cause of great concern to all connected with the dairy industry, but we know that the Ontario cheese marketing board has asked the government of Ontario for authority to look after the marketing of cheese in this country. It is regrettable that at the present time there is a very poor market; but I am sure if the provincial government, after considering the situation that is developing, would come to the federal government and say, "The condition is serious. Can we not work out some co-operative effort to aid the cheese men," this government as usual would lend a sympathetic ear to such an appeal.

I would like to see a greater advertising campaign undertaken by the makers of Ontario cheese, in an effort to sell more cheese in Canada. I think we have the finest cheese produced anywhere in the world, but it is rather disheartening to learn that Canadians eat less cheese per capita than almost any other people in the world. If the Ontario cheese marketing board would undertake an extensive selling campaign I believe that could do much to relieve that situation. I do bespeak on behalf of the cheese makers of Ontario every consideration and assistance on the part of the government, should that assistance become necessary.

There is another matter I would like to discuss at this time. The hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Huffman) made a plea in this house not long ago for the rural mail carriers of Canada, and I would like to support that plea wholeheartedly. I feel that this government might well set up a special committee to study this problem. Under our present system, in order to obtain a contract it is necessary to put in a tender at such a low rate that there is actually no profit for the contractor. In effect these men must cut each other's throats. I do not think that is a good method by which to award rural mail contracts. Surely some alternative could be worked out to give a new deal to these people. The cost of automobiles has greatly increased. In the spring and winter months the roads are often in bad condition, and it is impossible for the rural mail carriers to maintain their vehicles in good condition at the present rates. I would respectfully suggest to the government that this committee be set up as soon as possible to see if some alternative satisfactory method of awarding contracts cannot be worked out.

There is one other matter which I should like to bring to the attention of this house, and it concerns the Canadian Farm Loan Board. In my opinion the present policy of this board is most inadequate to meet present needs. I know of numerous instances in my county where farmers with valuable farms have been unable to raise $3,000 or $4,000 mortgages. We know that the government is lending up to 90 per cent on urban dwellings. Why should we discriminate against the farmer, which in effect is what we are doing if we do not change the Canadian Farm Loan Board regulations as they exist today. I do not believe that those regulations have been revised for many years, and we all know of the difference in value which exists now as compared with the time when these regulations were put into effect.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that when I spoke in this budget debate a year ago I said that the future of Canada was bright, and that the affairs of this country were in good hands. Everything which has happened since that time only serves to make that conviction stronger. In fact, we must admit that our vision could not perceive of the great developments and expansion that was to take place in Canada. I believe that if the Canadian people prepare to work hard and to work together they can produce in Canada an unsurpassed heritage. I am convinced that our government has played a notable part in the progress which Canada has made. I believe that the government merits the confidence it enjoys amongst the majority of the people of this country. From my experience and my association in this house I am prepared to say that the actions of the government are motivated by one simple desire, to do, at all times, what is in the best interests of Canadians and in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Robertson) has used the words "double talk" and "fraud" in a manner that suggests some attention should be paid to certain of the remarks that he made. I noticed that he has seen fit to repeat the utterly false statement that I, as premier of Ontario, was opposed to family allowances. This suggests the desirability of referring to the incident which occurred here on Monday, and for the reason that the statement that was made on Monday in another debate has been followed by a similar statement tonight. I intend to deal first with that subject.

Speaking on a private member's motion the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) entered the debate just before the closing hour, and, with the knowledge that there would be no immediate opportunity for reply, placed on the record statements with which I now propose to deal, in view of the fact that it is obvious that this is a pattern which is to be followed by those associated with him. I propose to deal with this because it is not the first time that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has placed on the record similarly inaccurate statements in the same way. If I do not deal with them, particularly in view of the repetition of those statements tonight, I know that the minister will follow his usual practice of saying that his statements were not challenged, and therefore it must be assumed that they were accurate. He will, of course, disregard the fact that he spoke until eleven o'clock, and that no opportunity was afforded to deal with it. The minister had special reasons for knowing how completely inaccurate his statements were, but it is not only the inaccuracy of his statements in which I am interested; I am equally interested in the very obvious reasons for the introduction once again at this time of something which had no conceivable bearing of any kind on the motion which was before the house last Monday.

The motion under discussion at that time proposed that consideration be given to the adjustment of family allowances to bring them in line with the greatly increased cost of living in this country. Whether that would be wise or unwise is obviously debatable. One member of the C.C.F. party attracted considerable attention only a few days ago when he argued that there should be a reduction in the over-all payment of family allowances. The minister responsible thinks that there should be no change. Others consider that if the figure originally chosen was correct, then adjustments should be made so that the family allowance will represent the same amount in real buying power. It should not be open to question in this house that each of those three points of view could be sincerely held, without any question being raised about the belief in the principle that family allowances should be paid. Nevertheless, although I did not introduce the motion, nor in fact had the resolution on this occasion been introduced by a member of the Conservative party, the Minister of National Health and Welfare took the opportunity to once more attempt to create the false impression that I was opposed to the payment of family allowances. In support of this contention he read from a newspaper report covering part of something I had said nearly eight years ago.

One might well wonder why this persistence. One might well wonder why the return to something that took place during the war years. One might well wonder why the minister returned to something that took place before we finally met here in a dominion-provincial conference in August, 1945, in response to the request of the government of Ontario, conveyed to the government of Canada by myself as premier of that province at that time. Even if the minister had correctly interpreted my position at that time, it would have had no bearing whatever upon the motion before the house.

Mr. Sinclair: Have you ever recanted?

Mr. Drew: This is not the first, nor the second, nor the third time that the minister has made this same inaccurate statement. When he says that I was opposed to the payment of family allowances at the time I was premier of Ontario, he is repeating what he knows from the record and from his personal knowledge to be directly contrary to the facts. Under the rules of the house the minister would, in any event, be compelled to accept my statement as to the truth or otherwise of what I said. I do not rest my position on any such rule, and I will deal with this matter upon the basis of the record which is well known to the minister. On the other hand I express the hope that the hon. member for Northumberland (Ont.) has been misled, as others have been, by the minister through the repetition of that inaccurate statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinclair: Iniquitous legislation!

Mr. Drew: The point I wish to emphasize and re-emphasize is that, in this case, the minister has no excuse, because my own position as premier of Ontario and that of the Ontario government are a matter of record.

An hon. Member: It sure is.

Mr. Drew: Speaking on behalf of the Ontario government, and before any of the discussion took place which the minister now seeks to interpret so inaccurately once again, I made it clear over and over again that we believed in the principle of family allowances and that we wished to discuss the subject with the dominion government. As the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) well knows, in writing and otherwise we proposed to the then prime minister of Canada that there should be conferences to deal with the broad problems of social security. Those who remember what took place know that the letter which I wrote to the Prime Minister of Canada was used by him as the basis for the discussions. He sent that letter to the premiers of the other provinces, with the suggestion that this be taken as the basis of our subsequent meetings.

At that time the war seemed to be drawing to a close and the Ontario government—and for that matter most of the other provincial governments—were expressing their concern at that time about the danger to our constitutional position if centralization of taxation and control continued to follow the pattern which had developed during the war. During the war we had all agreed to the suspension of many constitutional prerogatives of the provincial governments to facilitate the war effort. We were doing our utmost, however, to persuade the dominion government to hold conferences before the end of the war so that after the war was over our democratic federation should return to its historic position of checks and balances between the dominion and provincial governments, as laid down in the British North America Act. I objected—and I was not alone in that objection—to the action of the dominion government in dealing with this subject of family allowances without consulting the provinces and in dealing with that subject as though the payment of family allowances were merely a matter of dollars and cents and not a social problem of the utmost importance to all our people.

As has been the case over and over again when we have sought to emphasize the constitutional position, the government employed all its propaganda power, used at the expense of the people, to convey the impression that we were impeding their course which, one would almost think, to hear their statements, had by that time gathered something of the atmosphere of divinity.

In the very speech to which the Minister of National Health and Welfare referred last Monday, I said as long ago as August 9, 1944:

> We are in favour of every proper step being taken to encourage large and healthy families. We believe in sound provisions for family allowances and social security.

That was nearly eight years ago. Surely those words are definite enough. But they were studiously disregarded by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as they have been over and over again when he seeks to give the very opposite impression to this house—and, of course, outside of it with even wider disregard for the accuracy of his statements. As he well knows, that has been my position, as it was the position of the Ontario government, at all times when this subject was under discussion. Nor is there any necessity for defining my position by any isolated statement of that kind. In public statements, in letters to the Prime Minister of Canada at that time, in personal discussions with him and in statements to the Ontario legislature, this subject was discussed many times. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is well aware of that fact.

Just to place on record exactly what our position was—and a position that I might say was well known to the dominion government at that time and since—I propose to quote from the record of what I said in the Ontario legislature on February 22, 1945, more than seven years ago and long before I was in this House of Commons. I shall continue to quote until I indicate that the quotation is ended because, of necessity, it is a fairly extensive quotation.

> This government has from the beginning been convinced that family allowances are an integrated part of the whole question of social security, and has so stated. The members of this legislature will recall that I made this clear and definite statement on behalf of the Ontario government on August 9 last:
> "We are in favour of every proper step being taken to encourage large and healthy families. We believe in sound provisions for family allowances and social security."
> That was our position then. That is our position today. I have stated over and over again that we regard family allowances as one of the most important social services; that it is therefore within the exclusive constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces; that the provinces must be consulted if there is to be any effective administration of family allowances; and I have publicly urged over and over again that there be a dominion-provincial conference to settle the basis upon which the dominion and provincial governments of this country can best combine their legislative authority for the benefit of all our people.

The problem with which this and every other provincial government is faced has been stated most clearly by the Hon. Stuart Garson, Premier of Manitoba. I will quote his own words on the subject:

"We are still puzzled as to one of the most important points. . . We have no information before us which indicates conclusively whether the dominion government itself regards and justifies family allowances primarily as a social security measure, or as an instrument of federal fiscal policy . . .

It seems to me that the point here is that the dominion government in introducing family allowances without consulting the provinces, whose jurisdiction over the field of social services heretofore in practice has been considered almost exclusive, surely could not have intended to justify them solely or even primarily as a social service measure. As such they would constitute a federal intrusion in a provincial field of jurisdiction."

I would remind hon. members of this house that I have been quoting from the words of Hon. Stuart Garson, who at that time was premier of the province of Manitoba. I will now continue to quote from the record of the debate in the Ontario legislature:

I do not believe the situation could be more clearly stated. If family allowances are to be regarded solely or even primarily as a social service measure, then again to quote Mr. Garson's words, "They would constitute a federal intrusion in a provincial field of jurisdiction."

Now we are told by the minister responsible for the administration of this act that it is part of a broad system of social security. If that is so, and we have never been in any doubt that it was so, then this act is an intrusion upon the provincial field of jurisdiction without any consultation with the provinces. In fact the situation goes very much farther than that. Having disregarded the constitutional position of the provinces and their jurisdiction over social services in the introduction of the act, the dominion government has refused repeated requests from myself and other provincial premiers for a dominion-provincial conference to discuss this and other invasions of our authority.

I wish to assure the members of this legislature that we have at all times made it abundantly clear that we were not seeking to raise constitutional issues but that we were seeking to avoid constitutional difficulties in the future. I have made it clear, and I believe the premiers of other provinces have made it equally clear, that our purpose in insisting upon a dominion-provincial conference immediately is not to raise barriers against measures which will be for the benefit of our people but rather to make sure that we combine the full constitutional power of the dominion and provincial governments, so that whatever is done may not be upset subsequently by any one who wishes to test the validity of legislation of this nature in the courts. We also wish to make sure that the highly trained and competent social service workers in the different provinces have their part in the administration of any plans of social security which may be adopted.

Anyone with the least knowledge of family and child welfare knows that the health, housing, nurture and all the interests of human beings, hang together in a well-integrated whole. You cannot deal with the human needs of a family today without relating closely all the resources in your social catalogue—maternal care, nutrition, housing, mothers' allowances, all forms of assistance, etc. So, your whole welfare security program cannot be done on a bits and pieces basis. It has to be unified and its administration rests with the provinces unless the whole basis of confederation is to be destroyed. . . .

That is the end of the quotation from the records of the debate in 1945.

Mr. McIlraith: What is the precise date of the quotation?

Mr. Drew: February 22, 1945.

Mr. Sinclair: What is the date of the quotation the minister used?

Mr. Drew: No sooner had I made that statement than misrepresentations were repeated such as those which have been repeated here tonight, and were repeated on Monday night in regard to our position in relation to family allowances. For that reason I referred to this subject again only four days later in the Ontario legislature, on February 26, 1945, and to those who have apparently come into the house since I started to speak, that was over seven years ago. Again I quote from the record of what I said on that occasion, and again until I have indicated that the quotation is ended I shall be quoting from the record of the discussion in the Ontario legislature:

The statement I gave to the legislature last Thursday was not intended as a complete statement on this subject, nor was there any suggestion that it was intended to take the place of the remarks I proposed to make in the debate on the speech from the throne.

I did recall, however, our positive and very definite statement that "we are in favour of every proper step being taken to encourage large and healthy families. We believe in sound provisions for family allowances and social security."

In spite of our position having been stated so clearly, statements are still made that we are opposed to family allowances.

I referred to the iniquitous principle involved in the measure which has been adopted by the dominion government. My speech quite clearly was not referring to any opposition to family allowances. It was referring to the principle that family allowances are not part of social security and that they should be regarded as a mere economic question. We also believe it is an iniquitous principle that very large sums of money should be taken from the taxpayers of this or any other province to be paid for something which falls within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, without consulting those provincial governments and establishing a proper basis of taxation and payment right across Canada.

At the time I said that we would oppose the course being followed by the dominion government, we had the unqualified assurance of the Prime Minister of Canada that there was going to be a dominion-provincial conference to discuss matters of this kind, and it was our intention to do everything within our power at that conference to assure that we have a proper system of family allowances and that the rights of the people of Ontario be protected.

Now may I come to the suggestion that we intend to take legal steps to prevent the dominion act going into effect. That is not our intention and it never has been our intention. I have said in this legislature and elsewhere many times that I do not believe that the dominion and provincial governments should get involved in legal technicalities, but rather that they should meet around the council table to work out their problems and find the very best solution in every case, so that their combined powers may find full expression for the advantage of the people of this country.

Our purpose is to have in this province the very best system of family allowances which can be worked out on the basis of the accumulated experience of every other jurisdiction which has already adopted this measure. As I said last week, we wish to join hands to combine our legislative power with that of the dominion government to assure the best social services which can be devised.

You will find that in a speech as recently as Saturday night, Mr. Claxton made it quite clear that this province has been co-operating in all the preliminary details necessary for carrying out such a measure under such terms as might be agreed upon. We have, in fact, set up the most modern methods of recording vital statistics, and have installed photographic devices which provide the government at Ottawa with every detail of our vital statistics for the very purpose of carrying out this or any other measure.

I believe it is an iniquitous principle that payments should be a mere baby bonus based upon the fact that a baby has been born. I believe that our people want real family allowances, in the accepted meaning of that term, for the maintenance, care, training and upbringing of children, in a way that will assure the welfare of the children themselves. That is not accomplished by the present dominion act. We have the clear words of the Prime Minister of Canada, "The act does not in any way attempt to legislate in respect of family life." If it has nothing to do with family life, then how can it possibly assure the welfare of the children in those families which receive the money?

As you know, we have continued to press for a dominion-provincial conference right up to the opening of this session for the very purpose of bringing together the combined authorities of our governments so that in this, and every other case, no constitutional difficulties might arise and that everything should be done with full knowledge of the facts and with the certainty that what is undertaken will be carried out in the best interests of our people.

That is the end of the quotation which was taken from what was said in the Ontario legislature on February 26, 1945. I would point out that what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) read had nothing to do with the question of whether or not we were in favour of family allowances. He was quoting from a speech which he now has in his hand—and I welcome the fact that this has been brought out in the open, here, instead of simply knowing that it is being repeated with trimmings, as it has been repeated, with very unreliable trimmings over and over again in the past.

And may I say this, in so far as this is concerned, that I believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare knows his Shakespeare well enough to recall that it was only when Iago was not exposed that he was really dangerous.

But, in so far as this is concerned, I do wish to go on with another aspect of the subject. The Minister of National Health and Welfare himself is either dealing with the question of family allowances or he is dealing with something else. And if he wants to raise other subjects, then let him be quite assured that, on that level, he will be inviting a course that would of necessity result in dealing with matters which have no relation to the subject which he pretends to be dealing with, and which he regards as of so much importance.

Those were not the only occasions upon which I spoke about this subject. It was discussed frequently. What is more, the subject was discussed with representatives of the dominion government. And they themselves came to realize that it would have been an iniquitous thing to have carried out their original plan, and simply appropriate money and hand out payments without any regard to the possibility that those payments might never be used for the benefit of the children. Therefore they came to the Ontario government, as they went to other governments, and they sought the assistance of their social service organizations to do the very thing that we had said should be done.

And it may be a matter of interest to know that the present Minister of National Health and Welfare has on different occasions commended the Ontario government for the manner in which it has carried out those services in co-operation with the dominion government. And the very minister who now repeats this statement that we were opposed to family allowances knows very well that it was under my direction, as premier of Ontario, that the instructions were given that those services should be made available.

It may very well be asked why the Minister of National Health and Welfare would raise this subject at this time. The purpose was clear. It was the same purpose which has prompted a number of members on the other side of the house for some years to do the same thing, and prompted another member here in this house tonight. Because those statements seemed so unworthy of notice, and were so palpably absurd, I must confess that I have not dealt with them as vigorously as I should. It seemed to me that, in themselves, they constituted the most severe criticism of those members who made them.

On looking back over the numerous occasions on which this utterly unfounded allegation has been made I find, however, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has taken occasion to mention that I did not deal with his statement and that, therefore, I must be regarded as accepting its accuracy. He knew perfectly well what the position was; but because of that attitude, because of the obvious reason for introducing a subject which had no relation to the motion before the house last Monday, I place these facts on the record today in a way that I have not attempted to do before, or have never thought that it was necessary to do since I entered this house.

I am well aware of the nature of the attacks which have been made upon me personally in regard to family allowances. Please do not think that these attacks, which are made from house to house, do not come back and are not accurately reported. Please do not think for one moment that I am not well aware of exactly the nature of the things that are being said in the different provinces, and which are being said in different provinces in entirely different ways.

An hon. Member: You were not there, George.

Mr. Drew: I recognize the fact that at least one member of the Liberal party is well aware of exactly what has been done, and has indicated that. In the province of Quebec I am described as being an opponent of the people of Quebec.

Mr. McIlraith: Aren't you?

Mr. Drew: And do not think that I do not know that. And may I say that the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) displays his usual fairness in the remarks he has just made.

Mr. McIlraith: Your association sent me a speech delivered on July 9, 1944, with the subheadings that the association put on it.

Mr. Sinclair: When you called the French a defeated race.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in these interpolations, because it is quite obvious that what is being said has nothing whatever to do with whether I was for or against family allowances—nothing whatever.

What has just been said has supported what I have been saying, and what has been exposed now is the type of underhand campaign that has been carried on; and I welcome the opportunity to bring it into the open.

Mr. Chevrier: You are a past master at underhand campaigns.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Transport says that I am a past master at underhand campaigns, he simply brands himself as the contemptible type of politician that I always knew he was.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege: No hon. member in this house—

Some hon. Members: Take it.

Mr. Chevrier: I have a right to the floor. I am rising to a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Before I decide whether it is a question of privilege, I would suggest to both hon. members that they withdraw their remarks.

Mr. Chevrier: Just a minute.

Mr. Drew: Not "just a minute".

Mr. Chevrier: The leader of the opposition has made a statement in this house using the word "contemptible", which no member has a right to use in regard to another member. He should withdraw it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I willingly withdraw the statement I have made if the hon. member withdraws the statement that prompted it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) did make a statement which, in my opinion, was also unparliamentary; and I think both hon. members should withdraw.

Mr. Chevrier: I accept your ruling, and withdraw accordingly.

Mr. McIlraith: Before the leader of the opposition continues, and speaking to a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. McIlraith: —the leader of the opposition used precisely—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is speaking to a question of privilege, but I cannot hear what he is saying.

Mr. McIlraith: On a question of privilege: The leader of the opposition used the precise language with respect to me that the Minister of Transport used with respect to him, and which Your Honour has asked the Minister of Transport to withdraw. I would presume, therefore, that the leader of the opposition will withdraw his remarks, which were in identical terms.

Mr. Abbott: He certainly will.

Mr. Drew: I point out that I referred to a "contemptible campaign"; those were the words I used; and I leave it to the record.

Mr. McIlraith: "Underhanded".

Mr. Drew: "Underhand campaign", yes. I referred to an underhand campaign, and that of course obviously was referring to a general campaign outside this house—and the matter stands there.

Mr. Speaker: I did not take it that the leader of the opposition was referring to the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Abbott: He did; he certainly did.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is unfortunate that the matter was not brought to my attention at the time. I am sure that the leader of the opposition does not want to use any expression that is unparliamentary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I say, I do not know what words the leader of the opposition used. He knows what words he used and if they were unparliamentary, it is up to him.

An hon. Member: Better withdraw.

Mr. Drew: I am proceeding because the words that I used were not unparliamentary. They will stand as a matter of record and Your Honour will be able to read them tomorrow in Hansard.

Mr. Abbott: Continue with your text.

Mr. Mutch: Have you special privileges?

Mr. Drew: I was referring to the kind of campaign that was carried out from one point of view. But, of course, that would not have been a satisfactory campaign to carry on in other parts of Canada so an entirely different campaign was carried on in the rest of Canada. In that campaign I was described as being too friendly to the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: Where was that?

An hon. Member: That is a good one.

Mr. Mutch: Why bring that up?

Mr. Drew: Apparently the hon. member has fallen a victim to his own propaganda. There are one or two hon. members who do know the nature of that propaganda. I see the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) nodding affirmatively, because he does know of it. I am pointing out something to which I shall refer by means of quotations because this was dealt with as well in the Ontario legislature. My experience in this respect is not unique.

Mr. Abbott: He has lost his place.

Mr. Drew: May I at this time, in order to lighten the otherwise rather strained atmosphere some people are seeking to create, welcome the wanderer home and say on behalf of everybody in this house that we are glad to hear his remarks again in this house.

Mr. Abbott: I am more than grateful. The weather was not as good as it was in Nassau, I am told.

Mr. Drew: I shall deal with that subject later. I say that my experience in this respect was not unique. We had an example yesterday afternoon in a speech made in this house when we heard the old catalogue of attacks upon different leaders of the Conservative party. There is not a member in this house who does not know of the shameful and shameless things that were said about one of the most brilliant Canadians who ever entered public life, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. I remember the things that were said about Sir Robert Borden, about Lord Bennett, about Mr. Manion, Mr. Hanson and Mr. Bracken. The time has come, yes the time is long overdue to place squarely where it belongs the full responsibility for this effort by officials and others of the Liberal party to undermine confidence in their political opponents by fair means or foul.

The quotations from what I said in the Ontario legislature, which I have already read, dealt with attacks of one kind which have been made here in this house and were made in this house more than seven years ago and also in the Ontario legislature. But I also found it necessary to deal with that other kind of attack, the charge that we were so closely associated with Quebec to the detriment of the rest of Canada. There is no hon. member who is frank who will not admit that he has heard that statement made here in this house and elsewhere. So that I may indicate what my position has been all the way through these discussions, I shall quote from the Hansard record of the debates of the Ontario legislature of April 15, 1948, as follows:

> The co-operation between the governments of Quebec and Ontario has covered a very wide field. We have been able to make satisfactory agreements, not only for the construction of new power plants on the Ottawa river, but also for additional supplies of electric power over and above existing contracts. We have established a wide measure of uniformity in different fields of taxation, and there has been the closest co-operation between such related departments of government as mining, lands and forests, highways and so on.
> The governments of Quebec and Ontario have at all times, since the meeting of the dominion-provincial conference, in August, 1945, held similar views in regard to the importance of respecting the constitution which made this country a nation in 1867. On no single occasion, either at the first meeting of that conference or at the meetings which followed, did either the government of Quebec or the government of Ontario express any opinion or put forward any proposal which did not recognize the desirability of general agreement to provide those services which will elevate the living standards of all the people of Canada wherever they may live.

It is only necessary to examine the statements made in different provincial legislatures this year to realize how disillusioned are some of those governments which submitted to the terms put forward by the dominion government without consulting the provinces. The governments which a year ago hailed the purchase price of their taxing rights as the dawn of new financial security for the provinces, are, in a number of cases, now forced to resort to new forms of taxation to meet their current financial requirements.

I believe the time is not far distant when those provinces which did give up their most important taxing rights for a fixed payment, without any compensating advantage, will come to the decision that the refusal of the governments of Quebec and Ontario to submit to such terms actually saved our federal system, without which there can be no sound basis for national unity in Canada.

I repeat exactly what I said then: The time will come when the people of this country will understand that it is extremely important for all Canadians that the British North America Act at least have the continuing existence which was assured by the fact that two of the provinces representing well over 60 per cent of the population of Canada did not abandon that division of authority which was so well created in 1867. Then I went on to refer to this attempt that had been made at that time in the Ontario legislature to criticize me for being too friendly with Quebec, for being too closely associated with them in what we were doing at that time. I quote again from the Hansard record of that day:

I regret any attempt should be made to criticize that co-operation. Before confederation these two provinces were one. Our history follows a parallel course through many long years. One of the most important questions before all of us today in Canada is whether we will fan the embers of past misunderstandings, or seek in every way we can to find a broader basis for co-operation and friendship with the common purpose of building a stronger and more united Canada, within which every province and everyone in them will share the many advantages and opportunities which Providence has placed at the disposal of this great nation.

What I have quoted shows the position I took, first of all in regard to family allowances, and second in regard to this allegation repeated over and over again that the government of Ontario was aligning itself too closely with Quebec, that they were becoming too intimate. Yes; on that very day it was said, as an attack, that I walked arm in arm with the premier of the province of Quebec.

Mr. McCann: You let it go, though.

Mr. Drew: I have been prepared to walk arm in arm with the premier of Quebec or the premier of any other province or the Prime Minister of Canada when the course they were following was really intended for the welfare of the people of Canada. May I say to some of those who are so anxious to sow the seeds of suspicion and distrust—

An hon. Member: And discord?

Mr. Drew: Yes, and discord—that it was not only the present premier of Quebec with whom we had very friendly and satisfactory relations. My very first official call as premier of Ontario was on Premier Godbout of Quebec, to discuss the mutual interests of our two provinces. I have said publicly in the Ontario legislature and I repeat now, that unlike some of those who belong to the same party in other fields I found Premier Godbout most anxious to co-operate with the province of Ontario and ready to join hands in any way he thought he could at that time, in the interests of the two provinces.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not one of us who on some occasion has not used words which taken from their context could convey a meaning entirely different from that which was intended. I will go further. There is not one of us, including the Prime Minister and the members of the government, who on some occasion has not used words that at a later date and in view of later events he would have chosen otherwise.

Mr. Sinclair: Now we are coming to it.

Mr. Drew: But let us go still further. The question before us is this. Is this government, or are the members of the party who make up this government, so anxious to establish a basis of understanding and good will among other nations but anxious only here in Canada to create friction, misunderstanding and discord by the repetition of things of this kind? Is it more important to try to create good will and understanding in Canada or good will and understanding among distant countries in whom we are interested but whose welfare is not our concern as much as that of the country in which we live and which we are pledged to serve? I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that not very long ago we listened to a Liberal member repeating these very statements, using such terms as "fraud" and "double talk" and words of that kind.

Mr. Robertson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that I only read what the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) had said in referring to the budget. He referred to it as a fraud, and I said the real fraud was the double talk of the Conservative party.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member who has just spoken obviously was only reflecting what had been prepared for him, perhaps by the recent member for an adjoining riding.

Mr. Robertson: I would ask the leader of the opposition to withdraw that remark, because absolutely no one helped me in the preparation of that speech.

Mr. Drew: I withdraw the remark. The speech sounded so much like Mr. Thomson that I did make a mistake.

Mr. Abbott: That sounds so much like Rod Finlayson that it is hard to distinguish.

Mr. Drew: The great intelligence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is well displayed by the interjection he just made. He has been complaining about the fact that for some time I have been reading statements I made in the Ontario legislature over seven years ago. I would point out that, highly though I regard Mr. Finlayson, he was not with me at that time. I was quite able then, as I am now, to make my own statements and I take full responsibility for the statement that the minister was utterly irresponsible in the statement he just made. It was very interesting to note the very generous applause with which members of the Liberal party greeted the speech by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Robertson).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: And of course it should be applauded because it followed their pattern, and I would be surprised if it were not. But it is also interesting to note how unwelcome to the members who applaud in that way is any statement which deals with the conduct of which they have been guilty for so many years.

I have placed these matters on record, Mr. Speaker, and I go further and say this. There is not one member of this house who would not wish that at some time he might have put words in a different form.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: That applies to the Prime Minister, to every member of the government, and I am sure to every Liberal member in this house. May I say this? No matter what words are used the question before the members in this house today is whether or not we are going to seek a basis of unity or try to destroy unity by picking out anything that will sow the seeds of discontent in this country of ours.

Mr. Speaker, is it not an interesting thing that we should be applauding the fact that two nations, which only a few short years ago were engaged with us in bitter conflict, are now free of the shackles imposed upon them after the war and that we are seeking to lay the foundations of friendship with those nations at this time? True, we remember the conflicts that took place, but today we are seeking to build for the future by extending the hand of friendship to Germany and Japan, and other nations, in a common fellowship of nations for our own good. If it is logical, if it is sensible, that we should seek grounds of understanding in the international field, then surely it is unworthy of any Canadians who profess a belief in that course and at the same time follow a different course here in our own country. Certainly, there have been misunderstandings; certainly, there have been differences of opinion and violent differences of opinion; but it is the genius of our form of democracy and of our people that we are able to compose our differences and join hands in friendship in building for the better days ahead.

I ask hon. members to recall this fact. They are going back nearly eight years, as they have gone back for other periods of time and yet is it not significant that here in this building, on August 6, 1945, the representatives of the nine provinces which then made up Canada met to discuss the future of Canada with the representatives of the dominion government? Is it not significant that there were those that thought that the unity of purpose and common understanding between the representatives of Quebec and Ontario were too close for their satisfaction? Whether the allegation was right or wrong, that it was too close for their satisfaction, at least there was no doubt that there was real understanding between the governments of Ontario and Quebec in regard to the constitution and what it meant in protecting the rights of our people. May I go further and say that there was not a single provincial premier who disagreed with the position that we took at that time in regard to the importance of the constitution as a basis for national unity. One by one some of the provinces found it necessary to make financial arrangements, but that did not change their expressed belief that we should preserve the constitution intact in every way.

Now, with that background, with the fact that the representatives of Quebec chosen by democratic process within that province, met and found common ground—yes, and, according to those who sought to criticize us, close friendship—with representatives chosen by democratic process in Ontario, surely that is evidence of the way in which the affairs of this country can be operated in the best interests of the people of Canada. Those who talk so piously of national unity, and at the same time sow the seeds of suspicion and distrust, not in relation to any subject under discussion but for another purpose clearly disclosed, those people are guilty of nothing less than a form of national sabotage. I repeat the words that I have used before:

> One of the most important questions before all of us today in Canada is whether we will fan the embers of past misunderstandings, or seek in every way we can to find a broader basis for co-operation and friendship, with a common purpose of building a stronger and more united Canada, within which every province, and everyone in them, will share the many advantages and opportunities which Providence has placed at the disposal of this great nation.

We have great and important subjects to discuss, Mr. Speaker, and we can discuss them upon a factual and reasonable basis. There are two courses open. If members of the government depart from any subject before this house seeking to introduce other subjects for purposes so clearly unrelated to the matters in debate, then their real interest in national unity will be clearly expressed. The choice is theirs. There is no doubt about the fact that they have used anything that they thought would be of advantage, and no harm will be done in exposing openly anything that they have used secretly, and used over and over again. But the fact still remains that if we here in this country are sincere in our expression of belief in good will, in better understanding and friendship between peoples in distant lands, then the test of that sincerity will lie in the course that we follow right here in Canada.

I have placed that on the record, Mr. Speaker. I shall be able to refer to it without repeating it on other occasions. The choice is the choice of those on the other side as to which course we follow from this point on. I have dealt with one subject which I was prompted to do by the remarks that were made here tonight and earlier. I wish now to deal with the remark that was made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Of course, Mr. Speaker, that vacant look of surprise on the minister's face is a perfectly natural expression to which we are all accustomed. Nevertheless, it is a perfectly natural expression for a man who returns after a long absence to surroundings which now must almost seem strange to him.

Mr. Abbott: I did not get as far away as Nassau, either.

Mr. Drew: I am referring to the interjection he made when I welcomed him back. I welcomed him back and he made an interjection which suggested that possibly he was able to keep in touch with affairs just as well where he was as it was possible for me to do in Nassau. It happens that I was in Nassau while this house was not in session.

Mr. Mutch: Why did you not wait?

Mr. Drew: It also happens that I am not responsible for the presentation of the budget. I would be ashamed if I were.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Abbott: So would the country.

Mr. Drew: But I will assure him of this. This is not the first time that I have been in opposition and it is not the first time I have occupied another position. I will only assure him of this. No matter how remote he may think is the possibility of a Conservative government's being in power, I will tell him that no Conservative finance minister who was the finance minister of any government for which I was responsible would lay a budget before this house and then leave the house without any member of the government representing him to deal with what was before it.

Mr. Abbott: I was just wondering—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Abbott: I was just wondering if my hon. friend—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Abbott: I was just going to ask a question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: If it is a question that the minister wishes to ask, it can be asked with consent.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am quite ready to allow the minister to deal with this matter after I have finished. He has not risen on a question of privilege. I would suggest that he contain himself.

Mr. Abbott: I was wondering if my hon. friend would allow me to ask a question. If he does not want me to ask it now—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Abbott: —I will wait.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend—

An hon. Member: He is up again.

Mr. Knowles: Can we not sell tickets to this show?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Abbott: I just wanted to ask a question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the question to be asked unless the leader of the opposition consents.

Mr. Abbott: It is quite all right. If he does not want to answer it, I do not mind.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Abbott: It is a very simple question. He is afraid to answer it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Abbott: It is a very simple question.

Mr. Rowe: Rise, then, and ask it.

Mr. Speaker: I must ask hon. gentlemen to maintain order.

An hon. Member: Ask the Conservatives.

Mr. Speaker: I refer to all members of the house.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to interrupt.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps the leader of the opposition will allow me to ask the question when he is through with his speech.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Can we not sell tickets to this show and pay off the national debt?

Mr. Rowe: I do not think the minister wanted to ask it very bad. Let him get to his feet if he wants to ask it.

Mr. Abbott: It is a good question.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Killing time.

Mr. Drew: To me it is a very interesting thing, Mr. Speaker, to hear a remark to the effect that I am killing time; but this is the first moment for some time that it was possible for anybody to be heard, in view of the noise which has been coming from the other side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinclair: From the Conservative benches.

Mr. Drew: I was interested in one of the remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. with regard to the budget itself which he finds to be so satisfactory. He asked us where there could be any savings in this budget. Without attempting to cover too broad a field with regard to the many places where savings can be made—and many of them have been suggested—may I remind every hon. member that we have had dramatic evidence recently of how money can be saved. That has been furnished by what happened at Petawawa.

Mr. Ferrie: Do you endorse Ross Thatcher?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: The Petawawa incident is something which does more than merely raise the necessity for charges being laid. It is a great deal more than that. Let us remember that this is not the first time that there have been extensive thefts from camps here in Canada. This is not the first time that there have been warnings to the Department of National Defence that it was necessary that there be careful supervision of the military establishments of this country. There was, for instance—apart from other lootings in other camps—the dramatic episode at Farnham in Quebec where, for all practical purposes, it was discovered in December, 1949, that a whole camp had disappeared. That camp was equipped with plumbing, electrical fixtures, wiring, sinks, showers, refrigerators and all the things that go along with camps.

Mr. Cruickshank: Was that Sam Hughes?

Mr. Drew: That camp disappeared except for a few of the walls and the foundations which could not be conveniently moved. Of more than 100 wooden structures—and very solid wooden structures they were—in that huge camp area, an undisclosed number had been lifted intact from their foundations by a heavy-tracked vehicle and sold for prices ranging from $25 to $50 to farmers and other residents in the eastern townships at that time.

That incident surely should have been a warning of the necessity for effective supervision of the valuable property under the control of the Department of National Defence. But other events have gone on which were or should have been a warning to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and the responsibility must be his under our system of responsible government. Last June here in Ottawa there was a fire which did damage to the extent of $731,332.88, according to the returns tabled in this house. That was on June 2. On June 6 the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) met the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Fraser: In his seat.

Mr. Drew: —spoke to him in his seat in this house, and told him that he was able to furnish him with the names of men who could swear that paint, raincoats and other materials of that kind, and of the nature of those that had been in this building which was burned on June 2, had been offered for sale on the streets of the city of Ottawa. He told the same thing to the Minister of National Defence on June 12.

Mr. Fraser: June 13.

Mr. Drew: Or on June 13. It was indicated that those names were available. Naturally the hon. member for Peterborough West expected that he would be requested by the appropriate officials to give the names so that these could be followed up. Nothing was done. That was only one of a number of fires last year which resulted in damage which reached a total in value of $1,438,354.87. Nor have those fires stopped. For the first two months of this year there were fires that cost this country, according to the government's figures, $3,173,442.27. The thing that is very noticeable about these fires is the number of occasions on which they occurred in places where goods and equipment, and things that might be disposed of, have been stored. After all, what more effective way to make it impossible to check on the amount of the remaining stores of any kind could there possibly be than to have a fire which would destroy part of the stores and make it quite uncertain as to what had been there when the fire started?

Let us simply consider what happened at Petawawa. This extraordinary series of thefts was not discovered by anyone in the Department of National Defence. These carload thefts were not discovered by this department that had warnings for years of looting and thefts as well as of the danger of fire. It came to light only because of the integrity, because of the honesty and the sense of public duty, of the wife of one of the men in that camp. She, knowing that her husband was being approached by a participant in this nefarious scheme, reported it, as it was her duty to report it, and a duty which she fulfilled, to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. But it was not the Department of National Defence. So far as they are concerned, the chances are, so far as any record would suggest, that these thefts would still be going on if it had not been that someone was approached whose honesty itself was the safeguard of this country.

If it were not so serious in what it implies in a break-down of morale in certain sections of that organization—and certain very limited sections of that organization—this thing would be laughable. Who ever heard of any organized thefts which had reached the effrontery of stealing a whole railway siding?

Mr. Rowe: Tracks and all.

Mr. Drew: Tracks and all. Theft is certainly becoming a fairly confirmed habit when the temptation to lift rails from a siding cannot be resisted by those who were carrying out this operation on such a grand scale. And there appears no likelihood that this would have been discovered, although all this was under the supervision of the Department of National Defence. It so happened that these rails belonged to a railway company. The report suggests that they belonged to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Of course, so far we have only the reports, but reports written in a manner to suggest that they were from people who had made inquiries on the spot.

The officials were challenged in regard to the absence of this track. They indicated their surprise, and I have no doubt that the surprise interpreted itself in a proper admonition to those who had been so careless in their operation. But, according to reports—and these are the reports, after all, that the public received—not to be stymied by anything of that kind they went and tore up another track and replaced the rails in that way.

It is ludicrous, Mr. Speaker, but it is the sort of thing that indicates a complete break-down of any measure of supervision by—

An hon. Member: Better anchor it.

Mr. Drew: Yes, they should have anchored it, as one of the Liberal members suggested. They should have anchored that baby tank that got away.

Mr. Rowe: They had better watch some of the branch lines of the C.N.R.

Mr. Drew: The fact is that in so far as we have yet been informed these carload thefts include stoves, electric refrigerators and things of that kind—

Mr. McLure: Everything that was loose.

Mr. Drew: —in substantial quantities. The fact is that anything that was loose went, and even things that were fairly tight went as well until they were discovered.

This wholesale looting is not just the responsibility of a few men whose names have been mentioned in the newspapers. This could not have happened if the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) had paid the slightest attention to the repeated warnings in this house that looting was taking place and that steps should be taken to safeguard government property in this country. These things would not have happened even, in all probability, if the Minister of National Defence had acted on the clear and positive information furnished him by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) last June. These things would not have happened if a proper system of supervision had been established in any of the camps.

Most hon. members have had military service of some kind, and most of them know that almost to the point of annoyance the very first thing that is insisted upon in any military establishment is a daily accounting for the stores for which you are responsible; and officers and N.C.O.'s are detailed for the express purpose of checking over daily, or at regular intervals, things that are under government control.

This great camp at Petawawa, with an investment not by the government but by the people of Canada of many, many millions of dollars, was a place where any sort of efficient organization under the Department of National Defence would have prevented a thing of this kind happening before it even started. These series of thefts, the disappearing camp at Farnham, the fires in government stores amounting to millions of dollars, the thefts at Petawawa, and the other reports that have been presented to this house of the looting of government property, all have suggested for a long time the most detailed and exhaustive examination of the Department of National Defence.

The Minister of National Defence tells us there are inquiries. What kind of inquiries? I asked him today under what authority Mr. Currie had been appointed, and he has promised to inform me, but I must admit that it has not been possible yet to find under what order in council, or other order, Mr. Currie has been appointed.

It is not a few men at Petawawa, Mr. Speaker, who are on trial; it is not a few men with whom they were in contact who are on trial. It is the Department of National Defence that is on trial. It is the Department of National Defence that should be brought before a proper tribunal and made to account for its handling of government property, and that is particularly true at a time when this department is asking for a blank cheque of more than $2 billion of the people's money.

If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) wants to find places where he can save money, now that he has returned to the fold, may I suggest that he ask the government that an order in council be passed appointing an appropriate body which will have the full authority to inquire into every activity of the government, including the activities of the minister himself. I have heard the suggestion that this is something for the defence committee. Members of this house know just how freely the defence committee is being permitted to go into matters at this time. But, Mr. Speaker, I pointed out on an earlier occasion that the terms of reference of the committee on defence expenditures are not wide enough to embrace the kind of inquiry which should be conducted into the inefficiency, gross negligence and failure properly to administer public property, which has already been disclosed by this series of events to which I have referred.

When I speak of the minister being accountable, naturally I am speaking of his being accountable only in his capacity as a minister of the crown. In view of certain statements that I have seen reported in the press, even made by a Liberal member, asking that there be some scapegoat for the minister among the officials in the department for the incompetence and failure of that department in regard to the foot-and-mouth disease, I would point out that under our system the man responsible for the effective administration of his department is the minister. And when a matter of this kind occurs, it is the minister who should explain, before some body that can take evidence in the proper manner, exactly what the circumstances were, what directions were given, what measure of control there was, or what lack of control there was, in regard to these matters which are of so much importance to us.

Now, these are matters which certainly are worthy of the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). But one thing more. The Minister of Finance made a statement in his budget speech of April 8 which carries us beyond this immediate point—and I leave that point with the recommendation, which I make in all earnestness, that the Minister of Finance, while this budget debate is still on, will urge the appointment of an appropriate body to conduct an inquiry into that department which is asking for approximately half of the vast sum which he seeks to raise from the Canadian taxpayers this year.

But when we examine that huge sum, in the light of what he has said, we find that on April 8 he told us—and these are his words—

> I expect there will be a shortfall of expenditures below the amounts provided by parliament in the appropriation votes.

Mr. Speaker, without some explanation, which has not yet been made, that statement means one thing, and one thing only. It means that the minister expects that he is actually going to tax the people beyond the amount he actually requires. That is something he has no right to do. It is something he has no right to ask us to support. From medieval days our system of parliament has rested upon the assumption that parliament could rely upon the figures presented by the minister of finance, and that it could rely upon the fact that, to the best of his knowledge, he was placing before the House of Commons the figures which represented what he thought would be required from the people for the tasks the government expected to be called upon to undertake.

Mr. Abbott: I did that this year, too.

Mr. Drew: Then, if he did it this year, it would be interesting to know what he means when he tells us that he expects the expenditure will be less than the amount for which he is asking.

Mr. Abbott: I said by how much.

Mr. Drew: Oh—

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I did; read the speech again.

Mr. Drew: This speech is perfectly clear, and it clearly indicates the expectation that once again, to use the words of the minister, there is going to be a shortfall of expenditures below the amounts set out in the appropriation votes.

Already tonight the suggestion has been made that it was a commendable thing that surpluses be used to reduce debt. The repetition of that statement merely indicates how dangerous a state of mind some of the members of this house are actually in at this time. No member has raised any question about the wisdom of paying off debts at the appropriate time. But what has been questioned is the right of this government, or any other government under our parliamentary system, to raise funds for one purpose and to appropriate them for something else.

If it is intended to tax our people, to overtax our people, in the way the government is doing, then let the government say what the moneys are for. If they are for the payment of debt, then say so—and, upon reasonable explanation, doubtless the minister would receive support from the house. But the trouble is that the minister's record is so bad that members of this house have no reason to expect that anything that he puts before them will have any relation whatever to the facts as they will ultimately appear.

The last budget proved, by the most convincing demonstration that there could possibly be, the need for the most exacting review of every detail of the government's estimates before us, and for the most exacting review of the budget itself. After all, could anyone imagine a better piece of evidence of the slipshod and careless way in which last year's budget was prepared than what happened in the case of certain high incomes in this country?

Until such time as the Minister of Finance is prepared to say that he has reached the conclusion that there is some point at which some people should receive not only nothing, but should receive less than nothing, then his budget of last year is simply evidence of slipshod methods in the preparation of the budget, no matter what his intentions might have been. Because he has disclosed quite clearly that at a certain level his taxes reached the point where they not only took the whole income, one hundred per cent of it, but in some cases taxed the people beyond their incomes.

Now, do not let him put on any smug appearance of glorying in taxing the rich. That was not his intention, as he disclosed. It was simply a result of slipshod methods, and now he seeks to rectify them. And nobody will know until next year whether he has or not, if he continues in the same way, and without any more willingness to review the facts than he displayed previously.

There is also this fact that should be borne in mind. There have been inquiries going on now for the last couple of days which have disclosed, as a result of the brilliant and untiring efforts of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the utter breakdown of the supervision of the Department of Agriculture over an extremely important aspect of agricultural activity in this country.

What has been disclosed there, as is clearly set out in an article in Maclean's magazine, by Mr. Blair Fraser, is not merely negligence within a government department, but a failure to integrate the activities of that department in a manner which would have produced effective results.

There, again, is something with which the Minister of Finance should be dealing, not in this case in connection with the awful impact of the foot-and-mouth disease, but rather as to what it discloses in the way of a costly lack of integration of the efforts within that department.

These are only some of the things the Minister of Finance could be doing. Therefore I return to the request that has been made before, that if the committee on defence expenditures is, in fact, to be a committee which can carry out the terms of reference under which it operates, then it should not be confined to things that have happened in the past; but all the defence estimates for the coming year should forthwith be referred to that committee, as were the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

I close these remarks with the request to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that, just as he moved that the estimates of the Department of External Affairs be referred to a committee, he likewise move that the estimates of the Department of National Defence be referred forthwith to the committee on defence expenditures. May I suggest at the same time to the Prime Minister that he advise the chairman of that committee to act in a manner which will suggest reasons for confidence that the committee really intends to inquire into the affairs of the Department of National Defence.

We are dealing with a budget which means $343 on the average from every man, woman and child in Canada during the coming year, or a total of $1,715 on the average from every family of five in this country. These taxes can and should be reduced. I have suggested ways in which the Minister of Finance, if he will make his recommendations to the government, can reduce expenditures and thus reduce the crushing burden of taxation during the coming year.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what I have to say in the few moments I shall take to say it will have reference to that part of the speech of the hon. gentleman that had to do with family allowances. All I can say to him is that while I may not be a good enough scholar of Shakespeare to appreciate the quotation he gave the house I do know of another quotation from Shakespeare that might fit this particular occasion. My hon. friend will remember the words in Hamlet which Shakespeare immortalized: The lady doth protest too much, methinks.

Reference was made the other night to my hon. friend's earlier views on family allowances arising out of comments that were made by myself regarding a proposal to increase the present family allowance payments. I went on to say that since there was in one quarter of the house a desire that that should be done one could but conclude that there was now general agreement in this house with one exception—that exception of course being my amiable friend, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher)—as to the merits of the present Family Allowances Act.

I noted, as I think is historically the case, that the then acting leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Peel, had on July 25, 1944, moved an amendment to the Family Allowances Act which would have had the effect of giving the Family Allowances Act a period of suspension for many months. As one looks hurriedly at Hansard he cannot help but agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who said on that occasion, and I quote from page 5345 of Hansard, volume V, 1944:

> I regret that the constitutional argument has been introduced at this time by the official opposition. I think that was a move to shelve this important matter, and I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that your ruling has been sustained.

That was the situation at that time. Undoubtedly the amendment brought in by the then leader of the opposition would have had the effect of shelving the present Family Allowances Act. I want my hon. friend to know that the reference that was made to his views on Monday night was not a paraphrasing by me, for I used words which he was reported in the press to have uttered. He did not take me to task; he did not say that those words were incorrectly reported; but he went on tonight to explain what his view was, not only in 1944 but in 1945, one year later, when it was apparent to everyone in the country, including the then premier of Ontario, that family allowances were indeed very popular and acceptable to the people of Canada.

I take it that my hon. friend is fully convinced now that the present Family Allowances Act is one that deserves the support of the people and if he should perchance ever become prime minister of this country he will never repeal the existing measure. I put that question to him three years ago and he made no comment. I take it that I interpret correctly what his position would be if that were to eventuate.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to interrupt—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: —the hon. minister—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to interrupt—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. minister has resumed his seat.

Mr. Drew: I merely wanted to say that I have already referred to the fact that my failure to comment at that time was taken subsequently as having a meaning that I did not intend. If the minister wishes me to state very briefly what my position would be I shall be happy to do so.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: It is a matter between the minister and the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Martin: I should like my hon. friend to speak.

Mr. Drew: I shall state it very briefly. As I have said from the very beginning, I believe in a system of family allowances which recognizes the constitutional responsibility of the provinces for social services as being part of property and civil rights.

If I were called upon to accept responsibility my first act in respect of family allowances would be to call the provinces together and to work out with them a fully effective system which would take full advantage of their social service organizations. That is what I have said before and what I have quoted tonight I believe.

Mr. Martin: I am very glad that we have had a very important declaration just now from the leader of the opposition that—

Mr. Drew: Not just now, in 1945.

Mr. Martin: —he would call the provinces together and that the present Family Allowances Act would be submitted for their consideration and if there was a substantial number of the provinces—

Mr. Drew: I did not say any such thing. Do not distort what I said; I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. Martin: If a substantial number of the provinces should take that view—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin: I have only ten minutes.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege.

Mr. Martin: I am entitled not to be interrupted.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has not completed his remarks.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, I would point out that I made no such statement. The Hansard record will indicate the extent to which the minister is now seeking to distort what I said less than two minutes ago.

Mr. Martin: I do not distort what anyone says in this house and I think the house generally accepts that as the case. My hon. friend has said that he would submit the existing Family Allowances Act—

Mr. Drew: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says that he said nothing of the kind, but has he not just spent an hour telling us that he never said anything against family allowances and now he says, "I said nothing of the kind" although he just said he would call the provinces together.

An hon. Member: Two hours.

Mr. Drew: Read Hansard and you will see what I said.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Martin: I am going to read not Hansard first of all, but from a publication entitled "Where Ontario Stands."

Mr. Drew: Iago again.

Mr. Martin: I do not like to make personal remarks. I have no doubt that I have been guilty sometimes of being self-centred, but I am not alone in that. This is not self-centring. I am now going to quote my hon. friend.

Mr. Drew: You are going to say just exactly what I said a short time ago.

Mr. Martin: When my hon. friend was speaking I did not interrupt him once. I enjoyed his speech, just as I suspect he will enjoy mine. This speech was entitled "Where Ontario stands; an address broadcast by Hon. George A. Drew, K.C., M.P.P., Premier of Ontario, August 9, 1944." If I were to quote from a publication other than this I am sure the hon. gentleman would be on his feet at once contesting the source of my quotation, but I am sure there will be no question about this source, for the speech is contained in a document issued by Progressive Conservative headquarters, 85 Richmond street west, Toronto. In those days it was known as the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Drew: As it is today.

Mr. Martin: I am glad to have that correction. I am not going to read this whole speech, though it is quite interesting. On page 3, however, in the second paragraph I find these words:

> Why is it that Mr. King has created the serious situation which he himself foresaw? Why, in spite of our repeated requests for a conference to prepare for the post-war period, did he go ahead with the bill which he knew was not worth the paper it was written on?

I put this query to the leader of the opposition, not for a reply now: Is he still of the opinion that the Family Allowances Act, which is responsible for improving the health standards and welfare of over four and a half million children every month, is not worth the paper it is written on?

Mr. Drew: Is that a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin: Then he went on—

Mr. Drew: I thought it was a question and I was going to answer.

Mr. Martin: I am sorry the hon. gentleman interrupts. He concluded his observations. He was entitled to make a defence, just as he is entitled now to protest against his discarded opinions.

Mr. Drew: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin: But I rather deprecate that he should have brought in the question of national unity. I did not raise that issue. I quoted from one source only; that was the hon. gentleman himself. He will find nothing in what I said the other night that is at all inconsistent with what I have tried to do all my life—

Mr. Drew: It had nothing to do with the issue before the house, nor has this.

Mr. Martin: In that speech the hon. gentleman went on:

> Many millions of dollars from the pockets of the people of Ontario would go to the province of Quebec under this measure. But I assure you that the government of Ontario intends to do everything within its power to make sure that this iniquitous bill does not go into effect. It is not this bill alone—

These are the significant words.

> It is not this bill alone but the whole principle involved—

Not this bill alone but the principle of family allowances.

Mr. Drew: No, no.

Mr. Martin: The hon. gentleman continued:

> —but the whole principle involved which we intend to resist. If our money is to be used under the agreement then it is to be used for total war.

Lest there be any misunderstanding about the interpretation I place on what my hon. friend said, I am going to quote from an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of August 11, 1944; and I believe I have current justification for thinking the Journal would not misinterpret anything the hon. gentleman said. The heading was, "Premier Drew on Family Allowances" and the editorial went on:

> When the government first introduced family allowances, the Journal said that apart from the measure's objectional dole principle, plus its dangerous mortgaging of the future national income, the proposal held a threat to national unity. We based the last claim upon the disparity between our different provinces in the matter of large families, or, to be more specific, upon the preponderance of large families in the province of Quebec.

Those were not the words of my hon. friend. That is the first paragraph in the editorial. I do not know who wrote it, but recognizing the language I have my own idea. It goes on:

> Now comes Premier Drew of Ontario to bring this issue into the open; to state it with a force and in a way to challenge grave reflections. Says he:
> "When Ontario handed over certain of its taxing powers (to the federal government) the reason for doing so and the conditions under which the transfer was made were so that the government and parliament of Canada could wage total war."

They are now quoting the leader of the opposition, as premier of Ontario.

> "This family allowance bill is an obvious bribe . . . there is every reason why it should meet with approval in Quebec where there was a very important election approaching . . . Millions of dollars from the pockets of the people of Ontario will go to the province of Quebec under this measure . . . The people of Ontario will be asked to pay nearly half of the $200 million which will be needed as the initial amount to put the Family Allowances Act into effect.
> Our attitude toward any measure which takes money from the pockets of the people of Ontario for the special advantage of Quebec is based upon considerations which affect that province alone. You know what those considerations are.
> You know that we face an issue here in Canada hardly less important in its bearing upon our future than the outcome of the war itself. Temporizing will no longer do . . . We are paying the penalty of appeasement . . . Silence has been mistaken for weakness . . ."
> No one need be in doubt about Mr. Drew's meaning. He may be right or wrong; he at least is honest and clear. Little sense exists in efforts to gloss over the fact that, in the main, he is right . . .
> Nor need any doubt exist that in the matter of gain from this family allowance measure Quebec's share will be out of all proportion to that of Ontario . . .

I am not going to speak at length; I am just going to refer to some other editorials. On September 30, 1944, again in the Ottawa Journal, will be found an article dealing with the hon. gentleman's views on family allowances. There was another on February 23, 1945, in which I find this:

> Premier Drew's August 9 radio address, in which he declared that the "iniquitous bill" (the Family Allowances Act) would be resisted by Ontario, was quoted in part by Mr. Hepburn. Reading from a copy of the radio address, Mr. Hepburn quoted the paragraph in which the premier spoke of Ontario's money going to the province of Quebec under the Family Allowances Act.
> "It is one thing to say, as the premier says—

And this is the point I made a while ago.

> —that the province should have been consulted," said Mr. Jolliffe, "and it is an entirely different thing to say that this measure will be resisted by every means within the power of the government. I assume Ontario families will receive payment under the act in July, and I do not suppose the government will attempt to intercept the allowances."

Mr. Drew: Was that Mr. Jolliffe or Mr. Hepburn? You mentioned both names.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Hepburn first and Mr. Jolliffe second. The hon. gentleman will recognize those two gentlemen as distinguished contemporaries in another legislative field.

Mr. Drew: I recognize them as authorities you would follow.

Mr. Martin: They are not authorities, but they are witnesses as to what my hon. friend's views were at that time. The fact is that these quotations, some of which I have given in extenso and some of which I have paraphrased, and others in which I have given dates and references, can be looked up by any hon. member. I say to the hon gentleman, as I said the other night, that as the minister responsible for the administration of this measure I welcome the fact that, in spite of the reservation he has made tonight, at least he now accepts the important principle of family allowances. But since he has raised the issue—

Mr. Drew: Just the same as ever.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend groans. I suppose if I were in a similar situation I would groan too.

Mr. Drew: You cannot follow a straight line for thirty seconds.

Mr. Martin: In his speech tonight the hon. gentleman challenged me to support what I had said in this house last Monday evening. I leave it to this house and to the hon. gentleman if I have not been accurate and fair. I sincerely hope I have convinced the hon. gentleman that we should not disturb the present Family Allowances Act.

On motion of Mr. Abbott the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 2, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

SASKATCHEWAN—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE AND OTHER DOCUMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I should like to refer to the question of privilege that was raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I do not think it is necessary for me to read what appears in yesterday's Hansard, other than the significant remarks which were made. I stated:

> I understand that the matter referred to by the hon. member was discussed in the committee this morning, and my hon. friend wishes to have the documents which were tabled in the committee tabled here as well. That will be done.

After that statement was made the member for Lake Centre said this:

> There are still some, other than those tabled in the committee. There are still the certificates of analyses that were ordered to be tabled here, and they have not been tabled in the committee as yet, nor have they been tabled here. The place where those documents were to be tabled was the House of Commons, and I am asking now particularly for these certificates of analyses, none of which was included in the return tabled.

I have in my hand sessional paper No. 169-F, Tuesday, April 29, 1952, and in it is listed the documents which were tabled. Among the documents tabled is the Department of Agriculture production, "Certificates, health of animals division, specimen record for inspectors, identification numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9; disease suspected, infectious stomatitis; owner of animals"—and so on. This is the statement of analysis, and it is here.

After we went back to the committee yesterday afternoon, the certificate was found to be on the record already, both as tabled in the house and as tabled in the committee. I wish to draw to the attention of the house the fact that there was no effort made to withhold this from either the house or the committee. It was on the record yesterday when these statements were made, and is still there.

With regard to the other documents which were tabled in the committee but which were not here, I have them on my desk. There is this large sheet and this larger file, which I thought had everything in it and I still think has everything in it called for by the order placed on the Orders of the Day on March 3. I have added to it this small file about which there is some question as to whether it was required by any order. Nevertheless it is here and was tabled in the committee. I should like to lay it on the table now.

The suggestion was made that there are some other documents. I have had all the records checked for any documents that by any stretch of the imagination could be said to have anything to do with the intention of the order. There are some communications here which have to do with the effect of the quarantine on grain, and things of that kind which were not thought to be included in the records asked for and which may mean something or may not mean very much so far as the desires of the hon. member and others may be concerned.

Then there are the records with regard to following the man who was employed by Mr. Waas; this was done under special investigation. They were on files separate from the others and they are here as well. I am going to put those on the table. Whether or not they have any bearing on the request can be decided.

I could find only one other communication of any kind which might have reference to the matter and which some of the opposition members might desire to have. It is a communication from Mr. Taggart to Dr. Childs when he was at Regina, asking him to come back to Ottawa on February 20, the day on which it was finally decided in the minds of everyone here that the malady could be foot-and-mouth disease. That document is one which was wired, from Mr. Taggart to Dr. Childs, to Regina; and when he came back he had the wire, of course. This is the wire and I hereby table it.

That is everything that I know of, and everything that anyone in the department believes could be required by the order. It is all here and will be put before the committee.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a question? Is the report on Willi Bruntjen, the German immigrant, a mounted police report?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it is not a mounted police report, although there are some things on it that refer to mounted policemen. It is the report of the following of the immigrant employee of Mr. Waas. I hope I am not tabling something which it has already been decided by the house is privileged because it is a mounted police document. I do not think I am, however.

DIPLOMATIC INSTRUMENTS

TABLING OF EXCHANGES OF NOTES

Mr. Jean Lesage (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) I beg leave to table copies, in English and in French, of the following diplomatic instruments:

1. Exchange of notes, March 16, 1951, amending paragraph 4 of the annex to the Australia-Canada air transport agreement of June 11, 1946.

2. Exchange of notes (November 26, 1951) between Canada and South Africa constituting an agreement concerning the avoidance of double taxation on income derived from the operation of ships and aircraft.

3. Exchange of notes (February 13 and March 19, 1952) confirming the recommendation of March 1950, made by the permanent joint board on defence concerning bases in Newfoundland leased to the United States.

4. Exchange of notes (January 22 and March 22, 1952) between Canada and Monaco concluding a non-immigrant visa modification agreement between the two countries.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—SITTINGS OF COMMISSION IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked a question, part of which is in the following terms:

> Is the Prime Minister in a position to advise regarding the commencement of the sittings of the commission on the South Saskatchewan river project, and also whether sittings will be held in Saskatchewan as it has been determined will take place in Manitoba and Alberta?

I take it that by "sittings" the hon. member meant public hearings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; that is what I meant.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have now received from the secretary of the royal commission the following information. Public hearings are being held in Lethbridge today, May 2, and if not completed will continue tomorrow, May 3. The commission is meeting with the Manitoba government on May 9 for the purpose of discussing a submission which that government might wish to make, and also to discuss the question whether it would be desirable to have public hearings in Manitoba.

The Saskatchewan government has filed an interim submission with the royal commission but has reserved the right to submit more material later. The intention is that arrangements will be made for this further information to be presented at a later date, and that the question whether or not there should then be public hearings in Saskatchewan will be considered between the commission and the Saskatchewan government or others who may wish to appear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to thank the Prime Minister and to suggest this. If there are not to be private sittings in Saskatchewan, various municipal bodies and civic bodies want to make representations and they should know that they can make them direct to the commission.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sure that this statement which the hon. member has made in the house will get publicity and will serve as notice to those who may wish to make submissions that they can do so, and that it is perhaps rather urgent that they do not take too much time about it because we are all anxious to have the proceedings completed and to get a report as soon as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: Is it not a fact that it has already been decided that there would be public hearings in Saskatchewan? My understanding—and I got it from one of the members of the government—is that there would be public hearings.

Mr. St. Laurent: The information I get is that the commission is desirous of getting all the information that may be helpful, but does not want to take more time than is required to reach a proper decision.

LIVESTOCK

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—LEGALITY OF PROVINCIAL EMBARGOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister yet given consideration to the legality of provincial restrictions on the movement of livestock? Will the government test the constitutionality of such restrictions?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question, although it did not reach me until about four minutes to three.

In reply to the hon. member's first question, I may say that as long as the possibility exists of an amicable withdrawal of the provincial restrictions on the movement of livestock, we have not formulated an opinion concerning their legality. In reply to the second question may I say that this will depend upon the actions of the provincial governments and our own views as to the constitutionality of the individual provincial restrictions.

ASSURANCE TO PRODUCERS OF FLOOR PRICE ON CATTLE AND HOGS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) asked me a question yesterday which I was unable to answer then, but which I can answer now. His question was to this effect: whether or not a report had been made by my parliamentary assistant, who had just been in Calgary, on the conditions existing in the market there, and what had been arranged as a result of the visit.

In the first place I want to congratulate my assistant on having carried through a very successful mission in Calgary. He, with Jack Byers of our staff and Mr. Youngman of our pasture services in the west, went to Calgary to discuss there the possibility of dealing with the fact that heavy beef was on that market in such quantities that it made it very difficult for producers to receive reasonable prices, and the further fact that there might be a possibility of putting some of the lighter cattle on our pastures.

When the parliamentary assistant arrived there he found that the main problem was the heavy beef. He negotiated with the packing houses and with those who had the heavy beef, and finally arranged that we would take the frozen sides of that beef off the market at the floor price. That arrangement was made both in Calgary and in Edmonton. He also found that, up to date, the lighter cattle, at least in so far as they were in the feeder class, were being taken rather freely back to the farms by those who could feed them, and for the time being there is no necessity of putting the lighter cattle on our pastures. Nevertheless he left Mr. Byers there with instructions to watch the movement of cattle and deal with those problems as they come up. My understanding is that as a result of those arrangements beef is being maintained at the floor on those markets.

GERM WARFARE

PRESS REPORT AS TO STATEMENT OF TORONTO CONTROLLER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the Globe and Mail newspaper's statement that ex-controller Stewart Smith of the city of Toronto is reputed to have made a statement that the troops associated with our troops fighting in Korea are now using germ gas—

Mr. Riley: Question.

Mr. Ferguson: —is there any law in Canada—

Mr. Riley: Question.

Mr. Ferguson: You could not answer if I asked it of you.

Mr. Riley: You do not know how to ask it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: Is there any law in Canada to bring this man either to prove or disprove his statement with regard to the associates of our forces in Korea—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: —when we consider in Canada that these men are now at war in Korea?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I want to thank the hon. member for the implication in his remark that perhaps I could answer his question, but I am afraid his confidence is misplaced; for what he is asking me is a legal opinion upon a statement which I have not yet examined. I shall be glad to have a look at it and bring an answer down on Monday.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

WIRE AND CABLE COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I did not give him notice, but I know my confidence will not be misplaced. Is the investigation of the wire and cable companies, to be made by Mr. Goldenberg under the combines act, to be carried out as a result of the action of the minister directly, or of the combines commissioner, or of the complaints of private citizens? What is the alleged wrongdoing that is to be investigated?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In reply to my hon. friend's question I may say that this inquiry, like the majority of inquiries conducted under the act, is conducted on the initiative of the commissioner himself, on the basis of complaints from certain individuals.

With regard to the other points that my hon. friend has raised, I regret that I cannot make a statement regarding them because it is not the practice to disclose any information such as that asked for until the final report has been received from the combines commissioner.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 1, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as a general rule I do not intervene at this stage of the budget debate; I wait to make any comments I may have until some of the amendments or subamendments have been disposed of. I am doing so today only because I understand that while I was away for some days last week the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) referred to that absence and expressed disapproval of the fact that I was not present in the house during the course of the debate at that time. Therefore I am going to take a minute or two today, if I may—I think I should—to indicate to the house the circumstances under which I was absent.

I have always felt it to be the duty of any public man, any member of parliament, to make a certain number of speeches to organizations outside the house in order to discuss matters of public interest, and in the course of that duty I have always felt that I should try to make one or possibly two speeches a year in the United States, because of the close interest which exists between the two countries.

Some two or three months ago, I think it was, I received an invitation from the United States chamber of commerce to speak to their fortieth annual meeting in Washington. As hon. members know, the chamber is perhaps the largest single organization of businessmen in the United States. I appreciated the invitation, and it seemed to me it might be a suitable opportunity to express my views which I thought needed to be brought to the attention of businessmen in the United States. Therefore I accepted the invitation, subject of course to the usual reservation that if my parliamentary duties prevented my going I would not go.

I brought down the budget on April 8. We adjourned over Easter. On the Tuesday following our coming back here the budget debate was opened. I was able to be here. I listened to the very interesting speech of my hon. and genial friend, the official financial critic of the opposition (Mr. Macdonnell); I listened to the speech made by my friend the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) and my friend the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low), and to a number of other interesting speeches which were made on that day.

In listening to the three gentlemen to whom I first referred I felt that I had got at that time a picture of the general views of the three parties with respect to the budgetary proposals which I had made. I am fortunate in having a capable parliamentary assistant; I had a competent and capable Acting Minister of Finance in the person of my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and I felt that under the circumstances it would perhaps be not unreasonable if I were to fulfil the speaking engagement to which I have referred.

I am not telling hon. members anything they do not know when I say that as a rule in the budget debate a good many speeches are made which have not very much to do with budgetary matters. We had an outstanding example of that yesterday evening—

Mr. Cruickshank: How do you like that?

Mr. Fleming: You refer to your colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Abbott: —when my friend the leader of the opposition spent over an hour telling us what he thought about family allowances seven or eight years ago. I was going to ask him the question whether he thought that had anything to do with the budget, but the circumstances were such that I was not able to put the question to him.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is never too late to hope, though.

Mr. Ferguson: Ask your parliamentary assistant; perhaps he can tell you.

Mr. Abbott: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I enjoyed listening to the speech, but frankly I do not concede it to be my duty as Minister of Finance to sit in the house, or necessarily to be in the house, to listen to speeches of that kind.

However, be that as it may, I felt that I could safely and properly fulfil this speaking engagement in Washington. I could have gone down to Washington the afternoon before the day I was to make the speech—it was to be a luncheon—and come back the next day. As it happened, and as I am certain hon. members know, the Canadian chamber of commerce and the United States chamber of commerce have a joint committee composed of the members of the two chambers, known as the U.S.-Canada committee. It has been in existence for some years. They meet twice a year, once in Canada and once in the United States, just before the meetings of their parent bodies, and they discuss matters of particular interest to our two countries.

The chairman of the Canadian chamber this year, an old friend of mine and classmate at McGill, was good enough to ask myself and my wife to go down to the meeting of the U.S.-Canada committee, which was held at White Sulphur Springs just prior to the meeting in Washington of the United States chamber of commerce. And may I say, in parenthesis, that these organizations select delightful places to hold these meetings. I decided to accept the invitation.

I was very glad indeed to go, because I found the meetings of this joint committee, which are unofficial meetings of course, most interesting. Among other guests they had invited there were the deputy minister of fisheries, Dr. Bates, and a former distinguished civil servant, Dr. Camsell. Two of the items they were discussing were fisheries and the development of the Northwest Territories. I might say, if I may interject this, that I was proud of our civil servants, and the way in which both Dr. Bates and Dr. Camsell contributed to those discussions. I was happy to have the opportunity to sit in with them.

As I said last night, the weather was not too good; it rained most of the time. For reasons which the house will know, I was not able to get away in January, because I had to go to London to attend a meeting of finance ministers. After the first of February I am pretty well tied up with the preparation of the estimates and the budget. So I welcomed this opportunity to get down there for two or three days and to take part in those discussions. Then I went to Washington and made my speech to the chamber of commerce Wednesday noon and left that afternoon.

Those are the circumstances under which I visited the United States, a visit which has been the subject of some criticism by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Eglinton.

Contrary to what the leader of the opposition said last night, that there was no member of the government who was in the house to answer questions which might be put, certainly my parliamentary assistant was here every day. I regret that these two gentlemen felt they had to bring this matter up in the house. Of course they were quite within their rights in so doing; but since they have done it, I did feel that I owed to the house and to myself the explanation I have given this afternoon. I am quite ready to leave it to the judgment of the house, and to that of the constituents whom I have represented here for a little over twelve years, whether the public interest has suffered as a result of my trip to the chamber of commerce meeting in the United States.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate. However, during the course of the proceedings last night, as I am informed, my name was taken in vain for, I think, the third or fourth time in connection with the ordnance fire of last June. And, having regard to the fact that my recollection of a certain interview which I had with the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) is quite different from his, I think in fairness to the truth, and to my own position in the matter, I should place on record my recollection of the case in question.

The first of two statements with which I should like to deal is one which was made by the hon. member for Peterborough West to the Ottawa Journal, in these terms:

> Even before the serious central ordnance depot fire in Ottawa last year I went to Defence Minister Claxton and Justice Minister Garson and told them I had people willing to testify paint was being openly offered for sale by men in uniform in Ottawa.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the first point I should like to make in connection with that statement is that the hon. member did not see me before the ordnance depot fire, because the only occasion upon which he came to see me at all in the matter was to discuss the ordnance fire, and he could not discuss it until it had occurred. Therefore he must have seen me after it occurred.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, may I just correct that? I spoke to the Ottawa Journal when they called me and I said that I had spoken to the minister. I did not indicate the time. I think it was after the fire.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser: Just a minute. And I told the minister after we spoke—

Mr. Garson: Let me tell the story in my own way. My hon. friend told the minister, when a few days ago I happened by accident to meet him in the elevator in this building, and said, "What do you mean by saying that I met you before the fire? You know perfectly well that you met me after the fire, because you came to me to discuss the fire." The hon. member agreed.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, I agreed.

Mr. Garson: Exactly. But between the time this was published in the Ottawa Journal and the time I accosted the hon. member in the elevator he was very reticent and mum on the question, and never made any correction concerning the time of our meeting.

Then, as to the second part of the hon. member's statement published in the Ottawa Journal which, in my view, is quite incorrect, the hon. member has never at any time given to me or mentioned to me the name of anyone willing to testify that paint or anything else was being openly offered for sale by men in uniform in Ottawa.

Mr. Fraser: I told you there were men in—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend will have the privilege of replying afterwards, if he wishes to. In the meantime, unless he wishes to raise a point of privilege, I think I should have the floor.

Now, this first correction, namely that he did not see me before the fire, is borne out by a second statement which has been made in this connection by no less a dignitary than the leader of the opposition, who, basing his remarks upon information furnished to him by the hon. member for Peterborough West, is reported at page 1797 of yesterday's Hansard as stating that the hon. member for Peterborough West saw me on June 6—and that is four days after the fire, not before it.

I suggest, in respect of a conversation which my hon. friend says consisted of his walking across the floor of the house and sitting down beside me, and speaking to me while the debate was in progress—so that I would be in the position of having one ear on the debate and one ear listening to my hon. friend's remarks—that that is not a very satisfactory basis ten months later upon which to base the sort of charges that he has made in the public press of this country. I suggest that if the hon. member's recollection of their interview is not any more accurate than it is concerning when it took place, that it is very inaccurate indeed.

There is no doubt as to when the interview took place; and I do not think there will be any doubt, if my hon. friend will refresh his memory, as to what he said during that interview. He came to me, and he went on to emphasize what he had already commented on in the Ottawa Journal, namely, that in these ordnance fires, after the first fire had been officially put out and was smoking, another fire took place in another part of the warehouse. He said in that connection that that to him was an indication that the origin of the fire was incendiary. He said in that connection that rumours were going around the Ottawa streets and through the valley to the effect that people had been offered ordnance goods for sale by military personnel. He said, "I want you or the authorities to conduct this investigation upon the hypothesis that this fire was incendiary in character and that it was set by military personnel in order to cover up thefts of stocks from the warehouse, which thefts they wanted to hide by the fact that the warehouse had been burned down."

It is rather difficult to cast one's mind back to a conversation some ten months ago and to recollect all that passed back and forth. I think my hon. friend will recall that I told him then that the fire was under investigation by competent experts and that it seemed to me, as one who was inexpert, that in any inquiry of this sort it would be almost routine for the experts, among the various theories which they might advance as to what the cause of the fire was, to consider as one of those theories that it was incendiary and that perhaps it was set in order to cover shortage in the warehouse stocks.

I certainly did not think that the hon. gentleman's idea, if he will permit me to say now what I was too polite to say then, was of any world-shattering character. I did not think that it contributed very much to the solution of the matter. The conversation ended pretty much with that.

With regard to the hon. gentleman's statement that he offered to furnish to me the names of men who would swear that military stores had been offered on the streets of Ottawa, as I said before, my recollections certainly do not agree with those of the hon. gentleman. But in saying that I want to be fair. I do not claim that my memory has any greater retentive power than his, nor do I question for a moment his good faith in relying upon his own memory. But I must confess that the thing that puzzles me after this lapse of ten months is that I do not have these names. I have never had these names. I am perfectly certain that I have never refused the tender of these names by the hon. gentleman or by any other living person. Whether his memory is right or whether my memory is right, the fact is that he did not furnish these names to me either orally or in writing when he spoke to me on June 6, 1951, or at any other time.

Let us assume that the information as set out in the statement of the leader of the opposition or in the statement which my hon. friend gave to the press is one hundred per cent correct—which, if I may say without offence to these hon. gentlemen, I will not admit. As I say, let us assume that it is all correct. It is to this effect: He walked across the floor of the house, sat down beside me, had a conversation, said he had people who were prepared to swear this, did not give me their names then or ever, and then walked back and resumed his seat. Never from that time until now, in writing or orally or in any other way, has he offered to supply these names or to submit them and say, "Would you like to send them on to the police?" He never had any further conversation with me at all.

Now after ten months have elapsed he makes these charges in the public press from coast to coast upon the basis of that conversation. Let us assume that this matter is as important as all these weighty charges would indicate; and it is indeed very important. My hon. friend walked across the floor of the house to speak to me. One of the responsibilities of members is to pay the minimum amount of attention to the proceedings of the house. If he had thought that I was perhaps a bit inattentive to his alleged offer to furnish the names of these witnesses and that it was most important that those names should be further investigated, why could he have not said, "Listen, you are not paying attention to me as I raise this question". Or why could he not have later written me a letter saying, "here are the names of these witnesses"? Instead of that we had this one conversation, then there was a complete lapse of ten months, and then these all-out charges were hurled through the press of the country. As one member of the house may I say that while my hon. friend may be within his lawful rights, this is conduct to which as one exposed to it I must object.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a word about this matter. What the minister has said regarding the Ottawa Journal is quite true. They got the information from me by telephone. I told them I had spoken to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I told them that according to the information I had, ordnance stores had been sold around Ottawa. That is absolutely true. It was given over the telephone and that statement is true. I never saw the Ottawa Journal until the late afternoon of the day on which the statement was made and the motion moved in the house.

Between the time that that was moved and the following day at noon, when I was called home hurriedly because of sickness, I had no opportunity to see the minister. But I did see the minister and spoke to him and he agreed that I had talked to him about this matter. I agreed with him that it was on account of the million dollar fire in the ordnance stores that I had spoken to him. I happen to have the date of that conversation here in a file which has just been put on my desk. The date was June 6.

I spoke to the minister and told him that I had information regarding paint, raincoats and other things having been stolen and sold in Ottawa. I told him that I had heard, not from one but from more than one who had been in my office. I said that I had had a man in my office that day who was willing to swear to this matter and testify that this stuff was being sold.

Mr. Cruickshank: Who was that man?

An hon. Member: What was the man's name?

Mr. Fraser: The minister has never at any time asked me the name of that party. It was not up to me as a member of parliament to give it to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: You took an oath.

Mr. Fraser: Oh, no.

Mr. Cruickshank: You took an oath as a member of parliament.

Mr. Fraser: It was not up to me to investigate. I told the minister that I knew of men who were willing to testify. It was entirely up to the minister to ask me for their names, and he was not interested to do so.

Mr. Sinnott: What a flimsy excuse!

Mr. Fraser: I went away from his desk absolutely frustrated. I thought that the government did not give a darn what happened to ordnance stores so far as fires and the materials in those stores were concerned.

Mr. Mutch: You were born frustrated.

Mr. Fraser: On the 13th of the month the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was sitting in a seat near me, and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was sitting in the seat next to me.

Mr. Cruickshank: He has moved up one seat now.

Mr. Fraser: I told the Minister of National Defence on the 13th of June last year, with respect to the fire in the ordnance stores which occurred on the 2nd of June, a Saturday night—

Mr. Sinnott: We all knew that.

Mr. Fraser: You are lucky to know that much. I could tell a story about "I know that" some time, and it would just fit your case.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fraser: The fire occurred on the 2nd of June, a Saturday night. According to my information, some five officers and their men fought the fire for three hours before an alarm was sent to the Ottawa fire department.

Mr. Claxton: That is not so.

Mr. Fraser: At five o'clock the next morning another fire broke out in the other end of the building, which certainly shows there was something wrong some place.

Mr. Sinnott: Who told you that?

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott).

Mr. Fraser: The Minister of Justice seems to think that I should have told him the names of the men.

Mr. Sinnott: Why not?

Mr. Fraser: According to my observations, I do not think mounted police carry on in that way. I remember that during the last war, when there were spies in Canada, I told the chief commissioner of the mounted police about a case in Hamilton. Shortly afterwards I received a letter in which he said that there was nothing to it. However, I understand that some weeks afterwards they picked up thirty-six people in a house on Catharine street in Hamilton who were considered to be spies.

The reason I did not press the matter was that I thought that the Minister of Justice was having his department and the mounted police investigate my information that thefts had taken place. I thought the matter was under investigation but evidently it was not. In the case which took place some years ago to which I have referred, the matter was investigated and they discovered that I was right.

Mr. Cruickshank: That would be the only time.

Mr. Fraser: In the present instance it is only the minister's word against mine. That is all it is.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. Garson: With reference to the point about which my hon. friend is speaking, have I his permission to interrupt on a question of privilege?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fraser: I interrupted the minister, and I am quite willing that he should say what he wants to say.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, if I may offer a suggestion by way of correction of my hon. friend, it is not a case of my hon. friend's word against mine, because he admits he did not give me the names of these people.

Mr. Rowe: You admit you did not ask him. Did you ask for them?

Mr. Fraser: I have told the minister why I did not give the names to him. When I told him about the matter he paid practically no attention to me.

Mr. Rowe: Did you ever ask him?

Mr. Fraser: I did not think that was becoming of a man supposed to be the head of the Department of Justice and the mounted police. It is his department that should investigate. I thought he would send the mounted police to my office. I would have willingly given the names.

Mr. Sinnott: You are looking for publicity.

Mr. Cruickshank: It would have been dangerous if he had done that.

Mr. Fraser: I would have willingly given the names.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Fraser: Certainly.

Mr. Garson: Is it his position that he would not voluntarily give the names to me but he would give them to policemen if I sent them to his office?

An hon. Member: Did the minister ask for them?

Mr. Fraser: I always like to be correct. I would not give names to the minister when sitting in his seat in the house because I did not have them with me. I had them in a locked file in my office.

Mr. Rowe: If you had asked for them you would have got them.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why did you not unlock the file?

Mr. Rowe: He would if he had been asked to do so.

Mr. Cruickshank: He does not need to be asked; he is a member of parliament.

Mr. Rowe: Does every member of parliament tell everything he knows?

Mr. Fraser: I know that this man offered to testify. I know he certainly would not come to my office, sit down and allow me to take notes of what he had to say unless he was really an honest citizen and would back up what he had to say. From what he told me it was not only his word that was concerned but there were others who would have supported him. I wrote a letter to him dated the 14th of June in which I said I had spoken personally to the Minister of National Defence the day before when he had come over to our side of the house and sat down beside me. I said in my letter that I had asked him about stocktaking at ordnance, and that the minister had said they were not stocktaking when the fire took place. I told the minister that according to the men who came to my office, paint was being sold from ordnance stores. I said the minister had said that the allegations about shortages in stores could not be true because at the last inventory, shortages amounted to only one-third of one per cent.

I am not much at mathematics, although I used to be pretty good, but the government have involved us in such huge figures that millions are not millions any more. We are into the billions. In answer to a question of mine in the house the minister said that the expenditure on the buildings and one thing and another amounted to billions. If I am correct one-third of one per cent of $1 billion would be $3,333,000. The minister said that their expenditure on buildings and so forth amounted to billions. Therefore the loss last year must have been away up in the millions of dollars. That is not chicken feed. It is the money of the taxpayers that pays for these buildings and stores, and it is no wonder that our taxes are so high when such fires take place.

An hon. Member: It has to be more than $3 million to interest this crowd.

Mr. Fraser: Somebody has put a note on my desk to the effect that the Minister of Justice has treated the information I gave him in the same way that he treated the flour milling report.

An hon. Member: How funny!

Mr. Rowe: Funny, but true.

Mr. Cruickshank: Don't tear up that note.

Mr. Fraser: I did not know that the minister was going to speak on this matter today. My file is upstairs. I only have a few notes here. From what I can find out, between the time I told the Minister of Justice and the time I told the Minister of National Defence, absolutely nothing was done. When the Minister of National Defence spoke on this matter on April 21 he referred to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. The third man who came to me said that from what he could make out Crown Assets Disposal Corporation would sell machinery and other things to an individual to be turned over out of national defence stores. However, when the order for that material would reach ordnance it was generally altered, and other articles were added to it. A year ago in the public accounts committee I asked how the department kept its inventories. I think there must be something definitely wrong with the way they check inventories and keep track of material. Personally, I feel a different system of bookkeeping should be installed, because I have been told of many cases of theft during the war since this news appeared in the press. In Toronto during the war we were told of tires being given to the men so they would not have to buy them for their automobiles.

We had a fire here in the ordnance depot on New Year's eve this year. I shall read from a report in the Ottawa Journal of April 16:

> Upwards of three hundred persons, many of them civilians, were attending two New Year's eve parties in No. 26 central ordnance depot, Plouffe park, the night of the $20,000 fire which raged through the southeast sector of the building.
> This was revealed this morning as the trial of Pte. Hector Davis, 17-year-old Aylmer soldier charged with arson in connection with the blaze, began . . .
> The officer on duty the night of the fire told the court he had made only one tour of duty through the depot instead of the usual two because he had been given the extra task of greeting party-goers.

Personally, I would think there is some laxity there in not having the proper supervision. Another thing that I would suggest to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is that he should not have the sergeants or officers messes in an ordnance building. They should be contained in a separate building so that the ordnance building could be properly patrolled. You cannot patrol an ordnance depot, or any other place for that matter, if you have three hundred people inside of it.

When I spoke to the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Defence, I told them that raincoats were being sold at a certain place in Ottawa. I mentioned one place where they were sold, but I shall not mention it in the house. The minister can get the name from me afterwards if he has forgotten. I also said that one man that had been in to see me had been offered twenty gallons of paint at $4 per gallon. He knew it was from ordnance, because the man was in uniform.

I first mentioned the fire in the ordnance depot on the Monday after it occurred, that would be on the 4th of June last year. Between that time and the time I spoke to the Minister of National Defence I had five men in my office to see me personally, and I had three telephone calls, all giving me information.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend will supply us with the names of those gentlemen now?

Mr. Fraser: I told you last year I had them up in my office. I am not going to name names here because I would not know whether they would wish to testify a year later. The minister must remember that there have been many changes in the ordnance here in Ottawa since that time.

Mr. Garson: May I suggest to my hon. friend that he let us have the names of these gentlemen.

Mr. Fraser: I have been asking about these fires for a long time.

Mr. Garson: What about the names?

Mr. Fraser: I am not putting them on the record. Do you think that would help the case? I just wonder if the minister—

Mr. Garson: We can form our own opinion of the validity of the hon. member's assertions.

Mr. Fraser: These men came to me in confidence. On the 6th of June I was willing to give the names. I still have them.

Mr. Brooks: Would not the statute of limitations run against them now? Does the minister intend to prosecute now or does the statute of limitations prevent that?

Mr. Garson: There is no statute of limitations.

Mr. Fraser: Long before the ordnance fire I was asking questions. I asked about the fire loss, 1949-50, and during that time it amounted to $1,173,000. The following fiscal year which ended on March 31, 1951, the fire loss amounted to $1,126,000. I personally feel, Mr. Speaker, that if the Minister of Justice had paid attention to what I said on June 6 there would have been a number of convictions for theft, not only in the Ottawa ordnance—I think they call it No. 46—but also in other places in Ontario. Since this case has broken, Mr. Speaker, other fires have happened and other thefts have been noted. I do hope the Minister of National Defence and his officers will have a little better co-operation with the men in the ordnance department and other parts of the defence organization to make sure that these things do not happen again.

Mr. Rowe: They might at least have saved the tracks at Petawawa.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, one member says that they might at least have saved the tracks. I understand that at Petawawa they even stole the weigh scales so as to weigh the scrap metal and other things to make sure the men in the camp got their proper rake-off on what was stolen.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, it is a case of the word of the Minister of Justice against mine. He has acknowledged that I had spoken to him on June 6 of last year, and I did. I spoke to the Minister of National Defence on June 13 of last year. He has not denied that, and I do not see how he could. I was surprised at the defence minister saying at that time that there could not be anything in it at all because our losses are only one-third of one per cent. When you are dealing in millions of dollars, that is a great deal of money. I know that you, Mr. Speaker, being a Scotsman will realize that. I thank you very much.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): In a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, I shall refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). Before that I should like to refer to the speech delivered last night by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in which he saw fit to repeat in this house speeches made elsewhere regarding what he calls "wholesale looting" in the Canadian army. Hon. members will recall that this was the subject of a motion to adjourn the house on April 21. At page 1424 of Hansard the hon. member moved the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing "a definite matter of urgent public importance." It is interesting to note that having moved to adjourn the house on the score of urgency—if the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) wants to continue his speech, perhaps he will do so.

Mr. Fraser: It was the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who butted in, not I.

Mr. Claxton: The leader of the opposition moved to adjourn the house on the ground of urgency and then made this speech raising this subject again some thirteen days later. Hon. member and other hon. members will recall that in the house just previously that day I had made a statement on thefts at Petawawa. I announced the appointment of Mr. George S. Currie, a prominent chartered accountant and a man of outstanding integrity—as I think the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and another hon.

member admitted—to investigate this matter. It may be of interest if I put on the record the telegram asking him to act. It reads as follows:

George S. Currie, Esq., C.A.,
Aldred Building,
Montreal.

Ottawa, April 21, 1952.

Confirming telephone please undertake immediate investigation and report earliest possible date into deficiencies and other irregularities engineering detachment at Petawawa and related matters there or elsewhere both to determine cause and make recommendations regarding security and accounting for stores equipment and services so as to prevent recurrence with any additional powers or terms of reference which are necessary to make complete and thorough investigation and report.

Brooke Claxton,
Minister of National Defence

Later that day I received the following telegram:

I am pleased to undertake the investigation referred to in your telegram of today's date and am making plans to commence immediately.

Mr. Currie began his work immediately and is now at work.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Rowe: Under what authority or statute was Mr. Currie appointed?

Mr. Claxton: I was just going to come to that matter. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) asked under what authority that was done. It is under the authority of section 4 of the National Defence Act. The provision for the payment with respect to services of a professional and similar character is made in the defence estimates and will be made in consequence of a minute of the treasury board.

Mr. Currie had been deputy minister of national defence. He had served with distinction in the first world war and we felt that no better man could be found to do this job if we searched the length and breadth of the country. In my statement of April 21 I added this:

. . . if in the course of its work the select committee on defence expenditure would like to look into stockkeeping, accounting or auditing procedure, or any other matter relating to its work, on the spot and anywhere, all facilities will be provided.

The terms of reference of this committee are quite broad enough to permit of this. Let me read them:

That a select committee be appointed to examine all expenditure of public moneys for national defence and all commitments for expenditure for national defence since March 31, 1950, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and in particular, what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses; and that notwithstanding standing order 65, the committee shall consist of twenty-six members to be designated by the house at a later date.

The terms of reference of the select committee on defence expenditure were modelled on those of the committee set up during several years of the war to deal with war expenditure. Let me read those terms:

Resolved that a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon and in particular what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses; and that notwithstanding standing order 65, the committee shall consist of twenty-six members to be designated by the house at a later date.

The committee's terms of reference are, I submit, ample to look into the accounting and stocktaking procedures affecting or controlling expenditures in order to suggest any economies that may be made. Obviously the committee has power to visit places, if it wishes to do so, in exactly the same way as was done by the war expenditures committee during the war. In my statement I offered to provide all the necessary facilities for that purpose. That went without saying but I thought it was a good thing to make that clear. That will be done if and when the committee determines that it is desirable.

In his speech last night the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred to what the hon. member for Peterborough West had been stated to have said to the Minister of Justice and myself. In his remarks the leader of the opposition gave a correction of the statement as it appeared in the Ottawa Journal for April 14, 1952. In that paper the hon. member for Peterborough West is reported, within quotations, to have said:

Even before the serious central ordnance depot fire in Ottawa last year I went to Defence Minister Claxton and Justice Minister Garson and told them I had people willing to testify paint was being openly offered for sale by men in uniform in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, it was one thing for the hon. member to come to us, as he now admits, after the fire. However, had it been true that he came to us before the fire and had we then done nothing about it, that was indeed a serious charge; but that was the way it appeared in the press and that is the way it was referred to in several places throughout the country, until the leader of the opposition last night gave the corrected statement which I was happy indeed to get. But there is no concealing how serious it would have been had the Minister of Justice and I been told of this situation before the fire and had done nothing about it. It now turns out, however, that—in accordance with the statement of the leader of the opposition and of the hon. member for Peterborough West as he made it today—the report in the Journal is not in accordance with what the hon. member for Peterborough West said today. It now appears that he told the Minister of Justice what the Minister of Justice said on June 6, some three days after the fire; and he told me, according to his statement here in the house, what he said on June 13. The hon. member for Peterborough West came to me in the house, as he says, and said: I have heard that paint and some other things are being sold out of the ordnance stores and that the fire was probably set because of the fear of a stocktaking which would result in those thefts being discovered. That was what he said. And as the Minister of Justice has indicated, if it was true that there were thefts of substantial amounts, and if it was true that there were shortages, then that was a reasonable suggestion as to the cause of the fire which would have occurred to everyone. At that time the fire had been under investigation from the early morning o June 3. There were two fires that night. Both were caught in consequence of alarms instantly given, not as the hon. member for Peterborough West said, but instantly given, and fought with skill and courage by both the Ottawa fire department and the members of the armed forces.

The second of these fires broke out at about four o'clock in the morning in quite a different part of the buildings, and it likewise caused serious damage. There were representatives of the Ottawa fire department, of the fire marshal of the armed forces, of the provost corps of the armed forces, of the R.C.M.P. and of the fire investigation bureau representing the Canadian Fire Underwriters, at my invitation, from almost the time of the fire. The fire was investigated. People were interviewed for months covering every aspect of it, regarding rumours of deficiencies that might have led to someone setting fire to these premises in order to avoid discovery.

Now, what I told the hon. member for Peterborough West that day, on or about June 13, was that a stocktaking had recently been held in the part of the building where the consumable stores such as paint were contained, and where the fire occurred. This stocktaking indicated a very small deficiency relatively to what is usually found in a section of a warehouse containing consumable stores such as paint, wrapping paper, washing materials and the like. The deficiency was less than 1 per cent; so that—and this is the point I made—it was unlikely, in view of the relative smallness of the deficiency, that anyone could have set fire to that particular place for the purpose of concealing the deficiency, particularly when a stocktaking had taken place within a matter of weeks.

Mr. Fraser: That is different from what I understood you said.

Mr. Claxton: We can each give our impression. Then the hon. member said he had been told of this by people who had informed him. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if an hon. member, or any member of the public, tells me, after a fire of substantial proportions, that he has anyone who can bring anything to bear on the cause of that fire, I will say: Let us have his name.

Mr. Fraser: You never asked me.

Mr. Claxton: Well, that is your impression; my impression is that I did ask the name.

Mr. Fraser: I had a witness.

Mr. Robertson: Let us have it now.

Mr. Claxton: And that would be the most natural thing in the world. However, the point is this at this time we had police actively at work. They stayed on this job for months after, and it was an easy thing, as the Minister of Justice had pointed out, for the hon. member for Peterborough West to have spoken again either to the Minister of Justice, or to myself, or to have written to us about the matter if it was of the consequence that he says it was. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that to say that he felt frustrated is hardly a good reason for not taking the positive action of coming to the assistance of those responsible for the enforcement of law, as might have been done so easily.

If he was frustrated then, why does he cease to be frustrated now and make this statement at this late stage? If the hon. member sees fit to do it, I would be glad to have any names he has on conditions of confidence so that we can turn them over to the police and see what the situation is.

What may have given rise to all this was something that has not so far been mentioned, and it is of some consequence. It is that already at the ordnance depot there had been prosecutions for theft of rope, leather, shirts, boots, paint brushes, overalls, kit bags and so on, which were found in the possession of Morris Levinson, a junk dealer of Ottawa, and Harry Altman who operated a war surplus store in Ottawa. The value of the stores is estimated at $3,000. On March 22, after a prolonged investigation, three soldiers and two civilian receivers were charged in civil court. Harry Altman was convicted but the sentence was quashed in the appeal court. Morris Levinson and the three soldiers were found guilty and sentenced to fines or imprisonment. That was just three months before this event occurred, so that what the hon. member said was hardly news at that time. What would have been useful would have been to have the advantage of any leads other than those which probably arose out of published reports or private knowledge of the investigation and prosecutions which had already taken place.

There were a number of stories current following the Plouffe park fire: one, that jeep and other automobile parts had been sold around Ottawa from Plouffe park. Jeep and automobile parts are not even kept at Plouffe park. In order to meet some of these statements at the time I authorized a statement to be made on July 10 as follows:

Jeep and other automobile parts are not even kept at Plouffe park. There is no truth whatsoever to the report that the loss of military clothing in the fire would delay the organization and training of the 27th Canadian infantry brigade group. The fact is that no military clothing was stored in the burned section of the depot and none was lost. There was not one garment or any type of clothing or equipment stored in this part of the building. Neither is there any truth in the rumours that there were stock shortages in the area where the fire occurred. Stocktaking in the area concerned was completed on April 13, 1951, and deficiencies were less than one-half of one per cent—and these were for a year and four months of operation—considered to be a remarkably good showing for materials like paints, cleaning and packing materials, and other similar consumable stores.

We have had professional assistance from time to time from firms of accountants to advise us with regard to accounting procedure and the like. One such was James C. Thompson of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Company who, under cover of letter dated April 17, to Mr. E. B. Armstrong, assistant deputy minister (finance), Department of National Defence, Ottawa, Ontario, wrote:

Dear Mr. Armstrong:

In connection with our recent examination of accounting for stores at 26 COD, Ottawa, I wish to confirm my statement to you that during the course of our investigation we found no evidence to suggest that the recent fires at the depot were in any way instituted to cover up shortages of stores. While we are not in a position to state how the fires arose, we do not believe that there was any connection between such fires and the accounting for stores and materials.

Mr. Speaker, the motion of the leader of the opposition to adjourn the house was not allowed but the next day he made a statement in the Ottawa Journal covering generally the same grounds.

In the same Ottawa Journal we have a report referring to the last fire. This states that a soldier employed in the ordnance depot had been convicted of setting the last fire, and sentenced to two years less one day.

Because it has some bearing on fires and thefts, it is important that we should have some perspective to our discussion. When I ask that the house follow me in this part of my speech, I do not want anyone to think for one moment that I want to diminish the seriousness of the charges that have been or may be laid, or of offences such as those that have been described, whether they be the theft of public property, the fraudulent use of public property and services, or arson. These are dreadful things; and I can assure the house that those of us in the Department of National Defence have done, are doing and will do everything we can to prevent them, to detect them and, where we find them, to make sure that the law takes its full course.

But when we have exaggerated statements of the extent of fire losses it is important to have a sense of proportion. I deplore the size of fire losses. We do everything possible to reduce fire losses by fire drills, fire fighting equipment, fire prevention campaigns, fire education campaigns and co-operation with the civil authorities. But fires still occur.

I would point out that it is difficult to compare the situation of military buildings with that of civilian buildings. Military buildings to a great extent are of temporary construction. A lot of them are wartime buildings, with the wood dried out and impregnated with oil. Military operations are frequently related to activities that use dangerous materials, such as explosives, fires for forges or for metal work, and stoves for local heating. Then, in many of those wartime buildings there is imperfect wiring, and the like.

So that I suggest it would be natural to expect that, under the law of averages, the losses of military buildings might be higher than those in settled areas. But I do submit that it is difficult indeed to make comparisons of figures because of different methods of valuation and different methods of accounting.

I mention these figures for purposes of illustration only. I may say they are the only figures those concerned with the matter in the department or in the other offices concerned with statistics have been able to give me. These are the figures for 1949, the last year in respect of which figures for civilian valuations and losses are available.

In the cities of Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver the assessed value of real estate in 1949 was $4,229,300,000. In the same year the comparable value of property in the Department of National Defence was $1,229 million. By taking 65 per cent of the cost of national defence property, to put it on some sort of basis of comparison with the assessed value of real estate in these municipalities, we arrive at the figure of $844,400,000.

In that year fire losses in the armed forces for buildings and contents amounted to $1,074,485, or 13/100 of 1 per cent of the valuation, as I have arrived at it. Fire losses to civilian buildings and contents in the cities mentioned totalled $11,336,700, or 27/100 of 1 per cent of the assessed value of the civilian property.

The ratio in 1950 for the service buildings was 13/100 and in 1951 it was 12/100 of 1 per cent.

Mr. Green: Would there not be several million more people around civilian buildings?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, but I think that would lead to more effective prevention and detection measures, and more fire fighting apparatus.

I wish to leave the question of fires there and, against that background, say a word about the matter of losses through thefts.

Mr. Green: Before the minister leaves the subject of fires, would he tell us what the losses by fires were in 1950 and 1951?

Mr. Claxton: I just gave them.

Mr. Green: And up to date in 1952, in defence property.

Mr. Claxton: I just gave them for the earlier years. I have not the figure for 1952, but it is higher this year.

Mr. Green: I thought the minister said that figure was for 1949.

Mr. Claxton: After I had given the figures for 1949. I gave the ratio of service losses later. I have not the actual figures here, but they were put on Hansard, in a return made some time ago.

Mr. Green: I thought the only figures the minister gave were for 1949.

Mr. Claxton: I gave ratios for later years. It is important to appreciate how the scale of defence operations has changed since Korea. Measured in terms of money, our defence appropriation before Korea was $425 million. Today, since Korea it is $2,001 million, or nearly five times as large. Measured in terms of manpower it has increased from 47,000 to 96,000, and in civilian employees from 26,000 to 40,000.

[Mr. Claxton.]

During that time we have had hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of contracts placed and under way, not only for equipment and stores but also for buildings. At the moment there are under way in Canada 513 major contracts, 22 of which are at Petawawa. I suggest to hon. members this means that in every military establishment, hardly without exception, we have a situation whereby, in addition to ordinary military operations on a greatly expanded scale, we have construction going on to a degree which can be compared only to the peak of wartime activity. Swarms of civilian workmen are employed by the civilian contractors, and numbers of service and civilian workmen are employed on different parts of development projects.

It does not require any great imagination or experience in this kind of operation to realize that this is an exceedingly difficult one in which to maintain proper security with regard to certain types of equipment. When we think of other activities on a somewhat similar scale, such as for example the Canadian National Railways, we see that even they do not compare in magnitude with what is going on in defence. Last year the C.N.R. had an inventory in December of stores and supplies of $94 million. I do not suggest that these figures are comparable, but in defence we have in stores, either in the main depots or with the units, equipment and supplies to a value of which may run to one billion dollars. This inventory figure of $94 million for the C.N.R. was adjusted for losses of $18,344. The C.N.R. had claims for losses of freight by theft of $110,103 and had unallocated losses of freight amounting to another $278,375. That despite the fact that its operations are carried on along railway rights of way behind fences and in compact and well-guarded yards, stations and warehouses.

In the armed forces, we have several different types of accounting bodies which hold stores. First of all there is the ordnance which operates mainly at the central ordnance depots, No. 25 in Montreal, No. 26 here and No. 27 at London. It makes issue to units. Then we have the army service corps which handles food, oil, gasoline and the like. There is the Royal Canadian Electrical and Mechanical Engineers which has charge of parts for automobiles and the repair of equipment which these units receive from ordnance. The engineers have the equipment which they use in the field companies. There are medical and dental stores as well. All these have a rather similar accounting procedure.

The articles they have are susceptible of accurate and efficient stocktaking, stock-keeping and accounting procedures. Then we come to another class, the class of surplus stores or salvage obtained by engineer works companies. Commodities come into the hands of the engineers in this way: At a camp like Borden or Petawawa some wartime huts have to be replaced by new houses and barracks. Wartime equipment which is wearing out has to be replaced in huts which have been renovated. Equipment such as stoves, sinks and shower stalls is put into the hands of the engineers but until the procedures which we developed in 1949 are made effective salvage equipment of this kind was not put expressly on their charge.

This equipment is examined to see what will be disposed of and what will be put into good condition and kept for future need. The thefts at Petawawa were principally related to this type of equipment, being either scrap or equipment that was in the hands of the engineers but not on their charge and awaiting a decision as to whether it would be disposed of or put on charge. When I mention to you that the operations carried on by the work service engineers has increased from a program of some $30 million in 1949 to $300 million in 1951 you will see that the scale of their operations has increased out of all recognition.

Mention has been made before of Farnham. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is reported on page 1797 of Hansard of May 1 as having said:

> That camp disappeared except for a few of the walls and the foundations which could not be conveniently moved. Of more than 100 wooden structures—and very solid wooden structures they were—in that huge camp area, an undisclosed number had been lifted intact from their foundations by a heavy-tracked vehicle and sold for prices ranging from $25 to $50 to farmers and other residents in the eastern townships at that time.

Perhaps the leader of the opposition and others who have referred to this have had in mind the first reference to it which appeared in the press when the Gazette of December 14, 1945, had headlines such as this: "Army Reveals Farnham Camp Looted, $50,000 in Huts, Fittings Missing". Then followed a rather extensive report.

What are the facts about Farnham? Farnham was a summer camp built in 1940 primarily for use by troops in tents. Erected on it were some cookhouses, bath houses, latrines, store rooms, offices and the like. They were spread over an area of six square miles. The cost in 1940, including clearing, excavating and services, was $96,344.40. The camp was used during six years of war. It was declared to be surplus to military requirements in 1946 and in the ordinary course it would have been disposed of through War Assets Corporation as it was at the time.

However in 1947 I froze all disposal procedures while we had another look because of the changes in the international situation and the build-up of the armed forces. From the time when the camp ceased to be occupied in 1946 until 1949 a good part of the plumbing and other fixtures was removed by army engineers for authorized use in other establishments. Two civilian guards were charged with looking after the property but unfortunately they removed a good part of what was left and sold it to residents in the district. That was discovered and they were prosecuted. A court of inquiry was held and it was found that the value of the material stolen and not recovered was $3,500. It was found also that it would not have been possible to ensure the safety of the camp without employing sixteen men which would have meant an expenditure of about $32,000 a year. It is clear from this that what should have been done was either to let the camp go to sale or to let it walk off. We could not do that and we put in two guards. Unfortunately they proved to be untrustworthy.

Mr. Green: Were they convicted?

Mr. Claxton: One was convicted and the other has not yet been tried. He chose a speedy trial and the prosecution is still in the hands of the provincial authorities. It would not be proper at this time to go into the question of Petawawa any further. The matter is now before the courts, and I do not think anyone would regard it as appropriate or useful, even if it were in order, to refer further to it. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred to a baby tank being lifted. We have no evidence of that whatever. We do not know what is meant by a "baby tank". The only tank part that his reference may have been intended to cover is part of a cupola of a tank that has been used for years as a target for Piat firing. It has been immobilized of course and has been unworkable for years. It appears that one of the civilian scrap buyers may have removed some part of that. The story is that when asked about it he said it was part of a load of scrap that formed a part of his order.

I referred the other day to the theft of soil pipe. I am informed that was not on charge to the Department of National Defence but to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as part of its operations, and that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was in process of turning it over to national defence to be used by the works services of the engineers. References have been made by the hon. member for Peterborough West

(Mr. Fraser) to improvements in accounting procedure. I want to assure him that changes are constantly being made in every type of operation having to do with accounting procedure. With the assistance of treasury officials, members of the civil service commission and outside aid, as well as officers of the department who include some chartered accountants and others expert in this field, changes are being made steadily from time to time.

With respect to the question of stores—and I think hon. members will agree that is the most difficult kind of article to keep under effective control—this matter was the subject of a study made in 1949 when the chief auditor of the Department of National Defence consulted three leading civilian firms, Anglin-Norcross, the Foundation Company of Canada Limited and Hill-Clark-Francis Limited. I am informed that these firms thought that the system we had worked out was all right. It was worked out after a study had been made of the United States system which was largely adopted by us with adaptations for use in Canada. I understand that system is quite similar to the one subsequently adopted in the United Kingdom and Australia. It is a cost accounting system with various elements accounting for materials and supplies, job cost, real property records, installed engineering fixture records and works feature cost records.

The plan was to establish this system progressively during the years 1950 and 1951 but, as I have indicated, the tremendous expansion of the activities of the works branch, as well as of others in the armed forces, has delayed the full establishment of the system, but it is now being pressed forward. Unfortunately, or fortunately, the administrative staff of national defence was not increased nearly in proportion to the operational forces, and yet it still had to deal with an all-time peacetime peak load. That task has taxed both personnel and equipment. The result is as I related to the house in the statement I made, and I have nothing further to add at this time. The matter is the subject of an inquiry by Mr. George S. Currie, and no doubt it will be inquired into later by the special committee on defence expenditures. The matter will be developed further as the cases proceed in the court. With respect to discrepancies, irregularities and dishonest practices, those are the subject of further investigation, and if it should develop that there is reason to believe that criminal offences have been committed, charges will be laid.

I only wish to add that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and perhaps one or two others have asked questions or made statements about defence matters during the course of this debate. I propose to deal with those in detail at the next convenient opportunity or else ask my parliamentary assistant to do so when he returns. Finally, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) suggested that some other tribunal should be set up to look into these matters. I have mentioned those already in existence, but I do suggest to the house that if there is one proper tribunal to deal with this kind of question it is the tribunal that is dealing with it now, the tribunal of parliament.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question? Early in his remarks the minister gave the authority under which Mr. Currie was appointed to make an investigation. I understood him to say it was section 4 of the National Defence Act. I should like to have confirmation of his statement because that section does not seem to deal with the point at all.

Mr. Claxton: I asked the deputy minister of justice and treasury officials about this matter. I am informed it is the practice for ministers to engage professional assistance of this kind by virtue of general responsibility for the conduct of their departments, and payment is provided by a vote therefor. We have an appropriate vote, and it would be authorized by the treasury board.

Mr. Green: Has there been any order in council passed or any authority of any nature?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Green: The section to which the minister referred reads as follows:

> The minister shall have the control and management of the Canadian forces, the defence research board and of all matters relating to national defence including preparation for civil defence against enemy action, and shall be responsible for the construction and maintenance of all defence establishments and works for the defence of Canada.

That is the section.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Green: Would Mr. Currie have any authority to investigate the actions of the minister or deputy minister?

Mr. Claxton: He can investigate anything he likes.

Mr. Drew: Since I asked the original question, may I ask the minister whether there is any other authority under which Mr. Currie has been appointed other than section 4.

Mr. Claxton: No, I think that is all.

Mr. Drew: Would the minister explain what authority Mr. Currie would have to call witnesses or to compel the production of documents, records or anything of that kind?

Mr. Claxton: It may be taken, Mr. Speaker, that since we have invited this investigation, and engaged a man of the integrity and competence of Mr. Currie to conduct it, he will have full access to all records within the Department of National Defence. If his investigation should require that he should look elsewhere for records or to summon witnesses whom he cannot get through other means, then my telegram to him indicated that steps would be taken to see that he had adequate powers.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this afternoon we have listened with some interest and keen concern to the three members of the cabinet who spoke. It is rather strange that, despite the fact we received somewhat of a lecture from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that all speeches should be relevant to the budget, at least two of the three speeches and half of the other were as irrelevant as they were defensive.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): In reply to your leader.

Mr. Rowe: My leader has never had to make as many defensive speeches as we had to listen to this afternoon.

Mr. Abbott: He made a pretty good defence last night. He spent most of last night on the defensive.

Mr. Rowe: If he was irrelevant last night, then you were both irrelevant and defensive today—

Mr. Abbott: I did not say he was irrelevant.

Mr. Rowe: —because you never once touched on the budget, and you did not even tell us about your trip.

Mr. Abbott: I do not like to make as lengthy speeches as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Rowe: I am very sorry that the weather was not better. I am not too critical personally, however, about your visit to the United States—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: —because I learned something from your speech there that you had never said in parliament. It is always an advantage to hear cabinet ministers speaking in other places while parliament is in session, because they are speaking more freely than they would in their very responsible and dignified positions in this house. It does not help parliamentary responsibility, however, or aid in instructing the rest of the house.

I am not going to follow the defensive speeches of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) or the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I noticed that the longer the Minister of Justice talked the more involved he became, and the more he defended the more he had to defend. I quite realize the heat with which he crossed the floor, and I am glad that the language of the minister and the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) was not placed on the record, because when they are not on their feet they are both capable of describing each other. I do feel, however, that it is rather novel that the minister of defence should be on the defensive so much this afternoon.

I know that we have had the laughs and jeers of those who have been the yes men of this government, and who express such brilliant gibes when they are sitting down but express so little when they are standing up, no matter what is stolen or burnt. As the minister has said, I know that the loss is only a small portion of what we are spending—2 per cent or a half of one per cent. A million or two here or there: it just cannot be possible that it is disappearing. In fact, the Minister of Finance is always more sure that his budget is right if it is large enough. The larger it is the more he can boast about its greatness. The more burdensome it is on the people, the more certain he is that he needs the money.

I have read the budget, and I have listened with interest to some of the speeches that have been made. I have not heard them all, but judging from those I have heard from those who sit to your right behind the government, I am at least consoled by the fact that I did not miss very much in the ones I did not hear. I feel that the government seems to have given us a budget which the taxpayers of this country accept, Mr. Speaker, but it contains the highest taxation and is the largest budget this country has ever known. If it is conspicuous by its size, it is even more conspicuous by its vagueness and its lack of relationship to any fiscal policy. In fact, I have been waiting in vain to hear from the Minister of Finance, or his rather fluent assistant, any description of fiscal policy.

Mr. Sinclair: You are so seldom here you would not hear it if we did give it.

Mr. Rowe: I was here long before the hon. member, and I have been here long enough to know that if he were speaking every day I would not be here as often as I am, because I would not be missing very much. I have watched the hon. member since he came into the house. I know that he is so sure of himself that he likes to hear himself very often, and always did. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the noise a member makes is any indication of his contribution to this house. I have heard the hon. member many times, and he is becoming about as efficient as some of those who jibe when they are sitting down. He is generally good at that. However, as he progresses and attains a dignified role, he may live to learn that it does not pay.

I wish to bring to the attention of this house the fact that we are carrying a burden which I think is dangerous. In bringing down his budget I must say that the Minister of Finance has almost become a magician. You have all seen the advertisement throughout the years for the old Magic baking powder. I believe we might call this a kind of magic budget powder, because it convinces the taxpayer who does not look into the matter very much, except when he is making out his income tax form, that he is paying less than he was. The minister very clearly showed the people that their taxes were going to be reduced, yet through some magic formula he showed that our revenues are going to be higher. I have listened to many budgets, and to many ministers since the days of the Hon. Mr. Robb. I must give my congenial friend the Minister of Finance top marks and the grand championship for being able to take from the people with one hand, give to them with the other hand, and yet show them that they pay less while he receives more. I think it is very clever. My dear old friend the Hon. Mr. Robb, whom the present minister knew very well, was not a lawyer and so was never able to convince people as the present minister can that they were paying less but he was receiving more. However, Mr. Speaker, civil government and civil administration by the government, in a country the size of Canada, which is a growing country, is a great burden on our development. I refer to civil administration itself, the bare necessities that need to be paid for, in order to run the affairs of this dominion.

But there is something on top of that. There is not an hon. member in the house who does not realize and appreciate the tenseness of these times. They realize that we might be thrust into war at almost any moment and that suddenly, like a lightning flash in the night, our whole existence might be threatened. Independently of party, there is not an hon. member in this house who is not ready at all times to co-operate with the government and to try to help constructively in order to see that the money is properly spent and that preparedness for an awful day such as that which may come sooner than we think shall go full steam ahead and indeed be the first obligation on the Canadian people. That is our duty to ourselves, to our people, to our country and to civilization itself.

The amounts that are mentioned are tremendous. To speak again of the days that I was referring to, this budget now before the house is eleven times larger than the budget which was introduced when I entered this house. It is just eleven times as large as that one. You are taking eleven times as much from the people. Despite the need for defence, the government has gone on and on with regard to expenditures. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) no doubt must have a new way for spending money on social security and the welfare state almost every time there is a cabinet meeting. I see the Minister of Finance smiling. I will credit him with this virtue: he is not quite as wildly extravagant as are some of his colleagues. Nevertheless, he is not as careful as I should like to see him be. At a time when the defence obligations of this country are so essential and so vital to our very existence, surely we should at least be careful about superimposing upon those obligations other forms of obligation that may well-nigh threaten the economic progress of this country.

On top of all the defence obligations we have not only a social security or welfare state program but a debt reduction program and a surplus-provision program as well. The surplus last year was twice as great as was the whole budget in 1925. I am referring to the surplus alone. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to use just my own words, although I have had some experience in watching budgets and in trying to make a business pay. I have also had a lifetime's experience trying to make a farm pay, and I certainly have had the normal experiences in watching what makes progress possible.

Coming from that great city of Montreal, the Minister of Finance has watched business grow. I must credit him with knowing at least some of the essential and fundamental necessities in connection with keeping a business flourishing. He said:

> I wish to emphasize however that we cannot have all these and reduce budgets too. Canada can afford these things we are doing but only at the cost of forgoing expansion or improvement somewhere else. Trying to do them all will only result in inflation. We must all hold some of our projects and programs in reserve even though they are sensible or indeed profitable.

What he is saying there is merely this. If we are going to do all the things some of his politically-minded colleagues would suggest, and are going to give everybody everything that is asked for, are going to give as many people as many things for nothing as they wish at election time—if we are going to do all these things we are going to be in difficulty.

We must reduce other projects if we are going to spend more recklessly than ever before for civil administration. Never has a government spent as recklessly and wildly as has this government in connection with civil administration; never before has a government ventured in peacetime, or even in wartime, to spend so much on a defence program. Never before has a government ever ventured to spend so much on the welfare state. Never before has a government superimposed all these things, one upon the other, and ventured to have a surplus which is twice the size of some of our former budgets, and then planned to tell the people: We are reducing debt at the same time.

Mr. Speaker, not even a financial magician like the Minister of Finance can make that game last. When he tells you that he can do it only by retarding the economic progress of this country—when he makes that admission—it is time to stop, look and listen. The signals are out—and they are there in their tragic nakedness—warning us to view the future with great concern, if not alarm.

Mr. Speaker, the only way in which this country can ever afford to maintain the social services of the welfare state for which the pattern has been made is by an extension in industry and production such as we have never yet known. Even if there were a slight falling off, what would happen? The minister on another occasion said that he felt that we were in a very dangerous period when we had to tax industry 50 per cent of their net earnings or when we had to tax industry 50 per cent. He has made that statement on various occasions. Yet he now glibly tells us: We are going to take 54·6 per cent from the industries of this country. Where is expansion going to come if the minister is correct? From his long experience in his professional and civil life before he came into this house, he states exactly what is so true, namely that it can be done only at the expense of economic expansion.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the members of this house—those who are interested enough to be here this afternoon—will weigh that consideration seriously and ask themselves the question: Where do we go from here?

Mr. Speaker, it is true that we have been experiencing an all-time high in prosperity brought about by conditions and for reasons beyond the control of this government. Do not let anyone—even the most hard-boiled supporter of this government—think that the government has brought about this so-called prosperity or that they have made it possible for the Canadian dollar to be worth 2 per cent more than the United States dollar. This is a strong and powerful country. It has been said that some people are born to greatness, some achieve greatness and some have greatness thrust upon them. Canada as a nation has had greatness handed to her. Canada is a great country. It must be strong in order to stand a government as reckless as is the government we have had for the last few years.

Seriously, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter that I wish to direct to the attention of the Minister of Finance. He smiles. I am glad that he can do so. That is one of the happy faculties he has. He can smile even in the face of possible tragedy, whether it be political or financial. And it is a good thing he can. Many people in Canada will not be able to smile if he keeps on taxing them. I agree with him that he has no other course but to levy the taxes he is levying if he is to meet all the political obligations, you might call them, and all the things that will have popular appeal up and down the highways and byways of this country, because they must be paid for.

May I point out that today the textile industry is more or less in the doldrums and unemployment increasing; the leather industry is in a very serious condition today, and so is the lumber industry. That industry is threatened, and orders are falling off tremendously. I could add some others that the Minister of Finance knows very well are going to seriously affect his tax returns next year. He knows very well, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot continue to tax the people as we have been taxed, and expect this condition to grow better.

This government expects next year to take at least 30 per cent more from income than they took last year. Superimposed on that is a 2 per cent social security tax, amounting to an additional $214 million. It is pretty hard to see where there is any tax relief in sight and as these industries fail to pay the volume of taxes, there is little chance of the rate being reduced. However, I am aware that next year the government will likely try very hard to reduce taxation. Election year is always a great year for the taxpayer, and I am sure that the government will bend every effort next year to budget for a small surplus. In fact we will likely be told next year that a surplus is unnecessary, that a surplus increases extravagance and encourages spending. We will likely be told that we do not need to budget for a surplus. I can only say this in advance: The public will be waiting anxiously before an election is announced to hear the clarion call for an election; for next year's budget will tell whether there is to be an election or not. There has not been a budget by this government, or by the party that is now in power, in the last three elections in which they have not handed out hard-earned cash or reduced taxes or handed some form of bonus or a subsidy to get themselves reinstated because of the fear of losing power for the sake of power alone.

I said there is very little relationship between taxation, fiscal policy and the budget. Before I leave the taxes I do wish to say that I regret very much the minister did not see fit to allow deductions for hospitalization and medical expenses. I urge upon him that when the resolutions are up he reconsider it and allow the expenditures to be deductible before income taxes are paid.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He is waiting for an election.

Mr. Rowe: As the hon. member for Greenwood has said, he is saving that as an election touch; in fact, it would be a very neat election idea, and along with that it would be very attractive. It would please the doctors, the nurses and the hospitals. It would please many people. If you cannot do it in any other way I urge you now to make that concession before the election, because the country needs it. I know that you allow any of us who wish to contribute to hospitals or to other charitable causes, to our churches and so on, to deduct those contributions from income tax.

Mr. Abbott: Up to 10 per cent of your income.

Mr. Rowe: Yes. Not many of us want to give much more than that.

Mr. Abbott: Not many of us do.

Mr. Rowe: No. I leave it to the minister's own judgment to say whether deductions for medical expenses are not just as fair as charitable donations. If a person can afford to pay the medical expenses not of his dependents but of someone else's children, if he can afford to pay a thousand dollars, and some do, or five thousand dollars to a hospital for medical expenses, that ought to be deducted before income tax. If it were a charitable gift it would be deductible. Surely, if you want to pay $1,000 for the medical expenses of some crippled child, whether he belongs to your own family or not, it should be deductible from income tax just in the same way as $1,000 paid to a hospital drive is deductible. I compliment the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on bringing this matter before the house. I am glad that everybody supported it except the Minister of Finance. I am sorry that after receiving such support it was turned down by the Minister of Finance. Again I urge upon him not to wait until an election year. Do it this year. There will be a lot of sickness this year. The minister is imposing heavier taxes on the people. Business is not as good as it was. There is a lot of unemployment. Many people need help this year. I plead with the minister again to reconsider and bring it in this year. As someone said to my right, better late than never. If you cannot bring it in this year, bring it in as an election sop, and it will still be good in 1953 or 1954, because if the government is defeated our party will carry out those good intentions.

I have been alarmed, Mr. Speaker, and I know the Minister of Finance has expressed his alarm, at what is going to happen to our business and to our expansion program that is so vital and necessary if this young country is to grow as it should. I am alarmed at the fact that there is no relationship between fiscal policy and this budget similar to what there should be and has been in other years.

It has been suggested that we should have a careful study made of our whole trade situation, especially international trade, and with that I am in full accord. I think you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that several years ago, and in fact on two or three different occasions, I urged that we should have an empire trade conference. It has been suggested very vigorously recently by our leader and by the hon. member for Lake Centre, but the government has paid very little attention to it. I would ask the Minister of Finance to reconsider that request. I believe every other party in the house has suggested that it would be bound to do some good. I recall the empire trade agreements of 1932. While these were difficult years, there is no one who remembers the proceedings of that conference who will not agree that the agreements were of great benefit to Canada at that time and for many years after.

At the present time the United Kingdom is studying where she can buy her goods, and we have given very little co-operation. In 1951 we purchased $31,900,000 worth of goods per month from the United Kingdom. At the present time, even though she is buying over $60 million worth per month from us, we have reduced our purchases from Britain by at least one-third, or approximately $10 million a month. On the other hand, the United Kingdom has sent her trade commissioners all over the world, and not long ago, when this great drive was put on by red China and Russia, representatives of eighteen different countries visited Russia.

I believe Sir John Boyd Orr of Great Britain has within the last few months negotiated contracts to a value of $50 million with the countries behind the iron curtain. I have been wondering what is going to happen in this country. Great Britain is buying from us this year at a rate of $10 million per month less. It is now estimated that we will sell $70 million less of goods to Australia and to New Zealand than we sold last year.

Britain is buying lumber from countries behind the iron curtain; she is buying grain from the same countries; and she is trading her textiles to those countries, while our textile mills are closing. We have a situation which, if not dangerous, is certainly critical. But in the policies we hear from the government with respect to the expansion of trade we do not hear a word that would encourage enterprise. Indeed, in the words of the Minister of Finance, that expansion must be reduced.

The only expansion we see is in the welfare state. The only expansion to which the government adheres is that recommended by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who would spend all we make, and give even more away. So, if the government takes any credit for the kind of prosperity that has been thrust upon it, it must also admit that it has given very little opportunity for the development of any expansion program for the future.

Yes, it is truly said that the power to tax is the power to destroy. The government knows that now, if it did not know it before. I was amused when the Minister of Finance rose in his place and reduced the taxes he had increased at an earlier time on tobacco and cigarettes. And we will recall that there are reasons for his having done that. His reason for the reduction was that he had put the rate up so high that he collected a million dollars less in revenue. That, of course, is possible. I venture to say that if he raises the rates on personal and corporation income tax in the next year—and of course he will not do that, because it will be getting closer to an election—he will have exactly the same condition, in general, as he had in connection with cigarettes and tobacco. The minister knows that in respect of those two commodities his revenues fell to the extent of a million dollars, because he increased the taxes to a point where sales dropped. That is possible in business.

I agree with the minister that when one gets above a 50 per cent tax on the business life of this country he is reaching the danger zone. That is why there are signs of curtailment and fears among the people who hold to the view that, by expansion and productivity, perhaps we could weather the storm of the future, no matter how severe it may be.

I am not going to speak at greater length. I would urge the government to reconsider some of its proposals, and to beware of the dangers ahead. There are many signs that are not good. I shall not do more than make a passing reference to the government's tendency to spend more because it knows it is going to have a big surplus. For instance, last year they spent about $17 million advertising themselves, about $4,500,000 on telephones and telegrams. In fact, they spent so fast that, when the surplus got too large, it was spent so that in the last few months before the budget it was half gone.

This year the minister says the surplus might be $9 million. But no one in this country knows what it will be—and, if one may judge by his record, the Minister of Finance does not know whether there will be a surplus of $9 million or $300 million, or a deficit. I venture to say however that if it is $300 million, instead of spending $17 million on publicity before an election, it may spend $34 million.

This is what creeps in when there are large surpluses. If there ever was a time both in business and in government when budgets were important, that time is now. They are important in family life, and as they apply to schools, churches and other enterprises. But they are vastly more important when related to our national business.

Every business in this country is taking stock today, and trying to economize all along the line. They are watching every dollar of expenditure for purposes of maintenance and repairs, and looking carefully at programs for expansion. I know of many industries that have reduced their expansion programs because they see danger signs. They see a tax of over 54·6 per cent on everything they make. They see increased interest rates, and they believe that with decreasing business it is time to take stock and to cut out extravagance.

Today our farmers are afraid of things in addition to the foot-and-mouth disease, because that disease has not done to the beef cattle industry much more harm than the sale of oleomargarine has done to the dairy industry. The importations of oils for oleomargarine have almost ruined the dairy industry, while the foot-and-mouth disease is threatening the beef industry.

Lack of fiscal policy on the part of the government has ruined several industries; yet we find among government members very little concern. We see extravagance in almost every department. This afternoon we have listened to three ministers defending themselves, arguing as to whether someone told them about a theft before a fire or after a fire, arguing whether it was started at one end of the building or at the other end, and admitting that it started in two different places—but no one knowing how much had been stolen in between the two fires.

We have today the spectacle of more civil servants than were ever employed before, with 40,000 additional in the Department of National Defence alone—almost as many as there are soldiers. Those employees are falling over each other, and yet there were not enough left to patrol valuable property on New Year's eve. Is it any wonder that in some places nearly everything that was not nailed down was stolen?

Someone told me today—and I could scarcely believe it myself; and after the cross-examination between the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) I am almost afraid to say what I heard; and I shall not give the names—but I was told that a skating rink was stolen from the defence department, including even the ice. Now, I can hardly believe that that could be true.

We do know however that millions of dollars' worth of equipment has been stolen from Petawawa. I want to know what these 40,000 civil servants are doing, now that they are on the payroll. Is one watching the other? As someone has pointed out, they have even stolen scales to weigh what they had stolen. Someone else says that they were sending telegrams to each other. It is bad enough to steal rolling stock; it is a bold thief who will tear up rails; but it is a bolder thief who will steal scales to weigh the scrap iron he has taken.

Well, that is the spectacle. These are burdensome figures. They arise from the taxation threatening to cripple industry in this country. They are coming from taxation that threatens to retard enterprise on the part of the individual. They are coming from taxation that threatens the very life of this country. And I say quite sincerely and seriously, even if it was the last thing I ever said in the house, that no matter what party is in power after the next election—and I have seen many changes; and I can hear the rumbling in the mulberry bushes even now—

An hon. Member: You are not making any forecasts, are you?

Mr. Rowe: Forecasts are dangerous. I can hear the rumbling in the mulberry bushes now when you hear three ministers apologizing in one afternoon. You can hear it, and it comes awfully fast. It comes and hangs down around your ears before you know it is there. This government is powerful, but the larger they are the harder they fall. When they start tumbling they will fall over each other so fast in defeat that you will not be able to distinguish among them.

Mr. Garson: You should know from experience.

Mr. Rowe: You have had some experience yourself. It is true that I have had more experience than my hon. friend, but at the same time they will fall so fast that you will not be able to distinguish among them the really bright one like the Minister of Finance and the duller ones who think more when they are sitting down than when they are up speaking. They will all look alike when the tide turns. I know it seems to be a fine thing to them to adopt the tactics they have adopted. The Minister of Finance is looking a lot older since he came down here.

An hon. Member: The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Finance looks younger every time he gives us one of his budgets. He looks even younger today than when he first came here. All these tactics do not disturb me. I think of Sir John Macdonald who said that you always find the most sticks under the best fruit trees. Whether it is the leader of the Social Credit group or the leader of the C.C.F. party that they start knocking and making those little chips of personality they will find that those persons grow larger and more influential all the time. The same game was played with one of the greatest statesmen this country has ever produced, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. I well remember the whispers of death and all the other games that were played. They tried to play the same game with that great leader Sir Robert Borden. They are trying to play the same game now with the leader of our party. They tried it before he became premier of Ontario, and then in three elections, which he won. They are trying to play the same game now.

It is all part of their tactics, wise or otherwise. I say that advisedly, without casting any reflection on anyone. I am not going to point out the ones who do it or who have devised the plan, but I do say that their tactics are becoming conspicuous to the public of this country. The respect which we pay personally to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of this country as leader of your party can be distinguished from the type of respect you pay to the great leader that we have, who I believe will be the next prime minister of this dominion.

On this side we are not at all ashamed, we are not at all disturbed because we know they are simply the old tactics. When the tide turns they will find that they have not worked. The public will then be looking for someone to replace the government who have fallen in spite of themselves. The government is growing weary. It is a government without a policy. It is a government which is carrying on extravagant and wasteful expenditures. It is a government which is trying to carry on five different avenues of expenditure at one time, like a juggler at the circus trying to keep five balls in the air.

The public will consider that it is time for a change. When it is time for a change they will not talk about some of the petty tactics that have been used or about what somebody said eight or ten years ago. They will ask whom they can get to replace the great Prime Minister whom we all respect as a gentleman. It is the same type of campaign that has been used in by-elections and general elections—they say that the Conservative party cannot form a cabinet.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: Hear them saying, "hear, hear." God has been good to those wonderful men to your right, but surely he did not place all the ability in this country in the old Grit party. I think the Lord had better judgment than that. I know that that has been said many times before, but I know the people will look for a leader who has outstanding ability, who has unchallenged integrity, who knows where he is going, who is not afraid to fight or to lead. Our leader probably would be more popular if he were more fearful. He would probably be more popular if he told everybody everything they wanted to hear. He would probably be more popular if he would try to enlarge the welfare state and make it bigger than ever.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time expired at 5.41.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Go ahead.

Mr. Garson: We want Rowe.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member was so carried away with his enthusiasm that he lost track of the time.

Mr. Rowe: It was not that, but I did not want to establish any precedent in this house.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Rowe: I appreciate very much the fact that, after what I have said, the Minister of Justice is ready to say, "we want Rowe." I would not join your cabinet even if you did ask me. I must correct the Minister of Finance and tell him that I have not been carried away with my enthusiasm. Apparently they have been so carried away with my logic that the Minister of Justice is saying that he wants to hear more. I am not going to speak about my enthusiasm or logic, but I do want to say that I appreciate the courtesy that has been extended to me to continue. I appreciate the hearing that has been given to me by the few that are here.

An hon. Member: On your own side too.

Mr. Rowe: I want to leave with the Minister of Finance a fair warning of the signs on the horizon. He should urge this government to do what any sound business enterprise must do today, count the cost and expand rather than retard your enterprise. The minister should send out his men to find what can be done to encourage industry to expand. I know that even my hon. friends to my left will agree that the only job security labour can have is by an expanded industrial productivity.

As the Minister of Finance has said, we cannot have that if you continue to tax and tax and tax. The power to tax is the power to destroy and to continue to tax as you are taxing now, while it may not destroy entirely, will retard; and then when times change, as they are changing in many industries, the crushing burden will fall, not only on that industry but on the welfare state. The two per cent will look pretty small with which to pay old age pensions when there is not much from which to take the two per cent. Things will be different when your income is shrinking. The old age pensioner should be aware of those political apostles who for the sake of power, and power alone, are ready to say, "We will give you twice as much again if you will only continue to vote for us." There are only so many shekels in the pot. Do not kill the goose that lays the golden egg because she is not laying as well as she was.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, on April 8, after lengthy and laboured compilations intended to explain the mistakes that he made in the budget estimates, the hon. minister stated that for the sixth consecutive year we have a surplus. Instead, in my opinion, he should have said that for the sixth consecutive year we tax our people more than is necessary. Such great revenue surpluses over expenses as have been piled up in 1951 by this regime, while municipalities and school boards must resort to provincial grants in order to meet their obligations because they are unable to make both ends meet, show clearly and definitely that the central power unfairly appropriates fiscal sources which do not belong to it.

For the government thus to pile up money surpluses when our workers are working their hearts out to make both ends meet is unthinkable, and it was only natural for our people to expect to be relieved of a substantial part of the tax burden.

Alas! the federal government is an ogre and it will relax its grip only to claw more strongly at the Canadian taxpayer. They assume all rights, assume responsibilities beyond their purview only to gain an electoral advantage by extending their paternalism to fields outside their jurisdiction.

Out of every dollar paid in taxes by the Canadian taxpayer 77 cents go into the coffers of the federal treasury. From 1945 to 1951 inclusive, the federal government has collected in taxes the amount of $9,988,624,394 of which $2,810,440,687 came from the province of Quebec.

Out of this amount, $4,810,343,705 were paid as income tax of which $1,212,530,887 were paid by my fellow citizens of Quebec.

It is not surprising, then, that provinces and municipalities, through lack of funds, should be unable to proceed to the development of any material projects which would improve living conditions of the community or make up for shortcomings in the social security program.

The unavowed aim of the Ottawa government is to reduce if it can the provinces to beggary and to bankruptcy, while depriving them of the revenue which they urgently require to achieve the task entrusted to them by the constitution.

In economic life, large corporations do not act differently. They begin by engaging in unbridled competition against their rivals. Having reduced them to indigence or to an extremely perilous position, the large corporations supplant them by absorbing them. Thus we see the strong swallowing the weak. But should not things condemned in economic life also be considered reprehensible in politics and in national life, wonders that distinguished Montreal journalist, Léopold Richer.

Making use of his talents as a juggler, the Minister of Finance attempted to persuade the people that income tax would be lowered by 6 per cent, whereas the load of taxation will actually be heavier in 1952 than in 1951.

I do not like that way of doing things any more than I like the attitude of the Minister of National Revenue who announced as a gift the refunding of income tax to millions of taxpayers who had paid too much during the last fiscal year.

In doing so, the minister is not making gifts to anyone. He is simply refunding to the taxpayer part of the money to which he is entitled, money of which he was unfairly deprived on his pay cheque.

I say part of the money, because the government has had free use of the money for a certain period and refunds it without paying interest, while it demands a high rate of interest from those who owe it anything.

During fifty-two weeks the government takes away too much from the workman, the small wage earner and collects millions of dollars that do not belong to it, but when the time comes to return that money to its rightful owners, it adopts an attitude of liberality.

These are expensive refunds for the country. Considering the staff and the paper work needed in connection with that operation, the delays and the correspondence resulting from it, we find that the refunds made by the government bear heavily upon the population.

The request of the CTCC asking the federal authorities in the memorandum it has submitted this year to set the exemption from income tax at $1,500 for single people and at $3,000 for married people with a reduction of $400 for each child is reasonable and sensible.

Those who govern us must protect the family and allow all those who ensure the continuity of the race and consequently the strength and prosperity of our country to meet the appalling cost of their needs and to fulfil the obligations which they have towards their children. It is a factor which should not have been disregarded and which should be kept in mind while our next budget is being prepared.

The Minister of Finance would be well inspired besides to consider what help should be received by parents who direct their sons and their daughters towards our high schools and our universities where they receive the finishing touch to their education.

Every student who is 21 years old and who has no personal income should be classified as a dependent. But the government exerts more pressure than ever on the unfortunate father at the precise moment when his children's education becomes more expensive; as a result, many gifted and richly talented students are unable to complete their education and cannot enter the career they might otherwise have chosen.

I feel that a tax exemption of $1,000 a year should be granted to any father or benefactor who pays the tuition fees of any student 21 years of age or over who attends a secondary school or a university.

The people nowadays, as they were, unfortunately, from 1939 to 1945 under the Mackenzie King government, are being taxed for war purposes. As was stated by the opposition's financial critic, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), we will be spending, this year, $13,150,000 a day.

Such an orgy of waste is horrible and those who are responsible for it should be censured by the representatives of the people. I cannot vote for people who put the welfare of youth in trenches and who, instead of putting the money of the poor and humble to peaceful uses, spend it on the manufacture of bombs and weapons of destruction.

Spending over $2 billion for the so-called "national" defence is foolish. Money is thrown out the window when, in a twelve-month period, $46 million is spent on travelling expenses, nearly $11 million on telephones and telegrams and $10 million for international advertising purposes.

The huge sums we spend on the United Nations Organization are a total loss.

The part given to Canada, the obligations assumed in its name in the field of external relations are out of proportion with its population. We are going bankrupt for countries that do not want to save themselves.

The people pay the cost of keeping our armies in Asia and Europe.

Our leaders seem to have lost all sense of proportion. They increase taxes on the double and spend the money at an even faster pace.

Our sad adventure in Korea, Mr. Truman's war which was approved by our Prime Minister, has cost our people, up to now, over $100 million not to mention the dead and wounded, and tortures of all kinds.

Our government is neglecting peace and the works of peace for the benefit of warlike ventures.

I cannot approve that policy and shall vote accordingly.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost.

Mr. Johnston: I was paired with the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Speaker, will you call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind the house that there are several bills on the order paper which are to be considered in committee of the whole. Shall I consider all these bills in one motion, or is it the wish of the house to have them considered separately? First of all, there is the bill to incorporate the Boundary Pipeline Corporation; then there is the bill respecting the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts and then divorce bills.

Mr. Green: I would suggest that they be taken separately, Your Honour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am informed that in committee of the whole they will be taken one by one. Once the motion is carried that I leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole these bills will be called by the chairman one by one. Therefore they will be studied separately. It is customary under standing order 110, when several bills are reported from standing committees, for one motion to be made to have them all referred to the committee of the whole, in which case each is studied separately.

PRIVATE BILLS

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, the specific task of the House of Commons at this time is to decide for or against the incorporation of Boundary Pipeline Corporation, whose sponsors are seeking the right to build a natural gas pipe line in southern Alberta as far east as Winnipeg. To arrive at a decision on this particular bill, parliament I believe must first make up its mind on a much broader and far more important issue; that is the issue of a national gas policy, the framework upon which the actual structure of pipe lines may be built and upon which to establish our attitude towards the Boundary Pipeline bill and the many other matters which will, over the years ahead, be a proper concern of parliament.

The purpose of a national gas policy may be summed up in these words: The mating of areas with proved and potential natural gas reserves to the market areas inside and outside Canada, subject to the marriages being economically sound, and the provisos that the matchmaking be planned to bring the maximum possible benefits to the areas of gas reserves, the Canadian gas consumers, and the Canadian economy as a whole. This involves getting gas to as many Canadians as possible.

An effective gas policy will help provide adequate incentives for continuing exploration to increase the nation's proved gas resources; an effective gas policy will also directly and favourably affect the rate of petroleum reserves discovered in Canada, the growth of petro-chemical and other industries based upon the by-products of gas and petroleum, and the growth of other industries within Canada that may use gas as a fuel.

At the present time the only province in Canada with gas reserves big enough to be wedded to outside markets is my home province of Alberta. Like many proud parents, my home province has been reluctant to recognize that its gas progeny are getting big enough and numerous enough to warrant marriage to some outside markets. Recently, however, Alberta approved what might be called the engagement of its Peace river gas reserves to the Pacific coast market. The coming marriage may be expected to set a precedent for others.

Before going on let me mention the great importance of the coal industry to the national economy in both peace and war. In view of the fact that gas export will reduce to some degree markets for Canadian coal in areas now served, and the fact that national interest requires that the coal industry be maintained in a reasonable state of health, the government should take, coincident with building a gas pipe line, all possible steps to expand marketing areas for Canadian coal, and speed research for new uses of coal.

I recognize the right of provinces producing natural gas to fully protect their own long-term supply from their own resources, and their right to determine the fields or areas from which gas may be exported, based upon surplus of reserves over local needs in such areas and/or the desirability of exporting dry gas in order to obtain valuable by-products contained in the raw or wet gas of certain fields. The Canadian government, however, has the right and the responsibility of determining the disposition of natural gas declared surplus of its own needs by any province. A national gas policy, if it is to serve Canada to the best advantage, must take into account a number of factors. First, it must recognize the right of provinces possessing gas reserves to reap a maximum possible benefit from them, and in so doing in a material degree determine route of pipe lines. Second, it must recognize the national interest which, in some circumstances, will mean supplying all gas to one section of the country rather than to another, or to some section of the United States instead of to some gas-hungry portion of Canada. Thirdly, it must recognize the economic facts of life—the relationships in distance and terrain between gas fields and prospective markets, both in Canada and the United States; the costs of getting, transporting and selling gas; competition with other fuels; the need of incentives to keep finding more gas reserves. Fourthly, it must recognize the political facts of life, which in some degree reshape economy both in Canada and in our neighbour to the south.

In the light of these facts there are certain guiding principles upon which parliament should grant incorporation to companies seeking the right to build interprovincial or international gas pipe lines, and upon which the board of transport commissioners, or some other appropriate body, should recommend to the government the granting of permits for the construction of such lines. Among these principles should be: a sound economic basis to support the pipe line; preference to be given to serving Canadian markets wherever feasible, construction on Canadian soil wherever feasible, of pipe lines between Canadian fields of origin and the most distant market to be served; construction on Canadian soil of a maximum possible mileage of a pipe line, if a portion or all of the gas is to serve a foreign market.

A national gas policy must recognize that export to the United States may be given favourable consideration under certain conditions. For example, there are United States markets essential to the economic operation of pipe lines to certain Canadian markets which are inadequate in themselves to support a pipe line project. We should not bar export in cases where exchange agreements could be made for an equal volume of United States gas to supply Canadian markets far distant from our own fields, provided the exchange is on a long-term basis, guaranteed at a lower cost than the gas from Canadian sources. Nor should we bar United States markets in the near vicinity of Canadian gas fields which, by reason of their location or type, do not economically fit into the Canadian supply picture. Nor should we bar United States markets whose serving with Canadian gas could provide very material Canadian national defence or economic benefits.

Another important phase of the national gas policy should be the ensuring of very material Canadian participation in pipe line projects. It is desirable that a substantial percentage of equity stock and bonds or debentures be made available for purchase by Canadian corporations and investors. Weight should be given to the degree of Canadian financial participation planned when the appropriate authorities consider each pipe line application. Weight should also be given to the extent of participation by pipe line sponsors in the exploration for and development of natural gas resources in Canada. In other words, are they seeking gas for all o part of the proposed pipe line's need?

Of Canada's provinces, only Alberta has the great majority of its urban population served with natural gas, and only Alberta has a growing surplus over and above its own long-term requirements. Its gas reserves are spread over a territory exceeding 120,000 square miles, stretching from the American border into the northern Peace river and Athabaska river regions, and stretching from British Columbia to Saskatchewan. The number of known gas areas in Alberta now exceeds 150, and the number is increasing at the average rate of one new discovery per week.

Northeastern British Columbia, adjoining Alberta's Peace river area to the west, became a promising gas area because of small discoveries a year or two ago. In recent months northeast British Columbia has come through with what looks like a major gas field in the Fort St. John area. This region, now separated from any large markets by hundreds of miles of small population territory, is taking on growing importance in the planning for pipe lines.

Boundary Pipeline Corporation

Southern Saskatchewan, now at the early stages of a great oil and gas exploration program, has provided its first important gas fields in recent months. The largest one, near Brock in western Saskatchewan, is looked upon by the provincial government of that province as the basis for a government-sponsored pipe line to Saskatoon. This gas-hungry province is now regarded as a good prospect for great gas reserves. In coming years, when Saskatchewan communities are provided with local Alberta gas, the wheat province may share in the supply of gas for export markets. Southwest Manitoba, with a couple of small oil discoveries to its credit, to date, is favourably regarded as a prospective important gas source in coming years.

Thus, while today Canada can count only upon Alberta as a major proved area of gas reserves, a long-term national gas policy must take into account the fact that a far broader region of the west has bright prospects. Briefly summarized, it covers most of Alberta, northeastern British Columbia, the south half of Saskatchewan, the southwest corner of Manitoba, plus part of the remote Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Major markets that can be described as being within economic reach, under certain conditions, of this western Canadian gas ocean centred on Alberta include: Alberta itself; the Vancouver region of British Columbia; the larger cities of Saskatchewan and Manitoba; the great population centres of southern Ontario and Quebec; the Seattle-Portland region of the United States; the Spokane-Hanford-Trail triangle of Washington and British Columbia; the industrial market in central Montana, and the Minneapolis-St. Paul region of the midwest United States.

The supplying of these markets would require not one but several pipe lines; backed by proved natural gas reserves more than double those of western Canada today. Meantime, in the United States, North Dakota and eastern Montana have recently emerged as potentially large gas reserve areas; and reserves are continuing to grow in the states of Texas, Oklahoma and Kansas, which are the source of a vast network of major gas pipe lines stretching from the Pacific to the Atlantic in the United States as far north as the Michigan-Ontario border. These American gas reserves could, and may, capture some of the markets now on the list of prospects for western Canada's gas.

As the container of over 90 per cent of western Canada's currently proved gas reserves, Alberta is today the major factor in determining how soon a national gas policy can advance from the planning to the execution stage.

Alberta's Social Credit government believes —as I do—that the best interests of the province will be served by exporting natural gas found in excess of Alberta's long-term requirements. In January, 1951, it passed incentive legislation to encourage the oil industry to speed up its exploration for gas. The results since have been spectacular.

Before tossing some big billion figures at you, let me briefly explain the relationship in heat value between gas and other fuels. Each cubic foot of natural gas has a heating value of about 1,000 B.T.U.'s. Artificial gas—with which many of you are familiar—has only about 500 B.T.U.'s per cubic foot. One ton of good grade coal is equal in heating value to about 20,000 cubic feet of natural gas. One barrel of fuel oil is roughly equal in heating value to 5,000 cubic feet of natural gas. Therefore when I refer to one billion cubic feet of natural gas that is the equivalent in heating value of 50,000 tons of good grade coal or 200,000 barrels of fuel oil.

According to Alberta's petroleum and natural gas conservation board the proved gas reserves as of last December 31 totalled 6,830 billion cubic feet, which is equal to 341 million tons of coal or 1,366 million barrels of fuel oil. That figure incidentally is 127 times Alberta's own gas consumption of last year.

During last year crude gas reserves increased more than 40 per cent, climbing by 2,100 billion cubic feet, equal to 105 million tons of coal or 420 million barrels of fuel oil. The year's increase in proved gas reserves was 39 times greater than Alberta's gas consumption for last year. New gas discoveries were made at a rate higher than one per week. The conservation board states in its recent report to the Alberta government that Alberta can now safely anticipate the development of further established gas reserves at an average rate of at least 1,000 billion cubic feet per year for almost the next eight to ten years.

Let me add that the board's estimate of reserves as at the beginning of 1952 does not include any estimate whatsoever for a substantial number of discoveries made in the final months of last year nor does it include any estimate for the discoveries made so far this year. The discovery rate is still better than one per week. The board's estimate of Alberta gas reserves now on hand and its estimate of reserves to be found in coming years can pretty safely be said to be conservative.

The government has ruled that a 30-year supply for Alberta is far enough ahead to permit reserves of gas for provincial use. The conservation board after very extended hearing of evidence from interested parties, including utility companies which are vitally concerned with a long-term guaranteed supply for their own Alberta needs, has come up with the 30-year need figure which has given full allowance for the expansion of Alberta's population and industry. That figure is 4,127 billion cubic feet, which is equal to 77 years' supply at Alberta's 1951 consumption rate of 53·6 billion cubic feet.

However, over the next thirty years the conservation board reckons that the actual average annual consumption will be 137 billion cubic feet or about 2½ times greater than last year's need. Apparently a good safety margin is provided to make doubly sure that Alberta will not run short.

About 5,000 billion cubic feet would support for twenty years two major gas export pipe lines from Alberta, such as the largest of the several pipe lines now projected westward and eastward from my home province. By last December 31 Alberta had 2,700 billion cubic feet of gas proved in excess of the board's estimate of the 30-year need. Add to that the Alberta reserves since proved and the beginning of reserves in northeastern British Columbia and Saskatchewan and it is safe to say that the west now has on tap some 70 per cent of the gas needed for two major export pipe lines. If the 1952 reserve growth equals 1951, the west will have proved gas for major export in both directions within a year. There is every reason to expect that reserves will continue to build up over the years to come, permitting further expansion of export facilities.

There are many shades of widely varying opinion in Alberta regarding gas export. Many oppose the export of gas, fearing that such export might leave Alberta short of gas for its own needs. The answer to that is simply that Alberta has only scratched the surface of its potential gas resources in the opinion of geological and engineering authorities. The best way to discover more is to provide explorers with incentives. An expanding list of gas fields shut in for lack of markets is the very opposite to incentives.

Some say that all the gas should be kept in Alberta in order to force industry to come to that province in search of low-cost fuel. The answer to that argument is simply that to the extent that industries locate because of fuel costs, Alberta will continue to attract them despite gas export. Gas in Alberta will cost just a fraction of what it will cost in cities to which we might export this resource.

Actually gas exports will bring Alberta a measure of industrial growth and enrichment dwarfing the nebulous benefits accruing from a "keep the gas in Alberta" policy. With export of its gas surplus, Alberta will still draw industries that need Canada's lowest cost fuel, and will in addition have the great industries of the petro-chemical field based upon the by-products of raw gas, plus a still further expanded petroleum industry. Not the least of the benefits would be the government's royalties and fees from gas and by-products on crown lands connected to export markets.

Bear in mind that a number of Alberta's larger gas fields, now shut in for lack of market, contain wet or sour gas, that is, gas laden with sulphur, propane, butane, natural gasoline and condensate. Notable among these are the huge Pincher Creek field in the southwest corner of the province, and the recent Olds and Okotoks discoveries near Calgary. The rich by-products exceed the residue gas in value and can provide the basis for large petro-chemical industries once markets for the residue dry gas are made available.

Let us look briefly at Pincher Creek. This field must be produced at a year-round, steady flow of between 150 and 200 million cubic feet daily in order to justify heavy investment in by-products plants and development, and to obtain the maximum benefits for Alberta and Canada. No residue gas market of that size can be obtained in Alberta for at least 15 years, and so the field must be fitted into an export plan.

When that is done, Pincher would provide residue gas totalling some 1,920 billion cubic feet, about 80 per cent of the needs for an economic major export pipe line. That gas, at well-head value of 11 cents per MCF, would bring in a gross $211 million. Before the dry gas could be transported by pipe line, its by-products would have to be extracted. These by-products at present well-head value would bring in $351 million or five-eighths of the total value of the field's content.

These by-products would include 7,400,000 long tons of sulphur, worth $163 million at $22 per ton; 38,400,000 barrels of condensate or light oil; 9,800,000 barrels of natural gasoline; 12,700,000 barrels of propane, and 10,400,000 barrels of butane.

Pincher's sulphur production under full-scale operation of the field would equal about one-half of all Canada's current consumption of this product, and could displace over 80 per cent of Canada's current sulphur imports.

Much of Pincher's sulphur would be used in chemical manufacturing for a variety of Canadian needs. The butane would form one of the bases for a large chemical industry. Like the refinery gases obtained from the cracking of crude oil, butane contains constituents from which rubber, nylon, alcohols, plastics and other petro-chemicals can be manufactured. The condensate, oil and natural gasoline, could in whole or in part be fed into the stream of crude products to western Canadian oil refineries, blending with other Alberta oils for production of a wide range of high quality refined products. Chemical manufacture from these products is also a good prospect.

The propane production of Pincher would be adequate to supply for twenty years over 66,000 farms with low cost convenient fuel for cooking, heating, refrigeration and tractor operation. Propane could also be used for chemical manufacture. It should be remembered that the great bulk of farm and rural homes in Alberta and other prairie provinces can never be economically served with natural gas because of the high capital cost of transport and distribution pipe lines. Their best bet for low cost fuel, equal in convenience to gas, is propane put up in pressure tanks for home use. That propane can come from Alberta's wet gas fields once the residue gas can be marketed.

The Pincher Creek field alone could bring to southern Alberta capital expenditure greatly exceeding $100 million, including drilling of additional wells, the construction of a gasoline plant and a sulphur plant, railway facilities, and the construction of up to three petro-chemical plants plus subsidiary plants to turn some of the chemicals into products of various types. Other idle Alberta wet gas fields, while individually not as large as Pincher Creek, could also bring industrial developments through their by-products once the residue dry gas can be marketed. Many of our fields of course are dry gas fields containing little or no usable by-products. Their raw gas is suitable as fuel for local or export markets, and of course has tremendous value for Alberta and Canada.

I mentioned earlier that Alberta's government favours gas export. So far its steps toward the allocation of gas for export have been taken with extreme caution and with reservations, but recent statements by Alberta mines minister, N. E. Tanner, would indicate that longer, less cautious steps are in the offing. My own stand as an Albertan is that my province should now recognize the realities of gas reserve growth, the benefits to Alberta and Canada from major export and the danger of losing markets through continuing delay, and should adopt a bold progressive policy on gas export, boldly executed.

The major opponent to a bold gas export plan, or even to a plan of limited export, is the Liberal party of Alberta. The Alberta Liberal leader, Mr. Harper Prowse, has placed his party solidly against any export of gas. He recently declared that export of gas would go down in history as "the great betrayal of the people of Alberta." Of that statement let me say that if a great betrayal of Alberta is being perpetrated it is being done by those in public life who play on prejudices and misinformation for petty political advantage, and who refuse to weigh the facts upon which their guidance of public opinion should properly be based. To me, gas fields are like all other resources of Alberta: grain, cattle, coal, oil and others. They can only bring benefits to Alberta and Canada if put to use. Our agricultural industry has grown to its present greatness because of our active and successful efforts to gain markets for our surplus beyond the borders of Alberta. Our oil industry is now reaching a state of greatness because of the successful drive for markets beyond the province. The same is true of all others among our present major industries. Why should we put gas in any different category?

Despite the Alberta Liberal party, I believe that the sound-thinking great majority of Albertans will support the broadened use of Alberta gas for the benefit of that province and Canada under the terms of the national gas policy I have outlined today. I believe also that Canadians generally will support this policy.

Let me now get down to the specifics of gas markets and pipe line plans. The Alberta government has recently authorized Westcoast Transmission Company to export gas from the Peace river area of northwest Alberta, and has in effect informed Canada that the first major gas pipe line should serve the Pacific coast market. This project is economically sound only if the United States coast markets, covering Seattle, Portland and other smaller communities, can be served in addition to the markets of Vancouver and smaller British Columbia mainland cities. In fact only about 20 per cent of the planned market is in British Columbia and around 80 per cent in the United States. Five years after completion of the line anticipated annual demand would be 56 billion cubic feet, about 12 billion in British Columbia and 44 billion in the United States. Expressed another way, Vancouver's only hope for gas is dependent upon Canada's willingness to allow the bulk of the pipe line throughput to go into the United States, and upon the willingness of the United States to accept Canadian gas in lieu of building a line in from their own Texas fields.

Westcoast's pipe line would draw gas from a territory covering several thousand square miles, including the Peace river region of both Alberta and British Columbia. A number of Peace river area towns will be able to get gas because of the construction of Westcoast's extensive gathering system connecting the numerous gas fields in that region. The region itself offers no major market for gas, and its gas would not be competitive in the markets of south and central Alberta, or in pipe line systems reaching eastward from that province. The opening of a gas market along the Pacific coast will very materially increase incentives for both gas and oil exploration in the whole Peace river region, with attendant benefits for British Columbia and Alberta.

The Progressive Conservative members of this house are fully in support of this plan to get gas to British Columbia and the United States Pacific coast. We recognize, however, that there are still major obstacles in the way before the plan can be carried out. The first of these is proof of availability of adequate gas reserves to support the pipe line. The Alberta government has granted an export permit to Westcoast for a term of twenty-two years, but that permit has only allocated gas in specified volume for the first five years. The volume is 42 billion cubic feet yearly, or a total of 210 billion cubic feet. The volume and term of years will not support the proposed $100 million pipe line project. Alberta should clearly state now that it will dedicate adequate present and future Peace river area gas reserves, in excess of local thirty-year needs, to the coast pipe line. British Columbia should also make clear that it will allow British Columbia gas to enter the United States. Such statements, coupled with engineering evidence of proof of adequate proved and probable reserves in both the Alberta and British Columbia sectors of Peace river, would justify the board of transport commissioners granting a permit for construction of the pipe line.

The next hurdle would be securing of a permit from the United States federal power commission for construction of an affiliated pipe line from the Canadian border to the United States markets. There will be opposition from sponsors of a proposed pipe line from Texas to the Pacific northwest. The main question will be whether the Portland-Seattle region will accept lower cost gas from Canadian sources, or higher priced gas from Texas which potentially could offer greater security of supply. That question is worth remembering when we consider gas supply for eastern Canada. When and if it gets the Canadian and United States permits, Westcoast's final steps would be securing of steel and finances for construction of the pipe line and the actual building of the line. The marriage of gas reserves to markets could be consummated in some two years, provided the present obstacles are eliminated without undue delay.

Let us now look eastward from Alberta, and consider how Alberta and Saskatchewan gas resources might best be matched with markets to ensure that the eastern prairie provinces, Ontario and Quebec, can gain the benefits of natural gas supply. The two major proposals are (1) Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, which would construct a 30-inch diameter line from Alberta, across southern Saskatchewan and Manitoba, thence across the north side of the great lakes, and down to the principal communities of Ontario and Quebec as far east as Montreal; and (2) Western Pipe Lines Limited, which would build a 24-inch line from southern Alberta as far east as Winnipeg, and thence south to the large market area centred on Minneapolis and St. Paul. The western project would require an exchange agreement whereby American gas would reach the Ontario and Quebec market.

The Trans-Canada project is the most ambitious yet conceived for Canada. It would involve around 750 miles of gas gathering lines connecting some 34 fields in south and central Alberta, plus about 2,250 miles of main line transport system, and 270 miles of lateral lines connecting the system to some 71 cities and towns in four Canadian provinces. Construction cost would exceed $250,000,000. Initially the system could handle an average of 346,000,000 cubic feet of gas daily, but could be increased to 515,000,000 cubic feet daily at fairly small additional cost. Initially it would serve a Canadian population of 3,600,000, about one-quarter of the nation's total, located adjacent to the pipe line route between Alberta and Montreal. If gas supplies and economics warrant, it could later on extend services to more than a million additional Canadians in southern Ontario, and along the St. Lawrence east of Montreal as far as Quebec. Market studies by the backers of the project indicate that first year sales of gas might be around 86 million cubic feet, building up to 115 billion by the fifth year. Within 15 years, if gas is available, the Trans-Canada line could be putting through over 200 billion cubic feet annually.

Boundary Pipeline Corporation

Western Pipe Lines Limited would build a line having, by its fifth year, an indicated market of some 70 billion cubic feet yearly, and increasing thereafter. Of that total about 15½ billion—or 22 per cent—would service southern Saskatchewan and Manitoba cities as far east as Winnipeg. The other 55 billion cubic feet, or some 78 per cent of the total, would be delivered at the American border south of Winnipeg to Northern Natural Gas Company, for use in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area. A contract has already been signed between Western and Northern for a year-round steady supply of about 150,000,000 cubic feet daily, this being subject of course to Western getting the right to construct a pipe line from Alberta. Northern is a United States firm already operating large scale gas transport and distributing pipe lines from the mid-continent United States as far north as Minneapolis. Western's plan is economically sound only if it gets the large United States outlet in addition to the market of the Canadian prairies, according to sponsors of the company.

There is a third proposal for a pipe line eastward from Alberta—that of Boundary Pipeline Corporation, whose bill for incorporation is now before this house. Its sponsors propose a 16-inch diameter pipe line from southeastern Alberta to Winnipeg, a much smaller scale project than either Trans-Canada or Western. I am opposed to the bill on several grounds. The Boundary pipe line project is condemned by its limited size, the very fact which its sponsors have presented as its virtue. Even if a small size pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg were an economic project—which I question—the proposition falls far short of meeting Canada's best interest because:

First, it would open up only a limited market for the rapidly growing gas reserves of the west. It would not, for example, open a market of sufficient volume to allow the Pincher Creek field and its by-product industries to develop on an economic basis. Small scale export eastward would not meet the increasingly urgent market need for Pincher and the host of other south and central Alberta gas fields.

Secondly, the Boundary project would penalize consumers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. A small scale line would have to sell gas at substantially higher prices than would a major project.

Thirdly, acceptance of the Boundary project could delay, perhaps for years, the securing of gas in large volume for Ontario and Quebec, either by direct pipe line from the west, or by gas exchange with the United States.

[Mr. Nickle.]

I question whether a line built to serve the cities and towns of southern Saskatchewan and Manitoba would be economic. In other words, I doubt whether it could serve a large enough market, or deliver gas at a low enough price to compete with other fuels, to obtain adequate revenue to recover its cost.

Eliminating Boundary, we would have two projects to choose between, both of large size that would open major markets for Alberta gas, and would deliver gas to southern Saskatchewan and Manitoba at lower cost than would a limited project like that proposed by Boundary. Which would best guarantee gas supplies to Ontario and Quebec, and bring the broadest benefit to Canada? The answer is not quite as simple as it might appear at first glance.

The all-Canadian route proposed by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines offers as its advantages: a major construction project all within the country; the only economic means of delivering gas to Canada's lakehead cities, and the potential mining and pulp and paper markets north of the great lakes; and possibly greater security of gas supply for the mass markets of southern Ontario and Quebec. The disadvantage of the Trans-Canada project is that the cost of gas to consumers in southern Ontario and Quebec would be somewhat higher than cost of gas that might reach these markets from the United States. These higher costs would stem from the comparatively limited markets en route to eastern Canada, the long distance, and the nature of terrain and climate that would make construction and operating costs higher than for a line from the mid-continent United States.

That brings us to the question: Can a supply of gas be obtained from the United States? Unless a long-term firm gas exchange can be worked out, it would be better for eastern Canada to have a guaranteed supply of gas from Alberta at higher cost than to have lower priced gas from the United States but no guarantee of continued supply.

Much has been said about gas exchange in recent years, and is continuing to be said, in the United States and Canada by sponsors of pipe lines and distributors of gas. I do not recall, however, any statements on this matter made by the governments of the two countries. There is a pressing need for a decision on this at government level, because within a comparatively short time Canada will likely have to choose between a Winnipeg-Minneapolis and an all-Canada pipe line eastward from Alberta. There are also the facts that: (1) Alberta and Canada have already authorized, and have started, export of 10 billion cubic feet of gas yearly to defence industries in Montana; (2) southern Ontario gas distributors are again seeking even short-term supplies of United States gas for their increasingly urgent needs; (3) in order to give Vancouver gas, Canada is seeking the right to export large volumes of gas to the United States Pacific northwest; and (4) the United States apparently desires Alberta gas for its atomic energy installations in Washington and Idaho.

In the light of these several facts, and in order that a sound national gas policy might be evolved, I suggest to the government that it immediately initiate negotiations with the government of the United States to determine whether or not a large-scale, long-term firm agreement is feasible for exchange of natural gas.

May I further suggest that, in order to facilitate the execution of a sound national gas policy, the government should immediately instruct Dr. George S. Hume and Alexis Ignatieff, geological survey of Canada authorities on our natural gas, to make a detailed re-survey of gas reserves, proved, probable and possible. Such a survey could probably be completed in three to four months. It would supplement the excellent, detailed reports on Alberta gas reserves, as of last December 31, prepared by the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board. The Hume-Ignatieff re-survey should cover, in addition to Alberta, the known and potential gas resources of northeast British Columbia, the Yukon and Northwest Territories, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Such a survey should be supplemented from time to time by revisions based on new gas discoveries, and further evaluation of fields already discovered. Such information would be of tremendous value in shaping the specific detail and carrying out of a national gas policy.

Mr. Herridge: Once again, Mr. Chairman, we find this house giving consideration to a bill which would provide a charter for another company that wishes to build a pipe line in Canada. Before proceeding I must say that I was greatly interested in noting with what intent interest the members on the government side of the house listened to the hon. member for Calgary West when he was speaking just before I rose. At this point I might say that I think the committee is most fortunate to have a member who is as well informed as is the hon. member for Calgary West on the technical aspects of natural gas transportation and marketing.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, is entitled "An act to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation". Why are we getting this succession of bills to incorporate pipe line companies during the last two or three years? Why such interest in the transportation of Canadian natural gas? Why, on occasion, repeatedly in the committee and sometimes in the house, is there a suggestion that there is great haste to get the bills passed and to let the companies get the charters? I just want to read briefly from a report that I have here in my hand. I might say that one of the major witnesses for this company, when asked what the purpose of the company was, said that they were anxious to give service to the people of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I do not question the fact that if the pipe line were built they would give service in this respect to these people. But that is not their prime motive. Their prime motive is to be found in the fact that it is a profitable investment to get a charter to build a pipe line in Canada. I am not questioning the motive; it is a legitimate one as things are today. We must, however, realize that this American capital is being attracted to Canada because there are opportunities to make good profits—and guaranteed profits—in a public utility of this type.

I have in my hand the 27th annual report to the shareholders, 1951, of the International Utilities Corporation. I will just read two or three short paragraphs to indicate what valuable things these charters are and for which provision is made when the House of Commons passes a bill that gives a company the right to build a pipe line. Reading from page 3 of the report I find the following:

> The past year was marked by many developments favourable to the long range outlook for our corporation and its subsidiaries in Alberta, Canada . . . The business of the subsidiaries for the year 1951 was again at record levels. Gross operating revenues increased nearly 16 per cent, $14,221,000. Despite substantially higher income taxes—

I presume the Minister of Finance hears that.

> —increased allowances for depreciation and higher operating costs, consolidated net income reached $1,700,000, an increase of $210,000 over 1950. In addition, net profit on the sale of investment securities amounted to $263,000.

Then again:

> Consolidated net income was equal to $2.07 per share, exclusive of investment profits, and $2.39 per share, including investment profits, based on the average number of shares outstanding. This compares with $1.90 per share reported in 1950. Computed on the shares outstanding at the year-end, consolidated net income was equal to $1.80 per share excluding investment profits, and $2.08 per share including such profits.

We in this group, Mr. Chairman, have continually advocated and suggested that these private carriers of oil and gas should be publicly owned. We believe that the main transmission lines used for the transporting of oil and natural gas in this country should be nationally owned, and that those nationally owned lines would sell the gas to the various companies concerned—and the same with oil —or would charge a fee for the transmission of gas or oil for the various companies using this service. If we had social ownership of the means of transportation through pipe lines of oil and natural gas in Canada today, I believe we would not have this unplanned competition for charters. We would not have applications being made for charters over the same route, or this duplication of charters, or this possibility to secure charters through the House of Commons and to sell them without building a foot of pipe line because of the right vested in the charter. In our opinion—that is, in the opinion of this group—if we had socially-owned pipe lines for the transmission of oil and gas in Canada we could plan the distribution of Canadian oil and Canadian gas in a proper and efficient manner, at possibly a lower cost to the consumer, without the duplication and the competition and, shall I say, the lack of planning that exists at the present time when company after company makes application for a charter over the same route, and sometimes conflicting with the legitimate interests of another company and so on.

I see that it is now nine o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I should like to move that progress be reported.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will now resume the business which was under consideration at six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, in an earlier speech in this debate I dealt with several features of the budget itself. Tonight I want to discuss housing. That is a phase of our economy for which the budget makes no provisions commensurate with the need existing today. The housing problem is today, as it has been for several years, our No. 1 domestic problem. With the single exception of national defence, there is no subject before this house that is of more vital importance to greater numbers of people than is that of housing. The need is growing greater year by year. There are more than twice as many Canadians today without homes as there were in 1939. In that year the shortage was estimated at 225,000. Today the shortage of houses is officially estimated at anywhere from 500,000 to 700,000. Only a few days ago the mayor of Windsor reported that more than 4,000 families in that city were not properly housed. At the same time we heard the mayor of Ottawa claiming that 4,000 families in this city were living in shelters that were below provincial housing standards. The Winnipeg city council special housing committee is reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 12 as saying that in that city today there is a permanent population of inadequately housed people. Since 1946 that city's housing committee has received 8,634 new applicants. The reapplications over these years total well over 20,000, indicating that there are in that city many thousands who have been without homes for the last five or six years. A considerable number of applicants, the report states, are living in one-room slum dwellings with three or more children. Seven families, the report states, at the No. 3 wireless project are living in four rooms with seven or more children.

I had the occasion some months ago to visit the city of Brantford, the city that is represented by our highly esteemed Speaker in this house. That city is very prosperous, and in many respects a very beautiful industrial city. It is surrounded by some of the finest countryside we have in the province of Ontario. Yet here, out on the dilapidated airport just outside the city, hundreds of citizens with their families were crowded into what had once been barracks and other buildings used by the air force, crowded into small apartments with nothing but beaverboard partitions between them. The partitions were so thin that every sound that was made in one apartment could be heard through the walls in the other. There was no privacy. There were no playing fields for the children. When the soldiers occupied these buildings during world war II there was a well-kept playing field. There was a recreation centre; there was a swimming pool. When Brantford is obliged to use that as emergency shelter for the citizens there are no playing fields for the children. I saw puddles of water knee-deep out in front of some of the shelters. There was not a blade of grass to be seen anywhere there in midsummer. There was no swimming pool. The children were playing around the cement remains of what had once been a swimming pool for the air force. The conditions in Brantford could be duplicated in most of our larger cities and suburbs.

Anyone who has driven along No. 2 highway west of Toronto, through Mimico, through Long Branch, and has seen the trailer camps and has seen the emergency shelters out at Long Branch, will know that the conditions in Brantford, in Winnipeg and in Ottawa are duplicated in Toronto and elsewhere. Mr. McClaskey, regional supervisor for Ontario of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, told the Ontario association of real estate boards at Niagara Falls on February 19 that in his personal opinion Ontario alone needed today 450,000 housing units. Premier Frost stated in the Ontario legislature that for a number of years the province of Ontario will need 40,000 to 50,000 new homes each year if we are to begin to catch up with the demand for family accommodation. Mr. Earle Sheppard, president of the Ontario association of architects, stated to the council of that association, as reported in the Daily Commercial News for February 18, that the failure of house building to keep pace with industrial growth in Ontario was prejudicing the future of defence production. The value of contracts, awarded for factory construction, showed an increase last year over 1950 of 250 per cent, while the value of home building contracts showed a decline of 7 per cent.

He went on to say, according to the report:

> It was absurd to concentrate on industrial construction and neglect the provision of housing for workers. Mr. Sheppard asked how can we get volume production of defence and other essential items if there are no places or only inadequate places for people to live? Every month hundreds of families move to or are formed in our great industrial centres. The time wasted in searching for accommodation and the worry caused by living in cramped unhealthy quarters result in reduced productivity. The housing shortage has plagued us ever since the end of the war, he said, and there is no sign of a concerted effort to solve it.

The Canadian Builder for March, 1952, has this to say in an editorial:

> Never has Canada's need for new housing units been so pressing as in 1951. There were about 150,000 marriages during 1951. Immigration stood at the highest point since before world war I, probably including 35,000 family units among the 170,000 newcomers. Natural increase of births over deaths was about 250,000.
> This would seem to indicate that we could have done with at least 150,000 new family dwelling units last year. However, actual completions, according to dominion bureau of statistics figures were only in the nature of 80,000; starts were about 70,000; while total under construction at December 31 stood at around 50,000.

We have no right, Mr. Speaker, when we are today spending $2 billion to protect our way of life, to force tens of thousands of children, who will be our future citizens and probably soldiers in a future war or wars, to live in such ramshackle slums as they are living in today. I wish some of the cities and boards of trade who invite members of parliament to visit their cities and large industrial concerns would take some of the cabinet ministers and some members of parliament through the emergency shelters in those cities and suburbs. I wish the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) could be taken on some of those trips. I am sure that the minister, full as he is of the milk of human kindness, once he became aware of the situation, would never sit idly by and see that situation grow worse from year to year. He must know that a few millions spent now on good housing would save his department many millions by way of medical bills and hospital bills in years to come.

Mr. Sheppard said, in his report, that there is no concerted effort being made today to solve our housing problem. For six years since the war, now nearly seven years, governments at three levels in this country have all been playing a pass-the-buck game with our housing problem. They are still unable to reach any sort of agreement on the division of costs for building within the municipalities.

Housing has now become a national problem, a problem of grave national concern to provincial and municipal governments as well as to the federal government. One reason why there has been no concerted effort is that this Liberal government just cannot make up its mind where it is going, so far as housing is concerned. It cannot make up its mind whether it is getting into the housing business, or getting out of it.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) does not want the government to go into the landlord business, nor does he want it to go into the business of building subsidized low-rental housing. The explanation the Prime Minister gave the Trades and Labour Congress a few weeks ago was a unique one, one that is rather difficult to understand. According to press reports, the reason he gave is that there could not be enough of this type of housing to go round, and he said he did not like to see a system whereby any government or any political machine would have the selection of those who were to get houses.

It is rather difficult to follow the Prime Minister, or to understand what he means. Does he fear that eventually his successor to the leadership of the Liberal party will not be able to control political patronage within the party as well as he controls it at the present time? Or does he foresee a day when possibly some other party may come into power, and will be subjected to the lures of political patronage, more than is the Liberal government? What I suspect was his meaning is that today political patronage has become such an integral part of Liberal practice that the Prime Minister just cannot visualize a government housing authority that would select applicants for low-rental housing on any basis other than that of political patronage.

Even if we accept the Prime Minister's implied confession as genuine and realistic, and not an excuse for the government to keep out of subsidized low-rental housing, I would point out that the selection of tenants on the basis of political patronage could not be much worse than the system prevailing across this country today in connection with the allotting of government contracts and the appointment of government employees in connection with anything that comes under the authority of the government.

Under such a system, even with Liberal political patronage applied to the selection of houses, at least Liberals would get those houses. Probably they would get the new ones, and there would be some old ones left for the Conservatives and the C.C.F.'ers. Even that would be an improvement upon the present system.

Incidentally the Prime Minister is in excellent Liberal company when he takes this position regarding subsidized houses. In the latter part of March the Toronto metropolitan house builders association sent out what the press called a "ringing challenge" to all the speculating and contracting house builders in the greater Toronto area to get together and "to do something quick" to forestall the passage of proposed provincial legislation which would enlarge present assistance to subsidized rental housing. The national home builders association, according to the press statement, sent out a similar call to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, to the Canadian Manufacturers Association, to the Canadian Association of Real Estate Boards and to the Ontario Property Owners Association to oppose provincial legislation that could promote subsidized rental housing.

These are the people who agree with the Prime Minister when he says we do not want low-rental subsidized housing. Those of us who support subsidized low-rental housing also have some fairly respectable friends. Our friends may not be as affluent as those who support the Prime Minister, but nevertheless they are good and substantial citizens. For example we have the president of the government housing authority, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Mansur, in his address to the Winnipeg convention of the national home builders association, is reported in the daily press to have said that there is a definite need for public rental housing in Canada. Then, the labour congresses in Canada have supported public rental housing for years—and I include the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour. In the briefs they presented to the government on March 26 and 27 both these organizations advocated subsidized low-rental housing as at least a partial answer to our housing problem.

A conference was called in Toronto early in March by the Ontario command (housing committee) of the Canadian Legion. It was comprised of representatives of welfare agencies, churches, labour and the construction industry. That conference passed a resolution proposing that the federal government pay subsidies to promote house building. Rev. W. W. Judd, general secretary of the council of social services for the Church of England, said at that conference:

> The time has come when a further degree of subsidization is necessary. Housing is a social problem, not an individual one, it is the responsibility of the whole community.

In 1947 the Canadian Council of Churches took up the question of housing. This council is composed of all the Protestant churches in Canada and the following resolution was passed at that time:

> The Canadian Council of Churches, believing that bad housing conditions are detrimental to healthy personal, moral and social life, and that public assistance is necessary to finance the building of homes for families with low incomes, urges the federal government to institute a national low rental housing program which will provide decent housing for low income families at rents they can afford to pay.

That was in 1947. At their annual meeting in Montreal in November, 1951, they passed the following resolution:

> In the name of Christ, and for the sake of the health and morale of our people, we urge upon all levels of Canadian government, federal, provincial and municipal, the necessity and urgency of providing decent housing for people earning moderate or low wages and salaries, through an effective public housing program which will produce low cost and low rental dwelling units.

What is clear is that real estate boards and associations of speculative builders all support the position taken by the Prime Minister regarding subsidized housing. Trade unions, the Canadian Legion, the Canadian Council of Churches and responsible municipal and other officials concerned with housing do not support the government's reluctance to provide low rental housing. On one occasion the Prime Minister is reported to have said that he did not want the government to become a landlord for a great number of citizens. The real estate boards and associations of speculative builders, along with the Prime Minister I presume, think that such a course would be socialism. I submit that whether that be socialism or not, this government is already in the landlord business of necessity and against the wishes of the Prime Minister.

In 1951 the federal government was renting, mostly to second world war veterans, close to 25,000 houses. In that year they collected rentals amounting to $13,200,000. The government has found the rental business fairly prosperous. Of that 25,000 houses there were only 21 rental accounts more than three months in arrears and the total arrears amounted to only $413.

The reluctance of the Prime Minister and the government to go into the landlord business in compliance with the wishes of the real estate boards has had the effect of reducing the number of houses it has for rent. Last year, even with the 25,000 houses it has for rent, there were 14,000 fewer houses than in 1951. The government's policy of selling wartime houses which has been going on for a number of years, while not reducing the actual number of houses available, has made it increasingly difficult for many veterans who formerly occupied these houses to find accommodation.

I said that there has been no concerted action on the part of governments at the different levels, on the one hand, and on the part of the lending institutions, on the other. This is chiefly because the government does not know where it is going in the matter of housing. The government is torn between its allegiance to real estate boards, speculative builders, lending institutions, private enterprise and those who want to continue to build for the upper third income group, on the one hand, and the hundreds of thousands of those in the lower income brackets who six years after the war are still without housing.

The present situation constitutes a national emergency which is getting worse. Fewer houses were built in 1951 than in 1950. There is every indication that without some drastic change in government policy there will be fewer houses built in 1952 than there were in 1951. New housing starts to date are only 55 per cent of the 1950-51 level. The carry-over on January 1, 1952, was only 46,000 as compared with 60,000 on January 1, 1951. The houses that are being built are being built for sale and for those in the upper third income group only.

Mr. Hignett, the regional supervisor of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, is reported in the Winnipeg Tribune of April 12 as saying that $3,300 is the minimum annual income required to maintain the payments on the lowest price houses being built in Canadian cities today, that is, four-roomed bungalows costing $8,500 with a monthly carrying charge of $63.50. He points out that only those in the upper third income group today can afford to buy such houses. Today Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is serving only the upper third income group.

The condition is daily becoming worse. Building costs have increased 125 per cent since 1939, and during the same period wages increased 93 per cent. That is not all. Dr. Firestone of the Department of Trade and Commerce forecasts that building costs will advance another 20 per cent by 1955. This means that an increase of $10 in the monthly carrying charges will shut out of the home buying market all those with annual incomes below $3,500. It will shut off from assistance from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation those with incomes less than that amount. Any change which will reduce the monthly carrying charge by $10 will, on the other hand, bring many thousands back into the home purchasing field.

It is sometimes argued that the building of houses for those in the higher income groups provides vacant older houses which those in the lower income groups can move into. Apart altogether from the social stigma that would result from forcing those in the lower income groups into old houses, and even old houses would be better than none, there are a number of other factors. Old houses, like new houses, have greatly increased in price. Down payments on these houses are usually large and interest rates are usually high. There is no assistance provided by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the purchase of old houses. All these factors add up to a very grave situation for the houseless low wage earner.

I have said that housing is a social problem. If the hundreds of thousands living in cellars and garrets, in slums, trailers, emergency shelters and emergency makeshifts for houses are to be properly housed, we must adopt public policies that are not normally associated with an economically operated business activity. In other words, houses must be built and sold or rented at prices that bear some relation to the occupant's income regardless of whether or not that price will bring dividends in dollars and cents on the capital invested. There are values that accrue to a society of happy and contentedly housed people that can never be measured in dollars and cents. For one thing, a happy and contentedly housed people are one of our greatest offensive weapons against communism. I want to quote again what the Canadian Council of Churches has to say on this subject. On page 2 of their report there is the following:

> Experience proves that emotional strains imposed on the crowded family group, major and minor delinquent behaviour among children when they stay away from home because of its discomforts, undermining of health through unsanitary housing conditions, and marriages delayed or dangerously strained by doubling up as a result of the housing shortage, all these produce conditions which are harmful to healthy personal and social life. The churches are convinced that the present housing shortage in Canada is one of the greatest single factors in contributing to shattered homes and families, and that the toll of broken homes and separated families will continue to mount unless immediate steps are taken to solve the low wage earner's housing problem.

Judge Allan Fraser of the Ottawa juvenile court claims that the housing shortage is "the greatest single factor" contributing to the breakdown in Canadian family life. In an address before the Ottawa Optimist Club, Judge Fraser said that he knew personally of housing conditions in the capital that were not fit for animals. "There are families of nine and ten trying to live in two rooms, with the father and mother sleeping on the floor," he said.

In Hamilton, Mayor Lloyd D. Jackson recently declared that "the story of housing in this city is absolutely heartbreaking. I can hardly begin to describe it." Miss E. Duffy, of the Hamilton Children's Aid Society, said that parents in increasng numbers were being forced to board their children out, and even part with them entirely because of their inability to get decent homes for them. "It is most important for the future of the children of Hamilton," she said, "that some remedy to the situation be found at once. Present conditions are contributing to child neglect, and our efforts to help parents improve their way of life are practically nullified by the seriousness of this housing emergency."

Just think for a moment of a country that can put $2 billion a year into the defence of our way of life, yet leave tens of thousands of children to be brought up in a way of life that is not becoming to a civilized democratic country! You may ask: What is the answer? There is no simple answer to that problem, as the minister in charge of this department well knows. I submit that first of all as a country, as a people and as a government we should recognize that housing is a social problem and that adequate housing will contribute values to society that cannot be measured in terms of interest or dividends on the money invested. I suggest in the second place that the minister and the cabinet should make up their collective mind as to where they are going in the matter of housing, whether the government is getting into or out of the housing business. If it is getting into the housing business, then subsidized low rental housing must be provided. I do not think that the Prime Minister's political patronage argument against it is a good reason for the government's refusal. More effective co-operation between governments at various levels is necessary to make section 35 of the National Housing Act operative.

If the government is going out of the housing business, if it is going to leave it to private enterprise to solve the problem, then the government must take such measures as will induce private enterprise to provide society with an adequate building program. There are two difficulties that appear to have stood in the way of housing during the past year. The first one was the cost to the municipalities of providing serviced land and servicing the communities in which houses would be built. The second was lack of mortgage finance. When you consider that a housing program such as we carried out in 1949 and 1950, when we built about 90,000 houses, requires at least 25,000 acres of serviced land, you can realize the burden that is thrown upon the municipalities. Municipalities are loath to take advantage of the facilities of section 35 of the National Housing Act for the purchase and servicing of land for low rental housing.

The mayor of Windsor is reported to have said in the Ontario legislature that the present land assembly plan, under which the federal, provincial and municipal governments share the cost of acquiring and servicing land for building, is only scratching the surface and not meeting the real problem. Since every 500 new houses require a new school, municipalities are faced with additional costs for education. Numerous resolutions by organizations interested in housing have called for the federal and provincial governments to bear the full cost of education and social or welfare services within the municipalities. If it were possible for the federal government to provide relief by way of federal aid to education part of that difficulty would be removed. If the government were willing to get together with the provincial ministers of education to ascertain if some formula could not be worked out whereby this government may assure the provinces a part of the cost of education, the municipalities would then be able to devote more of their revenues to housing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has now expired.

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, the budget address was clearly and ably presented by its author the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). It was vigorously criticized by the financial experts of the opposition, but they should not be reproached or feel too depressed if their criticisms made little impression upon this house or upon the public at large. Much time, I think perhaps too much time, has been spent in this discussion so I shall be brief.

The best indication of the soundness of a budget is the reaction of the taxpayers. Our taxpayers are a fairly intelligent lot. They realize that taxes form the great source of revenue for a government, and that if we are going to spend $2 billion on national defence, a billion and a half on health and security and still find enough money to run the country, someone must pay taxes. They did not expect substantial tax reductions at this time. True, certain industries were suffering. They made representations to Ottawa during the year, and they obtained relief. When I was home at Easter I received calls from many people expressing appreciation for what had been done. In fact, I only received one letter of complaint from an individual in the civil service stating that he thought civil servants were the forgotten people, and asking me for an appointment to discuss their case when I next returned to Regina.

No one denies that taxes are high, but everyone realizes we are better able to pay taxes now than at any other time in our history. People believe also in the pay-as-you-go system. Never have people been better paid, better fed, better clothed and, may I say, better governed than they are in Canada today under this Liberal government. I was surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He and his associates generally claim to be the friend of the little man. But let them not forget there are some little men in business, and the little men in business needed this tax relief to protect their businesses and save them from bankruptcy. Let me suggest to him and his associates that they should ascertain the facts before they pass judgment.

I should like to discuss a matter of great importance. Almost a year ago a royal commission was appointed to study the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project. It consisted of Dr. T. G. Hogg of Toronto, chairman; Mr. G. A. Gaherty, Calgary; and Dr. John A. Widtsoe, Salt Lake City, Utah; and Mr. B. T. Richardson, Ottawa, secretary. Here is the order in council under which they were appointed, and here are the terms of reference. The commission was to conduct an inquiry into the following matters, namely, whether the economic and social returns to Canada and to the Canadian people on the investment in the proposed South Saskatchewan river project would be commensurate with the cost thereof, and whether the said project represents the most profitable and desirable use which could be made of the physical resources involved. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the inquiry is on the South Saskatchewan river project and the possibility of building a safe dam in a proper location and the economic soundness of the proposed irrigation and power project.

There is a sixth paragraph in the order, by whom it was suggested I do not know, but it tends to make this direction ambiguous and leave it entirely to the commission to determine its terms of reference. This project has been studied and reported upon for fifteen years. Under the direction of the Department of Agriculture, men of the staff of the P.F.R.A. have studied and prepared reports on every phase of this project. I should like to put some of their names on the record. They are: Dr. L. B. Thomson, director, P.F.R.A.; Dr. C. C. Spence, senior economist, dominion Department of Agriculture, Edmonton; Mr. G. L. MacKenzie, chief engineer, P.F.R.A.; Mr. G. M. Munro, assistant chief engineer, P.F.R.A.; Mr. A. E. Palmer, superintendent, dominion experimental station, Lethbridge; Mr. G. W. Parkinson, chief of design section, P.F.R.A.; Mr. J. G. Watson, construction engineer, P.F.R.A.; Mr. R. Peterson, soils mechanic and materials engineer, P.F.R.A.; and Dr. J. D. A. Mollard, engineering geologist, P.F.R.A.

In addition, they had as consultants such eminent engineers as Major General H. B. Ferguson, Washington, D.C.; Dr. A. Casagrande, Harvard university, Cambridge, Massachusetts; Mr. L. F. Harza, construction engineer, Harza Engineering Company, Chicago; Dr. J. A. Widtsoe, irrigation and soils expert, Salt Lake City, Utah. They had two eminent contracting engineers—D. S. MacDonald and W. B. Ramsay—as consultants. Mr. Speaker, on my desk are reports upon the work done and recommendations made by these men. These reports are all available to the commission.

The commission met in Washington a few weeks ago where all these men and many others were available for consultation. They were in western Canada last year and they are there now consulting the governments of the three prairie provinces. Why they should waste time consulting governments whose views are already well known is beyond me. It is well known that a royal commission should deliberate very carefully before bringing down a report, but in this case all the evidence has been accumulated and presented to them so the process of arriving at a conclusion should not be a lengthy one. I would earnestly ask the government, therefore, to modify the terms of reference if necessary to see that a report on this project is made in the very near future. When this report is made, if it be the desire of the government that the commission report on other things I shall have no objection to their sitting longer.

After the remarks made by the Prime Minister today I was inclined to eliminate this portion of my address, but later in the day I saw a statement made by Mr. Richardson, the secretary of the royal commission, as it appeared in the Regina Leader of April 26. The article states:

> He said public hearings in Saskatchewan were being planned for the "near future."
> The Saskatchewan hearings will be held after the commission has examined the mass of engineering and technical data it has assembled.
> It is expected the commission will make its report this year.

Well, gentlemen, I think we should not delay much longer in getting a report. Mr. Speaker, at a time when we are spending four and a half billion dollars per year we cannot hesitate for a moment to develop our natural resources wherever we may find them. It is only through the aggressive development of these natural resources that we can ever hope to meet our ever-increasing expenditures.

Since I have been in this house I have been watching—I am glad to see the member for Rosetown-Biggar and I hope he will come in and sit down along with the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). I am glad to see them here because I wish to discuss the C.C.F. tonight. In Ottawa, the C.C.F. appear mostly as a group of benign individuals exuding honesty and benevolence. In Saskatchewan, where they form the government, they appear in their real character, and may I say a not very attractive character. During the Easter recess I spent a few days in Vancouver, British Columbia. The C.C.F. of British Columbia were in convention, and announced their platform for the forthcoming election. Under the leadership of Mr. Winch and son, they decided to go "full out" for nationalization.

Mr. Noseworthy: No provincial election speeches.

Mr. Gibson: Giving away other people's money.

Mr. McCusker: Hydroelectric, mining, lumber, pulp and paper, fishing—all industries were to be nationalized. Hospitalization, although very expensive in British Columbia today, was to be given at a much reduced rate and medical care was to be entirely free. One must give them credit for boldly telling of their intentions. Their intentions are similar to those of the C.C.F. in Saskatchewan when they first came into power. In fact, Mr. Fines, the financial expert of the C.C.F., was in British Columbia at that time. Was he there in an advisory capacity or was his visit purely a coincidence?

When the C.C.F. came into power under Hon. Mr. Douglas in Saskatchewan, they proceeded with their program of nationalization. What has been the result?

Mr. Noseworthy: Good government.

Mr. McCusker: Failure.

An hon. Member: The people must like it.

Mr. McCusker: Transportation is a monopoly and should have been a profitable one. Their capital was given to them by the government. They had no interest charges to pay. Yet they have made no money.

Mr. Thatcher: Certainly they made money.

An hon. Member: Let him make his speech.

Mr. McCusker: I have not seen this year's statement but last year the only part of that system which made money was the lunch counter in the bus station in Regina.

Mr. Thatcher: The company had an over-all profit.

Mr. McCusker: Then as to the box factory in Prince Albert, Mr. Mitchell, the owner had trouble with his men. They struck. The government told him that unless he settled immediately they would expropriate the property. He said: Do that. They did. What resulted? It is failure.

Mr. Thatcher: It was not failure.

Mr. McCusker: The fish filleting plant has practically ruined the fishing industry in northern Saskatchewan. As to the lumber business I will not repeat what the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison) said. He covered that situation some time ago and explained what a mess they have made of it.

Mr. Thatcher: It is doing very well.

Mr. McCusker: As to the sodium sulphate plant, they sank $1 million into that.

Mr. Thatcher: What is the production of that plant?

Mr. McCusker: They had to close it down last fall and call upon their competitors, whom they had tried to put out of business by making them pay high royalties, for assistance in filling their contracts. Then what about the woollen mill in Moose Jaw? The hon. member ought to know about that.

Mr. Thatcher: It employed 125 people.

Mr. McCusker: Financially it is a failure. The tannery was a failure and was closed down. As to the shoe factory, this was a good investment. They brought in an expert to run it and after they closed it down I asked him why. He said: I will tell you. It should have prospered. It is a good little plant. I am experienced in that business but they gave me so many superintendents and sales managers that they ran the business into the ground. They advertised it for sale. The advertisement read: "A first-class opportunity for an experienced person." They sold it.

Then comes the insurance company. They initiated a cheap packet coverage for cars—one the line companies had difficulty to compete with. They lost heavily in that venture.

Mr. Thatcher: The lowest insurance rates in Canada.

Mr. McCusker: Yes, but the company is practically broke as a result.

Mr. Thatcher: It is not.

Mr. McCusker: I must not forget the brickyard because I have been named in Saskatchewan as being involved in that.

Mr. Rowe: Have you some shares in it?

Mr. McCusker: I happened to be president of International Clay Products. When I was overseas they told my solicitor that we would sell the plant to them or they would expropriate it. My solicitors went ahead with the other officers of the company and effected the sale to them at a very reasonable price. Since that time they have put half a million dollars into it. Last year, a little over a year ago, I went west. I was driving west alone and I met Mr. Sykes of the Journal. He said: I have a two weeks holiday. I asked: How would you like to accompany me out west? He said: Fine. As we drove out through Estevan we stopped to see this old brick plant. I hardly knew it. It was modernized. Half a million dollars should modernize a plant. I said: How many bricks are you making a day now? The answer was: 56,000. In the old days, with the old obsolescent machinery we used to turn out approximately 100,000. I said: How many men do you employ? The answer was: 96. We employed 80. I said: How is it that with 96 men, and all this modern machinery, you are making about half the bricks we used to turn out in a day? He said: It takes a lot of men to run those labour-saving devices.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCusker: There are two public utilities listed here which were established in the old days by a Liberal government.

Mr. Thatcher: They were always losing money in those days.

Mr. McCusker: They are the telephone and power corporation. They were alone and set aside and managed separately from the other crown corporations until the picture painted of the crown corporations was so bad that they decided to link them up. Now when you say: How are the crown corporations doing, they say: "Fine"; and that is what I wanted to tell you about. They are being financed with profits made from the telephone and the power company, profits that should be used to extend power lines and to extend the facilities of the telephone company.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McCusker: You just sit down for a moment. I am going to deal with you shortly. Time does not permit me to dwell at any length upon this formidable list of failures. What has resulted from that? Private enterprise was driven from the province. When the C.C.F. came into power in Saskatchewan Imperial Oil had five drilling rigs and seismographic crews working in Saskatchewan seeking oil. On account of the confiscatory legislation that was envisaged, they pulled out and went to Alberta and those crews are responsible for the discovery of Leduc, Redwater and three other major fields. It would have been rather nice to have those discoveries made in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Thatcher: How much oil was discovered under the Liberals in Saskatchewan?

Mr. McCusker: Finally, becoming alarmed at the loss of population in Saskatchewan compared to the other provinces, and impressed by the developments taking place in Alberta and Manitoba under free enterprise, the C.C.F. decided to drop the nationalization program and to attempt to bring capital to the province. They promised the oil company the same deal they were getting in Alberta.

Mr. Thatcher: Do you object to that?

Mr. McCusker: Not at all. I think it is excellent. Just wait. Do not be impatient. You will hear the rest of it. They promised the oil companies the same deal as they were receiving in Alberta. The big companies swarmed in, seeking leases, for it is felt that the potential oil and gas resources of Saskatchewan are equal to those of Alberta. What happened? Instead of allowing the legitimate oil companies to bid for the choice leases, they gave a concession of 9 million acres to a Mr. X of Montreal. He paid one-tenth of a cent an acre for the lease. He was not a legitimate operator. He disposed of his acreage to the legitimate companies, who had been trying to get them before, at a handsome cash profit and retained a royalty of 2½ per cent on 9 million acres. Here comes the joker. The C.C.F. government claimed they did not know this gentleman, that he was a perfect stranger. Yet he walks in and gets 9 million acres and goes away with a 2½ per cent royalty on them. I asked this question, as do the people of Saskatchewan: Who are his hidden associates? Dr. Schumiatcher, Q.C., then legal adviser to the premier of Saskatchewan and the government, formed several companies and applied for leases. He left the government employment on the eve of having those leases granted; they were leases amounting to hundreds of thousands of acres of oil land and a large acreage, 250 square miles, of uranium leases in the most favoured portion of Saskatchewan. Who are his associates? Now, gentlemen, you may get some idea of what is going on there with a C.C.F. government in power when I tell you this. During the short session of the Saskatchewan legislature a little over a year ago the government slipped through an amendment to the assembly act, which permitted members of the legislature to obtain leases of oil and mineral lands from the government. In fact I am told it went further; a member could hold leases through an agent, and that agent did not have to make known the names of those for whom he was acting. The storm of public opinion rose so high over this that the Saskatchewan government hastened to repeal the legislation at the last session of the legislature. A measure of comedy was added to this particular type of proceedings when the provincial treasurer, the Hon. Mr. Fines, produced and tabled affidavits to the effect that all the C.C.F. members of the legislature were honest men.

Mr. Thatcher: That is more than I can say for the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. McCusker: But the bug of private enterprise—or should I, in these times of agriculture investigation, call it the virus—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether I misunderstood the remark that was made about somebody being dishonest.

Mr. Thatcher: You did not. I withdraw.

Mr. McCusker: Thank you, I had not heard it. I do not pay much attention to what he says, anyway. The bug of private enterprise, or should I say in these times of agriculture investigation the virus of private enterprise, had now entered the veins of Premier Douglas and finance minister Fines. They gazed with envy upon the neon lights advertising Famous Players and Rank movies, and so they decided to build a theatre for themselves.

[Mr. McCusker.]

Mr. Thatcher: You are pretty courageous to attack them down here.

Mr. McCusker: Soon we see a company formed with Mr. Bodnoff, one of Mr. Douglas's constituents from Weyburn, as president, Mr. Douglas and Mr. Fines as shareholders and directors and Mr. Schumiatcher as secretary-treasurer, to build a theatre under the stars, the Sunset Drive-in. This was built with the above-named officers holding a large mortgage upon it.

Of course it was purely a coincidence that Mr. Bodnoff received a very large loan of $75,000 from the Saskatchewan government insurance company a short time previous to the formation of the theatre company. We all know now that the Saskatchewan government insurance company—

Mr. Coldwell: I rise to a point of order. I am not objecting to what the hon. gentleman is saying, but I do not think it requires very much courage to stand in this house and attack people who have no chance to reply in this house.

Mr. McCusker: I am expecting you to defend them. I will come to that in a moment. You are their leader; I am expecting you to defend them.

Mr. Coldwell: No. I am not using this parliament for provincial politics. I will do that in Regina, in your own constituency.

Mr. McCusker: When—

Mr. Coldwell: Just cowardly.

Mr. McCusker: No, there is nothing cowardly about it because this will be right on their doorsteps tomorrow morning.

Mr. Thatcher: You flatter yourself.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether any hon. member should accuse another hon. member in this house of being a coward.

Mr. Coldwell: If you insist that I must withdraw then I will withdraw, but I keep my own opinion.

Mr. McCusker: I do not care what the hon. member says. Nobody pays any attention to him in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Thatcher: See how much attention they will pay to you next time.

Mr. McCusker: Let us go on with this: I know it is hard to take. I am showing you C.C.F. socialism with the veneer off.

Mr. Drew: Liberals in a hurry.

Mr. McCusker: We all know that the Saskatchewan government insurance company comes under the department of the provincial treasurer, Mr. Fines. When he was asked in the Saskatchewan legislature why this money was not placed in farm loans Mr. Fines is reported to have stated that they did not yield a high enough rate of interest, and so it goes on. The virus of private enterprise, once it got into their blood, spread just as rapidly and has been just as persistent as that of foot-and-mouth disease.

Another cabinet minister has gone into the hotel business. I want to read an editorial. Hon. members are objecting that I was giving too much attention to Saskatchewan. I will come right into this house. This is from the Leader-Post and is an editorial of April 28, headed "C.C.F. inconsistency", and reads as follows:

> Redistribution should not be the "business" of parliament, nor of a parliamentary committee, Mr. Stanley Knowles, C.C.F. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the question of redistribution has been referred to a committee.

Mr. McCusker: It is redistribution in Saskatchewan that I am talking about, Mr. Speaker. I will not read the first paragraph which has to do with the statement of Mr. Knowles, and is no doubt the official view of the socialist party. The next paragraphs set out how redistribution is carried out in this house and I shall not refer to it. But since the rest applies to Saskatchewan I would like to read it, sir, with your permission:

> Aside from the merits of Mr. Knowles' proposal, a point of interest to Saskatchewan is the wide gulf between C.C.F. talk in Ottawa and C.C.F. action in Regina.
> Saskatchewan under the C.C.F. government had a redistribution a year ago, in preparation for the forthcoming election. Was it handled by an independent commission? The answer is "no." Was it handled by a committee of members, with representation thereon from both sides of the house? Again, the answer is "no." The only members who had anything to do with it were C.C.F.'ers, behind closed doors where the boundaries were drawn under the eagle eye of provincial treasurer Fines. Eventually, Mr. Fines, on behalf of the government, told the legislature where the boundaries of the constituencies were to go, and that is where they went, except for a few minor changes.
> The Saskatchewan opposition did not go as far as to request an "independent commission" such as the federal C.C.F.'ers talk about. It moved an amendment to the redistribution bill asking that the present Ottawa procedure be followed, that instead of the government presenting redistribution as a fait accompli a special select committee of the house be established to redraw the boundaries with both sides of the house represented thereon.

I will not read the whole editorial. It was refused. This is what happened:

> Saskatchewan polls that went Liberal in 1948 were lopped off here, and others which gave the C.C.F. a majority were added there to strengthen the shaky seats. Robert Walker, who won Hanley with a 51 majority in 1948, was fixed up with a majority of 166 if the people vote again as they did in 1948. Shellbrook's boundaries were shifted to raise the C.C.F. majority from 175 in 1948 to a potential 388. Touchwood was lifted from an actual C.C.F. majority of 168 in 1948 to a potential 413 in 1952, or whenever the election is held. Kerrobert-Kindersley's potential C.C.F. majority was raised from 178 to 436.

And so it goes on. I just wanted to show you, Mr. Speaker, that performance is a little bit different from talk. The reason we have lost population is that we have a government which has brought about a lack of industrial and business opportunity; a government which has passed farm security legislation which has made it impossible for our young men to obtain a loan to buy a farm; a government which prefers to use the people's money to develop movie theatres rather than to develop agriculture.

I should like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to state which, if either, of these groups he supports, the radical group on the coast or the capitalistic group in Regina. I am amazed that he can support either. Is he trying to walk a tight rope between them? Obviously he should disown one or the other, or both.

I hate to mention the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, whose independent stand in this house last week sent a convulsive shudder down the spine of the leader of the C.C.F.—a tremour which was recorded in the press throughout Canada. This reaction, of course, amazed all hon. members of this house who had heard the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) attack the Liberal members, on the radio and in this chamber, for their honourable conduct towards their leader who, by the way, has never in any way attempted to interfere with our duties and privileges as members and who, moreover, never expects Liberal members to have their speeches vetted by him before they deliver them.

What happened to the poor member for Moose Jaw? He was summoned to the whipping post and emerged from that ordeal so thoroughly shaken that he was heard to mutter as he walked back to his room—"Mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa". He then dashed off an iron curtain confession of guilt and a new profession of faith. But what an ordeal that must have been for the usually loquacious gentleman who now sits in his room or in his seat in this chamber, in gloomy silence. In fact, tonight I have been one of the first to cheer him back a little bit towards normalcy.

Can it be that the leader of the C.C.F., seeing the Saskatchewan trend and seeing the free enterpriser in the bench behind him becoming bolder, feared a contest for leadership?

Mr. Coldwell: What a parody! What a parody!

(Translation):

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the farsighted budget he has laid before us. Every Canadian should congratulate the minister and also every member of the cabinet for having given the country such good administration and having shown a sixth consecutive surplus; thus they have reduced the national debt by $2,544 million, which means a saving of more than $62 million in interest charges for the Canadian people.

No, the minister need not be ashamed of showing such a wonderful surplus and I challenge our opponents to criticize it with worthy arguments to support them. As a matter of fact it is a government's duty, in time of peace and prosperity, to show a surplus in order to reduce the huge debts we have had to make, while we were forced to defend our country and civilization in order to ensure security to our fellow countrymen.

This year, the hon. minister has done even better for we have a surplus in a year that is, at it were, a semi-war year since more than $1,441 million was spent for our armies in Korea and elsewhere, again to provide for the security and the defence of this country and other countries which also want to defend liberty against the threat of communism.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of piling up surpluses in peacetime and during periods of prosperity like the one we now enjoy in this country because we were compelled to run the country into debt to the amount of $2 to $3 billion each year in wartime. Should we again be compelled by our enemy to defend our country we would be in a better financial position.

If we are now enjoying great prosperity it is mostly due to the sound administration of the Liberal government as opposed to the administration we had between 1930 and 1935, during which period a Tory government directed the country's business until it was gotten rid of at the general election of 1935. What a good thing that was for everybody!

The people of Canada were then experiencing the worst industrial stagnation in its history, most of the workers being unemployed and many farmers and businessmen having gone bankrupt. These people were not then complaining about taxation, because they were not earning enough money to take care of their own needs.

The picture is altogether different today when Canada has undergone a thorough transformation; as a matter of fact, most of our towns and rural areas have improved out of all recognition. Consequently, I say that we should continue to proceed along the lines of good government and harbour no worry.

However, I find, like anyone else, that a budget amounting to $4 billion and a half represents a tremendous expenditure for a population of 14 million people scattered as it is over ten different provinces and the large spaces of a country such as ours.

With the permission of the house, I will review the reasons compelling our government to impose such high taxation. First of all let us see what conditions are in other countries in order to find out if we are paying more or less taxes than the people of these other countries.

Let us see, in the first place, how our friends from the United States fare. This country, with a population of over 150 million people, is one of the most advanced and the richest in all kinds of raw materials. Furthermore, due to its geographical situation, this country is able to grow all the products it requires. Its clever and resourceful people pay, on the whole, much higher taxes than our own. In spite of this, the United States have shown a large deficit for many years.

I now wish to quote from the New York Herald Tribune:

> A New York paper praises Canadian taxation policy.
> The New York Herald Tribune states, in an editorial, that Canada's answer to the threat of inflation places that country ahead of the United States on the road to secure stability.
> In pointing out a few taxation adjustments announced last week in the Canadian budget, the newspaper adds that the people responsible for the preparation of the taxation program in the United States could take note of Canadian methods.
> The willingness of the Canadian people to accept the bad news of a level of taxation high enough to offset an expanded budget is proof that they realize the fact that a taxation program which contributes to economic stability is an adequate program.
> It is not by accident that since the war the Canadian dollar has reached parity with the American dollar, that the public debt of Canada has been reduced, that the American investments in Canada have greatly increased and healthier economic conditions than in the United States have been maintained.
> Canada did not merely stick to a payment in cash policy. Having accepted the gross burden of taxation required to balance its budget, Canada has centred its attention on improving the efficiency and fairness of its taxation.

I challenge our opponents to say that they are not proud to realize that their Canadian money is worth more than any other money in the world, and that foreign capital is flowing into Canada. Therefore, were it not for these governmental restrictions, we would get thousands of requests from citizens of other countries who would like to settle in Canada. While I am dealing with immigration, and though I am not opposed to it, far from it, I would nevertheless like to suggest to the government that we should not proceed with too much haste in this connection, for I cannot see how we could receive more than 100 thousand emigrants a year, which, added to the natural increase of our Canadian population, would bring it up by 200 or 300 thousand a year. We must be logical and give these people employment.

But let us return to the reasons for levying taxes for an amount of $4 billion and a half. First there is an amount of $2,100 million for the defence of our country and for assisting less favoured people. I do understand that the amount is quite high for a population of 14 million. I hope that the threat to peace will subside and that we shall soon be in a position to reduce our armament program.

But what did our opponents say, and more particularly the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew), leader of the opposition? At the time of the invasion in Korea, in June, 1950, we were accused of not spending enough, we were told that we should be spending two or three times as much, that we were endangering the security of the country. Several members of the opposition even asserted in the house and at public meetings that we should have more than 200,000 men under arms and that we should resort immediately to conscription. Some of them went so far as to say that we should be a member of the Atlantic pact. To hear them speak, one would think that there should be Canadians on guard duty all around the world. Really, Mr. Speaker, if the government were to listen to everything that is said by the leader and the Tory members, they would believe that the expenditure should not be $2,100 million but much more than $3 billion for defence alone. Our armed forces would comprise not a mere 100,000 men but 250,000 or even 300,000.

While I am speaking of the armed forces, I think it would be a mistake to accelerate the tempo of enlistments. We must, of course, fulfil our commitments, but we must also avoid subscribing to new obligations. It is a good thing to furnish war equipment, food and so forth; but it seems to me that it would be still a better policy to draw the line as far as the sending of soldiers abroad is concerned.

Those countries have a right to expect our help and besides, by helping them, we actually protect ourselves; but let it be admitted that their population is ten times as high as ours, that they are at home and that their supply of raw materials is insufficient to employ their population. And while we open our doors to some of their youth, most of whom are of the same age as our young soldiers, our own young men are fighting on the battlefields. That is why I repeat, Mr. Speaker, it is all very well and also quite natural to help but we must not send more soldiers than we have now, except in the case where the danger should become greater.

I would not forgive myself if I did not refute the criticisms directed against us by the opposition and, for the most part, by the second and third oppositions and by many members who pretend to be independent but are greater Tories than the Tories themselves on the amount we are compelled to spend for the administration of the country, in addition to defence expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, I have made what I consider a fairly accurate calculation of what the amount would be if the government were to agree to all the expenditures they suggest. We would need a budget of more than six billion. Oh, how generous are our friends of the opposition! They are always prepared to suggest increases of all kinds, pensions, better wages for government employees, subsidies here and subsidies there, subsidies for everybody. If the water level rises and overflows in the springtime, in some little creek, the government should carry it away to some other place. To hear them tell it, one would think the government was a huge mountain of gold and that the only thing to do is to help oneself.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. members who endorse the policy of the Liberal government are as generous and sympathetic as the hon. members of the opposition when it comes to helping others, to making contributions out of their own pockets, and I challenge our opponents to find a single Liberal member who is not in favour of all social measures intended to help people of slender means, to give adequate salaries to the civil servants, to help our farmers through subsidies, our workers, etc., as well as foster education. We want adequate pay for our servicemen, we take care of our returned soldiers, we help our hospitals, we give fair treatment and an adequate salary to our workers, in short, we promote by all possible means the development of our country and make sure that all Canadians will be treated justly so that our national unity will be preserved. But—and there is a "but" which we must not forget—all social laws ever adopted in this country have been sponsored by a Liberal administration. Every dollar spent by the government must be repaid by the Canadian people. That is why it is necessary to collect taxes and that is why we must not go faster than our resources will allow us to go.

And then after requesting that over $6 billion be given, contributed and spent, they turn around and accuse us of overtaxing the people. I understand that the role of the opposition consists in criticizing. Now, my good friends, be serious. During the Korean invasion, you had a fair game and you said that the danger was impending. Any man who is close to danger is ready to take any means, like during a thunder-storm we fear the thunder, and as we are good fellows we implore the protection of Divine Providence. Unfortunately, too often after the storm we forget to give thanks, yet sometimes people die without sufficient preparation. It is the same as far as the Korean war is concerned. Because things look a little better now, some are bound to forget and to blame us for too much preparation and, for the rest of the budget, we are blamed again after having been asked to spend twice as much or three or four times as much.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that no single member of this house who is a supporter of the Liberal government welcomes high taxation more than anyone else. To begin with, we also pay taxes, as well as our opponents and our friends who have elected us, not to mention those who have given their voice to our opponents. Most of the hon. members in this house wish to be re-elected with a greater majority. Then we must make new friends and keep such friends as we had before. Consequently, we want our families where the head of the family has many dependents to be taxed less, to receive a bigger family allowance, certainly less taxation for everybody, a pension for the disabled as soon as possible, an increased old age pension, etc., etc. But, where shall we find the money and yet incur no deficit? It is true that we have a surplus but that is a good investment for all Canadians. To support this contention I quote an article which appeared in the London Times:

(Text):

I have a newspaper article headed, "Financial Strength of Canada Helping Buttress Free World". It is dated April 15, quotes the London Times, and reads as follows:

> The financial strength of Canada is helping to buttress the entire free world, the London Times says today. "Clearly Canada is exceptionally favoured by fortune; but prosperity as well as adversity is a test of statesmanship, and much credit is due to Mr. St. Laurent's government for the happy condition of the nation's affairs," the Times says. "Canada may be congratulated the more wholeheartedly by her friends because her financial strength helps to buttress the entire free world."

(Translation):

To be able to enjoy prosperity, the finances of the country at least must be in good condition. In case of war we would be in a better position to defend our country and if peace should continue, as it is our wish, and if the markets where we sell our products become less profitable, our country will have to be in a sound financial position to undertake in due time vast projects to help the development of our natural resources and to ensure employment for our workers.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture who is not in his seat at the moment, but who will certainly read this request, to consider closely the prices of our farm products, because during the last few months the prices of cheese, beef, pork, eggs, poultry and milch cows went down by more than 25 per cent. Even now the price of the hide of a month or month-and-a-half old milk-fed calf is only 40 cents. We must remember that that requires an hour and a half of work by the farmer to skin a calf and that children's shoes sell at $2 to $4 and shoes for grown-ups sell at $10 to $15, which means first of all . . .

(Text):

If I may say it in English—fifteen hours of work for a farmer and ten calf skins for a pair of child's shoes...

(Translation):

. . . and forty-five hours of work and thirty calf hides for adults. Obviously, there is something wrong with our shoe manufacturers. I have investigated the matter personally and I was told that they have lowered the prices of hides and shoes considerably, but that they have increased wages. I think that they too need a wider margin of profit. Which means that at the present time our farmers are producing at cost, since there has been practically no reduction in the price of what they have to buy. Almost everywhere we see wage increases, which makes them think that the price of goods they have to buy will go up, since inevitably, when an industry increases its wages, it also increases the price of its products proportionately. The railways and all the other means of transportation are charging exorbitant rates on all freight. So our farmers are leaving their farms. Statistics are there to prove it. That is why there is a shortage of housing in our cities. Such a condition can throw our economy out of balance and cause unemployment, and even a certain lack of balance in our society.

Agricultural loans are inadequate in Ontario. The provincial government actually neglects the Ontario farmer. The loans should be increased by at least 50 per cent. Instead of lending $4,000 on a farm, we should lend $6,000. It would be much easier then for the head of a family to purchase farms on his sons' behalf, for one needs more than $12,000 to buy the farm, the cattle and the necessary machinery. Such an improvement in the law would encourage farmers' sons to remain on the land, which would be an excellent thing for all Canadians.

I would feel remiss in my duty if I failed to remind our excellent minister of national health to see to it that bilingual old age pension cheques be distributed throughout Canada. I feel sure that there is not one of us who would not be in favour of unity and justice at home.

(Text):

I am of the opinion that there is not an hon. member who is not in favour of unity, good understanding and justice in this country.

(Translation):

We are descended from two great races with a glorious past. In this land of our ancestors, we speak French and English and we have been living in harmony for centuries; have we not become allies in several wars, standing together in the defence of freedom? Why should Canadians not be able to live side by side and respect one another?

To achieve that end, we must be treated equally well. Then let us have bilingual cheques, like bilingual currency. School legislation, although it comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces, should be applied without any discrimination as to race or language, and not as in British Columbia. This also holds true as far as religion is concerned. That would be in the greatest interest of Canada. Let us follow the example set by our young men, either French or English-speaking, who have shed their blood and made the supreme sacrifice at the front to defend their country, their race and their religion. We, who represent them all, should not fear to pass legislation accordingly and endow this country with a distinctively Canadian flag.

I conclude by asking Divine Providence to protect the health of our Prime Minister, who is widely known as a man of superior qualities and a great Christian.

(Text):

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would only speak on the subject of the budget once, but sitting in the house listening to the speeches made, one begins to feel like a steam boiler. Since you have not got a safety valve, when you get up to a certain pressure the only way to relieve it is to say something about the things that are bothering you. I should like to say two things about the speech made tonight by the member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker). I am sure he would not want to mislead the house or make an inaccurate statement.

Tonight the hon. member used the figure of one and a half billion dollars as the contribution made by the federal government in the field of social security. I am sure that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare knows that figure is not correct. When he uses that figure of one and a half billion dollars he is including the provincial government's contribution, the money spent by the municipalities in the field of health and welfare as well as private contributions that are allocated for that purpose. I want to correct the record on that, and I am sure the parliamentary assistant would want me to do so. The federal government is not spending one and a half billion dollars; that is the total amount of money that goes into that field in Canada from the agencies that I have mentioned. The second thing I should like to put on the record is the position of the small industry in Saskatchewan operated by the Saskatchewan government. Now, it is not my prerogative to defend the Saskatchewan government in this house. There are five members from that province who are capable of doing that. The reason I am interested in the industrial set-up is that in my last election that was the only issue in the campaign in my riding, based on a statement made in the house by the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) just before adjournment. The Saskatchewan industrial set-up was a complete washout so far as the hon. member was concerned. Fortunately, I had just returned from Saskatchewan where I had spent two weeks, much of it in Regina with the men who were responsible for setting up and maintaining these small industries. I had the facts and figures in my pocket at the time the member for Lake Centre made that speech.

Immediately following the hon. member's speech I rose and put the facts and figures I had obtained from the men in Saskatchewan on the record. I have kept in touch with that industry ever since. If the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare will look at the budget speech made by the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan in 1952, he will find that in the over-all operation of industry under the management of the provincial government there was a net profit of $3·5 million. Those are the figures the provincial treasurer gave the legislature.

Mr. McCusker: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but will he permit a question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. McCusker: I wanted to ask him through you, Mr. Speaker, if he included in that the telephone company and the power corporation?

Mr. Gillis: It was all-inclusive.

Mr. McCusker: That is the statement which I made. I think I said that the crown corporations standing alone did not carry themselves but they had lumped in with them, for the purpose of accounting, the telephone company and power corporation which were old corporations making large profits, and therefore it showed as though the whole scheme of crown corporations were making a profit; in fact the latter two concealed the actual deficits of the first.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to argue about the details. What I am interested in is this. At the time the Saskatchewan government took over the power operations in that province it was a dead loss, and the telephone company was in the same position. I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that the position of industry in that province at that time was nil. If I belonged to that province, regardless of politics, I would have to give the government credit for taking the initiative and trying to set up small industry on the prairies to create employment. There has been a wide expansion of power in that province since the government took over. I believe it is all to the good. I wish that the Nova Scotia government, with the resources it has available, would undertake a similar development. Regardless of the fact that it is a Liberal government, I would be one of the first to pitch in and help.

Mr. Brooks: And New Brunswick too.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Gillis: And the province of New Brunswick also. I merely say that because I am interested in the Saskatchewan government's efforts to put some industries on the prairies; that has never been attempted before. Of course these men were inexperienced and were feeling their way. Nevertheless, there are a lot of people who have employment in these little industries today, regardless of whether the money was made in power, in telephones or in the over-all picture. Some sections will lose.

For instance, take the Dominion Steel and Coal, a huge free enterprise octopus that stretches across this country. It has twenty-six subsidiary organizations, and you will find that many of those subsidiaries are losing money while others are making money. The over-all picture enables that huge organization to remain solvent, and in a position to employ thousands of people. I compliment the Saskatchewan government on that particular matter for creating employment and experimenting with industry. The men lacked experience, but I think they have made a very great success of it. I just wanted to straighten out the record on those two points.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, that I should like to develop rather fully and that is the question of whether there will be another fall session. The recriminations that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has to take, the accusations that the house is being prolonged for the purpose of giving members another indemnity—one hears those things. So far as I am concerned, as one member of this house, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that those accusations are justified. On June 8, 1951, I spoke on this question and pointed out that, so far as I was concerned, a second session was necessary, and I put the legislation that still remained untouched on the record. That prediction in June turned out to be correct because hon. members were here in December. They had a two-day recess for Christmas, and the business was not completed then, or not as it should have been.

Today is the 65th day of this session. If the session prorogued tonight, hon. members could go home and draw their full indemnities. What does that mean? It means that in the years gone by the anticipated length of the session was 65 days, and hon. members could complete their business when they were dealing only with the problems of Canada with 8 million or 9 million people. They did not then have the problems of the world to contend with as we have today. Anyone who takes a look at that order paper which I have in my hand—and I refer to today's order paper—and looks over the 34 items of legislation that are still on it, to say nothing about the legislation that is yet to be brought forward in this session, such as amendments to the Criminal Code, the Combines Investigation Act, with regard to immigration, unemployment insurance, and all those things that will have to be dealt with—

Mr. Blackmore: And all the estimates.

Mr. Gillis: —and who thinks that that agenda can be completed by the end of June, is not figuring on giving that legislation much consideration. Then you have all of the estimates to handle in addition to the legislation that is on the order paper and the other items that we know must be brought in. In the light of all that, I am obliged to rise and say something about it. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has been fair, considerate and understanding as far as the members of the house are concerned. In addition to that, he wants to give everybody in this house an opportunity of examining that legislation, and not just rushing it through at the last minute.

On the question of remuneration, I want to compliment the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) who got to his feet here last evening and made a strong speech on that subject. When you take a look at the legislatures, for example, what do you find? I have in my hand a clipping—and it is dated May 1—which shows that in the province of N wfoundland the members of the legislature increased the indemnity to $3,000 a year. In the province of Ontario I think the indemnity is about $3,900. I think $3,000 is fairly well the indemnity across the country. In its last session the Ontario legislature sat for less than seven weeks. You must consider the fact that members of parliament come here from all over this country, many of them with businesses, many of them with law offices. You are not able to work here. Premier Frost recently made the statement that he figures that being a member of the Ontario legislature is a full-time job and that it is not possible to carry on as they have in the past and just consider it a part-time job.

As I said in June last year, we have arrived at the position in this country when members of parliament are going to have to make up their minds whether they are going to work for the people of Canada and accept the responsibilities that have been given them as members of parliament or whether they are going to stay home and look after their practice, if they are lawyers, their businesses if they are businessmen or their farms if they are farmers in some other part of the country. They just cannot do a good job either here or at home having regard to the time that must be spent in this parliament at the present time.

I am saying that because I think that the criticism and the kicking around that the Prime Minister has taken in the last few days is completely unjustified. I do not think he merits it, and I think it is up to the individual members of this parliament to show that they appreciate the fact that he has some understanding of and consideration for them, both with respect to the time they must spend in the house and as to the inadequacy of their compensation.

I think the time has come in this country when the government of Canada and the members of this House of Commons must do something. I do not believe in just putting the gun to the cabinet and saying: You must do it. As a member of this House of Commons I think I have some responsibility in the matter and should be prepared to express my opinion on it. I think it is a full-time job. I think the members of this House of Commons should be paid an adequate indemnity so that they might be able to do the kind of job that the people who elected them expect them to do.

I have in my hand the set-up in the United States as it affects our opposite numbers in that country. I am just going to put it on the record:

> Beginning in January, 1947, the compensation of senators, representatives in congress, delegates from the territories and the resident commissioner from Puerto Rico is at the rate of $12,500 per annum each; and the compensation of the speaker of the house of representatives and the vice-president of the United States is at the rate of $20,000 per annum each. Whenever there is no vice-president, the president of the senate for the time being is entitled to the compensation provided by law for the vice-president. Starting also in January, 1947, each member of either house receives an additional $2,500 per annum as an expense allowance for which no accounting is made. Beginning at the same time the government contributes to an annuity which a retiring member of congress may receive after six years of service and attainment of the age of 62 years, or upon retirement for disability after five years of service.

I should like to ask hon. members of this house if they think that a member of the House of Commons who has to spend the amount of time that we have to spend in Ottawa doing the business of the country is not as good a representative or is not performing just as good a job as is his opposite number in the United States? Do you think the people of Canada, with regard to what their members should receive, are any more parsimonious than are the people of the United States? I do not think so. In this house I have stated a good many times that, as to the riding I represent, the only question I have ever been asked on the subject of remuneration is: How do you get by on it? How do you manage it in Ottawa for six, seven, eight or nine months of the year, maintain a family in this part of the country, and get by on the amount of money that you get?

There is no question as to what the member of parliament should be entitled to. I think the situation is the same in every riding of this country, if the member of parliament faced up to his responsibility and tried to have the people that he represents see the parliamentary job as it is today, under circumstances that have drastically changed over the last ten years.

I see that it is eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Gillis the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we will continue the debate on the budget. If this debate were concluded, we would proceed with Bills Nos. 182, 183, 184 and 181. Those bills relate to veterans matters.

Mr. Green: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In that order.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 5, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Second report of sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.—Mr. Cleaver.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That votes Nos. 485, 486 and 493 of the main estimates for 1952-53, approved and reported upon this day by the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, be referred back to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South) presented the first report of the special committee on veterans affairs, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CHANGES IN GREAT LAKES SEAMEN'S SECURITY REGULATIONS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to lay on the table of the house two copies, in English and in French, of order in council P.C. 2306, passed on May 2, 1952, under the provisions of the Emergency Powers Act, respecting changes in the great lakes seamen's security regulations.

CONSUMER CREDIT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUSPENSION OF REGULATIONS MADE UNDER ACT OF 1950

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that an order in council has been passed, effective tomorrow, suspending all the regulations made under the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act.

This act was passed by parliament in September, 1950, and the first regulations under the act came into force in November of that year. The regulations were considerably stiffened in March, 1951, and generally speaking required down payments of one-half of the selling price in the case of motorcars and motorcycles, and one-third for all other commodities, with the balance to be paid within the succeeding twelve months. Last January the regulations were relaxed by permitting payments of the balance to be spread over a maximum period of eighteen months.

The situation with respect to consumer credit is now such that I believe we can safely suspend the operation of these regulations. However, if conditions made it necessary, I would have no hesitation in recommending the reintroduction of consumer credit controls, and in view of existing uncertainties I believe the present legislative basis for such control should be maintained. For this reason the government will invite both houses of parliament to present addresses to the governor general praying that the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act be continued for a further period. Hon. members will recall that this act is purely an enabling act authorizing the governor in council to make regulations respecting the control of consumer credit, and that under its own terms it will expire on July 31 next, unless the action I have suggested is taken.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 185, respecting the board of elders of the Canadian district of the Moravian church in America.—Mr. Decore.

QUESTIONS

HOUSE FURNISHINGS FOR SERVICE OFFICERS

Mr. Balcom:

1. Are homes furnished in part or in full for service officers transferred from one area to another in or outside Canada?
2. Under what circumstances are these supplied?
3. Do furnishings remain the property of the crown?

Mr. Blanchette: 1 and 2. In general all permanent and temporary married quarters provided by the Department of National Defence are furnished with stoves and refrigerators. At some isolated stations such as Goose Bay, where the costs and difficulties of transportation make it impossible or uneconomical to move personal furniture into and out of the stations, furniture is supplied according to an established scale. Also in a few quarters which have been for a long time in the possession of the department, additional furniture is provided and in a few cases furniture which was provided prior to world war II has been permitted to remain when no particular economy would result in removing such furniture. Privately owned or rented houses are not supplied with any public furniture.

3. Yes.

ARMED FORCES—MEDICAL SERVICES AND NURSING SISTERS

Mr. Balcom:

1. Is any action being taken to consolidate into one the three medical services of the armed forces?
2. Is any action being taken to consolidate into one the nursing sisters of the three armed forces?

Mr. Blanchette: A high degree of co-ordination is now being accomplished through the inter-service medical committee which was set up to correlate the medical services in the armed forces and to conserve medical resources both professional and material, by eliminating duplication of effort.

In all areas where this is practicable the hospital or hospitals of one service provide for the hospitalization of personnel of all three services in that area. In addition all service hospitals and medical installations take men from all three services. Close co-operation is also maintained with the hospital services of veterans affairs. Further steps towards co-ordination have been considered and are being actively examined at the present time.

CHEESE IMPORTS

Mr. Fraser:

1. How much cheese was imported into Canada during (a) 1950; (b) 1951; (c) the first three months of 1952?
2. From what countries was this cheese imported, and what amounts from each country, in each of the years (a) 1950; (b) 1951; (c) the first three months of 1952?

Mr. McIlraith:

1 and 2.

GRAIN—MANITOBA—COMPENSATION FOR DAMAGE BY DEER AND ELK

Mr. Dinsdale:

What steps are being taken to allow moneys which have been paid by Manitoba farmers under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to be used to compensate farmers whose unharvested crops have been destroyed by deer and elk, after inspection has been made of the damaged grain?

Mr. Gardiner: Compensation under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act can be paid to farmers suffering damage to crops by deer and elk, but only on the same basis and under the same conditions as to those farmers suffering a crop loss for any other reason.

[Mr. Blanchette.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—PROFESSIONAL GROUPS

Mr. Murray (Oxford):

1. How many registered pharmacists in the province of Ontario have received benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, during the years (a) 1949; (b) 1950; (c) 1951?
2. How much money was paid out in benefits to registered pharmacists in the province of Ontario during the years 1949, 1950, 1951?
3. What professional groups other than registered pharmacists pay into unemployment insurance in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. The unemployment insurance commission does not make an analysis of the occupational characteristics of applicants for unemployment insurance benefits.

2 and 3*. See answer to No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GRAIN OVERAGES

Mr. Argue:

1. What overages or shortages of wheat, oats, barley, rye and flax were shown by each licensed elevator company operating in the prairie provinces in the crop year 1950-51?

2. What overages or shortages of wheat, oats, barley, rye and flax were shown by each elevator company in its terminal operations at Fort William-Port Arthur and Vancouver?

3. How were the shortages in country elevators disposed of?

4. On what basis did the wheat board pay for any overages it purchased: (a) country elevator operations; (b) terminal elevator operations?

5. What was the value of any overages paid to Her Majesty (a) on country elevator operations; (b) terminal elevator operations?

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

SUBSIDIES

Mr. Murray (Oxford):

1. What amount has been the average government subsidy payment during the fiscal year 1950-1951, to non-agricultural groups?

2. During the same period what amount by way of government subsidy payment did agriculture receive?

NATIONAL PARKS—TOURIST CAMP RATES

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Has the rate for tourist camp space at Wasagaming, Manitoba, been increased recently?

2. If so, by what amount and what is the reason for the change?

3. Are tourist camp rates being raised at all national parks across Canada?

4. If so, by what amount?

Mr. Winters: Return tabled.

PENSIONS—R.C.M.P. AND JUDGES

Mr. Thatcher:

How much money has the government paid for pensions to (a) retired members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; (b) judges, in each of the fiscal years ending March 31, 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950, 1951, 1952?

OBSCENE LITERATURE

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What are the names of the books, magazines, or other publications forbidden entry into Canada because of the immoral or obscene nature of their contents?

2. Have any seizures taken place since March 12, 1952, and have any prosecutions been taken as a result of same?

3. Have any prosecutions been taken against persons for having these forbidden articles in their possession, and if so, where and with what results?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INVERNESS COUNTY, N.S.—COAL DEVELOPMENT AND ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. Gillis:

For a copy of the report made to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys on possible coal development and economic conditions in Inverness county, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, when this motion was before the house on April 30 last the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) suggested that there was in existence a report compiled by Dr. Haites.

Until a few months ago Dr. Haites was an employee of the geological survey of Canada, a branch of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. During the course of his duties he made many routine progress reports through the coal research laboratory at Sydney, Nova Scotia. Dr. Haites assisted in the preparation of a report submitted to the Nova Scotia department of mines by Dr. Lewis E. Young, a well-known mining engineer who had been engaged by the province of Nova Scotia as consultant on the Inverness coal fields.

After his work on the report for Dr. Lewis Young, Dr. Haites was authorized to visit other coal fields in Inverness county in order to assist Mr. W. M. McDonald of Sydney, who was conducting exploration in these fields to assess the needs, if any, for further geological work in these areas. However, as Dr. Haites could devote only a limited time to this further work in Inverness county, he produced a progress report only for the information of his divisional chief and the director of the geological survey. This report is not available yet for distribution, as it is proposed to carry out further investigation this coming summer before any opinions on possible coal reserves and developments in Inverness county can be formulated.

If this progress report is the one which the hon. member has in mind, I would suggest that he can see it if he cares to call on Dr. W. A. Bell, director of the geological survey of Canada, Royal Victoria Museum building.

Because of our inability to produce the report asked for at this time, I request that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Gillis: The explanation is satisfactory to me. I understand, from what the minister has just said that, based on the examination made at that time, there is a report available in the mines department in Nova Scotia. I am quite willing to accept his explanation and ask that the motion be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Withdrawn.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—ADVISORY COMMITTEES

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of circular letter No. 18 and also a copy of circular letter No. 19, issued by the unemployment insurance commission with reference to the work and functions of the commission's advisory committees.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I wish to table the return now.

CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS

INCREASES IN BENEFITS TO OTHER THAN MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act to provide increases in the scale of pensions under this act comparable to those in the basic scale of pensions under the Pension Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

BREAK IN P.F.R.A. DAM ON FRENCHMAN RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the federal government been asked for financial assistance to restore damaged property, including that in Eastend, Saskatchewan, resulting from the break in the P.F.R.A. dam on the Frenchman river? Will such assistance be granted?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman sent me notice of his intention to ask this question. On April 29 the premier of Saskatchewan telegraphed me about floods in southwestern Saskatchewan, and stated that Hon. J. H. Sturdy, minister of social welfare, was then in Ottawa, and asked if he could not see me, or some other member of the government, in that connection. I replied at once as follows:

Re your telegram concerning floods in Saskatchewan. All the information that we have comes to us through the P.F.R.A., and because the P.F.R.A. reports to the Minister of Agriculture, arrangements are being made for Mr. Sturdy to see Mr. Gardiner.

I understand that Mr. Sturdy and the deputy minister of his department, together with the mayor of Swift Current and the mayor of Eastend, did see the Minister of Agriculture, and perhaps it would be more convenient if the Minister of Agriculture informed the house as to what took place during their meeting.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has stated, I was interviewed by Mr. Sturdy, the minister of social welfare in the Saskatchewan government, and the mayor of Eastend, together with the mayor of Swift Current, and as well the deputy minister of the department of social welfare in Saskatchewan. They presented the case for assistance both to Swift Current and to Eastend. I discussed the question with them and indicated that I did not think it came under the class of national calamities, and therefore suggested that the matter be dealt with in some other manner.

The procedure that has been followed by provinces generally, and always has been, at least since the days of the calamity in Nova Scotia and the cyclone in Regina, is for the provincial governments to make representations to the effect that the damage done is so great that they themselves are not in a financial position to deal with it, and that the federal government give some assistance. I said I doubted very much whether either of these cases of damage would come even within that class; and then we went on to discuss the matter further. I intimated to them that there had been some damage as a result of irrigation operations in certain areas, and that the matter should be dealt with as between Dr. Thomson, our man at Regina, and the deputy minister, who was along with Mr. Sturdy and the mayor of Eastend. The matter was left there; and from that time to this I have not had any further representations; but I expect there will be representations made.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask this supplementary question: Does not this damage result from the collapse of a federal works project, namely a dam under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and therefore come into the category for which the federal government is responsible, as defined by the Prime Minister to the House of Commons on April 7?

Mr. Gardiner: In the opinion of our officials it is not damage that results from the breaking of the dam; some others, however, may think it is. That is a question which will have to be dealt with and determined as between the two parties.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THEFTS FROM VALCARTIER CAMP—LAYING OFF OF CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of National Defence make a statement to the house concerning the reported theft of live hand grenades from Valcartier camp, and also the laying off of 120 civilian employees who were working in engineers stores?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The commanding officer of the camp on Friday afternoon, April 25, caused the ranges that had been used during the winter, with live ammunition, to be examined to see if there were any grenades that had not gone off. Eleven grenades were found that had not exploded. They were marked with markers, and the area has been wired off. As it is in a danger area, there are of course danger signs.

The engineers were sent for to deal with this ammunition, and they arrived on Monday from Ottawa. Ten grenades were missing; no trace of them has been found. The area commander, Brigadier Fleury, has caused wide publicity to be given to the matter, and has urged that whoever has the grenades should return them.

With regard to the other matter, in connection with the annual stocktaking of the engineers stores, some 150 civilian employees working with the engineers have been laid off temporarily so that the stocktaking can be proceeded with, with all possible expedition, by service personnel.

Mr. Green: How long will it take?

Mr. Claxton: A matter of days or weeks, rather than months.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, May 2, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned on Friday evening I had begun to make a few remarks concerning the business now before the house. At that time I dealt with the question whether second sessions were necessary on the two occasions on which they were held, and whether the remuneration for members of parliament was adequate or otherwise. I made my position clear, and I am not going to pursue the subject further.

There is another matter about which I want to say a few words at this time. The press and members of the house have commented on a speech made in the house by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). I make my observations now because I know that when the next election rolls around there will be a united front of Liberals, Progressive Conservatives, and any others who may be opposing us, supported by a copy of that little bible, Hansard, in their hands, trying to prove to the people of Canada that the C.C.F. generally is opposed to social security.

I want to make this clear, that the member for Moose Jaw as a citizen of Canada has a right to say what he likes; but when the member for Moose Jaw accepts the responsibility of running on a ticket and supporting a program that has certain basic principles, he is expected to conform as closely as he can to those basic principles.

There is all kinds of room for quarrelling on many matters—and I think I am a pretty good example of it myself, because I have stood in the house on many occasions and discussed matters concerning which other members of the group did not see eye to eye with me. But those matters did not have to do with the basic principles of the movement.

I do not expect the hon. member for Moose Jaw to think as I do, and I do not expect to think as the hon. member for Moose Jaw does. We are all more or less creatures of our environment; we are conditioned by it. There is considerable difference between my background and early environment and that of the hon. member for Moose Jaw. And when we see two people thinking exactly alike we know that there is only one of those people thinking, anyway. So this kind of controversy does not do any harm.

I am not concerned about what the hon. member said; he has a right to say it. But when a member gets up in the house and makes a speech such as that made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, setting forth certain proposals that presuppose a reduction in expenditures, and so on, then that speech is at least subject to analysis by other members. It is the analysis he made, and the economies it was supposed to bring about, with which I am now concerned.

On Friday night I dealt with his proposal that no second session was necessary. While the hon. member did not give many reasons why there should not be a second session, on Friday evening I gave many reasons why I thought a second session could hardly be avoided.

His second proposal to save money is one with which I completely disagree. For example, he said in no uncertain terms that broadcasts to points behind the iron curtain should be discontinued, and in that way we would save a couple of millions of dollars. In my opinion the broadcasts being sent to points behind the iron curtain are one of the most important parts of our national defence set-up. In my view of Europe today, Russia is in much the same position as Hitler was in when we invaded Europe. It has expanded to a point where I am pretty sure it will find it difficult to police the whole territory while continuing to maintain its machinery of production. I believe Stalin is in the position of the fly that has captured the fly paper: he is there, but he is stuck with it.

The only assurance millions of people behind the iron curtain have is that which is conveyed to them in these broadcasts, indicating that there are people on the outside of the curtain who have an interest in them.

Some day, either by means of negotiation or otherwise, there will be deliverance for them. I think it would be one of the most disastrous things that could happen if these broadcasts to points behind the iron curtain should be discontinued.

The hon. member made some other miscellaneous recommendations which did not amount to very much. I am just going to deal with the major ones where he thought that some money could be saved. He said that post offices, wharves and drydocks should be cut to the extent of some $20 million. I can understand the hon. member making that recommendation because there are not many docks or wharves on the prairies. I am sure we have all heard the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) stressing the necessity for improvement, expansions and extensions of the facilities at Saint John, and I have no doubt Halifax is in the same position as well as other eastern Canadian ports. The renovation and improvement of post offices right across the country is badly needed at the present time. I do not think the hon. member thought the matter through very much when he chose those particular items as offering a saving of $20 million.

Then he proposed that the civil service should be cut by five per cent. I suppose anyone could get up here and say that there are too many civil servants and therefore they should be cut by ten, fifteen or twenty per cent, but the hon. member did not present any valid reason why any reduction should be made. To cut the civil service by five per cent would mean a reduction of about 10,000 right across the country, but the major reductions would be made here in Ottawa. Those reductions would not be made at the top levels; we would find junior clerks, filing clerks and perhaps some stenographers being relegated to the streets. What would happen to them? They would have to go on unemployment insurance. I certainly would not recommend the cutting down of any service which would mean the throwing into unemployment of those who are barely making the means of livelihood, barely making enough to pay their rent, buy some clothes and get a bite to eat. I am certainly not prepared to accept the recommendation that a particular classification in the civil service should be reduced unless I can be presented with facts and figures to show what money will be saved and what is going to be done with the money saved. I am opposed to that recommendation.

The hon. member also suggested that transport be cut by five per cent. We have the board of transport commissioners, and in addition we find that this department handles aids to navigation, telegraph lines, telephone lines, airports, and many other things. I cannot see how the personnel of that department could be cut. In my own end of the country I would think that the different branches of this department need more employees. I cannot understand why the hon. member for Moose Jaw picked on that particular department.

The hon. member proposed that there be set up a commission similar to the Hoover commission for the purpose of pruning government expenses, and all that kind of thing. Anyone who remembers the Hoover commission will recall that in summing up their recommendations they merely said that they were opposed to certain things because they added up to nothing more or less than liberal recommendations and liberal policies. I am sure that the hon. member for Moose Jaw does not want that kind of commission set up here for the purpose of pruning the civil service of this country and cutting expenditures. That is a job for the members of the House of Commons, and I for one am not prepared to hand it over to any commission.

Then the hon. member referred to old age security. We have had many statements to the effect that old age security should not be paid to people in the higher income brackets. However, I think the present arrangement is the best one. It would need a great number of additional personnel to cull out month by month those who were ineligible because of income; you would practically have to duplicate the present number of employees in the department. The present set-up is the simplest one you could have. Much of this money comes back in taxes, in some cases more than is paid out.

The payment of $40 a month in many cases puts the recipients in a higher income bracket and when they are taxed on that basis you will perhaps get more than the $40 back. The present arrangement cuts down on the needed personnel and avoids many mistakes that would be made in checking and rechecking. I am completely opposed to that device for saving money, because I do not think any money would be saved. I think the hon. member for Moose Jaw was ill advised in picking on that particular thing. Exactly the same argument could be advanced in connection with his suggestion for reducing family allowances. If you placed the payment of those allowances on a "look and hunt" basis, as suggested by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, it would mean increased costs of administration.

That is all I want to say on that, but I thought it was necessary to say it. Practically every newspaper from one end of the country to the other has played up this theme during the last couple of weeks. We have Conservative members to our right, with Liberals to their right as well as in front of us, and they would all offer a united front at the next election in trying to prove that the C.C.F. did not believe in old age security, family allowances, and so forth. If I did not say something about it the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) would say, "You were in the house and you did not say anything; silence gives consent. Why did you not express your opinion then?" I am not expressing my opinion for the purpose of injuring the hon. member for Moose Jaw—he will learn as he goes along—but I did think it was necessary to make the points I have in connection with the recommendations he placed before the house.

In the time remaining at my disposal I want to say a few words with regard to a statement made by Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways, to a committee which was set up a few days ago and which has finished its work. Its formal report will be presented to the house within the next day or so.

The coal industry of Nova Scotia has been having a pretty tough struggle over the years. The government set up a coal board to supervise and assist the industry. Money has been lent for the purpose of mechanizing the industry in the Atlantic provinces. With all these things one would have naturally assumed that there was a future for the coal industry. Then Mr. Gordon came before the committee a few days ago and when I asked him some questions with regard to the use of diesel engines on the main lines east of Montreal he told us that they were going to use them one hundred per cent and that no steam locomotives were to be purchased.

The coal industry of the maritime provinces sells some 1,200,000 tons of coal annually to the Canadian National Railways. Mr. Gordon made it quite clear that that market for coal was going to shrink year by year. He said that at the present time they have a five-year program in effect, which began in 1951, and which will mean shrinkage of some 280,000 tons a year in that industry. I asked Mr. Gordon if that figure represented an annual reduction, and he said that was so, but the next day he amended his statement somewhat. However, to my mind he did not amend it in such a way as to alter his first statement. His last statement was rather ambiguous. It was not very clear, and I am still sticking to the figure of 280,000 tons as the annual amount of shrinkage, beginning in 1951, in the market for maritime provinces' coal.

This situation has caused a lot of apprehension in those provinces. I have in my hand an article that appeared recently in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald containing a statement of Mr. L. A. Forsyth, president of the Dominion Steel and Coal Company, with respect to the year 1951. Mr. Forsyth says that there has been a steady decline in the production of coal, and that the coal industry is facing a crisis at the present time. On the other hand there is an encouraging feature about his report. He said that while the production of coal was going down, the production of steel was improving. He said that the steel position was much better from the standpoint of profits and production than it ever has been in the history of the corporation.

It would appear that there is going to be a swing in the base of the economy of Nova Scotia from coal to steel. In my opinion that is a good development, because the coal industry not only faces the loss to oil of the Canadian National Railways market for coal, but also faces the threat of natural gas from Alberta. Last year the house passed a bill giving a pipe line company the right to pipe natural gas from Alberta into Quebec city and greater Montreal. Natural gas can replace coal in the domestic field, and in the whole industrial field, with the exception of the production of basic steel. Therefore, in addition to the shrinkage in coal production because of the loss of the C.N.R. market to oil, in a few years' time we are going to be faced with the problem of meeting the competition of natural gas.

I said that I thought the swing in the economy from coal to steel was a good one. As the production of steel increases, it will create an additional demand for coal, because basic steel cannot be made without coal. I think the whole future of that industry in eastern Canada depends on the extent to which the government is prepared to assist the industry and encourage it in the creation of that new base for the use of Nova Scotia coal. In addition, a lot of consideration should be given to the establishment of subsidiary fabricating and steel plate industries. Such industries, as we lose markets to oil, as in the case of the Canadian National Railways, and to natural gas from Alberta, which will cover the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, would then be able to take up the slack of what we lose in these other fields.

I have no illusions about the period through which we are passing. Anyone who has watched the situation closely will realize that the world is in a transitional period of a new industrial revolution. I believe that ten years from now we shall be having similar discussions in the house about the threat of atomic energy to fuel oil, natural gas and other fuels. We are now in the transitional period of swinging from one basic fuel to several others that are more economical, and I think there are things that the government can do during that period to lessen the shock to the areas that will be affected by new technological advances. Do not make any mistake about it; I am not arguing against technological advances. They are inevitable, and I hope that as a result of them every miner who has to work underground in order to earn the means of livelihood will be able to come up to the surface and secure employment where he will be able to get some fresh air and sunshine and prolong his life for a good many years rather than have to work underground, whether in a rock or coal mine, where he is subject to health and accident hazards.

I am not arguing to keep the coal miners down in the mines, but I recognize the fact that these men now have a means of livelihood there, and that money is invested in these operations that are being displaced. There should be a transitional program when markets are being lost because of such advances, and people living in these areas should be given a chance to protect their investment. They should be given the opportunity to secure employment in order that they may live, eat, wear clothes, have homes and pay taxes. The man in the street, who could contribute to the pool of wealth, is not much good to the country if he is just walking the street and drawing something from the pool without contributing to it.

Considerable encouragement is to be found in the research that is now being carried on. I noticed another article in the Chronicle-Herald with the heading, "Coal Research Program Reviewed by Experts, Progress is Reported." A search is being made for other uses for coal rather than just burning it and letting it go up the chimney in smoke. That is encouraging. One never knows what may come out of it. The Halifax Chronicle-Herald suggests, and I think rightly so, that in the transitional period it may be necessary for the coal board and the government to get together and decide whether more assistance is not necessary for the industry until such time as the picture is clearer. The subventions were fixed some ten years ago. They are statutory, and in the light of the new circumstances, the drop in production and the worsening of the position with respect to markets, it may be necessary to sit down with the coal operators, have a look at the subventions and see whether additional assistance is not necessary.

There is another encouraging feature, as pointed out by Mr. Gordon before the committee. I refer to the good future in Canada for gas turbines, as reported by a Vickers engineer. Research is going on, and it may be possible that the diesel will be displaced by the gas turbine engine which will burn coal. All these things are encouraging. I raise the question at this time because the government has a huge investment in the coal industry. For instance, the government has made a loan of $375,000 to the Avon Coal Company. The Dominion Coal Company has a program of mechanization under way at the present time which will cost $13 million when completed. To that end a loan of $7,500,000 has been advanced by the dominion government to this company. Four Star Collieries Limited has a loan of $100,000 from the dominion government.

If the industry is as shaky as indicated by Mr. Gordon and Mr. Forsyth when reporting to his board of directors, I find it hard to understand why the government would lend such a large amount of money to an industry whose future looks so bleak. I do not think it is as bleak as it looks, and if there is a proper approach to the problem by the government, the coal board, the operators and the miners themselves, the industry has a future in the production of steel. The logical place to expand the production of steel is in that part of the country. The logical place to do some fabrication and to have some subsidiary industry built around steel is in that part of the country. All the ingredients necessary to make steel are there, with iron ore ninety miles away, coal within ten miles of the steel plant, and a huge establishment there with many trained personnel in the community, many of whom are unemployed at the present time. I hope the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) with his coal board will keep in touch with those responsible for the operation of the industry and with the miners themselves so that while this transition is taking place during this new industrial revolution the shock of displacement will be lessened as much as possible.

I am sorry I had to take this much time for the second time in this debate, but I did feel it necessary to deal with the two subjects on which I have spoken.

(Translation):

Mr. P. L. Dubé (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the occasion offered by the debate on the budget to inform the government that I have received a large number of representations from my constituents, asking me to take steps with the proper department so that the sums paid out under the Family Allowances Act as well as the Old Age Security Act be increased to compensate for the high cost of living.

I do not hesitate to declare, Mr. Speaker, that family allowances and old age pensions should be raised in proportion to the cost of living—as was done for the whole salary scale—so that these social services, so well initiated by the present government, may be appreciated as fully by every Canadian mother as they have been in the past. Family allowances, after all, are given to mothers as a salary, to help them improve their children's food and shelter.

I sincerely believe, therefore, that family allowances should be increased, since it is food especially—milk and meat, for instance, which are essential for a proper diet—and the price of rents and heating that have gone up the most.

A single person can find a room close to where he or she works. The head of a family cannot. He has to find a house—children are no longer admitted in apartments—and he must pay heating and transportation, the cost of the latter having almost doubled these last few years. A single person can balance his or her budget, but the head of a family cannot, with prices being what they are. One need only inquire at the banks and loan companies to know or to find out in what state of anxiety some householders are living today.

I also ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to give consideration to heads of families who send their children over 21 years of age to a university. I do hope the minister will take into consideration the remarks I am now making and that he will see to it that an exemption is granted to the heads of families who are doing their utmost to have their children educated and thus give Canada a pick of young people who will be a credit to our country. Many fathers are obliged to withdraw their children from schools and colleges because of a lack of co-operation on the part of the authorities of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude by saying that I was very much surprised to learn that family allowance and old age pension cheques are bilingual only in the province of Quebec. I think it is my duty to draw the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to the fact that I have already received several requests from people in my province asking me to urge the minister to have all cheques issued in both official languages.

I believe they are entitled to demand this, for it is one of the prerogatives recognized and granted by the British North America Act of 1867. In the name of all my constituents, I therefore ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to remedy this situation which has been in existence for quite a time, in order to be fair to all without prejudice to anyone.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Before this debate concludes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations, particularly after listening to the speech of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) Friday afternoon, during which we heard his humorous auctioneering of mid-Victorian tax policies. The hon. member said time and again that the power to tax is the power to destroy and in that connection I want to bring to the attention of the house the position of this group in respect to taxation; for this group believes the power to tax is the power to distribute.

Before proceeding I do want to say for the information of the parliamentary assistant that I for one appreciated receiving the booklet, "Budget Papers", giving an explanation of the budget. It is a most useful document for members of this house who want to understand clearly the implications of the budget, many of which they would be unable to understand without the assistance of the explanations given in the booklet.

As I said a moment ago, I wish to make a few observations on the point of view of this group with respect to taxation; the philosophy of taxation, shall I say, from the point of view of this group. As we see it the purpose of all income taxation is to obtain a redistribution of the national income and to pay socially for certain services which cannot be properly provided by the individual. I think a review of history will show that larger budgets have almost always provided a greater redistribution of income for the lower income groups through some form of social service, welfare service or government service. As socialists we have no hesitation in saying that we believe income taxation the fairest form of taxation yet devised by the parliamentary system. As socialists we are concerned that expenditures shall be useful and socially desirable. Secondly, we are very much concerned that the money voted by parliament shall be spent efficiently and without waste. I think that is evidenced by the desire at all times on the part of members of this group to examine and inquire carefully into the expenditures provided for in the estimates. I am pleased to see that we have at least half the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) in the chamber at the present time.

Mr. Gibson: It is a pleasure. I was wondering if the hon. member was speaking for the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) in connection with these questions of taxation.

Mr. Herridge: I do not intend to reply to facetious remarks. Regardless of the fact that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe emphasized that taxation is the power to destroy, I am sure no one would wish to return to the days of small budgets and no income taxation in this country. Just for a moment or two I want to review the history of income taxation as it has evolved in Great Britain, the United States and Canada over the last hundred years.

Great Britain has had some form of income taxation for over a hundred years. It was given effect to at the beginning of the nineteenth century. It was dropped. It was given effect to again, and again dropped. As a matter of fact there was no effective form of income taxation in Great Britain until the concluding days of the nineteenth century.

What did we have when we had these small budgets, when budgets were supposed to provide only for the army, the navy, the police and the bare necessities of government? We had the industries of Manchester, with the Lancashire cotton mills making the largest percentage profits in history in relation to the total capital investment. At the same time we had poverty and slums. We had the coal mines in Lancashire and in Wales also making the largest profits in modern commercial history in relation to the investment, and at the same time we had child labour, hovels and squalor. At the same time we also had the great landowners in Great Britain, with their large returns, their elegance and their security, with farm labourers being paid a wage that provided a bare existence. The adoption of a measure of income tax in Great Britain in the latter days of the nineteenth century was also the beginning of the first form of social welfare legislation in that country.

If you read the records of the British parliament, of the American congress or our own Hansard you will find that large corporations and wealthy individuals fought the imposition of the income tax and described it as unethical and financially unsound. Repeatedly was heard the slogan that taxation is the power to destroy. You find that in the records of the British parliament. Another slogan was that the income tax was a method of soaking the rich. Those slogans have been in existence since the first liberal or reform-thinking people conceived of an income tax as a fair form of redistributing the wealth.

When we come to the United States, what do we find? Income tax proposals were advanced in the congress of the United States in the latter days of the nineteenth century and they were fought vigorously. Prior to the bringing in of income tax legislation we had the meat packing industry and the steel industry, making enormous profits, slums in Chicago, slums in Pittsburgh, and poverty, fortunes in railroad building, fortunes in land speculation, fortunes in grain speculation while farmers were robbed of their fair share of the national income and left in a most insecure position.

As I read the record, in the United States congress in 1894 attempts were made to pass legislation providing for income tax in that country, and the same people who say that taxation is the power to destroy, when income tax is mentioned, were the people who termed that legislation as a "communistic socialist march". I am exceedingly glad that we have gone a long way since that time. However, as a result of the efforts of the people who really saw that income tax provided an opportunity to redistribute wealth under capitalism, on July 12, 1909, a joint resolution was passed by both houses of congress recommending a law to levy an income tax. Yet we find even in the United States during the depression, former President Hoover still pleading with congress for a small and balanced budget and for a paring of expenses to the bone in an effort to protect investments and to protect capital. At the same time the standards of living in the United States fell to a disastrous level.

What is our Canadian experience? I think the income tax was first given effect to in Canada during the first world war, owing to the necessity of raising an unusually large amount of revenue with which to prosecute the war. From that time on it has been more or less generally accepted, although the rates were fairly low until recent years. But what happened in Canada? The point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that a person's attitude towards taxation reflects one's attitude to life.

We can remember the depression budget of Lord Bennett in 1931, and what happened. Still in the belief that taxation is the power to destroy; still in the belief that one must reduce expenses, must pare them to the bone and must consider investments before human beings, in the budget of 1931 income tax was increased in the medium brackets but was reduced in the higher brackets, sales tax was increased from one per cent to four per cent, and there was an increase in postal charges in Canada.

What was the result of that taxation philosophy? We had thousands of single men unemployed in this country and receiving twenty cents a day in relief camps. Many farmers across Canada lost their farms to mortgage companies and many small businesses went into bankruptcy. All of that happened just because of that approach to the question of taxation and the desire to protect investments. That was done sincerely because those in control believed that investments were the bedrock of security in the country and therefore there was this policy to protect investments.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly.

Mr. Brooks: Does he believe that the depression had anything to do with it at all?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly I would not blame any government for the total effect of the depression. It was a world-wide depression and it affected our external markets and so on. But I think that a different taxation policy, with the use of the national credit, would have made it possible during the depression to employ people—at building houses and doing constructive things in Canada which would be useful, and which would be much appreciated at this time—rather than to pay men twenty cents a day in relief camps.

That is all I am going to say in that respect, Mr. Speaker, except that recently I was reading a book on taxation—and I thought it was a good one—entitled "Taxation for Prosperity", by Randolph E. Paul. I want to quote briefly from that book, because I think in one paragraph is to be found an excellent statement of a philosophy so far as the purposes of taxation are concerned. At page 207 of this book I read:

> What is required is that we build a tax system which is intelligently directed toward creating and maintaining the kind of world we want. The basic struggle hinges on our choice of worlds. The later, and more technical, struggle is concerned with means to the desired end, that is, the specific taxes we select. The battleground of conflict will not always be sharply delineated. The critics of particular taxes frequently say one thing and mean another. The real objection to a tax may be that it tends to produce the kind of economic or social order which its opponent does not want. But the critic does not always speak out in such ultimate and candid terms. He pleads that the tax will not produce revenue, or cannot be administered, or that taxes should not be used to promote social and economic results. Even while his objection is premised on fear that a particular tax will have unwanted social and economic consequences, he may deprecate the notion that taxes can produce such effects. But we need not let our thinking be confused across levels. The fundamental question is always the kind of world we want; our choice of taxes is always a selection of means to that end.

That is why we in this group believe that income taxation provides an opportunity under capitalism for the redistribution of wealth. That is why we in the C.C.F. have pioneered the fight for universal old age security without a means test; and we will continue to do so because we believe it is still sound and practical. That is why we in this group have continued to support proposals for all the nation's children to receive family allowances without a means test, and will continue to support those proposals.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) made some reference to old age security and family allowances without a means test. He mentioned that there was some saving in connection with administration costs. We support these proposals because we believe that the return of payments by those in the higher income brackets in connection with old age security and family allowances, after a very close examination, show that there is no loss to the treasury, but a great saving, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said, in the administration costs of this legislation. That is why the C.C.F. continues to fight for an adequate and sound superannuation scheme for all our civil servants—I might say at this point, including some persons who work as stenographers in the House of Commons or for parliament, and have done so for a good number of years. They should have the opportunity of being retired on a decent pension. Some are working now only because there is no pension in existence. We believe they are entitled to that, and that this country is quite willing and able to provide it.

I might also say that is why we in this group support the practice of sending literature free to farmers. Business has its trade commissioners all over the world. Business is provided a great deal of service, the international trade fair, literature and other services. We certainly believe it is good policy to supply the farmers of this country with free literature, because it is a part of our educational program; and secondly, this literature has been and will continue to be of great assistance to promote increased production. I know that as far as I am personally concerned, and many of my neighbours, we have found this literature most valuable. To illustrate, Mr. Speaker, I am going to tell the house a story. We had in our district a very estimable English settler. When many of our settlers came out they had not been farming before, and they were somewhat new to Canadian conditions, and did many things that any farmer would not do, and which they corrected as a result of experience. I remember this friend of mine, a fine gentleman, ordered 200 day-old chicks from a hatchery, and put them under setting hens. They gradually began to die, until half of them had died. He wrote to the local poultry inspector for his advice and information. The man came and examined them and said: "Are you doing this and doing that?" He finally asked: "What are you feeding these chicks?" My friend replied: "Why, feeding them, you silly ass, doesn't the mother feed them?" My point is this. The man wanted to get some information. The inspector said: "If I were you, I would write to the Department of Agriculture; you can get a bulletin there on any subject." He wrote to the Department of Agriculture, and continued to write to the Department of Agriculture, and from then on he never made such glaring mistakes as that.

We in this group also consider that the overseas broadcasts are an instructive contribution to world understanding and peace. We consider them a good investment for the total amount involved. It at least shows that we in this country are trying to promote an understanding with the people behind the iron curtain. And since they do not have an opportunity to hear directly from us, they can hear from us in this way.

I now intend to make some criticisms of the budget. I may say before passing on to them that we in this group are not in the habit of asking for increases in old age security payments, increases in family allowances or increases in veterans pensions without being willing to get up at the same time and support increased taxation on a fair basis to meet those payments. Mr. Speaker, I have a few criticisms of the budget to make and they are mainly on the ground that something more could be done to equalize the burden more fairly on the Canadian people. We believe that the present income tax exemption should be raised from $1,000 to $1,500 for single persons and from $2,000 to $3,000 for married persons. Our leader dealt with this question on the occasion of his budget speech last year, and I want to re-emphasize his representations in that connection. We believe we are sound in this suggestion because business is allowed exemption for the cost of operation, repairs, depreciation and transportation expenses. Why not do the same things for human beings?

At this point I want to bring to the attention of the minister and of the parliamentary assistant a situation which exists in my constituency, and which I think must exist in many districts. I think this matter should receive some serious consideration by the minister. I am making direct reference to the employees of the Canadian Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. Many of them live up to 25 miles away from their work, because of better living conditions and the opportunity to live in the country, away from the plant itself, and away from the congested city conditions. They drive back and forth night and morning to their employment. In fact, if many of them did not live at this distance there would not be housing for all the employees of that company. This is a considerable expense to these employees. They have co-operative societies. They own buses. Their transportation is actually provided at cost, as the result of co-operation. Thousands of these men have to travel some distance every day. I have had talks with quite a number of the men. They have also written to me and they have suggested that it would only be fair if they were allowed that cost of transportation to and from work daily. They say it should be allowed as an exemption from their income for computing income tax. I do ask the minister to give consideration to their suggestion. I think it is fair. It is a cost which the men cannot avoid. It is a daily cost, and in the period of a year it amounts to a considerable sum. Once again I do urge that the minister give some consideration to permitting the men to charge these costs as an exemption before the income tax is calculated. As I said before, we make all kinds of allowances for business. Why can we not make the same allowances for the human machine? That is why we in this group suggest that the exemption for single and married men could be raised.

I think it would be quite fair for the minister to say: Where would we obtain the revenue that would be lost in increasing the exemptions to single and married persons? We in this group suggest there could be an increase in tax on the higher corporations; that we could have an excess profits tax according to the balance sheet of several of the large corporations in this country, and there could be increased rates of taxation on the higher incomes, and there could be very fairly a capital gains tax. There are gains in the sales of stocks; there are gains in the quick turnover of real estate and there are gains in parimutuel betting and lotteries, and things of that sort. We believe that increases in these fields I have mentioned would counterbalance any money lost in increasing the size of the exemption for the people in the lower income groups.

In his speech the minister claimed that he had about reached the limit of corporation taxation in Canada. In that connection I want to quote briefly from two or three papers I have before concluding my remarks. I have in my hand the Christian Science Monitor of April 26. This paper contains a very interesting article entitled: "That Hum? —It's Canada, an intimate message from New York by Harry C. Kenney." I am going to quote three short paragraphs. This is an article written by an American about Canadian conditions:

> Yet, today, a country is mentioned—perhaps offhand in the course of business conversation—and suddenly a sparkle comes to their eyes. Their thinking sharpens. Their "built in" desire to accomplish bristles. That country is Canada. The word here is "watch it."

With that I agree. I continue:

> The country to the north is growing in importance and is expected to become one of the world's great industrial powers. Why? Because it has resources. This is what the industrialists and businessmen in this country are interested in. What is inspiring and hopeful to investors, financiers, businessmen, and industrialists here is that the Canadian government is ready to do business on fair terms. Federal controls are few and profits on investments have been exceeding investments in the United States due to a more favourable tax structure and the government's helpful attitude in the development of industry.

Then, again, in conclusion:

> One can almost see the skyscrapers of New York leaning to the north as the men who know scan a new horizon.

Then, I should like to quote from a magazine, U.S. News and World Report. This is the issue of April 18, 1952, and I place this on the record in answer to the minister's claim that the taxing of incomes of corporations has about reached its limit in Canada. At page 84 of the publication I find this:

> Corporation Taxes to be Reduced in Canada
> The personal income tax in the United States is much heavier.
> For example, a U.S. bachelor with a net income of $2,000 pays $311. A Canadian bachelor with the same income pays $170.
> It should be noted, too, that 31 American states and a number of cities impose income taxes of their own. There are no provincial or local taxes on personal incomes in Canada.
> Corporations, like individuals, are to get a slight reduction in tax rates under the new Canadian budget.
> The result will be that, so far as the central government in Canada is concerned, the top effective tax rate on corporations will be 45 per cent. In addition, there are provincial taxes of 5 to 7 per cent.
> Canada has no excess profits tax, and the new budget proposes none.
> In the United States, corporations pay a regular federal tax of 52 per cent, plus an excess profits tax of 30 per cent. The average federal tax is about 60 per cent. On top of that, 32 states impose relatively small taxes.
> So the Canadian corporation, by comparison, comes off fairly easily. Still, Mr. Abbott told Commons that the cut he recommended in corporation taxes was too sparing. He added:
> "Excessive rates of tax on corporate incomes, if long maintained, can do a grave damage to the economy as a whole, and if I had more leeway for tax abatement, it is to corporate and personal income tax that I would give first consideration."

I have quoted these two items in support of my argument that I believe fully the minister could increase exemptions on personal income tax, and recoup his revenue losses from an increase in taxation on larger corporations, from a limited excess profits tax, from an increased tax on higher incomes, and from the capital gains tax, without affecting the operations of any company.

As has been pointed out by previous speakers, we in this group are critical of the minister because of his failure to remove the four per cent floor on medical expenses. Surely the unanimous opinion of the house, as expressed by a resolution dealing with that subject, should have received more consideration. In conclusion may I reemphasize that this group believes in income taxation as a means to redistribute wealth, and we advance our suggestions as a practical and immediate step to that end.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, during the time at my disposal this afternoon I propose to discuss in a thoroughly friendly way United States foreign policy, either as a means to lasting peace or as a means of interference with the establishment of lasting peace. In this connection I wish to quote from a speech which, it is reported, Mr. Woodward, United States ambassador to Canada, is giving in southern Ontario towns. This quotation is from an American publication called Labour, in its issue of April 26, 1952. This is what it says:

> Woodward, who is making a speaking tour in southern Ontario, emphasized that the U.S. is now striving "to promote conditions throughout the world which will make peace possible."
> He added: "In simple terms we must set up an environment in which peace can flourish. We need to provide economic and social aid to both the war-devastated and the underdeveloped lands, so that their peoples can satisfy material, social and spiritual needs.
> "We are not trying to establish an international dole. Self-help is the only way that people can grow. Our aid can only be a stimulus to the efforts of the peoples themselves. At the same time, we must extend the helping hand to those living at barest subsistence levels."
> However, Woodward continued, implementation of this policy cannot be accomplished by unilateral action alone. "The safety of every nation," he declared, "is bound to that of others. Collectively we can so organize as to prevent the fall of any single nation. For this reason, the U.S. has consistently supported the United Nations."

Further on in the report he states:

> "Yet, while we rearm, we remain determined not to neglect our own well-being or our program of preserving peace through economic aid to others. We know full well that our own security is intimately related to the economic strength of our friends."
> He reaffirmed the position of the U.S. towards the concept of collective action. "We do not go the path alone, we are fully conscious of the importance of collective action," Woodward asserted. "We will continue to support the United Nations. We will continue to develop the North Atlantic Treaty Organization."

The whole tenor of that report is highly commendable. Anyone reading it, or anyone listening to Mr. Woodward's speech, undoubtedly would be impressed with the idea that the United States actually is pursuing policies conducive to lasting peace. Mr. Woodward is manifestly sincere; of that there can be no question. He is genuinely sincere in the belief that his country is really striving to promote throughout the world conditions which will make peace possible, and to set up an environment in which peace can flourish. Mr. Woodward is convinced, when he says:

> "We know full well that our own security is intimately related to the economic strength of our friends."
> "We do not go the path alone, we are fully conscious of the importance of collective action. We will continue to develop the North Atlantic Treaty Organization."

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Woodward is confident that his country will be working toward the laudable objectives he envisages when, and so long as, it will continue to support the United Nations and to develop the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

I wonder if Mr. Woodward has had time to study fully the meaning of the United Nations and the organization known as NATO. I propose now to devote a little time to the consideration of those two organizations.

This parliament in 1945 rushed into the acceptance of the United Nations, little realizing just what it was running into—just as it rushed into the acceptance of Bretton Woods, with hardly anyone, with the exception of the Social Crediters, dreaming of what that agreement involved. Most members are only now beginning to find out what kind of noose we put our heads into when we accepted those two commitments.

Now parliament has rushed into the NATO organization with very little real comprehension of what that organization stands for or involves; so far as I know it has never been explained to us in elucidating detail. Does Mr. Woodward know that if not specifically stated it is clearly implied, in the United Nations charter, that that charter is, in essence, a glorified embodiment of four most pernicious concepts? This will come as a surprise, not only to Mr. Woodward but I imagine to nearly all people in the United States and in Canada including members of this house.

Those concepts are: First, the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause designed to be expressed in, and enforced through the international trade agreement and the international trade organization.

Second, the unlimited pursuit of favourable trade balances with no practical assured provision whereby the victims of the process can possibly liquidate the international debts inevitably imposed and saddled upon them by the more favoured nations while those favoured nations are achieving favourable trade balances, the working out of this mischievous concept and its devastating effects being by its United States advocates called by the deceptive euphemism "expansionist policy".

Third, an internationalist world federation headed by, controlled by and ultimately dictated to by, the United States of America, and the United States of America alone.

Fourth, an international gold standard expressed in and enforced through the international monetary fund provided for in the Bretton Woods agreement.

If my time will permit I intend to develop adequately each of these four pernicious concepts and show the accuracy of what I have said concerning them. If not, I shall endeavour to cover briefly with some degree of adequacy these important aspects of the international situation as they confront us today, and point out, or at least imply, how hopeless it is for people who are pursuing policies such as are embodied in the United Nations charter to obtain a lasting peace.

What evidence can be adduced to establish my contention that the United Nations charter does embody principles based upon these four pernicious concepts? May we deal with each of these concepts in turn? I should like to quote from a book of great value called "The British Declaration of Independence," which is a recent work by Henry Drummond-Wolff, one of the most able students of our times, and critics of our ways. On page 34 he said:

> The structure of the United Nations is determined by the most-favoured-nation principle and expansionist policy. The organization forms the nucleus of international federation and is situated in the United States.

Mr. Drummond-Wolff is famous for his brevity and conciseness; he is famous for the amount of information which he can crowd into a few words.

This quotation definitely conveys that the most-favoured-nation principle is designed to be the determining factor in shaping the policies of the United Nations. The international trade organization is one of the specialized agencies of the United Nations. All the proceedings of that organization up to the present time have indicated that the sole objective behind the authors and designers of the international trade organization was to destroy the principle of imperial preferences throughout the British empire and prevent that principle being applied by other nations.

Hon. members who did me the honour of listening to my remarks on April 9 or of reading my speech will remember that I pointed out that it was the determination by the United States to prevent Japan from using preferences in her dealings with China, and the equal determination by Japan that she would use preferences because she had to in order to live, that brought on the war between the United States and Japan in world war II. As I pointed out on that occasion, this is a desperate matter to everyone who is anxious to establish peace in this world of ours.

In the course of the endeavours to establish the international trade organization hon. members will recall that conferences were held at Geneva, Havana, Annecy and Torquay. The United States representatives at those conferences seemed to be actuated by only one motive, to beat down imperial preferences. They wanted to beat down the tariff protection of other nations but at the same time maintain their own tariff protection at a level high enough to enable them to use that device in conjunction with the various other techniques which they employ to hinder imports from coming into the United States, to keep out goods from almost any nation in the world. All these conferences indicated with abundant clarity the type of thinking that actuated United States leaders. They were all for the elimination of preferential tariffs and bilateral agreements.

That ought to be sufficient to establish the first of my four points. If the international trade organization was to be one of the specialized agencies through which the United Nations was to work, and if the objective of that organization was to eliminate imperial preferences and the use of preferences throughout the world, then beyond all shadow of a doubt the objective of the international trade organization and everything pertaining to it was to jam down the world's throat the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause.

Those who are interested in this matter will find some profit I believe in reading my speech on April 2 in which I discussed the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause with the object of enabling people out in the country and on farms to get some idea as to what this thing was all about and how it would work.

The quotation which I have already read establishes the accuracy of my statement to the effect that the United Nations charter embodies the freedom for a nation adequately powerful to pursue unlimited favourable trade balances. This freedom to pursue unlimited favourable trade balances is what the United States calls an expansionist policy. The ordinary individual reading about expansionist policies will surely say, "I believe in an expansionist policy; certainly I do." But what is the use of our believing in an expansionist policy when the only nation that can actually expand unlimitedly in accordance with that concept is the United States? What the United States was actually standing for was an expansionist policy primarily if not wholly for and in behalf of the United States.

As an illustration which will help us to think a bit concretely about this matter, in 1947 the United States exported between $11 billion and $12 billion of goods more than she imported. It must be obvious to anyone that it is utterly impossible for the people of the world to live in a community of nations in which the United States is free to go on doing that kind of thing indefinitely, with no check, no balance, no restriction, no means to rectify the wrong which is being committed. There is no way whereby this $11 billion or $12 billion can be paid off.

I turn to the third principle. The quotation I gave a while ago establishes the soundness of my contention concerning a dictatorship under an internationalist federation ruled by the United States. The foundations of this mechanism were laid in the Dumbarton Oaks conference meeting in two sessions, first, between Russia, the United Kingdom and the United States from August 21 to September 28, 1944, and second, between China, the United Kingdom and the United States from September 29 to October 7, 1944. Those who wish to check on this point may refer to page 263 of the World Almanac for 1952.

Chapter 1, section 1, of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals for a joint international organization reads as follows:

> The purposes of the organization should be to maintain international peace and security; and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace.

This may be checked by reference to the United Nations conference on international organization, volume 3, page 2, to be found in our own library.

Could anyone imagine more convincing proof of dictatorship objective with the United States telling the world what to do, than we see developing in the NATO organization? There is only one authority in the world that is trying to tell the other nations what to do, and that is the United States. She is not only telling them what to do but is forcing them to do it by every economic means at her disposal, and she has an abundance thereof. We see the thing working out. We heard a member of the house talking in favour of it only the other day.

There remains my assertion that the United Nations charter embodies an international gold standard under the international monetary fund. Is that assertion based upon truth and sound logic? In order to establish what I want to say I must read an authority whom I think everyone will find beyond any question whatsoever.

First, however, let me recall for the house that the Bretton Woods agreement was one of the first specialized agencies established by the United Nations. In fact the Bretton Woods agreement was all settled and signed by a conference in July, 1944, before the San Francisco conference of 1945 took place. We in Canada merely rubberstamped, during the dying hours of the fall session of 1945, what had been done at the Bretton Woods conference. Members of the house would not even listen to any kind of reasoning as to the recklessness of our behaviour in thus dashing into acceptance of this dangerous document, a document to be proved even more and more dangerous as the days went by.

In support of what I have said concerning the Bretton Woods agreement and the gold standard I should like to read now from an article written by Paul Einzig, one of the most brilliant and authentic young economists in the world today. The article I am reading is taken from the April 7, 1945, issue of a periodical published in Toronto, Canada, in those days, under the name, The News. Here are the words:

> It must be clear to those who understand the meaning of the report of the Bretton Woods international monetary conference, that the experts of forty-four nations have agreed on a return to the gold standard after the war. Unfortunately, very few laymen can possibly understand the report. If the public were to realize what it is being led into it would raise its voice in a powerful protest, instead of allowing the experts a free hand to do their worst, as they did in 1925.

That is, when England went back to the gold standard after world war I. I continue:

> Some weeks ago Lord Bradbury, in a letter to the Times, complained that the previous joint statement of the allied experts on the post-war monetary system, which was published in April, so far from being plain English was hardly even English at all. Yet that document was clarity itself compared with the tangle of tricky technical clauses contained in the final draft of the experts' plan of the new gold standard. These clauses conceal from the British public the fact that, for the second time within the life of the present generation, sterling is going to be linked with gold, this time much more rigidly even than nineteen years ago.
> In 1925 the gold standard was, at any rate, restored in the full light of publicity. The public knew what was happening. It had only itself to blame for having failed to heed the advice of the lone voices crying in the wilderness—that of the Daily Express prominently among them—warning the country against the consequences of the proposed step. In 1944, on the other hand, the public is only too well aware that a return to the gold standard would be unmitigated evil, spelling ruin and misery. It would now be politically impossible to reintroduce the gold standard openly. But it is being introduced just the same, this time in disguise, under another name. The public is lulled into a false feeling of security by being told again and again that the new system is not the gold standard.
> And the text of the measures with the aid of which sterling is supposed to be wedded to gold has been made so obscure and complicated that even the expert, with the specialized study of a lifetime behind him, has to read it many times before fully grasping its true meaning. Yet, once the plan is translated into intelligible English and is denuded of all camouflage, every layman of normal intelligence is bound to realize that it is the gold standard, the full gold standard, and nothing but the gold standard.

Admittedly, it is a different gold standard from the one we abandoned in 1931, just as the gold standard adopted in 1925 was different from the one suspended in 1914. But the changes are, for the most part, considerably for the worse.

That is striking enough, is it not? I do not know whether or not members would be prepared to accept readily the words of Paul Einzig. There is no greater authority on monetary matters, national and international, than Paul Einzig, but in case they might desire a little more evidence on this matter of Bretton Woods I should like to quote the words of Mr. René Léon in his book, "Bretton Woods". The passage from his book is found in a very fine book called "The Awakening" by L. S. Amery, published in 1948. It reads as follows:

Under conditions of extreme readjustment, social, political and economic, can expansion of trade and also balance be achieved on the basis of fixed exchanges? My answer is, No . . . To harness world economy to static exchanges at such a time and under such conditions is to stifle action and obstruct reaction, because it is by their very fluctuations that the exchanges create those correctives which make for balance in international trade relations. . . . Fixed exchanges are the conduits through which economic ills will flow and spread across national boundaries. They will shackle the weak economies to the strong, and debilitate the strong without strengthening the weak. The sum of all economic activities will be a gravitation downwards towards a generally lower standard of life all round . . .

I leave that for hon. members to take at face value. It is perfectly clear that what Mr. Léon foresaw is occurring today. In spite of the fact that we are engaged in a cold war and preparation for war on a huge scale, we still see danger signs of the breakdown of the system we are trying to make operate.

I believe I should quote one more passage from Paul Einzig's work because it is of such value to all those who are really interested in trying to see their way through the difficulties of our times. Speaking of Britain he says:

But let the reader judge for himself from the following facts:

(1) Under the old gold standard the value of sterling was legally fixed in terms of a given weight of gold. This will be precisely the same under the new gold standard.

(2) Under the old gold standard our monetary authorities were under the obligation to buy and sell gold freely at a fixed buying and selling price. This will be the same under the new gold standard, with the difference that gold will not be available for internal hoarding.

But then even under the gold standard of 1925 the authorities had the right to call in hoarded gold in excess of 10,000, so that this difference is not very important.

Under the old gold standard sterling was allowed to fluctuate within a range of about 1 per cent. Under the new gold standard its range of fluctuations has been rigidly fixed at 1 per cent.

Under the old gold standard there was no limit for the fluctuation of the price of sterling for future delivery. In this respect the new gold standard is much more rigid, for under it a limit will be set also to the fluctuations of "forward" sterling.

When, before 1931, Britsh export trade was handicapped by the unduly high exchange value of sterling, the cheapening of the price of "forward" sterling bought in advance by foreign importers to pay for British goods to be delivered later provided some relief. Under the new gold standard there can be no such relief.

I have several other quotations along this line with which I do not think I will burden the house; but those facts which Paul Einzig has given concerning the Bretton Woods agreement and its application in Britain must be evidence beyond question that as far as exchange is concerned things are far worse under the United Nations, with its Bretton Woods gold standard agreement, than they were before.

I am sure Mr. Woodward will read these remarks of mine, and I want him to know that I have the kindliest feelings toward him and his nation, but I do hope they will discover the error of their ways before it is too terribly late. I would like to ask Mr. Woodward, whether or not he thinks the four principles or four concepts I have indicated as being in operation in the world under the United Nations charter are conducive to world peace. I would ask him how in the world he believes they can be. I may say more about that.

He may doubt the prevalence and the ill-effects of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause. I would invite him to recall with me certain facts about his country's history since the beginning of world war I. These facts taken together and appropriately related to each other will, I fancy, tend fully to convince him that ever since at least as far back as January 8, 1918, the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause has been a guiding consideration in drafting United States foreign policy pertaining to trade.

On January 8, 1918, President Wilson, in a speech before congress, made a statement of the war aims and peace terms of the United States, enunciating his famous fourteen points.

The third of those fourteen points was worded as follows:

The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

That unquestionably is a call for the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause. Let me adduce in this connection some evidence that I believe deserves respect. I refer to "The Commonwealth" a relatively recent work written by the British economist, Henry Drummond-Wolff, to whom I have already referred, published recently by Hutchinson and Company, London, New York, Melbourne, Sydney and Capetown. From page 9 I quote:

In 1922, the United States, having become the principal creditor, changed its traditional most-favoured-nation policy from the conditional to the unconditional form.

And on the same page:

The effect of this change was described by the economic committee of the league of nations on September 12, 1936, in the following terms:

"The United States adopted the principle of the unconditional clause, but as they did not at the same time adopt a policy of tariff agreements the clause—for which they invariably pressed—enabled them to continue to impose duties, which were in some cases prohibitive, without fear of discrimination, while they had the benefit of all concessions made to one another by other countries.

In April, 1925, the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Winston Churchill, restored the gold standard. Western Europe was exposed to dumping from the Soviet union and to imports of low cost surpluses from the United States. Tied to the gold standard and prevented by the most-favoured-nation clause from exchanging complementary trade among themselves, European countries were compelled to borrow heavily.

That does not speak very well for the principles underlying the new system that was set up through the United Nations charter, does it? Then from pages 22 and 23 I quote:

The principal creditor maintains its condition of monopoly through control of monetary gold, guaranteed markets, export of surplus production and unrestrained price competition. The insistence by corporations, on unconditional most-favoured-nation rights throughout the world, leads to the denial of export trade to nations that, possessing adverse balances, are deficient in monetary gold, foreign investments, exchange and credit.

Genuine equality of treatment and opportunity would demand equality of producing, consuming and purchasing power, which depend on access on equal terms to trade and to the raw materials of the world.

Access on equal terms is not provided by an equal, legal right to purchase in the open market. It becomes a reality only when nations receive equal access to effective reciprocity through bilateral and regional action. Promiscuous, multilateral commerce cannot afford effective reciprocity.

And again from the same page:

The most favoured nation thus enjoys favourable balances, and money returns from external sources. The less favoured nations suffer adverse balances and are compelled to increase their foreign debt in order to avoid default. They are subjected to exploitation and domination which they will, sooner or later, resist by force.

That is quite clear. Again I quote from page 28:

The gold standard—most favoured nation mechanism is the cause of booms and depressions. It prevents the free, regional co-operation of sovereign nations, through effective reciprocity.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Then from page 30, referring to expressions used in the Atlantic charter, Henry Drummond-Wolff has this to say:

"Access on equal terms" can be achieved only by the better or, if necessary, complete balancing of trade through bilateral or regional reciprocity. Such reciprocity can be effected only by preferences or priorities. It is not provided by "reciprocal" trade agreements that establish a general most favoured nation rate of tariff.

The Atlantic charter opened a new phase in the militant opposition of the United States to preferences and controlled economies.

Once more I would like to ask Mr. Woodward how, in the face of declarations like that, he can conceive that in supporting the United Nations charter the United States is working to establish conditions under which peace "can flourish".

It will be wondered whether or not evidence can be produced to show that the United States has actively used the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause to prevent nations from co-operating with each other. Once more I adduce evidence that cannot be lightly treated. From Henry Drummond-Wolff's "Commonwealth" I quote, this time from page 10:

An attempt by Belgium and Holland to introduce a system of reciprocal tariffs at the Ouchy convention of 1932, was promptly vetoed as conflicting with the most favoured nation principle. Negotiations at Oslo in 1930 and 1937 among the Scandinavian countries were similarly circumscribed. Repeated attempts by the Balkan countries to establish preferences among themselves and with the central European countries were frustrated.

In 1935, Germany's use of exchange control and clearing agreements in southeast Europe was countered by the withholding of most favoured nation rights from her by the United States. This had the effect of imposing a penal rate of tariff against German imports into the American market.

The Anglo-American trade agreement was entered into on November 17, 1938, as a result of powerful pressure from the United States.

Some will wonder whether or not this man Henry Drummond-Wolff is an authority. There is no question that he is a great authority, and knows exactly what he is talking about. His words are weighty words. They contain solemn warnings for us.

Why has the United States inflicted upon the world this unconditional most-favoured-nation clause, and why has she been following the policy which I have indicated in my talk? There is a definite reason. At the close of world war I the United States was a creditor nation for the first time in her history. She was greatly industrialized and thus able to produce more than she could sell to her own people for the purchasing power they were able to obtain. In 1918 she produced $60 billion worth of goods but the effective purchasing power in the hands of her people was only $45 billion distributed, and of that $5 billion went back out of circulation in payment for life insurance and in other kinds of investment which took the money out of consumer purchasing circulation. At that time the United States, realizing that she had more goods being produced than her people were being provided with money to buy, should have introduced social credit. By distributing purchasing power to her people, by the social credit technique, she could easily have kept her people employed, could have raised the standard of living of all of her people, and could have avoided making herself a nuisance in the markets of the world.

But she chose not to do this. Instead, she tried to force her goods into the markets of the world no matter how much injury was thereby done to other nations in the process. In other words, she continued to export her unemployment all over the earth, regardless of whom she hurt.

During the inter-war period the United States had accumulated from annual creditor balances on trade and income account between $13 billion and $14 billion. She had not increased her imports. She had not invested abroad. She had acquired between 85 per cent and 90 per cent of the non-monetary gold stocks of the world. The New Deal had failed after $58 billion was fruitlessly expended upon it.

What was she going to do? In October, 1944, President Roosevelt made a statement that has a tremendously important bearing on this whole matter I am discussing. He said:

> I intend to find jobs for 60 million Americans by trebling our exports abroad.

Thus we find that all the acts, the agreements, the insistencies of the United States during those troublesome times from 1922 to 1933 and onward have been as a result of a selfish though understandable desire on her part to keep her people busy by exporting their goods into the markets of the world in spite of what that could possibly mean to the world.

If we are to find any solution to the troubles which confront the world, may I urge Mr. Woodward that he report to his president and his government that the only possible peaceful solution for the United States and for mankind is to introduce social credit into the United States, enabling her to sell her goods within her own country and thus to take care of that one-third of the United States people who, according to Roosevelt's declaration, are always the submerged third and whose income is so low as to constitute a scandal to the United States of America.

Next, the United States should accept imports that other nations offer her in payment for the goods they wish to buy from her; she should accept those imports, not necessarily to take them into her country to compete with the product of her own producers but to redistribute them to other nations needing such goods. Just think what she could do with regard to cheese for one instance if she accepted it from Canada and western Europe. Think how she could help the needy nations by accepting that cheese, not in order to let it compete with the output of her own producers but to help other needy nations, by sending it abroad to them. This cheese she could buy with debt-free money created by congress under authority granted to it by the constitution of the United States, money like the $450,000,000 of greenbacks, with which Lincoln freed the slaves.

Next the United States should adopt, and lead out in, a system of scientific world distribution based upon the principles of social credit, a system that would enable all the people who produce goods in the world to dispose of their goods profitably to people who need the goods, a system that would enable all the people in the world to derive the benefit they should have from the productive capacity of the other nations of the world.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: I submit this to Mr. Woodward, with all kindliness and good feeling, as being the only possible solution under which "peace can flourish".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, before the house is ready for the question, I have a few remarks I wish to direct to housing. It has already been said in the house by others that in the province of Ontario there is a minimum need for some 450,000 housing units and that in the country as a whole there is a need for some 700,000 units. I think it would be interesting to place on record our achievement with respect to housing since 1946. It is as follows:

	New Homes	New Families
1946	67,200	108,000
1947	79,300	75,000
1948	81,200	83,000
1949	91,000	77,000
1950	91,800	74,000
1951	85,000	96,000
	495,500	513,000

As a result of continuing high employment, a continuing high birth rate, a high rate of family formation and large scale immigration we find ourselves in about the same position with respect to housing as we were in 1945. Despite the achievement—and it was great—we have not made as much progress as we had originally anticipated. In the departmental annual report Mr. Mansur said that on the assumption that an average family cannot afford more than about 23 per cent of its income for shelter, the average prospective home owner in 1950 required a gross income of about $2,700 to purchase a new minimum house. By the end of 1951 family income of about $3,300 was required to meet the debt service on a similar house. The only conclusion that we can draw from that is that now we are rationing houses by purse. Persons with less than $3,000 income—and that is 70 per cent of our population—appear to bear an unfair share of the national sacrifices made necessary by the defence program. Of course the immediate need is for mortgage money to be made readily available, for easier down payments, a longer amortization period and more rental housing of perhaps the multiple type. I think the government should give consideration to further subsidization. When I say that I have in mind that, instead of dealing with the provinces on a basis of 75-25, for low rental housing we could make it more attractive if we put it on the basis of 80-20 or 85-15, in order to give the provinces some greater incentive to start building low rental housing under section 35.

Quoting Mr. Mansur further—he is president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—he said there was a decline of 24 per cent in dwelling starts, which were 72,000 in 1951. He said that situation arises for four reasons and those are—and I quote—(1) shortage of mortgage funds; (2) shortage of serviced lands; (3) large down payment requirements; and (4) increased level of debt service. By that he means increased level of municipal taxes.

Then he has this to say—I am still quoting Mr. Mansur:

> The supply of mortgage funds from all sources under present arrangements constitutes a definite limitation on the value of house building.
> If for social reasons an annual housing program equal to or greater than those accomplished in 1949 and 1950 is a requirement, it may prove necessary to find additional sources of credit to be made available for mortgage on new residential construction.

That is the challenge.

What I have to say is particularly directed to the shortage of mortgage funds. We have in the past always considered mortgage funds as an exclusive field of private enterprise. We have often been asked by private enterprise: Why does the government enter the field of private enterprise? I think the government does it for two primary reasons. First, in the interest of national security. The government has Chalk River, which is the atomic energy plant, and Canadian Arsenals, which make munitions. It was felt that both should be a public endeavour. They also have Polymer, which made synthetic rubber during the war. I do not think anyone quarrels with these three endeavours in the interest of national security; but the government also enters the field of what is considered private enterprise for another reason, and a very good one indeed, and that is to meet a social need and to fill a vacuum in a field vacated by private enterprise.

Historically lending institutions have always made conventional house loans. But from time to time they have left the field open, with the result that the government has had to enter it. I will carry you back first to some 40 years ago when the government, out of a desire to provide a measure of security for the people of this country, passed the annuities act. At that time private enterprise was not interested in writing small annuities. They failed to meet a social need, and they failed to meet a requirement for personal security. Today it is an entirely different picture. Private enterprise is becoming very interested in the annuities field, and is attempting to regain its foothold to the extent that it is alleged that they are doing some lobbying against the government bill which was intended to raise the annuity level from $1,200 to $2,400. It is true and cannot be denied that, at the present time, the dominion government annuity is by far the best and the cheapest annuity on the market. We need to continue in that field in order to meet a need that exists there. We entered the field because private enterprise abdicated it. The government stepped in to meet a social need, which was found very essential by the people. I think it would be well to say here that once government steps into the social field it never vacates it.

Let me again bring to the attention of these lending institutions something that they may have forgotten. Back in 1929 farmers were unable to obtain loans from private institutions on their properties, on land, on livestock, equipment and improvements. It was necessary for the government of the day to pass an act to set up a farm loan board, because the private institutions had turned a cold shoulder to that particular field, and there was urgent need for it. The government is now making a considerable amount of loans in that field. In 1951 they made 3,242 loans, and 94 per cent of the interest that was due was paid. The arrears amounted to less than 2 per cent. Since 1929 they have written 34,485 first mortgages, 17,000 of which have been paid in full. At the end of 1951 they had a profit of $131,705.21. That field was partially abdicated by private enterprise, and the government stepped in again to meet a very great social need.

The Veterans Land Act provides an opportunity for veterans to build their own homes and to own small holdings. I merely indicate that the government has invested some $250 million in 31,000 properties, and they have received in repayment of these loans 95·5 per cent. There again the government stepped in when private enterprise abdicated or refused to participate in that field.

On May 5, 1951, the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) made a statement of policy in this house, and a very interesting statement it was. It provided that a defence worker would be able to obtain a house under very easy conditions. A defence worker is a person certified by his employer to be engaged in the production of defence supplies in a plant designated in whole or in part by the Department of Defence Production as a defence plant. The only requirement was that the house must be owned and occupied by the defence worker. The defence worker can build a house under his own steam, or he can purchase it from a builder who would build it under supervision by the Central Mortgage, which would be the architect, the planner, the guarantor as to quality of building and the adequacy of the house. All he had to pay was 10 per cent down, and it is amortized over a period of some 25 years. The loan would be 90 per cent on the agreed contract price fixed by Central Mortgage, and the monthly payments would include principal, taxes and interest. All the employer had to do was to make monthly deductions to meet the payments while the employee was so employed at the plant. There was to be no liability on the employer at all. If at any time the employee terminated his employment the employer had no further responsibility toward the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and the employee who had obtained a home as a defence worker could retain the home. He could sell the home to other than a defence worker during the five-year period immediately after completion by paying one-ninth of the original amount of the loan. After doing that he could sell it on his own terms. He could sell to another defence worker without having to pay the one-ninth of the original loan.

Up to the present time about 600 homes have been built in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, or are in the process of building. Homes cost from $8,650 on which there is a down payment of $870, and monthly payments of $59 which include principal, interest and taxes, to $10,700 upon which there is a down payment of $1,070 and monthly payments of $71 which include principal, interest and taxes.

It is a bit disheartening and disappointing to know that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have never had an application by a defence worker to build a house. They have never refused an application by a plant to be designated as a defence plant. Yet we find an opportunity there for housing of which no one seems to be aware; and my purpose in speaking today is to try to bring about some awareness of that situation.

Mark you this: the house that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is building for defence workers at a top price of $10,700 is selling privately today for about $14,000. The difference is the profit the builders are obtaining for this same house. Yet, for some reason or another, there are few takers. I cannot understand it.

In the minister's statement of October 5 he had this to say:

> To the extent that mortgage financing is not available from lending institutions for defence workers, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be prepared to make direct loans. The Minister of Defence Production will from time to time designate defence plants to which these special housing arrangements are applicable.

Here, again, was an invitation by the minister asking lending institutions to make money available to defence workers. Lending institutions defaulted again, and it was necessary for the government to step in and to make direct loans.

At the last session of the provincial legislature of Ontario an act was passed authorizing the lending of $10 million to young farmers to start into farming in Ontario. That surely could have been made available by lending institutions, if they had thought it was worth their trouble.

It has been pointed out to me that I have neglected to mention that the government is lending money to veterans, by way of business and professional loans, under plans very similar to those applying to housing. All this business could have been available to the lending institutions of this country if they had wanted to make those loans.

They say they are short of money. The other argument they use is that the bond market gives them a good return. They say that they can obtain 4 per cent or something slightly in excess of that on bonds, and that they receive a better net return on a 4 per cent bond than on a 5½ per cent mortgage. As a matter of fact the bond I have in mind is that of the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission, which was put on the market recently.

That is not the whole story. Last year we amended the Insurance Act, which gave the lending institutions powers far wider than they formerly had, with the result that they can now invest in real estate, in debentures and in common stock, which they were unable to do some years ago. What is happening is this, that these same lending institutions are using their money to buy up large chunks of valuable real estate. I know in my own city of Toronto they are buying office buildings, they may be first class investments—they would know best about that. But, more than that, they are buying up Dominion store, Woolworth store and Loblaw store leases, and holding them as an investment. That is where their money is, with the result that they do not have it available for those people in Canada who need to build homes.

It is true that what they are doing may be more profitable and easier; but on the other hand it seems to me that they have a social responsibility and that, from their point of view, it ought to be more desirable to help build up this country, rather than keep the profit motive entirely before them.

From time to time all of us have seen institutional advertising by mortgage, trust and insurance companies. We see page-size ads in newspapers and magazines showing a picture of two old people, a man and his wife, talking to one another and saying, "We have provided security for ourselves." Then there is some talk about a paid-up pension plan or an annuity. We see at the bottom the name of an insurance company, with information as to its assets, how much insurance it has written, and so on. These are first class ads, and they serve a purpose. It does seem to me that these lending companies have missed a great opportunity.

Why should they not run one of these ads showing a picture of a subdivision of perhaps a hundred houses, with the caption, "We did this with your money. We helped build this subdivision. We financed the building of these houses because we believe it is a good investment. This is what we think you would want us to do with your money."

I had occasion to go out on Sunday to look through some of the subdivisions already completed. It is a pleasure to see them. One sees thousands of small homes with combined living and dining-rooms, small breakfast nooks, modern kitchens, good basements and satisfactory heating units. True, these houses are small—almost like dolls' houses. These subdivisions are filled with children—little ones, some of whom are still creeping, others walking and still others running about. The subdivisions are full of life.

We want these lending institutions to be helpful in building up our country. In those subdivisions we see fathers digging their gardens, building fences, painting and weeding; and unless we make mortgage money available for these kind of people we are not likely to have much more building in this country—unless, of course, we do something about it. And I am about to propose that we do.

I am sure the house will agree with me when I say that the homes built through national housing loans are a complete and absolute answer to communism, nazism, collectivism and totalitarianism. It should be our main objective to make homes for all the Canadian way of life.

If these lending institutions are more concerned with using their gold-plated scissors to clip coupons or to collect rents from downtown office buildings than they are in meeting social needs at a profit, then they are also vacating a field which, traditionally, has been their own. We now have on the statute books the authority to make direct loans for homes. If they are not forthcoming from private enterprise, then there is no alternative for us but to enter the field.

Once we are in the field we will never vacate it. Neither this nor any other parliament will permit us to vacate it. Private enterprise as represented by these various institutions has only itself to blame. They have not discharged a public trust or shown any social consciousness. That field is historically theirs, and I think all of us in this house would want them to continue in it, but if they abdicate and abandon the field, even in a slight degree, then this government must enter that field and improve it in every conceivable way possible. More than that, once we are in the field we will be able to lend money more cheaply and be able to make sure that the people benefit to a greater extent than they are benefiting now.

For the moment we have section 35 of the housing act and we have the defence workers' scheme. We have our hands full in making subsidies available for low rental housing to the people. I appeal to the minister and I submit to the house that this problem must be faced. Complaints have been made from members of the opposition—just the other day we had one from the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland)—that mortgage money is not being made available to all communities. It is claimed that it is partially available only in the larger cities and not in the small municipalities. We ought to make certain that the same facilities are available to them as are available to those who live in the large cities. It is the responsibility of the government to see that that is done. I bring this matter to the attention of the house, of the minister and of the lending institutions now. I suggest to the latter that if they do not fully re-occupy that field on the double the government must enter it at this particular time in order to meet the great need that exists.

Mr. A. C. Murray (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to take part in the budget debate this year. Rising at this time I am faced with the question of what I can say that has not been said already. For my part I do not intend to be associated with all the remarks of those who have spoken in this debate, particularly those who do not see any merit in this year's budget, who seem to have lost all sense of direction and who apparently do not realize that civilization is at stake. Their voices sound like voices crying in the wilderness with no one to lead them out of their Gethsemane. Surely this is a great nation in which we are privileged to live. It was not built on wailings and lamentations; it was built by the hard work, the industry and the integrity of the men and women who came to Canada's shores. So today I prefer to take my stand with the government of today who with equal integrity, with equal industry and with equal hard work is placing first things first for Canada and its people, and sees in the future a great destiny for our country.

I realize that it is not wealth and riches that brings greatness to a nation. Rather it is the men who travel in its service. So at this time I want to join my voice with those who have already paid a tribute in this chamber to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and members of the government of today, who are pursuing the wise course they have followed on behalf of the people of our country. It has been said:

> Give me men to match my mountains,
> Give me men to match my plains;
> Men of courage, men of action,
> Men with Canada in their brains.

It seems to me that that is typical of the St. Laurent government. So I repeat that while there may be nothing new that I can say in this debate, on the other hand it seems to me that there is a need for a repetition and reiteration of those fundamentals and principles upon which our nation was built and likewise upon which this year's budget has been founded.

Assembled as we are here today we represent constituencies, we represent homes, we represent business, we represent agriculture, we represent professional life; we are all wrapped up in this bundle of life. We all have our problems, but I say that whatever those problems are they are not very different from the problems of the men and women living behind the iron curtain or at or near the 38th parallel. After all, it is a way of life—a way of living. We feel that our way of life is the best way, and I for one know that it is. However, in saying that I realize also that there may be a great number of people living within our nation today who apparently have no sense of direction.

It seems that over the years we have developed a sense of speed to the maximum but in co-distinction to that sense of speed we may be co-equally losing our sense of direction. I think it is immeasurably more important to retain a sense of direction, to retain a sound fiscal policy for our nation, to retain a sound budget than it is to retain a sense of speed.

Sometimes I think it is good for all of us to be reminded of the great country in which we are privileged to live. I recall that after last year's budget I took time out to kodak, to develop and to print the finest flower in the garden, the first-prize chrysanthemum—the constituency of Oxford, which I have the honour to represent.

Today I should like to preface my remarks in this budget debate by indicating how privileged we are to live in this land of Canada, one of the finest nations in the world today. I think Dr. John Fisher has done and is doing a great deal to educate Canadians, not only as to the geography of their country but as to its potential wealth and resources. Dr. Fisher has described our country as being a tri-oceanic country, bounded by the Atlantic and the Pacific with a coastline of five thousand miles and the Arctic with a coastline of twenty-six thousand miles.

I wonder if at times we appreciate that this country in which we live is as high as it is wide, that from Pelee island in Ontario to Ellesmere at the top of the roof of the world, and still in Canada, is practically the same distance as from British Columbia to Nova Scotia.

I like the metaphor used by Dr. Fisher in describing our country when he referred to it as being a house of many rooms. First of all we have the veranda. We call it the American veranda and we are glad to have United States tourists come to our country and spend their dollars. Then we have the ground room in this house. At the moment I think of the cities as being on the ground floor. I think of my home city of Woodstock, Ontario, and the surrounding towns of Ingersoll, noted for its cheese, about which I shall say something later on, and the town of Tillsonburg, noted for its prowess in the field of sport. Then I think of other cities like Toronto, Montreal, Halifax and Vancouver. I think of the great contributions they have made to the industrial growth of our nation. Then, sir, above this ground floor we have another room. We call it the mezzanine floor. I am thinking at this time of the cities on that mezzanine floor that are so well represented by different members in the House of Commons, cities such as Sudbury, Kirkland Lake—whose member we think of at this time—and other places such as Noranda, Haileybury and Val d'Or. I think of the great contributions in minerals they have made to Canada.

Back and beyond the mezzanine floor there is a bedroom. There are not many tenants living in that bedroom today. About the only time we hear from them is when Churchill on Hudson bay speaks out during the white sheets of winter or when the ships go sailing in there for two or three months of the year. Last week we heard the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) speak about that region, and I would recommend his excellent speech to every member of the house. I predict, as did the hon. member for Churchill, that some day many thousands of people will live in that far northern bedroom of Canada. If you do not think so just remember this. You will be amazed, as I was, to learn that Stockholm in Sweden is as large and beautiful a city as Toronto, yet Stockholm is on the same latitude as the Yellowknife area hundreds of miles north of here. Therefore I say that some day there will be many people living in that great far northern bedroom of Canada.

At this time I should like to compliment the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) for the part he is playing in endeavouring to populate that area. I recall that some little time ago I heard Dr. Pleva of the University of Western Ontario make the prediction that the population of Canada will double itself within the next thirty years. Therefore I foresee, as was emphasized by the hon. member for Churchill the other day, a great future for that northern bedroom of Canada.

Some time ago I remember reading an article in the Financial Post to the effect that members of parliament should travel more in order to learn more of the great country in which we are privileged to live. I think that we should, that a great number of us do not appreciate or realize the potentialities and vastness of the country in which we live. I want to say to the house today that Canada is a great country, and it seems to me that, instead of the bickerings and lamentations we hear from time to time from members of the opposition, we should slip down on our knees more frequently and thank God for the privilege of living in Canada.

It is not a glamorous country like the United States of America. Neither is it a glorious country like Great Britain with all its history and traditions, but to each and every one of us today I think Canada is an exciting and fascinating country. To those of us with Scottish blood in our veins, may I say, I like to think of that song we sing on St. Andrew's day or on the birthday of Robert Burns, namely:

> Oh ye'll take the high road,
> And I'll take the low road.
> And I'll be in Scotland afore ye. . . .

It seems to me that is typical of the role of Canada today, neither the high road nor the low road but somewhere in between, fabulously right. Today as I speak of Canada I am reminded of the words of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) when he said to us some time ago that Canada's real strength is not in its size, great and all as it is, and neither is its strength to be found in its resources, great and all as they are, but rather the solid enduring strength of Canada comes from the character of our people. In other words, the sinews of production are not dollars but rather our effort and the spirit to achieve. That spirit has animated our nation throughout its history, and I predict that spirit will carry our country through every hard test the future may bring.

I submit that the history of Canada has been one of meeting the challenge of difficulty. That is why I say that this year's budget is substantially sound. It is not, as was stated by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), a false budget. Neither is it an Alice in Wonderland budget or a phantom budget. To the sound thinking people of Canada it is like the ones that have preceded it that have been brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). It is a stability budget. By whatever waters of Babylon our tents may be pitched, or whatever political differences we may have, none of us can deny that as a result of this year's budget Canada's credit abroad is being strengthened, inflation is being controlled, capital for investment is being attracted, and today our dollar is at a premium in the market places of the world. I should like to repeat the heading quoted from the Financial Post of April 12 by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance which reads: "It Hurts But It Is Sound". I should like to read one of the sentences in that article. It is as follows:

> There are people in other countries who only wish that their own governments would or could follow our example.

As was emphasized by the minister, our major difficulties are international in their origin. I say again today that freedom is not free. It was bought with a price and we are going to have to pay the price of retaining it. I feel that the Minister of Finance, in the light of the exigencies of the times through which we are passing, has budgeted in the interests of Canada as a whole. I am sure he must have had those lines of Longfellow constantly before him when he was compiling this year's budget:

> Build today, then, strong and sure,
> With a firm and ample base;
> And ascending and secure
> Shall tomorrow find its place.

The Minister of Finance has set before us a fiscal policy that has made our nation the envy of the world. He has held true to those precepts that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and others with Scottish blood in their veins learned at their mother's knees, namely, to save for a rainy day. In that regard I have here a copy of the Toronto Star of March 24, 1952. It contains an article with the heading, "Saving For Rainy Day Good Idea Frost Says But Doesn't Follow it." The article reads in part as follows:

> Almost two centuries ago a noted English author and moralist, Abraham Tucker, wisely admonished people to save for a rainy day. "It behooves us," he wrote, "to provide against a rainy day while the sun still shines." This was sound advice when these lines were penned and it is equally sound advice today . . . Premier Frost himself raised this point in his budget speech. "Credit," he said, "should be soundly used. It is a real asset which should always be conserved. Times come in the life of a province when, because of recession or other conditions, it is necessary to increase the net debt. But in times of buoyancy it is the way of prudence to pay as much of our capital costs as we can from current revenues."

It would appear that the federal government has done this, and that it has reduced our debt in the past five years by almost $2 billion. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the minister must have been reading some of the old axioms before preparing this year's budget. I am reminded in particular of one that is attributed to Confucius. You know, we made Confucius say some silly things but he had his more serious moments; and in one of those serious moments he said this:

> It is the duty of us in our day and generation to plant the trees so that those who follow after may enjoy the shade.

I think the minister was following that axiom in this year's budget. He is budgeting not only for a solvent Canada today but also for a solvent Canada tomorrow. He has indicated that if we are energetic and resolute, and if we work, there is a good prospect of achieving in the not too distant future perhaps not genuine peace throughout the world but at least a position of reasonable confidence and security that can be maintained at a more reasonable cost than we are now compelled to pay.

I agree with the minister that work is the greatest morale building force in the world today, the one thing that gives dignity and self-respect to man. If we will work, by the grace of God we can save ourselves. If on the other hand we become a nation of parasites, as some in this house would want us to be, then I fear that only deterioration and decay can set in. I think of my grandparents coming to this country. Why did they come here? Because they saw in this land opportunity and work for their brood of children. Ofttimes today I fear that opportunity may be beginning to disappear, when in certain quarters you hear it said to men, "Don't work so hard. Get as much as you can." I say that when a seed bursts in the blackness of the soil and reaches to the sunny heavens it is performing a natural instinct; and we are thwarting that kind of effort in Canada if today men are told, "Don't work so hard. Get as much as you can."

So I think the minister is to be congratulated on the stability budget he has brought down this year. We all realize that his role is very difficult; nor has it been lightened by the times through which we are passing. If I were to make one or two suggestions—and certainly it would only be by way of suggestion at this time, not by way of criticism—the first would be that further consideration be given to the medical deduction over and above the 4 per cent allowable at the present time. In that regard I think the minister might very well recognize the principle he established last year in exempting certain drugs such as cortisone, liver extract, and so on. I think that principle might be further extended as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) suggested to include drugs such as di-alpha tocopherol, as well as some of the antibiotics such as aureomycin, terramycin, chloromycetin and some of those expensive drugs that are on the market today. I say to the minister that hundreds of these new drugs are coming onto the market, and the horizon is equally challenging and tremendous. I think it would help a good many people if consideration could be given to extending the list of drugs to include those I have suggested.

Then I am interested and concerned, as I know the minister is, with the present tax structure with regard to corporations. I think a perusal of reports coming from industry for the first quarter will indicate that while business is good and sales are good, money that could be used for further expansion is being siphoned off in taxes. I know the minister will bear in mind that we want to do our best to help the further expansion of these industries that have done so much to build up our country.

Then I would want to say a word at this time on behalf of the dairy industry of my county and particularly the cheese industry, which at this time is in a rather precarious condition. Already hon. members on both the opposition and the government sides have emphasized the position in which the cheese industry finds itself, which is further aggravated by the presence of surplus milk in the country due to the foot-and-mouth disease. I hope the federal government will adopt a very sympathetic attitude toward that industry, which through no fault of its own finds itself in such a position.

Then, sir, I would want to join in the remarks of the hon. member for Kent, Ontario (Mr. Huffman) and the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Robertson) in asking that further consideration be given our rural mail carriers. It seems to me that this is a subject to which every hon. member would like further consideration given; but at this time I only want to join with the others who have spoken in asking that the government give the most careful consideration in order that something better might be done on behalf of these men who give years of service in carrying the mails of our country.

It is not my intention to speak longer in this debate, but in the light of Canada's progress I am sure we must all feel that we are advancing steadily toward full nationhood. This country of 14 million people is playing a far more significant part in international affairs than did the 5 million people who came to our shores from less prosperous lands and I feel that the fruition of the plan of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to build the St. Lawrence seaway, either alone or in co-operation with the United States, will mean one of our greatest adventures in development. We must admit, I think, that while we have been vigilant for our own prosperity we have gone forward steadily and in freedom toward a decent level of life. We have carefully re-examined the way of human welfare; and as a result of the old age security program of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) thousands of citizens of Canada can now live in dignity and self-respect.

I suggest, sir, that there is a strong tide flowing in the affairs of men. Social injustices are being swept aside and human progress is at the flood. Some may ask what of the future. I suggest, sir, that this is not the time for us to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, as one hears the phrase. This is not the time to be merely on the defensive as to those things that are just and true and of good report. Now is the time for all of us in this great nation to be active thinkers and doers, in furthering and in sharing with others the verities and the abundance of this great nation in which we are privileged to live.

I started my speech this afternoon by saying that it was a privilege to take part in the budget debate this year. I am reminded that privilege and responsibility are veritable Siamese twins in the world of abstraction. You never meet them alone. I say to this house: whether we serve as members of the House of Commons or whether we act as citizens of Canada, each and every one of us in turn has a like responsibility not only to build our defences strong, not only to budget for a pay-as-you-go policy, not only to maintain a sound economy for our nation, but also somehow, in some way, to build the attributes of decency among the peoples of the world and to work for that day when peace shall come and wars shall be no more.

If we do that—if we go our way improving the standards of living of our people; if we help our neighbours where'er in the world they may be—then it seems to me that we can face the future undaunted and with the surety that it will be of our own shaping.

I do not know of any finer way in which I can, with any greater propriety, interpret that closing thought than to give you the thoughts presented by Mr. Cameron Ralston when he visited our nation some months ago. Speaking particularly to those of us with Scottish blood in our veins, he said this: As you know, we in Scotland have a patron saint called Saint Andrew but long ago many of us have substituted a great Scottish son in his place, namely Robert Burns—one who wrote of simple things; one who said that a simple man was the greatest work of God; one whose heart was touched by the affliction of a mouse or a daisy in the field; one who wrote that great and majestic poem: "A Man's a Man for a' That." If my memory holds, I should like to give the closing verse of that great poem:

Then let us pray that come it may,
(As come it will for a' that,)
That Sense and Worth, o'er a' the earth,
Shall bear the gree, and a' that.
For a' that, an' a' that,
It's coming yet for a' that,
That man to man, the world o'er,
Shall brothers be for a' that.

I therefore say to you in closing this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, that likewise we in Canada have a great responsibility. We have a responsibility not merely to act as a bridge between Great Britain and the commonwealth, and not merely to act as a stopgap between Great Britain and the United States. We have our own torch to bear; to carry and to maintain the highest forms of decency and the soundest forms of fiscal policy that it is possible for the nation of Canada to achieve. That the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has endeavoured to do his part has been exemplified, I submit, by this year's budget. He has endeavoured to plant the trees, in his time and generation, so that those who follow after may enjoy the shade.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the last speaker but one for the stand he took this afternoon when he spoke in this budget debate on the subject of housing. I was very glad to hear him join with us in criticizing the lending institutions for their failure to make mortgage money available for the socially desirable objective of housing for our people. I thought his words were well chosen when he suggested that private enterprise, as represented in this case by the lending institutions, should recognize its social responsibility and should be more concerned about the housing of our people than it is for making a profit out of investments of the kind to which he referred. I was also glad to hear him join with us in prodding the government and in urging that if mortgage money is not being made available by the private lending institutions for housing, the time has come for the government to go into this field itself.

That view of course has been expressed from this corner of the house a number of times; it was expressed only the other day by my colleague, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), and I hope that in due course between us we shall be able to persuade the government that it has no option but to implement the suggestions made again this afternoon.

I was also glad to hear the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) suggest that improvements will have to be made in the terms of section 35 of the National Housing Act. He spoke, as he always does, in glowing terms of this section, the section which makes possible joint federal-provincial low-rental housing projects; but nevertheless in the course of his speech I thought he made it clear that one of the greatest lacks of our time is still the lack of low-rental housing. I suggest that one of the reasons there is not as much building of homes for ownership as both the hon. member for Spadina and I would like to see is that many of the people for whom he expressed concern this afternoon simply cannot afford the ownership of homes even on the terms possible under the National Housing Act, and that what is necessary for great numbers of people is low-rental housing.

The hon. member for Spadina, although he praised section 35 of the act, admitted its shortcomings when he pointed out that not enough housing is being built, and when he suggested that probably the proportion to be guaranteed by the federal government under section 35 should be increased from its present figure of 75 per cent up to 80 per cent or 85 per cent or perhaps even higher. I fully agree with him as to the desirability of as much home ownership on the part of our people as possible, but the fact of the matter is that for great numbers of our Canadian citizens the only solution to the housing problem in the immediate future at any rate lies in extending the principle of public low-rental housing. This is a matter of extreme urgency, and I hope that, even as the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) ought to pay attention to our plea that government money be made available for the building of homes where private mortgage money is not being supplied, he will also pay attention to our plea for the improving of section 35 so that it may be used more widely for the actual building of low-rental housing.

I might add further that I was glad to note the statements of the hon. member for Spadina in respect of a number of other matters, particularly when he suggested that there are various fields where social responsibility requires that, private enterprise having failed to deliver the goods, the government, in the name of the people, should step in.

There are one or two matters, Mr. Speaker, that were the particular reason for my getting into this debate again at this stage, but before I come to them there are one or two general comments with respect to the budget that I should like to make. I agree with those who have said that one of the faults of the present budget is the manner in which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) presented it, particularly in his failure, when he gave us his tables showing the new rates of income tax, to include a column showing what the rates were as actually paid in the year 1951. In most budgets it has been the practice to indicate the amount of tax paid at various income levels for the last year and for the current year. In this instance the minister chose to omit the column showing the actual amounts paid in 1951. He chose rather to compare the rates to be paid in 1952 with what would have been the case if there had been no budget at all. The result is that the minister found it possible by his method of reasoning to suggest that there was a decrease in income tax; whereas in point of fact in the actual amounts to be paid by the citizens of Canada there will be an increase in 1952 over what was actually paid in 1951. I think it is unfortunate that the minister chose to present it in that way, but at any rate it is now painfully clear to the people of Canada that this year's budget does involve an actual increase over what was paid last year in the rates of income taxes.

It is also clear that that increase is felt by our people before the social security tax is added. In that connection I should like to point out that the Minister of Finance seemed to enjoy referring to old age security and its cost as many times as he could during the course of his budget speech on April 8. I am reminded by the minister, the parliamentary assistant and others who refer so often to the cost of social security, of the line followed in this respect by the Winnipeg Free Press which is published in my own city. That newspaper is most anxious that people realize something that they already know, namely that we do have to pay for social security, and indeed for everything that we provide for ourselves through the medium of our governments. But the Free Press even goes so far as to suggest that the deductions at the source paid by the average worker when he gets his pay envelope should be itemized for him, and that he should be told every time he gets his pay envelope just how much has been deducted from his pay for social security.

I have no objection to that being done, provided at the same time something else is done—and I hope the Winnipeg Free Press will join me in this suggestion, to be implemented along with their own. I suggest that at the same time on the wage earner's envelope there should be indicated the amount he has contributed, during that period for which he is receiving his pay, to the profits of the corporation for which he is working. After all, that is where the wealth of this country comes from—from the toil of our farmers on the farms, our workers in the cities, our miners, our fishermen—it comes from all those who work to produce the great wealth of this country. It is precisely because the profits of great corporations, defence costs, social security items and everything else, are paid for by the work of our people, that we contend that our people are entitled—not as a matter of charity, not as a handout, but as a matter of right—to social security, not only to the extent we have achieved it thus far, but in an expanded form such as we of this party shall continue to advocate.

One of the reasons I wanted to speak again at this stage of the debate was to discuss briefly with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) what I consider to be a continuing piece of discrimination as between lawyers and trade unionists. I wish to say that I take those two groups for the purpose of putting this matter in a simplified form. There are others who are with the lawyers, and there are others, likewise, who are with the trade unionists.

The Minister of Finance will recall that for a few years leading up to just before his budget speech of last year I had a good deal to say concerning the deductibility of trade union dues, teachers' fees and other like amounts for income tax purposes. I pointed out to him that in practice a line was drawn which, despite the way in which the minister defined that line, for the most part became a line between people like lawyers and doctors on the one hand and people like trade unionists and school teachers on the other. The line that was established was drawn, technically speaking, in terms of whether one's income was gross or net. If one's income was gross, in terms of fees he received out of which he paid expenses —hiring help of one kind or another—he was permitted to deduct fees, such as those of law societies. But if one's income was net, such as wages or salary, he was denied that right.

I believe there is complete agreement between the minister and me as to the facts. Strictly speaking, that was the way in which that line was drawn. Nevertheless, in actual practice, since most lawyers were in the one group and most trade unionists were in the other, it worked out so that lawyers were getting the right to deduct their fees to the law society, while trade unionists were not getting the same right in respect of their trade union dues.

Part of this is now old history, but it will take only a few moments to review it. I am going through it because it leads up to a continuing discrimination which I hope the minister will even yet bring to an end. He knows that during the years 1945, 1946 and 1947 the law was worded in such a way that in due course the Exchequer Court of Canada decided that it did entitle trade unionists to deduct their trade union dues during those years. That decision was made by Mr. Justice Angers in June of 1949. However, that decision was made because a trade unionist, Mr. Joseph A. Cooper of Winnipeg, a moving picture projectionist, had appealed against the decision of the Minister of National Revenue. Mr. Cooper had sought to deduct his trade union dues. The Department of National Revenue had denied him that right. He went through the usual machinery and, in due course, in April of 1948, appealed the decision to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Interestingly enough, it was in May of 1948, only a few weeks after Mr. Cooper filed his papers with the Exchequer Court of Canada, that the government brought in notice of a resolution to change the Income War Tax Act so as to make it clear that trade unionists would not have that right. It is my belief that the government took that step so soon after this case was taken to the Exchequer Court of Canada because they had reason to believe that the Exchequer Court might rule in favour of Mr. Cooper, in view of a decision the Exchequer Court had made on November 1, 1946, in the Bond and Rutherford case.

The case of Bond and Rutherford involved two lawyers from the city of Winnipeg who had appealed against a decision of the income tax authorities denying them their right to deduct their bar society fees on the ground that they were on salary—one of them was employed by the city of Winnipeg and the other by the province of Manitoba—and therefore that they were not in the same class as the average lawyer who makes his income by collecting fees and paying out expenses in connection with the making of his income.

Mr. Justice Thorson on November 1, 1946, had ruled that, in view of the way the act then read, Mr. Bond and Mr. Rutherford were just as entitled to deduct their fees to the law society as were other lawyers, even though Mr. Bond and Mr. Rutherford were on salary. I think it followed that, Mr. Justice Thorson having made that decision in the Bond and Rutherford case, it was almost inevitable that the Exchequer Court would make a parallel decision in the Cooper case.

I draw the government's attention to the fact that nothing was done immediately following the decision in the Bond and Rutherford case, which was made by Mr. Justice Thorson on November 1, 1946. That decision was accepted; the law was not changed. But immediately after Mr. Cooper took his case to the Exchequer Court of Canada in April 1948, in the very next month, the month of May, a resolution was brought in to change the Income War Tax Act and to alter its wording so as to make it clear that the right to deduct trade union dues would be prohibited.

The decision of Mr. Justice Angers was not made until June 1949, and by this time the law had been changed respecting the income taxation years of 1948 and 1949.

The rest of the story is known, of course, to hon. members. The matter was debated in the house three or four times, and was voted down on at least two occasions. But finally, on April 10, 1951, in the minister's budget for that year, he announced that legislation would be introduced to make trade union dues deductible.

Naturally I was very pleased to have this decision made by the government. It was good to know that that battle had been won, and I think all hon. members recognized that it was only a matter of fairness that the legislation be so worded that groups such as trade unionists and teachers would be in precisely the same position as groups such as doctors and lawyers.

So far so good. But it was only a few months after that change respecting dues to trade unions, teachers' associations, bar societies, medical societies and so on was made that there appeared in the newspapers an item to the effect that a ruling had been given that lawyers were permitted to deduct for income tax purposes expenses incurred in connection with attendance at conventions of the Canadian Bar Association. I was surprised. I felt, "Well, here we go again; this is where I came in. We have just succeeded in getting one discrimination ended and now another one turns up." I did not know at that time that for some considerable period apparently lawyers had been deducting expenses incurred in connection with attendance at bar association conventions provided they were on gross rather than on salary, but it now transpires that that had been the case.

It also transpires that the decision referred to in the press last fall was one given on August 30, 1951, by Mr. W. S. Fisher, Q.C., a member of the income tax appeal board. As hon. members know, when the Income War Tax Act was replaced by the Income Tax Act one of the changes made was to provide that appeals which had formerly gone to the Exchequer Court of Canada would now go to the income tax appeal board. Therefore the decision of Mr. W. S. Fisher, Q.C., has in fact the status of the decisions by Mr. Justice Thorson and by Mr. Justice Rogers, to which I referred a few minutes ago.

The decision of Mr. W. S. Fisher, Q.C., on August 30, 1951, related to an appeal by Mr. H. F. Parkinson, a lawyer who had claimed a deduction from personal income in connection with expenses incurred personally by him in attending a convention of the Canadian Bar Association. The facts in connection with this decision are to be found on page 1458 of Hansard of April 21, 1952, where answers are given to questions I had asked about this case. It appears that the reason the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue disallowed Mr. Parkinson's claim for this deduction was that Mr. Parkinson was apparently a member of a partnership and was on salary. The department took the view that if these expenses had been claimed by the partnership it would have been a different story, but since they were claimed by Mr. Parkinson as a deduction from his personal income that put him on the wrong side of the line and therefore he could not be allowed that deduction.

As I say, Mr. Parkinson was not satisfied with the decision of the taxation division and he appealed to the income tax appeal board. It was held by Mr. W. S. Fisher of the income tax appeal board that there was no reason to differentiate between the procedure of deduction adopted by the appellant and the procedure of deduction that would be adopted in the case of the partnership.

I submit that we are right back where we were at the time of the Bond and Rutherford case. We now have a case of an individual lawyer claiming deduction of convention expenses from his personal income. He was denied that by the taxation division but was allowed it by the income tax appeal board which, as I say, is the present counterpart of the Exchequer Court of Canada at the time when the other decisions were made.

My request in connection with this matter is that fairness be established. I am prepared to admit that it is more difficult to make a case for the deductibility of convention expenses than it was to make a case, as we did with eventual success, for the deductibility of dues either to a trade union, to a teachers' society or to other similar bodies. But I submit that it should be one way or the other, either both lawyers and trade unionists should be allowed their convention expenses as deductible for income tax purpose, or neither should be allowed this right. When I ask that the same treatment be accorded to trade unionists as is accorded to lawyers I have in mind other groups as well, such as farm conventions of one kind and another, church conventions, women's institutes, the Canadian Legion and all the rest. I submit that if lawyers attending conventions of the Canadian Bar Association are permitted to deduct their convention expenses regardless of a line that has been drawn in the act, indeed if that right is given to them, even when they are on salary, by a decision of the income tax appeal board, then the law should be so worded as to grant that right to trade unionists and other groups as well. All I ask is that the law be fair.

I have questioned the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) about this once or twice, notably on October 15, 1951, when I drew his attention to this particular case and asked if steps would be taken to extend the same privileges to trade unionists attending their conventions and to other comparable groups. On that day the minister said that since I had not given him notice, perhaps my question could stand until a later date. I reminded him of it on Friday, October 19, 1951, as reported on page 195 of Hansard for that day, at which time the minister said:

> I had forgotten to answer the hon. member's question. Of course it is one of law. I have not examined the decision of the income tax appeal board; but I assume the board must have decided that the lawyer in question incurred these expenses as necessary expenses in earning his income. If a member of a trade union is in the same position in deducting expenses, and if he can say that his attendance at a trade union convention was necessary, incidental to the earning of his income, then I assume that as a matter of law the court would hold the same thing. However, it is purely a question of law.

Those were the words of the Minister of Finance. In passing, may I point out that a trade unionist on salary is not in the same position in the matter of deduction as is a lawyer on gross income, so that that similarity vanishes. But the point that bothers me most about this is the minister's insistence that this is purely a point of law. In view of that insistence I asked the minister this supplementary question:

> Does not the minister feel that the law should be changed so as to make sure that all these different groups are treated alike?

This was the minister's reply:

> Mr. Abbott: No, I think it is strictly a question for the courts.

My point is that when the courts, the Exchequer Court of Canada in that case, decided that the law as it was worded in 1945, 1946 and 1947 gave Mr. Cooper and other trade unionists the right to deduct their trade union dues, the government took the view that that was not what they had intended. Since the court had drawn their attention to the fact that the law was at variance with their intention they took immediate steps to change the law. In fact they acted in advance; they acted as soon as they realized there would be a decision favourable to trade unionists.

When I spoke about this during the course of one of the debates on the question of trade union dues the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) expressed the view that I should not have chided the government for doing this, that I should rather have complimented the government for bringing the law into line with what had been the government's intention in the first place. The point I am making is surely obvious. If the government jumps in fast to change the law when the court's ruling is such as to give advantage to trade unionists, why is it when a similar ruling gives an advantage to lawyers the Minister of Finance simply says that it is strictly a question for the courts?

I submit it is a question of fairness. It is a question of the wording of the law, and the government should deal with the matter one way or the other. Either it should amend the law so as to make it clear that lawyers cannot claim their convention expenses—and heaven knows what convention expenses might include—or it should change the law to see to it that the same right is accorded to trade unionists, farmers, church people, legionnaires, indeed all those who have conventions that they must attend either in connection with the earning of their living or in pursuit of interests relating to the welfare of this country.

I submit it is a matter of simple justice and fairness. One cannot put the blame for it on the courts. What the courts do is to interpret the law as it stands at any given time. The courts have made an interpretation in the Parkinson case. Inasmuch as the government acted immediately to change the law following the decision in the Cooper case, I suggest they should act immediately following the decision in the Parkinson case and change it either one way or the other.

I would remind the minister that this matter has been taken up with the government by a number of people. I have in my hand, for example, copies of letters that have been exchanged between the Victoria and district trades and labour council and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). My time is passing so perhaps I had better not read all the correspondence. However, I would simply indicate that the Minister of National Revenue replied on January 11 of this year to the secretary of the Victoria and district trades and labour council to the effect that expenses of trade unionists in attending conventions could not be allowed as a deduction from income in their case. He went on to say:

> I would draw to your attention that members of the legal and medical professions who derive their incomes from an office or employment are not allowed any deduction from such income for convention expenses.

That is true, Mr. Speaker, but there is a catch in it, for most lawyers and doctors are not in that category while most trade unionists are. That is exactly the position we were in when we were debating union dues versus law society dues. Drawing a line like that is drawing a fictitious and unreal line. The fact of the matter is that in actual practice most lawyers now have the right, if they attend a convention of the Canadian Bar Association, to deduct their convention expenses, but practically all trade unionists—indeed all of them—are cut off from that right because of the nature of their income.

We have had other lines of this kind drawn in the income tax laws throughout the years. I can think of one that used to be there that drew a false distinction between sleeping car conductors and train conductors in respect of a matter having to do with income tax. For years it was held by Mr. Ilsley that nothing could be done about it but in due course the line was changed and a more sensible position was taken. I urge that this matter be looked at on the basis of fairness and that the law be changed so that it will be equal in its application to all our people. Surely that is the basis on which laws should be enacted, and I urge this most strongly upon the Minister of Finance.

There are a number of other matters I wish to speak about but I will use what time I have left to say a few words on the other side of the medal. The Minister of Finance is aware of the fact that I have had a good deal to say in budget debates throughout the years about deductions that I think should be allowed to people, and I think he will give me credit for the fact that the appeals I made have been like the one I have just put forward, on a basis of what I regard as essential fairness. But he may say to me: Yes, but you never suggest ways and means by which more revenue might come into the treasury. I should like to make one or two suggestions along that line right now. I have in my hand a clipping from Business Week of April 21, 1951. I admit at the outset that it is about a year old and also that the figures contained in the article relate to the United States and may refer to an earlier year, but I suggest that they are symptomatic and that attention should be paid to them.

The article and the table with it tell us what percentages of various kinds of income are reported to the tax collector in the United States and taxed accordingly. For example, we are told that the picture in the United States is that 99 per cent of trust fund income is reported and accordingly taxed, and that 95 per cent of wages and salaries is reported and taxed. However, only 76 per cent of dividends is reported, only 71 per cent of entrepreneurial income is reported, only 45 per cent of rental income is reported and only 37 per cent of income from interest is reported. Let me make it perfectly clear that these are figures for the United States, and they may be for a few years back because the clipping is dated April 21, 1951, but I suggest that a real effort should be made by the Canadian income tax authorities to make sure that other classes of income are put in the same position as wages and salaries.

So far as the income tax authorities are concerned, the man on a wage, the man on a salary, has had it. His income is spelled out clearly on the T-4 slip he gets at the end of the year. The wheat farmer of the west is in much the same position because he sells his wheat to the wheat board. But there are the other groups which Business Week suggests manage in one way or another to report less than their total income. I submit that, if the figures for Canada are in any sense comparable to the figures I have given, there is a substantial sum of income in this country escaping taxation because it is not got at as readily and easily as wages and salaries.

On the other side of that picture I suggest to the Minister of Finance that the deductions allowed in the corporation tax and the deductions allowed to business people, entrepreneurial people and so on should be tightened up. To my way of thinking there is too wide a discrepancy between the limited deductions allowed to the average taxpayer on wage or salary and the wide variety of deductions allowed to those whose income is gross from which they make their various deductions. We have heard these matters discussed in the house from time to time, trips by businessmen and all sorts of expenses that somehow or other are allowed if you are on gross income. I suggest there is a real field there for tightening up and for increasing tremendously the amount of income on which government taxation might be levied.

To use the language I used a moment ago, I say again that the wage earner in particular has had it. He gets his income in the form of wages that are paid to him by his employer. In the first place most of his income tax is deducted at the source. At the end of the year he gets a T-4 slip showing the amount he has earned. There is no getting out of that, and the kinds of deductions that he can make on his income tax form are so few that it only takes him half an hour to make out his income tax return. There is nothing he can do about it. But the type of person who is on gross income and who is permitted a whole host of deductions can stay up all night, or two or three nights, thinking up ways and means by which to cut down the amount upon which he pays taxes. I submit that in view of the figures I quoted from Business Week there is a wide measure of income the government could tax to far more than offset what it would cost the treasury to implement these proposals for fairness as amongst other groups to which I have referred. Indeed I am satisfied that what would be lost to the treasury by removing the 4 per cent floor under medical expenses, for which the house voted on March 26 and concerning which I have spoken a number of times, would be more than offset if the minister would pay some attention to the type of suggestions I am now making.

I am just about through, Mr. Speaker, but in this connection I have in my hand a clipping from the New York Times of September 23, 1951, headed "Expense accounts held tax source". The dispatch is by a writer named Clayton Knowles—a namesake, although I do not know him. It is datelined at Washington, September 23 last, and reads:

> In a move to increase the tax yield, Senator Paul H. Douglas, Democrat of Illinois, proposed today to limit tax deductions for business entertainment and travel, to reduce opportunity for "high living at public expense."

The article goes on to say that Senator Douglas proposed to strike out deductions for liquor and for entertainment, and to limit allowable travelling expenses to $12 a day. This was commented upon in an issue of The Nation which appeared shortly after Senator Douglas introduced his bill, in these words:

> The suggestion of Senator Douglas that congress limit the deduction of entertainment and travel expenses from taxable corporate income will probably strike more fear into the heart of the average businessman than all the talk of higher corporate rates.

That is why I suggest that if this policy were pursued the minister might pick up quite a good sum of money, more than enough to offset the cost of some of the things we have been asking for. The dislike of business for a suggestion of this kind shows there is real money to be found in this way. This editorial in The Nation goes on to say:

It is no secret that high corporate rates, especially the excess profits tax, have increased the temptation to pad the expense account in order to reduce the tax bill. The "swindle sheet" today takes more money from Uncle Sam than from the employer. So while applauding Senator Douglas' suggestion, we wonder why it singles out liquor and travel.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Knowles: I hear hon. members calling "time", and for once I agree with them; I see that my time is gone. I commend the rest of the editorial from which I have been quoting, for it makes other valuable suggestions. I hope the minister will pay some attention to the proposals I have made in the latter part of my speech, as to ways in which he might pick up more money; and at the same time I urge him to pay attention to my plea for fairness, which I made earlier in my remarks tonight.

Mr. P. T. Hellyer (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, some time ago the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) gave me very good advice. He said, "Listen carefully for a while, and then make a speech on a subject close to your heart." Tonight I would like to speak on housing, a subject that is close to my heart.

Historically housing accommodation was supplied by fathers to their sons when they got married and set up their own establishments. This was taken as a matter of course and proceeded from generation to generation. Masters provided housing for servants, and it seemed a very workable and very satisfactory system.

Mr. Wylie: Times have changed a lot.

Mr. Hellyer: Just as my hon. friend interjects, times have changed. Whether we liked it or not we had the great industrial revolution, which produced results both good and evil. Unfortunately we have to take the evil with the good. However desirable the old system may seem in retrospect, it is impossible to return to it. So we might as well be realistic and accept the situation as it now exists, and do the best we can with it.

I know all hon. members are as interested in this subject as I am. The situation in the city from which I come and part of which I represent is not good, and certainly is deserving of a great deal of study and research. In Toronto a married couple without children can find accommodation in a single room for a fairly modest amount, and can get along quite well. But as soon as they start raising a family they immediately project themselves into the position of having to seek accommodation which will cost double or treble that which was required of them without children. It is owing to this unfortunate social handicap and to the fact that recently the proportion of house building in respect to total construction has been in serious decline that I feel further study must be given to the problem of increasing the supply.

I suppose the next logical point is, whose responsibility is it? Constitutionally, according to the judicial interpretation of the British North America Act, it is a provincial responsibility. However, I feel that because the constitution is a product of human beings, it should not be allowed to interfere with the welfare of the people. Actually the problem breaks down very nicely and naturally into aspects. The first, the federal aspect, is the financial responsibility. The federal government has been charged with the responsibility over money and banking. Owing to the tremendous capital investment required it is beyond the ability of any other level of government to take care of the problem. It is quite natural, then, that the financial responsibility should be looked after where that can be done adequately, and that is in this federal parliament.

Then there is the provincial aspect. Under our constitution property and civil rights fall within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. Therefore it is quite reasonable and logical that the provinces should undertake the responsibility of providing the land and services necessary for these housing developments. In addition, there is a very definite private responsibility on the part of the industry, and I think the industry will do its part to accept that responsibility.

I will discuss these points in the order in which I have outlined them. The first is the federal aspect. As you all know, through the agency of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation the federal government makes joint loans to prospective home owners and also to builders for speculation. These joint loans are made with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation putting up 25 per cent of the money, and the lending institution, ordinarily an insurance company or trust company, the remaining 75 per cent. In effect this means that the availability of mortgage financing is directly tied to the selling of insurance. This raises a very logical question. What possible connection has the selling of insurance with the need for residential housing? In addition, as my hon. friend and colleague from Spadina (Mr. Croll) outlined this afternoon, at the moment we are faced with the problem that the net return to financial institutions on N.H.A. loans, after charges for administration, is approximately 4½ per cent.

These companies now find other equally or more attractive investments in the commercial field. This substantiates mere balance sheet decisions against National Housing Act loans. But I personally think that the insurance companies have a great moral responsibility not only to their policy holders but to the public at large; they have a trust to ensure and to preserve our way of life and to keep it worth fighting for.

There seems to be a widespread impression that mortgage financing is in the field of risk capital. I personally do not subscribe to this theory because I feel that in a stable economy investment in good, sound housing is not of a risk nature; it is not of a great risk nature, anyway. If we have another depression which is nearly comparable to the one experienced in the 1930's I believe we would have either a change of government or revolution; and probably in either case the paper that the mortgage companies and the insurance companies held would not be worth much.

In a stable economy it would seem that the interest rate on residential mortgages is too high. Mr. Speaker, we fight wars with 3 per cent money and we fight the causes of wars with 5½ per cent money. Is that a sensible thing to do?

Mr. Low: No. It is nonsense.

Mr. Johnston: This is the most sensible speech I have heard from the opposite side of the house.

Mr. Hellyer: Next is the provincial aspect. Generally the provinces must co-operate fully with the municipalities in supplying serviced land and educational facilities. In many areas these fields have been left on the doorstep of the builders. I cannot see why the builders should have to shoulder the entire responsibilities of the municipalities and the provinces put together.

If I may mention my own province, may I say that in it there is a great field for educational aid. The cost of education to municipalities makes almost prohibitive the allowing of new subdivisions. Consequently the municipalities are doing everything in their power to restrict and to obstruct new subdivisions for residential housing. They admit this fact quite openly. In the paper last week there was an article written of and subscribed to by the reeves of various municipalities in the greater Toronto area, stating that circumstances make it almost impossible for them to supply educational facilities for new residential subdivisions.

As a representative of a Toronto constituency I know hon. members will excuse me if I just touch on our own problem briefly in the course of my remarks.

Mr. Low: It is a typical problem.

Mr. Hellyer: I have here a clipping from the Toronto Daily Star, dated Saturday, March 8, 1952. It is an article as a result of a speech made by a Conservative member of the provincial legislature. The member who was speaking was Mr. Harold Fishleigh, Progressive Conservative member for Woodbine, Toronto. He has this advice for our provincial government:

> Appoint an official with authority to:
> Acquire land immediately for 30,000 homes. Survey, prepare plans and register same. Let sewer and water contracts; build water works and pumping stations, plus primary schools.
> Sell the land to builders at a fair profit and business frontage for as high a figure as can be obtained.
> This would give 30,000 homes per year within two years at no loss to the province and give the outside municipalities a chance to obtain more industries on their land and get their affairs in order so they could revert back to installing the services and putting them on the tax rate.

I can offer to the premier of Ontario no better advice than that given by his own supporter. I think it is sound and factual. This procedure would, as Mr. Fishleigh has stated, increase the supply of housing, owing to the favourable conditions; and also—he did not mention this but I think it is almost beyond dispute—it would mean, if that land were sold at even a modest profit to the province, a saving of from $300 to $500 for each and every housing unit built on it. This saving would be passed on directly to the individual purchaser. The entire operation would be self-liquidating and would not cost the taxpayers a cent.

There is also the responsibility of the industry itself. In this connection there is vast room for improvement. I think the industry recognizes this fact and is doing everything that it can to co-operate in overcoming the problems.

First, there is the problem of building products. I have here a clipping from another Toronto newspaper of probably some authority, namely the Globe and Mail, of Monday, February 6, 1950, and which is headed "Sees Obsolete Methods Behind Housing Lack".

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member said the date was 1950.

Mr. Hellyer: That is what it says here. I do not know whether or not it is a typographical error. The article reads in part:

> Antiquated building methods, lack of organization in the building industry, obsolete ways of manufacturing bricks and restrictive labour practices were cited as among the hitches in housing by two authorities last night.

One of the authorities was P. A. Deacon, Ontario chairman of the Community Planning Association of Canada, and the other was J. Louis Shannon, one of the Toronto controllers. These gentlemen are quite accurate in some of their observations. Even the bricks we use are not standardized. There are many different sizes and such a simple device as a storey rod so that all houses come out at the same level at the first storey is practically impossible because one type of brick runs you an inch higher and another type of brick runs you an inch lower, and standardization is impossible.

Builders in the United States are attempting to inaugurate and implement a system of modular construction; and I understand they are finding it quite successful in cutting the cost of production. I think we would be wise if we could follow their example in that respect. The whole industry needs streamlining. It needs a great deal more engineering. It is of course difficult for this to be done unless it can be provided with some sort of continuity. It is necessary to have a sufficient supply of mortgages to keep building operations more or less continuous. Otherwise the advantages derived from planning and engineering are lost in the muddle of jumping around and waiting for new mortgage finances. It also makes it difficult to maintain an adequate and competent staff. Trained people just do not like jobs in which you need them for a while and then do not need them for a while, where you do not need them for a few weeks, and vice versa, and back and forth. If the flow of mortgage financing was more or less continuous it would enable the industry to enlarge consistently for a few years and provide more capital, it would enable them to buy more and better equipment, to cut costs all the way along the line, and to take advantage of some of the elementary and basic principles of savings that are involved when one plans and co-ordinates production as is done in all manufacturing industries—as a matter of fact, in most industries outside of the house building industry.

The house building industry is probably one of the most inefficient remaining in our country today. One of the greatest single problems is the supposedly uncontrollable factor of the weather. Winter building probably does more to disrupt continuity than anything else except the mortgages. It is a problem that I do not think is completely hopeless, but it does require very extensive research, and also a great deal of capital and very expensive equipment. I have some ideas on the subject which, from an engineering standpoint, I think are quite sound, but it would require a tremendous amount of capital to implement them, and the building industry, owing to the fact that it has had only a few good years, is still slowly emerging from the infant stage and is not yet financially capable of expensive capital outlay. It will take a while to reach the size where it can produce units efficiently the way other industries produce their product. However, there is hope in this field, and every effort should be made to continue the research and to take advantage of any constructive ideas.

Another problem in the house building industry is labour. The productivity of labour in the house building industry is very low. This is not entirely the fault of the workers. As a matter of fact it is probably not even largely their fault. I think that a great deal can be done in this regard, and especially through the medium of continuous building, and if possible year-round building. At the moment the building trades in the Toronto area are seeking very substantial wage increases. Perhaps they are being misled, not intentionally, but inadvertently. Much has been said in the last year about diminishing returns. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) found it only too true with his tobacco taxes. I think that the people engaged in the building trades will find it true this year if they are successful in obtaining the increases that are asked for.

They are going to proceed to price the industry out of the market even further, and it is almost priced out of the market now. It will be impossible to ask the mortgage companies to absorb the entire increase in costs in the mortgages, and it is reasonable to assume that the entire cost of increased wages will be reflected in the down payment, and this will tend to restrict even further the effective demand for housing, with the logical consequence that fewer houses will be built, fewer months will be worked, and on a yearly basis less income will be derived by the people engaged in the industry. It is possible that a few people working in the general construction side of the construction industry may benefit, those who have guaranteed year-round employment; but generally speaking, especially in the house building trades, where employment is of a seasonal nature, they may find that they will have a smaller yearly return with the higher wage than they have at the present time, working more months of the year. This is a very old problem, the matter of short working periods among the building trades, an age-old problem, and it is one of the very difficult and seemingly insurmountable obstacles in the way of streamlining the industry.

It is not fair to take so much of the time of the house talking about housing without making some concrete suggestions. I have a few recommendations to make which fall largely into two classes: First of all, the short term, and second, the long term. In the short-term field I feel that the federal government should immediately increase its proportion of the joint loans from 25 per cent to 33⅓ per cent. I am sure the Minister of Resources and Development will concur in that.

Mr. Fleming: If he were listening.

Mr. Croll: He is.

Mr. Hellyer: And also at the same time reduce the interest rate on the total loan by one half of one per cent, to four and a half per cent. I suppose an aside should not be brought into a discussion on housing, but the Minister of Finance is present tonight, and since this is an address on the budget I might just state very briefly my views on tampering with interest rates as a tool of combating inflation. I personally do not believe that raising interest rates on long-term mortgage contracts is a legitimate method of combating inflation. It is the only method that this government has used in their battle against inflationary pressures that I cannot support wholeheartedly and without any reservation. I think generally speaking they have done a magnificent job, second to none in the world. They have shown that inflation can be curbed by monetary and fiscal policies, but they have also proved to those who are interested in the subject that depressions also can be cured by applying the tools in reverse, and it rather refutes the arguments of some of our friends to the left that in order to have a consistently productive and acceptable economy we must have either a war or a rumour of war. I think that idea in future will be completely disintegrated, and it will become accepted that in a diversified economy it is possible so to control matters that the hills and valleys are levelled out pretty well to a reasonable plateau.

In this respect, I think the government is to be complimented. It has done a remarkably good job on its fiscal and monetary policy, but I think changing the interest rates is a little bit like correcting a school child by slapping his ears to such an extent that he loses the use of his hearing. It is a long-term corrective. How do we know that ten years from now we will want thousands of contracts with a high interest rate? At the moment it may be expedient to have very high interest rates on mortgages, but what will it be like five years from now or ten years from now when these contracts are still in operation?

This is a subject which cannot adequately be dealt with as an aside in a discussion on housing, and consequently I will not elaborate on it, but I would love to sometime. I cannot agree with the raising of interest rates on long-term contracts, and consequently I propose that in addition to increasing the Central Mortgage proportion of the joint loan, the interest rate be reduced to what it was last year.

Second, I think the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should increase the differential of guarantee on long-term amortization to make it more attractive for the lending institutions to increase the amortization period. At the moment some difficulty, in fact substantial difficulty is being encountered in effective demand, owing to the fact that the people are not making enough money to carry the loans on new houses. If the amortization period could be increased to 25 years it would increase the number of prospective customers substantially, and I think would be very helpful. However, I can understand insurance companies being reluctant to do this unless there is an even greater differential in the guarantee.

Then, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation could increase the differential of guarantee for outlying districts, such as North Bay. This would be helpful to the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland), who was so concerned about this problem—and rightly so.

Then, fourth, in cases where applications are turned down by lending institutions, and especially in outlying areas, I think Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should again make direct loans available to prospective purchasers.

Turning to long-term requirements: I think the greatest single hope of the building industry is the hope of becoming a greater industry so far as physical volume is concerned, an industry which would turn out more units per year, the year round, and consequently could take advantage of the efficiency to be achieved in that way. This would be real progress, and would be a real gain in wealth which could be passed on not only to the customers but also to the workers in the industry.

Secondly, I think a national conference should be held, or at least that it would be helpful, to discuss building codes and the standardization of materials. Building codes are antiquated. They vary from municipality to municipality, thus making it very difficult for a builder to carry on operations in four or five places at one time owing to the fact that in one place he is permitted to do one thing but is not permitted to do it in another, and vice versa. This makes uniformity and standardization most difficult. Any step taken in the direction of uniformity of standards in building codes, on a national level, would be most welcome. The same would apply to any discussion respecting the standardization of building materials, at the same level.

Such a conference might not accomplish a great deal; its progress might be slow. Those of us who are young, in particular, have to learn that progress is slow, and sometimes only piecemeal; but progress is sure if one keeps plugging at it. We must realize that building codes are not going to be made uniform or standardized overnight. Building materials cannot be standardized overnight. But progress can and should be made in that direction, so that the next generation will be able to reap the benefits from these tedious but consistent improvements.

In closing my remarks may I point out that in my view housing is a serious domestic problem, especially in the urban centres of our great country. Perhaps the only other comparable one is the necessity of retaining the purchasing power of our currency. If these suggestions are implemented they will aid in the development of a new generation of sturdy, self-reliant and responsible citizens who will take their place, as was said so eloquently this afternoon by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Murray), as our greatest national asset.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my warmest congratulations are extended to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Hellyer) on his most objective approach to a very serious problem, namely that of national housing.

This afternoon the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) made an excellent contribution to the debate, and this evening the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) dealt with the same subject. From time to time others have laid emphasis upon the urgent necessity for an overhaul of the National Housing Act.

Speaking in the house on Thursday, May 1, my colleague, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), devoted considerable time to a discussion of this subject. He concluded his speech with this observation:

> It seems to me that this government should introduce some legislation that would afford some protection of the money which the home builder has invested, and which would ensure that the money was properly spent.

It is our conviction that the minister has now heard sufficient hon. members within the house, and also he must have read sufficient criticism as it has appeared in the newspapers emanating from many parts of Canada, to cause him to take immediate action to see to it that appropriate amendments to the National Housing Act are brought before the house.

It is not my intention to devote much time to a discussion of this subject, more than to say that those of us in some of the smaller centres, because of the withdrawal of the lending institutions from so many of the smaller communities within Canada, have been greatly inconvenienced. In this way there have been taken away from the people of those communities benefits which would have accrued to them as a result of the National Housing Act.

May I emphasize that the time has long since passed when, through the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), the government should take appropriate and effective action to solve this mighty and serious problem.

The amendment offered by the Progressive Conservative party is in these words:

> That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
>
> "the proposals of the Minister of Finance are unsatisfactory because they would continue to levy excessive and unjust taxation instead of assuring substantial tax reductions.
> This house condemns the government for taxing far beyond actual requirements and for its waste and extravagance.
> And this house regrets the failure of the government to assure efficient administration in all departments of the public service.

We of the Social Credit group agree with that amendment. It is true that in his budget address to the house the Minister of Finance indicated that there would be certain tax reductions. First of all, there was the tax reduction upon automobiles. The minister was told when that tax was increased—as it was increased some months ago—that there would be substantial hardship imposed upon many persons who found it absolutely essential to have automobiles in pursuing their normal activities of life. He has since learned; but I am wondering if he did not know a year ago, or if this action has not been the result of a lot of costly publicity in which the automotive dealers had to indulge in order to secure at least a measure of justice, or to remove a large measure of injustice.

It is also highly significant that only this day has the Minister of Finance deemed it advisable to remove credit restrictions upon purchases. I wonder, too, if it is not significant that that action was taken just at this time, instead of several months ago. I suggest it is highly significant that it is taken at this time, only four weeks away from the election date in a province from which the greatest objection came with respect to these unfair restrictions. I am speaking of the province of British Columbia.

It was also noted that the minister saw fit to reduce taxes on cigarettes. Was he not told a year ago exactly what would happen? Was he not warned that the law of diminishing returns would assert itself? Did he not realize the extent to which smuggling would be undertaken? Could he not have envisioned the tremendous cost, quite apart from the loss in revenue, which would accrue as a consequence of having to have our customs officers and our R.C.M.P. running back and forth across the country trying to apprehend smugglers when there was much more important work for them to do? Surely he must have realized that a year ago. We are not unmindful of the arguments which he advanced in connection with the previous budget and we realize now just how weak they were. I trust the Canadian people do also.

There is a reduction in the taxation upon electrical appliances. I believe it was the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) who laid emphasis upon how unfair it had been to young people who had attempted to set up homes during the past year and who had suffered this heavy penalty as a consequence of paying this tax during the operation of one year. Talk about discrimination, there is an example par excellence.

I have been impressed by certain observations made by hon. members of this house during the course of the budget debate. I was struck by one observation made by the hon. member for Greenwood, I believe on the same evening the budget was brought down. He said that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had made the Canadian people tax conscious—he certainly has done that—tax puzzled—it is not a day dream—and tax angry—which is a reality. All one has to do is to be in closer contact with the Canadian taxpayer than the Minister of Finance seems to be to realize just how true that observation is.

It has been emphasized by some hon. members during this debate that once more there has been discrimination against the Canadian taxpayer who suffers from an extremely low income. We have again placed him in a position where tax reductions which he receives are on a percentage basis much less than the benefits extended to those in the higher income brackets.

My leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), referred to the disastrous effect which the government's tax policy is having upon farm and other types of production within this country. It has imposed upon the minds of our Canadian producers the fear that something disastrous may result as a consequence of producing to the optimum level. And this in the face of the fact that everywhere in Europe we find that persons are so much in need of the commodities which we are capable of producing. To me all this is not a bit surprising. It simply represents a continuation of unimaginative Liberal financial policy.

The other day I made a rough computation—actually it is not so rough—to ascertain if possible the net effect of the federal government budget upon the taxpayers of the provinces. It was quite natural and normal for me to think of the province of Alberta because that is the province whence I come. Figures were available only for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951, and I find that during that fiscal year the federal government took out of my province the following amounts:

General income tax	$40,780,457.98
Corporation tax	22,587,274.85
Non-resident tax	809,109.71
Gift tax	110,028.30
Deferred tax	4,837.60
Private companies tax	4,697,480.43
Excess profits tax	583,338.88
Succession duties	1,839,098.54
	$71,411,626.29

That was a total for one year as far as those taxes were concerned. But let us consider the excise and customs duties. An estimate which has been computed as carefully as it is possible to compute it, and which I believe is on the conservative side, indicates that during the year there was taken from the taxpayers from my province through excise taxes and customs duties imposed by the federal government, a total of $105,285,714, making a grand total up to that point of $176,697,340.29.

Is that all? Certainly not. Through the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, which has resulted as a consequence of federal government fiscal policy, and based on the cost of living index for 1951 of 184·5, the people of my province lost through that devaluation a total of $391,500,000.

Mr. Low: Straight confiscation.

Mr. Shaw: Outright and downright confiscation. I have mentioned the losses accruing as a result of the freight rates differential. My province is at the apex of the Canadian freight rates structure. The goods which we export, including our raw materials, must be quoted f.o.b. Halifax, Fort William, Toronto, Vancouver or some other place and then we must pay more for the manufactured goods imported into the province. All this as a consequence of the freight rates structure. Just to show how ridiculous that can be, let me tell you that certain goods manufactured in central Canada are shipped through to Vancouver, placed in warehouses and then shipped back to Calgary and Edmonton by local freight which is more costly than the transcontinental rate. That can be done more cheaply than to unload them at Calgary or Edmonton on their way west. What that costs us, heaven only knows, but it runs into hundreds of millions of dollars every year.

What have we lost as a consequence of the settlement of the British wheat agreement? That must run into tens of millions. Western Canadian farmers as a whole lost $376 million but a substantial part of that was borne by the farmers of my province.

I happen to represent a part of Alberta where a lot of feed grain is grown. The farmers of that area find it profitable to procure feeder livestock and feed the home-grown products. Last year the farmers in my district through two feeder associations bought $500,000 worth of feeder livestock at anywhere from thirty to thirty-four cents a pound. Then what happened? After feeding that livestock all winter the price was pegged at a figure which will gross them about twenty-two cents per pound. Those farmers have lost tens of thousands of dollars as a consequence of that action.

I have always maintained that that was something which could have been avoided had the government taken proper steps. The thing to do was to have called a conference of the provinces so that no such thing as a vicious embargo would be established by one province to keep out goods from a neighbouring province.

Sometimes we are told that we provinces—I am speaking now as though I were a province—should be most grateful for the subsidies and grants which the federal authority makes available to us. But in the case of my own province these subsidies, grants and payments for such things as irrigation and public buildings do not equal more than approximately 50 per cent of the taxes which were extracted from the people of that province by the federal authorities in the year 1951. That is without taking into account all these other losses which in some cases it was quite impossible to calculate. I sometimes wonder whether some of these federal grants are made to the provinces with the idea of helping them or is it with the idea of being able to try to claim credit for everything that is done by a province? I well recall that in 1949, after the federal government had undertaken to make grants for hospital construction under certain very specific and rigid conditions, and grants incidentally which in themselves would not build one hospital anywhere in Canada, the government came along at election time and said: Yes, you have lovely hospitals but we put up the money to make their construction possible.

As I say, I wonder sometimes whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was actually concerned about health and welfare or was he more concerned about getting his toe in so that somebody else could claim credit for all that was done? We are grateful for these grants, certainly we are, but at the same time it seems to me that there should be a little reasonableness, a little more good sense, and some people ought to have their feet a little more solidly fixed on the floor before they make some of their utterances.

Mr. Byrne: You have got yours in the clouds.

Mr. Gibson: No more of that.

Mr. Shaw: I do not mind interjections if they are made in such a tone of voice that it is possible to understand them. I am going to move on to something that I think is of practical concern to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). We happen to come from a province where gas and oil have been found.

An hon. Member: Gas especially.

Mr. Shaw: I notice that you are clamouring for it though.

An hon. Member: Not this kind.

Mr. Shaw: Developments in the field of gas and oil have been tremendous and have been advantageous not only to the province but to all Canada. Certainly at a time like this, with warnings coming from outside the country of threats hanging over us, nothing can give us more comfort than the knowledge that our oil and gas development has been so phenomenal. What does annoy me, however, is what appears to me to be a deliberate effort on the part of some to injure the industry through deliberate misrepresentation. I am going to accuse the Liberals. I dare say there is not a Liberal member from British Columbia who would not support the export of gas from Alberta to British Columbia.

Mr. Gibson: You have had our lumber.

Mr. Shaw: That is quite all right. I appreciate that. I am merely asserting there is not a Liberal in this house who would not welcome the export of gas from Alberta to British Columbia.

Mr. Gibson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Shaw: All right. Then I say some of the Liberals from British Columbia should come into Alberta and try to convert their own Liberal leader in that province, a man who is doing more to prevent gas and oil export than any other single person I know. This house was told that the other evening by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle), who certainly knows what he is talking about. It is a strange situation. The Liberal leader in Alberta, not being able to find a sensible election issue, is undertaking to concoct something relative to the oil and gas industry. As far as I am able to ascertain, federal Liberals outside of Alberta certainly do not agree with him. Take a paper like the Lethbridge Herald, a Liberal paper which supports the Liberal party in Alberta. It believes in the export of gas from Alberta. Let us take the Calgary Albertan. I do not think I should call it a Liberal paper although it has said that in the federal field at least it will support the Liberals. It takes strong issue with the Liberal leader in Alberta because of the damage he is doing to gas export from the province.

The attack first started last fall. At that time the accusation was that Albertans were being bled of their wealth by money powers outside of the province, and that the people of Alberta were not procuring a fair share of that asset. When that did not work the Liberal leader in that province swung to the other side of the pendulum and started attacking the export question. I know why he is doing it. It is because the leaders of farm organizations in Alberta have taken a position in opposition to the export of gas from that province, and therefore such an attitude appears to be politically popular. Conceivably some of the municipal councils have taken the same position, and there is the possibility that political support may be acquired from those quarters. I have an editorial before me certain parts of which I am going to read. They relate to the attacks which started last fall with respect to the share of gas and oil production which accrues to the people of the province. I wish to refer to the Calgary Albertan of October 11, 1951. I have quoted the first paragraph once before but it consists of only four lines and I think it is an excellent paragraph with which to commence an editorial of this character. It reads:

> It may not be our duty to keep cleaning up in the trail of Mr. Harper Prowse, but somebody's got to do it. The misinformation he spreads, the twisted ideas he leaves, cannot be left to clutter up public thinking indefinitely.

Mr. Johnston: Is he the Liberal leader out there? You would almost think he was from Ottawa.

Mr. Shaw: I sometimes think the Liberals out there wish he were not their leader. The editorial continues:

> Once more, this time to a Lethbridge audience, the provincial Liberal leader has repeated the myth that the big foreign oil companies are fleecing Alberta of its rich resources with the connivance of the Alberta government. He says that countries like Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia and Venezuela get up to 70 per cent of the oil wealth extracted by foreign companies, while the Alberta government is content with retaining on behalf of the people a measly 14 per cent. The figure for the other countries is up to 50 per cent, not 70, according to our information.
> Mr. Prowse did not explain—or at least it was not mentioned in the report of his speech—that 50 per cent is paid on net profits and in Alberta it is 14 per cent of gross production. In other countries the government takes up to half of what is left after all expenses are paid, while Alberta takes one-seventh of everything and leaves the companies to pay all expenses out of the other six-sevenths.

The rest of the editorial is extremely enlightening, but I have read that part to show that in the light of the facts the charge that was made last fall, which it was thought would make an election issue, petered out. Now it is the question of export, and once again the Albertan comes along with a very effective editorial in their issue of April 30, 1952. Dealing with this matter it has this to say:

> The Liberal party will concentrate on the gas export issue in the coming provincial election because it believes the voters can be stirred by it. It will stand unalterably opposed to export, now or ever. Most other issues will fade into the shadows of that one. The Lethbridge Herald supports the Liberal party on general principle. Yet it is also strongly in favour of gas export. We are looking forward to seeing how it can rationalize the contradictions. In its latest gas export editorial it tries to blame the government for public confusion and misinformation. It says the government should have come out frankly two or three years ago and explained why export would be good for the province. But instead of giving that leadership it has been "scared by the political angle," says the Herald.
> It is true that the government should have been more forthright, and that the politics of it was frightening. But it must also be admitted that all along the government has been somewhat in advance of public opinion—

I feel I can classify this as a Liberal newspaper; and it goes on:

> —and that no government could afford to become too far separated from what the public is thinking.

What the Herald glaringly omits to say is that Mr. Prowse and the Liberal party have been responsible for circulating most of the misinformation. They have deliberately aroused public prejudice and fanned and fed it. They have created public alarm where none existed. They have misrepresented the issue obviously for none but political purposes and it must be admitted that they have had some success.

Mr. Low: A tempest in a teapot.

Mr. Shaw: Right.

Mr. Prudham: Would the hon. gentleman like another editorial to read? I will send one over.

Mr. Shaw: Sure. If my time permits I will read them all. Of course I am going on the theory that the minister would not send it to me if it were going to help my case at all.

Finally, the people are beginning to see the fallacy of the Liberal party position and the unscrupulousness which underlies it. But things like that they have to see for themselves. Mr. Manning could not have forced it on them. In fact, if he had tried to move faster he might have made the Liberal case more plausible.

Then it refers to ambitious politicians and counter-appeals, and also to the very great damage which is being done as far as this extremely important industry is concerned. It also deals with the other equally important aspect of the industry, namely the provision of Alberta natural gas to British Columbia and other parts of Canada. The short concluding paragraph reads:

That's partly true. But let's not forget that the Leader of the Opposition plays a key part in public affairs, and to the extent that he perverts his responsibilities the business of government suffers. Let's put the blame where it really lies.

I am not going to take time to read the editorial the minister sent over to me, because it would occupy the remainder of my time. However, I thank him for sending it, and I extend an invitation to him to put it on record any time he sees fit. I will send it back. It is from the Calgary Herald, a Conservative newspaper. It it takes a position in opposition to the export policy of the government of Alberta it is also taking a position in opposition to one of its own Calgary members, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle), who in the course of his speech the other night indicated that he supported the policy of the Alberta government as far as the export of gas was concerned. The hon. member said industry would still come into the province in order to obtain that commodity at the least possible cost.

As far as industry coming to the province is concerned, I would say that quite apart from gas we have not done too badly there. The cost of industrial plants completed or commenced last year in Alberta totalled approximately $65 million, while construction already approved for 1952 is in excess of $42 million. We have been getting industry out there, and we will continue to get it. Even though we make surplus gas available to other parts of Canada we will also obtain additional industry in western Canada —industry associated with the extraction of by-products from the gas that comes out of the ground in the several extremely important fields of Alberta.

As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, all Canadians should glory in the realization that we have such a gas and oil industry in Alberta, and in the years to come I believe we will have an equally important industry in the province of Saskatchewan. That is especially so at a time like this. If war should break out and oil from the Middle East be cut off, the gas and oil of western Canada could spell the difference between victory and defeat. So I deplore actions on the part of anyone, no matter what their purpose, if they result in impeding or perhaps actually destroying an extremely important industry. So I say to the Liberal members from British Columbia and other parts of Canada, if you want gas—and after all you will get gas from Alberta as our surplus becomes available—for heaven's sake come to my province and try to stop the tongues of those who are your worst enemies as far as obtaining gas is concerned; and once again I refer to your colleagues in the provincial field there.

I have practically exhausted my time.

Mr. Prudham: Very good provincial election speech.

Mr. Shaw: Someone says it is a good provincial election speech. I believe that was the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). He has already gone into Alberta, where an election has not even been called, and delivered a speech which could be tagged as nothing but a provincial political speech. My understanding is that it went over as a free time broadcast, sponsored by the private radio broadcasting stations in Canada. That is a program which I always assumed was to be objective in character, and non-political. I had no intention of saying that, but the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys made his interjection and I could do nothing but answer it. He has already started the provincial campaign in Alberta, even though the election has not been called.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes I would like to take advantage of this debate to refer to a number of matters of interest to the people of Newfoundland. First I would like to say how pleased everybody must be with the announcement made this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). It was mentioned over the radio several times, and you could almost hear the people cheering. But this is only what we told the minister he should have done. When he put on the taxes last year we told him he was going to increase the cost of living. I remember a return brought down in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. Hodgson) about the increase in the number of refrigerators being imported into the country. It rose from about 700 to a huge number, something over 100,000, because the excise tax had been increased to such an extent that it paid people to buy refrigerators imported from the United States.

That is the answer to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) and the hon. member for Norquay (Mr. Wood), who have been complaining about the high duties. It was not the high duties that were keeping up the cost of goods in this country; it was the high taxes imposed by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Wait till I get started.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Just one short question. Has the hon. member noticed any difference in the prices of refrigerators and household appliances since the combines investigating committee sat last fall?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I will be honest with the hon. gentleman and say I have not. I have not given any consideration to that aspect of it.

Mr. Sinnott: And you are supposed to be an honest man.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What is this? Are we going to have a free for all, or am I going to be permitted to make a few remarks on this subject? It was not only in regard to the manufacture of automobiles, refrigerators, electric stoves and that sort of thing that high taxation had an effect. In my constituency there is a small industry run by a man whose father before him was engaged in the business of manufacturing trunks. In many of the outport settlements of Newfoundland people use trunks as wardrobes of a sort, in which they keep their belongings. People buy trunks and keep their good things stored in them. Before I came here for the session this gentleman came to me and pleaded almost with tears in his eyes for me to try to get our Minister of Finance to do something about taking off the taxes. He did not mind the sales tax so much, but this heavy excise tax was putting him out of business. He had been in that business all his life, since returning from the first world war, and his father had been at it before him. All my life I can remember seeing that little industry, which now was declining. I am glad to know the minister has at last seen the folly of his taxation policy of last year, and that he has been able to answer the question asked by his parliamentary assistant, and to see that his parliamentary assistant was not quite so sure as he felt himself to be when he asked in the House of Commons here a short time ago, after criticizing the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming): "Where, O where, is there any country whatsoever with a sounder economic position than that of Canada?"

I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman has returned to the house.

Mr. Thatcher: It is about time.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not know whether his attention has been drawn to the editorial in the Post-Record published in Sydney, for April 25, entitled "Beating Around the Bush," in which the statements made by the hon. gentleman are criticized, in my opinion, roundly and soundly.

Mr. Thatcher: And fairly.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, of course.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think it is in accord with our procedure for an hon. member to read in the house statements that are made outside the house for the purpose of reflecting on statements made inside the house.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I do not approve of reading such statements, and I was not reading this article. I was just holding it in my hand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): As I always do, I was going to try to give the gist of the criticism which the hon. gentleman's opinions, expressed so nobly and so boldly here, have aroused throughout the country. The hon. gentleman knows that this is a rich and wealthy country and, if he comes to analyse the prognostications of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) for last year, I do not think that he can compliment him on the accuracy of his forecast. A man who budgets for $30 million surplus and ends up with nearly a billion, who does not know what to do with it and has to stow away $300 million or $400 million, cannot deserve much credit for accuracy at any rate. This country is a marvellous one. Everyone knows that. But how much better would it be if it had a better government!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCann: Question mark.

Mr. Fleming: And soon.

Mr. Sinclair: Bring back R. B. Bennett! Those were the days!

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have the floor, Mr. Speaker. If hon. gentlemen are interested in this subject, they can continue discussing it after I have finished. If we had as Minister of Finance a man of the type of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell)—

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinnott: What a tragedy!

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In that event there would be some reason for the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) asking the question which he asked rhetorically here a little while ago.

Mr. Sinnott: What a tragedy that would be!

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): We have been under severe taxation. The burden of taxation on the people is too great. Everywhere you go, everyone is talking about the same thing: the cost of living is too high and taxation is too high. It must be too high when the minister is able to show such an enormous surplus as that which he had this year. I suppose in no other country in the world has such a surplus been obtained from taxes taken from the people—

Mr. Sinclair: No country in the world has had better times. We have had good times.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —when the government did not need it for the purpose of meeting the expenditures of this country. The minister may smile in the comfort of the government benches, but the people in the country are not smiling. The people who have to pay the taxes are not smiling. Taxes are far heavier than the people are able to bear. The people are groaning under the weight of taxation which the minister has put on them with such enthusiasm.

Mr. Sinclair: In times of best employment and best incomes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He has reduced to some extent and eased the restrictions which he put on credit last year. In that way he will have compensated somewhat for the errors he made in his previous budget.

Mr. Sinnott: I suppose the hon. gentleman is content for the people to go on paying $62 million in interest for the next generation.

Mr. Fleming: What does the hon. member know about the next generation?

Mr. Sinnott: You would be surprised.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I now want to refer to another subject; it is one in which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is interested. I want to refer to railway matters in Newfoundland. In that tenth province we have a main railway line which extends about 545 miles in a semicircle from Port aux Basques to St. John's. It is a narrow-gauge railway and it now has to face the colossal task of handling the increased trade with Canada that has developed since the act of union in 1949. By that union between Canada and Newfoundland, most of the import trade which we had with the United Kingdom and with the United States has been diverted, and most of the imports of Newfoundland are now coming from Canada. The railway is groaning under the task, and is not able to carry the load; it is not able to keep up with the traffic. A piece of goods—for instance, a refrigerator or a boiler or something like that—shipped from Ottawa takes six to eight weeks to get to St. John's. Is the government being fair to Newfoundland if it is not going to give any better service than that? Even an express package takes from seven to ten days to reach St. John's from Ottawa. A person travelling on the railways can generally get there in four days. Seven to ten days is not the right time for an express package to take to get there. Freight has to wait for seven weeks, and I think that is far too long. In fact, I wonder if the railway will ever be able to bear the traffic as it is today. Will it be able to do so?

The minister knows that there is a bottleneck at Sydney. I know that great works are being undertaken to improve the facilities at the two terminals, namely at North Sydney and at Port aux Basques. Please God that in another three or four years we shall have in service across the straits a ferry which will be able to handle the passenger traffic at its peak, and also able to carry most of the freight and to accommodate tourists with their cars in the summertime. But it is going to be at least three years before that ferry will be in operation. Construction has been delayed. It has only just started now, and the people cannot expect much relief in that direction until that time at least.

So bad is the situation that I wonder if it would not be a good idea for the government to give consideration to the question of building a wide-gauge railway across Newfoundland. It is the only part of the main line of the Canadian National Railways in the country which now is left with this narrow gauge. The government had to build a wide-gauge railway in Prince Edward Island in order to accommodate the traffic. Why should it not do so in Newfoundland? Further than that, I have heard the suggestion made that it might perhaps be feasible to convert part of the railway line into a highroad and use diesel-operated trucks to carry the freight. In any event, the responsibility is on the minister and he must find some way of solving this problem of improving the means for the transit of goods to Newfoundland, especially to St. John's.

A copy of the Fundy Fisherman was sent to me the other day. I am not quite sure who owns it or who is interested in it, but I suspect it is either a Liberal senator or a Liberal member of the House of Commons. In it there is an article dealing with Newfoundland, and in which reference is made to the expectations which the people of Newfoundland had when they came into union with Canada in 1949. The writer of the article in that paper says that the people have reason to complain, that they have a just grievance, in that they are not being treated as they should have been treated. The writer thinks that Newfoundland's public facilities, especially with regard to telephone communication, should be brought on a par with those in other parts of Canada. He points out—as have both my colleague the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) and I in this house—that Newfoundland had a small debt in 1949. It was insignificant when compared with the public debt that was being carried by the people of Canada. It was only about one-seventh of the public debt borne by the people of Canada. This article goes on to say that Newfoundland therefore should have its public facilities improved to a great extent in order to compensate for the increased debt which they have been compelled to bear.

It is quite obvious that the public facilities which we must have down there are better wharves, breakwaters, and various other things to facilitate trade and the natural industries of the country.

I must compliment the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) on the fine speech he made in favour of improving the port facilities in the harbour of Saint John, New Brunswick. This spring the board of trade of Saint John, New Brunswick, circularized those members who had visited Saint John last year, and pointed out that the port facilities, although it is a national harbour, were not able to accommodate the steamers coming in there—that they had to wait outside the port for a chance to get a berth at the docks. It is a national harbour, and if the facilities are not good enough it seems to me the government should do something about it.

The Daily News of St. John's points out in its editorial of April 24 that the facilities in St. John's, Newfoundland, ought to be improved similarly; that it ought to become a national harbour. Most of the trade is carried on through St. John's; it is the capital of the province; it is a city of nearly 70,000 people. The principal imports have to go through there, and the exports have to pass through there on the way out. The government ought to give consideration to making it a national harbour. In addition, the article goes on to show that it is important from a strategic point of view. During the second world war many naval ships, British, United States, Free French, Canadian and other allied shipping, were constantly using the port, and yet the facilities are not what they should be, although they received great improvement during the war.

I now wish to pass on to another subject, sir, namely that of housing. I want to compliment the minister responsible for the valuable work he did in connection with slum clearing in the city of St. John's and the 140 units which were constructed there during the past couple of years. It is undoubtedly a great improvement, and I am sure that the people who have benefited by that construction appreciate it very much. I am glad to see that a contract has now been let for about 140 more units to be constructed in the city of St. John's.

Mr. Sinnott: Under a Liberal government.

Mr. Fleming: In spite of it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I want to draw the attention of the house to another serious matter—I think I have done so before. I do not know how much it concerns people living in other provinces, but it seems to me regrettable and something that must be repaired, that in the small settlements throughout Newfoundland none of these housing loans or any part of the housing policy reaches them. A man living in a place like Portugal Cove South, near Cape Race, is in this position. I was in his house this past summer and I asked him how he liked living in a place like Portugal Cove South, which is about 90 miles from the city of St. John's. In the winter the roads are usually blocked. There is no communication by road or by steamer with the city, and they are there for the winter. He said: "Well, I am a fisherman; I have lived here all my life and I would like to stay here, but my wife, she's not so keen on it". They had a fine new house, but all the houses in this settlement are a good distance apart. Usually a man has his house built with a garden in front, and then he has his barn and fields for hay and that sort of thing, and pasture behind, and a hundred feet away there is another house and so on. But they are not laid out under any regulations. Houses of that type are the most numerous ones in Newfoundland. None of them has received one cent of all the moneys that have been poured out or guaranteed by the federal government.

The minister may be interested to know that the provincial government has just introduced a bill to create community councils in settlements that have no town council. They are not big enough for a town council, but they are going to form community councils. I have been one who has criticized the provincial government very frequently when I disagreed with them. Here is something for which I must compliment them. If they are responsible for introducing that piece of legislation then I tell them they are doing one of the best things that they have ever done.

As the minister must be aware, I am sure, one of the first and fundamental things contained in the report of Lord Durham a hundred years ago when he investigated conditions in Canada was that people were going into parliament with not even the experience of having served on town councils, because no such things as town councils then existed. He recommended as the first step in the development of responsible government the creation of a system of councils. Unfortunately we have never been able to develop them sufficiently in Newfoundland. I remember years ago when I had the honour of being in the government, in 1932 or 1933, drafting a bill to form town councils but the commission of government which came in a year or so afterwards did not implement it as it should have done. But a number of small towns were incorporated, and this new bill is going to create a corporate responsibility in a large number of settlements. I hope that when these community councils are set up the minister will give consideration to granting them assistance for the improvement of housing in the small settlements. It is a matter of great concern. I am sure it must have existed in many places in Canada, and still exists, that these houses are often without a regular water supply. They depend upon wells, and they have no sewerage facilities and no form of central heating system. It seems to me that these three things are vital and ought to be introduced and ought to be in the possession of every family throughout Canada. We cannot say that sound housing is possible until these facilities are available.

I remember the late President Roosevelt of the United States taking great credit for the rural electrification of the state of Ohio and of other states through his electrification schemes. Well, it seems to me too that in Newfoundland, where we have such a large water supply, electricity could be a great help in that respect. I think loans should be made available to those fishermen who work so hard, deserve such consideration, and get very little. Very few of them can benefit from this wise and prudent policy of the government.

We have just heard an address by an hon. member who represents a Toronto constituency. But I am speaking tonight on behalf of those who do not live in cities and who cannot easily get accommodation when they are looking for a loan to improve their homes. Therefore they must wait even for years before they can get married, because every nail and every piece of timber or every improvement that goes into the home must be paid for in advance. A friend of mine who lives down there has been two or three years building his home. He is waiting to get the home built before he can get married. He is an industrious man. I do not think it is fair to him. The loans are available to people who live in cities. He is a good citizen, an industrious man and he has to pay for everything in cash. He has not the benefit of that accommodation. Therefore I hope that the minister will give consideration to these points I have raised.

I want to refer to another subject that has always been dear to my heart in regard to Newfoundland. I refer to the question of agriculture. This year in Newfoundland potatoes are reaching the highest price in the history of the island. I think they are reaching the highest price in the history of Canada. Anyway, they cost about 50 cents a gallon in the city of St. John's today. I think that is too much for potatoes. Our people cannot afford to pay that. There is something wrong with our Department of Agriculture, which neglected last year to see the general over-all picture when not enough potatoes were planted. The year before I remember the late member for Victoria-Carleton talking about a floor price for potatoes. Now in Newfoundland they have to put a ceiling on to keep them from going too high in price. What sort of an industry is it when it fluctuates like that? Is that the best type of fiscal policy, or agricultural policy, that we can have—a policy where, in one year, an industry is depressed right down to the bottom, while in the next year no one grows potatoes, with the result that people have to pay enormous prices for them?

I do not hear people in this city of Ottawa talking about the price of potatoes. But in Newfoundland potatoes are a staple diet. Someone told me yesterday that the government is considering importing potatoes from the United Kingdom. I certainly hope they do, if they can be obtained cheaper, and offered at a cheaper price to the people than the price at which the small supply of potatoes now available is being offered.

The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) points out to me that potatoes are coming in from the state of Maine. They have always come from Maine, because it is just across the river from New Brunswick. There has been a constant sale of potatoes right here in Ottawa, from the state of Maine.

I remember that in 1932 we bought potatoes in the United Kingdom, some very fine strains indeed. There were the Aran Banner, the Aran Victory and Kerr's Pinks, which the people still grow in Newfoundland. Those potatoes were rot-free and canker-free, and they gave splendid results. In those dreadful years during the depression, the government, of which I was then a member, imported 30,000 or 40,000 barrels of potatoes and gave them to the people to plant. And it was a good thing we did, because by so doing we provided them with a substantial stock of potatoes to carry them through the winter, and to provide them with seed. These strains have been carried on ever since, with the result that in a year when the blight struck most potatoes, those particular ones were free from blight, and therefore were a great help to the bulk of the people who were depending upon them.

I notice that in the report for 1951 there is reference to the setting up of an agricultural experimental station. I went to see that station in St. John's, and I have nothing but the highest praise for the work being done there. But that is not enough; we want more than one experimental station in Newfoundland. I believe there are more than 120 in Canada; but I do not think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is taking his responsibilities in regard to Newfoundland seriously enough. On an earlier occasion I asked him to give consideration to the setting up of more experimental stations in Newfoundland so as to demonstrate to the people in the different parts of Newfoundland the type of vegetables that can be grown to the greatest advantage. They could be grown in greater quantities, and in this way increase the amount of produce the people could obtain from their own area.

There is a great amount of trade going on. Wealthy manufacturers are producing large quantities of iron ore from Bell island and from Buchans. We have the greatest pulp and paper industry in the world at Corner Brook and at Grand Falls. We are sending out large amounts of exports of this kind and bringing in a lot of money. But when that money comes in, what do the people have to do? They have to send up to Canada for anything they need. I do not think that is a good condition, when so much they need could be produced in Newfoundland. I do not think any hon. members, including those in the government, would want to see us bringing everything over that narrow-gauge railway, which is about seven weeks behind time in the delivery of goods.

The Minister of Agriculture should give consideration to the setting-up of more experimental stations, and he should consider more carefully the situation of agriculture in Newfoundland. I know the minister is deeply concerned with affairs in his own province at the present time, due to the foot-and-mouth disease, over which he had no control. I know he is very much concerned with that. But, apart from that he has not given the proper consideration he should have given to the development of agriculture in Newfoundland. I must appeal to him again, as I have appealed to him before, to get his men busy setting up more experimental stations down there, with a view to improving the condition. Newfoundland has great possibilities. I know it can produce all the potatoes it needs, because I have studied the matter for years, and have compared imports with the amount required by the people. I know that in some years the total imports have amounted to no more than 50,000 bushels, which is only about 16,000 barrels; and I know that the total production of the country was nearly three quarters of a million barrels. Potatoes are a vital product, so far as the people of Newfoundland are concerned.

Finally, I wish to make reference to the fisheries in Newfoundland. As we all know, fishing is an important industry today in Canada. Through the acquisition of Newfoundland, Canada can now claim to be the greatest fishing country in the world. I know the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) has expressed great interest in the matter. I read an article recently in the Fundy Fisherman, taken from the Liberal Advocate. It was written by the minister, who makes reference to various aspects of the fisheries. This spring when I asked him if a date had been set for the killing of seals, he admitted that he should have known but said that he did not know. I suggest there are certain features in connection with the sealing industry he ought to look into. I am glad to know that a date was agreed upon between the Norwegian interests and the interests in our country in regard to the date of killing seals. This is a very important factor in the sealing industry.

Last year the situation was disastrous because there had been no convention, with the result that the seals were killed when they were very young and had not reached a prime condition. Therefore although a ship might bring in 100,000 seals, or 40,000 seals, they would weigh only a few pounds each. On the other hand if they had waited several days, in the light of the fact that a seal increases its weight at the rate of two pounds a day, the seals would have been much heavier in weight and the results would have been more profitable to all concerned.

This year I spoke to the captain of the first arrival, The Arctic Sealer—Captain Hill—who is a very experienced sealing captain, and he asked me to draw the attention of the minister to the desirability of protection for certain kinds of seals. There is a seal which is a breeder seal, and which should not be killed. It should be protected for a certain number of years so that the future of the herds may also be protected. I believe it is the Bedlamer seal to which he was referring. Perhaps the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Bradley) would confirm what I say in this respect.

I suggest the Minister of Fisheries should give consideration to this point. In the article in the Fundy Fisherman the minister pointed out that the government was always giving consideration to the matter of protecting the fisheries. Through an error in the article—and I am sure it must be an error—there is a statement that these fisheries are inexhaustible. I think it should have said that these fisheries are not inexhaustible, and that therefore they must have protection, and that if they are not properly protected they will become exhausted. Certainly if they are not protected they will become seriously depleted, and the industry would suffer.

We know that salmon fishing is a very profitable industry in British Columbia. It is important also in Newfoundland. Fishermen catch salmon and sell it fresh. They also put it in tierces and sell it in a pickled condition. In addition to that, salmon fishing is a great attraction to the tourist. Many Americans come down there in the summer months and fish our rivers for salmon. I have been a rod and fly salmon fisherman for many years and I regret that our rivers are becoming very bad. During the last twenty-five or thirty years I have seen a tremendous difference in our rivers. Too much wood has been cut along the banks and when we have rain or snow there are not sufficient trees to hold back the moisture so that it can flow gradually into the river. The result is that the water runs off quickly and we have floods which wash away the spawning beds. And then quite often a drought will follow and the river becomes low and the fishing is no good. The salmon have trouble getting up and those that do get up die off.

I know that the minister is talking of facts when he speaks of the assistance which has been given in connection with the development of salmon hatcheries and the building of fish ladders and that sort of thing in British Columbia, but he has not done very much in that respect in Newfoundland. I must ask him that he do something about this because it is a pity that our salmon rivers are becoming depleted and are less attractive at a time when we were hoping to profit so much from them.

I am glad to note that we are getting more plants in Newfoundland to preserve codfish in the fresh state and that our United States markets still continue to be profitable. That market is capable of further exploitation. A good deal of fish is sent to different parts of Canada. I am glad to note that at Fermeuse in my own constituency a new plant will go into operation within three or four weeks. The manager of that plant has written to me complaining that he must send forty or fifty miles to get a customs officer in order to enter and clear vessels as that port is not yet a port of entry. I am sure the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) will give consideration to a reasonable request that a customs post be established in that settlement.

In order that the earnings of the fisherman may be constant he needs a constant supply of bait. Nothing is more important to our fisheries than the provision of bait depots. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) seems to be a rather timid person and not as generous in supplying bait depots as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) in the building of breakwaters and wharves. I am very glad to note that in the constituency of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert two large breakwaters are to be constructed, one at Chance Harbour and one at Lorneville in the constituency. I noted an article in the Fundy Fisherman referring to a meeting attended by the hon. member at which they passed a vote of thanks for his attendance. I think he deserved it for getting two breakwaters, one costing $200,000 and the other costing $280,000.

I am sure that both those places are important and that the breakwaters will be most useful, but that total of nearly half a million dollars would construct about eight bait depots. When I write to the Minister of Fisheries about bait depots he always replies that there is not as much fish caught this year as was caught last year and that there was not as much caught last year as was caught the year before, and so on. He comes back with figures and I must admit that perhaps he is right. There was not as much fish caught this year and there will not be as much caught next year because the people are leaving these settlements. They cannot catch fish unless there is a regular supply of bait.

There is a method of catching codfish known as trawling. This consists of a long line with hooks placed every five or ten feet, the hooks themselves being suspended on lines about four feet long. A trawl might be half a mile long or a long line may be four, five or ten miles long. As every hook is baited you can imagine the amount of bait necessary to bait all the hooks on a line ten miles long when you have a hook every four or five feet. They must have a regular supply of bait. It is most important that the fishermen of Newfoundland should have more bait depots, or if that cannot be done there should be holding depots, places where a supply of bait is readily available to them to prosecute their fishing.

Although the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) has many arduous duties to perform he has not lost interest in the fishermen. Recently he made a broadcast which brought forth a blast of withering scorn from the minister of fisheries of Newfoundland. I do not propose to intervene in this interesting argument between the Secretary of State and the provincial minister of fisheries, but the Evening Telegram of recent date took up the cudgels on behalf of the Secretary of State.

In an editorial they quoted with approval what appeared to me to be extracts from that radio address by the minister. I am not sure how far I can go quoting these, but reference is made to profits of around $10,000. I was interested in finding out the results of the experiments advocated by the Secretary of State and on March 19 I asked certain questions in this connection which were answered by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacNaught). The questions which I asked appear on page 585 of Hansard of that date and were as follows:

1. What has been the cost since its commencement of the long liner experiments in the Newfoundland cod fishing?

2. What has been the revenue received from the same?

3. What boats have been operating during the past year, and what boats are operating now?

4. What number make up the crew on each boat, and who is the captain of each?

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Here are the answers by the parliamentary assistant:

The information as to longlining experiments carried out by the federal government in Newfoundland is as follows:

1. $40,181.24.
2. $3,280.98.
3 and 4.

Year	Name of Boat	No. of crew	Captain
1951	O Johnny O.....	3	R. W. Decker
	Miss Osborne	4
	East Wind	4	Gordon Hemeon
	Edward Humby	4
1952	Edward Humby	4	Gordon Hemeon

That answer differs considerably from the statements which appear in this editorial. I should like the Secretary of State, who has been among the first to advocate these long liner experiments, to explain the discrepancy between the figures referred to in the editorial and those given in the answer by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was paired with the right hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Cardiff: I was paired. Had my pair been here he would have voted with me, and that would have been two more votes for the amendment.

Mr. McCubbin: I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I realize that I will not win any popularity prize by delaying the taking of the vote on the main motion, but I will try to finish in time to have that vote taken before eleven o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I draw the attention of hon. members to citation 467 of Beauchesne's third edition:

> Whenever an order of the day has been read for the house to resolve itself into the committee of supply or the committee of ways and means, the motion "that the Speaker do now leave the chair" must be proposed, except on Thursday and Friday as provided by standing order 28. When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance, and it is not necessary to move an amendment for that purpose; provided that the discussion and the amendment, if one is moved, shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session—

And so on. Then I would refer hon. members to the latter part of citation 345:

> Members may discuss various matters on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair without any amendment being proposed; but once debate is stopped on one matter and another matter intervenes, members cannot again discuss the former.

It seems to me that almost every matter which could be discussed has been discussed on the amendment and subamendment, and I do not think it would be in order to revive a discussion on matters which have already been discussed. If the hon. member is discussing something new I think it would be in order for him to do so; but if it is a matter which has already been discussed it seems to me, from the citations I have read, that it would not be in order.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Abbott: In view of the fact that it is ten minutes to eleven I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

PROVISION WITH RESPECT TO TIME OF EXPIRY

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 182, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Brooks: Is this bill being referred to the committee on veterans affairs?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is being referred to the committee right now.

Mr. Lapointe moved:

> That Bill No. 182, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951, be referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT

PAYMENT TO ESTATES OF FULL AMOUNT OF POLICY

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 183, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is nearly eleven o'clock. I know there are some hon. members who wish to have some discussion on this bill. I would therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Lapointe: Can we not have the discussion in the committee?

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we shall take up first Bill No. 183, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act; that is the bill on which the debate has just been adjourned. Then we shall take up Bill No. 184, to amend the Pension Act; the resolution to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act; Bill No. 181, respecting allowances for war veterans and their dependents. There are also three resolutions under the name of the Minister of Transport which we shall take up, one respecting the construction of a railway line from Terrace to Kitimat, one respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners, and one to amend the Aeronautics Act; and also Bill No. 9, respecting the appointment of auditors for the national railways. If we had time left, we would take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour, which is No. 6 on today's order paper.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 6, 1952

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Third report of sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.—Mr. Cleaver.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse) presented the first report of the standing committee on public accounts, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION RESPECTING CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved:

That the report from the civil service commission respecting certain employees of the House of Commons, tabled on April 21, 1952, be approved.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 186, for the relief of Ludwik Bulkiewicz.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 187, for the relief of Jean Betton Harris.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 188, for the relief of Violet Mary Bailey Black.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 189, for the relief of Corinne Larocque Sergent.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 190, for the relief of Omer Montpetit.—Mr. Winkler.

HEALTH SERVICES

REPORT OF ONTARIO SURVEY COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I beg leave to table the report of the Ontario health survey committee.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

COMPLAINT AS TO EMPLOYMENT OF UNITED STATES WORKERS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in a position now to reply to a question I asked him concerning employment of United States workers in some of the very large projects under way in British Columbia?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): At the same time that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra drew this to my attention I also received letters from the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) and several other members from the province of British Columbia. I have since received rather lengthy reports from four or five companies against which there have been some complaints. Without putting them on Hansard in full, I should be glad to show them to any hon. members who would care to come to see them.

I might state briefly, however, that this is the situation:

The Northern Construction Company employs 2,000 Canadian workmen, and seven United States citizens. These seven United States citizens consist of one project manager, three superintendents, one tunnel walker, and two civil engineers.

The Mannix Company Limited have ten United States citizens and 1,130 Canadian employees. Of the ten United States citizens there are one project manager, two superintendents, one assistant superintendent, three foremen, two construction machine operators, and one general office manager.

The Morrison Knudsen Company have 3,100 Canadian employees and 99 American personnel. Then there follows a long list of this personnel.

In general the policy is to admit skilled foremen, and the like, who are permanent employees of these construction companies. I am informed by the companies that they have some difficulty inducing these people to come to Canada to supervise the work because they say that wages are higher in the United States than they can obtain in Canada. Nevertheless we do grant temporary entry to those who, it would appear, could be used to advantage in construction work and thus give employment to Canadians engaged in that work. At the same time it is not the policy of the government to admit persons unless they have a real contribution to make.

The personnel representatives of the companies have been in touch with this department and with the Department of Labour. They are most anxious to co-operate and to secure their requirements through the national employment service.

As I said, I shall be glad to show these reports to any member wishing to see them.

Mr. Green: Would the minister be willing to table those reports? I would urge upon him the necessity of his department, as well as the Department of Labour, keeping a close check in the matter.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We do keep a close check. As I said, the figures indicate the situation. The reports are prepared by these companies, and I would prefer not to table them at least until they are checked.

FUR SEALS

DISTRIBUTION OF CATCH—RESTORATION OF JAPANESE SHARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is consideration being given to Japan's claim to the restoration of that country's share in the Alaska fur seal catch and treaty? If so, to what extent will this affect the proportion of the skins that Canada now receives, and has the United States government been acquainted with the matter?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): I would prefer to take the hon. member's question as notice, and to answer it tomorrow.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mayhew: I should like to refer again to the question asked by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure). I left the impression that he had not given me notice of his question, but the fact is that he did give notice. Unfortunately I did not get it until after he had asked the question.

TELECOMMUNICATION

NEWFOUNDLAND-RADIOTELEPHONE SERVICE—REDUCTION IN COST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, of which I have given notice. Can he tell us if any steps have been taken to bring about an improvement and a reduction of costs in connection with telephone communications with Newfoundland?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask the question. The answer is as follows:

Under normal propagation conditions the quality of radiotelephone service with Newfoundland is very good. However, as a result of a deterioration in radio communication generally during recent months the service has not been up to its usual standard of quality, in spite of every conceivable effort by the engineers of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation to effect improvement.

The situation is being watched very carefully and the corporation will continue to exert every effort to overcome the difficulties.

The corporation was prepared to consider a reduction in the tariff, but negotiations were still under way in respect of a financial settlement with the Canadian Marconi for their franchise, so it was considered unwise to disturb the rate structure. The settlement referred to was completed last week, and the corporation is taking steps immediately to initiate negotiations aimed at effecting a downward revision in the existing rates.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

ISSUANCE OF CHEQUES IN BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) if any representations have been received by him or his department to the effect that old age pension cheques are not bilingual. If so, what does he intend to do about it?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question. The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. Among the recommendations or representations received was one made recently by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene). I can only add, with regard to the second part of the question, that the matter is under continuous study.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

ASSURANCE TO PRODUCERS OF FLOOR PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Have any reports been received by the minister, or others in his department responsible for checking, as to whether fair prices are being paid to producers based on the prevailing floors under beef, pork, eggs and butter? Have any complaints been received from producers or producer organizations with regard to prices being paid to them for these products? I am sorry I did not have an opportunity to give notice of my question. If the minister is not prepared to answer today, I shall be content to have the question stand until tomorrow.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): So far as the purchase of cattle and hogs is concerned, there is, as the house knows, a board that was set up under an arrangement with the provinces. That board is composed of some seven persons, and there is an advisory committee. The board is arranging for the marketing of hogs and cattle.

They are of course constantly receiving messages from people in different parts of Canada, some of which might be considered as complaints, but others of which might be considered as advice to the board. Occasionally when people are not able to get a satisfactory answer from the board they do wire or write to me. As a matter of fact I received three or four communications today. Those matters are dealt with either by telephone or by wire, as soon as the messages come. They are being constantly dealt with.

So far as eggs are concerned, there have been messages to the effect that there is not a satisfactory situation. I have a delegation coming in tomorrow from British Columbia to discuss the question with me.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has the minister been informed that the buying price for good steers at Saskatoon is approximately $17 per hundredweight? If so, what steps is the department taking to see to it that the price paid is the floor price of $22.80.

Mr. Gardiner: I have not had that information; but there are difficulties in Saskatchewan owing to the great publicity that is being given to the fact that we have foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan, which seems to have convinced many people that we have it all over Saskatchewan. We receive objections from every province in Canada to taking any cattle from Saskatchewan. We even have objections from other countries to taking any beef that comes from Saskatchewan. Of course we all know that the foot-and-mouth disease area is only about 50 miles square, and that even with the buffer area included it is not more than 100 miles square. In other words, it is a very small part of Saskatchewan. There is no safer place, in Canada or anywhere else in the world, from which to get beef than from the part of Saskatchewan which is outside that area, because it is entirely covered by veterinarians who are checking it every day. And that is the only part of Canada that is. Therefore there is no danger in taking beef from there.

People seem to have the idea that we are having the same trouble everywhere in Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact we are trying at the present time to open up a packing plant that has not been used for packing-plant purposes, in general, in the southwest part of the province, in order to take care of the cattle there that we cannot get to any market at present.

CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCES

DEFERRED DEPRECIATION FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance, of which I have given verbal notice. Now that the minister has announced the suspension of consumer credit regulations, is it the intention of the government to take similar action with respect to deferred depreciation?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): No consideration has yet been given to any amendment of these regulations.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

ADVISORY COMMITTEES—REFERENCE TO RETURN ORDERED MAY 5

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour to take a look at sessional paper 75, which was tabled yesterday in response to a motion passed by the house calling for the tabling of circular letters 18 and 19 of the unemployment insurance commission. The return that was tabled includes circular letter 18, but not circular letter 19, although there is a note which I would like the minister to study. If there is something that corresponds to circular letter 19 I hope that consideration will be given to tabling it as was ordered yesterday by the house.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I shall look into the matter.

Veterans Insurance Act

URANIUM

EXTENSION OF GUARANTEE PERIOD FOR PURCHASE IN ORES AND CONCENTRATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): I have had occasion from time to time to announce to the house changes in the policy with respect to the purchase of uranium in ores and concentrates. Under the present policy, Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited will purchase uranium in ores and concentrates at a minimum price up to March 31, 1960. In recent weeks the advisory committee on mining and exploration has given consideration to a possible further extension of the guarantee period. The committee has now recommended that the period of the guarantee be extended to March 31, 1962. The government has accepted that recommendation. It is hoped that this further extension will provide an additional incentive to the search for radioactive ores.

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT

PAYMENT TO ESTATES OF FULL AMOUNT OF POLICY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lapointe for the second reading of Bill No. 183, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at eleven o'clock last night I had intimated that I had a few words to say on this bill to amend the Veterans Insurance Act. The bill is a short one, and it is not my intention to delay the house very long in discussing it. As I understand it, this amendment was made necessary by an oversight last year when the bill was being considered by the veterans affairs committee and the house.

I feel that, generally speaking, the Veterans Insurance Act is a good act, and I believe that is the feeling of most veterans and members of this house. It was discussed thoroughly last year in the veterans affairs committee. But there is one section of the act which is considered by many veterans to be unfair and as incorporating a wrong principle so far as veterans insurance is concerned. I refer to section 10. When the committee met last year, Mr. T. D. Anderson, general secretary of the Canadian Legion, brought this matter to the attention of the committee. This section as it now stands reads:

> Subject to subsections two, three and four of this section, where on the death of the insured a pension becomes payable under the Pension Act or any pension law of the United Kingdom or any of His Majesty's dominions, to any person mentioned in subsections one or two of section six or in subsection one of section seven of this act, there shall be deducted from the amount of insurance the aggregate present value of the pension or pensions so payable computed on such basis as the governor in council may prescribe.

Under that section, when a person who has been insured dies and his widow or beneficiary is entitled to a pension, a deduction is made from the amount of insurance paid. It was felt by members of the committee last year, by the Canadian Legion and other veterans bodies that this was an unfair principle and that some change should be made.

It is suggested that the cost of insurance under the Veterans Insurance Act is comparable to the cost of insurance sold by private companies, and no such company makes a deduction such as is provided for here. It is felt that these deductions should not be made.

There are certain classes of persons who are not insurable under the Veterans Insurance Act. In some ways this act is more strict than contracts with private insurance companies. I think it is only fair that when an insured person dies his widow or dependent should be able to expect that the full amount of insurance will be paid.

This constitutes a great weakness in the Veterans Insurance Act. It is most unfair to make these deductions. When the Veterans Insurance Act was being amended at this session I had hoped that consideration would be given to deleting this particular section. The recommendation made by the Canadian Legion to the committee last year was not considered because it was ruled that the terms of reference were not wide enough. That recommendation was as follows:

> The Legion would accordingly recommend that section ten either be deleted or so amended as to provide that no reduction in the amount of insurance payable under the act be made because of any pension paid under the Pension Act or other legislation referred to in section ten.

As I say, that recommendation was not dealt with by the committee last year, and I had hoped that it would be dealt with this year.

Mr. Speaker: Before the minister replies, may I say that it is not in order to discuss an act generally when it is before the house for amendment. Only the principle of the amendment should be discussed. I did not interrupt the hon. member, but as there are other similar bills coming up later this day I thought I should bring the rule to the attention of the house.

If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the remarks made by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). I am aware of course that this matter has been studied previously. I believe that to get a true picture of veterans insurance one must go back to the legislation dealing with world war I veterans, the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act. It will be found that section 10 of that act has the effect of providing that if a pension under the Pension Act is awarded on the insured's death, the proceeds of the policy will not be paid as insurance but will be limited to the return of the premiums with compound interest. Of course there is the $500 exemption, of which hon. members are aware.

This section was included in the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act because of the very low medical standards required under the act, and to provide against the payment of insurance in the event of early claims together with the payment of a pension for the same beneficiary. I also understand that the original intention of that act was to provide insurance for returned soldiers who could not be insured elsewhere and whose widows might not be pensionable in the event of the death of their husbands. Under those circumstances it was reasonable to include such a safeguard.

When the Veterans Insurance Act was considered in 1944, somewhat the same principle was applied, for the same reason. The medical standards set by schedule B of the Veterans Insurance Act were such that very few applications were declined. In fact I am informed that since the enactment of the legislation not more than sixty applications have been declined. However, the amount payable under the Veterans Insurance Act is calculated in a different way. Generally speaking there is again the $500 exemption, but on the balance of the insurance the amount paid is the reduced paid-up insurance value available at the date of death. What that actually means is that the amount payable is in proportion to the part of the premium term that has elapsed. In other words, every policy that is fully paid up is paid in full; but let us take the case of a 20-payment life policy that has not been paid up in full; if the policyholder dies after twelve years, the amount payable would be approximately the $500 which is exempt, plus twelve-twentieths of the balance of the policy.

I can quite understand that this matter is of great interest to all those concerned with the welfare of veterans, and if the committee should see fit to do so I would certainly have no objection to its calling before it the actuaries of the department, who are familiar with the actual workings of this insurance scheme, in order that they may secure from them all information respecting the actual basis on which this insurance plan works.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question? In the discussion on the resolution preceding the bill I raised a point about making the legislation retroactive. I believe that has been done. Would the minister state whether that is so?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes. If the hon. member will look at section 2 of the bill he will see that it reads as follows:

> This act shall be deemed to have come into force on the 30th day of June, 1951.

That is the date that had been intended.

Mr. Green: That was the date upon which the other bills came into effect?

Mr. Lapointe: That is right.

Mr. Mutch: It is right in the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

PENSION ACT

ADJUSTMENT OF CLOTHING ALLOWANCE IN CERTAIN AMPUTATION CASES, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 184, to amend the Pension Act.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a statement, please?

Mr. Lapointe: I made a short statement when the resolution was introduced, and there is nothing I should like to add to it. I think that the matter can be fully discussed in the committee.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): There is one point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. The bill is really like all Gaul; it is divided into three parts. The purpose of the first is to make more adequate provision with respect to the allowance for excessive wear and tear of a pensioner's clothing when he wears a prosthesis. The purpose of the second part is to make more adequate provision when there are two dependent parents of a deceased veteran, and the third part is to provide what are described in the explanatory note as a few administrative changes.

We heartily agree with the proposed changes to benefit those veterans who have had amputations, and also with the increase in the benefits for dependent parents. There will of course be an opportunity in the committee to consider the adequacy or inadequacy of these increases.

The administrative changes are contained in sections 3 and 4 of the bill. The purpose of section 4 is merely to correct an error in the present Pension Act, but it seems to me that the other so-called administrative change is a pretty drastic one. I suggest to the minister that he should have his officials give it further consideration. This change takes away the right of a veteran or a veteran's dependents to sue the crown where a pension is either paid or may be paid under the Pension Act. The explanation given for taking away that right of action reads as follows:

> The purpose of this amendment is to ensure that an applicant whose claim is based on accidental injury or death due to negligence of a servant of the crown, shall not be placed in any better position than an applicant whose claim is based on disability or death due to enemy action.

On the face of it that looks like a reasonable explanation. I presume the difficulty has arisen because it has now been made so much easier to sue the crown, and also because there are many more men and women in uniform now than at any other time when Canada has been at peace. However, I would point out the comparison with a veteran who is disabled in war is hardly a fair one. I think a better comparison would be with the widow of a civilian who is killed.

Take for example an automobile accident on the Pembroke road in which a truck belonging to a crown company, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, which, as the minister knows, operates the atomic energy plant at Chalk River, collides with an army truck and a veteran is killed. This section will deprive that veteran's family of the right to take legal action following his death, because the widow and children would be pensionable under the Pension Act. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is practically certain to have insurance on its trucks. If it does not have such insurance I would say there is gross negligence. But whether or not it has insurance, surely the widow of that veteran should have the right to sue the crown company if she so wishes and recover damages, which might run to $25,000 or $50,000, depending upon the number and age of the children, the income of her husband, and so on.

I cannot see why that right should be taken away. I grant that if the widow does sue a crown company and gets a judgment which would amount to more than the pension commission would pay, certainly no pension should be paid by the government. There is similar protection now in the Pension Act.

I think sections 18, 18(a) and 18(b) contain the provisions applying to similar cases. But I am afraid it is going much too far simply to put a section in the Pension Act which entirely takes away the right of the veteran or his widow and children to claim damages, merely because they might have a pension or might be able to qualify for a pension. In any event I would ask the minister to have his department give this section very careful scrutiny. I can see no reason why that right should be taken away as is provided by this section.

Mr. Lapointe: I shall be very glad to look into the point—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Do I understand that the minister is closing the debate?

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): At the request of various members of the house and of the Canadian Legion, the government agreed to set up a committee on veterans affairs. I think this discussion should take place in that committee. I do not know the rules, but if I did I would probably break them. It seems to me that having requested that a veterans affairs committee be set up, and that request having come also from the Canadian Legion and other organizations representing veterans, all this discussion should take place in that committee. Then, if you like, these matters can be further discussed here.

Mr. Green: Of course you are not the Speaker, fortunately.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, but I speak for a lot of legionnaires.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): All I wish to say is that I shall be very glad to have the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) looked into. I am sure the officers of my department will be only too happy to appear before the committee and give any explanation he desires. While I am on my feet may I congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) on the wisdom of his words.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Lapointe moved:

> That this bill be referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to.

CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS

INCREASES IN BENEFITS TO OTHER THAN MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act to provide increases in the scale of pensions under this act comparable to those in the basic scale of pensions under the Pension Act.

Mr. Brooks: Could we have a statement by the minister?

Mr. Lapointe: The purpose of this legislation is to amend schedules I and II of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, which apply to claims granted on account of disability or death under part VI of the act to air raid precaution workers and under part VIII to voluntary aid detachments. Although there are actually only six awards under this act, it has been considered fair that the schedules governing the amounts should be raised in order to correspond to the raises under the Pension Act granted last year, increasing the amounts paid by the same proportion.

Mr. Gillis: Might I ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member would reserve his question until the house is in committee on the resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Gillis: Would the minister put on record all the classifications covered by the civilian war pensions act? It does not just cover air raid workers and so on; it covers the merchant marine, I believe, the fire fighters and auxiliary services as well. I would like a list of the classifications covered, if possible.

Mr. Lapointe: I believe it does cover all the other non-veteran organizations. I have not the act before me at the moment; I did not think this legislation was going to be introduced just now. We will have all that information in the committee. Actually, as I mentioned, there are only six awards under this legislation. I do not believe there could be any more, because I understand that there is a limitation of one year in the case of disability or death.

Mr. Green: Would the minister repeat under which part of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act these pensions are payable?

Mr. Lapointe: Parts VI and VIII.

Mr. Green: It is hard to understand why the increases would be restricted to those two parts. The resolution before the committee reads:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act to provide increases in the scale of pensions under this act comparable to those in the basic scale of pensions under the Pension Act.

Anyone reading that resolution would naturally take it that all the pensions granted under the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act would be covered and that they would all be increased. I believe the minister has said that only six people are to benefit as a result of this bill. When we turn to the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, we find that part VI refers to air raid precaution workers, and part VIII refers to what are called the voluntary aid detachments. In other words, there is no increase for Canadian merchant seamen and salt water fishermen.

Mr. Lapointe: I think I have the answer now.

Mr. Green: I point out to the committee that there are other groups under that act. It may be that they are covered in some other way, but it does not seem reasonable that they should not be treated in the same way.

Mr. Lapointe: They are not being treated differently. Schedules I and II of this act provide for pensions for disabilities and death for those two groups referred to. All other groups, with the exception of those coming under part IV, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, are compensated at the rate appearing in schedules A and B to the Pension Act, and consequently have been affected by that change.

Mr. Pearkes: Would this apply to the present day air raid precaution service personnel who were injured in Canada during training periods?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, I think it would deal with the case the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Green: Would it apply to civilian defence workers who are injured from now on?

Mr. Lapointe: As I mentioned, Mr. Chairman, there is a statutory limitation on the time within which a claim can be admitted, and that would naturally apply to air raid precaution workers during the last war. I have not the act before me so I do not know whether, as it stands, it could be made to apply to the present day situation. I shall look that up, and we can get the information when the bill is before the committee.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 191, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION—INCREASE OF ALLOWANCES, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 181, respecting allowances for veterans and their dependents.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned the other day when introducing the resolution, the bill which hon. members now have in hand is a complete revision and consolidation of the existing legislation with the changes which are being brought forward by the government this year. Naturally the most important amendments are the increases in rates and the introduction of a new procedure in determining the basis on which veterans allowances will be paid.

The other day I explained briefly that it was proposed that recipients of war veterans allowance would be permitted to take what might be termed casual or seasonal employment without having the income derived from such employment taken into consideration in the computation of the amount the recipient is to receive under the War Veterans Allowance Act. In other words, the allowance will be paid on a monthly basis rather than a yearly basis.

I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that one section of the bill, namely section 3, sets out those who may qualify as recipients of war veterans allowances. It is mentioned that, subject to the general clauses of the act, any veteran who has attained the age of 65 may qualify. When the bill was drafted it was felt that all veterans who applied for war veterans allowance at the age of 60 would be dealt with under the new section 4 which introduces the new principle I just mentioned. I understand, however, after discussing it informally with the various groups, that this might be interpreted as raising the age at which a veteran may qualify for war veterans allowance. Since it is not intended by this legislation either to take away or to restrict any of the privileges of veterans but rather to make this legislation a more flexible instrument for the veterans welfare, I have no objection to the 65 which appears in the bill being changed to 60.

As I stated, my understanding of the operations of the act would lead me to believe that a veteran of 60 would benefit under this bill as it stands, but if there is likely to be any misinterpretation I have no objection to a change. I would ask the chairman of the committee to entertain any amendment, when the bill is before the committee, which would recommend that the words "60 years" be substituted for the words "65 years" appearing in the bill. That is all I wish to say at the moment.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I am pleased that the minister has suggested this amendment, because I think there would be a lot of confusion in the minds of veterans and others with reference to that matter.

Mr. Lapointe: I realize that.

Mr. Brooks: As a matter of fact, I felt myself that 65 was a mistake.

As the minister said, this is a complete revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act. As far as that is concerned I think we are all in agreement with the revision and the consolidation. It is quite a difficult matter to have to go through a number of acts to find what you require. If we have all the different amendments in one consolidation, then I say it is all to the good.

As the minister has intimated, there are more changes, and I shall discuss them later. For a few minutes I should like to go over the background, Mr. Speaker, if I may, of the War Veterans Allowance Act. Now that we have a new consolidation I do not think it is out of place that I should do so.

In the last few months all hon. members have had a splendid opportunity of acquainting themselves with the background of the War Veterans Allowance Act, as it has been published in the Legionary, the official magazine of the Canadian Legion. In three past issues they have given us a very clear picture of the War Veterans Allowance Act, and the different steps which led up to the legislation which we have at the present time.

It is very interesting to note that it was in 1930 that the first act was passed. It is also interesting to note that the basic principles, as we understand them at that time, are practically the same as the basic principles of the War Veterans Allowance Act today; that is, that men were prematurely aged and were more or less unemployable. Medical authorities stated that a man who had served in France, with all the suffering, privation, and so on, may be said to have his life expectancy lessened by from five, six, seven to ten years. I was interested to read the basic reasons, from the medical standpoint, as given by Dr. White of the city of Saint John in 1928 when the provincial command of the Canadian Legion met in that city. I may say that Dr. White was the mayor of the city of Saint John at the time, and also one of the leading surgeons and physicians in Canada. He also had considerable experience in the veterans hospital at Saint John. Dr. White stated at that time regarding this subject:

> The war and its effects, the stress and the strain, the privations, the wants and the diseases and all that he may have suffered while he was away have lessened his efficiency, have drained his vitality which came about in three, four, five, six, yes, perhaps, ten years, and we find that a man—a robust man—with all his ambitions before him which have been largely set aside on account of his patriotism, unable now to carry on as he would have been had he remained at home. He begins to feel the infirmity of advancing years much sooner than he otherwise would have done or much sooner than in the case of other men, and yet he has no way in which officially he may receive treatment when he presents himself at one of the hospitals in the country, nor has he any remuneration whatever or any official protection. What is going to be done with the man whose life is threatened, whose health is injured, whose efficiency as a breadwinner is impaired and yet who has not upon his discharge papers a single bit of evidence that will entitle him to treatment in the hospitals, to say nothing of pay and allowances?

As I say, that statement was made by Dr. White to the command of the Legion in Saint John at that time. The War Veterans Allowance Act has been the answer to that statement.

There are men whom I should like to mention this afternoon—I cannot mention them all—who have been greatly responsible for the present act. The first man I would mention is the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) who attended this meeting in Saint John at that time, and who on that occasion said that he agreed with Dr. White, and that his committee and he himself were trying to work out a scheme. There are other men whose names I am sure come to all veterans: Sir Arthur Currie, Brigadier Ross, General LaFlèche, General Price, Alex Walker, Brigadier Foster, the present president of the Canadian Legion. These men have all striven, and I think the act we have today is the result of the hard work of these men and many others.

I might also say, Mr. Speaker, that I know the War Veterans Allowance Act has been a godsend to many of our returned men, who would have been in a distressing position in this country today if we did not have it. Not only were these men aged prematurely, but they had another claim. Those of us who were in the first war and those who were in the second war know that the rate of pay the men received was very low. The man who spent five or six years in the army at $1.10 a day and came back found that the man who had stayed at home had received very high wages and had been able to establish himself in a far different position economically from the man who had served overseas. Therefore on two counts, both physically and economically, the man who had served overseas was in a very different position from the civilian.

The amendments in the new bill provide for certain increases. A single man has been receiving $40 a month under the present act. This is to be increased to $50. A married couple have been receiving $70. This is to be increased to $90 a month. The question which naturally arises in the mind of every veteran is: Is this enough; considering the cost of living as it is today, considering the situation as it exists today, is this increase sufficient? The Legion have made a very careful study of the war veterans allowance situation in Canada, and as a result of that study they set out in the Legionary of April of this year the situation regarding the recipients of war veterans allowances.

I am not going to take the time of the house this afternoon to quote the different exhibits of the Canadian Legion. The first one they have is veteran A. Here is a veteran who served in the first war, in the battle of Amiens and Cambrai. He was gassed during the battle of Canal du Nord. However, after he came back he was able to carry on until he was 64 years of age, and when he became unable to work he was receiving $160 a month. He was placed on war veterans allowance, the only income that he had. His wife was ill. His income for the month of February, as stated in the Legionary, was $56.46. I may say that he had received unemployment insurance, had been overpaid, and that amount paid was particularly small, owing to the fact that some unemployment insurance payments were being deducted. The monthly expenditures for this man and his wife were $95.76. This amount did not include clothing. In this case the Legion pointed out, very properly and conclusively, that the amount these people were receiving at that time was not sufficient. Even the amount of $90 a month now suggested would not have met the expenditures in this case, leaving aside those amounts spent for clothing.

Then, they referred to veteran B, a man 66 years of age who received $180 a month while employed. He became unemployable, with no means other than his war veterans allowance of $40.41 a month. Out of his total income he paid $373 for food, and $6 a week for room, amounting to $312 a year. At the end of the year this man found that, to live, he had to borrow money.

This is just one more case indicating the impossibility of those who are unemployable living on the amount of war veterans allowance formerly paid, or on the amount proposed in the new legislation.

I could go on and give other examples mentioned in the information I have before me, but I feel it is not necessary to do so. All these cases were given careful study by the Legion, and they came to the conclusion that if these people were to be permitted even to exist, a certain amount would have to be paid to them. After making careful analyses and investigations the recommendations of the Legion were as follows:

1. That the basic principles upon which war veterans allowance is allowed and paid be unchanged.

I think that principle is being retained.

2. That war veterans allowance be increased from $40 single and $70 married to $60 single and $120 married.

I would point out that these amounts were set after very careful consideration and study of the cases I have mentioned. There is no member of the house who could not multiply the cases I have mentioned, or who could not describe such cases by the hundreds all across this country. I believe all hon. members will agree that not only the Legion but the National Council of Veterans and other veterans organizations have never been exorbitant in their demands upon the government. They have always kept in mind, first, the requirements of the veterans and, second, the burden upon the taxpayers. If I might make a comparison, they have never tried to obtain large sums of money from the government or from the people as have the legionnaires in the United States. I suggest therefore that the Legion's recommendation of $60 a month for a single person and $120 for married is not unreasonable. I am surprised that at this time, when the act is being consolidated, the government is recommending the payment of $50 to a single veteran and $90 to one who is married.

To continue with the recommendations of the Legion:

3. That the total ceiling be raised to $1,200 single and $2,000 married.

What do we find in the new legislation? We see that the ceiling is to be $720 for a single man and $1,200 for one who is married, allowing a spread of only $120. Under the old act it was $125 for a single man, and $250 if married. In the present instance, however, we have a spread of only $120 in each case. I am sure this is not going to be satisfactory to the Legion, and I feel certain it will be equally unsatisfactory to the members of the veterans affairs committee. Then, to continue:

4. That Canadians who served in England only in the first war be entitled to war veterans allowance.

[Mr. Brooks.]

I do not like repetition. I mentioned this matter the other day, and it has been discussed in the house on many occasions. It has been debated in the veterans committee. I have always felt that England should be included as a theatre of war, so far as the payment of war veterans allowance is concerned, and that these men should come under the act. It is not necessary at this time to repeat the reasons. We know there was considerable hardship and suffering on the part of men in the first contingent who went overseas. I see the minister smiling, but I suggest there can be no question that there was suffering, because the men who were stationed in the south of England for purposes of training were exposed to serious hardships. They were away from their families and receiving $1.10 a day while the people at home were receiving high pay, and had the opportunity to re-establish themselves during a time of war. However, those men in England did not have that opportunity.

There are many other reasons I could give. There can be no doubt that the Legion is making a fair request when it asks that Canadians who served in England during the first war should be entitled to war veterans allowance. To continue with the recommendations:

5. That widows of imperial or allied services with twenty years residence in Canada be entitled to war veterans allowance regardless of the date of death of their husbands.

I have no doubt other hon. members will make reference to this suggestion. The argument has been before the committee on many occasions.

6. That home exemption be raised to $9,000.

I see that in the act it is raised to $6,000, and I shall reserve my comment as to whether $6,000 is a satisfactory amount. That, however, is one of the minor provisions in the bill.

I am sure the measure before us will not be considered satisfactory by the committee now set up, and that it will not be favourably received by members of the House of Commons. More particularly I am sure that it will not be satisfactory to the Canadian veterans across the country. This legislation reminds me of that which was brought before the committee in 1948. The government suggested at that time an increase of ten per cent in the pension, and it will be recalled that that percentage was scorned by members of the committee, with the result that it was increased to twenty-five per cent. I believe that when the veterans committee now set up considers the matter it will conclude that the government has not suggested the proper amount.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief in what I have to say, because I am supposed to be in the committee on agriculture. Then, further, I have been asked to speak on the radio—although I do not know why.

I cannot see the purpose of this discussion, unless it is simply a matter of obtaining publicity—and I like publicity myself. We have asked for a committee and have been given it. I am surprised that my good friend who is sitting practically opposite has not brought out the fact that the Canadian Legion is the main organization representing the veterans of Canada and they have not as yet presented their brief. My understanding is that they are going to present a brief to the committee, of which I happen to be a member and of which I understand the previous speaker (Mr. Brooks) is also a member, but they have not yet done so. They presented a brief last year.

I happen to have probably a more distinguished position in the Canadian Legion than some of my good friends. They do not wear this button.

An hon. Member: Oh, now!

Mr. Cruickshank: They do not wear that one. The Legion has not yet presented its brief. For the benefit of my hon. friend who just interjected may I say that I am a delegate to Montreal at my own expense on behalf of the Legion, and I doubt very much if he has even been appointed a delegate. I am going there for a week at my own expense.

Why have all this discussion? I am surprised at the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), who has been a long-time advocate for veterans welfare in British Columbia, and a very good advocate—I give him credit—

Mr. Green: What are you surprised at?

Mr. Cruickshank: I am surprised that you have not pointed out to your colleagues that no brief has been presented by the Canadian Legion. I give my hon. friends of the opposition a lot of credit for what they have done. We insisted on it, we worked for it, and the government gave us a committee on veterans affairs this year to discuss the very matter the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has just been discussing. Let us go before the committee.

My advice to the veterans of Canada, through you, Mr. Speaker, is that the best way we can get results in connection with war veterans allowance, as we got results last year in connection with disability pensions, is to keep pensions and veterans affairs out of party politics. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra knows that since he and I have been here the endeavour has been to keep this matter out of party politics. We have got results. Last year we even got more than the Legion had asked for.

Mr. Brooks: We all agree with that.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why make a political speech such as you made this afternoon?

Mr. Brooks: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has suggested that I made a political speech because I spoke this afternoon on veterans affairs. I should like the hon. member to withdraw that remark. The house has the right and the duty to deal with any bill, whether it concerns agriculture or any other matter. Why that right should be taken away from us as the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has suggested simply because it deals with veterans affairs is something I would not know. We have the right to discuss any subject in this house before it goes to a committee.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am sorry, but I have to leave. I shall be brief, as the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) wants to speak. I am not withdrawing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: If I said anything unparliamentary I am ready to withdraw. I will withdraw to this extent: There is a Legion convention to be held, a veterans committee is to sit, but I understand that there is also a by-election to be held in the maritimes and I will let that speak for itself.

An hon. Member: Cheap.

Mr. Brooks: I rise again to a point of order. The hon. member has attributed to me motives which I have never considered. I never thought of the by-election or anything else. Year after year these matters have come before the committee and I have taken the same attitude. The hon. member knows that. He has accused me of talking for political reasons, and I feel that that should be withdrawn.

Mr. Cruickshank: If I have accused the hon. member of speaking from political motives—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and I heard the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) ask him to withdraw what he considered to be an accusation that he had made a political speech I must ask the hon. member for Royal i he really considers that that is offensive. That is being said almost every day in this house. Members are being accused of making political speeches all the time. It seems to me that in the House of Commons where elected members of parliament deliberate it is normal that political speeches should be made. I do not think anyone should take offence because someone says he is making a political speech.

I have looked over the rules, especially citations 294 and 295 at pages 96 and 97 of Beauchesne's second edition, and I cannot find anything there that would justify my asking the hon. member for Fraser Valley to withdraw what he has said. Citation 297 reads:

> The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged—

Mr. Fraser: That is the one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Royal rose in his place on a point of order. Then the hon. member for Fraser Valley resumed his seat and the hon. member for Royal clarified his position. I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley should be satisfied with the explanation given by the hon. member for Royal. I refer also to citation 294 which reads:

> If a member should say nothing disrespectful to the house or the chair, or personally opprobrious to other members, or in violation of other rules of the house he may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings, or injurious to the character, of individuals.

I think the hon. member will agree that the point is one that can be easily settled if the hon. member for Fraser Valley accepts the explanation of the hon. member for Royal, and I think he is prepared to do that.

Mr. Cruickshank: I will agree that the hon. member for Royal was not speaking for a political purpose; I will say that he was speaking as he had the right to speak, as any member with ambitions has the right to speak. It has been said of the ghost cabinet that if and when, to the misfortune of the people of Canada, a Conservative government should be in power, the hon. member would be the minister of veterans affairs. I admire him for his ambitions which will never, never be fulfilled. I do not think he can take exception to that.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member is getting further back all the time, and he has been here nearly as long as I have.

Mr. Cruickshank: I will admit that I have not got—

Mr. Brooks: I have had no opportunity—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Cruickshank: I admit that I have not got to the front seats, but I am at least surrounded by cabinet ministers and parliamentary assistants.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would remind the hon. member for Fraser Valley that we are now discussing the principle of a bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: I think I was provoked. I think my hon. friend will agree that at least since 1940 we have all endeavoured to keep partisan politics out of veterans affairs. I think he will agree that while we have not got everything we asked for on behalf of the veterans, we have been fairly successful.

Mr. Brooks: We have had to fight for it, yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: I hope the great population of Canada are not having to wait too long for my radio broadcast. I admit that the hon. member has a legal and technical right to discuss these matters, but it was my understanding that they would be discussed in the committee before being brought up on the floor of the house or spread through Hansard to the various parts of Canada. There are many members who would like to express their opinions. I know that colleagues of mine want to express their opinions, and colleagues from my own province who are veterans have asked me to speak on their behalf. However, we thought that the time to do so was after the legislation had come back from the special committee. I think the senior opposition member from the province of British Columbia, a very gallant and valiant soldier and defender of the Legion, will agree with me.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he not remember that in other sessions there has always been a debate on second reading before such bills go to the committee? I am sure we had a debate a year ago on the second reading of the amendments to the Pension Act. I really cannot understand why he is objecting to a debate at this stage. As a matter of fact it is the proper time, and certainly for members of the house who are not on the veterans affairs committee and want to express their views. I believe it is an opportune time also for members who may be on the committee but who have suggestions they wish to make.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may ask a question, but if he makes a speech he will be deprived of his right to speak later.

Mr. Cruickshank: If I remember correctly, the discussion last year was on the order of reference and the order of reference only.

Mr. Green: That was an additional discussion.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member made the same speech he has made today.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of offending the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), I am going to say a few words on this bill. We have just given second reading to four bills concerning veterans affairs without any discussion because they involved only mechanical changes in legislation. I am a member of the veterans affairs committee and I am not going to apologize for saying a few words at this time, because I think the bill now before the house to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act is new legislation.

I also think that members of the veterans affairs committee have a right to hear the expression of opinions by other members of the house so that we may be guided as to what their opinions are when we are discussing this legislation. In the second place, irrespective of what anyone outside the house may think of legislation it is still the responsibility of members of the house to study it and form their own opinions of it.

The bill now before the house disappoints me greatly. I certainly did not expect that kind of legislation.

Mr. Brooks: Don't make a political speech.

Mr. Gillis: I am going to be as brief as I can. I was glad to hear the minister say that the change setting up two classifications of veterans is not a firm one and is subject to amendment by the committee if the committee so desires. I believe that particular change alters the principle of the act.

Mr. Lapointe: I have asked the committee to amend it.

Mr. Mutch: They will.

Mr. Gillis: I am glad that the minister has decided to do that. That still leaves the means test in the War Veterans Allowance Act, and that is a strong point of agitation on the part of the Legion branches. They feel if a war veteran can meet the requirements of the act from a medical standpoint, if he is unemployable in the area in which he resides and can qualify for the $40 or $50 a month, whichever it is going to be, that he has met the requirements of the act. They feel that to put into effect ceilings of $720 or $1,200, as they are now, is not only doing a disservice to the veterans but is causing a loss of production which otherwise would benefit the country.

How does the government benefit by making it mandatory in the legislation that if a veteran is in receipt of the maximum amount of war veterans allowance he must sit at home and do nothing because otherwise he will interfere with his allowance? As I read the legislation, the amount of permissible earnings is very low.

Mr. Lapointe: Will my hon. friend permit an interjection?

Mr. Gillis: Certainly.

Mr. Lapointe: If he will read section 4 of the bill he will find there the introduction of a new principle whereby a recipient of war veterans allowance can take employment and increase his income, and his earned income is not subject to any ceiling.

Mr. Gillis: That is exactly the point that I was leading up to, and I am very glad that the minister pointed it out.

Mr. Lapointe: It is not the point you are leading up to. You are saying the opposite.

Mr. Gillis: No, I was going to deal with that very point next. From what has appeared in the press, and from statements made by the minister in the house, most people who do not understand this legislation would assume that the war veteran can receive his $50 or $60 a month, whichever we fix, without interfering with the payment of the war veterans allowance. That is not so. Under section 4, if a veteran who is 60 years of age and is in receipt of war veterans allowance takes employment for a month—you are going to compute it on a monthly basis rather than on a yearly basis—his war veterans allowance will stop during the time he is working and earning.

Mr. Lapointe: Certainly.

Mr. Gillis: Why certainly? Does that not create an incentive for the man receiving $60 a month to stay at home? He knows that when he takes employment and notifies the Department of Veterans Affairs that he is employed his war veterans allowance will stop during the period of employment, and then he has to go through all the machinery again to be reinstated.

Mr. Lapointe: No.

Mr. Gillis: Oh, yes.

Mr. Mutch: No.

Mr. Gillis: Many of them will stay home rather than interfere with the only assured income they have.

Mr. Mutch: That was true in the past, but it is not now.

Mr. Gillis: It will be true in the future, too.

Mr. Lapointe: No.

Mr. Gillis: Instead of the administration of the legislation loosening up I find that it is tightening up more and more all the time throughout the country. I hope the minister is right, but I visit the branches—I visited some during the Easter recess—and I have a pretty good idea what they are thinking.

Mr. Lapointe: So have I.

Mr. Gillis: As I was saying when the minister interjected, as to war veterans who are 60 years of age and who have passed the medical test and are totally unemployable in the regular labour market, if the ceiling on permissible income was removed and these men were permitted to go out and earn something during four, five or six months of the year if they could find suitable employment, I think you would find many of them taking employment if they knew that their assured income of $25, $30, $40 or $50 a month was not going to be interfered with. They would thus not only increase their own standards but would contribute to the pool of wealth of the country at the same time. I know that war veterans are much concerned about that point.

The minister has already stated that we can amend the section raising the age to 65. I would also suggest that the provision for permissible income, which has been cut down from $250 for a married man and $120 for a single man, should be restored. That is another amendment that should be made. I am never very much concerned about the amount of money. There are other things that are just as important.

I think the minister's advisers made a mistake. I am sure it was not the fault of the minister. I know he is subject to the treasury board and a whole lot of red tape, that he cannot just say, "I am going to do this." He has his own troubles, and I appreciate that. But I believe he should have included in this bill at this time a provision that would enable payment of this allowance to be made to the widows of imperial war veterans, many of whom were just on the borderline. Their husbands died without having resided in Canada for the full twenty years. They were perhaps a year short, or six months, or maybe two years. But the fact of the matter is that it is not the dead man who is looking for something; he is well taken care of. It is the widow who still has to eat and wear clothes and maintain some kind of shelter. She has met the residence requirements, and I believe the act should have been amended to enable many widows of imperial veterans, who up to now have been ruled out, to receive this allowance.

A second point of discrimination that I think the minister should have given consideration to is the matter of veterans who served in England during the first war. Previous to the second war the veterans took that situation for granted, and there was not very much agitation about it. I grant that during the second war there was bombing and all that sort of thing; but when the second world war veteran, who spent most of his time in England waiting to get into the war, was qualified for the allowance, it naturally caused resentment among the older veterans who had spent their time in England. It was not their fault. They were kept there, assigned to duty there, and they feel they should be entitled to the allowance as well. I believe wiping out those two points of discrimination and injustice, concerning the widows of imperial veterans and men who served in England during the first war, are just as important as stepping up the allowance. Hundreds of veterans and widows are suffering under that injustice.

I said I was going to be brief, Mr. Speaker, and I am. I feel very strongly about these things, but I am a member of the committee and I am going to reserve any further remarks until we call in the Canadian Legion and hear their representations. I am sure if the minister is as flexible in regard to the rest of the act as he is on the section which provides for a step-up in age, this legislation is going to come back with a lot of amendments. So I will reserve any further remarks until such time as the committee has dealt with the bill, when I hope we will bring it back pretty badly emasculated as compared to its present form.

Mr. Mutch: I hope you are wrong.

Mr. Gillis: The parliamentary assistant says he hopes I am wrong. Well, I expect his assistance—

Mr. Mutch: It is a choice of words, not a choice of motives.

Mr. Gillis: —in revising this act. I look forward with a great deal of interest to the work of this committee. While the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and others say there will be no second session this year, if the government is firm about bringing back this bill in its present form I am sure we shall be wrangling over it here until Christmas.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this is a good piece of social legislation, for the obvious reason that only three elements are required for the grant of an allowance. If I am wrong about it, I hope the minister will correct me. The first is service. The records of all veterans are kept in the department, and it is easy for those concerned to decide whether or not an applicant is qualified from the point of view of service. Then there are two other elements, and I am referring to the latter part of clause 3, not speaking of age. Those elements are disability and need, and there shall be no relation between the disability and the service, which makes the difference between this legislation and the Pension Act.

In virtue of this legislation, if a veteran who qualifies as such under paragraph (k) of section 2 is ill and unable to earn his living, he is entitled to the allowance by right; and the legislation does not make the grant of the allowance humiliating for him. This is the way I see this legislation, and naturally the only thing to do is express one's appreciation to the minister who sponsors the bill and to the government, for correcting certain difficult cases in order to make life happier for veterans who were unable to secure high enough pensions, and who were in hardship. I hope the members of the committee will take these remarks into consideration when the bill is before them and will hasten their report to the house, so those who will come under this bill may secure some benefit from it at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): The hon. member for Temiscouata—I should say my good friend the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot)—has just said the War Veterans Allowance Act is social legislation. In that he is wrong, because in reality it is a partial payment for gallant services rendered. The vast majority of the recipients of war veterans allowance were front-line troops, Canada's fighting men. In their civilian life they have shown the same courage and the same sense of responsibility they showed on the battlefield; and they have great pride in their service. They do not consider that in getting the war veterans allowance they are accepting any handout. They believe they have more than earned that allowance, and they are correct.

This act was passed in the first place on the basis that because of their front-line service these men were pre-aged to the extent of ten years. That was why the qualification age was made 60 instead of the age of 70 which was set for the old age pension. These men are veterans who have been badly handicapped in civilian life because of their war service, and they have been in great need. Unfortunately when we were doing justice to the war disability pensioners of Canada last year we were unable to help the recipients of war veterans allowance. Many of us regretted that fact and, as Your Honour knows, expressed our opinions on the floor of the house on more than one occasion. However, be that as it may, we now have before us a complete revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act. Because that is the case we must be certain that the new act is expressed in terms which are fair to these veterans.

There are several provisions in the bill which bother me a great deal, and today I propose to deal with five of them. The first one is the point the minister mentioned when he opened the debate. I was very glad to hear him give an assurance that the committee would be requested to put the main age qualification back from 65 to 60. The raising of that qualification from 60 to 65 was a very unwise move, and I am surprised that the bill, as presented to this house, brought about a change of that kind. The terms of the bill as we now have it do, of course, provide an exception in the case of a veteran who is employable; the age at which he can qualify is now set at 60.

Mr. Mutch: Is the hon. member not beating a dead horse? The minister had admitted the possible implication.

Mr. Green: Perhaps I shall be able to beat the parliamentary assistant. He may be a dead horse, and I sometimes think he is.

Mr. Mutch: Oh, I shall still be here.

Mr. Green: The majority of the war veterans allowance recipients have always qualified on the basis of having reached 60 years of age. There is, of course, a provision in the act for veterans under that age to qualify, but only if they are permanently unemployable. I believe that only a very small number have come under that latter provision. This idea that the veterans have, by their service, been pre-aged to the extent of ten years is basic. It was behind the original act and the raising of that age to 65 would have wiped out any idea of pre-aging. I say that because civilians are now qualified for old age assistance at age 65. As a matter of fact, to be consistent with the provisions covering old age assistance for civilians from 65 to 69 and old age security paid civilians over 69, this War Veterans Allowance Act should have been changed to reduce the age from 60 to 55 and to make the payments automatic at 60. I am not advocating that today, but I say that to be consistent that is what should have been done rather than to shove the main qualification age up to 65.

The second point about which I am bothered is this exception which is contained in section 4 of the bill. Let us see how it reads. The sidenote reads "employable veterans", and the headnote above section 4 reads "allowances to employable veterans." Subsection 1 of this section reads:

> Subject to this act, an allowance is payable to a veteran who resides in Canada, has attained the age of 60 years, is unable to maintain himself by following his former ordinary occupation but is capable of taking light or intermittent employment and is unemployed.

It would seem that this would put some at least of the recipients of war veterans allowance on a monthly payment basis. I would point out that this section has several effects. In the first place, it introduces entirely new phraseology which is quite different from that in the present War Veterans Allowance Act. Of course, that means there will be difficulty of interpretation. I refer for example to the words, "by following his former ordinary occupation." As hon. members know, that is something entirely new. Another new phrase is "capable of taking light or intermittent employment." I think those phrases will bring a good deal of difficulty into the administration of the act.

Further, this new provision will mean more and bigger investigations. They will have to take place more frequently because the payments will be on a monthly basis. It will mean more snooping by departmental investigators which has been one of the objectionable features of the act right through the years. It will mean also more means testing and a larger staff. Again, the provision is not applicable to widows.

I have no doubt that the intent behind this proposed change was good. I think the minister and his officials are trying to help the veteran, but I suggest that a better way to meet the situation would be to exempt earnings—and I mean earnings as distinct from other income. I would refer the minister and other members to section 6 of this bill. Under the heading of "exempt income" we find listed the various types of income which are not to be taken as income for the purposes of the act. One of those types, contained in paragraph (d), is "any casual earnings of the recipient." Now, I suggest that paragraph should be changed to read "all earnings" instead of "casual earnings". The effect would be to remove from consideration any money that the veteran was able to earn once he had qualified for war veterans allowance. That is what I should like to see, but if the minister will not go that far, he might change the words "casual earnings" to "earnings from light employment", which would give a much broader coverage.

If this suggestion is adopted then once the veteran had qualified for the allowance all his earnings would be exempt. And that would be a tremendous help to the veterans. It would be a great incentive to them to keep active, to try to carry on in some sort of occupation; it would have very little or no effect on the employment situation in Canada, and, Mr. Speaker, it would be directly in line with the principle of our old age security legislation. Those payments are made automatically, and the recipient is encouraged to go out and get some kind of job. If the civilian of 70 is to be encouraged to go out and earn what he wishes, then I submit that the veteran should be encouraged to do the same thing at 60, and that an amendment should be made to the War Veterans Allowance Act to bring about that result.

The third point in this legislation which bothers me is the amount of the increase. I believe it is insufficient. Some earlier speakers in the debate have referred to the amounts, but I should like to point out once more that the single veteran is being raised only $9.95 a month, from $40.41 to $50.

Mr. Knowles: It is $9.59.

Mr. Green: Yes; I have that in my note, but I read the wrong figure. Taken on a yearly basis, he is being raised from $485 a year to $600, which is an increase of $115. The married veteran will be raised from $70.83 a month to $90 a month, which is $19.17; on a yearly basis that means a raise from $850 to $1,080, an increase of $230.

I believe that $50 a month per person is the minimum for a mere existence in Canada today. I do not believe there is one member of this house who would contradict that statement; and yet these men will not be getting that under the amendment. Certainly a man and his wife will not be getting that. It has been recognized in at least some of the provinces that $50 a month per person is a very minimum, because in my own province of British Columbia, and in Alberta and perhaps some other provinces, old age assistance payments and old age security payments have been increased by the provincial government in question by the payment of an additional $10 a month. We should not ask the veteran to switch over to old age assistance or to old age security. We should not ask that, because he is the responsibility of the federal government of Canada and he should be paid, and paid an adequate amount, by the federal government of Canada. Yet if this bill goes through in its present form the married war veterans allowance recipient in British Columbia and in Alberta will be wiser to switch over to the civilian form of assistance.

The fourth point about which I am concerned is the amount of permissive income over the allowance. It has been reduced by this legislation to $120; whether the veteran is single or married, his permissive income over the amount of the allowance is only $120. For many years, I believe from the start of the act in 1930, although I may be wrong in that, certainly for many years, there has been set out in the War Veterans Allowance Act permissive income for the single veteran of $125 a year, and for the married veteran $250. Under the Old Age Assistance Act, passed by this house last year, there is a permissive income of $240 a year. That applies both to the single man and the man who is married; and certainly there should be just as wide a coverage for the veteran.

This question of permissive income is very important for quite a large group of veterans. Clearly those who are also in receipt of a small pension are caught when the permissive income is too low. Hon. members need only be reminded that last year, when we raised the pension, those men who were in receipt of a small pension and who also had their war veterans allowance had that allowance cut by the same amount that the pension was raised, so they derived no benefit whatever from the legislation of last year.

The final point about this bill which gives me great concern is the failure to incorporate in the act, or to place in some other statutory form, provision for what is called war veterans allowance assistance. For three years, I think, there has been an annual vote called the war veterans allowance assistance fund. From that fund payments could be made to a recipient of war veterans allowance who had no other income whatever. He could get a maximum of $10 a month if single or $15 a month if married; but that payment is subject to a second means test, and it is not made necessarily in the form of money. It may be by supplying clothing or furniture; it is just general assistance. At the time that that policy was introduced, some of us complained that it should be in the form of a statute rather than subject to an annual vote which meant that it could be changed each year. I am sure the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) will remember that at that time he intimated he wanted to try out the new plan first, but agreed that before long it should be covered in some kind of statute.

Now that we are revising the War Veterans Allowance Act I believe that we should include in it provision for this war veterans allowance assistance fund. Last year the Legion asked that those recipients of war veterans allowance who were unemployable should get $60 a month single and $120 a month if married. I believe that their requests were within reason. The minister told us the other day when the resolution preceding this bill was being debated that he did not intend to make the allowance fund statutory, but rather intended to continue it as an annual vote. I hope that he will give further consideration to that question.

There are several other points which could be raised and which are equally important, such as the inadequacy of the provision for the widows of imperial veterans, and some of the procedure followed in making claims for repayment under the act. However, I shall have a chance to discuss those points in committee. I did wish to place these other points before the minister and the house before the bill is sent to committee.

In conclusion may I repeat a word or two about these veterans. They are splendid citizens; citizens to whom Canada owes a debt which can never be repaid in full, no matter what terms we write into the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that this bill as a whole is to the advantage of the veterans, and we are pleased to see it before the house. However the sore spot in the whole War Veterans Allowance Act is that the means test remains in it. It seems strange that, although the total earnings of recipients are increased, the extra earnings a veteran may get are reduced to the extent of $5 a year. If the government does not see fit to take the means test off, as most of us would like to see, then I cannot see why it did not increase the maximum earning allowance of veterans.

As it is, the veteran is put on the spot. It looks to me very much as though he is being encouraged to take the old age pension and to forget about the war veterans allowance. Outside of that, the point that I thought was so detrimental was that of raising the age limit from 60 to 65. I am glad to hear that the minister is going to consider an amendment to reduce the age to 60, because the age 65 violates the presumption upon which the age limit was established, and that is that veterans pre-aged by ten years as a result of military service. With the old age pension coming on at 70, and with the group from 65 to 69 included under an old age security scheme, it would appear that the veterans were not being pre-aged at all.

However, I am glad the minister is considering making the reduction to 60 years when the matter is discussed in committee. I am pleased to see that the allowance for a single man is increased to $50, which brings it up to the same amount as the old age pension in Alberta. However we do regret that the married allowance is only $90, which in our province gives them $10 less than that received by the old age pensioners.

On many occasions the Legion has suggested $60 for those who are physically handicapped and cannot take any advantage of casual earnings. They should be given at least a pension equivalent to the total earning power of a veteran under the War Veterans Allowance Act. We would like to have seen a much greater increase, brought somewhere in line with the cost of living index. However, those things may come in time—at least we hope they will.

I shall have more to say on these points in committee. I believe section 4 of the bill has some merit, in that it enables the veteran to work for a short period of time without having his allowance cut. However, it looks to me as though this is a sort of top-heavy arrangement, and that it will require a good deal of administration. It may be difficult to keep up with these veterans who are working at odd times. We will need to have a good many inspectors running around to find out whether or not the men are working.

The whole thing would be much simpler if the minister would say, "We will wipe out the means test, and put the war veterans allowance recipient on an equal footing with the old age pensioner over 70 years of age."

I was glad to see an increase in the exemption on homes and premises from $4,000 to $6,000. To my mind that is still pretty low, because today a $6,000 home does not amount to much. Even a modest home is valued at much more than that.

Then, the measure does not take into consideration the widows of imperial veterans whose husbands died before they had their 20-year residence qualification. As I have said before, it seems a pity that these widows are being penalized just because their husbands died. That does not make sense.

No recognition has been given to those world war veterans who served only in England. Many of those men put up with hardships, sickness, cold and misery, and the only reason they were not sent to France was that they were needed in England. Many of them served as instructors, and the like. I know of one imperial veteran who served in England during world war I, and whose health was impaired as a result of that service. That man gets the grand pension of something like $8 a month. He is almost 70 years of age now, and for several years has been living on that $8, and a railway pension of $25. He could not qualify for a war veterans allowance, even though his health was impaired to the point where he was given a pension for it.

I do not intend to say more at the moment, but I shall have more to say in committee, and perhaps when the bill returns to the house.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what caused the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) to become so excited this afternoon, because, in my parliamentary experience, it has always been the custom for several members of each party to express their views on second reading of any bill concerning veterans affairs.

As a member of the committee on veterans affairs I do not propose to repeat any of the arguments expressed this afternoon. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) expressed my views, and I have nothing further to say at this time.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, since coming to the house I have had the opportunity of serving on various committees on veterans affairs, and naturally I have interested myself in the welfare of the returned man.

This year I am not on the committee. I should like to address a few remarks and perhaps offer a few suggestions to the committee, in the hope that they will give cognizance to what I have to say. The minister has intimated that he is prepared to entertain amendments and in fact has suggested one himself.

I should like to stress the importance of striving for simplicity when amending this War Veterans Allowance Act. We are dealing with many ageing men who do not react as quickly as younger men to complicated arrangements and administrative procedures. Anything which can be done to make this act simpler would be of great advantage in enabling these ageing veterans to understand it more easily.

That brings me to section 4 of the bill which introduces the new principle of seasonable employment. It seems to me that this is a most complicated clause; it is another "if and when" the individual will be permitted to draw an allowance. I am not clear from what has been said whether the veterans will receive the other benefits under the act, such as hospitalization, when he is actually in employment. The benefits of hospitalization are one of the outstanding reasons why many men who might otherwise go on old age pensions prefer to remain under war veterans allowances.

At the present time we have in British Columbia a form of hospital insurance which is compulsory. If a veteran is not on war veterans allowance he must pay the provincial hospital insurance. That is why I stress this point. I want to know whether the veteran will still be protected for full hospitalization when he is in seasonable employment and will not have to pay the provincial hospital insurance during that time.

Mr. Mutch: The answer is that he will be.

Mr. Pearkes: When I refer to the need for simplicity I cannot help feeling that the same result could have been achieved if the ceiling on permissible earnings had been at least doubled. I believe that would take care of men who get seasonable employment and also the large number of marginal cases who are just able to earn enough, perhaps by some form of permanent employment for a day, a week or something of that sort, or who are drawing small incomes or pensions which now prevent them from obtaining war veterans allowances because their outside income is more than the very strict means test now applied to these allowances. I suggest that it would have been simpler to do it this way and perhaps the committee will entertain as an alternative a considerable raising of the ceiling as opposed to the introduction of this new principle.

There is one other small point I should like to deal with concerning South African veterans or veterans who have served in other countries. With regard to the South African veteran, the amendment deals with the time of the actual landing on the continent of Africa. It just so happens that a Canadian contingent had left Canada and was en route to South Africa at the time peace was signed. Should not this amendment be more in accordance with the principle now adopted in so far as Korea is concerned? Should we not apply the date when the man left Canada in order to go to South Africa rather than the date of landing? If a man volunteered to serve in South Africa and was actually on the high seas en route to that theatre of war when peace was arranged he should receive consideration. I suggest to the minister that he consider changing that wording and instead of having it the date of landing in South Africa it should be the time the individual left Canada. That would be in conformity with the practice now being followed in connection with troops serving in Korea who receive veterans preferences when they leave Canada.

I should like to repeat my plea for the men who served in Great Britain only during the first war. These men are ageing and I should like to see them included in these benefits. If that cannot be done, perhaps some special latitude could be given to the minister to deal with individual cases where great hardship is evident. I happen to know of one case where the minister was able to obtain special permission for the hospitalization of an old veteran. I do not know of anything in the act that gives the minister the ministerial prerogative, shall we say, to act in exceptional cases. I commend the minister for having found a way to deal with this one case, but similar cases are bound to arise and perhaps more flexibility should be introduced into the act to permit these old veterans being looked after.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the committee but I have carried on a considerable correspondence with the department on behalf of veterans in my riding and have received a number of submissions from Legion branches in my riding. Therefore I feel I am justified in making the few comments I want to make regarding this bill. I regret that the government did not see fit to bring in this amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act last fall. While the increases are to be retroactive the fact is that by delaying this amendment for five months or since the pensions were increased a considerable amount of unnecessary suffering has been caused to many thousands of veterans.

I suppose one of the reasons for the necessity for this legislation arose out of the fact that a great many veterans could not receive pensions who were in reality entitled to them, and they were covered by this legislation. Veterans have pointed out to me that if section 63 of the Pension Act, under which a veteran is supposed to be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, were operative, many veterans who now have to receive the veterans allowance would be in receipt of basic pensions. Over the years I have had occasion to take up scores of cases with the department, and I cannot recall a single instance where the veteran was given even the shadow of the benefit of the doubt. In every single case I have taken up with the department, unless the veteran could establish the fact that his present incapacity arose out of or was caused by his service, or unless some medical officer could certify to that effect, there was never the slightest benefit of the doubt given to the veteran.

One of the things that veterans in my riding have been protesting is that while this act is being amended the Pension Act is not being amended at the same time so that the veteran may be given the right which he is supposed to have under section 63 of that act.

Mr. Lapointe: On a point of order, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member but I suggest that for the last five minutes he has been airing his views about the Pension Act and its administration while we are concerned with discussing the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Speaker: Probably the hon. member will now discuss the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Noseworthy: Apparently I am getting into trouble with the chair quite frequently. I think it would be well to review the situation of the veterans from the point of view of the promises that were made to them, particularly during world war I. Reprinted in the April issue of the Legionary is the promise—

Mr. Lapointe: I hope you will not blame me for that.

Mr. Noseworthy: —made by Sir Robert Borden at Vimy Ridge in 1917. The minister knows these words by heart but it will not hurt—

Mr. Lapointe: I have read the same magazine you have.

Mr. Noseworthy: —to remind him and his officials who administer veterans legislation of the promise Sir Robert Borden made to the men of the services at that time. He said:

> I give you this assurance; that you need have no fear that the government and the country will fail to show just appreciation of your service to the country and empire in what you are about to do and what you have already done . . .

This is the point that is interesting.

> The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of the people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion that the country will support the government to prove to the returned man its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire.

The thought expressed there by Sir Robert Borden is that of the government attempting to guide the country, to guide public opinion, the government trying to induce public opinion to support the government in its generosity toward the veteran. Look at that promise in the light of the history of what has happened since 1917. When have we ever found the government trying to convince the public to support them in their efforts on behalf of the veteran?

Mr. Knowles: It has been the other way around.

Mr. Noseworthy: Year after year it has been the other way around. Representatives of veterans organizations have had to fight just as persistently and with just as much determination to get what they considered a fair deal from the governments of the two parties that have been in power as they had to fight the enemy to win the war in the first place. That has been the history of the veteran's fight with governments through the years since 1917. Instead of the government being out in front trying to induce the public to agree with them that the veteran needed these various benefits, it has been the veterans organizations, the parliamentary committees, members of the House of Commons almost unanimously year after year and people throughout the country pushing the government in order to induce them to deal fairly with the veteran.

From day to day we find in the press considerable criticism of some of the social services that the government is rendering. Certain sections of the press are very critical, but I have yet to see any section of the press throughout Canada that has been critical of the government because the government was too generous with the veterans of world war I and world war II. The country has been pushing the government and not the government trying to induce the country to be more generous to the veteran. The current issue of the Legionary has an editorial on the War Veterans Allowance Act to which it gives the title, "The Long, Long Trail". I think it might be well to look for a few moments at the length of that trail and the nature of the struggle that veterans have had along the trail. It was not until September, 1930, eleven years after world war I, that the War Veterans Allowance Act first became operative. At that time single veterans received $20 a month and were allowed to earn an extra $10, as much as they are allowed now under the new act. Married veterans were paid $40 a month and were permitted to earn an extra $20, twice as much as they are allowed to earn in addition to their allowance under the present act.

The next amendment was made six years later in 1936. That year the age of eligibility was reduced from 60 to 55 years. Two years later economic handicap and not age was made one of the conditions of eligibility; still no improvement in the allowance. In 1941 by order in council special provision was made for an extra $5 per month for single men and $10 for married men by way of a supplementary grant; still no change in the basic rates. In 1943 widows' allowances were provided; a long time after 1919. In 1944 free treatment and domiciliary care were provided. In that year world war II veterans and northwest rebellion veterans were included.

Then we come to 1946, when the basic rate was increased from $20 to $30 for single men and from $40 to $60 for married men, and the allowance on behalf of children was continued until the age of 21 provided they were still at school. The ceiling on earnings then was $125 for single men and $250 for married men, a little more than twice what is allowed under the present act. In 1948, in line with the cost of living, the rates were stepped up again to $40.41 and $70.83 per month. Then in 1949 a sort of second means test was applied, making available $10 a month for single men and $15 for married veterans from the war veterans allowance fund. Then, after a fight lasting twenty years from the time the act was first introduced, imperial and allied veterans were brought under it. Now we have this amendment under which single veterans are to receive $50 and married veterans $90, with a ceiling of $120 a year on additional earnings whether married or single.

I think these rates should be taken into consideration along with the latest request of the veterans organizations, when they appeared before the cabinet last November. At that time they asked for $50 for single men and $100 for married men, and they wanted outside income permitted up to $250 for single men and $500 for married men. They also asked that those totally unemployable should receive allowances at the rate of $60 and $120 for single and married men respectively.

I submit that those requests are very modest. Certainly they are not out of line with the promise that has been made during the war years to those who served. I think a country that can raise over $2 billion for defence should be able in some way or other to raise the ante for single and married veterans to $60 and $120 per month respectively. I do not believe that would endanger the economic position of the country. I believe it would be a token to the veterans, especially those of world war I, that at last the country is recognizing and attempting to implement the promises that were made over thirty years ago.

There are a number of items pertaining to this bill that have been referred to and about which veterans have written to me. These have been mentioned already. Certainly veterans are going to find it very difficult to understand why the ceiling on additional earned income should be limited to $10 a month. I can see no good purpose to be served by that limitation except perhaps to save the government a few paltry dollars. I suppose it will amount to this, that any veteran who can struggle to work by any means will continue to work as long as he can stand up, rather than have to live on the meagre allowance provided by this act. And as long as he can do that the government will be relieved of the responsibility of paying him that allowance. That is the only purpose I can see to be served by limiting additional earnings to $10 a month.

Then I notice that the act distinguishes between intermittent and casual earnings. When the minister closes this debate I hope he will point out just what distinction the department draws. I have been asked that question, and I have not been able to give an answer. I suppose that intermittent earnings are those of a man who is able to hold a job intermittently; who is not able to hold a steady job but is able to take intermittent employment. He would be entitled to come under the act. If a man takes casual employment, however, his casual earnings are not considered as income for purposes of the act. If the minister will clear that up it will be appreciated, because veterans are under the impression that if they earn over $10, whether it is casual or intermittent or anything else, and the department finds out about it, that amount will be deducted from their allowance.

There is one other question I want to mention to which I think the government should give consideration in paying the veterans allowance. That is the plight of veterans today in the matter of housing. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) put on record the economic position of a number of veterans as reported in the Legionary, listing them as veteran A, veteran B and so on. I am going to add a little more from that same article:

> Veteran A now lives in two makeshift basement rooms seven feet below ground level. They were formerly a basement storage, actually just one room, and the small curtained-off portion now used as a bedroom was a coal bin before they moved in.

That was veteran A. Veteran B:

> A small $6 a week room is his home.

Veteran C, a widow, has given up her apartment since her veteran husband died, sold her furniture and gone to live with her niece.

Veteran D, another widow.

> She is living in two damp basement rooms and during the winter stays in bed most of the forenoon, partly because of her health and partly to keep warm as she cannot afford an adequate supply of fuel.

That is the treatment which today is being meted out to the men who served in world war I, and to the widows of those men. The prime minister of this country at that time assured these men that the government would take the lead in trying to induce the Canadian people to agree to giving them that to which they were entitled. Does it not seem evident that today the people of Canada have reason to be ashamed of the treatment that we as a country are meting out to those who served in world war I, and who now can scarcely find enough on which to live?

I think, Mr. Speaker, that when the committee is reviewing this act they may well do so in the light of the promises which were made to these veterans, and they may well consider giving to these men an allowance of at least $60 single and $120 married, with the ceiling on earnings either removed or raised to what the veterans themselves requested, $250 single and $500 married.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I feel that this is an occasion, Mr. Speaker, when the members of this house, particularly those who are not members of the special committee on veterans affairs, should express to that committee their views concerning this bill. I suggest that the Canadian Legion and the other veterans organizations that will appear before the committee should know when they appear what the views of members are. I feel that it is our duty to speak at this time, and I only wish that more members on the government side would speak, so that we can back up the Legion in what some of us believe will be the requests that they will make to that committee.

I think the first criticism that all of us feel about the bill which has been presented is the inadequacy of the amounts provided. As members have put on the record repeatedly today, the bill raises the amount provided for single veterans under the War Veterans Allowance Act from $40.41 to the sum of $50 per month. It raises the allowance provided a married veteran from $70.83 to $90.

Mr. Speaker, on the desks of a good many members in the house this afternoon there is a copy of the afternoon edition of the Ottawa Journal. The main heading reads:

Abbott predicts 10 years of good times

To me it is incongruous, whether or not that prophecy is correct, that on a day when we are told that we are in for ten years of good times we should be asked to accept a bill which provides to our burnt-out pensioners only $50 a month in the case of a single veteran and only $90 a month in the case of a married veteran. When we were at the resolution stage preceding this bill I expressed the view that if the government did not measure up to the requests of the Canadian Legion, the members of the house and of the committee would have to do their best to try to persuade the committee to measure up to those requests. Many of us were deeply disappointed when we received the bill after first reading and learned of the amounts upon which the government had decided. As I say, there is no doubt in my mind, particularly in view of the amounts the Canadian Legion has requested, that this phase of the matter will be discussed at considerable length and in considerable detail by the special committee on veterans affairs.

I want the Canadian Legion and others who are appearing before that committee to know that, in their request for a larger amount, they have the support of a great many members of this house. They have the support of their veteran colleagues, and they have the support of those of us who are not veterans and can perhaps speak in a special way for the general population of the country. I urge most strongly, Mr. Speaker, that when this bill is before the committee the government pay attention to the request that will be made at that time, and pay attention to the request of members of parliament generally that the amounts be set higher. I want to say again that I wish a few more members on the government side would speak in this debate, even if only briefly, and express their views with regard to these amounts. If they are satisfied with them, let them stand up and say so. But if they are not, as I am sure—at least as I hope—is the case with a good many members on the government side, I think they should join with us in saying that these amounts of $50 and $90 are inadequate, and that the request of the Canadian Legion for not less than $60 single and $120 married should be granted.

I see that it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Friday, May 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, when speaking on this bill to incorporate the Boundary Pipeline Corporation last Friday evening for a few minutes I took the opportunity briefly to point out that we in this group are in particular opposed to the granting of charters to companies for the building of pipe lines under private ownership. My time was so short that I had only the opportunity more or less to commence my introduction; therefore I am going to take the opportunity to elaborate somewhat further on our point of view in this group with respect to the public ownership of pipe lines, and to deal with a few other aspects of this bill which is so important to Canadians generally, and which unfortunately many people in Canada are not greatly concerned about.

We in this group, Mr. Chairman, believe that it would be to the advantage of the Canadian people if pipe lines were nationally or socially owned as common carriers. We believe that national planning on that scale would prevent, as I said the other evening, the duplication of charters for the building of pipe lines across Canada. During the last three or four years we have seen the competition between various companies endeavouring to secure a charter giving them the right to build a pipe line over a designated route. No doubt if three or four charters are granted covering a similar route, then it simply means that some of these companies have a charter which they could sell to the highest bidder without building a route at all. Therefore we believe in public ownership, particularly with respect to national transportation, because a pipe line as a common carrier would be part of our national transportation system. If it were publicly owned it would give an easy opportunity for planning, and an opportunity to prevent duplication as a result of the competition between various companies in the building of these pipe lines.

My second point is that because competition would be eliminated between these various companies and we would not have two pipe lines built where one would suffice, there would necessarily by good management be a lowering of the costs to the consumer. The experience of Canadians with respect to railway freight charges and railway transportation charges would be different today if it had been possible when the railways were built in Canada to have a nationally-owned railroad system and to have avoided some of the expensive duplication that exists today such as the parallel railroads from Kamloops to Vancouver on both sides of the Fraser river and so on. We would have more than lower costs to the consumers. Instead of the profits going to private interests, and in the majority of cases in connection with these pipe lines to non-Canadian interests, these profits would be retained in Canada and would be added to the total revenue of this government for the advancement of social services and things of that kind, which would make it easier for the government to add $10, $15, or $20 to the war veterans allowance that was advocated in the debate this afternoon.

Boundary Pipeline Corporation

Many of us think that the Canadian National Railways is losing a great opportunity by overlooking the possibilities for the national ownership of pipe lines as public carriers in Canada. They have the rights-of-way; they have the grades; they have the bridges built; they have all the facilities to unite a public pipe lines transportation system with their railroad system. It is amazing even today, with regard to the publicity given to the great development of oil and gas in Alberta and to the numerous debates in this house which members on the government side listen to with great interest and enjoyment throughout the years, to find that there is still a great laxity and a great lack of interest and appreciation of what this oil and gas business means to Canada at this time and in the days to come.

To support that argument, Mr. Chairman, I want briefly to quote from the Ottawa Citizen of March 10, 1951, which contained an article entitled: "Gas for Canadian cities"; and also the subtitle: "Lack of interest in pipe lines may result in Americans getting Alberta's fuel." The article reads:

> The idea of building a pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg is too much for the average Winnipegger's imagination, this despite the fact that an oil pipe line now connects the Manitoba and Alberta capitals. Yet even a gas line from Edmonton to Montreal would be a routine construction job compared with some of the lines that have been built elsewhere in the world.

Mr. Chairman, members in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, when we were dealing with this bill, and when the companies' agents were producing their witnesses, emphasized the difficulties of building a trans-Canada pipe line to Montreal. Further on, this article has this to say:

> By contrast, the cities of the northern United States are exceedingly aware of the possibilities for growth that would follow the tapping of Alberta's gas resources. The promoters seeking to serve them have shown ten times the activity of those who want to serve Winnipeg. Finally, to complete this catalogue of contradictions, there is no financial problem involved. Money for a gas pipe line, any pipe line headed in any direction, is available in plenty and in fact clamouring for a chance to be spent. If there is one thing that there is plenty of today, it is money for investment in pipe lines. That, more than any other factor, makes this sleepy-headed attitude of Canadian cities utterly baffling.

There is a lot of truth and common sense in that article. While we have American interests competing with one another to build these pipe lines in Canada there is a lack of interest on the part of Canadians themselves to build them. The capital is in Canada, and the government has credit resources with which to build these lines. I am of the opinion that in the days to come if we do not change the direction of our policy in this connection we will have cause to regret it.

It is mentioned here that money is available for investment in any quantity. Why? Because in the carrying of gas and oil there is, if one may judge from United States history, an increasing profit. That is why in this group we are continually reiterating our belief that these pipe lines should be nationally owned, that they should be part of the Canadian National Railways system, and that these commodities could be provided at a lower cost, leaving the profit for the Canadian people.

Last year there came before the house and the committee a bill making provision for the building of a pipe line from western to eastern Canada. The pipe line, to operate as far east as Montreal, was to be operated by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. That bill received considerable discussion in the house and in committee. I should like to remind the house that, as a result of the efforts of half a dozen members in the committee who had tried to make certain again and again that the pipe line bills would be amended so that the main pipe line would be in Canada, an amendment was moved. The amendment was to make certain that Canadian requirements were served first before Canadian gas and Canadian oil was exported to other countries.

In this application to build the Trans-Canada pipe lines it was proposed to build a gas pipe line from Alberta to Montreal, following an all-Canadian route, paralleling the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways. The pipe line would be approximately 2,200 miles long, and would gather in lateral lines of about 900 miles. The main transmission line from Alberta to Toronto would consist of 30-inch pipe and from Toronto to Montreal of 24-inch pipe.

That charter has now been granted and because we believe that Canadian requirements must be served first some of us in the committee, and some in the house, are concerned about the granting of a charter to the company now applying, in case it may jeopardize the building of the pipe line under the charter now granted.

In that respect, and in connection with the bill known as the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines bill, I want to quote from a paper presented at the annual meeting of the Engineering Institute of Canada at Montreal on May 9, 1951, by Dr. G. S. Hume. This paper is entitled "Utilization of Natural Gas in Canada". I should like to quote from it some references he makes to the granting of a charter to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company Limited. Dr. Hume has this to say in that connection:

> Finally, the last export permit for gas from Alberta is being requested by a group of Texas operators representing Delhi Oil Corporation of United States and Canadian Delhi Oil Limited for a project, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, to bring gas from Alberta, starting in the Princess area, eastward to Winnipeg, and thence across the Precambrian shield via Fort William and Port Arthur, via Sudbury to Toronto, and thence to Montreal, with a branch line to Ottawa.

When we know about the intentions of this company, and what the building of a pipe line would mean, from Alberta to Montreal, some of us are rather surprised that more Ontario and Quebec members have not shown some concern in making certain that Canadian gas goes first to Ontario and Quebec rather than first to the United States. Dr. Hume goes on to say:

> Various routes across the Precambrian shield from Fort William to the vicinity of Sudbury are being investigated. This pipe line as proposed would be 30-inch diameter capable, with the requisite number of compression stations, of carrying initially 365 million cubic feet a day increasing to a maximum of about 500 million cubic feet a day. The cost is estimated at about $250 million.

Then farther on Dr. Hume says, in connection with the pipe line:

> There are certain features for a pipe line project of this kind which appear to be essential if the pipe line is to operate with the greatest efficiency and hence provide as reasonably priced gas to the consumer as can be obtained. One such is underground storage as in depleted or partially depleted gas fields of Ontario during the off-peak summer months so that the load factor of the pipe line could be kept up as nearly as possible to the maximum. A low load factor on such a pipe line would make it uneconomic. Thus underground storage facilities for gas is a prime consideration from the price standpoint even if the pipe line could operate economically without such storage. In addition to providing a means of taking care of off-peak loads, storage also gives a considerable measure of insurance in the consuming area against interruptions in service due to breaks of the transmission line. Long pipe lines are operated, of course, without underground storage facilities. There are various ways of taking care, at least in part, of the variable load.

Then, after dealing with that technical problem, he goes on to say:

> These are what are known as industrial interruptible sales. This is a partial compensation for more nearly uniform sales throughout the year. There is no doubt all these features will be fully dealt with by competent engineers before the proper authorities when and if consideration of the pipe line project reaches the final stages. No specific data have yet been made available, but it is known that studies are now under way.

That company has already received a charter from parliament. It has been before the board of transport commissioners, and at this stage had spent a considerable amount of money—and this paper was written about a year ago. We are wondering if we would jeopardize the building of that pipe line to Montreal if we were to grant the charter sought in the bill before us. This bill would make provision for a smaller pipe line to Winnipeg, and we are of the opinion that if the charter were granted for the smaller pipe line it would become economically unfeasible to build the pipe line from Alberta to Montreal.

That is our major argument. We are concerned about the granting of this charter, unless we can be assured that gas will flow to Ontario and Quebec as a result of a firm and sound exchange arrangement between Canadian and United States producers.

Further to illustrate the great value of this natural resource, and the great competition there is in the United States for charters, as well as the influence brought to bear, I should like to read briefly from an article in the Ottawa Citizen of May 5, 1951, headed "U. S. Pressure in Gas Deal". The article reads:

> Export of Alberta gas to Montana demonstrates how demand for Canada's natural resources mixes in U.S. politics.
> But using political influence for corporate gain is part of the warp of American democracy. It is done as a matter of course. Persons or groups who find themselves facing obstacles that they cannot surmount, instinctively turn to the government for help. There is a revealing paragraph in the first letter from Mr. C. E. Wilson, president of the office of war mobilization, to Rt. Hon. C. D. Howe. It reads:
> "During the past several months, I have had several letters from interested American groups, urging that I ask your intervention and assistance in persuading—'(Alberta)'—to give assent and encouragement to the construction of a pipe line for the sale and delivery of gas to the American northwest."
> Mr. Wilson went on to explain that he had refused to intercede for these groups.

I might interject here to say that I think Alberta is following a very sensible policy by moving slowly in connection with these growing demands for the export of Alberta natural gas. I think that is a sound policy when—

Mr. Blackmore: They are always sound.

Mr. Herridge: —they are not sure of their reserves. The article goes on:

> The Canadian dilemma at the moment is that, through the exercise of influence at Washington, plus a desire to co-operate to the hilt with the United States in re-arming, we may be pressured out of some of our resources which from a long-term Canadian view it would be better to keep.
> Title to most of our oil and gas resources in Alberta have already passed into American ownership. American owners naturally think in terms of their operations as a whole. They do not separate in their minds their foreign assets unless they are forced to do so. When they discover that they can achieve their ends in Canada by nudging Washington, they'll nudge Washington.

Then the article concludes:

> Alberta with its oil and gas, Quebec with its iron ore, are roughly in the same position today that Venezuela was in two or three decades ago. We welcome foreign capital with open arms. We offer them our resources on terms so generous they rub their eyes in wonder. And because we speak the same language they are not conscious of being in a foreign country. It is like being at home where, if they can't get what they want from a state government they hop a plane for Washington.

I read these quotations to indicate that Canadian writers and people interested in the gas and oil industry in Canada are concerned about the lack of interest across Canada in the development of this great natural resource. We in this group urge public ownership of pipe lines. If that is not possible at the present time, then our second policy is to press, in co-operation with other members of this house and other parties, for the provision of Canadian natural resources to Canadians first before they are exported from this country. We believe that we should use this fuel, this power and this heat in Canada to our own advantage before exporting it because it will mean taxes paid to the national, provincial and municipal governments; it will mean the employment of labour and the development of our own industries. The Ottawa Morning Citizen of February 4, 1951, contained a very interesting article entitled "Exporting Natural Resources" by James H. Gray. He has this to say in conclusion:

> If the gas, or the iron ore, or the pulpwood, were processed completely in Canada, a dozen tax sources would be created. The production companies would be taxed on income, the workers employed would be taxed on income. The same would be true of the processing companies and the people with the end product.
> Curiously enough, one of Anaconda's main competitors in the copper business in Canada is Consolidated Mining and Smelting. Anaconda is protected by three cents per pound tariff against Canadian copper. Without Canadian gas it would have had to use 1,600,000 barrels of oil, or 500,000 tons of coal annually, at two or three times the price. That would have given a competitive advantage to a Canadian company, if it could have used the gas instead of coal.

I have quoted these articles from various newspapers and other sources to try to prove my argument that we in this country should be careful in granting these charters for gas pipe lines when we are not sure of our own requirements or our developments in the future. During the past ten years industrial development in Canada exceeded the expectations of everyone prior to that time. We do not know what the future will bring and a few years may find us in the position where we find it necessary to use our own total gas resources.

I should like to deal briefly with two aspects of the bill as discussed in the committee. I have found from my experience in the committee, as I said before, that a number of members have made every effort to be certain that Canadians shall have the first opportunity to use their own gas and oil. When this bill was before the committee I must say that the company had a most excellent witness in Mr. Herring. I do not think any member of the committee doubted that he was an expert in his field and I am sure that all would say that he was one of the most competent and clear-cut witnesses that have appeared before the committee in connection with any of these applications for charters.

He was asked a series of questions over a period of three meetings of the committee and I know that other members as well as myself were impressed with his frankness and clear explanations of the technical aspects of the production and marketing of gas. I want to repeat what I said the other evening that we were most fortunate in having the hon. member for Calgary West as a member of the committee because without doubt he has a thorough knowledge of the production and marketing of oil and gas.

The witness gave an excellent description of the economic aspects of the project. He described the purposes of the company and its future intentions. He said that the purpose was to proceed to Winnipeg first, but many of us in the committee noted a change of emphasis after two days of cross-examination. There was considerable emphasis on Winnipeg being the first objective of the company with the possibility of building the line to the United States border if supplies were sufficient.

Later on in the committee proceedings the witness rather played down the possibilities of the company exporting gas to the United States. I think other members of the committee will agree with me in that. He saw that there was consistent opposition to this matter of exporting gas to the United States to the detriment of Ontario and Quebec. I should like to quote from page 97 of the report of the committee in that connection, when I was cross-examining the witness as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the witness a question. I would like to be able to understand the situation. Throughout his evidence it seemed to me that the witness emphasized that the real purpose of building this pipe line—I think that during the whole of the time on the first day this witness was giving his evidence he emphasized the possibility of continuing this pipe line into the states, to cities like Minneapolis and other centres, and the possibilities that that offered for the exchange of gas between Canada and the United States so that Ontario could get it. Now, just a few minutes ago in answer to a question the witness stated definitely that the success of this venture rests upon moving gas to the Winnipeg market. I would like him to explain to me the reason for the change there.

Mr. Herring then replied as follows:

> I see your point. Our recommendation to our people is that we feel that if 75 million cubic feet of gas can be obtained from Alberta that would be adequate. We have recommended an economic pipe line to Winnipeg for that gas. I did not emphasize any other point except that. I have always stated that at such time as additional reserves were available in Alberta that we would recommend to them at that time the most economic application of such reserves to their system, within limitation. If that gas, as it increases in Alberta, becomes available in sufficient volume—and we spoke of the northern natural market over in Minnesota, and that is what we recommend when we come to that point because at the present time we cannot see the economics of going into Ontario and Quebec across Canada.

That is just the point so far as certain members of this committee are concerned. We are hesitant about giving our support to this bill because we believe that the ultimate objective of the company is the piping of much larger quantities of gas to the northern part of the United States than would be used between Winnipeg and the source of the gas. We are hesitant about supporting the granting of the application of this company until we are assured that the interests of Ontario and Quebec are protected so far as the receiving of natural gas is concerned prior to its export to the United States.

Mr. McIvor: As a member of this committee I voted for the bill after moving an amendment. There is no more honest or efficient committee than the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and I think this measure was pretty well handled by it. However, I think all hon. members will admit that those who are putting up the money have a good deal of the say as to where the line will go. When a bill of this kind is being discussed there are people who have an axe to grind, and I admit that I am one of them. I have an axe to grind. I object vigorously to any measure providing for a pipe line that will come to Winnipeg but will not come to Fort William and Port Arthur. I supported this bill—

Mr. Hodgson: It stops at Winnipeg.

Mr. McIvor: —because the amendment I moved was carried. The purpose of my amendment was to eliminate the words "outside Canada" so that it would be an all-Canadian route. That may not go far enough but it was as far as we could go at the present time. There are those who think that Fort William and Port Arthur are merely two little spots amidst a lot of bush, rock and great lakes. Fort William and Port Arthur are among the most progressive cities in Canada, and they will need a lot of gas and oil. On the way to Fort William on the C.P.R. there are towns that will need gas and oil such as Kenora—the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River will support me—Keewatin and Sioux Lookout. At the lakehead there are towns like Nipigon and Schreiber and new places that have sprung up with quite large populations such as Terrace and Marathon. They will need oil. Then there are the mining towns of Geraldton, Beardmore and Longlac. There would be a good deal of encouragement for the building of such a pipe line to the lakehead. I represent those at the lakehead who say that while it would cost a lot to build a pipe line to the lakehead it is only fair that that region should have some consideration when our own natural resources are being sold. I also admit that the dominion government is not investing one dollar in it and is taking no risk. The people who supply the gas and who put up the money are taking all the risk. I am going to support the bill.

Mr. Larson: I move that the committee do now rise and report progress.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Mr. Blackmore: No.

The Chairman: Those in favour of the motion will please say "yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Chairman: Those who are opposed to the motion will please say "nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Blackmore: We could not hear what you said.

The Chairman: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Blackmore: We could not hear what you said about the motion.

The Chairman: The motion of Mr. Larson was that the committee rise and report progress. I asked if it was the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion. Some hon. members said "no". Therefore I asked those in favour to please say "yea" and those opposed to please say "nay". Then I said that in my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Low: Let us have a standing vote.

Motion (Mr. Larson) agreed to: Yeas, 53; nays, 6.

The Chairman: I declare the motion carried.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee that I call all the clauses of these bills at one time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 of these bills carry?

Mr. Knowles: Just before you ask the committee to carry clause 1 of all these bills, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a brief word. It is not my intention this evening to delay the passing of these bills in committee, for they are the same bills we have had before us earlier this session for second reading. Since a majority of the house decided we should deal with divorce here rather than elsewhere I had thought other members would be interested in examining these bills clause by clause, but apparently that is not the case. I note that what you are now asking is that we agree to clause 1, which is the significant clause, of all the bills before us. They number some 157. I merely rise to call attention to what the house is doing, putting 157 of these divorce bills through the stage known as the committee of the whole in what is but a very brief compass of time.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 of these bills carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Section agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Section agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the preamble carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Preamble agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report these bills?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Bills reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall these bills be read a third time?

Mr. Fulton: Before the bills are read a third time, by leave, I wish merely to ensure that it is made clear on the record that they carried in committee on division.

Mr. Knowles: And there were 157 of them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member said that quite clearly on every clause, as well as the preamble and the title.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He was not the only one.

Bills read the third time, on division, and passed.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member, who is the mover of the motion, speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member closes the debate I would like to say a few words regarding this bill. I congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on his persistence on behalf of this amendment. He covered ground again this year which has become quite familiar.

I am not going to attempt to make the same points I tried to make when the bill came up last year. Amongst other things I said then that I would give close study to the pros and cons of this question, and I have tried to do that. Nothing I have seen has caused me to believe that it is a very bad thing to adopt the voluntary check-off when it has been arranged by agreement between the two parties concerned. I think it has many things to commend it, just as so many other items agreed to by collective bargaining have much to commend them. While the present Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act is not to everyone's desire, and perhaps would be a sorry document if it were, on the whole it works very well.

Of one thing I have become quite sure, in connection with this effort in encouraging industrial peace in Canada; the spirit of good will and co-operation between the two bargaining parties is of far greater importance than trying to make the act so tight, so rigid and mandatory in the hope that it might be able to cover all contingencies that might come up from time to time. We in the federal Department of Labour have been doing our very best to help create the kind of industrial atmosphere in Canada in which peace and good labour relations might flourish. For the past year and a half I have heard from time to time the most forceful exhortations from those speaking on behalf of wage earners generally. In this house and even more especially outside it I have been told in no uncertain terms in reference to what happened here in September of 1950, in connection with the railway strike, that the principle of compulsion must not—and I repeat must not—be allowed to creep anywhere into our permanent labour legislation.

I take that to mean that if it is possible to avoid it, government legislation should not compel either side to agree to any bargaining item normally coming under collective bargaining. I will admit that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act does have some compulsory provisions. For example, there is the provision that an agreement must not be for less than one year. These compulsory provisions, however, apply to both parties. I am not going to say for a moment that never again should the act be amended so that this principle might be included. It may be that the time may come when this amendment should be included in the act as part of a well balanced over-all review, based on a reasonable period of experience in its present form.

I am fully aware that there are members in all parts of this house who feel that that time may be now, and I have the greatest respect for their views. But I do maintain that we can afford to go slowly as we have done in adding further compulsory items and particularly a compulsion which, for the first time in federal legislation, would impose duties on one party to collective bargaining and not upon the other. I should like to be sure also that the establishment of the principle of parliament determining such questions as are now active in the area of industrial self government does not run against the long term best interests of organized labour itself. I am confirmed in this let-well-enough-alone attitude when I reflect that parliament made it quite clear in section 6 of the original act that there is no restriction whatever on the rights of parties to collective agreement to include such a provision.

I should like to repeat that this government is not opposed to the voluntary check-off in those industries coming under the federal labour code. But the government feels that, for the present at least, the check-off should be made effective only through a freely negotiated agreement by means of collective bargaining.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that I have had the opportunity of expressing my views on the attempt which is being made by this bill to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. During the debate which was opened by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on April 1, members will have noticed that the discussion tended to show the desirability of applying the principle of the voluntary revocable check-off to industries under federal jurisdiction, without placing too much emphasis on the method which is being advocated to attain that aim. We all agree on the soundness of this principle of the voluntary revocable check-off as the least possible measure of union security to which the trade unions of this country are entitled.

I am afraid, though, that a member who has been listening to the debates which have gone on in the past years, and again this year under this bill, has been misled in some way since the whole discussion has been on the principle of the check-off, the development of check-off provisions in the country, and so on. Figures have been given showing what the situation is in the manufacturing industry, for instance. Tonight I should like to discuss the effect that the passage of this bill would have on the act which it proposes to amend, the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The bill is directed at inserting in this act a subsection 3 to section 6, which is one of the sections under the heading of "Unfair labour practices", and which would operate upon the request of any certified trade union to compel the employer to comply with the procedure of the voluntary revocable check-off. My point is this. Even if all the members in this house were to agree on the principle of the voluntary revocable check-off, and wished to see it applied in all plants in this country where the workers are properly organized, the method advocated in this bill to achieve that end within the field of federal jurisdiction is wrong and objectionable.

I have taken the same stand in past debates on the same subject, and it is the stand I am taking today against this bill. I was unavoidably absent when the bill came up for discussion for the first time on April 1 of this year. I have read in Hansard the address which my colleague, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Dickey), delivered on that occasion. He has taken the right approach in examining the bill from the angle which I have just mentioned. He made a very fine address and I wish to compliment him sincerely.

As it is now nine o'clock and I should like to proceed further, I move the adjournment of this debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION—INCREASE OF ALLOWANCES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lapointe for the second reading of Bill No. 181, respecting allowances for veterans and their dependents.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock we were discussing the motion for the second reading of the new War Veterans Allowance Act. I had just indicated, as had other members who had preceded me, my feeling of disappointment that the government is asking the house to raise the amount paid under the War Veterans Allowance Act to only $50 a month for a single veteran and to only $90 a month for a married veteran. I had just pointed out that I felt it was particularly incongruous that on this day we should be reading headlines in the papers to the effect that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is predicting prosperity and good times for the next ten years, and at the same time we are asked to agree to such small amounts for our burnt-out pensioners, to whom all of us feel we owe so much. I earnestly hope that those who appear before the special committee on veterans affairs, when they request that committee to increase these amounts, will know that they have allies in a good many of us in the house. We earnestly hope that their pleas for amounts such as $60 a month single and $120 a month married will be accepted and recommended back to this house by the special committee on veterans affairs.

I feel too, Mr. Speaker, it is most disappointing that the government at this time, when it has chosen to rewrite the War Veterans Allowance Act, has retained the means test to the extent that it is retained in this new version of the act. Under the act as it stood before this bill was brought in, a single veteran was permitted to have $10.42 a month other income and still draw the full amount of the burnt-out pension. A married man was permitted to have $20.83 a month other income, and still draw the full amount of the war veterans allowance. Actually, those margins between the amount of the allowance and the total income that a burnt-out pensioner could have, have been reduced. They have been reduced in both cases to the sum of $10 a month.

In passing I want to say at this point that I still think it is unfortunate that we had by accident back in 1949, in connection with the Old Age Pensions Act, the introduction of the idea of the other income being made the same both for a married couple and for a single person. As I have said, it was an accident; it was done for reasons I need not go into, but I registered my objection very strongly at the time. Now that idea has been carried forward in the present Old Age Assistance Act and here we have it introduced for the first time into the War Veterans Allowance Act. Previously this legislation always provided that the amount of other income permitted to a burnt-out pensioner was twice as much in the case of a married veteran as in the case of a single veteran. Now it has been made the same in both cases, and that margin, as it were, has actually been reduced from the former figures down to $10 a month. I realize that the minister can reply—but I suggest to him that it is only a debating point so far as this margin is concerned—that the ceiling has been raised, but the fact of the matter is that the ceiling has not been raised to the extent that the amount of the allowance itself has been raised, and that is what accounts for this lessening of the margin to which I have referred.

In view of the feeling of a great many Canadians that there should not be any means test at all with respect to the war veterans allowance, it does seem unfortunate that this measure now before us provides not only for the retention of the means test, but for the lessening of the margin that is permitted to a burnt-out pensioner. I hope that this point will come in for considerable discussion in the special committee on veterans affairs. I say again to the representatives of the Canadian Legion, and to the others who will appear before that committee, that in their request that the income ceilings be raised to $1,200 single, and $2,000 married, they have allies and supporters here on the floor of the House of Commons. I know that members of the committee will listen closely to what the representatives of the Legion have to say, and I hope that not only the private members of the committee, but the government representatives on the committee will pay attention to the Legion's request for considerably increasing the ceilings.

It is obvious now that the government is not going to agree to the removal of the means test from the War Veterans Allowance Act. In that circumstance it means that we will have to concentrate on the effort to secure the raising of these income ceilings. I believe that consideration should be given to the point that was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) when he suggested that the objective sought by the portions of the act that are designed to permit burnt-out pensioners to engage in employment on a monthly basis without losing all their burnt-out pension in other months could be achieved just as well by raising the permissible income ceilings to the figures suggested by the Canadian Legion, and in so doing some of the other difficulties would be taken care of as well.

I think again of the ill-feeling that has developed in a good many quarters over the way in which burnt-out pensioners, on receiving the old age security pension, have had their burnt-out pension reduced. We understand it in this house at any rate that there is no means test in the Old Age Security Act itself. Everyone 70 years of age who meets the other qualification, namely, that of sufficient residence in Canada, qualifies for the $40 pension under that act regardless of his means. Most people in Canada who qualify for the pension under the Old Age Security Act do not suffer any loss in their other income by virtue of the fact that they are in receipt of that other pension; but in the case of war veterans allowance recipients, when they receive the old age security pension, it is taken into consideration by the war veterans allowance board in computing the burnt-out pension under the means test. In other words, they are still under a means test.

I remind the house and the government that it would have been possible, if the government had seen fit to do it that way, to put income received under the Old Age Security Act in the same class as income under the Family Allowances Act. Income under the latter is referred to in the War Veterans Allowance Act, and is not counted as income for the purpose of the War Veterans Allowance Act. In other words, technically speaking, legally speaking, it could have been done. If the government prefers not to do it that way, that is another of the problems that could have been solved if the suggestion of the hon. member for Nanaimo were taken, and the permissible income ceilings were raised substantially rather than following this other method of providing for part-time employment.

As I say, and as he said, if you raise the permissible income ceilings to figures such as have been suggested by the Canadian Legion, a burnt-out pensioner over 70 who is on the old age security pension would not suffer any loss in his war veterans allowance and at the same time you would take care of the burnt-out pensioner who would be able to take part-time employment. They would both be protected by legislation of that kind. I hope the government will not take the view that this bill in the form in which it has been presented to the house is sacrosanct but that it will let the committee examine the whole question, and if the committee in its wisdom feels a different pattern should be drawn up, that the government will let the committee draw up that different pattern and recommend it back to the house.

I express that hope partly on the basis of what the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) had to say in the house this afternoon. I was very pleased to hear him say when he opened the debate on second reading that in view of what he referred to as the misinterpretation to which the bill was being subjected because of the raising of the age from 60 to 65 except in cases of those finding it difficult to retain steady employment, he was prepared for the committee to change the age and put it back to 60 where it had been. Well, obviously that results from public reaction which has already reached the minister, and I hope that the degree—

Mr. Lapointe: Ah!

Mr. Knowles: All right—for any reason that the minister wants. He says, "Ah". I do not know what he means; but it has come to his attention in some way that the wording of the bill in that respect, as he has presented it to us, is not satisfactory.

Mr. Mutch: It lends itself to wilful misrepresentation.

Mr. Knowles: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Mutch: It lends itself to wilful misrepresentation, and therefore should be changed.

Mr. Knowles: The parliamentary assistant is saying something quite different from what the minister said.

Mr. Lapointe: No, no; that is exactly what I said this afternoon. It is exactly what I said; but you were not interested in making a speech then.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Veterans Affairs thinks, even before this bill was debated in the house, that that section of the bill was misrepresented, and he thinks it is wilful—at least so they are now saying. That is of course a matter of opinion. But even if he thinks that is the case, it is interesting to note that because that happened he is prepared to suggest that the terms of the bill should be changed. I hope the same elasticity and flexibility he has shown will be carried over into the committee, and that the whole pattern can be changed, so far as the government is concerned if, after it has heard the representations of the Legion and others, the committee in its wisdom feels that changes should be made.

Another type of change which obviously will have to be made—and it is technical; I do not intend to go into it in detail—is that after the change from 65 to 60 is made in section 3 of the bill it will follow that changes will have to be made in sections 4 and 31, and perhaps in other parts of the bill as well. Otherwise certain features of the bill will not be clear. At the present time it is drafted on the basis of two categories. If a change is to be made back to the age of 60, I hope the government and committee will see to it that no ambiguity is allowed to carry over.

I am glad to note that there is a section in the bill which, if I read it correctly, does carry out the minister's undertaking of last fall that any changes made under the bill would be made retroactive to January 1, 1952. There was never any doubt that that undertaking would be fulfilled, but I am sure it will mean a great deal to our burnt-out pensioners to know that when this bill is finally enacted there will be for a good many of them an adjustment back to January 1, 1952.

I am sorry there is no change in the new bill with regard to the definition of "theatre of war" for those who participated in world war I. It does seem to me that the case we have been making across the years for an ever-dwindling number of men in this category is one which should not continue to fall on deaf ears. There is not only the plight of the veterans themselves who, through no fault of their own, were not able to get beyond England during the first world war, but there is the plight of the widows of those veterans who, though they qualify in every other respect, are denied the allowance provided under the act. That, too, I trust will be discussed in detail in committee, and I hope that after representations have been made the committee will give consideration to making a change in that definition.

Similarly I support those who have urged once again that the widows of imperial veterans be granted the allowance, if they have had the required residence in Canada, and that they should not be denied it merely because their husbands happened to live in Canada prior to death something less than the full 20 years.

There are other aspects of the matter upon which I might comment. However I do not believe it is necessary to do so at this time. I confess I have spoken with respect to this legislation on a good many occasions. I have done so because this legislation is extremely important to the needy older veterans of this country. There are many who, though they have served their country well, do not qualify as some of us feel they should qualify under the Pension Act. They must fall back on this legislation, and I feel we should take every possible step to make this the kind of legislation which shows for our burnt-out veterans a high degree of respect, and I think it should really show our appreciation of what they have done for us.

I earnestly hope that these important aspects of the matter, the amount of the allowance, the means test, the relation between war veterans allowance and old age security, as well as other aspects, will be fully considered in committee, and that the committee will be the kind of committee we have had in some years in the past. They have not all been the same. There have been committees in which there was a certain amount of wrangling, as indeed there is in most committees of the house. On the other hand there have been committees when it has seemed to us that the veterans have got together and, on a co-operative basis, recommended what was best for their comrades as a whole.

I hope that will happen this time, and that when the members of the committee have so recommended the government will accept the recommendations they make for real improvement in this very important piece of legislation.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this subject, and in doing so shall try to brief. As I am not a member of the committee I will not have the opportunity presented to others to discuss these matters at length.

I feel it is useful to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that there is not entire agreement with the legislation he proposes to have enacted at this session. We are grateful that this matter is being dealt with, in line with the promise given last fall. But it is only fair to indicate at this stage that the legislation does not come up to our expectations.

As the debate progressed I was just thinking that this is a clear indication of the tremendous impact of war on society. Thirty-four years have gone by since the close of the first great war, and we are still attempting to settle some of the problems that affected those who served, and their dependents.

The War Veterans Allowance Act affects people who served in the South African war, which was brought to a conclusion fifty years ago this month. Then, there are a few survivors from the northwest field force whose active campaigning in western Canada occurred about sixty-seven years ago. But this does serve to indicate the shocking impact of war.

In 1979, thirty-four years from the close of the second great war, I suppose the survivors of that war will be arguing about the matter of assistance for veterans. I would hope that we could have the matter solved before too long.

Another point I would mention is that the number of people involved under this legislation is very small. According to the figures available at March 31, 1950, the survivors of the northwest field force who were benefiting under this act numbered only 60, while there were 336 from the South African war and about 24,700 from the first great war. Incidentally I hope that the veterans of the second great war will take a keen interest in the veterans of the first great war, just as the veterans of the first great war felt indebted to the South Africa veterans. It is sometimes overlooked that the South Africa veterans played a great part in the organization and training of the armies who fought in the first great war. Because of their experience, the contribution they made was considerable. As the veterans of the second great war mature a bit they may perhaps acknowledge that the veterans of the first world war made a similar contribution toward their activities.

The number is small compared to the total population of this country. In 1930 there were 51,000 in round figures drawing benefits under this particular legislation, and I am referring only to veterans and not to widows and others. That number has since dropped to 25,000.

Mr. Speaker: It was drawn to my attention earlier in the day that a discussion on pensions generally was not in order under this bill. At the present time is the hon. member discussing the question of pensions to veterans generally? If so, I would ask him to confine his remarks to the principle of this bill which deals with allowances to war veterans and their dependents.

Mr. Churchill: I was referring to those drawing war veterans allowances; I was not making any reference to disability pensioners.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. member to refer to the number of pensioners in 1930.

Mr. Churchill: Under war veterans allowance.

Mr. Knowles: Burnt-out pensioners.

Mr. Speaker: He mentioned some 50,000 for the year 1930.

Mr. Churchill: I was quoting from the report of the war veterans allowance board which appears on page 140 of the annual report of the Department of Veterans Affairs for the year ended March 31, 1950. That shows that in 1930 the number drawing allowances under the War Veterans Allowance Act was 51,000, which number has now dropped to 25,000. The total number is decreasing at the rate of approximately 1,000 a year. Each year new people are taken in under the legislation, but the over-all total is decreasing at that rate.

I maintain that it is a decreasing obligation so far as the veterans of the first world war are concerned and I think we can afford to be reasonably generous with these men. In order to qualify they must be sixty years of age or over and must prove that they served in a theatre of war. I remember the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) giving in the house what I considered to be the finest exposition of the service rendered by the men in this category.

These men were not wounded during the war but they suffered the hardships of campaigning. It has become quite obvious that men who underwent the campaigns in northwest Europe from 1914 to 1918 have in many instances suffered as a result.

I recall one sergeant, subsequently a sergeant-major, who came from the maritimes. He had served in France, first in an infantry regiment and later in a machine gun battalion, from the spring of 1915 up to the end of the war and then through the occupation in Germany. He was never wounded and to my knowledge had not missed an action except when he was away on annual leave. That is only one instance and I know of others whose service was lengthy. While they were not wounded they have now reached the age of sixty or over and are beginning to show signs of their exposure to the elements during the campaigning they endured. It was to aid these people that this legislation was enacted.

I think that they are as deserving of generous treatment as any of those who come under our veterans legislation. Consequently I think the Legion is well advised to suggest that the allowances should be increased. I would be happy to support their suggestion. It has been pointed out to the minister before that the Legion and other veterans organizations which deal with these matters are responsible bodies. The Legion has not put forward any extravagant claims at any time. They give close attention to matters of this sort and have not wished to be a burden on the country. Their representations have been carefully investigated and have received close attention indeed.

I regret that the means test has not been removed. This ceiling on the earnings of those coming under war veterans allowance is most annoying. I can give the minister instances where the burden falls largely upon the wife of the veteran. Take where a war veteran is burnt-out and unable to work. He finds that he cannot support himself and his wife on the allowance and the wife must go out to work. We must remember that the wives of those on war veterans allowance are not young women. They have reached the time when they should be retired but in many instances, in order to maintain the home and provide food and clothing, they have to go out to work. At that point the ceiling comes into effect.

I know of one instance of a war veteran suffering from arthritis who is unable to do any work. His wife, who is not a young woman, goes out to work every evening cleaning and sweeping up in a business block. The combined earnings exceeded the ceiling permitted and then the means test was applied and the war veteran was threatened with a reduction in his allowance. When the wife discussed this with the officials they drew attention to the possibility of casual earnings. This is a difficult matter for some people to understand, but it amounts to giving up a steady job and just going around to work a few days here, a few days there and a few days somewhere else and keeping your earnings down to a point where they do not exceed the ceiling.

I think one of the worst features of this legislation is the means test and the establishment of the ceiling, and I should like to lodge my protest. These people, few in number, an ageing group, should be given every encouragement. Where you have dependents who are doing their level best to assist, that should be recognized and these people should be given the benefit of the extra work they do. I hope that during the course of the meetings of the committee all these matters will be discussed in detail and that more generous treatment will be afforded these people on war veterans allowance.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak for a moment on this matter. As one who has been associated with the Legion for many years, in fact from the very first time to which Your Honour referred a few moments ago when the first payments of war veterans allowance were made, and having been here when the matter was dealt with at that time, I have some special interest in this legislation. I am not going into the details of the criticisms and suggestions that have been made. The minister has been here, has heard them, and I know that he will give them consideration and that the committee will do likewise.

Unfortunately I am one of the veterans who cannot be on that committee, and it is for that reason that I transgress on the time of the house for three or four minutes. I think the point made by the hon. member who preceded me is an important one. The group affected by this legislation is small in number and must inevitably become smaller as time goes on. As he says, there will be no replacements for those who took part in the first world war, and it is going to be many years before the veterans of the second world war can be affected by this legislation. We do not know under what circumstances, financial or otherwise, the country and the government will be operating by that time.

In the meantime we have a direct responsibility to these pitifully few veterans from earlier battles and wars. There are only a relatively small number from the first war. Having studied the legislation, and without committing oneself as to any definite figure as to the payments which should be made, there should be substantial increases. We have the recommendations which will be presented, as we know, by the Legion to the committee. I am sure the minister will agree that all Canadians can be proud of the attitude that has been taken by the veterans organizations in Canada in the past, and particularly the Legion. Their attitude has been different from that which may have been taken by similar organizations in other countries. They have shown a degree of responsibility towards such matters which has inspired confidence on the part of the country.

One reason why the demands of the veterans as expressed by the Legion have general support throughout the country is that throughout all these years the Legion has always taken a sane and rational approach to the different problems. A great many members of the Legion give of their own time at inconvenience and expense to themselves to service and look after their comrades who have suffered disability or are burnt-out as are the ones we are dealing with today. When such an organization appears, as it will, before the committee in the very near future I suggest that its representations should be received with the greatest of respect. I trust that the committee, as I am sure it does, appreciates the fact that not only the returned men who are members of the house but practically all members of the House of Commons welcome their views and are inclined to endorse them.

As I said, the number of men concerned is diminishing, and surely in these times, when we have a degree of development such as we have never known before and when we are looking forward to further thresholds, returned men who suffer from no particular disability except the fact that they were burnt out in the interests of their country should be properly looked after. I suggest it is not right that there should be a ceiling with respect to them such as is imposed by this legislation. There should not be control of casual earnings, whatever they may be, in the way that is proposed by the legislation. I hope that these matters—and I know they will—will be considered by the committee.

While the members on the other side of the house who are returned men perhaps feel for various reasons that they do not want to take part in the debate at this time, nevertheless we know that they are interested. They have exercised influence before in committees and on the government. There have been times when they have exercised very substantial influence in connection with these matters. I simply speak as one who will not be a member of the committee. I think I am expressing the views of everyone. I know I am expressing the views of all who sit around me, and I believe of members generally and of the people of the country. The country expects the committee to deal with this legislation in a most constructive way and to report it back to the house on a scale considerably modified from that in which it is sent to it.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I merely want to add my voice to the protests respecting the regulations concerning supplementary earnings that have been voiced by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and other members of the official opposition. I do so because I consider that it is an economic error. There are veterans of the first world war with considerable technical skills and who from time to time over short periods can command considerable earnings. I have in mind a veteran who appealed to me. He is a radio technician capable of doing special work on electronics. He could earn $1.50 to $2 an hour doing his specialized work but he was informed that if he accepted a job with one of the firms in that line of work he would lose his war veterans allowance.

On the face of it probably that is just. However, this man suffered an eye injury during the first world war, and his age was such that a company employing him could not in any way guarantee him permanent employment. Nevertheless from time to time he was capable of doing extremely valuable highly skilled work but because of his eye injury he could only do so on a temporary basis. No employer could possibly employ him on a permanent basis when his disability prevented him from working steadily. I feel that a man with such skill should be encouraged in every way to do as much useful work as he possibly can. I feel that the regulations limiting extra earnings not only destroy his morale and his ability to do useful work, which is in itself an extraordinarily bad thing, but also prevent a great deal of useful work being done throughout the country, which is also a bad thing.

Third, this man with special skill had to make a decision whether he would undertake the work—and in this case the job sought the man—and thereby lose his war veterans allowance, with the knowledge that should there be a recurrence of the eye injury, which was expected, that would prevent him from continuing with this work, he would become unemployed and would have to reapply for the war veterans allowance.

I mention this case, Mr. Speaker, because in my opinion one thing we should do from an economic point of view is encourage all the useful work that can be done in Canada. Anyone with special skill, anyone who can do work even of a temporary nature, should be encouraged to do it. If a man suffers a recurring disability which from time to time prevents him doing regular work, nevertheless he should be encouraged to work whenever it is possible for him to do so. It is good for the morale of the man. It is good for the morale of the country, and it is good for our economy.

I feel that these regulations are negative. Believe me, a lot of these old soldiers are extremely proud. More than anything else they want to be usefully employed, but these regulations virtually prevent their employment in many cases. This has come up on several occasions through people who have appealed to me. While they have received sympathetic consideration, nevertheless they have had to come to a decision—and it is a dreadful decision for anyone of any age to have to make—as to whether they would do useful work or attempt to live on the allowance the government granted them. It seems to me nothing would be more calculated to destroy the morale of those in receipt of war veterans allowance, those veterans of the first world war, than to so limit their extra earnings as is proposed under this legislation.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): I am not going to detain the house very long; but like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), since I am not a member of this committee I would like to place before the house the consensus of opinion of the veterans in my riding, who number several thousand. Tonight we are dealing with a bill which will affect a large number of people in my constituency, many of whom have come there to enjoy the better, drier climate we have in that part of the country. Their number is gradually diminishing. I am afraid that unless something is done quickly the benefits we are hoping to render the burnt-out veterans will be wasted. They will not be there; they will have completely burned away.

To me this is a form of adjustment of a debt of honour, a keeping of faith with those who passed on fighting for these very things: higher standards of life, greater security for their fellow men. If we do not carry out what we fought for in the first and second world wars we will be breaking faith with those who have gone before, particularly if we cannot take better care of their dependents.

The disabled veterans are satisfied with the generous treatment they were accorded last session. I certainly hope the same generosity will be shown in dealing with this group of veterans. In the case of the disabled veterans the brief presented to the committee by the Canadian Legion became practically the blueprint of the final legislation. I feel that was because of the careful thought and study put into that brief by the officers and members of the Legion. It represented the carefully collected and studied opinions of all the branches throughout the dominion. The same careful canvass has been carried on again with regard to the veterans allowance. I may say I know the work of the Legion very well; I have been a past president and am now a life member. I joined the Legion within the first few months after it was formed, so I know the thoroughness with which the brief will be prepared before being presented to the committee.

From information that has come to me I have some knowledge of one or two points I know will be dealt with in that brief, and on behalf of the people I represent I ask the minister to do something about those matters. In the first place they ask that the principle of the war veterans allowance be not changed, but they ask that it be increased from $40 for a single man and $70 for a married man to $60 for a single man and $120 for a married man. I think that is a reasonable request. I do not believe they are asking for too much in view of the high cost of living today. With the dollar only worth fifty cents, they are practically asking for half those amounts. So while the bill does not contain any figures, since the minister has already changed his mind about one matter I hope he will change it about this as well.

Another point is that the total ceiling should be raised to $1,200 for single men and $2,000 for married men; and to carry that out I suggest that the minister go further and entirely remove the means test. I believe we should encourage these burnt-out men to take any work they can do in order to keep up their morale and give them something to live for. Even though they may earn a little more than the minister believes they should, we must not forget that they can still render useful service to society. I have in mind my own district, where for two or three months each year we have a scarcity of labour to pick fruit. It is true that these veterans cannot do any hard work, but they are ideal for this type of labour. They can work for two or three months picking fruit and sometimes it pays very well, because of the rush nature of the work. So I feel the minister should consider allowing money so earned to be added to their allowance without penalty. Otherwise the fruit industry would have to do without the help now given by these men.

Then the widows of imperial and allied veterans with twenty years of residence in Canada should be entitled to the war veterans allowance regardless of the date of death of their husbands. I believe this is absolutely correct. I am speaking on behalf of the veterans of my riding, and they are 100 per cent behind that thought.

I well remember Canadians serving in England who would have liked to have gone to France but could not. They had to stay behind in a training camp or work in hospitals or in charge of supplies. During the last war, in many cases, these men ran risks equal to those run by men who were in the front-line trenches. I remember that during the first war the men had to work pretty hard at the base looking after the supplies, whether the base was in England or in France. They were pleased when they were ordered to the front, because they went to the trenches for a rest. Therefore the veteran who served only in England may well have rendered, in that time spent in England, service equal to if not greater than that rendered by one who went to France, who perhaps even then did not see the trenches.

I feel that the implementation of this policy to increase the allowance is long overdue. I could name dozens of cases in which there was hardship that have come to my particular notice. On their behalf I urge the minister to reconsider the bill, especially after discussion with the members of the Canadian Legion. I do not believe the cost would be very high, but that can be considered after the numbers have been arrived at, the ages and the amount to be paid. I feel that the implementation of such an act would round out the program of care that we have developed for our ex-service personnel. It would give us a complete program of care. At present we have looked after the disabled, and we have looked after other small groups. This would complete the program, and Canada could be proud of the service rendered to returned men because it would be the equal of any country in the commonwealth of nations. I hope that the minister, who has already shown a tendency to modify his views and change what is already incorporated in the bill, will continue to do so until the needs of these men have been taken care of.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, lest he should assume from the fact that I did not speak that I had changed the views which I had expressed last year, I know the minister, who welcomes serious suggestions from whatever quarter they may come, will not take amiss the fact that I rise for a few minutes for the purpose only of making it clear that I still hold the same views which I expressed when we discussed this subject on November 19 last year. The views which I then expressed can be found at pages 1133 to 1135 of Hansard for that date. I am, therefore, not going to go into the matter at any length or indeed to repeat what I said, except to say that I support the views as then put forward by the Canadian Legion. Nothing has happened since that has in any way given me any reason to change or modify that stand.

The only point in this discussion or anything that was said on the previous occasion to which I should like to refer especially is the subject of the means test. It was one of those points which I mentioned especially on that occasion when I said words which I feel are equally applicable at this time. When referring to that means test and advocating that it should be either substantially raised or altogether abolished, I said that when it is maintained at its present level it is indicative of a mean and a narrow approach to this problem. I still feel that way, Mr. Speaker. I think that, although there have been some modifications, the legislation as presented, with respect to the means test particularly, imposed a limitation on the over-all income of this dwindling number of burnt-out veterans which still represents a mean and narrow approach to the problem. I did hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe)—I know he will receive much advice from the committee on this point—would find himself able to accept at least to a large degree the feelings which have been almost unanimously expressed with respect to the raising of the level of the means test.

Apart from that, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing much to add to what I said on that occasion. I have given the minister the page reference and I am quite sure that with that consideration for the views of others which he always shows, he will be glad, realizing I am not a member of the committee and will not have an opportunity of expressing these views there, to read what was said and give that consideration to it which he always gives.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that the minister is closing the debate.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is not my intention to delay the house much longer. I wish to express my appreciation to every member in this house who has taken part in this debate today. The purpose of the debate is to obtain the views of the members concerning the legislation before it is sent to the committee. I do feel however that, in fairness to myself and to the government which is bringing forward this legislation, there are some comments which I should make.

At the opening of the debate I stated that I would ask the chairman of the committee to see that an amendment was introduced to a section of the bill in order to change the qualifying age from 65 to 60. I tried to explain then, but quite possibly I did not succeed, that my understanding, and that of my advisers who have had considerable experience in the interpretation of veterans legislation, is that the insertion of the words 65 years in this particular section would not change anything as compared to the present application of the law. I understand, however, that it might be interpreted as raising the age at which veterans could qualify for veterans allowances. Since I do not want any such interpretation to be given to this legislation, which is an endeavour to make it a more flexible instrument for veterans welfare, I had no objection at all to the changing of the age from 65 to 60. Some hon. members have seen fit to argue the bill as though this change were not to be made. They have not taken my remarks into consideration, or possibly I did not express myself clearly; otherwise, I should think that they would not have spoken as they did.

Much of the discussion which has taken place today has been on the question of ceilings on casual or intermittent earnings by the recipients of war veterans allowance. Many of the speeches this afternoon were on that particular subject. I feel that some hon. members have not fully understood the purpose and effect of the new section 4. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) —I am sorry he is not here—said that the veterans felt that the putting into effect of the ceilings of $720 or $1,200, as they are now, is not only doing a disservice to the veteran but is causing a loss of production which would benefit the country. He went on to ask: How does the government benefit by making mandatory in the legislation that if a veteran is in receipt of the maximum amount of the war veterans allowance he must stay at home and do nothing because otherwise he will interfere with his allowance? This shows a complete misunderstanding of section 4, Mr. Speaker, as I tried to point out to him during the course of the debate. The whole purpose of that section is to permit a recipient of war veterans allowances to take employment, employment of the nature which was described by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) tonight. In fact, I think the best argument in favour of section 4 was the speech made by the hon. member for York West tonight when he described to us the situation of certain veterans who are skilled workmen. Because of ill health certain veterans are not capable of holding full-time employment; but in a period of full employment they are capable of taking a job for three or four months. Under the legislation as it stands today they would not take that employment because they would lose their war veterans allowance. That is the case at the present time. But when this new section is in the act any such veteran who is receiving war veterans allowance may take this employment and may receive this salary, whatever it may be. It may vary from a very low salary for unskilled labour to a relatively high salary for skilled labour. And when he ceases to work at this particular employment he will immediately be qualified to return to war veterans allowance and start to draw his war veterans allowance. In other words, as I mentioned when I introduced the resolution preceding this bill, the general effect of section 4 of the present bill is to take away the ceilings on earned income. I do not believe that ever before has any of our legislation gone so far forward. I know that the necessity for such legislation has been urged for some time.

Suggestions have been made that the same result would be achieved through other means in amending the act. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) suggested that this was new phraseology, new wording introduced in the legislation, and that it might bring about difficulties. I sometimes find that certain people would rather be wrong than be recent. I do not believe the fact that new wording or new phraseology is introduced into the act means that the principle which it carries is by any means wrong, and I do not think that my hon. friend would pretend that either. He may fear administrative difficulties. I think he mentioned that. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have the responsibility of administering this legislation as I have the responsibility of administering the department; I believe that generally speaking hon. members will agree that the officers of the Department of Veterans Affairs are competent. Most of them have been devoting many years to the cause of veterans. They have followed this legislation; they have taken part in the evolution of the legislation, and I believe they are in a position to foresee any difficulties that may arise out of the administration of the new principle.

Mr. Green: I suggested that all earnings should be exempt just as casual earnings are now.

Mr. Lapointe: Well, as I understand it, under section 4 the earnings are exempt; that is the purpose of this section, and that is what I am endeavouring to explain to the house.

I just wanted to put forward these views and these explanations, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit a question, purely for clarification? Does he not mean that earnings are exempt from being carried over into a month in which one is on the allowance?

Mr. Lapointe: No, that is not what I mean. Possibly I could best explain it by giving a hypothetical case. Let us take the case of Private Knowles who starts drawing war veterans allowance on January 1.

Mr. Graydon: General Knowles.

Mr. Knowles: Not burnt-out, though.

Mr. Lapointe: Possibly I was unfortunate in my choice of a name, Mr. Speaker, but I said it was a hypothetical case. He starts drawing his war veterans allowance at whatever rate it may be on January 1. That is, his veterans allowance year starts on January 1. He receives an allowance of $50 for January, February, March and April. At the beginning of the month of May, being an expert gardener, he gets a job planting tulips in front of the parliament buildings, and doing other work of that sort, and carries on—

Mr. Pearkes: You plant tulips in the fall.

Mr. Lapointe: Tending the tulips would be a better term. He carries on with this work until the end of September. Whatever salary Private Knowles draws during that time does not count at all in the computation of his war veterans allowance. On September 30 the head gardener tells him that he no longer needs his services. He may immediately stop work, and start receiving his war veterans allowance in the month of October. That is my understanding. I think my hon. friend will understand that his income during his months of employment is completely exempted as regards his right to receive his war veterans allowance when unemployed.

Mr. Knowles: With respect, I believe that is what I said.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM TERRACE TO KITIMAT, B.C.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill conferring authority upon the governor in council to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct a line of railway from Terrace to Kitimat, in the province of British Columbia, a distance of approximately 46 miles at an estimated expenditure of $10 million and an average expenditure of $217,391.30 per mile. The bill will make provision for the issue by the company of securities, which may be guaranteed by the government in respect of the cost of construction. To enable the company to proceed with construction forthwith, temporary loans may be made to the company out of the consolidated revenue fund, upon terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council and secured by company securities.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a statement at this stage?

Mr. Chevrier: I was going to make it in committee.

Mr. Green: I would prefer to have it made now.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, this resolution seeks to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct a branch line of railway between Terrace and Kitimat, in the province of British Columbia, a distance of some 46 miles. The resolution may be divided into three parts: First, that part which confers upon the Canadian National Railways the right to construct the line at a cost of $10 million; next, that part which authorizes the Canadian National Railways to issue securities guaranteed by the government in respect of the cost of construction of the line; and last, that which provides for the making of temporary loans out of the consolidated revenue fund for the purpose of meeting the cost of the line as it is being constructed.

The Aluminum Company of Canada is engaged at the moment in the development of a large-scale aluminum industry at the head of Kitimat Arm in British Columbia. The construction of the railway from Terrace to Kitimat Arm will be the means of enabling the Aluminum Company to proceed with a series of plans it has in that area. These plans I shall discuss in greater detail as I proceed.

The present plans call for initial production at the rate of 91,000 short tons of aluminum annually, and while it is impossible to forecast at the moment what production will be, the assurance is that the ultimate capacity will be in the neighbourhood of 550,000 short tons annually. The production of this aluminum, as the house knows, is dependent upon electrical energy.

The Aluminum Company has, over and above the establishment of the plant, also in mind the production of electrical energy to the extent of 1,600,000 horsepower.

The construction of the proposed branch line from Terrace to Kitimat will not only enable the company, as I said earlier, to proceed with the development of the electrical energy; it would also make possible the development of substantial timber resources in this area. In addition, the opening up of another seaport at Kitimat will have economic significance in not only developing a seaborne trade out of Kitimat, but also in developing trade in the area. Much more tonnage will arrive by water at Kitimat than will depart from there at the outset. But as the plan which the company has in mind progresses it will, I believe, become easier to develop export trade than will exist at the outset.

The full development of the company's plans aims, first of all, at the establishment of a hydroelectric plant at the nearby coastal point of Kemano on the Gardner canal. This plant will utilize a head of 2,600 feet of water which will be diverted by a system of lakes at the head of Nechako river, which will develop the 1,600,000 horsepower referred to earlier.

Also there will be constructed a transmission line which will transmit the electrical energy from the area of the tunnel to Terrace, a distance of 55 miles. There will also be established under this plan a deep-water dock for the handling of waterborne material, equipment and supplies for the outward movement of a proportion of the finished product. And, finally, there will be set up a new townsite in conjunction with the plant, and industrial works, with schools, recreation and other facilities which should accommodate, ab initio, some 8,000 people.

The estimated cost of constructing a line as set out in the resolution is $10 million. This relatively high cost of construction is due to the difficult terrain over which the line will have to traverse. I have before me, and there will be available in the committee—to which I take it the bill based upon this resolution will be referred—a report prepared by the Canadian National Railways, research and development section, which will give not only a detailed analysis of the traffic which is likely to accrue out of the construction of the line, but also the financial return which should come from it.

That report will indicate that there should be an annual freight traffic accruing to the Canadian National Railways of 113,535 tons during the first five years of operation of the line, and 168,685 tons during the second five-year period. The principal sources of rail traffic, other than those derived from the Aluminum Company, would be forest products; and a minor but probably increasingly important resource would be that of fisheries.

There has also been prepared by the research section of the Canadian National Railways a statement indicating the traffic, from the point of view of revenue, that is likely to accrue during the first five years of operation of the line, and during the second five years.

During the first five years of operation it is expected that there should be a net betterment to the Canadian National Railways operations of $1,100. That is arrived at by total revenues of $1,854,800 and total expenses of $1,503,700, plus interest on the cost of construction, which would leave the $1,100 net operating result for the first five years.

The position is better for the second five years to the extent that it is expected there will be a net operating revenue of $323,000. I need not go into detail, because that can be done at a later stage.

Then, following the practice it always follows—in my experience at least—in connection with the construction of branch lines of this kind, the Canadian National Railways seek to reach agreement with the company in question. In this instance they have entered into an agreement with the Aluminum Company which guarantees a minimum volume of traffic during the first ten years of operation and provides for the allocation of a substantial amount of electrical power for general industrial purposes, and the industrial development of the area.

Under the terms of the agreement the Aluminum Company undertakes to secure to the Canadian National Railways gross system earnings in freight, passenger and express traffic during the first ten years of operation of the proposed branch line equal to the capital cost of the line, but not exceeding $10 million.

The proposed bill would authorize the Canadian National Railways to expend on the construction of this line the sum of $10 million, and would be similar to bills of this nature which have been passed previously by the house. It would provide for the granting of temporary loans to the railways and a government guarantee of securities issued by the railways for the amount of $10 million necessary for the construction. The Kitimat project of the Aluminum Company is of great importance to the economy of Canada. I need hardly say to the house that it is of great importance from the point of view of the production of more aluminium which is required urgently at this time.

I believe that it is fitting that the Canadian National Railways should be the agency to enter into an agreement with the Aluminum Company for the construction of the line. It is fitting also that the Canadian National Railways should have taken such a prominent part in the development of this natural resource as it did in the development of the nickel deposits in the Sherridon-Lynn Lake area and as it did in the development of the timber resources in the Kiask Falls-Barraute area on the national transcontinental. This measure to authorize the building of the proposed branch line is one which I am sure will commend itself to the house.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition strongly favour the construction of this branch line. The minister has given the house most of the details, but I would like to point out that although the line will run about 400 miles north of Vancouver it will be south of the Canadian National Railways line which runs from Jasper to Prince Rupert. Incidentally that line was the main transcontinental line through British Columbia of the old Grand Trunk Pacific. Half of the province of British Columbia lies north of that line and practically all of that half, with the exception of the Peace river belt in British Columbia, is undeveloped. Therefore this railroad holds great possibilities for the west coast province.

Terrace is an incorporated village on this line from Jasper to Prince Rupert and is about 100 miles inland. It is situated on the Skeena river in the midst of good farming country. I take it that the proposed line is to run in a southwesterly direction from Terrace to Kitimat, which is a small Indian settlement on tidewater where there will be built an all-year port; navigation will be possible in and out of Kitimat throughout the winter months.

This line is needed because of the huge undertaking by the Aluminum Company of Canada Limited in that area. If their whole plan materializes there will be situated at Kitimat the largest aluminum smelter in the world. That may seem odd to hon. members as I must admit it did to me when I first heard of the plan. Here was this great company going into unsettled territory and proposing to establish this huge plant. However, the main reason for that is the tremendous power potential. The production of aluminum requires vast quantities of power. Materials can now be taken in by ship and when this branch line is constructed it will be possible also to bring them in by rail and of course the products of the smelter can then be transported either by ship or rail.

The project is really an amazing one. The company is building a large dam on the Nechako river about 140 miles inland from the Pacific coast. This river now drains to the east into the Fraser river which flows into the Pacific below New Westminster. They are damming that river and its tributaries and changing the whole drainage system from the east to the west; at the western end of this system they are boring a tunnel through a mountain to the Pacific coast for a distance of ten miles; this tunnel will have a diameter of 25 feet and, as the minister has said, will have a drop of about 2,600 feet.

The power plant is not to be located out in the open, but is to be inside this mountain in the Kemano district in an excavated cavern 1,400 feet underground; the power plant site will be 1,000 feet long, 80 feet wide and 100 feet high. Those are the dimensions of the cavern which is to be tunnelled out of the mountain and in which this power plant will be installed. That of course will protect the plant against atomic bombs and landslides and apparently will help in the production of the power.

From that power plant transmission lines will run, not to Terrace as the minister said, but about 50 miles over the mountains to Kitimat which is to be the site of the smelter and the terminus of this branch line. That transmission line goes over territory so rough that in spots the materials needed to be taken in by helicopter.

As I say, the smelter is to be located at Kitimat. The first stage of this development at Kitimat is to be completed in the spring of 1954 and it is hoped to produce at that time 83,000 metric tons of aluminum annually. According to the literature of the Alcan people there will be a town there then of from 6,000 to 7,000 people, of whom about 1,100 will be production workers. The cost of that first stage will be about $160 million and I believe the horsepower to be produced is roughly 420,000. Incidentally they are not going to bring bauxite, the raw material for aluminum, to Kitimat; I understand the plan is to process the bauxite partially in the Caribbean and bring to Kitimat a product known as alumina.

World markets for aluminum are steadily expanding and it is hoped by the company that because of those expanding markets and the establishment of other industries at Kitimat it will be possible shortly to go ahead with the whole plan. If that is done there will be eventually a production of over 500,000 metric tons of aluminum annually and the population of Kitimat will be about 50,000. It is expected the total cost will be over $500 million, or half a billion dollars, and the power developed will total 1,600,000 horsepower. That means doubling the Canadian production of aluminum. As I said before, it means the largest aluminum smelter in the world; half as large again as the aluminum smelter at Arvida in the province of Quebec where, incidentally, I believe only 1,200,000 horsepower are produced.

For British Columbia and Canada this is a most promising development. It will mean a great deal for Terrace and the vicinity. Farmers there will have a market for their crops. There is also good farming land to the east along the main line in the north of Canadian National Railways. It will mean jobs for the people who are already in that central portion of British Columbia. It will mean a great increase in population in all the centres along the line from Prince George right through to Prince Rupert.

I believe this Alcan plan will develop the whole of central British Columbia and should greatly hasten the construction of a railway outlet from the Peace river to the Pacific. It will also help to open that portion of British Columbia lying north of the line from Jasper to Prince Rupert.

It can very well be compared with the developments that are taking place in other parts of Canada. In Quebec we have a railway line being constructed into the region of the iron ore deposits, a line running over 300 miles from Sept Iles right up to the border of Labrador. Last year we approved the construction in Manitoba by the Canadian National Railways of a new line from Sherridon to Lynn Lake, a distance of about 155 miles. In northern Saskatchewan there is the development of the uranium mines, and the northern part of Alberta of course is a hive of activity. In the Mackenzie district there are also great developments taking place. All these northern developments are significant and I believe they are of the utmost importance. I think the future of Canada depends largely on expansion of her activities northward.

With regard to this proposal, in so far as Canadian National Railways is concerned the minister intimated that the railway is to be asked to pay the whole cost of $10 million. That seems to be a different course from that followed last year with respect to the construction of the railway line from Sherridon to Lynn Lake. In that case the Department of Defence Production undertook to pay $4,725,000, practically one-third of the cost. The railway was not charged with that much of the cost. The reason given was that the opening of the line was partially for defence purposes; that it would mean the production of nickel, copper and other metals useful for defence preparation.

Here we have a branch line being constructed which will aid in the production of aluminum, and I do not understand why help should not be extended to this line by the Department of Defence Production in the same way that help was given to the Lynn Lake line. If my suggestion were carried out the cost to the railway would be that much less. Canadian National Railways would have that much more opportunity to make the line pay. When the minister closes the debate, or in the discussion of the resolution in committee, I hope that he will explain why a different course is being followed in this case.

In the construction of the Lynn Lake line the mining company concerned, Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited, undertook to pay $5 million which was a little over one-third of the cost, the other $5 million being provided by Canadian National Railways. There is no mention here of the Aluminum Company having to pay any portion of the cost although they will get most of the benefit from the branch line. It is true that in the case of the Lynn Lake line there was a provision for repayment if the tonnage carried on the line exceeded a certain figure. However, the minister has intimated that the only agreement made in the case of the Terrace-Kitimat branch line is that the company will guarantee a minimum amount of traffic for the next ten years, and will guarantee to supply a certain quantity of electric power to Canadian National Railways. I believe he did not indicate how much power was to be supplied. In the case of the Lynn Lake line the agreement also covered freight rates. There was provision for the freight rates that were to be paid on the line. We would like to know whether there is any similar provision in the case of the Terrace-Kitimat branch line.

I mentioned earlier in my remarks that it was hoped that other industries would be established at Kitimat. We are getting encouraging news in this regard every day. For example, since my return from the coast after the Easter recess press dispatches have indicated that there is reasonable expectation of a great pulp and paper plant being erected there by the Powell River Company, one of our timber companies, which is planning to act in co-operation with the Aluminum Company. There has also been an announcement that the Canadian Liquid Air Company will establish a plant at Kitimat where they will produce some of the products required by the Aluminum Company. We hope these are only the forerunners of many other industries that will come to the Kitimat district because of the immense production of power.

The official opposition agree that the bill should be sent to a committee. We suggest the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines where it will be possible to hear evidence from the officials of Canadian National Railways and possibly also from the Aluminum Company of Canada

Limited. The committee of course will have charge of the conduct of its own meetings, but we hope it will be possible to get the full story of the branch line and the developments that are to take place in the Kitimat area.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as the representative in this house of the area where the whole Alcan development project, including the proposed railway line, is located, it would be impossible for me to let this resolution pass without saying a few words on it. Naturally the first words I say in this connection, on my own behalf and on behalf of the people of the Skeena district whom I represent here, should express our appreciation to the management of the Canadian National Railways, to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and to the government for the prompt action they are taking to assure adequate transportation facilities in that area at the earliest possible moment, and as soon as they will be needed by the large development which is taking place.

In that connection I would like to invite the Minister of Transport—and again I am sure I am speaking on behalf of those I represent—to come out to that area and be there when this railway is started. I would suggest also that he return to be there when the line is officially opened. In both cases I am sure his presence would be welcome; and if he wished to make it even more enjoyable for us he might bring along his parliamentary assistant as well.

I do not want to let this occasion pass without expressing one other word of approval and commendation which I feel is due. I would like in this house to express the very great debt of gratitude owed not only by the people of Skeena, not only by the people of British Columbia but by the whole of Canada to Hon. E. T. Kenney, minister of lands and forests of British Columbia, for his many years of effort which have culminated in the introduction of a bill to build a railway from Terrace to Kitimat. This railway line is just a symbol of the tremendous development going on in that area at the present time, a development so great I noticed it was mentioned in the British House of Commons no later than the 21st of last month.

I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who have been guilty—if "guilty" is the word—from time to time of asking for subsidies and artificial aids to be contributed by governments toward the promotion of some industrial developments. This particular development is based on nothing of that sort. It is a sound business proposition following sound business lines, because the resources of power are there. It will be able to carry itself, and in so doing it will be part of the development of a very large, practically new area of this dominion. It is such a large development that its beneficial effects will be felt far and wide. Our suburbs as far south as and including Vancouver will gain some benefits from this development. It is a fact that in such areas as Vancouver—and Vancouver is not alone; this is also true in cities like Toronto, Montreal and other large places—you always find people expressing surprise that there should be a major development somewhere else. I do not think there is any call for any Canadian city to express surprise that major development is taking place in what they very often picturesquely call the hinterland, because it was on the hinterland that all these cities were built.

Turning to the line itself, I understand from the minister it is expected that this railway will be completed in the fall of 1954. It is expected by the Aluminum Company of Canada that their smelter will be in the initial stages of production at the same time. I mention that fact for a reason. I have heard the criticism, not in this house or in these buildings but in other parts of the country, that this line was being built in order to enable the company to take in materials for the construction of their smelter and townsite, and that from then on the line would be a dead issue. I point out that the line will not be completed until at least the first stage of smelter construction has been completed. Therefore the purpose of the line obviously is to serve an operating smelter, not to make it possible to build one.

The development of which this is only a part has its lessons which we have to learn. It has a very definite lesson, I respectfully submit, for the government of the Dominion of Canada. They are not only going to have to provide that area with a railway line, through the agency of the Canadian National Railways; it is going to be absolutely essential that the other services provided by the dominion government be brought up to the same standard of development which the Canadian National is now proposing to introduce. Increased population of course will result from this area of industrial development; but I might mention that a great increase has already taken place in the population of that area. Little communities which 18 months ago could number their population by the dozen, or in some cases by the hundred, are now numbering their population by the hundreds and thousands. When I first saw the town of Terrace some 13 years ago it would have had a hard time to count a total population of 700. Today its population undoubtedly will be over 3,000 and in another 18 months over 5,000. Terrace is just one example. The population which is moving into that area will have to be given all those services for which this government and this parliament assume responsibility.

I think it would be only fair to say that this part of British Columbia is going through a period of expansion which will last about five years. During that period it will make the same gain in population and industrial activity that the extreme southeastern part of British Columbia made in forty years. The development based on the Kimberley mine and the Trail smelter, so well known to the members for Kootenay East and Kootenay West, is roughly the same size and importance as this development will be. I know that country. It took it from 1913 to the present time to build up to the extent it has. We are going to go through the same development in a period of five years, and we are certainly going to suffer some growing pains in doing so.

This line will run from Terrace to Kitimat. At Terrace we have a municipality which will shortly be a flourishing city. Eighteen months ago the population of Kitimat was 42, including Indians. Within the foreseeable future, say within three to five years, we will have a city comparable to Arvida. The development which will take place at Kitimat is primarily, as we all know, in connection with an aluminum smelter. But this railway line we are now asking the Canadian National Railways to build is not a one industry affair. It is not being built to serve only one company. According to its own figures the company proposes to eventually develop over 1,500,000 horsepower. It proposes to develop immediately 450,000 horsepower, and to use immediately 300,000 horsepower. So 150,000 horsepower of electrical energy will be immediately available. As their electrical production increases it is to be expected that further surplus electricity will be available for sale to other industries. We know of several who are now planning to go in there. So I would not like the impression to get out that this railway is being built solely for one company.

There are those in the country—I am not referring to anyone in this house—who take every possible opportunity to criticize anything in the nature of improvement or expansion of Canadian industry. They will raise the claim that Canada is building a railway for one private company, but that is not the case. I have no intention of talking out a measure in which I have such an interest.

I shall close by saying this. It would be surprising if the member who represented the district in which such a tremendous development was taking place did not take a tremendous pride in what is going on in his own constituency. I should like to say further that I take great pride in the knowledge that this tremendous development, which will be of such great value to Canada, was engendered and brought to fulfilment in an industrial and economic climate fostered by a Liberal government.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): So that this resolution will pass, I will not keep the house beyond eleven o'clock. I should like to add my voice, however, as another member from British Columbia, to most of what has been said by the member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite). I should like particularly to express the pleasure which all of us from that province feel in the development which is now taking place in an area which suffers so much from climatic and other conditions. These disadvantages are now, to a large extent, going to be compensated by this tremendous industrial development, and thus people will overcome their otherwise natural disinclination to visit that area.

In a serious vein, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of pleasure, particularly to any member from any part of British Columbia, to see the development which is going on in that province, and which has been fostered and is taking place in an atmosphere which is probably unique in the history of this country. One has only to recall the fact that our province has increased in population by fifty per cent or more in the last ten years to realize what is going on out there. It is true that as yet we do not match the pace of the industrial development of Ontario, although in proportion we come very close to it. I think it is correct to say that we match, proportionately, the pace of the development in Quebec.

A list of the projects which are now on the map for British Columbia, starting if you like at the project of Alcan; the project of Kitimat; followed by the prospect of increased and expanded oil refinery capacity; followed by prospects of a tremendous increase in all sorts of natural energy which will flow from the introduction into British Columbia of natural gas from the Peace river district from both Alberta and our own province; accompanied at the same time by tremendous developments in the pulp and paper industry, which both accompany and are assisted by the possibilities of the chemical industry which flow also from the introduction of natural gas; all those things, Mr. Speaker, indicate that if the twentieth century belongs to Canada, certainly the second half of the twentieth century belongs to British Columbia. There was one thing particularly which the member for Skeena said which impressed me, and which I think will be obvious to all members. It was that these tremendous industrial developments, accompanied as they are by an increase in population, make increased demands upon the services provided by government as well as those provided by private industry.

I regret to say that there are not many minutes left in which to lay before the house some of the ideas with which I wanted to deal in that connection.

Mr. Chevrier: On the bill.

Mr. Fulton: As the minister points out, some of them may be said on the bill, although remarks are more closely confined when we are discussing a bill. The salient thought which to my mind emerges from the discussion of a project of this type is that, in view of the tremendous commitments which this country has undertaken with respect to social security programs and the current defence effort, we must not lose sight of the fact that in allocating public moneys to various types of expenditures none is more important than those types which will produce a return, and which will contribute to the development of our resources as well as to the industrial and economic development of this country. I believe that unless we concentrate to an even greater degree than we have in the past on that type of activity which will develop real wealth for Canada, we may some day find ourselves in difficulty and in danger of not being able to meet the other sort of non-productive commitment.

I am pleased, therefore, at this time to add my support, as I am sure other members in British Columbia do and probably other members from all parts of Canada do—the turn of the maritimes will come eventually—

Mr. Nowlan: If it had not been for the maritimes, there would be no British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: At this late stage, I am not going to be drawn into a controversy of that sort. We are in full support of the project which the minister has laid before us tonight.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, it is now eleven o'clock. I had intended to say a few words on the resolution, but because of the lateness of the hour I shall reserve that for second reading of the bill.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I think we had better rise and report progress.

Mr. Chevrier: May I suggest to the hon. member that he has asked two questions with which I could deal when the bill is before the house. The bill is ready and can be distributed early in the morning. If that happens, it might go to the committee some time this week. I hope to get the resolution through, because it is certainly unanimous if one can judge from the discussion that has taken place.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 192, respecting the contruction of a line of railway by Canadian National Railway Company from Terrace to Kitimat, in the province of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, there are two government notices of motion on the order paper, one in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the other in the name of the Minister of Justice. I was told by the Minister of Justice and the assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that it was agreed those motions would be referred to the standing committee on external affairs without debate, and that the debates would take place after they are reported from the committee. If that is the understanding with the representatives of the opposition parties, the motions for reference will be moved. If not we will proceed with Bill No. 191, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, Bill No. 192, respecting the construction of a line of railway by the Canadian National Railway Company from Terrace to Kitimat, in the province of British Columbia; then the two resolutions in the name of the Minister of Transport, one respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners and the other to amend the Aeronautics Act; also Bill No. 9, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways. If we have time left we will take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour, which is No. 6 on today's order paper.

Mr. Green: We have not yet had the Kitimat railway bill. We will have the bill?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It will be distributed the first thing in the morning.

Mr. Green: We cannot consider it tomorrow unless it is distributed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told the bill will be distributed the first thing in the morning. We attended to that this afternoon, and I am told you will have it in the morning.

Mr. Green: I would make that reservation. We must have a reasonable opportunity to study the bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes.

Mr. Green: This resolution has been sitting on the order paper for some weeks, and there is no cause for rushing it through without our having an opportunity to study the bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes; it is understood that you will have an opportunity to study and discuss it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is a reasonable opportunity?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It will not lie on the order paper a long time if the debate is not too long.

Mr. Graydon: Is it the government's intention to move to go into supply any time this week?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No; the only day we could move to go into supply would be tomorrow, and we are taking up this legislation. On Thursday and Friday we will proceed with the budget resolutions.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 7, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

SUMMARY FOR PERIOD APRIL 1 TO APRIL 30, 1952

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to lay on the table a summary of orders in council passed during the period April 1 to April 30, 1952. The last such summary for the period March 1 to March 31 was tabled on April 7.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I had a question on the order paper, which was answered during my absence by the Prime Minister, in regard to whether or not there were any orders in council concerning which there is no statutory provision that they must be published or tabled. Have there been any in that category, in addition to those the Prime Minister has tabled from time to time?

Mr. St. Laurent: There are orders in council awarding contracts, and they are not published. They are administrative acts. After tenders have been called the tenders come before a committee of council, and an order in council is made awarding the contract to the lowest tenderer. But there is no distinction between orders in council concerning trade and commerce and those concerning defence production, and orders in council that come from other departments.

KOREA

RESULTS OF NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN UNITED NATIONS AND COMMUNIST REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to make a short statement on armistice negotiations in Korea. Members of the house will have seen that the communist negotiators at Panmunjom have turned down the proposal of General Ridgway, the United Nations commander in Korea, to solve the outstanding points of dispute in the Korean armistice negotiations. The proposal was, first, to exchange approximately 70,000 Korean and Chinese prisoners for the 12,000 Korean and United Nations personnel whom the communists state they are now holding as prisoners; secondly, to accept communist nominations of Poland and Czechoslovakia for membership on the neutral nations supervisory commission in exchange for communist acceptance of the United Nations nominations of Sweden and Switzerland, and thirdly, to omit from the provisions of the armistice any reference to the reconstruction and rehabilitation of airfields. This offer was put forward as representing the utmost limits to which the United Nations command could go in making concessions and was intended to be considered as a whole rather than to be the subject of piecemeal bargaining.

Careful and individual examination of the approximately 132,000 prisoners held by the United Nations command has revealed that about 70,000 would accept repatriation. Sixty-two thousand have indicated that they would forcibly resist any United Nations effort to repatriate them.

I am sure hon. members will agree with me when I say that in the circumstances it is unthinkable that the United Nations forces in Korea should undertake the invidious task of forcing these men to return to communist rule. The United Nations command can obviously make no concession on this point other than to allow the communists to have the 62,000 men interviewed either by a neutral body or by joint Red Cross teams from both sides in order to satisfy themselves that these individuals have made their decisions of their own free will and not under compulsion. This the United Nations command has offered to allow, and in doing so has given a convincing demonstration of its good faith in the matter.

In nominating Sweden and Switzerland and accepting the communist nominations of Poland and Czechoslovakia for the neutral nations supervisory commission, the United Nations command has been scrupulously fair to the communists. What the United Nations command would not do was to accept the communist nomination of the Soviet union itself to a body which is described as the neutral nations supervisory commission.

The United Nations command has also agreed that the armistice provisions will not make any reference to the reconstruction or rehabilitation of airfields but this was done only after considerable heart-searching. I think so important a concession is another proof-positive of the genuineness of the desire for an armistice on the United Nations side.

I am sure that all members of this house will regret profoundly the communist refusal of this offer that could have brought an end to the fighting in Korea on terms that would have been fair and would not have betrayed the principles of the United Nations charter which governed the original intervention. We must hope that the communists may even now reconsider their refusal. We must also hope that, notwithstanding this refusal, there will be no need for a resumption of full-scale hostilities. If such resumption should take place, with all its unforeseen consequences, the communists would have to accept full responsibility.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister two questions arising out of this statement? First, does it mean that the present negotiations are definitely broken off for the time being? Second, out of the 62,000 prisoners who have indicated that they do not want to go back behind the iron curtain, how many are Chinese and how many are North Koreans?

Mr. Pearson: In answer to the first question of my hon. friend, as I understand it no action has been taken on the United Nations part to break off negotiations notwithstanding the refusal of the communists to accept this offer. I am sure we all hope that no such action will be taken or will be required.

In answer to the second question, I have not the figures at my command at the moment but I believe—this is subject to correction—that the great majority of the 62,000 are North Koreans.

Mr. Graydon: That would seem to indicate that the iron curtain countries are not the paradise that some people here and elsewhere would have us believe.

Mr. Pearson: It is rather convincing evidence.

QUESTIONS

FUEL OIL AND GASOLINE PRICES, BRANDON, WINNIPEG AND REGINA

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What is the price of fuel oil and gasoline in Brandon, Winnipeg and Regina?
2. Is there any discrepancy in price of these products as between these cities?
3. If so, for what reason?

Mr. Howe:

1. Retail prices per gallon, April 1, 1952:

	Gasoline		Fuel oil
	Grade 1	Grade 2
Winnipeg	.407	.384	.171
Regina	.393	.376	.151
Brandon	(1)	(1)	(1)

(1) Not available.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. As far as is known, price differences between cities are normal market differences.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—PROFESSIONAL GROUPS

Mr. Murray (Oxford):

1. How many registered pharmacists in the province of Ontario have received benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, during the years (a) 1949; (b) 1950; (c) 1951?
2. How much money was paid out in benefits to registered pharmacists in the province of Ontario during the years 1949, 1950, 1951?
3. What professional groups other than registered pharmacists pay into unemployment insurance in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. The unemployment insurance commission does not make an analysis of the occupational characteristics of applicants for unemployment insurance benefits.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. All members of professional groups employed under a contract of service, excepting (a) those in receipt of more than $4,800 a year; (b) private duty nurses; (c) teachers; (d) those employed by hospitals (not operated for gain) or by charitable organizations, or in agriculture, horticulture, forestry, fishing, and hunting and trapping; (e) those employed by municipal and federal governments and certified by those governments as permanent employees; (f) those employed by the provincial government of Ontario whom the province has not insured (provincial concurrence is required); (g) members of the armed forces, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or any other police force.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON MANPOWER

Mr. Thatcher:

1. How many times has the national advisory council on manpower met since its inception?
2. What has been the total cost of the council to date?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. The national advisory council on manpower has met four times since its inception.

2. $5,687.72.

GIFTS OF FLOUR TO GREECE

Mr. Riley:

1. Has the Canadian government, either alone or jointly with the Canadian Red Cross Society, made any recent gifts of flour to the people of Greece?
2. If so, was such a gift shipment of flour sent to Greece aboard a ship called Ocean Navigator, on or about the eighth day of April, 1952?
3. Was it shipped through the port of Portland in the state of Maine?

Mr. Lesage:

1. Yes. The government made a gift of 500,000 bushels of wheat to the Canadian Red Cross Society as a contribution to famine relief in Greece. The Canadian Red Cross Society arranged for the milling of the wheat in Canada and the transportation of the flour to an ocean port. The Greek war relief fund of Canada arranged through the Greek War Relief Association Inc., U.S.A., to have carriage charges from a United States port to Greek ports defrayed by the government of the United States under the Mutual Security Act.

2. 203,250 bags of the gift flour were carried aboard the Ocean Navigator which sailed on April 11, 1952. The remainder of the shipment, 3,059 bags, were loaded on the Lindenwood Victory which is reported to have sailed on April 19.

3. The Ocean Navigator sailed from Portland, Maine and the Lindenwood Victory from the port of New York.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WHEAT—CROP YEAR 1950-51

Mr. Fair:

1. During the crop year 1950-51, what quantity of the following grades of wheat were purchased by each elevator company: No. 1 Northern, No. 2 Northern, No. 3 Northern, No. 4 Northern, No. 5, No. 6 feed; No. 1 Northern tough, No. 2 Northern tough, No. 3 Northern tough, No. 4 Northern tough, No. 5 tough, No. 6 tough, feed tough; No. 1 Northern damp, No. 2 Northern damp, No. 3 Northern damp, No. 4 Northern damp, No. 5 damp, No. 6 damp, feed damp?

2. What quantity of each of the above grades was in possession of each company concerned at August 1, 1950?

3. What quantity of each of the above grades was sold and delivered by each company, during the crop year 1950-51?

4. What quantity of each grade remained in the elevators or in possession of each company at the 31st July, 1951?

Mr. Howe: Return tabled.

CAMPBELLTON, N.B.-CROSS POINT, QUE., FERRY

Mr. Dube:

1. Was a contract awarded for the operation of a ferry between Campbellton, New Brunswick and Cross Point, Quebec?

2. If so (a) on what date; (b) to whom; (c) how many tenders were received and from whom; (d) what were the specifications of the ferry boat; (e) what is type of construction; (f) what are the rates and schedule; (g) what is the amount of subsidy; (h) on whose recommendation was the contract awarded?

3. Is wharf construction or dredging necessary with the type of ferry specified in contract?

4. If so, what is the estimated cost in this connection?

5. Was a recommendation made to the cabinet regarding the awarding of this contract? If so, by whom?

6. At what date does contract call for ferry to be in operation?

LEGAL SERVICES—MANITOBA LAWYERS

Mr. Bryce:

1. What moneys have Manitoba lawyers received from the dominion government for legal fees, expenses, etc., during the years 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950 and 1951?

2. What are the names of the lawyers and the amounts received?

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL BOARD EMPLOYEES

Mr. Thatcher:

1. How many employees were working for the foreign exchange control board as at June 30, 1951?

2. On what date was the board discontinued?

3. How many employees were dismissed when the board discontinued operations?

4. How many were absorbed into other departments, and of these, what are their names, salaries, and present occupations?

GOVERNMENT PURCHASES OF OVERALLS

Mr Fraser:

1. How many pairs of overalls were bought by the different departments of the government or agencies of the government during the years (a) 1950; (b) 1951; (c) the first four months of 1952?

2. From what firms or individuals were these overalls bought?

3. What quantity was bought from each firm or individual?

4. What was the cost of overalls purchased from each firm or individual?

RADIO STATION CJNT

Mr. Viau:

1. Is there a radio station CJNT in the city of Quebec?

2. If so, is it privately owned or affiliated with the C.B.C.?

3. What are the names of its directors?

4. If affiliated with the C.B.C., under what class?

5. Was it added to any network of the C.B.C. for commercial programs in 1950 and 1951 upon request of any sponsor?

6. If so, how much did it receive from the C.B.C. in 1950 and 1951 for commercial network service on the basis of a network card rate?

7. What other revenue did it receive from the C.B.C. in 1950 and 1951?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MOUNTED POLICE—DISMISSAL OF F. D. MILLER

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all the evidence taken on an investigation on alleged misconduct of F. D. Miller of Edmonton, Alberta, formerly of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and a copy of all correspondence since the 1st of September, 1950, to date, that passed between the department and the said Miller and counsel on his behalf, asking for rehearing and readjudication.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, there is a precedent for the refusal to produce evidence such as that covered by the motion of my hon. friend. This is reported on page 1669, volume II, of Hansard of the session 1939.

There is no precedent for the production of such evidence. It is not in the public interest to establish such a precedent by tabling a copy of the evidence as requested by the hon. member.

The right of the commissioner, acting under the authority given to him by the act and under the general supervision of the minister, to engage and discharge personnel at his discretion has over the years proved to be one of the principal factors in maintaining a high level of discipline and efficiency within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Any suggestion that that authority may be questioned would weaken the whole fabric of discipline and control. Likewise, to set a precedent which would allow the examination in a public way of the proceedings of the trial of disciplinary offences would be detrimental to the best interests of the force and the general membership of the force.

Most members of the force are frequent witnesses in criminal cases, as well as being required to make arrests and to exercise such other authority as is given to them by law. To publish infractions of discipline, most of which are of a technical or service nature, would affect adversely the position of the member as a peace officer and leave him open to innuendos and attacks which are out of all proportion to the offence for which he may have at one time been found guilty and punished.

The strict, even severe, standards of discipline insisted upon by the force are well known and are accepted by recruits when they are engaged as well as by older members each time they re-engage. The reputation the force enjoys and is striving successfully to maintain in the face of recent substantial expansion is based very largely on adherence to these standards.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I add a word to what the minister has said? Certainly no one would want to prejudice the discipline of the force; on the other hand, as I see it, precedent must give way to the possibility of injustice. Above everything else, in the preservation of the liberty of the subject it should never be possible for officers to place themselves in a position where injustice may be done to an individual.

Your Honour is aware of the famous English case of Archer-Shee. In that instance the navy department took a similar stand, and it was many years before Sir Edward Carson was able to secure justice for that man. In order to secure justice this man is prepared to allow the record to be produced regardless of any innuendo that it may contain, and if the minister will not alter his stand and allow the matter to be reconsidered, I must ask for a vote of the house. If a department of the government can deny a review by parliament to an individual who says that there has been gross injustice, then a serious situation is indicated.

Mr. Garson: Before any vote is taken I should like to cover one of the points raised by my hon. friend. He rather left the implication that if these documents were not produced an injustice would be done to the gentleman named in his motion. I might say for the information of the house that in this particular case there was a charge preferred against the member of the force under the act and he was convicted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before a member of the force.

Mr. Garson: Yes. The act provides that, where a member of the force has been guilty of misconduct as a member of the force, a superior officer has the authority to try any charge of that kind. In this case the charge was tried and the member involved was convicted. He appealed to the commissioner of the force, and his appeal was disallowed, but the penalty was reduced. Exercising his discretion the commissioner then dismissed the member from the force, following which representations were made to the minister for reinstatement. The record was examined by the minister—myself—in the exercise of his general supervisory powers with respect to the management of the force. The minister supported the commissioner's decision, and communicated that fact to counsel for the member who had been dismissed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Dyde of Edmonton.

Mr. Garson: That is right, Mr. Dyde of the Milner, Steer firm of Edmonton.

Mr. Coldwell: Since a vote is to be taken on this motion, may I say a word? You have allowed a discussion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member's remarks will be brief, because the motion is not debatable.

Mr. Coldwell: I shall only be a minute. I believe we are getting to the point in the House of Commons where the liberty of the subject is endangered because of these secret reports and documents. I am going to support the hon. member for Lake Centre because of my feeling that information the house should have to protect the liberty of the subject is being denied in this particular instance and has been at other times.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was negatived on the following division:

HALIFAX, N.S., CUSTOMS BUILDING—REFACING

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and correspondence since the first day of July, 1951, together with any reports or contractors' recommendations, in connection with the refacing of the customs building at Halifax, Nova Scotia.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): So there will be no misunderstanding between the hon. member and myself I wish to state that I have no objection to producing the documents on this file, with the following reservation: if there are any privileged or confidential letters, reports or recommendations, they will not be produced. That may avoid further discussion.

Mr. Speaker: Carried.

GENOCIDE

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION SIGNED BY CANADA ON NOVEMBER 28, 1949—REFERENCE TO EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament approve the ratification by Canada of the convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide as signed by Canada on November 28, 1949, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would move, with the consent of the house, that this resolution be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house unanimously approve of this resolution being referred to the standing committee on external affairs?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXTRADITION

SUPPLEMENTARY CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA—REFERENCE TO EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the supplementary extradition convention between the United States of America and Canada, signed at Ottawa on October 26, 1951, amending the supplementary extradition convention between the United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, signed at Washington on December 13, 1900, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: I beg leave, with the consent of the house, to move that this resolution be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that this resolution be referred to the standing committee on external affairs? It must be agreed unanimously.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO LOSSES AT GORDON HEAD CAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, of which I have given notice. In view of newspaper reports indicating the disappearance of public property from Gordon Head army camp, near Victoria, British Columbia, will the minister inform the house what steps, if any, have been taken to investigate this situation and apprehend the guilty parties?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this morning I received a report that a regular inspection of the ordnance stores at Gordon Head disclosed a shortage of something under $5,000 in extent over the period from January, 1951, to March, 1952. Because of the nature of the articles short, the matter was referred to the R.C.M.P. and city police by the local officers in order to ascertain if any offence had been committed. There is no evidence as yet that any offence has been committed, but the matter is being looked into.

KOREA

FURLOUGH FACILITIES FOR CANADIAN TROOPS IN TOKYO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? My reasons for asking it are set out in the notice which I sent to him. Has any representation been made to the minister by service personnel or welfare organizations with regard to providing better furlough facilities for Canadian troops on leave in Tokyo?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): As the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said, he was kind enough to send me notice of his question. Until today the only representation made in this connection was that made by Bill Boss, Canadian Press correspondent. When the party that accompanied me to Korea was in Tokyo, we visited and looked into the leave centre at Ebisu. I then asked Brigadier Connelly, head of our military mission there, to see what could be done to improve the facilities. Some work along this line was then being done by the Australian organization in charge of the centre. On my return I made arrangements with the Red Cross to send a number of Red Cross workers there. To establish them in the far east, Dr. Stanbury, commissioner of the Red Cross, was good enough to go to Japan. I asked him to look into the situation. He did so and this was the subject of a speech yesterday.

Dr. Stanbury told me he was going to send a report to me, but has not done so as yet. I have had a talk with him, however, and it confirms my own views. This situation is not by any manner of means ideal, but in the view of the military officers, however, it is about as good as we had before, and the chief of the general staff, when he went out a couple of weeks after me, felt that the situation did not justify our separating ourselves from the commonwealth division in Tokyo and creating special facilities for Canadians, thus making the difference between our conditions of service and those of Great Britain and Australia even greater.

Just today I received from the adjutant general a recommendation that we should establish a recreation centre in the centre of Tokyo. This follows a report made to him on May 1, by Brigadier Connelly, which was in the hands of the adjutant general's branch on May 3. It has since been studied, and it is recommended that we should establish a recreation centre in Tokyo, and a suitable building has been found for this purpose. I shall be making the appropriate recommendation to my colleagues.

IMMIGRATION

PROCEEDINGS IN DEPORTATION OF U.S. CITIZEN WALTER HARRIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration with regard to a United States citizen, Walter Harris. Has there been any investigation into the allegedly long imprisonment that he suffered? Has there been any suggestion of incompetence on the part of any officials of the department? Why was the department so long in setting up a board of inquiry? These are some of the questions I should like the minister to answer, having regard to the statement that has recently been made.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The hon. member was kind enough to telephone me a few minutes before three saying that he was going to ask these questions. In answer to the first question, there has been an investigation made by myself as to the procedure that was adopted on this occasion. In answer to the second question, there has been no incompetence shown that I have been able to ascertain. In answer to the third question, concerning the length of time this gentleman was incarcerated, I might point out that the Immigration Act requires certain procedure to be adopted to deport an alien who is in jail in Canada. This procedure was followed precisely throughout the whole of the proceedings.

In answer to the final question, whether there had been an unduly long period in convoking the board of inquiry, I should say there was not, for this reason. We were notified on March 12 that this gentleman was in jail. A search of our records was made on March 13, and it was ascertained that he had not been landed. An order was made on the 14th for the holding of a board of inquiry. This order was dispatched by mail on Friday the 14th from Ottawa, was received in Hamilton on Monday morning the 17th, and the board of inquiry was convoked on the 18th.

DOMINION DRAMA FESTIVAL

QUESTION AS TO AWARDS—BESSBOROUGH TROPHY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Is the government considering any action to prevent the substitution of a distillers' trophy for the Bessborough trophy as the top award in the dominion drama festival inaugurated in 1933 by the Earl of Bessborough, a former governor general of Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman sent me notice of his intention to ask this question, and the answer is as follows:

The question of awards and financial administration for the dominion drama festival is of course a matter which comes under the full control of the authorities of the festival.

In the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences there were recommendations dealing with cultural activities such as those of the dominion drama festival, the implementation of which will require legislative action. This special matter is related to a good many other similar activities, and it is not possible to deal with them all at once. The government is continuing to give consideration to the recommendations of the report of the Massey commission, and, when decisions as to the appropriate action to be recommended to parliament are made, they will be announced in the usual way.

CHEESE INDUSTRY

QUESTION AS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVERT CRISIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Will the Minister of Agriculture tell the house what provision the government has made or is about to make to avert the pending crisis in the Cheddar cheese industry?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): This morning I discussed the whole question with Hon. Thomas Kennedy in Toronto.

CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS

INCREASES IN BENEFITS TO OTHER THAN MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 191, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

Canadian National Railways

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM TERRACE TO KITIMAT, B.C.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 192, an act respecting the construction of a line of railway by Canadian National Railway Company from Terrace to Kitimat, in the province of British Columbia.

He said: Yesterday during the resolution stage of this measure I dealt with a number of questions, but I think the house will expect me to say something on the bill which is now before the house.

As I indicated on the resolution, the bill has to do first with the authority to construct the line; next, with the authority to issue securities and also to make temporary loans. By this bill the governor in council is authorized to provide for the construction and completion by the Canadian National Railways before November 1, 1954, of a line of railway approximately 46 miles in length from Terrace to Kitimat in the province of British Columbia. The cost of the line is estimated at $10 million which will be financed by the government.

The financial provisions of the bill authorize the railway company to issue securities not exceeding $10 million which may be guaranteed by the government. Provision is also made for temporary loans not exceeding $10 million to be made by the Minister of Finance to the railway company to enable the construction to proceed without the delay attending the borrowing of the necessary funds from other sources.

Clause 8 of the bill authorizes, and in fact requires, the Minister of Transport to make a report to parliament annually in the same manner as reports are made under the other legislation concerning branch lines passed previously by parliament.

The Canadian National Railway Company has entered into an agreement with the Aluminum Company of Canada under which the Canadian National Railway agrees, subject to the provisions of enabling legislation, to complete the railway, and the Aluminum company is to provide traffic amounting to $1 million a year for a period of ten years or, in the alternative, make payments to the railway company of one-third of any deficiency below the $1 million. If the Aluminum company is required to make any payments to the railway company, refunds will be made to the Aluminum company on the basis of one-third of any excess of gross revenue earned by the railway company over the $1 million in any year. This refunding provision may be extended for a further period of ten years, but in any case the amount refunded by the railway company to the Aluminum company shall not exceed the total payments made by the Aluminum company to the railway.

The Aluminum company has also agreed to make available a substantial amount of electric power to other industries locating in that region.

I should like to mention that in addition to the rail traffic to be secured in connection with the Aluminum company project, Kitimat valley has about 2¼ billion feet of accessible timber estimated to be capable of yielding 22,500 tons of rail traffic annually with gross earnings in the second five years of operation of the line of over $342,000 per year. There is also an expected fisheries development in the processing of chilled and frozen fish which would yield about 650 tons of freight per year, or an annual revenue of about $32,000.

The estimates of rail traffic indicate that average annual gross revenue for the first five years will amount to $1,854,800, and average annual operating expenses will be $1,503,700, resulting in average annual net operating revenue of $351,100. Interest on cost of construction is estimated at $350,000, leaving a net revenue for the first five years of $1,100.

Mr. Green: Is that per year, or for the five-year period?

Mr. Chevrier: That is for the five-year period. This is computed on a basis of five years at $1,100.

For the second five-year period, average annual gross revenue is estimated at $2,828,200 and operating expenses at $2,155,000, resulting in average annual net operating revenue of $673,200. After deduction of $350,000 for interest the net annual revenue for the second five-year period of operation is estimated at $323,200.

Owing to the difficult terrain over which the line must be constructed, the cost of construction will be heavy, but the building of the line is so plainly in the national interest that this bill should commend itself to all members of this house.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, last night and this afternoon I listened with interest to the minister in his explanation of the purposes of this bill, and I also listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) who, I am sure, is pleased to see this additional development in his constituency.

We in this group support this bill, first of all because we recognize that it is the result of increased development and production in British Columbia. We are pleased to see this further extension of the Canadian National Railway system. We hope that this production and development in British Columbia and in Canada will make it easier still for this government to provide improved social welfare services to the people of Canada.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to say something on the resolution stage yesterday, but it was impossible for me to get into the discussion. I have only just a minute or two before I have to attend a meeting of the external affairs committee but I think I should indicate the position which my group takes toward this bill.

We think that it is a fortunate thing for any part of Canada to see the development that is taking place in the area of Kitimat in the constituency of my friend the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite). We are glad to see that development. It augurs well for the future of Canada; it will doubtless make for a stronger and better Canada.

When a railway is to be built from Terrace to Kitimat, we think it is only natural that we should look to the Canadian National Railways to build it. I think that is a proper procedure. I just want the minister to know that we support the bill and approve the help which the government is giving by way of assistance in financing, making advances on loan, and so forth.

There is one thing I do not intend to say much about; when I think of the building of this line of railway by the Canadian National Railways it makes me think that some consideration ought to be given to the extension of the Canadian National from the Peace river country to the coast, to link up perhaps with this very road. Were that done I am quite sure that we would see much greater development than is possible by the construction of these piecemeal lines.

I just wanted the minister to know that we are happy to see this line being built, in view of the development that will result from it in the Kitimat area.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the bill as presented to the house is in practically the same terms as the bill which was passed last year to authorize the construction of a railway from Sherridon to Lynn Lake in the province of Manitoba. I notice that there are one or two differences, but they are not of great importance. I presume that this is a standard type of bill authorizing the construction of a branch line.

I was pleased to hear the minister say today that the Aluminum company have undertaken some obligation in connection with this construction. He did not make that fact so clear last night, but it appears from his remarks today that they are undertaking some financial obligation, as was done by Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited in the case of the Lynn Lake line.

However in the course of his remarks today the minister did not deal with my query of last night as to why the Department of Defence Production are not assisting in this construction, as they did in connection with the Lynn Lake line. The figures given today for the cost of operating the line do not indicate that there is likely to be very much profit. Some pretty close budgeting has been done—some pretty close figuring—on a scheme of this kind, which has not yet commenced. The minister has announced that during the first five years after the railway is built there will be a profit of $1,100 for the five-year period. I hope he is right. But it probably will not be any more, or he would have said so. Then, even for the second five years the net operating revenue is estimated at only $323,000.

I submit those figures show that the Canadian National Railways should have assistance from the Department of Defence Production in this construction. If a certain amount of assistance were given it would be possible for the railway to operate at a profit. Surely this great production of aluminum is of value in our defence preparations. That other department paid last year almost $5 million, or nearly one-third of the total cost of the construction of the Lynn Lake line.

In addition, I notice from the annual report of the Department of Defence Production, which we received today, that they are helping with other developments, none of which is more important than this Alcan development. For example we find at page 32 of the report, under the non-ferrous metals division—and I presume this would be the division under which aluminum would come —the following paragraph:

> The division also kept informed of, and assisted industry in, the development of Canada's natural resources, in so far as non-ferrous metals, iron ore, and some non-metallic minerals, such as asbestos and quartz crystals, are concerned. In addition to arranging for priority assistance in this field, the division took an active part in several projects undertaken with a view to increasing production of certain strategic materials.

Aluminum, of course, is a strategic material. The report continues:

> Among these was the reactivation of the Emerald tungsten mine in British Columbia ensuring adequate supplies to meet Canada's defence needs. To stimulate the production of cobalt, an incentive buying price schedule for northern Ontario ores was instituted by the government early in 1951 and guaranteed for three years.

In fairness to the Canadian National Railways I do hope that consideration will be given to having the Department of Defence Production pay some of the cost of the construction of this line.

Incidentally, the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) is also very interesting; and it would be helpful if the minister could tell the house what thought has been given to extending the railway in the Peace river area down to Prince George in British Columbia. This would complete the picture of railway transportation in that part of British Columbia. This development has been much too long delayed, and I hope there are some plans in contemplation for this other construction.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I heartily agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) who has suggested that assistance should be given by the Department of Defence Production.

This discussion brings to mind an historic moment in the history of Canada. In 1874 discussions took place in the House of Commons as to the final plan or route for the Canadian Pacific Railway. After everybody had had his say, Sir John A. Macdonald, the great leader of the party so well represented by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, rose in his place to speak. At that time Sir John was in opposition. His speech, as mine will be on this occasion, was brief: I have at least that in common with the great first prime minister of Canada.

After consultation with certain people he said, "There is no doubt that the road should go along the line discovered by Alexander Mackenzie, and that it should pass down through the Peace river area, through the Nechako country, and so on." He put his finger on the map, where Fort George was located, and said, "That is the centre; that is where the rivers meet; that is where the trails cross. That some day will be a great city."

Fort George is today Prince George; and of course it is an outstanding centre in the Cariboo electoral district which I have the honour to represent. I mention it in this connection because the Cariboo country is the hinterland to Prince Rupert, Kitimat, Vancouver and the other great coastal ports on the Pacific.

I am supporting this measure because it brings to fruition the dream that, no doubt, that great pioneer statesman had of the development of the interior of British Columbia. I refer not so much to the development that has taken place along the 49th parallel in the southwest corner of British Columbia, but rather to the heart of the country where most of the wealth is located, where we see the great plains and the great timber areas, where we find the waterpower and the minerals.

That is where we should have a metropolis, the place where Sir John placed his finger, at the confluence of the Nechako and the Fraser, the site of the present city of Prince George.

The building of this industry at Kitimat is probably the greatest event in northern British Columbia since the building of the first railway. I commend the minister upon his having appreciated quickly the need for rail extensions there, and the building of this Kitimat cut-off. I would hope that later he might see his way clear to have the Canadian National Railways build a branch into the Peace river country. I know that Premier Johnson of British Columbia has that in mind. The people of British Columbia are united in their desire to see a railway in the Peace river country, the great agricultural area in which few people live, but a place where all kinds of grains and fodder can be grown. Indeed, that area can produce most of the products grown here in Ontario, with the possible exception of tree fruits.

That area remains to be tapped by rail. If a town is built at Kitimat, and if this branch railway is to be as profitable as indicated, then there must be back of it and back of Kitimat an extensive farming industry. There must be dairy and other products to supply a big industrial population. Recently we had a discovery of oil and large quantities of natural gas in the Peace river country. I believe that today consideration is being given to running branches from the proposed pipe line to Vancouver to serve Prince Rupert, Kitimat and other places on the northern Pacific coast.

I think also of the great development which has taken place in the interior of British Columbia north of the 60th parallel within the confines of the riding represented by the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). During the last year or so there have been vast developments in all kinds of minerals, particularly uranium, oil and natural gas. That country has no rail connection with the Pacific coast and I visualize the construction of a line, possibly down through Grimshaw in Alberta, the continuation of the Northern Alberta railway over into the Peace river bloc in British Columbia, with a further extension from there by Canadian National Railways to Pacific tidewater.

These great smelters and refineries will just naturally be located around Prince Rupert, Kitimat and other points on the Pacific coast. I think it would be wrong to think otherwise. The construction of railroads in Canada is a matter of great national importance today, just as it was in 1874. We are entering a new era of discovery, mechanical devices, invention and general development.

Last night we had as a guest in this House of Commons the president of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines Limited. In the early thirties when so many young men were having to go into the unemployment camps wondering what they were going to do, Grant McConachie thought that it would be a good idea to become an aviator. He had been firing a locomotive on the Canadian Northern railroad. He learned to fly an aeroplane and went up into the north country where he flew out furs, fish and everything that offered. He carried these commodities down to Prince George, Edmonton and other rail centres.

From that small beginning he developed a great business. I am very happy that I had some little part in getting him launched out of Ashcroft with the first air mail service out of the Cariboo. From that small beginning he built up a great air fleet which now spans the Pacific to Japan, China, Australia, New Zealand as well as points in South America. Great wealth has been brought to this country through the operation of that air service as part of our transportation picture now being worked out in the northwest and toward the completion of which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is making such a great contribution.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was asking why a differentiation was being made between this branch line and the Sherridon-Lynn Lake line where a contribution of $5 million or some such amount was made by the Department of Defence Production. In answer may I say that Canadian National Railways do not deal with branch lines on a set pattern. They are considered in accordance with the circumstances that arise and each case is decided separately.

There are reasons why in this case there should not be a contribution by defence production. First, no request was made by Canadian National Railways to the government and therefore no opportunity arose. Next, I think there is all the difference in the world—I say this with deference to my hon. friend—between this and the other line.

There was a great shortage of nickel-copper production such as was discovered in the northern part of Manitoba, certainly on this continent. The situation was such that it was felt that defence production should contribute that amount, not only for that reason but also because of the length of the line which is several times the length of this line.

There is not the same shortage of aluminum. We have the development at Shipshaw and there are a number of developments in the United States. There was not the same urgency for this development as there was in the other case. Even if there was a contribution I cannot see that it would make much difference because it would be made out of the revolving fund of defence production.

Mr. Green: The position of the railroad would be bettered, would it not?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it would. The estimated traffic operations for the first five-year period indicates that there will be a small profit.

Mr. Green: Does that include interest on the loan from the government?

Mr. Chevrier: The position of the Sherridon-Lynn Lake line was not the same.

Mr. Green: What about the Peace river outlet?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think that I should be asked to deal with a matter of that kind under this legislation. This is specific legislation dealing with a branch line from Kitimat to Terrace. When the government determines as to whether it will construct a line into the Peace river country it will announce its policy in the usual way. I suppose that when my estimates are up I shall be asked certain questions and I shall be glad to deal with the matter at that time.

Mr. Green: Why not tell us now?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think this is an opportune time to deal with it. This is legislation for a specific branch line and I think it should be treated accordingly.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

New Westminster Harbour Commission

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

NEW WESTMINSTER—EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES AND PROVISION FOR LOAN

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners, to extend the boundaries of the harbour, and to provide for a loan of one million, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the harbour commissioners for the purpose of constructing additional dockage facilities in the harbour.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are two parts to this resolution. The first relates to the extension of the boundaries of the harbour of New Westminster.

The New Westminster harbour commissioners were incorporated by chapter 158 of the statutes of 1913, and were given jurisdiction over the harbour of New Westminster from the eastern end of Douglas island to the Sandheads. In 1938 the harbour was extended to include a small area lying between the harbour of New Westminster and the North Fraser harbour. The present boundaries are set out in chapter 37 of the statutes of 1938.

Certain waterlot properties in the Fraser river and the Pitt river which were formerly administered by the Department of Resources and Development as part of the railway belt lands were transferred to the administration of the Department of Transport in 1951. It is now proposed to extend the boundaries of the harbour to include these waterlots which will be placed under the jurisdiction of the harbour commissioners and will be used for industrial sites in connection with waterborne transportation. The boundaries of the harbour would be extended eastward in the Fraser river to Kanaka creek and northeastward in the Pitt river as far as Pitt lake.

The second part of the resolution seeks authority for a loan of $1,250,000 to the harbour commissioners to enable the commissioners to construct additional dockage facilities in the harbour. With respect to the proposed loan, the harbour commissioners represent that there is not sufficient dockage at the port of New Westminster to handle present traffic, and there is no publicly-owned wharf terminal. Five private berths are owned and operated by Pacific Coast Terminals Limited. Two city-owned wharves are operated under lease by private operators. On the south side of the harbour across the Fraser river there are two berths owned by Fraser Mills and three berths at the grain elevator leased to private interests. A number of shipping agencies have made representations to the commissioners pointing out the insufficiency of dock facilities for present and future traffic requirements.

In 1946 the city was surveyed by Harland Bartholemes for a future town planning scheme including the waterfront. This survey envisaged a frontage as now proposed extending eastward from the present city dock frontage to Pattullo bridge. On the basis of this report, the city wishes in time to release all interest in its waterfront property and with this objective in mind has approached the harbour commissioners to take over the most easterly portion of its docks. The city is also prepared to convey to the crown the adjacent waterfront property lying eastward for a distance of 1,500 feet for the development of additional dock frontage. The commissioners propose to construct dockage facilities on this property and have asked for the loan of $1,250,000 for this purpose.

The port of New Westminster has made substantial progress in recent years which is reflected in the increase of traffic moving in and out of this port. In 1951 there were 394 deep sea arrivals in port with a deep sea freight tonnage in and out of 936,320 tons. In addition there were 1,924 coastal arrivals with a coastal freight tonnage in and out of 2,120,000 tons. This represents an increase in tonnage over 1950.

United States defence authorities consider that this port would be a logical operating point for defence shipments in view of its rail connections to United States points via Great Northern, Northern Pacific and other American railroads.

With the major industrial development now proceeding in British Columbia and the adjoining province of Alberta it is essential that adequate deep sea dock facilities be constructed to take care of traffic moving in and out of the port of New Westminster.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition are very happy to support any development of the port of New Westminster. As a matter of fact it was under a Conservative prime minister, the late Sir Robert Borden, that the New Westminster harbour commission was set up in the year 1913. The statement just made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) seems to make out a very good case for the proposed legislation. I wonder whether the government is going to give any assistance in the erection or installation of these docks. I took it from his statement that the New Westminster harbour commissioners would have to find all the money and that there would be no assistance from the government.

This is one of the great harbours of Canada; furthermore it is a fresh water harbour and has that advantage over salt water harbours. The manner in which it has been developed reflects great credit on the different harbour commissioners and on the citizens of New Westminster. In British Columbia we believe that the city of New Westminster is more or less in a class by itself. Mind you, I am not leaving out of comparison my own city of Vancouver. However, from the start the city of New Westminster has been blessed with citizens possessed of the highest civic spirit. Hon. members will have heard of their different athletic teams such as the Salmonbelly lacrosse teams. Every boy in New Westminster is supposed to be born with a lacrosse stick in his hand. Down through the years there has been this wonderful spirit and one of the results has been the New Westminster harbour development. Therefore we are very glad to be able to say a few words in support of the proposal.

After the bill has had second reading I presume it will be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I think that is wise because that is the best way for members of the house to become acquainted with the various financial and other details which cannot be adequately studied in the house. I hope the minister will move to refer the bill to the standing committee.

Mr. W. M. Mott (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have the opportunity to say a few words in support of this measure. As the sitting member for New Westminster, known throughout the whole world as the port of New Westminster, I appreciate very much, as will the citizens of New Westminster, the kind remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). No doubt in his younger days he has faced New Westminster lacrosse teams on many occasions years ago when they were known throughout the whole world and won championships throughout the world.

Mr. Knowles: He is not that old.

Mr. Mott: He is old enough to have played lacrosse and they are still playing it. I should like to mention something else that goes back a little farther in the history of the port of New Westminster. Around the year that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra mentioned, 1913, the population of New Westminster was approximately 10,000 people. Nevertheless they did look to the future. They could see what that great river meant and the great development that could take place from the point of view of being one of the leading harbours of the world. The council submitted a bylaw to the people involving an expenditure of $500,000 to start building docks. The first two docks built at New Westminster were constructed then, and from that time onward even sailing ships have come up the river to take on cargoes such as timber and lumber which they carried to all corners of the world.

The harbour has grown since that time until last year there were 394 deep sea ships in port. That represented sixty ships more than in 1950. The latest report I have for the year 1952 shows that from January 1 to March 31 there have been 104 deep sea ships in port compared with ninety-six for the same period last year. The traffic on the river is still increasing. The harbour is about twenty miles from the mouth of the river, and there is a space of about twenty miles on each side of the river that could and probably will be one of the greatest industrial empires on the Pacific coast. It ties in with four railways, the Canadian National, Canadian Pacific, Great Northern and Milwaukee. The two United States railways come into New Westminster before they go to Vancouver, the same as the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. It is really the first port of entry from the United States, and it has grown very quickly during the last twenty years.

I support the extension of the harbour limits already mentioned by the minister, and which no doubt will be explained in the bill. There has been difficulty in the upper reaches of the river owing to the fact that no one has control. Some two years ago I had a letter from one of the large industries in that area. There was ice on the river; they were frozen in, and the employees were laid off for about ten days. I believe they also lost a tug trying to break the ice around their booming grounds, and altogether it cost them about $35,000. At that time there was no one to go to. The dredging is looked after by the Department of Public Works with headquarters at New Westminster, but when it comes to difficulties in regard to navigation on the river they all look to the New Westminster harbour commission. With that idea in mind I support the extension of the harbour in order that there might be proper policing, and so that in winter if it is necessary to go beyond the present boundaries of the harbour in order to break the ice and keep the river open, that may be done by the New Westminster harbour board. We have not been able to do that in the past, so I think this extension of the boundaries is a move in the right direction.

I am very glad to support this bill. I appreciate very much the kind remarks that have been made. I will have more to say when this matter goes to committee, since I am a member of that committee; and for the information of hon. members, especially those of the opposition, I may say that I understand the chairman of the harbour commission will be coming here to attend the meetings of that committee, when I am sure any questions we may have in mind can be asked and answered at that time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As a member of this group, Mr. Speaker, and a member from British Columbia, I want to make some brief remarks on this bill. I listened with interest to the minister, to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), and to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mott). Before proceeding with my remarks I must say I endorse and support everything said in connection with this development by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Not only have I heard of this development in this house this afternoon. On occasions when I have visited New Westminster I have had an opportunity to see the docks and watch the loading and unloading of ships. I have been told of the enterprise of the early residents of that city and of the council of 1913, which placed before the residents a bylaw calling for the expenditure of $500,000, which was a large sum of money for a city with a population of about 10,000 to raise. I think the developments in New Westminster, particularly the harbour developments, are a credit to the first and succeeding councils who have dealt with these matters. In fairness to the hon. member for New Westminster I should say that I have heard even his political opponents pay tribute to the work he did while mayor of New Westminster in promoting harbour improvements.

This bill appeals to this group, because it has to do with a development which resulted from co-operative community action, by the people themselves. Certainly these developments should receive the endorsation of all across this country, and the financial support that will be provided by this legislation. The port of New Westminster is of particular interest to the southeastern portion of British Columbia, because that is the port through which flow many of the products of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, fruit from the orchards of the interior of British Columbia and other commodities produced in that area. They flow through that port because of the improved facilities provided through the enterprise of succeeding councils of that city. Therefore this group wholeheartedly supports and endorses this bill.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I remember being in New Westminster in 1913. At that time there was very little navigation on the Fraser river, just the odd Indian canoe or a lumber barge going up to Fraser Mills. That great, broad, beautiful river was developed through the imagination and energy of the citizens of New Westminster. When this harbour board was first established the commissioners served without salary. It was a work of love on their part. The project had to succeed, and I am not surprised to learn the great number of deep sea ships that now anchor in the Fraser river. In my opinion there is no other harbour in the world with greater possibilities. Now that harbour is being extended many miles inland. It will now take in the Pitt river which flows into the Fraser. At the confluence of the Pitt and Fraser there is a natural site for a metropolis. The Pitt begins up in Pitt lake, and is a great fresh water flood. So I believe this bill is going to contribute greatly to the industrial development of British Columbia.

In this connection I would like to mention the work that has been done in the development of the Fraser river by the Daily Columbian of New Westminster, formerly owned and edited by a gentleman who was a very distinguished member of this house, the late Hon. J. D. Taylor, and now edited by Miss Dorothy Taylor. It was under the direction of Mr. Taylor that the incorporation of the harbour board was brought about, during the regime of Sir Robert Borden. Mr. Taylor was a native son of the Ottawa valley, one of those young Canadians with lots of courage who went west and made himself a fortune, also gaining great fame as a national speaker. This was one of the projects very dear to the heart of the late Mr. Taylor and his managing editor, the late J. W. Cunningham, who in those early days was drawing up blueprints and plans and publishing advertisements, trying to get new industries to locate in this little community. I think also of the late Mayor Keary and also of Hon. A. Wells Gray, who was mayor of the city and provincial minister of lands, who practically gave his life in community service to the royal city of New Westminster. So it gives me great pleasure to be able to offer a word of support for this resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Green: Would the minister answer my question concerning any government contribution to the cost of erecting these docks?

Mr. Chevrier: The government is making a loan of $1,250,000 for that very purpose. It is the desire and intention of the harbour commissioners of New Westminster to build dockage facilities upon land which they will get from the city; and this amount is for that purpose.

Mr. Green: There is not to be an outright contribution from the government?

Mr. Chevrier: No, there is not.

Mr. Green: I am wondering about that, because in many cases the government actually builds docks. I wonder why in this case there is no contribution by the government.

Mr. Chevrier: This is an entirely different case. The government builds docks in its national harbours—

Mr. Green: And in other harbours as well.

Mr. Chevrier: No, the government does not build docks in other harbours, except through the Department of Public Works. I am talking now of the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. The harbours that are under our jurisdiction have been built in part, and I would think for the most part—I think now of Toronto, for instance—by the funds and revenues obtained from the commission itself. This is certainly the case here. The government has been of great assistance to the harbour of New Westminster from the point of view of public works and other facilities with which I am not fully familiar at this time. I do not think that the government has neglected this harbour in any sense of the word.

Mr. Green: What about the extension of the boundaries? I understood the minister to say that the boundary would be extended right up the Pitt river to Pitt lake. As I read the act which is now in force, the jurisdiction only goes to the mouth of the Pitt river. I may be wrong in that.

Mr. Chevrier: At the moment the jurisdiction goes to the east end of Douglas island, which is at the mouth of the Pitt river, and it is proposed under this bill to extend the jurisdiction northeastward along the Pitt river to Grant Narrows, and eastward along the Fraser to a point that I mentioned earlier which is in the vicinity of Fort Langley.

Mr. Green: What are the respective distances?

Mr. Chevrier: I would have to guess at that from looking at the map. This is not a scale map, but I would think the jurisdiction is about half of that which the harbour already has.

Mr. Green: Have there been any representations made by municipal councils in this area to which the jurisdiction is being extended?

Mr. Chevrier: No, there have not.

Mr. Pearkes: One may expect a reasonable development and expansion of the port as a result of this jurisdiction, but one of the limiting factors in the expansion of not only the port of New Westminster but other ports in British Columbia has been the lack of suitable dredges to keep the channels and the approaches to the ports open. Is any provision being made for an increase in the number of dredges that can be made available in British Columbia?

Mr. Chevrier: Not under this legislation, but as my hon. friend knows that is a matter for the Minister of Public Works and I understand that provision is being made in his estimates for certain dredges.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 193, respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read a second time.

Mr. Chevrier: I was wondering if the house would consent to the second reading of the bill now, and I shall give my reason for that request. If there is any objection, I shall withdraw it. The reason is that the railway bill has been referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. This bill will also be referred to that committee, and I understand that it is the intention of the chairman of the New Westminster harbour commission and one other member to be here next week. As the house knows, Thursday and Friday have been set aside for the budget resolutions, so it will be impossible to consider this measure on those days. It is a simple bill that can be broken down into two parts, one having to do with the extension of the boundaries and the other concerning the loan of $1,250,000. There will be an opportunity for discussion when the measure comes back from the committee. If the house were willing to give it second reading and refer it to the committee, I think it would be very helpful.

Mr. Green: I am very sorry, but we have a duty here at least to look at these bills before they are passed. We have not got the bill, and there has been no opportunity to study it. We cannot agree to give any bill second reading without seeing it. This bill can be brought on for second reading on Monday.

I do not think there will be any difficulty in getting it passed in short order, so that there will be no inconvenience whatever to the chairman of the New Westminster harbour commission.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the house.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ZONING OF AIRPORTS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Aeronautics Act to provide that the governor in council may make regulations for the zoning of airports and also to provide for the payment of compensation in respect of any property injuriously affected by the application of the said regulations.

He said: There are two parts to this resolution, Mr. Speaker, which is concerned with a measure to amend the Aeronautics Act. The first part relates to the making of regulations to provide for the zoning of airports. The second part deals with the payment of compensation in respect of any property injuriously affected by the application of the proposed regulations.

Dealing with the first part of the resolution, it must be apparent to all that airport approaches should be protected. At the present time there are no regulations restricting the use of lands in the vicinity of airports or limiting the height of buildings or other structures which are hazards to the landing or taking off of aircraft. During the last war the airport zoning regulations, 1939, were made under the War Measures Act. These regulations applied to military airports and definitely restricted the height of structures and use of land adjacent to these airports. These wartime regulations afforded necessary protection to aircraft using the airports but are no longer in force. The only means of zoning airports at the present time is given by the Expropriation Act which authorizes the taking of land or any interest therein for public purposes. This method is not considered adequate to meet present-day requirements of airports.

By airport zoning is meant the division of certain land adjacent to or surrounding an airport into definite areas in which the height of buildings or other structures, and objects of natural growth, is limited and the use of the land is restricted according to definite plans so that the airport approaches are protected from dangerous obstructions. The need for protection of both the aircraft and the public from dangerous obstructions in the vicinity of airports is obvious. The building of houses and other structures on locations from which later on they may have to be removed should be discouraged.

In most instances, airports have been located in sparsely settled surroundings, but the growing importance of air travel and the expansion of cities have caused a movement to locate various buildings adjacent to airports in recent years. If the height of these new structures is reasonably regulated so as to prevent them from interfering with the use of the approaches to the airport, the public interest in the airport will be protected, and the owners of property adjacent to the airport can make the best use of their land by adapting it to purposes which conform to this public interest. The recent casualties in populated areas where aircraft have landed out of control causing loss of life and extensive damage indicate that great care should be taken not only in the location of suitable airport sites but also in regulating the erection of buildings in the vicinity of an airport.

Turning now to the second part of the resolution which is complementary to the first, it is intended to make provision for the payment of compensation to persons whose property is injuriously affected by the application of the zoning restrictions. The introduction of airport zoning will permit the orderly development of land in the vicinity of an airport without danger to air navigation. Generally, this will be beneficial to property owners in the area but it is recognized that in some cases hardships may occur to property owners who have acquired land or have planned developments on property immediately adjacent to airports for purposes which no longer would be feasible under the restrictions imposed by zoning regulations. It is intended to take care of these cases by providing for compensation. This will apply in regard to future structures which are dangerous to aircraft. The removal of obstructions now on the land will be dealt with under the normal procedures of expropriation for which compensation is provided under the Expropriation Act. It is not the intention of the measure which I propose to introduce to have a retroactive application but to prevent the creation of future hazards. The zoning regulations, therefore, would be merely preventive as regards future action.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we have two suggestions to make with regard to this measure. The first is that the bill, when it has been introduced, should be allowed to stand on the order paper for a reasonable length of time in order that the municipalities concerned may study it and may be in a position to make representations. This measure will affect a great many municipalities and we think it will affect quite a large number of people. We would urge that time be given for the terms to be studied by people across the country who are interested. We also think that, when the bill gets second reading, it should be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for careful study.

I presume that the bill will be somewhat similar to Bill No. 197 which was given first reading in this house on April 12 of last year. That bill of course dealt only with the zoning. There was no provision for the payment of compensation. I would ask the minister to explain, when the house goes into committee on the resolution, the type of airports which will be covered. Will the measure apply only to those airports where there is instrument landing or will it cover all of the airports in the country, large and small? It should also be possible for the minister to give us the approximate number of airports which will be affected.

What consideration has been given to the legislative jurisdiction of the dominion? Here we have a measure which will interfere with property and civil rights. A man may own property adjacent to an airport. He may have bought that property for the purpose of erecting a factory or some other type of building, and is suddenly met with these regulations which prevent him from carrying out his intention. In a measure of this type there would seem to be a conflict with the jurisdiction of the provinces. We should like to know what consideration has been given to that particular side of the matter.

We would also ask the minister to explain in more detail how he proposes to compensate these owners. As he has mentioned, the present system has been to expropriate the land that is required. That procedure raises many difficulties. The owners usually think they are not getting the right amount for their property. I expect there will be even greater difficulty in working out a system of compensation for damage arising as a result of these zoning regulations.

Many of these airports are owned by the municipalities. Will the compensation be paid by the government in full, or will there be some responsibility on the municipalities to contribute to that compensation?

These are some of the questions which come to mind in connection with the resolution. When the house goes into committee I hope the minister will give answers to those various questions.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the minister for bringing in this resolution at this time. I think it would be an excellent thing to standardize the regulations concerning airports in place of leaving them to the various municipalities, as has been the practice so far.

I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to make a suggestion. In the Aeronautics Act, as it is now, there are provisions that enable the department to make certain grants to help in the construction of airports in certain municipalities which cannot afford to build them themselves. These provisions of the law do not provide for help being granted in the acquisition of land on which to build an airport, but only for a grant to help in the transformation of the land into an airport afterwards.

In my county a situation has arisen lately where one municipality had a great deal of difficulty in raising enough money to buy the land. I think the department would have been disposed to help, but unfortunately the act did not give it the necessary power to do so. I should like to suggest to the minister that he might consider amending the act to include these powers to help not only in the construction of the airport itself but also in the acquisition of the land.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe that all of us in Canada are justly proud of the wonderful safety record that has been established by our various Canadian air lines. Other hon. members are probably in the same position that I am in when I say that I have almost been able to persuade the members of my own family that it is now safer to fly in this country than it is to travel by any other means. Because this bill seems to have as its purpose the desire to take measures to assure that that safety record will be maintained and even improved, it certainly meets with our approval. There are a number of questions that occur to one, but most of them can be asked when we get into committee.

From what the minister says, I take it that one of the reasons which have prompted the government to bring in the bill at this time is concern for safety aroused by some of the tragic accidents that have occurred in the United States, particularly where planes have been taking off or landing at airports in thickly populated centres. That being the case, it seems to be highly desirable that favourable consideration should be given to this measure. When we get into committee I shall be interested in learning from the minister whether, since the War Measures Act became inoperative and the zoning regulations under that act therefore lapsed, there have been any cases where structures have been built which would have contravened those regulations. If so, I would be interested in knowing whether the regulations to be made under this act will be retroactive to the extent that any structures that have been built since the suspension of the War Measures Act will have to be removed or altered in conformity with this bill.

I think, too, we are interested in the other side of the picture. Perhaps today the minister might deal with this phase of the matter. For example, are there any provisions in the bill that impose restrictions upon air traffic, as well? From time to time complaints are made by people in some areas as to the route that planes follow. Some folks who try to sleep at night feel that the night planes always come in just over their homes.

I realize the problem involved here. For example, in my own city of Winnipeg we are proud of the fact that our airport is so accessible to the downtown area. We know of course that we cannot have it both ways. We cannot have the airport close to town and not have the aircraft fly overhead. However I have received a number of complaints from patients in Deer Lodge hospital, wondering if something could not be done to reduce to some extent the disturbance the patients in that hospital feel they are called upon to endure.

All told, the bill would seem to be a commendable one. I am sure the minister will see the reasonableness of the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that the bill stay on the order paper for a while, so that those who are interested may have time to look into it. But we are glad to give the measure our support.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should answer at this time some of the questions put to me.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made two suggestions, the first of which was that the measure should be allowed to stand over. I would have no objection to that, but I would remind him and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who also made the suggestion, that the bill stood over for more than a year. Bill 197—

Mr. Green: That was only part of the present bill.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Chevrier: Bill 197 stood over because it broke new ground. In other words, it provided for the zoning of airports in a certain area. Because it was stood over we received a large number of representations from municipalities. And from those representations—and they came not only from municipalities, but from other interested persons—evolved this bill. However, I would repeat that I am not making any commitments that that will be the case. Personally, however, I would have no serious objection to it.

The next question was, to what type of airports will this apply? It is difficult to give the number of airports to which these restrictions would apply, but it is not difficult to say the kind to which they would apply. As I see it, all the transcontinental airports would be subject to them, as well as many of the airports that lie on the north-south routes which are considered as major airports.

Mr. Green: What does the minister mean by the north-south routes?

Mr. Chevrier: I mean the routes which go from north to south. For instance, Goose and Gander lie to the north of Halifax and Sydney—likewise on the west coast, and likewise in certain parts of central Canada. Then, unquestionably, there are military airports, perhaps a large number of them, to which regulations of this kind would apply. Offhand I can think of some 20 or 25 to which unquestionably the restrictions would apply.

I think consideration would have to be given to the closeness of a field to an urban area, and there would be other considerations as well.

Mr. Green: Each airport would be considered on its own merits?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right. Special consideration will be given to each airport. For instance, in the compilation of these restrictions special studies were made of the conditions at Dorval and Malton.

In order to answer some of the other questions raised it would be necessary to give the restrictions. I hesitate to give them at this time. They will be given and explained during consideration of the bill. Generally speaking, however, they can be divided into three classes: Restrictions which would apply horizontally from the centre of an airport to about 13,000 feet outside the centre; restrictions which would apply to the approaches on a sloping plane; and restrictions which would also apply to the sides of the approaches.

Mr. Knowles: They are restrictions as to height?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. This would of course be much more stringent in respect of a plane which would go up and down than in respect of a horizontal plane.

I could go into more detail, but I do not think I should at this stage. A question was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre concerning retroactivity. I do not think anyone will be affected in so far as retroactivity is concerned—certainly not at the two airports to which we have given consideration. I know that in the first group of restrictions no buildings will have to be taken down, nor will any buildings contravene the restrictions as we intend to put them into effect. Buildings however may contravene the other two groups to which I have made reference, and I think it will be adequately covered by the terms of the bill. I was asked what consideration was given to the jurisdiction of the federal government. I believe the jurisdiction of the federal government has been pretty clearly established by two cases—first, in re the aeronautics case, which was a decision of the privy council, and which established the jurisdiction of the federal government in respect of aerial navigation under section 132 of the British North America Act.

Then, again, that jurisdiction was more than amply confirmed under the peace-order-and-good-government clause of the British North America Act in the Johanesson case. This case came from the Winnipeg courts, and went I believe to the appellate division of the Manitoba courts, and finally to the Supreme Court of Canada. I believe it is a unanimous decision, and indicates clearly that, with reference to this question, we have jurisdiction.

In the case of Johanesson et al. v. Rural Municipality of West St. Paul et al.—this case is reported at (1951) D.L.R., volume 4, page 609—the headnote states:

> Aeronautics or aerial navigation is a matter falling within the exclusive legislative authority of the dominion parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada and it includes within its scope the power to license, regulate and locate aerodromes. Consequently, provincial authorizing legislation, and a municipal by-law passed thereunder, dealing with licensing and prohibiting of aerodromes are ultra vires. Moreover, the field has been occupied by the Aeronautics Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 3.

How do we propose to compensate those injuriously affected by these regulations? If we proceed under the Exchequer Court Act, as we intend to, the compensation rules are clearly set out. I do not think I am required to deal with that at this stage.

The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine raised a point which I know is vital to him and to others in that area or in other areas where the population is more isolated and segregated than in the central parts of Canada. I am not in position to say what the decision would be under legislation of this character. I can tell him that his and similar cases will be considered on their merits.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say whether this would apply to structures built since the regulations under the War Measures Act were suspended and which would have been contrary to those regulations had they still been in effect?

Mr. Chevrier: I thought I answered that a moment ago in the negative. I speak from memory, but I do not think that structures built since the zoning regulations under the War Measures Act lapsed would be affected. I am referring only to Malton and Dorval where I do not think any building will contravene the regulations in the first group. The regulations under the second and third groups are far more stringent and I am not prepared to deal with them now.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask for a little more detail regarding the type of airport concerned. The minister has referred to transcontinental airports and airports on the north and south routes. But there are also feeder services coming into those transcontinental airports. Would an airport served only by a non-scheduled service be included?

Mr. Chevrier: This will apply to construction whether the airport is used by non-scheduled or scheduled lines. It will depend upon the proximity of the airport to an urban centre. Dealing more specifically with the first part of my hon. friend's question, I could give the names of the airports that would be affected.

Mr. Pearkes: That would give us some indication.

Mr. Chevrier: Dorval, Malton, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Quebec, Goose, Gander, Moncton, Sydney.

Mr. Green: Lethbridge?

Mr. Chevrier: I think that Lethbridge would be affected.

Mr. Pearkes: Patricia Bay?

Mr. Chevrier: Patricia Bay, Dartmouth, the lakehead. Those are some fifteen or so airports that come to my mind. Then there are a number of military airports where jets will be operated which will also be affected. We have not given consideration to those at the moment, but we have given consideration to Uplands. There will not be any difficulty about zoning there because that is some distance from the city.

Mr. Jeffery: Will the London airport be affected? I ask that because I recently attended a meeting of various bodies which were considering possible restrictions.

Mr. Chevrier: It would be.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the airport at Downsview be affected?

Mr. Chevrier: I think it would.

Mr. Green: Many of these airports are owned by municipalities.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Green: What will be the responsibility of the municipality in connection with the payment of compensation?

Mr. Chevrier: I think that is a matter which might be considered when we are dealing with the bill. I would rather not get into that discussion on the resolution stage. There will be two divisions to the bill, one dealing with restrictions and the other dealing with compensation and I think that would be an opportune time to deal with this.

Mr. Green: Is there to be some responsibility on the municipality for the payment of compensation?

Mr. Chevrier: I would think so.

Mr. Green: The government is not paying all the compensation?

Mr. Chevrier: I hesitate to answer that at this time. I think that is really a matter which should be considered when the bill is before us.

Mr. McLure: Will this affect the airport at Charlottetown?

Mr. Chevrier: As I envisage the regulations at the moment I do not think they would affect any buildings within the restricted area at Charlottetown.

Mr. Knowles: Is this bill in any sense a two-way street? The minister made it clear that it will impose restrictions upon property around airports but will it also impose restrictions upon aircraft flying over the area around an airport?

Mr. Chevrier: It does.

Mr. Green: Is the minister sure about that? Does this bill impose restrictions on aircraft?

Mr. Chevrier: I misunderstood my hon. friend. This bill does not affect aircraft.

Mr. Green: Has any study been given to the situation at the Vancouver airport?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there has.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Green: Will it affect any structures which are already up?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not able to say.

Mr. Green: Is that airport being taken over by the dominion government?

Mr. Chevrier: The status quo remains. My hon. friend is familiar with the position. I have not received any further representations from the city which knows the position of the department.

Mr. Green: What is that position?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think this is the place to discuss it.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 194, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. J. J. McCann (for the Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I believe this bill is in exactly the same phraseology as bills which have been passed in preceding years. If there is no change, we have no objection.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). There is no change and the remuneration has been consistent for a few years. I think members of the house are pretty familiar with the measures that are involved.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the parliamentary assistant and the ministers present know, it has been our view in this group for some time that it would be preferable to have the audit of the accounts of the Canadian National Railways done by the Auditor General of Canada. That is not to suggest that there is anything inadequate about the work done by the firm of George A. Touche and Company which the government has nominated for this job from time to time for quite a few years now, but we feel it would be more appropriate to have this work done by the person, together with his staff, who is the direct appointee and direct servant of the parliament of Canada.

I recognize that it would require additions to the staff of the Auditor General for him to take on this heavy work, but there is no doubt that that could be done. We are conscious of the fact that the reports which the Auditor General makes to parliament on the public accounts of the country are set up in a little different form from auditors' reports prepared by private firms such as George A. Touche and Company, either for Canadian National Railways or for any other business which they may be auditing. That seems to follow from the very nature of the case. We would expect that the only interest such a firm of auditors has is in determining whether the accounts are correct. I think the parliamentary assistant will bear me out that the printed report emanating from this firm of accountants which is laid before parliament is merely a statement that they have examined the accounts of Canadian National Railways and the various subsidiaries and have found that everything is in order. We have no doubt of that, but on the other hand I would point out that when the Auditor General reports to parliament on the public accounts he seems to go at matters in a slightly different way. I confess I am not a professional accountant, and there may be points that can be raised in connection with this matter, but it seems to me it would be more useful to parliament to have, so far as the Canadian National Railways is concerned, statements such as those that are given to us by the Auditor General with respect to the public accounts.

As the house knows, this suggestion has been made to the government on quite a number of occasions. If I may say so I think the best and most exhaustive speech in support of this proposal, the one revealing the greatest amount of research on the matter, was made some years ago by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) who is now parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. He urged most strongly in a very exhaustive speech some years ago that this change should be made. We have proposed it in the form of an amendment to the second reading of similar bills on a number of occasions. In view of the large number of members who are out of the house today attending important committees, the suggestion of moving an amendment at this stage would of course hardly seem appropriate. However, I again make the suggestion that the government should give further consideration to the idea of having the auditing of the accounts of Canadian National Railways done not by an outside private firm nominated by the government but by the Auditor General of Canada who is appointed by and is a servant of the parliament of this country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Auditors.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the parliamentary assistant to tell us whether any further consideration has been given by the government to the suggestion that I have just repeated?

Mr. Benidickson: The suggestion that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made is one that is under constant consideration. However, I am informed that the chief competitive railway organization in this country maintains an audit by the same accounting organization. I am informed that is the consistent practice among United States railways south of the border. We have heard the suggestion that the hon. member has made in other sessions. The affairs of a railway of this size are very intricate. There are, as you know, a number of subordinate corporations and the audit involves an audit of inter-corporate associations. With all deference to what the hon. member has said, we have felt that there is more to be said for a continuous audit by a firm familiar with all the relationships of the organization rather than to change at this time.

Section agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Now.

Mr. Abbott (for Mr. Chevrier) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

COMPENSATION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH FROM CERTAIN DISEASES

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947, to extend the provision for the payment of compensation contained in section 8 of the act.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a statement on the resolution?

Government Employees Compensation Act

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to make a short statement now. This amendment of the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947, will not affect a very great number, but of course to those whom it will affect it is just as important as if thousands were involved. The Government Employees Compensation Act provides for compensation to federal government employees or their dependents where disablement or death comes as a result of industrial disease due to the nature of the employment. The right to compensation and the amount of it in each case are decided by the provincial workmen's compensation board under the statute of the province concerned. Under our federal act the term "industrial disease" is defined as follows:

> Any disease in respect of which compensation is payable under the workmen's compensation act of the province in which the disease was contracted.

This amendment is needed because the categories of diseases now included under the definition of industrial disease in the provincial workmen's compensation acts are not exactly the same in all the provinces. Thus a few diseases which are listed as industrial diseases under some provincial acts may not be recognized as such under some other provincial acts.

Because of this situation parliament included in the federal act of 1947 a provision giving authority to make regulations to provide for compensation for federal employees employed in tuberculosis sanatoria and also for nurses in the field who may get pulmonary tuberculosis owing to the nature of their employment, regardless of the province in which the disease was contracted. The present amendment is designed to cover other cases; for instance, where a federal employee may be disabled or his death caused by a disease which is due to the nature of his employment and peculiar to his occupation, but not included in the statute of the province where the disease was contracted. We feel that all such cases should receive the same treatment no matter in which of the ten provinces the employee happens to be employed at the time.

This amendment is designed in particular to cover employees in federal government laboratories, particularly animal disease laboratories and in animal disease field inspection work, where they may be exposed to virus infections in the course of their work. These diseases are not recognized as industrial diseases in the five provinces between here and the Atlantic: Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. Presumably workers in industrial establishments in those five provinces are not exposed to the diseases in the ordinary course of their employment. Consequently there apparently has been no occasion in the past for those provinces to extend their acts to cover these cases. Federal employees so exposed will now be protected.

The proposed amendment is put forward after consultation with the provincial workmen's compensation boards and the health officers of the federal Department of National Health and Welfare as to the best way of handling these cases.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I listened carefully to what the minister had to say in regard to what the proposed amendment means. I would judge that these are steps in the right direction and that the amendment is desirable and necessary. But there are other features about this federal compensation act on which I would like to say just a few words.

I have had the experience of handling a couple of cases under this act. One case was settled very expeditiously and satisfactorily. It had to do with a seaman, and was handled through the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). But in another case on which I was consulted here in Ottawa, concerning an employee who was entitled to compensation under this act, the result was not so satisfactory. What I am getting at is that the federal compensation act as such has no machinery of adjudication, and the average employee who may be entitled to compensation under it knows very little about the act. The adjudicator, the person who processes the claim, is a provincial government employee here in Ottawa. I am thinking particularly of the city of Ottawa at this time because most of the federal government employees are located here.

In my opinion the adjudication and processing of the claims of federal employees works all right in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia or Manitoba. The natural thing for such employees is to contact the nearest official. Here in Ottawa, however, the average employee knows very little about this act. Many of them do not know where to go if they have an accident or contract some disease. Finally they are sent to the provincial government representative in Ottawa and then to a doctor in this city. Then that claim has to go to Toronto for adjudication.

I am not casting any reflections upon the efficiency of those in Ontario, Nova Scotia or elsewhere who have to handle their own claims. They are familiar with their own industrial set-up; they know exactly how the regulations apply as between industry and industry. But I think it is wrong, with the great bulk of federal employees located in this city, to have the provincial adjudicators deal with claims arising here. In view of the large number of employees in this city I believe the minister would be well advised to set up somewhere within his own department a small board that would look after the adjudication of the claims of federal employees in this city. He should also make that fact known. Then the people affected would know to whom they should apply, from whom they could get advice, and where they must go to have their claims adjudicated. That would be done by someone who understood the circumstances existing in this city, instead of being sent to Toronto for processing and adjudication. The evidence is not properly assembled; it must be done by correspondence, and all that kind of stuff. In addition I believe the federal government should have a doctor somewhere in this city to whom federal employees might report in the event of an accident or illness, in order to protect themselves under this act, so their claims would be handled from a medical standpoint by somebody in this city, someone having to do with the federal compensation act.

I am not quarrelling with the amendment. I am not quarrelling with the act. It is a good thing. I am quarrelling with the mechanics in connection with the adjudication and processing of claims on the part of federal employees. The average member who has been taking a look at this during the years he has been here will realize that quite a few people did not get the kind of deal they would have got if there had been machinery here in Ottawa to administer this act instead of having the whole thing handled by the provincial authorities. I do not think there is any similarity between the kind of problems the provincial boards have to handle and the problems that arise when federal employees suffer accidents or contract what may be construed as industrial diseases. In making his statement I think the minister himself pointed up the fact that the definition of industrial diseases in the different acts across the country is not the same, and does not always cover the kind of industrial diseases that may be covered by this act. For that reason I believe some processing and adjudication machinery should be set up here in Ottawa, together with a medical consultant, so the federal employees located in this city might be properly looked after. I say that because we have such a great number of them here, perhaps more than are employed in the average industry, and I think a request that this kind of machinery be set up is logical and reasonable. I wonder if the minister would give some consideration to it.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Gillis: Has the minister anything to say on my suggestion?

Mr. Gregg: As the hon. member knows, the administration of this act was transferred from the Department of Transport to the Department of Labour just two years ago. The objective, of course, in asking the various provincial workmen's compensation boards to act as adjudicators under this act was for the purpose of economy, and the fact that very effective boards are set up in the various provinces. I think that applies particularly to the province of Ontario.

For the year from April 2, 1951, to April 29, 1952, in the whole of the province of Ontario there was a total of 4,054 claims. I could get a breakdown of those as to how many were in the city of Ottawa, but the hon. member is probably able to make an accurate guess. Of those claims, 7 received pensions; 7 received compensation; 7 received full salary and 2,930 received medical aid; 16 were rejected and 4 were fatal. Other than what the hon. member has said today, it has not been brought to my attention that there were any delays in dealing with these claims, but after the representations made here I shall be glad to look into it to ascertain whether any cause for grievance in that regard does exist.

Mr. Green: Will the proposed amendment be wide enough to cover the case of a rehabilitation officer of the Department of Veterans Affairs who develops tuberculosis through contact with patients, say in one of the military hospitals? As I read section 8 of the present statute, such an employee would not be covered. It does seem that there should be some change made so that cases of that kind could be dealt with. There would probably be similar cases in the Indian affairs branch, in which some government official would come in contact with tuberculosis but would not be eligible for assistance under the act.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, there was a special item inserted to take care of those dealing with tubercular cases, and it is my understanding that they were covered. Consequently, those in the veterans affairs department and Indian affairs branch would be covered prior to this amendment. This amendment only applies to those industrial diseases in the five eastern provinces that are mainly related to laboratories. I shall be glad to check and make sure I am right on that, and refer to the matter when the bill is before the committee.

Mr. Green: As I read it, the act only refers to nurses and would not be wide enough to cover such a case.

Mr. Gregg: I shall check on that.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say whether this bill involves any changes in the rates of compensation?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the rates of compensation in respect of the new diseases being defined in this amendment will be the same as the rates already in the main act?

Mr. Gregg: That is correct.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gregg thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 195, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, though I did not announce further business for today, I think it would be a pity if we were not to employ all our time. I would suggest that we take up the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of National Defence. I understand that there would be no objection to that resolution being considered this afternoon.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

DISCIPLINE AND ADMINISTRATION—COURTS MARTIAL—PENSIONS, SUPERANNUATION, ETC.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend the National Defence Act to effect certain changes respecting the discipline and administration of the forces and to provide that persons who commit grave breaches of the Geneva conventions of 1949 may be tried out of Canada by court martial; to amend the Defence Services Pension Act to provide that the total emolument, by way of salary and pension, payable to a pensioner who is employed as a civil servant may be adjusted in accordance with current rates of pay and allowances of the forces and to provide that members of the forces who are otherwise eligible for pension may be permitted to count periods of full-time reserve service of a continuous duration of six months or more for the purpose of determining the amount of pension; to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act to enable a person who served overseas with the Royal Canadian Navy during the second world war otherwise than at sea to count such service for the purpose of the Civil Service Superannuation Act notwithstanding that the time for election to count such service has expired; and to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act to make the provision respecting the eligibility of servicemen to sit as members of the House of Commons consistent with the provisions of the Canada Elections Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that at two previous sessions bills were submitted to the house bearing the titles the Canadian Forces Act, 1950, and Canadian Forces Act, 1951. Those measures contained a number of miscellaneous provisions respecting defence. The bill which would be introduced if this resolution carried will be entitled the Canadian Forces Act, 1952, and it would follow the precedents set by the previous measures.

This bill would involve a number of amendments to the National Defence Act, Civil Service Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Act and the Senate and House of Commons Act. The amendments to the National Defence Act, with one exception, are concerned with technical changes, and perhaps at this stage I do not need to go into them in any detail as hon. members can better appreciate what they are when the bill is before them. The only matter of substance proposed by way of amendment to the National Defence Act is to enable Canada to carry out obligations that we may assume under the Geneva conventions of August 12, 1949. These conventions relate to the treatment to be accorded members of the armed forces who in time of war are wounded, sick or shipwrecked, taken prisoner of war, and the protection of civilians. Under these conventions the countries signatory to them agree to provide penal sanctions and to bring alleged offenders, regardless of their nationality, before their courts. This proposed provision would enable us to do that.

The bill contains a proposed amendment to the Civil Service Superannuation Act to correct an anomalous situation wherein certain former members of the navy with service ashore overseas in the second world war may not at present allocate the amounts of their period of active service on the same basis as their army and air force counterparts. In other words, a member of the army or air force is permitted to count his service overseas for certain purposes under the Civil Service Superannuation Act, but a member of the navy who had similar service overseas is not at present allowed to count that service for the purpose of civil service superannuation.

Other clauses in the bill would amend the Defence Services Pension Act in two respects. The first amendment deals with the situation of retired officers who are on pension and who have taken up employment in the civil service. At present these officers may receive by way of service pensions only an amount which, when added to their civil service salary, does not bring their total emoluments above the level of their pay and allowances upon their retirement from the forces. The proposed amendment would enable these retired officers, now in the civil service, to r ceive the difference between their civil service pay and the pay of their rank as it then is, which would enable them to secure the advantage of any increases in pay subsequent to their retirement. This would be achieved by providing that such civil servants could receive by way of service pension an amount that, when added to their civil service salary, does not bring their total emoluments above the current pay and allowances of the rank in which they were retired. In other words, a new ceiling would be created, namely the pay and allowances of the forces in effect from time to time as an alternative to the pay and allowances in effect upon retirement.

Perhaps I can give an illustration; it sounds quite complicated but it is not. In the department we have a retired rear admiral working as special adviser to the minister. His civil service pay was fixed at $10,000. His service pension was approximately $6,000. Hence for a full year's work, full time, he actually received $4,000 over and above what he would have received without working. The pay and allowance of a rear admiral are now increased to about $11,000. This amendment would enable this rear admiral to secure $5,000 net for his services instead of the $4,000 that he now gets.

Mr. Brooks: What would happen in case an officer were demoted?

Mr. Claxton: The person we are considering has been retired and he would not be subject to demotion. In the case of officers who retire from the armed forces, particularly those having technical qualifications, we are sometimes finding it highly desirable to continue their services as civilians after they have reached the retirement age; but there is not much inducement in their working full time and assuming the responsibilities of a heavy job unless some change is made.

Mr. Pearkes: Is this provision limited to officers only?

Mr. Claxton: I have not looked the matter up for some years, but it is my recollection that the restriction does not apply to men today. I will look it up and give an answer when we get into committee.

The second amendment to the Defence Services Pension Act would enable contributors who have had long periods of full-time reserve service to count that service as full time for the purpose of computing the amount of their pension but only if such contributors would have sufficient service to make them eligible for pension without this amendment.

There is in the bill a proposed amendment to the Senate and House of Commons Act to modernize or to bring up to date the terminology of the provisions in that act respecting the eligibility of members of the forces to sit as members of the House of Commons. At present the act refers to the non-permanent active militia and other terms which have been replaced. This would bring that terminology into line with an amendment made to the Canada Elections Act at the second session of 1951. The provision would be identical.

There are only six clauses in the bill. They are all of a technical nature except that with regard to the Geneva conventions, and I hope the house will adopt them.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, this is rather an omnibus resolution inasmuch as it is a bill to deal with amendments to four separate acts. On hearing the resolution my first thought was this. Would it not have been better to bring in four resolutions and to have four bills, each to amend one of these various acts? To put them all together seems to me to be a rather confusing and complicated way of dealing with this particular matter. These amendments deal with subjects which range all the way from courts-martial in connection with crimes which may have been committed in connection with the Geneva conventions of 1949 down to changes in the Civil Service Superannuation Act and in the Defence Services Pension Act. Of course the matter of many retired service personnel finding employment when they have left the service and of government departments utilizing the special knowledge that service personnel have acquired through their service—as, for instance, in the example given by the minister—has always been a problem.

I see that you are looking at the clock, Mr. Speaker. As I have one or two further comments I wish to make, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Pearkes the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will go into committee of ways and means and take up the budget resolutions, I am told, in the following order: excise tax, customs tariffs, income tax and succession duty.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 8, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

MARINE AND FISHERIES—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay) presented the second report of the standing committee on marine and fisheries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. W. A. Robinson (Simcoe East) presented the first report of the special committee on the national film board, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Second report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That votes No. 85 to No. 115 inclusive of the main estimates for 1952-53, approved and reported upon this day by the standing committee on external affairs, be referred back to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

NO. 16 REGIONAL ORDNANCE DEPOT

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Has a decision been reached to move No. 16 regional ordnance depot from Regina to Winnipeg?
2. If so, on what date, and for what reason?
3. How many personnel will be transferred?

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2. While no final decision has been made, additional ordnance depots are required to meet the needs of the Canadian Army, and consideration has been given to the location of regional depots adjacent to the respective command headquarters. If this is proceeded with, No. 16 regional ordnance depot in Regina would become an area ordnance depot for the Saskatchewan area on a basis similar to that of other area ordnance depots.

3. If this proposed change is proceeded with, it would now appear unlikely that it would be necessary to transfer any personnel.

ARMED FORCES—OFFICERS TRAVELLING BY AIR

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many officers in the armed forces travelled by T.C.A. since the first day of January, 1951, on official business?
2. What is the total of expenditure paid or incurred in such transportation?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Officers in the armed forces made 5,910 trips by T.C.A. between January 1, 1951 and March 31, 1952.

2. $735,134.95.

COST OF LIVING INDEX

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What are the particulars of the composition of the present cost-of-living index?
2. What are the various elements making up the present cost-of-living index?
3. In the prospective cost-of-living index, what changes are going to be made as far as the addition of further elements is concerned, or the removal of any now included?

Mr. McIlraith:

Composition of the present cost of living index:

1. Purpose. The dominion bureau of statistics cost of living index measures the influence of changes in retail prices of goods and services, upon the cost of a representative urban wage earner family budget.

Each index figure is a percentage which shows the relationship between the dollar cost of the index budget at a specified time, and the corresponding cost of the same budget in a reference period. The bureau's reference period now is the five-year interval 1935 to 1939, and the average cost of the index budget for this period is represented by 100·0. The comparable cost at March 1, 1952 was 189·1 per cent of its base period cost. This figure of 189·1 becomes the cost of living index for March, 1952.

The index budget. The index budget was calculated from annual purchases reported by a group of 1,439 typical wage earner families in the following cities: Charlottetown, Halifax, Saint John, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, London, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Edmonton and Vancouver. These expenditures covered the year ending September, 1938.

The survey families averaged 4·6 persons and the majority had two or three children. Family earnings in many cases were supplemented by minor sources of income; total incomes for these families were heavily concentrated between $1,200 and $1,600. They ranged, however, from as low as $600 up to about $2,800 per annum. There were approximately two tenant families to every one home-owning family, and about one family in three operated a motorcar.

Group index numbers

The index budget is divided into six expenditure groups for which separate indexes are calculated; these are foods, fuel and light, rent, clothing, home furnishings and services, and miscellaneous items. Each group contains a list of items sufficiently large to make it representative of the merchandise field covered. It would be possible to add many more minor items without affecting the movements of the composite cost of living index by any significant amount. These additions would lengthen the time required to calculate the index and impose a greater burden upon firms making price reports, without improving the accuracy of the index. In many cases accuracy might be reduced, as comparisons on a quality basis are not possible over a long period. This would be true of style merchandise such as women's hats. The cost of all these omitted items is included in group weights, which represent all expenditures falling within the six groups noted above. The base period food weight of 31 per cent, for example, was calculated from total food costs reported by survey families, although the food index includes only 46 items which represent about 75 per cent of a representative family's food expenditure.

Foods. Prices used in calculating food indexes are collected on the first business day of each month from approximately 1,600 stores covering independent and chain grocers and butchers. Quotations for each of the 46 budget items are averaged and then multiplied by the budget quantity for each individual item to find the cost for that item. These individual cost figures are added together to find the total cost of the food budget; this figure is then expressed as a percentage of the corresponding reference period cost to produce the food index.

Fuel and light. Separate indexes are calculated for coal, coke, gas and electricity. The two last mentioned are reckoned from monthly bills for quantities which are typical of consumption in the cities represented. The bill for each city is weighted by the number of domestic consumers in order to calculate dominion indexes. The coal index also takes account of typical amounts consumed in different areas and of the population of each city represented in the index. Price changes for coal are related to kinds used in the greatest quantity in each area.

Shelter. Changes in shelter costs are determined by movements of rents. Since 1948 changes in shelter costs have been determined by data obtained from rent surveys inaugurated by the special surveys division of the dominion bureau of statistics. The surveys are taken four times a year, in March, June, August and November. The rent index is calculated from a matched sample of households. That is, the aggregate rent paid by a group of households at a given point in time is compared with the aggregate rent paid by the same group of households for the same living quarters at the next point in time. By using a matched sample for each survey period, variations due to changes in the sample and to non-response are eliminated. The index is, therefore, a measure of the change of rent paid for the same accommodation. Rent reported is the cash rent paid in all cases regardless of minor changes in the services provided. Serious difficulties are involved in attempting to assess the money value of services, such as those provided by janitors, and it is not practical to attempt to adjust the index for variations in the amenities or services provided by the landlord. However, when there are changes in the amount of accommodation or space rented, the cases are eliminated from the comparison. Rent for commercial premises is specifically excluded from the calculation of the index. Thus, cases in which the rent covers both living quarters and commercial space are excluded from the aggregates from which the index is calculated. Usually, the rent index is not adjusted until one month after each survey period.

Clothing. The clothing index has been based upon a carefully selected list of men's and women's apparel. It includes no children's clothing, and omits some items of adult clothing which are of considerable importance, such as women's dresses for afternoon and evening wear, women's hats, men's hats and gloves. Unusual difficulties in maintaining continuous price series on the same quality of goods occur in clothing due to style and seasonal changes which must be excluded from price comparisons based upon quality. The items in the clothing index have been selected to represent the basic materials entering into clothing in approximately the same proportions as they would be found in a complete clothing budget. Some of the items chosen to represent basic materials form a comparatively small portion of a complete budget, but are useful in measuring clothing price trends because of their standard construction. Women's woollen hose afford an example of such items. The index contains 33 items of clothing, piece goods and footwear, and price series for these have been examined individually over a period of years to test their reliability. Most apparel now is composed of six basic materials, cotton, wool, rayon, nylon, leather and rubber. The bureau uses a clothing list of 33 items with the knowledge that a limited but accurate price series will measure the trend of clothing prices better than a large list including items which fluctuate widely in price due to style and seasonal factors. Department stores are the source of bureau clothing prices. These distributors handle approximately one-third of the dominion's clothing trade, and make monthly price returns to the bureau, especially designed for the cost of living index.

The bureau of statistics is concerned not only with the accuracy of prices reported, but also with the comparative quality of goods priced from month to month. It considers a decline in quality to have the same effect upon living costs as a rise in price. Field representatives have been given special instructions and training regarding this matter, and price schedules for clothing and home furnishings have been specially designed for the reporting of quality changes in addition to the recording of comparative prices.

Home furnishings and services. The home furnishings and services index is a composite of nine subgroups, including two sets of service costs in addition to actual furnishings. The nine subgroups are: furniture, electrical equipment, floor coverings, textiles furnishings, hardware, dishes and glassware, cleaning supplies, laundry and telephone. The complete group accounted for 9 per cent of the base period index budget cost, placing it next to clothing in importance. It is similar to clothing also in many details of construction. The data for furniture, electrical equipment, floor coverings, textile furnishings, hardware, dishes and glassware are obtained from department stores and the same principle of the representation of basic materials by a comparatively small number of items is used. There are 8 items of furniture, 3 of electrical equipment, 3 of floor coverings, 4 of textile furnishings, 6 of hardware, 2 of dishes and glassware, 4 of cleaning supplies, 3 laundry rates, and one type of telephone service.

Miscellaneous. Five subgroups, health maintenance, personal care, transportation, recreation and life insurance comprise the miscellaneous index. This list does not exhaust all remaining family living expenditures, but most of those which are left, such as church contributions, support of dependents, etc., cannot be treated in the same way as items which are bought and sold. The index takes no account of these items which amounted to only 3 per cent of average wage-earner family living expenditures reported in the bureau's 1938 survey.

The health section is based upon prices for 6 items of household medical supplies, 2 kinds of hospital service, 3 types of doctors' fees, and rates for 6 types of dental service. In view of the stability of fees for doctors, dentists and hospitals, these records are collected only at annual intervals, while medical supplies are priced quarterly. Records of practically all miscellaneous subindexes are collected from 23 of the larger cities, chosen to give adequate regional representation.

Personal care costs are represented by 9 items of toilet requirements plus fees for men's haircuts and shaves.

Three kinds of transportations are represented in the transportation subgroup: motor car, street car and railway. The two latter present no special problems, but motor car operating costs are more difficult to measure. The bureau's record is based upon service station prices of gasoline, licence fees, tires and wage rates for garage mechanics. It is assumed that depreciation is 35 per cent of operating costs, and that for car owners as a group it remains constant from year to year.

The recreation section includes records of motion pictures theatre admissions, and newspaper, magazine and tobacco costs.

The life insurance index is based upon premiums for ordinary non-participating life policies, since these appear to give the closest possible approximation to the cost of pure risk. Averages of premiums for ages 20, 35 and 50 years have been used covering the records of 11 large companies.

The Cost of Living Index Calculation

There are two stages in the calculation of each of the six principal group indexes from which the composite number is calculated. In the first stage, the general procedure is to multiply current price averages by budget quantities. These products are added together and the resultant aggregate divided by a corresponding base period aggregate. This number is multiplied by 100·0 to secure a subgroup index for the current period. The index is then multiplied by a subgroup weight indicative of the cost of goods in this subgroup relative to all goods in the group. When all subgroups have been weighted similarly, the group index is found by adding up this second set of products and dividing by 100·0. This routine is repeated to secure the final composite cost of living index. The second and third stages of weighting are made necessary by the fact that it is not feasible to include all items in the family budget.

3. Addition of Further Elements to the Prospective Index, and the Removal of Old Ones

Final decisions remain to be made on a few items in the new budget, but in total the new index will be calculated from prices of approximately 225 items as compared with the present list of 160. Additions to foods will include a considerable number of fresh fruits and vegetables; and items of children's wear will be added to the clothing index. In addition to rents it is planned to price the principal home-ownership costs if certain technical difficulties can be overcome. Fuel oil will be added and the list of household equipment and services has been expanded. The Other Commodities and Services index will include a number of additional items, in particular, a wider representation for transportation and recreation. Life insurance premiums will be dropped because they include a large element of savings, while the other major element, risk, is related to future rather than current purchasing power measurements. Additional information concerning the new consumer price index will be found in the attached statement.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

The New Consumer Price Index

(Reprinted from the Daily Bulletin, March 14, 1952, for your information)

During the latter half of 1951 the dominion bureau of statistics held numerous meetings with groups and organizations to explain and discuss the plans for the revised index which is to be renamed more accurately the consumer price index. The groups and organizations included not only a wide variety of interests but also competent technical opinion. They represented consumers, labour, management, farmers, and professional economists. In addition, it has been possible to discuss the most up-to-date techniques for constructing consumer price indexes with experts of several countries which have highly developed statistical organizations. During the course of these discussions it was decided to use 1949 as a base period and work resulting from this decision will require several months to complete. Therefore, publication will not commence before the summer of 1952, at which time a comprehensive explanation of the index will be issued. The present statement outlines briefly some of the main features which appear to have wide public interest.

Purpose and title.

The main purpose of the revision has been to bring up to date the list of items and quantities included in the index budget and to place the series on a post-war base. Thus there will be no change in the fundamental purpose of the index which is to measure changes in the prices which the consumer pays for goods and services.

While the title, "cost-of-living index", has historically been used to describe indexes which serve this purpose, it has proved confusing, and will therefore be changed to "consumer price index". This change in title is one which is being adopted widely in other countries and is made to clarify the real purpose of the index, that is, to measure changes in prices of a representative basket of goods and services.

Base period.

The post-war period selected as the base for the new index is the calendar year 1949, and the index for that year will be 100. Since prices were higher in 1949 than they were in the period 1935-39, which is the base of the present index and which now equals 100, the new index numbers will be lower, of course, than if they were on the 1935-39 base. This does not mean that prices have risen less; the percentage change in the price level shown by the new index would be the same from month to month whichever base is used.

The index budget.

In determining the items to be included in the budget it was first necessary to decide what families should be selected from the nation-wide sample of household expenditures collected for the year ending September 1948, and supplemented by four food surveys in October 1948 and March, June and September 1949. The new index has been designed to reflect the experience of families located in 27 cities, each having more than 30,000 population. They ranged in size from two adults to two adults with four children and the annual incomes of these households during the survey year ranged from $1,650 to $4,050 with the majority of incomes between $2,000 and $3,000.

The income and size limitations were selected to secure a wide coverage within which expenditure patterns could be adequately represented by the same price index. The families have not been restricted to those with wage earner heads. Actual tests showed that expenditure patterns of households with wage earner heads were almost identical with those of other urban families within the same size and income ranges. This is not surprising when it is considered that wage earners and non-wage earners are found living on the same streets, buying in the same stores, and generally living in the same manner. It was thus possible to include families with all types of income, without making the index less representative of wage earners.

Although there have been considerable changes between pre-war and post-war purchasing habits, the general pattern of spending has altered surprisingly little. Changes in the classification of items to give more useful group indexes prevent exact comparison of the old and new index patterns, but the degree of similarity can be judged from the following summary table. The new household operation group compares roughly with a combination of the two series for fuel and light and home furnishings and services. Likewise, the new other commodities and services group contains many of the items listed in the present index under miscellaneous.

Group Base Weights of New and Old Indexes

Budget Group	New index per cent	Old index per cent
Foods	32	31
Clothing	11	12
Shelter	15	19
Household operation	17
(Fuel and light	6)
(Home furnishings and services	9)	15
Other commodities and services	25
Miscellaneous		23
Total	100	100

Final decisions remain to be made on a few items in the new budget, but in general the changes to be made can now be stated. In total the new index will be calculated from prices of approximately 225 items as compared with the present list of 160. Additions to foods will include a considerable number of fresh fruits and vegetables; and items of children's wear will be added to the clothing index. In addition to rents it is planned to price the principal home-ownership costs if certain technical difficulties can be overcome. Fuel oil will be added and the list of household equipment and services has been expanded. The other commodities and services index will include a number of additional items, in particular, a wider representation for transportation and recreation. Life insurance premiums will be dropped because they include a large element of savings, while the other major element, risk, is related to future rather than current purchasing power measurements.

Joint publication of the old and new series. The substitution of any new statistical series for an old one almost invariably leads to some confusion. Cost of living or consumer price indexes are used for numerous purposes, including the adjustment of wages. It seems advisable, therefore, to make available for some months, both the old series and the new. However, it is not the intention to continue the old series after the end of 1952.

USE OF ARMY BUSES OUT OF OTTAWA

Mr. Ferguson:

1. For what purpose were army bus 103, licence No. 6011F, and army bus 105, licence No. 6115F, used on the 2nd day of May, 1952?
2. Were they used out of Ottawa on the 2nd day of May, 1952?
3. If so, what trips were made, and what was the total mileage?
4. At whose request were such trips made?
5. What was the nature of the military duties on which they were engaged?
6. Was any charge made for the use of the buses for such trips?
7. Are similar arrangements to those made in this case available in every part of Canada?
8. If not, what are the conditions under which applications for such arrangements can be made?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Transporting Royal Canadian Army cadets of Finch high school, Finch, Ontario.

2. Yes.

3. From Finch, Ontario to Ottawa and return. Total mileage on each bus was 185 miles.

4. Headquarters Eastern Ontario area, Kingston, Ontario.

5. Visit war museum and House of Commons.

6. No charge was made.

7 and 8. Transport to assist in carrying out training programs is provided for Royal Canadian Army cadets in all parts of Canada where it can be made available.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many orders in council have been passed (a) during the year 1951; (b) since the first day of January, 1952?

Mr. St. Laurent: Return tabled.

LIVESTOCK

FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL EMBARGOES ON SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the Manitoba government lifted its embargo on the shipment of livestock from Saskatchewan to the Winnipeg stockyards? Has the federal government removed its embargo on shipments of livestock from the Winnipeg stockyards to eastern Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The Manitoba embargo is, I think, only against cattle. They lifted the embargo against sheep and hogs. There has been an embargo in connection with the quarantine with respect to Winnipeg on the movement of cattle past Winnipeg since the first outbreak.

Mr. Wright: That is still on?

Mr. Gardiner: It is still on.

Mr. Coldwell: That is federal?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: What embargoes or orders affecting the marketing or moving of livestock are now in effect in Alberta? What measures have been taken by the minister and his department to untangle the chaotic situation reported by this morning's papers to exist there?

Mr. Gardiner: I think I stated yesterday—if I did not, I will state it now—that we have a definite understanding with all the provinces that we shall be permitted to exercise even the authority which the provinces think is their responsibility with respect to the marketing of meat as long as the United States embargo remains in effect. This arrangement has been functioning fairly satisfactorily.

Occasionally we have representations made by the provinces to the effect that something that is being done is not working as smoothly as it might. There was an arrangement made between the packing houses at Edmonton, Calgary, I think Lethbridge, and Vancouver, a day or two ago with our consent and more or less under our direction. Instructions were issued to both railways yesterday in the same terms. One railway interpreted them a little differently from the other. One railway kept on shipping meat and the other did not. This was reported to us, and inside of a few hours at the outside they were both operating in the same way, namely, taking beef through to Vancouver. How the article got into the newspapers without the correction I do not know, but the whole matter was settled yesterday and there were no difficulties such as were outlined in the papers this morning for any length of time whatsoever.

Mr. Harkness: Does the minister mean live beef or dressed beef?

Mr. Gardiner: I mean dressed beef.

BEEF AND PORK

SURPLUS OF GOVERNMENT PURCHASED STOCKS—SUGGESTED GIFT TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the increasing seriousness of the problem of surplus beef and pork piling up in government purchased stocks in western Canada, the probability that the United States market will be closed for some time—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nickle: —and the fact that Britain lacks the dollars to purchase Canada's beef and pork surplus—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nickle: —is the government now prepared to consider a substantial gift to Britain of a portion of this surplus pork and beef?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I am not in a position to answer the question, other than to say that arrangements are being made to handle meat which I think will turn out to be satisfactory.

FUR SEALS

DISTRIBUTION OF CATCH—RESTORATION OF JAPANESE SHARE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): On April 8 the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) asked the following question:

Is consideration being given to Japan's claim to the restoration of that country's share in the Alaska fur seal catch and treaty? If so, to what extent will this affect the proportion of the skins that Canada now receives, and has the United States government been acquainted with the matter?

I understand that Japan has expressed its hopes to the United States government that negotiations for a new pelagic fur sealing treaty might be initiated at the earliest possible date. Preliminary to considering the Japanese request, the United States government has organized a scientific investigation for the purpose of obtaining scientific data concerning the distribution, migration and feeding habits of the fur seals of the north Pacific ocean, which might be useful in the formulation of a fur seal treaty. Two Canadian scientists have been assigned to participate in the investigations, which are now in progress.

NATURAL GAS

QUESTION AS TO EXCHANGE BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government negotiated with, or is it now prepared to initiate negotiations with, the United States government in order to determine whether or not a large-scale long-term firm agreement is feasible for exchange of natural gas between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this is a question that should be placed on the order paper. May I again remind hon. members that questions asked on the orders of the day should be for the purpose of securing information and should state only such facts as may be necessary to make the question intelligible.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the excise tax on goods enumerated in schedule I of the act that are at present subject to the rate of twenty-five per cent be reduced to fifteen per cent.

2. That the excise tax on furs and articles manufactured of fur be reduced from twenty-five per cent to fifteen per cent.

3. That the excise tax on soft drinks be reduced from thirty per cent to fifteen per cent and that there be assessed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on preparations for household use in making soft drinks.

4. That the excise tax on stoves, washing machines and refrigerators be repealed.

5. That the excise tax on carbonic acid gas be reduced from fifty cents to twenty-five cents per pound.

6. That the excise tax on cigarettes be reduced from two and three-quarter cents to two cents for each five or fraction of five cigarettes contained in each package.

Excise Tax Act

7. That the excise tax on manufactured tobacco be changed from five cents per ounce or fraction of an ounce to eighty cents per pound.

8. That the excise tax on Canadian raw leaf tobacco be reduced from one and one-quarter cents per ounce or fraction of an ounce to eight cents per pound.

9. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:

(a) drinks prepared from milk or eggs;
(b) preserved fruits;
(c) cooking oils and salad oils but not including mayonnaise or salad dressing;
(d) baling wire for baling farm produce;
(e) steel pens for farm animals;
(f) preservatives for use exclusively in treating nets, ropes and lines used in the fishing industry;
(g) clays and earth for use exclusively as filtering materials in the refining of petroleum oils;
(h) goods enumerated in customs tariff items 411a, 437, 476b.

10. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the ninth day of April nineteen hundred and fifty-two.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The parliamentary assistant will know that it is in no personal sense that I begin by asking whether we are to deal with these resolutions without the benefit of the minister. We have raised that question before, and I raise it again now.

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am asking whether we are to deal with these resolutions without the benefit of the minister.

An hon. Member: Don't you think the parliamentary assistant is qualified?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I take it the answer is yes. First of all I should like to ask whether it is proposed to deal with these proposals seriatim or whether the whole is to be regarded as one resolution.

The Chairman: If it is the unanimous wish of the committee that we study these resolutions paragraph by paragraph, of course we will follow that course. Perhaps the hon. member would indicate his idea as to how we should proceed. Is it the wish of the committee that we consider this resolution paragraph by paragraph?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Sinclair: This has been decided in the past. We have four resolutions here, one dealing with the Excise Tax Act, one with the Excise Act, one with income tax and one with succession duties. For convenience they are broken down into paragraphs. The practice has been to consider them paragraph by paragraph; but taking the excise tax resolution as an example, the vote will be on the resolution as a whole.

So far as the other point is concerned, I rather anticipated that it would be raised so I looked up the record to see how these budget resolutions have been piloted through the house in recent years. I find that when the present Minister of Finance was parliamentary assistant to Mr. Ilsley in 1944 and 1945, he did the job of piloting the resolutions through. After all, they are only indications in principle of the changes which will be presented to the house later in the various bills amending these acts. I have been assistant to the present minister for four budgets now, and on each of those occasions it has been the practice to have me discuss the resolutions. In his budget speech the minister spent considerable time on the principle, and of course later when the bills are before the house he will be here to deal with them in detail.

Getting back to the original point on how we will consider these resolutions we have had a vote in this house on this very matter. We have before us four resolutions, each of which is divided into various paragraphs; but the actual vote will be on each entire resolution, not on any paragraph of any one of them.

Mr. Riley: I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant if he intends to proceed with these resolutions in the absence of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Graydon: I understand that in the Department of National Revenue, particularly in the customs and excise division, there is a different method of paying employees for overtime from that followed in connection with the regular monthly or semi-monthly cheques. My information is that in some instances these employees have to wait a very long time for their overtime pay. Will the parliamentary assistant look into that matter and give the committee any information he can find, at an appropriate time? I would like him to indicate how long they have to wait for their overtime pay, and whether there is not some method by which that difficulty could be remedied so that they could get their overtime pay in the ordinary way when they get their regular cheques.

Mr. Sinclair: Of course this question has nothing whatever to do with the four resolutions now before the committee, nor with the Department of Finance. It is a question which can be quite properly asked of the Minister of National Revenue when his estimates are before the committee, because it is purely a matter of administration within that department.

Mr. Graydon: Then perhaps my hon. friend would be a kind of honorary messenger for me and see that this request gets to the right place.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if I might say a word about the procedure we are following in connection with these budget resolutions. I recognize the correctness of the statement made by the parliamentary assistant to the effect that on at least two previous occasions, if not more, the house has decided by a vote that there must be only one vote on the entire resolution, no matter how many paragraphs it contains. No one in this committee will suggest that I agreed with that decision. I disagreed with it strongly; I still think the house made an incorrect decision, but we seem to have no alternative but to abide by it.

Nevertheless I think we must all recognize that it would lead to a most disorderly debate if we were to wander all over the eight or ten paragraphs into which, in the language of the parliamentary assistant, some of these resolutions are broken down. So I suggest that even if we are not given the right to vote on these paragraphs seriatim, they should be discussed seriatim so that it will be in some sort of order. I would urge, Mr. Chairman, that you find some language on the basis of which you could call for the discussion of these various paragraphs one at a time.

One other point has been mentioned, and I would like to say a word on it while I am on my feet. I recognize the fact that in a good many sessions it has been the practice for the parliamentary assistant to do some of the work of the Minister of Finance, particularly at this stage of the budget proceedings. After all, that is what parliamentary assistants are for, to take some of the load off the shoulders of their ministers. I suggest that with respect to some of these resolutions, at least with respect to some of the paragraphs in some of these resolutions, pretty important issues are involved. I would hope that if we reach an issue about which some of us feel pretty strongly, the discussion might be allowed to stand until we can have the minister here.

I hope you will not call me to order if I mention, merely as an example of what I now have in mind, paragraph 5 of the resolution respecting the Income Tax Act. It has to do with medical expenses. As the parliamentary assistant knows, we have already had considerable discussion about that matter in this house, and on one or two occasions he spoke for the Minister of Finance. As the house knows, we got into considerable confusion over that whole matter; and I feel that when we reach that subject we should have the right to discuss it not with the parliamentary assistant but with the responsible minister himself.

That is the paragraph about which I feel most strongly. There may be other items in these resolutions about which other members feel strongly; and I suggest that while it would be in order for us to proceed to discuss some of these matters with the parliamentary assistant, if hon. members really want to discuss important issues with the Minister of Finance, that is our right and privilege.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to add just a word on the question of method. Some of us felt very strongly last year that the decision to take the items concerning the Excise Tax Act, for example, in one resolution worked, shall I say, an unfairness from our point of view, because it meant that members had no opportunity to indicate their objection to any particular item without voting against the whole resolution. However, that was done last year. I am not going to pursue the matter further now except to say that I do not think it should be regarded in any way as being accepted as a precedent. For my part I am merely refraining from putting it to the test at the moment.

I do not propose to make any extended preliminary remarks concerning the Excise Tax Act. After all, we have here in a measure an act of repentance; and repentance, as far as it goes, is an attractive thing. Even though the minister is not here to receive our congratulations on his repentance, we will, as I say, go that length with him.

With regard to the sales tax, of course there was no repentance there. We have a gesture here under paragraph 9 concerning certain articles on which the sales tax has been repealed, and when we come to that paragraph I hope to find out just what that means and just what the amounts involved are. In the meantime, I should like to ask, under paragraph 1, what is the amount involved? What amount was collected under that, and what is it expected we shall realize under the new rate?

Mr. Coldwell: Is the parliamentary assistant going to answer that now?

Mr. Sinclair: Again I am in the hands of the house as to the way in which hon. members want these answers given. I can give them in groups or individually, but if it is done individually I shall be up and down all the time.

The Chairman: It would appear as though, for the convenience of members, it might be preferable to accept the suggestion that has been made by the parliamentary assistant and apparently agreed upon by the spokesmen for the other parties, that is, to consider the resolution as a whole for the purpose of a vote, but for the purposes of detailed discussion to call the paragraphs seriatim.

Mr. Coldwell: I believe it will be a little difficult to stick very closely to that particular method of dealing with this resolution, because one may wish at the beginning to make some remarks that will have general application; and that is what I wish to do.

Generally I think the house welcomes this resolution, because, as the hon. member for Greenwood has said, it is in the nature of an act of repentance for some of the taxes that were imposed last year.

Since the excise and sales tax are the hidden taxes which raise such enormous amounts of money, I was interested to get in the mail today an analysis made by a representative of the Winnipeg Tribune and published in their issue of last Saturday, May 3. Apparently this newspaper sent out one of its representatives to make house-to-house calls in the city of Winnipeg, and he called upon some fifteen modest homes of persons whose incomes were not high. It is interesting to note what this investigator found regarding the tax situation. A break-down showed that the total income of these fifteen homes, the income of the men and women—in one case the joint incomes of a married couple, but usually individuals—was $65,400. The income tax paid amounted to $5,122; city tax amounted to $3,458. Interestingly enough, the computation—leaving out such things as amusement taxes levied by the city—showed that the hidden taxes paid by those who lived in these houses amounted to $5,229. In other words, the hidden taxes on the group of people interviewed, who, as I say, were in the very moderate, or perhaps in one or two cases what I would term the low income groups, were higher than the taxes levied directly through income tax.

I am not going to put it on the record, but a complete break-down will be found in the Saturday edition of the Winnipeg Tribune at page 5. The incomes of these fifteen families range from $1,500 to $5,900, the latter being the highest income in that group. They were a very representative group, and the survey indicates clearly that the hidden taxes are greater than the direct taxes. These are the taxes of which most people thoroughly disapprove. The occupations were: carpenter, switchboard operator, shipper, salesman, stenographer, three school teachers, one music teacher, accountant, assistant bank manager, bus driver, two secretaries, auditor, retired police officer, and agent. Those were the occupants of the fifteen small houses the photographs of which appear on the front page of this newspaper.

The comprehensive analysis and table found on page 5 of the Winnipeg Tribune clearly indicates that the taxes on clothing, cigarettes, household furniture and other appliances exceed the income taxes paid by those individuals. No wonder that many people in the country prefer the direct income tax, because these excise taxes which we are discussing this afternoon do bear very heavily indeed on the people in the moderate and lower income groups.

I know it is argued that the larger the income the more of certain things people buy. But these taxes are levied not only on luxuries but on ordinary household necessities such as boots and shoes and a wide range of furnishings. I am very happy to see that this resolution does to some extent rectify the situation, although I should add only slightly.

The sales tax is being repealed on drinks prepared from milk or eggs, and up to this time they have borne the tax; on preserved fruits, which have borne the tax up to this time. Many times in this house we heard that food was exempt from the sales tax. The tax is being repealed also on cooking oils and salad oils, but not including mayonnaise or salad dressing. It is being repealed on some farm commodities, such as baling wire for baling farm produce, and steel pens for farm animals. The fishing industry will benefit by the repeal of the tax on preservatives for use exclusively in treating nets, ropes and lines. The tax is being repealed also on clays and earth for use exclusively as filtering materials in the refining of petroleum oils, and on the goods enumerated in customs tariff items 411a, 437 and 476b.

What I am pointing out is that I am glad to see that relief, but it does rather discount the statement made in this house from time to time that foods were not taxed. Certain drinks prepared from eggs and milk are used extensively in the feeding of invalids, and preserved fruit is used in a good many homes throughout the country. Of course, salad oils and cooking oils are now used extensively in the preparation of food in households as well as in restaurants and other places. I welcome that change, but it does indicate that although we were told from time to time that the sales tax did not apply to food, here we have a group of foods upon which the sales tax has been levied, and that tax is to an extent being repealed.

[The Chairman.]

What I rose to say was that these hidden taxes in particular have imposed a greater burden, relatively, on the low income and middle income groups than on the higher income groups. I do not want to traverse the ground that I traversed in the budget debate itself, but I am glad that the excise taxes are being repealed in a number of instances or reduced in a number of others. I suppose the tax on automobiles is being reduced substantially because it has been difficult to sell automobiles. I rather suspect, however, that there may be another reason, that reason being that there is a rather important by-election in the county of Ontario in which the great motor centre of Oshawa is situated. I do not know, but very often we find that something of this sort is done when an election or by-election is in sight. It is an interesting coincidence, but of course it may not be more than a coincidence. Far be it from me to suggest—although I might think it—that the government would do anything of that sort in view of forthcoming by-elections.

The reductions that are made in these taxes are welcomed by the committee. The criticism I am making is that in most instances they do not go far enough; we still have these hidden taxes imposed, and they are quite substantial taxes. That is particularly true, of course, with regard to the sales tax. Even if two per cent of it has been earmarked for a desirable purpose, it is still 10 per cent in aggregate, namely eight per cent for federal revenue and two per cent for the special purpose.

While we are supporting the resolution because it reduces the impact of such taxes, I want to say that none the less we feel that this is the wrong way in which to raise revenue for the country; it is a method which is not based on the principle that most of us I am sure really at heart believe in, namely, the principle of the ability to pay. We shall have more to say when the individual paragraphs are discussed.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to say a word in general about the proposals involved in this resolution concerning the excise tax. We too welcome the relief from what had become an almost intolerable situation, that is to be found in the terms of this resolution. I should like to support what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, namely, that the hidden taxes in many instances have become heavier as a burden than are the direct taxes. That fact has been known for quite some time.

There is another evil involved in the imposition of the indirect taxes as we have been using them to raise revenue and it is this. In the main they are imposed at the manufacturer's level. Because of the fact that they are imposed at that level, by the time the consumer pays the final price the tax is pyramided several times. In a number of instances it can be proved without doubt that, in addition to the tax received by the government, there is also a shadow tax which pushes the price up but which the government does not get. It goes to inflate profits.

While I am not against a reasonable profit, I certainly am opposed to any taxation scheme that will inflate those profits and cause the ultimate consumer to have to pay more than he ought to pay for the goods that he buys, particularly those things that he requires to buy from day to day and from year to year in the ordinary process of living. That is one of the great objections that we have to the excise taxes as they are used by this government.

As to the economic effects of the taxes, I think it can be shown that the government could use the ultimate purchaser's tax, receive the same revenue and yet not do the economy half the harm that they are doing to it with these indirect or hidden taxes imposed at the manufacturer's level. To get away from that pyramiding I would strongly urge that we avoid hidden taxes and adopt an ultimate purchaser's tax. I know the arguments against that procedure. I know that if the consumer pays the tax and sees that it is added to the marked price, he wants to kick the dickens out of the government. I know that argument; but it does not get away from the fact that it is preferable that the tax be collected as an ultimate purchaser's tax and be remitted to the government rather than have the bad effects that the present tax method now imposes upon the economy.

It is often argued that if the excise tax is made to apply at the consumer's level we shall have to deal with many more people and will make many more people collectors of taxes. As a matter of fact that is true. But most people throughout the country who are in business are collectors of taxes for the government anyway. They are certainly collecting income taxes. They are having to make deductions at the source, and they have to make volumes of returns to the government. It would be a simple additional matter for them to make a return on the ultimate purchaser's tax. If the employers of labour across the country who are in business are given to understand that they are asked to do this in the interests of the economy of the country rather than for the purpose of imposing upon them an additional burden, I am quite sure that they would not protest at having to do the job.

However, as has already been said, if the government persists in following its present taxation methods it will certainly persist in pyramiding prices beyond reasonable levels. That is a thing that concerns a great many people across this country.

As I say, we welcome the relief that has been provided in the resolution. I was greatly disappointed to see that the plea I made a year ago, and also this year during the budget debate went unheeded. On both occasions I asked that careful consideration be given to placing on the free list such materials as the concentrated vitamin E products. I do not see them under paragraph 9. I want to point out that since I spoke last year on this subject in the course of the budget debate I have investigated much further into this whole matter and have concluded that the work being done on these concentrated vitamin E products is exceedingly valuable. It is the type of work that cannot be done by any other method, apparently. I went down to the University of Ottawa to hear Dr. Shute present an illustrated lecture on this subject. He used coloured photographs—which, by the way, cannot be camouflaged. Coloured photographs are difficult to touch over; they therefore showed the actual situation as they existed before and after. His lecture, together with other information that I have been able to get, convinced me beyond a shadow of a doubt that the di-alpha tocopherols are exceedingly valuable in treating heart and vascular diseases. There are in Canada today many people who are receiving great relief from those conditions through the use of heroic doses of di-alpha tocopherol in various forms. I am quite well aware of the fact that the Canadian Medical Association has not yet placed its seal of approval on di-alpha tocopherol and the claims of the discoverers with regard to its uses in heart and vascular cases. I realize that, but I am also fully aware of the fact that a reasonable investigation has not yet been made by the medical association. That is a fact, and it can be proven. But the results of the treatment can be proven also. They show beyond doubt that this substance is most valuable. The tragedy of the situation is that when cases become quite advanced the only way relief can come to the patient is through his taking these heroic doses day after day for the rest of his life. That means a very large outlay, because the cost of the substance is high. It has to be brought across the boundary line from Rochester, where it is distilled from wheat germ; and it has to pay a duty. Before it can be brought into the country for sale it has to pay a sales tax on the duty paid price, which boosts the cost to these people beyond their ability to pay.

An association has been formed in this country known as the Vitamin E Society of Canada. As a matter of fact, one of the members on the Liberal side of the house is the president. He and his own family have had evidence of the value of this substance in the treatment of heart and vascular diseases. It seems to me that the pleas of a group of 1,500 people who make up that society should not be just turned aside lightly. That is not all. It can be shown that more than 1,500 medical men in the country are prescribing the substance—well, a year ago they were prescribing it; if they have continued, it means in fact that they have found it is valuable in the treatment of these heart and vascular disorders.

I am hoping that before we get through the discussion of these resolutions the minister, or his assistant, will give assurance that careful consideration will be given to putting this substance on the free list so far as sales tax and customs duty are concerned, so that these poor people who have to buy the material to get any relief whatever, or indeed to keep themselves alive, may get away from paying the very heavy price they now pay for it.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I can answer two or three questions now. The hon. member for Greenwood asked first of all the total revenue involved in the past year in this particular excise tax. The amount is a little more than $150 million. The revenue reduction during the present fiscal year, 1952-53, will be $55,900,000, and a reduction when applied over the full year—that is next year—will be $61,700,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that the reduction?

Mr. Sinclair: That is the reduction. The total revenue for the past year was a little over $150 million.

So far as the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar are concerned, I regret I did not read this article in the Winnipeg Tribune, but two things struck me immediately about it. I think that any statistician in the country would be very dubious about any survey made on an examination of only fifteen samples. Here our bureau of statistics like to take a very large number of cases in surveys so that a proper average can be obtained. The second point which I am a little surprised at is the ability of a newspaperman to actually get down to a figure apparently as closely as he has done to show the impact on the individual of the federal sales tax and excise tax which are not levied, of course, at the retail level but back at the manufacturer's level, where the individual has no knowledge. This is a calculation which the statisticians in our department and in the department of the bureau of statistics have considerable difficulty in estimating.

The third point is of course perhaps a good demonstration of the difficulties and fallacies of sampling just one group—in this case low-income families. For example, take a married man with two children. For ease of calculation we will take two children not in receipt of family allowances, so there will not be any compensating factor of exemption for family allowances. This man has to earn more than $2,800 a year before he pays any income tax. So that you could say that that man is entirely taxed indirectly. He is paying one hundred per cent indirect taxes to the federal government. That would be a pretty alarming statement. On the other hand, we can say with pride that this situation develops because this man receives the highest income tax exemptions of any country in the world.

At the other extreme this reporter could have gone to the rich men in Winnipeg—I do not know which part of the city they live in—and interviewed them, and he would have found that about ninety-nine per cent of their taxes were direct taxes, because of course the direct income tax is so heavily progressive in the upper brackets that—

Mr. Coldwell: The impact of the higher taxes would not be as great on that man as on the man in the low-income group.

Mr. Sinclair: Mainly because the impact of this violently progressive system of income tax is so terrific on that man. The best way to get the national average, to see the national impact of the direct taxes against indirect taxes, is by using the illustration which I am very grateful to the hon. member for Peace River for provoking me into finding out. That is the study of the change in incidence of tax since this government took power. I mentioned that in my speech on the budget. In 1935 over 23 per cent of our total tax revenues—and after all, the tax revenue comes out of all the people of Canada—were direct. The rest were indirect, or 77 per cent. Today 62 per cent of the federal government tax revenues are from direct taxes. So we have advanced into the field of direct taxation more and more; and as we are able to increase income tax exemptions, for example, those members of the opposition can quote all the more alarming examples by taking people over or under income tax, in which case they pay one hundred per cent indirect say in the low field; but I think the national average has shown the direction towards direct taxation which this government is following.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar went off the first item onto the sales tax item. I do not know whether I should answer him now, or whether I should preserve an orderly discussion and keep my reply until we reach paragraph 9. He mentioned, for example, that perhaps there are many foods which are not now exempt from sales tax. Well, if he will read schedule III of the Excise Tax Act he will have some difficulty in finding any food purchased by the ordinary householder of Canada—

Mr. Coldwell: I was speaking in the past tense.

Mr. Sinclair: Even in the best example he used he made a fairly understandable error. He talked about the item as of preserved fruits. Actually, preserves in the ordinary sense used by the family have been exempt for many years. Preserved fruit made in the Okanagan valley out of Zuka melons used as fruit filling for cakes for example. They are not candied fruits, and certainly are not preserves, and this item is applicable to that very small field.

So far as salad oils and cooking oils are concerned the hon. member was quite right in pointing out why this has been done. Formerly, and not so long ago, the household used solid fats such as lard and shortening, and the restaurants used cooking oils. Today the housewives also have gone into the use of cooking oils and liquids rather than solids. This is now recognized by the item in the sales tax resolution, paragraph 9.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): That would include margarine?

Mr. Sinclair: I am afraid the hon. member has not given this the study he usually gives these things, for as far as margarine is concerned I think it is the only basic food in Canada which does pay a 10 per cent sales tax. However, I do not intend on this resolution to be provoked into a discussion of margarine.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Margarine is a product of a certain cooking oil which is imported into this country.

Mr. Sinclair: These are cooking oils and salad oils. Margarine as a manufacturer's product is not an oil. It is actually in solid form and is taxable at 10 per cent sales tax under the federal government's Excise Tax Act.

As far as these drinks are concerned, we have had a most interesting discussion in past years. There were certain prepared drinks which were made out of fresh milk. Those were exempt because milk always has been exempt, as have eggs. Some manufacturers were going into the business of canning or bottling these drinks and it was contended that they too should be exempt, and this was done. The manufacturers were also making other drinks out of dried milk and dried eggs and they also contended that their products should not be taxed, and we have agreed now to this.

The hon. member probably has the schedule to the Excise Tax Act before him and he will see that the only foods, if you can call them foods, still under the schedule subject to sales tax are various fancy relishes, pickles and things like that. A continuous pressure is being exerted to have them too exempt.

The hon. member commented on baling wire. I think the decision this year is as a result of the discussion last year when several hon. members from the prairies pointed out the inconsistency of exempting baling twine and not baling wire. Not so many years ago only baling twine was used and it is only recently that baling wire has been used to any national extent. Now that hon. members have drawn the attention of the government to the fact that this is a necessary agricultural product, it is included.

The hon. member for Peace River again brought up this interesting question of the incidence of the indirect taxes when applied at the manufacturing level. Perhaps I have had some little effect on him because he seems to remember one major point I brought up and perhaps one minor one. Undoubtedly a tax imposed at the manufacturing level is the easiest and cheapest to collect. There are comparatively few manufacturers. Their sales are not generally made for cash but rather by invoice and there is an accurate record of their sales. The cost of collecting a tax is always important because it would be ridiculous to have a tax when the cost of collection was excessive.

Mr. Low: Are the manufacturers paid for making the deduction at the source?

Mr. Sinclair: No. The second point was with regard to public acceptance. The hon. member contended that if the public realized that the tax was being imposed they would be more hostile. That is not borne out by the experience of my own province. When the province first imposed a direct sales tax there was great resentment, but when I go home now I am always amazed to see how readily the people pay it. They realize that the tax is put to a good use of which they approve. There is perhaps a third reason why the federal government has not since the war intervened in the indirect field at the retail level. If the provinces are to have a sales tax they are restricted to a tax at that level.

The other point, which is a matter of considerable importance as far as the efficacy of collection is concerned, is that manufacturers generally make only the one type of goods. That is, a manufacturer would manufacture an article which is either taxable or not taxable. On the other hand, the little retailer handles dozens of articles, some subject to sales tax, some subject to excise tax and others subject to no tax at all. There would be a real accounting job forced on that man if he had to collect tax on his sales, and also the opportunity for evasion would be considerable. It has been a great problem for the provincial administrations which have sales taxes with exemptions.

Some of the states in the United States have found it better to do away with exemptions entirely, to impose a turnover tax of a certain percentage. But that immediately would give rise to members of parliament or members of the legislatures asking for the removal of that tax on food or other things and soon you would be converting from a straight turnover tax to a sales tax.

Then there is the matter of drugs. The minister and his budget committee have given further consideration to extending the list of drugs to be exempted. As was pointed out earlier in this debate some years ago the 5 per cent average medical deduction was reduced to 4 per cent in order to cover the cost of drugs. Consideration has been given to the type of drug which is expensive and in fairly wide national demand, the type of drug which is not used so much for the cure of a disease as for its continual treatment. I suppose insulin is the best example.

The minister has examined the various representations which have been made. Naturally neither the minister nor his budget committee are medical experts and they must rely to a great extent on the advice of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Canadian Medical Association, who after all are the ones who are using these drugs for their patients across Canada. Some of the recent drugs which have been suggested for exemption include substitute blood plasma, aureomycin and streptomycin, and vitamins of high concentration. The minister is giving continual study to these requests and as the opportunity offers the list of drug exemptions is extended.

Mr. McLure: A few moments ago the parliamentary assistant introduced a new matter when he said that oleomargarine was the only foodstuff that pays the 10 per cent sales tax. How much per pound is paid on oleomargarine in the way of sales tax? By asking that question I hope to find out what I have never been able to find out, the cost of a pound of margarine.

Mr. Sinclair: Obviously I have not those figures before me because margarine does not come within the scope of this resolution. I am informed that the actual tax on margarine is around three cents per pound. It varies as the price varies. Once again may I say that that subject is not covered by the resolution. I shall be glad to answer any questions that are within the scope of the resolution.

Mr. McLure: At three cents per pound that would be placing the cost of the manufactured article at about 27 or 28 cents, which is ridiculous as we know. However, that is not what I want to speak about at the present time. The excise tax on furs and articles manufactured of fur has been reduced from 25 to 15 per cent. When this tax was imposed they imposed it on the raw article. Then another tax is imposed on the processed article, and then there is the sales tax besides.

A farmer finds that he has to pay a tax of $3 on an article which cost him $20 to raise, and that leaves his return at $17 for the raw article. When it is processed another tax is imposed on the tax already paid. These taxes are pyramided and taxed over again. As I have said on several occasions, the trouble is that those who imposed this tax had no idea what they were taxing. But they still continue using the same method and tax this article twice when other articles are not taxed in the same way. They tax it in the raw state, in the processed state and then as a finished garment.

Mr. Sinclair: I cannot quite understand the hon. member's first point. Schedule III of the Excise Tax Act shows the exemptions from excise tax and at the bottom he will find "furs, raw." I am informed they have been that way for many years.

Mr. McLure: I know that there is a tax.

Mr. Sinclair: There is no federal tax on raw furs.

Mr. McLure: No federal tax?

Mr. Sinclair: There is no federal tax on raw furs.

Mr. McLure: I beg to differ with you. If you are correct I should have quite a premium coming back to me. I have already paid it for this season.

Mr. Sinclair: I would suggest that the hon. member go to the office where he paid it. It might well be a provincial royalty, which some of the provinces have. So far as the federal Excise Tax Act is concerned, if the hon. member will refer to page 38, schedule III, at the bottom of the page, he will find that raw furs, as are almost all raw products for manufacture in Canada, are exempt from tax. There is of course an excise tax on the processed article. The excise tax which we are now dealing with covers a very wide field of manufactured and processed goods in Canada, but there is no federal tax on raw furs.

Mr. McLure: Let me try to prove it this way. A farmer has raised a fox and has a silver fox skin. We will say that it costs $20. That is a raw skin. The moment he sells it or offers it for sale to be processed and made into a garment there is a 15 per cent tax applied on that raw article with the result that the purchaser's price is reduced and the farmer only receives $17. I should like to have that explained. I have asked for an explanation on other occasions but it just comes back to the same thing. Surely there is some explanation, or admit that that is so.

Mr. Sinclair: All I can read is the law. First of all there is the fact that there is no tax payable on raw furs, which are exempt under schedule III. Then I would refer to page 13 of the office consolidation of the Excise Tax Act. Section 80A reads as follows:

There shall be imposed, levied and collected, an excise tax equal to 25 per cent—

That is now changed to 15 per cent.

—of the current market value of all dressed furs, dyed furs and dressed and dyed furs . . .

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): With respect to the importation of furs, a large quantity of furs is being imported into Canada at the present time. Is there any possibility of having an embargo placed upon Russian furs entering the Canadian market?

Mr. Sinclair: That is an entirely different matter under the customs tariff resolution. It is not an item of the present resolution. There is a resolution concerning the customs tariff, but according to my recollection it does not include any reference to that.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I shall bring it up later.

Mr. Johnston: I want to ask a question for information. First let me say with respect to the tax on cigarettes that I understand the tax was reduced—

Mr. Sinclair: May I raise a point? Did we agree to take up the resolution item by item? As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, to dash around from item to item is a little confusing. The cigarette item is well along in the resolution.

Mr. Johnston: I am speaking generally.

The Chairman: Order. I understood from the remarks made by the leader of the C.C.F. group that a general discussion of the resolution would take place first. Judging by the remarks of the hon. member for Queens, his questions pertain to a specific paragraph, and the hon. member for Bow River has addressed himself to the tax on cigarettes. If the general discussion is concluded possibly we might discipline ourselves and agree to study the resolution paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. Cannon: Before we finish the general discussion—

The Chairman: I understand it is not finished yet. The hon. member for Bow River has some remarks of a general character.

Mr. Johnston: We had been speaking about margarine and everything else and I thought we might do a little smoking for a while. There were two or three other items to which I wanted to refer but I will make my remarks when we come to the particular section.

Mr. Fraser: The parliamentary assistant mentioned that some drugs and vitamins of high vitamin content were exempt. Would that include super A's with a strength of 50,000 units?

Mr. Sinclair: Are you referring to the list I read?

Mr. Fraser: No, I am referring to your remarks in answer to one of the members.

Mr. Sinclair: I gave a list of the drugs to which consideration is now being given, but the ones actually included at the moment are insulin, radium, cortisone, ACTH and liver extract.

Mr. Fraser: Then the minister also mentioned certain vitamins.

Mr. Sinclair: No. I read a list of drugs of this type which had been put forward for further consideration.

Mr. Cannon: On the general question of the sales tax, I wish to bring to the attention of the minister and his parliamentary assistant on behalf of my constituents an application they have made that certain articles used by fishermen should be exempt from the sales tax. The general principle that commercial fishermen should benefit by exemption from the sales tax has been on our statutes for some time. At the present time motors for fishing boats, fish nets, fish lines, cordages and barrels for salt fish are exempt. I have had some correspondence with respect to this matter with the Department of Finance, which so far has not produced any success, suggesting that rubber boots, rubber suits, fishermen's work clothes and gasoline and oil used by commercial fishermen in their fishing operations should also be exempt from the sales tax. The fact is recognized that fishermen's living conditions and income are not any too good particularly in my county where the fish they catch are all processed into smoked and salt fish which are sold at a comparatively low price. I submit if this request were granted it would not make much difference from the point of view of revenue for the department but would mean a lot to the fishermen who have been asking for it insistently and have written to me on several occasions in that connection.

Mr. Sinclair: Since this matter refers specifically to item 9 of the resolution, perhaps I might defer my reply until we reach that item.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask a question?

The Chairman: Order. Do we now start to discuss the resolution paragraph by paragraph?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes.

The Chairman: Then we limit ourselves to paragraph 1.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Agreed.

The Chairman: The other paragraphs will be called later.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): What about the income tax?

The Chairman: We are now dealing with the Excise Tax Act. There are also resolutions concerning the Income Tax Act, succession duties and so on. I understand then that hon. members agree to limit themselves to discussing paragraph 1 of this Excise Tax Act resolution.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to be in order at all times, but as a matter of information, since margarine was mentioned a moment ago, I should like to know under what item that will come. I sent to my secretary for certain information and she sent me the wrong papers. The information I have entirely discredits the parliamentary assistant.

The Chairman: Margarine was only mentioned incidentlly. If any discussion is to be entertained in that regard it would be on paragraph 9. We are now on paragraph 1.

Mr. Knowles: Can the parliamentary assistant say whether, when this resolution and the section of the bill based thereon are passed, any 25 per cent excise taxes at all will remain?

Mr. Sinclair: There will be none at all.

Mr. Johnston: I would like to know whether the companies, say the automobile manufacturers, have reduced their prices to the full extent of the tax reduction. If the government and members of parliament generally see fit to reduce a tax because of its effect on the buying public, then I think it only fair that this house should make sure that tax reduction is passed on to the consumer. I do not want to give away any cabinet secrets but my information is that there was an understanding with the government that in the case of some of these tax reductions the full amount of the reduction would be passed on to the consuming public. My observation, together with items I have seen in the newspapers concerning the prices of cars, would lead me to believe that this full tax reduction has not been reflected in the cash price of cars. I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant whether that is so. We should know.

Mr. Sinclair: In the first place the government does not make any agreements with any industries in regard to tax changes. Such changes are first announced in the house after they have been given consideration by the minister and later by the cabinet. The second point is that the government does not set the prices of automobiles.

Mr. Johnston: I did not suggest that you should set the prices of automobiles, but I certainly think you have an obligation to see that tax reductions are reflected in prices.

Mr. Sinclair: It would be difficult to do that without setting prices. This matter has been raised in the house; and as hon. members know the representations on this matter for reduction of tax were made partly by the public, partly by the dealers and partly by the manufacturers, who said a reduction in taxation was necessary in order to sell cars. My own feeling from watching the advertisements is that in the light cars, for example, the reduction in advertised prices has been about $150 or $160, which is about 10 per cent of the manufacturers' selling price on such cars. The competition in the automobile business today I think is sufficient safeguard to ensure that manufacturers and dealers will put their products in their showroom windows at the lowest possible prices.

Mr. Johnston: That does not answer the question I asked. I am not mentioning the car dealers or manufacturers to direct any particular criticism at them; I am using them only as an illustration because when I was speaking the other evening the Minister of National Health and Welfare asked me, "What about cars?" According to the article to which I was referring on that occasion, speaking from memory the price of a $2,300 car had been reduced by $140. On the basis of that clipping, which I later sent over to the minister on his suggestion, the tax reduction of $140 had been based on the price of $2,300, and certainly that is not a 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member knows, of course, that the 10 per cent is on the selling price at the factory.

Mr. Johnston: That is right; and as the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I were sitting at his desk discussing this newspaper clipping we came to the conclusion that the price indicated was the manufacturer's price. That is the point I want to make. In the interests of the country I do not think we should reduce a tax and then have a company, I do not care whether it is a manufacturer of automobiles or anything else, make a profit on that tax reduction. I believe any reductions should be passed on to the consuming public in full, and I think the government has both a moral and a legal obligation to see that this is done.

Mr. Sinclair: I am not here to defend the automobile industry or the car dealers—

Mr. Johnston: I want it understood that I am not trying to criticize the automobile industry as such.

Mr. Sinclair: Most of us who understand that the tax is paid on the manufacturers' selling price realize that the reductions have been pretty well in line with the 10 per cent reduction in tax. However, I might point out a fact which has not been given very much publicity. Individual dealers who had cars on hand have suffered quite a loss because of this reduction in tax. They have not publicly complained about it; but when they acquire a car from one manufacturer they pay the tax, and the cars they had on hand on April 8 were cars on which they had paid a tax of 25 per cent. Far from trying to squeeze the public I think the car dealers of Canada, in giving these reductions immediately, showed they were willing to pass along these reductions despite the fact that they had paid the higher tax on those cars they had in stock.

Mr. Johnston: I do not want any misunderstanding in this regard. I can quite understand that a dealer with two or three cars in stock at that time might have taken a loss; but this tax is not applicable to just one or two cars, or one or two cans of tobacco a dealer may have had on his shelf. This is a process which is going to continue for quite a long time, and the parliamentary assistant should not try to suggest that it only affects one or two cars. It will affect every car a dealer gets for perhaps a year or more.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In my part of British Columbia the dealers passed the reduction on to the public. That was stated in half a dozen different newspapers, and the dealers were commended on having done so and given the public a square deal. Of course the dealers out there are not chisellers; they do what is in the public interest.

Mr. Wright: I thought I heard the parliamentary assistant say there had been no complaints from dealers who had been caught with more than the usual stock of cars on hand when this tax change took place.

Mr. Sinclair: I said there had been no public complaints. Of course the dealers made representations, but they have not been crying to high heaven in the press that they were caught with these cars on hand. The next morning they offered reductions.

Mr. Wright: In the northern part of western Canada where the harvest was not completed last year many dealers were caught with very large stocks of 1951 cars they were unable to sell. Then the budget came along this spring, before the crop was harvested, and there was a reduction of 10 per cent. Many of those dealers are in rather serious difficulties. Because of the late harvest last year they were unable to sell their stock, and they have had to take a loss on the 1951 cars together with the budget reduction of 10 per cent, which means that on many of those cars they will lose from $300 to $500. I have had letters in regard to this matter from a number of dealers, and have forwarded them to the minister.

Mr. Sinclair: I would question just one thing; that is, how they can lose $300 to $500 by this 10 per cent reduction in excise tax.

Mr. Wright: I said they had that loss when they had to sell a 1951 car in 1952, along with the tax reduction. Of course I am not saying the government is responsible for that, but I am saying they have suffered this loss. It is made greater by the fact that they were unable to dispose of their cars last fall and had them on hand this spring when the tax was reduced. The loss is much greater than it would have been in an ordinary year, and therefore this has been a serious matter for them.

Mr. Knowles: When the automobile people made their representations to the government prior to the date of the budget, asking that consideration be given to reducing the excise tax, I believe they also made representations with respect to the level at which the tax is applied. I know the parliamentary assistant has already discussed this matter in general terms in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River earlier this afternoon, but I should be glad to hear from him any words he may care to offer in connection with this practice as applied specifically to automobiles.

I raise it in this connection for one or two reasons which I shall indicate. I understand that the tax is imposed at the manufacturers' level. That means, so I am told, that many if not all dealers throughout the country, when they take cars into stock, have to pay the excise tax in advance, even though those cars may be held for some time. The results of that are at least two. One is the result that the member for Peace River and others have referred to from time to time, namely the pyramiding of the cost to the eventual consumer. The other is the amount of money which dealers—and they are not all big fellows—may have to tie up in the form of these excise tax payments which they must make in advance.

I understand that some representations were made by the automobile dealers requesting that a change be made in that respect. They asked that the tax be not levied until the actual sale of the new car is made by the dealer. These people point out that the argument that the parliamentary assistant used today about it being difficult to apply these taxes generally at the last point because of the wide variety of goods and services that are sold in a country like ours hardly applies to automobiles. The automobile is a fairly substantial piece of machinery; every car is well registered, and automobiles do not go astray as public property does sometimes. In that case it should be quite feasible to apply the tax at the point where the car is sold by the dealer to the final purchaser.

One of the reasons that I should like to see it done is to see what the result would be in terms of advantage to the dealers and advantage to the final consumer. I think it would be of advantage to both. It would be a help to the dealers in not having to tie up in advance that money which is simply money paid to the government. It should result also in a lower price for the car to the consumer if the tax does not appear until that final stage. I wonder whether any consideration was given to that specific request from the automobile dealers with reference to this tax on automobiles.

Mr. Sinclair: This problem is not unique with automobile dealers. It may be a little more striking, but it does not affect the automobile dealer any more than the dealer, for example, in electrical appliances. A dealer in electrical appliances may have $50,000 worth of stock in his store on which exactly the same excise tax has been paid at the manufacturers' level. He has had to finance that extra carrying charge in exactly the same way. It looks a little more striking in the case of the automobile dealer because he had fewer units, but I am quite sure the aggregate of a big appliance store as against an ordinary automobile dealer is about the same.

It gets back to the basic problem of whether the tax is to be levied at the manufacturers' level, where it is easily controllable and easily collected, or at the retail level. The first break in the principle, of course, would immediately result in demands from the next largest group of appliance dealers, and so on all the way down. Actually the problem of financing the price paid to the manufacturer is always with the retailers, and that price has always included not only the selling price of the manufacturers but whatever federal or local taxes may be embedded in it. So far as the automobile trade is concerned, because of the very great difficulty some of them had experienced in recent months, they have become highly competitive. The pyramiding to which reference has been made may occur when it is a seller's market, when the dealers can sell anything they get and when, by rule of thumb, they put on 25 per cent or 50 per cent mark-up on anything they buy. Once selling becomes competitive however, and it certainly has been in the automobile field and the appliance field in the last six months, then the dealer can no longer operate in that manner. The retailer has to consider the value of any trade-in; he is aware of the actual mark-up he is getting and sets his price accordingly.

I could not ask for any better evidence of that than from the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones), who must have had a very vivid experience in the last six months in pricing in that field.

Mr. Knowles: There are two comments I want to make. First, I think it would obviously require a great many more electric irons to be in stock to equal $50,000 than it would in the case of automobiles, if the hypothetical example of the parliamentary assistant is used. The other thing I wish to say is that the main argument the parliamentary assistant uses against making this change is that if this break were made and it were done for one group, in due course he would probably have to do it for others. I do not see that it is an argument against taking a step in the right direction to say that you may have to take further steps in that same direction later. Despite the satisfaction of the parliamentary assistant that he has answered this question on former occasions and has answered it again today, I do not feel that he has yet dealt with it satisfactorily so far as we are concerned. Our contention is that by imposing these taxes at the manufacturers' level, it is necessary for the dealers to finance them and this policy does lend itself to pyramiding so far as the consumer is concerned.

Mr. Coldwell: If I may follow the hon. member, I should like to emphasize one point that the parliamentary assistant overlooked. He speaks of a retailer having $50,000 worth of electrical appliances, and that is true. It would, however, be a fairly large retailer, whereas throughout the country you find a good many small automobile dealers in the smaller places who might have $50,000 worth of automobiles which they are pledged to sell. In other words, many of the automobile dealers are small people in the sense of having capital, whereas any electrical dealer with $50,000 worth of stock would be fairly large and have a fairly large amount of capital.

The whole problem, as I see it, is that automobile dealers who perform a useful service in the smaller communities in servicing automobiles are often people with a relatively small amount of capital, and the imposition of this tax at the level where it is now imposed does make it difficult for them to finance; that is the whole argument. It is not that we want to extend this principle, but you have a group of people who are in a peculiar position in relation to their capital assets and their ability to pay this particular tax, and at the same time perform a service that is necessary in the community. I think that is the plea that has been made.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have a question which is somewhat similar. I am told that taxes were collected on cars held by dealers on consignment. My understanding is that the tax is payable when a sale takes place. I take it when a car is on consignment no sale has taken place.

Mr. Sinclair: The member raises a case which I remember of one of the larger automobile concerns in Canada who, anticipating perhaps some reduction in taxes, sent the cars to their dealers on consignment for a month before the budget. They said that because of that they had not made a sale to the dealer and there was no need to pay the tax until an actual sale had been made. The Department of Justice ruled that under the actual wording of the act the tax was payable at the time of delivery by the manufacturer, so taxes have been assessed on those cars just as on the cars from other automobile firms which were sent forward in the old way.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask the parliamentary assistant this question? Does the provincial government pay this excise tax?

Mr. Sinclair: You mean the provincial government buying cars? For example, on their cars?

Mr. Ferrie: No; buying equipment. Never mind buying cars.

Mr. Sinclair: It will depend.

Mr. Ferrie: On their road equipment, their snow equipment?

Mr. Sinclair: That is exempt.

Mr. Ferrie: The parliamentary assistant says that is exempt?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Ferrie: If the provincial government is exempt, why is not municipal government exempt?

Mr. Sinclair: On my notes here I have the hon. member's name marked down because he raised this problem last year and the arguments against this are the same as those which I advanced last year. We have had the discussions almost every year on that subject. The extension of the right of exemption from excise tax and sales tax to the provincial government is as old as the sales tax. The municipalities are creations of the provincial government. The reasons that I advanced last year still apply. The government has reviewed the situation and has decided that the exemption should be extended only to the provincial governments.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to come back to my question. I am a great believer in people paying their taxes, but one runs into cases where governments seem to be—what shall I say—without conscience in the matter of taxes. Today things are being done which in ordinary dealings between individuals would be regarded as intolerable. I know there is a law to be kept. I know that the parliamentary assistant said that the argument of the Department of Justice is that the tax became payable on delivery, apparently regardless of sale. It seems a curious point, but I am not going to set myself up in argument with the Department of Justice. The question I want to ask is this. Were there distinctions? Were there cases where cars had been delivered on consignment, let us say under legal circumstances A, where they were not regarded as taxable and in other cases where, under legal circumstances B, owing to some slight difference no doubt in the agreement, it was held that they were not taxable on the ground, I presume, that delivery had not taken place?

Mr. Sinclair: I would prefer to give a full answer to this question when the excise tax bill is actually before us; but the information I have at the moment is that some companies actually rented warehouse space, moved cars from their factories into those warehouses without consignment to any dealer, and actually held the cars themselves; in other words, they distributed them around in order to get them away from the factory. I am informed—but I would want to check that information and give the exact details when the bill is before us—that the tax was not payable; that is, that the 25 per cent tax was not payable on those cars. However, I will give the exact details as to the number of cars involved, if any, when the bill is before us next week.

The Chairman: Is discussion concluded on paragraph 1?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have one question, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry I was not here for all of the discussion. What was the tax before 1951 on these items? Was it all 15 per cent?

Mr. Sinclair: It was not quite all the same. It was 15 per cent on most but it was 30 per cent on soft drinks, candy, chocolate and chewing gum. We are now back to the 1950 status, with the improvement that the 30 per cent tax on confectionery is now also 15 per cent.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On luggage?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What was the tax on luggage?

Mr. Sinclair: It was 15 per cent then. In 1947-48, of course, or up to 1948 we had a 35 per cent luxury tax, a war tax. That was removed in 1948 or 1949. But actually, before these increases were made the excise tax was 15 per cent across the board, with the exception of soft drinks, chocolates, chewing gum and candy where it was 30 per cent. Now it is all 15 per cent.

The Chairman: Shall we go on to paragraph 2?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): On paragraph 2, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: We are still on paragraph 1. I asked a moment ago if discussion had terminated on paragraph 1. The hon. member for St. John's West said he had just one more question. Now I am asking whether we can move on to paragraph 2. Is it agreed that we should do so?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to address himself to paragraph 1, he may still do so. Shall we move on to paragraph 2?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to know the amount of the tax collected and the amount of the anticipated loss.

Mr. Sinclair: The tax collected last year, the balance, was $4,792,000. The effect of the reduction this year will be $2·1 million and a full year $2·3 million. These figures are all out of balance as far as straight mathematical proportion is concerned because of the lag in collections. The month of March is not due, for example, or is not in the hands of the government until May. That is why this figure is out of proportion. You will remember last year the figure on soft drinks, where the big consumption is in the summer months. The reductions in revenue are not strictly proportionate owing to the fact that three-quarters of the year is involved in one case and the full year in another.

Mr. Noseworthy: Did I understand the parliamentary assistant to say that there is no tax on raw furs as such?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Noseworthy: There is a 15 per cent tax now on the raw furs when they are cleaned and dried?

Mr. Sinclair: When they are dressed and dyed.

Mr. Noseworthy: There is another 15 per cent excise tax when those furs are made up into the finished article?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Noseworthy: For instance, into fur coats?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Noseworthy: There is what—a 10 per cent tax?

Mr. Sinclair: A 10 per cent sales tax.

Mr. Noseworthy: There are just the two taxes?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

The Chairman: Shall we move on to paragraph 3?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I think the government could well consider further reducing this tax. It would be a great help to the trappers in the northwest who are having a very hard time this year. There are great changes in the use of furs, in styles and so on. The hon. member mentioned silver fox. A few years ago they were worth $50. Today you can buy them from the trapper for $50 a dozen up where I am. Mink, which formerly were expensive, are now greatly reduced.

Mr. Sinclair: They are not yet essential to life.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Then as to stone marten, I discussed this matter with a trapper the other day at Lower Post, B.C., and at Fort St. John, my home. He had 220 pelts of stone marten and found no market for them above $20. This time a year ago, or two years ago, those pelts were worth $50. We have the finest fur in the world being produced in a state of nature up in the northern part of Canada and also being produced under farming conditions. It would be a good idea to reduce all kinds of taxes on these furs, including the sales tax, so that people would be encouraged to wear more of them. Another thing to be remembered is that furs are not a luxury. They may be considered as such down in the southern part of Ontario or in places with warmer climates. But in western Canada fur garments are vitally necessary and they should be made as cheap as possible to the consumer.

Mr. McLure: There is an excise tax on raw furs. Either the government are collecting it or somebody else is collecting it for them. I want to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant this fact. This is before the reduction of the tax to 15 per cent, and when it was 25 per cent. I have a couple of items here. The owner of these did not want to sell them at the low price at which he thought raw furs were going, so he decided that he would have them made up. He shipped the raw skins to have them tanned. One bunch of them were valued at $20, less than the cost of producing them. On those skins at $20 there was an excise tax of $5. Then there was another bunch priced at $17, and the excise tax on those raw skins was $4.65 each. That was on the raw furs. Then they were tanned. After that they were processed, and finally he paid the 10 per cent sales tax. To say that there is no excise tax on raw furs is to say something that is not true. Somebody is making a mistake. We are paying it, whether the government is getting it or not. If it is sidetracked, that is a different thing.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps that is where the surplus comes from.

Mr. McLure: Well, it would make quite a surplus.

The Chairman: Shall we move on to paragraph 3, excise tax on soft drinks?

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether in any discussions that took place between the soft drink people and the government, prior to the date of the budget, any comments were made as to whether or not any tax reduction would be passed on to the consumer? I recognize the position he took a while ago this afternoon when he said to someone to my left—I think the hon. member for Bow River—that the government could not enter into any agreement or undertaking with any group of people in this country as to what would happen as a result of budgetary changes; hence, the way I put my question. Were there any discussions on this point? Did the government have any reason to believe that if it reduced the tax on soft drinks the price to the consumer would be reduced accordingly?

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, no such promise or undertaking was made. I may say in this connection that the representations which were made were made, I suppose, by a great number of members of parliament who have small bottling works in their ridings, by the small bottling works and by the trade association. I cannot say that I can recall myself any representations by the two or three large operators in the country. It was the small operators working, either on their own drinks or on licence or royalty from other concerns, who felt the impact of the reduction last year in the candy, chocolate and chewing gum tax from 30 per cent to 15 per cent. There is a field which is shared by them, and when we gave the candy people a reduction of 15 per cent tax, then they were getting mainly from the children a much larger volume of sales for those articles, which of course resulted in a falling off in the sales of soft drinks. I remember in particular the western small bottlers association coming down here with the actual financial statements of a series of small bottling plants in the four western provinces, and pointing out that far from making money because of this tax reduction to their competitors, they were actually losing money. They asked for this reduction in tax not so they could reduce the price of their products, but just so they could stay in business. They have been very gratified to get it. Most of these small bottling plants feel that now, because of this reduction, they will be able to stay in business and get their fair share of what you might call the confectionery market.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to ask one question in case I misunderstood the parliamentary assistant. I understand we are on paragraph 3, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: Am I correct in believing that chewing gum also is included?

Mr. Sinclair: The present tax on chewing gum is 15 per cent.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Cruickshank: Is chewing gum under this item? I have gone to a lot of trouble to be here for paragraph No. 9, and I want to ask the parliamentary assistant this question. Are any mineral or vegetable oils used in the manufacture of chewing gum?

Mr. Sinclair: Chewing gum is not in this item. This is a soft drink item.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member mentioned chewing gum himself two minutes ago.

Mr. Sinclair: I mentioned chewing gum, candy and chocolate only because they are competitive fields. Since I did not expect to be asked questions about the manufacture of chewing gum I have not the answers here. But my recollection from my school books is that chewing gum is made out of chicle, which is a product of Central America. I should be very glad to write the hon. member a letter if I find out that any vegetable oils are used in chewing gum.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, he will not write me a letter. He will answer before we get to paragraph 9, because I have some figures to put on the record.

Mr. McLure: I take it for granted that since the parliamentary assistant did not take issue with me there is a tax on raw furs; as I have shown, on a $20 skin there is a tax of $5, which has now been reduced to $3.

Mr. Sinclair: The only reason I did not answer was that I had already answered it twice today, and I get a little tired of listening to my own voice. I will again read the act because neither the parliamentary assistant, the minister, nor the government decides it; it is the Excise Tax Act. I refer the hon. member to schedule III of the Excise Tax Act, the one which in fact specifically exempts raw furs. I also refer the hon. member to section 80A which says that there shall be an excise tax on processed, dyed, dressed furs, the manufacturer's product, which the hon. member mentioned. There is an excise tax on the processed product, as the hon. member for York South mentioned, whether that fur is incorporated into a garment, whether it be entirely a fur garment. When it is made into a fur garment then there is a general sales tax of 10 per cent applied. Beyond that I can make no other answer, except to refer the hon. gentleman to the act which was passed in a previous session of this parliament.

The Chairman: We are now considering paragraph 3, excise tax on soft drinks. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. McLure: Allow me one more question, Mr. Chairman. I might say that I have an invoice in my hand. I do not wish to put it on the record since it is rather of a private nature. This invoice shows positively just what I said a moment ago. This was before the reduction, of course. It is dated March 1, and on a skin valued at $20 the sum of $5 was paid, and when it came down to $17 or $16, the sum of $4.65 was paid.

Mr. Noseworthy: I have one supplementary question. Is the tax collected on dressed furs based on the additional value that the dressing adds to the raw fur, plus the value added by the dyeing and dressing?

Mr. Sinclair: The value of the saleable product; that is the raw product plus whatever manufacturing cost has gone into it. It is the same as the tax on this pen; it is the cost of the pen when sold, not just the cost of the work which went into the materials of the pen.

Mr. Noseworthy: Can the parliamentary assistant tell me the relative value of the fur before it is dressed and dyed and after?

Mr. Sinclair: That would be a matter that would depend on the fur and on the degree of processing. I think that the most difficult of all processing is the one we hear about every year when the Minister of Fisheries makes his statement on Canada's share of fur seals from the Aleutian islands. It would depend entirely on the skin and the actual degree of work done on the skin, as in any other manufacturing process.

Mr. Noseworthy: I think it will be found out that the value upon which the dressed skin is taxed is largely made up of the value of the raw skin and that the dressing and dyeing has comparatively little bearing on the original value.

Mr. Sinclair: I would doubt that very much on most skins, although that may be true with rabbit skins. In the case of most skins the actual work of processing and dyeing and making the coat is where the real cost is involved.

Mr. Noseworthy: That does not enter into the tax for dyeing.

Mr. Sinclair: The coat would be sales taxed, but here again I do not pretend to be an expert as to the division of costs as between processing, dyeing and tanning the fur. The hon. member for Queens may be, but I certainly am not.

Mr. Nowlan: Is that latter part of the paragraph dealing with preparations for household use new?

Mr. Sinclair: This paragraph is new. The small bottlers pointed out that these chemical preparations—I suppose most hon. members know them by their trade names—which are being sold are strong competition to the bottled soft drinks. It was felt in fairness that whether a drink was bottled or in a dry form it should have the same rate of tax applied. I think these things are almost entirely a matter for the manufacturers.

Mr. Nowlan: I note the parliamentary assistant used the word "chemical," but this paragraph refers only to preparations for household use. I would imagine there will be tremendous difficulty in administering this section when that term is used. I am thinking of lime juice which is used extensively during the summertime.

Mr. Sinclair: Lime juice would be exempt under another category.

Mr. Nowlan: This does not say "chemical," it says "preparations for household use." That would include chocolate milk.

Mr. Sinclair: Which would be exempt under the schedule.

Mr. Nowlan: It says "preparations for household use." I think there should be a clear understanding of what it covers.

Mr. Sinclair: The Department of National Revenue have a clear understanding because they actually phrased the resolution so that it would cover these things.

Mr. Knowles: Coloured powders.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to know the amount of tax obtained.

Mr. Sinclair: The tax secured last year was $19 million; the revenue reduction this fiscal year will be $10 million; for the full year, $11 million.

Mr. Knowles: How much do you expect to get from these coloured powders?

Mr. Sinclair: We have no estimate on that at all.

The Chairman: Shall we go on to paragraph 4?

Mr. Knowles: Despite what the parliamentary assistant said when we started this discussion today, I think he will agree with me when I say that it is too bad we cannot have a vote on this paragraph of this resolution by itself. I am sure that if we had a recorded vote this is one paragraph where the vote would be unanimous, including those on the other side of the house who supported the imposition of this tax last year.

Mr. Cruickshank: We did not.

Mr. Fraser: You certainly did.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You may not have known it, but you did.

Mr. Knowles: I am simply trying to point out that all of us support the removal of this tax and that includes those on the other side who a year ago supported its imposition. I think that what has been said during the budget debate and today has been well put. It has been pointed out that it was most unfortunate that this tax should have been imposed. It created a great hardship. When the income tax is put up one year and then brought down the next, although one might complain at least it must be admitted that it is across the board and affects everyone.

But here was a tax which affected only those whose circumstances were such that they had to make these purchases during that twelve-month period. I think it emphasizes the particular unfairness of having put this tax on stoves, washing machines and refrigerators a year ago. It seems to me that the government ought to find some way to make redress to these people who were put in that unfortunate position of having to pay this extra cost. It will be a long time before many people in this country forget the unfairness of that tax. We are glad to see it go.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If they forget, you will tell them about it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want the figures for paragraph 4.

Mr. Sinclair: Revenue this year, $10·5 million; reduction of revenue for this fiscal year, $10 million; for the full year, $11 million.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That leads me to make this comment. I understood the parliamentary assistant to say that under paragraph 1 of schedule I of the Excise Tax Act, the reduction for the remaining part of the year would be about $55 million, or about $65 million for the full year.

Mr. Sinclair: $61·7 million.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If we add the reduction under paragraph 4, which is the same kind of thing, it gives a total of $71 million. I think the people who bought these articles last year and were unnecessarily taxed should know that they were taxed to the extent of $72 million. I should like to refer to some of the items to show how they come within the range of the ordinary necessities that people, particularly householders, have to have. Schedule I includes automobiles, cameras and other things, but section 3 (a) covers electrical appliances adapted to household or apartment use, such as blankets, chafing dishes and so on. Then section (b) covers appliances adapted to household or apartment use such as stoves, hot plates, grills, washing machines and so on.

This tax was protested against last year but despite our objections we did not have a chance to vote on the thing. I hope that somehow or other these people who have paid this $72 million will know that they paid it and I hope they will endeavour to find out where the money went. It may be said to them that some of it went to the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Rehearsing a political speech.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I notice that schedule I refers to stoves and then in paragraph (b) there is reference to stoves when designed for using other than solid fuel. In that case the tax is reduced from 25 to 15 per cent. Here we have a provision under which the tax is to be repealed on stoves apparently without any limitations. Is there some explanation of that? Have I made my point?

Mr. Sinclair: What date is the act you have?

Mr. McCann: Get the one I gave you.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes. I got this from a very responsible quarter.

Mr. McCann: Throw the other away. It is four years out of date.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I got this from a very responsible quarter. This is August, 1951.

Mr. Sinclair: Page 34.

Mr. McCann: You picked up the wrong one.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have the August, 1951, consolidation of the Excise Tax Act with amendments to date.

Mr. Sinclair: Page 34, 3(b).

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Page 34, 3(b). The stoves there are of a peculiar kind, but under 4 the word "stoves" apparently is used without limitation of any kind.

Mr. Sinclair: I am afraid I still do not get your point because this refers to all stoves.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Under 4 the excise tax on stoves is repealed.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That means there is no tax.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Under (a) the tax on stoves of a certain kind is reduced from 25 to 15 per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: Putting it in the 15 per cent bracket, which has now been removed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): One of us is not quite grasping the other's point. There is no limitation in No. 4 on the word "stoves". It does not say stoves of a particular kind; it says "stoves". Should you not say "stoves other than those described in schedule 1"?

Mr. Sinclair: There is no excise tax on stoves. As far as 3(b) is concerned, the effect of this is that there is no excise tax on stoves. As to the special 15 per cent excise tax, if you will recall we had quite an animated discussion about one particular group of stoves, combination stoves. The 15 per cent excise tax was imposed on electrical stoves but stoves using solid fuels were not included. Now we are removing the 15 per cent tax which is in 3(b), page 34, schedule I. We removed the 15 per cent tax on both electric stoves and combination stoves. There is no tax on stoves using solid fuels. Neither pays the 15 per cent tax now.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry to be so persistent but I want to read this. I have read, I believe correctly, from schedule I of the Excise Tax Act, and that does include these stoves. Item 1 says that the excise tax on the goods enumerated in schedule I that are at present subject to the rate of 25 per cent shall be reduced to 15 per cent. Are there some of these in schedule I that are not subject to the 25 per cent?

Mr. Sinclair: It said specifically in 3 (b) that stoves were subject to 15 per cent. There were never any stoves subject to 25 per cent. The 15 per cent tax on electric stoves is now removed. There was never an excise tax on the ordinary coal and wood stoves. The hon. member will note that the 25 per cent is at the end of 3 (a) but 3 (b), which specifically mentions stoves, is 15 per cent, and that tax has been removed. While I am on my feet, although I am anxious to get the resolutions through, I do not think I should allow this chance to pass without saying that first of all every member in the house just loves to vote for tax cuts, especially when elections or by-elections are near. Therefore the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre cannot assume very much of a cloak of virtue when he says how anxious the members of his group are to vote for tax cuts.

Mr. Knowles: I said your fellows want to vote for these cuts this year.

Mr. Sinclair: Of course they do. Last year when the excise tax increases were instituted we were faced with increasing expenditures for defence. First of all we had to raise revenue. The second problem was the rate of spending at that time. One reason why we had to have consumer credit regulations was to put a check on such spending in order to conserve two things in particular that were in very short supply at that time, steel and copper. Since that time two or three things have happened. Government revenues have been more abundant than was forecast by some hon. members opposite who again predicted collapse. Our tax needs are not as great to raise the revenue required. The supply of steel and copper has greatly improved during the last year. For these reasons we were able to make these reductions. Because it is good sense as far as the country is concerned to vote for tax increases under certain conditions does not make it any less good sense to remove such increases when conditions have ameliorated.

Mr. Cruickshank: In the opinion of the parliamentary assistant, or his department, did not price maintenance have a great deal to do with reducing the cost of refrigerators washing machines and other electrical appliances?

Mr. Sinclair: All I can say to that, although it is not quite within the resolution, is that there certainly has been much keener competition, especially in my home city of Vancouver, between sellers, competition which was not possible otherwise under the old price fixing by manufacturer.

Mr. Cruickshank: Did the hon. member for Greenwood not oppose that?

The Chairman: Order. If we may take it that the discussion is concluded on paragraph 4 we will proceed with paragraph 5. If there is no discussion on paragraph 5 we will take up paragraph 6.

Mr. Fraser: With respect to paragraph 6 since the small reduction that was made in the tax on cigarettes, has there been any increase in revenue or in the consumption of cigarettes?

Mr. Sinclair: We cannot tell because our receipts of revenue run more than a month behind. The tobacco factories make their end of the month returns one month in arrears, and therefore we have no knowledge of that yet.

Mr. Fraser: What was the loss last year as the result of the imposition of the extra tax?

Mr. Sinclair: Far from a loss, we actually got a very healthy revenue out of the tax. We did not lose money on the tax.

Mr. Fraser: You got a healthy revenue but not as much as you got the year before. That is what I want to get.

Mr. Sinclair: You want the reduction in revenue compared with the year before?

Mr. Fraser: Yes.

Mr. Sinclair: You want the reduction in occurred because of less smoking of cigarettes, and of course there was an increase in the smoking of cut tobacco. The decrease in the case of cigarettes was $4,658,446.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It would be interesting to have an estimate of the number of people who decided to quit smoking cigarettes and who discovered, as the hon. member for Fort William has always pointed out, that it is a very harmful and unnecessary habit. In increasing the tax to the extent that he did, the Minister of Finance performed a great work of reform and cured hundreds of people from coast to coast of this iniquitous habit.

Mr. Coldwell: What was the increased revenue from cut tobacco?

Mr. Sinclair: It was a little over $12 million. We dropped $4 million on cigarettes and picked up an extra $12 million. Cut tobacco rose from $21,888,000 to $34,110,000. On balance we were up about $8 million.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant which was more effective in bringing about the loss in revenue, the increased tax on cigarettes or the 2 cents that the companies added to their price?

Mr. Sinclair: Of course I am not in a position to answer that. I am here to answer questions on taxation and not on merchandising practices.

Mr. Johnston: The same thing is involved with respect to cars which I was discussing a while ago. Now we find that it is also true of cigarettes. The price of cigarettes was not raised at the time the tax was imposed but the cigarette companies came to the government and put on a good deal of pressure to have the tax reduced. In their wisdom the government decided that they were not able to reduce the tax and there was a loss of revenue. In order to magnify the loss of revenue and increase the pressure which they could put upon the government to reduce the tax, the tobacco companies raised their price another 2 cents. That certainly did not help the situation. Now a tax reduction is introduced on cigarettes. The price was reduced by 3 cents but the tobacco companies are still in the position of making an extra profit of 2 cents on every pack. In effect that is making a profit on reduced taxation.

We find that occurring all along the line. In almost every case where a tax reduction has been effected we find that almost all these great companies, these financial octopuses—I am not saying all of them but the tobacco companies are one example—are making an increased profit on tax reductions. I think that practice should be stopped.

My next question, Mr. Chairman—I suppose I will be out of order, and if so you will tell me—was going to be whether there has been a reduction in the price of cut tobacco, which was mentioned a moment ago, because of the reduction in tax?

The Chairman: Perhaps we could consider paragraphs 6 and 7 together.

Mr. Johnston: I know it comes under 7.

The Chairman: Let us consider the two together and the hon. member will be in order.

Mr. Johnston: Then perhaps the minister will answer the question.

Mr. Sinclair: It might be better if we did take them together. As to the first point, in reference to the 2 cent increase charged by the cigarette manufacturers last year, I am not a smoker myself but I recall from press clippings that they said it was due first of all to the increased wages they paid their employees and in the second place—perhaps members from the tobacco growing areas can confirm this—because they had paid the highest prices on record for the Canadian tobacco crop. If the hon. member expects a rollback of that 2 cents I presume he would also expect a rollback in the wages paid the employees and the prices paid the growers.

Mr. Johnston: That is a lot of hooey. The parliamentary assistant knows very well that these companies could easily give back that 2 cents without affecting wages at all. I am sure of one thing, that these companies never increased the wages of their employees because of the increased profits they made through the tax reductions. You can't get away with that.

Mr. Sinclair: I cannot follow the hon. member at all. I was only repeating the statement at the time that the increase was due to the higher wages they paid last year and to the record prices for tobacco they paid Canadian farmers. They said that as a result they found it necessary to increase prices by 2 cents. I suggest that the obvious implication of the hon. member is that if he wants that 2 cents rolled back then there should be a rollback in the prices paid Canadian farmers and a rollback in the wages paid Canadian workers.

Mr. Johnston: I never suggested any such thing.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member's second point shows the serious consideration he has given these resolutions. There is no reduction on the tax on cut tobacco, so that it is impossible for the companies to make a profit on a reduction we did not give.

Mr. Johnston: I did not say there was; I was asking if there would be.

Mr. Fraser: I have no brief for the tobacco manufacturers, but the hon. member for Bow River said they had made extra profits. Well, in reading some of their reports I noted that the last two dividends of one company had been cut from 12 cents per share to 2½ cents. That shows they are not making a large profit.

Mr. Johnston: That has nothing to do with it.

The Chairman: In order to conduct an orderly discussion perhaps we might dispose of paragraph 6 and deal with paragraphs 7 and 8, since I think they go well together. Has the discussion terminated on paragraph 6?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Then we will take paragraphs 7 and 8.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Under which of these items would plug tobacco come? That is the hard pressed tobacco or block tobacco generally used by fishermen in Newfoundland for chewing and smoking in their pipes. At the present time in my province it costs 60 cents a plug. It used to cost 27 cents before union. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant would be able to tell us the reason for the great increase.

Mr. Sinclair: This is the proper item, dealing with manufactured tobacco. One of the differences between the Newfoundland system of taxation and our system was the fact that we did tax liquor and tobacco more heavily than they did, so when they came into confederation and felt the impact of our taxation it may well be that the cost of these tobaccos increased. I would suggest to the hon. member, however, that there were other financial transactions which were to the advantage of most Newfoundlanders, which more than compensate for the extra cost of plug tobacco.

Mr. Wright: I would like to know the effect of the change from 5 cents per ounce to 80 cents per pound. Those two figures appear the same.

Mr. Sinclair: They are the same. It is a question of the interpretation of the law. Up to now the tax has been 5 cents per ounce or fraction thereof. If you bought one of those small packages of tobacco containing an ounce and one-third, you paid the tax for two ounces. By changing it to the basis of a pound, a package of an ounce and one-third will pay the tax for an ounce and one-third.

Mr. McLure: There is no reduction in this at all. Paragraph 7 says the excise tax on manufactured tobacco is to be changed from 5 cents per ounce to 80 cents per pound. In paragraph 7 the excise tax on raw leaf tobacco is reduced from 1¼ cents per ounce to 8 cents per pound, so there is no reduction whatever in the first paragraph; it is just a change. I would like an explanation of paragraph 8 in connection with the manufacture of chewing tobacco. They say the proper way to use tobacco is to masticate it, that you get more for your money that way than any other way. What is the effect of the reduction in paragraph 8?

Mr. Sinclair: Paragraph 7 deals with all manufactured tobacco other than cigarettes. The effect of this change will be that the manufacturer who for reasons of packaging wants to put up his manufactured tobacco in quantities including a fraction of an ounce, for example three and a half ounces, no longer will be penalized. Previously he would be charged duty on four ounces. This will make it possible for the manufacturer to pack his tobacco in any size package he wishes with the knowledge that he will pay tax on that tobacco pro rata at the rate of 80 cents per pound. That has to do with all manufactured tobacco other than cigarettes, such as chewing, smoking and cut tobacco. Paragraph 8 deals with raw tobacco, the leaf tobacco which is not further manufactured into plugs, or cut, or made into cigarettes. The reduction in tax is given as an incentive to grow more of this class of tobacco.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This raw leaf tobacco is just as it is produced by the farmer?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I take it paragraph 7 includes plug tobacco and refined tobacco for making cigarettes. That tobacco has a higher price than plug tobacco in the trade, without any tax being levied on it. It costs more to produce, does it not?

Mr. Sinclair: I cannot say as far as the actual cost of manufacture is concerned. In these tobacco taxes we are not concerned with the ad valorem value; it is a specific tax of so much a pound. Whether they make it into plugs or into fine cut for rolling cigarettes or into chewing tobacco, the tax is 80 cents a pound. If the cost of making chewing tobacco is less than the cost of making fine cut, then of course the cost to the consumer will be less; but that is a manufacturing problem.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But the tax is the same?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do I understand that the change was made in paragraph 7 because you could not work out the tax on let us say an ounce and a half if the rate was 5 cents an ounce; that you had to make it 80 cents a pound so the tax could be worked out?

Mr. Sinclair: The previous system actually penalized manufacturers for packing their tobacco in other than even ounces. Apparently there are good reasons in the trade why they do not want to pack tobacco in two ounce, four ounce or eight ounce packages. Under the law as it was, you paid 5 cents an ounce or fraction thereof, so if you chose to have a package weighing five and one-third ounces you did not pay tax for five and one-third ounces but for six ounces. You paid for the five ounces and had to pay for a full ounce on the one third. Today you will pay one third of 80 cents.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why could you not have said "at the rate of 5 cents an ounce"? Would that not have done the same thing?

Mr. Sinclair: At the rate of 5 cents an ounce or 80 cents a pound makes no difference. We are removing a penalty under the old wording.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I see that.

Mr. Noseworthy: I understand, then, that the Imperial Tobacco Company will have to pay tax on the tobacco in bond, then another tax on that when it is processed into cigarettes and then a tax on the cigarettes?

Mr. Sinclair: No; there is one part of this country where the people buy this raw tobacco and smoke it without the necessity of Imperial Tobacco or any other company manufacturing it. On that we get a tax under paragraph 8. So far as the tax on manufactured tobacco is concerned, the excise tax, that is paid by the manufacturer on his manufactured product. The farmer who sells to the manufacturer does not pay that tax at that level, so there is no pyramiding of the tax in that way. This tobacco covered by paragraph 8 is tobacco which is not later manufactured so there is no manufacturing level at which we can recover taxes.

The Chairman: We shall pass on to paragraph 9 which repeals the sales tax on a number of items. Perhaps hon. members could limit their discussion to the items contained in subparagraphs (a) to (h).

Mr. Cruickshank: On paragraph 9—

Mr. Knowles: Could we not, first of all, have a general discussion on the sales tax? I think perhaps the member for Fraser Valley would agree to that proposal.

Mr. Cruickshank: It was my understanding from the parliamentary assistant himself that we should follow this procedure, but if I am out of order I shall wait until later.

The Chairman: Before we began discussion of this resolution paragraph by paragraph I understood that it had been suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that we were going to have a general discussion on the resolution, and that took place. I thought therefore that, following what we have been doing since the first paragraphs have been discussed, we might analyse each subparagraph seriatim if that is agreeable.

Mr. Knowles: I was not asking that we should have a broad general discussion such as we had when we were on the first paragraph, but I am suggesting we might at this point have a discussion on the general principle of the sales tax before you ask us to confine our remarks to these particular items.

The Chairman: To follow the wish of the hon. member, if he is to observe the rules, his general discussion of the sales tax would have to be restricted to the particular items mentioned here. He could discuss, generally, that the sales tax is being repealed on the items mentioned in subparagraphs (a) to (h).

Mr. Knowles: I think the chairman should permit me to welcome the repeal of the sales tax on some items, and to express the hope that it might be repealed on some others as well. The parliamentary assistant has already indicated that there are a few items in connection with which the minister is considering whether or not the tax might be repealed. As a matter of fact, I wanted—I see the chairman is nodding his head.

The Chairman: That, of course, would be a reference in passing.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I not have a word in this?

Mr. Knowles: I shall be glad to yield to the hon. member and make my remarks later.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member wishes to speak on the matter of procedure we are now discussing.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am not speaking on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. When I got up some time ago I bowed to the fact that I was possibly out of order, and would wait until another section was called. I represent a dairy district and am therefore interested in this paragraph 9 (a), drinks prepared from milk or eggs. In some areas ice cream is being produced from imported foreign oils. I should like to know from the parliamentary assistant what steps are being taken to protect the people of Canada.

I have a parliamentary return—which is certainly not anything I made up—and it shows that since 1948 approximately 735,450,-612 pounds of soya beans have been brought in and manufactured. Some of this material has gone to make the drinks mentioned in paragraph 9 (a). In a return tabled for the member for Lanark it is shown that since 1948, 239,607,700 pounds of copra were brought in duty free, and that was not mentioned in the previous return. Among other things, this material was manufactured into drinks prepared from milk or eggs. I know that the word "margarine" is almost as repulsive to the parliamentary assistant as it is to me, although from a different angle. I am leaving margarine out of this discussion, because no one would accuse a person of drinking margarine. Milk drinks are definitely being made from these imported oils, and are being sold in Canada. Under a ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada, margarine is also being made and some provinces are even colouring it. The same ruling of the supreme court permits the manufacture of ice cream or these milk drinks out of imported oils.

I should like the parliamentary assistant to tell me just how much the revenues of the Dominion of Canada will be affected by the repeal of the sales tax on drinks prepared from milk or eggs. Obviously it will affect the revenue of every farmer within the dominion.

Mr. Sinclair: This item, of course, is a further help to the dairy industry of Canada. You will recall that two or three years ago when ice cream was classed as a confectionery we had strong representations, from every corner of the house and especially from members representing farm constituencies, that ice cream be no longer classed as a confection but rather as a food. It was pointed out that would be of assistance to the dairy farmers, and because of that two years ago ice cream was included in the schedule of exemptions from sales tax.

Last year, further representations were made that there were many wholesome drinks made from milk which should get preferential treatment over other drinks that are not fresh products. We therefore exempted from sales tax preparations made from fresh milk. It has since been pointed out by people who are interested in dairy products that other good manufactured drinks are made out of powdered milk or skim milk and eggs, which are also dairy products. The Minister of Finance has therefore made this further extension of the exemption from sales tax to those drinks which are made from milk or eggs. If these drinks are made from substitutes for milk or eggs such as soya bean oil, to which the member referred, then they are not in this classification and are not exempt from the tax but would pay the sales tax of 10 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I say a supplementary word? I think that is a fair explanation that we have had from the parliamentary assistant. It is clear in my mind and I hope it is to the press of Canada and to all the producers of Canada that they cannot in the future use this imported copra or soy bean oil to manufacture drinks as they are doing today and as they have been doing for the last six months.

Mr. Sinclair: I want to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that it is no such thing. I said that drinks which are manufactured from milk and eggs are now going to be exempt from sales tax. Drinks which are manufactured from other things—soft drinks, for example —are going to bear a 15 per cent excise tax as well as sales tax. Other drinks prepared from other materials will come under the usual sales tax of 10 per cent. The only assertion I have made now is that drinks prepared either from fresh milk, dried, powdered or skim milk, or eggs are now totally exempt from sales tax.

Mr. Cruickshank: I understood the parliamentary assistant to say this. He clearly stated powdered milk and so on, and I accept that statement. But he has also implied, if not stated, that these copra and soy bean oils imported duty free will no longer be permitted in use without taxation—that is sales tax—in milk drinks or in other milk products. He definitely stated that.

Mr. Sinclair: They always have paid sales tax.

Mr. Fraser: I want to ask this question. This includes liquid and powdered drinks?

Mr. Sinclair: No; drinks.

Mr. Fraser: This is put in the liquid form?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Fraser: Then the tax will still remain on the powdered form of drinks?

Mr. Coldwell: On such things as Vi-Tone?

Mr. Fraser: Or Ovaltine?

Mr. Sinclair: First of all, Ovaltine is not a drink. It is only a drink when it is mixed with water or milk. In the second place those are preparations not solely prepared from milk and eggs.

Mr. Fraser: This tax still remains on powdered drinks?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: I have just one word to say. I want to support the hon. member for Peace River in regretting that more drugs have not been placed on the exempt list, particularly vitamin E. I do not want to labour the point because the hon. member for Peace River has dealt with it well in the past and today. I just want to say that I am in full support of what he has said.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I agree with my leader that the hon. member for Peace River has done an excellent job in pressing this point with respect to vitamin E and some other drugs as well. I also feel that further consideration should be given to the whole question of the sales tax and other forms of taxation on drugs and medicines generally. A while ago I put on the order paper some questions with respect to this matter, and I received the answers the day after the budget was brought down. They are to be found at pages 1936, 1937 and 1938 of Hansard for April 9, 1952. I asked these questions:

1. What drugs and medicines are subject to import duty?
2. What is the rate of duty on these drugs and medicines?
3. What other taxes are drugs and medicines subject to, and what are the rates of such other taxes?

It took about two and a half pages to give the details of the duties on drugs and medicines. I will not say anything more about that matter at this point. I will raise that question again when we get to the customs tariff resolutions. I just want to mention in passing that, in addition to the sales tax that applies on drugs and medicines, a good many of them are subject to customs tariffs of various rates.

With regard to question No. 3 which I just quoted, this was the answer given, and of course it corresponds to what the parliamentary assistant said earlier this afternoon:

Sales tax of 10 per cent on drugs and medicines except ACTH; cortisone; insulin; liver extract for use exclusively in the treatment of anaemia.

I believe the parliamentary assistant named one other substance.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Sinclair: Radium.

Mr. Knowles: Yes; he mentioned radium. The four that are listed in the answer that I have just given correspond, of course, to the drugs which are allowed as medical expenses when one computes his personal income tax, provided you get above that 4 per cent floor. We are glad to know that this principle has been recognized as far as it has. But I submit that there are a great many other drugs—not only vitamin E and highly concentrated vitamins—which for the sake of health people are called upon to purchase and to use over a long and continuing period of time. They are almost in the class of food, in the sense that people are required to make use of them. I feel strongly that the sales tax should be removed from those products.

We have in the house two or three druggists, one of whom I see to my right; I refer to the hon. member for Oxford. No doubt they are interested because they are druggists. I was not thinking of that, however. They will know the truth of what I am saying. Although there are perhaps many patented medicines on their shelves on which taxation is not out of the way, they will know that there are many products, vitamins and various other items, that are really essential and which should not be taxed in this way. As I say, the answers given to my questions on April 9 indicate a form of double taxation on a good many of these drugs if they have to be imported into Canada from some other country.

Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that there are a number of questions here that all tie in together. I hope you will not think I am out of order if I just mention these in passing in order to indicate how broad this field is. The question that we will be debating at another point, namely, the 4 per cent floor under medical expenses, is related to this matter. The whole question of health insurance is related to it. My feeling is that this government has moved far too slowly in the field of enabling the people of Canada to do something that will help with regard to medical expenses of one kind or another. I think it is a minimum request that we are making when we ask that there should not be this heavy taxation on drugs and medicines.

Mr. Wright: I just want to ask the minister what things are enumerated in customs tariff 411a, 437 and 476b.

Mr. Sinclair: Would you mind if we first called (a), (b) and (c)? When we get to them I will give the answer. Would the hon. member mind waiting until we get to (h)? I will read off the whole thing then. We are at (a) now.

Mr. Wright: Oh, I understand. I thought we were on the clause as a whole.

The Chairman: Is there any further discussion on (a)?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant why no consideration was given to taking the excise tax off the powdered preparations. It was only put on last year or the year before.

Mr. Sinclair: No, no;—

Mr. Fraser: It has only been on a short time.

Mr. Sinclair: —this is not excise tax. This is sales tax.

Mr. Fraser: Sales tax, I should say.

Mr. Sinclair: It has always been on.

Mr. Fraser: And it is going to continue?

Mr. Sinclair: It is not on powdered milk.

Mr. Fraser: I know it is not on powdered milk. But as to a preparation like Ovaltine, it is made of milk and eggs, and milk has to be added in order to use it.

Mr. Sinclair: The same sort of answer as that given with regard to soft drinks, candy, chocolate and what not, applies to Ovaltine. Tea and coffee are fairly heavily taxed, and the 10 per cent sales tax does not seem out of line by way of comparison in the same field. As you have seen in the years you have been here, this field of food exemption has been steadily extended until now only specialty foods such as that and various relishes and pickles are not now exempt from sales tax.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to (b) of paragraph 9?

Mr. Fraser: What does this include? Is that for soda fountain purposes or all preserved fruits?

Mr. Sinclair: These preserved fruits are a very narrow class; ordinary preserves, jams, jellies and preserves are already included. There is quite a developing industry of making fruits for baking which are not candied fruits; the Zuka melons of the Okanagan valley are used principally for that. They do not come under the classification of candied fruits, but do not class as home preserves. They were subject to sales tax. They have now been relieved of sales tax.

Mr. Fraser: Would that include cocktail cherries?

Mr. Sinclair: It would include cocktail cherries, if they were not a candied maraschino. A lot of cocktail cherries are made out of these melons. If it were a candied cherry —most of them are—it would not qualify. The bakers use these preserves a great deal for making their cakes.

Mr. Fraser: Where is your explanation of just what preserved fruits means in this instance?

Mr. Sinclair: That is the interpretation of the Department of National Revenue.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to (c)?

Mr. Blackmore: Before we pass on, I believe that someone ought to say something about what I am going to say now.

Mr. Riley: Are you going to take forty minutes to say it?

Mr. Blackmore: We will wait and see. I believe there is altogether too much of a tendency for people in the cabinet, and even members of parliament, to live in a sort of ivory tower. I do not believe that a man like the parliamentary assistant—I have a lot of admiration for him—begins to realize the degree of suffering and privation which is being endured by the common man and his wife throughout the country generally. The income tax and other taxes are so severe, the municipal taxes are so severe, and then the sales taxes are so severe, that if any one of them has a mishap in his family it becomes almost utterly impossible for him to carry on.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It is still better than Russia.

Mr. Blackmore: That is no credit to us. Perhaps the hon. member wants us to be like that.

The Chairman: I do hope that the hon. member will soon give consideration to paragraph (c), cooking oils and salad oils but not including mayonnaise or salad dressing.

Mr. Blackmore: I cannot hear what you say, Mr. Chairman, there are so many people trying to talk.

The Chairman: We had a discussion as to the procedure and it was agreed—

Mr. Blackmore: I still cannot hear you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I am sorry; I will try to make myself understood. At the beginning of our consideration of these resolutions we had a discussion on procedure. It was agreed that we would limit ourselves to a study of these resolutions paragraph by paragraph. We have proceeded along those lines, and we have already considered all the paragraphs except paragraph number 9. We have now arrived at a discussion of the subparagraph on sales tax. We have considered the subparagraph on drinks prepared from milk or eggs and also the one on preserved fruits. We are now discussing cooking oils and salad oils but not including mayonnaise or salad dressing. The hon. member may speak.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was going to say that taxes on absolute necessities, such as certain drugs that mean life or death, are just simply close to criminal. One or two people have written to me concerning their situation. They have simply had to give up their loved ones to die because they could not possibly afford to bring in needed drugs to keep them alive. The drugs are available; they are just across the line. If the taxes were removed they would have a much better chance of getting them; but these taxes, as I have said, are becoming positively criminal. Someone ought to tell the parliamentary assistant, and I hope he tells the Minister of Finance, that he should not try to laugh off too many of these things. Our Minister of Finance comes in here with a jaunty air as if there was not a care in the world.

An hon. Member: Would you like him to look sober?

Mr. Blackmore: We would like him to look like a sober man, not like a man who is laughing at a funeral. I hope it is conveyed to the Minister of Finance, that something ought to be done for the great common man throughout this country.

The Chairman: Shall we move to subparagraph (d), baling wire for baling farm produce?

Mr. McLure: Have you passed subparagraph (c)?

The Chairman: I have just called subparagraph (d). If there is no discussion on this subparagraph, we shall move to subparagraph (e), steel pens for farm animals.

Mr. McLure: I should like to revert to subparagraph (c). The sales tax is repealed on cooking oils and salads, but not including mayonnaise or salad dressing. Does that include the oils for the manufacture of oleomargarine? Or should it read, but not oils for the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. Sinclair: This tax of course is put on the manufactured product, when the product is packaged and sold as a cooking oil. I will not use the trade name, there are many of them on the market made out of soybean oil, some animal oils, sunflower seed oil. It refers to an oil used as shortening in cooking. Restaurants have used them for many years. In recent years housewives are turning more and more to using these cooking oils, instead of the same things solidified into lard or shortening. Because of the change in the housewife's habits we are now including these cooking and salad oils used in the homes. They are now exempt from sales tax.

Mr. McLure: Is margarine not a solidified oil? Should it not come under this?

Mr. Sinclair: Margarine as such pays a ten per cent sales tax. Butter is exempt; lard is exempt; shortening is exempt; margarine pays 10 per cent sales tax. Those cooking oils—

Mr. Gibson: Why?

Mr. Sinclair: Because it is the law.

Mr. Gibson: That is no answer.

Mr. Sinclair: These cooking oils are now being included on the same basis as lard and shortening because the housewives are using them in increasing quantities.

The Chairman: Is there any further discussion on this question?

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: We were dealing with subparagraph (c) of paragraph 8.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask for consent to revert to subparagraph (b) for one moment to bring something to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. Some of us feel strongly about legislating in this, shall I say, condensed manner. In this case just the words "preserved fruits" are used and I understand that the details are set out in regulations. Would the parliamentary assistant seriously consider spelling out in the bill, either by reference to the regulations or in some other way, a provision that would settle any doubts.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps it would be easier if I read the whole clause as it will appear in the final act. It will be:

Fruit, fresh, canned, frozen, dried, evaporated, preserved.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It seems to me that the difficulty is in not having a further definition of the words "preserved fruits." I understand that there is a regulation which I presume can be altered from time to time and I still raise the question whether we should be legislating in this way.

Mr. Sinclair: The department must accept the terminology generally used by the trade. As far as the people who are dealing in these things are concerned, this category of fruit, fresh, canned, frozen, dried, evaporated, preserved has a quite clear meaning to them. It has a meaning quite separate from that of the housewife in connection with jams, jellies and preserves of that type.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If that is the full statement then it looks as though I am answered. I was told that there is a regulation, but we can deal with that when the bill is before us.

The Chairman: Subparagraph (c). If there is no discussion, subparagraph (d).

Mr. McLure: This item covers baling wire for baling farm produce. This would be the wire used for baling hay, straw, sawdust, shavings and other such things. I understand that it also includes chicken wire used by farmers. Can the parliamentary assistant state whether I am right?

Mr. Sinclair: I am afraid you are not. Chicken wire is not generally used for baling purposes. Baling wire is the wire commonly referred to as hay wire which is used for the purposes mentioned by the hon. member. This wire is used instead of the twine which was used in the past.

Mr. Wright: I think I will have to correct the farming knowledge of the parliamentary assistant when he says that baling wire is something used in place of the baling twine which was used in the past. As a matter of fact, there were only a few machines which used twine. Baling wire has been used extensively for at least fifty years to my knowledge.

Mr. Sinclair: I am happy to have that correction and perhaps that will satisfy the hon. member for Queens.

The Chairman: Subparagraph (e).

Mr. McLure: Would this cover pens made of fine steel wire which would be used by farmers who are interested in raising mink? I think it should include this type of wire because furs are being taxed in other places and some consideration should be given to the fur producer.

Mr. Sinclair: This item would not cover the wire used in making pens to enclose fur animals or poultry, for instance. This is the recognition of a need for greater extension to include newer types of farm equipment. Last year we had a rather unusual item in connection with milking parlours. That seemed a rather odd thing to members who were not acquainted with farm operations, but it was a perfectly proper development in the dairying industry. These steel pens are sold as a unit. It is not a matter of stringing wire on posts. Requests have been made by farm members of this house and by cattle associations for the inclusion of this item. Last year we included stanchions, feeding troughs and milking parlours and this is another extension of the exemption of articles of farm equipment.

The Chairman: Subparagraph (f).

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine stated earlier that he appreciated the exemption being applied to preservatives used to remove slime from nets and lines or to increase their life. He asked also that rubber boots and rubber capes used by fishermen should be exempted. That raises a difficult problem in the taxation of commodities, the problem of control. Rubber boots and rubber capes are not used solely by fishermen nor are they sold only through fishing supply houses. They are sold generally for industrial and ordinary use. The manufacturer sells to the wholesalers and suppliers, who then sell them to the fishing supply people and to many other retailers. Because of that administrative problem it has not been possible, despite the hon. member's representations, to include them in the considerable list of fishing supplies which are now exempt from the sales tax.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): This item is of great interest to the members from the maritime provinces. For some time I have wondered why preservatives used in the fishing industry were not exempt from sales tax. This matter has been brought to the attention of the department and discussed in the house on different occasions. I had received correspondence from fishermen in the province of New Brunswick, from manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers, bringing this matter to my attention. Together with the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, the matter was taken up with the department some time ago. Speaking in the chamber on March 12, I mentioned the fact that pesticides or insecticides used in agriculture were exempt from sales tax. For that reason I would expect that materials used for the same purpose in the fishing industry would receive the same treatment. For the benefit of those who do not have any knowledge about this small item, I might say that coal tar is one product used to a great extent all over the maritime provinces.

We have to contend with the marine borer and in many parts of the maritime provinces lobster pots have to be dipped completely in coal tar. Prior to the war coal tar sold for $5, $6 or $7 a barrel. Since the war it has steadily increased in price until today it costs the fishermen about $22 a barrel, and there was a sales tax of $2.20 added to that retail price. I know this step will be appreciated by those engaged in the fishing industry. Catechu and other preservatives are also used. They would come under this item and that also will be of some benefit to the fishermen. I want to take this opportunity to thank those responsible for giving serious consideration to this problem and finally deciding to do away with the sales tax. I can assure the officials of the department who are responsible that the move will be appreciated by all fishermen of the maritime provinces.

Mr. Riley: I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Charlotte has just said with respect to this concession to the fishermen of the maritime provinces particularly. At the same time I should like to point out that the hon. member for Charlotte first brought this matter to my attention a couple of years ago. I join with him in expressing the appreciation of the fishermen of our part of the country for the relief given to them under this item. The loss of revenue to the government may not amount to very much but the saving to the fishermen, who felt previously that they could ill afford to pay this tax, is a really big item to them. Again I should like to thank the officials of the department responsible for this relief.

Mr. Nowlan: I should also like to say a word about this matter. The fishermen on the bay of Fundy coast engaged in hand lining and that type of fishing are also interested in this matter, and I know that the relief that has been given will be appreciated by them. However, I would suggest to the parliamentary assistant that this is only a beginning on what I think should be further consideration of the problem of the fishermen. After all, the department has gone a long way throughout the years in dealing with the farmer. Today a very large part of the equipment used in the farming industry is exempt from sales tax, and properly so. The fisherman, who is also a primary producer and who is facing very serious problems, should be given more consideration than has been the case heretofore. The parliamentary assistant mentioned a moment ago the problem involved in connection with the goods mentioned by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine. Obviously there are administrative problems but I think they can be overcome. Gasoline used by farmers is coloured in some way and is not liable for tax. I am quite sure that the manufacturers of fishermen's goods could put a mark on them of some kind so that they could be recognized as such and be exempt from sales tax if such an exemption were granted. Some sort of brand could be put on them, probably not by way of colour but in some other way.

Mr. Byrne: So the miner could not wear them.

Mr. Nowlan: I am sure it can be done. It is a matter of working it out. We realize there are administrative details but there are far greater problems confronting the fishing industry today than the problems of administration confronting the department. I hope that the department and the parliamentary assistant in reviewing the matter in the future will give further consideration to the relaxation of sales tax on this branch of primary industry.

Mr. Gibson: Can the parliamentary assistant tell me if this provision applies to the creosote used in the treatment of piling with respect to some types of fish traps? It might apply there on the same basis.

Mr. Sinclair: If the hon. member will read the item he will see it refers to preservatives for use exclusively in treating nets, ropes and lines used in the fishing industry. I had not thought, as perhaps I should have, of the fact that the piles used in one or two types of fish traps in the riding of the hon. member for Nanaimo, I believe, are creosoted pilings. However, that is a problem that could be raised at a future date. I should like to add one thing to the helpful remarks of the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings. I think some members would be pleasantly surprised if they would look at schedule III and see to what extent we do exempt from sales tax materials used by fishermen. I think that in the house, probably because the farming group is a little more vocal, we have tended to overlook the fact that the government has given very wide exemptions with respect to the articles used by fishermen in commercial fishing. We are always anxious to consider new proposals such as have been made by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. McLure: Has the parliamentary assistant a list of what are termed preservatives for the treating of rope? If a fisherman were using a quantity of such material for that purpose would his word be taken that it was a preservative for treating rope? For instance, there is one called cutch which is largely used in the treating of nets of all kinds, rope and other lines used in fishing.

It is one of the best preservatives for taking care of fishermen's nets in order to avoid mildew in the hot weather when they are not being used. Would the preservative have to be specified or would a declaration from the fisherman be sufficient?

Mr. Sinclair: In inquiring about this matter I of course was thinking of the types of preservatives used by the fishermen in my own riding, but I am happy to tell the hon. member that the officials of the department mentioned cutch used in the maritimes and said it was a most excellent preservative with no administrative problems since it apparently has no other use except as a preservative of netting. It is included.

Mr. McLure: It is a soluble gum.

Mr. Gibson: Not much of a preservative, either.

Mr. Carroll: There is good reason for thanksgiving this evening so far as the items included in this particular paragraph are concerned. On behalf of the fishermen of the constituency I represent—and there are many of them—I want to thank the government and the Department of Finance particularly for the splendid effort they are making to help the fishermen to reduce their costs of production.

Some three years ago I raised the question that was brought up today by the hon. member for Gaspe, not with the finance department especially but with certain members of the government. I was interested in having something done to reduce the sales and other taxes on gasoline used by fishermen. At that time I was given the same explanation the parliamentary assistant has given tonight. Of course I can see great difficulties in the way of doing anything of that kind, though of course it has been done in other industries. I was glad to hear the parliamentary assistant point out that many things have been done to reduce the cost of production of the fishermen, though often these are not well known by some of the smaller fishermen. The parliamentary assistant pointed out that there is a schedule which sets out all the articles on which taxes have been removed. I do not want to delay the committee longer; I rose only for the purpose I indicated.

Mr. Ashbourne: On behalf of the fishermen of Newfoundland and Labrador I should like to say a word of thanks for this exemption from the sales tax. As other hon. members have said already, I would like to see the government go further and exempt certain other items as well. In regard to rope, for example, I know certain sizes of rope are exempt now from sales tax, but I think the officials of the department might look into the possibility of having the larger sizes exempt as well. While the smaller sizes of rope are used by the individual fishermen, the larger sizes are used on the vessels in which these fishermen go out to sea.

While I am on my feet I would like to support the request made this afternoon by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine that certain other articles he referred to be exempt in order that the expenses of the fishermen might be reduced and their earnings increased. I hope the minister will be able to give sympathetic consideration to that request, particularly now when we see the decline of the fisheries in our area. All these things enter into the costs of the fishermen. Cutch, which was mentioned a moment ago, is used almost exclusively in the barking of nets and twine used by the fishermen. Some of them also use it for barking their sails; and I am very glad this preservative has now been included in the exempt items.

As I said before, I would like to see this list of exemptions made much larger, in order that these men who gain their livelihood reaping the harvest of the sea may be encouraged by seeing something done to assist them. I may be out of order, Mr. Chairman, but these men who go out to catch the fish realize that they do not qualify for unemployment insurance, as do men in other work. That is an additional reason why they should be given further help, so they may continue their work of providing the good protein food so necessary for our people.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What section does this come under? Is it under the Excise Tax Act?

Mr. Sinclair: Schedule III gives the exemptions from sales tax, and these will be added to that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How much will the government lose in revenue by removing this tax?

Mr. Sinclair: This is one of the items where it is very difficult to make any estimate, because chemicals of the creosote-copper sulphate type are used in many other lines of industry and are taxed. They are under one tariff item, so it would be impossible to make an estimate.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I suppose it would be a comparatively small amount?

Mr. Sinclair: I know that to fishermen in my own riding the cost of washing nets is very considerable. As far as the eastern fishermen are concerned, the members who have spoken tonight seem to think this is a substantial cost to the individual fisherman.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Do you know the revenue from that complete item at the present time?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): If I may say so, it will save thousands of dollars to maritime fishermen.

Mr. Sinclair: The answer is the same. It is a problem which very often occurs here when exemptions are made for one class within a group. Aside from this one material, cutch, apparently the other preservatives are widely used also in other branches of industry where they are not exempt. Since they were all taxable, there has never been any attempt in our tax records to set aside for example the copper sulphate used for preserving nets, as distinct from that used in many other branches of industry. That is why it is impossible to give an estimate. The only measure we have of the importance of the issue is the fact that representations have been made by members of parliament from fishing ridings and by fishermen's associations, asking for the removal of this tax.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Has any consideration been given to removing the duty on material which goes into the manufacture of nets? For instance, they are going to use a great deal of nylon now, which I understand is very much stronger and more lasting than the material now in use. Is any consideration being given to taking the duty or sales tax off that material; or is there any sales tax on it?

Mr. Sinclair: At the present time there is no sales tax. A year or two ago we had a debate on that matter. Up to that time nylon had been included in the lingerie items in the tariff, because that was its principal use. It was only when the other use developed, first of all on the west coast in connection with tuna fishing and latterly, though not to any great extent, in connection with nets—though it was used to a considerable extent in making small ropes and lines—that further consideration had to be given. When we come to the Customs Tariff I can explain that; but there is no sales tax on nylon when used for fishing lines.

Mr. Gibson: I wonder if the parliamentary assistant could tell me whether this also applies to anhydrous copper sulphate?

Mr. Sinclair: When used as a preservative for fishing nets.

The Chairman: Then have we concluded the discussion on subparagraph (f)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

The Chairman: Then we will take up subparagraph (g). Is there any discussion? If not we will go on to subparagraph (h).

Mr. Wright: What is the customs tariff now on items 411a, 437 and 476b?

Mr. Sinclair: The reason we are putting 411a in here is to carry out what has been the administrative practice under a ruling of the tariff appeal board. Item 411a reads:

> Machinery, logging cars, cranes, blocks and tackle, wire rope, but not including wire rope to be used for guy ropes or in braking logs going down grade, and complete parts of all the foregoing, for use exclusively in the operation of logging, such operation to include the removal of the log from stump to skidway, log dump, or common or other carrier.

That is at present administratively carried out, but we are now putting it in the act.

The second thing is perhaps of more general interest, though I am quite sure that item 411a is of great interest to certain hon. members here. Item 437 covers the following:

> Locomotives, cars and coaches and repair equipment, belonging to railroads, brought temporarily into Canada for the purpose of clearing obstructions, fighting fires or making emergency repairs on railway lines within Canada;

When railway equipment is brought in here from the United States on rental to Canadian railways, as sometimes occurs, we do charge them sales tax. Occasionally when a disaster occurs, such as a bridge going out or a fire, it is necessary to move in railway equipment through the United States to fix the bridge or fight the fire. The Railway Association has made representations that it was unfair to assess sales tax or the 1/60th duty per month on railway apparatus brought in for that purpose.

The item also covers:

> . . . detector cars when imported to test rail in tracks in Canada.

There are new types of cars turned out by the Sperry Company whereby the car itself going down the track can detect a crack in the rails that is not obvious so far as the observation of the track walker is concerned. There are no such cars permanently in Canada, and up to the present time they have come in for testing Canadian lines.

The third item covers:

> Surgical suction apparatus including motive power; prepared surgical sutures; ethylene; operating room lights designed to minimize shadow, not including bulbs; all the foregoing of a class or kind not made in Canada, and complete parts thereof, for the use of any public hospital, under regulations prescribed by the minister.

There is one other item which I should mention because it is not covered by the resolution. The customs tariff item and the excise tax items should be generally in the same language, and these items on artificial limbs have been different in the two acts.

Tonight, therefore, in the excise tax resolution and in the customs tariff resolution we are going to make the items the same. Item 236b in the excise tax schedule reads, "spinal braces and parts thereof; artificial limbs and parts thereof". We are changing that to read, "artificial limbs, spinal and other orthopedic braces and parts of the foregoing". The same wording will be in the customs tariff resolution to which we shall come later.

Mr. Wright: There is just one question I wanted to ask the parliamentary assistant concerning the sales tax. Can he tell me whether sales tax is charged on tires for farm wagons for replacement purposes or on tires for farm machinery for replacement purposes?

Mr. Sinclair: My understanding is that they are, but I can have confirmation of that in just a moment or two. If we are not on this resolution, I shall answer that on the next resolution.

Mr. Byrne: Can the parliamentary assistant say whether any consideration has been given to exempting safety equipment which the boys are required to wear in accordance with their duties in the mines?

Mr. Sinclair: I do not know of any request having been made but the hard hats, for example, that are used by both loggers and miners in British Columbia are taxable.

Mr. Jones: Is consideration being given to exempting from sales tax materials and goods used in the treatment of cancer? I have been asked about it. I feel it should be exempted, because the material cannot be purchased in Canada at all. These victims have to buy it in large quantities.

Mr. Sinclair: I am not familiar with the equipment to which the hon. member is referring. This afternoon I said that recommendations, for the most part, did come from the Department of National Health and Welfare and further back from the medical profession. Radium is free from sales tax, and it is used in the treatment of cancer. Perhaps if the hon. member would let me know a few of the details concerning this other equipment, I could give him an answer. X-ray apparatus which is used in the treatment of cancer is also exempt.

Mr. Jones: The doctor orders the patient to purchase this equipment for his own use, and this particular patient drew to my attention that it was not available in Canada. I would be pleased to give further particulars to the minister. Could that be exempted later?

Mr. Sinclair: The matter could be given study. All these things have to be studied, and the question has not been raised.

Mr. Jones: If the merits of the case warrant exemption, could that be done?

Mr. Sinclair: Once again I may say that these exemptions for drugs and for equipment are generally given in cases where the drug is not being used as an immediate cure but as a continuing treatment. The example I used this afternoon was insulin for diabetes. If the hon. member cares to provide the minister or myself with the details the matter can be given consideration, but whether the consideration will be favourable will depend upon the recommendation of the medical authorities and the extent of the use of the particular apparatus.

Mr. Knight: There is one thing that is in continuing use by the victims of deafness. Did the government give consideration to the exemption from duties and sales tax of equipment for the deaf? It is a plea that I have made before in this house. All this equipment comes from the United States and there is always a hold-up at the border. The equipment is so expensive that in many cases people have to do with items for a long time because they cannot afford to have duplicates. If anything is to be done about it, it should be taken into immediate consideration. Has the parliamentary assistant any comment on that?

Mr. Sinclair: The comment I have is that it has been given consideration and a step forward has been taken. The hon. member has said most of the apparatus does come from the United States. I do not want to be out of order, but if you look ahead in the customs tariff items you will find item 482 has been extended. We can resume this discussion when we get to the customs tariff resolution.

Mr. Knowles: This is just a technical question, but when the parliamentary assistant first began to discuss paragraph 9(h) he said that these changes were being made to bring the statutory provisions into line with administrative practice following a decision of the tariff board. I am not criticizing the changes that have been made. They sound very good to me, but I should like to know how a decision of the tariff board affected sales tax matters.

Mr. Sinclair: The first point, of course, so far as the tariff board is concerned, is that not only matters in respect of tariff coming under the Department of National Revenue, but also rulings by the department on excise and sales tax matters can be appealed to the tariff appeal board. That is the first point. The second point was that the appeal was made against the wording in the act. The intent had been carried out by the department. This was the intent that had been carried out. The ruling of the tariff board on the present wording in the act was adverse to that intent. Item 411a has now been changed to carry out what was the practice, what was the intent and what is the wish of the industry as far as that is concerned. But the hon. member's primary point is as to appeal to the tariff board. That board can be appealed to on matters of excise tax or sales tax as well as tariffs.

Mr. Knight: Before we get too far from the item which I raised, I should like to point out that what the parliamentary assistant was talking about in item 482 was the matter of tariffs. I think he said that.

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Knight: This particular item on which we are now working is paragraph 9, which reads "That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed." My question had not reference to item 482 in the tariff rates which we shall come to later. What I asked him was whether any consideration has been given to the abolition of the sales tax on those particular goods.

Mr. Sinclair: The reason I mentioned the customs tariff, Mr. Chairman, was that he actually asked me whether anything had been done in that regard. I said that nothing had been done.

Mr. Knight: I beg the parliamentary assistant's pardon. I did not ask him any such thing. I asked whether the government had given any consideration to the abolition of the sales tax on those particular items, namely equipment for the deaf, such as batteries and so on.

Mr. Sinclair: Once again, Mr. Chairman, accepting even the words of the hon. gentleman at the present time, may I say that not only did the government give consideration but in giving that consideration they decided to give this relief especially since, as the hon. member pointed out, most of this equipment still comes from the United States; and the relief was from 15 per cent under some British categories—22½ per cent, 15 per cent and 20 per cent in the American tariff. That is a substantial step forward as far as the cost of these articles to the people in Canada is concerned. I was trying to show him that consideration has been given and that a step forward has been taken. It is quite true, however, that as yet the sales tax has not been removed.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Knight: I am talking about the sales tax. I should like to know where that sales tax on such goods is collected. As to this equipment for the deaf which is coming from the United States, where is the sales tax collected?

Mr. Sinclair: The sales tax on any import is collected at the place of import.

Mr. Knight: Exactly; and that is the point. That is the reason why I mentioned that these goods came chiefly from the United States. In my experience—and I have had half a dozen cases of this particular type—the fact is that this sales tax is collected at the border, and the delay is not owing to the tariff or the customs duty but is owing to the collection of the sales tax at the border point. I have known, from my own experience, of a lady who had to wait ten days or two weeks until these formalities were taken care of; in her particular case she could perhaps afford to pay the sales tax. But the point is that the sales tax is collected at the border and it causes delay. That was her particular complaint, and I think her complaint was a valid one. These people are absolutely helpless without their hearing aids; they might as well not be living as far as any association with other people is concerned.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, the sales tax on goods which are imported is collected by exactly the same officials who collect the customs tariff and the excise tax, if applicable, namely the officers of the customs and excise division of the Department of National Revenue. I pointed out that consideration has been given, that a measure of relief has been given,—

Mr. Knight: With regard to the sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: —a measure of relief actually more substantial than mere removal of the sales tax, if he will consult the customs tariff.

Mr. Knight: I suggest that the parliamentary assistant should talk about relief in the tariff when we come to item 482, if I may use his own words. I am talking about alleviation of the sales tax, as mentioned in this paragraph 9 with which we are now dealing.

Mr. Sinclair: I do not know how often I have to tell the hon. member that there was no relief given in the sales tax; but in the consideration of that problem, very substantial relief has been given to imports, which is the very point he himself raised when he mentioned the fact that most of these goods come from the United States. Despite what the hon. member may think, I am sure most of the people in Canada who need these hearing aids will be grateful for the substantial reduction in the tariff which is included in the schedule.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I did not ask for any postscript to the answer to my question. I am to understand, then, that there has been no alleviation in this budget with regard to the sales tax on equipment for the deaf? Can the parliamentary assistant answer that question yes or no and let us get on with something else?

Mr. Sinclair: I am happy to find that at last the hon. member has understood. There is no reduction in the sales tax on this equipment. And I again say, so that he will not be able to misunderstand me the next time, that there has been a substantial reduction in the customs tariff. If the hon. member is sincerely interested in the problem, I would suggest that he study the full impact of all taxation on such things, not merely the excise tax.

Mr. Knight: We will deal with the other matter when we come to it.

The Chairman: Shall we take up paragraph 10? Is that agreed?

Mr. Catherwood: Before we come to paragraph 10, may I ask this question? As a result of the explanation given by the parliamentary assistant it would be impossible to estimate the loss of revenue in a section such as this. Can he tell me approximately what would be the total loss of revenue resulting from a repeal of the sales tax, under section 9, on all these items (a) to (h) inclusive?

Mr. Sinclair: In his budget address the minister gave the estimate on those as $1 million.

The Chairman: Shall we take up paragraph 10?

Mr. Sinclair: One moment, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Melfort asked me whether tires for replacements on farm equipment are exempt from sales tax. The answer is yes, on farm implements and on any farm machinery. That is in the farm implement item 409b, etc.

Mr. Wright: Sales tax is not collected on tires for farm machinery?

Mr. Sinclair: On those items which are in that class in item 409.

Mr. Wright: Can you give us those?

Mr. Sinclair: It is the farm implement item. This is put in the Excise Tax Act. There is at least a page and a half of them.

The Chairman: Shall we now take up paragraph 10?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Is there any discussion of paragraph 10?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I want to make an attempt to convince the parliamentary assistant that there is still an inconsistency as between paragraph 1 and paragraph 4. I want him to look at the Excise Tax Act and either agree with me or tell me where I am wrong. On page 34 of the Excise Tax Act it is stated that stoves of a certain type are subject to 15 per cent tax. Then paragraph 1 states that articles in schedule I of the act that are at present subject to the rate of 25 per cent be reduced to 15 per cent. I take it that that does not affect the status of these stoves which remain at 15 per cent so far as paragraph 1 is concerned. If I am right up to that point, then I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that when you come to paragraph 4, there should be some qualification in the word "stoves", something to the effect "That the excise tax on stoves other than those referred to in 3(b) of schedule I."

Mr. Sinclair: The actual resolution says that the excise tax on goods enumerated in schedule I of the act which are at the present time subject to the rate of 25 per cent are going to be reduced to 15 per cent. Well, that does not include 3(b) because 3(b) is not at 25 per cent; it is at 15 per cent. That is the electrical appliances group on which we put a special tax of 15 per cent, and now paragraph 4 says that is all repealed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In other words, you say that paragraph 4 comes along and repeals the tax on all stoves? It does away with the effect of 3(b) on stoves?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes; and when the bill comes along 3(b) will not be in it. The first resolution, the 25 per cent rate under paragraph 3 is repealed, and then the fourth paragraph says that this special 15 per cent tax on stoves—it is generally referred to as being on electrical appliances—is also repealed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If that is what is in the bill perhaps that covers it, but it does seem to me to be a roundabout way to get at it.

Resolution agreed to.

Excise Act

The Chairman: We shall now take up the resolution dealing with the Excise Act which reads as follows:

EXCISE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act, 1934 and to provide:

1. That the duty of excise on spirits distilled from wine produced from native fruits and used in the treatment of domestic wine be repealed.
2. That the duty of excise on spirits used directly in the manufacture of goods subject to excise tax under schedule I of the Excise Tax Act be repealed.
3. That the duty of excise on beer or malt liquor brewed in whole or in part from any substance other than malt be reduced from forty-five cents to forty-two cents per gallon.
4. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the ninth day of April nineteen hundred and fifty-two.

We shall deal with the paragraphs seriatim. Is there any discussion on paragraph 1?

Mr. Knowles: Will the parliamentary assistant explain this paragraph? Perhaps he can give a general explanation with regard to this resolution as a whole.

Mr. Sinclair: Hon. members may recall that those members who are from the areas of Canada which produce wine, the Niagara peninsula, part of Quebec, the Okanagan valley and Vancouver island, at various times have protested against foreign wines in one respect being more favourably treated as far as taxation is concerned—that is aside from customs tax—than domestic wines. The reason for that lay in the fact that as far as light wines are concerned, wines of ordinary fermentation, Canadian wines have an advantage; but on wines which are called fortified wines, wines to which spirits are added, heavier wines, for example, sherry, to which grape alcohol has been added, the Canadian wines suffer a disadvantage because we levy an excise duty on the spirits which they use to fortify the wine, and when the wine is sold to the public we put an excise tax on it. They objected first of all to the fact that we levied this excise duty on what was an article used in the manufacture of goods. In general we try to avoid that. They objected also to the fact that there was a pyramiding of taxes since the excise tax was then paid on the resulting cost of the wine, which included not only the cost of the spirits to fortify the wine, but the excise duty on it. And the various members from those ridings, the grape growers association and the wine growers associations on many occasions have asked that this problem be considered. It has been, and we are now removing the extra duty of $1.50 a gallon on those spirits which are used in the manufacture of these strong wines to fortify them. We still at the end have the same excise taxes; that is, when the wines are sold to the public, of 50 cents a gallon on still wines, and $2.50 a gallon on sparkling wine.

Mr. Adamson: What is the difference between light wine and strong wine? What is the difference in alcoholic content? When does a wine become strong wine, and when does it cease being a light wine?

Mr. Sinclair: My understanding is just at the point when it is fortified; when it has gone through its own process of natural fermentation and then has to be fortified with distilled spirit, which is generally a grape brandy, it is a strong wine; that is the wine on which this special excise duty is applied. On the ordinary wine, which is not fortified, this duty of course does not apply. It was only on the wines such as port and sherry, which come to my mind, continental wines which are fortified, that this applied.

Mr. Adamson: Irrespective of the strength of the wine at natural fermentation, it does not come into this category?

Mr. Sinclair: Light—

Mr. Adamson: No matter how strong is the alcoholic content of natural wine, it does not come under this?

Mr. Sinclair: A natural wine does not use spirits for its fortification. I think if you remember your high school chemistry, or perhaps your efforts and mine to make home brew or homemade wine, you will recall that there is an early limit to natural fermentation.

Mr. Adamson: It blew up eventually.

Mr. Sinclair: There is little variation between the strength of natural fermentation of wine and beer. The next step to get it up to 20 per cent alcoholic content can only be reached by the addition of the spirits. I think the hon. member for Lincoln wants to speak on this. He is more of an authority on this matter than you or I.

Mr. Cavers: I should like to compliment the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant on the inclusion of this matter in the tax item that we are discussing at this time, because it has to do with a very important industry in the district from which I come, namely, the producing of grapes in the district of the Niagara peninsula. There are many grape growers in the Niagara peninsula, the majority in the constituency of Lincoln and some in the constituency of Welland.

Mr. Lennard: What about Wentworth?

Mr. Cavers: And there are some in Wentworth too. To a great extent, they depend on the growing of grapes. We appreciate very much the effort that has been made by the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant in arranging to have this tax repealed which we feel is an unjust tax on the grape growers of the Niagara district. It put us in a very unfavourable position with regard to wine which is imported from California, South Africa, South America and other countries. This deletion is only fair treatment for the grape growers and domestic wine producers of the province of Ontario.

The Chairman: We shall now discuss paragraph 2 which deals with the excise tax on spirits used directly in the manufacture of goods.

Mr. Sinclair: I may give a word of explanation on this. These spirits referred to in item 1 are also used in the manufacture of certain mouth washes and hair lotions and things like that, and exactly the same argument applies, namely, that they pay an excise duty when they manufacture it, then they pay an excise tax and a sales tax on the finished product. Since we were clearing up the situation as far as the wine growers were concerned we decided to do the same thing with respect to those other manufactured products.

The Chairman: Is there any discussion on paragraph 3?

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to hear the parliamentary assistant admit in what he has said on the first two paragraphs of this resolution that there is such a thing as a tax that pyramids.

Mr. Sinclair: Very rare—these cases are so rare—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinclair: Hon. members are laughing, but they will recall that our two main indirect taxes are sales taxes and excise taxes, and they are not pyramided. They are calculated on the same base. This was one of the rare examples where there was one in the wine. I made a little error with the wine, since the excise tax on wine is specified by the gallonage. Therefore it was not pyramided; but in the case of the mouth washes and the hair lotions there was an element of pyramiding because of the application of 10 per cent sales tax to the finished product.

The Chairman: If there is no discussion on paragraph 3, we shall proceed with paragraph 4.

Mr. Sinclair: There is another anomaly in paragraph 3. Ninety-five per cent of the beer in Canada is made from malt, and we tax the malt to secure the tax on the beer produced, and we tax it at the rate of 21 cents a pound. It takes two pounds of malt to make a gallon of beer, and that is at the rate of 42 cents a gallon. There are several other beers in Canada, some made from rice and some made from corn flakes, other than malt, and they have been in the past taxed at 45 cents a gallon. Those who were in this type of brewing business complained that they were being discriminated against and so the tax has been reduced on these rice and corn beers to the same rate as on the malt beers, 42 cents per gallon.

Resolution agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff be amended by striking thereout tariff items 216d, 216e, 216f, 231d, 231e, 237(a), 237(b), 237(c), 237(d), 238(1), 238(2), 238(3) (i), 238(3) (ii), 238(4) (i), 238(4) (ii), 238(5) (i), 238(5) (ii), 238(6) (i), 238(6) (ii), 238a, 238b, 238c, 238d, 238e, 238f, 238g, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 322a, 323, 324 and 325, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I hope the parliamentary assistant is going to make a general explanation. The minister referred to this in most general terms. I understand that the chief items to be dealt with concern glass and plastic. I understand also that there are actually some increases in the tariff rates with which I am sure the parliamentary assistant will want to deal more particularly because we were assured not long ago in the most moving terms that the raising of the tariff was an unholy thing that this government would never do.

Mr. Sinclair: Hon. members will realize, as the minister pointed out in his budget speech, that these items fall mainly into three classes. The minister's remarks will be found on page 1256 of Hansard. The first class covers changes which are consequent upon investigations which were carried out by the tariff appeal board on plastics and glass. There are actually four voluminous and excellent reports which the minister tabled the night he gave his budget speech.

The second group covers changes in classification and nomenclature. This is a very rapidly developing world as far as chemicals and other specialized products are concerned and new names, descriptions and terms are being created. It was necessary to bring the tariff items up to date as far as names were concerned.

The third group covers the incorporation into the tariff schedules of various reductions made by order in council under section 284 of the Customs Act. The governor in council has authority to reduce the tariff on materials which are used in the manufacture of goods in Canada. The governor in council cannot reduce the tariff on manufactured articles, but it can be reduced on primary products. Some of these reductions by order in council go back as far as 1907 and they are now being incorporated in the schedule.

The first group of items, as I say, are as a consequence of investigations which have been made in recent years by the tariff appeal board on both plastics and glass. Last year the tariff board made an interim report, and we adopted into our schedule, certain items covering plastics both of the cellulose and resin type. I find it most difficult to condense the report—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the parliamentary assistant intend to come back to plastics later on?

Mr. Sinclair: I think the glass items are first. I find it most difficult to condense this most exhaustive report on the glass industry. Some hon. members may have read it, and others may not have had the time. I have a statement here of information culled from that long report which may or may not be of value.

The essence is that here in Canada there are two principal manufacturers of glass, one a branch of a British company and one a branch of a United States company. They make what is commonly called sheet glass; they do not make plate glass. There are considerable imports from Great Britain, the United States, Belgium, France and Czechoslovakia.

When glass is imported for manufacture into other products, such as plate glass and the better qualities of sheet glass for manufacture into mirrors, it was subject to a drawback of 50 per cent. The main consequence of this report on glass has been a reduction in the tariff on glass and the removal of the 50 per cent drawback which had been allowed on glass imported for manufacture into mirrors, for laminated glass, for thermopane double glass and so on.

This is an extremely technical thing and I can read this statement if hon. members desire. The only purpose in reading it would be to place on the record a summary of this excellent report by the tariff board.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want the parliamentary assistant to have to read a long report, but it seems to me he might deal briefly with the expectations as to the course of trade and prices which are expected to flow from the recommendations.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Sinclair: To forecast trade and prices would be rather difficult. Perhaps it might be helpful if I gave this report. The total imports during 1951 of sheet and plate glass were valued at about $14 million, of which the United Kingdom supplied $5,600,000 worth. Imports from foreign countries were valued at about $8,400,000, of which the United States supplied $4,400,000 worth, Belgium $2,500,000 worth, France $570,000, Czechoslovakia $450,000 worth, and Germany about $300,000 worth.

The most important item in the new glass schedule is item 319, which covers plate glass, formerly dutiable under tariff items 320, 321 and 322. Item 320 covered plate glass in sheets up to 7 square feet and was duty free under the British preferential tariff and a most-favoured-nation rate of 10 per cent. Item 321 provided for plate glass in sheets over 7, but not over 25 square feet, duty free under the British preferential tariff with a most-favoured-nation rate of 20 per cent.

I might say in passing that there is no general rate on glass because countries outside the general agreement covering most favoured nations are not exporters of glass, or for that matter manufacturers of glass.

Mrs. Fairclough: Except Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Sinclair: Czechoslovakia is a member of the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Item 322 provided for plate glass, n.o.p., at rates of 17½ per cent under the British preferential and 25 per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff. A drawback of 99 per cent of the customs duty applied to plate glass when used in the manufacture of safety glass. This provision for a drawback is now being cancelled and plate glass will continue to be duty free under the British preferential tariff with a most-favoured-nation rate of 5 per cent.

The imports of plate glass during 1951 were valued at $6,730,000. The United Kingdom supplied $2,167,000 worth, United States $3,460,000 worth, Belgium $970,000 worth, France $72,000 worth, and Germany $62,000 worth.

The item of second importance in the new glass schedule is item 318, which now covers ordinary window glass and thick window glass. The former item 318 provided for ordinary window glass duty free under the British preferential tariff with a most-favoured-nation rate of 10 per cent. Item 319 provided for thick window glass duty free under the British preferential tariff with a most-favoured-nation rate of 20 per cent. A drawback of 50 per cent of the duty was allowed on thick window glass and plate glass used in the manufacture of mirrors. The drawback provision is cancelled and window glass continues duty free under the British preferential tariff with a reduction in the most-favoured-nation rate from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent. Imports during 1951 of the glass covered by the new item 318 were valued at $5,450,000 of which the United Kingdom supplied over $2,720,000 worth, Belgium $1,400,000, France, $450,000, Czechoslovakia, $446,000 and Germany $225,000.

The other important items in the new glass schedule are 322(a), 322(b) and 323, the items covering laminated glass or safety glass. We have had plate glass, sheet glass and now this is the third major glass item in Canadian industry. During 1951 the imports of the glass provided for in these items amounted to only $129,000 worth, but during 1950 the value of the safety glass manufactured in Canada reached almost $10 million. There was $10 million worth made in Canada and $129,000 worth imported. Laminated glass and manufactures thereof were formerly dutiable under tariff item 322a at the rate of 17½ per cent under the British preferential tariff and 25 per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff. The new item 322(a) reduces the tariff on laminated glass, not further processed than cut into rectangles, to 5 per cent under the British preferential tariff and 12½ per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff. The former rates of 17½ per cent under the British preferential tariff and 25 per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff are continued on laminated glass further processed than cut into rectangles and on manufactures of laminated glass. In other words, the semi-finished product when imported in sheets without finishing into sizes carries a considerably lower tariff than the finished product when it is brought in exactly in the shape of windshields and so on. Those are the three principal classifications and the three principal items.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I recognize the difficulty of assessing business conditions in Czechoslovakia, but no doubt that was taken into consideration. Would the parliamentary assistant say something about the Czechoslovakian situation?

Mr. Sinclair: This resolution is actually on the tariff items and not on tariff policy. Czechoslovakia is still one of the agreeing parties comprising the thirty-four countries which form part of the general agreement.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And as such entitled to most-favoured-nation treatment.

Mr. Sinclair: And as such is entitled to most-favoured-nation treatment unless there is a specific denunciation of that country by another member. That of course was the situation last summer at Geneva when the Americans and the Czechs both denounced the agreement they had made with each other, both however remaining in the general agreement.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What was the reason for that denunciation?

Mr. Sinclair: I was there. There was several reasons given on both sides such as the failure to carry out not just tariff reductions but other obligations reached under the agreement. However, I do not think it is proper for me in discussing a tariff item to discuss tariff policy. The second part deals with plastics.

The Chairman: The first part has to do with glass and the second part has to do with synthetic resins.

Mr. Sinclair: I can make the same sort of summary of the report if it is desired or perhaps members would rather read it themselves.

Mr. Nowlan: As to the first paragraph, can the parliamentary assistant tell us what happened? I notice that 238e is set forth in the one but I do not find it enumerated in the schedule. Is that repealed or does it appear under another number?

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is now on plastics?

Mr. Nowlan: On the tariffs.

Mr. Sinclair: The tariff on plastics.

Mr. Nowlan: That is right. I might give the background of why I am raising the matter. There has been some correspondence with the department by farmers of my constituency about the importation of plastic silo tops manufactured in the United States. There is a letter from the deputy minister of the department stating that if they are synthetic resins they come under item 711 at a 20 per cent ad valorem rate, and if made of cellulose acetate under tariff item 238 at 25 per cent. I was hopeful that possibly 238e had disappeared and therefore they could come in there.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I could give a short summary of the plastic situation. These old items are removed from the tariff schedule and these new items, including the items passed last year on cellulose and resin plastics, are now a part of the 900 sequence items.

Mr. Nowlan: That is what I feared when I looked it over.

Mr. Sinclair: If you want the rates I can give you the rates.

Mr. Nowlan: Where are they now?

Mr. Sinclair: Item 915. The great difficulty is in knowing exactly what type of plastic article the hon. member is referring to because one has to be an organic chemist of pretty high standing to pick out these various plastics.

Mr. Nowlan: The deputy minister says it comes under synthetic resin which would be 711—this was written last year by the department—or else 238e if made of cellulose acetate.

Mr. Sinclair: Item 908 is the one that now has to do with manufactures of synthetic resins. The rates are 15 per cent, 20 per cent and 30 per cent.

Mr. Nowlan: The most-favoured-nation rate is 20 per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: I know that the policy of the department in many cases has been to reduce or abolish the tariff on imported farm machinery of a type not manufactured in Canada. This particular type of equipment is essentially for farms and nothing else. They are plastic covers for silos which of course are in great demand today. We have a letter from the department saying in one case that there is no sales tax because it is for exclusive use by farmers, and then the other letter says that there must be a duty of either 20 or 25 per cent because it comes under one or other of these old items which, as you say, are now 908 or something else.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the problem with the inclusion of this very wide range of plastics in the raw, semi-manufactured and manufactured states. I must confess that, in all the study I have done on these resolutions so far, the most baffling has been this report on plastics because the language is completely foreign to that used by anybody in the House of Commons. The tariff board spent a great deal of time on an actual study of the situation. They called in not only the manufacturers of the basic plastic products but also the manufacturers of the secondary products, and this schedule is to their general satisfaction. It carries through the same basic principle of giving a low tariff or no tariff at all on raw materials not of a class or kind manufactured in Canada, with a slight tariff on those which are manufactured in Canada, and intermediate tariff on semi-processed imports, and a higher tariff on finished articles.

The plastics industry is growing very rapidly in Canada today, particularly in the west, in Alberta with the resins and in British Columbia with the cellulose plastics. In the semi-processed stage the rates are higher; and in the finished stage, which Canadian manufacturers should be able to manufacture if not from primary plastics of Canadian manufacture then from plastics imported from Britain or the United States, the rates are still higher. That is the general pattern which runs through this new schedule which now covers both resin and cellulose plastics.

Mr. Nowlan: I quite appreciate the problems in connection with the development of the plastic industry, but I think the hon. gentleman will agree that this type of plastic covering will have a very small demand in Canada as a whole. I would think it is a type particularly suitable and necessary for farm use, and I suggest that consideration should be given to its exemption when used on farms. I am quite sure it is not manufactured in Canada at all, or if it is the manufacturing is done in western Canada, which raises problems of freight, deliveries and so on in the east.

Mr. Sinclair: That will certainly be given consideration. Now that we have this complete plastics schedule in the tariff I have no doubt we are going to get many requests during the coming year for tariff concessions on items used in fishing, farming and mining. As a matter of fact one item has been mentioned already by various hon. members, a small fishing apparatus which is made of plastic and which is included in an amendment to this schedule.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I fully realize the force of what the parliamentary assistant says about this strange new language we are now speaking, but there are one or two general business considerations which I think are relevant. Can we be informed as to how much of what we use in Canada is currently being imported; how much is made by whom, and who are the chief competitors? In other words, just what has induced the tariff board to recommend certain liftings in the tariff?

Mr. Sinclair: All that information is detailed in this report by the tariff board. Every manufacturer in Canada is listed here, with what he makes and what he imports. I am afraid I cannot easily summarize that for the committee except by reading the very long report. The number of secondary manufacturers in Canada is growing very rapidly. We have a fair number of primary manufacturers, and this development in Alberta with natural gas and oil has given that industry great encouragement. The Columbia cellulose plant in Prince Rupert, which is going to have a chemical plant in Edmonton, is another example of that development. But except by reading the report to the committee in detail, with column after column of figures showing the production of individual companies, I am afraid I cannot give any easy summary.

There is one important point in my opinion, however, which I think should be emphasized. As you know, by the Geneva agreements many of our existing tariff rates have been bound for three years, which means we cannot increase them. Even though we can give reductions to other countries, we cannot increase those rates. Those bindings, of course, were given in return for bindings of value to Canada in other countries; but we were very careful in new fields, where we could not assess the impact of such bindings, not to give any assurances or bindings of that kind. I would like to draw attention to a paragraph in the report of the tariff board which points that out:

> The board does not, in this report, recommend rates of duty which will apply when goods not now made in Canada begin to be produced in this country. The board is aware that industry is concerned lest low or free rates on goods not now manufactured in Canada may become bound against increase under international agreement.

They are thinking, of course, of the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

> In view of the rapidity with which this industry is developing and changing, the board recommends that those responsible for Canada's tariff policy bear this point in mind when undertaking international negotiations or, indeed, when new materials in this field are produced in quantity in Canada.

I may say the Minister of Finance has certainly accepted this recommendation. Moreover the chairman of the tariff board, which made this report, has been on the various Canadian delegations at Havana, Geneva, Annecy and Torquay at which various items were bound, so he is well aware of the problem.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to go back and ask one question on glass. One of the things that concern one is that as I understand it there is now an abandonment of the drawback, so that Britain and Czechoslovakia are left competing with each other. I have forgotten just what rates were indicated by the parliamentary assistant, but in any case there was formerly a substantial British preference. Have we any assurance that the basis of competition will be fair, and that the dumping regulations now in force will be effective with regard to Czechoslovakia?

Mr. Sinclair: The problem of establishing fair market values for goods from behind the iron curtain is very difficult. That was one of the points raised by the Americans in their denunciation of their trade relations with Czechoslovakia. It is almost impossible for our trade commissioners to circulate freely in Czechoslovakia and find out the current selling prices in that country of the type of goods they send to us. It is even more difficult for individual salesmen going to Czechoslovakia to ascertain those prices. On the other hand it is perfectly open to any Czechoslovakian trade commission or businessman to come to this country and find the fair market price of any commodity. That is undoubtedly a great problem.

However, I think most hon. members are aware that the glass industry was recently the subject of a report by the combines investigation branch. It is an industry in which there is not as much competition as generally exists in other industries in Canada. We have for the most part the Pilkington group of England, who are here with two branch factories, and the Pittsburgh Glass Company of the United States who are here with two or three factories under various names. The only real competition for those two groups comes from those individual Canadian importers who bring in Belgian, French, German and Czechoslovakian glass. Personally I feel that it is pretty healthy to have that competition, especially when you remember that there is only one glass company in all Britain. The Pilkington company is the only glass company there.

I do not want to bring in the findings of the combines branch in connection with the glass industry of Canada, but I feel that the removal of the drawback and the lowering of the duty will be a healthy thing as far as competition in the glass industry in Canada is concerned, and will be of benefit to those who use glass, especially the ordinary household where glass is used for windows and mirrors.

Mr. Hosking: With regard to imports from Czechoslovakia, I have looked through these tariff changes for items dealing with hats and dresses. The hat industry in Canada is finding it very hard to remain in business in competition with imports from Czechoslovakia, where the cost of manufacturing the article apparently is not known and cannot be assessed. Has the department given consideration to having our own government fix a value for these Czechoslovakian products when they come in, and charge the tariff on that assessed value, instead of accepting the figures of these countries behind the iron curtain in regard to the cost of manufacturing these articles? That would apply to glass and hats and other articles which, in order to hurt us, they send here in quantities at will, and on which no basic value can be set because we have no access to their records.

Mr. Sinclair: That matter, of course, does not relate either to this resolution or to the Department of Finance. There is provision in the law—

The Chairman: If it does not relate to the resolution now before us, I am afraid the hon. member will have to ask his question at another time. Shall this resolution carry?

Mr. Adamson: The minister said no plate glass was made here, and I realize that. When he mentions heavy glass, does he know whether any 32 ounce glass is made in Canada? There is single diamond, double diamond and 32 ounce glass, which I think is especially heavy. Is the latter type manufactured in Canada?

Mr. Sinclair: I do not believe so. I do not recall any mention in this report of heavy sheet glass. Both thin sheet glass and ordinary window glass are the types made in Canada. Cast and rolled glass are also types not made or made in very small quantities. Most of it is imported from either Britain or the United States.

Mr. Adamson: The reason for asking is that I had to buy some the other day, and I was informed that I could not get it in Canada. I had to import Belgian glass, I think it was.

Mr. Sinclair: I have one or two amendments to resolution 2. This is the second class, and perhaps I could give a general summary of the type of change made in this class. Resolution 2 contains 89 items, containing 27 new tariff items established to meet some of the many representations received for reductions in tariff during the last twelve months; 7 items on which the existing rates have been modified with no change in wording; 46 items in regard to which the wording has been clarified or revised to provide for additional products; 9 items which do not precisely fall in any of the above groups.

Some of the principal products covered by the group of 27 items referred to above are: pollen; culinary herbs; carbon tissue paper; plant protectors; extenders or substitutes for blood plasma; mullite; chemical preparations for coating the inside of fluorescent lamps or electronic tubes; plasticizers of petroleum origin; cast shapes of melted basalt rock; overhead rail tracks for industrial plants; dredges for removing the overburden in mines; ball and roller bearings for the repair of agricultural implements; machinery and apparatus for the manufacture of antibiotics, etc.; instruments for the interpretation of aerial photographs; automatic pilots and thermostatic controls for gas water heaters; apparatus for the receiving and transmitting of photographs by wire; steel rolls filled or surfaced with paper or cotton; scale parts; wood split pulleys; tires and tubes for tractors; material for electrotypes and engravings; waste containing aluminum oxide; United Nations and North Atlantic treaty publications; and materials for use in the manufacture of oil well drilling machinery and apparatus. On all of the foregoing the tariff has been substantially reduced or eliminated.

The general tariff on bananas has been reduced from $1 per stem or bunch to $1 per hundred pounds. The general tariff is the most important tariff so far as bananas are concerned, because our sources of supply are countries which are neither under the British preferential nor under the most-favoured-nation tariff. As I said, the general tariff has been reduced from $1 per stem to $1 per hundred pounds; the British preferential rate of 10 per cent and the most-favoured-nation rate of 17½ per cent on olives, sulphured or in brine, not bottled, has been suspended until July 1, 1953; the most-favoured-nation rate of 15 per cent on aircraft, complete parts thereof, and engines therefor, when of types and sizes not made in Canada, has been suspended until July 1, 1955; and the most-favoured-nation rate on ovens for commercial bakeries has been reduced from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent.

The group of 46 items consists mainly of amendments to facilitate administration and to remove anomalies.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask what the parliamentary assistant is reading from? Are these amendments to this schedule we have here?

Mr. Sinclair: This is a summary of the changes covered by the second resolution. Actually, the second resolution is embedded right in the schedule. You have to look along past the end of the plastic schedules to find it. It is at the bottom of page 13 if you have the separate resolutions.

The third group covered by this resolution is a group of 46 items consisting mainly of amendments to facilitate administration and to remove anomalies. The wording of some items has been widened in scope. The most important items in this group are those covering automobile parts, the wordings of which have been revised and brought up to date during trade agreement negotiations when some of the most-favoured-nation rates were reduced from 25 per cent to 17½ per cent. The item covering tractors has been amended to provide for accessories therefor. The wording of the item covering rubber tires has been amended to continue duty free entry of tractor tires which were formerly covered by an administrative ruling. That is part of the problem which the member for Melfort raised. The tariff has been reduced on milk evaporators from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent and the wording of this item has been widened to cover milk driers. The item covering off-highway trucks has been amended to include half-tracks. The revised wording of the item covering photographic cameras and equipment is now being inserted in the permanent tariff. I do not know whether members want to ask questions on the individual items or perhaps I should move the amendments to the items.

Mr. Helme: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might mention item 409m which has to do with internal combustion traction engines. I take it this will mean gas, gasoline distillate and diesel engine tractors. Up to the present time there have been three classifications for internal combustion tractors. Am I to understand from this that all three classifications will be free of duty now?

Mr. Sinclair: All internal combustion tractors are now free of duty.

Mr. Helme: It says "accessories", and they have been a rather difficult thing in connection with farm tractors in so far as lighting equipment or starting equipment was concerned. There has been a lot of trouble. Will they be free of duty, too?

Mr. Sinclair: That was included, too. That was a point raised by the farm members last year. The farm tractors themselves were exempt but the accessories were not. Those are now covered. That is one of the items in which there is a change of wording because of representations made between the bringing down of the budget and today.

Perhaps I could move these amendments in order. The first amendment is to tariff item 156a, b, c, d, e and f. This is a liquor item and perhaps I should give an explanation first, and then move the motion. In the present item 156 we do not provide for miniature bottles of liquor. Whiskey is imported from the United Kingdom in miniatures containing 1⅔ ounces, so that a dozen of these miniatures contains 20 ounces, but that is only ⅛ of a gallon. Prior to this amendment the duty on them was collected at the rate of ¾ of a gallon per dozen. This is much the same problem as we had with the tobacco a little earlier. Provision is also made for miniatures containing from ⅛ to a ¼ of a gallon per dozen, for miniatures containing from ¼ gallon to ½ gallon per dozen, and for miniatures containing from ½ to ¾ of a gallon per dozen. Previously all these small bottles were taxed per dozen as containing three-quarters of a gallon. Now we find there is an intermediate stage. We went from one-eighth to a quarter and from one-quarter to a half and from one-half to three-quarters. There are also bottles which have apparently one-sixth —over an eighth and less than a quarter— and the importers pointed out that fact to us. I should therefore like to move that the present item be deleted.

I beg leave to move or the Minister of Public Works will move:

That schedule A to the customs tariff as amended by resolution 2 be further amended by striking thereout the second paragraph of proviso (2), the paragraph covering:

"Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than one-eighth of a gallon but not more than one-fourth of a gallon per dozen, as one-fourth of a gallon per dozen" and inserting in lieu thereof in said schedule A the following paragraphs:

"Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than one-eighth of a gallon but not more than one-sixth of a gallon per dozen, as one-sixth of a gallon per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages, containing more than one-sixth of a gallon but not more than one-fourth of a gallon per dozen, as one-fourth of a gallon per dozen;"

This was added. This change was made at the request of the United Kingdom authorities who pointed out that we had covered all except one class by having too wide a gap. Now we cover the bottles in every size of these miniatures.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is some proviso.

The Chairman: This amendment is moved by the Minister of Public Works on behalf of the Minister of Finance. Shall I dispense with the reading of the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Sinclair: The next amendment is to tariff item 197f. I beg leave to move, or at least the Minister of Public Works will move:

That schedule A to the customs tariff as amended by resolution 2 be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 197f and inserting in lieu thereof in said schedule A the following item, enumeration and rates of duty:

"197f. Carbon tissue paper, valued at not less than forty cents per pound, for use in the manufacture of carbon paper.

B.P.	M.F.N.	Gen.
Free	7½ p.c.	25 p.c.

This is paper produced by Britain, carbon tissue paper not manufactured here in Canada. It is a carbon paper made out of rag stock. It is of better quality than that made in this country from ordinary newsprint or cellulose. To make quite sure that this reduction to the British covered only rag stock paper a value of not less than 40 cents per pound has been placed on it.

Mrs. Fairclough: One hundred per cent rag content?

Mr. Sinclair: Almost, because it is 40 cents per pound. It is not entirely, but almost.

Mrs. Fairclough: Do we not produce in Canada one hundred per cent rag content?

Mr. Sinclair: Not at all. Ours is all cellulose.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, no.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the information I have here.

The Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment proposed by the Minister of Public Works. Is the committee agreeable to the amendment?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the parliamentary assistant not going to answer the question raised by the hon. member for Hamilton West?

Mr. Sinclair: I thought I just did that. Of this type, our imports last year amounted to 783,000 pounds valued at $348,000. The United Kingdom supplied 298,599 pounds valued at $197,700. The United States supplied 484,505 pounds valued at $150,422.

The Chairman: Shall I again dispense with the reading of the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, it may be that in this particular classification, where you get into a tissue stock, we do not produce it in Canada in 100 per cent rag content. But 100 per cent rag content stock is produced in Canada. Can the parliamentary assistant say whether or not any 100 per cent rag content stock is produced here in other weights?

Mr. Sinclair: This is for the manufacture of carbon tissue paper.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is a tissue stock.

Mr. Sinclair: We have no information on that from those who manufacture it. There are very excellent 100 per cent rag stock papers made in Canada; there are also some fine papers made. But as to a tissue for the manufacture of carbon paper, the information of the tariff commissioner is that this class of rag stock comes entirely from Britain and the United States. This item is for the advantage of the British. It does not affect any Canadian manufacturer of this carbon tissue paper because ours is valued at less than 40 cents a pound and is therefore not affected.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Sinclair: There is an amendment to the section just mentioned by the hon. member for Prince Albert. I beg leave to move, or rather the Minister of Public Works moves:

That schedule A to the customs tariff as amended by resolution 2 be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 409m(1) and inserting in lieu thereof in said schedule A the following item, enumeration and rates of duty:

"409m(1) Internal combustion tractors (not to include highway truck-tractors)—

The important part is that in parenthesis.

—and accessories therefor; parts of all the foregoing.

B.P.	M.F.N.	Gen.
Free	Free	Free

This is to make sure that these so-called highway truck-tractors are not included; but all the ordinary tractors, as we think of them, are now free from tariff as are accessories as well.

Mr. Helme: Do accessories include replacement rubber tires and tubes?

Mr. Sinclair: I am told that will be covered in item 618(b) which we shall come to in just a moment.

Mr. Wright: On this item I have a suggestion to make to the parliamentary assistant. I have been given to understand that this word "accessories" does not cover all of the attachments which should be covered under this item and that representations have been made that the words "attachments and accessories" should be used there instead of simply the word "accessories". I have been informed that there is a great difficulty in the department in distinguishing between what is an attachment and what is an accessory. I am told that it would simplify the administration and would widen the application of this item if the two words were used.

Mr. Sinclair: The second section of this item 409 specifies attachments. I think there is quite a difference between an attachment and an accessory. A plough pulled behind a tractor could be called an attachment.

Mr. Wright: It also is covered under other items.

Mr. Sinclair: That is, of course, the point I am getting at. There is difficulty in the department in distinguishing between what is an accessory and what is a gadget. Again that is a problem of administration. But the present exemption includes the generally accepted accessories to a tractor and they are free in the British, most-favoured-nation and general tariffs.

Mr. Wright: Have representations not been made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other bodies which are interested in having this word accessories widened by using the word attachments there, or in having this item widened by using the word attachments as well as accessories? I am given to understand that there is difficulty in the matter and that it would simplify things greatly if the word attachments were used. If it is possible, will the parliamentary assistant let this amendment stand tonight and make more inquiries with regard to this matter. The second item mentions attachments to be combined with automobiles in Canada for use on traction engines and parts thereof. It uses the word attachment there and not the word accessories. I think there is a point here which should be investigated.

Mr. Sinclair: In the discussion of the tariff schedule, a discussion which is almost continuous in the department—because these representations come forward the year round, unlike income tax representations which are generally made just before the budget—I do not know of any item to which more attention has been given than to this tractor item because of the problem raised and because of the wide use of tractors. I am informed that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture made such a suggestion. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in putting forward proposals on behalf of the farmers, naturally want all taxes removed from all types of equipment that can be possibly used by farmers, and to a great degree that has been accomplished in recent years; but as far as the administration of the Department of National Revenue is concerned, this is the wording which they want, and in view of their experience this is the wording which will include all bona fide accessories on tractors, but will exclude others.

Mr. Wright: If there is any regulation which distinguishes between attachments and accessories I should like to know just what the interpretation is as to what is an attachment and what is an accessory. They must have some definition which they go by. I would like to get these two definitions.

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that neither we nor the United States department of internal revenue have any clear-cut distinction by regulations between an accessory and an attachment. It is the past practice of the department which has been their guide, as to what is a useful accessory and what is not. When the actual bill is before the house we shall have the same item back again, and I shall at that time have with me whatever rulings the department has given in the past on accessories.

Mr. Helme: Item 409m (2) reads:

> Traction attachments designed to be combined with automobiles in Canada for use as traction engines and parts thereof.

I believe this relates to an attachment which can be put on automobiles. You take the back wheels off the automobile and put the tractor wheels on and make a light tractor of it.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Helme: There are other things pertaining to tractors that are referred to as attachments. For instance, in the trade we refer to lighting attachments, starting attachments, belt pulley attachments, power take-off attachments, hydraulic pump attachments, and so on. These are part of the tractor. I should like to have a clarification of that, if I may.

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that these are all classed as tractor accessories by the department.

Mr. Helme: They would be free, then.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

The Chairman: Hon. members have heard the amendment. Shall it carry?

Mr. Wright: Just one further point. Would a two-wheel platform on rubber tires, attached to an automobile be considered an attachment and be free of duty?

Mr. Sinclair: It certainly does not come under this item. I am informed that it is not—you mean the ordinary little trailer?

Mr. Wright: A two-wheel trailer.

Mr. Sinclair: No, it is not exempt.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: We now come to tariff item 618b.

Mr. Helme: Before we take up item 618b may I refer to item 427b on page 19? This item refers to ball and roller bearings and complete parts thereof for the repair of agricultural implements and agricultural machinery specified in certain tariff items. Across this country we have harvesting equipment, combine harvesters. I was informed last summer—this was in July—by a field man of the customs department that combines as a machine are brought into this country duty free, but any parts that might be required for these combines, once they are in service, are subject to duty. That would of course include ball bearings. It does not seem reasonable to me that when a machine that was brought in here duty free requires replacement parts duty should have to be paid on them. May we have some information on that?

Mr. Sinclair: This amendment is made specifically to cover that point. It is quite true that in our tariff schedule we still have a few items under which the article itself, with accessories, can be brought in as a unit free of tariff. But when individual parts are replaced some of them—they are getting rarer and rarer—are not duty free. The main reason for such a situation is that the parts may be in very common use in other classes of goods which have paid tariff on the way through. The same situation exists in other goods. As an example I refer to the matter of rubber boots and rubber clothing for fishermen, raised by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine when we were discussing the last resolution. This item 427b has been placed specifically in the tariff this year to make sure that not only are the ball bearings and the roller bearings for agricultural implements free when they come in as part of the machinery, but that they are also free as replacements.

Mr. Helme: Am I to understand then from this item that combine harvester, thresher machines are in as agricultural implements?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Helme: Agricultural implements are duty free?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Helme: And combine harvesters are wholly used on the farms for threshing and harvesting?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Helme: It does not seem reasonable to me that parts of these machines should be subject to any duty whatsoever, because they cannot be put on the highway or put to any other use. I must say that with respect to threshing machines which were in use previous to the bringing out of combines—some of them are still in use as a matter of fact—their parts are duty free. They both do practically the same job.

Mr. Sinclair: In the actual case the hon. member referred to, the thresher combine, the parts for them are now duty free. Ball bearings are an example of a commodity which could be well used in other types of machinery which, as a whole coming into the country, might not be duty free. This is an example of the item I was talking about which could be used both on duty free equipment and on equipment which pays duty. To clear up the situation, however, we are specifically including now ball bearings and rollers of all agricultural implements as parts which come in duty free.

The Chairman: Are there any other amendments?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes. I have an amendment to item 447c. This is a new item to provide for duty free entry under the British preferential and most-favoured-nation tariffs of "steel rolls, filled or surfaced with paper or cotton, for use exclusively in the manufacture of paper". These rolls were formerly dutiable under tariff item 446a at the rate of 10 per cent under the British preferential tariff and 22½ per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff. These rolls are not made in Canada and have to be returned every few months to the United States to be refilled. Each time of their return, duty is assessed at the rate of 22½ per cent.

During the calendar year 1951, 9 new rolls and 77 refilled rolls were imported, the value of which was over $62,000. About 75 per cent of the cost of the refilled roll is represented by the cost of the refilling.

For a number of years the tariff has provided for duty free entry from all countries of forged steel rolls for rolling ferrous or non-ferrous, metals, and for sandcast or cast iron rolls for rolling iron or steel or for use in manufacturing paper.

Since the item has been included, the industry has drawn attention to the fact that the wording was not quite exact as far as their purpose was concerned. Therefore the Minister of Public Works will move that tariff item 447c as at present worded be struck out and the following be substituted:

"447c. Supercalender rolls consisting of a steel core filled with discs of paper or textile fabrics, or both, for use exclusively in the manufacture of paper.

B.P.	M.F.N.	Gen.
Free	Free	35 per cent

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Where are the rolls chiefly from?

Mr. Sinclair: Entirely from the United States.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is the reason for doing away with the British preference?

Mr. Hunter: You cannot make it any freer than free.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Formerly it was 10 per cent on the British preference, 22½ per cent most-favoured-nation, and now they are on the same basis.

Mr. Sinclair: Correct. It is just carrying out the general government policy as far as trading is concerned. We cannot get these rolls from the British. The British have supplied none of these rolls.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is my whole point.

Mr. Sinclair: All these rolls come from United States.

Mrs. Fairclough: All of them?

Mr. Adamson: Are not any made in Canada?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Sinclair: I have another amendment to move in connection with item 410f. Up until now we have permitted the tax free importation of dredges used for gold alluvial mining. These dredges are used mainly in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. It is proposed now to provide for another type of dredge used in alluvial mining in connection with the iron mines in northwestern Ontario. In drafting the item some doubt was expressed as to whether or not the pipe leading away from the dredge through which the dredged material was dumped could be considered part of the dredge, which was certainly the intention. I shall ask my colleague to move an amendment accordingly.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That schedule A to the customs tariff as amended by resolution 2 be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 410f(2) and inserting in lieu thereof in said schedule A the following item, enumeration and rates of duty:

410f(2). Complete dredging plant, including integrated floating and shore discharge pipe line and booster station equipment, for development of mineral deposits; parts of all the foregoing.

British Preferential Tariff	Most-Favoured-Nation Tariff	General Tariff
Free	Free	25 per cent

Mr. Adamson: Where do most of these come from?

Mr. Sinclair: The United States.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Sinclair: There is a suggested amendment to item 618b.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That schedule A to the customs tariff as amended by resolution 2 be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 618b(1) and inserting in lieu thereof in said schedule A the following item, enumeration and rates of duty:

618b. Tires and tubes, wholly or in part of rubber:

(1) For replacement on the agricultural implements and agricultural machinery specified in tariff items 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409h, 409j, 409l, and the tractors provided for in tariff item 409m.

British Preferential Tariff	Most-Favoured-Nation Tariff	General Tariff
Free	Free	Free

Mr. Wright: As most farm machinery today is on rubber this amendment will be of considerable assistance in connection with replacements. Will this apply to farm wagons?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Wright: I think the government might go the whole way and make it apply to farm wagons.

Mr. Sinclair: Up until now farm wagons have been looked upon as having other uses as well as agricultural. We have gone quite a long way in this budget in expanding the field of lowered tariff on agricultural items.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Sinclair: I shall ask my colleague to move an amendment in connection with 682a.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That schedule A to the customs tariff be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 682a and inserting in lieu thereof in said schedule A the following item, enumeration and rates of duty:

682a. Net floats of any material except wood, for use exclusively in commercial fishing; carapace measures of any material.

British Preferential Tariff	Most-Favoured-Nation Tariff	General Tariff
Free	Free	Free

Mr. Sinclair: In the description of fishing equipment to be exempted we have added "carapace measures of any material." I notice the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is smiling. It may be that he does not appreciate the importance of these things to our fisheries. An apparatus for the measuring of lobsters must be effective, in view of the strict enforcement of the law by the fishery department.

Mr. Knowles: The parliamentary assistant does not know my background or he would not say that.

Mr. Sinclair: I am surprised the hon. member laughed.

Mr. Knowles: It may be that I was enjoying what the hon. member said.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Knight: I should like to say a word in connection with books, and I am speaking now on item 708a. Certain publications are admitted to Canada free, but I suggest that there are other publications which should be admitted free and which should not be subject to sales tax. I think hon. members will agree that a contact with books generally is the best form of adult education you can have. There is a school of thought among educators and others that we are neglecting to make the works of the literary masters available to our students, even our university students.

We seem to be turning more and more to digests, synopses and extracts, and to my mind those are no substitute for the original book in the hands of the student. I think the main reason for such substitution is the high price of books. As far as the reading public is concerned, and I am afraid this includes the younger reading public, it seems to be turning more and more to trash, the kind of book that is the cheapest. I refer mainly to the 25 cent books to be purchased in drug stores, pool rooms or tobacconists.

I should like to say something with regard to censorship for the benefit of the Minister of National Revenue. I do not intend to commit myself now as being in favour or not in favour of censoring our reading matter, since I should be called to order, but I do want to say that we might as well not have any censorship in this country as to have the type of censorship we have.

The Chairman: May I ask the hon. member to what item he is addressing his remarks.

Mr. Knight: Item 708a.

The Chairman: That refers to publications of the United Nations.

Mr. Knight: Perhaps the item should be 696 which refers to items for the use of colleges, academies, schools or seminaries of learning in Canada.

The Chairman: The two items are 696 and 708a.

Mr. Knight: I shall trust to the discretion of the chairman to direct me as to which item is the appropriate one.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should inform the hon. member that the reason I rose was that I heard him speak about the censorship exercised by the Department of National Revenue. We are dealing now with various items, and if he is dealing with 696 or 708a he may do so but only inasmuch as they have to do with the increase or reduction of tariffs, or whatever treatment they are being given under this resolution.

Mr. Knight: I shall avoid censorship, Mr. Chairman. I merely want to say that many of these 25 cent penny dreadfuls can be found among the books which are on the censorship list of Canada. However, I shall say no more about that. With respect to the publication of decent literature we are very far behind Great Britain, for example, in the publishing of cheap editions of good books. Rather than restricting, I think the government should encourage the widest circulation of books and literature of all sorts. The sales tax and the customs duty do raise the prices of books which in my estimation are altogether too high in Canada, and that is one of the reasons why people are forced to read the sort of thing about which I have been talking.

Another point is that Canadian publishing houses, in selling books which they bring in from the United States and upon which they pay duty and brokerage, charge Canadian customers 10 per cent more than the price for which the Canadian customer can purchase the same book from the original publisher in the United States and then pay the customs duty and sales tax himself. These United States exporters find it convenient to set up branches in Canada, and we are in fact subsidizing the establishment of these institutions at the expense of the public and the Canadia university student in particular.

To come back to the tariff, I am aware that on the free list of publications there are, as well as those mentioned in 708a, certain educational books for university libraries or books prescribed for the regular curricula of schools and universities. However, I want to point out that unlike the items in 708a, reference books which are brought in by bona fide professors in universities and teachers in schools for reference purposes are subject to the tariff which is not charged on the publications in this item. I think that is a state of affairs that could very well be altered. If a professor or teacher is worthy of the name he does not confine himself to the textbooks prescribed by the curriculum. He wants reference books, and as long as he is a bona fide university professor or teacher I see no reason why these books should not be admitted free. I shall go further and say that it would be better for the educational standards of the country—and goodness knows education at the moment is in a deplorable state—if educational books of all types were admitted free of not only customs duty but sales tax, for sale not only to people in educational institutions but to the public at large. In my opinion the government should collect no revenue which involves any limitation upon the wide circulation of educational books. Indeed, I think I would go further and say on any books.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to speak on this item. Are you going to speak on books?

Mr. Adamson: Yes. I shall be very brief. I had had representations from libraries and others along the general line indicated by the hon. member who has just spoken. Certain public libraries and our parliamentary library, I believe, have to pay not only duty but sales tax on books brought into Canada. I think it is a rather anomalous situation that at least should be considered.

Mr. Sinclair: I have heard so much about this matter in recent years that I think tonight I had better put on the record exactly what the situation is as far as books are concerned. To listen to the hon. member for Saskatoon, one would think there was a heavy tariff on books. Actually there is no tariff at all on any book coming into Canada from within the British commonwealth. I think our first responsibility is to see that there is the freest exchange of books and literature between the various members of the commonwealth. I think it might also be desirable to put on the record the various tariff items as far as books, pamphlets and periodicals are concerned, which those who are really interested in this matter could have easily consulted the customs tariff and ascertained. Tariff item 169 reads as follows:

Books, viz.:—Novels or works of fiction, or literature of a similar character, unbound or paper bound or in sheets, but not to include Christmas annuals, or publications commonly known as juvenile and toy books.

Under the British preferential tariff they are free, most-favoured-nation tariff 10 per cent, and general tariff 25 per cent. Then we have four separate treaties with various other countries to permit the free exchange of books between our country and those countries. Tariff item 170 reads as follows:

Books, periodicals and pamphlets, or parts thereof, printed, bound, unbound, or in sheets (not to include blank account books, copy books, or books to be written or drawn upon (in any other than the English language).

Under the British preferential tariff they are free, most-favoured-nation tariff free, and general tariff free. We also have a reference to the United States trade agreement there. The next tariff item which members could have read is 171. It reads as follows:

Books, printed, periodicals and pamphlets, or parts thereof, not otherwise provided for, not to include blank account books, copy books, or books to be written or drawn upon.

In other words, blank books do not come in under that item but other books not otherwise provided for do. Under the British preferential tariff they are free, most-favoured-nation tariff 10 per cent, the general tariff 10 per cent. Then we have four other trade agreements with special reference to free exchange between these countries and our country. The next item is 171a which reads as follows:

Printed sections of dictionaries and encyclopedias, unbound, consisting of not less than eight uncut pages, when imported by book binders to be bound in cloth or leather in their own factories.

Under the British preference they are free, most-favoured-nation free, and general tariff free. Then we have tariff item 172 which reads as follows:

Books, pamphlets and charts, printed or published by any government abroad; official financial and business reports and statements issued by companies or associations abroad; books, pamphlets and reports, for the promotion of religion, medicine and surgery, the fine arts, law, science, technical training, and the study of languages, not including dictionaries.

We covered those in the previous item. The item continues:

Scripture and prayer cards, and religious pictures and mottos, not to include frames; books, bound or unbound, which have been actually printed and manufactured more than twelve years; manuscripts; insurance maps; freight rates, passenger rates and timetables issued by transportation companies abroad and relating to transportation outside of Canada in book or in pamphlet form.

Under the British preferential tariff they are free, most-favoured-nation tariff free and general tariff free. Tariff item 172a refers to tourist literature from any country and in each case entry is free of duty.

Item 172b:

Prayer books, missals, psalters, religious pictures and mottoes, not to include frames; free, free, free.

Then item 173:

Books which are included in the curriculum of any university, college or school in Canada for use as text books or as works of reference, not to include dictionaries; printed books, pamphlets and cards for use in schools to test the degree of intelligence of pupils; all books for bona fide libraries, and being the property of the organized authorities of such libraries and not in any case the property of individuals or business concerns, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the minister; directories for free reference libraries; books received from free lending libraries abroad, subject to return under customs supervision, within sixty days: free, free, free.

The Minister of Public Works tells me to send the hon. member a copy of the rest of the schedule. Actually, of course, the great bulk of the books imported into Canada come in free. The one substantial class of books on which there are tariffs are novels from the United States, on which the tariff is 10 per cent. I emphasize again that these books for use in colleges, schools and universities, or books coming to bona fide libraries from any country, come in free. Books in foreign languages come in free. All books from the British commonwealth come in free. So the position, far from being that suggested by the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon, is that the tariff actually affects very few publications as far as the importation of books into Canada is concerned.

Mr. Knight: I am glad the parliamentary assistant has been able to tell me that we have free entry of books into this country. I did not hear what the tariff is on books coming from the United States.

Mr. Sinclair: It is 10 per cent on novels, nothing on books for schools, universities, libraries.

Mr. Knight: When my hon. friend says that books for universities come in free it is a bit misleading, because bona fide university professors do not obtain all their books free. I suppose a great many Canadians get or would like to get books from the United States, but on those books they have to pay a customs duty as well as a sales tax.

Perhaps the greatest point the parliamentary assistant made was that there is no need to raise this question, that books are practically free as far as tariff is concerned. He told us about books from the commonwealth and all the rest of it; he read a long list of things that come in free. The point is that I can base my argument on that very fact. I would say the revenue the Canadian government is getting from the restrictions it is imposing on the importation of books to this country is not worth it. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant could tell me just how much the duty on books is worth to the national revenue of this country. As I interpret his words it would be very little indeed; and if it is very little indeed I would say it has only nuisance value, so why not do away with it altogether? That is exactly the plea I am making, and I think that is one reason why this particular tax should be done away with.

I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant two questions. What is the total revenue accruing to the funds of Canada through the imposition of duties on books? I would have liked to include in that a question as to the amount that would be lost through abolition of the sales tax, but at the moment I suppose I can only ask about the customs duties. My second question is, what are the four countries with which he said we had a special treaty in this regard?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Sinclair: My duties as parliamentary assistant here, I think, are to put through the items appearing in the schedules now before this house. I do not think it is part of my task to read, as I had to read, the existing tariff schedules to an hon. member who wants to make a long speech on books. I would have thought he would read the schedules before making that speech. The same is true in regard to revenue.

Mr. Knight: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I have not asked the parliamentary assistant to read anything. I asked him a question. I asked him the revenue accruing to Canada through the importation of books, and I asked him the names of the four countries with which Canada has a special treaty in this regard. The parliamentary assistant seems to be particularly cantankerous tonight. On my last question he tried to cut me down. He is most unreasonable, as I see it. I want the information. What are we here for if we cannot get information?

Mr. Sinclair: One of the simple reasons we are here is to get information from the many documents the government and the library provide hon. members. There is no item in this schedule dealing with books. The only item having to do with publications at all refers to publications of the United Nations and its agencies and publications of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and its agencies. There is no loss there because we have not been charging tariffs on these items. As far as the revenue on books is concerned, if the hon. member cannot dig it out of the publications supplied to him, all he has to do is put a question on the order paper, as he has done so often, and he will get the full story of the tariff on books and the countries with whom we have these agreements, together with the revenue last year or ten years ago or twenty years ago.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think it is a pity we should have to be scolded. As a matter of fact I listened with great interest to what the parliamentary assistant had to say. I loved the sonorous way he rolled out the word "free", and I think we all received a little education. I think he should be glad of an opportunity to give us that education, and not scold us.

Mr. Sinclair: Nothing was further from my mind than to scold the hon. member for Greenwood, because I will say he does a little research before he comes into the House of Commons on matters he intends to speak on.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was as ignorant as anyone else on this subject. Everything the parliamentary assistant said was interesting to me. I was glad to hear it, and I think we might all be glad that we received this bit of education, thanks to the hon. member for Saskatoon. I am glad personally.

Mr. Sinclair: If my job here is to give interesting information on all items which are not in the schedule now before this house, I could be here a long, long time. I do not think the hon. member for Greenwood would be so grateful for all the irrelevant information I might produce. I think my job here is to discuss the implications of these reductions in tariff which are proposed in this schedule.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think the whole answer is that the parliamentary assistant has not explained the difficulty in which the hon. member for Saskatoon finds himself. It is the old story of the difference between theory and practice. If a university wishes to import these books true enough they come in duty free. If a professor imports them in his own name he pays the tariff, unless he has the foresight to go to his board and ask that they import them in their name on his behalf. There should not be that differentiation. If a book is free to the university it should be free to the professor in the university.

Mr. Sinclair: In my own fairly long experience with universities most professors wanting books have the library acquire them, and in that case they are free.

Mrs. Fairclough: If the professor pays for the book he should get it free of duty.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the communicative mood in which my hon. friend the parliamentary assistant finds himself I will give him a chance to give other information. I shall relate what I have to say to items such as 206a and 220b. There may other items in the group now before us which are also related to the question I have in mind. The question I wish to put to the parliamentary assistant is this. To what extent are there any tariff changes in the group of items now before us affecting drugs and medicines? I said this afternoon when we were on another item that at pages 1396 to 1398 of Hansard for April 9, 1952, would be found answers to questions of mine having to do with sales tax and tariff rates on drugs and medicines. Naturally I am not going to read to the parliamentary assistant now the long list of items on those three pages, but I would call his attention to one item in particular. I take it from page 1397 of Hansard, under item 220, which is perhaps one of the most important items in relation to the question of duties on drugs and medicines.

Item 220 reads:

> All medicinal and pharmaceutical preparations, compounded of more than one substance, including patent and proprietary preparations, tinctures, pills, powders, troches, lozenges, filled capsules, tablets, syrups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences and oils, n.o.p.;

When dry, the British preferential tariff is 17½ per cent; the most-favoured-nation tariff 20 per cent and the general tariff 25 per cent.

There is more to that item 220, but that is all I need to read at this time. I notice that item 220d is referred to in the schedule now before us, but there is no reference to item 220 itself. I should like to know whether consideration has been given to reducing this omnibus tariff on medicinal and pharmaceutical preparations. I do not know whether the parliamentary assistant has taken the trouble to look up the three pages of Hansard to which I referred. He will see that there is a long list there of items which the Minister of National Revenue, in his answer to my question, regarded as referring to drugs and medicines. I have tried to compare that list of items with the items in this group, although I confess that I have not taken every one and checked it. I hope the parliamentary assistant will not accuse me of not doing enough research on the matter, but I did not find many cases, if any, where the tariff has been reduced on so-called drugs and medicines.

Mr. Sinclair: The one covering item in this schedule is 206a(3). You can see the class, so far as the item—

Mr. Knowles: That is the only item in which there has been a change? Is that all the parliamentary assistant has to say?

Mr. Sinclair: I think that if the hon. member reads over the list he will find that most of those are of a class or kind made in Canada. There is always a difference in the schedule of rates for products which are not made in Canada and products which are made in Canada. A year or two ago we had a discussion on the same problem in connection with antibiotics, whether or not it was worth while to encourage, by some tariff protection, the construction of plants to make penicillin, aureomycin and these other antibiotics. In looking over item 220 I would say that almost all of those articles are of a class or kind made in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Is it possible to ascertain tonight, or shall I put it on the order paper, what the revenue is from an item like 220?

Mr. Sinclair: I certainly cannot tell the hon. member that tonight because item 220 is not here. There is a new item 220d for coating fluorescent lamps.

Mr. Knowles: I notice that the official in front of the parliamentary assistant is looking at a book. Can he find it?

Mr. Sinclair: He is an official on tariffs, not of the Department of National Revenue which is the one that records statistics so far as revenue is concerned.

Mr. Knowles: I just want to say, as was pointed out this afternoon, that the cost of drugs and medicines to the Canadian people does seem to be increased far more than I think it should be by the imposition of the sales tax we were talking about this afternoon, and now by far too many duties on this long list of medicinal items. I certainly hope that the government will give further consideration to both of these pleas that we have made today, for the elimination of the sales tax on medicines and for reducing or eliminating tariff thereon.

Has the parliamentary assistant been able to get any information as to the revenue obtained by the federal government on drugs and medicines, in any form that the parliamentary assistant can give it?

Mr. Sinclair: I have here a report on trade in Canada for 1950 in which the classification is not by tariff items, but on these medicinal, chemical and pharmaceutical preparations—this does not include Canadian production which is the greater part of this field—total imports were almost $6 million, $5,892,000, and the tax paid was $1,154,000, which is a little less than 20 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: And the cost of the products produced in Canada would equal the cost of those brought in from the United States, plus the tariff.

Mr. Sinclair: Is that a statement or a question?

Mr. Knowles: It is a statement with which I am sure the parliamentary assistant agrees.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask the minister a question on item 199h, on page 16, concerning pots, boxes, bands, collars or protectors for plants. I have had very strong representations made to me by several of the greenhouse men and market gardeners in my constituency concerning this item. They request the elimination of the tariff, as it is not an item that is made in Canada at all and it is an essential item for the production of plants, flowers and other crops.

Now, I gather that the general tariff rate is 10 per cent, and there has been a substantial reduction which I am sure my constituents will be glad to see. I gather that the greater part of the importations—all of it is imported—comes under the item of the general tariff—

Mr. Sinclair: No, all of it comes in under either most-favoured-nation or British preferential tariff rates.

Mr. Adamson: I am glad to hear that. Then, it is virtually a removal of the tariff on this item.

Mr. Nickle: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question referring especially to item 848(1) and (2) on page 33. I judge that 848(2) is a new item covering materials for use in the manufacture of the goods enumerated in tariff item 848(1). Is that correct?

Mr. Sinclair: It is new, yes, because out in your province there is the beginning of an industry in the manufacture of this oil well drilling equipment. We are now, therefore, extending the exemption which is given to most industries in Canada, that the primary products they use in manufacture shall be exempt or have low rates of duty.

Mr. Nickle: I am glad to have that included. It will have a very material effect on stimulating the production of oilfield equipment in Canada. One point in item 848(1) is not clear. We have there a list of machinery and apparatus, which is free, including casing and tubing and drill pipe for use in connection with natural gas or oil wells. Does this free list cover steel or iron pipe used for gathering oil or gas for transportation or distribution?

Mr. Sinclair: No, it does not. That part is an old item. Actually, the change in the schedule is 848(2), materials for the use in the manufacture of goods enumerated in tariff item 848(1). The manufacturing process gets this special provision but not the transportation end, the movement away from the well in the pipe lines.

Mr. Nickle: Can the parliamentary assistant advise me what the tariff is at present on iron or steel pipe for transmission?

Mr. Sinclair: Item 397, pipes and tubes, of wrought iron or steel, plain or coated, welded or seamless, with plain or processed ends: 15 per cent, the British preferential tariff; 22½ per cent, the most-favoured-nation tariff; and 30 per cent, the general tariff.

Mr. Nickle: In view of the fact that pipe used for transmission and the gathering of oil and gas is a material item in the cost of construction of pipe lines and in view of the fact that transmission is a material item in the cost of the oil or gas to the consumer, will the tariff board or the government consider placing line pipe or pipe for the transmission of oil or gas in the same category as pipe actually used in the boring of a well?

Mr. Sinclair: Consideration was given to that question three or four years ago and I believe there was actually an item placed in the tariff schedule resolution but it was withdrawn in the following bill because of the opposition of quite a number of western members to any increase in the tariff on pipe. However, consideration is given to all of these representations. There is, of course, quite a substantial pipe industry in Canada itself, using Canadian steel out of Hamilton, Algoma and Sydney.

The Chairman: Shall resolution 2 carry?

Mr. Nickle: Just one more question, Mr. Chairman. The parliamentary assistant mentioned the fact that we have mills in Canada rolling iron pipe. I believe the maximum diameter of pipe that can be rolled in Canada is 16 inch, which is smaller than the diameter of pipe used for any large oil or gas pipe line such as those that are now contemplated east and west in Alberta. Inasmuch as pipe larger in diameter than 16 inches cannot be rolled in Canada, should not that larger pipe come into Canada from United States mills free of duty?

Mr. Sinclair: The government's policy at the moment is that it should not. Consideration can be given. The tariff on pipe at the moment is a measure of protection to those mills in eastern Canada. No doubt as the oil and gas industry develops, and there is going to be this greater demand for such pipe, the Canadian mills will, as they have in the past, extend to meet that demand. But at the moment there has been no change made in the tariff on such sized pipe.

The Chairman: Shall this resolution carry?

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions 2 and 3 agreed to.

4. Resolved, that schedule B to the customs tariff be amended by striking thereout tariff items 1014 and 1067, the enumerations of goods and the rates of drawback of customs duties set opposite each of said items.

Mr. Knowles: If resolution 3 has been carried, may I ask a question with respect to 4? Can the parliamentary assistant tell us what is meant by items 1014 and 1067?

Mr. Sinclair: Those are the two drawback items on glass which, as a consequence of the tariff board's report on glass, are now dropped.

Resolution 5 agreed to.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act to correct certain anomalies, to clarify the application of certain provisions and to make certain technical amendments.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I should say just a word. This resolution does not give much in the way of detail because there is no general change in the rates or in the incidence of the taxes. As hon. members know, an overhaul of the succession duty law is needed. We had hoped to be able to bring forward a full revision for the consideration of hon. members at this time but it has not been possible to do this. There are, however, a few amendments of a technical nature which require immediate attention. These amendments are not matters of policy but are merely clarifying certain provisions of the law and removing certain anomalies. It is difficult to discuss them without the bill. They are almost entirely legal points such as those which the hon. member for Hamilton West raised in her speech in the budget debate. The minister will be putting through this bill. The resolution is just in effect a warning to members to the effect that there are going to be technical amendments made to the succession duty act, because of the experience in recent years, without changing the basic rates of duty or the levels.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I was not prepared to speak upon this subject at the moment because I thought we were taking the income tax resolution first. However, in the amendments to the Dominion Succession Duty Act I hope that cognizance will be taken of the incidence of double taxation of which I spoke and of which I gave an example in my remarks on the budget. I believe this is a situation which is well known in the taxation field and one which has long required some revision. If this is one of the points which it is intended to rectify, with the introduction of this resolution, I would be heartily in favour of it. In going into the matter I trust that not only this particular problem will be rectified but also the many others which are familiar to all of us in the field of succession duty and income tax incidence.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I should explain to the hon. member that she was quite right in saying that the list given last night indicated that the income tax resolution would come first. But since this is only a warning if we do get it through tonight it means that perhaps the bills based on the three resolutions can be circulated tomorrow and then we can start afresh on the fourth resolution, namely the income tax resolution. When the succession duties bill is in your hands you will be better able to see whether the points you have in mind are covered. The minister also told me to say that the usual period will intervene between the introduction of the income tax bill and the succession duty bill and discussion in the house. These are very technical bills requiring detailed study, unlike the excise tax and the customs tariff bills which are quite straightforward. There will be an interval of probably a week between the circulation tomorrow of the income tax and succession duty bills and the discussion in the house by the minister on second reading.

Mr. Adamson: I hope that the anomaly with regard to the succession duties between the common law provinces and the province of Quebec will be considered when this bill is being brought down. I refer to the situation which at present exists whereby in the common law provinces, when a taxpayer dies, his estate for succession duty purposes is considered in toto and duties are levied on the entire estate whereas under the civil laws of the province of Quebec, when a taxpayer dies it is considered that half of his estate belongs to his wife and succession duties are levied on merely the half of the estate considered as belonging to him.

It appears to me that that is an anomaly which should be eradicated. I think that the situation under the Quebec law is a good one because it certainly provides for the widow a degree of security which is not found under the laws of the common law provinces. I feel that that is one of the points which might form the basis of discussion in a dominion-provincial conference so that succession duties shall be levied on an equal basis throughout the entire dominion. I understand that unless there is a marriage contract in the province of Quebec the taxation as I have explained it is in force; but if there is a marriage contract, then of course the terms of that contract are valid. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that since we are discussing this very serious matter of succession duties, the double succession duties that are levied, particularly in the province of Ontario, consideration should be given so that succession duties shall be considered on the same basis throughout the entire dominion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has the parliamentary assistant available the basic figures showing what the succession duty has yielded in the way of revenue during the course of the years it has been running? Perhaps I could wait until we have the bill.

Mr. Sinclair: The amount is shown in the budget papers. My recollection is that it was $32 million last year—that is federal succession duty, of course. Pardon me, the forecast of revenue in the coming year is $43 million. The rates of course are not changed. Last year it was $38 million; this year $43 million; and the forecast for next year is also $43 million.

Mr. Nowlan: The parliamentary assistant said that this resolution was a warning. I think it should be a warning against having resolutions such as this. It reads:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act—

If it stopped there it would have been much clearer and much better. It then goes on to say:

—to correct certain anomalies,—

Which I presume is the amendment. Then it continues:

—to clarify the application of certain provisions and to make certain technical amendments.

I think it is a warning against having any resolution such as this, Mr. Chairman. We would be much better off if we did not have any resolution such as this.

Mr. Sinclair: That very point was discussed as to whether a resolution was needed at all. I used the word "warning" perhaps in a colloquial sense; but it was an indication to the house that a tax measure or a money measure was coming. Since this involves changes in the law without a change in the rate or in the incidence of the tax doubt was expressed as to whether a resolution was needed at all. If we had no resolution we might have been subjected to the criticism that we were bringing in a change in a tax bill without a resolution. If we had left it as an amendment to the Dominion Succession Duty Act, then there would be a question in hon. members' minds that perhaps we were going to change the rate. They would have said: if they are not going to change the rate, why do they not say so; this was the decision made, and the resolution is an indication to the house that the succession duty act is to be amended, but not amended in a way to levy new tax changes, changing the rates or changing the incidence.

Mr. Low: It would have been better simply to have said: "Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act but not to change the rates." As it is, it is the height of vague ambiguity.

Resolution agreed to.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue in ways and means with the last budget resolution concerning income tax. If we have time we shall take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of National Defence. It was discussed yesterday and the debate was adjourned by the hon. member for Nanaimo; then the resolution in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning a treaty of peace between Canada and Japan; next, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys concerning the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; then if we have more time we shall take up a little bill of the Minister of Justice to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act, and then Bill No. 93 to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 9, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Third report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO DATES OF SESSIONS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 196 (from the Senate), to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERPRETATION ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO REPORTS TO PARLIAMENT

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 197 (from the Senate), to amend the Interpretation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GASOLINE AND OIL

STRIKES OF REFINERY WORKERS IN UNITED STATES—SUPPLY SITUATION IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. In view of the present situation in the United States, will the Minister of Defence Production make a statement on the gasoline and oil situation in Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): The whole question of Canadian requirements of gasoline and oil is under constant review in the Department of Defence Production. It is not anticipated at the moment that the supply of petroleum products in Canada will be seriously affected by the current strikes of oil refinery workers in the United States, except the supply of aviation gasoline which is already a matter of serious concern.

This situation has resulted in a serious reduction in the production of aviation gasoline in the United States. The petroleum administration for defence, Washington, has issued its order No. 6 which temporarily restricts the use and forces a reduction in the consumption of aviation gasoline within the United States. The order also prohibits export except under certification by PAD.

Because of the policy of close co-operation between Canada and the United States, and as United States companies and associates supply in excess of ninety per cent of all aviation gasoline consumed in Canada, it is deemed necessary that restrictions similar to those in force in the United States be placed upon the consumption of aviation gasoline in Canada in order that reduction in Canadian consumption may be in line with that in the United States. By order in council P.C. 2754 of today's date all grades of aviation gasoline have been declared an essential material under the provisions of the Defence Production Act.

Canadian oil companies have been requested to limit their deliveries of aviation grade gasoline during the 28-day period commencing May 6, 1952, to sixty-five per cent of the amount delivered during the month of April, 1952. Arrangements have been made whereby the petroleum division of the Department of Defence Production will be prepared to take under consideration cases of unreasonable hardships, such as problems that might arise in remote areas.

The departments of national defence and transport have already curtailed their flying operations. The Department of Transport, the air transport board, and the Air Industries and Transport Association of Canada are requesting aircraft operators to eliminate all non-essential flying.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say whether this will affect T.C.A. schedules in any way?

Mr. Howe: Yes. T.C.A. schedules have already been curtailed; I understand that sixteen scheduled services have been eliminated already. T.C.A. is in the same position as the other aviation services, that only sixty-five per cent of the gasoline consumed during the month of April will be allocated during the month of May.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister say what aviation gasoline is made in Canada, and whether any steps could be taken to increase that production without incurring a very large expenditure.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Howe: High octane gasoline is made at Calgary in limited quantities, but about ninety per cent of our 100-octane gasoline is imported from the United States. To supply Canada a very large expenditure would have to be made; and since the trend is toward jet flying—and of course jets use low grade fuel—it is not felt that the very large investment involved is warranted at this time.

Mr. Green: Can the minister say how long it will be possible to maintain even these reduced schedules?

Mr. Howe: I should think we would be able to carry them on indefinitely.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER MEETINGS OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Would the Minister of Agriculture state whether there is any truth in the report that the committee on agriculture, investigating foot-and-mouth disease, is not going to resume its sittings?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): We did spend a number of days in the committee considering the foot-and-mouth epidemic. That consideration required that quite a number of officials remain tied up at the committee meetings. At the moment the department is engaged in most trying activities, which require greater staffs than we have required at any time since the war. It was thought that we were really spending too much time in the committee at this time, and that the good resulting was not sufficient to warrant our being tied up for the next few days, in any case, until we get on with what is considered to be a very important job. While it is not altogether in my hands, I think probably there will be another sitting. I hope, if there is, it will not be necessary to have more than one.

VETERANS LAND ACT

REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO SELL SMALL HOLDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to address to the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question I asked the previous minister some time ago. Has his department given consideration to allowing those under the Veterans Land Act with two-acre holdings on the outskirts of cities to sell all their property except the normal city lots on which their houses stand, so that to some extent they may be relieved of high city taxes?

[Mr. Adamson.]

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The question was considered previously, and it has not been judged appropriate at this stage to acquiesce to this request.

ALBERTA TAR SANDS

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary West): In view of the growing interest in Alberta's bituminous sands—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nickle: —could the minister advise this house of progress—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Nickle: —in research related to these oil sands by scientists working under his direction?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I could not hear the question. I do not know whether it should be placed on the order paper or answered now by the minister.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his question. I have a rather lengthy and technical statement which I think partly answers it. If it is your wish, Mr. Speaker, I can put it on the record.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There were so many interruptions I could not hear the question. I will leave it entirely to the minister to decide whether the question should be answered now or later.

Mr. Prudham: I think perhaps it would be better as a return, so if the hon. member will put the question on the order paper I shall be glad to table the reply.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That for the 1953 and subsequent taxation years there be substituted for the graduated rates of tax and the defence surtax that are at present applicable to the income of individuals, the following graduated rates of tax:

(a) 17 per cent of the amount taxable if the amount taxable does not exceed $1,000,

(b) $170 plus 19 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $1,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $1,000 and does not exceed $2,000,

(c) $360 plus 22 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $2,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $2,000 and does not exceed $4,000,

(d) $800 plus 25 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $4,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $4,000 and does not exceed $6,000,

(e) $1,300 plus 30 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $6,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $8,000,

(f) $1,900 plus 35 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $8,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $8,000 and does not exceed $10,000,

(g) $2,600 plus 40 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $10,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,000,

(h) $3,400 plus 45 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $12,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $12,000 and does not exceed $15,000,

(i) $4,750 plus 50 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $15,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $25,000,

(j) $9,750 plus 55 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $25,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $25,000 and does not exceed $35,000,

(k) $15,250 plus 60 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $35,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $35,000 and does not exceed $50,000,

(l) $24,250 plus 65 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $50,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $75,000,

(m) $40,500 plus 70 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $75,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $75,000 and does not exceed $100,000,
